Fear of death, Sir, in my view is an instinctive reaction, and to conquer or subdue that fear is a feat of which some people are not capable. In wartime fear of death operates thousands of miles from the battlefield, one mile away and on the battlefield itself. No one who has seen death in its many forms can say, and be believed, that fear of death is not a powerful factor in determining any course of action. That is not to say that many criminals are not completely wreckless and fearless, but there must be many others criminally inclined who shrink from risking their lives.

The minister has quoted statistics, and he has quoted the Fauteux report. He has referred to a slight increase in rates. That reference, in my view, is a gross distortion, based, as it is, on inaccurate statistics. The only statistics that can be quoted in a debate of this nature are statistics compiled by the courts referring to convicted murderers. These statistics say nothing about the hundreds of cases that are reduced from charges of murder to manslaughter or to mere assault, and nothing about the cases of attempted murder, and only those that go to trial. So the use of statistics does not prove anything on either side of this argument for or against, or for expansion.

The minister quotes statistics as between Maine and New Brunswick. I could quote just as many statistics on the other side of the fence to show just how useless statistics are. While we are on the question of statistics, and having regard to the exchange between the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the minister, the four cases to which the minister referred in which commutations had been made since the last ban was in effect, all referred to police officers and prison guards.

Then, the minister speaks of giving an opportunity to those concerned in order to make further studies. Of what earthly use could they be? Surely, the main reason for the passage of this legislation five years ago was to determine the deterrent effect the ban would have, or the lack of it, on the basis of the changes that were made. If the power of commutation is exercised on a universal basis throughout the five year period, with that knowledge in the minds of those who have the propensity to commit crimes of violence and murder, what is the point? They know the Cabinet is going to commute any sentence of death they might get.

The minister also said that in Canada only one man has been convicted of murder a second time, but he made no mention of the Head case in British Columbia, and he made no mention of the Cully case, which is a more recent one. My colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North, raised this matter, too, that notwithstanding the fact that the law says parole will not be considered for ten years after conviction, these prisoners still get temporary leave of absence and that is exactly what Cully got. He was in jail for killing a five year old child.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know the hon. member would not want to mislead the House. Mr. Cully escaped from custody when he committed the acts he is accused of committing, he was not on temporary absence.

Mr. Woolliams: Tell us about the Geoffroy case?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that may be a point of discussion, but not a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: I believe that is a point of debate. No one is denying that Mr. Cully escaped, but the fact is he was out, very recently after having been incarcerated for the murder of a five year old child, on temporary absence attending a Christmas party. It was as a result of that which gave rise to the charge of attempted murder of a ten year old boy. I will get into the bail reform provisions and other matters relevant thereto in a moment.

I have suggested already that the fear of death operates within many of those people who are trained to kill, like the thousands of Canadians in World War II and the Korean war. Those people were trained to kill, as I was, and I have regard to my own reaction when I took part in those activities. I know how I feared death and how my comrades in the service in which I served and in other services feared death. There was a genuine fear and there is a genuine fear of death in the mind of every rational person. It is upon that basis that my own convictions are held.

I am going to retain an open mind on the matter, and if this bill does go to the committee I am going to listen to the updated evidence. If what is adduced before that committee alters the beliefs I now hold, that is fine. I am open to the alternatives but at the moment my conviction is that the fear of death is a deterrent. That is a personal conviction I express.

I have spoken about statistics and of the complete unreliability of statistics. Part of the explanation for the lack of a significant deterrent effect of the ban on capital punishment is the fact that the terms of the 1967 bill have not been fully carried out. The Cabinet, which has the prerogative of mercy, has invariably commuted all death sentences to life imprisonment. Not one execution has occurred since December 11, 1962.

This has had two main effects relevant to the extension the minister, on behalf of the government, is asking for at the moment. It has invalidated the experiment it was supposed to be, since a true assessment of the effect of the partial ban cannot be made, and it has contributed to the problems of police officers in carrying out their duties. Oh, how it has contributed to those problems. It has almost completely destroyed the morale of certain segments of law enforcement agencies and police organizations in this country. This is very serious because it makes the task of police officers fraught with even more difficulty.

Not only have all death sentences been commuted to life imprisonment, the parole board has established the practice of granting parole after only ten years of a sentence of life imprisonment. No comprehensive survey of public opinion has been made on this question, but a Gallup poll conducted in the spring of last year found that 63 per cent of Canadians believed violence had increased in their communities over the last five years.

There is an even more significant poll that was published recently by the Weekend magazine. Let me quote from the November 25, 1972 issue where this statement is set forth:

> If a government plebiscite were held now, would Canadians vote to retain or reject capital punishment?
> Nobody knows, of course, but an unofficial Weekend Magazine poll of readers in urban and rural areas from coast to coast has turned up some 30,139 people who think retention is necessary.
> Some 3,383 others think capital punishment should be abolished.
> Another 100 people sent in unmarked ballots, suggesting probably that they were undecided. There is no way of estimating how many readers were undecided, however, since many doubtful ones probably just did not bother sending in ballots.

• (1420)

That is a ratio of ten to one on that poll of almost 32,000 people polled, and that is the feeling in the country.

There was another recent article in the Toronto Star of January 18, 1973, and it winds up with the following comment:

> When parliament debates the question let them not confuse us by suggesting that common sense, ordinary justice, or the Bible are at issue. What is to be settled is whether murderers are guilty and deserve to die, or whether they are unfortunates who need 20 years of conditioning, psychologizing, and further opportunities in our society. On that simple question I have a feeling that ordinary citizens would vote overwhelmingly in favour of traditional justice.
> And let not our Members of Parliament assume that the ideology of an elite group of experts is more important than the free choice of a democracy. That lesson should have been learned in the last election.

The minister mentioned churches. He gives great weight to the number of executives in the church organizations who have come down in favour of abolition. Let me suggest to him that those church organizations do not represent every individual member in the congregation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They do, in fact, represent a minority in terms of the over-all church organizations in this country. In my view, public safety and adequate law enforcement must be assured. The existence or non-existence of a death penalty is of little effect if the population is not properly protected. It is the manner of carrying out whatever law parliament passes that will achieve public safety. This opens up the whole area of government policy which has brought about the rising up of the majority of Canadians in protest against the permissiveness of the policies that have been followed by this government.

Before I get into that field, I want to say a thing or two about the minister's repeated assertions in the House and outside that there is going to be a free vote. The importance of this debate is quite obvious. The decisions taken by the members of this House of Commons will have far-reaching and long standing results. Since this is an issue of such grave importance and since it is a highly emotional matter, we in this party believe that it should be decided by each member according to his conscience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: A free vote is necessary to permit this, and a free expression of opinion, in order to explain the vote of each individual member is necessary to accomplish this. This was the case which the minister tried to put before us in 1966 and 1967. We believe that this is the only sensible way to treat a matter of such seriousness. I was here in 1967 when that other so-called free vote was held, and it was so far from being a free vote on that side of the House as to have been a ridiculous charade. They were regimented, marshalled and told that this was a cabinet bill, a government bill, and they voted for it solidly. The only place where a free vote was exercised was on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the statement the hon. member has just made. I am a member of the Liberal party and in 1966-67 I voted to keep the death penalty, and nobody twisted my arm.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: That is hardly a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and if it were—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —to be deemed such, then every individual member over there would have to rise and make a declaration as did the hon. member who has just spoken, whom I respect and whose statement I accept.

Mr. Comtois: There are many others.

Mr. Nielsen: If those hon. members would only have the courage to stand and make their interjections, I would gladly sit down, but let us not have these squeaks from the back seats.

The fact remains that there must be on that side of the House those who do not favour the abolition of capital punishment. There must be retentionists there, and it would be very interesting to see whether they follow the dictum of their party set down in 1967 and vote en masse for either this bill or this manufactured attempt to get them behind the Fleming-Prud'homme amendment. As to the New Democratic Party, I predict that there is not one of them who will vote against this measure. They will vote as a party for the bill which this cabinet is presenting or for the amendment that is being manufactured at the moment under the blessing of the minister. So I expect that the matter will go to committee.

Having said that, knowing the way the NDP will vote, knowing the way the government members will vote, we can expect the matter to pass because there are abolitionists in this party who will support the measure. So if the bill will be passed, I ask members: why waste time? Why do we not vote on it, send it to committee where we can obtain the updated information? The reason is obvious—delay to avoid embarrassment, delay to hang on to power, delay so that they will not have to face the embarrassing legislation which they must bring in dealing with the more serious and urgent economic ills which assault the country today and which are of their creation.

I want to say a word about the decision that must be made. The abolition or retention of capital punishment is in part a highly personal decision. The effects of this decision must be taken into account. No decision will be relevant unless it can be enforced. Enforcement implies carrying out the law, but both the law and current practices need to be clarified before an intelligent decision can be made about capital punishment. Three areas in particular must be considered. The government must be asked to outline its intentions in the matter of sentencing policy. I regret that the Solicitor General is not listening, but perhaps he will be able to read my comments in Hansard and will deign to advise the House on these matters which I am raising for his benefit. They must declare to the House their sentencing policy, their parole policy, the remission practices and the exercise of mercy by the cabinet.

With respect to the sentencing practices, the major issue here is the definition of the term "life imprisonment". At present, as I have said, an inmate serving life imprisonment is eligible for parole after ten years. But even that imposition of the law is being by-passed by present practices in the Department of the Solicitor General, as I have shown. This practice of the department is objected to by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police who insist that there must be a genuine life imprisonment, who say that only if life imprisonment actually means something can it be effective. The Fattah study states that the certainty of punishment is one of the most important factors associated with deterrence, and so it is.

The Solicitor General, in an interview on January 15, 1973, appeared receptive to the Fleming-Prud'homme proposal to abolish capital punishment and to impose instead a mandatory minimum of 25 years sentence for convicted murderers. I do not go along with that proposed amendment because all it does is place a definite price tag on murder. Someone in his youthful years may well be planning premeditated murder and may say, "Well, I don't have to face the death penalty. All I have to face is 25 years. I am 20 years old now and I will be out when I am 45, so why not." In my personal view that is no solution. Only if life imprisonment means something, and is adhered to, can any such a policy be effective.

Before dealing with parole practices, let me say that I know the Chairman of the Parole Board and have known him for many years. I think that he and those who work with him are very dedicated people. They take their jobs very seriously. They have some very awesome decisions to make. They make them as their consciences dictate, and after the utmost possible consideration given to each case. I am not criticizing the individuals in the parole system, but I am criticizing the system itself. It, after all, is the product of government policy.

The present parole system has been frequently used as a quasi-judicial body and a court of appeal, rather than as a parole board whose main function is determining when inmates are eligible for parole. In respect of temporary absences the Parole Board has no jurisdiction whatsoever. That jurisdiction is exercised by prison officials. Section 6 of the Parole Act states that, "the board has exclusive jurisdiction and absolute discretion to grant, refuse to grant, or revoke parole." The Chairman of the board has defended the system as one that "compares favourably with any in the world." After recent events in Canada, I do not think anyone can have any quarrel with that.

It is my submission that reform of the parole system is necessary to make it fair to both the inmate and the public. The Solicitor General has his values reversed, as did his predecessor, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the whole cabinet, because they are placing more emphasis on the paramountcy of concern for the inmate rather than for society in general. They are so obsessed with the idea of rehabilitation—

Mr. Allmand: That isn't true.

Mr. Nielsen: —and a less harsh treatment of inmates that they have forgotten about the paramount concern which is the protection of society. That is why public safety has taken a back seat in the policies of the government. That is why in recent months in this country we have experienced some of the most tragic events besetting our citizens. I need only mention the Lothian case, the Head case and the Kully case. It is all a result of the permissive direction which the government is taking with respect to parole practices, bail reform and the like.

Capital Punishment

Another suggestion I have to make is that the approval of the Governor in Council should be mandatory before any release for persons sentenced to life imprisonment.

A third area which I suggest needs a positive declaration of the government's intentions concerns the exercise of clemency. I have alluded to this earlier in my remarks. Since 1962 no one has been hanged in Canada. There have been four convictions for the murder of police officers since 1968, and the government has commuted the sentence of all of them. The cabinet has the power of granting mercy or clemency. It is argued that the present practice of invariably commuting every death penalty to life imprisonment is undermining both the legal process and the power of parliament. That is my conviction. What is the point of us wasting time in a debate like this, which merely extends the five year ban on capital punishment except in the case of the murder of a prison officer or a police officer, if we know full well that the cabinet will commute such a sentence anyway? What earthly sanity is connected with that? Whether we pass this legislation or not, we know that the cabinet will continue to commute such sentences.

Mr. Harding: What would you do if the Conservatives were in power?

Mr. Nielsen: Just before lunch I said that the government is playing politics with this measure. Now the hon. member, who has so inanely interjected while remaining seated, is doing the same thing.

This practice of invariable commutation in my view removes any deterrent effect that the death penalty could have. No conclusions can therefore be drawn about the validity of the partial ban experiment in the last five years. Commutation prevents the legal process. The Canadian Police Chiefs argue that by removing any element of deterrence, this discourages them in their work. Just remember the Lothian case. Why on earth should a police officer in a large centre like metropolitan Toronto risk his life by getting out of his patrol car, which incidentally he occupies alone, when he knows he may get shot, stabbed or by other means killed? For what purpose?

Commutation undermines the authority of parliament since it breaks and frustrates the parliamentary process. I do not think any logical argument can be advanced against that. This exercise that we are going through today, and probably on Monday and Tuesday, is an exercise in complete frustration because we know that if the police officers and prison guards are murdered those convicted of crimes will have their sentences commuted in any event.

In my view clemency, the prerogative of the Crown, should only be granted where, in the first instance, mercy has been recommended at the trial stage and, second, in the case of established error in conviction. It is my suggestion that this House has several options, but they are predicated on the Solicitor General declaring certain intentions. I believe that once the government announces its intention regarding sentencing practices, once it announces its intention of defining life imprisonment, once it announces its intention of defining its parole policy and the exercise of clemency, then this House can consider various options.

First we can consider, I hope as open-minded individuals, total abolition of the death penalty, and I refer again to the Fleming-Prud'homme amendment. I cannot overemphasize the fact that, even if that amendment were advanced and accepted, absolute adherence to the sentencing practices would have to prevail. At present we have no knowledge of what the government proposes with respect to those practices.

The second option is to make no change from the 1967 amendment. This means another extension of the ban on the death penalty for a period of five years. Incidentally, the Canadian Association of Criminality and Corrections has suggested a two-year ban to permit further studies.

The third option is the appointment of a royal commission with responsibility for correlating the needed factual information and conducting public hearings. There is a need for further studies and for assessment of public opinion and representations by citizens groups and individuals.

Finally, there is the matter that was dealt with by the minister, a national referendum. A national referendum was suggested by the Canadian Police Association. The minister's brief reply and rejection of that course was, in effect, a paraphrasing of Edmond Burke, to the effect that it is the responsibility of this House to make that decision. However, because of widespread public concern over this matter, because of the growing public opinion that I am sure is being expressed not only throughout the media of the country but also in members' mail that there should be a referendum, that suggestion should receive serious consideration in this House. The California precedent cited by the minister was an extremely weak argument. He dismissed the referendum that was held recently in that state on the basis that, as our constitutional and governmental practices are different inasmuch as a referendum once passed in California immediately becomes law whereas that is not the practice here, a referendum should not be held here. If the written media is an indication and if my mail and that of other members who have spoken to me is, there is rising support for a referendum. It is an alternative that should be considered.

Those are my personal views. Others from my party will participate in this debate. It has been indicated to me that several speakers from the party to my right and from the government side will participate. However, it is my personal view still that this debate is a waste of time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What party is on your right?

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I meant the party to my left, if I may exaggerate to the extent of calling those hon. members on my left a party. Instead of this measure, we ought to be debating much more urgent legislation. However, if it is the intention of government and NDP members to prolong this debate, we will participate in it; we will not abdicate our responsibilities. We will make our contribution. But I hope it will be remembered that the members of my party who will contribute will do so on the basis that they are genuinely expressing a free opinion and, when they vote, they will be casting a genuinely free vote.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first opportunity I have had of rising to speak in this House, I think it is traditional to congratulate you on your election as Speaker, and to congratulate the Deputy Speaker on his election. I also wish to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for looking after the new members of this House. He has looked after us very well in a very fine way and I think I speak for all new members when I say we very much appreciate what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has done and for the very kind assistance that he has rendered to those of us who are shaky newcomers in this awesome place, the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Awful.

Mr. Leggatt: Awful, all right. The thrust of my remarks will be that no news is good news. As this is my maiden speech, this is a painful process—I suppose that is why they call it a maiden speech. I do not know. In any event, to direct my remarks to the point, I agree with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that there is a great deal of public concern over this question. Certainly, my mail has conveyed it, as has the mail of a great many hon. members. There is reason for that concern. I agree that some statistics for the past five years indicate a rising crime rate. Those statistics I will refer to later. But there are, in addition, other reasons for this concern. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this question has been sensationalized in the media to the extent that an unnecessary climate of fear has been generated in the public mind.

It is easier to sell newspapers when you sensationalize murder. I know that there is a great deal of public concern, but a great deal of that is not related to the facts as explained to us today by the minister. Another factor exaggerating that concern is the portrayal of murder on the entertainment media. The way that murders are usually committed on television encourages a climate of fear, a climate of panic. Let us also consider the movies. Why do most of the provinces of this country not restrict in some way or classify gory or violent movies? It seems passing strange to me that children can go on a Saturday or Sunday afternoon and watch, without restriction, movies involving the worst kind of gore and violence. They see things which bring out our worst instincts. I submit that what the news media and entertainment media show has exacerbated this problem.

If I were to assess the public mind correctly, and nobody can, I would not doubt that a great majority of the people favour retention of capital punishment, and the reason for that is clear. People fear for their own safety. Therefore, we must surely direct our attention to whether abolition promotes public safety and the public good. Of course, the reason most often put forward in favour of the death penalty is that the death penalty acts as a deterrent. I will not give many statistics; the minister referred to them in detail. On the surface, the deterrent argument is not logical, because a murderer is not a logical person. He is rarely a person with a rational mind. He commits murder when he is not rational, when he is not logical, when his tendencies are suicidal or psychotic.

Most of the media portray the murder as being planned and carefully executed with great skill by the criminal. This is not the case. Murders are usually committed in fits of passion by people of limited education and, most often, by people from deprived and underprivileged groups. Last but not least, they are often committed by other members of a family.

The United States experience is interesting and the minister referred to it. The murder rate in the U.S. is the highest in the world. In the abolitionist states of the United States the murder rate is 4.65 per 100,000 of population. In the retentionist states it is 7.65 per 100,000 of population. Incidentally, if we are concerned about the safety of police officers and prison guards, as we ought to be, it is interesting to note that those who carry on their profession in the abolitionist states of the U.S. are safer than those who carry out their duties in those states which retain capital punishment.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the police.

Mr. Leggatt: I will come to the police in a moment. If one looks at the world scene and examines the rate for the democratic socialist states of western Europe—and let me say that I am proud to be a member of my party—one will see that they enjoy the lowest murder rates in the world.

Mr. Yewchuk: But the highest suicide rates.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Yewchuk: That is right; look at the statistics.

Mr. Leggatt: The bill before us now places police officers and prison guards in a special category. I welcome the ministers indication that the government is continuing along the road to abolition and that the reason a measure proposing total abolition is not before us is that further information and statistics are awaited. I know I speak for many other members of this party who favour total abolition.

• (1450)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: It is interesting to note that it was the police in Austria who were instrumental, a long time ago, in persuading that country to abolish capital punishment. They did so because the absence of a death penalty reduced the risk attached to bringing in criminals. After all, if a man had committed a murder and had nothing to lose he could be expected to be a much more dangerous culprit for police to tackle. Then again, consider a murderer with a suicide wish. Here, the death penalty might not only fail to work as a deterrent, it might work in reverse.

No one will deny that the occupations of police officers and prison guards are hazardous. But let us be realistic. In terms of death hazard, the rate for construction workers is 7.7 per 10,000; in mining it is 11 per 10,000; in agriculture, 6.5 per 10,000. The rate for police officers is 3.1. Theirs is not the most risky occupation in this country, despite what one might expect from reading the front pages of every newspaper.

Another cogent reason for not enforcing a death penalty is the increased public protection afforded against offenders who might be released after trial because of a jury's hesitation to convict. After all, when a jury is faced with the awesome responsibility of deciding whether life should be taken or not, it errs on the side of freedom for the possible offender. So there is the chance that a guilty man will go free, possibly to prey once more on the public. A considerable body of argument shows that the death penalty fails as a deterrent but that it increases the hazard to the public.

It is, of course, a cliche to say that the death penalty is discriminatory. But it is. It is a penalty most often imposed on the poor, on the homeless and on ethnic and racial minorities. A study of United States statistics indicates that since 1930, 3,859 people have been executed in that country. Mr. Speaker, 53 per cent of those executed were black. Incidentally, I have tried to get government statistics in terms of our native Indian population in Canada, and I am sorry to say the minister does not keep statistics on this basis. I am surprised. I suspect it is because an unduly large proportion of the population of the penal institutions of this country consists of native Indians—that their numbers are quite out of proportion with their share of the total population.

In terms of this debate, I think that what is taking place is a dialogue on death. Most people here already have their minds firmly made up and I do not believe there will be many changes as a result of the wind which will blow across the chamber on the subject. But let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker. How can proponents of the death penalty answer those who say: How is it possible to correct an error? In my view, one mistake is too high when the price is measured in terms of human life.

The issue of the death penalty is a red herring to the extent that it avoids the real concern of the public with its own safety. As I admitted earlier in my remarks, statistics do show that there is a rising crime rate. Over the past five years, murders increased by 53 per cent, the assault rate by 52 per cent, the robbery rate by 83 per cent, the rape rate by 42 per cent and narcotics by an incredible 1,724 per cent. It is also a fact that the age group whose members most often commit crimes increased abnormally by comparison with the rest of the population. But, Mr. Speaker, the streets of this country are still safe, unlike those of our neighbour to the south. And there is a better way of protecting the public than by enforcing a death penalty.

No one has mentioned during this debate the fact that there are six million guns in the hands of the public of this country. Half the murders committed are committed by means of guns, and half of those are by means of rifles. Yet a rifle is something one can buy without restriction in any department store. Persons of unsound mind, persons with serious criminal records, have ready access to weapons. If you want to reduce the risk of harm to the public, stop the distribution of guns throughout this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: Death is only a quarter of an inch away and when the means are at hand, deaths will occur.

I am sympathetic with those who suggest that a review of the parole legislation and its administration are long overdue. I agree with some of the comments made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on this subject. Consideration should also be given to mandatory sentences without access to parole or temporary release. The problem is to identify the psychotic offender who is incapable of rehabilitation. This is the direction we should be taking in order to protect the public adequately. I agree with the hon. member for Yukon that there should be a review of sentencing policy. The important thing is to get at the true causes of crime—social alienation, poverty, slums—spawned by the free enterprise system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Spawned by the welfare system.

Mr. Leggatt: It is every man for himself under the free enterprise system, and if that does not encourage a climate of violence I do not know what does.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: When this bill is referred to the committee, I hope the committee will deal with the issues raised by the hon. member for Yukon and I hope it will deal with the question of guns held in this country. I hope real protection will be afforded to the public. But all the capital punishment legislation in the world will not protect anybody. The hon. member for Yukon says the statistics available can be used by either side. But if they can be used to support one argument or the other, surely he should be supporting those of us who seek abolition. The onus, surely, should lie with those who wish to take life.

As I say, many of us in this quarter favour total abolition rather than the bill before us, but I am not proposing an amendment at this time. I am heartened by what the minister said in his address, that we should move toward total abolition—I think I quote him correctly. This is a position I have no difficulty in supporting.

• (1500)

I should like to end with a quote from Ramsay Clark, former Attorney General of the United States. In dealing with this subject, he said that society pays a heavy price for the penalty of death that it imposes. Our executionists may cry vengeance in the wake of a horrible crime, but reason and experience tell us that killing the criminal will not undo the crime, prevent other crimes or bring justice to the victim, the criminal or society.

Mr. Speaker, executions cheapen life and we must, above all, cherish life. In a humane and compassionate society, which surely we all seek, the death penalty has no place whatsoever and I urge ultimately total abolition.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise for the first time at the beginning of this session to congratulate those who have been appointed to guide the debates of the House.

Bill C-2 is one of the most controversial legislation ever discussed in this House. The years 1966-67 are still alive in my mind. At that time we waged a strong fight against abolition of capital punishment. Since then we have grown older and so has the government. It is said that with age comes wisdom and I hope that this year our debates will have a different tone because, as the government said themselves, this legislation is back in the House after five years of peace but this time under not so lively conditions.

It seems that arrogance is not so prevalent and that members will enjoy more personnal responsibility.

I want to congratulate the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) for saying that this vote will be absolutely free. Therefore, each one of us will be able to vote according to his conscience. Thus our discussions will not be so impassioned and more reasonable. So, before stating my opinion on some clauses of the bill, I will make a few general remarks on the principles behind my final decision on the thorny topic of capital punishment.

Just as a man must safeguard his own life and protect it, so it is his duty to respect the life of others. This is why homicide or murder is prohibited by moral law as well as by civil law which must reflect what is found in natural law.

The civil authority must protect the individuals through legislation and it has the right to pass and enforce the legislation required for the common welfare and to protect the life and assets of the people.

Since it is the duty of civil authority to uphold order in society, consequently it is entitled to impose penalties and seek redress from those who violate order and law. It is the sanction which perfects and completes the law. However, does that power of civil authority include the death penalty?

The political authority has the right to impose the death penalty to murderers.

The civil authority has the right to take all necessary means to serve justice and ensure the security of citizens; capital punishment is necessary to ensure justice and the security of Canadian citizens. So, civil authorities have the right to impose capital punishment.

Punitive or vindicative justice requires that the punishment of a crime be as equal as possible to the crime committed. For certain crimes such as homicide, for example, there is no other punishment than capital punishment to establish this equality between punishment and crime. So, for justice to be served, capital punishment is sometimes necessary.

It is practically impossible to ensure the security of the citizens against the acts of certain individuals without applying the strongest restriction available against criminals. And the strongest restriction available is capital punishment. Life imprisonment, as some suggest as a sanction, is not a strong enough deterrent to stop potential murderers. Indeed, murderers can sometimes escape and thus not serve their punishment. On the other hand, the horrible crime of taking away the life of another individual is not punished adequately by life imprisonment. Capital punishment is a more effective way of preventing it. Death is the deprivation of life, the greatest possession, and capital punishment has to be imposed upon those who take this possession away from others.

It is being said that life imprisonment ensures public security. To that I reply that life imprisonment ensures security in a certain way but is it effective enough? It can be sometimes, but not in all cases.

Another objection is that homicide is forbidden by natural law. Now capital punishment is an homicide, therefore capital punishment should be forbidden.

The word "homicide" should be clearly defined. In fact, natural law does not forbid all homicides. It is against unjust homicide only and it is not true that capital punishment is an unjust homicide.

There is another objection. Some hold that innocent people may sometimes be executed and that a miscarriage of justice can never be repaired.

It is true that capital punishment may be imposed upon an innocent person by error, but the fact that accidents may occur should not be reason to abolish capital punishment, not any more than we should stop manufacturing automobiles or aircraft because they sometimes cause accidents. That miscarriages of justice, which are very scarce, can happen is not reason to depart from a general principle.

On the other hand, I say to the supporters of the absolute right to live that the murderers themselves do not recognize such right in others. That right is not absolute for if it were a soldier killing an enemy in war would be considered as a criminal. That right may be taken from those who do not respect it in other people. As a matter of fact, the murderer taking the life of somebody else cannot claim an absolute right to life to escape the punishment fitting his crime.

Mr. Speaker, those principles having been established, the main objections proved wrong, let us return now to the bill itself.

When we read this bill, we find the following explanatory note:

The purposes of this Bill are, by amendments to the Criminal Code, to provide for

(a) the reinstatement of the law relating to capital punishment that existed prior to December 30th, 1972, for a period terminating on December 31st, 1977, and

(b) the elimination of the use of the terms "capital murder", in relation to murder that is punishable by death, and "non-capital murder", in relation to murder that is punishable by life imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, first of all I am pleased to note that the government, in this bill, approves the principle of capital punishment. However, it changes its mind, it agrees in principle but does not do anything or allows the legislation to be defective.

I have always maintained that the main quality of a national legislation was universality and, as soon as this is taken away, the legislation becomes discriminatory and out of date, like Bill C-2. The bill now before us is selective in that it only protects a very small part of our society. I quote from the bill:

Murder is punishable by death, in respect of any person, where such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of

(a) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or

(b) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties.

We could have added: a prime minister, a minister, a judge and so on, in order to have a legislation of wide scope. Honestly, I do not see any difference between a police officer, a deputy police chief or a prison guard and a prime minister. Nowadays, more prime ministers are killed than prison guards. I do not see any difference, even less from a sentimental point of view, for I suggest that the life of my wife or of my children is just as important as that of all the people I have listed. I say: "just as important"! This is the opinion of most people. Then, why is such a restrictive legislation introduced in the House, after accepting the principle of capital punishment. The principle is accepted and it is intended to apply it to a small specific group. This is wrong.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I do not support all the provisions of this bill. I suggest that this measure should have the most essential quality of any legislation, namely, universality. Only then will it be possible to talk about justice.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want a selective justice, either for myself or for anyone else. I want the same justice for all, throughout this country. This is the kind of legislation we want.

It is claimed that something is changed, where I suggest there is only a change in wording from the phrase "capital murder" to "murder that is punishable by death". Mr. Speaker I do not see much difference.

I have often said that we are in favour of the death penalty in the case of capital murder. That is why we are supporting the same cause today.

Some of my colleagues will speak on the famous parole system. Several members had the opportunity of hearing the opinion of experts, great Canadian jurists who were definitely against parole. I believe that this bill is only the continuation of a former bill that was already submitted and against which we voted. We hope that a free vote will be held and that the members, aware of their responsibilities and of the protection that they owe the public, will vote as sincerely as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a few quotations for the benefit of the various parties in the House. If I may, I will read remarks made by a former member, a jurist named Rémi Paul who wrote the following in 1964:

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IS NECESSARY IN ORDER TO PROTECT SOCIETY.

The commutation of Georges Marcotte's sentence, the announcement of a debate on capital punishment and of a free vote on this matter have brought once more the subject to the fore in parliamentary circles.

We asked a member who is a lawyer, who previously objected to the abolition of hanging and who recently pleaded in the House in favour of Marcotte, to express his current opinion on this problem.

The reference is to Mr. Rémi Paul, a former Progressive Conservative Member of Parliament. I shall read one or two excerpts to call the attention of Progressive Conservative members to the opinions of their former colleague,

I continue quoting:

Mr. Rémi Paul, Progressive Conservative member for Berthier-Maskinongé-De Lanaudière is still in favour of the death penalty. The reason for his intervention in favour of Marcotte was the special treatment given by judicial authorities to Jean-Paul Fournel, who informed on the alleged Santa Claus murderer.

Everyone, remembers the celebrated trial of the alleged Santa Claus murderer.

I shall now quote from an article in the March 7, 1966 issue of the Journal de Montréal;

YOUNG CONSERVATIVES IN FAVOUR OF MAINTAINING DEATH PENALTY

Over two thirds of the young Conservatives who met in Ottawa for a conference have just declared themselves in favour of maintaining the death penalty in Canada.

Some Progressive Conservatives may vote for keeping capital punishment and maybe some will object to it, but I just want to give these two examples to the Progressive Conservatives to say that not only senior citizens, but even the young also want retention of capital punishment.

As for the New Democrats, it is always pleasant to hear them for they express such contradictory views. For as long as I have known them, they have been for the protection of murderers just as they are for abortion on request and all other human depravities. As soon as there is a murderer to defend, they are there to do so. But they agree wholeheartedly with this slaughter of innocents—abortion on request—and this after having fought for murderers. How pitiful! Look at Paul Rose who is in jail. He complains that he is not well fed because he does not get dessert three times a day. But what did he do to Mr. Laporte? That is what we often forget. We shed tears over the plight of those poor murderers, but we allow to be killed thousands of innocents, helpless children who want to be born. This is why I call them innocents. And the New Democratic Party advocates abortion on demand. As late as last year, I heard some of those members plead for the protection of animals and ask that legislation be passed to that effect. But the protection of human beings, is that of secondary importance?

Why are we here? Above all, to establish justice, inasmuch as it is possible and to protect society. One must not consider, Mr. Speaker, the punishment in the light of the murderer himself, but from the point of view of the community as a whole which demands the most complete protection against those individuals. If punishment is to be proportionate to the offence, it must be above all a deterrent in order to protect society. Laws are made above all for the individual and society, not for the criminals.

So I soon realized that that was the reason why thousands of people took the time to answer the survey I made in my riding, because when I speak here, I speak on behalf of 90 per cent of my constituents who are in favour of capital punishment. Indeed, as I said, out of 2,000 answers I received, 90 per cent were in favour of retaining capital punishment. And this result can be explained by the many murders of all kinds committed in our country in recent years, for instance those vicious murders by Dion and others, and this same Dion after being released killed four innocents, four young children, and finally, as the State did not impose justice, a fellow inmate did for him a service that society was refusing him.

Taking into account murder, arson, fraudulent bankruptcies, healthy people are terrified by the fact that all death sentences are being commuted to life imprisonment. Resurgence of murder and organized crime should prompt the government to reinstate capital punishment without deliberation. Often we hear the common saying: Vox populi, vox Dei, or else that in true democracy the opinion of the majority should be law.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I should find it difficult to decide against the will of 90 per cent of the Roberval constituents. Therefore, I shall continue to support those who favour retention of capital punishment. And as a last argument, I should like to quote from an editorial that was broadcast by CJMS on November 21, 1972.

The death penalty imposed on Réal Chartrand for the capital murder of officer Labelle forces us again to question the usefulness of capital punishment.

People know that it is through a decision of the House of Commons that the death penalty has been retained for a few years now in our Criminal Code, and this exclusively in the case of deliberate murder of a police officer or a prison guard, and also that after 1962 there has indeed been no hanging in Canada.

Again in the forthcoming months the members of the House of Commons will have to study this question. First of all, even for those in favour of capital punishment, such a sentence is totally inadequate.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it is inadequate because selective. And now I resume the quotation:

In fact, there is absolutely no difference between the well-planned murder of a police officer and that of a bank manager . . .

—or of any other person in Canada, for that matter.

Again I resume my quotation:

. . . In our case, we must carry the debate further.

Is the death penalty really useful as a deterrent against crime? It would seem, from the comparative scientific studies carried out where it exists and where it does not, that it serves no such purpose. Therefore we sincerely feel that the despicable individuals who have lost all respect for human beings should be given life terms, and that hanging or killing them would bring nothing more to society.

Mr. Speaker, I have a few minutes left, I believe, and should like to quote from a speech Mr. Wagner delivered in 1965—when he was Minister of Justice in Quebec—inviting people to write to the federal government and tell them that the death penalty should not be abolished. When he gave this speech Mr. Wagner surely never expected that one day he would be elected to the House of Commons and would become the leading progressive conservative member in the province of Quebec,if not the only one. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is a man I respect, and a great jurist. This is what he said:

The Minister of Justice, Claude Wagner . . .

An hon. Member: There are other opinions.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Someone has said that there are other opinions. I agree, but you cannot rob anyone of his opinions. This is my opinion and I have the right to express it.

An hon. Member: Indeed you have!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): On December 30, 1965, l'Action of Quebec City printed the following, and I quote:

The Minister of Justice, Mr. Claude Wagner, who recently said that he would suggest to the federal government to hold a national referendum to abolish capital punishment, was not surprised to learn that Mr. Pearson did not favour such a referendum. He says that Mr. Pearson is entitled to his views and opinions.

But, the minister added, if the government does not want to go to the people, the people will go to the government.—

I don't know if he expected that during the last election campaign, but this year the people went to the government. The people have elected a government for themselves. And I continue to quote from that newspaper:

And the minister is inviting everyone to write to the federal government to say that in the present circumstances, it would not be advisable to abolish capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I see that I have taken just about all my time and that I cannot read from that letter any longer. However, I would like to quote the following statement from the Civil Service Association of Canada.

As a Member of Parliament, you will be requested, during this Parliament, to take a stand on the matter of abolishing the death penalty in Canada. Due to its very nature, the Civil Service Association would not usually interfere in such a controversial issue involving public policy. We would think that our members would rather express their own opinion on this matter as the government seemingly intends to do so in Parliament, leaving to everyone the opportunity to make up one's own mind.

It so happens however that, in this particular case, our Association has a major interest to uphold concerning a particular aspect of the problem.

The association is opposed to the principle of selective law which would protect police agents only and not all its members and I wholeheartedly support them just as I hope that, by the end of this debate, a truly national and universal law will be adopted. It is then only that we will begin having justice for all.

[English]

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have risen to speak in this House and I should like to congratulate you and your confreres upon the election to your posts. You, Sir, go about your duties in such a way that you have my unbounded admiration. I do not want to revert to the Speech from the Throne but I must mention my two fellow freshmen who moved and seconded the address in reply. I think they added a great deal of distinction to the first days of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: During the last few months we have all received many letters from our constituents, many of whom favour the retention of capital punishment for the killing of prison guards and policemen. In essence, this is the program the government supported five years ago and which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is asking us to support now. I believe we all realize that half a loaf is better than none. A few people have written me saying that capital punishment, right across board for all degrees of murder, should be instituted. On the other hand, many people are asking for complete abolition of the death penalty. So it is extremely difficult to attempt to assess a true picture of the wishes of the electorate.

Many kinds of polls have been taken, but these cannot give the complete public viewpoint. Aside from that, they are almost always untrustworthy. It is unrealistic to attempt to hold a referendum on the subject. Just think of the recent national referendum in England, which later entered the common market and ignored the results of the referendum which did not favour that move. This took courage—but it took a majority government, Mr. Speaker.

For all these reasons, though where possible we should try to respond to the wishes of the electorate, we as responsible Members of Parliament must vote according to our consciences on the question of capital punishment. We must stand up for our personal principles, no matter how they may be received by the electorate. Fortunately, we will have a free vote in the House on this question, and I do not think Members of Parliament should vote in any way except for that in which they believe. It is hardly possible to be a good Member of Parliament and act only according to the expressed wishes of the electorate alone, because sometimes the great mass of our people are not reached by educative media. So frequently if we follow opinion blindly, we are bowing to the will of the vocal few.

Unfortunately, there has been a great lack of public education on the subject of capital punishment. However, we as members have had access to a lot of information from parliamentary sources, the press and research bureaux as well as from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). Thus, we have been able to do a great deal of reading and I think by now must have developed our attitudes fairly definitely. In my view no one should take part in this vote unless he has undertaken considerable study, had acquainted himself with the different facets of the problem and, finally, has struggled with his conscience.

It is unfortunate that the public of Canada has not in turn been able to read more impartial literature. A great many pamphlets and material from organizations, broadcasts and the press tend to strike emotional attitudes. These, in turn, really have the effect of clouding the real facts. If we look at the evidence impartially, most of us will agree that the state has the right to put to death anyone who has committed a crime against the state. The person who is trying to overthrow the state by violent means is a traitor. Indeed, when the War Measures Act was invoked, if things had come to the worst and there had been a real revolution, I think the state would have properly discharged its duty by putting people to death for committing treason. It would have been for the courts to decide at that time what treason really meant and to stand by the decision.

In considering the present question, as we are a civilized country all available evidence pertaining to murder should be pondered deeply. The subject has been studied from the standpoint of the value of capital punishment as a deterrent to the potential murderer. There are other considerations as well. For instance, is the death penalty required for its deterrent effect? Does not killing a culprit give a poor image as to the value of a human life and the dignity of the human being? Has life imprisonment, without an attempt at rehabilitation and parole, any place in modern society? Finally, is it true that there is only a small percentage of recidivism in respect of murderers?

Also, is it true that anyone who murders should be considered in a narrow sense to be insane? In my opinion, we can prove that all murderers have a unique personality defect. These varying areas of the subject under discussion have been covered in the literature which is available and I think there is no need to dwell on the minor points but only on the question of a unique personality defect.

As to the prevention of murder, we can accept the fact as proven beyond doubt that capital punishment of itself has no deterrent effect: this should be emphasized. This point can be discussed further from the standpoint that the murderer, whether he has committed an atrocious, ghastly, premeditated murder, whether he has killed with cold-blooded reasoning or whether he has killed in an agitated and emotional state, is so obsessed with the accomplishment of the end he desires that he will kill at any cost, even at the risk of losing his life. He does not think that the penalty is likely to apply to him or, if he does think so, he considers this only a faint possibility.

I would like to put some new evidence before this House. Dr. Robert McKie, within the last two years, wrote a thesis for his PhD at Michigan State University. He and other psychologists were studying at Jackson state prison which contains one of the largest number of murderers in the world. The subjects of the study were 20 murderers and 20 other prisoners who were serving long sentences. The findings showed conclusively that the murderer is a strange individual who has a definite personality defect. It is the opinion of this study that we have many potential murderers in the population, and the group is larger than one would think.

The unique inheritance and early development of these people is such that when confronted by a certain set of circumstances, whether the act is sudden or planned in detail the action usually takes a violent course. In an emotional, sudden murder the criminal does it unthinkingly because it is the only way in which he can find a solution to the dilemma in which he finds himself. In addition, in a premeditated murder the criminal possesses such a decided personality defect that the taking of a life means nothing in the accomplishment of his goal. At the same time, in the case of sex slayings, whether of a grown woman or a child, the murderer views the sexual partner with immediate revulsion and his solution to that emotion is to kill. Although sometimes we say that hanging is too good for him, we still must be influenced by the fact that capital punishment has no deterrent effect on his actions. That is my first argument. My second will not take long.

Murderers, we know, can be model types of prisoners, as good as any Sunday school boy. Apparently they often exhibit shame and they can be guilt ridden. Frequently they will carry out religious and moral rituals or atonements. However, this apparent reformation should not be taken at face value. For the very reason that a murderer is this type of person it must be stated that when he is released on parole or is enabled to rejoin society, even on a short pass, or whenever a set of circumstances, even in prison, presents itself which remotely resembles the original crime, because he wants his freedom his reaction to the set of circumstances will be the same as it was originally.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my feeling that we must make two decisions. Firstly, we must abolish capital punishment as a modern approach to punishment for murder and also as a deterrent to potential murderers. Secondly, we must imprison these people for life—and I mean life. We must as a society recognize that murderers are not capable of responding to any attempt at rehabilitation. So, Mr. Speaker, on this one important point it is my opinion that murderers need to be treated with humanity but they must be locked up for ever.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in the short time remaining I wish to put on record a few comments with regard to the question of capital punishment and what I think about this bill. In 1966 there was a free vote in the House. The House voted 143 to 112 to retain capital punishment. The government, in assessing the situation and wanting to push through an abolition bill, agreed to a compromise. It eventually compromised with its own retentionists who wanted capital punishment for the murderers of prison guards and policemen. The government agreed to compromise and induced the retentionists to allow passage of a bill for a five-year trial ban of the death penalty. That bill passed by a vote of 105 to 70.

Was the five-year trial period long enough? That is the question concerning us in this debate. The minister in his speech said it was not a question of the period being long enough; he is for the abolition of capital punishment. Thinking that the House would not pass an absolute abolition bill, he is putting forward this lame-duck bill that will extend the five-year trial period. He wanted complete abolition.

Anybody who votes for this bill is voting for abolition. The government said it would accept the obligation entailed in its compromise of 1967. It was obligated to permit the execution of criminals in cases where prison guards or policemen had been insolvent. The government did not live up to its end of the bargain. Do hon. members think it will live up to it in the next five years? I suggest it will not, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) are abolitionists. In facts, practically all the front bench except the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) are abolitionists. In 1966 the Minister of Finance voted for the retention of capital punishment, but in 1967 he was one of those who was sucked into the compromise. Will he hold the government to its bargain? I doubt it. He will endorse this additional five-year trial proposal because he is a senior member of the cabinet, and the cabinet will accept this legislation. Here and there, maybe, there will be the odd member who will be allowed to show his independence by voting against the bill, but basically this is not a free vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Virtually all the cabinet will vote in favour of this bill. Virtually all the backbenchers over there will support it. The only parties which will allow a free vote are the Conservative party and the Creditistes, perhaps.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): It is not a free vote and it was never intended to be one. The situation with regard to the rate of increase in premeditated murders is that in the last five years there has been an increase of 39 per cent—greater than the increase in population during that period. The most effective means of dealing with these circumstances is the legislation which was passed in 1961 setting out areas in which capital punishment or non-capital punishment were applicable. That was a good piece of legislation if the government had only carried it out.

Some members have argued that the death penalty is not a deterrent, but, Mr. Speaker, no punishment is a deterrent unless it is used. Capital punishment has not been applied for the last 12 or 15 years in Canada and it has therefore simply lost all its deterrent value. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) can say that capital punishment will be imposed in cases involving the murder of prison guards and policemen, but everyone in Canada knows he and his cabinet colleagues will not do that. So no deterrent at all is involved.

After all, if a hydro company threatens to cut off power to a customer who does not pay his bill, but fails to do so even though the bill remains unpaid, it is not likely it will ever be paid. On the other hand, if power is cut off as a matter of policy in all such cases, the effectiveness of the deterrent is apparent. Many deterrents are used in our system of law and order. The breathalyzer test is a good example. If it were not used, no one would pay any attention to us. But since everyone knows it is used, it has tremendous deterrent value.

I am not one who necessarily believes that hanging is the method of execution which ought to be used. But the threat to take a man's life certainly has a deterrent value if people are convinced there is an intention to carry it out. How can the government convince anyone that the law will be carried out when they are all abolitionists?

Many socialist members on either side of the House believe we must rehabilitate criminals in our penitentiaries and jails, yet there is talk of the Solicitor General bringing in an amendment which would impose 25-year, life imprisonment in place of capital punishment. Well, 25 years would probably amount to life for a lot of people because when you reach 50 you have only another 25 years to go.

Mr. Allmand: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know the hon. member would not wish to mislead the House, but I made no suggestion that I would introduce an amendment to provide for a minimum 25-year period of detention.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): It was stated in the newspapers that the minister would look favourably upon such an amendment. If he denies it, his reaction will be noted in the days and weeks ahead when this issue is debated. He will have plenty of opportunity to vote against such an amendment, one which I am told a couple of his henchmen intend to move. A long term of imprisonment is not a solution. To my mind, to lock a man away in a cell for 25 years, with no chance of rehabilitation, is far more cruel than capital punishment.

The whole country is concerned with this issue. Many people are concerned about their safety on the streets of our cities. They are worried lest this country go the same way, in some respects, as our neighbour to the south. Will women and children feel free to walk the streets after the sun goes down? The idea that if there were not public access to guns there would be no more murders, or far fewer murders, is false; a person intending to commit a crime will obtain a gun anyway. The Santa Claus murderer, for example, used a machine gun. It is illegal to buy machine guns; nevertheless he had one and he used it.

Consider the case of the policeman killed recently in Toronto. When the police found out where the young fellows were hiding, they went in with 75 well-armed men, all of them sharpshooters. The criminals knew they had no chance of getting out so they took their own lives. Unless this parliament takes firm action to bring about a balance in the situation, people will begin to use guns in order to protect themselves and we shall slip back into a lawless society rather than strengthen one which tends toward the preservation of law and order.

It is a most difficult thing for men to police one another. It is difficult to arrest one's brother, to put a person in jail, to administer capital punishment. But someone has to do these things, and the responsibility rests upon the government. They have failed to live up to it in the last five years and I do not believe they will do so in the next five years. Therefore I urge the House to vote against this bill.

May I call it four o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It being 4 p.m., the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motion and private bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the acting House leader or someone in authority on the other side if he will confirm whether on Monday we shall be pursuing debate on this particular bill.

Mr. Lang: That is the present intention, Mr. Speaker.

Abolition of Senate

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

ABOLITION OF THE SENATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (abolition of the Senate), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a week ago last night there was a vote in this House of 128 to 102 in favour of excluding the members of the other place from an important committee. The purpose of this bill is to finish the job so far as the Senate is concerned, and I am encouraged by that vote of a week ago last night to believe that if this bill could come to a vote today there would be enough consistency around here to carry it.

• (1600)

As the House is aware, this is not the first time that I have proposed the abolition of the Senate. I suppose I have to say that I have lost count of the number of times I have tried to do it in various ways. However, since this is a day when we seem to be talking abolition from morning until night, perhaps my proposal will be more effective. I said to one of my colleagues a while ago that perhaps I should take a cue from the bill we have been discussing thus far this day and tell the House that if hon. members are not prepared to go for a total abolition of the Senate, maybe they would go for a five-year abolition. At the end of five years I am sure we would not bring the Senate back.

An hon. Member: What would we do with the old boys?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The five years will take care of most of them. Perhaps I could dispose quickly of one or two minor arguments in favour of my bill. It does cost over $6 million a year to maintain and operate the Senate. While that is not a large sum of money as federal expenditures go, I can think of a good many more useful ways to spend $6 million a year. Another argument that I am sure will appeal to many members of this House is that if we were to abolish the Senate we could make very good use of their office space in this centre block.

The main and most serious reason for my proposing that the other place be abolished is my belief, and that of my colleagues, in the principle of democracy. We believe that the laws of the land should be enacted by persons who are chosen by the people of this country, by persons who are responsible to the people. That is the case with the members of the House of Commons. We can make mistakes, but when the next election comes along, if the people back home do not like the mistakes we have made they can get rid of us. In the Senate we have a body of men and women, fine and able persons though they may be, who are not chosen by the people of this country and who, once they are in their places as Senators, are literally responsible to no one. They are not even responsible to the prime minister who recommended their appointment to that other place.

It may be that 106 years ago when the constitution of this country was drawn, it was the accepted belief that democracy had not sufficiently matured to be trusted completely. It was the accepted belief that there was a place for a body of elder statesmen, a body of individuals divorced from politics to give sober second thought to, and to check on, what was done by the elected representatives. I think that is no longer true; I believe democracy has reached the point where we should believe in it and trust it. I believe that there is no place in the Parliament of Canada for a group of persons with the power which Senators have, considering the fact that they are not elected by, nor are they responsible to the people of Canada. Therefore, I express very strongly the view that we should do away with the other place.

I referred in passing to the powers of the members of the other house. Their powers are very great. The fact that they do not exercise them does not detract from the fact that they have those powers. They have a veto over what we can pass in this House. That is not just a veto for one session, two sessions or three sessions; they could go on for a thousand years, if they lasted that long, vetoing any legislation that this House might pass. I think that in principle, in theory, this is wrong and that very serious consideration should be given by the members of this House to my proposal that the Senate be abolished.

Let me come back to the allusion that I made a moment ago to sober second thought. I think that is a cliché that does not have any real meaning. There are many second thoughts given in this House of Commons. When legislation goes through from first to second reading, then to committee and to report stage and then to third reading, a great deal of thought is given to it. In fact, that is one of the reasons our rules are structured in the way they are, so that we can give proper thought to the legislation we are considering, keeping in mind the reactions and the views that we get from our constituents while the legislation is going through. If there is to be a rethinking of legislation, the place for that rethinking is here. It should be done by members responsible to the people of Canada, not by a group in another place who are responsible to no one.

It is argued sometimes that the reason for the Senate is to protect the minorities in this country. Because it has been said that that is the reason for the Senate, some people seem to labour under the illusion that minorities are protected, that minority rights are secured because there is a Senate the composition of which is different in number from that of the House of Commons. I submit members will have a hard job to find in our history many cases, if any, where minority rights were protected by Their Honours in the other place. We protect those rights in this House by our representation, based on our responsibility to our constituents. The other place where minority rights are protected is in the courts of the land. So I see no reason for having a Senate on the basis of that argument.

The fact that Quebec and Ontario do not have the overpowering number of members in the Senate that they have in the House of Commons—in other words, that representation is on a fixed basis rather than on a representation by population basis—is nice window-dressing but it does not really give protection. Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Saskatchewan are no better protected by the Senate of Canada because the number of Senators is, proportionately, not as low as is the number of Members of Parliament. Therefore, I suggest that that argument, which has been bandied about for 100 years, really has no merit.

Another argument that is sometimes used in defence of the Senate is that they do great work in committees. That is an argument that is made in this place too. In fact, it used to be said, when members were less active on the floor of the House of Commons than is the case today, that the member who did not say much on the floor of the House was a great man in committees. I have in mind, of course, the days before we had the sound amplification system, when that was true. I recall that fewer members did take part in debates on the floor then, compared with the case today. I think it is a happy development that many more members are now taking part. But the argument that Senators do great work in committees is, I suggest, hardly an excuse for maintaining, at a cost of over $6 million a year, 102 potential committee members. If we want a special job done, whether regarding poverty, land use or what have you, there are plenty of people in academic, business, labour or farm circles who can be engaged to do that particular piece of work.

In fact, the vote I referred to that took place in this House a week ago last night has dealt a serious blow to the argument about the value of the other place for committee work, because we decided in this House, by a majority vote, that we did not want them on the important food prices committee which has been established. So I submit that maintaining, at over $6 million a year, a group of potential committee members—and very few of them actually take on the work of committees; just a handful—is an argument that does not carry any weight.

It is sometimes said that those of us who want to abolish the Senate go too far: why do we not advocate its reform? Some will say in reply to my argument that what is wrong with the Senate is that its members are not elected, therefore are not responsible to the people and that the answer to the problem is to provide for the election of members of the Senate. I think that would be a ridiculous course for us to take. We already have enough struggles, conflict and confrontation in the governing of this land. We have the conflict between the executive arm of government and the House of Commons. We have the issues that obtain between the federal government and the provincial governments. If we had an elected Senate which had the legal and moral authority to stand on its own feet, as it does not now do, we would just have another incidence of confrontation which would slow down the decision-making process and the governing of this country.

Just as some countries have got rid of their upper chambers, and just as we have done it in this country in our provinces, I think we should do it in respect of our upper house. There was a time when we had an upper chamber in Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Quebec, but the day came when those provinces—if not the others—realized that there was no real value to their chambers. By the same token, I think the day will come when we will realize that, so far as our upper house or other place is concerned there is no real value.

Some hon. members, if they read Bill C-10 carefully, will see that it is designed to abolish the Senate, but they may also see a number of things in it that puzzle them. May I point out that the only purpose of Bill C-10 is to abolish the Senate by cutting out the provision for it in the British North America Act. Obviously, if one cuts out of the British North America Act any reference to the Senate, one has to amend quite a few other sections in a consequential way so that the provisions of the fact that we based on the fact of the Senate have some other base. It means, for example, that it is necessary to re-enact clauses about the use of the French and English languages, leaving out references to the Senate.

I hope hon. members will not feel that because those clauses are being re-enacted in their present form, that is taking any decision in respect of the language question or any of the other questions. Indeed, in drafting my bill to abolish the Senate I knew that if I had tried to solve some other problems as well, I would have had trouble getting my bill passed in one hour this afternoon. The point I wish to make is that much of the language in Bill C-10 is consequential; it is simply a question of necessarily changing other sections of the British North America Act in order for the Senate itself to be abolished.

Some hon. members may say, "Supposing we do pass this bill in this House this afternoon; does it not have to be passed by the Senate, and is there not some slight doubt that their Honours would do that?"

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I quite agree, despite the confidence of my seconder, that at first blush the Senate would not like it. I believe that if the representatives of the people elected to this House took the decision that the Senate ought to be abolished, after an election or two with the members in this House taking that stand the members of the other place would realize that is what the people of this country wanted. If we cannot do it any other way, we could let the efflux of time take care of them. There would be persons appointed to the other place who would know the will of this House and the will of the country and would act accordingly. Certainly there are problems. But we have the right to do it, and if in this country there is the opinion that we ought really to be a democracy, governed by persons who are responsible to the electorate, we can solve the technical and constitutional problems.

Therefore, I present this bill once again, hoping that the members of the House will give it the consideration it deserves. By five o'clock, if we have not passed the motion for second reading so that the bill can go to the committee for study, at least we will be a little farther down the road of trying to make this parliament one that is truly democratic, one that will have in it only those persons who are elected by and responsible to the people of Canada.

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, may I pay my respects to you on the occasion of my first speech in the House.

Abolition of Senate

[English]

Rightly or wrongly, Mr. Speaker, the Senate of Canada seems to have the worst reputation of any legislative body in the world.

[Translation]

In 1942, Senator Grattan O'Leary, then a reporter, wrote and I quote:

A Senate appointment is not employment and the Senate is not a place where they are supposed to work.

And he was appointed senator in 1962!

When Jean-Luc Pepin was an hon. member as well as a cabinet minister, he called the Senate a political house of refuge, a house for the dead, the most exclusive pensioner's club in the world and a tourist attraction. In short, he saw it as being the only flaw in the British North America Act of 1867.

What must we think of these views, Mr. Speaker?

[English]

That is especially so now that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has presented a bill to abolish the Senate. Is the Senate such an outdated institution that it should be abolished, or should it be reformed?

[Translation]

Why should we abolish a chamber which Sir John A. Macdonald called:

[English]

"The sober second thought in legislation".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in a federative country like ours, the Upper House has a very important part to play. For instance, in the United States, each of the fifty states, whatever their size and population, is represented by two members in the Senate.

In Australia, each of the six states sends to the Senate ten senators.

[English]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there are very few countries in the world without an upper house. They may vary in composition, but the reasons for their existence are always the same. The authors of the constitutions of England, France, Germany, the United States, Italy, and even Spain have considered it wise to provide their countries with the safeguard of an upper house.

• (1620)

However, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, why our Senate should be abolished? Why not reform it? The Senate is an Upper House similar to the House of Lords in England but, contrary to widespread popular opinion, it does not have such restricted powers as the British House. Our Senate is not a representative house, that is true, and its members are not elected directly by the people, that is also true, but it is a House of the people as much as the House of Commons. Its members do not come from any particular class or caste. They come from all walks of life.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is a basic difference between the two legislative assemblies of Canada. The House of Commons is and should be a deliberating assembly. It is a place where holders of opposite opinions meet, come to grips and decide on the fate of legislation before them. The Senate, on the other hand, the upper House, is and should be a workshop and not a theatre. Its function is to review legislation brought forward by the House, a task which should be carried out perfectly and boldly.

What are now the powers of the Senate? The Senate of Canada has all the powers vested in the House of Commons, except that no bill can be initiated there which involves a tax or a disbursement. The Senate can review legislation brought forward by the House of Commons, bring thereto such amendments as it deems necessary or useful, accept or refuse to pass the legislation and debate—this is essential—at any time, freely and in detail, matters related to the government's official policy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, if bills are inadequately prepared and insufficiently thought out, it is the duty of the upper house to delay their adoption.

The Fathers of Confederation wanted it to be the duty of the Upper House to give willingly sympathetic opinions to the government, and to postpone, modify or even reject government measures according to its own judgment, and without political prejudice.

A second Chamber that would merely rubber stamp the decrees of the Lower House would have no value. The Senate must be independent and be able to act freely. It is, so to speak, the regulator who can prevent hurried or ill-conceived legislation from being passed.

[English]

In fact, Sir John A. Macdonald was of the opinion that an upper house would be of no use if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing, of amending, of postponing the legislation of the lower house.

Of course, there are times when the two Houses oppose each other; they have obviously done so repeatedly in the past. That is doubtless why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wants it abolished. For instance, during the 1961 session, when the progressive conservative government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in power, there was a test of strength between the two Houses. The Senate rejected Bill C-114 which declared vacant the post of governor of the Bank of Canada and removed Mr. James E. Coyne from office. Was it wrong? The Senate's move allowed Mr. Coyne to be heard and clear up a complex matter.

Please allow me now, Mr. Speaker, to speak of a few Senate committees which accomplish serious work. The senators on those committees, whether they sat alone or with Members of Parliament, made serious inquiries.

[English]

I would like to speak particularly of some special committees of the upper house and the influence they have had on subsequent legislation.

For example, the Land Use Committee established in 1957, a committee which made the inventory of Canadian lands, conducted soil studies and research on agriculture, water pollution, drainage, erosion, land financing and farm credit. Its report resulted in ARDA in 1961 and in at least seven other important pieces of farm legislation.

The Public Service Committee sat in 1966 and 1967 and before it appeared several representatives of the Civil Service, industry and various government agencies. Its most important recommendation was to grant to civil servants the right to collective bargaining.

[English]

The special committee on manpower and unemployment established in 1960 made a complete study of this question. The results of this study led to the formation of the Department of Industry in 1963, to the creation of the Economic Council, to the creation of the Atlantic Development Council and to the creation of the regional economic expansion program. The Senate Committee on Aging contributed greatly to the establishment of the guaranteed income program for persons over 65. The same committee recommended the training and retraining of workers. The Senate Committee on Science Policy was formed in 1967. It provided a national forum for the assessment of our country's efforts to date in scientific research. The recommendations of this committee led to the creation of the ministry of state for science and technology and a minister was appointed to head it. Then the Senate Special Committee on Mass Media was formed in 1969.

An hon. Member: That was a waste of money.

Mrs. Morin: For several months it studied the question of the ownership and influence of the mass media in Canada. The Senate Committee on Poverty visited all the provinces and held many hearings. The main recommendation in its report suggested the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income system to replace the existing social security plans.

The Divorce Committee was established in 1966. Its recommendations brought about drastic changes in the Divorce Act.

Now, in Quebec and in the other provinces, divorce cases are dealt with by provincial courts.

The Committee on Consumption and Corporations was established in 1966. The most important recommendation of this Committee resulted in the establishment of a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in 1967.

I only mentioned a few of those committees, Mr. Speaker, made up of men of wide experience. They bring to committee work a degree of experience and stability which is sometime lacking in the Commons.

Thanks to the work of those committees, the Senate debates contain a great deal of information and considerations ignored by this House.

The members of the C.C.F. party, and later the NDP members, have always asked for the abolition of Senate. Whay not talk then of reforming the Senate?

[English]

Governments have often boasted of improving the Senate by the quality of those they appointed to it. Occasionally they have been concerned with choosing people with great reputations. However, so long as there is discretion in the choice of Senators there will be no real reform. Thus, there has often been talk of having each province designate a certain number of Senators who could be appointed for a five or ten-year term. This system would have the advantage of conforming to the requirements of federalism and, in particular, it would open the Senate to representatives of parties which have never succeeded in forming a government in Ottawa but which have held power in the provinces.

If for a quarter of a century such a system had been applied, there would not be in the Senate so many Liberals and Progressive Conservatives. Alberta and British Columbia would have sent some Socreds there, Saskatchewan some Socialists, and Quebec, Liberals and Progressive Conservatives with an autonomist tendency.

Again, as regards reforms, Mr. Speaker, a very important one has been introduced in the Seante these past few years when the retirement age was set at 75. Perhaps it would be possible to make it compulsory for all at age 65. And, speaking of reforms, since the retirement age is normally 65, should we not consider applying this also to the Senate?

Still in the field of reforms, why could more bills not originate from the Senate? This would relieve the workload of the House of Commons and enable it to consider more thoroughly some other legislation.

• (1630)

[English]

Some have advocated an elective Senate. This would make the other house simply another House of Commons, divided along party lines and holding debates characterized by the expression of party points of view, like those occurring in this House. The Senate is a storehouse of many talents and abilities and its members are ready and waiting for opportunities to serve the Canadian people. For example, the inquiries conducted by royal commissions could be handled by the existing Senate committees, thus saving the country several millions of dollars.

The Senate has always attempted to act as a sort of ombudsman to safeguard the supremacy of parliament and to ensure that the rights of individuals and minorities are respected. Through the many amendments made to certain bills the Senate has demonstrated that, when necessary, it is also capable of placing limits on the ambitions or demands of an all-powerful executive. It is for these reasons that I think the Senate should not be abolished; but maybe we should think of reforms for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my speech on Bill C-10 I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) who has just spoken. She made a very good speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Abolition of Senate

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I enjoyed listening to her, although I would not agree with all she has said. I am interested in the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes, Mr. Speaker. A year ago some Liberals offered to put me there, I think in order to convert me. But I am interested in the Senate mainly because I have had a rather long association with it. I have witnessed it at work a little more closely than many other hon. members, and I have listened to discussions about the reform or abolition of the Senate a little more often than possibly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The Senate was devised to give sober second thought to legislation passed by this House. I do not think it is now working very well, although it has conducted some good studies and some bad ones. Why is it not working well? That is the matter we should try to analyse. Last year it passed a mammoth tax bill consisting of 739 pages—and there were an additional 70 amendments which must have brought it close to 800 pages—in about a day and a half. Senators could not possibly have read it in the time allowed them to pass it. Why did they pass it in such a short time? Was that exercising sober second thought? No. They passed it because political influence was brought to bear. Hon. members may recall Bill C-176 which took a year and a half to get through this House. The Senate took about four days to pass it. That bill was not given sober second thought with respect to the regions of the country that were going to be affected by it.

Another reason for the establishment of the Senate was that it would protect regions of Canada, which did not have large populations, to be well represented in the House of Commons. I repeat that the Senate did not give sober second thought to Bill C-176 and the way it would affect certain regions. Here, again, we saw politics at work in a group of people appointed to work for the good of the country and not for the good of the political party which appointed them to the Senate.

Senators have forgotten the main purpose of the other place. I do not favour complete abolition of the Senate. There should be a body to give sober second thought to our legislation. I am willing to give the Senate a second chance. The Senate should be a non-political body once its members are appointed. No Senators should be allowed in the caucus of any political party. But look at the position of the Liberal party. Where do we find the president of that party? In the Senate, Mr. Speaker. Where do we find the former president of the Liberal party? In the Senate, Mr. Speaker. Where do we find the vice-president of the Liberal party? In the Senate, Mr. Speaker.

They have not given the Senate a chance to work in a non-partisan, non-political manner. They have not given it a chance to work for the good of the country. They do not deserve a second chance. But being of the generous nature that I am, I would give them that second chance. However, I would change the Senate to make certain that it did work for the good of the country and not for the good of a political party.

We need some legislative body to protect the various regions of Canada which do not have large populations. This House is dominated by elected representatives who come from the two most densely populated regions of Canada. The politics demonstrated in this place influence politics in the Senate, thus completely destroying the protection of the 24-24-24 system devised when the Senate was first established.

Over the years, we in this chamber have had difficulty finding a neutral enough person to act as Speaker of the House of Commons; but no such attempt is made in the Senate. The government appoints the Speaker over there, and he takes over. In the present case it is a she: she takes over and runs it in a partisan manner. I believe a chairman should be chosen who is not a senator to preside over debates in the other place. Further, Senators should not sit in the other chamber in political bodies to the left and to the right of the Speaker. Perhaps they should sit according to the 24-24, and seven for Newfoundland, system.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is another 24 in there.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You mustn't forget western Canada.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Did you think I would? Now I wish to deal with the question of conflict of interest. We still appoint Senators whose main concern is the directorship of companies: they are shareholders in one company or another. It may be wrong or it may be right, but I have heard the story that when Washington imposed the 10 per cent surtax on Canadian goods, the first thing Canadian Senators wanted to find out from Washington was whether that surtax applied to the companies of which they were directors. That is an evil thing. When people accept appointments to the Senate they should pledge themselves to work for their country, not for a political party or for a company in which they hold shares.

They should completely divorce themselves from political parties, from directorships of companies and from holding shares in any company in Canada. They should use their knowledge in a fair-minded way for the good of the country. Many things that a political party must do are sometimes unpopular in the country. The Senate in that way is unique. It is an appointed body and can recommend to this house or to the country measures which may not be popular. Senators need not worry about what the country thinks. They need only worry about what is good for the country and whether the measure will serve the country. This they are not doing today.

I point out that the president of the Liberal party is a Senator, and the vice-president of the Liberal party is a Senator. They are concerned with upholding the Liberal party in a favourable position in this country. I think that is wrong. I sometimes think we play too many party political games in this House. There is too much partisan debate for the sake of partisanship, and not enough attention is paid to the subject matter being discussed. That should never happen in the other place, but it will continue as long as we allow Senators to play a political role. All the same, they have a role to play.

It is perhaps sometimes overlooked that in an election the best man does not always win. I am sure hon. members will agree with me. Often small, but important segments of our society are not able to elect members to this place. That is why I think it is a good idea to appoint representatives provided those in the other place in a non-partisan and non-political manner.

The former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) appointed the first Indian to the Senate, which I think was commendable. That provided representation for people in our society who had not been able to elect one of their own to this house. Since then two men of Indian extraction have been elected. I think such appointment to the Senate is very worth while. Another worth-while appointment to the Senate was that of a railroader. The Senate should be composed of representatives of a cross-section of the industries and peoples of Canada. That is the beauty and benefit of a non-elected body as part of our legislative process.

To conclude my remarks, I suggest the Senate is certainly worth keeping but it needs serious overhaul. Senators should be brought down to earth, shaken up and told they are here to work for the good of the country and not necessarily for the good of the party which appointed them. Certainly, they should keep out of politics completely.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all express my surprise at the fact that a member with the experience of the honourable member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) could say that he wishes that the Senate not become a political forum. One must go far in order to be able to state that politics has no relation to a Chamber of Parliament. If this is all the seriousness that can be contributed to a debate such as this one, I do not think that what has been said by the honourable member for Crowfoot should be considered with much interest. May I however say to him that I agree with one of the points he made.

The Senate needs reform. I would suggest one dealing with membership and appointments.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate has lost part of its powers because, when it was first established, the intent was to grant it powers equal to those of the British House of Lords which obviously has not been the case.

At the time the Senate was being instituted, during negotiations concerning the Confederation Act, Sir John A. Macdonald made the following remarks concerning the Senate:

> In order to protect local interests in each province, we have deemed it necessary to give the three broad divisions of British North America equal representation in the Upper House, since the interest of each division will be different. Therefore, the Legislative Council, whose task it will be to temper and regulate the legislative process ... will be made up of an equal number of 24 representatives for each division.
> Of what use would the Upper House be if it were not to exercise, as and when required, its right to oppose legislation proposed by the Lower House, to alter or postpone such legislation. The Senate should not be merely an office for the recording of Lower House decrees.

That is the whole mistake. In order to protect regional interests, it was sought to vest in the Upper House actual legislative powers.

And as early as 1868, the year following the creation of the Canadian Confederation, a study was already launched to determine why the Senate was not functioning properly.

Of course it did not work because it had been given legislative powers while its members could not be elected by the nation.

[English]

I think the Prime Minister of that time indicated, as suggested by Mr. Dafoe in the Winnipeg Free Press in 1943, that without the Senate and without the arrangements which have been made there would not have been confederation. At the time the problems facing the Fathers of Confederation made it essential that those regional jealousies be protected. At that time this question was very important. Of course, we have seen its importance diminish. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he suggests that there has been regional protection. When the Senate was created we worked under a two-party system. Now we have more than two parties; there are fragmentary parties in the House. Historically, these smaller groups have protected and represented regional interests.

There has been no difficulty about the protection of regions because of that development and also because of the phenomenon of the Privy Council of England having given to the provinces power greater than that which was intended under the British North America Act. However, the Senate foresaw the situation which we are now facing, inasmuch as within our own demographic design there are minorities. Reading the latest census report, I see that there was in Canada in 1971 a population of 21,568,315. Of this number, those who indicated their mother tongue as English numbered 12,973,810; those who indicated French as their mother tongue numbered 5,793,000; those whose tongue was German numbered 561,000; Indian and Eskimo, 179,000; Italian 538,000, and there were 144,000 whose mother tongue was Dutch.

Here are further figures: Polish, 134,000; Ukrainian, 309,855; other nationalities, including Japanese and Chinese, 932,000. And these nationalities are spread all across the country. These people will tell you it is impossible to receive effective representation by population in the case of a small minority distinguished because of racial origin. We have in this country espoused a policy which recognizes and, indeed, encourages multiculturalism. This is as it should be because we are a new country.

[Translation]

And we must invite all the citizens of the world to come and settle here. On the one hand, we can't invite them or encourage them to keep their traditions and, on the other hand, fail to give them at least some indication that they will be involved in the government of the country. To declare today that the Senate is expendable is to deprive those people of the opportunity of being appointed to a Canadian legislature where they could be urged to take part in our democratic process.

This is the situation as it exists today. It is all the more serious that according to the last census, Canada had a birth rate of 16.8 per cent per 1,000 inhabitants. In the province of Quebec, it is 14.8 per cent. Although 1968 statistics show that the death rate in the province of Quebec was 14.8 per cent.

Therefore, our population is in a static position in that the birth rate is equal to the death rate. There will be no increase in the birth rate in our country if present tendencies persist. Moreover, I should like to point out that we create 200,000 new jobs every year in Canada for those born in 1945, 1947, 1948, 1949, when the birth rate was 30 per 1000 inhabitants.

But while huge institutions are set up to accommodate all those people, what is being done? The populations's natural growth is checked through birth control. When the people who are working now are gone, who will replace them in those huge institutions we are setting up? We must promote immigration; it is the only solution. We have birth control, but foreigners—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order please. I think the hon. member should get back to Bill C-10, for he seems to have wandered away from the subject of the bill.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for reminding me that I might have been drifting away from the subject. We have reached a point where we will have to encourage immigration. Then, we will have more new Canadians who are neither of French, English nor Italian origin. They will then ask for the right to be represented. That is when we will see the need for keeping the Senate.

You wanted to know what I was leading up to: well, there you have it.

Mr. Speaker, when one sees far into the future one is at times hard to understand. In any event—

[English]

What I wish to stress is that to go as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggests would be to deprive Canada of that camera—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That camera?

Mr. Blais: —of that camera within which we can achieve such representation. I agree with the hon. member with reference to the removal of the section respecting the qualifications of Senators. I was aghast when I read section 23 of the British North America Act to see that only landed gentry are permitted access to the Senate. I cannot believe that an act for which I have such great respect would permit the continuance of a distinction whereby only a man who has equity of $4,000 clear and free of indebtedness would be entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Whether he has ability or not doesn't matter.

Mr. Blais: I would agree to the complete removal of that provision were it possible. However, the other clauses of the hon. member's bill are most repugnant to me, though I do not quarrel with his sincerity. When I addressed myself to the subject, I did so with some trepidation because it is a serious one. I do not intend to begin a tradition of opposing the hon. member's bill every year. I would appreciate it if the information contained in these debates were conveyed to the public so that the views expressed could receive the attention they deserve. There could be a question of public interest here: a constitutional amendment is proposed.

Reverting to the discussion in the House a while ago, society has a hard time getting somebody else to push the button which will take away an individual's life. Imagine the difficulty we would experience in getting a murderer to hang himself by his own hand. I take it the hon. member's bill would need to be accepted by both Houses expressing themselves as in favour of such an amendment. I confess I find it difficult to imagine such a situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

DISCHARGE OF OIL FROM "IRISH STARDUST"—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43 I ask permission to move a motion on the grounds of urgent necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That the special committee of the House of Commons on environmental pollution be re-established, composed of not more than 20 members to be later designated by the House, to investigate all matters relating to the discharge of oil by the bulk carrier Irish Stardust into the waters of Johnstone Strait and the Strait of Georgia, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the ownership and operating authority of the ship; the condition of the ship both before and after the incident; the role played before, during and subsequent to the incident by each and every agency established by act of parliament with responsibilities related to preventing or minimizing the damage; and the adequacy or inadequacy of relevant legislation and regulations, with powers to report from time to time its observations, opinions and recommendations thereon;

And that the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House either in Ottawa or British Columbia, and to travel between Ottawa and British Columbia; to print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the committee; and to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as it may deem advisable or necessary, and to delegate thereto all or any of its powers except the power to report directly to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL PARKS

PROPOSED GROS MORNE PARK—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgency. Bearing in mind the memorandum of agreement signed by the appropriate ministers for Canada and Newfoundland on October 31, 1970, respecting the establishment of a national park on the west coast of the island of Newfoundland, and in view of the imminence of the necessary expropriations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development recommend to the Governor in Council that the communities presently designated within the boundaries proposed for the Gros Morne National Park not be subject to the relocation clauses which would have the effect of destroying the traditional way of life, and rights, of several communities and their citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Again, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order Paper Questions

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not, and the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

January 26, 1973—The Minister of State for Urban Affairs—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the National Housing Act".

Mr. MacEachen: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has asked that this bill stand. Perhaps I should draw to the attention of the House an error in the French version of the recommendation attached to this bill to amend the National Housing Act.

The French version of the recommendation reads in part as follows:

... augmentant de quinze milliards à dix-neuf milliards de dollars le montant global ...

Whereas it should read:

... augmentant de seize milliards à dix-neuf milliards de dollars le montant global ...

The English version of the recommendation is accurate.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SATELLITE PARK—NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 5—Mr. Crouse:

1. Is it the intention of the government to establish a satellite park along the coast of Nova Scotia as a supplement to the facilities provided by Kejimkujik National Park and, if so (a) what are the boundaries of the area selected (b) what is the estimated size of the park?

2. How much money has been set aside for the development of a satellite park?

3. On what date does the government estimate development work for a satellite park will be undertaken?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. A proposal to establish a coastal adjunct to Kejimkujik National Park has been under study for several years and in response to negotiations with the Province of Nova Scotia, this proposal has been given a low priority. (a) Precise boundaries have not been established; (b) The size of the proposal cannot be determined until boundaries are agreed upon.

2. No funds are currently programmed for this purpose.

3. No date has yet been determined.

BUDGET—REVENUE ESTIMATES VERSUS ACTUAL ESTIMATES

Question No. 156—Mr. Broadbent:

In each budget since 1968 (a) what was the estimate of revenues and what were the actual revenues collected on both a budgetary and national accounts basis (b) what accounted for the difference between the forecast and the actual amount collected in each case where the discrepancy was greater than 2 per cent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The following table shows, for each budget presented in the period from fiscal 1968-69 to the present, the published forecast of revenues both on a budgetary and on a national accounts basis. It also shows the actual outcome for each year, and the percentage difference between forecast and actual revenues.

Fiscal Year	Budget Date		Budgetary Revenue	% diff.	National Accounts Revenue	% diff.
1968–69	Oct. 22,	Forecast	10,105	−0.9	12,125	−2.2
	1968	Actual	10,191		12,397*
1969–70	June 3,	Forecast	12,025	−2.5	14,310	−1.4
	1969	Actual	12,324		14,505*
1970–71	Mar. 12,	Forecast	13,150	2.6	15,620	0.5
	1970	Actual	12,803		15,545*
	Dec. 3,	Forecast	13,035	1.8	15,700	−0.2
	1970	Actual	12,803		15,731
1971–72	June 18,	Forecast	13,660	−4.2	17,050	−4.1
	1971	Actual	14,227		17,752
1972–73	May 8,	Forecast	15,670	n.a.	19,250	n.a.
	1972	Actual	n.a.		n.a.

*Prior to Historical National Accounts Revisions. n.a.—Not available.

Disregarding the sign of the difference, the average difference between forecast and outcome was 2.4 per cent on a budgetary basis and 1.7 per cent on a national accounts basis. It should be noted that these averages have been somewhat distorted by virtue of the fact that some budget forecasts were rendered obsolete by a subsequent budget within the same fiscal year, or by discretionary changes introduced without the benefit of a formal budget.

For the five budgets for which "forecast versus actual" comparisons are available, three underestimated budgetary revenues, while two overestimated them. An important factor causing the underestimation was a higher than anticipated rate of price inflation. The overestimations occurred in 1970, and were attributable to the greater than anticipated deceleration of the economy experienced in that year.

In considering the accuracy of these forecasts, it is necessary to note that there is some imprecision in the published National Income Accounts, which constitute the point of departure for economic and fiscal forecasting exercises. For example, there is at the present time a residual error of approximately $2.0 billion or two per cent between the income and expenditure sides of the accounts. In addition, there is always uncertainty regarding the rapidity with which persons or companies respond to fiscal measures.

CANADA MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM

Question No. 191—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What were the names of employers who offered at least 20 jobs to the recipients of grants under the Canada Manpower Mobility Program, in each of the fiscal years 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 to date?

2. How many jobs were offered by each of the above-mentioned employers in each of the above fiscal years?

3. What was the total value of mobility grants in each of the above cases in each fiscal year?

4. What are the objectives of the program?

5. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Grants under the program are given individually to workers who meet the eligibility criteria prescribed by the Manpower Mobility Regulations rather than to employers and therefore the Department does not maintain a record of the names of employers offering jobs to manpower mobility grant recipients.

2. See 1 above.

3. See 1 above.

4. The primary objective of the Canada Manpower Mobility Program is to optimise the use and geographical mobility of all manpower resources available to the country by assisting unemployed, underemployed and about to become unemployed workers, who cannot get suitable employment locally to move to more productive and more remunerative employment. The aim of the Canada Manpower Mobility Program is not to subsidize all worker mobility, but rather to assist and serve as an incentive to those who need to move but require financial assistance. The program also helps workers to travel to and take advantage of training and retraining opportunities which are not available in their home communities. The Manpower Mobility Regulations provide three types of assistance: Trainee Travel and Commuting Allowances: to enable adults to take training in a locality other than that in which they reside. Exploratory Grants: to enable a search for employment in another area. Relocation Grants: to facilitate permanent relocation.

5. Yes. December 1972.

LOANS GRANTED BY EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION FOR PURCHASE OF SHIPS BUILT IN CANADA

Question No. 202—Mr. Laprise:

Has the Export Development Corporation granted any loans to the Compagnie Maritime des Chargeurs Réunis and to the Société Navale Chargeurs Delmas-Vieljeux for the purchase of ships built in Canada and, if so, what amounts and interest rates have been granted to each of these two companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Export Development Corporation states: 1. On September 10, 1971 it made an agreement with La Compagnie Maritime des Chargeurs Réunis of Paris, France, agreeing to lend that company $15.12 million repayable in instalments after delivery, to finance a sale by Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec, of two 15,600 ton multi-purpose vessels.

2. On September 10, 1971, also, it made a similar agreement with La Société Navale Chargeurs Delmas-Vieljeux of Paris, France, to lend that company Can. $37.8 million on the same terms to finance a sale of 5 similar vessels by the same shipbuilder.

3. The same rate of interest applies in each case; it is a commercial rate negotiated on the basis of rates prevailing internationally at the time; interest rates in Canada's long term financing are not published because negotiations now in progress may be hurt by publication.

ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK—MALLORYTOWN LANDING SECTION

Question No. 227—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with improvements to the beach and swimming areas at the Mallorytown Landing Section of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park?

2. Is it the intention of the government to improve the adequacy of the camping area at Mallorytown Landing by (a) utilizing undeveloped land presently government owned and lying north of Highway 2S (b) acquiring additional land presently privately owned and lying between Highway 2S and Highway 401?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Improvements at the Mallorytown Landing Section of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park that are planned for 1973/74 consist of: (a) A small building in the area will be remodelled into an Interpretive Centre. (b) Some renovations to the Outdoor Theatre. (c) Continuing the enlargement of the beach area by adding sand.

2. (a) No. (b) No.

*CANADA MANPOWER TRAINING PROGRAM—STATISTICAL INFORMATION CONCERNING PEOPLE IN RECEIPT OF ASSISTANCE

Question No. 265—Mr. Stackhouse:

Will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration inform the House how many people received federally funded retraining programs in 1972, or any part of it for which statistics are available, and how many of them obtained jobs in fields in which they had been retrained?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, during the 1972 calendar year a total of 327,950 persons received assistance to enrol in federally funded training programs, distributed as follows among the various types of programs:

	No. of Persons Enrolled in[1] Federally Funded Training Programs—Canada, 1972
1. Full time institutional	153,952
2. Training on the job	44,429
3. Part time institutional	46,951
4. Apprenticeship	32,888
5. Training in industry	49,730
Total	327,950

(1) Enrolments represent numbers starting training courses during the period; an individual may participate in more than one course during the year, and he is counted each time he starts a new course.

While persons participating in programs 3 to 5 are usually employed, the bulk of those involved in programs 1 and 2 above are unemployed when enrolled in training.

According to the latest follow-up results for full time institutional training, 76 per cent of trainees who completed skill courses in 1971-72 were employed three to four months after graduation. 48.5 per cent of the graduates found employment in occupations for which they were trained, and the remaining 27.5 per cent were employed in occupations not related to their training course.

Of the 44,429 persons enrolled in the training on the job program in 1972, 66 per cent completed their training. 93 per cent of those who completed training were employed after federal funding was terminated; 89.8 per cent were with the same employer working in the occupations for which they were trained; another 1 per cent were in a different occupation, while the remainder found employment with another employer.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

SUBVENTIONS FOR COAL TRANSPORT PROGRAM

Question No. 166—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What were the names of corporations benefitting from subsidies under the Subventions for Coal Transport Program (SCT), in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 to date, and what were the amounts of subsidies in each case?

2. What are the objectives of the above program?

3. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Return tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that starred question No. 53 and starred question No. 56, both of which have been on the order paper since January 4, have not yet been answered. It is very difficult to ask questions in the House before orders of the day, restricted as we are by the rules, and the reason for starred questions is to enable answers to be given.

It is obvious that the answer to starred question No. 53, having to do with the removal of the descriptive letters "RCMP" from detachments, automobiles and other vehicles, might be embarassing to the finer sensibilities of the cabinet, but that is no excuse for not answering it. Starred question No. 56 asks:

Since January 1, 1972, have any departments of government removed from mail envelopes the letters O.H.M.S. and, if so, what departments—

That question is in the same category. In view of the newly-found devotion to Her Majesty on the part of the Prime Minister, I see no reason why I should not get an answer to this very simple question.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POLLUTION

DAMAGE FROM OIL DISCHARGE BY VESSEL, "IRISH STARDUST"

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 26 I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the failure of the government to exercise its authority under the Canada Shipping Act to enact the regulations and to establish an administrative organization which could have prevented the widespread damage to seashores and coastal waters off British Columbia resulting from damage to the hull of the vessel Irish Stardust, the subsequent voyage of this ship to Victoria and the discharge of fuel oil therefrom.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has forwarded the notice required under Standing Order 26. I have given serious consideration to the hon. member's proposed motion that the House adjourn to discuss the matter referred to in his notice. Essentially, the hon. member proposes that the House debate what he terms the failure of the government to take certain action. Thus the hon. member for Comox-Alberni wishes to put before us a motion of censure against the government. With respect, I suggest to him that Standing Order 26 cannot be used for this purpose. He knows, I am sure, that there are many precedents to this effect. As the House knows, there are a number of avenues open to hon. members to bring on a debate based essentially on a censure motion. In particular, Standing Order 58 is available for this purpose.

In the circumstances, I regret that the hon. member's motion cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 26.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

DECREASE IN DEDUCTION FROM 1973 INCOME ALLOWED PERSONS 65 YEARS OF AGE OR OLDER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue arising from the fact that Canadians 65 years of age or older are permitted to claim an exemption of $1,000, as opposed to the $650 previously permitted, in completing their income tax returns for the year 1972. Will the minister indicate what exemption is available to Canadians 65 years of age or older in computing their tax deductions in connection with employment for the year 1973?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): The exemptions are those provided for in the law, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: He doesn't know the answer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether there is any explanation of the fact that in the TD-1 forms being sent out by the department, that is, the form on which the employee's tax deduction is computed for the year 1973, the exemption available to Canadians 65 years of age or older is $650 rather than the $1,000 such a person can claim in respect of income in the year 1972? Is there any explanation for this other than confusion within the minister's department and the government?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, the explanation is that the exemptions will be subject to the law that parliament passes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this question to Canadians 65 years of age or older who are now completing their tax deduction forms and, therefore, on the basis of these forms are being subjected to tax deductions in excess of those that would be made on the basis of the $1,000 exemption being applied by the government for the year 1972, can the minister assure the House as to any steps he proposes to take to prevent taxes being deducted from Canadians of the age of 65 years or older on the basis of the lower exemption included in the form? I ask this question, Sir, because if this is not done immediately many Canadians of the age 65 years or older are going to suffer an injustice and will have to wait for a year or so for a tax rebate instead of getting the benefit of the exemption that has been made available to the same people for the year 1972 but which is not being made available to them for 1973 through confusion in the department and the government.

• (1420)

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I expect that an adjustment will be possible and we will be anxious to see that is is made just as we were very anxious to see that the forms were available as quickly as possible at the usual time so that people could take full advantage of any increase in exemption that parliament accepts.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister come into the House tomorrow and state what emergency measures the government proposes to take to correct this injustice? I ask the question in view of the fact the minister has no idea what this is all about.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, there is no injustice and many—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

DECREASE IN DEDUCTION FROM 1973 INCOME ALLOWED PERSONS 65 YEARS OF AGE OR OLDER—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE LEGISLATION TO CORRECT SITUATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question, but may I direct it to the Minister of Finance as the minister responsible for introducing tax legislation. In view of the confusion to which reference has just been made, will the minister consider separating from his other budget proposals of May 8 of last year the proposal regarding the amount of the exemption for those aged 65 and over and will he bring it in right away so that last year's arrangment can be confirmed and so that this year's arrangement can be put into effect without delay?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no confusion, but the hon. gentleman's representation will be considered.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

POSSIBLE REASONS FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCING DATE OF BUDGET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Is the delay in announcing the date of the budget contingent upon the conference of federal-provincial ministers on welfare and other related matters later this week in which old age security matters are going to be discussed? Also, must we await this determination before we get the date of the budget so that all related matters, including that alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, can be straightened out, because there is a great deal of confusion in the mind of the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Wellington on a last supplementary on this subject and will then recognize the hon. member for York South.

COMPLETION OF 1972 RETURNS—AVAILABILITY OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS TO ANSWER TAXPAYERS' QUESTIONS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the confusion that exists and the problems faced in filling out income tax forms, are the minister and his department considering making members of that department available at strategic points to help answer some of these questions?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there is no confusion thus far—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanbury: Hon. members opposite may be wishing to promote some hysteria among the public, but that is not the case yet. We have made available this year additional facilities for providing information to the public. For the first time citizens can call their income tax office from wherever they may live in Canada without toll charges, so they can get this information readily and without expense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will return to this matter as there are a number of supplementaries. We will hear the hon. member for York South and a representative of the other party to complete the first round of questioning and return to this matter later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED CEASE-FIRE VIOLATIONS—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION—METHOD OF REPORTING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some questions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the situation in Viet Nam and out of the disquieting reports that the cease-fire agreed upon is apparently not yet fully observed and that there any many violations. Are he or the observers watching the situation carefully, and have the parties to the Paris agreement, and particularly the joint military commission set up under it, been informed that if violations of the cease-fire continue Canada may have to reconsider its acceptance of a part in the International Control and Supervisory Commission?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while it is regrettable, I do not think it is surprising that after a war that has lasted for a generation there has been a continuation after the hour of the cease-fire. In a number of public statements and in representations made to the various parties I drew attention to the possibility that this might be so, and that the international commission should not be expected to undertake its responsibilities immediately, that it was necessary to provide some time before the cease-fire could be considered to be in effect. However, I do hope that this situation will not continue and that we will then be in a position to carry out our responsibilities in the hope that the truce will in fact be observed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I may say so I am very glad that the minister made that statement. I want to ask a supplementary question. In view of recent allegations that Canadians on the old International Control Commission made separate reports containing military information to the United States authorities, I would like to ask the minister whether present Canadian personnel have been formally instructed to make all reports, whether unanimous reports or separate reports, as provided for in the Paris agreement, to all four parties to the Paris agreement and not to any one of them alone?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I also have heard these allegations. They have not been pinpointed. It is not clear from the reports I have heard whether there are charges in fact that Canadians did give this information or whether in fact these were simply third-hand reports to the effect that somehow some information had got into the hands of the Americans, perhaps through Canadian eyes. Our personnel on the old International Control Commission were authorized to give individual reports only to Ottawa. They were never authorized to give reports to any other country, including the United States, and that is the situation today. I do hope that the measures we are taking will remove even the suggestion that we might be engaged in spying activities.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, to understand the minister correctly I should like him to clarify the situation. My reading of the agreement indicates that the members of the International Control and Supervisory Commission may issue either unanimous reports or each member of the commission may issue reports to the parties to the agreement. If my understanding is correct, will the minister take steps to make certain that such reports, even when there is not unanimity on the commission, will go to all parties to the agreement as well as to Ottawa, and that such reports will be made public so that people can know exactly what is happening on the ground?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a reasonable suggestion. It is certainly what we have in mind and I hope it can be carried through.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT BY SUPERVISORY COMMISSION PERSONNEL

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the point the minister makes about the commission taking a bit of time to get established, but could we know whether the observers have yet been able to obtain the freedom of movement that the protocols call for?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the commission is just being organized now and, as the hon. gentleman knows, it has to work along with the military commissions to discharge its responsibilities. We are not yet in a position to know whether in fact the agreement will be carried through with respect to those sections that do give reasonable access to the areas in South Viet Nam.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—DISPATCHING OF DESTROYER, "TERRA NOVA", TO SOUTH PACIFIC

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Can he advise the House whether the Terra Nova or any other Canadian war vessel is to proceed to Viet Nam immediately or in the near future and, if so, for what purpose? Could he also tell us whether he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are satisfied with respect to the propriety of Canada stationing a ship that may be provocative, in the sense that it is armed, in Vietnamese waters?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will appreciate that the second part of his supplementary asks for an expression of opinion. The minister may want to reply to the first part.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Terra Nova is sailing today for the South Pacific but is not sailing directly to Viet Nam and will not be going into the territorial waters of either South or North Viet Nam. It is on an extended training exercise and is also part of our contingency planning in the event that we require a possible evacuation.

• (1430)

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, will the minister not carry his answer further and tell us whether or not these training exercises include plans for the Terra Nova to carry any live armament on board? Also, where will it be serviced?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the ship will be armed in the conventional way. It does not carry helicopters but it will carry the normal armament such as depth charges, cannon and other normal destroyer equipment. It will be supplied at the ports of usual call such as Hong Kong and Singapore.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—MEASURES TO STOP PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the price of feed grains noticeably increased last week in eastern Canada, can the minister say whether he intends to take the required measures to curb this price increase?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the latest prices on feed grains but I am aware of the increases which are mostly due to the protein supplement. We are meeting with the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association and I am having another meeting tomorrow with the people directly involved in the industry in eastern Canada.

FEED GRAIN—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE RESPECTING PROTEIN SUPPLEMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he had time to consider the recommendation of the Maritime Farmers Council that feed grain protein supplement be added to the feed freight assistance program? If so, when will he make an announcement?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is one of the things we are discussing and will be discussing later this afternoon with the National Dairy Farmers of Canada.

GRAIN

FLAX—PROVISION OF SUFFICIENT SUPPLY AT WEST COAST PORTS TO MEET EXPORT DEMAND

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary and direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the lack of supplies of flax, a protein oilseed, at west coast ports to meet export demands, can the minister assure the House that action is being taken by the Canadian Wheat Board and the transport committee to put sufficient supplies in place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this, of course, is normal procedure under the block shipping system. Without doubt, as ships are scheduled grains as required are sent to meet them. In the case of flax a very large ship can occasionally require some additional supplies and some waiting time. This has not happened often in recent weeks.

Mr. Gleave: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question, in my view, was not supplementary but related. Perhaps the hon. member might be given an opportunity in a moment to return to this subject. I will recognize him in due course. I had undertaken when we were on the first subject to return to it after the first round of questioning. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert has a supplementary to the first question asked this afternoon.

INCOME TAX

INTERPRETATION OF 1972 FORMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether it is not a fact that across the country there is great difficulty among taxpayers in interpreting the new income tax forms? Indeed, they might as well be written in Sanskrit.

An hon. Member: Or put out by Information Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister whether he will send out instructions on the interpretation of some of these sections to the various offices across Canada, because I have found that when they were communicated with their answer was, "Well, how do you expect me to know what it is?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will he send them some information so they will be able to explain the unexplainable?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the answer?

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the answer was. I think it would be about as intelligent as I would expect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what the answer was.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My interpretation of the right hon. gentleman's intervention is that it was a suggestion or representation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I think he can assume that the minister has heard it. I do not think it was a question in the usual form. If the minister wants to reply briefly, perhaps it would be simpler if he were allowed to do so and then I will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to leave the impression that I did not want to answer the right hon. gentleman's question. I was anxious to answer. I would be glad to consider his representation, but very clear guides have been sent with the forms this year and I think his constituents will find them helpful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking about people in Ontario who have written.

Mr. Baldwin: What would Gordon Sinclair think about it?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I have taken the trouble to compare the forms this year with those of 1962.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanbury: I find them as simple this year and the exemptions are much higher—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister kindly resume his seat? The hon. member for Don Valley.

Mr. Diefenbaker: People do not know what the forms mean.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CONTINGENCY PROGRAM FOR PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell us whether or not the contingency program for price and wage controls, which has been mentioned off and on in the House, has been discussed with the appropriate officials of the provinces?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Sir.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the Minister of Finance and the government that a price and wage control program could be put into effect in Canada without the support and co-operation of the provinces?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If that should ever become necessary, and the hon. gentleman knows my view about that, of course we would need a national consensus and that would require provincial co-operation. In constitutional terms it is probably not necessary.

HOUSING

INCREASE IN RENTS FOR LOW COST APARTMENTS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I had wanted to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs but maybe the Minister of Finance will answer it in light of the great increase in certain costs. As Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has agreed to permit rents for low-cost apartments to go up immediately, would the minister be prepared to investigate this increase of between 15 and 20 per cent in low-cost housing, particularly as an agency of the Department of Urban Affairs has agreed to the increase?

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the parliamentary secretary's attempt to answer the question, but I directed it to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps I should direct it to the Prime Minister. As rent increases are affecting tenants all across Canada, with the rents paid by thousands of people being increased by 15 per cent, would the Prime Minister ask the minister responsible to investigate the matter and report immediately upon his return?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the subject is an important one and it will not be lost on the minister who is in Toronto today addressing the annual convention of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada. I feel rather certain that they will be discussing this kind of question with him, officially or unofficially, and the minister may have some answer when he comes back.

FOOD PRICES

PRESENTATION OF GOVERNMENT'S CONTINGENCY PLAN FOR PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE FOR ANALYSIS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to present to the committee on food prices its contingency plan for price and wage controls so that the committee will be able to rule and judge whether it will be an effective plan if and when the government decides to bring in wage and price controls?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the very nature of the question deals with a contingency plan. It is a contingency question. I would have to give a contingency answer.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE RECIPIENTS IN NURSING HOMES—SUGGESTED PROTECTION OF PORTION OF PENSIONS AGAINST RISING RATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he advise the House whether he is giving consideration to the recent proposal from a number of very prestigious deliberate bodies that legislation be introduced to protect a substantial portion of the pensions of old age security recipients living in nursing homes, who find that the rates there rise much faster and more frequently than pension increases?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter will certainly be discussed when I meet with welfare ministers this coming Friday. I am sure they are aware of the situation, just as I am aware of it, and I am sure it will be discussed.

AIRPORT

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON LANCASTER EXPROPRIATION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. The hearings on the Lancaster expropriation at the Vancouver international airport have been completed and I am wondering when the report on these hearings will be tabled in the House of Commons?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a decision in connection with this expropriation has to be made before Friday. I have not given any thought to tabling the report of the hearing, but if it is the wish of the House I will do so.

Mr. Reynolds: In view of the fact that these reports have not so far been tabled and that hearings started today on expropriations in connection with the runway at Vancouver airport, and in view of the fact that members of this party and of other parties have asked that the hearings be stopped until they have had a chance to review the report of which the minister spoke, would the hon. gentleman agree to halt the proceedings until the report is tabled and the people in the area have had a chance to review it?

Mr. Dubé: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree to stop the hearings because if too much time is spent the expropriation would be declared abandoned. But I agree to table the report on the first expropriation.

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON GROUNDING OF SHIP

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport about what can only be described as the incredible saga of the Irish Stardust. In view of conflicting news reports, can the minister tell us exactly where this ship went aground, in what circumstances, and under whose authority or direction the vessel proceeded to Victoria after grounding?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust the minister can give this information briefly. Otherwise he would have to give the information to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Environment is now in British Columbia for the specific purpose of conducting a thorough inquiry and receiving all reports and thus be able to inform the House of what happened.

I have partial information which I can give the House. For instance, the amount of oil spilled I know was 340 tons. I know there were a pilot and an assistant or apprentice pilot on board, that there was an opening of some four feet by two in the hull of the ship. For any further information, I think we shall have to await the return of the Minister of Environment for details.

RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL CONSENSUS FOR INTRODUCTION OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise us how he intends to recognize a national consensus in favour of wage and price controls when it occurs?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): That will be a matter of judgment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: That is what you are short of over there.

Mr. Hellyer: Since there have been innumerable polls indicating that more than 70 per cent of the Canadian people already favour them—in some provinces such as British Columbia the percentage is as high as 86 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Hellyer: —when will the minister agree that the percentage of agreement has reached a national consensus? Or does he believe there ought to be 100 per cent agreement?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I watch opinion as closely as does the hon. gentleman. And I have found great difficulty in trying to establish the opinion of the party to which he now belongs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hellyer: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this is debate between the hon. member and the minister and I am afraid it could go on for a long time. I shall return to the hon. member eventually, but a number of hon. members who failed to be recognized last Friday are still waiting, in particular the hon. member for Edmonton Centre who has a supplementary from last Friday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMMUNICATIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF DAVEY REPORT ON NEWS MEDIA

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was beginning to wonder whether I was becoming the most invisible member of the House.

Some hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Paproski: My question is to the Prime Minister. It is now two years since the Davey report on the news media was presented to the government. When does the government propose to implement the recommendations contained in that report, tabled December 9, 1970, in particular the one proposing the establishment of a federal press council?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the hon. member is mistaken. There was no report to the government. It was not demanded by the government nor was the report made to the government. It is a report regarding which both opposition and government members can form various opinions.

Mr. Paproski: My supplementary is directed to the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism. Would the minister advise the House who are his federal multicultural centre program representatives, and whether they are speaking for the minister's department or for the Liberal party when they travel across Canada promising multicultural centres?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is visibly out of order.

RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES

INITIATION OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST PFIZER COMPANY FOLLOWING RECOMMENDATION OF PROSECUTION FOR PRICE FIXING

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Inasmuch as officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have completed their investigation of the Pfizer Company Limited in connection with price fixing and have made a recommendation to prosecute to his department, what steps have the department taken to initiate proceedings against this company?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I would want to look into the exact status of that matter to see whether there is anything I could reasonably report to the hon. member at this time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROJECTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT LEVEL TO ASSIST IN ESTIMATING COST—TARGET FOR YEAR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, one which has a good deal to do with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Has the minister arrived at any projection of the level of unemployment for this year in order to be able to calculate the cost of unemployment insurance? If so, has he passed this information on to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in order that the latter might be in a position to calculate the cost this year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Any projection would be bound to contain a number of ingredients, not only the level of unemployment but the average number of weeks per benefit and the average weekly payment during those benefits. As the hon. member knows, there are a number of ingredients that would go into such a projection.

Mr. Alexander: The minister seems to have forgotten that one of the prime criteria embodied in the Unemployment Insurance Act calls for government intervention once unemployment reaches 4 per cent. Can I assume from the minister's answer that the unemployment target as far as the government is concerned is the 4 per cent referred to in the Unemployment Insurance Act? I ask this question because it seems important to me that no change should have been made in the act in this regard. In other words, is that the limit which the government accepts?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am not too sure I would be happy even with that target. That was the threshold at which parliament decided to bring in contributions from the people of Canada over the employer-employee contributions. As I have said on other occasions, the target for me and for the government is that we would not be satisfied unless every man and woman in the country able to work and seeking work could find work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Yukon, but it seems to me that this kind of exchange that has been going on, from day to day, I may say, between the hon. member for Hamilton West and the minister on this same point is not very helpful, from a procedural standpoint, at least.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the House, but it seems to me it is of extreme importance, because of the calculations required for the Unemployment Insurance Act, that the minister have a projected figure of unemployment. My last supplementary is this: in order that we may arrive at some idea of the government's thinking on this subject, will the minister advise us whether his target is to reach an unemployment rate of less than 6 per cent this year?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Sir.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration who I assume would be the Minister of Labour. Would the hon. gentleman inform the House whether the discussions with the leader of the New Democratic Party are yet concluded with respect to Bill C-125, so that we may know when to expect this legislation to be proceeded with.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The answer is, yes.

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL OFF BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST—RESPONSIBILITY FOR CLEAN-UP COSTS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in connection with the grounding of the Irish Stardust off the British Columbia coast. Who will be responsible for the clean-up costs resulting from this oil spill?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The master of the ship was brought into court last Friday and a bond of $20,000 has been deposited with the court pending the report we are to receive. So legal action has been taken, though I do not know the result of it.

• (1450)

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the cost of the clean-up of the pollution from this oil spill will greatly exceed $100,000, may I ask the minister whether the fund that has been set aside through a levy on the import and export of oil will be applied to the cost of cleaning up this disaster, or can it be applied?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as I said previously, I do not have a complete report on this spill. The Minister of the Environment will be here tomorrow and I think he will be in a better position to give the information requested by the hon. member.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—POSSIBLE REVISION OF GOVERNMENT'S POSITION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

An inquiry, the results of which were published over the weekend, reveals that 59 per cent of all Canadians favour federal help to the 1976 Olympics: would the right hon. Prime Minister then tell us whether his government will study the possibility of revising the position taken last week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know on what point the hon. member would have the government revise its position. It is identical to the position Mayor Drapeau has always taken, that is, that the Olympics would not cost the Canadian government a penny. I am wondering whether the hon. member is now suggesting that I should disagree with Mayor Drapeau.

[English]

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could also report to the House when his minister returns on the number and amount of LIP applications in the hands of the government respecting the Olympic games?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot seriously suggest that that is a supplementary. The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Lawrence: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; it was supplementary to the question about the Olympic games. These LIP applications are with respect to the games.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Dauphin.

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF SALES AND EXCISE TAXES AS MEANS OF CONTROLLING INFLATION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister considering cutting federal sales and excise taxes in the forthcoming budget as a means of containing inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's opinion.

AMENDMENT OF AGREEMENT WITH MANITOBA ON SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Keith Taylor (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact lengthy delays have occurred in completing an amending agreement with the government of Manitoba for the Manitoba special area, would the minister advise the House whether an amending agreement has now been completed and, if not, when such an agreement will likely be completed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I too am unhappy, as I am sure the hon. member is, that delays have occurred. I do not think they are entirely one-sided in that this is a complex issue. We are continuing our talks and I have indicated that I am prepared to meet with the officials of the Manitoba government any time they are ready.

Mr. Taylor: Would the minister advise the House what additional areas and projects are being discussed with the province of Manitoba and which of these projects have been agreed upon?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, until such time as an agreement is actually signed there can be no definitive agreement. In fairness to the government of Manitoba, I think I would have to get their consent to the disclosure of any matters that are now the subject of negotiation.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF CONSULTANT ON HEALTH PROBLEMS OF FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR IN EUROPE—METHOD OF DECIDING CASES

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Now that a consultant has been appointed to deal with the health problems of former European prisoners of war, would the minister tell the House whether or not all applicants are going to have an opportunity, if they desire, of appearing before the consultant? Or how will each case be decided?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I say that I spent some time this morning with the gentleman who was appointed the other day, and no specific rules have been laid down yet. Considerable time will be taken in doing this very important job. The doctor who has been appointed is under no particular rules and is not strapped down. No one is telling him what to do. It will probably take him six months or more to do his job. As far as laying down any specific rules at this time is concerned, we are not intending to do so since we do not think it would be proper. He will be reporting to us and we will watch the situation with him. Our department and all doctors across Canada who have some familiarity with this sort of thing will be giving him all the assistance possible.

FOOD PRICES

AVAILABILITY TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF STUDIES AND REPORTS BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he has now had an opportunity to peruse the studies, reports and recommendations of the Prices and Incomes Commission, and can the minister indicate to the House whether any such studies will be made available or put at the disposal of the House committee on food prices?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certain studies have already been made public and they will be available. With regard to other studies that we expect will be published as soon as the work of translation and printing has been completed, they will be available as they are disclosed to the public.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—NATURE OF REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER TO COMPANIES RESPECTING PRICES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that on the weekend the president of General Motors Corporation described the minister's efforts to get that company to bring its prices into line with those in the United States as being somewhat less than aggressive, would the minister inform the House of the nature of his attempts to get this corporation and the other automobile companies to bring their prices down, and with what success?

Mr. Speaker: I would hope that the minister will attempt to reply briefly. It seems to me that this question is very wide and would normally invite a statement on motions.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I agree the question is very wide. The first thing I should like to say is that the president of General Motors issued what he described as an emphatic denial of the statements attributed to him in the Financial Post article. As to my efforts with respect to narrowing the price differential, I did meet, as I told the House earlier, I think on our first day back, with the president of General Motors and the presidents of the other auto companies. I secured a commitment from the president of General Motors and from the president of Ford Motor Company that there would be no increase in 1973 model year cars respecting economic costs, and a further commitment with respect to 1974 year model cars which would respect the government's objective of narrowing the price differential.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact these companies have already increased their prices on 1973 models after they gave that assurance to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and in view of the fact that in announcing his budget proposals last year the Minister of Finance specifically said that he would expect the automotive industry to take into account in their pricing policies the tax reduction they received and they have not done so for the 1973 model year, can the minister indicate what plans his department has in mind to bring these companies into line?

Mr. Speaker: Again I suggest that this information should be given by way of a statement on motions.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN PROPOSALS TO FORTHCOMING LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS TO STUDY BEFORE PRESENTATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister inform the House whether he has taken any steps to prepare a comprehensive Canadian approach to the conflicts of political, military, legal, economic and fisheries problems which confront us on our Canadian continental shelf? If so, will the people's representatives in this House have an opportunity to study these proposals, either in the House or in committee, before they are presented to the next Law of the Sea Conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had the international legal section of my department engaged in this matter for a very long time now and they are very well prepared for the next Law of the Sea Conference. In appearances before committees of the House I think they have been very forthcoming and I am sure they will continue to be so under the questioning of my hon. friend and others.

• (1500)

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Iceland has declared its position, which has been known to the various nations for almost a year, can the minister indicate when Canada will make its position known publicly or at least to members of the House of Commons so we can react to Canada's position?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hope members on the other side, as well as on this side, will all be agreed in respect of protecting Canadian interests.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period and have gone beyond it by a few minutes. Perhaps the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate might ask a supplementary question and then I will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to jeopardize the chance of the minister gaining international recognition again but would he answer the question? I should like to ask why Canada cannot make its position known in respect of the Law of the Sea Conference, which is very vital to the marine parts of this country, just as the position of Iceland has been made clear for almost a year?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any mystery about Canada's position or the vital questions to be raised at the Law of the Sea Conference. As I say, when the committees are in session I am sure my officials will be very happy to appear and answer questions. I do not think it would be appropriate, however, to put before the House the various views that have been considered internally. What really matters is the position we take at the conference, and we will be very happy to oblige the hon. member.

Mr. Lundrigan: We have no position; we have nothing.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe might be allowed to ask a supplementary question. And then I will call orders of the day.

PROPOSAL TO NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY RESPECTING INVESTIGATION OF MARINE RESOURCES OF NORTH ATLANTIC—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been apprised of an all-party delegation proposal put to the North Atlantic assembly in November past which calls for an investigation of marine resources in the North Atlantic prior to the Law of the Sea Conference, and will he indicate what answer he has given or what decision has been made in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the House may know, the North Atlantic Assembly is an organization which is not dominated by governments. It is a group of members of parliament who meet as members of NATO. The government always gives very serious consideration to the proposals made. I cannot answer in respect of this specific one because it has not yet been brought to my attention.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Friday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, there have been several other members who have spoken before me in this debate on capital punishment, and I should like to congratulate them. They have all spoken eloquently and, I am sure, from deep conviction. This topic so transcends in its value many of the others we have before us that, in my view, it does not admit of partisanship.

I regret that I cannot agree with all those who have spoken before me, including members of my own party, because I cannot agree with those who think it is proper for the state to deprive its citizens of their lives. We have heard much argument in favour of that proposition, Mr. Speaker, and we shall hear more. In fact, I am resigned, as I comprehend the situation now, to being on the losing side of this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Reilly: My hon. friends say no, but I am afraid that too many members of this House will not vote according to their consciences, but that they will vote according to the way they believe their constituents want them to vote.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Reilly: That, of course, would result in the reinstatement of the death penalty in this country. I hope I am wrong in that assessment. I hope I am wrong because if there was one thing that impelled me to leave private life and come to this House, if there was one motivating force, it was the belief that the most sacred thing in existence is human life, and the most lasting and beautiful things that men do are those things they do to enhance it.

None of us is here to impose harsher restrictions on life. In my submission, we are here for one thing and one thing only, and that is to ensure that Canada is a good place to be and a country in which everyone may be free to pursue the course he deems best for him. It is only when people behave in such a way that is a menace to the happiness and well-being of their fellow citizens that the state has the right to intervene. Even then, in my submission, that right of intervention is qualified in this way, that there must be as little force as necessary to ensure the public safety. This is the rule followed in the courts of this country when a person is accused of assault and pleads self-defence. The rule is that some force or some restraint may be allowed, but only enough to repel the attack. I believe that approach is the one which the government should take toward crime. If that principle were to apply, then capital punishment would disappear in this country for all time, regardless of circumstance.

Capital punishment does not protect anyone who could not as effectively be protected by imprisonment for life, if necessary, of the murderer, and I shall deal with that later. We will hear many facts and statistics on both sides of this question. We will hear pro and con on the proposition that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder. We will hear, and I wish this were not so, from many people who will claim that obedience to the word of God Himself requires the reinstatement of capital punishment.

I have received, as I am sure all hon. members have, a good deal of mail on this topic. It has come from those on both sides of the question, but the central theme repeated in nearly every piece of pro-hanging mail I have received, the common theme that runs through all of these retentionist's letters is this blasphemy on the name of a being whom all of us, regardless of our religious affiliations or backgrounds, have been taught to believe is above all else, a God of love.

I do not propose to tell you how God feels about this. I am not that arrogant. He does not tell me how He feels on this or any other human concern. But I was raised a Christian, and the most puzzling anomaly in the pro-hanging argument is the ability of the proponents of capital punishment to equate the Christ of the manger, the Man-God who chose to come among us as a weakling infant and who suffered Himself to be reviled, tormented and beaten, and finally murdered in a horrible fashion, but who in the midst of all that was able to forgive his tormenters, with a person of stern being who demands an eye for an eye. I cannot understand that.

Let me quote from Hansard on this matter. Almost seven years ago the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) was asked a question about God's will in the matter of capital punishment. He said, as recorded at page 3286 of Hansard for March 28, 1966:

> Mr. Speaker, may I say very simply to the hon. member as seriously as he asked the question, that in all the teaching I received about God and about the duties of all men to God the central point was that mercy and charity in the human breast and human mind are the most obvious and most essential characteristics of a religious and godly life. This is as true for society collectively as it is for every individual in society. Second, all the teaching I received on the subject has taught me that it is not right for me to state certain ideas and seek refuge in the assertion that they come from God but that it is much more important for me, as it is for all members in this house, to use the intelligence and the conscience which God gave us to arrive at the conclusion at which we are intended to arrive as human beings exercising our own will.

I share those sentiments of the hon. member for York South. I have not heard them better put and I shall not try to improve upon them. We learned from different teachers, but the principles were the same. We learned, I think that the same principles are common to all human institutions, and if one of them is immutable and universal it must be that human beings, individually and collectively, are the most precious things in the world.

I do not oppose capital punishment because I harbour any sympathy or concern over the fate of murderers. I must confess that I do not spend too much time mulling over their fate. I do care very much about the society in which I live and the effect on that society of state murder. If I may quote a former member of this House, I should like to cite a speech by the former member for Winnipeg South, Mr. Sherman.

He said on March 28, 1966:

> I am opposed to the death penalty because it brutalizes me and brutalizes society. It forces me to descend to the same level as the murderer I am hanging. It is sanctioned murder and I resent having to participate in it or have any part in it because it drag me down to the level of the person who is sentenced to death.

That is the matter we should be concerned about, Mr. Speaker. The society that puts people to death is a sick society. It is sick because those societies that insist on the practice almost invariably choose the most painful methods of execution available to them.

There have always existed painless ways to kill people. If those proponents of capital punishment really believe it is necessary as a deterrent to others, or for public safety, they could accomplish their aim in painless fashion. But they do not, Mr. Speaker. They strangle their prisoner; they break his neck; they crush his windpipe. They send thousands of volts of electricity through his body and cook his insides. They choke him to death with poison gas. Did you ever hear of a society that killed its prisoners by giving them an overdose of a pleasant, easeful narcotic? That would be very simple. But if I were to propose in this chamber the adoption of that course, the angry reaction from one end of the country to the other would be heard by all hon. members. The reason such a reaction is that a prisoner would not be struggling in agony, in pain, even as he surrendered up his most precious possession, his life.

In my experience these proponents of hanging are the same people who are the first to moan piously about the fate of the fetus whenever the question of abortion is raised. Even before a fetus has achieved growth to the point where it could survive in the human environment by itself, they insist that its quasi-human status be prolonged. Why? Is it because of their reverence for human life? Or is it because they insist that the errant woman who carries that fetus should suffer the shame, the indignity, the torment, and the opprobrium of society for her so-called crime? I wonder, but I don't wonder very long.

There is one reason, and one reason alone why people insist on capital punishment, and that is revenge. It is easy to understand why people seek revenge. It is easy to sympathize with them. I have three small children, Mr. Speaker. If one of those children were harmed or killed by someone, my immediate reaction would be to want to murder in return, as horribly as I could contrive to do it, the person responsible. That wish is not rational, and its fulfilment would do me a terrible disservice. It demeans me and brings me to the level of that pitiable creature who wronged my child. It renders me no less contemptible than the murderer. I submit that to the extent that one of us is demeaned and sickened in this fashion, society is contaminated by the disease. I do not want that kind of society, and I do not want it for my children.

It has been said by those who want to reinstate hanging in this country that violent crime is rising everywhere and that people are not safe on the streets. I do not know whether this is true. Certainly, I have never encountered any difficulty walking the streets of this or any other Canadian city in which I have lived or visited. But supposing it were true, would the reinstatement of capital punishment change it very much? I seriously doubt that. I believe that our society places far too high a premium on material things, and far too low a premium on human well-being and safety. For that reason, I urge a much more drastic approach to crimes of violence, crimes against the person as opposed to crimes against property.

Only last week I read about a man who kidnapped three young people, two girls and a boy. He struck the young man over the head with an axe, then raped the two girls, struck them over the heads with his axe, and threw all three of his victim into a river. He was convicted of these offences and received a sentence of 18 years in prison. In my opinion, that is not enough. I believe he should never again see daylight except in the exercise yard of some prison, not to punish him but to protect society against the possibility that he would do it again, and to protect him from himself because he has shown that he cannot cope with life among us. His violence could be directed anywhere, even against himself. I do not believe that a man who viciously and wantonly attacks like that is a misunderstood individual. I understand him; I understand him all to well. I understand the message he is sending. He is saying he cannot live in our society, that he cannot cope with our society, and that for his own good and that of society he should be locked up. That goes not only for those who kill people, who kill others, but it also goes for all violent people.

But it is not necessary for us to authorize the state to do something that we have not the courage to do ourselves.

[Mr. Reilly.]

The killing of another human being guarantees only one thing. If he is a murderer, it guarantees he will not be here tomorrow to repeat his offence. However, that is equally true of car thieves, forgers and pickpockets, and it is not the answer. We must learn to distinguish between the crime and the person. Just as there are non-capital crimes committed by people who would never be turned loose, who ought to be imprisoned for life, there are capital crimes committed by people for whom one day in jail would be unnecessary. This kind of approach and emphasis on public safety and rehabilitation, with the one before the other, would take a great deal of money to put into effect. The present slapdash approach to sentencing and parole, which is under justified attack from all sides, would have to be scrapped. In its place we should put a system which does not punish but protects, which does not destroy but renews where possible. It is always more difficult to save a bad situation than to quit cold and move along; but very often, Mr. Speaker, the rewards are worth the trouble.

We are told that capital punishment is a deterrent. If that were so it would seem to me that when it was suspended for all but one category of murders, the number of offences within that one category would either stabilize immediately or diminish. Yet we find, and these are the only statistics I shall cite, that in 1968, the first year after the Criminal Code was amended, there were eight persons charged with the murder of policemen, the only offence which still carried the death penalty. That was an increase of 800 per cent over the previous year when only one person was so charged. In 1969, that figure fell to seven persons charged with murdering a policeman, and in 1970 it fell back to one. If those figures tell us anything, it is that the presence of the death penalty did not deter anyone, and that the incidence of crime, violent and otherwise, is a totally unpredictable thing.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, and I am getting rather weary of the proposition, that the burden of proof in this matter rests upon me or upon those who support my position. In a sense our position is analagous to that of defence counsel, and I submit that the only thing incumbent upon us is to demonstrate a reasonable doubt. The burden of proof, if any proof exists, is clearly upon those who would commit this state perpetually to a policy of cold blooded murder. They have not established even a prima facie case for their position, Mr. Speaker, and their only contributions have been those of obfuscation, bloated rhetoric and alarmist nonsense about what happens on the streets when the sun goes down. They have deliberately tried to confuse the issue of rising violence in general with that of whether the state should demand and collect a life for a life, and they are behaving irresponsibly when they do so.

I do not believe you can prove ultimate principles, Mr. Speaker. You cannot demand a reason for everything. But that does not mean that these principles are unintelligible or imponderable or that they cannot be reflected upon. And surely one of them is that no man, individually or through the agency of the state, has the moral right to kill another, unless his own life is in peril. I want to deal now with the question of our responsibility as Members of Parliament. The theory is being advanced, most recently by the Canadian Association of Police Chiefs, that members ought not to vote according to their individual beliefs or their consciences but according to what has been described as the expressed will of the Canadian people. I do not know of any satisfactory way in which to determine the wish of the electorate, short of holding a plebiscite and requiring every citizen to take part in it upon pain of penalty. But even if there were a way to determine the wish of the electorate it would make no difference to me. I intend to vote according to my conscience, because I believe this is my responsibility as a Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: In support of that position I should like to quote part of an essay on representative government by John Stuart Mill. He says that he disagrees with those who insist that a Member of Parliament is in fact an instructed delegate. He goes on to say that constituents:

> ... are entitled to a full knowledge of the political opinions and sentiments of the candidate; and not only entitled, but often bound, to reject one who differs from themselves on the few articles which are the foundation of their political belief: That in proportion to the opinion they entertain of the mental superiority of a candidate, they ought to put up with his expressing and acting on opinions different from theirs on any number of things not included in their fundamental articles of belief: That they ought to be unremitting in their search for a representative of such calibre as to be entrusted with full power of obeying the dictates of his own judgment: That they should consider it a duty which they owe to their fellow-countrymen, to do their utmost toward placing men of this quality in the legislature: and that it is of much greater importance to themselves to be represented by such a man than by one who professes agreement in a greater number of their opinions: for the benefits of his ability are certain, while the hypothesis of his being wrong and their being right on the points of difference is a very doubtful one.

I hope that members will listen to that message, Mr. Speaker, and that those who have not been listening will read it because I think it is an important doctrine. I hope they will be able to vote according to their own consciences, and when they have finished voting I hope they will be able to contemplate their action free of doubt. It is a fearful responsibility and I am sure most Members of Parliament wish, as I do, that they did not have to accept it.

For me, once I have been forced to take the responsibility, the choice is relatively simple. I have been able to make it a highly personal issue. Recently my wife and I were fortunate enough to have born to us a son. He is now two months old, a little tiny person just becoming aware of the world around him. Some of the happiest moments that I spend—and they are very few these days—are with this little person before I come up here to work in the morning. He is not capable of doing any wrong now but in the years to come if I fail him as a father—and God knows I am a fallible man—or if something vital to humanity is left out of his make-up, he could go wrong. He could come to grievous harm or even do harm to others. I do not like to think that will ever happen, but I have to recognize that it could. Then, I have to ask myself if I could ever contemplate with calm and equanimity the idea that one day my son could be taken out and brutally strangled because he failed or I failed? Could I ever bring myself to believe that society was in some way better off because it destroyed that body that I helped to create? Could I ever believe that one decent purpose was served by choking off for all time that brightness and being of my son? Mr. Speaker, the answer is, whatever he has done, God help me, no, I cannot. I will not ever believe that. My son is no different from anyone else's son.

Those are my arguments, Mr. Speaker. They may not be strong enough to move any hearts. They are not buttressed by ledgers full of facts; they are intuitive. But they are none the less valid because I believe that when men and women presume to decide whether they should kill their brothers and sisters there are more important things to consider than facts. I think they should listen to their inner voice. I have listened to mine and it tells me simply that killing is wrong and we should not do it. I urge all members to support the government bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, it pleases me that I rise immediately after the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) to make my remarks on this very difficult bill before us. He and I come from similar professional backgrounds and share, from our experience of the world as journalists, the belief that the death penalty is wrong.

My stand as an abolitionist goes back about 11 years to December 11, 1962. In Toronto, at the Don jail on a very cold drizzly night when Canadian society for the last time—and I hope it was for the last time—took life in the name of its laws. That was the occasion of the hanging of Ronald Turpin and Arthur Lucas, both convicted of capital murder. To me, as a young newsman of 22 or 23 years, it seemed like something out of "A Tale of Two Cities", something very medieval or Dickensian; waiting until midnight after all the lights had gone out in the jail and that single, symbolic light remained; waiting for the 30 or 35 minutes for the crowd of drunks to emerge from the nearby bars and the motocycle gangs to come revving their engines; waiting till that light went out and the notice was posted on the door of the jail. Then, I went with the other newsmen to the old city hall where I listened to the sheriff of York county, a witness to the hanging, a man shaking and shaken, declare that he would never again have any part of it, that he had changed his views on the necessity for the death penalty.

In the dark of night, in the 1960's, in Canada, two men were hanged, back to back, because society said that would stop somebody else from committing the same crime. I cannot believe that, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe that any member of this House, having considered the mass of material that is being circulated to us, can possibly believe that the death penalty is a deterrent.

We all agree that statistics can be manoeuvred and manipulated to make our point. However, I should like to present a few statistics to show that they do not prove a thing, that they are not conclusive and we must refer to facts, because only then do we find some satisfaction in our views or the possibility of changing our views.

I have a list of the murder rate in various American states, those with the death penalty and those without. I am going to refer to it very briefly. In the State of Alabama they have electrocution. According to the latest statistics available for 1971, the murder rate in Alabama was 11.7 per one hundred thousand of population. If I wanted to play with statistics I could go to Rhode Island, which has not had the death penalty for many years. There the murder rate is 2.2 per one hundred thousand. If I were to be more responsible in reciting these statistics I ought to mention those for Massachusetts and Maine. Those states are in about the same part of the U.S.A., both are composed of the same types of people who live in similar environments. In Massachusetts, where electrocution is retained, the murder rate is 2.8; in Maine it is 0.4; so, we still come out ahead in that circumstance. Now let me compare New York with New Jersey. New York, without the penalty, has a rate of 5.4, but New Jersey, with electrocution, has one of 3.9. There, the tendency is in the other direction. What does this prove? It proves nothing when you try to compare murder rates with the imposition of capital punishment or the non-imposition of capital punishment. There is simply no relationship between the punishment and the murder rate.

Of more immediate concern to this House are Canadian statistics. I believe those most recently available are for 1970. The statistics are reported by the various police departments across Canada. I will use them, but I point out the inadequacy of statistics and their use unless there is a very deep study of how those figures are arrived at, and unless they are fully understood and related to the various tables. Briefly, the number of murders reported in Canada in 1970—and this figure will be repeated time and again so I ask hon. members to bear it in mind—was 430. This figure, I repeat, relates to two years ago. According to police records, 430 people were killed. Well, the number of people sent to trial, in other words the number of murder cases that were heard, and I mention murder cases because we are talking about the crime of murder, was 153. Out of 153 cases, only one accused was convicted in 1970 of capital murder under the law of that time; only 34 of 153 were convicted of non-capital murder and 56 were convicted of manslaughter.

So, if we are talking about capital punishment versus non-capital punishment, let us remember that out of 430 cases, or reported cases, there was only one conviction for capital murder. There was a grand total of one convicted out of all that number, under the law. Yet that law remains on the statute books. It is the law of our country and of our society. In other words, we feel that we must take a life, as a society, in order to stop people from taking a life. That is a very strange rationale. Let me repeat the 1970 figure, because we shall return to it again and again. Out of 430 cases or incidents reported by the police departments, one accused was convicted of capital murder. To be fair, there are 33 cases still pending. Nevertheless, one was convicted of capital murder and 153 cases out of 430 incidents went to trial.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) said, in opening this debate the other day, that there is a two-year delay in the provision of adequate statistics and that therefore he would like to have this legislation in existence for another five-year trial period. He suggested that if statistics are to be valid they must be taken from a broad cross-section of the population; only in that way can you reach any conclusion. Any single set of statistics is of questionable value. I am not sure that we need more statistics.

However, if the minister thinks we do then, since he is a member of the government I support, I am prepared to support him in that position only if we cannot do better. I am sure we all harbour our own doubts as to the proper way statistics should be used, because statistics have been compiled for decades around the world. We have seen exact statistics compiled in the United States over the last ten years. There are our own statistics, as I mentioned a moment ago, for 1970. Indeed, if we need more, let us have more, but what will they show? We have already seen that there was one conviction out of 430 incidents.

The issue of a national referendum was introduced into this debate. I think the Solicitor General referred to it and dealt with the matter much more adequately than I could deal with it. Some question arose about the referendum in California where public opinion demanded the return of the death penalty. That referendum had the force of law; it would not have the force of law in Canada. Much more important and more to the point, it seems to me that if we in this House react to popular issues with popular decisions, there is no reason for the existence of this House. We cannot escape the obligation of making decisions on behalf of those who voted for us. I think we should set a very dangerous precedent indeed if we were to try to escape making such a difficult decision as this through the mechanism of a referendum, and thereby set a precedent that could have an effect in law. In any crisis in future when any unpopular decision would have to be taken by parliament, that is the precedent we would follow.

It is said that the polls show that an overwhelming number of people want the return of the death penalty. Without trying to be biased, and forgive me if I am, I remind hon. members that our system of law and parliamentary procedure is very much based on the British system. I do not think that parliament across the water is disintegrating and I do not think its effectiveness as one of the best trial by chance, true democratic means of carrying on government and holding together a society is failing. I think we respect it and do not try to impute motives to whatever government is at the helm at the moment. It should be remembered that just before the government of Great Britain voted for the permanent abolition of the death penalty, 80 per cent of the people polled had said, "No, we want the death penalty." Would anyone say that the British parliament turned against its people, or that it had not tried to act wisely and carry out its heavy responsibilities under that system.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) mentioned the RCMP when he spoke in this debate a few days ago. He said that there was great concern over declining morale of the NDP—

Mr. Stanfield: Not the NDP.

Mr. Fleming: I beg your pardon. I did not mean the NDP; I withdraw that. I meant that there is concern over declining morale in the RCMP.

Mr. Woolliams: I expect to see the NDP leader rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak about improving the morale of that party, if it needs improving. I was talking about the RCMP. The hon. member for Yukon said that the RCMP suffered from low morale and that morale should not be further eroded as it would be if we permitted the bill before the House to pass. I for one, along with any really involved Canadian who cares for his country and participates in its activities, take great pride in the RCMP and the respect it has brought us around the world. Yet, surely to goodness there is a basic difference to be remembered; they are law-enforcers and we are law-makers. We must take into account their views and their experiences, but the decision is ours. If the morale of the force is low, surely to goodness it is not low because we are not hanging people—even if the RCMP thinks we ought to. We must consider that morale and correct it, if anything is wrong, without resorting to that kind of red herring and without embellishing the kind of argument that pits the morale of that force against society taking human life under its laws.

An old friend of mine who is a prison psychiatrist has written me a letter. He is not a wild-eyed dreamer, but a practical man. He wrote to me and I wrote to him; we do not agree completely, as one can see from the contents of his letter. However, we do not think the issue of the death penalty is simple. It is much more complicated than, "Execute and be safer or do not execute and be unsafe." He wrote:

> I would rather confine my remarks to my observations, after ten years of forensic work, on convicted murderers. At least one I know is probably completely innocent. Several others were undoubtedly mentally ill at the time of their offense, but not so markedly so as to convince a court of their lack of guilt by reason of insanity. Several (especially the women) were with a person who committed a murder, but struck no blow themselves, and often deny any knowledge that a murder was planned. Most Canadian killers commit murder only once within a highly-charged emotional relationship, often within the family. It seems entirely capricious to me that some of the accused in a homicide offense are found not guilty for reasons of accident, self-defense, automatism, or are found guilty of manslaughter rather than murder. This might depend on the calibre of the lawyers, the judge, the public reaction to the apparent facts, the demeanour or social class of the accused, etc. The point seems to revolve around this—there is a tradition that the lawbreaker should be punished, and most severely for severe crimes. After society has exacted its retribution, and reminded the populace of its basic sanctions, then how many of these people remain dangerous?

According to the experts, not many remain dangerous. Some do, and we ought to enact laws that will protect us from those few. That does not mean that we need to kill those people in order to be protected. I shall deal with that argument in a moment. What is the relationship between a death penalty and the number of convicted murderers? I read from the second paragraph of this letter:

> You tell me that those who wish to retain capital punishment are concerned about the rising crime rate, violence in the streets, and the safety of the public. So are all decent citizens. The growth of crime may have its roots in a very complex causality—e.g. the decline of the stable family structure, over-population, urbanization, the dishonesty of corporations or unions, parole, drugs, government waste, the Bail Reform Act, the welfare philosophy, the decline of the churches, etc.

Any one of those reasons is important. Not just because the law says you may hang or you may not hang.

I want to make one further quote if I may. This is a quotation from Lewis Lawes who was the warden of Sing Sing Prison for many years. Warden Lawes said:

> Not only does capital punishment fail in its justification, but no punishment could be invented with so many inherent defects. It is an unequal punishment in the way it is applied to the rich and to the poor. The defendant of wealth and position never goes to the electric chair or to the gallows. Juries do not intentionally favour the rich, the law is theoretically impartial, but the defendant with ample means is able to have his case presented with every favourable aspect, while the poor defendant often has a lawyer assigned by the court . . . with no experience.

In making his case the other day, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon showed his great debating skills. These are, I am sure, known not only to members in this House but elsewhere as well. Before I came here I had heard about them. He has what I would call an excessive ability to manoeuvre words and situations. As an example, he quoted the Toronto Star of January 18, 1973, and he seemed to imply, in his use of that quotation, that the rule of majority must be the rule this debate should follow. The hon. member for the Yukon said that in an earlier debate on this subject he had made a long and objective study and had taken a particularly unemotional look at the question. He went on to say that statistics did not prove anything. On that point I must agree.

The Star article the hon. member quoted was cited without reference to its author. The newspaper itself, I would like to make clear, is on record as being in favour of abolition, but it is in favour of abolition with a proviso that would guarantee the real safety of society. I quote from an editorial which appeared in the same newspaper, the Toronto Star, two days later than the article quoted by the hon. member for Yukon. It is headed, "A substitute for the gallows", and reads as follows:

> One of the basic problems in the debate over retaining the ban on capital punishment is what to do with hard-core murderers—the type who were almost always hanged under the old system. The penalty for non-capital murder is now, nominally, life imprisonment, but under present practice prisoners sentenced to life may be released on parole after serving 10 years.
> If the National Parole Board had an infallible record in selecting prisoners suitable for release, there might be no quarrel with this; but the board is unfortunately anything but infallible. As a result a great many people are haunted by the fear of hardened, vicious killers being turned loose to kill again, and their fears have contributed to the demand for the return of the gallows.

The article goes on, Mr. Speaker:

> To meet this problem, Solicitor-General Warren Allmand has indicated that he is considering a mandatory minimum sentence of 25 years for all convicted murderers.
> This is altogether too sweeping. Murderers after all, fall into many categories.

The article goes on to make reference to crimes of passion and so on. The article later goes on to say:

> But there are other types of murderers for whom long minimum sentences are certainly justified. They include hired killers, political assassins and terrorists, sexual psychopaths and other psychopathic killers. These are the types who, if released, are likely to repeat their crimes. Keeping them under lock and key for as long as possible is therefore a measure of public safety.

If Allmand's proposed 25-year minimum sentence were restricted to murderers in these classifications, it would do a good deal to reassure the public, and it might disarm a good deal of the opposition to the permanent abolition of the death penalty.

I apologize to the minister if the 25-year minimum idea has been hung upon him but the non. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and I do propose it. I will get back to that point in a moment. I am sure most hon. members are aware that we had intended to propose something along that line. We are not making a formal amendment at this time. We are still considering how the principle might be adjusted a little.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) made reference to the question of crime in the streets. I was pleased to hear that he feels safe in our streets and I must admit that I share his feeling. However, many women and children do not feel safe. In the suburban part of Metropolitan Toronto from which I come there has been a great deal of crime, including several murders, over the last year or two. There has been an increase in drug problems, and evidence of increasing fear among the people. It is unfortunate that people have focussed upon the death penalty as a means of regaining their safety, as if this vengeance would put fear into criminals. I do not believe that retention of the death penalty will have the effect they desire. The general rate of crime has gone up more rapidly than has the murder rate. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot relate the two. I cannot believe that a couple of hangings, terrible as it would be for society to return to that condition, would change the trend of crime.

I agree we have to review the bail system, the parole system and tighten them where necessary. We have to work toward a healthier society, and I appreciate that this sounds lofty, as does being in favour of motherhood and so on. Right now, in my opinion, it is more necessary to work toward this healthier society than it has ever been. Perhaps we should direct ourselves to improving our environment and education—and when I say "education" I mean not just education to be scholarly, but education in coping with the tremendous drives and strains of our day.

While I will, if I must, support the bill before us, I do hope that at a more appropriate time, perhaps in committee, I may argue with its principle to some small degree. I wish to say that I would rather not have half the principle, but the whole principle, while recognizing the need for deterrent power and especially the feeling of public safety through whatever final legislation is approved by this House. For that reason, as many are probably aware from statements outside the House, the hon. member for St. Denis and myself will attempt at a more appropriate moment to get a life imprisonment term for first degree murder which will mean a 25-year incarceration period, without release for any reason other than, perhaps, to attend a funeral of a mother whilst under guard escort; 25-years of incarceration with just a possibility of parole to give a glimmer of hope. At this point, I think it is important to put emphasis on the safety of people rather than on that of the criminal.

If some are alarmed at this idea on the grounds of the impossibility of rehabilitation, let them argue the point as statistics become available. Maybe, if they prove their point, this regulation can be rolled back. But only by parliament. I believe that the taking of life by society has proved not only ineffective, but that it is wrong. Meanwhile I do believe we must give our people some reassurance that we are acting in the interests of their safety.

There are two letters I would like to read, if I may, Mr. Speaker, because I hope that some hon. members have received similar reactions. The first letter reads:

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I have just read in this morning's Gazette that you and Mr. Marcel Prud'homme propose to introduce an amendment to the bill regarding capital punishment whereby convicted murderers would not be eligible for parole for 25 years. Congratulations. I hope you are successful. I have just written my own M. P., Mr. Warren Allmand, to this effect.

Until now, people like myself, and I believe we run into thousands and possibly millions, have had no alternative but to ask for the return of the death penalty because any other punishment was ridiculously easy on the murderer. Loss of freedom for 8 - 10 years seems ridiculous to me for such a crime anyway, and I believe if you are successful with your amendment the feeling of the population toward banning the death penalty either permanently or temporarily would be completely different.

Mr. Speaker, my time is running short but in conclusion I should like to make reference to the formation in 1964 of the Canadian Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty. From time to time during this debate we have heard references made to the "do-gooders" who are in favour of motherhood and against sin. Let me give you an idea of what this Society is. First off, it is not a social service agency, though the work that they do is just great and should always be respected. So often the public's view of such organizations is slanted in that sense. It was founded by a young man named Ted Matlow, who was a law student at the University of Toronto. He had read some news stories and reports and became concerned when this issue was building here that no one in society was trying to focus on the wrongness of taking life under our law. He wrote letters to 30 Members of Parliament and former members of parliament who got together and formed this society.

To show that this is not a matter of political philosophy but rather a matter of conscience and understanding, let me give the House an example of the kind of people who belong to this society. For example, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) was a member of the founding group. The leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), was also a member of that group. Senator Wallace McCutcheon, who can hardly be described as a left-wing Liberal, was a member of that group. The late Mr. Ross Thatcher was also a member. So was Frank McGee, once a member of this House. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), very respected by his fellow members, especially those on the benches opposite, was a member of that group. All of these were men and women who felt concerned enough to get together and decide to fight for the principle that society should not take life.

I want to make one thing clear as I conclude. This does not for one moment mean that I, as an abolitionist, have any right to be pious, to look down my nose at those people who honestly believe that the death penalty is necessary. If those people succeed in this debate and we return to the law as it stands today, and as it stood before the trial period, then the onus on them will be much greater than that which the rest of us, as abolitionists, will bear if we succeed. Because by voting for retention they in fact carry the weight of society's decision to take a life. If these 120 votes or so succeed, that will start the gallows working again. I do not scoff at the responsibility that they bear or how deep their conviction is within their conscience, for they must live with that. But I am sure that they must be as aware on their side as we are on ours of the real concern. I am not afraid to live with an angry public because of a superficial understanding of what I believe. The retentionists may have the public with them this time, but they must live with themselves if we in fact go back to hanging.

In studying this matter in the past I remember making some reference to what was said by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It is a small point and not the most important point in this debate. I think the most important point is the issue of deterrence and whether or not society should take life; whether it is for the public good to do so. Public safety is also important. The right hon. member for Prince Albert is on our record as having said that in his own experience as a criminal lawyer he saw one client of his condemned, executed, and then six months later the star Crown witness came foward and confessed to the crime.

I should like to refer to one final letter, if I may. This letter came to me a week or so ago and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I would like to sincerely approve of the proposal to be put forth to the Federal Government (and also by Marcel Prud'homme) re capital punishment.

I cannot quite bring myself to advocate the death penalty for murderers, either of the police doing their duty, or of a civilian, in spite of the fact that my husband and two business associates were murdered in Hamilton in 1937.

The murderer, father of a lawyer in that city, served a term in Kingston, during which time he apparently became a model prisoner and went about teaching religion to other inmates.

He was released some years later—where he is or what he is doing I have no idea, nor do I wish to know, and I never discuss it with anyone.

I did, however, call our member, Mr. Terry O'Connor of Oakville, and told him of this tragedy in my life and of my approval of your proposal—with accent on 25 year minimum sentences.

The guilty man (or woman) has to live with this dreadful act he has committed and perhaps, by the grace of God, can make something of his life.

I support the government, and I hope very much that this bill, after receiving the support of this House on second reading, will go to committee. At that time I hope with my colleague, the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), to make some proposals with regard to a 25 year minimum life sentence and also with regard to the categories of first degree murder.

More than anything, however, I hope that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) is wrong—I know that he speaks in honesty and conscience—when he says he believes that the retentionist side will win. I appreciate that all of us have to act in accordance with our own conscience and in light of our own experience, reflecting, of course, the views of our electorate. But I would find it incredible if today we voted for retention, in view of the number of states that have abolished the death penalty and the example of Great Britain, whose government stood in the face of a public that was not fully aware of the situation and voted according to conscience to abolish the death penalty. The British parliament continues its tradition of making difficult as well as easy decisions. Then, there is the example of the United States which has to cope with the terrible dilemma posed by the referendum that was held in California recently and which resulted in a mix-up of the law. I hope that when the moment comes for the final vote, we shall take the responsibility upon ourselves, and as individuals, be we retentionists or abolitionists, vote according to our own mind, not simply reflecting the will of our constituents or any other group.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the calibre of my remarks will be equal to the calibre of the debate we have had to date. I listened with great interest to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly), the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), and also to the brief remarks, in view of the shortness of time, of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). I think the debate has been of very high calibre.

Let me come down to the nub of the matter. I think parliament wants to know where I stand on the abolition bill. I am going to oppose the bill. I will support only law that retains some from of capital punishment—and I emphasize some form of capital punishment—for planned, premeditated, deliberate killing, known as culpable homicide, and for the killing of a person by violent means where any reasonable person would or ought to know that death would ensue. This is defined as capital murder. That is the provision in the law today, unless this bill receives a vote of confidence in this House.

I support the formula that was devised by the Diefenbaker government under which murder was defined as culpable homicide, categorized either as capital or as non-capital murder. From my experience, only in exceptional cases does a trial judge let the matter go to the jury as capital murder under the formula of 1961. In other words, only when the evidence indicates a certainty that the killing of another person was planned, premeditated, deliberate or caused by violence that was planned and premeditated, and as a result death ensued, is the jury asked to decide, first, whether the murder was capital or non-capital. Ninety-five per cent of cases under the old formula went to the jury as non-capital murder cases, which called for a penalty of life imprisonment. Hence, for most murders the death penalty was abolished as early as 1961. That was the first step in the reform of our criminal law. I think all of us would agree, whether we are abolitionists or retentionists, that that was the case.

Before discussing the merits of my argument for capital punishment as an effective punishment for capital murder, let me repeat that in my opinion—I say this quite frankly—there was no need at this time, when Canada is suffering from a lack of economic policy, to have a debate on this bill.

Why do I say that? Since the Trudeau government was elected in 1968 capital punishment has been abolished as a fact, or as we lawyers say, de facto, if not totally by law, or de jure. As the Solicitor General told me last Friday in response to my questions, no one has paid the price according to law by suffering death for killing a police officer or a guard, and no one is waiting in custody for a commutation of the death penalty at this time. Those are the facts and that is where we start on this debate. There has been a complete softening and easing, in my opinion, on capital punishment under the present government with reference to those found guilty of murder and violent crime.

The 1967 bill was only approved by this House of Commons on the grounds that capital punishment would remain for all those convicted of killing police officers and guards. The government would never have been able to get this bill approved by certain areas of this country if that solemn undertaking had not been given by the government, which is lead by the same man today. No sooner had the bill passed than a group of prisoners awaiting penalties had their sentences commuted. There were 12 of them who were found guilty of murdering police officers and guards who had their sentences commuted, and I will deal with their names later. A number of them were awaiting the sentence, but the bill was no sooner passed and received Royal approval than their sentences were commuted. In my opinion, this was a fraud perpetrated on parliament.

The Trudeau government has not changed and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has not changed. All those people convicted of capital murder under this bill will have their sentences commuted as has been done previously. I would rather see a government come in today and say honestly that it intends to abolish capital punishment absolutely, and then let us have a vote on that. Truly that is what we will be voting on when this bill comes back from the committee for third reading.

In my opinion this debate was called by the government for the purpose of sweeping under the carpet serious problems of unemployment and inflation, as well as the suffering and frustration of our senior citizens and those on fixed incomes who are waiting for relief in respect of all these economic cares. In a sense, the Prime Minister has carried out the emasculation of the democratic process by ignoring the will of the people who are asking for immediate relief, and this course is being supported unfortunately by the NDP because it must do so for its own survival. It is that support which is the reason this government, defunct and bankrupt of ideas, is now still in office.

Let me now turn to the names of those people convicted by due process of law in Canada, which means a trial by jury in most provinces, with the exception of one, the right to an appeal and the right with leave, and under certain circumstances without leave, to go to the Supreme Court of Canada, of murdering police officers and guards but who have had their sentences commuted since January 4, 1968. There are 12 in all, and they are as follows: Douglas J. Booth, René G. Castellani, Jean-Jacques Boivin, David A. DeLeon, Henri Boivin, Herbert M. Myers, Harold A. Ortt, Ovila Bonlet, Leonard Otto Borg.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

By the way, Borg's sentence was commuted on July 3, 1969.

Then we have Clifford Wickett Lurvey, December 23, 1970; William R. Rosik, February 4, 1971, and the twelfth, Thomas Mason Shand, March 8, 1972. So twelve people convicted of murdering police officers and guards had their sentences commuted, even though there was a solemn understanding that if we passed the bill those people convicted of such crimes would be subject to capital punishment. It is true that there is the Royal prerogative, but it was never intended to be used in that fashion. Where a discretion is exercised 100 per cent one way, there is no discretion at all.

The Solicitor General left the impression by his speech, perhaps unintentionally, that there were only four convicted killers of police officers and guards who had their sentences commuted since January 4, 1968, whereas there were four under the 1967 bill but 12 in total since January 4, 1968. I repeat that there were four as a result of the 1967 act, but the government stayed eight executions of killers of police officers and guards while the 1967 bill was being approved and receiving Royal Assent. In brief, all 12 were convicted under the same kind of law. There was no change in 1967 from what existed in 1966, when it comes to that, because in 1967 the law in respect of killing police officers and guards did not change the penalty.

Then on Friday, and I am not breaking a confidence here because this is a matter of information, I received the following letter from the Solicitor General:

Eldon.

I just got more information on your question. There were 17 commutations on January 4/68—

This means that over and above the eight, there were nine found guilty of capital murder under the old law who received commutation of sentence on that date. The letter continues as follows:

The government decided to get these matters dealt with before the new law got fully under way.

We have really had complete abolition. There is no question but that the government wanted complete abolition, so it could have gone ahead with the economic problems and I am sure this would not have bothered the conscience of any Cabinet member. That is the point I wanted to make.

All arguments and points of view in reference to capital punishment have previously been discussed, stated and restated in this parliament. We have had two lengthy debates. Nothing has changed and nothing new will come out of this debate. Do you think any person will really change his mind after the debate is over or because statistics and figures will be given by various people to support their own viewpoints and special interests, showing increases or decreases or a holding of the line in respect of murder convictions? Murder victims are not mathematical figures; murder victims are human figures and spell human suffering at all levels.

We have had a tremendous amount of statistics. I received a call from the Calgary Herald on January 18, 1973 which indicated there were some statistics left out. I am not going to spend too much time on statistics because my time is limited and I do not want to waste it in this way. I can only draw the conclusion that a breakdown of homicide has been made into 10 or 12 categories. When we look at those categories we must make some deductions. When you lump them together they do not mean very much.

The number of murders in the course of robbery and theft, which is violence, shot up almost 100 per cent during the first three years after the ban. After seven years with fairly level figures, about 65 or 68 killings, there were 119 in the next three years. If you analyse the statistics and motives you will find that murder shot up in numbers in connection with crimes of all kinds; sex crimes and others. The only type of murder where the figures did not go up were those murders caused by passion, generally killings between spouses, which always, as I suggested in my introductory remarks, would be categorized as non-capital murder as a judge would withdraw a different charge from the jury.

I am the first to admit that this subject is a highly emotional and highly controversial one. That is why I was so happy to hear the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) speak as he did. In this party when we say there will be a free vote, we mean a free vote. There will be no duress on members of this party from anyone. Certainly, we all feel sympathy for an accused awaiting trial and at the time of conviction. I have had experience and I know the feelings of the family, the accused and the community as a result of a conviction. We have sympathy at the time when there is an agonizing waiting period in the penitentiary. You only have to talk to the people who have been in penitentiaries for years to know what kind of a penalty that is.

All of these things after the event tend to work men and women into an emotional frenzy. However, on the other hand, if there were as much emphasis and publicity about some of the monstrous, horrifying and brutal crimes committed against society, the emotional frenzy and sympathy could well run the other way and certainly would be more inflammatory. One only has to consider how the people felt in Vancouver after the Head case.

Let us consider the Head case. This is a man who had been convicted on four different occasions of brutal, sexual assaults on girls between the ages of six and nine years. During the time he was under a life imprisonment sentence he was once declared criminally insane and had the sentence reduced to 15 years. He was released illegally, in my opinion, and I have not time to go into that, and while out of the penitentiary he was accused and found guilty of murdering Tanya Busch, a girl of about six or seven years of age who was the daughter of a prison guard. This apparently was a vendetta against the girl's father.

There are many other cases I could outline and if this bill should go to the committee I hope to deal with them there. I was criticized when I cited the Head case in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister in order to defend his solicitor general, tried to accuse me of linking the two, meaning Head and the victim, prior to the charge of murder. I ignored that remark then and I do so now. My purpose in this debate is to see that society is protected in these cases against administrative asininity. Of course, the minister must take responsibility in this case. The previous minister went on and on and on, and would not stop until finally it became a chronic situation and changes were made. Certainly, we should have rehabilitation of convicted prisoners. I should like to congratulate the new Solicitor General in that regard. It should be remembered that the former solicitor general never understood the priority; that the protection of society must be paramount over rehabilitation and paramount over any other consideration is the protection of society. That is the fundamental matter to be considered in this debate and no other.

I speak from experience. It is not for me to discuss how many times I have been called upon to use my energy and ability to defend those charged with murder. The Solicitor General was teasing me the other day because he had gone to a certain institution and met 12 inmates who had been convicted of murder and who had got a new trial. He was somewhat surprised, but I know something of standing in court with the responsibility of defending people charged with capital and non-capital murder. I mention that only to emphasize that my experience should permit me to speak from the other side of the fence as it were.

Many of my friends suggest that basically I should be an abolitionist, but in the face of violent crime and the lack of consideration for the most precious civil right of all, the right to live within that degree of freedom and liberty that a free society guarantees the individual, I say that the most important civil right is life. I must measure up, therefore, to the responsibility and oppose the bill. Those who obey the law must have rights as well as those who deliberately and violently break the law. If I thought imprisonment was the answer I would support the bill. However, I only have to refer to examples such as the Geoffroy case and the Laporte case to see how much consideration is given to the accused and how little consideration is given to the victims or their relatives, even to the extent that Geoffroy should spend his honeymoon in Spain. I once described it as "going the Goyer way".

The bill flaunts the will of the people of Canada. I dare this government and the abolitionists to test the will of the people on the question of capital punishment by plebiscite. I have started to take my own plebiscite but I did not have time to send out house mail so I advertised asking for a straight yes or no. In the last three days, 996 replies came in from Calgary North asking for the death penalty on planned and premeditated murder but only 70 replies were against it. Total replies were 1066 so that gives me some idea of how people are worked up about the way our society is protected today.

We all dream of a day when society would be safe for the smallest and the frailest. I listened to the hon. member for Ottawa West and I wish to congratulate him on the recent birth of a son. We all reject the law "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" and hope that in the 20th century the scaffold will be dead, war will be dead and violence will be dead—but they are very much alive, Mr. Speaker.

Where have we failed in society? Today, we look around us and see that monstruous, planned and deliberate murder is committed and for what purpose? I will deal with questions of insanity and provocation in a few minutes, but why are most murders committed? They are committed for power and materialism.

One of the arguments presented by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) in favour of abolition is the fear of judicial error. Let us talk about that, Mr. Speaker. It would have been more likely to occur prior to 1961 when the definition of murder was changed. The penalties were changed too; for example, life imprisonment for non-capital murder and the death penalty for capital murder. When you have a capital murder case before a judge and jury and the evidence leaves any doubt, not any reasonable doubt but any doubt, in the judge's mind, he reduces the charge to non-capital murder and the jury then only has to decide the question of guilt or innocence. That has been my experience before the high courts in Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I am sure that the judges in the other provinces also understand their responsibility and duty. We have a great judiciary in Canada; our judiciary cannot be compared with that of the United States. Since 1961, few have been convicted of capital murder because where the evidence leaves any doubt—not any reasonable doubt—the judge would withdraw the question of capital punishment from the jury and they would have to decide only on the question of guilt or innocence.

What are some of the defences to murder? Some people believe that if a person has been killed, there has been a homicide. That is not necessarily the case, Mr. Speaker. Let us deal with insanity, Mr. Speaker. Is it any defence? The law of insanity has been more liberally interpreted by the courts. Although parliament has not amended the M'Naghten rule in reference to the law of insanity for 100 years, our knowledge now of diseases such as schizophrenia, paranoia or a combination of both, has increased. From scientific and medical experiments, experts are able to advise the court far better than they did 100 years ago or even ten years ago. The courts have liberally interpreted the section which sets the following test: First, did the accused know the nature and quality of his act and, second, did he know the act was wrong? In other words, did he know what he was doing and did he know it was wrong? Some people lack social conscience and cannot determine what is right or wrong. I had a case once where one brother shot another on the golf course and, because of something in his environment or make-up, he was declared insane. He did not know that what he was doing was wrong. The law provides protection in such a case.

Provocation is another defence. In my experience, courts are giving a more liberal interpretation of the law where culpable homicide may be reduced to manslaughter if provocation is proven. This is where a reasonable man is provoked beyond what a reasonable man can take. For example, if a man came home and found his wife in bed with somebody else and, without any time elapsing, killed that person, that is not murder but it may be manslaughter.

Last but not least, the courts are now being presided over by younger, more progressive thinking judges and, in consequence, there is a more liberal interpretation of the law. I know when I was a young lawyer some of the judges I appeared before used to make me shake and tremble. Today, the atmosphere is more homey and the judicial atmosphere is that justice not only must be done but must be seen to be done.

Life imprisonment and capital punishment have proven to be inadequate with the administration ignoring the Criminal Code which demands that before a person is released there must be an order in council permitting his release. In consequence, these people are released only to duplicate or substitute another crime of violence. I ask hon. members to check their copies of the Criminal Code. Section 684(3) reads:

> Notwithstanding any other law or authority, a person in respect of whom a sentence of death has been commuted to imprisonment for life or a term of imprisonment or a person upon whom a sentence of imprisonment for life has been imposed as a minimum punishment, shall not be released during his life or such term, as the case may be, without the prior approval of the Governor in Council.

When our late prime minister, Mr. Pearson, introduced that provision, I thought it was somewhat dangerous because it put the matter in the field of politics. But today, released criminals wander around. Just today I was told of a case in Calgary—I will check it out—where a young person was sentenced to 15 years for kidnapping a girl and locking her up in the trunk of a car for a period of seven or eight hours. Now, that offender is going to university, and spends one or two days a week in jail. That is a fine way to get a schooling. If you cannot afford university commit the right crime, such as kidnapping.

In his speech, the minister stressed swift administration of justice. In my opinion, he overlooked one of the most important things, namely, proper punishment. Mr. Justice Mackay of the Court of Appeal of Ontario had something to say about this matter in 1954. He visited prison institutions in the United States, and also at Kingston in Canada. The honourable lady behind me in this party knows something about Kingston, Mr. Speaker. Over the years a few riots have broken out at Kingston. Here is what Mr. Justice Mackay said:

> The ultimate justification of any punishment is not alone that it's a deterrent, but that it is the emphatic denunciation by the community of a crime, and from this point of view there are some murders which, because of the enormity of their horror, demand the most emphatic denunciation of all, the death penalty.

He was talking about two young men who had taken an old couple in Northern Ontario and sat them on an electric stove, turned on the burners and tortured them in order to get a few pennies from their pension cheques. The punishment must suit the enormity of the crime. As I say, in 1954 Mr. Justice Mackay had interviewed many prisoners in the United States. Bank robbery was a common crime in those days, and criminals told him on occasion they would not take ammunition with them fearing that if they used guns, and were caught, they might fry. Those were their words.

I am not here to say whether capital punishment is a deterrent, but I agree with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in that regard. The most precious civil right is surely the right to life. Today we heard one speech about humanity. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) talked about young girls and boys being safe on the streets. Mr. Speaker, I have kept a file on violent crimes over the last two months, violent crimes against children. I hold it in my hand. I do not think the streets are that safe. When we talk about capital punishment being a deterrent I will end with these words, and maybe this is the answer:

> There is a rock in a harbour, and upon it a lighthouse is placed to warn ships of the danger. One hears about the ships that run upon the rock in the fog, or during the storm, but one never hears of the ships that passed by in safety.

That is an argument in favour of the deterrent. Who knows how many people capital punishment has deterred from committing murder?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, a previous participant in this debate has remarked that at this stage most of the members have already made up their minds and it is hardly likely their attitudes will be changed in the course of the debate, even by the most eloquent and cogent speeches. For this reason I was inclined to refrain from contributing to the debate, and particularly because I so entirely agree by what was said by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), and also today by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly). However, I have received, as no doubt have other hon. members, a great many letters from individuals and organizations both within my constituency and outside of it, and I did take an active part in the parliament that passed the act of 1967, the partial test ban, which we are now asked to extend for another five years.

I have deeply held convictions on this subject that I would like to express. I would much prefer the final and total abolition of capital punishment, but I will support the partial ban in the present bill as the best available means of moving towards that final and total abolition.

These are moral issues, and questions of fact are involved as well as questions of principle. In my opinion capital punishment, the taking of life by the state, is degrading. Above all, after the most careful study that I have been able to make, I have come to the conclusion that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent and serves no useful purpose.

Many of those who wish to see the return of capital punishment and argue for its retention do so very sincerely, and because of their belief that it is necessary for the protection of society against the gravest of all crimes, the commission of deliberate murder. But in my view this is a mistake.

The great and preponderant weight of the evidence is in favour of the proposition that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent. Mr. Speaker, the matter has been argued over the years in many jurisdictions. I have not the time and I do not want to go into all of them. I was impressed by the statement of Professor Fattah on this matter in his "Study of the Deterrent Effect of Capital Punishment with Special Reference to the Canadian Situation," prepared for the Solicitor General, which has already been cited in parliament by the Solicitor General himself. He concludes that the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent is so limited that its abolition cannot have any serious effect on the incidence of murder.

He cites the following limits of deterrence: one, deterrence is irrelevant to the bulk of the population who follow the normal norms of society and whose self-concepts will not permit them to commit crimes, including crimes of murder. Two, deterrence cannot be effective in the case of certain acts of impulsive nature where high emotions or strong motivations are involved. I suspect that they are a very large percentage of the crimes of murder. Three, deterrence cannot be effective for certain categories of criminals such as insane, abnormal, impulsive or compulsive offenders or those consciously or unconsciously seeking to be punished. Four, the death penalty cannot be an effective deterrent for those who are not afraid to die or for those who have a conscious or unconscious desire to die. This includes murderers who commit suicide. Five, deterrence cannot be effective in the cases where punishment can be avoided. I suspect that in the case of most murderers they are satisfied that the punishment can be avoided by their own actions.

I have seen, and I have no doubt most of the members of the House have seen the statistics relating to this question from Europe, Great Britain, and from the various jurisdictions in the United States of America where, I believe, some 11 states have abolished capital punishment. As far as I have been able to determine it is not an even balance. The unquestionable conclusion to be drawn from these actual experiments in the abolition of capital punishment must be that abolition does not in fact increase the rate of crime.

Let us recall that crime was more rife in communities such as Great Britain when capital punishment was a penalty for conviction of petty theft and numerous other offences. Indeed there, when to pickpocket was to commit a crime carrying capital punishment, many people carried on their occupation as pickpockets in the shadow of the gallows, and that is a fairly good illustration, I think, of how capital punishment was a deterrent. When it was proposed to abolish capital punishment in England for the theft of goods worth five shillings or more from a shop, Lord Ellenborough, Chief Justice of the Kings's Bench, said that the repeal of the law and the abolition of the death penalty for stealing goods worth five shillings would cause the most dire consequences, including complete loss of security by homeowners in Britain. The same sort of argument is being used today, and it has the same sort of validity.

There are, of course, much more recent examples. There have been in innumerable studies of the matter by those expert in criminology. The great majority of experts have concluded, as stated by Barnes & Teeters, eminent penologists, in a book entitled, "New Horizons in Criminology", as follows:

> History reveals the most varied and numerous proofs that there is no correlation between the severity of the Criminal Code and the infrequency of crime. The statistics that we have available show that there is no ground whatever for holding that the murder rate increases when the death penalty is abolished.

That is stated as a fact by experts and by innumerable people who have taken the trouble to examine the facts.

Let us deal with the moral issue. Let me quote what the Reverend Archbishop Temple of Great Britain, for whom I have the highest regard and reverence, has written:

> I believe that the example of the state taking life, even when it does so in return for life already taken, does more to lower the value of human life in the minds of its citizens than the deterrent influence of this penalty can do to protect the lives of its citizens. In this way I believe that the main influence of the retention of the death penalty is rather to increase than diminish the number of murders.

Those who propose the retention of capital punishment or, indeed, the repeal of the law passed by parliament in 1967 cite facts to show that there has been an increasing number of murders in Canada since the enactment of the legislation abolishing the death penalty, except in the cases of the murder of police officers and prison personnel. What those who cite such figures fail to observe and what is made quite clear in the volume, "Capital Punishment—New Material 1965 to 1972" published under the authority of the former Solicitor General, is that the increase in the rate of that crime has been less than the general increase in the rate of crime in Canada with respect of offences which are not subject to capital punishment. So, even if there is an increase in the rate of murders, that increase is less, apparently, than the common trend of crimes not affected by the existence of capital punishment.

I now want to turn to another item in the book, "Capital Punishment—New Material 1965 to 1972". As mentioned at page 62, the death penalty has been abolished with respect to convictions for rape in Canada. It is of interest to note that at this time, because that law was abolished as long ago as 1955. One would think that if capital punishment had been an effective deterrent with respect to that crime, the abolition of capital punishment would have been accompanied by a substantial rise in the crime rate respecting that particular offence. Exactly the opposite has happened, as shown by the tables. After the death penalty was abolished for that particular offence, the number of offences steadily declined.

I am persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that those most able to recommend on questions involving moral judgment are almost universally in favour of abolition. As recently as November 24, 1972, and may I be pardoned as an Anglican for citing this authority, Archbishop E. W. Scott, Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, said in a statement to the government that, in his view, the death penalty was immoral as long as there is the faintest possibility that an innocent person might be put to death.

Speaking as a lawyer with some experience in the courts, I know that it is indeed a possibility that an innocent person might be convicted after trial and put to death. In the most advanced jurisdictions of the world there are classic examples of this. The famous Christie case in England is well known because, after an individual was executed for murder, another person confessed to being the guilty party; indeed, it was clear that a miscarriage of justice had resulted. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) testifies to a clear case of judicial error in a murder case in which he was engaged as counsel.

I have the greatest respect for the courts. I have a lot to do with them. They are a necessary and vital institution in our society. Nevertheless, the courts are a human institution. It is notorious that, on occasion, they do err. I, myself, have been involved in cases—not, I admit capital cases—in which subsequent new evidence has shown that decisions made and confirmed by courts of first instance and approved by courts of appeal were, in fact, clearly and entirely erroneous. Another case that comes to mind is the famous Truscott case. That case did not involve the finality of execution. On his conviction, as I recall it, Truscott was either 14 or 15 years old. If he had been older he would have been executed and there would have been no possibility of reviewing his case. I studied his case in great detail and it has always been my view that the dissenting judgment of Mr. Justice Hall in the Supreme Court of Canada, in which he held that there had been a mistrial in the Truscott case, was far more convincing than the judgment of the majority of the court.

Archbishop Scott, in the statement I mentioned earlier, went on to say on November 24, 1972:

> Since there does not seem to be any conclusive evidence that the death penalty does in fact constitute a deterrent, the present legislation should be retained for at least another five years.

The General Council of the United Church of Canada last month confirmed its stand taken in 1956 for the abolition of the death penalty and now asks the federal government to make such abolition a total, permanent feature of the Criminal Code, as of the expiry date of December 29, 1972.

Social workers are another group with experience in this field. In the province of Ontario, the Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers which represents 1,150 professional social workers supports the abolition of the death penalty. They state:

> The issue of the death penalty is really one of ethics and morality. As social workers we feel that the worth and dignity of man is cheapened and lessened by state execution. We are in strong support of the abolition of the death penalty.

There is no lack of high judicial authority on the subject of capital punishment. Quite recently the Supreme Court of the United States, by a five to four verdict, ruled that the death penalty was unconstitutional as it was a breach of the phrase of the Constitution forbidding cruel and unusual punishment. This is a weighty authority in a jurisdiction close to our own and deserves our most careful consideration.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, those countries which can claim the highest measure of social advance have almost exclusively accepted the abolition of the death penalty without serious consequences. I am thinking in particular of the countries of northern Europe, where the murder rates are low and where capital punishment has been abolished for many years. I am thinking of 11 states of the United States of America where the experience has been the same. I am thinking of Great Britain, whose social judgments we have often been content to follow in Canada. In that country, after a checkered career, abolition of the death penalty has now been finally accepted. In my view it would be a retrograde step if, indeed, we were to reintroduce the death penalty as the general consequence of conviction for murder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: I am well aware, of course, as are all members of this House, that the crime of murder is often accompanied by a disregard for human life, by brutality and horror which causes, and justly so, moral indignation. It is my view, however, that moral indignation is a poor basis for judgment. Sometimes moral indignation results in a cry for vengeance. The state should not be the instrument for vengeance or retribution. There is the duty, of course, to protect society; but if, as I have said, the protection of society does not require the use of the death penalty, then the state should not use this means.

• (1640)

I am aware from letters I receive that many of my constituents believe the death penalty to be necessary for their security. All I can say, and I say it with all sincerity, is that I believe they are mistaken. I do not know whether in my constituency the majority would like to see the death penalty retained or restored. I am deeply convinced, however, that this is a matter of moral judgment and conviction and that I have no right to shelter behind any theory as to the counting of heads. Ever since the famous speech of Edmund Burke to the Bristol voters, it has been clear that our parliamentary system does not require us to be counters of heads or automatic reflectors of opinion in our constituencies. We are elected to use our own best judgment and to obey our deepest convictions.

I believe, with all the conviction I can muster, that capital punishment does not perform the function claimed by its supporters, nor do I think it can ever be made to serve such a function. It does not protect society. It brutalizes society. It is an archaic custom which has disappeared in most civilized countries. I earnestly hope that this parliament will not take a backward step but rather that it will, perhaps after further delay and further study of statistical evidence, move toward total and final abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member who has just spoken. He has given us in such an eloquent way an excellent case for the abolition of what he called a custom which is out of date and which ought to be abolished. It is clear that many of the documents from which the hon. member read are familiar to all of us here, so that in this debate there is bound to be some repetition as we explain to other members of this House and to our constituents why we will cast our votes on this bill in a particular way.

There are those who view the capital punishment debate primarily in terms of its effect on law enforcement and public safety. They argue, correctly I believe, that the prevention of violent crime is one of the most important functions of government, and, indeed, a government which fails to establish and sustain the citizens' safety of life and limb is not worthy of support. Many Canadians today believe hanging should be reintroduced as punishment for murder.

The Gallup poll published on February 2, 1972 asked whether or not the death penalty should be brought back. Of those responding, 63 per cent said yes, bring it back. Of those who favoured reinstatement, 64 per cent cited a rising crime rate as their reason. The heart of the matter, then, seems to be whether or not capital punishment is an effective deterrent against the crime of murder. In certain cases it could so be regarded, as, for example, when a convicted murderer kills again after release from prison. The friends and relatives of victims of such crimes have every reason to feel deeply bitter toward a society which allows a dangerous person to be at large and repeat the criminal act of murder.

In general, however, contrary to popular opinion, there is no clear evidence that the death penalty serves as a deterrent against the committing of murder. In the United States, where the use of the death penalty is determined state by state, there is, in fact, an inverse relationship. The five states with the highest homicide rates all retain the death penalty, while the five with the lowest homicide rates have all abolished the death penalty. Over all, the mean homicide rate in retentionist states is more than double the mean rate in abolitionist states. This, of course, does not prove that retaining the death penalty results in more murders; it simply underscores the difficulty of trying to prove through statistics that the death penalty deters murderers.

The most serious of the social arguments in favour of the death penalty, then, is based on the theory of deterrence. It is claimed that if persons intending to commit crimes know what the punishment will be, they will turn away from committing them. At first glance, this seems to make good sense, but upon closer examination the idea proves less convincing. It has been said that an ordinary person is deterred from crime by comparatively minor penalties. A normal person, if sure of being caught, would refrain from a criminal act out of regard for the consequences. Murderers, however, are surely not normal people. They are abnormal people driven by who-knows-what compulsive forces. Certainly, they are driven sometimes by strong emotional forces, by forces accompanying insanity, even though their particular state of mind at the time may not be legally so defined. In conditions like these, no weighing of consequences takes place within the minds of such persons as they decide to kill. The psychopath will not be deterred by threat of punishment, however severe. Crimes of passion, including violent crimes committed under the influence of drugs such as alcohol, cannot reasonably be assumed to be deterrable by a means such as a death penalty.

If it could be proven that the death penalty was in fact a deterrent—and it cannot be so proved—then, surely, every effort should be made to make the deterrent as effective as possible. As it is now, however, most executions are private affairs rather than public spectacles. Attendance is restricted to the prison warden, a physician, a chaplain and a very few others. Surely, it is illogical to admit to the execution only those who are least in need of such a spectacle to deter them from committing murder.

Why, also, if the death penalty is a deterrent, do we chose a method which is considered to be relatively swift and painless in place of one involving prolonged torture and agony? In Canada, hanging has been accepted as a humane method of execution. In the United States, many states have chosen to electrocute or gas the condemned. If deterrence is the main purpose for imposing the death penalty, then it should not be as humane as possible but, rather, slow and agonizing. It should not be a private affair but, rather, a public spectacle.

The bill presently before the House seeks to limit capital murder to cases involving the death of police or prison officers. Those who deal with criminals on a regular basis in the line of duty are unusually susceptible to being murdered. There is no doubt that they ought to receive some special protection, indeed, considerable special protection. It is worth noting, however, that the largest number of police murders, a total of 11, took place in 1962 when capital punishment was still in effect, a year in which two murderers were executed. Since 1962, there have been no executions in Canada; nor has there been an increase in the number of police officers killed in the line of duty. Police work can be extremely dangerous and often is, but there is no evidence to show that having the death penalty in effect makes the working life of a police officer any safer.

It is quite true that there has been an increase in criminal homocide in recent years, but a report from the Solicitor General's department on the deterrent effect of capital punishment, which has been mentioned in several instances in this debate, concludes that the increase cannot be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment. Other violent crimes have also increased, and this situation disturbs and troubles us all. But is the answer to the problem to introduce the death penalty? Is not this simply one more violent reaction to violent action? If we use killing in an effort to prevent killing, then surely this is a sign of despair in our society. It shows that we have no answers to the pressing problem of violent crime and how to prevent it. In addition, capital punishment leaves no room whatsoever for the possible errors of those who sit in judgment on other persons.

I take the stand that the lives of others are not ours to dispose of. The state, in its enforcement of the law against criminal homicide, must not itself permit what amounts to legalized murder. If we appeal to private individuals to refrain from killing, we have just as much right, indeed we have an obligation, also to appeal to the state to refrain from killing.

It should be possible, and I believe that it is possible, to protect society without judicial killing as a sanction. Of course, the public must be satisfied that an individual guilty of murder is given a sentence that is appropriate to his or her crime, considering all the circumstances in each case. The public must be assured that a dangerous criminal is not set free again to threaten our safety. There is surely a need for a better system of deterrence to acts of violence in our society. Certainly, however, the imposition of the death penalty is no such deterrent.

In a five to four decision last June, the United States Supreme Court ruled that the death penalty must be forbidden in almost all cases because it had lost its usefulness. In short, as a deterrent to murder it does not work. I say, then, that we ought to abolish, not in part but outright, the death penalty. When we have done that, we should push on with other social and economic measures which hopefully will be effective in decreasing the resentment and hostility harboured by some of our citizens, for these are the emotions which may very well in some cases lead to acts of violence, including murder.

[Mr. Penner.]

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, with your permission may I call it five o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—External Affairs—Viet Nam—Proposed peacekeeping force—Source of funds to cover cost of Canadian participation; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Old Age Security—Inquiry as to increase in basic amount and lowering of age of eligibility; the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Public Service Amendment of statutes affecting employment—Legislative priority.

PRIVATE MEMBERS MOTIONS

FINANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY ON CROWN CORPORATION ACTIVITIES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee of inquiry on Crown corporations exercising financial, commercial or industrial activities be established to study the various Acts establishing such Crown corporations, the Crown Corporations Act sections 76 to 88 of the Financial Administration Act, and all other laws concerning Crown Corporations and to recommend to the House the adoption of a law regarding federal public enterprises; the committee should also study the following subjects without restrictions (a) the legal rules pertaining to the employees of such corporations (b) their financial structure (c) the way in which they are financed (d) government control over said corporations (e) fiscal regulations (municipal, school, provincial and federal taxes, (f) the status of the administrators (g) the privileges of such corporations resulting from their being "commissioned by Her Majesty" (h) the status of the subsidiaries of these enterprises (i) their purchasing policy (j) the problem of auditing by the Auditor General of Canada or by private auditors (k) the appropriateness of State intervention in the economic field in the form of enterprises; and all other matters concerned.

Mr. Speaker, once again I am introducing this motion concerning Crown corporations and I would like to draw the attention of the House on three specific facts.

Firstly, Crown corporations are creatures of the Government and, as such, of Parliament itself, each one with a specific field of activity. Now, the only information we get as members of Parliament on those corporations is summarized in their respective annual reports. Finally, parliamentary control is just about nonexistent. This I will try to show in a little while.

Secondly, the government to-day, in Canada, ownes and operates about a hundred industrial, commercial or financial corporations the assets of which are in excess of $20 billion. This modern phenomenon of governments involved in business undertakings give rise to many problems especially where parliament and parliamentary control over such corporations are concerned. For instance who will tell me what is the status to-day of a government involved in business dealings? Will it be subject to private law or public law? Will it be given a mixed status and be made subject to both private and public law? What kind of control has parliament over these Crown corporations? How is it that the Auditor General of Canada, who is a parliament employee appointed by parliament cannot audit the books of all these Crown corporations?

For MPs, the main sources of information on Crown corporations are their annual report, written questions on the order paper, and the tabling of documents. We shall see how efficient each of these may be. Why is parliament opposed, through the government, to creating a committee on Crown corporations so that members may control their operations?

Those are questions which warrant consideration since, in this House, Crown corporations are now a forbidden subject. Nobody dares mention them. What means of control do we have over the Crown corporations? They amount to just about nothing. The corporations do send us their annual reports which, and everybody will agree with me, are put away on the shelves to collect dust.

To my mind, normally or ideally, those reports should be referred to a parliamentary committee on public corporations. In a way, such a committee would act as a shareholders' meeting and the members could control the various activities of those companies.

The written questions offer the hon. members another opportunity of obtaining information on Crown corporations. The written questions are those the members put on the order paper. Anybody knows that. They can be technical. However, I would remind my hon. colleagues that in all cases, the minister may decline to answer a question on the order paper without stating his reason for doing so, and it is even against the Standing Orders of the House to insist on getting an answer; furthermore, no debate is allowed under those conditions. In this regard, I refer my colleagues to Citation 181(3), page 158 of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, 4th edition. In other words, neither annual reports nor questions on the order paper have any value as far as parliamentary control is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I am bringing forward the motion before us in order that members of Parliament may exercise some control, be aware of what is happening in Crown corporations, and report to the people of Canada on the activities of some hundred Crown corporations handling over $20 billion of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Speaker, it quite frequently happens that the management of such an agency or the minister in charge refuse to reply to our questions. In fact when a member of Parliament makes an inquiry of a minister or writes to a Crown corporation, inquiring about one area or another, on many occasions he receives negative replies. That is what I particularly want to object to.

For instance, I am concerned with the problem of internal management. A public agency is under no obligation to reply to a question concerning internal management, yet the appointment of personnel of a public agency is solely a responsibility of management. One can make any kind of patronage one wishes. Management never discloses information from the personal files of officers and employees. Also, and I quote:

It is not customary to ask Crown corporations . . . information about their employees or other matters of internal management.

This is why it was so difficult last year, as much for me as for the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, to learn how many employees of each one of these corporations were bilingual, how many had English or French as their mother tongue, what were their salaries. It is a nonsense to tolerate such a situation.

If a member of Parliament wants to inquire about the salaries of the employees of these hundred or so Crown corporations, what will happen? A public corporation will not answer a question either about the salary of an employee or of a group of employees. The answer will be:

. . . salaries are deemed confidential.

I would refer you to the order paper of October 23, 1963, more precisely to question No. 1246. Regarding salaries, the late Hon. Guy Favreau, then Minister of Justice, said, and I quote:

Let us note here that in the Public Accounts, while the individual salary of every public servant paid more than a certain amount is listed, the salaries of employees of a Crown corporation are grouped under a single item. It is practically only through a question directed in the House to the responsible minister that the salary of an officer or an employee of a Crown corporation will be known if it pleases the minister to divulge it.

Then again, may I remind the House of the citation of parliamentary procedure which I quoted earlier, so that the hon. member still cannot get the requested information.

Again recently, the C.B.C. stated through its responsible minister, and I quote:

. . . it is not the Corporation's policy to divulge the salary paid to an individual.

With regard to fees, any public corporation will also refuse to disclose what it pays to an individual.

This is what appears on page 4975 of Hansard for December 4, 1967:

—The Corporation is not usually required to disclose the fees paid to any particular person.

Identical replies were given to questions Nos. 1,713 and 1,868 of December 4 and 18, 1963.

Each time the minister gave exactly the same answer so that one can conclude that CBC is protected by the minister; he is authorized to refuse to answer if he feels like it so that any member, whether on the government side or on the opposition side, has absolutely no control and cannot get information in any way.

On the subject of the contract awarded following a call for tenders the public firm will refuse——to disclose the name of the companies or persons submitting tenders or to give information on the tenders received.

And that at almost any time.

One could also talk about internal studies. It could be interesting sometimes for a member to know the studies made by experts within a given Crown corporation. Those studies, one must admit again, are paid for by the taxpayers.

There again it was decided, and I quote:

—it is contrary to custom ... to disclose the names of persons assigned to studies.

The firm considers those studies to be—

—private documents—

—for the internal use of the firm.

I could refer you to the debates of the House of Commons of February 26, 1969, page 5969. One could also talk about the salary of the president and general manager of a corporation. One can read there:

It is customary not to disclose any information from personal files of civil servants and employees and this custom was supported by the Sessional Committee on Railways and Shipping.

I will refer now to page 5665 of the Debates of December 20, 1967 and page 6387 of the Debates of March 10, 1969.

Mr. Speaker, that answer was given by Air Canada, Northern Transport Corporations Limited, Eldorado Nuclear Limited, Cape Breton Development Corporation and by Polymer Corporation Limited. Nevertheless, the Canadian National, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, the CBC, the CHMC, and the SACE revealed the salary of their chief executive. So there is no established or well defined practice there either.

All that may somewhat bore some of my colleagues but it is nonetheless an extremely important matter. In concluding, I will only call their attention to this: It is a well known fact that a large industrial, commercial and financial area is owned and operated today by the federal government. I will say for the benefit of my colleagues, that the government operates uranium mines, like Eldorado Nuclear Limited, coal mines, like Cape Breton Development Corporation, is carrying out mining exploration through SOQUEM and oil exploration through the Panarctic Oils Limited. The government operates one of the world's largest railway systems with the Canadian National Railways Company. It owns several road transport corporations with the Canadian National Transportation Limited. It operates the most important hotels in Canada with the Canadian National Hotels Limited. It is involved in air transport with Air Canada and Eldorado Aviation Limited as well as maritime transport with the Canadian National and Northern Transportation Corporation Limited.

The State, the federal government, is also one of the largest rubber producers in the world, with Polymer Corporation Limited; it owns and operates one of the largest radio and television systems, namely the CBC, it produces and sells electricity with Hydro-Quebec, Ontario Hydro etc. It grants interest bearing loans through the Industrial Development Bank, the CMHC, the Farm Credit Corporation, the Deposit and Investment Fund, etc. In brief the state owns and operates today more than one hundred of those corporations and thus administers more than $20 billion of the taxpayers' money in goods and capital.

The purpose of the motion I introduced is to urge this House to create a committee to study all factors related to the administration of these corporations. Why is the Auditor General of Canada not allowed to audit the accounts of these corporations? I could refer my colleagues to a question which I asked in the House and that I had to put on the Order Paper. Finally, this question was answered after pressures were put on the minister. I was told that for this or that Crown corporation, the books were audited by a Toronto company, made up of friends of the party in power, etc.

Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General of Canada is the only public officer commissioned by Parliament to audit accounts. I do not understand why this person whom the government does not like but who however has authority, could not audit the books of these corporations on behalf of Parliament. I do not understand why hon. members, who have been elected by their constituents, could not have the privilege and right to sit on a parliamentary committee on Crown corporations, for instance, in order to know the administration, the policy, the investments of such corporations, etc.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion will not only get the attention of my colleagues from all parties in this House, but most of all their support, so that Parliament finds a way to control the Crown corporations and thus account for them to the population in a more efficient way.

[English]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is similar to a notice of motion standing on the order paper in my name and one on which I spoke a few years ago. In fact, his notice of motion goes further than mine. Mine simply suggested that there should be at least one member of parliament on each of the boards of directors of crown corporations in order to have closer control over the spending of government that takes place through the crown corporations. The hon. member for Lotbinière suggests that perhaps a special committee of the House could be established to look into all aspects of crown corporations. I think this is a good idea, although I do not necessarily agree with all the details the hon. member has mentioned. This is something which is long overdue.

We come here as representatives of the people but are unable to represent them because we have absolutely no say over most of the spending of government which takes place through crown corporations. Even the minister has very little to say in the matter because these corporations have become completely autonomous, and it is a bad thing to suggest political interference. Who represents the people of Canada if not the Members of Parliament? We should be looking into these matters; indeed, it is our duty to do so yet we are being thwarted at every turn because the Mandarins have built into their organizations so much autonomy and so much independence from the elected representatives. They are trying to head us off at the pass because we have been asking that control be given back to those who were elected. I can give a very good example of this.

Certain bills which are being prepared by the Mandarins propose to include members of the public service on the boards of directors instead of Members of Parliament. They want to keep us as far away as possible whilst retaining and adding to the power that they already have. This is the case in the Air Canada Act which is being prepared at the present time. Until recently even Air Canada had nothing to say about it because the Mandarins were writing themselves into the act as members of the board of directors. Are we going to stand for this kind of thing?

I believe that the hon. member's suggestion that a special committee be formed is an excellent one. Most of our crown corporations report to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) for Canada and that minister exercises certain statutory powers over some, such as the CBC, CRTC, Canadian Film Development Corporation and the National Museum. However, he is not responsible for the management of them. The role of the minister with regard to some of the other agencies is as spokesman to the House. If we ask a question of the minister in the House, all he can say is that he will refer it to the corporation in question and bring back their answer. In other words, responsibility concerning the management of most of the corporations and agencies under the jurisdiction of the minister does not rest directly upon his shoulders. Consequently, he has no direct control over their activities in spite of the fact that the over-all policy is supposed to be a policy of the government.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, there are some Crown corporations which have been making policy, although in my view this should not be the role of a Crown corporation. Policy should be made by the government. The merits of independence from the executive power have been questioned by many people on the grounds that any agency which spends public funds should be answerable to a public official who, in turn, must be responsible ultimately to parliament. On the other hand, those who argue in favour of the greatest possible independence of these agencies from the executive power claim that these institutions must have a freedom of action which will keep them outside the political sphere completely, so that they can fulfil their obligations and duties objectively and without partisanship.

With regard to the question of keeping outside the political sphere and being non-partisan and objective, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that when you get patronage from public servants, it is far worse than any patronage from politicians. The argument that is used is the sensitive one regarding freedom of expression and thought, particularly with respect to the CBC. Government control of the CBC would infringe on freedom of expression and thought, of course, but it seems to me that there is a great deal of difference between control by the government and the other extreme which is abuse or licence and which really cannot be called freedom at all.

The government has several solutions at its disposal. For example, it can name the president of the CBC and it has control over the budget which goes before the committee. In theory I suppose the minister could tell the committee not to approve the budget but, of course, this simply is not done. It would be tantamount to a vote of non-confidence in the government.

Another more difficult problem is the question of control over corporations and agencies by this parliament. Parliament must authorize funds and expenditures. Of course, it could refuse but I have never known this to happen and I do not think it would be a very good idea to refuse funds already approved by the Treasury Board and which have very likely been spent. So, we are beaten before we start in that respect as well. There have been many complaints on the part of Members of Parliament, as well as by the public, and there has been an expression of frustration on the part of Members of Parliament. We represent the people. Therefore, we naturally feel that we should have some say in how the moneys of the people are spent. Yet under the present system when moneys are misappropriated by Crown agencies, the representatives of the people are helpless in stopping such practices.

I agree that it is a ticklish problem to determine where control should be applied. On the one hand, agencies should be free of political intervention if they are to function properly, but they must be kept aware of the fact that the funds are supplied by the people of Canada. The only control possible would be through the representatives of the people in parliament. This is the reason I have repeatedly suggested that on the board of directors of each of the Crown corporations and agencies there should be at least one Member of Parliament. This does not necessarily mean a member from the government side of the House. In fact, in the case of the CNR and the CBC these are large enough agencies that they could have more than one Member of Parliament on their boards, perhaps a member from the government side and a member from one of the opposition parties. This would ensure some kind of political in-put.

When I say political in-put, I am not talking about partisanship. These members would act as watchdogs over the spending of those corporations. Mr. Speaker, I have raised this matter on several occasions in the House, and on one occasion I had a concrete example given to me. Since I have not had the chance to ask for the hon. member's permission, that is, of the hon. member who wrote me this letter, I shall not quote it but merely paraphrase it.

This Member of Parliament ran into a very difficult situation when a Crown corporation laid off a number of men and advised him only the night before the announcement was to be made. Here was a case where the hon. member had several arguments that he could have presented. He was not able to do so because he only knew after the fact. As a result, many people were out of work because of the decision taken by the board of that Crown corporation. There is no doubt that other means could have been employed such as that political in-put which I have suggested by someone who understands the situation from the people's point of view, someone who represents those people here in this House. Here is a case where that hon. member felt that if he, or another political person, had been on the board of directors of that corporation this unfortunate situation could have been avoided.

So, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the idea of having Members of Parliament on the boards of directors is one of the things that should be considered by a committee. Therefore, I like the idea that the hon. member has put forward. The committee could be made up of members from both sides of the House, as are all our committees. It could go from place to place in order to decide what is the best course to follow to give us more control over these bodies.

A while ago I mentioned the Crown corporations coming under the Secretary of State. There are many others as well. There is the CNR, for example. The pages and pages that have been put into Hansard on that subject show that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the country with the way the CNR is handled. Perhaps a little more in-put from this House would help that situation. And we have people who are capable of doing these things, people who know just as much about railroads as people who are presently on the board of the CNR.

Air Canada is another Crown corporation which should be studied and looked at from various points of view. A committee of this kind could look at the various questions concerning Air Canada. From time to time we have heard suggestions that Air Canada should not be strictly a Crown corporation, that it should be owned only partially by the government, say, 50 per cent or 60 per cent, and partially through public shares. This is something that could be looked at by the suggested committee. We have heard another suggestion that CP and Air Canada should be amalgamated, and thereby have only one international airline for Canada. It is a suggestion that has merit and could be examined by a special committee such as this. There are all kinds of subjects that could be looked at by such a committee.

The government does not have to adopt everything the committee recommends, but the government would be in a position to judge much better the various problems which it does not have the time to examine itself. A special committee of the House could certainly provide the basic necessities, and bring the various studies together. Many studies have been made of different subjects, but the reports are lying about all over the place. They have never been co-ordinated, and one weighed against another, to determine the best course for Canadians.

I terminate with these words, Mr. Speaker, that although I still believe there should be Members of Parliament on the boards of Crown corporations, I should like to say that I am even more excited about the idea of a special committee which could look into not only that aspect but several other aspects of the affairs of Crown corporations.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter that is before us during this private member's hour is an interesting one, although when you look at the terms of the motion before us you find that it is a verry broad one indeed. The hon. member says that he wants a special committee of inquiry on Crown corporations, and the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) as well as the hon. member who moved the motion, seemed to imply that it is to be a special committee of this House. However, as I look upon the motion that is before us, I see that it could be much broader than that in its terms. It could include a special committee such as is brought in for other inquiries. I could think of the Rand Inquiry with respect to certain matters. I could think of the Bryden Committee, one formed for public service matters which, like so many other committees formed by the government, has never yet reported despite the repeated requests of members of this House.

There are many kinds of committees that could be envisaged within the terms of the motion. Unfortunately, the terms of reference are not clear as to what kind of committee the House would be dealing with in the event that it saw fit to pass the motion. However, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) asked a very fundamental question with respect to Crown corporations. He asked: what business has the state in the business field? As I pondered that question I was looking at a document called "The Government of Canada Programs and Services" issued in July, 1972, by CCH Canada Limited. On page 417 of that document there is an appendix which sets forth certain Crown corporations. The list is intended to be exhaustive, but from what the hon. member says I am satisfied that there are many more than appear on this list.

I return now to the question of what business has the state in the business field. When one reads about the various types of Crown corporations, one can see how the state or government has entry into the business world, under the guise of a Crown corporation, in a way that is somewhat frightening. A Crown corporation, Mr. Speaker, is a form of public enterprise which has become increasingly important as this type of institution has developed. As you know, Sir, Crown corporations are established and regulated under the Financial Administration Act which defines a Crown corporation as a corporation that is accountable to parliament, through the minister, for the conduct of its affairs.

Generally speaking, there are three classes of Crown corporations. First, there is the departmental corporation which is a servant or agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada and is responsible for the administration, regulation or supervision of activities that are governmental in nature. I do not think there is much difficulty with that kind of Crown corporation or any problem with respect to intrusion into the private sector.

Second is the corporation which is an agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada and is responsible for the management of trading or surplus operations on a semi-commercial basis, or for management, procurement, construction or disposal activities on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada. That kind of corporation, I think, has intruded into the business life of the community. Then there is the other type of corporation known as the proprietary corporation, which is responsible for the management of lending or financing operations or for the management of commercial and industrial operations involving the production or the dealing in of goods and the supply of services to the public. The agency corporation normally is required to conduct its operations without federal appropriations. Whether Crown corporations conduct their operations with or without federal appropriations, they are none the less those kinds of corporations that bring themselves within the parameters of the question posed by the mover of the motion before the House.

Certainly, when there is an intrusion into business life and, more importantly, when this intrusion is occasioned on money provided from the public purse, there ought to be some agency set up for the control of those expenditures, to monitor the activities of those corporations and organizations. Two types of agencies have been suggested in this debate. The first is a special committee of this House or perhaps of both Houses. I hesitate to make this suggestion because the other place has suffered somewhat at the hands of this House. Such a committee is one suggestion. By this means there could be a reporting from time to time on a regular basis and the opportunity to call witnesses. Actually, Mr. Speaker, we have such rights at the moment.

I am a new member of this parliament. I first came to this chamber of January 4, 1973. Before coming I read, in preparation, some committee proceedings involving an agency of government, the National Capital Commission, which is near and dear to my heart and to those in the constituency I have the honour to represent. That commission came before a committee of this House to have its estimates examined. The chairman of the commission, Mr. Douglas Fullerton, and the responsible minister through whom that commission reports to this House were examined by members of the committee composed of representatives from all sides of the House. I admit that that committee examination was not searching because there was general agreement in the community and committee over the objects and methods of operation of the National Capital Commission. So to those who say that this kind of reporting does not take place, I say that it does.

I am satisfied that as a result of the work of the hon. member and his eloquence in putting forward his motion to the House, the matter will be given consideration and these rights will perhaps be expanded. It is not true to suggest, however, with all respect, that there is not examination by committees. The other method of reporting was that put forward by the hon. member for Cochrane who suggested—it was an interesting suggestion, perhaps new in this House—that a Member of Parliament should be appointed to sit on each of the boards of directors of Crown corporations and Crown organizations. He even suggested, and this was indeed a novel departure, that the government of the day—of this day, I assume—ought to appoint a member of one of the opposition parties to sit on such boards.

Let me say that if this is another deathbed repentance or another lesson learned from the election, I as a member of the House and of the opposition welcome the generous suggestion and look forward to an appointment to one of the boards or commissions so that I may enjoy, with hon. members on the other side of the House, the fees, honorariums and honours which would come from serving on the distinguished boards of various Crown agencies. But that has been tried in Ontario. The government of Ontario is in the firmament among the governments of this country; it is known for its progressive legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: That government is well known for its responsiveness to the needs of the people and its ethics in public dealings are beyond approach. It has examined the subject; it examined it with respect to Ontario Hydro. The hydroelectric commission of Ontario was the forerunner of the types of publicly-owned utilities that have met the needs of the people of Canada. It is a very important element in our life and contributes to the well-being of the community.

The Ontario government tried the experiment; it still does it. A number of members of the legislature of Ontario still sit on the board, and they have been criticized for that. The critics say that the very thing the hon. member for Cochrane said is good is, in their minds, bad. The critics say that such appointments have introduced to the administration and operation of that kind of commission a political input which has no place there. Of course, I am satisfied that if the government saw fit to accept the generous suggestion of the hon. member for Cochrane and appointed members of the opposition to the boards of commissions and corporations of the federal government, that kind of input would not take place. However, as a member of this House I would be very much concerned if only my colleagues on the other side of the House found themselves on such boards of commissions and corporations.

Speaking as a member who represents a riding touching the national capital area, there is one matter that disturbs me. In his speech this afternoon the hon. member for Cochrane, I believe, referred to the civil servants of this country being a group of mandarins. He implied that it is bad to appoint a person to membership on a board of a Crown corporation or agency merely because that person is a public servant.

The hon. member for Cochrane implies there are not, within the public service of this country, sufficient men and women of objectivity to handle the public affairs of these corporations engaged in business, I think this is a dangerous doctrine. He spoke of what he called public service patronage. I do not know what he meant by that, but I should like to remind him that his hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) served in the public service of Canada and that other members sitting on the front benches opposite served in the public service of Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): So did I.

Mr. Baker: The late Mr. Lester Pearson served in the public service of Canada. Indeed, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did so. Mind you, he served in a mysterious capacity. But he served. The hon. member for Cochrane says he served as well. I am not sure whether this was an enhancement of the public service or not. Nevertheless, public servants, merely because they are public servants, should not be deprived of the right to serve on boards of directors and to serve the public in this particular way.

Let us not hear talk in this debate of patronage. Unless I missed the point completely, the hon. member for Cochrane was speaking of patronage and as a member of a party which is a pastmaster of patronage. I want to remind him that a former member of this House, the former hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton is now an executive assistant. Who would have thought that a preacher and an agriculturalist would become an expert on the Post Office? But he is now executive assistant to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). It is an odd coincidence that all the problems of the Postmaster General seem to coincide with the arrival of that former Member of Parliament and another defeated candidate of the party, a man well known to me, another member of the club by the name of Mr. Gervis Black, the man who ran, and lost at Leeds, has found his way into the public service. So when there is such an opportunity for people to serve in various capacities, it seems to me that members of the public service ought not to be excluded from the boards of these corporations as the hon. member suggested. On the contrary, I think it is important that they be included.

The motion before us says, among other things, that the committee should study, without restriction, the legal rules pertaining to employees of Crown corporations. If this proposition is carried to its fullest extent, the servants of these public bodies would not enjoy the reasonable protection which is accorded public servants in the service of Canada, namely, that their affairs ought not to become the subject of debate on the floor of this House or in any committee.

The motion then goes on to say that the committee ought to examine fiscal regulations, municipal, school, provincial and federal taxes; and this is to be done without restriction. I have not been in this House long, but I have heard the discussions which have gone on among hon. members with respect to the British North America Act and the division which has been made among the jurisdictions of the various parliaments of this country. I do not believe it would be appropriate for this House to consider a resolution whose effect might well be to infringe upon the time-honoured restrictions which the BNA Act imposes.

This is not to say that these restrictions ought not to be continually examined or that provision ought not to be made, when found necessary, to meet the needs of the people of this country. But we ought not to pass anything which would upset the delicate balance which men of good will were able to put together in 1867 and which has served us reasonably well, with notable exceptions, since that day.

The motion then goes on to deal with the status of the administrators. I am a little at a loss to understand what that phrase really means. Does it mean that the committee should consider whether or not management and administrators are to be examined to determine whether they ought not to enjoy the same status in the business world as persons who, let us say, work for the T. Eaton Company or for Domtar? Does it mean that there are to be rules and regulations for the management of Crown corporations so that they cannot function?

What does the motion mean when it goes on in the next paragraph to say that the committee should examine "the privileges of such corporations resulting from their being 'commissioned by Her Majesty'." As I read the statutes, they are subject to the law. They can be sued and they can themselves bring suits. They are subject to all actions in the courts. If this is not the case, an amendment ought to be made immediately to ensure that they are.

The hon. member then goes on to deal with their purchasing policy. Is he advocating the placing of restrictions upon Crown corporations? Is he saying they ought to buy Canadian goods as opposed to goods from countries abroad?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I hope to leave about three or four minutes so that we may vote on this motion before six o'clock. Basically, I am in favour of it. Possibly for once in the history of this parliament, members opposite will vote for a private member's bill. On second thoughts, that is too much to ask for.

Since I came here some weeks ago I have been trying to get information with respect to several Crown corporations. One of them is Eldorado Nuclear Limited whose headquarters are in my constituency at Uranium City. I looked at the financial statement for 1971, but the information I was seeking is not there. I am basically a simple minded person and I like things to be presented to me in a simple fashion. A lot of facts and figures seem to be hidden, so I directed an inquiry to the ministry. For instance, I wanted to know the total number of employees. I am told it is 388. I also wanted a breakdown as between salaries of the employees paid at an hourly rate and otherwise. In other words, I wanted to know how much was being paid to the miners and how much to people employed on managerial functions. I was told there were 246.25 hourly-paid employees and 141.25 salaried employees. So they divide people into quarters. I also found that the wages of salaried employees were roughly $1,454,000 and the wages of hourly-rated employees totalled approximately $2,591,000. The rub comes in question No. 6 which is as follows:

What was the cost of producing a pound of uranium oxide for each of the past ten years?

The answer I received was rather frustrating:

The requested information is of a proprietary nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the Company's—and the public's—interests in light of the competitive position of Eldorado Nuclear Limited in marketing uranium on a worldwide basis.

So be it: that information is not available to me. Looking further into the question of financial statements, there is another company that is sort of an offshoot of Eldorado Nuclear, called Eldorado Aviation Limited; they published a balance sheet as well. Eldorado Nuclear also operates a store in Uranium City and it gouges pretty stiff prices out of the miners. There is nothing said in the financial statements about what is the profit and loss picture of this particular store in Uranium City, or about what it has to do with the mining of uranium.

I should like to indicate to hon. members that, despite what one hon. member said, I still believe that there is a place for Crown corporations in Canada. If it were not for the CBC, I doubt that television and radio would have reached the far-flung areas of Canada. Private corporations are not usually eager to fall over themselves to provide such services to sparsely settled areas.

According to the 1970 annual report of Eldorado Nuclear, Eldorado played a major role in the development of this fledgling industry by making available its know-how in the prospecting, mining and metallurgical fields, as well as by negotiating and administering contracts for the sale of uranium by private producers to agencies of the United States and United Kingdom governments. These services were provided by Eldorado without profit or fee. So we have Eldorado providing services to private companies without profit or fee.

By 1958 there were 25 producing mines in Canada and the peak output of almost 31 million pounds was attained the following year. This Crown corporation was the first uranium producing mine in Canada. When we had a uranium boom, many private mines were opened and Eldorado supplied consultative services to these private mines. Yet when there was a sale of uranium to Spain involving quite a few million dollars, the sale was negotiated by a private company subsidized by the Canadian government to the tune of $29 million. As the Member of Parliament representing this area, I have been unable to find out what proportion of the uranium oxide sold to Spain came from the mine in Uranium City.

I think that on that note I will end, Mr. Speaker. For once I hope government members will see fit to pass this resolution. Perhaps a bit of history will be made in this House if that is the case.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret that other hon. members have seen fit to take so long. Nevertheless, I was impressed with the extensive treatise of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I, too, have read the same book. Part of the comments I had intended to make he has already made, so fortunately I am saving myself some time.

I note that the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly) who has just spoken suggested we should vote for this motion. My problem—the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton apparently has the same problem—is that the motion seems to say one thing, whereas the hon. member who spoke in favour of his motion seemed to suggest it said something else. Then other hon. members have given further and varied interpretations of the motion. I am beginning to wonder what kind of commission, body, group or committee we would set up if in our haste we passed this motion without proper debate.

I want to align myself with the stand taken by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), but I take a somewhat different attitude to that taken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. There are Crown corporations in regard to which members could play a significant part and have some impact. Unlike the thinking of the Conservatives, I think we should operate without an honorarium. The criticism in Ontario is not that members of the legislature sit on these particular boards, tribunals and commissions but, rather, that they are paid. In other words, this situation is referred to as pork-barrelling and anything that these members do while sitting on the commission or board of directors is suspect. I think that we are adequately paid as Members of Parliament and that we have a role to play. However, I think we should be selective in our choice of Crown corporations.

Let me give the House an example of what I mean. I think Members of Parliament could have a social impact if they sat on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. I for one cannot understand how a Crown corporation that operates in large measure on subsidization through taxpayers' dollars cannot see fit to increase the pension of its retired employees to at least the 2 per cent level which other civil servants enjoy. That is one area where we could have an impact, perhaps not a financial impact but certainly a social impact.

Another problem is created by the kind of motion introduced by the hon. member, and that is the innuendo that there is something wrong here or illegal. He does not pinpoint the area that he would like to see studied. For example, I served on the public accounts committee and headed a small subcommittee which looked into the travelling expenses of CBC personnel who travelled abroad. We checked the accounts after the Auditor General had checked them. I must say it has always been my feeling that a man who said that he did not cheat on his expense account would lie about other things too. But the CBC personnel came out smiling on this one, and as a result got very little publicity. If we had highlighted the fact that some little thing had taken place, then we would have had scoops of publicity on this issue.

It is not correct to say that the Auditor General does not have any impact or make any input. He audits the books of many Crown corporations in Canada. If hon. members were to sit on the public accounts committee they might be studying the books of Eldorado, as in fact the committee has, where they would be able to ask questions.

Let me say to the hon. member for Meadow Lake, as one who lives in a riding where there is a Crown corporation, not to kid himself that he will not be charged with being responsible for what any Crown corporation in his riding does. Let him put all the questions on the order paper that he likes and get all the information that he can about Crown corporations, because his constituents are going to tar him with that brush. If the Crown corporation is a good thing, he will get the credit; if it is bad, he will not. I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, much has been written and said on the subject of capital punishment. Yet there is one aspect of this vital and perplexing problem which has been little considered or discussed. I trust it could prove to be the basic premise on which hon. members' final decision on the validity of capital punishment will be made.

Capital punishment, it has been established, is the execution of a criminal pursuant to a sentence of death imposed by a competent court. Whatever may have been its origin, whether in feelings of revenge as described by the lex talionis, the law of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, or in theories of retribution or deterrence, capital punishment is a term opposed to all irregular modes of punishment, such as the American "lynch law" or any modern survival of "blood avengers".

Capital punishment is so named from the Latin, caput, because hanging or decapitation was the most usual mode of death. In England, during Saxon times, man-slaying demanded the payment of what was known as "wer-gild" or "blood money", the amount of which varied with the degree of importance in the social scale of the murdered person.

In pre-Norman times there were various forms of capital punishment, including hanging, decapitation, burning, and hurling from rocks after the manner of the Roman custom of throwing malefactors from the classic Tarpeian Rock. After the conquest mutilation seems to have been substituted and this is the punishment mentioned in assizes of the time of Henry II. The law was variable for some time after that but gradually crystallized into such a condition that capital punishment became the common penalty for a great number of crimes, comprising treason and all felonies except larceny and mayhem.

This state of things continued to 1826, at which time there were nominally no fewer than 200 crimes punishable by death. Subsequently in England the only capital offences were treason, murder, piracy with violence, and the crime of setting fire to His Majesty's vessels of war, arsenals, military or naval stores and ships in the port of London. The sentence of capital punishment could also be passed by courts martial in various cases of mutiny, desertion or sleeping on sentry duty.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

In conformity with his general theory of punishments and reward, that the evil of punishment must not exceed the advantage to the offender, and that punishment should be exactly and mathematically proportioned to the offence, Jeremy Bentham proposed abolishing the death penalty in most cases, retaining it only for murder and treason, and this is a royal commission which submitted its report in 1866 recommended. In Canada, under the Criminal Code of 1906 only treason, murder, piracy with violence, and rape were capital crimes.

Arguments for or against the death penalty in all ages have been of two kinds. Some are categorical assertions based on traditional sentiment and beliefs. The claims that man's innate sense of justice requires that a murderer should lose his own life, or that man has no right to take life, fall into this class. There is another class of arguments which are empirical in nature. They mainly focus on the belief that capital punishment has a unique power to deter people from committing crimes.

It has been well established by statistical studies that: first, when comparisons are made between contiguous states with similar populations and similar social, economic and political conditions, homicide rates are the same and follow the same trend over a long period of time regardless of the use or non-use of capital punishment; second, the abolition, introduction or reintroduction of this penalty is not accompanied by the effect on homicidal rates that is postulated by the advocates of capital punishment; third, even in communities where the deterrent effect should be greatest because the offender and his victim lived there and the trial and execution were well publicized, homicide rates are not affected by the execution; and fourth, the number of policemen killed by criminals is no higher in abolition states than in comparable death penalty states.

Capital punishment, then, does not appear to have a specific influence on the number or trend of the kinds of crime it is supposed to deter people from committing, and its non-use is not followed by a significant upswing in the rate of these crimes. Modern thought, though, strongly concludes that there are types of murder which should be punished with the death penalty. These are: the killing of a policeman or jail guard who because of the nature of his occupation is exposed to being killed, and being the guardians of society they merit the most protection which we can give them; murder for profit or gain; murder during the commission of a crime or as the result thereof, and multiple murder, such as placing a bomb in a school, airplane or public place, or in the mail addressed to a person.

In April, 1966, an attempt was made to achieve complete abolition but it was rejected on a free vote in this House. In 1967, the same parliament passed for a five-year trial a law which has a compromise and which abolished hanging for all but the murderer of prison guards and policemen. This law, as we all know, expired at the end of 1972.

The profound question, then, that immediately faces hon. members in the twenty-ninth parliament is: Are you in favour of the death penalty for murder, or are you not? Perhaps you are one who on religious grounds believes that under no circumstances should life be taken, either by an individual or by the state. In this case, your vote is already decided. Perhaps you hold that society is becoming progressively more lawless and that the death penalty should be extended to more crimes than murder. If so, there are many precedents in history for your stern conviction.

Perhaps you will turn to statistics and try to prove to yourself that either one course or the other is correct. Your decision may depend upon the age, the civilization or the political climate at the time the events underlying the statistical data took place. You may turn to philosophical thought, to prominent moralists or or even to mystical essays to lift your mind out of the morass of indecision in which you flounder.

You may turn to the law and follow its developing course over the centuries and, by hewing strictly to the line, fashion out of solid timber your final judgment. You may find that the attitude to the death penalty is, by the nature of the flux of society, variable. You may have read that in certain countries in times of peace and affluence the death penalty was not considered necessary, but that in the same countries under the rule of a Hitler or a Mussolini or a Stalin capital punishment was used to its full extent.

You may argue that the executions of innocent persons have undoubtedly occurred, even though rarely. You may bolster your argument with the indisputable fact that the trend toward abolition has continued down the years to grow in the peacetime codes of many nations. You may appeal to all the authorities of your own and earlier times and, as they almost invariably have done, you may overlook the one aspect of this sombre problem which might point you to an altogether human and logical answer.

Should a man who has wilfully killed another man, himself be killed? Historically, this question has been asked of those living after the event. The prosecuting attorney pleads it in his implacable argument before judge and jury. The defence attorney denies it in his impassioned plea for the life of the murderer. The judge juggles the question in his summing up to their jury. And the jury deliberates on it, sometimes in anguish, sometimes in great clarity of mind. Yet in all that has been written and said on the subject of capital punishment, seldom has anyone questioned what the victim would say about it if only he could. And, after all, equally with his murderer, the victim has the right of say in the matter of his own death and its punishment.

It is preached, and rightly, that love, the highest of human emotions, should pe practised impartially in a society. It is a political dogma in our own country that equality is the right of all men. That the punishment should fit the crime is the assiduous desire of all lawmakers and of the law itself. Yet this love and this equality and this minute balancing of the law almost invariably are applied to the living. The victim, the dead man, is almost universally forgotten.

At the split second before his death, the victim-to-be has a moral and constitutional right to equality with his murderer. The love that flourishes in the land has an equal demand on the two of them. Equality and love must be equal, else the fabric of society is torn. In this split second before his death, the victim, above all others, has the right to cry out, "Do as you would be done by!" It is to this split second that judge and jury and attorneys and hon. members should look when assessing the rightness of capital punishment.

It is in the law that, if a man comes into your home with his fists clenched to assault you, you may take the requisite steps to defend yourself. You may not go beyond what is necessary to beat him back. You may not take the samurai sword off your wall and run him through. But you may employ equal force to his. Supposing the victim-to-be of a premeditated murder were to know in a flash of insight exactly what was in the mind of his assailant; suppose everything were equal; suppose the victim-to-be had a gun in his hand at the same instant as his murderer approached him with gun in hand. What would be the inalienable right of the threatened man?

What would you do if you were the victim-to-be? Would you simply stand there and allow him to shoot you through the heart? If so, you would voluntarily relinquish your equality before the law and your right to the love of the land. Would you turn and run? Then you would be a coward. Or would you employ equal force to his and shoot him dead? If the majority of hon. members are of the last opinion, then the vote is already in on the question of capital punishment.

The trouble is, the rights of the victim are often overlooked in the hurly-burly of the trial of his murderer. All the attention is fixed on the plight of the man on trial. Safe in their own comfortable homes, remote from the confrontation which took place at the moment of a man's death, people are prone in the intervening months to sympathize with this living man who is, after all, one of them and must merit mercy. They forget that the dead victim received neither sympathy nor mercy.

In effect, judge and jury and populace—all, to some extent, are accomplices after the fact in the murder of the victim. Society, after the crime, does not feel threatened and therefore can afford the luxury of pity for the killer and an inclination toward leniency. Instead, society should stand as a surrogate for the victim, stepping into his shoes in that split second before his death and deciding, with the wisdom of aftersight, what he would have done in the face of his murderer. And, in effect, I ask hon. members, what would you have done?

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, many excellent speeches have been given on the subject that we are now debating. It is a most controversial bill that is before us, yet a most important one. Certainly it is important to a convicted murderer who may be condemned to death as a result of this debate. It is important to all Canadians who want to do their very best for Canada in so far as it affects the safety of all of its citizens. A country which is not ruled by fair laws and guarantees justice for all is in trouble indeed.

May I first pay my compliments to various members, particularly the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), who are opposed to capital punishment. I respect their views and the sincerity with which they are presented, but I do not share them. Without any twang of conscience whatsoever. I tell you that under certain circumstances I am for capital punishment and I hope that the present bill before us is defeated. My feelings can be summed up in one statement. Where any country begins to think more of the criminal than it does of the victim, then that country is indeed in a horrible state of affairs.

My concern and where I ask that capital punishment be reinitiated in Canada is where it applies to the first degree murderer. The individual who kidnaps a little girl and finally strangles her, the man who shoots a bank teller, the man who over a period of months poisons his wife, the individual who puts a time bomb in a plane and consequently kills dozens of innocent people; this is the type of crime that I describe as first degree murder. Let us not forget, too, the professional killer, the man who kills for a price. These examples are premeditated murder and criminals of this nature, many of whom have been in and out of jail many times, should be eliminated from society.

Are my hon. friends suggesting that law and order have not deteriorated in the past five years? If they are, then they should start reading the papers. Let us for a moment look at that great country to the south of us. Last year there were ten times as many murders in New York city as there were in Canada, twice as many in Detroit as in our country. It is not safe, Mr. Speaker, to walk down the streets of those two cities by oneself because of muggings and other crimes of violence, and the same can be said of other American cities. Thank heaven that we have not yet reached that stage in Canada, but we would be fools not to admit that it could happen right here if our laws are not enforced much more stringently than they are at present.

The average Canadian criminal is now, if he knows his way through the system, all but able to escape meaningful punishment. He can plead psychological unfitness, economic deprivation, drug abuse, alcohol use, poor social environment, and first conviction for a particular crime as mitigating circumstances. Once sentenced he has his day, parole, compassionate leave, holidays, automatic remissions, good behaviour, and the Lord only knows what else, which reduces his time in prison, if such has been the sentence, to about one half of the sentence imposed.

It is no wonder today that people do not understand the courts and the judicial system. The man in the street is quickly losing faith in justice. The officials in society seem to be on the side of the criminal. Crime rates rise, not because of social or economic condition but because persons realize that little or nothing happens to them even when convicted. Certainly capital punishment will stop few from committing murder. However, re-establishing capital punishment, and in fact more strict punishment in general for social crimes, will restore greater faith in our judicial system. It will give greater vitality to persons who wish to lead good lives; it will give people a greater sense of security. Society will benefit. The old concept of reward and punishment will not be a relic of the past. It will reverse the too often criminal trend of our present society.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) tells us there is now compensation for victims of crimes. One could ask the Solicitor General through you, Mr. Speaker, how one compensates the victim of a murderer. The most that we could do is to pray for such a victim; he or she has passed all other compensation.

It is interesting to note that practically all guards and practically all policemen are for capital punishment. These are the people who really come into contact with all criminals, including murderers. Policemen are not fools, they are not pigs and they are not fuzz. They are men and women who are average Canadians like those of us here, who have accepted the dangerous job of making life for all citizens a better and a safer one. But, Mr. Speaker, many criminals are laughing at the police today. They scorn them and, as a matter of fact, in many instances society takes the side of the criminal and not the police. Deny it if you wish, but it is a fact.

May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why a policeman should risk his life against an armed criminal who may kill him and then get out of jail in eight or ten years? Why should a guard in a penitentiary face men known as lifers who have nothing to lose? They are supposedly incarcerated for life, and if they kill one guard or ten they cannot be punished more than now. The cards are stacked against the guards. A dog is supposed to be man's best friend, and yet there are some dogs that become mad and must be destroyed. Unfortunately, we have some men who become mad also and they, too, must be destroyed for the sake of society.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I add that I believe such murderers should be eliminated as painlessly as possible. Perhaps a tranquillizing pill and a shot of gas would be the answer for those people who claim that capital punishment is a matter of vengeance. Let us not forget that the vast majority of Canadian citizens conscientiously believe that capital punishment for first degree murder should be reinitiated. Let us as Members of Parliament represent the views of those who sent us here in the first place. Capital punishment must come back where the criminal, beyond a shadow of doubt, has committed first degree murder. It will make Canada a safer and a better place in which to live.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a popular and emotional issue.

This is why the Canadian people are extremely eager to know what will be the decision of their representatives. Such an issue, where indeed the right to live of some citizens is at stake, is very difficult and the members are reduced to a dilemma since some of them can quite conscientiously object to the death penalty while they know quite well that such is not the feeling of their constituents.

This is a real dilemma as we realize when hearing the members who state their views. Is the role of the member restricted to that of voicing a personal view or must he express the opinion of the people who elected him to do so? This the question to which we must reply. We should in that regard consult the public opinion which is well known. In the constituency I have the honour to represent I know—because I inquired in this connection—over 90 per cent of the population endorse capital punishment.

What makes citizens in general basing themselves decide in favour of capital punishment? Sure, there are a great many reasons ranging from simple revenge to instinctive reaction to inflict upon the murderer the same fate that he inflicted on his victim. This is an instinctive and normal reaction. But if you put yourselves in the shoes of the relatives or friends of the victims, you can undersand their instinctive reaction of insisting that the ultimate penalty be inflicted on the murderer.

• (2030)

Those who have known people who were accused of murder and were not guilty favour the abolition of the death penalty.

What is the major argument put forward by the public? It is for a would-be murderer the fear of knowing that he could be executed. Recent surveys and statistics tended to prove that this fear is practically non-existent. People often base their arguments on the following principle: Society cannot allow itself to do precisely what it blames someone for doing.

Mr. Speaker, people also say that in a modern society there ought not to be inhuman punishment, and they point to changes which have taken place through the years. One might be inclined to agree with those who base their arguments on the reasoned and reasonable principle that society should not allow itself to do what it blames someone else for having done.

Mr. Speaker, we must first of all ask ourselves whether the present society is not as barbarous as it could be centuries ago. Even today, do we not see murders which are acknowledged even by the authorities of all countries in the world?

Mr. Speaker, there are still wars going on that are so cruel as to exceed the greatest cruelties of a few centuries ago.

I ask myself whether society as it is now deserves abolition of the death penalty. That is the very serious question which comes to my mind. Crime of every kind are more prevalent than ever within our society, Humanitarianism has not only failed to develop but has on the contrary declined. I therefore ask myself serious questions and say: Since society, because of its failure to become humanitarian, does not deserve the abolition of the death penalty, although it would be ideal, we should retain, in such a society, means which rationally would seem obsolete.

Thus, what should prompt us to settle the matter and take a stand? I think that in such a case, the people's opinion must be relied upon and expressed in the House.

Cases where capital punishment should be maintained should perhaps be determined in a more precise way. I agree with that. For example, I cannot see why a difference should be made between a prison guard or a policeman and an ordinary citizen. In fact, I believe that all citizens are equal, whatever their functions may be.

It could be argued that policemen or prison guards run more risks of being attacked and that it is why capital punishment is maintained in their case. However, a statistical survey would show that everybody is in danger. The high number of traffic accidents shows how dangerous it is just to be out in the street.

In spite of the respect I have for policemen and guards, I must say they chose their occupation of their own free will. What is more, they have all they need to defend themselves and I fail to see why that distinction should be made.

To my mind, the law should be more explicit: it should state precisely what murders carry the death penalty. We would then perhaps manage to prevent them, or even eliminate them totally.

Heinous crimes are also committed, where the culprit himself asks to be done away with, as in the case of Léopold Dion. I believe the public view is right in these circumstances.

The two previous speakers said, and I am of the same opinion, that more attention should be paid the victim than the criminal.

To conclude, I would say that we should try capital punishment as we have tried its abolition. In fact, this punishment has been abolished for much more than five years, as it was the custom even before 1967 to commute death penalty to life imprisonment.

Consequently, capital punishment has not been imposed for several years. Why not give it a real try providing, and I repeat, we specify in which case murder would be punishable by death.

Mr. Speaker, this of course is a very serious question but there is no other way we can reason under these circumstances.

If at least alternatives were put forward in order that a criminal could pay his debt to society otherwise than through capital punishment, our thinking might be different. But there is absolutely nothing in this respect and one could ask therefore if it would not be better to put more into the studying of means which could eliminate crime; the problem of finding the appropriate punishment would then subside. As most people, I believe for instance that some offenders enjoy living at the expense of the state in our prisons and penitentiaries. The taxpayers see their dollars helping support offenders. I understand their resentment against such people and their wish to get rid of them at any cost. However if we found some means of putting those people to work and making them productive, the taxpayers could say: Well, those offenders have really paid their debt to society.

Therefore, I wonder if we could not revert to procedures providing the offenders an opportunity to pay their debt to society by becoming productive citizens and rendering some services to society. Since we have not yet reached that stage, I believe that now, in 1973, there is no solution but to retain imposition of the death penalty in very precise cases.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this being the first time I have had an opportunity of rising to speak in this parliament, I would like to bring to you greetings and congratulations from the many wonderful people it is my pleasure to represent in the electoral district of Red Deer. I thank you for affording me this opportunity of speaking on their behalf in this debate.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Speaker, over the years the average Canadian citizen has put a great deal of thought into the ways and means of controlling those who perpetrate crime. Could we, just for a moment, take a look at what constitutes an average Canadian? A Canadian is not a violent individual in any sense of the word. He or she is not barbaric, nor could one say they could be construed as being revengeful but, rather, he or she is a kindly, God-fearing person. Mr. Speaker, if you look closely you will find him to be basically honest, straightforward, hard working, seeking the opportunity to love and to be loved. He will be found to be one who recognizes the rights of others and who in return expects others to recognize his rights as an individual in this big, overwhelming world.

You will find a Canadian to be a person who appreciates the privileges that have been afforded him as a citizen of this great land; a person crying out for everybody to inject into society a little bit of common sense and justice for the common good. You will find an individual who wants to be treated as a human being, not as a mere number among the masses. He wants, not only for this generation but for future generations, retention of the basic rights of freedom of speech, freedom of worship and freedom of living and travelling through this fair land without the fear of being molested or struck down. You will find an individual who believes in maintaining and enforcing law and order.

Mr. and Mrs. Average Canadian live by the law and expect others to do the same. Recognition is given to the many laws which guide thought and action and which have a definite effect on the well-being of all. Through their eyes, let us look for a moment as Canadians at the infinite law of nature as laid down by the Divine Creator. There are basically, to all intents and purposes, two kingdoms in this world—the plant kingdom and the animal kingdom. The photosynthesis and growth which takes place in the plant kingdom complements the respiration and growth of the animal kingdom. One is dependent on the other for maximum growth and development.

Mr. Speaker, this is the basic law of creation laid down for the benefit of man until man decides, as a result of his craving, to disrupt the process. Whatever his reasoning may be for breaking this law, somebody is going to pay the penalty. It could be a law of the environment which is broken, which will prove to be detrimental to somebody or something, regardless of whether it is an oil spill, excess smoke or the misuse of chemicals. Somebody will have to suffer.

Take the law of electricity as an example. Electricity has proven to be one of the greatest benefits to modern society as we know it today and is one of the main basic energy forces in the world created for mankind. Engineers know how to develop it; they know how to control it; they know how to use it. But can they see it? No, they cannot. If an individual comes into contact with this force, he breaks the law of electricity, and we all know that the result can be instant death.

Mr. Speaker, look for a moment if you will at the law of gravity, another part of the perfect law. We know that if the gravitational pull of the earth were too little, we would float off into space; if it became too great, we would not be able to move on the earth's surface. If a man breaks this law by stepping off a cliff, for instance, we know what the end result would be.

I do not mention these facts of life to bore you, Mr. Speaker, but rather to remind this parliament that the people whom I represent, as do Canadians as a whole, respect these basic rules in the formation of man-made laws. Would it be too much to suggest that we, as elected representatives of this twenty-ninth parliament, are generally agreed on everything I have said to this point? But now comes the crunch. What do we do with those who break the rules in the game of life? What do we do with those who become so estranged and violent that they murder a fellow being deliberately, through passion, emotion, jealousy, hatred, greed or for any other reason? This is the question we have to deal with now.

As I mentioned earlier, Canadians are not a revengeful or barbaric people, as some suggest. I will not accept this as fact just because there are large numbers of people calling for capital punishment for those convicted of murder. When people call for capital punishment they are not necessarily calling for hanging. They are asking for the removal from society, in a humane manner, those who have proven beyond reasonable doubt that they cannot live under the code of life as laid down by the majority. Because of the concern of most Canadians and the divergence of opinion on this vital issue, I am convinced that the best way to reach an acceptable decision is to hold a national referendum in conjunction with the next federal election. As the minister is aware, I have a notice of motion on the order paper in this regard which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce a measure to provide that, on polling day at the next federal election, there shall be held a national plebiscite on the question of the abolition of capital punishment and on the related and consequent questions arising therefrom.

In all seriousness I ask hon. members to accept this motion as a bill of the government to let the Canadian people become a part of true participatory democracy. Since the decision reached on this important issue will have a direct effect on the future well-being of society, I believe every Canadian should be allowed to make a personal choice in a matter of such magnitude.

In my opinion, the argument of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) against a national referendum is very weak. To say that to hold a plebiscite on capital punishment would open the way for other plebiscites is, in my opinion, utter nonsense. This would be the satisfactory and just way to settle this highly charged, emotional question. The minister has said that there will be a free vote. It makes me wonder if he has a fear of going to the people and letting them decide for themselves exactly what they want.

The growing concern of multitudes in this country is caused by the continuing increase of crime over the past five years. The day has gone when we can say, "It can't happen here." Mr. Speaker, anything that can happen anywhere in the world can happen in Canada. Some of the most dastardly murders that have been committed on this globe have been equalled here. Do I have to remind hon. members of the Laporte slaying and of the children who are molested and either die or, if they survive, have their lives ruined?

Although it is not necessary to go into details here, the minister knows of many such instances, as we all do. He must realize that this increasing wave of crime is what people are crying against. No one feels safe any longer, and what hope is there for Canadians without a deterrent, an enforced deterrent? If the Solicitor General could prove to the people of this country that his department can bring crime under control, and also those who commit crimes, the Canadian people would not be so doubtful or uneasy. But I warn him now that they are not going to be thwarted much longer. There are thousands of Canadians who will not put their faith in or be guided by a government that seeks to abolish capital punishment and at the same time accepts a policy to legalize abortions. For many thousands of seriously thinking people these two proposals cannot be equated.

Canadians, as a whole, are a forgiving people and I would venture to say that by far the vast majority would lend a helping hand to anyone in trouble. Why, then, would those who contemplate crime take a club or a gun to break the law when such help is available? In my opinion, our people would not be so upset over this issue if they had any hope that justice would prevail and that crime would be controlled. Capital punishment is the only hope in controlling murder. Canadian citizens are holding on to this concept as hard as they can because since 1967 they have seen crimes occur which never should have been committed in a civilized country. Instead of the situation improving, unfortunately it is worsening.

I do not deny that Canadians have compassion for those who have broken the law, but I believe they have more compassion for those who are the victims of lawless action. I refer to parents, sisters and brothers of murdered children; I refer to the young mother and 22-month old baby who are left without a husband and father, murdered while on duty as a policeman just recently. Yes, Mr. Speaker, these are the real victims; these are the people whom Mr. and Mrs. Canadian are trying to protect when they press for capital punishment.

According to statistics, capital punishment is a deterrent. A report prepared by Statistics Canada for the Department of the Solicitor General reveals that an average of 222 persons, excluding police officers and prison guards, were murdered in each of the seven years before the partial ban came into effect. The annual average went up to 376 between 1968 and 1971, the last full year for which figures are available. The total for 1971 is 422 non-police murders. I quote for the benefit of the House a recent statement attributed to a law enforcement officer in Ottawa:

> In conversing with criminals while being transported to Kingston, the reason many criminals gave for not carrying a revolver was to avoid the possibility of execution resulting from the death of a victim.

Another police officer has recently stated:

> No worse time than the present could be chosen for the abolition of the death penalty. We must decide whether we are going to protect society against the criminal or protect the criminal against society.

Many Canadians believe this. I realize the minister has a great responsibility to protect those who have broken the law, but he has a much more serious responsibility to protect society. His duty is to lessen and control the ravages of crime which at the present time is growing and is out of control. What is being done to protect people from the increased use of drugs which has resulted in some murders? Never in history has there been a time as today. When the younger generation has been subjected to such lawlessness and all its influences.

If parliament removes this deterrent to crime without taking into consideration the individual wishes of people of this country, how, then, will we face those who are personally affected by unwarranted murder? Capital punishment cannot be a deterrent if it is not enforced, neither can life imprisonment be a deterrent if the sentence is not served.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have an opportunity to speak in this debate on capital punishment, a subject, to be sure, that is very important from all points of view. I think those of us who have come to the House since 1966-1967, when the suspension of hanging was agreed to, will be concerned that we do not spend a great deal of time threshing old straw or debating ideas that have already been well discussed in this place. Nevertheless, as I say, this is a very important debate not only to those people who may become subject to the law we pass here but also as an indication of the direction our society is taking at this stage of its national development.

I believe there is much concern in the United States, as well as in this country, over the recent public mass murders and gangland slayings that have occurred, as well as over the regular diet on television during the past several years of war and murder. I believe there is real concern as to whether our country, indeed our whole generation, is suffering from the brutalizing effects of this particular diet on our television screen every night. Fortunately, the Viet Nam war is almost at an end, at least we hope it is, with the signing of the pact this past week end. But there can be little doubt that a whole generation of people in North America have been witnessing the kind of program I have referred to on television, which is why I say there is concern whether there has been any brutalizing effect therefrom.

It will be interesting to see, both in this debate and in the public debate that follows along with it, whether our Canadian society has moved toward a more human position than was the case five years ago and whether we in this generation really do abhor the thought of murder as much as did the previous generation.

I was interested, when the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) spoke, to hear him say he did not feel this debate was important enough to command our time in the House at this particular stage. It seems to me there can be no question but that this debate has to take place now. Surely the issue of capital punishment is inherently important in our society, not only to people who are charged with murder and other crimes but to the whole society. It is indeed difficult to imagine a question of greater social significance than the grounds on which the state claims the right to deprive a citizen of his life. The legislation establishing, defining and circumscribing this right is surely important and involves one of the most fundamental decisions confronting any society at any time. It goes to the very core of our society's philosophy, reflecting and probably helping to create as well the values and norms which permeate all human social intercourse.

Secondly, it seems that this debate is important because of the kind of public opinion which has been generated during the past months and especially during the past weeks as a result of the number of newspaper articles, editorials and television programs we have had relating to the subject, as well as the number of letters Members of Parliament are receiving. It is our responsibility as representatives of the Canadian people to come to grips with this issue at this time.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of our obligation to enact legislation to replace the previous five-year law which expired on December 29 last. To ignore this issue would be to shirk our responsibility as members of this House of Commons. In the field of criminal law and punishment, as in all others, we must establish policy by design, by responsible, thoughtful and wide deliberation, and not by default.

I recognize the complexity of the issue now before this House, the difficulty of interpreting the relevant statistical data and the sincerity with which honest and responsible men hold divergent views. I want to make my own position clear. In principle I am in favour of the abolition of the death penalty. I regard capital punishment as morally repugnant, ineffective as a deterrent and inadequate as a means of ensuring the protection of our society.

I believe that the convictions of many hon. members on this matter are based as such on subjective theory as on a detached appraisal of statistical evidence. Indeed, I would venture to suggest that most people who have adopted a position on this issue have done so as the result of a sort of inner feeling or reaction which is conditioned by their background, their experience and their philosophy. That renowned criminal lawyer, Clarence Darrow, was no doubt right when he observed half a century ago that "questions of this sort are not settled by reason; they are settled by prejudices and sentiments or by emotion."

Given my own predisposition and the grave implications of state-sanctioned execution, it would require a considerable body of uncontestable evidence proving the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent to persuade me of the merits of the death penalty. Like other members of this House, I have read many reports, studies and analyses on the subject and I am not convinced that any significant link has been established between retention or abolition of the death penalty, on one hand, and the incidence of murder on the other. Indeed, the overwhelming weight of evidence, the opinions of professional psychologists, sociologists and criminologists leads to the conclusion that no such correlation exists. It seems to me that in nearly every country in the world the trend is to less and less capital punishment. Whether there actually is a law providing for capital punishment or not, there is a tendency to carry out fewer and fewer executions.

[Mr. Foster.]

If we consider France, where they still have capital punishment—incidentally, they still use the guillotine which was made famous during the French revolution—we find that between 1953 and 1969 only 22 out of 85 persons sentenced to capital punishment were actually guillotined. This country, which actually has a capital punishment law on the books, is moving toward fewer and fewer executions. Likewise, in the United States between 1965 and 1971 there were ten executions carried out, and those were all under state laws. There have been none under federal law in that country where they have criminal law both in the state and at the federal level.

I would venture to suggest that more statistics have been produced and cited on this subject than on any other. It is not my intention to bombard the House with statistics. Let me just say that there is no such study in which I have found evidence that demonstrates to my satisfaction the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent.

In Europe, those countries which have abolished the death penalty have no higher murder rates; in fact, in many instances they have significantly lower rates than those which have retained the death penalty. In the United States, the abolitionist states have no higher murder rates; in fact, they tend to have lower rates than adjacent states which have retained capital punishment. In those states where the death penalty has been abolished there is no appreciable difference in homicide rates before and after abolition.

In our own country, the result of our recently expired five-year experimental period—though the evidence is still incomplete and tentative—tends to demonstrate yet again that capital punishment has no deterrent effect. The excellent study of Dr. Fattah is most persuasive on this point. Let me quote, in support of this argument, a United Nations' document on capital punishment, published in 1968. That document sums up the position in the following words:

> With respect to the influence of the abolition of capital punishment upon the incidence of murder, all of the available data suggest that where the murder rate is increasing, abolition does not appear to hasten the increase; where the murder rate is decreasing, abolition does not appear to interrupt the decrease; where the rate is stable, the presence or absence of capital punishment does not appear to affect it.

It is interesting to note in passing that many authorities even argue that the death penalty, by contributing to a climate of violence and by appealing to the suicidal tendencies of some unbalanced people, actually tends to increase the incidence of murder.

Let me reiterate my own conclusion, Mr. Speaker. I can find no evidence of correlation in either direction between capital punishment and the incidence of murder in our society. To advocate the death penalty as a deterrent to murder seems to me to imply an underlying conception of human conduct and motivation to which I do not subscribe. It assumes a rationality of behaviour on the part of potential murderers, a deliberate choice between alternative courses of action based on calculated consequences and anticipated pleasure and pain. It is now generally acknowledged, however, that much of human behaviour is unplanned and habitual rather than calculated and deliberate.

Can we deny, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of homicide this aspect of human behaviour is particularly apparent? Very few murders result from cold, calculated plotting. The overwhelming proportion are crimes of passion, committed in the heat of the moment, often resulting from domestic quarrels and frequently associated with drink or drugs. Such crimes are every bit as deplorable and grievous as those committed with deliberate intent but—and this is the point I want to make—they involve no premeditation and no calculation of consequences. In these cases, and in the cases involving mentally deranged killers, the deterrent value of capital punishment, or indeed of any other penalty, is irrelevant. In short, Mr. Speaker, deterrence, if it has any significance at all, can only operate upon rational minds; and people in a rational frame of mind do not commit murders. This is the central dilemma, as I see it, of the "deterrent" school of thought.

In looking back over history, the trend toward a more humane treatment of criminals is unmistakable. It is shocking and frightening to be reminded that only a century and a half ago—as late as the early 1800s—teenage boys and girls were hanged for petty theft and for picking pockets. When offences such as these were removed from the list of crimes punishable by death, great cries arose, sincere no doubt, to express profound fears for the safety of persons and property. It is frightening to realize, too, that it was only a few centuries ago that men were burned at the stake, boiled in oil, broken on the wheel and subjected to the most hideous kinds of brutal torture, all in the name of justice and for the sake of deterrence. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether future generations will look back on our present debate with the same feelings that we now experience in regard to these earlier punishments.

In this historical evolution of criminal punishment, the total and permanent abolition of capital punishment marks a logical, perhaps inevitable step. We have come some distance in creating a more humane approach to the treatment of criminals. I cannot help but think that we in Canada are now in the throes of the last, long, agonizing step in this process of evolution.

Many countries, indeed, have already overcome this last hurdle. Many other countries have officially abolished or unofficially suspened the death penalty. Today, there are some 50 countries in the world where some form of capital punishment for certain crimes still exists. It is perhaps noteworthy that almost half of all executions in the non-communist world take place in South Africa, which has an average of one execution, usually of a black, every three days. Britain, after a five-year trial period, permanently abolished the death penalty in 1970. The United States supreme court has recently declared the death penalty under most circumstances unconstitutional.

Most statisticians acknowledge that five years is an insufficient period of time to permit a conclusive determination of the trend in the murder rate. I believe that the last two years of statistics for the five-year trial period are not yet available. To be frank, I doubt that any further evidence will be adduced that will cause convinced abolitionists or retentionists to alter their positions. I do think, however, that many people are as yet undecided on the merits of the case. For them, another trial period will provide an opportunity to gain additional information on which to base their judgment.

However one interprets the present evidence of public feeling on the issue of capital punishment, it is unmistakably clear that serious divisions of view exist within our country. A matter of this importance, I believe, should have as much public consensus as possible. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) is to the effect that for certain types of convicted murderers there should be a mandatory 25 years' sentence before the normal parole procedure will be considered. This would not only apply to convicted murderers of police officers and prison guards but also to certain type of murders which occur at the time of other violent crimes. When this amendment is moved at the committee stage, I think it should be given very serious consideration. The public of this country is concerned that there is not adequate protection from this type of criminal. It seems to me that the mobster or the hired killer is the type of person from whom people are demanding protection. Perhaps this type of criminal should be incarcerated for this long period before parole is considered.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize that I am concerned with he protection of society and with the adequacy of our present rehabilitation system. We should re-examine the ways in which we administer our penitentiary policies, our parole system and our leave of absence programs. Certainly we should continue our pursuit of the basic causes of crime, its nature, its prevention and its detection. In this way we can combine an effective and humane treatment of offenders with the maximum degree of public safety. I am confident that we are on the right road. Let us not now turn back.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, by the time we finish this debate we will have canvassed all the historical, philosophical, statistical, moral and religious aspects of this issue. Let me preface my remarks by saying that thus far there appears to be a trend with regard to a vote which will be uncomfortably close and therefore it is necessary to present the varying views to persuade members of the House of the importance of this issue.

I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) set the tone of the debate and presented arguments in favour of the bill in a quiet, persuasive and telling way. I happen to be a total abolitionist but I am prepared to accept Bill C-2 and extend the law a further five years on the same basis as it was in 1967, because of the necessity of gaining further public support and because of the minister's statement that we are on the road to abolition.

This important social issue embraces all the emotional, mental and spiritual values of members of this House and therefore it will help to reflect that no one possesses all truth and all virtue and that only light can chase away the darkness. That is why I respect the thought and feelings of every person who holds views contrary to mine. But I am quick to add that my view is not a bleeding-heart plea for abolition; my motive is for a more human and decent society rather than misplaced pity for the offender. I am deeply encouraged and strengthened by the report, publicly stated, of leaders in the community—church leaders, social workers, penologists, parole workers, and so on, who have expressed their concern, their conviction, their commitment and have indicated the worth of the individual and the redemptive powers of their teaching and their experience.

Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has said that we are on the road to abolition. This is because of recent changes in the law and the exercise of commutation which have resulted not only in de jure abolition but also in de facto abolition. Not since 1962 has a person been hanged in Canada. Canada has joined other countries in a gradual movement away from capital punishment and is concentrating on alternative methods of effective control. The amendments of 1961 introduced by a Conservative government, by the Hon. Davie Fulton, brought a sharp change in the attitude toward capital punishment. The bill which made a division of murder into capital and non-capital, with the automatic right of appeal even to the Supreme Court of Canada, the polling of the jury as to a recommendation of mercy which was to be forwarded to the Minister of Justice, and the abolition of the death penalty for persons under 18 years, plus the almost full exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy set the change in motion.

The Progressive Conservative party under the leadership of the Hon. Davie Fulton set the change in motion. The debate on that bill in 1966, and the passing of the new bill in 1967 which was introduced by the Liberal government, placed a heavy emphasis on abolition and stressed a move away from capital punishment. Both parties, the Progressive Conservative party and the Liberal party, are to be commended on this move to de facto abolition. Dr. C. H. S. Jayewardine summarizes his view of the movement to de facto abolition in the following way:

> Both parties sought to produce the change by executive rather than legislative action. Both parties were goaded into moving the bills that they finally introduced. That the one is now viewed as a retentionist and the other as abolitionist does not appear to be because of their ideological commitment but because of the result of the circumstances in which they were situated. It was the Liberal government's legislation that limited the imposition of the penalty of death to almost the point of abolition but then the legislation which the Conservative government had been earlier forced to introduce left the Liberal government no choice in the further legislation that they were then forced to introduce. It was the Liberal government that commuted every sentence of death but then the pattern of commutation set by previous Conservative governments left them no choice. It was as if destiny was unfolding itself unobtrusively so as to make the change that was occurring appear congruous with the will of the people.

I would ask the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to note that change in attitude of the Progressive Conservative party and the Liberal party when considering the move toward de facto abolition. This move, Mr. Speaker, is no different than it has been in other countries throughout the world. When I think that in the year 1840 the small country of Luxemburg moved to abolish capital punishment, and here in 1973—150 years later—the country of Canada is now moving in the same direction, it makes me realize that maybe we are moving not too quickly in comparison with other countries.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

England has moved. She commenced her move in 1965 and almost completed abolition in 1969. In 1972 we had the supreme court of the United States bring down an historic and dramatic judgment in which it said that capital punishment constituted cruel and unusual punishment and therefore violated sections 8 and 14 of the United States Constitution. This now is an attempt by Canada to march with the times.

Why am I an abolitionist? There are four main reasons. First, I believe in the basic worth and value of human life. Albert Schwietzer said it beautifully in the words "reverence for life" in the twenty-first century, and Jesus and Gandhi propounded the philosophy and lived it. In the debate on the bill in 1967 the former solicitor general said:

> I believe that so long as the state claims the right under the law to deliberately take human life there will be a tendency to regard life more cheaply.

I believe that reverence for life is substantially diminished when we base our law on revenge and retribution, and that reverence for life is substantially increased when we base our law on redemption, reformation and rehabilitation. My second reason for being an abolitionist is that many innocent people have been hanged in the past and many innocent people may be hanged in the future. Judicial courts, even with all the safeguards of appeal procedures, are not infallible. False testimony, mistaken identification, biased juries or misinterpreted circumstantial evidence all make it possible that an innocent person may hang. This is the reason for Lafayette's challenge, "I shall ask for abolition of the death penalty until I have the infallibility of human judgment demonstrated to me." This is why it goes unanswered by the retentionists.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall the debate in 1967 and the mention of the Christie case in England, which at that time indicated the wrong person had been executed and that this evidence did not come out until the execution had taken place. We remember the D'Arcy McGee murder in Canada which left many doubts as to whether the correct person was executed. And many of us have had agonizing question marks with regard to the guilt of the young man Truscott. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we feel that the death penalty is so final, so irreversible that it almost prompts the statement: I would rather see one hundred guilty men go free than one innocent man executed. This is why there is such a low conviction rate in Canada and elsewhere throughout the world; it is because of the reluctance of judges and juries to bring in a conviction because of the possibility of mistake. Therefore they grapple for and grasp at alternative verdicts.

The third reason I am an abolitionist is that people do not have equal opportunities before the courts. The scales are weighted against the poor and inarticulate. We cannot consider this problem of capital punishment and we cannot consider the act of murder without bringing into consideration the social, the economic, the cultural and the racial factors that are brought into play. Lewis E. Hawes, a former warden of Sing Sing penitentiary in the United States, has written, "Those who are executed are always poor and friendless." He has indicated that money assures the best counsel and the highest chance of acquittal.

Differences in racial, cultural and social status discriminate against the poor and the friendless. There is an old Indian saying, "Judge not a man until you have stood in his moccasins." How can we judge the man who has committed murder? How would you like to stand in the shoes of a negro in the southern states, charged with murder for rape, when he has full knowledge that never has a white person in the southern states been convicted of a similar offence?

How would you like to stand in the shoes of a young Canadian Indian when all the cards are stacked against you on economic, social and racial grounds? I hasten to add that we have gone a long way in changing the law and providing all with equal opportunities before the courts. Legal aid and the provision of lawyers in capital murder cases are steps in the right direction, but they do not meet all the inequities that still prevail under the law.

Fourthly, society is largely responsible for the conditions which breed crime and we must accept part of the blame. Violence has been rampant in the world these last few years, and violence begets violence. Just think of half a million men returning from Viet Nam. They have been trained and have experience in killing and they will come back and try to adjust to the American way of life. That will be difficult, Mr. Speaker. I do not doubt that many will encounter difficulties and will commit crimes which call for capital punishment.

The use of guns in society is another problem we must face. Here I recall the fate of the bill which Senator Kennedy brought before the American Congress. Its purpose was to prohibit the use of certain guns in the United States. Hon. members will recall the difficulties that he encountered. He met with no success in securing passage of that bill; it would not pass in Congress. Let me add quickly that an amendment to the Explosives Act was brought forward in the previous parliament. Differences and divergencies of opinion on restrictions affecting the use of guns and the use of ammunition sharply divided the members of this House. We did not come to any final conclusion on the bill.

I have said that society breeds crime. Poor economic conditions, poor employment prospects and lack of decent housing create a kind of desperation, a kind of alienation which form the bedrock in the breeding of crime. One might ask, what is required? Without doubt, we must emphasize the need for improving basic conditions to do with housing, to do with prison programs and to do with the acceptance of responsibilities on the part of inmates so as to bring about their employment and integration into the community. Please notice that I speak of integration into the community, not reintegration. Many men who have spent time in penitentiaries have never been integrated as part of the community; therefore, we cannot talk in terms of reintegration but must talk of integration.

At this stage I wish to commend the former solicitor general who had the courage and wisdom to bring forward changes in our penal system and in the treatment of prisoners. That action took courage and it brought on him criticism not only from members of the House but from many people across Canada. I think time will show that the former solicitor general was on the right track in developing such programs.

The age most critical for young people, the age at which they are most apt to get into trouble, is that between 16 and 24. That is why we in the NDP were deeply concerned over the young offenders bill brought forward in the last parliament. Evidence given before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs by social workers and other public officials indicated the need for diagnostic and related services to be used in cases involving young people. I for one am happy that I attempted to block passage of that bill. If we are ever to solve this problem and create the type of society in which young people will be less likely to commit murder, we must seek the support of our youth. We must introduce diagnostic and related services that will help us to meet some of the problems that youth encounters today.

We have heard many arguments against abolition and will continue hearing them. It is safe to say that deterrence and the protection of society are the main arguments put forward. Mr. Speaker, I cannot stand statistics, having found that they can be brought forward to support whichever side is preferred. Statistics fail to disclose the facts because they fail to take into account factors involving social, economic, cultural, educational and racial problems which play a far more important part in deterring crime than punishment.

United Nations' reports indicate that the examination of records of the number of murders committed before and after the abolition or reintroduction of the death penalty do not support the theory that capital punishment has a unique deterrent effect. It has been said, and will be repeated again, that if capital punishment is carried to its logical conclusion, then if we are to emphasize the deterrent aspect there ought to be public hangings across Canada. Let us set up a scaffold on the grounds of Parliament Hill, perhaps we should set up a scaffold in the civic square outside the city hall, perhaps we should set up a scaffold on the Expo property in Montreal and publicly display a scaffold in Stanley Park, Vancouver.

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Mr. Gilbert: This will bring such revulsion when people see what happens to a person who is hanged that capital punishment would come to an immediate end. Studies have indicated that in England during the nineteenth century, of 167 pickpockets who were hanged 164 had seen others hanged publicly. Actually, many of them plied their trade when witnessing the hanging of other pickpockets.

Professor Selling attempted to test the argument that capital punishment offers special protection to police officers by comparing police homicides in abolitionist and retentionist states. While stressing the special difficulties of such a test, Professor Selling reports that "on the whole the abolitionist states . . . seem to have fewer (police) killings but the differences are small".

I would be remiss in my duty if I did not point out that recent public opinion polls indicate that there is a sharp trend in favour of retention. Public acceptance of retention is a relevant but not controlling factor. We must remember that society does not practise what it preaches.

The steady decrease in executions across the world persuasively demonstrates that capital punishment is unacceptable to society today. One member who spoke earlier this evening mentioned a referendum and suggested that a referendum on the subject ought to be held at the next election. That course, Mr. Speaker, would be a dereliction of the duty of a Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: We are sent here to represent the constituents of our ridings and are expected to inform ourselves on the issues. We are expected to exercise common sense in our judgments. Sending the issue of capital punishment back to the voters in the form of a referendum would be a complete dereliction of our duty. It would not be necessary for us to be here, for all issues could be decided by referendum. Can you imagine what would happen if the imposition of taxes was determined on the basis of referendum?

Our best protection would be the introduction of basic reforms in the treatment and confinement of inmates. These are needed. It is also necessary to differentiate between different types of murder. Two out of every three murders are crimes of passion committed within the family circle. There is very little likelihood of repetition. The difficult issue is detecting the psychotic and containing him until he is fully restored. This would require research programs, treatment and reformation. This is why we say the Parole Act should be studied in detail so as to find out ways and means of detecting the psychotic killer and devising the programs and research necessary to deal with him.

I direct my final remarks to the new members in this chamber. After sitting here for a good number of years they will ask themselves, "What have I done to make this a better Canada?" And they might find difficulty in deciding. I might as well be personal, I have been here for seven years and I find it very difficult to answer that question. The role of the opposition is that of constructive criticism. This having been said, I feel proud of my own contribution to the final form of the young offenders bill and take pleasure in that achievement. The former hon. member for Welland, Mr. Donald Tolmie, made a significant contribution to the formation of the law permitting the expunging of criminal records. For his part in this legislation he is to be congratulated. Many of us have enjoyed the same kind of satisfaction that he did.

I would say to the new members, "If you want an opportunity to do something which will put Canada in a forward position, which will underline the compassion which is to be found in most of us, you have an opportunity to vote in support of the bill now before this chamber." If we concentrate on the changes which are taking place in terms of treatment, rather than revert to revenge and retribution, we shall march forward and we shall be able to say as the years go by that we have done a good job.

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to explain that at the third reading stage, I shall vote against this bill in keeping with the position I took in this House in 1967. I will explain my situation by repeating some of the arguments put forward by the Solicitor General (M. Allmand) who stated, as recorded on page 688 of Hansard for January 26, 1973, and I quote:

> The purpose of the original trial period in 1967 was to allow for a period during which those crimes punishable by death would be severely restricted. This five-year experiment would be a time of intense study and analysis, the results of which were to guide the House's deliberations after December 29, 1972. We are beyond the termination date of that five-year period but, unfortunately, we do not have the full data for the entire five years on which to base studies and, hence, legislative recommendations.

> It seems to me that we must see the process, commenced in 1967, through to its logical conclusion.

I want to be true to my convictions of 1967 even though, of course, I respect the contrary opinions of my colleagues. I hope they will consider mine favourably. In 1967, I voted against the bill when a free vote was held, regardless of the party line. In 1973, it will also be a free vote. In view of the fact that I have not heard further arguments against my former position, I think I must explain to the House why I will vote in the same manner as in 1967.

I am told that I have not changed. I did not change precisely because the arguments put forward by the Solicitor General himself and by the other members who until now have participated in the debate have not convinced me. I think I am entitled to my opinion in spite of what some members who say I have not changed may think.

Mr. Speaker, I note that the Canadian people are taking a tougher stand with regard to certain acts committed since 1967 and which were witnessed in Quebec and in other provinces. I note that the people are becoming more and more strict and are increasingly asking the government to pass a legislation designed to protect them against a seemingly greater degree of violence than when we enacted a similar legislation in 1967.

The act which abolished capital punishment for a certain type of murder expired on December 29, 1972.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I will probably repeat some arguments which were put forward in this House, but I believe that in such an important debate, it is difficult to avoid repetitions. We heard many repetitions in 1964 during the debate on the national flag when some 200 speeches were delivered, and I think that many arguments were then repeated. Nevertheless, each member is entitled to express his views on the bill now under consideration.

I said that except in the case of police officers or prison guards, capital murder was no longer involved.

The bill now under consideration would actually reinstate those provisions, but would substitute to the terms capital murder and non-capital murder the terms murder that is punishable by death and murder that is punishable by life imprisonment.

If the bill were passed, the provisions which have been in force during the past five years would remain for five more years, i.e. until December 31, 1977.

In case the amendments were not renewed or permanently adopted before December 31, 1977, we would again come under the act which was in force prior to 1967.

Clauses 8 and 9 of the bill provide for interim measures which will become necessary in case these provisions are adopted in the near future. Those interim measures are all the more necessary because, theoretically, since December 29 1972, the pre-1967 provisions have been restored.

If the bill before us were passed, it would not be fair for people not to benefit by its provisions merely because they fell under the act between December 29, 1972 and the coming into force of this bill, since normally it should have been introduced in the House before expiry of the five-year period, i.e. before December 29, 1972, in order to come immediately into effect on December 30.

I believe, therefore, that on second reading I shall not object to the bill being referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for detailed study; but the House will again have to deal with the bill and, unless amendments are proposed which coincide with the position I took early in my statement, I shall have to vote against it on third reading, as I did in 1967. On the other hand, I know that some hon. members intend to propose amendments, although I do not know exactly what they are. If some of those strike me as judicious, I shall be happy to support them; but if the bill rejects the death penalty, I shall have to vote against it.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there is an old story that has gone the rounds in many countries and, if I can paraphrase it, it is the story of a man who was sleeping and dreamed he was speaking in the House of Commons on the subject of capital punishment. And when he awoke, by golly, he was! You and me, Mr. Speaker, have both had the opportunity now on two separate occasions to listen to a debate in this chamber encompassing this important subject, and as I was sitting here this evening I was thinking how valuable it was to have the requirement in our rules that a matter cannot be debated twice in one session. However, it now seems that we have not taken enough precautions to have some extensive requirement to prevent this House of Commons from coming back regularly to debate certain issues that seem destined to be debated on into eternity. As has already been mentioned on a number of occasions in this debate, this matter was very exhaustively dealt with by parliament in 1966 and 1967; now in 1973 it is being debated again.

Indeed, this debate has a kind of Mackenzie King quality to it; the debate is so unreal. We are, in effect, asked to extend provisions that would partially abolish that which has already been abolished, as has been noted by previous speakers, for the better part of the last decade. Indeed, I think it is assumed in all parts of the House and by all hon. members that, regardless of the outcome of the debate, the practice that has become very firmly entrenched and accepted in this country today of abolishing capital punishment will be continued.

Perhaps I have missed it, but I have not heard it seriously suggested either inside or outside the House that this practice, which has been carried on extensively now by a number of successive governments, would be or should be discontinued. It therefore must strike many observers as passing strange that we should be launched once again, not on a debate of the kind we had in 1966 to abolish capital punishment but on a debate to almost abolish capital punishment, which I assume has really the end effect merely of satisfying some people more than others. Perhaps before too long there should be an opportunity to have some clear settlement of this issue if only to relieve parliament, let alone the general public, of this continued preoccupation with capital punishment.

As previous speakers have suggested, we are in very great danger, I think particularly in present circumstances when we are perpetuating this debate, of avoiding some of the fundamental issues that concern many hundreds of thousands of Canadians. We are going through a very serious time of economic and social dislocation in this country. We hear about it daily. We read about it in our newspapers. We watch it on the television screen. We know the extent of the misery that many of our fellow Canadians share. Yet here we are involving ourselves in this kind of rarefied debate of a matter which, thank God, touches on the lives of very few Canadians. I suggest something is quite obviously wrong with the priorities of a government that insists on having a prolonged debate on a subject of this nature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): There is no doubt that there must be a final resolution of this question, but the final resolution is not going to come in this debate. Regardless of the outcome, the question is not going to be resolved. What we are doing, either consciously or unconsciously, is merely contributing to a very unhealthy diversion at a time when some very important questions need to be resolved.

There are some undercurrents and underlying issues in the question of capital punishment and I want to deal with these because I think that if there is anything useful that can be said in this current debate it is not in dealing with the oft debated questions of the importance of a deterrent, the value of capital punishment as a form of punishment—not just directly for the individual involved but indirectly for society—and its importance in the whole build-up of the legal framework of our society. Perhaps I might more appropriately address myself to these concerns tomorrow afternoon, Mr. Speaker, and I shall therefore call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I ask the government House leader whether we are continuing this debate tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will carry on with this debate tomorrow and probably on Wednesday. I want at some point, either on Thursday or Friday, to ask the House if it would deal with the pilotage bill, but I will not change the order of business without giving good advance notice to my hon. friend.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the debate on Viet Nam take place on Friday?

Mr. MacEachen: It is proposed to have a debate this week, but there are still some loose ends to be tied up before I can determine at what point the debate will be held, whether on Thursday and Friday or part Thursday and continuing on Friday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—VIET NAM—PROPOSED PEACEKEEPING FORCE—SOURCE OF FUNDS TO COVER COST OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, however brief it may be, as I rise for the first time in this parliament I should convey my congratulations to yourself and to my distinguished friend and colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), on the elevation to his high post.

On January 16, in the midst of a flurry of questions in respect of the present situation in which Canada finds itself in Viet Nam, I rose and asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) whether he could in a general way at that point in time indicate to the House just who was going to pay for this very unreal excursion into peacekeeping in Viet Nam. The minister, quite properly, I suppose, with the range of knowledge available to him at the time, said he did not know, it was too early to tell and to the best of his knowledge at that time the only cost incurred would be the cost of salaries.

Things have changed quite a bit in the past few days since that question was posed. We do now have troops in Viet Nam, we do in fact have a multimillion dollar destroyer escort en route to water contiguous to Vietnamese waters, we have a Hercules apparently already standing by on the ground, and probably in their wisdom the government has seen fit to keep one or two 707s standing by in the event we have to get out. It would be a pleasure to pursue the reason for all this concern but I think we will have an opportunity to do that if we have a debate later this week.

What I am concerned about is just where the money is to come from. Our distinguished ambassador to France said on June 2, 1969, and I quote from page 9306 of Hansard for that date the last sentence in the second paragraph of the right-hand column:

> We believe we can achieve the transition, barring unexpected international developments, within a defence budget which will be maintained for the next three years at its current dollar level.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

This is what brought me to my feet the other day in the House and what brings me to my feet again tonight. I want to know where the money is to come from. This will involve more than just the cost of salaries. Will the defence budget, for example, be unfrozen in order to satisfy pay allowances? If it is not to be unfrozen, will attrition or further cutbacks in the armed forces budget provide that money for sustaining a peacekeeping operation of this nature and magnitude in Viet Nam?

Will manpower and capital programs suffer, and will there be further base consolidation? More forced attrition would, in my view—and I hope the view of all members of the House—be intolerable and the effects of it disastrous to morale and training programs. There is not enough money to do nearly the things that our Canadian armed forces have been assigned to do by this government.

I ask the distinguished parliamentary secretary where the money is to come from to pay the 2 per cent of the commission's costs in Viet Nam, and does he have any idea what those costs will be? These are questions to which I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) should properly have addressed himself in his initial indication to the House of what in fact we might be doing in connection with this observer role.

I doubt very much that the parliamentary secretary has a detailed response for me tonight, given his limited time, but I am interested in what the per diem cost will be, even if it is based on past experience. This 60-day business is for the birds. We have ships, planes and men over there, and the more people we put in Viet Nam, the more difficult it will be for us to get them out. We have been involved in similar operations in India, Pakistan, Palestine and Kashmir. We have been in Lebanon, West Iran, and we have been with the United Nations' Yemen observer commission. We have taken part in United Nations' emergency forces in Cyprus, and we have been involved in UN operations in the Congo, Korea and with the ICC. And now we are in Viet Nam.

These things are not done without a tremendous burden being placed on departmental budgets. The difference is, Mr. Speaker, that this time we are being asked to do something in the context of a frozen budget and in the absence of an indication from the Minister of National Defence of what the government's intentions are with respect to funding this operation and, indeed, the entire defence budget for the ensuing year. The three-year period called for by the former minister, Mr. Cadieux, has virtually expired. I hope that tonight the distinguished parliamentary secretary can give us some indication of how much this is going to cost and where the money is coming from. If it is going to come out of the defence budget, can he give us any indication of the government's intention and willingness to unfreeze once and for all the current defence budget?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) asked a lot of questions in a short period of time. As he will appreciate, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), in reply to this question on Tuesday, January 16, indicated that as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned the only expenditure it will likely be involved with is that for pay and allowances. Exactly how much this will be is now dependent upon how many personnel are actually sent, now that the government's decision has been made to participate in observer and peacekeeping duties in Viet Nam during the initial 60-day period, and how long the personnel may be required to perform their duties following the initial commitment.

Last Wednesday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in response to a question from the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) advised that initially it was suggested that Canada contribute 10 per cent of the budget of the commission. However, in the protocol it is suggested that each member of the supervisory commission should pay 2 per cent of the budget of the commission. As you are aware, Sir, the agreement and the protocols were ratified in Paris on Saturday, 27 January, 1973.

In article 14 of the governing protocol, the basic financing formulaes proposed are as follows: each member country of the commission shall pay salaries and allowances of their respective personnel; each of the four parties to the agreement shall contribute 23 per cent and each member of the commission for supervision to contribute 2 per cent; and, the international commission will prepare its own budget which will be submitted to the four parties signatory to the agreement for their approval.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would agree that as a result of the government's only becoming aware of the proposed financing formula on Wednesday last, this is only one of the several aspects of the protocols still to be resolved.

OLD AGE SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN BASIC AMOUNT AND LOWERING OF AGE OF ELIGIBILITY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to commend my hon. friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), for his attendance here tonight when a "late show" question is being put to him. This is a practice which I hope he will continue and it is a practice on his part that I would commend to other ministers.

On Monday, January 8, as recorded in Hansard at page 38, I put this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

In view of the general reference in the throne speech to the taking of steps to improve the economic conditions of old age pensioners, may I ask the minister if those steps will include an increase in the basic amount of the old age security pension? Will they also include a lowering of the eligibility age?

The reply of the minister was in these words:

Mr. Speaker, I expect to be able to make a statement in the House on this subject later on.

The minister kept that promise by making a speech in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on Thursday, January 11, and included in that speech was this sentence as found on page 202 of Hansard:

However I can assure hon. members that a substantial old age pension increase will be announced soon, and I hasten to add that it will not be a mere token increase.

Further on in that same paragraph he indicated a concern not only for those over age 65 but also for those under that age. The next day, Friday, January 12, in the speech that I made in the same debate I warmly welcomed the statement of the minister which I have just quoted and gave him my commendation on the attention he seemed to be paying to the department of which he is now the minister.

I may add that since that date there have been a number of other questions put to the minister. Maybe I am an optimistic type, but it seems to me that his answers have all been in the right direction. It does seem clear that something is going to be done to implement the promise in the Speech from the Throne and the promise made by the minister in his speech of January 11. If therefore, Mr. Speaker, I seem pleased with what the minister has said, and if I am optimistic and hopeful, why do I take the time of the House, even in a "late show" period, to press my question? Well, I suppose one learns from long experience in this place that even when things are promised, if one does not rise and press and demand them they don't come.

So I rise tonight to express to the minister the very strong hope that he is not going to be one of those ministers who take forever to implement the Liberal promises of 1919, but that he will act quickly. I remind him that what we are seeking, particularly those of us in this part of the House, is precisely what he has proposed—a substantial increase in the old age pension, not a mere token increase. I remind him also that we want that increase to be an increase in the basic rate of the old age pension. We want it added to the part of the pension that is paid universally, and without any means or income test.

I also remind the minister that we want him in some way to break the 65 age floor either to start paying pensions to all those between 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market or to start paying pensions to spouses of persons who are in receipt of the pension. In a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, these are the points that we hope will be part of an announcement soon, and of legislation which I trust will be introduced almost immediately after the announcement.

I am aware of conversations that the minister intends to hold with his provincial counterparts on Friday of this week, but he has told us that these are only a conversation, that those ministers do not have the power of veto over what he intends to do. Therefore, if it is too much to ask the minister to tell us tonight how much the increase is going to be and what he is going to do about the eligible age, I hope that at least he will confirm his promise that there is going to be action, that he will tell us tonight when the announcement is going to be made and when the legislation is going to be introduced. Mr. Speaker, I hope those dates are next week.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank the hon. member for his comments about my presence in the chamber. I would like to assure him that for me this is just part of the long, long training that I am told one has to go through before becoming a House of Commons man, and

I intend indeed to listen, in view of his experience, to his advice and to maintain my attendance in the House on a constant basis. I can assure him that so far as my other duties allow it, I will certainly listen to his advice in that respect.

So far as the other points he has raised are concerned, he has correctly reported the events that have taken place in the last few weeks and I do not think I can add much more to what he has said. The government indeed is committed to a substantial increase in old age pensions, and is indeed concerned about the fate of those below 65 years.

In the Speech from the Throne there was a clear statement to the effect that we wanted to review our social policy in all respects in Canada, with the provinces, over the next couple of years at the latest, but we would not let the old age pensioners wait for the results of our discussions. In light of the representations that I have received from the minister of social affairs for Quebec, for early discussions on this subject, we have agreed to have a one-day meeting in Ottawa this week when we are going to discuss this question of old age pensions in all its aspects.

Once more, Mr. Speaker, these are conversations. I know what the responsibilities of the federal government are in this respect, and this House is the body that will decide what action finally will be taken and it will not be left to provincial representatives to do so for us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, let him say next week, please.

PUBLIC SERVICE—AMENDMENT OF STATUTES AFFECTING EMPLOYMENT—LEGISLATIVE PRIORITY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on January 16 I asked a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) with respect to the amendment of statutes affecting the employment of public servants and the legislative priority of those amendments, as reported at page 331 of Hansard. The question arose as a result of representations made to me by public servants who expressed concern over the fact that the public service staff association had in 1971 made extensive representations to the legislative review committee chaired by John G. Dryden, wherein there were many suggestions made with respect to changes in public service legislation. That occurred in 1971.

In the intervening period many questions have been placed on the order paper and many questions asked in this House as to when there might be some report on the matter and some legislative enactment. At last in the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of the present session, there was brief reference to the amending of those two statutes which affect the working conditions of public servants. The questions having been asked, the minister replied:

I cannot do more than give assurance that amendments will be introduced this session. I will discuss the precise timing with the House leader.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

A similar answer was given to the supplementary asked at that time. In view of the delays, and in view of the great number of public servants in the national capital area and other areas who are anxious to know the answer to this question, it is important to raise it. They want to know, for instance, the limits on arbitration, the limits on negotiation, the resolution of the problem respecting redundant employees, the classification of employees and the standards, norms and rules that would apply; who will be prohibited from collective bargaining and who will not be. Then there is the whole question of managerial employees and confidentiality of certain procedures. There is also the matter of appropriate procedures with respect to the settlement of arbitrations and disputes.

The question of the appropriate procedure with respect to settlement of arbitration, the concepts of retraining because of the introduction of new technology, the whole question of delegation of authority, all of these are important and a large segment of the public service has been waiting a long time for answers. I expressed to the Clerk of the House my feeling that I was not satisfied with the answer given and that there ought to be a statement made by the minister telling us when these matters would be brought forward.

In addition to the budget surplus generally, there is the whole question of the House of Commons staff, the Senate staff, the Governor General's staff, staff locally engaged abroad and all other staffs which have to deal with an employer but which, unfortunately, cannot deal with him on a proper basis with duly qualified representation. I ask the parliamentary secretary whether he is able at this time to give a precise answer. I hope he will tell me that he has consulted the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) who in turn has consulted the government House leader, and that he comes into the chamber prepared to give a precise answer to questions which so many public servants are asking.

It seems to me the federal government should be the leader and point the way to industry and other governments as to what is the proper relationship and balance. This question was asked so that the matter could be brought forward at the earliest possible date. I would appreciate hearing from the parliamentary secretary, and look forward, as do so many public servants, to hearing that after the unemployment insurance legislation public service matters are next on the list to be dealt with.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret to tell the hon. member I am unable to give him the exact assurances he is seeking. There are a number of reasons for this. He is quite correct in assuming that the government does intend to introduce proposals relating to the Public Service Staff Relations Act and to the Public Service Employment Act during the present session. I am informed by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that the House will be given ample opportunity to discuss these matters.

Unfortunately, I cannot give the House the precise dates on which these amendments will be introduced. There is a heavy legislative program in preparation and items such as the budget and resolutions flowing therefrom will have to be considered as priority measures. The proposals relating to the legislation I mentioned will be introduced as soon as the timetable of the House will permit. Then, I would hope, they would be referred to the appropriate committee for discussion before returning to the House for a happy conclusion.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DECISION TO PROCEED WITH EXPROPRIATIONS

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement regarding expropriation proceedings to acquire a site for a new Toronto airport at Pickering, Ontario. Hon. members will recall that public hearings of objections were held during December in Toronto, as provided for in the Expropriation Act, and the hearing officer's report was tabled in the House on January 18. The government has given careful and detailed consideration to the objections documented in the report, and in particular the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has reviewed the technical aspects. These issues, as well as the vitally important social implications, have been extensively reviewed by cabinet.

My colleague the Minister of Transport is today tabling two documents most pertinent to this issue: first, a technical response to the objections made at the public hearing, which was prepared by the Ministry of Transport; second, a statement by the Minister of Transport regarding the need for a new Toronto airport. This in turn clearly establishes the need for the land being expropriated.

The government is convinced of the need for a new Toronto airport and I am of the opinion the Pickering site is required for this purpose. Accordingly, I have signed the notices of confirmation of expropriation and requested the Attorney General of Canada to take the necessary steps immediately to effect registration of the notices in the local land registry and title offices.

These Notices include the majority of lands described in the notices of intention. However, certain portions of the lands described in the notices of intention are not being confirmed. The lands that are not therefore being expropriated are generally located on the original boundary and I am advised by the Minister of Transport it is not essential they be acquired for the airport. This advice is based upon investigations completed since the first announcement in March 1972. I might add that the owners of these lands will be offered the option of selling their land to the government.

In accordance with the procedures laid down in the Expropriation Act, written offers of compensation, accompanied by an appraisal report, will be made to every owner of an interest in the lands to which the notices of confirmation apply. The more than 2,000 offers required will be made within the statutory ninety day period following the date of confirmation.

In addition to the market value of the property, which is to be calculated as of the date the notice of confirmation is registered and not the earlier notice of intention, an owner in occupation will also be paid for any costs or losses incidental to disturbance including moving to other premises. There is provision for compensating tenants and holders of security or mortgage interests, plus rules for other items and types of compensation. Of particular note is the right of an expropriated homeowner to claim additional compensation for the cost of relocating his residence in reasonably equivalent premises, if the compensation otherwise payable is not sufficient to permit this.

Many hon. members will also recall the strong support in the House of the provision in the new act whereby an owner may accept the government's offer of compensation and receive payment immediately, without prejudicing his right to claim additional compensation. An owner then has up to one year to negotiate settlement of such claims or to proceed in the Federal Court.

I should also point out that no resident will be required to move immediately. Obviously, the public examination of airport facilities announced last year and since reaffirmed, will help determine the timing and development of this airport.

In any event, it takes several years to develop an airport and thus many residents will not be required to move for a considerable period of time.

Clearly, it will be in the public interest to facilitate the continued residence of owners who wish to remain and this has also been the attitude of the Ontario government who are acquiring land in the adjoining area. Accordingly, such owners will be required to pay only the taxes and the usual costs of operation including maintenance and insurance, through to December 31, 1974.

In conclusion then, the decision to proceed has been made and I can assure the House that each owner will be dealt with compassionately and to the full extent of the new Expropriation Act.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). I received in my office a copy of the statement by the Minister of Transport and, as you will recall, Sir, the Minister of Public Works said that the Minister of Transport would table two documents, one being the statement. I wonder whether the hon. member for St. Paul's and Your Honour might not agree that the Minister of Transport be given an opportunity now to table these two documents, because my comments will be in respect of both the statement by the Minister of Public Works and the document to be filed by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I am tabling the response of the Department of Transport to the synopsis report of the hearing officer with regard to the new Toronto airport, as well as my own statement on the choice of the site.

[English]

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank both the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) for providing copies of their statements in advance of the presentation and tabling of the respective statements in the House.

It is distressing that the government finds it necessary to confirm expropriations of some 18,000 acres of land involving over 2,000 property owners when the question of need for a second airport has not yet been determined.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: This is clearly locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen. Even if a second airport is needed, which many people seriously doubt, the decision today destroys any flexibility left in siting an airport which may not be put into use for a decade. Surely this is one of the worst examples of backward planning this country has ever seen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: The government says it is convinced of the need for a new Toronto airport. While it may have reports from its technical consultants, and even these have been conflicting from time to time, who has it consulted in the Toronto-centred region? At least 14 of the 22 successful metro Toronto candidates in the October 30 election went on record during the campaign as saying there was no proven need for a second airport. The Toronto city council executive committee, representing over 700,000 people, last Wednesday requested the abandonment of the expropriations prior to a public determination of need. The regional municipality of York, representing 166,000 people, and the township of Pickering, representing over 30,000 people, have made similar requests, as has the mayor of Scarborough. Most of the formal objectors at the expropriation hearings in November and December gave primary emphasis to the unanswered question of need.

Yet the government pushes blindly on with virtually no public consultation and confirms the Pickering expropriations.

The lengthy statement of the Minister of Transport or, at least, the first nine pages of that statement, can be boiled down to this. He is saying to the people of the Toronto-centred region: You need a second airport; we have decided. Yet in the last four pages it appears to have suddenly dawned upon the minister that he should be concerned about public participation. He is at long last prepared to honour the commitment of his predecessor and arrange for an independent group to hear representations from the public as well as from the provincial and municipal governments. This independent group is to determine the type and timing of the facilities required, and the people will be able to make inputs not only on the question of the airport but also as to the kind of urban region they want, and how this would affect air service and airports.

We welcome this opportunity for public participation. It is long overdue. But we find it impossible to believe that this government can in any way maintain an open mind on the question when it appears to have already made its decision. The expropriations which have been confirmed today are for an airport. They cannot be for any other purpose if they are to remain legally valid. The government knows this. How can the public participation proposed in these circumstances be anything but a charade? At best, this is political waffling to avoid the political impact of a decision already taken. The Minister of Transport says in his statement that this process will be the first of its kind and could be a model for the future. Expropriate now—determine need later. Heaven help us!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wanted the Minister of Transport to have the opportunity to table his statement before we commented on the situation because his statement is a great deal more important, if I may say so, than the statement made by the Minister of Public Works. As to that statement, I can only say the minister is following the procedures under the new Expropriation Act. I would simply ask him, very seriously and very strongly, to consider making available to the proprietors of the property in that area the opportunity and the financial assistance necessary for them to obtain their own appraisers instead of having to depend merely upon the appraisers that the department will appoint. This invariably places the person who owns the home or land at a considerable disadvantage.

As to the decision itself, I cannot but agree with the very eloquent, very succinct and very excellent statement made by the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps, as he is a new member, he will not think me paternalistic for using those adjectives. I am really disturbed by the politics in the statement of the Minister of Transport. I am disturbed for a very fundamental reason. The Minister of Transport says very distinctly, as does the Minister of Public Works in his statement, that the government has decided (a) that a second

Toronto airport is needed, and (b) that Pickering shall be the location. Then he talks about public hearings after the expropriations are confirmed and he hints, but does not say, in referring to a public hearing that it is still possible for the government to change its mind. Mr. Speaker, I say earnestly to the minister that this is precisely the kind of cynical approach to participation by the people that degrades the value of government and the value of parliament.

• (1420)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: If the government has made up its mind that there is need for a second airport and that Pickering should be the site, it ought to have the courage to say so and stand behind that decision, and not try to fool all the people in the Pickering area into thinking that the government can still change its mind.

I am not an expert in this field, Mr. Speaker, and do not claim to be. Personally, I am simply not convinced of the need for a second airport in the Toronto area. Indeed, I may be considered as not being willing to keep up with the times but I say without hesitation that I cannot convince myself of the value of ever bigger, ever faster, ever noisier aircraft in this country or in the world. I am not at all convinced that humanity will be better and happier if we can fly across the Atlantic or across Canada in one hour or two hours less time than we now can. It has seemed to me for a long time that human progress and the quality of human life are being sacrificed on the altar of bigness and speed in our present society. I am not at all persuaded that this is the way humanity ought to go or the direction in which the Canadian people ought to go.

If, however, a second airport is indeed needed, then I appreciate that no matter where you try to locate it there will be difficulties. My only difficulty with the statement made by the hon. member for St. Paul's is that he entirely avoided informing the House and the people of Canada that the Pickering site for the airport was chosen by the Ontario Conservative government, as well as by the federal Liberal government.

Mr. Lewis: I think it is important to underline that, because it is part of the difficulty which faces us in discussing this problem.

Finally, if the minister and the government were convinced of the need for a second airport and of the need for Pickering as the site of that airport, these public hearings ought to have been held in 1970, 1971 and 1972 so that the people in the area might have had available all of the information and become educated about the need for the airport in that area since, obviously, no matter where you tried to put the airport, there would be objections in that locality as, indeed, there have been objections by the people around Malton to any suggestion of enlarging that airport. I say that the decision to establish a second airport was made in 1968 by the then minister of transport, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), before his reincarnation. We should have had these public hearings and these public discussions long before this, and the people in the area ought not to be put to the trouble of expropriation proceedings on a false and misleading basis as the statement of the minister suggests.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, in his statement to the effect that the government intends to give notices of confirmations of expropriation, the Minister of Public Works points out that the decision involves Canadian communications and business.

He also mentions the effects on the quality of the environment in which people will have to live in that part of the country.

Obviously, the decision to confirm the expropriations is as important as the project itself. The government seems deeply concerned about all aspects of the program, and it expresses its intention to create an independant group to study those questions and hear the representations of the interested parties. We should rejoice in that initiative. Although this is an outstanding project which must be carried out, to my mind it is imperative that the persons chiefly concerned, namely those who will be expropriated, should have the opportunity to be heard.

We already know that many problems have arisen in connection with the expropriation in Saint-Eustache, precisely because the owners concerned have not always been treated as they had been promised they would be in regard to some very justified requests.

I have in mind certain complaints by many owners of land located at the end of runways of the Ancienne-Lorette airport, near land owned by the Department of Transport. People who would normally have sold land for home construction in the towns of L'Ancienne-Lorette and Sainte-Foy cannot do so because the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not finance the building of housing units in this area.

On page 10 in his statement on expropriation, the minister implies that everything is being looked after and that expropriated owners have nothing to fear because this expropriation will be carried out on the basis of a particular aspect in the act that says you must provide "a home for a home".

I also have in mind the expropriation, which goes back to 1967, of Valcartier Camp. It was carried out by the Liberal government. It was based on legislation very similar to the one mentioned earlier. People were forced to vacate the site. In certain case, threats were proffered, insinuating that they either had to accept the price offered or make a deposit of $5,000 before appealing to the court, which was quite false.

In other cases, Mr. Speaker, the people expropriated were promised jobs, which they never obtained since most of them are still standing in line at manpower centers just like all the other unemployed of this country.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. minister states that all those expropriated will be paid at market value; however, we cannot forget that inflation has not yet been curbed and that it is quite possible that some of those appropriated are farmers who own a small farm worth $40,000 where they manage to make a living, whereas in five to six years such farmers, having given up their farm, will find themselves without jobs, owning only a house.

The hon. minister asserts that an effort will be made to preserve historical monuments and protect the natural beauties of the site.

Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. minister on all his good intentions. However, I hope the government will recognize that the major effort to be made is in the interest of preserving the dignity of citizens caught in this mesh.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED NEW RUNWAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the failure as yet of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to fulfil the commitment made to the House on January 16, 1973, through his parliamentary secretary, to give answers to questions raised concerning the environmental impact of the proposed new runway at Vancouver airport. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That in view of the commitment given this House on January 16, 1973, by the hon. the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, that if questions are raised regarding the environmental impact of the proposed new runway at Vancouver International Airport answers will be given;

And because this exact question was raised yesterday at the expropriation hearings presently being conducted at Vancouver;

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to immediately answer the question raised yesterday asking what the environmental impact of the proposed new runway will be, and to make such answer or answers available to the objectors and the public at the present hearings.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has reservations about the form of the proposed motion, but unanimous consent is required under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE, SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, in view of inadequacy of passenger service in southwestern Ontario and the delay of the government in moving to remedy this situation, I ask leave of the House to propose a motion under Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House urge the government to take immediate action to implement the recommendations contained in the report of the transport committee of the 28th parliament concerning passenger service in southwestern Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

FISHERIES

HERRING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek leave of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the herring fishery in British Columbia, which will commence at the beginning of next month, and the confusion that exists therein as a result of the arbitrary, dictatorial and personal decision of the Minister of the Environment with respect to licences for the herring fishery. Accordingly, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Olaussen):

That the matter of the herring fishery in British Columbia be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and that the said committee make an interim report regarding licensing and licence fees in the said fishery before February 10.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. Howard: Did the Minister of the Environment say no to that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain.

CITIZENSHIP

SUGGESTED EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN PERSONS FROM FEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to propose a motion under Standing Order 43. At the present time there are many long-time residents of Canada eligible for old age or other pensions who are not Canadian citizens. Before obtaining the right to vote they must first take out Canadian citizenship and the $10 fee could impose a financial hardship. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the question whether persons reaching age 65 years or over, or who are disabled or war veterans, and who are not Canadian citizens but are otherwise qualified for old age security or other social assistance be exempt from the $10 citizenship fee, be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Paproski: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, are we to wait for the statement by the Minister of the Environment—

Mr. Paproski: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member for Comox-Alberni resume his seat? I believe the hon. member for Edmonton Centre seeks the floor on a question of privilege. He should be given priority.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that no western members have been invited to the Bishop Laval commemorative stamp issuing ceremonies tomorrow in Quebec City. Is he still mad at us?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot raise a question of privilege in this way. It is a pure abuse of the rules. The hon. member knows that he has to give the required notice, which of course he did not give. This is not, by any stretch of the imagination, a question of privilege and it cannot be raised at this time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to the statement made by the Minister of Transport yesterday to the effect that we would get a report today on the oil spill off the British Columbia coast from the Minister of the Environment. I raise this point at this time because so far I have not seen the Minister of the Environment rising in his place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A few minutes ago the Minister of Transport tabled a statement which became the subject of comment by those who responded to the statement on motions made by the Minister of Public Works. In order that those who read the record might have everything before them, would it not be a good idea for that statement to be appended to today's Hansard? I refer to the statement tabled by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a suggestion. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is agreement on the part of the House to have the document appended to Hansard. I might say that the Chair had reservations about the propriety of the procedure we followed this afternoon of discussing under the Standing Order a statement which had been tabled rather than made to the House, but again it was perhaps an easier thing to do in view of the fact the two statements were before the House, one made by the Minister of Public Works verbally and the other one tabled by the Minister of Transport. I took no exception to the fact that members commented on the document that had been tabled, but that was to some extent irregular.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING NEIGHBOURHOOD IMPROVEMENT, REHABILITATION, OWNERSHIP, NEW COMMUNITIES, ETC.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-133, to amend the National Housing Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—STUDY BY BOARD OF EXAMINATION—DATE OF FINAL DECISION—DISPOSAL OF LAND IF FACILITY NOT BUILT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of this statement in the document he tabled this afternoon: "It is the government's intention to meet with the leaders of the other levels of government immediately to commence the study at the earliest possible date and report within 12 months". For purposes of clarification, will the minister tell the House whether this means that the government is now committed to reporting an absolutely final decision on the airport within 12 months?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government decided to build an airport at Pickering and we think that all the evidence we have now justifies the government doing so. Now, if there are new facts, if there are new circumstances which were not considered in the past, then I think this is the point where the government can be influenced. It is not with the idea of changing our minds. We took our responsibility. That means that the need for the airport was decided upon by the government after consultation with many, many people in the region and several organizations. So the purpose of the board of examination is to study the role of the new airport in relation to Malton, to establish the rate of development of the new airport and to listen to people who may have different ideas and who have new facts to bring forward, not old facts which have been considered and discarded by the department.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, referring to a related assertion in the minister's statement where he said "should we be moved to reconsider our present conclusion", which is the conclusion the minister just reaffirmed, "that the people of Toronto and Canada need this facility the land will still be there and the option will still be open". With regard to that option, Mr. Speaker, has the government a contingency plan for the disposition of the land?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, this is something we are going to study with all the interested parties, particularly the government of Ontario and the municipalities concerned. If some new technology is developed during that period, because there will be at least a period of 12 months when nothing will be done on this land, and if new and important facts are brought forward, we will have discussions with the interested parties and see what we are going to do with the land.

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, because I am not getting the information I would like. I should like to ask the minister with regard to the statement that "the land will still be there" whether we are seeing a preview of the next Liberal campaign slogan.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INTENTION RESPECTING EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS AT MALTON

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the minister has now decided to build an airport at Pickering, can he assure the people of Mississauga that there will be no further runway extension at Malton?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are now convinced that it would be impossible to meet the needs of the metropolitan area of Toronto with Malton airport alone. As for improvements, some will be made at Malton airport, but they will have no effect on the people in the vicinity.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister understood me. Will the minister advise the House whether there will be an extension of runway facilities? I am quite sure there may be other matters, but can the minister give us an answer with regard to runway facilities?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to do so.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT BOARD AND NAMING OF MEMBERS—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister indicate when the decision on the independent inquiry will be made and the parties involved named and announced in the House?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hope that in a couple of weeks, in co-operation with the government of Ontario, we will be in a position to set up this impartial board and start hearings right away.

Mr. Cafik: Will the terms of reference for this independent inquiry board be sufficiently broad to allow a full-scale consideration of the questions of airport need and location by that inquiry?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference were defined in the statement I made. However, we intend to discuss that with the Ontario government to make sure they are in agreement. We want the terms of reference to be broad enough to cover what the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I also have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister given thought and, if so, what is the result, as to where he will draw the personnel who will be on the inquiry?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. Does the hon. member mean the members on the board? The members of the board will be chosen jointly with the government of Ontario.

Mr. Hees: Half NDP, half Liberal.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Minister of Transport expand on the statement he tabled with regard to the 70,000 acres that have been frozen in the noise lands surrounding the proposed airport? Also, what does the government plan to do to compensate those whose lands are frozen?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless the minister can reply to the question briefly, this information ought to be conveyed to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question. Can the minister inform the House what infrastructure plans he has, especially by way of assistance to surrounding municipalities, with regard to the proposed airport?

Mr. Speaker: I again suggest that this might be part of a statement which might be made by the minister on motions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS, MEMORANDA AND DIRECTIVES TO FIELD OFFICERS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the request of the hon. member for York South on January 19 that all rules, regulations, memoranda and directives, especially with respect to regulation 145(9), sent to Unemployment Insurance Commission field officers be tabled in the House and in view of the minister's answer, is he now prepared to do so?

An hon. Member: He is not in the House.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGED REQUIREMENT THAT CLAIMANTS OBTAIN SIGNED STATEMENTS FROM EMPLOYERS VISITED IN SEARCH FOR WORK

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration of his parliamentary secretary. Is it the policy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to require benefit claimants to obtain signed statements from employers whom they have visited in their search for work?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice as well.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker,

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for one last supplementary and then the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. Rodriguez: If it is not the policy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, is the minister going to investigate this practice being used in several parts of the country and is he going to issue a directive to have this harassment stopped?

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT MEMBERS BE BETTER INFORMED CONCERNING PROJECTS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

I would ask him to intervene in order to enable hon. members to be better acquainted with local initiatives projects carried out in their constituencies, which is apparently extremely difficult at the present time. I for one get my information through newspaper reports. When I ask for information on various projects, I am always told that I will get some but I never do. As Members of Parliament, we should know what is going on in our constituencies.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Latulippe: Could the minister take some steps in order that we may learn what is going on in this connection?

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as of today the amount granted under the LIP program is $150,400,000. At this point, the funds are now almost exhausted. It is understandable that at the end considerable time will be taken to decide which of the remaining applications will receive grants.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration what machinery he proposes to set in motion to inform precisely each member regarding the standards of acceptance for projects?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member a supplementary.

The hon. member may put a supplementary question, after which I shall recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify my question, I shall ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can indicate to this House the process provided by his department to inform each member concerning what happens to the projects submitted in their ridings?

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it has been the practice to inform each and every member when applications are granted. However, if the hon. member wants to know more about particular projects, I shall be glad to receive details.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CABANO CARDBOARD PLANT—RESERVATIONS OF SYBETRA GROUP RESPECTING POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Did he receive, either from the Belgian group SYBETRA or from the Quebec government, any document informing him about the serious reservations of SYBETRA as to the conditions and responsibilities which it would assume in the building of the cardboard factory of Cabano?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been representations both pro and con on this matter. I ask the hon. member's indulgence so that I can take this question as notice and try to get a more complete answer for him.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE BETTER GUARANTEE OF PRESERVATION OF CULTURES AND LANGUAGES—THIRD LANGUAGE TRAINING GRANTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism. In view of the continuing demand from ethnic organizations and in view of the failure of the government to do anything meaningful about it, is the government considering amendments to the Official Languages Act which will offer a more positive guarantee of preservation of cultures and languages other than the official languages?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter of government policy which will be announced as a matter of course.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, relating to the research program which the government is conducting. Does a decision to give grants to provinces for the purpose of a third language training depend on the results of the cultural development research program?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, special research is being done with regard to the retention of mother tongues. I expect the report will be ready in about six months, at which time a decision will be made as to whether it should be made public and when.

• (1450)

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Can the minister tell the House when the multicultural advisory board will be announced? Can he tell us the composition of the board? When does he plan to consult with the opposition on its composition? Is the minister considering appointing Lubor J. Zink as chairman of the advisory board?

Mr. Sharp: Would that be your recommendation?

MULTICULTURALISM—STATUS OF RESEARCH PROGRAM

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. In view of the fact that more than a year has passed since the government announced its proposed cultural research program, can the minister tell us why the research has not yet begun and the reason for the delay in circulating the questionnaire to the various cultural groups?

[Mr. Wagner.]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): I will try to get an answer to that question as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members seeking supplementaries on this subject. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I will recognize him for a supplementary, perhaps one or two others, and then return to this subject later.

Mr. Haliburton: Would the minister make a particular effort to investigate whether the reason might be that the staff responsible to him are too few in number to make it possible for him to undertake this information gathering process?

MULTICULTURALISM—BASIS ON WHICH CHOICE OF CITIES MADE FOR RESEARCH PROGRAM

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): I should like to ask the minister responsible for multiculturalism whether he could tell us the basis on which the choice was made of five Canadian cities for purposes of research, whether there is a possibility of this number being increased and, specifically, whether the research program will also include rural areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has serious doubts as to the admissibility of this question. It seems to be more a matter of debate between the hon. member and the minister, and normally the hon. member should be invited to put such questions on the order paper. However, since the question has been asked the minister might be permitted to reply, if he wishes, after which we shall move on to the next subject.

FINANCE

WINTER CAPITAL PROJECTS FUND—ACCEPTANCE OF DIRECT APPLICATIONS FROM MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is the federal government considering accepting direct applications from municipalities with respect to the winter capital projects fund announced in December?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The arrangement we have with the provinces is that the municipalities apply to the provinces for their allocations from the fund.

[Later:]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the previous question concerning the winter capital projects fund. In view of the limitations placed upon the municipal capital works program, would the minister consider putting extra funds into the local initiatives program, particularly so as to benefit communities where the unemployment rate is greater than 20 per cent and the need is considerable?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to take that matter under consideration.

HOUSING

INCREASE IN RENTS FOR LOW-COST APARTMENTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs a question connected with the recent housing conference and having to do with the high cost of housing. Did the minister approve the permission given by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in consequence of which owners of low-cost housing apartments were able to substantially increase rents—I have in mind, for example, Bellabo Investments Limited—at a time when low and medium income group tenants are seriously struggling to make their budgets stretch to pay for necessities? Is the minister aware that as a result of this action the cost of housing for tenants was increased between 15 and 20 per cent?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I believe the buildings to which the hon. member refers are not regarded as low-cost housing. They are certainly not public housing, the rent for which is determined on a rent-to-income scale. As a result of representations made to me by the Solicitor General some weeks ago, I have asked the corporation for a complete review of its rental policy for 1973 and this is under way at the present time. I have told the corporation not to announce or make any rent increases in the meantime.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister has just returned from a housing conference and there are many questions we should like to ask; I know that many other members want to ask many questions on other subjects. May I ask whether the hon. gentleman is prepared to make a statement at this time on the subject of housing, with particular reference to the housing conference, in light of the fact that Keith Morley, the new president of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada, has been very critical of the housing program? Would the minister make a statement soon in the House?

Mr. Basford: First reading was given today to amendments to the National Housing Act which I would hope would be proceeded with on an urgent basis. This would allow full opportunity for a debate on the floor of the House and full opportunity for questioning on the whole range of housing policy when the bill is referred to committee. I would welcome such a debate and such questions.

Mr. Woolliams: I asked the minister whether he was prepared to make a statement. If he is, will he advise us why Mr. Fullerton, the chairman of the National Capital Commission, is now anticipating resigning, if he has not already resigned, because has clashed with the minister?

Mr. Basford: I am informed by the chairman of the National Capital Commission that he is not resigning and does not intend to do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF CANADIAN MISSIONARIES HELD AS PRISONERS OF WAR BY NORTH VIET NAM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs let the House and the country know how many Canadian missionaries are held as prisoners of war in North Viet Nam? I mention one, Mr. Lloyd Oppel of Courtenay, British Columbia. Representations have already been made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. This missionary was taken prisoner on October 28. He was engaged solely in missionary efforts. What representations has the government made for the immediate release of these non-combatant prisoners of war?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My recollection is that I replied to a question on this subject from the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can the minister tell us what the situation is? Has the government made representations and asked that these particular prisoners be released? There is no justification for holding them.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but unfortunately we have not been successful.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—POSSIBLE DISPATCH OF SECOND CANADIAN WARSHIP

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the role of the Canadian government in the Viet Nam affair I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the Canadian government is preparing to dispatch another vessel from the west coast to Viet Nam?

QU'APPELLE LAKES, SASK.—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN REPORT

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Bearing in mind the conclusions embodied in the Qu'Appelle basin study report, will the minister advise the House what steps have been taken by the government of Canada to assist in the implementation of the more urgent recommendations pertaining to the polluted condition of the Qu'Appelle lakes?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): The report to which the hon. member refers was prepared jointly with the government of Saskatchewan, and remedial steps will also be a matter for discussion with the provincial administration.

Mr. Balfour: Will the minister advise the House whether the government, jointly with the government of Saskatchewan, intends to begin construction this spring of tertiary sewage treatment plants in Regina and Moose Jaw, which cities were blamed for at least 70 per cent of the nutrients which pour into the Qu'Appelle water system?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member will place this question on the order paper. If there is urgency, the subject can be debated at the time of the adjournment.

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—DEPOSITING OF FUNDS BY OWNERS OF "IRISH STARDUST" TO COVER CLEAN-UP COST

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the following question to the Minister of Transport, particularly in view of the fact that the Minister of the Environment did not make a statement on motions this afternoon concerning the west coast oil spill. Have the owners of the Irish Stardust deposited sufficient funds to cover the estimated cost of the clean-up? If they have not, has the minister commenced proceedings to seize the vessel presently in Victoria?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I said yesterday that the master of the ship was brought into court and requested to deposit a bond of $20,000.

Now what happens is this: due to the ship's category, even if its master is responsible for the accident the latter does not, nevertheless, fall under the Canada Shipping Act. A ship commonly known as a "tanker" carrying at least 1,000 gallons of oil must be involved in order to justify legal action against the master under the Canada Shipping Act.

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—REQUEST FOR REPORT BY MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in view of the silence of the Minister of the Environment to a somewhat similar question concerning the Irish Stardust earlier on motions, I hope it will be in order for me to ask whether the minister will tell the House when he is planning to give us a report on the inquiry he is believed to have undertaken yesterday in Vancouver in connection with this accident?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this has been a serious spill, though it is not serious as far as the environment is concerned. Three agencies of the federal government are on the spot as well as nine vessels and they are succeeding in cleaning up. The clean-up should not be too costly so far as local residents are concerned but it will cost the Canadian taxpayer several hundreds of thousands of dollars, which we hope we can recover from the vessel owners.

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFER OF COLLEGE FROM CAPE BRETON TO OTTAWA—REQUEST FOR REBUILDING OF GYMNASIUM AND LIBRARY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to answer the question I posed to him on Friday regarding the possible future of the Canadian Coastguard College?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to move this college to Ottawa, contrary to the rumour the hon. member has heard. It is true that we are looking for some property here in Ottawa, but this is in connection with the integration of our administrative services and not for the purpose which the hon. member heard.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for his reply which is rather encouraging. Previously we always had the answer, "not at this time"; it now appears that it will not be moved—period—from Cape Breton.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, I cannot commit all future Liberal governments in this country.

Mr. Nielsen: That would be rather foolhardy.

Mr. Muir: My supplementary is this. Now that the minister has said the college is going to remain in Cape Breton—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Remember who put it there too, Bob.

Mr. Muir: The Minister of Finance should also realize that the Liberal government removed the naval base and destroyed 700 jobs. Now that the minister has said that the college will remain where it is for all time—period—when is he going to call tenders for the rebuilding of the library and gymnasium destroyed by fire and as yet not replaced either by his predecessor or by himself?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly to the question but we are running short of time and there are 35 members waiting for a chance to ask questions.

Mr. Muir: Is the minister going to reply?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should try to move on.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPROPRIATION OF LAND OWNED BY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATIONS IN METRO TORONTO—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN FUND

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact it has been revealed that, if approximately 21,000 acres of land owned by six development corporations in and around metro Toronto were expropriated now, housing costs in terms of land costs could be cut almost in two for the next five years, would the minister consider urging the use of part of the federal funds committed for land assembly purposes to enable the provincial government of Ontario to move quickly and expropriate this land?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, part of these funds will be used in co-operation with the Ontario Housing Corporation for purposes of land assembly. Second, the best thing we can do is to pass as quickly as possible the proposals laid before the House today regarding land assembly and new communities so we can push forward with these programs.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that according to the announcement of the minister the amount of funds he intends to use for land assembly would be entirely spent if this project were embarked upon by the provincial government of Ontario, would the minister reconsider the amount that he intends to allocate to the program with a view to increasing substantially such funds?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I said to the provinces that we should attempt to use the money already committed, and if they get that active and reach that stage then we will negotiate further funds.

GREEN BERETS WORN BY CANADIANS IN VIET NAM SUPERVISORY COMMISSION—NEED FOR CHANGE TO AVOID MISTAKE IN IDENTITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that the wearing of green berets by our peace supervisory personnel in Viet Nam creates an additional and unnecessary hazard to them because of the likelihood that they may be mistaken for United States green berets returning to the battlefield, is the minister considering ordering these personnel to change their headgear for something less inviting to aggressive action?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the dark green beret is part of our uniform. It has been worn for the last several years by the Canadian forces who were part of the former truce commission.

Mr. Hees: You mean all three of them?

Mr. Richardson: All of them.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—RECONSIDERATION OF INVESTMENT OF FUNDS IN PROPOSED GLOUCESTER TOWNSHIP PROJECT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in connection with a question asked earlier. In view of the shortage of funds announced by the minister for land bank purposes, and in view of the fact that there is a prematurity about land bank arrangements in the township of Gloucester, which is in the national capital area, is the minister reconsidering the decision to invest public funds in this project, which is so far into the future in terms of present need?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. This is a joint partnership arrangement with the Ontario Housing Corporation so as to identify and assemble land in accordance with the planning study prepared by the Ottawa-Carleton regional district. I think the planners would confirm that this is the kind of long-term planning that is required within the national capital area.

Mr. Baker: Is the minister aware of the fact that the reeve of the township of Gloucester, who has special knowledge of this matter, has characterized this land as a swamp and that—

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED FORGED LETTER FROM CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS ATTACKING PRIME MINISTER

Hon. W. G. In view of the fact that this letter is an obvious forgery and that it contains an obscene attack on the office of the Prime Minister, would the Postmaster General inform the House what action he intends to take to eliminate this abuse of the mails?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department are studying that case and I can assure the hon. member that if legal action can be taken in that case, it will be.

[Later:]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked of the Postmaster General. • (1510)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order. I suggest respectfully to all hon. members that it is not in order to preface a question with the words "is it a fact". The hon. member is inviting the minister to confirm or deny something. In addition, the hon. member is referring to something which is to happen in 1975 and I am not sure it is urgent. Having said this and taken up much time, I will allow the minister to reply.

Mr. Hurlburt: May I rephrase the question?

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Speaker: For the moment I will allow the minister to reply to the first question.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, in a supplementary am I allowed to change the subject a little as long as it pertains to the same matter?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are still—how do you say it—consulting or discussing this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, is this House to assume from the reply by the Minister of Agriculture that he will resist his cabinet ccllеague's willingness to sacrifice the Canadian family farm to the large corporate farm conglomerate?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when we make statements we like to be realistic. If we can foresee a realistic cut in food costs we will make such a statement.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Are the searches which are being conducted at airports for reasons of safety only? Can we be assured that they will not become blanket searches and that people found with items other than firearms and explosives will not be subject to other prosecutions?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is a rather sweeping question. I would have to know from the hon. member whether he is putting his finger on some specific problem and, if so, I will be pleased to look into it. Searches are being made now, of course, essentially for the safety of the travelling public. If the hon. member has some specific problem, as I say, I would be glad to follow it up.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the minister whether we can be assured that if, for example, one is carrying items that are proscribed under other statutes, such as "porno" literature and other things—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Have you seen your campaign literature?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: I have a lot of time but I don't know about anybody else.

An hon. Member: The way some guys' minds work!

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I want to be sure that these searches are being made for the sake of the safety of the travelling public and do not represent blanket government interference with the public as people go about their business. That is a perfectly legitimate question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well the general law of the land, that if an offence is detected that offence may be pursued. I am not sure that he is suggesting a wholesale change in the general rule that officers who have obligations should pursue them. There is no change in their general obligation.

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—TIME OF ARRIVAL OF SUPPLIES AND EQUIPMENT TO CONTROL DAMAGE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that contingency measures have been approved and set up to meet emergencies such as oil spills, I would ask the minister how long it took his department to get adequate supplies to the oil spill area at Alert Bay in an effort to contain the recent oil spill there?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my colleague was in British Columbia the day before yesterday, perhaps he is in a better position to answer.

Mr. Harding: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the minister to reply to the first question, following which the hon. member may ask a supplementary.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the first supplies were at the site of the oil spill the day the spill occurred. The vessels carrying most of the equipment were there the following morning.

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—PERMISSION TO VESSEL TO PROCEED TO VICTORIA

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, did officials from the Department of Transport give permission to the Irish Stardust to proceed to Victoria, a distance of some 200 miles and, if not, what action did they take to try to stop the ship?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I presume that if the ship did proceed to Victoria, that is because she was allowed to do so.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—MAINTENANCE OF QUEBEC PRODUCERS, QUOTAS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Since the Canadian Dairy Commission has announced that Ontario producers would not be penalized this year, as far as their quota is concerned, as a result of last summer's bad weather, could the hon. minister tell us if the same will apply to Quebec producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I understand it is the same, but I will certainly check into it.

HEALTH

COST OF DRUGS TO LOW INCOME GROUPS—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION AT CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which is perhaps related to the supplementary the hon. member for Lethbridge wanted to ask. It also relates to questions asked by myself and the hon. member for Simcoe North. Will the minister place on the agenda for his conference next Friday the urgent situation of those Canadians of all ages who are not quite eligible for any kind of social assistance, federal or provincial, but who have very small fixed incomes and are obliged to buy very expensive drugs just to remain alive?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the subject of the meeting next Friday will be a rather limited one. Obviously, we will be considering the economic condition of old age people in general and I am pretty sure this matter will be raised during those discussions.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—POSSIBILITY OF DEVELOPING MARKET IN EUROPE OR JAPAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the collapse early in 1971 of the $4 million North American market for swordfish, which has caused financial hardship for our fishermen who are quickly becoming an endangered species, has the minister taken any steps to assist swordfishermen in establishing export sales either to Europe or Japan where there are markets for this product?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have contacted the governments of those countries and we are assured that swordfish caught off the east coast would be acceptable to those countries.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's reply, what steps is he taking at the present time to re-establish this very necessary fishery in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, together with the government of Nova Scotia we have helped these fishermen either to convert to other fisheries or, hopefully, to continue in this fishery. But until they or the industry can develop markets there is not much point in investing more money in new vessels and new gear.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West for a last question before calling orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS ON AIR ROUTES—IMPORTANCE OF EDMONTON AND CALGARY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister in a position to give us a status report on the progress being made in the bilateral air talks between Canada and the United States and, in particular, has there been any change in the priorities accorded by the Canadian negotiating delegation as to cities on the Prairies such as Edmonton and Calgary?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these talks are continuing. There is considerable difficulty and the negotiations are very tough, but I can reassure the hon. gentleman that there is no change in the importance we attach to improved services for both Calgary and Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE MINISTRY

ABSENCE OF MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT—DESIGNATION OF PERSON TO REPLY TO QUESTIONS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think all hon. members regretted to hear outside the House that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development may be away from this place longer than anticipated. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate who will be assuming his responsibilities and answering for him in the House?

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take exception to the hon. member's point of order. Obviously it is not a point of order but a question asked after the expiry of the question period. If the House will allow the hon. member to ask his question and the Prime Minister to reply, certainly I have no objection. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister, unfortunately, will be away for some more days; I am not sure how many. His very excellent parliamentary secretary has been here every day just yearning to answer questions. The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo will be happy to answer any questions that might be put to him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta rising on a point of order?

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON LANCASTER EXPROPRIATION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works yesterday said that he would be tabling the report on the Lancaster expropriation hearings at Vancouver. I am wondering when he is going to table that report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the House ever arrives at the position at which points of order serve as a means of asking additional questions, as a few hon. members have been doing today, I think we will reach a difficult situation. The hon. member's point clearly is not a point of order. However, I certainly do not want to be difficult. If there is consent, the minister may reply to the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a quick reply is, tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed, from Monday, January 29, 1973, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in rising on the third day of the present debate, I repeat the concern of many hon. members who think that we should not take so much of the time of the House in discussing this matter, particularly when there are important pending questions involving economic, social and welfare fields with which we must be deal. The government has not seen fit to bring these matters forward at the earliest possible moment. I hope there might be some disposition, perhaps later this day, to extend the sitting time on this debate in order that we might wind up the second reading stage and get on with other important matters that we have indicated previously we should like to see dealt with as a matter of priority.

One of the difficulties in this third series of debates in recent years on the question of capital punishment stems from the fact that the basis for debate has shifted to a substantial degree. I suggest we are no longer debating so much the abolition or partial abolition of capital punishment as the question of restoring capital punishment. Perhaps the distinction seems subtle. On reading the speeches made in the past two days of debate, one will note the suggestion implicitly or explicitly, that capital punishment to all intents and purposes has been abolished in this country. Factually that may be correct, although the statute providing for the death penalty is still in existence. If this bill passes, the death penalty will be retained for certain offences. However, I submit that the practice of the government over the past ten years has made it virtually impossible, except in very unusual circumstances, for capital punishment to be restored.

Personally, I am most disappointed at being forced once more to debate the question of partial abolition. As I said last night, this position satisfies no one. I believe we would be on much stronger ground if the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) had brought forward a straightforward measure asking for the total abolition of capital punishment. I think in that way we might have brought some legislative resolution to this problem which would be more satisfactory than the solution we are likely to arrive at after the present series of debates has finished. Presumably, this question is to be studied in committee. I do not think that in this sort of debate we can really come to the heart of the problem.

In arguing for an extension of the present situation the Solicitor General suggested that, primarily, we do not have enough information. That argument has often been made in other cases and could be made in the present case. I think it will always be made. Certainly, in the next 10 or 20 years, or in the foreseeable future, there will not be available to us that kind of factual and convincing information that will convince all members of this House and of the general public that capital punishment either should or should not be abolished. The consideration of this question involves too many subjective elements. I do not think that Statistics Canada or the occasional social scientist can provide us with the kind of factual information that will clear away those doubts. We must accept this situation when considering capital punishment and remember that, certainly according to present practice, capital punishment has been abolished in this country. What we are really trying to do is formulate a law that will agree with the present practice.

From time to time people have questioned the government's right, legally or morally, to continue the practice of commuting death sentences. Not many doubt seriously that this activity will continue, or that it should. I presume that some segment of public opinion will argue that we should bring back the death penalty and give it effect. I hope in a few minutes to deal with the underlying causes for those requests for the return of capital punishment. I do not think such requests relate to increases in the murder rate. They reflect more a sense of apprehension, a sense of fear, if you like, and the knowledge, as one hon. member said last night, that the increasing wave of crime must be dealt with.

What are we talking about when we talk about this increasing wave of crime? No one has been specific. Are people talking about the rapidly rising cost of meat available at supermarkets? Are they talking of Bell Telephone's application for an increase in telephone rates, or about landlords who gouge tenants with rapidly rising rents? Or, are they talking about corporate welfare bums, to use the slogan the NDP leader used in his campaign, and their contribution to some unspecified kind of bureaucratic crime? Nobody has been specific as to what is meant by this wave of crime and wave of permissiveness that has engulfed society.

I feel that the question of capital punishment can be studied in an enlightened manner. There are areas of crime, too, which can be studied. Those areas are not to be mentioned facetiously, in the way I mentioned other so-called areas just now. For example, we know that during the past few years each and every year 5,000 Canadians have been killed on our highways. Over half these people have been killed directly or indirectly as a result of drunken driving. Drunk drivers are those who have reached the state of intoxication in which they cannot control their vehicle. These drunken drivers have driven on the highway and killed themselves or other innocent drivers or passengers who happened to be on those highways.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge not one Canadian has ever been executed because he has been convicted on a murder charge arising out of drunken driving. Indeed, not only have we not executed any of these people who have killed their fellow citizens while under the influence of alcohol but many of them, after very moderate penalties, have gone on to drive and drink again. If we are concerned about the incidence of situations of this kind when thousands of our fellow citizens are being killed and maimed annually, maybe we should use the very obvious deterrent values some people argue for in connection with capital punishment to deal directly with a very real problem, that of the increase in deaths on the highways directly or indirectly caused by the abuse of alcohol.

• (1530)

Of course no one has seriously argued for that in this chamber, nor is anyone likely to do so.

An hon. Member: You are the first one, David.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am the first one, as my colleague suggests, and I am not really suggesting it, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think it would be acceptable in any way, shape or form to the general public, nor would it be workable in any court of law.

There are a lot of things in terms of the wave of crime and the general permissiveness of society that have not been thoroughly looked at or analysed. If we are concerned about the increasing amount of violence in society, let us look at the roots of violence itself. Anyone who has spent any amount of time working with people who have run afoul of the law, whether in our courts or penitentiaries, has come away with the feeling that he has encountered a very sorry group of people. In most cases, these people come from homes that are almost non-existent or, to the extent that they are existent, are a very harmful influence on the individual. They come from backgrounds that would be recognized as producing these people who are emotionally, physically and socially deprived.

In our penitentiaries we are dealing with individuals who have not been able to cope with society for one reason or another, and who have often become distraught and desperate individuals. Perhaps nowhere is this more clear than in the latest preoccupation of our society with the very difficult offence of skyjacking. We are now beginning to get some clear feedback on the people involved in skyjacking activities. It is interesting to contemplate how our society is going to deal with people who hijack aircraft and take both planes and passengers on desperate journeys that indeed may end in death both for the skyjackers and some of the passengers. We are now finding that these people are the very last people in the world against whom we should consider invoking the death penalty, not because, as somebody might rush to suggest, they do not deserve it but simply because it would not be in the best interests of solving the very problem we are trying to resolve.

Here I quote a Dallas pyschiatrist, David Hubbard, who perhaps has examined, more exhaustively than any other doctor, the individual make-up of skyjackers. In a recent interview on the CTV television network he said:

—one of the common threats of skyjackers as a group is their interest in suicide, only they don't want to shoot themselves; they want to manoeuvre society into the position where society will kill them. Then, they are not guilty of the sin of suicide, and they can go ahead and rise to heaven. So we give them a death, offer them the image, at any rate, of a death penalty.

What Dr. Hubbard is suggesting is that by instituting the suggestion of using the death penalty we, in effect, make it more difficult for us to deal with these often insane individuals. They are one example, one extreme group, of people with whom we are trying to deal in tackling the growing wave of crime.

How are we going to deal with people who are suffering internal, and often external persecution, who have become disoriented from society, filled with hostility and hate, and acting out of emotional passion that bears no relationship to their true status in society and to society's recognition of them? The escape of capital punishment, that they expect, will not in any way deter them. For them, it will almost be a release.

As I said a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, statistically speaking there is no final answer. In New Zealand, which is an interesting analogy for us in Canada, the death penalty was abolished just prior to World War II. Shortly thereafter the murder rate began to increase sharply. It peaked in the 1940's, and then decreased. A careful review of world statistics will show that the increase in the murder rate in New Zealand was commensurate with the general increase throughout the world, and that Canada's murder rate paralleled that of our sister dominion, New Zealand. It is, therefore, not by statistics that we will make any final decision on this question, but rather by trying to root out the causes for increased crime, increased lawlessness, and the growing evidence of harmful permissiveness in our society.

I detect as well the influence of the media in exposing us, not just on a daily but on an hourly basis, to crimes of base violence. I am not attributing any blame or sensationalism to the media, although perhaps that should be looked at in some more exhaustive context. But it is obvious when some bizarre act of violence occurs, such as took place recently in New Orleans, or some other sadistic act occurs, we have the facilities to see it now almost as it happens, in living colour, in our own homes. And when one is exposed to an event of this nature, although it may be happening 4,000 miles away in a city of one million, two million or 10 million people, and one sees it in one's living room, one may well think that it might be happening down the street on which we live, even though the most violent thing that happened to one on that street in the last ten years was to be hit on the back of the head with a snowball. Because we are so exposed to the mass media, we have to develop a new sense of sophistication, a new sense of detachment, particularly when we are exposed, in living colour, to the latest violent events that occur. If we do not develop that kind of tolerance and sophistication we may become almost crazed in our response.

If we are going to deal with the real roots and causes of violence, and with the real violence that exists in our society, we must be concerned with the over-all impact of violence rather than just the occasional but more limited question of whether or not capital punishment, in terms of those who commit capital crimes, should apply. I think if we look at that question to any great degree we will have to come to the firm conclusion that we have not very effectively provided protection for society or rehabilitation for the offenders.

It is a shocking statistic that more than two-thirds of the people presently serving time in federal institutions, at great expense to the taxpayers, after their release will shortly commit further crimes and serve more time in those institutions. That is not good enough. It is not good enough in terms of society's protection, and it is not good enough in terms of the rehabilitation of the individual. Even on a very narrow basis, it is not good enough in terms of the millions of dollars spent annually to maintain those institutions. The difficulty has been that every reform and every change has occurred without sufficient understanding by or sufficient explanation to, the general public, and without those explanations and understandings it has been most difficult for society to understand and to accept possible improvements in our whole penal service.

Before us today, in addition to this partial abolition, there is the suggestion that we should think seriously about imposing a mandatory sentence of something like 25 years, and that no person convicted of the crimes suggested in Bill C-2 would be released before the end of that time. For the life of me, I cannot understand why that suggestion has any particular merit. Presumably the appeal in it is that there are people being released after such offences, and before 25 years have passed, who should not be released. To the extent that that is happening, Mr. Speaker, we must reject it. Indeed, we have to look at a situation in which no individual can be released into society without the likelihood of him being a responsible and law-abiding citizen. It is not just a question of a 25 year sentence because that may, in fact, be counterproductive. I think many officials who work with prisoners will tell you that in the life span of most men who spend time in institutions, there are times when they may be capable of being reformed and other times when they are not. To fix some kind of arbitrary figure would seem to me to destroy the very basis upon which, hopefully, our whole penal system is built.

I have on the order paper now a notice of motion, No. 27, which I would like the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and the government to consider very seriously. I should like the minister to indicate at some point whether this particular notice of motion, or one similar to it, might be acted upon in this session of parliament. My motion reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce a measure to establish a parliamentary committee to investigate all aspects of crime and its treatment in Canada, which should have specific terms of reference to closely examine (a) the subject of crime prevention and the work of the correctional consultation centre of the Solicitor General's department (b) the subject of punishment—its deterrent value and relevance to the rehabilitative process—with particular attention to capital punishment, by collecting factual information and holding public hearings (c) the correctional process, including the penitentiary and parole systems.

My purpose in suggesting this motion is that I think a fundamental requirement in dealing with the issue we are debating today, and the underlying questions related to it in terms of crime and punishment, is that we should have a well-educated public and a well informed House of Commons. I think the danger is that most of us tend to react to particularly violent events or perhaps news stories of one kind or another or, perhaps even more damaging, public opinion polls which really have little basis in fact.

Some people have already quoted the recent Weekend magazine poll. What value can a poll have when it sets out its case by showing a picture of a large noose with a ballot in the centre saying, "Which way will you vote?" I presume that poll was conducted everywhere except federal institutions but regardless of where it was conducted, out of subscribers numbering over two million, about 30,000 responded. I would not regard that response either as a fair sampling of public opinion or of the question being put.

I say, too, that the public has not been well informed from this point of view. There has grown a very large gulf between the leadership of known institutions, such as the various religious bodies, and those members of the general public who belong to the various churches. I have here a statement made by the Canadian Catholic Conference, the administrative body of the Roman Catholic church in Canada which reads in part:

> We consider it an illegitimate use of the Bible, especially the Old Testament, to quote texts in order to argue, in our time, for the retention of the death penalty. Each biblical text supporting the death penalty must be studied in the light of its historical context, and not simply applied to present day Canada.

It goes on:

> The question of the death penalty, in our opinion, ought not to focus on whether a convicted murderer, no matter how wanton, deserves to die. The focus should be on us: Should Canadians, as a community, try to break the escalating spiral of violence by refraining from violence even as a deterrent?

Mr. Speaker, I support the strong stand of the Canadian Catholic Conference and the other motions which have come from other major church bodies in this country urging that we totally abolish capital punishment. I would say that they also have a role to play in talking to their constituents, in exploring at greater length the underlying causes of this growing violence and the extent to which there may be indications of the real causes as well as the extent to which we are pursuing problems rather than solutions. It is important that we have committees similar to the ones I have outlined here. It is possible, when this bill gets into committee, that we will have the opportunity to examine other questions beyond the narrow one of the bill that the minister has introduced.

For my part, I would be strongly inclined, either at committee or report stage, to move an amendment to totally abolish capital punishment. I think we need to put that question to the test in the House now. I think it is becoming very farcical that we must come back here on a regular basis to partially abolish something that we had abolished over a decade ago.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, the highly controversial subject of the bill has been thoroughly and strongly discussed, and those who have dealt with it expressed contradictory opinions.

When this bill and its amendments will be put to the vote, each hon. member will have to assume his responsibilities as this will be a free vote even if there are some who maintain that is not so.

First, it is important to place the debate in its general present-day setting. We must at any cost break away from old and outdated notions of capital punishment, and resolutely place ourselves in the perspectives throwing light on the problem as it appears to us now.

It is imperative first to relinquish the old principles of retaliation, of payment of evil by evil, of retributive punishment. Ideas, morals as well as the need of the criminal policy have progressed with time.

It is therefore with a spirit adapted to the circumstances of our era that we should deal with the problem.

Therefore, it is not pointless to say that Canadian criminal law has achieved a great deal of progress in this matter. Should we not point out the effects of the 1961 legislation in this field? Capital punishment has since been abolished in the case of several kinds of murder. It remains applicable for capital murder. Even then the jury may, if they deem it justifiable, recommend clemency or pity. Furthermore, the 1961 act calls for an automatic review of cases by an appeal tribunal, especially in matters of law, proper proceedings and facts, and entitles the convicted person to appeal to the Supreme Court. Whether the murderer is rich or poor, his case can be brought before the highest court in the land without prior authorization.

Finally, no one under the age of 18 can be sentenced to death since 1961. It may be said that Canadian criminal law has been humanized in this field and that in practice capital punishment is meted out only for especially despicable crimes. As a result, the number of death sentences has decreased considerably since 1961. On looking over statistics given by the Department of Justice in the booklet on capital punishment, it may be seen that from 1961 to 1965, 34 persons were sentenced to death by Canadian courts which is an average of seven annually. From 1968 to 1972, six individuals were sentenced to death as a result of a five-year suspension of death penalty, except for the murder of police officers or prison guards.

Between 1920 and 1959, the average varied between 18 and 15.5 per year, while the Canadian population was less than at present.

In addition, as it can be noted, I only mentioned the convictions and not the executions, the number of which was still lower. As evidence, from 1962 to this day, there has been no execution.

This parenthesis on statistics enables us to conclude that today the death penalty is only imposed in Canada in unusual circumstances. We must therefore discuss the matter in realistic terms.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Surely the concept and finality of the death penalty has been altered. It is no longer a matter of punishing the criminal without regard for his rehabilitation, solely to serve as a terrifying example to his fellow-citizens. No matter how much opinions may vary on capital punishment, we all agree that whenever possible the delinquent must cease to be a menace to society through reform and not through his elimination, pure and simple. Whenever circumstances allow, the criminal must be reeducated and returned to society as a sociable member capable of coping with it, of being useful to it.

This having been said, the fact remains that some criminals cannot be changed, rehabilitated nor recuperated socially; they will always be a danger to the community.

It is from this point of view of real danger, of real necessity, that we must envisage capital punishment, that is, a radical end to the threat the criminal represents.

In this day and age, capital punishment must no longer be considered as the "supreme vengeance", but as a means of defence, an extreme means of protecting society. This then becomes a problem of "social protection" through the prevention of crime and, if need be, through the elimination of beings that are essentially antisocial and a constant menace to their fellow human beings.

Those who favour the abolition of the death penalty invoke many arguments, but I shall consider only a few.

First of all, some abolitionists claim that the state does not have the right to remove a citizen's life. Of course, this debate deals not only with the political concepts one may have about the state, but also with everyone's religious concepts.

Without going into a philosophical debate, let us say that in Canada nothing deprives the federal government of that power. According to the Constitution, criminal law falls within federal jurisdiction and, according to British North America Act section 91, parliament has the required authority to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Thus, the government not only has the power but also the duty to see to publish welfare and to this end it should take all necessary steps to ensure the security of all citizens and to protect the life of innocent people.

A study of the problem in the context of the protection of society and the defence of the community shows that it is hardly possible to contest the state's right to definite elimination of dangerous individuals who are beyond rehabilitation.

In the case of some particularly heinous criminal, is it not the duty of the state to take all steps—the most radical, if required—to protect the rest of society and particularly the personnel of prisons and the other inmates? It is to spare the lives of penitentiary staff, of citizens in general and perhaps of certain members of the community, for instance, in case the criminal should escape, that the state must, in certain circumstances, eliminate an individual who is a constant menace to society.

Is it not this very duty of the state to protect public welfare, the security of the country, which leads to the outbreak of some wars?

How can we deny the state the right to take the life of a dangerous criminal while it has the right to demand of its citizens any sacrifice required for the survival of the community and the defence of the country?

The state can force soldiers to expose their lives to save their country. But why could it not resort to capital punishment in the same interest?

The duty to inflict death in certain cases does not run counter to morals anymore than the necessity to kill in times of war or in cases of self-defence. As a matter of fact, it is the self-defence of society and the protection of its components.

Second, Mr. Speaker, some abolitionists believe that capital punishment does not deter anybody from committing crime or has a weak effect of deterrence and that life imprisonment is as efficient.

In our society, Mr. Speaker, people feel differently as to whether capital punishment deters murderers. I do not think one can resort to statistics to support one's thesis whether for or against.

Statistics are subject to various interpretations; they are dubious. It is almost impossible to set a useful comparison between countries because of the differences in the legal definitions of crimes, practices of the public department and courts, methods used to gather crime statistics, moral and behavioural standards and, finally, political, economic and social conditions.

Those are data which cannot be assessed validly. Certainly, a rigid application of the death penalty does not prevent the commission of premeditated murders. The authors rely on their cunning to avoid either the police or being condemned due to a lack of sufficient evidence.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, they take so many precautions not to be uncovered. Caught in the act they kill the policemen trying to apprehend them. In the case of criminal procedures they do not hesitate to assassinate witnesses who would have them condemned. This shows that they are frightened by the idea of capital punishment. In fact, all penalties are exemplary. If we do not leave our cars along a curb where parking is prohibited it is because we are afraid of being ticketed. If the object of all penalties is to deter the delinquent—and they succeed to a large extent—by what miracle could the death penalty, which is the most rigorous of all, fail its purpose?

Perhaps it is difficult to establish the relationship between capital punishment and criminality; however, the idea of this extreme penalty remains certainly narrowly tied to certain savage and horrible crimes. This notion of the seriousness of the penalty has doubtless remained rooted in minds for generations and common sense tells us that no other risk than that of losing one's life could deter man from the criminal intent of committing murder.

Furthermore, the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Capital Punishment stated in its report of 1956, and I quote:

> They considered that it was particularly effective in deterring professional criminals from carrying weapons and committing crimes of violence. In addition, it was contended that abolition would endanger police because a criminal seeking to avoid arrest would have much less fear of the consequences of the use of firearms or violence.

No doubt you will be told that it did not prevent police assassination, it happened recently in Toronto. But, in fact, the death penalty has not existed in Canada since 1962, the year the last death sentences were carried out.

My third argument relates to the execution of an innocent resulting from a judicial error which could entail capital punishment. The probability exists but it is far-remote and questionable. One cannot speak of conclusive cases, for it does not suffice to accuse oneself of a crime for which another person has been punished to conclude that the latter is innocent.

This was seen in Quebec with the Coffin case. If Simpson had died by assassination or by accident before retracting his confession we know how the abolitionists would have used this. Nobody would have dared express the slightest doubts on Coffin's innocence. In spite of this retractation are there not people who keep on believing in his innocence?

In connection with an eventual error this is what the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital punishment had to day on June 27, 1956 as recorded at section 60 page 60 of the white paper on capital punishment, and I quote:

> Considerable emphasis was put on the risk of irrevocable error in capital convictions. The fact that there was no known Canadian instance of the execution of an innocent person indicated the effectiveness of present procedures by way of trial and executive review and this suggests that the risk of error does not present a reasonable argument for abolition in Canada.

Even when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out in 1966 that judicial errors did happen he mentioned the United States and England but not one case in Canada.

The alleged error can only take place in the accomplishment, by society, of a duty strongly demanded by the common good. Since this duty cannot be accomplished by individuals or social groups, there is no other choice for the public authority. I think law enforcement in Canada, as far as murder is concerned, does have the necessary safeguards for preventing an innocent from being put to death.

If this bill is passed by Parliament this will mean that we would extend for five years the law which was in force from December 29, 1967 to December 29, 1972. Several reasons are raised and, among others, that a longer period would provide further statistics.

Mr. Speaker, while I recognize that many people would like to see capital punishment abolished for ever, a greater number still are ready to accept it. This, of course stands from the aversion of the public for murder, "the crime of crimes". Traditionally the public has always associated capital punishment with this particular form of crime.

The abolition of any punishment held to be fair, efficient preventive, can only be recommended where it is clearly demonstrated that in the opinion of the ordinary citizen the punishment has not been really operative. Experience has shown that the abolition of capital punishment, at the time when the public at large is firmly in favour of it, can create confusion and doubt with ensuing harmful repercussions on the administration of justice.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when the state has so much to do in its fight against crime, the accent should be put on protecting society rather than the criminal. There are reasons to believe that capital punishment can be a deterrent factor against armed robbery, and to abolish it at this time could only be interpreted by the masses of law breakers as a signal to engage in other criminal acts.

So, Mr. Speaker, for all the reasons I have stated, on second reading I will vote against Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, with regards to capital punishment, and vote for maintaining the law as it now stands.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the fact that the debate is to be continued for some time I would not have addressed the House on this subject having done so on two previous occasions.

I do not intend to repeat the arguments I raised in the two debates of 1966 and 1971. But I intend to place before the House the views of one who has had some experience with capital cases, not only from the point of view of the defence in court but also as prime minister—one who has had the ultimate responsibility, when a sentence of death has to be carried out, for signing the death warrant. Nothing gave me greater remorse than having to do this, and take the life of a fellow human being. That experience, I can tell hon. members this afternoon, equals the awfulness of having acted for an accused who was totally innocent, who was found guilty by a jury with a recommendation to mercy, and who was denied that mercy by the governor in council.

I do not know in how many cases I appeared for the defence but in writing down a list this morning, I arrived at 17 names from my recollection. Two of my clients went to the gallows; the others were acquitted. One of those individuals had his own views as to how the case should be conducted. I made it a point never to put the accused on the stand in murder cases because jurors did not hold it against an accused if he did not give evidence. Indeed, it was not until about 1900 that an accused in a murder case could take the stand and give evidence. I found that in cross-examination one could bring out the necessary facts upon which to build a defence, and I also ascertained by personal experience that when the death penalty was known to be the one to be exacted, jurors were very slow to convict. If there were any extenuating circumstances at all, the jury invariably found the accused not guilty. When there was any doubt at all, even doubt which had been conjured up, jurors tended to acquit.

This has been the history of capital cases for 300 years. When in earlier days not only were some offenders hung, but others were drawn and quartered, and others were disembowelled while they still lived, having been hanging for five or ten minutes, and allowed to see their bowels consumed by fire. Jurors would not convict. The result was that whereas in about 1800 there were some 200 different varieties of cases in which the death penalty could be imposed, with the passing years, jurors, representing the conscience of their nation invariably refused to convict.

I do not want to be repetitious but I told this story several years ago about a great grandfather of mine in York County. In the early 19th century executions were carried out in public. A lad of 17 was to be hung. The awful offence he had committed was pickpocketing. This was only 135 years ago. On the appointed day they gathered from all over the countryside. It was a day of celebration. Whisky was 90 cents a gallon. Everyone had a happy time. The lad mounted the gallows and following the custom made a speech to the assembled multitude pointing out that the wages of sin are death. And while he was awaiting execution, and while the execution was being proceeded with, four of the onlookers had their pockets picked. This gives one some idea of the deterrent value of capital punishment!

While I have not heard all the speeches made in this debate, I have been much impressed by the quality of those which have come to my notice. I must say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that since he assumed office as Solicitor General I have a great deal more hope that his department will be well-administered. I think his speech was one which deserved the widest circulation. It was the clear expression of a viewpoint which deserves the fullest consideration.

What I intend to do is simply to discuss some of the aspects of capital punishment and then place before this House the unusual anomaly, as I see it, created in consequence of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Furman case. Their bill of rights having the same wording as the Canadian Bill of Rights, the judgment of that court will certainly receive serious consideration when the Canadian Bill of Rights is subject to interpretation on the question of murder, whether it be soon or later.

Last night I was thinking over this matter and decided to send a request this morning for the judgments of the United States Supreme Court. How many hon. members have actually studied those judgments? There has been a casual reference to them. I find, however, since the book containing the judgments is in the Library, that I am the first person to examine them. I will return to this in a moment because I think the judgment of that court has brought about, as a result of the arguments mobilized by the five judges, a state of mind among those in the judiciary and at the bar which may result in Canada putting an end to capital punishment.

I told the House a moment ago that there is nothing more trying for a Prime Minister than to sign the warrant of death. It worried me. It was my signature that sent the last two to the gallows in December of 1962. We in the cabinet at that time followed the course of examining in detail the evidence in the case as well as the recommendations not only of the Solicitor General but of the law officers of the Crown. Almost the first day after I became Prime Minister a capital punishment case came before the cabinet with a recommendation for mercy attached. The law officers said, as did the judge, that the sentence should be carried out. I made myself perfectly clear that I felt that as long as I sat in the cabinet a recommendation for mercy would receive the full consideration and support of the cabinet in so far as determining whether or not there were extenuating circumstances.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, when the evidence was clear the law was carried out. If the law is wrong it must be changed by parliament, not by a cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If you were to ask me why I felt so strongly about recommendations for mercy, I would say that, speaking from memory, I think there were 38 convictions with recommendations for mercy between 1930 and 1957 which were followed by execution.

Why was there a recommendation? In those days the jury was not allowed to know that they could make a recommendation for mercy. It meant that there was division. Finally, as the jury deliberated, the decision was arrived at in this way: "Well, I will go with you on a verdict of guilty provided you join a recommendation for mercy".

Let me go back to 1885 and the trial of Louis Riel. I have read all of the evidence in that case. Louis Riel appeared to have a perfect defence, that of being not guilty by reason of insanity. He had the best lawyers who could be procured for the defence, Lemieux and Greenshields, both of whom afterwards became chief justices in the province of Quebec. He received a recommendation for mercy.

I have often wondered how different the history of our country would have been if the decision made by the cabinet that I had the honour to be Prime Minister of had been carried out in his case. He carried an appeal forward to the Privy Council and it was based on whether or not stipendiary magistrate Richardson had properly charged the jury on the M'Naghten rules. The Privy Council held that it was a proper charge.

I mention that in passing, but I begin with the proposition: no execution where there is a recommendation for mercy. If it were otherwise, juries would say that they conclude there is no purpose in recommending mercy and, regardless of the evidence, if there were any doubt they would acquit. That is all very fine when you are appearing for the defence, but I am not saying that it always leads to justice, even though I was one who always endeavoured to defend those who were innocent.

Let me tell the House about one of the greatest lawyers for the defence that Britain ever produced, Sir Norman Birkett. My hon. friend from Toronto who spoke yesterday was present on the occasion when I introduced Sir Norman Birkett, who afterwards became Lord Chief Justice. He had a tremendous personality. In introducing him I went a little farther than I should and said that he was the greatest defender of murderers in all British history. He resented that; he said it was a frightful statement to make. He defended 49 people who had been charged with murder and none had been convicted. he was not quite right; he had forgotten the first one.

There is no equality among individuals who are charged with murder. For example, you do not hear of many wealthy men going to the gallows. The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) made some mention this afternoon of social background and the like. I had my own feelings about this at the bar. Although only five per cent of my practice dealt with criminal cases, I made a rule early on that however poor a person was, in the British tradition I would defend him and go through to the Supreme Court if necessary, regardless of fee. That is the only way that justice can be assured. Because if justice has to be bought by securing outstanding counsel, then one of the most serious elements in capital punishment will have been achieved, namely that it is much easier for a wealthy man to go through an open gate than it is for a poor man.

May I mention another matter, Mr. Speaker? This is a free vote, but what does that mean? It means that each one of us according to his or her conscience will determine the course. But there is something wrong with this so-called debate, for the first principle is that the Cabinet shall say what it believes on a free vote. That is a prerequisite. Who speaks for the government over there?

Oh, no! The hon. gentleman points to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). He speaks for himself but not for the entire cabinet, unless the hon. gentleman is able to tell me that what the Solicitor General says represents the viewpoint of the Cabinet and the Cabinet will vote as the Solicitor General votes. Have I that assurance? The answer is silence from the gentleman.

I say that the constitutional principle is that the government must state its view. Let me quote from what happened in the United Kingdom in 1956 when the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Kilmuir, stated:

> Her Majesty's Government are clearly and unequivocally of the view that capital punishment must be retained. I endorse fully today what my right hon. and gallant friend the Home Secretary has said in another place about the dangers of this bill. However, I have said that this will be a free vote and I do not withdraw from that statement in any way. The government do not expect or wish that any noble lord should speak or vote against this bill out of a sense of loyalty to the government and least of all from party feeling. At the same time no government with any sense of responsibility could abstain from expressing their view on such an important matter.

We do not have that. Where are they and where do they stand? What is their view? Whatever their stand is they should stand together. That is the principle of constitutional government. Why is that not being followed?

My next point is this. An hon. member asked me a few moments ago in private conversation whether I believed that a member should vote regardless of any consideration other than his conscience, and my answer was no. Some hon. members say they are going to vote for this bill to retain a form of selective capital punishment although they, in their hearts, believe it is wrong. Surely, mankind had an example of that with Pontius Pilate. How can you take a stand in your heart in favour of something and then vote the other way? On a free vote everyone should let his conscience be his guide. I used to say to juries: In the panoply of this place, surrounded by something entirely new to you, I do not want you to agree with the view I express because I am prejudiced in favour of the accused. I am not on the jury and my learned friend the Crown prosecutor is not on the jury either. Then, I would always say: His Lordship is not on the jury either. There are not 13 members of the jury. Some judges did not like that.

Each one of you in this House has the conscientious responsibility of voting according to your conscience and for no other reason. Somebody will say that his constituents feel otherwise. I have never been able to find out what my constituents thought, except in a general way. I know that even the government was fooled on October 30. Whenever I have taken a stand that my constituents did not believe in, they never held it against me. Constituents have never held this against any other member that I know of, providing the stand being taken was a conscientious one.

Some members are in a quandary to know what to do because they have had petitions. I do not know whether you have had anything to do with petitions, but I suggest you can get people to sign anything. One of the finest examples of this took place in Madison, Wisconsin, about 15 years ago when members of a university decided they would find out what form of petition they could get signed. They put in the petition that they opposed everything in the Bill of Rights including "a", "b", "c", "d", and "e", and they got 3,000 signers on streets. People will sign any kind of petition.

Do you vote according to a petition? I am not going to repeat what has already been said, but the greatest lesson was ever given on parliamentary government and what members should do was given in that famous speech of 1774 by Edmund Burke. I will quote only a few lines, but it is well worth sending to the library to get the whole thing. He said:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the more unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention.

He went on to state:

> But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you—to any man, or to any set of men living.

That is the essence of being a Member of Parliament. The electors do not send Members of Parliament here to be delegates. They do not send them here for the purpose of being automatons. They send them here as Members of Parliament because they believe in general that the individual in question is of mature judgment and able to form appropriate conclusions.

One Prime Minister was once asked what his idea of leadership was, and he said that if you compare the electorate to sheep and there are two gates in the corral and you want them to go out one gate but they do not go that way but go through the other gate, you get ahead of them because you are their leader. That is not the kind of representation that makes for good parliament or the great institution of parliament. I am not going to labour that any further.

Why is there this feeling among people concerning the high degree of law breaking in this nation, in the United States and in the United Kingdom? Why is it that in 1970 the number of criminal offences in Canada amounted to 1,103,504 and with a population of 22 million in 1971 it amounted to 1,186,252? In other words, about 5 per cent of the Canadian population has been committing offences, not against the vehicles act, federal statutes, other than the criminal code, or against provincial laws, but actual criminal offences. Why is there this permissiveness? Is there any danger today for a person committing a crime in this country?

It was my government that set up the parole board and I should be the last to criticize any of its activities. But, Sir, the parole board ought not to be a freedom board for individuals who have been convicted of serious offences.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) yesterday evening mentioned the case of a kidnapper in Calgary. He was sentenced for the offence. Within a few months he was out, according to the hon. member's information, for five days a week attending university. He spent two nights a week in custody and five days a week in university. That kind of education ought not to be continued in this country. Let me also give you the example of the five Toronto men who, on November 8, 1969, were given sentences of between 10 and 15 years for the $200,000 ransom kidnapping of Mrs. Nelles of Toronto. All pleaded guilty, except the policeman who was sentenced subsequently. The sentences were 10 years, 10 years, 12 years, 12 years, 12 years, and 15 years. How long did those men stay in prison? They were there just long enough to understand where they could hang their hats in their respective cells. They are all out. The time served by two of them was 20 months, and two years by the others.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: No wonder kidnapping has become a favourite sport.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: As for the ringleader, he received 15 years. He was, given seven temporary leaves, totalling 42 days that began on January 16, 1971, after he had served 13 months. I am informed that as of January 3, 1972, he has worked at a ski resort, spending one night a week in custody.

An hon. Member: He does not want to leave.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never was crime more highly honoured. I could give other examples, but I must get on with what I have to say.

It is said that when a person is executed his execution acts as a deterrent. Well, why not hang people in public? Let the people join in and see. The form of execution has changed over the years. In Anglo-Saxon England, the punishment was boiling in oil. They changed that because oil was too costly. Hanging was introduced. Women were drowned because if they were hanged they would indecently expose their feet. Somebody mentioned the other day that William the Conqueror was the first abolitionist, and he was. He was opposed to the death penalty; he did not believe in it. He substituted mutilation of prisoners and the cutting off of arms, legs, and ears. He said as long as the trunk remains the individual would be alive as a witness to his crimes. Coming down to more recent times, in the reign of Henry VIII, 72,000 were hanged for theft. Elizabeth I of beloved memory said, in the name of humanity a change must be made. You should not hang people in chains unless they are strangled beforehand and she quoted scripture to support that stand. Then, they burned people at the stake for the commonest offence. This went on in some parts until the nineteenth century.

How many of you realize that Canada is one of the few countries that actually had no capital punishment for a long period of time? In Upper and Lower Canada after the revolution of 1837, because of the frightening use of capital punishment for a period of 20 years, there was no exaction of the penalty; yet there was no material increase in murder. I will not go into the other fancy forms of punishment, such as branding. Two hundred offences for which one could be executed existed up to 1815. What I am leading to is this, sir: The time has passed by when the idea of vengeance any longer has any place in our society. By all means protect society; assure that security that each of us is entitled to, but do it in a way that will not cause death.

It is my opinion that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) has merit and is worthy of consideration. Today, a man who commits murder knows that there is no danger of execution, no matter whom he kills. Even if he kills police officers, an offence for which we have retained the death penalty, he will be given a reprieve, no matter whether there is a recommendation for mercy or not. When the present legislation went before the House I opposed it on the basis that it calls for selective capital punishment. If a man goes to Government House and assassinates the Governor General, he is liable to be sentenced to life imprisonment. If in running away he fired a shot, not towards the police officer who is following him but ahead and the bullet ricochets off a plate on a tree and kills the policeman, he is guilty of capital murder. I opposed the system of selective condemnation for murder as an expedient that would not work, and it has not worked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those who bear the responsibility in large measure are ministers who, having induced parliament to accept this expedient, themselves failed to carry out the law which they asked should be enacted. When you do that there is a revolt in the hearts of the public. They ask, where are we going? There is crime on every hand, not only in this country, but in the United States and in the United Kingdom. What should we do? I think there should be safeguards. First and foremost, the individual who has committed crime should not be let out of prison until a reasonable portion of his term has been completed. Imagine letting people out after they have served 15 months for kidnapping. It is a wonder the authorities do not also give a bonus, a reward to that individual when he gets out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is ridiculous, preposterous and the responsibility does not rest on this side of the House. What is being done denies respect for the law. I do not need to mention that great gentleman, Geoffroy. Now, there was a man. He killed his wife in a most brutal manner; but, not thinking she was going to die, he set her on fire. He did this in order to marry—no—in order to gain the love of a most attractive lady. Then, two years later he applied to the solicitor general, not the present minister but the former minister. He said, "You don't know how worried I am. I have two children and they need a mother. My father and mother are no longer able to look after them." Well, Mr. Speaker, the father was dead 20 years before, and the mother had also passed away earlier.

• (1640)

The Solicitor General's department said, "This is a touching situation." So they let Geoffroy out to get married, and he had as his witness one who was sentenced to two years for his participation in the Rivard case. Incidentally, he is practising law again. And away he went. That is the kind of thing that undermines the administration of justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have the recent example of Head in British Columbia. Incidentally, British Columbia has the highest murder rate, next to Alberta.

An hon. Member: A Tory province.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will look into that because he is an authority, a fine counsel with a distinguished record. I just mention the fact that those two provinces enjoy a particular record. This man Head committed the most abnormal offence against youngsters and was sentenced to penitentiary. He was a vicious person. But they let him out because, after all, we have got to display that heartfullness that seems characteristic today! Reform—yes, Mr. Speaker, but do not let dangerous criminals out to wander about. Now he has been convicted again.

I don't say I have changed. I have the same view I always had that the murderer, the person who commits premeditated murder, the sex murderer, the person who commits a murder while committing another crime must not be released for 20 years. Let the criminal element of Canada know that, and you won't have to worry about deterrence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some ask: should we ever let them out? I say yes, but there is no deterrence in knowing that you are out in a few years after a despicable murder.

The next argument you hear is that we must protect police officials and custodial officers. Well, professor Sellin has been quoted a number of times. He made a survey of a large number of states in the United States to ascertain whether the existence of the death penalty made any difference in the number of criminals prepared to use lethal weapons against the police. He took all the cities in the six abolitionist states, and the number of attacks was

1.2 fatal attacks per 100,000 of the population. In the 11 death penalty states the rate was 1.3 per 100,000. Statistics can prove anything.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the right hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He may continue with unanimous consent of the House, and this has been given.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, I come to another phase. I don't know how many of you have studied the judgment in the Furman case, given by the Supreme court of the United States. It is a long judgment, and was rendered on June 29 last. The case before the Supreme Court involved three men, one who had committed a horrible murder, and two who had committed frightful rape. They appealed, and they contended that under the Bill of Rights of the United States the death penalty could no longer be imposed.

The Supreme Court judges heard the appeal, and the basis for quashing the sentence of death in each of the cases was the interpretation given by the majority of the court to the expression in the U.S. Bill of Rights which decrees that "cruel and unusual punishment" shall not be imposed. The wording in the American Bill of Rights is almost identical with that in the Canadian Bill of Rights. The Canadian Bill of Rights provides:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment of infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to ... impose or authorize the imposition of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment—

At once the argument was raised in the Supreme Court that hanging, electrocution, or death in the gas chamber was a practice that had been followed for long years. The question was asked: how could it be a cruel and unusual punishment? I cannot read the judgments of the judges at length, but I ask hon. members to read them because they have a message for Canada. Mr. Justice White used these words:

> To arrive at the conclusion that the death penalty violates the Eighth Amendment—

That is the amendment to the U.S. constitution which states that cruel and unusual punishment shall not be imposed.

> —we have had to engage in a long and tedious journey. The amount of information which we have assembled and sorted is enormous. Yet, I firmly believe that we have not deviated in the slightest from the principles with which we began.

The next words are very significant because they apply to our country as well.

> At a time in our history when the streets of the nation's cities inspire fear and despair, rather than pride and hope, it is difficult to maintain objectivity and concern for our fellow citizens. But the measure of a country's greatness is its ability to maintain compassion in time of crisis. No nation in the recorded history of man has a greater tradition of revering justice and fair treatment for all its citizens in times of turmoil, confusion, and tension than ours. This is a country which stands tallest in troubled times, a country that clings to fundamental principles, cherishes its constitutional heritage, and rejects simple solutions that compromise the values which lie at the roots of our democratic system.

Naturally, I don't say that I accept that description of the United States. It is more in keeping with a description of the United Kingdom, the giver and the fountain of common law which today is part of the history of the United States. Then, there follow these words:

> In striking down capital punishment, this Court does not malign our system of government. On the contrary, it pays homage to it. Only in a free society could right triumph in difficult times, and could civilization record its magnificent advancement.
> In recognizing the humanity of our fellow beings, we pay ourselves the highest tribute. We achieve "a major milestone in the long road up from barbarism" and join the approximately 70 other jurisdictions in the world which celebrate their regard for civilization and humanity by shunning capital punishment.

• (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there, in summary, is the position of the free world and our own nation today.

The same judge says, later:

> There is but one conclusion that can be drawn from all of this—i.e., the death penalty is an excessive and unnecessary punishment which violates the eighth amendment. The statistical evidence is not convincing beyond all doubt, but it is persuasive. It is not improper at this point to take judicial notice of the fact that for more than 200 years men have laboured to demonstrate that capital punishment serves no purpose that life imprisonment could not serve equally as well. And they have done so with great success. Little if any evidence has been adduced to prove the contrary. The point has now been reached at which deference to the legislatures is tantamount to abdication of our judicial roles as factfinders, judges, and ultimate arbiters of the constitution. We know that at some point the presumption of constitutionality accorded legislative acts gives way to a realistic assessment of those acts ... We have this evidence before us now. There is no rational basis for concluding that capital punishment is not excessive. It therefore violates the eighth amendment.

When I read that some members say the deterrent value is tremendous I wonder whether they have studied the report that was produced by the United Nations committee which was representative of all the nations of the United Nations at the time. That committee studied capital punishment and found as follows:

> ... it is generally agreed between the retentionists and abolitionists, whatever their opinions about the validity of comparative studies of deterrence, that the data which now exist show no correlation between the existence of capital punishment and lower rates of capital crime.

Now, what does Sellin say? The following is quoted in one of the judgments in this case:

> Sellin's statistics demonstrate that there is no correlation between the murder rate and the presence or absence of the capital sanction. He compares states that have similar characteristics and finds that irrespective of their position on capital punishment, they have similar murder rates. In the New England States, for example, there is no correlation between executions and homicide rates. The same is true for mid-western states and for all others studied. Both the United Nations and Great Britain have acknowledged the validity of Sellin's statistics.

This is a judge who served ten years in the criminal courts, and then as a judge particularly concerned with criminal malters. At another point in the judgment he said:

While the contrary position has been argued, it is my firm opinion that the death penalty is a more severe sanction than life imprisonment. Admittedly, there are some persons who would rather die than languish in prison for a lifetime. But, whether or not they should be able to choose death as an alternative is a far different question from that presented here—i.e., whether the state can impose death as a punishment. Death is irrevocable; life imprisonment is not. Death, of course, makes rehabilitation impossible; life imprisonment does not. In short, death has always been viewed as the ultimate sanction,

Another judge says:

. . . I can do no more than state a conclusion based on ten years of almost daily exposure to the facts and circumstances of hundreds and hundreds of federal and state criminal cases involving crimes for which death is the authorized penalty. That conclusion, as I have said, is that the death penalty is exacted with great infrequency even for the most atrocious crimes and that there is no meaningful basis for distinguishing the few cases in which it is imposed from the many cases in which it is not.

Then, Mr. Justice Marshall, one of the great jurists in the United States concurs, saying:

Candor compels me to confess that I am not oblivious to the fact that this is truly a case of life and death. Hanging in the balance are not only the lives of these three petitioners, but those of the almost 600 other condemned men and women in this country currently awaiting execution. While this fact cannot affect our ultimate decicision, it necessitates that the decision be free from any possibility of error.

Mr. Speaker, I could read further from this judgment but I see that private members' hour approaches. I have tried to place this matter before the House, but not in an emotional way. Our Bill of Rights, which I brought in, was ridiculed all over this country by lower court judges and some professors. Today, as a result of the Drybones case, it is superior to every law passed in this country since 1967. I spent a lifetime getting it and I spent another nine years being ridiculed until the Supreme Court of Canada spoke.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The wording of our Bill of Rights was put through the crucible of a committee of all parties which contributed greatly to its wording. We have the same wording in our Bill of Rights that the United States has in the eighth amendment to its Bill of Rights, namely, that there cannot be cruel and unusual punishment against anyone. While the Supreme Court of Canada is not in any way bound by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, I should like to be the counsel who would argue the case there, having behind me the prestige, the power and the greatness of a decision by the United States Supreme Court.

I conclude, Sir, by suggesting that because of this judgment to which no reference has been made, except a passing one, that the question of whether this parliament, in view of the Bill of Rights, has the power to impose the death penalty should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide once and for all. Then, this country would know where it stands, whether there is a right to impose capital punishment. Then we would be able to determine whether we can have a kind of qualified capital punishment that is neither fish, fowl nor anything else.

The government must tell this House where it stands. The government House leader is a man who always makes himself clear when he so desires. I should like to hear him say where the government stands on a matter in respect of which the practice of the government of Canada has been a denial of the equality of Canadians, a denial of the principle that there shall be no discrimination in the punishments that are meted out.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order to advise the House that it has been agreed as a result of inter-party consultation, that we will interrupt this debate for a short time at eight o'clock tonight in order to deal with the Pilotage Act which we hope can pass through the House in all its stages in a very short time. When this is done we hope to return to this debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order No. 40, to advise the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Housing—Purchase of land to establish land banks; the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn)—Canada Evidence Act—Suggested amendment to compel spouses to testify in child-beating cases; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Manpower—On-the-job training program—reasons for lack of applications.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

THE RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE PUBLIC REPORTS OF RAILWAY ACCIDENTS

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the Railway Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. Leblanc).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas).

The Railway Act

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent looked surprised when you called him.

In introducing this bill, I am well aware of the usual fate of private members' public bills, especially those introduced by opposition members. They are usually discussed at length for the full hour. More often than not, speakers from the government benches express their approval of the principles of the bill, but then proceed to talk it out and refuse to allow a vote to be taken. I realize that this is probably an integral part of our procedure. It is the government's responsibility to initiate legislation in the first instance. I suppose the corollary of this is that it is also the government's position that they should not accept suggestions from the opposition. However, how many times do we hear government members chide us for being critical, but not constructive? Yet, when we do propose, they invariably oppose.

Surely, there are certain areas which should be non-political. Surely, there are areas involving the public interest which can be discussed on a non-partisan basis and surely the whole question of the safety of public transportation, whether it be by land, sea or air, is so vital that it should be open to complete and frank scrutiny. This bill, through minor amendments to the Railway Act, would go a long way toward lifting much of the secrecy which surrounds the increasing number of accidents on our Canadian railways. The bill proposes to make an amendment which would alter only one word in section 226(1) of the Railway Act. The present section reads "The Commission may appoint". This bill would change the word "may" to "shall". In other words, it would make the commission's responsibility in this regard mandatory instead of permissive, as at present.

The section of the Railway Act which would be amended by this bill implies a duty upon the Canadian Transport Commission, not only to investigate accidents after they have happened, but to investigate railway running conditions and operating conditions with the object of preventing accidents. This section of the act places this duty on the commission. The commission should not wait for an accident to happen. If there is a deterioration of running equipment, of a road bed, or if the railways are not carrying out proper inspections and safety procedures, the CTC should step in and see that these conditions are corrected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): In my dealings with the CTC, I found that there was a continual contest between the CTC, the public and the railways. The CTC absolved itself of any responsibility by saying that under the act they do not have to investigate these cases. My bill attempts to correct this situation which exists today. It is very detrimental to the public interest, to those who use the railways and must be very disturbing to those who operate them.

After an inquiry has been made by the commission, under the present act, there is no compulsion to make the result public. Bill C-11 would amend section 226(2) by adding a clause which would force the commission to make available to the public the results of all inquiries they have made into running conditions, safety conditions, road conditions as well as inquiries into accidents that have occurred. This, briefly, is the gist of what my bill proposes to do.

In case there is any question as to why I consider the whole matter of railway safety important, I wish to quote from some authorities. I quote from page 8 of The Third Annual Report of the Canadian Transport Commission 1969:

> There have been many technological advances in the railway industry during the last decade, leading to greater operational efficiency, but these have created new safety problems. The increase in efficiency has not been matched by any significant decline in accident rates.

You can project that statement and say that if there has been no decline, then there obviously must have been an increase. I now wish to quote from the Fourth Annual Report of the Canadian Transport Commission 1970, page 9:

> In its 1969 report the commission referred to the safety problems being created by technological advances in the railway industry. It indicated a special program had been started to identify such problems and determine methods of solving them.
> During the first half of 1970 the commission became concerned by the increase in the number of accidents on the railways.

The report goes on to state that, as a result, a special inquiry was conducted into certain accidents in Quebec and was later expanded to deal generally with railway maintenance and operation practices:

> "and all matters and things likely to cause or prevent railway derailments and collisions between trains."

The report was completed and made public. A service to Canadians was performed by making the details of the report public.

• (1710)

The second investigation referred to is the Jones Report, the report which Mr. D. H. Jones, the Chairman of the Railway Transport Committee, was commissioned to undertake. This report was presented last year. While it was quite thorough, frankly, along with many other members of parliament I was disappointed with many of its conclusions. I do not think it solved anything. In fact, it simply delayed a final solution by suggesting that a tripartite committee be set up to carry out further investigation. So, the report did not solve anything. Nevertheless, that is not the crux of my position. My position is that, regardless of the recommendations in this report, there has been no change in the situation. The public is still not being made aware of what is going on in railway operations. No attempt has been made to open up this area to the public or to explain what is causing these accidents.

I do not pretend that this bill of mine is original. In the last parliament, the then member for Moose Jaw introduced a somewhat similar measure. His went further than mine does; he would have placed more onus on the railway operating people to make reports. But the purpose of the bill was the same—to lift some of the secrecy attaching to railway operating conditions and railway accidents. That bill received a sympathetic hearing. All the members who spoke on it said they were strongly in favour of the principle and that we would be doing a public service by allowing the public access to reports on running conditions and causes of accidents. But like all private bills this one, too, was talked out and nothing happened.

One would have hoped that following the initiative taken by the hon. member, somewhere along the line the government itself would have introduced legislation to have improved the situation, especially in view of the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission has openly admitted that the present situation is unsatisfactory. But instead of the situation being any clearer than it was previously, the public, today, is completely at sea. We hear stories about accidents being caused as a result of defective maintenance of the running bed, because the size of inspection crews has been cut down in the interest of economy, and so on. We hear stories of accidents being caused by faulty equipment, machinery which has not been properly inspected. All these things are disturbing to the public. The situation must be a frustrating one for the railways, too, because much of the blame for these accidents is being placed at the door of the companies. I believe it is in the interests of both the public and of the railways that investigations should be made and that the results of the investigations should be made public.

In the debate on the bill introduced by the former member for Moose Jaw, mention was made of privileged communications between the companies, their employees and others. I admit that some of this correspondence may be privileged, but I do not think we ought to sweep everything under the rug, saying it is not in the interests of the public that this information should be divulged. This is not the attitude taken toward other modes of transportation. In the case of air transport, for instance, accidents are inquired into and details are made public. The public is informed, for example, whether an accident has been caused by pilot error or by equipment failure. Everything is divulged. The same thing happens if there is a tragedy at sea. I cannot see why a distinction should be made in this area between rail travel and other forms of travel.

The United States has adopted a policy which is much more in the public interest. Under the United States transportation act of 1966, which was passed at about the same time as our own transportation act, a transportation safety board was set up. The sole purpose of this board, as I understand it, is to investigate causes of accidents and to make reports so that the public may know what has happened. Contrast this with the situation in Canada. It is true the CTC has power to make inquiries, but I defy any member here to get the results—to get any details of those inquiries. I have attended several committee meetings at which the Chairman of the CTC, on top-ranking officials of that body, have been present. Just try to pry out of these men details of what happened in a particular accident. One committee member, in frustration last year, said it was like trying to nail jelly to a wall. All you get is a discussion of legalities. Under the law, they say, we are only charged with doing so much. You gentlemen are Members of Parliament. You know the law. Why ask as? I say that we, as Members of Parliament, are entitled to know what is going on.

Railway transportation is a mode of transport subsidized directly by the Canadian people. We are shareholders. We are users. We have a right to know that the railways are being operated in such a way that the safety of those who use the lines is secured. Under the present system the only chance we have of getting information from the CTC is to question officials when they are here before the committee. Even then, instead of straight answers we get fencing and dancing and dodging. Either those officials do not want to answer, or they do not have the answers ready. I recommend that the House let this bill go to a committee where members would have an opportunity to investigate all aspects of railway safety and come up with workable solutions to protect the interests of the public.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) for having brought this bill to the attention of all Members of Parliament. I support this attempt to get the railways of this country, whether publicly or privately owned, to disclose details of accidents which occur on the railway system. Though we shall undoubtedly hear speeches from across the way to the effect that there is considerable merit in what the hon. member proposes with respect to public disclosure of circumstances surrounding accidents on railways, there will be less readiness to take the necessary action to have the bill sent to committee. I believe all members over there, including the minister in charge of urban affairs, should allow the bill to pass and go to committee, so that instead of merely talking about the situation we could get things done.

I am sure the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) is aware that, since the election, parliament has emerged as a far more significant body than it was last year when initiative rested entirely in the hands of the cabinet. In these circumstances, it should be far more responsive to the desires of individual members.

The hon. member for Moncton has introduced a bill which, in my view, is of considerable importance and I wish to deal with it, if I may, from the point of view of one who comes from the Prairies. In my area of Assiniboia, if you drive between the two major urban centres—if I may call them that—from the city of Weyburn to the town of Assiniboia, you can cross six railroad crossings. There was a series of accidents on these crossings last summer. These accidents were of real significance to the question of area transportation. One accident happened in the middle of the night when a pair of individuals driving a truck were hit by a train. Apparently these two were not used to the particular highway and were unaware of the peculiar way in which the rail lines crossed the highway, which was at a certain angle that made it almost impossible to see the train. That was a major accident. In addition, we have had at least two derailments in that area.

I suspect that if there were some kind of public disclosure made of the cause of derailments in the Assiniboia area, you would find the railway companies were not maintaining to the required standard the beddings and the track. You would find that the cause of the accidents was that the railroads had not lived up to their responsibility in a part of the country from which they have drawn considerable revenue from the land they obtained when the railroad was put through, from the mineral rights in the area, and from many other sources. The tracks in that area are not up to the standard required for moving grain, and railroaders should not have to work on them.

My father worked the rails, as did my grandfather and many others in Saskatchewan and on the Prairies. They can tell you all about travelling on those lines. Public disclosure of the causes of accidents would be one way to gain information that would enable us to improve the lines and the service on those lines. In this way, those who work on the lines would be provided with some element of safety. These railroaders can tell you all about their attempts to book off because they did not want to travel those lines.

During the election campaign I did some travelling between two towns in my area. I remember watching, with a constituent of mine a train going over the tracks and seeing the movement of the tracks. They were moving as much as eight to ten inches as the train went over them. I contend that, in the event of an accident on that track, there should be public disclosure of the condition of the track. I and the people of Assiniboia know why the railroad is leaving the track in such a condition. It is because there are 605 miles of track they want to abandon in that area. However, that is not the subject of this particular debate.

I believe the hon. member's private bill is a very good one and that we should accept it, knowing full well its significance. There have been some tragic accidents on railway crossings. There was one in Quebec, I believe it was, involving a group of young people, some of whom were killed and others injured when their bus was hit by a train. There are other examples in my area where people in cars have been hit by trains at railway crossings as have people in trucks. This underlines the fact that there is a real need for reform in the area of public safety on the railroads, and that action ought to be taken by the Canadian Transport Commission. The first action that should be taken is that the chairman should be fired. Then, we could go on from there and bring in some measures relating to public safety.

At certain times of the day in my constituency it is absolutely impossible to tell whether a train is coming along the tracks or not, and I have to cross these tracks all too often. The safest drivers who cross the tracks are bus drivers who bring their vehicles to a halt. Other people are insane if they go over the crossings at 10 or 15 miles an hour.

Many constituents have written to me about the threat posed by boxcars or flatcars going along the tracks. For example, at crossings there are no warning signals. If flatcars are moving along the track at night, then you cannot pick them out with your headlights when you come to a crossing, and as a result many accidents are caused. This is why the question of public safety is of great importance. I suggest one of the first moves to improve public safety would be to pass this private member's bill thus enabling public disclosure to be made of railroad accidents.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when I stood up a couple of weeks ago to make my maiden speech I referred to that strip of the country known as the green belt, or mid-Canada. I talked about the great distances we travel across the country and I spoke briefly about the way in which the railroads are failing us. Canada is a country that is tremendously dependent upon the railroads. There are two major railroads in this country which in my opinion, really do not want to run a railroad at all. Let me qualify that. One railroad, the CPR, has no interest in running a railroad, in my opinion. The other railroad, the CNR, plays a secondary role. But fundamentally neither is interested in running a railroad in this country in any modern sense.

There is a debate raging throughout the country about whether or not there should be a pipeline down the Mackenzie to satisfy the demand for oil and gas. Some hon. members have suggested that the railroads should look at ways in which they can contribute to the development of a new kind of ground transportation to compliment this kind of activity. But the railroads are just not interested. If a similar opportunity were offered to some other industry, it would be eager to grab it. There has been talk about developing an alternate means of ground transportation to the building of the new airport at Pickering. Where are the aggressive railroads who should seize this opportunity and develop ground transportation as the alternative? I believe we are approaching a major crisis in terms of growth and demand for energy, and that the railroads of this country will have to play a role.

I have lived in northwest Ontario for many years, in the town of Rainy River, which was a railroad town. I saw what happened to the people of that community when overnight the railroads decided to pull out—not completely but just about. They turned to diesel power and laid off 100 people, which practically wiped out any real estate values in that community.

The relationship that exists between the railroads and their employees is one that just cannot be imagined. I have heard railroaders say: "We don't work for the railroad but for the union; how the roads run, we just don't know". Employees who have worked for 35 years for the CNR in one case, and who have worked 42 years for the CPR in another case, have found a carbon copy of a letter on their desks stating that they had been laid off effective the day before. The people who live in the north country and in the greenbelt are dependent upon the railroads, yet the railroads take these arbitrary decisions. It is enough to make the people in that area lose faith in Canada and make them wonder whether we are interested in solving our problems.

Early in December the CPR announced that they were going to lay off 22 operators between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, and that in their place service centres would be set up. Apparently the CTC agreed to this. We have had some experience with the service centre at Thunder Bay. I have pictures of the service centre in the old city of Port Arthur, which I will show hon. members if they want to see them. These pictures show plaster falling off the ceilings, washrooms in dirty condition and so on. Those are the so-called service centres. These 22 men are going to be laid off. It is said they will be picked up in some other area, but somewhere along the line somebody will be bumped.

The name of the game, as far as the railroads are concerned, is subsidy. They go to the CTC, which allows them to lay these people off and run the railroads and services by using Zenith numbers, and so on. But the people are not going to ride these railroads. A year from now they will be back before the CTC saying the business is not there and they need bigger subsidies. The name of the game is not running a railroad, it is getting subsidies.

I support in general the implications of this bill because railroad safety is a subject that has bothered us a great deal. I have not the exact figures with me this afternoon, but I would suggest in the last 10 or 15 years the number of section men has been reduced to about 20 per cent or 25 per cent of what it used to be.

Last year, between April 20 and June 1, there were ten serious accidents on the railroad in the area between Thunder Bay and Sioux Lookout, and east, alone. On April 20 there was a derailment at Sunstrum with two lives lost and eight persons injured. I do not have the exact dates, but there was a derailment at Kelly, on the Sioux Lookout line, with 23 cars derailed and 11 persons sent to hospital. There was a derailment at Parmachenne, east of Thunder Bay, with a damaged bridge. There was a derailment at Jelly, seven miles west of the Neebing yards. There was a derailment near Shabaqua, 43 miles west of Neebing. There was a derailment between Garda and Arrita, about 30 miles west of Neebing. There was a derailment between mileage 78 and 79 on the Fort Frances subdivision.

There were also three bridges damaged, a washout near Griff on the Sioux Lookout line and a bridge damaged at mileage 20.8 on the Sioux Lookout line. There was a bridge damaged by fire west of Quetico, at mileage 109.6. There was another bridge accident subsequent to this which caused a great deal of damage, but the railway company has not cleaned up the pollution which resulted. These ten separate accidents happened between April 20 and June 1. In the north country we are now approaching the spring thaw, at which time washouts and accidents occur.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this matter because it is time we warned the railroads that we will be watching for accidents that may occur. I hope in our area there is not a repetition of what happened last year. Many of the employees are disturbed about this situation and fear for their lives.

Let me conclude by saying that an aggressive and concerned railway industry is vital to Canada, Canadian unity, progress and, in days of growing energy shortages, probably to Canadian survival. This industry must be vitally concerned with its responsibilities for the safety and the welfare of employees. If the management of the railways, particularly the CPR, does not want to assume responsibility, perhaps it is time parliament saw to it that management of these companies in Canada is put in other hands.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in support of the hon. member's private bill. As hon. members who have been here for some time are aware, every year Members of Parliament in all parties raise this and other issues concerning various aspects of our railroad system. Every year in this House and before the transport committee the same issues are raised. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas), who has been here longer than me, can probably vouch for this. In spite of that fact, nothing seems to be done. I am getting sick and tired of government members saying the same things, with the same result. It is time for us to quit talking a good fight.

The whole matter of making public the results of inquiries into rail mishaps has been aired time and again in this House. The former member for Moose Jaw, Mr. Skoberg, raised this issue repeatedly. I have a file of press releases, correspondence with the Canadian Transport Commission, railway union officials and officials of the railways all concerning the safety of operation. Any amendment to Canadian railway legislation which will do something about this and other matters will be welcomed. I suggest it is long overdue as far as we in this group are concerned. We must do a lot more to restore public confidence in the safety of rail transportation. This mode of transportation usually has the best safety record, but confidence is disappearing.

I suspect that many of those who have worked on the railroads since I left will tell you that many accidents can be attributed to a decrease in the number of train inspectors, car inspectors and track maintenance personnel. I do not understand how a track can be properly inspected by a crew driving in a truck along a highway parallel to the track. No one can convince me that this is proper track inspection or maintenance, but both companies have been getting away with this practice for a number of years. The rate of railway mishaps, I suggest, has increased in almost direct proportion to the decrease in the number of maintenance personnel.

I can never understand why the results of inquiries into rail mishaps are not made public. I can only assume it is because of fear. I recall the tragedy of the crash of a DC-8 aircraft in Toronto a couple of years ago. The report of that inquiry was made public and every member of this House received a copy. This report even gave in detail the last conversations of the aircrew with the control tower before the crash. Every detail of that inquiry was made public, but nobody was looking for revenge or anything else; no one was looking for a scapegoat.

The public needs and has the right to know the results of these inquiries. Surely this applies to rail transportation just as it applies to air traffic. The hon. member for Moncton and others, including the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), have been making efforts in this area for a number of years. I imagine we will be members of the transport committee again during this parliament, and I suggest that we get together to find more effective ways, as we have in respect of other issues, to get results.

If government members choose to talk out this bill we can take the matter up again before the transport committee. But it would be nice if the House gave this bill second reading and referred it to the committee; we could then deal with it when we meet with officials of the Canadian National system and study their annual report. This would provide an occasion which we have not had for a good many years to question the officials of the Canadian Pacific. Too often CNR officials are the only ones required to appear before a committee of this House. The CPR, which I submit has an even worse record, never has to come before the committee and give an accounting of the discharge of its responsibilities to the public under the Railway Act.

It would be nice if this bill were to be given second reading in a few minutes. I hope the hon. member for London East will agree. There would be no problem in reading this bill the second time. It may not go beyond that stage because the government may want to amend the Railway Act; and God bless it if it does! It would be useful from the standpoint of the work of the transport committee if this bill were given second reading now. We could then deal with it and meet with officials of the Canadian National Railways; officials of the CPR could also appear. Let us pass the bill; this measure is long overdue.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) who is a good friend of mine and is the sponsor of Bill C-11, an act to amend the Railway Act. I think his bill should be placed on the statute books of this country.

Prior to my election in 1968 I was a CNR railway engineer, a head end man. Between 1941 and 1968, 27 years, I worked in that capacity. For the first ten years I worked as a fireman and for the next 17 as an engineer running yard, freight and passenger trains in southwestern Ontario.

Railways conduct their own investigations, as does the CTC. In the case of crossing accidents a "slow" order is placed on the crossing where a person has been killed until the accident has been investigated by a CTC investigator. I think statistics will show that most of the people killed by a moving train at a crossing lived within 25 miles of the crossing. They knew it was there and perhaps crossed it every day on their way to and from work.

The adage stop, look and listen means nothing to some people. Wigwags and flashers mean nothing. To some, flagmen mean nothing. I know of flagmen who have been run down by motorists at crossings. And let us remember the number of people who are killed in automobiles through running into trains stopped at crossings. Some drivers will even race a train to the crossing, and when they beat it they will turn around and thumb their nose at you. For many months I ran a train between London and Windsor. One fellow used to haul fruit and vegetables to the Windsor market. He played this game with us for about five weeks. Then one morning at a quarter to five we nailed him, and that was it.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the railways are trying out a new system for the care and maintenance of railway equipment and track. Five men used to look after approximately ten miles of track; today they look after 30 miles of track and others operate as part of a gang that works out of a bus. Many of these employees who are personal friends of mine will tell you that even if they had the supplies necessary for looking after all the track, it would be impossible to do so because there are no longer enough men to work on the track.

I believe that railway accidents ought to be investigated by the railways and by the CTC. Quite definitely, a public statement ought to be made on such accidents. Many dangerous situations, if brought to the public's attention, could be eliminated. I certainly agree with and support the hon. member for Moncton.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-11 is a good measure.

Mr. Benjamin: Come on, Joe, sit down.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) should be highly commended for presenting it to this House. Further, he should be given full credit, whether the bill is accepted this evening or at a later date, for making the suggestions it contains to the House. I should like to bring one matter to the attention of the House, and I will be brief.

Mr. Benjamin: Good. Sit down.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The matter is now being investigated by the general inquiry into safety which has been in progress for well over a year. Certain parts of the report have been released from time to time and are in the domain of public disclosure. As I said a while ago, the entire report is nearly ready and the final report ought to come out soon. Although I support the bill, I sincerely think it might be useful if this measure were delayed slightly. It might be useful if we waited to see what the final report says. The report on the inquiry into safety will be disclosed to the public.

There has been an increasing trend when dealing with particularly important accidents to make public the reports of investigations. This is being done more and more, and I think the hon. member's bill is certainly a step in the right direction. For example, although I do not have the details regarding the Belledune accident near Moncton, the inquiry was finalized last week and a report will soon be made public.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in the debate on Bill C-11, an Act to Amend the Railway Act, which has been brought in by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) considering that for these past few years the issue of security on our railways has become more important than ever, especially in the Province of Quebec with the many derailments that occurred in the months of November and December, 1972, and January, 1973.

The bill now before us proposes the appointment of one or many persons competent to inquire into the causes and circumstances of railway accidents in order to prevent other accidents. The bill also calls for a report to be made public in such cases.

Mr. Speaker, we should examine this bill carefully and also we should dismiss the idea that it has been introduced by a back-bencher. The proposal is very interesting, as the hon. member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay) said, and the government should take it into consideration. No activity is free of danger and we shall never manage to prevent all accidents. Still, we can reduce their seriousness to a minimum in every field.

Mr. Speaker, I have visited Canada from east to west in the trains of our two railway companies and, despite some of their problems, I admit that they serve the people adequately and that the railroaders are familiar with their routes. The railwaymen who are manning trains in the Rockies are to be congratulated since they work in very dangerous places. However, very few accidents are reported in the canyons of the Rockies where landslides are rather frequent.

A few years ago, we still had steam engines which could haul 50-odd cars. However, through the years, we have succeeded in building diesel engines which are more powerful and which nowadays can pull up to 150 cars.

It remains to be seen whether the technology of security has progressed at the same rate as the design of these powerful machines. As some of my colleagues will point out the railway companies have perhaps not brought comparable improvements to the security of railroads and passengers.

When we talk with diesel engineers who have to take those huge trains throughout the country, they agree with us that there are some dangers. They tell us that it is almost impossible to stop a train when they see an obstacle on the tracks.

The Canadian Transport Commission conducts regular studies in this field and an inquiry is now under way on security conditions of our railways. I congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) as well as the Chairman of the Transport Commission on their prompt inquiries into the causes of major accidents which occurred on our railways during the past few years.

Mr. Speaker, it should now be pointed out in this House that 10 years ago there were some forty crossings on the railroad between Matapedia and Gaspe, all of which, thanks to the co-operation of the Canadian Transport Commission and the government of the province of Quebec, are to be eliminated from Highway 6 which girdles the Gaspe Peninsula within the next three years.

Such improvements to the highway network will certainly facilitate traffic and the people of the Gaspe peninsula and their visitors will greatly enjoy driving along a highway free of railway crossings.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I shall say that there is always room for improvement in the field of railway security and I urge the House to adopt Bill 11 now before us.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret not having been able to be in this House when the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) stated his case for the bill. Unfortunately, I had to remain at my office; I should have been most pleased to hear his comments.

Be it as it may, the subject matter of his bill interests me considerably, not to say that it fascinates me in a way, because since my election here in 1968 I have done the utmost to clarify all sorts of answers from the heads of various Canadian railway companies concerning accidents, number of passengers who use their lines and so on.

I even felt discouraged on occasion because every time I asked a question, they found all sorts of reasons for not answering. I have the feeling that it is not so much the minister responsible who answers in the House, for instance, regarding the railway companies, as the companies themselves which get together in order to withhold the vital information required by hon. members in the ordinary course of their duties.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, deals with the necessity to make inquiry reports public. I think that this is the essential aspect of the bill. About that matter, I have as have many other members very interesting experiences to relate to the House.

For example, I inquired, in the first session of the 28th Parliament, when a passenger service was established, in 1967, between Sydney-Halifax and Montreal via Edmundston, about the number of passengers from Edmundston, Moncton and other localities in the Maritime provinces. I quote that fact as an example only; the then Minister of Transport, the hon. Paul Hellyer, gave the following answer:

> The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: It has not been the practice nor is it considered in the best interests of the Company to disclose information of a nature which would be of value to its competitors.

I had asked very specific questions about statistics relating to railway accidents, particularly in the province of New Brunswick. Of course, I am proud that it is a member from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Moncton who thought of introducing this bill. Some unjustified arguments, in my opinion, were also given to me in this regard to refuse to divulge information which I asked for as a member of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, to allow members of parliament to do a good job for their constituents and the province they represent in this House—the Atlantic region as far as we are concerned—it is absolutely necessary that railway companies co-operate with us to a larger extent, when required, through the Canadian Transport Commission.

I think that much could be said about the inquiry process itself, which is too long, in my opinion, and I do not believe that problems which exist in this area will be solved by appointing a person responsible for investigations and obliging him to make public the result of these investigations, which are always endless. As a matter of fact, by the time the information is made public, quite often we will no longer need the information we asked for.

At all events, we must support this bill, but if it is not passed today there will be no reason to shed tears. The hon. member who took the floor on behalf of the New Democratic Party said that we should act according to our own convictions. It seems to me that the subject matter of this bill could very well be discussed in committee with the representatives of the Canadian Transport Commission when they will be called upon to appear before the committee on Transport and Communications, as well as with the CN authorities, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) stated a while ago that the commission was not only studying but, if I understood him right, actually taking steps to meet the objective stated in this bill.

So although this bill is essentially honest and pursues an objective entirely commendable and desirable it seems to me according to the information given to us by the parliamentary secretary that it comes somewhat too late.

But the introduction of a bill is always, particularly during the private members' hour, an opportunity for members to support the movers of various bills because some problems are strictly regional and that is why I rose to ask the CN authorities to make additional efforts to ensure more security on railway lines which millions of Canadians travel everyday—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It being six o'clock, the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

[English]

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we agreed earlier that we might interrupt the debate to deal with order No. 10, an act to amend the Pilotage Act. We also agreed that we would deal with it in committee of the whole, rather than sending it to the standing committee, and going through all the stages here.

Mr. Baldwin: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker. We think this important economic issue should be proceeded with right away.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party may I say that we agree.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PILOTAGE ACT

EXTENSION OF BYLAWS AND REGULATIONS DESCRIBED IN SECTION 43(4) TO FEBRUARY 1, 1974

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-127, to amend the Pilotage Act, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this amendment would extend the bylaws and regulations described in subsection 43(4) to the 1st day of February 1974. This is because the pilotage commission has not yet completed the work it has been called upon to do and is requesting more time. I believe after consultation with representatives of the pilots association and industry on items of tariffs they will be in a better position to report shortly.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I think we expected a little more from the parliamentary secretary than that. This is a matter of economics, and inasmuch as we have been here for a month and have not passed a piece of legislation that affects the economy I think before we get into committee of the whole there are one or two observations which should be made.

First of all, I hope that the government is aware of the serious situation that will exist at the port of Halifax and St. John's, as well as the river ports, in view of the tremendous increases that are going to come about as a result of the provisions of this bill. In some cases it will mean an immediate 60 per cent increase and in other cases the increase will be 180 per cent or 200 per cent. No one in Canada objects to paying for what are essentially good services and there is no question that these services are needed for the conduct of vessels in and out of the ports and restricted sailing areas. No one objects to paying just fees; what is objected to is the situation where receivers of pilotage services in Canada are being forced to pay through the nose. That is a matter of regret.

Another matter of regret, Mr. Speaker, which I think must be expressed before we move on is the fact that the government has had 19 months in which to make consequential or substantive amendments to the clauses of the bill that needed change. They apparently miscalculated to the tune of a couple of billion dollars in an area in which judgment played a role. I wonder how on earth they could have misjudged the length of time it was going to take Mr. Mahoney to complete his study of the Canada Shipping Act, if this is in fact the reason why this House is tonight faced with a deadline.

Surely something more could be expected from the parliamentary secretary than his cursory remarks. This type of housekeeping legislation, if it is so urgent, should have been the very first thing placed before us a month ago; instead of that we have it tonight because the deadline is February 1.

I do not think there is any point in getting into some of the details of the bill at this stage. Perhaps on second reading or during the committee stage the parliamentary secretary will explain why, after seven months in one sense and 19 months in the other sense, the government now wants an additional year. Perhaps he could tell us a little about the way Mr. Mahoney's work stands, and when we might expect to have a revision of the Canada Shipping Act before us so that we can do something about the pilotage legislation on a more permanent basis.

Perhaps over the next minute or two he would consider giving the committee some indication of what the government intends with respect to their reaction to the appeals that are being filed. I know that in a sense this is a little out of the context of our discussion in this House because it may become a matter for the courts, but perhaps the parliamentary secretary would give some indication of the government's position.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated earlier, there is a disposition to expedite the passage of this bill. However, I am sure other members must wonder, as I do, why on the eve of the expiration of the extension of the old bylaws and regulations the government comes along and asks for another extension for one year. The short answer, of course, is that the new bills and new regulations in respect of the various pilotage authorities and areas are not yet ready.

However, what really disturbs me, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that by tomorrow midnight, in my interpretation of what this bill means and what the Pilotage Act means, there will be a void, a vacuum, a situation in which there are no rules and regulations and no bylaws regarding the operation of ships in Canada unless this particular piece of legislation is passed. The extension that was available in the current law expires tomorrow at midnight. I can conceive of a pretty chaotic situation in the various areas and districts of Canada that are affected by the Pilotage Act. The old rules and regulations will disappear and there will not be any new ones to take their place.

According to people I have spoken to on the west coast there is tremendous concern about the period when a vacuum will exist. One thing that could happen is this. The new draft bylaws, rules and regulations which were to be the subject of consultation with the shipping and towboat industry may, if this bill is not passed, be put into effect out of desperation by the pilotage authorities because nothing else will be available to them: their old rules will be gone; they will have only the draft rules. Out of desperation, in order to have some kind of regulation or bylaw in force on February 1 they may put into effect a half-baked set of rules that will cause chaos. If that situation prevails, this government will be entirely to blame for waiting until the last possible moment to ask for an additional one-year extension.

We have given unanimous consent to bailing out the government. This indicates the concern of members of the House about this matter. Also, we respect the rights of the shipping industry. However, in the process of the bill going through the legislative machinery there could be a vacuum between here, the Senate and royal assent. I hope there will not. It is regrettable that the government, through the parliamentary secretary, should wait until the last possible moment, when we are on the brink of a confused and chaotic situation, to ask us to help them out of this desperate position. Naturally, we are concerned about this because of the situation that could exist with regard to shipping in Canada. We want to do everything we can to assist.

I have not seen the draft bylaws or regulations that are proposed for the west coast. I do not know if they apply to other parts of Canada as well. I have been informed that the draft form is so rigid that it imposes a straitjacket type of regulation on the towboat industry. This is a local type of towing. These boats tow from port to port in British Columbia. The skippers of these towboats know the waters in their areas far better than any pilot because theirs is a year-round operation. I hope these draft bylaws are not put into effect; if they are, a towboat skipper will have to take a pilot aboard to move from one side of Vancouver harbour to the other. That is stupid and ridiculous. This industry knows more about shipping and moving barges and logs on the coast of British Columbia than any pilot or the Department of Transport, yet that is the situation that prevails.

In this extension of one year, I hope that whoever is responsible for drafting the bylaws that apply to the west coast, and possibly to other parts of Canada, will have enough common sense to make them meaningful and workable in the industry. I hope that those who are wrapped up in the bureaucratic concept of their own importance and cannot see beyond the paper they are writing on, cannot see beyond their office and cannot look into the industry to see what is happening, will be removed from those positions so that common sense can prevail in the drafting of the bylaws and regulations. I hope the minister, his parliamentary secretary or whoever is piloting this bill through the House will respond to the concerns I have expressed on behalf of those who will be affected by the current draft proposals.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am quite agreeable to proceeding tonight through the various stages of this legislation as outlined by my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). However, at the committee stage we ought to have more elucidation from whoever is piloting this bill through this chamber than was given to us by the parliamentary secretary in his few words on second reading.

I recall the sense of urgency with which members of this House were asked to deal with the legislation to set up the Pilotage Act. I recall that the committee was asked to sit morning, noon and night to get the new pilotage arrangement on the road. Those who participated in that exercise have a right to expect the parliamentary secretary, if he is to be the spokesman for this bill, to give us a better picture of what exactly has happened since we, under pressure, put the machinery in motion for the new pilotage authorities.

I would like to know what progress is being made. What is behind the fact that it will take another year for the pilotage authorities to establish, in their own right, their own particular bylaws and regulations? I realize there are complexities to some of these bylaws. I have not had a chance to examine in detail the proposal recently presented with regard to the proposed bylaws of the British Columbia pilotage authority.

What progress has the pilotage authority made in setting up a new pilotage system? This question is very much in my mind in view of some recent events in British Columbia involving a ship which, as stated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in the House, had aboard a Canadian pilot and an apprentice pilot. While I realize we cannot in this discussion go into the pros and cons of the functioning of the pilot of that vessel, we should be enlightened as to why it is taking so much longer to make the new pilotage authority bill operative than was obviously anticipated when the legislation went through. The impression was given that this was a matter of great urgency. We were asked to wrestle with a new bill bringing new machinery into being, and government authorities would then proceed full steam ahead to make the new system operative.

I cannot recall exact dates but it seems to me it was a long time after parliament had passed the law before the members of the pilotage authority on the British Columbia coast were named and the new authority actually came into being. I think we should be given some idea whether it is the pilotage authority that has been lax in getting down to the task of bringing out new bylaws, or whether it is a case of dilatory action or lack of action on the part of the government following the passage of the Pilotage Act. These are among the questions which I believe ought to be examined when the measure is studied in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Continuation of Bylaws.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, before we do anything else there are one or two questions to be asked by way of clarification so that we may understand exactly what it is that we are doing. The matter before us is the Pilotage Act. It is apparently to replace some existing provisions in the Canada Shipping Act. We have had it since 1971—around June 30 as a matter of fact. Section 43 (1) (2) and (3) came into force immediately, whereas subsections (4) (5) (6) and (7) of section 43 and the rest of the Pilotage Act did not come into force until proclamation which, if my memory serves me correctly, was about February 1 a year ago.

The hon. gentleman's opening remarks were so brief that by the time we got our earpieces in he had finished. While I accept them, I think the parliamentary secretary might have gone a few steps further. I believe he now senses what I am asking. Why, at this particular time, does he want a year's extension? Perhaps we could start with that question.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I should like to give hon. members some additional information. The Pilotage Act, Section 43(4), provided that "every bylaw made or expressed to have been made by a pilotage authority as defined in the Canada Shipping Act and every regulation made pursuant to part VII of that act and in force, or deemed to be in force, on the commencement of this Act, continues in force unless the bylaw or regulation is revoked by an authority." The bylaws and regulations referred to in this subsection covered the operations of each pilotage district, including such matters as the licensing of pilots, examinations, collection of dues, dispatching of pilots, entry into the pilotage service, assignment to duty, discipline and other matters respecting the regulating of pilot service and tariff schedules for each of the 29 districts which were operated under the Canada Shipping Act.

Since their establishment the authorities have been required to negotiate with pilots of the various districts within their regions. Under the act, pilots may elect to be employees of the authority or to contract their services through their association. The authorities could not establish new pilotage tariffs until negotiations with the pilots were completed, and they have found it impossible to adopt new bylaws and regulations prior to the expiration of the old bylaws and regulations because of unavoidable delays involved in rendering operable their administrative structures and in negotiating new tariffs with representatives of the pilots and industry to provide for their operating costs and allow for increases in wages demanded by the pilots.

Furthermore, some of the tariffs proposed were objected to under section 23 of the Pilotage Act. When an objection is filed before the Canadian Transport Commission a tariff is held in abeyance until such time as the objection is disposed of by the CTC. It may be some time before hearings are held by the commission and a decision is reached on the contentious items of the tariffs.

Due to the reasons I have outlined, no new regulations or bylaws were enacted establishing compulsory pilotage areas or prescribing ships or classes of ships to which compulsory pilotage applies. It is believed that the proposed regulations or bylaws on compulsory pilotage areas and ships will also be objected to by representatives of the pilots or the industry under section 14(3) of the act, entailing further delays before regulations on this subject are implemented.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset to congratulate the hon. member for St. Boniface on being chosen parliamentary secretary. We have not had a chance to do this as yet. I should also like to congratulate him on his ability to read exceedingly well what has been written and placed before him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I learned that from the opposition.

Mr. Howard: One thing his speechwriters have done, however, is this: they have prevented him from saying anything meaningful. Is the parliamentary secretary now saying that the various pilotage authorities have been unable to draft bylaws because of these negotiations? Surely the whole purpose of bylaws passed by a pilotage authority is not simply to deal with tariffs. Surely they deal with questions of safety, the class of ships, the circumstances under which pilots operate and matters such as those visited upon the coast of British Columbia the other day through the stupidity of the skipper of the Irish Stardust.

• (2030)

Section 22 of the act, from a quick reading of it, and as I recall the discussion in the committee a couple of years ago when the pilotage bill was being dealt with, relates to a tariff of pilotage charges. We do not know what it means in terms of time sequence, but is the parliamentary secretary saying that every set of negotiations with the pilots is going to result in things coming to a standstill? Surely he is not saying that the pilotage authorities are not going to do anything about bylaws, regulations, rules, safety of ships, safety of the environment, concern about our coastlines, about our crews on ships, about what may happen if there is a repetition of a situation that happened recently when one of the B.C. ferries and a Russian freighter collided off the coast of British Columbia. Surely they are not going to abandon their responsibilities to the general public over what is going to be a course of negotiations regarding pilotage tariffs and fees.

The parliamentary secretary might be able to justify the government's negligence in the statement that he made earlier, but inasmuch as we have now reached almost the last day for passing this legislation—the deadline is midnight tomorrow, about 29 hours from now—I think we are entitled to ask just what is going to happen if the bill is not passed by February 1. What contingency plans exist? The parliamentary secretary avoided this question deliberately, but he should not have done so because parliament is responsible to the general public in this matter. The legislative authority for making bylaws expires at midnight tomorrow, according to the statement of the parliamentary secretary. But what if there are no bylaws, rules, regulations and safety requirements to go into effect?

True, all this is supposition. It may be that the Senate, contrary to its usual practice, moves with speed and dispatch and deals with this bill tomorrow. However, I am convinced that the government is not resting its whole case on the hope that parliament will give speedy passage to the bill. Although it received unanimous consent to deal with the bill this evening, the Senate may not give its unanimous consent and consider the bill in one day, with the Governor General then hustling down here tomorrow night to give royal assent to the bill. I think we are entitled to know what are the government's contingency plans, and so is the shipping industry.

I have another question I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary. As I understand it, unless the schedule has been altered there is in existence the Atlantic Pilotage Authority, a distinct authority with its office in Halifax. Its region is the Atlantic seaboard, the Atlantic coast. There is also in existence another pilotage authority known as the Laurentian Pilotage Authority. Its head office is in Montreal and its region of activity is the northern entrance to St. Lambert's lock and that general area. There is also the Great Lakes Pilotage Authority with headquarters in Cornwall, its region being all the waters in the province of Quebec south of the northern entrance to St. Lambert lock and all Canadian waters in and around the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba—in other words, the Great Lakes. There is also the Pacific Pilotage Authority which governs the waters along the Pacific coast.

I should like to know whether negotiations have been taking place with each of these pilotage authorities but have been stalled. Has each of these pilotage authorities been unable to reach a conclusive agreement with the pilots? I think we also require to know what is the position of the draft bylaws of each of these pilotage authorities. Are they incomplete, are they just proposals, are they waiting for some response from the industry in regard to whether or not they are acceptable, and does each of them require this additional one year's extension?

Another question I think we are entitled to have answered is this. I very much regret I have not yet had an opportunity to determine what authority is given by part VII of the Canada Shipping Act to make regulations. I assume from the general acceptance we give to the use of the word "regulation" that regulations made pursuant to part VII of the act are regulations made by the Governor in Council. In other words, they are order in council regulations as distinct from bylaws made by pilotage authorities. We should like to know whether these regulations that should have been prepared within the one year's time are half completed, whether anyone has looked at them, whether they have started to be drafted, whether they exist at all or are simply on the verge of being brought into effect by order in council.

These are all substantial questions that I think need to be asked and answered. This is especially so when the government comes in at the last moment and asks for unanimous consideration of the bill by the House. Consent was given because we realized the importance of the matter and the necessity for dealing with it expeditiously. The government also insists that there is a crisis, otherwise why would it have asked for unanimous consent? We agree that the matter is urgent.

In view of this, surely parliament is entitled to a little more detailed explanation than the well read statement made by the parliamentary secretary, which some civil servant obviously wrote, perhaps to cover up his own inability to draft regulations in time for consideration by cabinet.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I note that the last speaker kept on mentioning the fact that I read something. I am pleased to have read my statement because I am sure that the answers I have given him are correct. I also have a copy of what I said. I have definitely noticed that in many cases members on the other side of the House have no means of expressing an opinion unless there is argument. In respect of the hon. member's question as to what would happen if by midnight tomorrow we had not passed this bill, let me say that he knows the answer: we would not have the measures required.

In response to the question he asked as to why the authorities have taken more time than expected, let me point out that there were some difficulties experienced in setting up the internal organization after the regulations came into effect a year ago on February 1, 1972. Hon. members on the opposite side asked if we had expected that these authorities would be able to report before this time, but for reasons mentioned before they have not been able to do so. Another reason which made this impossible was the lengthy negotiation with the pilots associations. There were also appeals to the CTC in respect of proposed tariffs, and that commission has not yet concluded them. I might also say that there were long discussions with the shipping industry and the pilots in respect of pilotage, and these have not yet been concluded. I believe I have answered all the questions that have been asked so far.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the parliamentary secretary has said, but I wonder if he would answer the essential question. Had I known he was going to go off on that tangent I would have finished my question in the first place. I thought he understood it. What will be the status of these bylaws and regulations during the period February 1, 1973, to February 1, 1974?

Will they be frozen or will there be latitude for substantive amendment?

There are some punitive measures involved in this area. In fact, this is a matter that should have been before the committee in order that we could call witnesses and consider it in depth. I am now a little suspicious as to why this bill is brought in now and whether there is any reason other than the ones put forward. I gather that the House leaders met and arrived at an agreement to bring the bill before the House tonight. This is certainly not the time to deal with it. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary would address himself to the status of the regulations and indicate whether they are frozen or are subject to amendment or change during this one-year extension.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I might be able to answer that question. In considering the short amendment to the act we had to make a decision as to how long we might have to wait for the pilotage authorities to complete their work, so we decided to give the pilotage authorities another year. During that period of time, hopefully, all the difficulties that have been mentioned will be cleared up and the pilotage authorities will have completed their work and established their own regimes. Until that is done, the existing regulations are in effect.

I regret that I have to come to the House with the parliamentary secretary asking for what I understand really to be an agreement to suspend the Standing Order. This has been necessary because the pilotage authorities have not completed their work and we must take steps to ensure that the regulations exist after tomorrow night. That is really the basic reason.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the House leader whether there was any indication at some point in time that the regulations and the bylaws would not be completed. Is that the reason we are dealing with the bill at this late hour? Was there some indication that the bylaws and regulations would be completed prior to the expiration of this act, and is that why we are now called upon to pass this measure before the expiration of those bylaws and regulations?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, my understanding, which I think is accurate, is that it was hoped the authorities would have completed their work and would have established their own regulations. It was only a short while ago that I was made aware of the fact that it would be necessary to take this action. It was expected, until the very last moment, that they might be completed. However, as I understand it now, most of the work of the pilotage authorities is well advanced but not completed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, in view of the difficulties indicated by the parliamentary secretary which have arisen in respect of lengthy discussion, appeals to the Canadian Transport Commission, and so on, would it not have been advisable to have brought this bill in earlier, with a higher priority? The House has been in session since January 4. Why is it that we are now dealing with the bill at this point in time, when according to the parliamentary secretary there was sufficient indication that there was going to be a delay?

[Mr. Forrestall.]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I really must offer additional congratulations to the hon. member for St. Boniface. I am sure it is not within his talents and abilities, but he is taking the approach that the way to stay out of difficulty in the House is to keep answers short and concise.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Precise.

Mr. Howard: That may not be very enlightening to hon. members but at least it helps the position of the parliamentary secretary. I am sure this was an oversight on that hon. member's part, but he failed to respond to a couple of things about which I asked. Without accepting his initial response as being a reasonable explanation, because I do not think it is in one or two instances, I should like to know whether the regulations under part VII of the Canada Shipping Act are regulations as we normally know them, or are they the result of decisions by the governor in council?

If they are the result of such decisions, I would like to know why it is necessary to provide a year's extension to the governor in council in order to draft regulations. The governor in council has had more than a year to consider this matter; in fact, it has had all the time since the passage of the act by parliament. I am sure the cabinet has been considering these regulations. I would like to know whether a conclusion has been reached and why it is necessary to give this additional year's extension. If these regulations are not in any condition of preparedness, when is it anticipated that they will be?

The parliamentary secretary also failed to indicate what state, status or stage the various pilotage authorities have reached. Have those pilotage authorities which I enumerated earlier concluded drafting their bylaws, or are they still in consultation? The minister referred to discussions with the industry and the pilots. How close are those discussions to a conclusion? Is it the fault of the industry, the fault of the pilots or the fault of the pilotage authorities that those discussions have been protracted? How much longer will it likely be before the regulations and the bylaws of the various authorities are properly drafted? Are all the pilotage authorities at the same stage in respect of drafting the bylaws? In other words, are they proceeding in tandem? Does each association want to keep in step with the other? In other words, are they being held up because of the delay experienced by one authority in getting bylaws prepared, discussions concluded or negotiations satisfactorily settled?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to repeat, and I hope it will be satisfactory to the hon. member, that when we were discussing this question we felt we ought to allow several months as it might be possible for the pilotage authorities to complete all their work in that time. My own opinion was that it would be better to be safe by giving them enough time, rather than a six months' period, for example, and then have to return to parliament because they had not completed their work. I understand that the work of all the pilotage authorities is well advanced but is not completed.

I understand that two or three months ago it was expected that they would be completed by February 1 and that this law would be unnecessary. I would be delighted if they could complete their work within a few months, but I will not take any chances. I want to make sure that it will not be necessary to come back to parliament with a bill. If they finish within a short time, that will be fine.

Mr. Howard: What about the regulations?

Mr. MacEachen: With respect to the regulations, I must confess I have not looked at that section of the Canada Shipping Act to determine whether they are regulations under the governor in council; I presume they are. If that is the case, there will be no delay on the part of the governor in council in making its regulations, because if the pilotage authorities had completed the work we would have made the regulations and it would have been unnecessary for us to come before this House. I should like to qualify those words because I have not looked at that particular section of the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one final question? Perhaps the government House leader or the parliamentary secretary can answer. What would happen if the work leading up to the amendments that are required with respect to this law and regulations is completed, say, in another six or eight weeks? Can this matter return to the House so that the problem can be looked at in depth, or will it be frozen out, so to speak, for one year?

Mr. MacEachen: I would think if we were to notify the House that the pilotage authorities had completed their work in creating their own rules, it would not be necessary to come back with a bill. That matter certainly would be made known.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, in other words we would wait for one year and then there would be further amendment to this particular section, and that amendment would give it the long-standing position that is needed?

Mr. MacEachen: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I take it that there would be no impediment to the work undertaken in the Great Lakes area. Many amendments have been introduced to regulations now in existence; these affect some of the other areas. I take it there would be no impediment to the work that is going on by virtue of this specific amendment.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, absolutely none.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear that. Would the minister repeat his remark for the sake of the record?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to put that assurance on record for my hon. friend.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of questions I should like to raise in order to clarify certain things in my mind. As I listened to the parliamentary secretary explaining this situation, the question developed in my mind as to whether the proposed extension date of one year would be adequate. In other words, the committee ought to consider whether one year will be long enough. I ask the President of the Privy Council who has intervened in the debate whether I am correct in assuming from what he said that he has personally looked into the situation and satisfied himself that the proposed one year extension will be adequate to cover this period.

Certainly, his remarks seemed to lead to an inference of that sort. On the other hand, the explanation given by the parliamentary secretary left me wondering if we should not make the period two years. Could the President of the Privy Council clarify that question? I should like to ask him another after he has replied.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I am reasonably certain, or as certain as one can be of anything in this world, that the work can be completed within one year. I discussed the matter with the officials and was so advised when the matter was being considered and the bill was being drafted.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the President of the Privy Council, being an experienced member of this House and of the government, has obviously left himself wide open with that sort of assurance, especially if ever he has to come back to the House and say it cannot be done. I should like to ask one or two questions about the present state of affairs. As I read the original section 43(4) this matter was envisaged, as I think we understood, as a continuing process. In other words, as each new section of the work of the new pilotage authority was completed and the authority worked out all that was necessary in respect of a new bylaw, the appropriate or equivalent section of the Canada Shipping Act would apply unless the bylaw or regulation was revoked by an authority.

There was some discussion of tariffs and pilotage fees. I heard the parliamentary secretary discussing the question. I also heard that notice can be given of an objection. the particular workings of the pilotage authorities that I am most vitally concerned about are those raised by the hon. member for Skeena. I am concerned about bylaws and regulations that have to do with the authority which is provided for in section 14 of the act. Also, there is the matter of the establishment of compulsory pilotage areas and the prescribing of ships or classes of ships that are subject to compulsory pilotage, as well as the qualifications of pilots, and so on.

Could we have some report on this matter? These are areas in which action is to be taken by the pilotage authorities, as I read the act, followed by approval of the governor in council. I take it that the parliament secretary or the President of the Privy Council have some knowledge as to where we stand on compulsory pilotage areas and the defining of classes of ships that are subject to compulsory pilotage. To me this is the area which is the meat and substance of the whole new concept and is very important in the long run with respect to the scale of tariffs that may be applicable at any given time.

Where do the pilotage authorities stand with respect to that part of the work? Has the governor in council approved proposals by any or all of the pilotage authorities? Naturally, of particular concern to me and to pilotage authorities in British Columbia is the question of the definition of compulsory pilotage areas and the kinds and classes of ships which are required to carry pilots. This, to me, is a most important aspect of the work and I think we are entitled to know, when we talk about the timetable for extending the holdover of the Canada Shipping Act regulations, just where we stand in these very vital areas affecting the operation of the new pilotage system.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, my understanding of the philosophy behind the new Pilotage Act and of the royal commission that examined for such a long time pilotage in Canada is that the most efficient pilotage system can be established through decentralized authorities.

• (2100)

Mr. Barnett: I am agreeable to approving committee stage of the new bill, but what has happened with respect to putting decentralization into effect?

Mr. MacEachen: As the hon. member is aware, Mr. Chairman, pursuant to that philosophy of decentralization four pilotage authorities have been established in the country. Probably it would be best to describe them as regional authorities. They were established a year ago. As I understand it, they have jurisdiction to establish compulsory pilotage areas.

Mr. Barnett: Subject to the approval of the governor in council. Has the governor in council approved any of these?

Mr. MacEachen: On that particular detail I would have to obtain detailed information for the hon. member, and I would be glad to do so.

Mr. Howard: As I understand the situation, it is the governor in council, really the cabinet, who appoint the members of the various pilotage authorities. Can the President of the Privy Council tell us whether it has been found necessary to make any changes in the membership of the various pilotage authorities since they were first constituted about a year ago?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member says, the authorities were created just a year ago. The members of the authorities were determined as a result of nominations from pilots and shipping associations. To my knowledge there has been no necessity to change the membership of the authorities. I hope the hon. member won't have to ask that question a year from now, but maybe if he does I will agree with him that it might be necessary to do that.

Mr. Howard: If that question were asked at any time subsequent to now, it would only be because of the inability of the authorities to get the bylaws drafted. That is why I wonder if there is any difficulty with them. Does the minister know, with respect to the personnel or staff working with the pilotage authorities—I presume they employ their own staff or, if not, the federal government does—whether it has been necessary to fire any of these people because of their inability to develop bylaws to a successful conclusion?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Chairman. For example, the Atlantic Pilotage Authority employs 84 persons, including ten pilots, and supervises 60 pilots who are not members of the authority. We all ought to understand that the pilotage authorities had to set up their own administrations. The parliamentary secretary has explained that the work of establishing the administrations took quite a bit of time in the early months following creation of the authorities. There has been no necessity to change or fire any persons in these authorities.

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, when preparing my few remarks for this evening I was reminded of the situation where, if you take your research material from one source, in effect you are copying, but if you take it from several sources, that comes under the glorified heading of research. Each member who has participated in this debate has done a tremendous amount of research and a great deal of soul-searching. The speeches I have heard so far give clear evidence that a great deal of reading has been done by hon. members, which has served to elevate the calibre of the debate.

I want to put my position on the record and the reasons for the stand that I am taking. I believe that the death penalty is an immature response to an irrational act. I believe that advocates of capital punishment for murder are looking for an easy solution. There is not one. I am indebted to the Rev. George Goth who had an article in the London Free Press on this subject, on January 13 of this year. I would like to quote a few extracts from it:

> To be sure, I do not accept the voice of experts and statistics as final. None the less, it does need to be said that criminologists, by and large, do not believe that capital punishment acts as a deterrent. Violence creates violence.

If I may digress for a moment here, I would refer to the splendid address given by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) when he dealt with the question of deterrence. Returning to the Rev. Goth's article:

> To the argument that homicide is on the increase since the death penalty has been stopped the answer is very simple. Most crimes have increased dramatically in the past ten years. The reason for this is not a more cavalier treatment of the criminal. Let us rid ourselves of North American conceit. We belong to a violent society. Respect for authority has gone with the wind . . .
> We are living in a post-Christian era. The old order has died. No new one has come to take its place.

Faced with this, we in this House have a particular responsibility and certainly the government's responsibility increases day by day. The Rev. Goth makes the following points against the imposition of capital punishment, which he says does not meet the real problem. He writes:

There is no evidence that it will serve as a deterrent.

It would be a cheap evasion of the real causes of crime.

It is unworthy of any civilized state. Vengeance is not a mature response to an irrational act.

Violence creates violence. The state must not reduce itself to the level of the criminal.

We are looking for a simple answer and there is none. The way ahead will be long and hard.

• (2110)

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the comments made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay I should like to refer hon. members to the statements made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and his timely comments yesterday. I have listened very carefully to the debate, and those speeches that I missed I have read. I must say that the calibre of the addresses has been high. This is due in no small measure to the fact that it is a free vote despite the occasion taken by some to launch cheap political shots. I think the tone and calibre of the debate is high also because there are good arguments to be made on both sides of the issue.

I was somewhat surprised, however, to hear my friend, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), suggest yesterday that there is little room for error in our present courts system. I suggest to him that the courts system is a long way from being infallible and I think there are better arguments he could use than those that the courts nowadays are not very likely to make an error.

We have used the M'Naghten rule in dealing with the criminally insane for all too long a period, and although today psychiatrists can be called as expert witnesses it is extremely difficult on many occasions to convince a jury of schizophrenia, paranoia or other problems of the mind that would lead an individual to kill. But aside from all of that, I think we must be aware of the fact there is daily a possibility of error creeping into judicial decisions. Crowded court calendars increase this ever-present danger. There is always the danger of executing an innocent person. Mr. Dahn Batchelor writes in the current issue of the "International Review," and I agree:

One of the greatest arguments against capital punishment is the danger of executing an innocent person. No miscarriage of justice is more terrible to contemplate. The execution of the innocent generally results from three types of testimony: the first is circumstantial. It is impossible to dispense with circumstantial evidence. If such evidence was not permitted to be heard in a court of law, criminals could laugh at the laws because a legally sane person rarely commits murder in front of witnesses.

Mr. Speaker, the courts recognize that it is often necessary to rely on circumstantial evidence, but they also know it is dangerous to do so. I should like, as many of my colleagues have done, to relate a personal experience that perhaps more than anything else convinced me that mistakes could be made and that we should be extremely careful. I will alter the circumstances a little to protect my client and the other parties involved, but the circumstances are true.

Some years ago, an elderly couple in their seventies were viciously beaten by, they said, three men. The licence number of the car used by the criminals had been secured and the police, through a splendid bit of investigatory work, eventually charged three men. One of the three men came into my office and indicated that they had in fact been together all day long, and this was established. He also indicated to me that they had done a tremendous amount of drinking. It is significant that this man did not know whether he had in fact participated in the beating up and the robbery, but he thought the likelihood was very good that he had although he assured me he had absolutely no memory of the incident; and in light of the amount of alcohol that had been consumed by him that day, I believed him.

Relying, however, on the necessity of the Crown to establish its case, a plea of not guilty was entered on behalf of this particular individual. In a subsequent interview with him I asked if time had helped his memory, had given him any reason to believe that he had participated or that he had not. He indicated that he established with his landlord the exact time that he had come into the house. Because he was actually at that particular time some 20 miles away from the scene of the crime, he began to wonder if he had, in fact, participated in the savage beating and robbery.

When we retraced his steps it was determined that he had left the company of the other individuals. The three men had driven off in the car, but subsequently he got out of the vehicle and went to a restaurant. We were able to find someone there who remembered him, not only because he had been violently ill in the restaurant but also because he had neglected to pay his bill. It was established that he had been in the restaurant at the time the vicious and brutal beating had taken place. I wondered at the time, Mr. Speaker, if we had not been able to locate that witness in the restaurant and if the elderly couple, or one of them had been killed, whether this man, not knowing whether he had participated, could have been hanged for this particular offence.

Aside from errors in the courts, Mr. Speaker, there are errors that creep in as a result of circumstances in particular cases. This case convinced me in dramatic fashion that it is possible to make a mistake. As I say, I wondered whether this man would have been found guilty of murder if one of the couple had died, or whether he would have served a long prison sentence if we had been unable to establish his innocence. He could not, in effect, go into the witness-box and proclaim his innocence because he did not know whether he had participated.

Mr. Speaker, it was exciting this afternoon to hear the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) answer the question that I think is on the minds of many of us. Many of us have answered it to our satisfaction. I do not feel that I came down here as someone to pass on what I think the majority of people in my riding would do in the circumstances, to act as a computer card punch-out. I think I have an obligation to use such intelligence as I have to vote as I see fit.

The retentionist is in the enviable position of not having to pull the cord that opens the trapdoor, to pull the switch nor, for that matter, to drop the gas vial into the gas chamber. I think in the heat of the moment almost anyone could kill in the interest of protecting a member of his or her family, or in the interest of protecting a fellow human being from a vicious attack. This is done without thinking in the heat of the moment, and I think it is possible for most people. However, I wonder if a year later, after the passion had been dispelled, after the heat of the moment and after the victim had long been buried, whether one person could go into a cell and hand another a cyanide tablet and say, "This is retribution for the heinous crime you committed." I think it is unlikely. The right hon. gentleman this afternoon pointed out very clearly that these hangings, these killings do not take place in public. If we are going to use that as a deterrent, surely in public is where society should say it should take place.

Mr. Speaker, I take strong exception to those who say that we abolitionists are backed into a corner; in other words, that we have more concern for the accused than we have for the victim. Of course this is not the case; this just cannot be true. I have no sympathy—my heart is filled with revulsion at the thought that one individual would take the life of another.

When the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in his remarks mentioned that the first hanging in Canada was that of a 16-year-old girl, I think that filled most of us with revulsion. Had that taken place last night I do not think that one person in this House would have agreed with it. We have come a long way in 150 years, Mr. Speaker, and I think the time has come for abolition. I am going to support this bill, but I hope amendments will be introduced at the committee stage. I am not at present a member of the committee; that is why I want to make one or two remarks about my attitude.

Because I am an abolitionist, I think more than ever we have an obligation to society to protect society and so I abhor the situation where an individual who takes a life, a sexual offender, a psychopathic killer, is granted leave of absence or parole after a ten-year period. I think something must be done to protect society and that is why I feel, as an abolitionist, that individuals who kill other individuals should be put in prison; whether it be for a period of 20 or 25 years could be argued, it is academic, but the time has come to stop these ridiculous, easy paroles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I do not want to talk about particular cases, nor do I want to take the position that the right hon. gentleman took this afternoon to usurp the responsibility of the parole board, but the people of Canada are fed up with the easy access to leave of absence and parole. Mr. Speaker, I think I have made my position clear. I am an abolitionist; I support this bill. It would be my hope that amendments would take place at the committee stage which will see to it that there are no easy paroles, no easy leaves of absence. I hope the committee will read my speech and make appropriate amendments.

• (2120)

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in any debate, when it comes time for the thirtieth or thirty-fifth speaker, or whatever I am, to stand and say a few words, that person wonders what he can possibly contribute to the debate. I expect the answer is always, very little. What I am really doing this evening is giving a personal testimony rather than attempting to influence the outcome of the debate, since most of the arguments on either side of this case have been presented very ably by members who preceded me. There are a few things which are peripheral to the issue but they may have a bearing on the thinking of some members of this House. I want to draw these to the attention of the House before dealing with the main issues.

Some participants in this debate, notably the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), seem to consider it to be a sort of interlude between discussions of more difficult and socially important legislation. There is a certain element of hypocrisy in the legislation before us, legislation which continues the practice of restricting capital punishment to murderers of policemen and prison guards. Most of us cannot conceive of a Canadian cabinet reversing the practice of more than a decade and failing to exercise the royal prerogative of mercy on behalf of someone convicted of murder.

As appropriate as the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) were this afternoon when he said, in effect, "The law is the law; the cabinet must obey it. If it does not like it, it must change it," it is extremely unlikely that a cabinet would change the practice of the past decade or more. Like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), I would be much happier if we were completely honest with ourselves and the country and dealt with arguments for and against the abolition of capital punishment on their merits, avoiding the kind of obfuscation incorporated in the bill before us.

Having said that, I cannot associate myself with those who argue that the question of whether or not to retain the death penalty should be of relatively low legislative priority. To me, the outcome of this debate will reveal the general level of civilization, sophistication, compassion and understanding in Canadian society. It will also help to determine the level of civilization, sophistication, compassion and understanding in the years to come, because laws do change social attitudes. For that reason, this debate is important.

The debate is also important because the people of this country are telling us it is important. I very much doubt that any member at this moment is receiving more mail on any other subject. Public interest is revealed also in the response to questionnaires sent out by members. Returns of questionnaires which avoided the question of capital punishment have been much lower than returns of questionnaires which asked for opinions on the issue.

I entered this debate only after a considerable amount of soul-searching both with respect to the merits of the case and having decided that total abolition of the death penalty represents the greatest public good with respect to the correctness of taking a stand which would not seem to be in accord with that taken by a majority of my constituents, at least a majority of those who have taken the trouble to acquaint me with their views.

I feel obliged to inform the House, even in speaking for abolition of the death penalty, that returns of my questionnaire, about 3,000 of them now out of 35,000 mailed, confirm the results of similar unscientific, and I emphasize that word, surveys, conducted over the past few months by newspapers, magazines and the electronics media. In the returns of my questionnaire there is overwhelming support for the retention of the dealth penalty.

In retrospect, I believe that a more careful wording of the questionnaire would have modified the results of the questionnaire somewhat but would have left a majority of opinion in favour of retention of the death penalty.

Some grade 11 students from Lord Selkirk regional comprehensive secondary school in my constituency conducted a much more careful survey of 1,000 people on the issue of capital punishment. They discovered that in excess of 50 per cent of those polled favoured retention of the death penalty and only 36 per cent of the adults wanted abolition. I have lived in my constituency since I was 11 years old. I feel very much a part of it. I am saddened by the seeming fact that a majority of my neighbours do not believe, as I do, that capital punishment must be abolished. Yet I will vote for abolition in this House, or as near as I can come to abolition of the death penalty. What gives me that right? How can I, as an elected representative, vote against what would seem to be the wishes of the majority of my constituents at this moment?

Other members in attempting to explain their taking similar action, that is voting for abolition, referred to or quoted John Stuart Mill and Edmund Burke on the difference between a delegate and a representative. Stripped of their elitist language, both Burke's statement to the electors of Bristol and Locke's passage in an essay on representative government help to explain my position. Put simply, I believe that as an elected representative I have been sent here to exercise my judgment based upon the best information available to me, and that one of the most important pieces of information upon which I base any judgment is my assessment of the opinion of my electorate at any given moment. The opinion of my electorate always remains one of my most important considerations. It is always taken into account. However, there must be other considerations as well. In the final count, the opinion of my electorate must remain just one consideration, however important that one consideration may be.

I am not a delegate. Our system, I believe wisely, does not require me to poll my constituents on every issue and vote according to the results of that poll. If after reflection my constituents believe my judgment to have been faulty, their remedy lies in the polling booth. It is my hope that they will never feel obliged to resort to that remedy, but in the final analysis I must live with myself and my conscience.

Capital punishment is an emotionally charged issue. It is the duty of a politician, when dealing with such an issue, to attempt to divorce himself from emotion and to make his decision on the basis of logic and the facts before him. If that means occasionally acting contrary to the immediate wishes of his constituents—and such occasions will present themselves only rarely—then so acting is his duty. There are few Canadians today who do not wish that more of their politicians had possessed the courage or the judgment to oppose the internment of Canadian-Japanese and the confiscation of their property during World War II, although public opinion at the time was overwhelmingly in favour of the action taken by the government. I wonder, in that regard, how public opinion would be expressing itself in relation to capital punishment today if yesterday we had discovered that the state had hanged an innocent man or woman, something which has happened in the past.

The advocates of the retention of capital punishment have never yet answered Lafayette's challenge, "I shall ask for the abolition of the penalty of death until the infallibility of human judgment has been demonstrated to me." The hon. member for Calgary North tried to answer this challenge yesterday but I believe he failed to do so. No one can say how many innocent persons have been murdered by the courts. Consider the opportunities for error, the opportunity for false testimony to be given, the possibility of mistaken identification, the possibility of a biased jury, the possibility of evidence being misinterpreted. I could go on.

Responsible estimates of the proportion of innocent persons among those executed run as high as 5 per cent. But even if the figure is only .5 per cent, the argument against capital punishment because of the possibility of judicial error is a powerful one. That a judicial error may occur, even if only rarely, is sufficient reason to avoid exacting the penalty of death. I believe society should never lay claim to absolute authority over life.

Why do so many Canadians at this point in time wish to retain the death penalty? Part of the reason lies in the fact that we are disturbed, even frightened by the pace of change, social and technological, in our society. We seem to be losing control over important events which affect our daily lives. We set up a complicated system to ensure a reasonable standard of life for those people who have suffered misfortune—people who for illness or some other reason are no longer capable of providing for themselves—and we see people for whom the system was never intended benefiting from it. We pay our taxes and for the most part we obey the laws which govern us; we avoid temptations to cheat and steal and to take advantage of our neighbours. Yet we see others almost literally getting away with murder.

We search desperately for a touchstone, some evidence of permanence and certitude in a world increasingly characterized by change. And our search is without success. This leads to frustration, to a desire to lash out and assert ourselves. As a result, some citizens commit crimes of violence. The rest of us react by saying, "Kill them", thinking perhaps that in so doing a danger to our lives and to the lives around us may be removed and that others so inclined might be frightened away from such action.

To such thinking I pose two principal objections. The first is that we as a society have no right to take the life of any person. The second is that state-sanctioned murder probably accomplishes no real purpose in any event. The first argument is a moral one. I appreciate that there are sincere, concerned people who will disagree with me on moral grounds. For many of us, this is a matter of interpretation. What do we do when in one place a guide book to moral behaviour says, "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed" and in another place seriously questions the moral authority of judge and executioner, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone"?

I hope that this debate will not see numbers of members quoting the Bible as an authority for the retention of the death penalty. If such does happen, there are other members of my party who are better equipped than me to offer rebuttal. But in anticipation I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to a passage from a publication put out by the Institute of Mennonite Studies:

A close study of these earliest chapters of the Bible shows that the death penalty as stated there is clearly not so much a requirement as a limitation. It is spoken against the background of a story of corruption in which vengeance was the general pattern . . .

Let us, therefore, begin realistically as the Bible does. Vengeance does not need to be commanded; it happens. It is the normal response of fallen man to any situation which calls for his hostility. And normally such vengeance is unlimited.

Most primitive peoples show the same pattern of vengeance as the Old Testament peoples for whom the rules in the Bible were initially established. In such societies it is normal for vengeance and counter-vengeance to raise the toll of suffering brought about by any offence far beyond proportion to the original damage done. Limits have been set, as in the Old Testament. But I believe it to be a terrible distortion to interpret this practical solution, to limit punishment to the actual wrongdoer, as providing some sort of sanction for the death penalty. On the contrary, I believe the most powerful assertion of my heritage is in favour of the sanctity of human life.

I want no part in a decision, even a collective decision, which leads to the taking of sentient human life. Murder of any sort, in any circumstances, even in the course of an execution, is never moral and it should not be legal. In "Spirits Rebellious," the Lebanese philosopher, Kahlil Gibran, comes across the corpses of three people who have been executed for committing crimes. He writes:

Three human beings who yesterday were in the lap of life today fell as victims to death because they broke the rules of human society. When a man kills another man, the people say he is murderer, but when the Emir kills him, the Emir is just. When a man robs a monastery, they say he is a thief but when the Emir robs such a man of his life, the Emir is honourable.

Shedding of blood is forbidden. But who made it lawful for the Emir? Stealing money is a crime, but taking away one's life is a noble act. Shall we meet evil with evil and say this is the law? Shall we fight corruption with greater corruption and say this is the rule? Shall we conquer crimes with more crimes, and say this is justice?

I said earlier that some people are leaning toward retention because they feel capital punishment may reduce the number of murders committed. This theory of deterrence is undoubtedly the most serious of the social arguments for the retention of the death penalty. It is argued that if persons who are tempted to commit a crime know in advance what the punishment will be, they will turn away from committing such a crime. Superficially this appears to be a sensible argument. It is the argument put forward by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) on Friday.

However, that the argument is basically in error can be seen clearly upon closer examination. A major source of the error is the assumption that murder is like speeding and that a normal person, through fear of being caught, will refrain from it out of consideration for the consequences. But the fallacy is this: murderers are not normal people, for the most part. Most of them are driven by forces of emotion, or outright insanity even, to such an extent that no reasoning takes place at all; there is no weighing of consequences as they proceed to kill. I am not necessarily making a plea that such people ought to be pitied; it is a demand that we understand the circumstances in which they are, for the most part, incapable of reacting and reasoning like normal human beings.

Thus to attempt, as did the hon. member for Crowfoot, to draw a parallel between the noose and the breathalyzer is at best foolish. Numerous psychological studies have made this fact clear. In committing murder, people for the most part are committing an insane act and are not capable of reasoning rationally. I think the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) this afternoon cited studies made of skyjackers, but there are other cases on record where unbalanced persons lacking the strength of will to kill themselves have committed murder or other violent acts as an indirect act of suicide. Here the death penalty is an encouragement to murder, not a deterrent. A small minority of murderers are professional criminals for whom death is simply one of the occupational hazards. They are also reasonably sure of avoiding capture, or if captured of avoiding conviction, or if convicted of avoiding execution.

The error of the deterrent theory can also be shown statistically. I do not intend to cite the great tables of statistics that are available, because this would take up too much time. In addition, such statistics are vulnerable to subjective interpretation and most of the statistics available have already been cited by other participants in this debate. However, I will cite the judgments of objective studies which have analysed the statistics. These studies have consistently found that there is absolutely no valid evidence to prove that the death penalty has any deterrent value whatever. This has been the finding generally throughout the western world and it has led country after country to abolish capital punishment over the course of the past 100 years. There are now probably in excess of 70 jurisdictions in the world that have abolished capital punishment.

In 1953 the British royal commission on capital punishment concluded that there is no clear evidence that homicide rates are influenced by the death penalty or by the frequency of executions. The New Jersey commission to study capital punishment found that the death penalty could not be demonstrated to be a more effective deterrent than life imprisonment. In Canada the joint committee on capital punishment reported on June 27, 1957, that capital punishment is not an effective deterrent, that it had no unique deterrent effect that could not be accomplished by imprisonment.

Ten years ago the United Nations published a report questioning the deterrent value of the death penalty in which it said that data showed no correlation between the existence of the death penalty and the incidence of murder. More recently, Dr. Fattah of the University of Montreal once again demonstrated in an objective study that a case cannot be made for the deterrent value of capital punishment.

I shall not waste time exchanging interpretations of statistics with hon. members who wish to retain the death penalty, but I will say this. If there is dispute about the meaning of the statistics—and I would admit the possibility—then the burden of proof rests on those who wish the state to commit murder. There is a powerful moral argument against killing a person even by way of judicial execution. To support their position, those in favour of the retention of capital punishment, by any standard of justice, must present evidence beyond reasonable doubt that executions have some beneficial social effect. So far in this debate I submit they have not done so.

I am convinced that the people of Canada do not lust after the blood of murderers. I am convinced that if at the moment the majority tend to favour capital punishment, it is because they want an assurance that their lives and the lives of their loved ones will not be placed in jeopardy because of inadequacies in our penal system, our parole system and the totally and completely inadequate attempts at rehabilitation in penal institutions.

I am convinced that if the people of Canada could see avenues to explore other than the death penalty in the search for security from crimes of violence, they would eagerly explore them. To the extent that we as elected politicians have not made it apparent to Canadians that other avenues do exist, we have failed the Canadian people. We should be looking, for example, at indeterminate sentences for crimes of violence. We should be looking, until we can bolster and render effective our efforts at rehabilitation and at making our parole system effective, at longer mandatory sentences for those who commit violent crimes. We should be seeking effective psychiatric services for those in our penal institutions. Finally and most importantly, we should be seeking the means to remove the social causes, the inequalities, the injustices, the uncertainties, the frustrations that foster and nourish crimes of violence.

However this debate is decided—and I fervently hope it is decided in a manner that will bring us closer to the total elimination of the death penalty—we will be failing ourselves and our electorate if we do not immediately begin work on providing real measures of security for Canadians; and I submit that the death penalty does not provide any real measure of security. We shall have failed if we do not immediately begin work on improving our penal system; to ensure that our penal system is capable of rehabilitating criminals; to ensure that until that rehabilitation is complete, possibilities for parole do not exist; to ensure that until our penal system is capable of accomplishing rehabilitation we do not admit persons to the streets who are incapable of undertaking their responsibilities as citizens.

This is the kind of action we must take. We must immediately begin the task of removing the injustices, frustrations and uncertainties that produce crimes of violence. Once this debate is finished this must be our task; otherwise this debate will have been pointless and we will have failed in our duties as legislators.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, contrary to all calculations and to my own expectations, my remarks in this debate at this hour of the night turn out to be my maiden speech. On this special occasion, therefore, I wish to join my voice with those who have extended congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on election to your high office and to those who also occupy the chair.

I am sure Mr. Speaker will understand when I suggest that to some extent I was encouraged to present myself as a candidate for a parliamentary seat by the firmness and impartiality—and even humour, where humour was needed to defuse tense situations—with which you and your illustrious predecessors, one of whom is sitting here with us, one in the other place, and still another being the present occupant of Rideau Hall, conducted the business of this House, thereby preserving for us its ancient and noble role, its dignity and tradition against so many attempted affronts.

It is a formidable task, I suggest, in this my maiden speech and as a retentionist, to follow almost immediately on the heels of the eloquence of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I accept the challenge although I have none of his legal training nor practice before the courts and in this House. I accept it more readily because, fortunately, there are a number of incidental statements made by the right hon. gentleman with which I do not have cause to take issue. I refer to his comment about the need of the fulfilment of the law carried out to the full, granting mercy where mercy is recommended but executing where execution is warranted, hard though that may be when no extenuating circumstances have been advanced. With all deference, however, I find that I must take issue with the right hon. gentleman not only on his basic stand for abolition but also in citing a supreme court ruling uttered by United States judges and suggesting that it might have a bearing in the Canadian context.

Meaning no disrespect to the right hon. gentleman or for the law of another country, I find the law of Canada, if properly administered, to be a law under which I feel I can live. I know we have inherited much of our law from Britain. We inherited it and we have transformed it and made it something Canadian of which we can be proud. Properly administered, that law is something of which we have no need to be ashamed. Nor do we have to go outside this country to buttress our respect for it. Carry an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, if you will, but let us draw all our arguments in any such submission from Canada's own experience and Canada's special character.

It has been said on a number of occasions from this side of the House that those sitting on the other side failed to get the message the electorate was seeking to get across during the campaign in September and October of 1972. Usually this deafness or obliqueness on the part of the Liberal party has been cast in economic terms; we have said it frequently and we will say it again. I think the Progressive Conservative party has tuned in to that message and is now seeking from this side of the House to get the government on the proper wavelength, but the government is being very obtuse.

The government missed the message that was cast in economic terms and, as evidenced by its approach to capital punishment, it missed it again on this issue of law and order. At least that was the message in my constituency, and I would say the government missed it throughout the land. Had the government been attuned to the public pulse it would have heard the refrain, "Bring back capital punishment. Our womenfolk can no longer go out in the evening alone to post a letter." I have heard that said in my constituency, and I am ashamed. Petty larceny, assault with violence, muggings if you will, purse-snatching and even assault causing bodily harm are on the increase in this country.

In these circumstances the people in my constituency want tighter disciplinary controls imposed on those who refuse to accept the laws of society. They are not against rehabilitation, do not get them wrong. What they are against are consultants and do-gooders being hoodwinked by a bunch of smart con men into getting early paroles or leave passes on compassionate grounds. Where does compassion lie? What compassion had these miscreants when they snatched a purse from an elderly lady who had just got her pension cheque cashed, or when they mutilated a little girl and left her abandoned beside the road to be found by heartsick parents and angry neighbours?

Compassion is a virtue whose display restores man's faith in his fellows and whose absence breeds only disgust. The people of this country are compassionate people. They know what compassion is. But let not those who know no compassion seek, by feigning contrition, to wring compassionate tears from those who have compassion deep in their hearts.

In addition to failing to get the message the electorate was seeking to put across in September and October, the government managed to get its priorities thoroughly confused. From statements issued by the government during the campaign and since, it is clear that the rights of the criminal are placed above the protection of society. How can such a government demand the support of society and the Canadian people?

Furthermore, since coming into the House the government has demonstrated with incredible clarity just what is its set of priorities. These priorities are not those of the Canadian people, of that I am convinced. The government refused to respond to the Conservative party's offer to defer the throne speech debate in order to get down to priority matters—inflation, unemployment and relief for the elderly living on fixed incomes. The government's response to inflation was a proposed inquiry into food prices.

Then it set out, not to suggest measures for curing unemployment but, rather, to legalize an illegality in procedures in respect of financing insurance payments, plus a number of schemes for toughening up the regulations affecting qualification for unemployment benefits and increasing penalties for illegitimate claims. Now we have had this eleventh hour consideration of the pilotage bill. The government certainly failed to read the message of the general election. Not only that, it is derelict.

May I call it 10 o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—PURCHASE OF LAND TO ESTABLISH LAND BANKS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on January 19 I asked the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) a question in respect of land banks and the sum of $500 million suggested by the minister to be used over a five-year period at the rate of $100 million per annum. I asked the minister whether he was going to use these funds in any one particular urban area in Canada, particularly metropolitan Toronto. I suggested to the minister that if he was going to use these funds in metropolitan Toronto, he would have to buy land from certain large corporations around metro Toronto sometimes referred to by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) as corporate bums.

The matter was brought to my attention even more forcefully in a call from a constituent, Joseph Pittari. He was very upset when he went out in Mississauga to buy a house and found that although he earned $13,500 a year he, his wife and daughter could not find a house in a new development, not even a semi-detached house, for less than $35,000. He telephoned me and wanted to know what this government was going to do about that problem.

Clearly, the problem of housing in metropolitan Toronto in particular, and in all Canada probably, centres around the cost of urban land. There is no question that the price of a lot in metropolitan Toronto is as high or higher than anywhere else in North America. It is disgraceful that less than 11 per cent of the people in this area can afford to own a new home.

The minister has set aside $100 million a year for the acquisition of land for a land bank in all of Canada. On checking the cost of vacant land in and around metropolitan Toronto and the town of Mississauga which I represent, I found that the average cost of land which could be developed in the immediate future or within four or five years for housing is $40,000 per acre. I calculate that if the entire $100 million were used to purchase land in the town of Mississauga, the minister might conceivably acquire 2,500 acres for the whole of Canada, all in one municipality. Mr. Speaker, that is less than half of the land owned by S. B. McLaughlin and Associates Ltd., less than one-third of the land owned by Erin Mills Development Ltd., and approximately two-thirds of the land owned by Markborough Properties Ltd. If the land of each company was purchased, it would still amount to a minor proportion of the land available or needed. The truth of the matter is that there is a land bank in the metropolitan Toronto area but it is owned by private development corporations.

We shall not solve the problem of making housing available by spending limited social capital on buying land. The problem will be met by using social capital to service land and to make municipal road patterns possible. It must be spent to make water and sewers freely available, on public transit, on halls, on public arenas, on community centres and schools. It is because there are problems connected with the provision of these amenities that it is impossible for the province of Ontario and municipalities in and around to permit land to be developed.

That land is there; developers right now want to develop it and are trying to develop it. The Urban Development Institute in Toronto which recently submitted a brief to the Prime Minister of Ontario set out this problem. They said that developers do not want to withhold land from the market place, that they want to develop the land in their land banks. It was suggested that the problem really is one involving ancillary costs of development. The province of Ontario and certain municipalities, particularly the municipality I represent, have already indicated to developers that development cannot be allowed to take place because there are not funds available for looking after those ancillary services.

The real difficulty is that this government is bankrupt when it talks about land banking. Land banks are not the answer. The answer will be found by using money presently available for LIP projects, for Opportunities for Youth projects, for waste here, there and everywhere and for every conceivable demand, in the right way. That money should be made available and lent to municipalities. It should be lent on debentures and secured against the land only so that needed land can be developed and the municipalities and provinces can get on with the job of making housing available.

Just going out and buying a piece of land has never been the answer to the problem of lot values. I speak with personal knowledge on this matter. A few years ago, I and some associates purchased 178 acres in the township of Vaughan, south of No. 7 highway; land you can stand on today, just as you could five or seven years ago, and see apartments and a housing development on three sides of it, with a sewer running through it. But that municipality still has not enough money to put in the access roads, the water mains, develop the water capacity, or build the schools to make it possible to service this land. Indeed, that and many other parcels of land could be made available so that lots could be sold in the area at the price they fetched ten years ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question put forward by the hon. member relates to the exact location of federally-supported land banking activities in the coming years. He mentions the Toronto area specifically. It is the government's belief that the specific location of these land bank areas is to be negotiated with the provincial and municipal governments directly concerned. So far as the government of Canada is concerned, the problems of price and the availability of serviced land in cities have to engage the attention of all three levels of government. A few months ago when Bill C-213 was introduced in the last session, again with the recent federal-provincial conference on housing and with the NHA amendments introduced today, the government has made clear its position on the question of land banking.

The idea behind land banking seems to have been missed entirely by the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) who has made the point that he feels the water, the sewer services and the other various service costs for a particular piece of land which he has given as an example should be paid for by the municipality. Mr. Speaker, I represent an area outside Montreal where over the years I have seen this kind of speculative activity which does not profit anyone but the speculator, the land profiteer. I put it to the hon. member for Peel South that it is not the municipality involved with the particular 178 acres that he mentions who should be responsible for those services; the owners of the land should be responsible for them. There is no question about that. For too long in this country we have seen examples of—

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot seek the floor when he is not speaking from his own seat.

Mr. Paproski: It is you he should be addressing, Sir.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, for a number of years we have had money available for land assembly projects. The total amounts which provinces have sought for this purpose in the past year comes to $50 million. We are offering $100 million and it is our belief that at the moment $100 million is sufficient for these land banking purposes. The objective is to create an amount of land available—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Again I regret that I have to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO COMPEL SPOUSES TO TESTIFY IN CHILD-BEATING CASES

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) if he was considering bringing in appropriate amendments to the Canada Evidence Act that would make spouses compellable and competent witnesses in cases relating to child-beating. The minister replied that the Law Reform Commission would probably be looking into this matter and that he would be considering the recommendations contained in its report.

Child-beating by parents is one of the most heinous of crimes as the victims are innocent and totally helpless. Each year in this country thousands of parental child-beaters go unpunished because the common law for many purposes has long regarded the married pair as constituting only one person, so one spouse cannot be forced to testify against the other in many instances, one of which is child-beating. Mr. Speaker, it is high time the Canada Evidence Act was amended to put an end to this archaic practice.

Most parental child-beatings take place within the confines of a house or apartment so that it is extremely difficult to find third party witnesses to such crimes. It is this problem, plus the Canada Evidence Act, which makes it virtually impossible to prosecute such cases in our courts. In 1971 there was 442 known or suspected cases in the province of Ontario alone of parental child-beatings, only 51 reached court and only 15 convictions were secured. And the rate of child-beatings has been increasing over the years. It has been estimated on good authority that in Canada in 1971 there were close to 5,000 such crimes.

The problem, of course, is that while physicians may report such incidents, law enforcement agencies in an overwhelming number of alleged incidents simply cannot lay charges because they know full well that neither the father nor the mother can be compelled to give evidence in court. Consequently, policemen are forced into the frustrating position of not laying charges when in fact they have good reason to believe that child-beating has taken place, complete with medical evidence. And if charges are laid, prosecutors are in the unfortunate position of either having to withdraw the charge "due to lack of sufficient evidence" or to attempt to proceed knowing full well they cannot examine the witness to the child-beating for corroborating evidence with which to gain a conviction.

I am fully aware of the fact that even if spouses were made compellable and competent witnesses in cases of child-beating, great fear would exist in the mind of a parent as a witness—I would think in most cases the mother—to tell the truth for fear of physical reprisal by the other spouse. But surely, Mr. Speaker, this is no excuse. In the first place, the spouse testifying would have the full protection of the law on her side and threats of physical reprisal could be dealt with effectively by the appropriate authorities. Besides, it is the infant's mental and physical well-being that we are concerned about here.

I strongly plead with the Minister of Justice to introduce amendments to the Canada Evidence Act to attempt at least to lessen the number of child-beatings in this country. I have talked to Crown prosecutors, police officers, and Children's Aid officials, all of whom have urged me to make this representation in the House of Commons and all of whom have expressed their utter frustration at the present limitations of the Canada Evidence Act. I sincerely hope the Minister of Justice will act quickly to plug a legal loophole that is responsible for allowing parental child-beaters to go unprosecuted and unpunished.

It is my understanding that the Law Reform Commission is looking into the whole area of family law, which badly needs reform. It is my hope that the Minister of Justice will in his wisdom and sense of compassion expedite recommendations of the commission as they may relate to child-beating.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I emphasize my argument with regard to certain anomalies in the Canada Evidence Act by citing the following: A spouse may testify against the other spouse in a case of rape, but not murder. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time is long overdue in bringing the Canada Evidence Act into the twentieth century.

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that the Canada Evidence Act be amended to make spouses compellable and competent witnesses in cases relating to child-beating will be studied very carefully by the Department of Justice. A recent report of the committee assigned to review the criminal code in England recommended, and I quote:

> 9.(3) In any court proceedings, the wife or husband of the accused shall (unless one or the other is accused jointly) be compelled to act as witness against the accused or the person jointly accused with the latter.
> (a) The act or acts constituting the offence will consist of assault or violent treatment on the part of the wife or husband of the accused, or any person who belonged, at the time, to the same family of the accused and was under 16 years of age.

The committee assigned to review the criminal code felt that this would protect battered children who might be unable to supply themselves the proofs of the accusation.

As indicated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in his reply the first time the question was put in the House on January 16, 1973, the question of amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the criminal code is at present under study by the law Reform Commission, but in a broader context.

One of the first reports submitted by the Law Reform Commission relates in part to the appearance of witnesses in criminal cases. The report suggests that spouses should be forced to give evidence in all cases. That, naturally, would involve a substantial change to present legislation and before preparing final recommendations on the subject, the law Reform Commission wisely called for the opinions of competent individuals and groups interested in this legislation.

In the circumstances, the minister of Justice feels that he should await replies from the public and final recommendations of the commission concerning the admissibility and the appearance of witnesses before bringing forward new legislation in this field, particularly since the law Reform Commission is making satisfactory progress in its project related to evidence.

MANPOWER—ON-THE-JOB TRAINING PROGRAM—REASONS FOR LACK OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my comments to the Department of Manpower and Immigration, specifically to on-the-job training. It appears this government has been dedicated to alleviating unemployment by a band-aid approach. For example, we have become the unhappy recipients of more types of programs than you can think of, such as LIP, OFY and Summer '73. Massive infusion of public moneys have been used to cut down the rate of unemployment. While the programs have merit in part—I do not want to be condemning in a general way—they are generally on a short-term basis. What we must concentrate on is long-term employment. On-the-job training, properly administered, could be a partial answer to that problem.

As I have stated in this House, I am very concerned about rural depopulation. I am also convinced that rural Canada has a labour force that can be utilized for the development of secondary industry in rural areas. Large numbers of our rural labour force are going to the cities to find employment that is more meaningful. Often they receive on-the-job training in the cities which they do not receive in the rural areas. Often they are employed by companies in which they see job advancement as being more likely than in rural areas. How is the on-the-job training program working in the areas to which I refer?

We are all aware that the age group between 18 and 25 is experiencing the highest rate of unemployment. Many of these people after completing high school go to the city only to be dissilusioned by the workaday world. Often they cannot find meaningful employment or any employment at all. With the minimum wage rate rising in many provinces, employers are not willing to hire these young men and women and offer them a long period of on-the-job training. Rather, they continue to prefer older employees, people with experience who have been on the labour market for some time, who do not need further training or who need only limited training.

As I see it, three problems have developed in the field of on-the-job training. The first is that communication with regional offices has been difficult in some areas in Manitoba. Employers were placed in the unfortunate position of having to press the government for specific details in relation to the program. While the department often came out with a variety of glossy printed material, employers were not able to get specific answers from the department once they had read the material.

I submit that departmental officials should be in the field to help employers get started with the program. The department has spent large sums advertising the merits of the program and trying to get employers to take part in it. It seems incongruous to me that in these circumstances employers should find difficulty in obtaining information.

Second, No. 12 of the fact sheets presented by the department requires employers to show technical and financial competence to provide full-time employment. Surely, departmental officers can decide without an exchange of bureaucratic red tape whether a firm can in fact afford to employ a person for on-the-job training. If we look at the training schedule on the basis of a 40-hour week for 40 weeks, we are looking at an outlay per employer of approximately $1,000. The government reimburses an average of 62.5 per cent during the training. I suggest there are better ways of determining the financial position of employers than by requiring them to fill out one form after another.

Lastly, employees have been asked in certain cases to provide specific work schedules for trainees. While I can see merit in this requirement up to a point, I believe these schedules should not be such as to force an employer to second guess the question whether or not an employee should be accepted under this program. Employers generally consider that employees should be exposed to various areas of the industry rather than made subject to a specific schedule.

In conclusion, I should like to submit that on-the-job training has merit. I welcome the program, as a former teacher, but I suggest the department take a look at some of the bureaucratic practices which are being followed and the administrative detail which is required at the present time. This, I feel, is minimizing some of the positive effects the program could have.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as a result of last year's experience with the on-the-job training program we introduced certain refinements in this year's program. First, a sliding scale of wage reimbursement providing an average of 62.5 per cent to the employer in lieu of a flat 75 per cent. Second, reduction of the maximum training period to 40 weeks from 52 weeks. Third, introduction of a maximum reimbursement of $100,000 per employer per region.

As well, the closing date for receipt of proposals was advanced to January 31, 1973, to ensure that maximum program impact would more closely coincide with peak winter unemployment. By introducing these refinements we had hoped to increase the number of trainees at the same level of program funding. Though the actual response from employers in terms of number of trainees and proposals received is somewhat higher than last winter, so far it has not been as high as we had anticipated.

I am sure the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) would wish to ensure that employees in training on-the-job programs are adequately protected, and it is primarily for their benefit that adequate scrutiny of employers has been introduced. There has been some experience of employers going bankrupt, and since the government pays the employer in a case of that kind the employee may be left without reimbursement. While we have introduced a requirement for employers to provide evidence of their financial capability for this purpose, we have no evidence that employers are not submitting proposals because of the questions they are asked in this investigation. However, if the hon. member has any particular case he would wish to bring to our attention, we would be very pleased to investigate it.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

APPENDIX

Statement By
Transport Minister Jean Marchand
On The Site Selection For A Second
Toronto-centered Region International Airport

The Minister of Public Works has now tabled the report of the Hearing Officer on the expropriation of the land for the new Toronto airport at Pickering and has indicated that the government intends to confirm the expropriation.

As the minister responsible for transportation, I should like to explain the reasons which led the Government to take this decision.

It is a decision with many broad facets. It involves the communications and business of the nation, the life style of Canadians, and their aspirations for travel. Equally it involves the growth and planning of the Toronto region and the opportunities for good community environment.

The federal government shares this concern about the elements of growth in the Toronto planning region, and has been moved by its expression across Canada as a whole and, more specifically, in the Toronto region. It is not a matter of the airport alone. Commuter rail services, rapid transit expressways and other transportation considerations are all related. Projections indicate that by the end of the century, just 27 years away, the Toronto region will have a population in excess of six million people. Some projections are well in excess of this, if one considers the entire Toronto-centered region within a radius of some ninety miles. The quality, direction and pace of this growth is a matter of deep interest and involvement for the federal government. The government is satisfied that the new airport is required, and for this purpose the expropriation of the Pickering site has been confirmed. In making this decision we are aware of the broad implications of such a development, particularly coordinated as it is with Ontario's plan for the Toronto-centered region. Accordingly as the government stated on previous occasions we will establish an independent group who will look at these questions and in doing so receive representations on all the issues related to the planning and transportation needs of the region.

Representations have been made in the recent Hearings on many aspects, but primarily on three main issues; the need for a second airport; the selection of the site; and the degree of public participation in the selection.

With regard to the need, no one can question that Toronto is at the hub of the domestic air transportation system. Equally, its importance as a gateway internationally and to the United States is growing rapidly and can be expected to increase at an even greater pace. People are exchanging visits from this area with families and relatives across Canada and abroad to Britain, Italy, Germany and Scandinavia, to name just a few. Transportation by air is no longer for the wealthy few, and in the years to come, its role can be expected to increase even more. The new bilateral agreements now before the government provide improved access abroad for Toronto and Ontario residents to many parts of the world. Travel to improve Canada's trading position and very great increases in the use of air cargo will be a vital part of our international economic activity.

Thus, more facilities will be needed—not just a little more but many times more than we have now. All technical studies affirm this. No one has challenged this although there have been differences as to what the forecast might be over the next twenty-five years. Most forecasts point to a seven to eight time increase. Some suggest a four-fold increase; and others a ten to twelve-fold increase. To deny this key area of Canada anything but its full potential for development would be dishonest and a true derogation of federal responsibility.

In 1968, in anticipation of the need, the idea was put forward to enlarge the present airport at Malton. The plan called for acquiring some 2,500 acres of land, land planned, and, in some parts, already serviced by adjacent municipalities for other purposes. Concentrating virtually all traffic at Malton would have resulted in a vast increase in the area and number of people that would be affected by noise. Some 65,000 more people in existing homes would be disturbed by the resultant increase in flight activity.

The government listened to the reaction of the people and of the municipalities and subsequently rejected this concept. Malton would continue to be expanded for the traffic of the 1970's, but not enlarged. This has continued to be our policy since the Minister of Transport, in December 1968, announced the two airport system.

Ontario later established controls on land around the airport based on our forecasts of the traffic in the 1970's to keep the situation from becoming worse. Since then communities outside the controls have grown rapidly; this is the fastest growing area of the fastest growing region of Canada. In contrast the residential areas on the land that is controlled have grown very slowly.

Some say that if we were more clever we could squeeze through all the traffic without enlarging the airport. Unfortunately this is simply not true.

With all the traffic at Malton, a fourth runway will be required by the late 70's and a fifth will be required for the traffic to the year 2000. The idea of building the fourth runway—very close (1,000 feet) to the existing north-south runway was studied. Our critics feel that this is what we should do but such a proposition will only give us about a 20 per cent increase in capacity, simply not enough. The fourth runway should be separated by some 5,000 feet and certainly no less than 3,500 feet. More terminals will be required and will represent the major portion (85 per cent) of all the expenditures to the year 2000 whatever the proportion of traffic at Malton and at the new Toronto airport.

There is simply not enough land for all these developments within the existing boundary; furthermore, the federal government and the province is concerned about the commitments made by the province of Ontario to those people in adjacent communities who were assured that the traffic would not increase and the noise would not become intolerable from the traffic of the 1970's.

The technical studies clearly show that the problem of noise is simply the volume and frequency of traffic over existing built up areas. Even if no new runway were needed (and clearly it is) and all the traffic could be accommodated on the existing three runways, approximately the same number of people will be affected. And we looked for every possible advantage in quieter aircraft, quieter engines.

We studied STOL in great detail as well as high speed ground transport. The development of STOL as Canadian transportation and industrial initiative is a matter to which the Government attaches high importance in both industrial and transportation terms. Clearly if it could solve the need of Toronto it would be most fortunate. But this solution does not meet the test. The fastest growing air marked is the long-haul; domestic, continental and international for which air is the natural way to travel. STOL will be important but will not reduce the need for facilities and the noise adequately to alter the basic need for the new airport. Similarly with high speed ground transport which in fact is a competitive mode with STOL: Neither are relevant or economic beyond 300 to 500 miles.

Next I shall deal with the selection of the site. Experts have made very extensive studies on our behalf assessing various alternatives. These studies have been released to the public and subjected to critical evaluation. As one would expect, there is much conflicting information and opposing points of view, but there are some common themes that provide the basis for a decision.

The Toronto region is continuing to expand. Ontario has elaborated a regional plan for orderly development in the area referred to as the Toronto-centered region. This plan recognizes that the growth should be distributed to reduce the pressures of urbanization in some areas and improve the economic and social opportunities in other areas; as this question is largely within provincial jurisdiction, the federal government does not feel that it should interfere with provincial planning priorities.

It was therefore apparent to the government that close collaboration with the provincial government was desirable. In this regard we have learned some lessons from the experiences of establishing a second airport in the Montreal regin. When this decision was taken in 1969, it was apparent that traffic at Dorval would expand by the late 1970's to a point where the existing airport facilities could not accommodate it, and there was no way in physical or environmental terms to expand Dorval. A second airport was required—a decision which I believe was fully supported by Quebec. However, the provincial government had other objectives in the selection of the site not consistent with civil aviation requirements or other national interests. We proceeded, but the federal government was obliged, because of the lack of provincial support at the time, to acquire 88,000 acres of land to guarantee environmental protection. The land for the airport site itself was about 17,000 acres, roughly the equivalent of what we are expropriating at Pickering.

In my view, it has been a substantial move forward in federal-provincial relations in that we have been able to achieve a consensus of view with the province of Ontario in selecting the site consistent with their planning and where they undertook to carry out zoning to protect potential noise land.

Since 1970, working with the province jointly we boiled down the possibilities for a new site and reached some basic conclusions.

We showed that Southern Ontario really consists of two broad regions of air travellers: The Toronto area; southwestern Ontario. Given the very great size of these regions, it became clear that two systems of airports for each region specifically developed for the needs of that region were most convenient.

In fact the documents demonstrate that even if we could accommodate all of the traffic at Malton, which we cannot, new airports would be required for maximum convenience. The multiple system of airports that we have proposed is more convenient and will cost the users less than any one single airport, even Malton.

With Malton to the west of Metro Toronto the closest possible site for the majority of travellers who live or are destined to Toronto is the Pickering site to the east. In turn the passengers from the southwest would increasingly use the improved facilities there especially for short haul or charter operations. Improved connections to regional domestic points and to key international airports from a number of centres like Hamilton, Windsor and London where relatively modest expansion is envisaged, would benefit these communities and adjacent areas; equally important, it would hopefully reduce automobile traffic congestion and fatalities.

This conclusion has been challenged. Critics say that the majority of passengers live to the west and if a new airport is needed it should be west of Toronto. Actually the majority of passengers live in Toronto and the idea is to locate as close as possible to them for convenience while avoiding as far as possible disruption as at Malton. There are fewer, but still a considerable number of passengers to the southwest, and they will find it convenient to use the airports there.

It emerged from all the studies that Pickering fully met aviation criteria, was convenient, and could be developed to satisfy future demand.

The Ontario government also reached the basic conclusion that the airport at Pickering best suited their regional planning. In the airport they saw further opportunities to achieve the goal of stimulating more growth to the east.

The planning of Ontario together with the establishment of a new airport held out the prospect of new jobs for 100,000 Canadians over the next decade. Clearly, this factor is a matter of interest to both levels of government.

As one who has long worked with people, I deeply regret the disturbance of some homeowners. This is true at any site. The natural features of the site will also be disturbed. These concerns must be weighed against the concerns of greater disruption elsewhere.

We set ourselves the task of finding ways to minimize the disruption, and we set ourselves the obligation of having the general public test these conclusions before we made a final decision.

All those on the expropriated land will be paid not only the market value but also related payments for relocation and disturbance as provided for by the Expropriation Act and other related expenditures as the Act is based on the principle of "a home for a home".

We will strive for the preservation of both historic buildings and the area's natural landscape; in this regard we will cooperate with the conservation authorities of Ontario, and also allow adequate opportunities to historic, horticulture and wildlife groups, to make recommendations as to steps that should be taken in respect to these questions.

A great deal of concern has been expressed in respect to the destruction of agricultural lands and we are convinced that with proper planning a great deal of expropriated land can be made available for agricultural use within the airport zone. We wish to assure residents that such lands will be leased back at rates which will assure that farming can be conducted on an economically viable basis.

Given the steps both levels of government have taken or envisaged, it can be fairly argued that the dangers in the general area around Pickering of unstructured urban sprawl and ravage to the environment that would have occurred had private speculation been allowed to continue, has been diminished rather than increased.

The question so often raised in connection with green belts and urban growth east of Toronto are, in our view, extremely important from an environmental and quality of life viewpoint. The federal government is convinced that an airport in the region will not, in itself, prohibit the achievement of an adequate buffer zone for green belt and recreational lands between Toronto and communities to the east. This is a matter which the federal government would be prepared to discuss further with the provincial government.

The final question concerns public participation.

Since the original announcement about expansion at Malton, we have listened to the people.

With respect to Pickering, hearings under the Expropriation Act have been held. This was the first time the act was employed for such a major project. The Hearing Officer conducted the hearings with objectivity and fairness. Everyone had the opportunity to object and was given the time to he heard.

Many objections were heard and they have been very effectively summarized in the report that my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, has tabled. The report records only the objections. But it is an important document and it weighs heavily in the balance of reaching a final decision.

In this balance we must also weigh the objections of others to the other alternatives and the objections of the majority of people today and in the future who will condemn us for procrastination and the abdication of our responsibilities until it is too late and impossible to plan sensibly.

Let me review the numbers of people involved and the issues raised. 2,163 people objected. These include 136 households and the land being expropriated. Some 130 owners also being expropriated formally wrote asking that the expropriation go ahead. The majority of the total 815 property owners did not object.

The approximately 2,000 people who objected and who live near the site and elsewhere were very articulate in their presentations. From the time of the announcement they have challenged the conclusions of the two governments.

Over and above the hearings, groups have met with government ministers, and numerous officials have themselves been made available to answer their questions. In addition, technical reports have been released for their consideration.

Their fundamental point is that we are overestimating the amount of the traffic, underestimating the amount of facilities that we could squeeze into Malton airport and not taking enough account of new technologies that could quieten the aircraft and reduce noise.

They are right that aspects of future technology are uncertain. We have evaluated these possibilities ourselves and are continuing to do so. But these important possibilities do not negate the need for the land for the new airport. The report that I am tabling today summarizes reasons drawn basically from the previous documents that demonstrate this conclusion.

Fundamentally it is a choice of either enlarging Malton or developing a new airport. Clearly failure to meet the growing demand is not an acceptable option for the people of the region, for Ontario and for the nation. And in the balance of the numbers of people disrupted, the economic and planning advantages gained and the capacity for air transportation achieved, Pickering is preferable.

After years of technical studies and after all the arguments have been heard, it remains to elected governments to make the decision. I personally could claim the need for additional time to review the whole matter further, and a few would applaud. But I have reviewed the matter, and this government has decided to go ahead sincerely believing it to be the right decision, and supported in this belief by Ontario.

While we intend to acquire the land, no one will be disturbed nor will construction begin until there has been an opportunity for an independent group working with the federal, provincial and municipal governments to determine the type and timing of facilities required and the one which in their view could be most consistent with the transportation and other planning activity of all three levels of government.

The decisions resulting from such an open public discussion will affect the life style of the residents of the region for generations to come. For this reason, it is felt that concerned community groups, as well as governments, should have full opportunity for participation.

This process will be the first of its kind and could be a model for the future.

The land will remain secure while this participation of the public and various groups occurs. The people will be able to make whatever inputs they feel is appropriate, not only on the question of the airport but also on the kind of urban region and how this affects air service and airports. The independent group and the government will be open-minded and will consider all information including any vitally new facts on technology or changes in the attitudes of the people that might point to a different conclusion than our present conviction. Should such information come to light and should we be moved to reconsider our present conclusion that the people of Toronto and Canada need this facility, the land will still be there and the option will still be open.

But in planning for the future we have concluded on the best information available that the Pickering airport is needed.

I hope this public examination will proceed expeditiously so that we avoid within ten years any kind of transportation crisis for Toronto which would force the travelling public there to use less convenient methods of travel or rely on other gateways for access abroad. As the transportation and planning needs of the area are urgent, it would not be in the general interest to unduly prolong such a hearing. It is the government's intention to meet with the leaders of the other levels of government immediately to commence the study at the earliest possible date and report within twelve months.

TABLING OF REPORT OF JOINT STUDY GROUP ON BASIC RATE OF PENSIONS

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in the two official languages the report of the joint study group on the basic rate of pensions.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we move from motions, may I ask whether the Minister of Veterans Affairs is going to refer the report he just tabled to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): In a matter, possibly, of a day or two.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table the report of A. W. Fisher, Q.C., the hearing officer under the Expropriation Act, with reference to five properties on Lancaster Crescent, Burkeville subdivision, on Sea Island, municipality of Richmond, province of British Columbia.

TRANSPORT

CHARTERING OF SHIP FOR SERVICE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43, involving the chartering of vessels by the Department of Transport, specifically on the matter of the chartering of the Princess of Tasmania for use as a ferry between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. Since the five-year charter will cost over $3 million for this British registered vessel, which could have been purchased by the government for less than $2 million, and this amount is now supplemented by substantial extra conversion expenses occasioned by stricter enforcement of British shipping regulations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport for detailed investigation.

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity has arisen from the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada today with respect to the claim of the Nishga nation of Indian peoples and the necessity that the parliament of Canada express some view about the matter. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

This house is of the opinion that the decision rendered today by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the land claim's case of the Nishga nation of Indians has implications beyond these particular claims and therefore expresses the view that there should be set aside a period of time within this session, in the reasonably near future, during which a debate may be entered upon relating to the hereditary and aboriginal rights of the Indian people.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity with respect to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. Therefore it cannot be put at this time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I solicit unanimous consent of the House, under Standing Order 43, to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the delay in taking remedial action and of the inability of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) to accelerate payments of unemployment insurance benefits, I therefore move seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the whole matter of payment of unemployment insurance benefits be immediately reviewed by the appropriate House committee and that an interim report be presented to the House by Feburary 15, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Lotbinière. It requires unanimous consent, since is proposed under provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have noted, as I have, that there is no unanimity. The motion cannot therefor be put to the House now.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CLOSING OF COSMOS IMPERIAL MILLS PLANTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning the sudden closing yesterday of the Cosmos Imperial Mills Ltd. plant at Marysville, New Brunswick, with lay-offs of some 300 workers, following similar plant closures by the same company in 1971 and 1972 in Ajax, Hamilton, and Trenton, Ontario, with job losses totalling 210, after the company had in May, 1972 accepted grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion totalling $403,000 for its plants at Marysville, New Brunswick, and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin):

That the dealings of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with Cosmos Imperial Mills Ltd. under the Regional Development Incentives Act be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development in order to establish whether or not the company acted in good faith when it applied for and accepted offers of grants of $403,000 from the public treasury for the ostensible purpose of creating jobs in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—EXPROPRIATION HEARINGS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the hearings under the Expropriation Act in Richmond, B.C., dealing with the proposed expansion of the Vancouver International Airport, are causing much controversy and grave concern in that area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the appropriate minister or ministers consult with the hearing officer and order these hearings to be adjourned immediately on the grounds that the spirit if not the intent of the Expropriation Act is being violated because the government has denied the residents affected full information as required under Part I, Section 4, of the said act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members might expect the Chair to take exception again to the form of some of these motions. I have long thought that members were perhaps taking advantage of this Standing Order. I doubt whether a motion proposed in the terms of the hon. member's motion is entirely regular in that it is more than a motion; it includes argument and as such would not normally be accepted in other circumstances. As always, the Chair finds it more practical simply to inquire whether there is unanimous consent to put the motion. I assumed the hon. member had reached the end of the motion.

Mr. Rose: No, I had not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am somewhat startled but I will allow the hon. member to complete the motion.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence I might say that since I am the fourth member to move such a motion I can understand your lack of patience with this technique.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: If I may conclude in a sentence, I make this motion with the utmost seriousness to allow time for the necessary environmental impact studies to be completed and for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) to visit Vancouver and discuss the department's long-range plans for the airport with the concerned citizens.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should complete my remarks now that the hon. member has completed his motion. I assure the hon. member that there was no lack of patience. I recognize that the hon. member has the right to propose this motion. My thought was that hon. members in drafting these motions, and I am referring particularly to the motions themselves, should take care to ensure that they respect the general rules for drafting motions and should not include argument. That was the suggestion I was making to the hon. member and others who exercise their rights under Standing Order 43. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, so the Chair will inquire whether there is such consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have noted that there is not unanimity. The motion, therefore, cannot be put under the terms of Standing Order 43.

B.C. INDIAN LAND QUESTION BILL

PROVISION FOR RECOGNITION THAT ABORIGINAL AND HEREDITARY OWNERSHIP NOT EXTINGUISHED

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-134, respecting Indian lands in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I have introduced this bill on a number of occasions in the past. I think it is probably even more necessary to deal with it now than was the case in the past. The purpose of the bill is to permit parliament to express an opinion and to give favourable recognition to the historical fact that the aboriginal and hereditary ownership of the land in what is now British Columbia, held by the native Indian people, has not been extinguished. It also seeks to give permission to the Governor in Council to enter into discussions with the native Indian people with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory settlement of these claims.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BICYCLE TRAFFIC DEATH TOLL, 1970

Question No. 2—Mr. Mather:

What was the annual bicycle traffic death toll in 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: The table below shows the pedal cycle fatalities in Canada for 1970 and 1971. Figures for 1972 are not yet available.

Pedal Cycle Fatalities in Canada
1970	124 fatalities
1972	not yet available

REMOVAL OF LETTERS O.H.M.S. FROM GOVERNMENT MAIL ENVELOPES

*Question No. 56—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Since January 1, 1972, have any departments of government removed from mail envelopes, the letters O.H.M.S. and, if so (a) what departments (b) for what reason was such action taken and under what authority?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes. (a) The following departments have begun to use envelopes without OHMS or related words printed on them (Environment, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Information Canada, Justice, Labour, Manpower and Immigration, National Defence, Prime Minister and Privy Council offices, Regional Economic Expansion, Science and Technology and Public Works). (b) Until 1970 the designs of envelopes used by federal government departments were quite various. In that year, designs began to be adjusted in accordance with the adoption of an identifying federal logo as announced in this House on October 23, 1970.

Pursuant to amendments to the Post Office Act 1971, which eliminated postage-free mail for the departments, effective April 1, 1972, the standards for envelopes and mailing were further amended by the Canadian Government Specifications Board, with deletion of the letters OHMS which were associated with the freedom from postage. Envelope designs have been revised by departments accordingly, as exhaustion of supplies has required new orders.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a real alibi.

Mr. MacEachen: It is good to have a real one.

THIRD NATIONAL PARK ON EASTERN SHORE OF NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 145—Mr. Forrestall:

Has the Province of Nova Scotia indicated to federal authorities whether or not it intends to proceed with the Third National Park on the Eastern Shore of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The signing of the Memorandum of Intention by the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia on August 25, 1972 indicates the intention of both governments to proceed with the establishment of the Third National Park in Nova Scotia and the Federal-Provincial Advisory Committee is presently assessing briefs submitted to them as a result of public meetings held in the area in early November.

EAST COAST WHALING INDUSTRY

Question No. 178—Mr. Crouse:

1. What scientific studies were carried out by the Department of the Environment prior to the implementation of a total ban on the East Coast whaling industry?

2. (a) What are the names of the scientists who carried out the studies (b) how much time was spent at sea conducting the studies (c) what was the name of the ship used by the scientists (d) in what areas of the ocean were whale sightings made?

3. Did representatives from the Department of the Environment or the Department of External Affairs meet with representatives from Russia, Norway, Australia, South Africa and Japan prior to announcing the East Coast whaling ban?

4. Has Russia, Norway, Australia, South Africa and Japan signed any agreement at the international level to stop catching whales and, if not, what annual quotas have been set for these countries by the International Whaling Commission?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. A seven year research program was carried out by the Fisheries Research Board of Canada involving population structure, morphology, parasitology, prey species reproductive capacity, physiology, pathology, and other disciplines.

2. (a) K. R. Allen and E. D. Mitchell. (b) 11½ months during the period 1966 to 1972. (c) Several ships were used, including William S, Polarstar, Westwhale 8, Fumi, Carino and Erline. (d) On the Continental shelf and Atlantic coast of North America from Florida, to Baffin Island, in the waters surrounding Greenland and Iceland, and in the northern area of the North Atlantic including part of the mid-Atlantic ridge.

3. No.

4. No. The International Whaling Commission does not have the authority to establish national quotas but it can set overall quotas. At its 1972 meeting, the Commission established overall quotas by areas for operations and species indicated as follows: Southern Hemisphere—coastal and factory ship operations combined, sperm whales 8,000 males and 5,000 females. Antarctic (south of 40° south latitude), for factory ships, 1,950 fin whales; 5,000 sei and Bryde's whales; and 5,000 minke whales. North Pacific Ocean, for factory ships, 650 fin whales; 3,000 sei and Bryde's whales and 6,000 male and 3,000 female sperm whales.

ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES—MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE

Question No. 179—Mr. Harding:

Do the terms of reference of any of the environmental studies commissioned by the government of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline include the possibility of rejecting the pipeline as environmentally unsound and, if so, which studies include this possibility as one of the conclusions and what are the terms of reference in each case?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The terms of reference neither seek nor preclude any particular decision. They make no reference to acceptance or rejection as the studies are intended to provide information on which applicants' or intervenors' environmental impact statements can be assessed. They are intended to supply government with data upon which questions can be based and subsequent answers can be assessed. The objectives of the environmental studies are: (a) to provide the base data required to develop an understanding of the northern environmental and ecological balance, with particular emphasis on probable pipeline routes along the MacKenzie Valley; (b) to provide the technical and scientific information necessary to enable government to assess proposals and statements about the impact on the environment of building and operating pipelines in the North.

NUMBER OF FULL-TIME EMPLOYEES IN FORMER DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Question No. 200—Mr. Knight:

1. How many full-time employees were there in the former Department of Trade and Commerce immediately before its amalgamation with the Department of Industry?

2. How many of these were earning more than $15,000 annually, distributed according to $1,000 intervals?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce): 1. The number of full-time employees in the former Department of Trade and Commerce prior to amalgamation with the Department of Industry was 1961.

2. Records are not available so as to readily provide information concerning salary ranges. However, the total earning more than $15,000 annually was 170.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY PERSONNEL BEFORE AMALGAMATION WITH DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Question No. 213—Mr. Knight:

1. How many full-time employees were there in the former Department of Industry immediately before its amalgamation with the Department of Trade and Commerce?

2. How many of these were earning more than $15,000 annually, distributed according to $1,000 intervals?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The number of full-time employees in the former Department of Industry prior to amalgamation with the Department of Trade and Commerce was 768.

2. Records are not available so as to readily provide information concerning salary ranges. However, the total number earning more than $15,000 annually was 157.

R. PATRICK LIPPERT

Question No. 219—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has any attempt been made by the Department of External Affairs to negotiate a parole for Canadian citizen R. Patrick Lippert of Kitchener, Ontario, who has been imprisoned in Cuba for ten years?

2. When was the last time that an official of the Canadian Embassy in Havana was permitted by Cuban authorities to see Mr. Lippert?

3. Has the government knowledge of Mr. Lippert's present state of health?

4. Is the present location of Mr. Lippert's imprisonment in Cuba known?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. There have been no negotiations. Mr. Lippert has not been eligible for parole but representations have been made and continue to be made on his behalf.

2. January 25, 1973.

3. Yes. Mr. Lippert is in good health.

4. Yes. Mr. Lippert is at the Guanajay Prison Farm.

LIP PROGRAM—COST BENEFIT ANALYSIS

Question No. 264—Mr. Haliburton:

Has any cost-benefit analysis of the LIP program been made and (a) if so, what were its conclusions (b) if not, does the government intend to conduct a cost-benefit analysis of this program?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No. (a) Not applicable. (b) Yes.

REMOVAL BY NATIONAL FILM BOARD OF VOLUMES ASSOCIATED WITH THE MONARCHY

*Question No. 528—Mr. Coates:

1. Has the National Film Board of Canada removed the following volumes from its libraries The Sceptre and the Mace, The Queen Opens Parliament, The Queen in Canada and, if so, for what reason?

2. Have any other volumes associated with the Monarchy and with Parliament been removed from the libraries of the National Film Board of Canada?

Motions for Papers

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have obtained from the National Film Board the following information. 1. Yes, because those films were out- of-date and seldom used. Moreover, it is customary for the National Film Board to withdraw some films from its film libraries located throughout the country for the above-mentioned reasons.

2. Yes and all those films are kept in the archives of the National Film Board of Canada.

PORTNEUF CONSTITUENCY—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL CONSTABLES ON OCTOBER 30, 1972

Question No. 600—Mr. Godin:

On election day, October 30, 1972 (a) how many special constables were appointed in the constituency of Portneuf (b) how many of them were members of (i) RCMP (ii) Quebec Provincial Police (iii) municipal police (iv) casual officers (c) were the casual officers sworn in and in which polling division were they on duty?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer as follows: (a) 43. (b) i. Nil; ii. Nil; iii. Nil; iv. 43. (c) As envelope 169 containing the results of the polls cannot be opened, it is impossible for this Office to inform you if the constables have been sworn in. Polling division numbers: 12, 15, 16, 20, 21, 49, 50, 58, 59, 60, 82, 84, 109, 111B, 112, 115, 119, 120A, 128B, 130B, 137A, 138A, 140B, 142, 144, 148, 152, 158, 164, 178, 183, 184, 197, 199, 203, 204, 205B, 217, 218, 227, 229, 231, 233A, 242, 245, 256, 257, 266HV, 271AH, 271LV, 272, 273, 284, 288, 316, 318.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 74 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that the motion be deemed to be adopted?

RELOCATION OF TRACK IN WETASKIWIN, ALBERTA

Motion No. 74—Mr. Schellenberger:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents or correspondence between the government, the CPR, the CNR, and any municipality or individual in relation to the possible relocation of track situated in Wetaskiwin, Alberta.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Coates.]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the other notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There appear on the notice paper notices of motions in my name, Nos. 36 to 40 inclusive, all of which were set down on January 8 and all of which were allowed to linger on the notice paper during the last session of the previous parliament. Surely in that period of time some decision must have been reached with respect to them. There is an even greater element of urgency now than there was before. I would ask the parliamentary secretary or the minister concerned in this matter whether some response could not be made next week.

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): On a similar point of order, Mr. Speaker, I also have a notice of motion for the production of papers, dated January 8, on the order paper, dealing with the production of the minutes of the British Columbia-Canada Liaison Committee on the Columbia River. That committee completed its work in 1960. Surely the government can make a decision to present these papers to the House?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have just made a note to look into that.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

DISTRIBUTION TO OFFICES OF REVISED TD-1 FORMS PERMITTING $1,000 DEDUCTION BY PERSONS AGE 65 OR OVER—STEPS TO PUBLICIZE AVAILABILITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of the press release he issued today saying that revised TD-1 forms permitting a $1,000 deduction by Canadian taxpayers aged 65 and over, as opposed to the $650 previously allowed, were distributed to district taxation offices last August with instructions that they were to be supplied on request. The release says in part:

The purpose was to enable those who wished to have the $1,000 exemption applied to current deductions to do so by completing the revised TD-1 form.

I would like to ask the minister what measures he or his department took to advise those Canadians affected, that is, those aged 65 and over, that these revised forms were available permitting the larger deduction of $1,000 rather than $650, so that this purpose could be carried out?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what steps were taken at the time, but the hon. gentleman will be familiar with the rather substantial publicity given to the announcement of the Minister of Finance concerning these new exemptions that he was proposing, and many people did inquire who felt they would like to use the new exemptions in their deductions and did obtain the forms. It is always possible, of course, that others will not wish to take a chance on that proposal being passed by parliament and having to end up paying a balance when they file their returns. We gave those people a choice, but I think there was ample publicity given to the proposal in the budget.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister's answer is that no publicity was given to the availability of those forms. The release also says that "those who prefer to continue the deduction of $650 pending enactment of the legislation need not complete the form". Will the minister tell the House what action his department took to advise the taxpayers concerned that they had this option of having more tax withheld if they did not fill out this form that was secreted in the offices of the department?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, taxpayers need only file new TD-1 forms when they wish to claim different exemptions from those they have previously claimed. So there would be no need to file a new TD-1 form unless they wished to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, this must be one of the most extraordinary instances on record of tax maladministration. So that we can get to the bottom of this matter, I should like to ask the minister whether he will table the letter of advice and instructions which went out to the district taxation offices with these revised TD-1 forms last August?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether that is customary but I shall be glad to look into that possibility.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when he intends to bring in the budget and the budget bills following it so that the House can act by act of parliament in matters of taxation rather than their being dealt with by press release?

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE LEGISLATION TO CONFIRM ADDITIONAL $1,000 EXEMPTION FOR PERSONS AGE 65 OR OVER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the assurance he gave on Monday that he would give consideration to the proposal I made that he bring in immediately a bill which by itself would confirm the $1,000 additional exemption for those aged 65 and over, can the minister tell the House whether a decision has yet been made?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that assurance that I would consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion will be discussed with the House leader, but I cannot go beyond that assurance and would not encourage him to be too optimistic about it.

Mr. Stanfield: I would not either.

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister any other forms available on request that will permit taxpayers to have less tax deducted at source?

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR FILING OF 1972 RETURNS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact the new tax act is being implemented and accountants as a whole are still not familiar with the act, and in view of the fact that as of January 15, 1973, the department had not mailed out personal income tax forms and would not distribute blank forms to accounting firms in Alberta, would the government extend the deadline for filing 1972 returns to either May 31 or June 30, 1973?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has been misinformed. The personalized tax return forms went out some time ago. If he has not received his, I shall try to arrange that he get it promptly.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF FERTILIZER—ACTION BY MINISTER—INVESTIGATION BY COMBINES OFFICIALS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the Minister of Agriculture a similar question to that asked of him on January 15 by the hon. member for Assiniboia in regard to the increase in the price of fertilizer in Canada and also the discontinuance of discounts. Can the minister inform the House as to what action he has taken and whether he has initiated inquiries in regard to these increases?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the investigation so far has shown that there is some price increase but not as much as many people would like to make out. The main concern at the present time seems to be a shortage of ingredients that the manufacturers need. The main ingredient comes from Saskatchewan and if more could be produced there maybe we would not be in trouble.

Mr. Gleave: I do not know who was trying to make out how great the price increase was. What I am asking the minister is this: In view of these reports and, indeed, the possibility of shortages, is he prepared to ask the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to initiate an inquiry and check into possible collusion on the part of the fertilizer companies, both as to price and supply, in order that we will be assured of satisfactory amounts of fertilizer in the coming crop year?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have done some of the very things the hon. member has suggested we ought to do. We have not finalized our investigation into fertilizer prices, but if we find any evidence of what he is suggesting, and there may be some although I am not in a position to say so to the House at this time, we will certainly ask for an investigation as suggested by my colleague.

INCREASE IN FARM MACHINERY PRICES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. As farm machinery prices and the cost of farm machinery repairs have been going up in the past year or so, can the minister tell the House what action his department is taking to implement the recommendations of the commission—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that that is not a supplementary but a related question. The hon. member will be given an opportunity to ask his question in a moment. For the time being the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Richmond.

FEED GRAINS—MEASURES TO STOP PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

My question is complementary to the one which I asked him Monday last concerning the excessive price increases of feed grains and proteins in eastern Canada. Can the minister tell us, after having met with the representatives of the Canadian Feed Manufacturers Association and the persons directly concerned with the matter in eastern Canada, what he intends to do to improve conditions concerning the price of feed grains?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the main cost is the high cost of proteins. There is a world shortage. I think the latest figures given to me show an increase of 140 per cent to farmers for these protein supplements. We will be making a decision next week as to how we will aid farmers caught in this cost-price squeeze.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Could the minister say whether he has actually met the representatives of this association and, if so, what practical solution he is considering for eastern Canada producers?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I have met with many of the producers from different parts of the agricultural industry who use feed grains and protein supplements. I have promised that action will be taken soon. We went through all the ramifications of taking action and I think they were satisfied with what I told them.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Can the minister then say whether, in view of his affirmative answer, he intends to inform this House in the very near future that a solution has been found for eastern producers, or whether this is only going to be done at the administrative level?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I promised the producer groups, the people concerned in this case, that before I make a submission to anyone I will consult with them first.

FERTILIZER—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALE OF CANADIAN PRODUCT AT LOWER PRICE IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I revert to the question first asked about fertilizers, a most important subject. Has the Minister of Agriculture received any submissions from people in western Canada about fertilizer made in western Canada being shipped to the United States at up to $20 a ton cheaper than it can be bought in Canada? Have any groups inquired about this and is his department ready to look into what appears to be a very important matter?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I recognize that this is an important matter because of the price and because of the availability of the basic ingredients in Canada. As far as I know I have not received a submission from any group, but I will need to check in my office first. I have received many informal representations about costs from individual farmers and from farmers at farm meetings I have attended.

An hon. Member: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the House might allow the Chair to recognize a few other hon. members who wish to ask questions and then return to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, the hon. member for Assiniboia and other hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries on this subject.

POLLUTION

GREAT LAKES—CANADIAN PROPOSALS AT TALKS WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS RESPECTING CLEAN-UP—MEETING OF TARGETS

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and is with regard to the Great Lakes pollution talks at present under way. Would the minister inform the House what was proposed by Canadian officials at the talks yesterday with the United States representatives on the progress of programs to clean up the Great Lakes?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, our main concern was United States performance in building clean-up facilities on the Great Lakes.

Mr. O'Connor: In light of the United States administration's attempts to cut in half funds appropriated by the U.S. Congress to construct necessary water treatment facilities in the next two years, did the Canadian representatives press for assurance that the United States government will live up to the targets it agreed to in 1972 for the Great Lakes clean-up? If so, has the government received detailed commitments that these targets will be met?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we pressed for that assurance and have been told on several occasions by the Director of the Environmental Protection Agency of the United States that the United States will be honouring its commitments with respect to the Great Lakes.

Mr. O'Connor: Can the minister tell the House whether anything was resolved or agreed upon as a result of yesterday's talks? Will he make a full statement to the House, perhaps on motions, as to what progress was made on completion of the talks?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen a detailed report on yesterday's talks. I will be glad to consider a statement on motions if there is anything unique that warrants reporting to the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON VIOLATIONS, POSITION OF CANADIAN SUPERVISORY PERSONNEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs bring the House and country up to date in connection with the Canadian supervisory force in Viet Nam. What incidents have taken place in the last 24 hours? Are Canadians in any way adjacent to those areas where there have been outbreaks? Also, what representations has the Canadian government made to the government of North Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the information we have does not differ fundamentally from what has appeared in the newspapers. The supervisory commission, consisting of Canadian, Hungarian, Polish and Indonesian groups, is in Saigon at the present time. They have to wait for a meeting of the military commissions before they can begin their work. For this reason, as far as I know, they are not in any danger.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is the minister coming to the point of concluding that the agreement made will, indeed, be the Munich of 1973?

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—ADDITIONAL CONTINGENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS FOR SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will another contingent of Canadian soldiers be leaving for Viet Nam and will they be leaving before the situation is cleared up?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the protocol calls for the completion of our forces between 15 and 30 days from cease-fire. That means that our second aircraft will be leaving in about two weeks from now.

Mr. Baldwin: Will you bring back the Bonaventure?

MANPOWER

POSSIBLE AMALGAMATION OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH AND LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Has he had discussions with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration relating to a recommendation that the Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs be placed together under one single program?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. speaker, in a very preliminary way. I am more concerned at this point about this summer's youth project, but that is a longer term objective.

Mr. Grafftey: Will such discussions affect the opportunities for youth program already announced in the House for next summer?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member means for this summer, the answer is, no.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN NISHGA LAND CASE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises from the decision rendered this morning by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Nishga Nation of Indians land case. Will the Prime Minister make a statement on motions at any early date outlining the government's position with respect to the question of land claims and the aboriginal rights of the Indian people?

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly discuss it with the minister, who will, unfortunately, be absent for another few weeks.

An hon. Member: What about the acting minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, there is an acting minister and, as I said the other day, there is the excellent parliamentary secretary from Kamloops. Get your questions on line and you will find he can answer them. That is the position.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question, partly necessitated by the noise from the far right which did not appear to have much sense attached to it.

Mr. Crouse: Don't you like your new friends?

Mr. Paproski: Shame on you. That is a terrible statement.

Mr. Howard: Would the Prime Minister tell the House today whether his statement in 1969, which then reflected government policy of rejecting aboriginal rights, still stands?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member will recall that spokesmen for his party as, indeed, for the Conservatives approved the government statement which was made in 1969.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members look up the record of what they said in Hansard, they will see that the only comment they had to make about the minister's policy was: "Too little, too late".

Mr. Baldwin: Not on that issue.

Mr. Trudeau: There will, no doubt, be a debate on the minister's estimates and it seems to me the matter can be brought up at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that both the question and the reply by the Prime Minister are debate. Is the hon. member for Skeena rising on a point of order?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Your Honour. My point of order is that the statement to which the Prime Minister refers is the one that was issued in the House on June 25, 1969. The question I asked related to a statement the Prime Minister made in September, 1969, in which he called the Indian people historical might-have-beens and rejected the notion of aboriginal rights. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman did not appreciate the force of my question. I want to know whether that September statement still stands.

Mr. Trudeau: It may be the hon. member was part of the riff-raff outside the hall when I was talking inside. He perhaps does not know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, apparently neither the hon. member for Skeena nor the right hon. gentleman know what happened today in the Supreme Court of Canada, because three judges decided to allow the appeal, three were in favour of dismissing it, and Mr. Justice Pigeon decided that since there had not been a petition of right the matter could not be heard. In view of the fact that no judgment has yet been formally—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the right hon. member. He knows I always hesitate to interrupt him, but he should ask his question. I am sure that the House will appreciate the information but, this information having been conveyed, the right hon. gentleman might ask the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I found it necessary to give the hon. members some information. In view of the fact that only seven judges sat on this case and there are nine judges in the Supreme Court, would the Prime Minister give consideration to having the matter re-argued before nine judges to the end that a judgment could be secured which would determine once and for all the aboriginal rights of this particular tribe of Indians? In this way justice could be done by simply reconvening the court and having the nine judges present.

An hon. Member: Not before that court.

Mr. Trudeau: I can only say I lack the rapidity of the right hon. gentleman, who seems already to have read the hundreds of pages of the judgment which only came out yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was today that it came out. The Prime Minister is wrong again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I was wrong again. I underestimated the rapidity of the mind of the right hon. gentleman. I can only say that the Minister of Justice has the judgment in his hands. I will flip through it, just as the right hon. member did, and try to say something about it.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): In view of the fact that the judgment is only 104 pages long and that a deadlock has been reached, would the government give consideration to referring the question of aboriginal rights to the Supreme Court in full bench?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That would to it.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACCEPT AS ITS OWN MOTION PROPOSING ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the government House leader. In view of the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman would now be willing to accept the motion I have on the order paper, No. 49, to set up a House committee to look into all aspects of the aboriginal rights of native peoples?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I promised the hon. member that I would consider the matter with the minister. Unfortunately, I have not been able to do that. But I will do it, and I will consider that suggestion in tandem with another suggestion, that possibly there might be an opportunity to debate the issue in the House at an early date.

AIR TRANSPORT

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN AIRLINES FROM MONTREAL TO TORONTO—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell us whether his department has received other requests from air transport companies wishing to be authorized to transfer their departure point from Montreal to Toronto? If so, what is the state of negotiations on this matter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, negotiations have been held between two countries. I think it is well known that these were negotiations between Germany and Canada, and between China and Canada. The cabinet has to take decisions regarding this subject, and I hope that they will be taken soon, but I am still unable to say what they will be.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. Minister of Transport.

The minister stated yesterday outside the House that there was no concern about Montreal's trade volume. Would the minister mean that a decision has already been arrived at on that matter?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I understood only part of the question due to a faulty listening device.

No decision has yet been taken. There is only a memorandum of agreement which will be submitted to the cabinet.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF TWO WORKERS AT OFFSHORE DRILLING OPERATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the unfortunate deaths of two young Canadians this past weekend in the course of offshore drilling operations and the uncertainty of surrounding events, would the hon. gentleman undertake to conduct a ministerial inquiry into this tragic happening?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of the question. I should explain that three representatives of the department's resource management and conservation branch arrived at the site last night along with experts from the Defence and Civil Institute of Environmental Medicine in Toronto to investigate the accident. I might add that a departmental representative from Dartmouth had already been on the scene together with an officer of the RCMP, and an investigation is now under way.

RESEARCH

STEPS TO ENSURE FAIR SHARE OF GRANTS FOR WESTERN CANADA AND MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence during the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in which he pointed out that 91 per cent of all industrial research grants are going to Ontario and Quebec, and in view of the government's newfound interest in industry in western Canada, can the minister indicate what steps have been taken to ensure that the west and, for that matter, the Maritimes get their fair share of these grants?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As far as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned, I am interested in seeing research and development grants spread right across this great nation of ours.

• (1450)

Mr. Andre: I assume that means that no steps have been taken so far. May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the inequitable distribution of current industrial research grants and the statement of policy issued by her department last September to the effect that the government was going to contract out research, can the minister indicate what administrative provisions apply to this policy so that the west and the Maritimes will be able to participate in the program?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the Department of Science and Technology include a survey of the allocation of these funds across the country. If the statistics referred to by the hon. member are available, it is because the department has made the ground work studies which will allow us to make a better balanced allocation of funds.

PUBLIC WORKS

PROPOSED TORONTO WATERFRONT PARK—STEPS TO CARRY OUT PROJECT

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or whichever minister is responsible for the suggested park on the Toronto waterfront. Would the minister responsible indicate what steps have been taken, apart from the press release just prior to October 30, to carry out this project?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): While I am, of course, very much in favour of this project, Mr. Speaker, actually it is my colleague the Minister of Public Works who currently has the closing of the transaction in hand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might like to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Arrol: Then I direct my question to the appropriate minister, the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding at the present time with the assembly of the land referred to.

HIRING POLICY—REHABILITATION OF JOB APPLICANTS WITH CRIMINAL RECORDS

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Does the government or more specifically the Post Office Department have a hiring policy intended to facilitate the rehabilitation of persons with a criminal record? If so, why does this policy not apply to persons who seek a job as mere despatch handler?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, such a policy does exist and if the hon. member has a specific case to put to me, I shall look into it very carefully.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN NISHGA LAND CASE—SUGGESTED ASSISTANCE TO NATIVES TO OBTAIN PETITION OF RIGHT OR FIAT AND REHEARING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question about the judgment rendered this morning regarding the claims of the Nishga Indian tribe. I have not had time to read the judgment either, but may I say that the information I have is that the right hon. member for Prince Albert is correct in describing the way in which the seven justices decided the case.

In view of this, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether he, in combination with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, would consider assisting the representatives of the Nishga tribe (a) to obtain a petition of right or a fiat from the present Attorney General of British Columbia—there may not be much difficulty in doing that—and (b) to apply for a rehearing of their case on the basis of the fiat?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it certainly would be my expectation to have a very early and full discussion of the problem involved in the judgment, and the nature and shape of the judgment, with the minister responsible and to set before him alternatives that may be available. I think we would be interested in seeking an expeditious solution to some of these problems, but I do not think I would want to comment now on the possible avenues for obtaining that solution which may be available to us.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the result of the judgments rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada this morning means that the issue has not really been decided in any satisfactory way, either from the point of view of the court or from anybody else's point of view, will the minister assure the House that he will try to find some way to place before the courts the merits of the issue for decision?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I and members of the House know that this would be the desire of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and of the government. It will be my job to attempt to lay before the minister courses of action that will lead to that result. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the substantial issue in the case remains to be decided notwithstanding the judgments, and this would certainly be the approach that we would be examining.

RECOGNITION OF ABORIGINAL RIGHTS OF NORTHERN QUEBEC INDIANS BY PROVINCE BEFORE JAMES BAY HYDRO PROJECT PROCEEDED WITH

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is also on the question of aboriginal rights. In light of the fact that the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, 1912, has been accepted by the courts as relevant to the present interests of the Indians of northern Quebec, is the minister going to insist that the government of Quebec fully recognize the aboriginal rights of the Indians in the James Bay area, as required by law, before proceeding with the James Bay power project?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware of the limitations placed on ministers in the House when issues are before the courts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You are in serious trouble over there.

Mr. Lang: Hon. members opposite may not respect the tradition in the House of avoiding comment on questions before the courts, but I should like hon. members to know that I do respect that tradition and I do not intend to make any such comment.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question which I will direct to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government, in light of this decision, is going to present a brief to the interlocutory hearings, and whether the government takes the position that the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act of 1912 does bind the government of Quebec to reach a mutually agreed position with the Indians in the James Bay area before proceeding with the power project?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has commented previously on this question. He indicated to the House that he did not want to act in a paternalistic way toward the Indians but that we would assist them in every way we were obliged to under the law and, indeed, our policy is to assist them.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED NEW RUNWAY—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, if I may change the subject my question is for the Minister of Transport. Because questions were raised on Monday last at the expropriation hearings in Vancouver asking what environmental impact the proposed new runway at Vancouver International Airport will have, will the minister fulfil the statement made to the House by his parliamentary secretary on January 16 to the effect that answers will be given and now give such answers to the House as well as to the objectors and the public attending the said expropriation hearings?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, hon. members know that the public inquiry now being held under the Expropriation Act is very limited, that is to say the commissioner can only receive complaints. He cannot decide on the consequences of the noise or plane exhaust gases on the environment; he merely hears the objections.

We have consulted all specialized government services on the consequences of noise and temperature on the environment; the Department of the Environment is supposed to collate all those reports. I shall be happy to send one to my hon. friend.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport. There is a clear commitment here to answer the question that has been raised, that is, what will the environmental impact be? Surely the Minister of Transport must inform the House when he is going to give the answer rather than an explanation of what he is looking at.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday he was quoted as saying there were environmental impact studies carried out respecting the Vancouver airport and that he would release them if they were requested to be released by the Minister of Transport. Has that minister requested these environmental impact findings, and will he release them?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there have been environmental assessments done. They have been done over the years by the various agencies of government which have been commissioned by the Department of Transport to carry out assessments of airport plans. They are not within one set of covers and are not readily available. I am not referring here to the expropriation of a few homes, the removal of which does not create any environmental hazard whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary question, but hon. members will appreciate that we are quickly reaching the end of the question period and a number of members are still waiting for an opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The Minister of the Environment has said the reports are there. Will the Minister of Transport release these findings to the people, so they will know what is going to happen in Vancouver when the airport is expanded and will have a fair chance at the hearings to enter objections in respect of the facts contained in the findings which they cannot get their hands on right now?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the Minister of Environment is right, Mr. Speaker, because these are two different things. On the one hand it deals with a review of arguments against building the airport and new runways while on the other it bears on specialized reports. I am willing to join them in one single item and publish it if the hon. member wants to get a copy of it.

HARBOURS

POSSIBILITY OF DEVELOPING NATURAL HARBOUR AT POINTE-AU-PIC

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport or to the Minister of Public Works.

Has the department received representations from the Murray Bay Marine Terminal of Pointe-au-Pic regarding the possibility of developing the natural port of Pointe-au-Pic?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I will check and reply later to the hon. member.

COMMUNICATIONS

REPORTED GOVERNMENTAL SURVEY OF CANADIAN WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Ellwood Madill (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and deals with a report that the minister's department plans to conduct an in-depth survey of Canadian weekly newspapers. Will he say whether such a survey is planned and, if so, will he explain its purpose?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, such a survey is being planned as part of a general survey of the commercial printing industry in Canada. This survey was discussed with representatives of the industry and it has their support. I cannot tell the hon. member when the results will be published but I should think it might be some months away.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

OVERTIME PAY—REQUEST FOR REPORT FOLLOWING SURVEY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. In view of representations that have been made over a period of several years about the payment of overtime to members of the RCMP, will he advise the House whether a survey was made of the force in respect of overtime and, if so, was the survey submitted to the government and has the government turned over moneys to the force for the payment of overtime?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP is presently conducting a study into overtime pay but I have not yet received the report. In the meanwhile, however, overtime compensation is being paid to the RCMP in the form of premium payments.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Solicitor General whether it is correct that the payments being made to members of the force constitute equal payments to all its members whether or not they actually work overtime.

Mr. Allmand: I would have to inquire about that further, Mr. Speaker.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—DECISION ON STAMP, COIN AND LOTTERY SCHEME PROPOSED BY COMMITTEE AND PROVISION OF FUNDS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the fact the main body of the Montreal Olympics Commission left this morning for Lausanne, Switzerland, to make a complete report to the International Olympic Committee, and that the commission feels its ability to cover the costs of the games hinges on government approval of special stamps, lotteries and coins, and in view of the fact the Prime Minister's office announced last week that the final decision had been made by the cabinet regarding this matter, will he now finally tell the House and, indeed, millions of frustrated Canadians what that decision is?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the simplest answer is that there was no such announcement made by my office.

Mr. Hees: What is the decision?

[Mr. Madill.]

Mr. Trudeau: Are you one of the thousands of frustrated Canadians?

Mr. Hees: I am frustrated every time I listen to you.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, some of us remember that the Prime Minister made an announcement through his office, but I will ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact the Prime Minister has had the Olympics budget in his possession since last October, will he tell the House whether he has, due to his obvious non-committal stand on this matter, withdrawn the government support of the games that he made initially in a letter written in 1968?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I must correct the hon. member again on his facts. The budget of the commission was only made known to the federal government in late November after I had been pressing COJO and Mayor Drapeau since at least August, in writing, to get that budget.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, since the facts are wrong, if it is permitted by the House I will correct those facts before attempting to deal with the question.

An hon. Member: As long as you get to the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the end of the question period. Perhaps the hon. member might ask a supplementary if he is seeking the floor for that purpose and then we will call orders of the day.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Prime Minister is evading the question as far as—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair was prepared to recognize the hon. member for the purpose of asking a supplementary question to which the right hon. Prime Minister might have replied. I will recognize the hon. member for that purpose, but I hope we will not get involved in argument.

Mr. Jelinek: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister made a decision one way or another regarding the request made to him by the Olympics committee back in October?

An hon. Member: Come on, Pierre.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—MEANS OF FINANCING—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the press conference given by Mr. Drapeau in which he confirmed again that he was not requesting funds from the federal government but approval of the means which the city of Montreal will be taking to finance the Olympic games, can the right hon. Prime Minister inform us if the verbal guarantee of the mayor of Montreal is sufficient or if he is asking for more concrete guarantees before parliament endorse the means of financing those games?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to parliament last week—and the situation is still the same at this time—that we could not introduce in the House an amendment to the legislation before we have more than verbal guarantees that the deficit, if any, should not be assumed by the Canadian taxpayer. This is still the position of the government and it is also the wish of Mr. Drapeau who right from the outset assured Canadian taxpayers that they would not have to pay anything since Montreal benefited in 1967 of millions of dollars for Expo 67 and because of this attitude of both Mr. Drapeau and ourselves we are simply waiting for some valid assurance not only from a political point of view but from a legal point of view that the Canadian taxpayer will not be the backer in the final analysis.

We are still waiting for that assurance and I think the Quebec government and the Montreal administration are presently working on it.

[English]

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Will he stop playing games and advise the House how much money he plans to give to the 1976 Olympics?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Why are you so tough on Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that his question as asked is somewhat irregular.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will hon. members kindly resume their seats.

[Translation]

I simply want to indicate that we have reached the end of the question period. Obviously, if we are to continue on this interesting subject we will have to do it during the question period tomorrow.

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 30, 1973, consideration of the motion of Mr. Allmand that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock last evening I was in the midst of listing a number of failures of the government to respond to what the electorate was asking during the past election campaign. My catalogue had not been terminated. We now have before us a bill asking for a moratorium on the death penalty. This, I submit, is in no way an answer to what the electorate asked during the past election campaign. The people were not asking for another moratorium; they certainly were not asking for perpetuation of the situation in which the criminal commits and the cabinet commutes. That is not law and order; it is not respect for the law.

We have heard a lot in this debate about deterrence. I wish to talk about it myself although my case for retention is not based only on deterrence. In this connection I submit that the very need for written law with its penalties and punishment presupposes an imperfect society. These imperfections or readiness to disregard the law are themselves graded in seriousness from jaywalking, through embezzlement and fraud to the commission of the most heinous of all crimes, murder. To each of these acts of lawlessness, be they slight or serious, is attached a progressively stringent punishment. Does it not follow from this—that is, the recognition of graded crimes alongside their appropriately graded punishments—that there is a deterrent relationship between the assigned punishment and the misdemeanour of crime? If it does not, I am seriously puzzled.

Are punishments deterrents? If not, what are they? Is the threat of having your driver's licence removed not a deterrent to exceeding the speed limit or driving while under the influence of alcohol or a drug? If this is a deterrent, why consider that other, more grievous punishments are not? In short, I find it difficult to follow those who are against the death penalty on the ground that it is no deterrent. There may be no statistical evidence to prove that it is a deterrent: those who were deterred from committing murder will not come forward and say so. Our evidence, therefore, is faulty; but that is no excuse for having faulty logic.

Furthermore, some are claiming, basing themselves on recent Canadian experience, that the death penalty has shown itself to be no deterrent. How can we draw any such inference when the death penalty has not been carried out because of cabinet decision since, I think, 1961 and certainly not since the moratorium? It has invariably been commuted. No statistics on the deterrent value of the death penalty for this period are, therefore, available. What do we really know, in such circumstances, about the deterrent effect of the death penalty in Canada.

We are told the statistics are two years behind in preparation and a clear five-year period is needed before any really reliable conclusions can be drawn. If this is the case, I submit we in this House and our constituents in the country are entitled to ask why the government did not ask in the first place for a seven-year moratorium so as to get five clear years' statistics on hand when the moratorium expired.

Had the government insufficient experience with delay in the presentation of statistics to imagine that the full five years' statistics would be available at the end of that period? If indeed that is the case, is that the reason parliament is being asked to approve this proposal? I submit that is not the case.

I have already suggested one reason which I believe to be the case; the government has got its priorities mixed. Furthermore, I think that the present bill is a compromise, as has been suggested by many previous speakers. It is a compromise between those, on the one hand, in the Liberal party who are split on the issue but are prepared to accept the moratorium to absolve their consciences and those, on the other hand, to my left who are theoretical abolitionists, some of whom are prepared to stand up and say so and some of whom are not prepared to do so.

I have a third reason for suggesting that the reason offered by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is specious. This reason is closely related to the number of convictions for murder under study in Canada. We are told there were 12 murderers in jail when the present moratorium went into effect. Is it the study on those 12 cases that is two years behind? Or was that comment related to the studies being made in other areas of criminality to prove, show or demonstrate that, comparatively speaking, the rise in one sector of criminal behaviour is greater or less than in another since the moratorium was instituted? No, Mr. Speaker, this sort of reasoning does not stand up too well to the searching test of logic or practicality.

This is a compromise bill because the government did not have the gumption to come out on this matter one way or the other to let us stand and be counted, abolitionists or retentionists. This is a bill introduced to cloak the bankruptcy of the government in the area of economic reform directed toward alleviating unemployment, reducing inflation, helping the old age pensioner and relieving taxation. For that reason alone it deserves to be defeated.

It would be tempting to examine other features of the minister's speech in the cold light of logic and to reveal its many inconsistencies. That temptation must be resisted, if only because of the clock. We are, in any event, dealing with a very practical and serious matter; the death penalty, something of concern to all Canadians. Emotions run high, I know; I felt the pressures throughout the election campaign. The wind is still blowing strong. My information, based on a survey regarding which returns are still coming in, is that 85 per cent to 90 per cent of my constituents favour the restoration of the death penalty to the statute books for use, as judge and jury direct, in cases of convictions on the charge of murder. As I say, 85 per cent to 90 per cent are for restoration of the death penalty, with only 2 per cent or so undecided.

Statisticians, sociologists, psychologists, academics of all sorts have provided us with their views on criminology. They have produced conflicting observations, conclusions and recommendations. Some argue that statistics show that the death penalty is no deterrent, and some that it is. These academics study either cold, inhuman statistics and from that material draw their findings, or they examine case files, interview a sampling of criminals and on that basis reach their conclusions. These conclusions are useful as signposts but they are conflicting; they are no substitute for evidence from those who know even more about criminals than statisticians, sociologists and psychologists.

There is a group of specialists in this field whose views we seem content to ignore, those who have to deal daily with criminals of all sorts. They are Canada's policemen. The Canadian Association of Police Chiefs has submitted a brief that recommends in favour of retention. Why do we turn away from this representation supported, as the police chiefs are, by practical, day to day contact with criminals of all kinds?

There are two or three other considerations I would like to lay before the House before rounding out my contribution to this debate. One of these deals with terminology. I do not quite know why we allowed ourselves to be sidetracked from murder, first degree; murder, second degree and manslaughter, etc., into capital and non-capital murder, and I care not which party produced the change. For myself, I find it hard to get the idea underlying non-capital murder. It is awfully capital for the victim, that is, if my Latin still serves me correctly.

Now we have a set of new terms being introduced—murder punishable by death, and murder punishable by life imprisonment. When, in Canadian law, have we associated a sentence with a charge? What sort of cockeyed logic leads people to dream up such nonsense? First of all, on the charge sheet the indictment would set things out in a way that almost presupposes guilt. Where have our law officers allowed themselves to be led by coming up with such ideas? Not only is this clumsy, in my view, but it is also contrary to the spirit of our justice to cite the maximum penalty along with the alleged offence. Where are we heading?

Next I think we should somehow set the record straight about murder. Some speakers opposite and to my left have charged that for the state to restore the death penalty is tantamount to making the state a murderer. Those who use this argument disregard the definition of "murder". In the Oxford pocket dictionary, "murder" is defined as "the unlawful killing of a person with malice aforethought." The state cannot become guilty of murder, on that definition. If the law exists, the state's action to implement it cannot be unlawful. In executing the sentence there is no malice. There is forethought, certainly, but the state exercises forethought with a view to its self-protection and the protection of its citizens. I reject that form of argument. The state is no murderer.

Finally, I do think it is important in any discussion of the death penalty to distinguish between the principle of requiring the death of the convicted murderer and the manner in which that penalty is executed. We are not here talking about hanging, the electric chair or what you will. We are talking about whether one man should die for having taken the life of another.

Speakers in this debate have devoted almost their entire attention to the fate of convicted criminals, whether they should die by the rope or in the chair. The whole emphasis of this debate has been directed toward the criminal and what might happen to him. Mr. Speaker, our concern should not be for convicted criminals but for law abiding Canadian citizens and the victims of crimes committed by criminals. Perhaps here we should be speaking for the dead, not for those who caused them to die.

Retentionism has been characterized in this debate as a vicious policy, one that caters to viciousness. With all due deference to those who have spoken along these lines, I just will not accept their argumentation. There is nothing vicious in the normal, law abiding Canadian. He is not vindictive nor is he vengeful. I submit that he is a charitable being. The letters I have received from my constituents along with the survey that they have completed are ample testimony to that effect. They have thought seriously about this problem. They are not vengeful. They are seeking other ways. Some shrink from hanging and the gallows; they say, "Find another quicker, less dramatic form of imposing the death penalty, but see that it is imposed."

Some are reluctant retentionists but because they fear the direction society is taking they want discipline back. They want people to know that misdemeanours will be punished and that criminals will pay for their crimes. I gathered this during the election campaign and from the correspondence I am now receiving. Canadians are not vicious, nor vindictive, nor vengeful. They are compassionate people, but they are fearful of the direction in which Canadian society is heading. What they are looking for is national self-protection. It is parliament's job to provide it. Civilized society is an ordered society. Regrettably, more and more people are becoming disturbed by the growing disorderliness of society and are preparing on their own to ensure that as far as they themselves are concerned, there will be order—or else! They are acquiring small arms for their own self-defence.

In these circumstances this parliament has cause to worry. The notion of an orderly society is beginning to erode; and when erosion starts, who knows where it will end? This falling away of society from its reliance on the upholders of law and order must be halted. There must be punishments for crimes and those punishments must be carried out. Society will no longer tolerate subservience to that philosophy which sees all criminality solely in terms of sickness and therefore devotes more attention to its alleviation than to the alleviation of the unrest that that sickness—if that is what it is—is spreading throughout society.

According to the survey that I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, there are 85 to 90 per cent in favour of the retention of capital punishment. These are the people who are either afraid of or have misgivings about where our society is heading. The views that I am receiving from my riding as a result of this survey also indicate that there are some 8 per cent to 10 per cent opposed to any form of capital punishment on the grounds that it is barbaric, medieval and unworthy of civilized persons.

I respect the views of these people: I do not agree with them, but I respect them and I voice their concerns in this House. These too, are compassionate people. Some of them, of course, are opposed to hanging because they feel we should not take life. Some advocate life imprisonment and some, equally compassionate, are undecided. Not wanting to take life, they are none the less fearful that permissiveness, if allowed to go unchecked, can lead to a society where no one is safe and no order can be assured. These views I wish to record, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to borrow from two speeches that have already contributed to this discussion, one by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie) and the other by a member whose riding I cannot recall but who spoke about "stepping into another man's moccasins". What the electorate is asking us to do—of this I am convinced, Mr. Speaker—is to provide them with the security and safety in society that they see slipping away from them. We are also being asked to provide a law which will enable judge and jury to step into the moccasins of the victim and in the cold, unemotional light of calm deliberation, determine guilt, award penalty even if that penalty is death for the accused, and see that it is executed. What is not so clear to my constituents, of course, are the confines within which I operate. Can this bill bring back what they want? Can it bring back the death penalty the 85 per cent want?

I should like to record the options as I see them. First, I can agree with the bill as it stands and permit the experimental period to be resumed. This in effect would suspend the death penalty. Second, I can oppose the bill, seeking its defeat in order to secure restoration of the status quo ante-1968; this would ensure the return of the death penalty for murder.

My options are clear. I oppose this bill. This is my inclination; this is what I am directed to do by my constituents; and I appeal to all members of this House who want order to return to our Canadian society to oppose this bill. Laxness and permissiveness have gone far enough; we must tighten up our discipline. I oppose this bill not because it is a government bill but because it represents an abdication of the law and order concept which any self-respecting parliament should uphold.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, as a new member of parliament, I had been green enough to prepare a sophisticated speech, but it seems very difficult today to deliver it in front of my colleagues, for the main arguments I wanted to underline have already been said.

On the other hand, I would like to rise a matter which seemed to be the main concern of those who intervened, saying that the first purpose was to protect society and still legalize murder. As a matter of fact, maintaining capital punishment would do just that. They also wanted to protect police officers but, in my opinion, the bill now before us brings no solution to this problem. It would just be a transition period. Now I suggest that capital punishment should stand trial, not murderers.

I think that it is extremely important—as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said yesterday—to know that this House has no jurisdiction to rule over the life or death of any individual. In my opinion, the authority which seems to be given to us is far beyond our competence. Anyway, we shall never succeed in protecting the public by hanging people who committed murder. And the problem will not be settled by taking the life of anyone even though this person has willingly killed another person.

What is to be considered, I suggest, is the kind of society in which we live and what leads murderers to commit such acts. As a matter of fact, our society should be blamed rather than these people who, thanks to a whole set of circumstances, may have been very badly educated.

I think that we should consider the viewpoint of the right hon. member for Prince Albert about the judgment rendered on June 29, 1972 in the United States, in the Furman case. If I may be permitted to quote from what the right hon. gentleman said:

> . . . given by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a long judgment, and was rendered on June 29 last. The case before the Supreme Court involved three men, one who had committed a horrible murder, and two who had committed frightful rape. They appealed and they contended that under the Bill of Rights of the United States the death penalty could no longer be imposed.

As for the eighth amendment in the American Bill of Rights, it can be found word for word in our own Canadian Bill of Rights which denies the right to punish people by taking away their life, certainly a most abominable punishment.

A number of my colleagues have alluded to the electoral spectre and public opinion. I too am aware that public opinion for the most part is in favour of capital punishment.

I believe however that a member should not have to take public opinion into consideration, since the public does not have the necessary background to make a valid judgment on the deterrent effect of capital on criminals.

I now quote from the conclusions of Ceylon's commission on capital punishment:

> Even if it were presumed that public opinion is in favour of capital punishment, it is not in itself a conclusive argument for reinstatement. Public opinion can be well informed and use reason, but in the light of our experience, it is not very likely; maybe from the strict political point of view public opinion strongly in favour of capital punishment can be a reason to maintain it, but surely it cannot be a rational justification.

• (1540)

Some will be readily happy to learn that we regard the death penalty as a political problem.

I continue quoting the report of the Ceylan commission:

> When public opinion is neither informed nor clearly defined, the social justification for a proposed legislative measure should be determined by considerations other than the public's belief in the justification of the said measure.

In my view the bill we are studying justifies all members of the House not to account for public opinion. Some will say that their image before the electorate is tarnished.

In good faith, I believe that a member who has some respect for himself can convince his electors that he has to take this decision according to his own conscience.

Moreover, it would be easy for people to play politics with that problem. It is easy to supply striking examples of offenders having been discharged and having relapsed. It is easy to describe some murders with all relevant details. I think that it amounts to distorting this debate.

A pertinent debate should bear on the following question: Should we or should we not continue killing people legally? This is the question now being put to us.

For me, Mr. Speaker, the situation is the following: my colleague from Matane (Mr. De Bané) and I will introduce an amendment in committee; we will be compelled to vote for second reading of the bill if we want to be in a position to propose an amendment for abolition of capital punishment under any form. If the intention is to add candies or to impose a minimum absolute term of 25 years, we shall agree. We do not mind what people will do. The question is to have the death sentence disappear. The point is to have capital punishment go on trial and not to have vengefulness gratified.

I hope people will understand that I do not pity the offenders. There are places where we can detain offenders in a decent fashion in order to prevent them from harming society.

Today, we should deal strictly with the issue, that is whether or not in this century the death penalty should still be enforced. My opinion Mr. Speaker, is that it should disappear.

Some of my colleagues have expressed another major argument: if the death penalty were abolished for any type of murder, police officers would run greater risks and would be in constant danger.

Mr. Speaker, there is a greater danger for construction crews, miners, farmers and transportation workers than for policemen.

There were 225,000 policemen in the United States in 1960. Between 1961 and 1963, 140 were killed by criminals, 97 died accidentally, which is a total of 237 or an annual average of 3.1 per 10,000 police officers.

I have some other statistics. On comparing with peace officers, the rate of eventual accidental death at work was 11 in the mining industry, 7.7 in the construction industry, 6.5 in agriculture and 4.2 in public services and transportation.

Dont't tell me that police officers are going to be protected. Risks are greater for construction workers, for transport and public service employees than for policemen. I can absolutely not believe that risks are going to be greater for police officers in view of the difference that already exists between construction workers and peace or police officers. In my opinion, this is definitely not a valid reason to justify legalized murder.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude my remarks simply by questioning the right of this House to dispose of the life of an individual. And I remind all my colleagues to read the judgment quoted by the right hon. member for Prince Albert yesterday because they will find it very instructive.

I suggest that we shall try in committee to have the death penalty abolished. I think that we shall try first to have the government's proposal rejected, but on third reading we shall have to abstain from voting because we cannot acknowledge—I do not know whether other hon. members will agree with me—the right of people to dispose of the life of convicts. I submit there are other means in 1973 to deal with criminals and prevent them from causing any harm to the public.

[English]

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, this is a strange age in which we live. The doers of society, those who pay their taxes and do their jobs, those who are members of ratepayers' associations, those who collect for the heart fund and cancer society, those who work in church groups, those who are active in service clubs, those who personally help those in need are increasingly held up to derision and ridicule, while the whiners and social delinquents are presented as the pure gems of society. The lost, the social orphans, the nuts and fruits of society, at least as generally depicted by the movies, newspapers, magazines, radio and television have become the heroes.

The more a man spits on society, the more society coddles him. If someone is lazy, we are to blame, of course. If someone is a thief, society is at fault. If the man of the house spends all his money on booze, then shame on society for driving him to drink. If someone is a rapist and murderer, why, society allowed the terrible environment which produced him. It has got so now that a person who defecates on the floor blames society for not cleaning it up. Sure enough, such characters will be hailed as heroes of the common people in some feature article in the daily press or in some documentary on the CBC.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arrol: The indolent, the far-out, the emotional blackmailers are pampered by sociologists, psychologists and psychiatrists, many of them as mad as the people they serve. Evil, it seems, no longer exists. Modern educationalists and left-wing groups romanticize the sick and the sorry in our society. If only we understood, they say.

What should be understood is that if there is no evil person in the world, it must follow that there is no good person. If we cannot blame individuals for their conduct, we cannot praise individuals for their achievements. This, of course, is nonsense. The fact of the matter, and it is the basic assumption to which I adhere in my remarks on the need for the reinstitution of capital punishment, is that there are incorrigibles in society. If a man's life has been one of violent, aggressive, anti-social activity, and if his career in crime culminates in the murder of an innocent person in society, that social misfit should be done away with; indeed, for his own benefit as well as that of the society he has rejected.

The majority of people in our nation feel it is our right and duty to go to war against outside aggressors and in the process, perhaps, kill thousands of the innocent as well as those who might be called the guilty in order to preserve the society we defend. Then why, when the enemy is inside the country and is fairly tried and judged to be the guilty one, should not society protect itself from such a one? Even if capital punishment does not act as a general deterrent, capital punishment certainly prevents the person who kills from ever murdering again.

That which is barbaric about capital punishment is not that society feels it has to remove the guilty one but the way in which the guilty one is removed. In this modern scientific age there are alternatives to hanging. If hanging is repugnant, then let us be merciful in the way in which the person is brought to death. Let him not suffer the cruelty of a lifelong sentence, or even 25 years, in prison. Let us close the book of life for the transgressor quickly, cleanly and finally. But let there be no mistake that a society, in order to maintain law and order, must provide both for rewards and punishment.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on this first occasion upon which I have risen formally to take part in a debate in this House I should like to begin by extending congratulations to Your Honour and to your deputy upon your election to the high offices you now hold.

I rise to take part in this debate, not so much because I believe my contribution will match any of the great speeches we have heard so far but because I feel I have a contribution to make which goes far beyond the question whether capital punishment ought to be imposed or not. I wish to consider the circumstances which lead people into committing capital crimes.

I remember as a child my parents telling me a fable from Aesop about a contest between the sun and the wind to see which could make a man take his coat off first. The wind blew as hard as it could but the only result was to make the man clasp his coat more tightly about him. After the wind had expended its efforts, the man still had his coat on. Then the sun had its turn. It came out in all its glory, and in a very short time the man shed his coat. For too long, as it were, we have tried to use the force of the wind to eliminate crime, rather than turning light on the topic.

I have heard expressed in this House and in my constituency arguments for and against deterrence; I have heard arguments for and against rehabilitation; I have heard arguments on the basis of divine instruction. And, Mr. Speaker, I have even heard arguments based on cost to the taxpayer. But in my view, when we are considering the crime of murder we should become much more curious about the conditions under which such a crime is committed and the nature of the criminals themselves. If we could prevent crime being committed, it seems to me we would be serving a much greater purpose in the long run than we would be by eliminating a criminal by means of a rope or a gas chamber.

In a detailed study of crime in Canada between March 31, 1964, and March 31, 1965, the following figures appear. I picked this particular year because the profile seems to be more complete. In that year, 3,621 offenders were admitted to penitentiaries. Most of them were under 30 years of age and 2,400 of them, or 67 per cent, were unemployed when their crimes were committed. Seventy-five per cent of those who were unemployed, or 1,800, had one or more dependants.

Something else which I found very interesting in this survey was that 1,600 of the 3,621 prisoners were alcoholics or had a drinking problem. That is a little over 45 per cent. Forty-one of the 3,621 prisoners were convicted of murder and 20 of them had an alcohol problem or, at least, alcohol was involved. Alcoholism and violence seem to go hand in hand. Beside being a factor in almost half the murders, alcohol played a part in 31 of the 47 manslaughters, 46 of the 77 rapes and 31 of the 51 assaults. These two factors, unemployment and alcohol, have not only contributed in a major way to crime in the past but, I believe, continue to do so today. In my opinion, this correlation will continue unless steps are taken to alter the situation.

Capital punishment does not by one iota alleviate the adverse conditions under which too many of our people live. What has the government done to alleviate the conditions which spawn crime? In 1971, the Senate Committee on Poverty concluded there were five million people living in poverty in this country. The committee made ten major recommendations but not one of those recommendations has been acted upon. The government has produced nothing better than band-aid solutions stuck on with glib platitudes and affecting only a very small percentage of the population. As long as large numbers of our people continue to live in poverty and deprivation amidst the great wealth of this country, alienation will thrive and crimes of violence, including murder, will be committed. For too long, those responsible for directing the economic destiny of this country have placed great emphasis on the standard of living. I think we ought to concentrate, now, on quality of living.

I mentioned alcoholism as being a contributing factor to crime. We know it is the most serious drug problem facing Canada today. How effectively involved has the government been in spearheading a program aimed at educating the youth of our society with respect to alcoholism? I tried last Monday to ascertain from the Department of National Health and Welfare how much money had been spent by the government in the past year on combating alcoholism. I was told none had been spent because there was no program. The federal government will spend, in 1972-73, $7,548,000 under the heading "non-medical use of drugs". None of this sum is earmarked for use in the particular area to which I have brought attention.

The time has come to exercise control over the advertising of alcohol on radio and television. In my own constituency, "Hockey Night in Canada" is probably the most popular program for the young people on Saturday evenings. Yet this program is sponsored by beer companies whose advertising is psychologically directed at the young people. The time has come to take a look at this kind of advertising and the effect it may have on "hooking" the citizens of this country on the most dangerous drug we have today.

On Friday last the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) stated, "There is a genuine fear of death in the mind of every rational person". The operative word in that statement is, of course, "rational". But the murderer is hardly ever a rational person. Between 1966 and 1969 alone, 36 murderers were found to be insane. Moreover, an interesting facet is the relationship between the murderer and the victim. In the 1964-65 period, 47.8 per cent of the total number of murders committed involved members of the same family.

In too many parts of the country there are no family counselling clinics; the family is left to cope with the pressures of an accelerated life style for which they are not mentally or emotionally equipped. The role of the federal government ought to be reviewed, with greater emphasis on community clinics co-ordinated and financed by all levels of government.

Funds for mental health clinics have never been as freely available as funds for improving physical health in this country. The state will spend, in 1972-73, on fitness and amateur sports $8.5 million, yet only $354,404 on mental health. There are far too many areas of this country where mental health clinics are unknown and where school and municipal authorities have no access to qualified help, assistance or educational information in dealing with the emotionally disturbed or the mentally disabled. Often it is done on an ad hoc basis and by well intentioned but untrained or unskilled volunteers. It is fairly obvious that the federal government has abrogated its leadership responsibilities in this field. I hope that at the upcoming conference between the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and his provincial counterparts the topic of mental health will occupy a position of some prominence on the agenda.

The annual cost of caring for all prisoners in federal penitentiaries is $51,900,000. Every penny intelligently spent on preventing the individual from becoming a prison inmate not only reduces penitentiary costs to the taxpayer but also does more to ensure the ultimate protection of society than does the rope.

Bill C-2 proposes capital punishment for those guilty of killing a policeman or prison guard while on duty. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) says he is an abolitionist. He provides an array of statistical information which indicates that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. My colleague from New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) last Friday presented a statistic which indicated that miners had a higher fatality rate—11 per 10,000—than police officers with a rate of 3.1 per 10,000. Coming from a mining district, I suspect that the 11 probably does not include those who die as a result of silicosis contracted after 30 to 40 years in the mines of Inco and Falconbridge.

No one would suggest capital punishment for the boards of directors of Inco and Falconbridge. Indeed, I think a more effective deterrent than the rope for these directors would be nationalization of their companies. The Solicitor General blithely ignores this statistic, which indicates not only inconsistency but also lack of political courage. The state must organize its resources, both human and material, in solving these human problems. Unless the government starts moving in this direction now, we run the dangerous possibility of reducing the human condition to nothing but a society of Clockwork Oranges.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I do not find this a particularly easy speech to make. I have given a great deal of consideration to how I shall vote on this particular issue, and I must say it is far more difficult for me this time to decide how to vote than it was last time when this matter came up for a vote in the House. At that time I was convinced, after reviewing all the evidence, that the main justification for capital punishment, namely, that it was an effective deterrent, simply did not exist and I therefore voted for complete abolition and then for the partial abolition bill which followed. That bill provided for a five-year trial, both to find out whether or not capital punishment was a deterrent and, secondly, to give the public of Canada some idea how the new system would work or whether in fact it would work at all.

It strikes me that, taking into consideration the way that the public of Canada feels about this issue, the trial period has failed in that it has not convinced either the public of Canada or Canadian police forces that doing away with capital punishment was a good idea.

Mr. Broadbent: What about the documentary evidence?

Mr. Reid: I want to deal with the question of evidence; the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has correctly raised that point. In reviewing all the evidence that has been put before us by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in terms of documents, in terms of the amount of material put before us by interested citizens and the evidence that members on all sides of the House have used, I think it is fair to say that that which supports the abolition of capital punishment is far more scientific, lucid and reasonable than that evidence which those who are retentionists have placed before the House to convince the House of their arguments.

I do not think that anyone who impartially reads this debate in the House of Commons, or the evidence that we have, can doubt that statement for a moment. Basically, the arguments used by retentionists are emotional. They are valid in terms of the way in which the Canadian public feels about this subject. I think those of us in this House who prefer the position of the abolitionists must be very careful in taking a position on this question, simply because of the way in which the public, which we represent, feels about it.

As I said before, the five-year period has failed to convince the Canadian public that we can have abolition and public safety at the same time. There are a number of reasons, serious reasons, reasons that deserve our attention, for that position. First of all, I think it is fair to say that there has been a growth of violence in our society, not just in British Columbia, Quebec or Ontario but in all of Canada.

This is not a purely Canadian phenomenon: it is equally a phenomenon in the United States, in the United Kingdom, in the European countries and in the underdeveloped world. It is not unique to us. If the figures mean anything at all, they seem to indicate that the growth of violence in Canada on a per capita basis is substantially less than it is in most other countries. On this point alone it seems to me that no one can blame the fact that we do not have capital punishment in this country at the present time for the growth of violence. Nevertheless, the important factor is not so much what the situation is but, rather, what those people who have sent us here believe, and it is in this kind of atmosphere that we must make our decision.

In addition, there has been a growth in what is called permissiveness which has been tied to the growth of violence in our society. There has been tremendous experimentation with a variety of drugs in our society, particularly with alcohol which has shown the largest increase in consumption of any drug even though some others have received most of the publicity.

There has been a decline in the power of legally constituted authority; people no longer accept authority blindly—parental authority, judicial authority, school authority, any kind of authority you wish to mention. That authority no longer has the high status it had. That breakdown of authority, coupled with permissiveness, drugs and an increase in violence preys very heavily on the emotions of Canadian people.

I think we are dealing with a gap between those who have studied the matter and the way in which an ordinary Canadian citizen perceives how the abolition of capital punishment will affect him. The ordinary Canadian citizen seems to believe that the prison system has collapsed, that there is no punishment adequate for the crimes that are committed, and that in particular when dealing with capital murder there is no guarantee that people who are legitimately convicted will suffer punishment for the heinous acts in which they have indulged.

I think it fair to say that the Canadian prison system has not been given much attention by governments. It has been allowed to wither on the vine. Governments have taken the attitude that this is part of the shadowy side of Canadian society. Society has put people away and has not cared about their rehabilitation or what happens to them when they are in these institutions. Consequently, our institutions of penal reform have become, not places of punishment and rehabilitation but, rather, graduate schools in the development of advanced criminals. I think that factor, coupled with the abject failure of the parole board over the last five years, has given the Canadian people a tremendous sense of uncertainty about the efficiency of our penal system.

I believe this is at the root of the brief which the Canadian Association of Police Chiefs has filed with all members of the House of Commons. They do their work in catching criminals, and once their work is done the courts sentence; but the penal system does not work and people are getting off with ridiculously light sentences and there is often no concept of punishment, let alone attempt at rehabilitation.

I believe the previous government from 1968 to 1972 made significant strides in the parole system, but these were not coupled with a proper system of penal reform which I believe we must have before we can develop an effective parole system. It seems to me that what is on trial here is not the question of capital punishment but, rather, the whole concept of the role of law, punishment and rehabilitation in a system of the just society. It strikes me that we have failed to reform the penal system to make it effective. The Canadian people are looking for some sense of security, so that people who have been convicted of crime are given proper punishment and then an opportunity to work their way back into society. At the present time the Canadian people feel there is no attempt at punishment, or that any attempt at punishment is a façade because people who are convicted of crime go to jail, learn more about crime and then are released upon an unsuspecting public.

Concerning the work of the parole board, some time ago a gentleman from my constituency was convicted of manslaughter, I believe. He served part of his sentence and was released on parole. As he went down to get the policeman who had carried out the investigation, he stopped off in another community and killed a person whom he had never met before. It is incidents of that kind, repeated all over Canada, which really lead the Canadian people to a sense of uncertainty as to whether or not we should continue the abolition of capital punishment. In other words, I would suggest that the parole board has caused a great deal of doubt in Canada as to whether or not capital punishment should be abolished.

I have a suggestion for the Solicitor General. The next time paroles are made and the person paroled goes wrong, those people who approved the parole should then go to jail and serve the rest of the sentence without any possibility of parole. That might make them think a little more carefully about what they are doing. Then we might have a system of parole in which the ordinary Canadian citizen could have some confidence. Unfortunately, that does not now exist.

The other problem I want to deal with involves the question of the police and the fear which people have. The police are our front line troops in terms of protecting society. Of all the jobs which we have people do in our society, it is the police who in many ways have the most difficult one. They are the ones who deal with what I think can be classified as the underside of Canadian society. They are the ones who try to keep the peace and protect law abiding citizens with the rules we in this chamber create. They often do not get the support they require and deserve from people in this House and outside.

When the police see the results of their work thrown away by our penal system, thrown away by the parole board or thrown away by the courts, they have cause to be worried. They are the ones on the firing line, the ones who are most in danger of being shot without warning, of being murdered in cold blood. Consequently, while I may not agree with the arguments they have proposed, I do understand fully the emotion which powers their request. This is an emotion which they share with the bulk of the Canadian people and it is an emotion which I believe we in this House ignore at our peril and at the expense of avoiding our proper responsibilities. That fear is there.

One of the tragedies in attempting to deal with the issue of capital punishment is that under our laws there are few people who have committed first degree murder who have come up for trial on a charge of first degree murder, an act that is premeditated and then executed. I have been told that there might be a maximum of 25, and perhaps a minimum of ten per year in these circumstances.

We are not dealing with murders that are committed under great surges of emotion or by accident. We are dealing with a very small number of murders which offend public opinion and frighten the public. These are exactly the kind of murders that do not call for capital punishment. It is those murderers, the public cries, who should have to face capital punishment; yet under the system as it is this does not in fact happen. It is unfortunate that the debate does not involve that central problem, because what the Canadian public has argued for in the sense of capital punishment does not in fact affect 95 per cent of the murders committed in Canada.

The difficulty I have in trying to explain this to my constituents is the gap between the knowledge we have been given and the perception of that knowledge by the people in our constituencies. We have so far not found any way of bridging that gap. It bothers me to be placed in a position of voting on capital punishment when there is such a gap between what the public wants and what the facts are as I perceive them and as a significant number of members here perceive them. The emotion and fear of the Canadian public and the reality of these facts as we understand them, in terms of who has committed murder and who is likely to commit murder, is so wide it almost seems impossible to be bridged.

If the Canadian people want a return to capital punishment, we as legislators have a fearsome responsibility thrust upon us, no matter where we stand on an individual basis or how we feel we should vote according to our conscience. If our constituents and the people of Canada argue strongly that they require capital punishment to protect them, and we in this House deny them by voting for abolition or for another five-year trial period, there is ample evidence to indicate that we are not in fact obeying the obvious declaration of the will of the Canadian people. This is a dilemma which should happen to no man, no party and no government. It is a question, not of whether I obey my conscience or my party but how I, as an individual Member of Parliament, relate to my constituents. I have an obligation to do what I think best with the facts at my disposal. If the facts at our disposal contradict or are in opposition to the way in which our constituents perceive the problem, this then puts the Member of Parliament in a position that is well nigh impossible. I find this to be an extremely difficult position to be in.

I regret that at this time I have not been able to come to any final conclusion as to how I will vote on this particular bill. Quite frankly, I am an abolitionist. From the evidence I have seen, I am convinced that capital punishment does not do the very thing that its proponents argue for it, that is, it does not act as an effective deterrent.

An hon. Member: Would it deter you?

Mr. Reid: I do not think so. If I really wanted to get you, for example, I would go after you. According to all the evidence and statistics that have been developed in this debate, capital punishment does not do what it is claimed to do. Consequently, I cannot accept that I should vote for a bill which may affect somebody else's life in the future on the basis of somebody's feelings.

We want to take our position in this House, particularly on an issue where we have a free vote, on our reading of the facts as they are presented. The facts as they are presented indicate quite clearly that in no jurisdiction in the world, where there is an opportunity to compare, is capital punishment a deterrent. Therefore, as an individual I am in an embarrassing situation. I am now going to indicate how I hope to extricate myself from this position.

An hon. Member: What did Burke say?

Mr. Reid: I want to deal with Edmund Burke and John Stuart Mill. This, of course, is the argument which all Members of Parliament memorize as soon as they become members, that is, the Member of Parliament is not a delegate with specific instructions to do this or that. The Member of Parliament is elected to exercise leadership and judgment. He is here to interpose, by definition, his interpretation of the common good above those who have elected him. I accept that definition. I accepted that definition when I voted for the abolition of capital punishment the last time and for the partial ban which has just ended.

I understand there have been changes in the rules of the House of Commons in that second reading is no longer the approval in principle that it was before the rules were changed. The motion to commit a bill to committee for further study does not commit one to the principle of the bill. The real debate, or real conflict of opinion should come when the bill is returned from committee for third reading. I believe that any reasonable interpretation of the existing Standing Orders will bear out that interpretation. In any event, my credential for making that statement is that I was a member of the committee which made the recommendation to the House of Commons which was subsequently accepted. That was our interpretation.

I intend to vote for the bill at second reading. I want to say to the House that I shall not vote for the bill when it comes down at third reading unless there are provisions to provide for those individuals convicted of murder and sentenced to prison with no possibility of parole for at least three-quarters of the sentence. For the other one-quarter of the sentence attempts should be made by the parole board to integrate these people back into the society in which they will have to live. I do not say whether that period should be 25 years, 22 years or 20 years, but it must be for a significant portion of a person's lifespan. I also believe that it is a useless experiment if we do not also provide some means for the rehabilitation and re-education of that man and, since we have women's lib, that woman back into the mainstream of society. If that is not done it is likely that the person will end up committing another murder or some other crime within a short period of time.

I take a philosophical position on capital punishment and the question of abortion which I developed only after being elected to this House of Commons when both these issues were brought forward for decision. I have taken what can be termed a conservative position on both these issues. I only wish the Conservative party would follow my logic and accept it as well. My position, basically, is that human life is far too precious to be wasted. I am an optimist about the way in which human nature can improve itself and develop. Accordingly, I am opposed to abortion of any kind on the ground that once conception has taken place there is a potential human being who has every right to grow and develop.

I am opposed to capital punishment by the same logic. Anybody who has made a mistake, however heinous it may be in the way of murder, there is a possibility for something useful to come from that person. I hold this position very carefully, Mr. Speaker. I do not mention it to the House lightly. I wish those people who are retentionists would take that argument to heart and follow it through.

It has always been a matter of some shock and even surprise to me that those people who are in favour of abortion on demand are also in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, a position with a logic in which I can find no sense at all. The logical position is that one is either in favour of abortion on demand and capital punishment, or one takes the position which I have enunciated, that one is opposed to abortion on demand and also to capital punishment.

I have made my decision, Mr. Speaker. I had not made it before I began to speak. I will support this bill at second reading. I will support it at third reading only if it is suitably amended to provide for long sentences without parole until the end. Otherwise, I am inclined at this time to submit my judgment to my constituents and the people of Canada. They are looking for some sign or symbol that their interests are going to be considered. They must feel that even though it may not be effective, we in this House have moved to protect society from the criminal element.

Mr. Knight: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that some members of this House had the good sense not to become either lawyers or professors, would the hon. member inform us what he means by a mandatory sentence of at least three-quarters of the period?

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It was my idea that if the proposal of long-term imprisonment without parole, which will be moved in committee by the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming), were accepted by the committee and reported back to the House as an integral part of the bill, one might consider taking 20 of the 25-year period in which there would be no parole and five years to integrate the person back into society. That is my position.

But I do insist that for a significant part of this time in prison he would not be let out. If you have taken somebody out of society for a significant period of time, you must also provide him with some way of returning to society, of coming to grips with a society which he will not know, having spent 25 years away from it. It is senseless to put somebody away for 20 years or 25 years and then suddenly release him back into a society and environment of which he has no knowledge and over which he has no control.

Capital Punishment

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I followed the hon. member's address with considerable interest and I wonder if he would be kind enough to answer one more related question. Did his decision regarding three-quarters of the term result from his reaction to what he senses to be the public mood in Canada, or was it in response to what he thinks expert penologists would recommend?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, it is a combination of both. It is in response to the need for security which the public feels, in terms of a long period in jail. It is also in response to the opinions of penologists with respect to the means of rehabilitating people into society after they have been away from it for so long.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Chair recognizes the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) I have to rule that in neither case was there a point of order; it was simply asking for amplification of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is with some concern that I rise to speak on Bill C-2, an act to amend the Criminal Code, for many Canadians are today wrestling with their consciences over the complex question of capital punishment. They are asking themselves: does one man have the right to kill another even if that man is carrying out that act on the orders of the state?

Obviously, there are times when a man finds himself in a situation where it is necessary to kill or be killed. Here I am referring to a soldier who in defence of his country or in defence of his own life is justified in taking the life of another. It is also acceptable to society if one man kills another in defence of his family whose safety is threatened or endangered. The law in most countries provides that anyone in fear of his life during an attack may kill another in self-defence. There are, therefore, occasions when a sound case can be made for killing another human being. However, in the bill before us we are concerned with the right of the state to take the life of a condemned murderer or to commute his sentence by cabinet decree.

The purpose of this bill is to reinstate the five-year ban on hanging which expired on December 29, 1972, and to extend it for another five-year period to December 31, 1977. It would also eliminate the terms "capital murder" in relation to murder punishable by death and "non-capital murder" in relation to murder punishable by life imprisonment.

No matter how we vote in this House on this issue, it is my firm conviction that we shall never again see a man hanged in Canada or put to death by any other means. I say this in light of the facts, for the federal cabinet has exercised its so-called executive prerogative of mercy more than 60 times during the past ten years by commuting all death sentences meted out by the courts.

In 1968, parliament approved the present trial ban on capital punishment in all cases except the murder of a policeman or prison guard. The House will recall that this was approved by a vote of 105 to 70. But hon. members know the result: since January 4, 1968, there were 17 death sentences commuted to life imprisonment, and of these 12 were persons sentenced to death for the murder of policemen or prison guards. It is therefore obvious that the present law was not upheld. Those who murdered policemen are still living and, under present laws, may one day be allowed out on parole. It therefore seems that we have not as yet given proper thought to this problem, and neither this government nor this bill will enable us find a solution that is generally acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

The abolitionists declare that capital punishment is not a deterrent and they point out that in a murder trial there is always the possibility of a miscarriage of justice, followed by the execution of an innocent man. The retentionists claim that the death penalty is a deterrent and that when it is imposed it prevents repetition of the offence by the executed criminal. On this ground there can be no argument. But the question still arises in the public's mind: does the death penalty deter others from committing murder? I submit that to this question there is no factual or final answer. In my opinion, the real question is not, alone, capital punishment but the alternatives to capital punishment and unfortunately this bill fails to deal with any death penalty alternatives. I think that the alternative to the death penalty seems to be the real crux of the problem.

Many of my constituents have implied to me that they do not want to see condemned murderers hanged by the neck until they are dead. They also state that they do not want to see them walking down the street, coming toward them, some ten years after they have committed a brutal murder. Obviously, our parole system is in need of major revision. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) who spoke immediately prior to me dealt quite adequately with this problem. I hope that members of the cabinet who are in the House and heard his speech will take cognizance of his remarks and comments, for they are in line with my thinking on this matter.

There has obviously been neglect of duty by the parole board. Obviously they have been too lenient in dealing with convicted murderers and this leniency has caused unrest, concern, frustration and alarm among many many thousands of Canadians.

In many countries that have abolished the death penalty imprisonment for natural life has become the alternative. In all my more than 15 years in this House I have been a firm believer in capital punishment and I have so voted whenever the issue has come before parliament. However, I would personally be willing to support the abolition of capital punishment on one condition, namely, that the alternative punishment be natural life imprisonment: the expression "natural life imprisonment" is only one of several titles for the same idea—imprisonment until death.

I believe that a convicted murderer by his own act has shown he can no longer be trusted and that he is no longer fit to live in our modern society. I believe he must be punished for his crime. It has been said that capital punishment in a humane manner is far less cruel than spending one's natural life in prison. Mr. Speaker, if we are looking for a deterrent to murder, I believe that the sentence of natural life imprisonment is a less compassionate sentence than the sentence of death. The key words in my proposal—I would emphasize them—are natural life imprisonment.

• (1640)

I also believe that we need this type of deterrent as protection for society. All too often we hear that the rights of the murderer as an individual must be protected. I ask this House, is it not away past the time when we should begin considering the rights of the victims?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: When a man blows up an aeroplane in order to kill his wife and collect her insurance, I ask myself what respect he had for human life. When a man hijacks an aeroplane and shoots two or three, or more, of its passengers and then directs the pilot to some unknown destination, when he takes over a whole planeload of people, I ask myself what respect he has for the life of others or even for his own. Society, Mr. Speaker, is crying out for protection against this type of outrageous action, against this type of murderer.

When I am speaking about natural life imprisonment for convicted murderers I do not mean that they should spend the rest of their lives in a cell. Meaningful employment could be found behind prison walls which would enable the convicted man to earn his keep. This afternoon the cost to society of keeping a man in prison was mentioned. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the cost would be almost the same whether the prison was full or empty. The guards would still be there, the cost of heating and maintaining the institution would be the same, so under my proposal the convicted murderer would help earn his keep.

Within the limits of certain principles there is no reason why a prisoner for life should not be treated decently. He could be allowed opportunities for education and for responsibilities within prison society. However, he should not be given even the hope of freedom except as he can manage to find it within himself. As a result of his own actions he would be permanently excluded from ordinary society.

The criticisms of this proposal are quite straightforward, Mr. Speaker. One of the main arguments is that a man condemned to prison for the rest of his natural life has precious little to lose. He may in desperation try to escape and he may kill anyone who stands in his way. In answer to this I can only suggest the prolonged use of solitary confinement or the retention of capital punishment for those who commit murder a second time. In this way, the various grades of reward and punishment would be maintained. Since there appears to be no hope of change in the murderer's attitude and he will be a continuing menace to society, it seems to me that a maximum security institution is the answer since capital punishment is obviously no longer acceptable to this government and I question whether it will be acceptable to any government in the future.

I have checked the Criminal Code and find that in order to bring about the changes I have proposed it would be necessary to change the present law. The sentence of natural life imprisonment would apply to those crimes which under the present law carry the sentence of death. Since December 29, 1972, at which time the 1967 amendment to the Criminal Code lapsed, capital crimes have included all acts of premeditated murder as outlined in the 1961 amendment to the Criminal Code. No change in the definition of capital murder is required by my proposal. For example, section 218(1) of the Criminal Code specifies the punishment for capital murder: it reads as follows:

> Every one who commits capital murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to death.

This clause could be changed to read:

> Every one who commits capital murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall be sentenced to natural life imprisonment.

What I am trying to do, Mr. Speaker, is to make the law acceptable or equal to the actions of the government. Other changes in the law would also be required, but I believe natural life imprisonment is an alternative to capital punishment. While its implementation would not be a simple matter, it obviously would provide Canadians with the alternative they require for their over-all protection.

The case for my proposal is quite clear and straightforward. If society should say, and if members of this House should decide that capital punishment is barbaric, then it must be prepared to employ that alternative which both justice and security demand. It is a requirement of justice that there be a reasonable relationship between the seriousness of crime and punishment. In my opinion, excluding death there is only one punishment which approaches the seriousness of murder, and that is permanent loss of freedom.

There are many who believe, and their belief is firmly based on the record of past experience, that the man who has murdered may murder again. An example was given to the House this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Even if the risk of this happening is slight, I believe society should be relieved of the obligation to accept that risk. The cabinet has the power of granting mercy or clemency, but in my opinion it has abused that power by automatically commuting every death sentence to life imprisonment, which in some cases means serving ten years or less. The cabinet is undermining our legal processes and the power of this parliament. This practice in effect removes any deterrent effect associated with the death penalty and makes a sham of the whole judicial process.

How can we expect society to have respect for the law when those who are supposed to uphold it make a mockery of its own rules and regulations? This can no longer be tolerated. We must set an example for the entire country if parliament is to remain supreme. In my opinion clemency, which is the prerogative of the Crown, should be granted only when mercy has been recommended at the trial or in the case of an established error in conviction. Until a suitable alternative to capital punishment is proposed as a protection for society, I feel that the government has left me no choice but to vote against this bill.

Mr. Antonio Thomas (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to voice my opinion and to show that I am not unwilling to speak. You will agree with me that if we all did as some members who like to make speeches at every turn for the obvious purpose of being in the limelight and afterwards making the headlines in our newspapers, our proceedings would be interminable and the Canadian people would be waiting still longer for the beneficial legislation which the government would like to pass. Moreover, I am unhappy to have to deal with the same matter, that is the death penalty, for a third time in this House. I will not repeat my previous speeches.

On the previous occasions, I will frankly admit that I had been disturbed, not on account of a difference of opinions with a few colleagues but on account of my love for my fellow-being and my duty as a legislator which is to protect society and which drives me into a corner. It is like the surgeon who must decide to remove an organ or not to operate and run the risk of finding out later on that the disease will cause the death of his patient.

It is somewhat the same in society. The legislator must make decisions likely to please most people. In this case, it seems that the majority is in favour of retaining capital punishment. Why? Maybe through lack of information—I did not say "formation".

The population at large would appreciate a little more security. A citizen would find comfort in knowing that his dear ones or himself will be not be attacked, beaten up, raped and killed. What happened since 1967, notwithstanding the provision to the effect that the murderer of a policeman or prison guard would be sentenced to the death penalty? I say, how many of these murderers have received this penalty? None so far. What can the abolitionists answer to this? Have they gone down in the street to inform the people, to explain their view concerning the reasons which have motivated the 1967 decision? Have they gone down in the street to listen to the opinion of the people? Certainly not.

In the course of the five years following the provisional abolition of the death penalty, statistics have kept on showing an upward trend concerning murders, even killings of policemen. Perhaps they will play on words saying that the population having increased, it is therefore normal that crime should increase. Let us be frank, let us consider percentages. People in favour of the abolition of the death penalty having lost their cause in 1966 came back in 1967 and won their point: the abolition of the death penalty would be in force for a trial period of five years, except in the case of killing a policeman or prison guard. That is a lot of bunk, in my view.

So why not apply the death penalty for a similar period of five years? Such an experience would allow us subsequently to make comparisons and it would then be seen what best serves the interest of public security. Besides, the public would understand better.

Mr. Speaker, concerning premeditated murder, we lawmakers must assume a heavy responsibility. The fact that society is deemed guilty is no reason to leave the same society in insecurity. It is therefore our duty to protect it, and what are we doing to this end? Should we increase policemen's salaries? Will that make them better detectives? Will an increase in salaries of judges increase their ability to make objective decisions? Would increasing salaries of ministers and members of Parliament make them better legislators? Money certainly does not endow us with the enlightenment of the Holy Ghost and make each of us better in his sphere.

When a child is observed to be hot-tempered or shows symptoms of a bad disposition, that is when parents should strive to correct him and they should not wait until he has grown to be an adolescent, a young man or even an adult.

A tree should be straightened while growing and not when it has achieved full growth. So, all this, Mr. Speaker, boils down to say that since 1966 and 1967 I have not succeeded in convincing myself that I was wrong. So I examined the problem and I realized that there is a cause for every ill.

During the Middle Ages and the following centuries, there were fewer murders because the authorities used to judge instantly and on the public square even those who were charged with simple theft. With the passage of times and everything it entails, we now realize that because of our tolerance and Christian charity we are now faced with an undeniable fact, which is that proportionately, the criminal is judged less severely than the poor guy who has committed a simple theft; the latter begins his tribulations and learning of hatred of his equal and the established authorities.

Why? I think it is because we did not have then a "more human" rehabilitation mechanism, and I emphasize the words "more human".

Ask former inmates how they were treated in prison. I understand better today why they have become revolted, worn out and, in some cases, social discards. Indeed, they were not offered a helpful hand, treated like human beings. Is it more likely that a criminal will be brought to realize his mistake through bad treatment, or through good reasoning? This is what we have got.

Had we had 25 years ago the rehabilitation system that we are developing today, perhaps we would not have to discuss this serious problem. I think it is due to a bad investment of the interest accrued since, that is mistakes and errors, that we are now faced with this dilemma.

However, since it is never too late to mend, I offer my small contribution to our proceedings by making a few suggestions which might prompt us to make acceptable amendments, thus putting us in a better position.

Let us begin with judges, lawyers and future judges. Why not ask them to review the Criminal Code and to propose amendments to the section dealing with the heavy onus of proof.

Furthermore, paroles should only be granted after consultation and discussion with all those concerned with the supervision, the behaviour or the mental state of the prisoner. I mean the classification officer, the correctional officer, the psychologist, the psychiatrist and even the governor of the institution. On the strength of a report signed by all those people and not only one of them, the parole officer would make the necessary recommendations to the parole board which would make a decision on the basis of complete instead of partial reports.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that on November 16, 1967, on the occasion of my speech on capital punishment, I criticized the abolitionists for their lack of concern for the victims of those criminals and we know what followed. We are now paying compensation to the victim's dependents. Unfortunately this does not bring the victim back to life but at least his family is able to survive. Besides, this is the only improvement since December 1967.

I also had another consolation when I was informed that a new program will be implemented in penal institutions to hire correctional agents with a role of contact and discussions with the inmates. They will no longer be simple jail wardens sometimes arrogant and rough not to say sadistic. Formerly, many of them had to be arrogant and rough with the inmates even though, deep down, they disapproved strongly of this attitude. The old rehabilitation philosophy and the manner in which it was implemented by the authorities confined the correctional agents as well as the inmates in an inhuman prison. Today we want the agent to be able to make more use of his human qualities so as to render progressively more responsible the individuals whom life has deprived of their sense of responsibilities toward themselves and toward others.

The Sollicitor General (Mr. Allmand) may rely on my full support as well as on the support of all people inbued with civic and humanitarian spirit. An inmate is not an animal but a human being such as you and me who, it is true, has made a mistake but has been punished for it by losing his freedom, and is in jail for a certain number of years. Losing one's freedom is already quite hard, but how can we hope to rehabilitate the inmate if he is hunted down as an animal, treated as a slave and scoffed at by society. He will revolt against that society at the very first opportunity. Our correctional agents would be happy and proud to participate in the new method instead of being the executioners of the old.

Mr. Speaker, I am not asking that criminals be given the Canada Medal for services rendered but, as I have said before, if we had tried something like that 20 or 25 years ago, I am sure we would not be squabbling today about retaining or abolishing capital punishment.

To my mind, our penal system is at fault, at least partially. However, we must not wait to see if this new starting point will lead us where we want to go; unfortunately, I still do not see how we can help the hardened criminal. On the other hand, I feel we can do something for the young and the adults who are sent for the first time to a penitentiary.

In short, having expressed my opinions, I suggest first of all that our penal system be humanized, along the lines of the existing program. Then, instead of asking that abolition of the death penalty be extended for another five years, I would ask that it be reinstated for the same length of time. It would then apply in cases of premeditated crimes, rape followed by murder, kidnapping followed by murder, armed theft followed by murder as well as hijacking.

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House compels many hon. members to ask themselves whether, in the name of what I might call a pseudo-advanced civilization, they should have capital punishment abolished or make themselves the spokesmen for the people they are supposed to represent.

I for one prefer to make myself the spokesman for the voters of my constituency; most of them consider that this is mainly a law for the protection of murderers and hired killers.

Many arguments have been put forward, including that there are fewer murders in countries where capital punishment was abolished. As far as I am concerned, I consider that we shall not have crime curtailed by setting the offenders free. If one compares this problem to that of road traffic, it can be said for sure that closing the roads to traffic will not enable us to prevent the escape of offenders.

I believe that for the protection of our people, the wisest solution would be to maintain capital punishment and to make the evidence act stricter so that when an accused is sentenced to death the evidence be complete enough to make sure that no error is being made. Otherwise, the same punishment would be applied to armed robbery and murder.

There are two conflicting theories on this matter: one, which might be called "intellectualistic", is that of advanced intellectuals, those who believe that they always speak on behalf of the people, whether they are called psychologists, sociologists or otherwise. Often, frustrated criminal lawyers who have lost cases would like to have the cause of such frustration removed. Moreover, the underworld is against capital punishment, which is understandable, because it interferes with its activities. People who indulge in subversive activities and would like to avoid the penalties they advocate, are called revolutionaries nowadays.

Even if there are few of them in Canada, shyjackers would rather have capital punishment abolished, for it would cramp their style if they thought of what was waiting for them in case of failure.

As for anarchists, who are always against any government legislation, they will probably support this one because their main purpose is to defeat the government.

The other argument, which might be called "realistic", is the one supported by the victims, by those who suffer from murders, namely the wives or close relatives of murdered men who have sometimes to live in poverty and fear as a result of these murders.

Among those who share this consensus, there are some who are exposed to this eventuality in the course of their work. They might be considered as potential victims. Those people are certainly in favour of retaining capital punishment.

According to surveys made in several constituencies, from 80 to 90 per cent of the people are asking for retention of capital punishment because they are afraid for their own security if it is abolished.

Also included are all those citizens respecting law and order, those with a clear conscience who are going about their own little business earning their own living, not that of others, and who are sometimes called the silent majority.

There are also police officers who, obviously, have to face criminals and who would like to have more arguments to convince them not to kill.

From another angle, religionwise, I would quote the Bible where it says many times that whomsoever kills a fellow human being be punished likewise.

Mr. Speaker, history has shown that in certain countries there was a rise followed by a fall of civilization. When civilization was on the rise, there was discipline in the schools as well as in other fields. Pride and honour also prevailed. Those are things which tend to disappear today. In ancient times there used to be vigour, a form of virility and devotion to work which made the citizens in their respective fields lead the country toward a higher form of civilization.

History has also witnessed, whether it be in Greece, in Rome, or in France, declines brought about quite often by the thoughtlessness of people.

It was often the great philosophers who misled the people by thrusting their dubious theories on them.

There was also decline after legalization of homosexuality, drugs and sloth. Indeed the latter replaced pride. In addition, the social climate was allowed to deteriorate and anarchy hit society. Certain groups of citizens were allowed to ridicule the laws, policemen and law makers. Finally, murder was allowed to serve as an instrument of power, as was seen in history, power accompanied by violence, fraudulent bankruptcies, exploitation of the worker and the farmer. Pride was also left to be annihilated by overly stringent succession duties and direct taxes which brought about situations like that of Louis XVI which led to the Revolution.

We must set specific objectives. Do we want the country to continue its upward march and protect itself against criminals, or do we want to start going downhill through indifference and lack of concern?

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, many people, including many members of this House, have spoken many words on this most personal of subjects. I rise knowing that few, if any, members are likely to alter their thinking as a result of my remarks or other remarks made during the course of this debate. I also recognize that my views probably do not coincide with a significant number, perhaps even a majority, of the people in my riding.

With respect to the question whether members of this House should vote according to their conscience, according to their own wishes or according to the wishes, the dictates, as expressed—if they are able to be expressed adequately—of the people in their ridings, the argument was perhaps put best by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke in this chamber yesterday. If I might be permitted to quote briefly from his remarks, as reported at page 785 of Hansard he said:

> How can you take a stand in your heart in favour of something and then vote the other way? On a free vote everyone should let his conscience be his guide.
> [Mr. Boisvert.]

A little further on, as reported at page 786 he said:

> Each one of you in this House has the conscientious responsibility of voting according to your conscience and for no other reason.

I cannot make the argument any better than that. However, I should like to assure my constituents, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I have read every letter, telegram, brief and petition they have taken the time to send me. I have replied to each one individually. There was no form letter nor evading of the question. I have unequivocally stated my views to them, whether we have agreed or disagreed.

The matter before us is one of primary importance and interest to every Canadian. The question of taking human life, either by the premeditated, cold-blooded act of one person in the name of revenge, passion or greed, or by the equally premeditated, cold-blooded act of all of us in the name of justice, in my judgment is decidedly wrong in each case. I emphasize that I feel it is wrong to eliminate a human life in either of these circumstances. In fact, there is no justification save self-defence for the taking of a human life under any circumstances.

Although I feel it should be incumbent upon those propounding the use of capital punishment to justify its necessity, the onus all too often falls on the abolitionist to justify his stand. So be it, Mr. Speaker, for I feel that the abolitionist stand can be supported.

In this debate we must ask ourselves whether our desire to either retain or abolish the death penalty is based more on objective, empirical reasons or more on emotional, instinctive reactions. No doubt because the matter is of such an emotional nature in which we are all able to see ourselves as victims, as friends or relatives of victims, or even as murderers, it is difficult to view the matter totally objectively. But as lawmakers it is our duty to act reasonably and rationally as far as possible, eliminating decisions based on feeling or basic human instincts.

One of the questions most frequently put to me during this argument asks me to imagine the brutal slaying of a loved one, usually a daughter, by a rapist-murderer. They try to make it as heinous and as gory as possible. They then ask, "How would you feel then"? Under those circumstances I would probably want to see the monster suffer a slow, agonizing death. During the agony, anguish and anger immediately following the event I might well attempt to carry out that slow, agonizing execution myself. But is this a valid argument for capital punishment? Hardly. We all feel revenge, even hatred at times. But these are debasing human emotions. It is unbecoming of us either individually or collectively to experience them, let alone use them as a basis for supporting the argument in favour of taking a human life.

This basic argument, that of need to avenge a death, is put in many forms. We are told that if a man takes a life he gives up the right to his own life. It is put in the form of the "eye for an eye" cliché from the Old Testament. But do these arguments not really beg a further question? The very large-looming query "Why?" still remains unanswered. Why an eye for an eye, and why a life for a life? Is it because the Bible says so, as some would argue? Surely the God and Christ, whose life is portrayed in the Bible as one of love, of forgiveness and mercy, is not now demanding a life for a life and an eye for an eye.

Then there is the argument that society must be protected from the totally immoral brute without a conscience who would kill anyone near him for any reason. I admit that this argument comes a little closer to a reasonable approach, as opposed to an emotional one, for the retention of capital punishment.

Certainly in accepting the "protection" argument we as a society are admitting defeat. We are admitting our inability to deal with those among us who fail to maintain accepted standards of social behaviour. Imprisonment in solitary confinement, if necessary, is sufficient protection. Such an approach permits the possibility, admittedly remote in most cases, of the rehabilitation of the murderer.

Of course, under a system of total abolition there must be increasing emphasis on the reform aspects of our penal reform system. No one should be granted his freedom until it can be determined that he is no more likely to commit a further serious crime than the average law abiding citizen. Until psychiatric and social analytical methods become sufficiently sophisticated to make such a determination with absolute surety—that is important—a man should remain behind bars.

In addition, there are indications from recent studies that when hanging is the inevitable outcome of conviction for murder, many juries are reluctant to convict. Thus, if protection is the desired result, we see that the opposite effect is sometimes achieved. Perhaps the most persuasive, and certainly the most often employed argument for retention is that capital punishment acts as a deterrent, dissuading others in society who may be inclined to murder someone.

Statistics are freely bandied about on both sides, more often irresponsibly than objectively. Adherents of both views fall into the fallacy of predetermining their position and then going about gathering statistical support for it, usually ignoring unfavourable information. The reverse, the empirical approach, study leading to conclusion, obviously should be employed. We have heard entire speeches dealing with statistics. I have read and analysed as many studies as most members of this House. The important word in that last sentence is "analysed". It is intellectually dishonest to seek support from cold figures without a close analysis of their true meaning.

For example, the Statistics Canada figures for murder, used liberally by retentionists, show that since the partial ban in 1967, Canada has suffered a significant increase in murders. Ergo, some would conclude, the threat of the death penalty prior to 1967 deterred murderers. This is a lot of nonsense when you examine closely the figures in question. An analysis of these increases, which includes the disposition of the cases in the courts and which takes into account that one man often kills many victims at once—as many as 40 in the boarding house arson case in Quebec—indicates that the rise in premeditated murders, which is the only type that could possibly be deterred by the fear of death, is insignificant. The overwhelming statistical evidence, both in Canada and around the world, concludes that murderers pay little attention to the possibly self-harming consequences of their acts. If there does exist some fear of apprehension, it results only in more elaborate planning in order to avoid detection and capture.

The definitive study in this area which has been quoted on many occasions is that carried out by Professor Fattah of McGill University. His study shows that the incidence of crimes for which the penalty has not been changed has increased approximately the same as the murder rate has increased. In fact, the increase in murders is slightly less than the increase in other crimes of violence for which the penalty has remained unchanged.

If the death penalty were an effective deterrent, murders would have increased relatively more than other crimes during any period of abolition, and particularly in the period of partial abolition over the past five years. In many provinces, such as Nova Scotia in 1968, Ontario from 1968 through 1970, Saskatchewan in 1968 and Alberta in 1968-69, homicide rates actually declined after capital punishment was legally suspended. I suggest these facts speak eloquently against a link between the temporary suspension of and the over-all increase in homicide in Canada. It can be argued that the rise in crime generally is related to the total social situation, to an increase in population and to changing moral attitudes but not to the application or non-application of a particular penalty, as studies have clearly indicated.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, of the usual reasons for retention and have, I suggest, effectively rebutted them. There are modifications of each of these three or four basic arguments. I have yet to hear an approach of any persuasive value other than those discussed. I spoke at the outset about the onus being on the proponents of the death penalty for establishing its necessity. It should suffice, then, for abolitionists to rebut the retentionists' case and then rest their defence. However, there are very positive arguments for abolition which can be effectively made.

The taking of a human life for any reason, by anyone, is a debasing, despairing reaction which admits of the inability of the killer, including society, to cope with the behaviour of the killer. In dealing with a social deviate, society should aim to protect itself from him and to rehabilitate him, and not to perpetrate further deviation under the guise of legal murder. Obviously, that second objective, rehabilitation, is entirely out of the question if we employ capital punishment. The surest way to ensure genuine respect for human life among Canadians is for the state to respect it. Even though a murderer may have no respect or reverence for human life, if we in turn kill him we exhibit no more reverence than he does. Taking his life does not help his victim or his victim's friends or relatives; it brutalizes them and reduces them and all society to the level of the murderer.

All of what I have said has been more eloquently put by others in this chamber. Suffice it to say that I am unequivocally opposed to the use of the death penalty. Given this position, we abolitionists face the conundrum posed by the government's motion before the House. By voting either for or against it we vote to retain the death penalty, albeit to differing extents.

What is the answer? The answer is not to abstain from voting. That would be an abdication of our responsibility to our electorate. The answer is to choose the lesser of the evils, to vote for the continuation of the partial ban for a further five years at this stage of the proceedings. In doing so, I urge all hon. members to seriously consider the motion to be put in committee which will totally abolish the death penalty and replace it with a mandatory 25-year jail term. Such a course would surely satisfy those retentionists who base their arguments on the requirement to protect society from the murderer.

I would urge all members before voting to approach the question in a reasonable, analytical fashion divorced from emotional considerations as far as possible. When we allow basic human instincts and emotions to cloud our judgment, we make mistakes. On this issue, Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to make a mistake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to take very long in this debate. I did not intend to participate in it until recently, but I thought that I should put some of my views on record to at least indicate how I plan to vote on this serious matter. This is one of the most serious questions we will have to deal with in this parliament. I have been trying to grapple with it in my own mind and conscience. All hon. members are faced with this.

A few speakers who preceded me suggested that this is not really a free vote, that positions are set on this side of the House and on the opposite side and we are being told how to vote. That, Mr. Speaker, is not the case. It is certainly not the case on this side of the House. I have been honestly and sincerely grappling with my conscience as to how I want this situation handled. I have tried to read as much of the literature that has been passed to me by the Solicitor General's department as possible. I have also read literature from other sources.

This is a situation where there are statistics to support both sides. There are statistics to show that abolition is best. Some states have had abolition for many years. The murder rate in those areas is very low. On the other hand, France still has the guillotine which is used to kill people. France has one of the highest crime and murder rates in the world. It is necessary to look at the whole picture. Each member must make up his own mind and then decide how he will vote.

My mail is running between 95 per cent and 99 per cent in favour of retaining the death penalty. However, I feel the same way as hon. members such as the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). Yesterday the hon. member for Selkirk made it very plain that even though his constituents are in favour of retention, he is going to make up his own mind. That is what I am going to do.

The hon. member for Sarnia stated that he was very concerned about people being let out on parole. I share his concern. There have been many serious situations in British Columbia. Recently there was the Head case. This case caused a lot of concern among many people with regard to our whole system of parole. I have expressed this view to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). We have to tighten up in this area. If a man is in prison for a very serious crime such as murder, perhaps there should not be any consideration of parole for 20 or 25 years. We should not go along with granting easy parole where a person convicted of a very serious crime is let out after a few years. I feel very strongly about that, Mr. Speaker.

I hope that when this bill goes to committee for consideration we can come up with a proposal upon which we can all agree to ensure full protection for society. Many people in British Columbia are honestly and very sincerely concerned about the slackness and the latitude allowed with respect to a number of inmates granted parole.

Now I would like to deal with a comment made by my colleague from New Westminster. He referred to the fact that a number of people sentenced to death in the United States tended to be from poverty-stricken categories and said a high proportion of them were Negroes. I tried to look up some statistics on this situation with respect to the native peoples of Canada, but I could not find any. I checked with the Solicitor General's department; apparently it does not keep statistics of that kind. However, from my personal observations over the years and from my own reading I cannot recall that very many native people had to be hanged in Canada. I would like to research this further.

I tend to believe that the proportion of native people who have received the death penalty is low compared with the total population of Canada. However, I am concerned about the number of native people who are in prisons and various other institutions right now. This is something I have discussed with my hon. friend the Solicitor General and I must express my pleasure at the concern he has shown, and the way he has responded to the situation. I hope we can go forward with a much more progressive program so that the number of native people in these institutions will continue to decline.

Over the past ten years the number of native people in detention institutions has gone down, but not far enough. The proportion of native people now in prisons is too high in comparison with that of the rest of the population. We have to do much better. As I say, I am happy with the attitude of the Solicitor General. I know he is working closely with the Department of Indian Affairs and with the various Indian organizations which made representations to him through the Department of Indian Affairs and other agencies of government.

The place to tackle this problem, though, is not in the institutions, although a lot can be done there. The work that has to be done must be done back in the Indian communities, tackling the reasons for and the causes of crime. There has to be much greater emphasis on education and meaningful social programs to help the native people play a much more constructive role in their own communities.

These were a few of the points that I wanted to make in my brief remarks, Mr. Speaker. As I say, I have had a very difficult time grappling with my conscience on this matter. After all the thinking and the reading that I have done, I believe the most sensible course I could follow at this time, on behalf of my constituents, would be to vote for the bill in its present form, with the hope that we can introduce an amendment to tighten up the parole situation so that we will not have a repetition of the mistakes that have been made in the past few years.

We are all concerned about the protection of society. This is our main aim. Perhaps there is something more we can do to assure Canadians that they are getting the best possible protection, from our laws and penal system, against all types of criminals.

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, when this debate on capital punishment concludes in the House of Commons the decision will be taken by a free vote. As I understand it, a free vote is one in which Members of Parliament vote according to the dictates of their own conscience. They are not necessarily guided by the opinions expressed by party caucus. Indeed, the party caucus should not impose direction on its members in this vote even though the subject may be discussed in caucus. Neither should a member necessarily be guided by the volume of mail he receives on the subject from his constituents, although his decision may be affected by the force of reasoning in a particular brief or representation.

The outcome of this vote should be a result of the individual searching of the conscience of each representative in the House of Commons and a result of his conscientious study of the latest material available. The vote is taken across party lines. There will be, as there have been so far, retentionists and abolitionists in all parties. I have every confidence that most members of the House will vote according to their conscience and I believe that anyone who uses the occasion of this debate to garner a few votes would be beneath contempt.

Certainly, a free debate would appear to be the best approach to the subject because the question of capital punishment, as so many have said, is such an emotional one that large numbers of people may tend to be influenced by those same forces that in the past led to such unjust acts as lynching, witch-burning and the like.

I heard it suggested by one speaker that the subject of capital punishment should be decided by a nationwide referendum. In my opinion this type of referendum is little more than an invitation to mob rule. One need only read the hundreds of letters one receives on this subject to realize that many of them are motivated by emotion and lack of logic, just as a nationwide referendum would be motivated by emotion and lack of logic. Imagine such a vote being taken on the day that a particularly brutal and atrocious crime had been perpetrated. This is not to say that one does not receive carefully thought-out and logical letters, but they tend to be in the minority on the subject of capital punishment.

One can hardly blame a citizen who experiences a feeling of almost ungovernable rage when he reads of the brutal murder and rape of a defenceless child, or of other atrocious crimes. We all share the feeling at the time. It is difficult to pit logic against such feelings of anger, yet we must attempt to approach the subject, if not from a logical point of view at least from a philosophic point of view.

For the benefit of my constituents I should like to mention the latest studies and debates that have been published on the subject of capital punishment. All hon. members are familiar with the two volumes available from the Queen's Printer, one entitled "Capital Punishment, New Material, 1965-1972" and the other "Study of the Deterrent Effect of Capital Punishment with Special Reference to the Canadian Situation," by Professor Fattah of McGill.

Most members of the House, on the basis of this latest material, are able to construct a logical argument to prove their points either for or against capital punishment. Therefore logic is unlikely to prevail. So, away with logic. Therefore I will not spend time discussing the deterrent effect of capital punishment since it is unlikely that I am going to convince anyone by quoting statistics or by taking that tack.

It is a fact, however, that long before the suspension of capital punishment in Canada a potential killer had over a 90 per cent chance of escaping execution in any case. These figures are based only on known incidents of murder, but many murders are not even detected, so that the probability of escaping execution is even higher than the percentage just mentioned. In a sense, then, the whole question of capital punishment or abolition is an academic one since it is unlikely that anyone is going to be executed in future in Canada.

On the face of it, if any province in Canada has the right to insist on the reinstatement of capital punishment it would probably be British Columbia, since the homicide statistics there are higher than those of any other province. These figures, however, are somewhat deceptive because although British Columbia has the highest average annual homicide rate it has the lowest percentage increase of homicide in Canada. The unfortunate fact is that homicide figures in British Columbia tend to be weighted by the number of homicides which occurred in the year 1962. Following the year 1962, in which there were 11 homicides, the rate of homicides decreased noticeably.

The deterrent effect of capital punishment on the whole is discounted on the evidence of enough studies that one can easily accept the thesis that it makes no great difference whether we have abolition or retention so far as the number of homicides is concerned. We must look, then, for another motive for reinstating capital punishment. Certainly, a civilized society should not employ revenge as a motive since nothing is gained for that society from revenge except perhaps here and there a feeling of well-being that one has "got even" in some manner with the criminal.

It is pointless to go into the religious arguments for capital punishment because the retentionists would quote from one point of view and the abolitionists would quote from another point of view so far as the Bible is concerned. Most orthodox churches oppose capital punishment on the ground that the governing Christian spirit should be one of mercy and forbearance.

I do not believe that the people who speak for the retention of capital punishment are motivated by a desire to deter or by a desire for revenge. It seems to me that the governing motive of the people who desire retention of capital punishment is one of frustration in a society which they feel is too permissive, a society which they feel has no means of handling those people who are unable to function with their fellow members in that society and, as the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) pointed out, from the economic and social injustices which rankle so deeply in our private enterprise society.

It seems to me, therefore, that we must resort to examining the question from the philosophical point of view. What is it that distinguishes mankind from the rest of the animals? Not necessarily the ability to reason, because some animals have shown that ability in varying amounts. But the one thing that man can do that other animals cannot do is to store experience.

The wild animal in nature teaches his young or her young by instinct and example and one generation after another learns in exactly the same way. But mankind is able to store his experience in history books, in monuments, through artifacts and the like. We must believe that man, through his ability to store experience and to learn from the past, is rising in the scale of human evolution. Despite this ability to store experience, it seems to us that the beast still lurks just below the sophisticated veneer of modern man. This is hardly surprising since man has been on this earth for a relatively short period of time in comparison with the entire scale of life, the continuum of life on this earth.

To paraphrase an example used by Dr. Miller, I ask you to imagine a rope stretching from Toronto and ending at the Speaker's chair in the House of Commons. This rope will represent the natural scale of life—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the desire of the Right Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable House attends him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-127, an act to amend the Pilotage Act—Chapter No. 1.

At 6.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 1, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

RIGHT HON. LOUIS STEPHEN ST. LAURENT

TRIBUTES ON NINETY-FIRST BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will grant me the indulgence of saying a few words regarding a former Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who celebrates his ninety-first birthday today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have for him an admiration bordering on affection. He sat in this House for a period of 16 years during which he was Minister of Justice, Secretary of State for External Affairs and Prime Minister. Prior to coming into the House he had a record as a most distinguished lawyer and was President of the Canadian Bar Association. Our relations throughout the years intertwined, one with the other. When he occupied the position of President of the Canadian Bar Association I was one of the vice-presidents, as I remember. When he was Minister of Justice I was the opposition critic. When he became Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the latter days of his tenure I was the opposition critic. He then became the Prime Minister and later I followed him in that position.

In all those years the great proprieties of parliament were upheld by him. He is a man who was always a gentleman, a statesman who gave of his best, and one who had a deep appreciation for the meaning of the monarchy within the parliamentary system. Indeed, it is sometimes forgotten that it was he who suggested to Her Majesty that it would be most helpful to the parliamentary system in Canada if she would open parliament. It was his suggestion that brought this about, although it came into being after I became Prime Minister.

We wait too often until men who have devoted themselves to their country pass on before acknowledging their contributions. This does not have the same meaning as conveying to a living person such as Mr. St. Laurent the feelings of all of us in the House. My suggestion, Sir, is that on this anniversary this House do something which has not been done before. I suggest that we have you, Sir, convey to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, a Privy Councillor of Canada and an Imperial Privy Councillor, of which there are only two now, Mr. St. Laurent and I, the good wishes, the felicitations and the congratulations of all of us, coupled with the hope that he will have many more years with us and that his life will be one of serene realization that in his day and generation he gave of his best.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues of the Liberal party, I would like to associate myself fully with the comments expressed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I think he is in a better position than anybody else to evaluate the task and the greatness of the man he has praised. He has lived through that period himself. He has seen Mr. St. Laurent at work and I think that those sitting on this side of the House, who have naturally a special esteem for Mr. St. Laurent, are very happy to hear these words from the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Since I have been Prime Minister, I too, must recognize that I have become more unfluenced by the remarkable talents of this man. I have become aware, through documents, programs and legislation which I must look after, of the path he has laid out and the wisdom which characterized his leadership of Canada in the course of the years he was a minister and Prime Minister of this country.

Furthermore, we endorse the suggestion made by the right hon. member. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that I hope——that the right hon member, when I am 91, will be able to stand in this House and utter—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —perhaps not the many, many deserved compliments that he paid to Mr. St. Laurent, but at least that he will be able to say about me the same words about his admiration bordering on affection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my leader, the hon. member for York South, has graciously suggested that I say a few words on behalf of our party on this occasion. I am extremely happy to do so. However, I wish to make it clear that I am not 91.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say that because of the next sentence I wish to utter. It does so happen that Mr. St. Laurent and I were first elected to the House of Commons in the same year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thus, I had the privilege of being here throughout the time he was a member of the Liberal cabinet and, finally, Prime Minister. I was also here, of course, during the session when he sat on this side of the House as the Leader of the Official Opposition.

On my own behalf and on behalf of my colleagues I wish to underline what has been said about the unfailing courtesy of Mr. St. Laurent. He was always the gentleman. It was midway through his career as Prime Minister that he became known as "Uncle Louie". Indeed that designation was not something coined in jest but rather in affection because we found him to be just that kind of person.

It must also be said that he made a singular contribution to the development of this country in terms of national unity, and in terms of making progress with respect to the achieving of a constitution that might meet all our needs. I suspect that historians will some day discover and point out that if it had not been for the Korean war, which interrupted certain plans that I know he had, we might well have made further progress than we did in that respect while he was Prime Minister.

We remember him with affection, and we feel that the House is quite appropriately taking a few minutes today to extend to Mr. St. Laurent our warmest greetings and congratulations on this his ninety-first birthday. I join with the Prime Minister in associating this group with the suggestion made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert that you, Sir, extend to Mr. St. Laurent the cordial greetings of this House of Commons and our best wishes to him for many happy returns.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf and on behalf of my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada I should like to join in the good wishes extended by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent on the occasion of his 91st birthday.

I did not have the good fortune, as did my two colleagues of the opposition, to see at close range this great statesman at work, but I did work under him. When Mr. St. Laurent was head of the country, I was in a position to see that he gave the best of himself, that he led the country and acted according to what he thought was best. Naturally, like all political men, he did not have unanimous approval from all Canadians in everything, but the fact remains that the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent played a very important role in the history of Canada. I join all my colleagues in this House to wish him many more years of happiness.

Mr. Speaker: I shall be happy to convey the good wishes and congratulations of this House to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, former Prime Minister of Canada.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker: I should bring to the attention of hon. members that the Chair has received notices of a number of questions of privilege, as required by the Standing Orders. Indeed, I think that today we have established a record in the history of parliamentary democracy in the number of such notices received. I would invite the hon. members concerned to be as brief as possible in their presentations for the guidance of the Chair. I will call on the several members who have sent notices in the order in which the notices were received. I first call on the hon. member for Skeena.

MR. HOWARD—WORDS USED BY PRIME MINISTER IN REFERRING TO MEMBER

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege I raise relates to a situation that occurred in the House yesterday and is reported in Hansard on page 826, following a point of order I had raised. Following that point of order there was a comment by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). To put it in its context I think I should read the comment:

It may be the hon. member—

In that instance referring to me, I believe.

—was part of the riff-raff outside the hall when I was talking inside. He perhaps does not know—

Then there were interruptions. My question of privilege is that yesterday, because of the racket and the noise from this rabble that calls itself the Conservative party—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nielsen: You just destroyed your point of privilege.

Mr. Howard: —I was not able to hear the comments of the Prime Minister. If I had I think I might have raised a legitimate question of privilege at that time, which of course would have been the time to do it. The question of privilege I raise now is that my rights as a member were interfered with by the noise in the chamber. Based upon that, I move the following motion, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

• (1420)

That this House calls upon the Leader of the Official Opposition to attempt to instil in his followers a sense of propriety and responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is a waste of the time of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members know that the duty of the Chair is simply to decide whether there is a prima facie question of privilege. Obviously, the way the matter has been put before the House would tempt me to suggest to the hon. member that there is a bit of non sequitur. I would not think, in my humble opinion, that there is a relation between the motion that the hon. member proposes and the basis of the alleged question of privilege. In the circumstances I would think there is no point in suggesting to the House that the motion which he has proposed under the guise of privilege be debated at this time. I do not think there is a prima facie question of privilege.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise on a question of privilege but I should like to make it very clear that I take no exception at all to the description of my party as a rabble because it is my understanding that rabble means the common people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. FORTIN—PROTESTS RESPECTING RECORDED TELEPHONE MESSAGE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Party of Canada has been informed that people who dial a certain phone number in London, Ontario, hear a recorded message against the Negro population of the United States as a group. At the end of the message, the listener is invited to write to the Social Credit Party of Canada at a local address and in Ottawa.

In the name of the Canadian Social Credit Party, I want to put on the record of the House that neither the telephone number nor the address given in the recorded message has the slightest relation with our party. The Social Credit Party of Canada believes in the brotherhood of all human beings and that message has never been authorized by our party which entirely repudiates its content.

Mr. Speaker: Again I very much doubt that the hon. member would expect the Chair to render a ruling concerning his question of privilege. The hon. member has submitted his remarks for the consideration of the House and I believe he should not pursue the matter any further.

[English]

MR. REILLY—REPORT IN "LE DROIT" ALLEGING DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CERTAIN MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS PROTECTIVE STAFF

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects all members of the House. It is based on a report in yesterday's Le Droit in which it is alleged that certain members of the protective staff of the House complain that they are being discriminated against. It says that many ministers of the Crown are aware of the complaints and sympathize with them but that they would rather an ordinary member of the House of Commons raised the issue. I hereby raise it, Mr. Speaker, because this House is a symbol of opportunity and justice for Canadians and I believe that allegations of this kind should be investigated. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. O'Sullivan):

That the subject matter of my question be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice from the hon. member and have given the matter some thought. With respect, I suggest to the hon. member that there is no question of privilege. The hon. member suggests that his rights as a parliamentarian or his rights in the discharge of his function as a Member of Parliament are impeded in some way. The grievance or matter to which he has made reference is one, rather, of administration, and I would think that if there is a complaint it should not be considered in the way the hon. member has proposed, that is, by way of parliamentary privilege.

MR. BALDWIN—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING ABORIGINAL RIGHTS OF INDIANS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to follow that pillar of pure parliamentary propriety, the hon. member for Skeena, on a question of privilege. Nevertheless, I raise an issue which involves a statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, to be found on the same page of Hansard as that already referred to by the hon. member for Skeena. On page 826 the following exchange is recorded:

MR. HOWARD: Would the Prime Minister tell the House today whether his statement in 1969, which then reflected government policy of rejecting aboriginal rights, still stands?

MR. TRUDEAU: The hon. member will recall that spokesmen for his party as, indeed, for the Conservatives approved the government statement which was made in 1969.

MR. BALDWIN: No.

MR. TRUDEAU: If hon. members look up the record of what they said in Hansard, they will see that the only comment they had to make about the minister's policy was: "Too little, too late".

MR. BALDWIN: Not on that issue.

I might have been inclined to let the matter go on the basis that it might have been part of the prime ministerial repertoire of red herrings, but it happens that on January 26 the right hon. gentleman, responding to a question from the hon. member for Yukon, answered as follows:

Mr. Speaker, if I might disagree with the premise of the question, there has, of course, been a very clear statement by the government on the question of aboriginal rights. It was made in the House of Commons at the time of the publication of the policy paper on Indian Affairs, and it was wholeheartedly supported by the spokesman for the Conservative party and the speaker on behalf of the NDP at the time.

I do not know whether it was because of lack of knowledge, ignorance or intent on the part of the Prime Minister that the statement was made. I am concerned about this very important issue, I followed the advice of the right hon. gentleman and examined the text of the statements which were made. Although it is true that both I, answering on behalf of my party, and the hon. member for Skeena, answering on behalf of the New Democratic Party, gave some qualified approval to some of the proposals dealing with the issue of Indian problems the right hon. gentleman's assertion is not in accordance with the facts. On page 10583 of Hansard for June 25, 1969, appear two sentences, which is all I will read from my remarks of that time. The first reads:

There is bound to be some contention about aspects of the statement.

The second, in the next paragraph, reads:

The statement involves what would seem to be a limited interpretation of existing treaty rights, and a reluctance to deal with specific claims of aboriginal rights.

How the right hon. gentleman can construe those statements now as being wholehearted support of the government's policy on aboriginal rights is beyond me. I had contemplated moving a motion, but if, at any time a motion were to be moved referring to a committee the matter of misrepresentation by the Prime Minister or other members of the government, it would be a very busy committee indeed that would be handling the issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether there ought to be any debate at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

The Chair is required to determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. However, it is traditional and according to practice to allow another hon. member whose statements have been brought into the question of privilege to comment briefly on the statement made in order to make it easier for the Chair to rule. The difficulty here, of course, is that there is no motion and, in any event, the eventual ruling would be that there is no question of privilege. At the same time, I suppose the hon. member who has been brought into the discussion will probably rise to claim his own privilege and would have to be recognized for that purpose.

Therefore I think it is good practice to allow the member who has been brought into a question of privilege to reply briefly, and then the Chair will make its ruling.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the authorization you have given me. I will not abuse it but will do the same as the hon. member for Peace River did, read from the debates of June 25, 1969, but quote paragraphs different from those quoted by the hon. member for Peace River. This statement was made by the hon. member on behalf of his party near the beginning of his remarks:

• (1430)

Many of the thoughts which the minister expressed in his statement were good thoughts, repeating the thoughts in the report of the committee.

We welcome the statement by the minister. It amounts to an acceptance of many proposals made by the Indian people through the years, and made by those who have worked on their behalf, in this party and elsewhere.

He goes on at some length, but I will go to the paragraph from which the hon. member just quoted, the one that talks of aboriginal rights. This is followed by the phrase I believe he read.

There are bound to be some very serious problems about who has the right to be consulted and the fullness of the consultation. By and large this must be regarded as a welcome statement and a step forward toward equality for the Indian people of Canada.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the red herring is not one created by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) wants to argue the point, I also have something on what he has had to say.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would rather not bring the hon. member for Skeena into the discussion. Obviously this is a matter of dispute between two members of the House as to a statement of fact. In any event, it is clear that a dispute as to facts cannot be the basis for a question of privilege. Again I have to refer to the fact there is no motion proposed so that facilitates the task of the Chair.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because my name, position and the statement I made on that date have been brought into the matter. The rules prevent me from reading my own statement of June 25 in its entirety. Unlike the Prime Minister or the hon. member for Peace River, I will not extract pieces to support a particular contention. I simply suggest it be read in its entirety and it will be seen that what the Prime Minister said yesterday with regard to what I said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House with a view to discussing an issue which cannot be delayed any longer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat? I apologize to the hon. member but I am under the impression that he wants to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Perhaps it would be more suitable if the Chair allowed the hon. member to move this motion later when motions are called.

[English]

MR. GLEAVE—ANSWER OF MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR WHEAT BOARD CONCERNING AGREEMENT WITH RAILWAYS ON USE OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to an answer the minister in charge of the Wheat Board gave me on January 15. At that time I asked him whether the two major railroads, the CPR and CNR, had agreed to bear certain charges with regard to depreciation and the cost of operation of certain hopper cars that the government had purchased. His answer was that there was such an agreement and he would provide it. Yesterday I was informed in committee that such an agreement did not yet exist. I think the minister owes an explanation to me and the House and should give more complete information than he gave at that time. I would not charge the minister with a deliberate attempt to mislead the House, but I do think his statement was incomplete. I would, therefore, ask that he correct it at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this would be the time for the minister to make a further statement. Perhaps he could do this on motions or, if the hon. member wishes, he can take the opportunity provided by the question period to ask a further question when we reach the third row. The hon. member will be given an opportunity to do so at that time.

BANK OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF G. K. BOUEY AS GOVERNOR

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that the board of directors of the Bank of Canada has recommended the appointment of G. K. Bouey, senior deputy governor, to become governor of the bank. The Governor in Council today approved that recommendation. Mr. Bouey succeeds Louis Rasminsky who is retiring after being associated for more than 32 years with the Bank of Canada.

I should like to take this opportunity to express deep appreciation to Mr. Rasminsky for the integrity and dedication he has shown in the service of this country throughout his years with the bank and particularly as its governor.

CONTROL OF RETAIL GASOLINE PRICES—EFFECT OF ACTION BY COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House pursuant to Standing Order 43. The urgency and pressing necessity of this matter arises, so I am informed, because of present and combined activity by some, perhaps all, of the major oil companies to change thousands of contracts with retail gasoline outlet dealers. As a result, Mr. Speaker, control of consumer prices for gasoline will shift from the retailer to the supplier. With present concern over the cost of living at the stage where price controls may be necessary, the effect of such private and concentrated control over the price of a product that is a necessity to millions of Canadians requires action by the House.

With unanimous consent, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the matter hereby raised be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that it be an instruction to the committee to report back to this House as quickly as possible with its recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Oxford. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has noted, as I have, that there is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put at this time.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House with a view to discussing a question which cannot be delayed owing to the financial and national implications involved, and I mean the 1976 Olympic Games. The federal government contribution is still problematical not only for the people responsible but for all Canadians. Given the importance of this question and because those games will be a reflection of Canada's image throughout the world and in view of their financial implications, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That a special debate take place within the shortest delay, after discussion with the House leaders, on the general participation of the federal government to ensure success of the 1976 Montreal Olympic Games.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, the motion moved by the hon. member necessitates the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House agree unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore, the hon. member's motion cannot be moved at this time.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43, concerning the matter of aboriginal rights of native peoples throughout Canada.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the claim of the Nishga nation of Indian people has resulted in a deadlock. It is now a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, because of the many projects going on in Canada that affect the native peoples, their lands, their environment and their rights, that action be taken by parliament.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Taylor):

That the matter of the aboriginal rights of the native peoples be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and that that committee be convened forthwith to deal with this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. I regret, therefore, to advise the hon. member that the motion cannot be put at this time.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

This House welcomes the conclusion of the agreements on ending the war and restoring peace in Viet Nam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four parties to the Viet Nam cease-fire.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21 this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE MINISTRY

NATURE OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST RULES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the Prime Minister back in his seat. I thought for a moment that he had rushed off to establish a line of credit with the new governor of the Bank of Canada. I should like to ask the Prime Minister an important question about any regulations that may be laid down within the government in regard to conflict of interest as far as members of the government are concerned. In particular, are there any rules laid down and in force with regard to the ownership of property by ministers, and are there any regulations or rules regarding disclosure or the imposition of what is ordinarily called a blind trust?

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say that there are no regulations or legally binding rules. I go on to say that I, in conjunction with my colleagues in cabinet, have applied some rules such as those the hon. gentleman has referred to. I would willingly at some point discuss them at greater length if the House so desires. I would merely remind the Leader of the Opposition that the Speech from the Throne indicated a desire to bring this whole matter before parliament, and I would prefer to do this at a time when we might look not only at rules relating to ministers but for members of parliament and, indeed, members of the civil service. It is this total package that I would like to see discussed in parliament. Some of this may entail legislation, particularly changes in the act affecting the Senate and House of Commons. Other facets of the matter would probably be dealt with more in the form of a statement of policy by the government.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Prime Minister indicate at this time whether these informal practices that are followed require disclosure of property owned by ministers or require the establishment, in the alternative, of some kind of blind trust? Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House very succinctly what the situation is?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As succinctly as I can, I would say a blind trust is the vehicle recommended in cases when ministers are in a position where they be involved in market transactions in connection with securities. The disclosure of property has been requested by me of ministers essentially in cases where expropriation by the federal government is involved.

Mr. Stanfield: Are there any actual regulations or informal understandings or requirements regarding senior civil servants or senior officers and directors of Crown corporations?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the sense of general directives conveyed to them by their ministers. But here again I would repeat what I said a moment ago, that it would be my desire to formalize them and make them the object of a policy statement which would be along the lines I have just indicated, and deal with the whole matter. To give an example, in the case of senior civil servants who are brought into the service and who have substantial securities, a blind trust arrangement is requested of them before their appointment is made.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's reference to the desirability of covering this matter in a comprehensive way, I wonder whether he would take a look at Bill C-38 in my name and, if it is acceptable, he could take it over and bring it in?

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON LAND HOLDINGS IN PICKERING AIRPORT AREA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the imminence of the expropriation of land in the Pickering airport area, would the Prime Minister undertake to make known to the House, and therefore to the public, the names of all of his ministers or senior civil servants who may presently have land holdings in the area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the case of ministers I believe I could give the answer right now if the House so desires. In the case of senior civil servants it would probably take longer to canvass them all, but I will undertake to attempt that. The answer to the first part of the question is that there is one minister, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has property in the area to be expropriated. He has had it for many years, indeed, before he became a minister and before expropriation was ever thought of or contemplated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Trudeau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am told that it is not even in the area to be expropriated. I believe it is in the noise zone, or something like that.

SUGGESTION THAT CABINET MEMBER MEET WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF NISHGA NATION CONCERNING LAND CLAIM

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the noise must be very close to this chamber. I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the decision yesterday of the Supreme Court with respect to the Nishga nation land claim. Without getting into whether it was a 4-3 or 3-3-1 decision or whatever it was, would the Prime Minister be prepared to meet or to have someone in his cabinet meet with representatives of the Nishga nation or the Nishga tribal council to see whether or not the government of Canada can co-operate with that nation of people to the end that their claim is recognized and dealt with?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the suggestion under consideration.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—PRIORITY IN DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Among the numerous measures that the minister is suggesting, and in view of the seriousness of unemployment and the great number of families at the poverty level, would the minister tell us whether family allowances will have priority over other projects submitted for consideration?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question in the speech I made in this House last January 11.

[Later:]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us whether the provinces have stressed the importance of a family policy, in order to develop as soon as possible a scheme of increased family allowances.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, this is not only the provincial point of view, but the federal government has clearly stated the importance it attaches to the improvement of a family allowance system.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN—INTRODUCTION OF NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell us whether the bill which has been introduced during the last session of the 28th Parliament will be reintroduced during this session?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House that the legislation concerning the family income, introduced last year in this House, is being reviewed and that we would introduce a new bill to the House during this session.

TRADE

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES CONCERNING BURKE-HARTKE BILL

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of increased support in the United States for the Burke-Hartke trade restriction bill, has the minister made any direct representations to the United States government recently to assure that the Nixon administration will oppose this bill and, if necessary, veto the bill if it is passed by the United States Congress this year?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the Burke-Hartke bill and its protectionism, and I am also aware that there are business groups in the United States that oppose it. I am hopeful that the administration will oppose it as well, as did the last administration.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware of speculation that the enactment of this bill, which incidentally insiders in Washington say is virtually a certainty this year, could end up costing Canada as many as 300,000 jobs and, if so, is the government going to take immediate and energetic action to remove this threat to our vital interests, or is the government simply going to cross its fingers and hope for the best from the efforts of the United States administration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's postscript puts him out of order.

Mr. Hellyer: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member, but it is somewhat irregular for hon. members to take advantage of the situation by asking a question which is clearly out of order and then seeking to ask a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also recognize that the hon. member for Trinity is not the only one who is doing this, so he will, of course, be recognized for his supplementary question.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister might have answered the first part of my question. I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council. Would he use his good offices to arrange a meeting at the earliest possible date of the Canada-United States parliamentary committee so that members of parliament from all sides of the House can impress upon their U.S. counterparts the stake both countries have in resisting protectionist impulses and working for a greater easing of world trade restrictions?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to use whatever good offices I have, but this is an entirely new jurisdiction that the hon. member has conferred upon me this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity, who has been associated with the group of questions, knows there is a method he may follow to have the subject included on the agenda. His representations and questions have been noted.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Trinity to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In answer to the question whether or not the government is willing to approach the United States government regarding non-passing of the Burke-Hartke bill, the minister said he hoped it would not pass. Can the government not do any better than hope and pray on an important matter like this? Can they not get the lead out and take some action on this important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—SUGGESTED ACTION TO PREVENT REDUCTION OF NUMBER IN CERTAIN PROVINCES PENDING FURTHER STUDY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I directed questions to the Prime Minister concerning the redistribution of seats and a decrease in the number of constituencies from the present number in Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

As provincial commissions are sitting and working on the redistribution to be made, it is necessary to have early action on this matter; otherwise they will have completed their work and any question of amendment of the constitution will be virtually out. I would ask the Prime Minister whether the government has given any consideration to a start in the direction of actually providing, while the whole question is being canvassed at length, that the number of seats in the respective provinces shall not be reduced? Something along that line would enable a full and complete study and would be assured, I believe, of a reasonable degree of support in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I looked around anxiously to see whether the statement by the right hon. gentleman that such a procedure would get a reasonable amount of support was accurate. I saw our own ranks applauding rather vigorously, but I did not notice too much on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: You certainly have to coach your applause, Pierre. It doesn't come easy, does it?

Mr. Trudeau: As I indicated the other day in dealing with this question, any solution such as that suggested by the right hon. gentleman might have the effect of either changing the principle of representation by population or have the consequence of a much larger number of members in the House. Let me just say that if a consensus could develop among the various parties along the lines of the suggestion that has been made, or along other lines such as perhaps delaying the application of the present redistribution, this party—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that our suggestion has more support than that of the right hon. gentleman. Both are suggestions that we are prepared to discuss. Let me just ask our House leader to consult the leaders of the other parties to see if such a result can be obtained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Inertia always has excuses. The right hon. gentleman received applause from those behind him who are generally afraid to support anything that comes from the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It was your side.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Prime Minister whether he will treat this matter seriously because, after all, while representation by population has its place, regionalism has always been accepted in redistribution of seats from the earliest days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we should not engage in a debate. It is perhaps more a matter of statements than questions in which we are getting involved now. I suggest we should limit ourselves to questions and answers at this moment, and for that purpose I will recognize the hon. member for York South.

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY ALTERNATIVES TO REDUCTIONS IN CERTAIN PROVINCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of the fact that merely delaying the results of the present redistribution plan will not accomplish anything in respect of representation in this country as far as certain parts of Canada are concerned, and in view of the fact that discussions among the House leaders could not possibly cover all the various suggestions that might be made, will the Prime Minister give serious consideration to setting up a special committee to study various alternatives that he or his advisers might suggest, as well as those suggested by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert and others, and perhaps come up with some suggestion that could be acceptable to all parties in the House as a final step, instead of merely delaying the application?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this idea of referring the matter to a committee is one with which we would agree. I merely hoped that a discussion between the House leaders might provide a quicker solution than the one suggested by the hon. gentleman. Certainly I will consider this and, if the member has no objection, I will ask our House leader to consult the other leaders to see whether they prefer the committee route, the route we suggested or the route suggested by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

TRADE

POSSIBLE SALE OF MINI-TYPE SUBMARINE TO RUSSIA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the arrangements for the sale of the Pisces. I am wondering whether or not his department has withdrawn its objections to the sale of this underwater craft to the Russians?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): If the hon. member is talking about a new order, the department has indicated to the manufacturers that we would be prepared to issue an export permit for the export of this vessel to the U.S.S.R. provided certain conditions are met.

Mr. Forrestall: As this is so very germane to good relations with the United States, I ask the government in all seriousness whether they are satisfied that no compromise of classified information, technological information, for example, is involved, and do we have the approval of the United States for such a sale?

Mr. Basford: Is the hon. member opposed to business for western Canada?

Mr. Forrestall: I am opposed to making a mess of our trading relations with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are getting involved in debate at this point.

[Later:]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, may I take the opportunity of answering the second part of the question asked by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East? The conditions to which I referred are those respecting the classified materials. We have received verbal undertakings, or verbal statements that there is no problem as far as materials are concerned, or with respect to black boxes and so forth, but we want to be sure of that before we issue the export permit.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSSIBLE EXCEEDING OF CEILING SET BY ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the hon. gentleman inform the House whether the $850 million ceiling provided under section 30 of the Export Development Act has been exceeded by the Export Development Corporation as of today and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It has not been exceeded to my knowledge. We shall have an opportunity of reviewing the outstanding loans and commitments of the Export Development Corporation very shortly, perhaps tomorrow on second reading of Bill C-3.

[Later:]

Mr. Stevens: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary. When the financing which has now been authorized by the board of directors of the Export Development Corporation in the form of offers outstanding is added to the outstanding liabilities under section 30 of the act, is the ceiling exceeded and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. Gillespie: That is the purpose of Bill C-3 which I hope the House will deal with expeditiously. The success of the Export Development Corporation has been very substantial, as I believe the hon. member will recognize. He has some knowledge of the banking industry. We have now reached the point at which we need further authorization from parliament to raise the ceiling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May we have order, please? There are a number of hon. members seeking to ask supplementaries on this subject. I suggest we return to it later. Clearly, we are again getting into debate. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment, but at this point the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED UNFITNESS OF TRACK TO CARRY GRAIN HOPPER CARS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of a matter which was raised in the House last May and June and revived again yesterday in a committee of the House. In view of the statement made yesterday by an official of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the effect that almost half of the railway track in western Canada is unfit to carry the hopper cars the government purchased for grain movement, can the minister advise what action is being taken by the railways to upgrade this track to standards which will permit wider use of the cars and tell us whether the government is requiring the railway companies to take any action to ensure this upgrading?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN HOPPER CARS—ALLEGED UNRESOLVED CONDITIONS OF PURCHASE

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): That is the sixth or seventh question the hon. gentleman has taken as notice. I hope he will reply to all of them one of these days. My supplementary is directed to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It concerns the same matter. In view of the fact that a number of conditions were laid down by the government when supplying these hopper cars to the railways for grain movement, and since these have not been resolved, will the minister tell us briefly what these conditions are and which ones are in dispute with the railways?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The premise stated by the hon. member is not accurate. The hopper cars are going into service on those lines where they can be used to greatest advantage. It is true there are many lines that cannot handle them, just as there are many elevators that do not have adequate scales for large-sized modern trucks. Both these questions, and the urgent need to develop better facilities to handle the hopper cars and the trucks, are searching questions to be resolved in the course of discussions at the Canada Grains Council level about the future of the grain handling and transportation system. That is exactly why I attach such importance to those discussions, and to moving ahead with them so that we can bring about improvements on the positive side instead of always being concerned about the negative side of the problems that go with new developments.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has answered the question I asked the Minister of Transport but he has not answered the question I asked him. What conditions laid down by the government are not resolved with the railroads in connection with the handling of these hopper cars? Would he specify these conditions that have not yet been resolved?

Mr. Lang: There are no conditions laid down that have not been resolved. As I indicated to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar a couple of weeks ago, an agreement was reached between the Canadian Wheat Board and the railways with regard to the initial use of the cars. A further and final agreement is being developed at this stage. The actual use of the cars is a matter which, under that agreement, is basically one for discussion between the Canadian Wheat Board and the railways. Those discussions are proceeding without any hitch whatsoever, and I know of no difference of view between the railways and the Canadian Wheat Board about the best use of those cars.

GRAIN HOPPER CARS—PAYMENT OF COSTS OF OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): In view of the fact that the railways are making use of the hopper cars on a free basis, can the minister say whether or not the government or the Wheat Board has been required by the railways to pay operating costs, repairs and depreciation costs in respect of these cars?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The interim agreement deals with some of these questions. The initial cost of maintenance is at present being borne by the railways. The question of the final disposition of these costs is one of the matters which is being further discussed in connection with the final agreement. The position, basically, that I have taken throughout is that the objective is to assure that the additional grain moves, and that no additional profit accrues to the railways through the use of the cars. Our basic provision of the cars and the capital involved was made with the objective of ensuring that the additional grain does move.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say yes. The Canadian government and the Department of National Defence in particular, which has most of the personnel there, are very much aware of the problem and are taking all necessary precautions.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TEMPORARY RELEASE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Solicitor General a question. In light of the fact that a man by the name of Head has been convicted of the murder of Tanya Busch while he was on one of those temporary absences from prison, a man who had been charged on four different occasions with raping girls between the ages of six and seven and who was released without any supervision over him, would the minister agree to have a judicial inquiry into the temporary release system which has sabotaged the good parole system set up by the Diefenbaker government?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, changes were made in the temporary absence system last summer as a result of that and other events. As a matter of fact, dangerous sexual offenders are no longer allowed out on temporary absence under any condition. Also, last summer a task force was set up to study all questions relating to temporary absence and parole, under the chairmanship of Judge Hugessen, and I received its report just before Christmas. That report is under study by officials in my department at present, and a report on it will be made to the House shortly.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In light of the fact that when I first raised this question in the House he asked me on that occasion if I was linking the two together, the release of Head and the murder of the girl, and in light of the fact that the law has now linked them, does he not consider under these circumstances that he should have a judicial inquiry into the temporary release program? I am sure the Prime Minister recalls the Head murder case.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, I recall it very well, but at least until the appeal procedures have expired I would not subscribe to the statement made by the hon. member. As to the part of his question about an inquiry into temporary release, I think the Solicitor General answered that very thoroughly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe who has a supplementary to his earlier question.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSSIBLE EXCEEDING OF CEILING IN ACT—TIMING OF LEGISLATION TO CORRECT SITUATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of his answer to my earlier question that indeed a ceiling increase is needed, and in view of his predecessor's comment that he anticipated that there would be some $500 million worth of financings agreed to by the Export Development Corporation during 1972, does the minister now agree with an official of that corporation when he says that he feels this is an emergency measure that is coming before the House and, if he does, would the minister explain why it was not brought before the House last summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take exception to two aspects of the question asked by the hon. member. The question may be important and interesting, but the hon. member is asking the minister whether he agrees with a statement made by an official outside the House. That clearly is not in order. Perhaps later on, if he has a further opportunity, the hon. member might rephrase his question. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO JAPAN—REDUCTION OF RESTRICTIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary in the area of export credits. In light of a recent study commissioned by the Canada-Japan Trade Council in which Canadian inability and apathy toward taking advantage of tremendous opportunities to increase exports to Japan are linked with what is generally felt to be cumbersome and often inadequate government programs to aid exporters, could the minister tell the House what initiatives he is now planning to remedy this situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be allowed to reply briefly, but the hon. member is asking for a statement which normally should be made on motions. The minister might indicate whether he proposes to make a statement; otherwise the question would hardly be in order.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it important to put on the record that Canadian exports to Japan last year increased by 15 per cent. There has been a major export drive by Canada so far as Japan in concerned. It was started by the former minister, my predecessor, with a major mission. I think the Japanese have responded in part by the liberalization of their trade regulations but, from our point of view, not nearly enough. We think much more needs to be done and we have made representations to that effect.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In light of the minister's latter remark may I ask him, can he now assure the House that Japan is living up to the promises made to his predecessor that there would be substantial reductions of restrictions on Canadian imports, and when can we expect a full report on this subject to be made to the House?

Mr. Gillespie: As I indicated in my first reply, we believe the Japanese government have made a number of important moves. We do not think they have gone far enough yet and we will be urging them to go farther.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with regard to trade with Japan. Is is not a fact that practically all of that increase, and in fact almost all of our trade with Japan is in raw materials, which provides practically no jobs at home, and would he stop being so proud and patting himself on the back?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question; that is debate.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN FIRE INSURANCE PREMIUMS BY ROYAL INSURANCE GROUP—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the Royal Insurance Group has raised premiums on fire insurance for home furnishings by 91 per cent in some cases, while the cost of home furnishings has risen by only 9.8 per cent in the last five years, would he consider investigating whether this raise is justified?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to ask the officials to see whether this is a matter that can be looked into under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the minister's reply. Will he also investigate whether tenants, as a result of these increased premiums, are being asked to offset higher costs of providing fire insurance for homeowners and landlords?

Mr. Gray: I will ask my officials to bear this in mind also.

SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—POSSIBLE FEDERAL AID TO REPAIR DAMAGE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister is aware of the urgency of speedy reconstruction of dikes, seawalls and roads around the lakes in southwestern Ontario because of tremendous storm damage, and is also aware that direct provincial aid has been held up for some weeks pending a federal announcement of financial participation. Can the minister say whether such a decision can be expected in the next day or so?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I talked to my provincial counterpart earlier this week and late last week. I understand that they are making submissions to the Ontario cabinet in Toronto today, and I understand that a submission is going to be made here possibly around the first of next week.

INCOME TAX

ELECTION BY BENEFICIARIES OF TRUSTS—ISSUANCE OF REGULATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, or perhaps to the Minister of Finance. Under the terms of the Income Tax Act effective January 1, 1972, beneficiaries of trusts had a period of election ending in February of this year, depending upon regulatory instructions. Since the regulations have not been issued will the minister kindly advise when they are going to be issued, or do they have to await the budget, and is his budget to be presented after March 1 next?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to look into that matter and report to the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF SECTION 12 OF 1972 TAX RETURN GUIDE

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. In order to keep the government's attractive 1972 income tax return guide crystal clear, would the minister tell the House whether the Department of National Revenue is going to issue an explanation of the statement in section 12 that "the amount to be reported a 'taxable amount of dividends from taxable Canadian corporations' is the actual amount of dividends received plus one-third of this total."?

ACCEPTANCE OF VALUATION OF FARMLAND—REQUEST FOR GUIDELINES FOR FARMERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue concerning persons who are running about the country claiming that they can evaluate farmland and assess the farmers. In actual fact, they are conning many farmers out of money. Can the minister indicate to the House and the country whether the valuations that these people place on farmland will be accepted by his department or is there a possibility that they will all be rejected and the farmers' money wasted?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to whom the hon. member is referring but I gather they are not employees of the Department of National Revenue. If he will give me the details I will be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Korchinski: Would the minister also have his department prepare guidelines for the use of farmers so that they can set up these evaluations themselves instead of being fleeced by those so-called experts. Perhaps the Department of Agriculture might assist in this matter.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Agriculture and I will be glad to get together and see if we can provide anything more than has been already. We want to help farmers, as other taxpayers, get the full value of tax reform.

Mr. Hees: If they can only wade through it.

REVISED TD-1 FORMS PERMITTING $1,000 DEDUCTION TO PERSONS 65 AND OVER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of National Revenue if he would produce the instructions that went out with the revised TD-1 forms last August in connection particularly with the position of Canadians who are 65 years of age or over. The minister undertook to look into the question. Can he now report to the House?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have sought the advice of my officials and hope to be able to answer the hon. gentleman tomorrow.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister be able to inform the House at the same time whether any other revised forms have been sent out that would be available on request and are more favourable to the taxpayer than the forms that are actually being circulated?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I can inquire but I do not think that the hon. gentleman would suggest that people who wanted to take the opportunity to have their deductions on the basis of the proposed higher age exemption should have been prevented from doing so. On the other hand, they should not have been required to do so either because, of course, until the House passes the new law there can be no assurance that this will actually be the exemption allowed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about come to the end of the question period and there are still a number of supplementaries on the subject. The Chair is prepared to recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN HOPPER CARS—POSSIBLE PURCHASE BY RAILWAYS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact it is the responsibility of the railways to supply and maintain sufficient equipment to meet transportation needs, and the government has assumed some of its responsibility by purchasing hopper cars, is consideration being given to having the railroads buy the equipment from the government to carry out their responsibilities or is it the intention of the government to retain ownership?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the specific reason for the involvement of the government in the purchase of this equipment was the difference of view about whether the railways could actually carry all the grain offered in the equipment they had if the elevator companies went to a complete seven-day-week system, as well as the difficulties the elevator companies had in connection with that system. In the area of fixed rates, negotiations were not proving to be very fruitful. As a result, the government entered into the matter with the purchase of hopper cars to make sure that the grain moved. The dispute on the issue obviously is an ongoing one. At the time it may be resolved I think it would be appropriate for the railways to take over the equipment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member for Assiniboia because I thought he had a supplementary to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. As I have said, we have reached the end of the question period and my intention was to recognize supplementaries on that question. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): It is not a supplementary but it is an important question.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will have to call orders of the day. I apologize to hon. members. The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo can be recognized tomorrow. I have to apologize to many hon. members in the fourth and fifth rows who were not called on today. I hope an effort can be made tomorrow by the Chair to give them some priority. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Crouse: No, Mr. Speaker. I had a supplementary to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I did say there could be one supplementary; perhaps I might allow the hon. member to ask it.

Oral Questions

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE CLASSIFICATION AS INCOME OF COMPENSATION AWARDED TO SWORDFISHERMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the question is related to the income tax problem and is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. It is a very serious problem in Atlantic Canada. When compensation was awarded to the swordfishermen in Atlantic Canada it was to cover their capital loss on their fishing gear. Is it the intention of the government to classify this compensation as income and require the fishermen to pay full income tax on it? If so, what steps is the government going to take to pay the fishermen for their capital losses?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it would not be my intention to charge people income tax on any more than is necessary. I shall look into the question for the hon. member but I cannot answer today.

Mr. Hees: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oxford on a point of order.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I refer to my motion proposed earlier today under Standing Order 43. When Your Honour asked for unanimous consent I could not help but see a great many members on the government benches exhibiting approval, but one member on the government side has become so accustomed to saying no that he did so automatically without looking at his colleagues. I wonder if Your Honour would consider putting the question again, because I know that the government is interested in keeping consumer prices down.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that it would not be regular to put the question more than once. We must assume that it has been decided today. As an exception, the hon. member might be allowed to propose the motion again tomorrow and we will put the question a second time.

Mr. Hees: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. As Your Honour has correctly pointed out, each day at the end of the question period, because of the limited time, a number of members are not able to pose questions on behalf of their constituents. Would it, therefore, be possible to have a meeting convened, with Your Honour as chairman, of the House leaders to see if the question period could not be extended to one hour by changing the rules of the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that I doubt that this would achieve the purpose he intends. I would have other suggestions to make but I shall not make them now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business of the House from now until the end of next week.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, today we will debate the Viet Nam resolution. Tomorrow, I propose to call Bill C-3, the Export Development Act, and if my hon. friend the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce succeeds in having that bill adopted on second reading we might consider Bill C-132, the Investment Review Act. Following the Export Development Act tomorrow, I am holding a priority place for the reports from the Standing Committees on Labour, Manpower and Immigration and Miscellaneous Estimates. I reserve the opportunity to bring on their reports as early as possible. With the bills I have mentioned and the reports of the committees, certainly the early part of next week will be occupied.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if negotiations on the budget have progressed to a satisfactory state with the junior partner in the coalition so that he can tell us when the budget is likely to be presented?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There have been no negotiations whatsoever.

Mr. Hees: Is it not necessary?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I hope that I will be in a position to announce the date early next week.

• (1530)

Mr. Lewis: Tell the hon. member not to be so "smart-alecky."

An hon. Member: Tell him again.

Mr. Lewis: I will tell him again if he does not stop that kind of rubbish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader whether the government's legislation respecting old age pensions will be on the order paper and available for consideration next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot offer my hon. friend that assurance, but it will be available to the House in an attractive form at an early date.

Mr. Baldwin: That is false packaging.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

This House welcomes the conclusion of the Agreements on ending the War and restoring peace in Viet Nam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the Note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four Parties to the Viet Nam cease-fire.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there was agreement among the House leaders, the announcement of which has probably been overlooked in all the excitement, respecting the length of speeches in this debate. Perhaps the government House leader could inform the House about this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be agreeable to this House if the initial speeches were 40 minutes each in the first round and if all subsequent speeches were limited to 20 minutes. That limitation would provide greater opportunity for participation in this debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this House had already had the opportunity for a preliminary exchange of views between party spokesmen before the departure from Canada of the first group of observers to the new Commission in Viet Nam. Despite the shortness of time, personnel from External Affairs and from our defence forces are already in the field. On behalf of the international community, they will observe and report on the implementation of the agreement on ending the war and restoring the peace in Viet Nam.

When the moment of decision came, the parties to the cease-fire had radically compressed the expected timetable. Consequently, the government was faced with the need to decide in time to have the Canadian delegation take off from Montreal on Saturday of last week if we were to comply with the terms of the agreements. Indeed, the parties asked us to do so on the basis of complex documents, some of which we saw for the first time on Wednesday of last week. Our participation, I think, was perceived by all sides in this House as necessary. Certainly, the speeches that were made by the party spokesmen when I made my first statement supports that position. I believe it was seen by the great majority of Canadians, as necessary. It was so because all Canadians, and indeed people the world over, so ardently desired that the fighting should stop in Viet Nam. As I explained to the House on January 24, the day of the government's decision, Canada had a choice to make that day.

On the face of it, it was a dilemma: we could, on one hand, accept membership in the new commission with whatever reservations we saw fit. This is what the parties to the agreement were asking us to do. But it would have meant committing Canada to an important step to which there are Canadian preconditions; and it would have meant doing so well before we could possibly know whether those preconditions were met or, in view of the complexity of the agreements involved, whether they were even likely to be met. The government would have regarded that as an abdication of responsibility. I am sure all hon. members would have so regarded it. On the other hand, we could have declined to participate in the new commission from the outset and turned it down flatly. By doing so, we could have stood in the way of ending the fighting in Viet Nam. No Canadian would have wished his country to do that.

We, therefore, decided to take part initially, and make available to the new commission the number of Canadian observers required by the agreements to meet the timetable set by the parties—in short, during that initial period, do all that we could to discharge the obligations of membership. But we were not prepared to commit Canada to open-ended membership before we were satisfied that Canada's preconditions for membership had been reasonably met. I should like to add parenthetically that these preconditions on membership had been enunciated by myself on behalf of the government and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on a number of occasions, not only in recent weeks but really over a long period of time when we had been asked to consider the possibility that somewhere in the world we might have to participate in some supervisory operations. Indeed, at the time we debated in this House the question of the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong, I laid down very clearly the kinds of preconditions we had in mind. I believe it was useful for us to have done so, and I believe that that has had some salutary effect upon the forms of the agreements entered into by the parties and upon the form of the protocol relating to the supervisory commission.

Our participation which will be for the first 60 days, will enable us to evaluate the arrangements made for international observation and reporting and to learn what scope there is for mediation. I must make it clear that Canada's preconditions were not mere gestures of reluctance; they were the product of long and sometimes bitter experience, and they were an effort to point the way toward effective international observation and reporting. Indeed, I think the preconditions that were established will help whatever other supervisory activities may be authorized by anyone anywhere in the world in future. They are the sorts of conditions we have laid down before the United Nations when we have talked about peacekeeping activities and how they might be organized.

We shall see, in the first 60 days, whether the arrangements can be improved. In particular, we shall see whether a continuing political authority is provided. We shall see whether the contracting parties are determined to make the agreements work. We shall see how our associates in the new commission view the responsibilities of our collective role. If we conclude that Canada's conditions are adequately met and that Canada's continued participation would be effective, we may decide to accept full continued membership, with or without reservations. If we conclude that Canada's conditions are inadequately met or that we are likely to be drawn again into an exercise in futility and frustration, as the previous commission had become, we shall decide to withdraw. Whichever decision is made will be conveyed to this House.

To avoid misunderstanding let me add this: we are not going to tackle those first 60 days of the commission's existence in a spirit of diffident and passive caution. We are going to make this commission work, if it can be made to work. Within its properly limited functions, we shall try to make it an active and inquisitive commission and an open, hard working and co-operative one. Frustration, inactivity and ineffectiveness have been forced upon us in Viet Nam in the past. If they are forced upon us again, we are determined that it will be no fault of Canada's.

Members will be aware that the cease-fire machinery includes joint commissions on which the parties to the cease-fire are represented, as well as the international commission on which Canada is serving. Unless these joint commissions function effectively, the international commission cannot function.

There have been great difficulties in setting up these joint commissions. Many of these difficulties seem to be psychological in nature. Given the history of the conflict, this is no surprise. The time of enforced waiting is, however, being put to good use by the International Commission on Control and Supervision. The logistics support and organizational arrangements for the teams and the headquarters are being improved. So far, co-operation between the members of the ICCS has left nothing to be desired. The moment the joint commissions are functioning effectively, the international commission can begin to deploy its teams and get down to work. I was informed today that the first movement of the commissions may begin very soon out to very limited areas. The situation in Viet Nam is still serious. I do not want to minimize the real risks that exist. These can only increase if the cease-fire itself, and the supervisory parties, continue to be ineffective.

In trying to make the commission work, we shall bear in mind that there are things which neither we nor the commission as a whole are expected to do. In particular, it must be clearly understood that neither the Canadian delegation nor the commission as a whole are a force to keep the peace. I regret very much that the shorthand term peacekeeping force is used so frequently because it seems to cause misunderstanding on the part of the general public. We are not sending a regiment to keep the peace in Viet Nam. We are sending a group of civilians and members of the armed forces to undertake a civilian task, which is to supervise a peace which we hope will come. It is the parties to the agreement who bear the responsibility for keeping the peace. We may be able to play a good offices role from time to time if the parties wish to avail themselves of the services of the commission or of the Canadian delegation for that purpose.

To accomplish the tasks which do form part of the responsibilities of the commission, we have provided, and are continuing to assemble, a body of men and women of the first quality. The delegation is headed by a foreign service officer of distinction and experience, including experience in Indo-China, Ambassador Michel Gauvin. It is composed of personnel of the Department of National Defence and of the Department of External Affairs who have been specially selected for the task. Many of them have previous experience of Indo-China and of international observation roles elsewhere. They can be counted upon to do all that anyone could, and the government will give them maximum support in their task. The government is mindful of the fact that Canada has been asked by all four parties to participate; Canada and the Canadian delegation are not the nominees, representatives or spokesmen of any one party or of one side in the Viet Nam struggle. The delegation will conduct itself accordingly.

As I told the House on January 24, the texts embodying the international observer arrangements are complex. I am sure those members of the House who have had an opportunity of studying the documents will agree with me that they are not only complex, but I think I can add without casting any reflection on them, they are a bit ambiguous also and, perhaps, deliberately so. We are continuing our careful study and analysis of them, but their full meaning and implication will only become clear in the light of our experience in seeking to apply them. Our publicly-stated conditions seem to have influenced those who wrote the agreements, but serious inadequacies remain.

It is important that the House be aware of what we consider to be the principal inadequacies of the international observer arrangements. One is that the agreements by themselves do not provide for a continuing political authority. It may be, of course, that the international conference envisaged in the agreements will repair that deficiency. I do not make this as a point of criticism particularly, I merely point out that it would have been perhaps impossible for the parties to the agreement to end the war in Viet Nam to have established an adequate international authority to which the supervisory commission should report without having the sort of international conference that is contemplated a few weeks hence. The government would have preferred the agreement and its supervision to come under the aegis of the United Nations. It is happy to note, however, that the Secretary-General of the United Nations will be invited to attend the international conference. This was one of the suggestions that we made very early, that it would help greatly if the Secretary-General could be there. If I may add a word, it would also suit us if he were the continuing political authority to which the supervisory commission might report.

Another deficiency is the obligation of unanimity in the commission's decisions and reports. It seems significant that the parties, wanting an effective commission, should none the less have provided that it must be subject to a rule of unanimity; in other words, to a veto. The effects of that rule are alleviated, as I pointed out before and as hon. members will have noted, by a qualified provision for reporting by individual members of the commission if unanimity cannot be achieved; but such reports would have no status as commission reports.

A further deficiency is that the new commission and each of its teams must act as a single body comprising representatives of all four members. This makes action by one, two or three national delegations impossible. This could turn out to be virtually an invitation to paralysis. We shall also be testing by experience the qualified provisions for the commission's freedom of movement.

Another deficiency is that the parties have provided that each of the four commission countries should pay not only the salaries and allowances of their personnel, but a fixed percentage of the general budget of the commission as well. This percentage turns out to be small, 2 per cent. The government is not inclined to make an issue of paying it. But however small, Canada has on several occasions expressed opposition in principle to paying any share of the general budget of the commission at all.

We believe that the provision for the sort of infrastructure and the payment for the ordinary expenses of the commission could have been met elsewhere. I understand the argument that is used in order to justify a token contribution from each of the members of the supervisory commission is that each of us under the circumstances would support economy in the expenses of the commission. This was the argument that was put to me. I said it was not one I could defend very well to the taxpayers of canada who would in any event be paying the salaries and allowances of the personnel. I thought there were surely more effective ways of ensuring economy. However, as I say, the 2 per cent is very small and I would not for that reason consider that Canada should withdraw.

Then, too, we have been concerned that the task of the international observers be realistic and realizable. Yet the agreement provides that the commission shall supervise and control the entry into South Viet Nam of military personnel and all military equipment. This seems to specify a task which is clearly beyond the means of an international commission of this size or, indeed, of any likely size.

Finally, although passing reference is made in the agreement to Cambodia and Laos, no precise arrangements are envisaged for broadening the cease-fire and settlement to these two countries. There seems to be no intention of having them participate in the international conference. We can only hope that, in the weeks ahead, the effects of a cessation of hostilities in Viet Nam will be extended to these two countries, so that the fighting will stop throughout Indo-China. Indeed, it is disappointing that Asian involvement in the arrangements as a whole is so slight. The omission of Japan and the ASEAN group of countries, except for Indonesia, is particularly conspicuous.

Some of these shortcomings in the arrangement are now built in. Others could be altered at the International Conference. Still others could be corrected or alleviated in their effects if the parties and our associates in the commission show enough good will and enough determination to make the commission work and be effective. We shall be watching and working for that. As I said at the outset, we are not taking a passive or a reluctant attitude; we want to make the commission work.

The comments I have made are not intended as the sort of facile criticism that those who were not involved in hammering out the agreement can always level at those who were. Obviously, this was an extremely difficult negotiation. It is a wonder there was any agreement at all. I am not suggesting that the circumstances could have permitted a better arrangement. What I am trying to do is establish, from the point of view of a conscientious member of the International Commission of Control and Supervision, the magnitude of the task given to us and the apparent poverty of the arrangements available to carry it out. This is not an effort to establish some sort of fancied position of moral superiority. It is an attempt to explain why we cannot undertake an open-ended commitment at this time: to lay before the House and the Canadian people the sorts of problems that can be foreseen and that led us to warn we might have to withdraw.

We will do what we can to alleviate the effect of these shortcomings by our own efforts, by the manner in which we approach the commission's operations and our participation in them. I have referred, for example, to the provision for unanimity. We are determined not to be frustrated by it. One way we will do this is by making the commission and its activities and proceedings as open and public as possible. We shall consider ourselves free to communicate our views, and the difference between our views and those of other delegations, to whatever person or organization we think fit, or to the public and the press. This applies to the rule of unanimity or any other provision of the cease-fire that might reduce us to inactivity or ineffectiveness.

For sixty days we are going to put everything to the test: the viability and effectiveness of the international supervisory arrangements themselves, the will and determination of the parties and of our commission colleagues to make the agreements and the commission work, indeed ourselves and our own ability to make the commission work and work effectively. By the end of the 60 days, Canada will form its own judgment of that experience and of prospects for the future. On the basis of that judgment, Canada will reach its own decision on continued participation for a further period.

I want to say candidly now that in some important respects, the international observer arrangements are unpromising. I will not prejudge the government's decision either way, but no one should assume as a matter of course that continued Canadian participation will be forthcoming.

Before concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the hundreds of Canadian men and women, civilian and military, who have served in commissions in the past. I say this because, although I have said on a number of occasions that the International Control Commission was reduced to a farce, it was not because of lack of effort on the part of the Canadians who served on that commission. It was just in the nature of the arrangements that had been made and that we are trying to correct on this occasion.

I should like to pay tribute to the men and women who are now in Viet Nam to begin work in the new commission, and to those who are preparing to go there. They went there and they are now going, not because their country has national interests of its own to pursue there, but because Canada recognizes it has a responsibility to contribute to peace in the world if it can do so effectively. I know of no better way of contributing to Canada's national interest than to end the war in Viet Nam, or to help end the war in Viet Nam.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Viet Nam

Mr. Sharp: The task is difficult: it can also be dangerous. Some Canadians have lost their lives trying to accomplish it. Others may yet do so. We bear a heavy responsibility to them: it is to ensure that their dedication and courage serve to contribute effectively to the maintenance of peace. We must do all we can to ensure their role is effective, and we must withdraw them if, despite their best efforts, their role seems doomed to ineffectiveness.

That is the purpose of the government's policy and of its recent decision. I know it is also the purpose of all Canadians and of this House which represents them.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, earlier while listening to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), I almost reached the point of asking myself this: Why are we holding this debate? To ratify a decision already taken unilaterally? To discuss a situation that is already settled? After all, we know that the government, strong in its omniscience, did not feel the need to consult parliament.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the present government has a rather strange concept of the role of this House. Still, at close range, one no longer wonders about the need for a debate, especially after having heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs, after touching upon the main aspects of the situation, tell us off-handedly: Some time later, after the 60 days, we will make a decision and advise the House. In fact, here is what he was saying:

[English]

Whichever decision is made the House will be informed.

[Translation]

We may wonder, Mr. Speaker, if we shall be advised of this important decision by a press release or by a cabinet statement. In the government's opinion this does not appear to be any more serious than that. This is why it is important to have such a debate. It is precisely this strange behaviour on the government's part which justifies holding a debate in the hope that there will not be any more repetition of this. The government will learn in the next few hours, and in no uncertain terms, that parliamentary sovereignty should not be scoffed at in such a way.

[English]

There are, Mr. Speaker, certain principles that we in this party feel should and must be affirmed with regard to our participation in the truce supervisory role in Viet Nam. It is our view that parliament and the people of Canada should have a clear understanding of the dangers and difficulties arising out of our country's present situation and, even more important, of what we can do in the days ahead to rectify many of these problems.

• (1600)

It is sad, but true, that our present situation in Viet Nam is precarious, and in many respects a direct contradiction of the conditions that our own minister established for any possible involvement on our part. It is interesting to trace our minister's approach to the conditions of our potential participation in any truce operation in Viet Nam. On December 18 the minister intimated:

We would consider participating in the Viet Nam truce, when, in our opinion, based on the lessons of the past and the circumstances of the request, an operation held the promise of success.

The lesson of the past, Mr. Speaker, was simple and fairly clear. There can be no success when a truce force is unclear as to its procedures, dependent for its supplies and logistics, and based more on an effort of representing opposing interests than any true international presence. It is precisely that type of situation the minister has committed us to, and despite his own conditions.

Our eagerness to participate when the basic conditions were simply unacceptable is even more surprising in view of the previous experience we have already had as members of the ICC in Viet Nam. The documented cases of absolute irrelevance and impotence on the part of the previous ICC should dictate to any sane government to never let this sort of thing happen again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Indeed, the old ICC had, in many respects, a task far easier and more clearly defined. Although it never had logistical support to do the job or, for that matter, legal freedom to undertake its responsibilities effectively, it at least had a geographical and political frame of reference. The 17th parallel served as a demarkation line. The old ICC had at least a frontier to patrol. But the present group does not even have that much.

At the time of the cease-fire, troops from the north were scattered in hundreds of enclaves in South Viet Nam, and estimates run as high as 145,000 troops. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how does one patrol this type of cease-fire if, indeed, the firing ever stops? Does one report the movement of a soldier from one enclave to another? Indeed, this proposition is sad, yet despite the difficulties with the task and the indirect nature of our function, Canadians are there.

We had expressed the hope in this Chamber sometime ago that if we were to do a job in Viet Nam this government would ensure that we were given the tools to do that job. This has not happened. Not even the 60-day caveat established by the government has any true meaning. If after the period of 60 days the government is thinking of withdrawing our forces, and if there is not a similar approach on the part of the other members of the truce commission, what then will be Canada's posture? Once we are sure we have in some respects made a commitment, while that commitment was hastier than it had to be and completely out of tune with our sorry experience in Viet Nam, it is a commitment that we in this House must consider positively. While any threat to the safety of our troops should in our estimation be met with a swift contingency operation to withdraw our forces, it is now the role of this parliament to consider carefully the positive steps we can take to rectify the unfortunate circumstances in which our forces now must find themselves.

You will note that I have said "this parliament". I believe, as do my colleagues, that the initiative must be wrested from the Cabinet and from the Department of External Affairs in this matter. Canadian troops as well as civilians have been sent overseas by this government on a poorly contrived and planned mission fraught with uncertainty and political difficulty. The Cabinet prerogative has been exercised, but what of the prerogative of parliament, Mr. Speaker? It is the prerogative and the sovereignty of parliament that we seek to establish clearly and without any question of a doubt. We intend to give parliament a concrete opportunity to express its volition with regard to our future posture in Viet Nam.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are obviously confronted with a fait accompli. We are willing to grant the government the benefit of the doubt in this respect. They may well claim to have received valuable information from their good advisers. As a last resort, in the last few hectic days of official war in Viet Nam, the urgent need for some action may have motivated the government. But still we are confronted with a fait accompli. What respect has been shown for parliament? What respect has been shown for democracy? Barely a few moments ago, the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us: "In due course, when we have made a decision, we shall report. We shall have the condescension, the magnanimity and generosity of informing you, through a press release or otherwise".

Mr. Speaker, the questions we asked the government were precise. I refer in particular to the questions I asked on January 24 to echo the concern of Canadians, which we represent here. These questions should have been discussed in the House or in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence when there was still time to do so. It could have been done before January 27, before a first Canadian contingent was sent to Viet Nam.

Mr. Speaker, I would say that our role of representatives of the people and the Canadian image through the world demanded that Parliament hold a debate earlier than today. We had to make sure of the reaction of all parties concerned in Viet Nam to the essential conditions imposed by the government and which we had endorsed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I referred a moment ago to the positive measures we can now take. I think it is important for this parliament to give several options a very clear examination. In his statement of January 5 the minister referred to the terms of our participation and said:

> The extent to which they were met would also constitute elements in our assessment of the viability of the operation as a whole.

I believe that Canada, as a participant in the international conference, should go a step further. I believe we must view the inadequacy of the present conditions as elements of the cease-fire agreement that could work towards its final undoing. Indeed, there are two cease-fires in Viet Nam. One is a bilateral arrangement between the United States and North Viet Nam relative to the exchange of prisoners and the cessation of bombing and future hostilities. That needs neither policing nor supervision aside from that furnished by the Red Cross. The second agreement, and the more crucial one for the peace of Indo-China, is the four power arrangement implicating all the belligerents in Viet Nam. That is the arrangement which requires policing but which, under the present circumstances, simply cannot be policed. Our position at the international conference must be that of ensuring a viable machinery, both political and supervisory, to police and secure that four-power arrangement.

• (1610)

You know, Mr. Speaker, there are many who have referred to our presence in Viet Nam as international. They are, unfortunately, being imprecise in their use of the term. The international forces of which we have been part in the Congo, in Cyprus, in the mid-East, have had measures of success worthy of note. Our previous effort in Viet Nam did not. Clearly, it was because our effort in Viet Nam has not been, and is not now, international. We were cast, in 1954 as the representatives of the western interest on the commission. There is little to illustrate that anything less has transpired the second time around. The value of our contribution will always be minimal, as long as we are not part of an international force.

Canada must, therefore, move first and foremost to establish the readiness of the upcoming international conference to have a truly international force in Viet Nam under the aegis of the UN.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, it is still time for us to inquire in particular about the condition of political prisoners and also about that of other prisoners, among whom there may be a few Canadians. I was greatly moved at hearing, a few moments ago, in the news report of 3:45, that a 30-year-old Canadian named Lloyd Oppel appears on the list of prisoners held by North Viet Nam.

Mr. Speaker, at the same time, I therefore ask the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs to bring a particular attention to the fate of many Christians in South Viet Nam who are only accused of publishing and commenting, before the cease-fire agreement, resolutions on justice in the world passed by the synod of bishops gathered in Rome in 1971.

Canada could have made many representations and had stronger guarantees had the present government condescended to better inform this House and really resort to Parliament.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, we find it difficult to understand why the government has waited so long before informing the House. We find it difficult to understand that the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs was somewhat taken aback by all this matter. We find all this very difficult to understand as we know that Canada has in the Department of External Affairs a service of experts who are rightly known to be among the most loyal and the most competent in the world.

If the government does not mind gradually losing its credibility, it is free to do so, but we do not accept that it causes Parliament to lose one more inch of its credibility before Canadians, in particular before the members of the armed forces and their relatives. Nor will we let it lessen Canada's credibility across the world because of a lack of foresight and a lack of timely firmness.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, to accept the fait accompli referred to in the resolution we must have the assurance that the amendment I am about to move will be approved by hon. members of the House.

As the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in other circumstances, verbal guarantees are not enough, we need written guarantees.

Viet Nam

Mr. Speaker, the stand in the House must clearly indicate that any decision on the part of Canada regarding its participation as well as the terms of its participation in the international commission in Viet Nam beyond the initial period of 60 days should not take effect unless it is ratified by a resolution passed in this House.

Mr. Speaker, our long-term image at the world level depends on our vigilance and solidarity and not on precipitated and unilateral decisions.

It is in that spirit of wisdom and solidarity, solidarity within Parliament, solidarity within the Canadian population that we should eventually reconsider our co-operation to the social and economic rebuilding of Viet Nam so that this peace we are all hoping for will be lasting and healing.

[English]

There must be reconstruction. There must be an international effort to rebuild that which has been destroyed and replant those areas which have been defoliated. Canada's commitment to accept a field supervisory role in Viet Nam must, at the very least, be matched by a commitment to aid in resolving the social and economic problems which all Viet Nam now faces. There is a tradition in Canada with regard to peace. It is a proud tradition. Surely, in the name of that tradition, we have the right to expect our government to be competent in carrying out the tasks of peace.

• (1620)

In 1954, after difficulties under the United Nations Supervisory Commission for Korea, and upon our embarking on our role in Viet Nam, the Department of External Affairs in a July 28 release said:

> The International Supervisory Commission should be able to function more effectively than the United Nations Supervisory Commission in Korea which, because of equal communist and non-communist representation, very often had effective action blocked.

We knew in 1954 what the mistakes in Korea had been and yet we allowed ourselves to commit them once more. Sir, we know today what the mistakes of 1954 were. While it may be the intention of the minister and the government to continue making those same mistakes, that is not what parliament or the people have the right to expect.

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, there is little that our troops are doing in Viet Nam today, little that any war correspondent could not do.

Mr. Sharp: Downgrade them; that's the way!

Mr. Wagner: It is because of the situation of our troops, and the need for positive steps on the part of the government in the interest of a meaningful peace, that the decision as to what transpires before the end of the 60 day period and beyond must not be made by the government alone. It must and should be made by the parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Wagner.]

Mr. Wagner: I therefore invite all my colleagues in this House to join with me in affirming parliament's right to determine the nature and the quality of our activities in Viet Nam. I invite my colleagues to establish clearly the precise role we can and must play in future negotiations and activities with reference to Viet Nam.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in matters external to our normal domestic scene there is often a tendency, out of confusion or a desire not to muddy the waters, to put trust in the government and not challenge its basic assumptions or positions. Sir, parliament is more than a forum for domestic problems. It is the assembly through which Canadians can express their views as citizens of the world.

Parliament has clear and direct rights which must be respected. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues in all parties not to abdicate those rights to any government or to any minister. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of moving, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse):

> That the motion be amended by adding thereto, next after the words "Viet-Nam cease-fire", the following:
> "and stipulates that a decision by Government of Canada concerning continuing participation and the conditions for such participation in the said International Commission beyond the initial period of 60 days shall not be effected unless and until it is affirmed by a Resolution of this House."

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I say immediately that I have asked my colleagues behind me to look at the amendment. It seems to me that this is a basic proposition which we had urged earlier about parliament having to make the decisions. I will say a word or two in a moment about the initial decision made by the government without coming to parliament, which may not have been avoidable, but I do not think there is any reason why, beyond the 60 days, that decision has to be taken by government without consulting parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I want to emphasize, and I say it kindly to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), that in these situations it is easy to carp, and to say what might have been in the agreements. But Canada did not write the agreements, and I do not think any member of this House, whether in the government or outside it, can be held to blame for that.

There may have been some argument on the part of the Department of External Affairs that, in order to meet the requirements of the Paris Agreements, personnel had to be in Viet Nam last Saturday. However, I agree fully with the statement made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe that that first step, having been taken by the government under circumstances which it believed forced it to take that step, from now on the government ought to consult parliament on any further step it may take with regard to this role.

What I specifically asked my colleagues behind me, since I was rising to my feet immediately after the amendment was moved—I hope I will have the answer before my remarks are finished—was whether the hon. member's amendment might not be improved by adding "or withdrawal" to it.

Mr. Sharp: Why just "continuing"?

Mr. Lewis: Parliament ought to be the body to decide what happens after the 60 days—not merely the decision to participate, but also the decision to withdraw. If such a decision is made, it ought to be made by parliament.

Mr. Fraser: One is included in the other.

Mr. Lewis: I don't think it is included in the other but, if it is, why not spell it out and then we can all agree? I appeal to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to yield to the appeal made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and have this acceptance of the responsibility of government to come before this parliament, in order to get parliamentary approval for either continuing participation or withdrawal, before it takes either of those steps. I appeal to the minister to accept the supremacy of parliament in this instance and to make the change unanimous on the part of all members of this House.

• (1630)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I shall suggest the subamendment which occurred to me as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe read his amendment.

Like every member of this House, Mr. Speaker, and every Canadian, my colleagues and I are uneasy about the role which Canada now plays. I have read and reread the agreements establishing the alleged cease-fire and the protocols attached to it. No one who has studied the documents can fail to have any other feeling than that the situation is dangerous and precarious. I share with the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe the feeling that it is dangerous; indeed, the minister kept emphasizing that he appreciated it was dangerous. I do not think any purpose can be served in blaming any part of the Canadian people, whether in government or outside, for the situation in Viet Nam.

Some of us believed that the agreement would never be signed and wondered whether it could be signed under the circumstances; but when it was signed, the world breathed a sigh of relief that the war in Viet Nam might now come to an end. Mr. Speaker, unlike members of the Conservative party in this House, unlike members of the Liberal party in this House and unlike members of the Social Credit party in this House, we in the New Democratic Party always condemned the war in Viet Nam and condemned the Americans for their barbaric involvement in it. On most occasions we have stood alone in our condemnation of that morally indefensible war. Because of that, we feel that the very signing of the agreement is of value to the world, of value not only for the people in Viet Nam but for the people of the world.

During the question period yesterday I was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) interject. I am trying to find his exact words in Hansard, but if I paraphrase him I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong. I heard him ask if the minister will now find out that the agreement in Viet Nam is the Munich of 1973. I was sad to hear that comment by the right hon. gentleman because I am certain that he is as pleased as anyone in Canada that the war in Viet Nam is over. Because of his position in this House, and as a former prime minister of this country, he cannot be unhappy that there is at least a chance that it is over.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there was a chance in 1938. I point out to the hon. gentleman that in his last few words he has indicated that he, too, is doubtful whether the agreement entered into will be effective.

Mr. Lewis: We are all doubtful, Mr. Speaker. I now have the words used by the right hon. gentleman yesterday. They appear on page 825 of Hansard at the bottom of the left hand column:

> Mr. Speaker, is the minister coming to the point of concluding that the agreement made will, indeed, be the Munich of 1973?

What was wrong with Munich in 1938, Mr. Speaker, was not merely that the agreement did not work but that the world was sold to the most abominable dictator in the history of mankind. That was what was wrong in 1938.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today it is Communism, and that you do not very often attack.

Mr. Lewis: If the right hon. gentleman is suggesting that the United States government should not have made the agreement with Communist North Viet Nam and should have continued the war and continued bombing South and North Viet Nam, which is what had happened, all I can say is that I am sad that the right hon. gentleman should take that kind of reactionary and antihuman stand at this time. I have no more use for Communism that he has, but the important thing in Viet Nam was to bring this war to an end. The first step was to have the American forces and other foreign forces withdrawn from Viet Nam, both north and south, and then leave it to Viet Nam, to decide its fate. I hope, with every other member of this House and every Canadian, that they will decide their future peacefully, that they will find ways of having genuinely free elections. Whatever they decide, and with all my heart I hope it will be in the peaceful way, I say that the first thing that this agreement about Viet Nam should accomplish is to give the people of Viet Nam the opportunity to decide their own future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That would be the first step toward peace in Indo-China. I hope they decide for democracy; I hope they decide for independence from any bloc, but it is time that they had the right to make their own decision. Because this is the major and desirable result of the peace treaties, I welcome them.

It is assumed by some, Mr. Speaker, that all the violations that are now taking place and that may take place will be the actions of the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong in South Viet Nam. Frankly, I am not convinced that this is necessarily the case. I have no reason to believe that the totalitarian regime of President Thieu is any kinder to the people of South Viet Nam than the totalitarian regime of Ho Chi Minh is in North Viet Nam. History has shown that the so-called elections carried on by President Thieu in South Viet Nam were no more free than the elections of other totalitarian states of whatever colour. One of the tragedies of the American presence in Viet Nam in recent years has been the American support of government leaders who are obviously out of tune with the genuine needs of the people in South Viet Nam.

I say that we should enter this job in the International Commission for Control and Supervision with absolute neutrality. I want to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that from reading about it one must conclude that Canada's role in the old ICC was one of which we cannot be proud. This is not to attack any individual on the ICC, but back in 1967 Canadian journalists, such as Gerry Clark, Tim Ralfe and others, were reporting that Canadian members of the ICC were acting in a completely biased, one-sided way in contacts with the United States authorities. Indeed, there was some suggestion that they were deliberately making themselves conduits for the American authorities in Viet Nam. That was not the role we should have played in the old ICC. I want to make it clear that my colleagues and I say that under no circumstances should the Canadian delegation in the present International Commission act in any way other than as a completely neutral group serving the interests of peace and the interests of all parties to the agreement on Viet Nam. It will be a betrayal of our role if our present delegation, or any member of it, senior or junior, acts in the way in which Canadian members of the old ICC are alleged to have acted. That is my first point.

I have a great deal of scepticism about the agreement, as I have already said. It is extremely ambiguous on points that one hoped would not be ambiguous. I took out of my files and examined again very fleetingly a copy of the Geneva Accord of 1954 that led to the establishment of the ICC. It provides for free elections, and the present agreement contains provision for free elections. I must say my blood ran a little cold when I saw precisely the same sort of ambiguity, precisely the same lack of precision as to how and when the elections will take place. There is precisely the same lack of precision as to who will conduct the elections, under what circumstances and by what instrument; there is precisely the same failure in the present agreement to set out the conditions of peace in clear terms as there was in the accord of 1954. One is afraid that this time it may fail, as it did the last time. The fears are there, Mr. Speaker. The ambiguity about the future of Viet Nam is very disturbing. There is terrible ambiguity and lack of precision in the agreement. Also, there is a certain lack of honest intention in the agreements and protocols with respect to civilian political prisoners, a subject with which my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) will deal in more detail. I will therefore not take the time of the House in discussing this point.

Some parts of the agreement, however, are fairly clear. There is a clear undertaking that there shall be a cease-fire, that the warlike activities are to end, or should have ended last Saturday.

Mr. Sharp: All the parties agree.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Lewis: All the parties have agreed to that. The agreements are clear on that point. There is to be no more fighting. The agreements also provide clearly that the parties in Viet Nam are not to receive weapons additional to those they now have and that any new weapons or armaments are to be substituted on a one-for-one basis. One of the duties of the commission in which we are interested is to see that that is done.

I and my colleagues therefore turn our attention to this very simple point, to this basic point: will the cease-fire agreement be kept? Will the fighting end everywhere in North and in South Viet Nam? If the fighting ends in a day or two, I think there will be a role for the International Commission to play. If the fighting does not end for some time, and I am not putting any time limit on my remarks, it will become clear that the International Commission cannot function. That is why we greeted with pleasure the government's announcement; it had sense enough to put a 60 day limit on our participation in this force.

I think it is important for hon. members of the House to know that the 60 days provided for Canada's participation in the commission coincides with the 60 days during which all foreign troops are to be withdrawn, and the 60 days during which military and other prisoners are to be exchanged. If things go as they ought to, by the end of the first 60 days of Canada's involvement in this commission, the American and other forces in Viet Nam should be gone. By then the prisoners ought to be exchanged and the Vietnamese people could then begin to keep the peace among themselves. As I said earlier, that, to me, would be the immense accomplishment of the agreements which established the International Commission. Once the Vietnamese people are left alone to decide their own destiny the help of the international community will become possible on a basis on which it was not possible so long as the war was, essentially, a war between the United States and parts of the Vietnamese people.

Our concern must be a twofold one. First, there is the safety of Canadians who are there; second, there is the avoidance of Canadian involvement in anything other than the specific tasks for which this commission has been established. I deliberately did not say "force" as the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) did. I am sure he does not disagree with me. I do not regard this as a force. No one in his senses thinks that 1,160 men, some military, some civilian and some support, from four countries, could possibly constitute a peacekeeping force. Half a million men probably could not do the job; certainly, 1,160 men cannot do it.

I think it is important to point out to the people of Canada that what we are participating in is not a peacekeeping force. If that were the suggestion, certainly, we would not support it in view of the conditions that now obtain in Viet Nam. We are merely participating in an observer force and it will try whatever moral suasion can accomplish, as I see it. We hope that the presence of observers from four countries, two of them generally sympathetic to the north and two generally sympathetic to the democratic group—and I do not say with the South Vietnamese government because I am not for President Thieu—may have some kind of moral influence on the combattants on the spot so that the cease-fire may be observed by them. As I see it, we are trying, under the agreements for setting up this commission, to ask a group of people representing four independent, neutral countries to tell the world what violations are taking place, in the hope that the international community will be able to influence the various parties in the situation to cease those violations.

I am emphasizing that we support what is taking place and that is not to provide a peacekeeping force. We would not support Canadian participation in a peacekeeping force under these circumstances, and I underline "under these circumstances". We think it is Canada's duty to take part in the observer force. When the four combatants, North Viet Nam, the provisional revolutionary government of South Viet Nam, President Thieu's government and the government of the United States wanted Canada to be a member of that International Commission, we had two alternatives. We could have said, "Go to the devil; we have been critical of the war and critical of the bombing and, when this supervisory task arises, we are not even going to look at it." We could have said that. Judging by the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, he might have wanted to say that. I see he shakes his head. I am glad to note that he would not have wanted that. Or, we could have said, as we did, I think quite rightly, "We will participate in the commission for 60 days and our decision as to whether we will continue beyond that will depend on what happens during those 60 days." If the peace is kept, if the cease-fire is valid and if we can perform a function, we will remain. If the cease-fire is not kept, if it is continuously violated and if the commission cannot perform a useful function, we will withdraw.

• (1650)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That is what I understood the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say. I want to tell him that is precisely what my colleagues and I in caucus, after careful consideration, wanted those of us who are speaking in this debate to say to the minister. As he is the person in charge, I am pleased that he has said this himself.

We believe that the international authority to which this commission should report must be an absolute condition for continuing participation in the international commission. To have to report to the joint military commission of the four-nation combattants is obviously a frustrating thing. As long as the international conference cannot establish a genuine international authority to which the commission reports, the commission's work will be frustrated and useless.

I join the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe in urging on the government that when the international conference is held, the government be not merely a passive member, but that it take the initiative in a number of directions, particularly in the direction of insisting that as a condition of the international commission there must be an international authority to which the commission reports. In our view, that international authority is there and ought to be used, namely, the security council of the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: If the international conference cannot be persuaded to make the security council the international authority, then I say that Canada should not agree to any international authority of which at least the Secretary-General of the United Nations is not a member. Even if the security council is not directly the supervisory body, the Secretary General of the United Nations would be and, of course, would make representations to the security council, the United Nations Assembly and to the world. I want to emphasize that it seems to us to be an absolutely indispensable condition for the situation.

I support the general amendment moved by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. In a moment, I will move a subamendment to it which, I hope, is now being prepared.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: If it is not, Mr. Speaker, without appearing to be presumptuous, I will move it from the floor. Before doing that, I wish to take two or three minutes to indicate a hopeful note. Many of us have been sceptical, and rightly so; doubtful, and rightly so; disturbed, and rightly so. However, I want to point out that there are also two indications of positive results from the Paris agreement. The first is a statement by Mr. Brezhnev, leader of the Soviet Union, just a day or two ago, that he regarded the Paris agreement as an important step toward improving relations between the Soviet Union and the United States and that this could be a possible guide for the settlement of problems in the Middle East. Mr. Brezhnev's words clearly indicate that the removal of Americans from the terrible, barbaric and immoral war in Viet Nam has opened another door to the possibility of the improvement of world relations.

Second, I must say that I greet with pleasure the announcement that Mr. Kissinger is due to go to Hanoi next week. Publicly we are told, and I hope this is the truth—forgive me for having some scepticism—to make a diplomatic announcement. I hope it is true that Mr. Kissinger is going there to discuss economic aid to North Viet Nam.

I have no hesitation in saying that while Canada and every other member of the world community ought to give every assistance possible to help in the rebuilding of North and South Viet Nam, the prime responsibility lies on the country that is responsible for the destruction in Viet Nam. That country is the United States of America.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: They have the primary responsibility for rebuilding that which they destroyed.

The invitation to Canada by all four signatories is an expression of confidence. I hope we will act in a way which will show we deserve that confidence.

I have already said that we support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I hope with all my heart that the minister and the government will accept it so it can be an unamimous expression of this House. However, I want to move a slight subamendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

Viet Nam

That the amendment be further amended by adding to the amendment after the words "continuing participation" the following words "or withdrawal".

The amendment would now read:

"and stipulates that a decision by government of Canada concerning continuing participation or withdrawal and the conditions for such participation in the said international commission beyond the initial period of 60 days shall not be effected unless and until it is affirmed by a resolution of this House."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that it is five o'clock. Normally we would proceed with private members' business unless arrangements have been made otherwise.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is agreed to dispense with the private members' hour today in order to give more time for this particular debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

This House welcomes the conclusion of the agreements on ending the war and restoring peace in Viet Nam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four parties to the Viet Nam cease-fire.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to examine all side-issues of the matter now under consideration, when we can only note that we are asked our opinion after the decisions have been taken.

I feel that such a procedure should never be followed. Moreover, there is a precedent in this connection which only goes back to 1964 when the House decided to send a Canadian expeditionary force to Cyprus. We are now wondering why for our active participation to a Viet Nam cease-fire such a procedure was not followed.

It could be objected that there was some urgency and very quick action was necessary, but I will answer that there can be nothing more urgent than the upholding of democracy. Consequently, an example of active and speedy participatory democracy could well have been given if just the same parliament had been asked to vote on the matter. Even now, as a result of current events in Viet Nam, we must ask ourselves to what extent that decision was wise.

Mr. Speaker, we understand that no effort must be spared to bring peace to that part of the world. We are all concerned about the painful situation that has existed in Viet Nam for years, as it is, of course, the duty of our country to be concerned about peace in that area of the world. But this must not make us overlook the fact that some actions are more or less indicated.

A while ago I heard the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) say that his party is the only one that has clamored for years against the war in Viet Nam.

Mr. Speaker, I must set the facts straight. If any party can brag about having opposed the war, any war, ours can. The leader of the Social Credit party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) has often been chided for too often making comparisons with the war of 1939-45 with regard to issuing credits.

Not only is our party against war, it also tries to make the leaders of our country, and those throughout the world, understand that there exists one excellent means of avoiding them: accepting for peaceful ends the credits that are accepted to wage war. I could give the example of the billions of dollars that the United States spent to make war. If the same amounts were spent on peace and if people decided once and for all to adopt a positive rather than a negative attitude and if all economic and material advances were channelled toward permanent restoration of peace it would be possible to reach that objective.

In the same line of thought, Mr. Speaker, until we find pacific means of settling world problems we will always be faced with international disagreements. And when financiers and leaders of all countries, particularly ours, will understand that all the money now being spent on war, defensive or otherwise, could be allocated to the establishment of permanent peace, then we will be able to say that our aspirations for peace have been reached. In fact, there is no doubt that what is happening in Viet Nam is not peace but rather a ceasefire and the developments that followed this famous ceasefire prove that peace is very far.

To sump up the present situation I should like to read an editorial heard on radio station CJTR in Three Rivers and entitled "A step in the right direction but no peace yet".

People had been talking sporadically about it for a few years and in more concrete terms since last fall, and it finally came through Tuesday when Messrs. Kissinger and Le Duc Tho finally signed the document ending the American and North Vietnamese intervention in South Viet Nam.

It is actually a cease-fire agreement and not a peace treaty. We should not delude ourselves. War will continue in Viet Nam between the North and the South. It will certainly be less extensive and less lethal, due to the absence of the American military might, including the famous B-52's, but it will remain cruel because death and misery will continue their work of devastation for some time, i.e. until either one of the two governments, probably North Viet Nam, succeeds in controlling the whole territory which was arbitrarily divided in 1954.

It is truly unfortunate that this should be so, but it cannot be otherwise. Those people have been fighting too long to stop when they are so near their goal. They fought against the Japanese during the World War, then against the French who, as colonizers, did a great deal for Indo-China, but the Asians wanted their independence and for eight years they harassed the territorial army until the fall of Dien Bien Phu in 1954.

Then, after a few relatively quiet years, the Americans, fearful of communism 6,000 miles from their coast, decide to intervene, at first discreetly, and then, caught in the mesh of circumstances, it turned out to be a real genocide with the greatest war machine in history sweeping over a tiny country.

During almost ten years, an atrocious and barbarous war cost the lives of 1,000,000 Asians and 50,000 Americans, many of whom never knew why they were killed. To that must be added a hundred thousand physically and morally wounded and mutilated men who, for years to come, will remind their fellow citizens of that war to which, for reasons of honour, the leaders could not manage to put an end.

For us as well as for millions of human beings in all countries of the world, and particularly the most developed, it is to be hoped that the withdrawal of the United States from Viet Nam will mean more than the disappearance from our papers and television of horror pictures and the live reporting of massacres involving men, women and children, that could be seen every day like any other sports news.

Mr. Speaker, I endorse that editorial, because it summarizes a cruel state of affairs and because Canada's participation in the cease-fire agreement will only be useful if the parties involved show good will.

Now, that is precisely what was being questioned in the editorial I have just read and this is the very reason why we have to ask ourselves seriously whether the Canadian mission now in Viet Nam will prove useful. Of course, the minister asserts that it is only a supervisory role, but we never knew exactly what that meant. We were told that as a member of the International Control and Supervisory Commission Canada accepted the rights as well as the duties. What are exactly those duties? I believe that the minister perhaps has not thrown enough light on the subject.

And no doubt the hasty decision to participate without first informing the House was due to the fact that a de facto situation was meant to be established. That is why apparently the famous 60-day initial period was accepted, subject to subsequent review.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps for a minority government such as ours, it was a way to avoid imbroglios, but I think that democracy is getting the short end of it.

Mr. Speaker, I must point out that there is only one French-speaking member in the Progressive Conservative party, namely the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I was somewhat surprised a moment ago when I was given his amendment in English only. I think that if the Progressive Conservative party wants to show that it is a little more Canadian, the only French-speaking member of this party should have the decency to introduce his amendments in both official languages.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Matte: Now then, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it known also that I hastened to translate that amendment and send the text to the hon. member who is speaking now.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I must point out that it is upon my request that the hon. member has done so.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I think that notwithstanding the language in which it was drafted the amendment itself deserves our attention. In my opinion, with such an amendment Parliament could recover the authority it should never lose in any kind of situation and especially such as this one.

I should point out at this stage that all countries form an opinion when they realize that Canada is a member of any committee. In such cases they say this is the position of the Canadian people as a whole. So, if this decision is not made directly by Parliament, it may well be considered throughout the world as not reflecting public opinion. This is why we should always ensure that decisions are made by Parliament itself. After these 60 days—nothing can be changed now—the government should act only after consulting this House.

Mr. Speaker, this war that has been going on for years has been discussed extensively and some grievances could be expressed against Canada. For instance, I wonder to what extent the North Vietnamese are interested in the Canadian participation, as we are aware that in many instances Canada, by accepting American sub-contracts, was materially participating in this war. It would be appropriate to ask whether it is logical to establish differences between the humanitarian feelings now being shown for the sake of peace whereas, at the same time, for vulgar economic purposes, we are participating in a war in a certain way by supplying weapons and accepting all kinds of sub-contracts from firms which only profit from the war.

Mr. Speaker, there should be no two ways in such circumstances. It is always unfortunate to realize that millions of human lives are being sacrificed so that industry might continue its production. If economic matters have precedence over true humanitarian problems, I wonder whether the North Vietnamese, because of our closeness to the United States, are a little fearful of us. It must be a well known fact in that part of the world, as everywhere else, that Canada and the United States are often considered as one entity, especially in economic matters. Consequently, I wonder to what extent Canadian participation could be considered as being truly neutral. Nevertheless, I believe we could be playing a peaceful role in Viet Nam, but not necessarily in the manner we are doing it now.

On the other hand, I would say on concluding my remarks that the best way for Canada to succeed in establishing peace in the world is still by leading the way. Our country can show the entire world that it is possible to establish genuine peace by insuring its own citizens true freedom and respect for human beings. If by implementing adequate legislation we prove that we can guarantee everyone a vital minimum income, we shall prove that these conditions are essential to peace. There will be wars as long as there will be misery and poverty next to wealth.

It would be highly desirable if the ceasefire in Viet Nam were to become a real treaty of peace. However, eveyone doubts it for one rather expects that the war will go on, but I think that in the long run we should take advantage of this opportunity to think seriously and wonder whether our country could not do more to prove to the whole world that peace can exist, but only if one respects the freedom of everyone else. Now, the way to respect such freedom is to consider each human being as it must be considered, that is to assure everyone that he will live without any problems and that he will be able to develop himself in healthy freedom. Canada will then perform peaceful work.

Mr. Speaker, before we achieve all these things, I sincerely hope that our involvement in this peace effort in Viet Nam will be successful.

As a conclusion, I would like to stress that if our involvement happens to have no result, the government will have to decide then and there to withdraw its force from Viet Nam so that Canada will not have to pay the piper.

[English]

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Friday night I went to the barracks at Long Point, Montreal, to meet with our Canadian Forces personnel on the eve of their departure for Viet Nam. It seems to me it might be appropriate to begin my participation in the debate on the resolution before us if I were to repeat some of the thoughts I expressed on that occasion in an informal way to our troops.

I said, first, that I was honoured to be meeting with them as their Minister of Defence on the eve of their departure on a mission which I considered to be important to Canada and to the world. None of us know yet whether this mission will be successful, but one thing I do know is that it is important for all of us that we, as Canadians, should at least try to play a useful and effective role in maintaining peace in Southeast Asia.

When I was speaking to our men on the eve of their departure I said in my view it was characteristic of the Canadian way of life that they, as fighting men, as part of a military organization, should be leaving Canada, not to fight but, rather, in order to help prevent fighting. Some may consider it a paradox of our time that fighting men should not be leaving our country to fight. But there are many in this House and across this nation—and I am one of them—who believe it is a triumph of our times that Canadians in military formation should leave Canada not to fight but to prevent fighting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: I went on to say on Friday evening that it was the military capability, the military training and the military discipline which would enable our personnel to be effective as an observer force. In today's world it is not enough just to be idealistically opposed to war; it is essential to be trained and disciplined and equipped if we intend to aid the cause of peace.

I told our men I was personally confident that before they returned to Canada they would have added lustre to Canada's reputation as a country committed to peace. Under the leadership of the late Lester Pearson and under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) there is no country in the world which has enjoyed a better international reputation for the work it has done to ease tensions and bring understanding to the so-called "trouble spots" of the world—no country other than Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: In this respect we have probably not done nearly as well as we should, but we have managed so far to do better than anyone else. I also said last Friday evening that although our men were not being sent from Canada to fight, none of us underestimated the difficulties, and even the dangers, that they would face in Viet Nam: there will be difficulties of language, difficulties in connection with living conditions in a war-torn land. I believe no Canadian should underestimate the sacrifices that Canadian personnel have willingly accepted in this sense.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as I spoke on a person to person basis with our Canadian contingent as they departed for Viet Nam, I told them about the government's concern, and my personal concern, for their safety in the event that hostilities might be resumed, or continued indefinitely. I told them, as I told the House on an earlier occasion, that we had made contingency plans to evacuate them from Viet Nam if such a course should become necessary. One of our plans in this respect became apparent last Monday when our destroyer, the Terra Nova, sailed from Vancouver for the west Pacific. I should like to make it absolutely clear to the House and to the world that the Terra Nova is not part of Canada's contribution to the International Commission of Control and Supervision. The Terra Nova, which carries supplies for 60 days and which can be resupplied at Pacific ports, has a double purpose. One purpose, a normal part of our naval operations, is to carry out extensive training exercises. The other is to provide us with a sealift capability in the event we should wish to evacuate Canadian personnel by this means. It has been made clear to all concerned that the Terra Nova will not enter the territorial waters of either South or North Viet Nam. In fact, most of the time she will be several hundred miles from Viet Nam. We are also keeping at least one Hercules aircraft either in Saigon or within three hours flying distance at Bangkok. At present we have two of our Hercules aircraft in Southeast Asia, one at each of these airports.

My most pleasant duty in Montreal last Friday was to introduce the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to our Canadian contingent. Following the tradition of the late Lester Pearson, no Canadian has done more than our Prime Minister to enhance Canada's international reputation. His visit to our Canadian forces on the eve of their departure was symbolic of the importance which he attaches, and which the government attaches, to their mission.

At one o'clock on Saturday, January 27, a Canadian Forces Boeing 707 left Montreal for Viet Nam carrying Canadian personnel who were leaving to take part in the 12th peacekeeping and truce-supervisory mission upon which Canada has been engaged since the second world war. On board that first aircraft were 130 military personnel, 15 men and women from External Affairs and eight Canadian newsmen. The same day a Canadian Hercules aircraft from Trenton took off for Viet Nam carrying initial supplies and support cargo to Saigon.

Before the departure I said to our Canadian forces that I hoped to be able to visit them personally in Viet Nam before the completion of their tour of duty. I had to say, because of the exigencies of government, that this was being expressed as a personal wish rather than as a plan that had been formulated. But I do hope that, accompanied by others who may wish to go, we can visit our Canadian personnel before the end of their tour.

I believe all hon. members know that our personnel and supplies have reached Saigon safely and in good order. On each day since their arrival I have been in direct contact with Major General McAlpine and his senior officers. This morning I spoke personally on the telephone from National Defence headquarters to General McAlpine in Saigon, and I am therefore able to report directly to the House that our commander in Saigon advises that the Canadian contingent is in excellent shape and all personnel are actively engaged in preparing to take up their new duties.

I have brought with me to the House this afternoon a transcript of my conversation with General McAlpine. I believe that the House will be particularly interested in some aspects of it because it provides the most immediate and direct information available about our Canadian personnel in Viet Nam.

General McAlpine told me, and this is a direct quote:

> Our arrival operations went well. We arrived in Saigon on schedule. We opened our headquarters at 800 hours on January 29th in accordance with the requirements set by the agreements and protocol.

General McAlpine went on to say that Commissioner Michel Gauvin is currently making arrangements for the International Commission to conduct their first reconnaissance of the regional headquarters' sites. He advised that three reconnaissance missions were being planned for tomorrow into the regions of Hue, Danang and Pleiku. I asked how many Canadians would be involved in these reconnaissance missions and he confirmed that there would be a total of six, four military and two personnel from External Affairs.

Later in the conversation I told General McAlpine that we were continuing with plans to send a second aircraft carrying additional Canadian personnel on February 10 and that we would keep to this plan subject to the possibility of conditions deteriorating. I asked him specifically if there was any reason that he could see why we should not proceed with our plans to send a second aircraft. His direct and clear reply was:

> I can see no reason why the second aircraft should not come out.

In another part of our conversation General McAlpine said:

> The troops are getting along extremely well with their colleagues from the other three countries on the International Commission and I think they should work well when we get together in the future on the key sites.

He said:

> To sum up, things are progressing very well. We are making up our operating procedures now and our support arrangements are becoming firm, and I can assure you we can meet all the obligations in the agreement and protocol.

This is a final direct quote from my conversation with General McAlpine this morning:

> I certainly do not intend to hazard my troops until their safety can be assured by all parties to the agreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: My reply, understandably, was that that is the kind of assurance we wish to have. Although none of our Canadian forces have yet proceeded to their stations in the Vietnamese countryside I am certain that hon. members will be interested in the proposed deployment of the International Commission in South Viet Nam. The headquarters of the commission is to be in Saigon and there are to be seven regional divisions throughout South Viet Nam, with regional headquarters established in each region. Each of the four national members of the commission will provide five personnel to each of the regional headquarters.

In addition to the seven regional sites there will be 55 team sites throughout the regions. Depending on the nature and function of the individual sites, each of the four participating nations will contribute either two or three observers to the individual site. As well as the observers at the various sites there is a requirement for 116 support personnel to provide the necessary service for the functioning of the contingent.

When these figures are broken down it means that we will have 62 military and External Affairs Canadian personnel functioning on headquarters' staff, 112 carrying out direct supervisory and observation duties and 116 providing operational support. This totals 290 personnel, which is the Canadian commitment to the International Commission of Control and Supervision.

As I have advised the House on earlier occasions, a requirement of the protocol is that our total contingent of 290 personnel should be in Saigon between 15 and 30 days after the cease-fire. We are now planning as I have indicated, but subject to review of circumstances, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has also stated, to send the remainder of the Canadian contingent from Montreal on February 10, which means that they will be arriving in Viet Nam on the sixteenth day following the cease-fire.

There has been, understandably, some expression of concern about the cost to Canada of participating in the International Commission. There have been questions in the House, some of which have been answered by my parliamentary secretary. Understandably, some members have wondered whether our expenditures in Viet Nam would bring about reduced activity on some of our bases in Canada. It must be evident that many of our expenditures are ones which we would be incurring in any event and are already within our budget. For example, the Terra Nova would have been on a training mission, the Hercules aircraft would have been flying supplies, and certainly all of the personnel would have been receiving their regular pay and allowances whether they were in Viet Nam or in Canada. However, we will be paying personnel in Viet Nam a foreign service allowance of $150 per month for single personnel and up to $180 per month for married personnel. The total cost of these foreign service allowances will amount to under $50,000 per month.

I can assure hon. members that our participation in the International Commission will not have a significant effect upon other operations in Canada. More important to me than any dollar cost that might be involved is the opportunity for Canadians to play some part in the role in which we as a nation have become recognized as world leaders.

My conversations with Canadian personnel leaving for Viet Nam revealed that they were proud to be representing Canada as members of the International Commission. I believe that most Canadians share that pride and welcome this opportunity for Canada to serve the cause of peace. In saying that, Mr. Speaker, I am not unaware of the difficulties, I might almost say the apparently insurmountable difficulties that face us as part of the International Commission.

I have said before on other occasions that some decisions that we make are decisions of the mind, they are logical and reasoned decisions, and there are other decisions which are decisions of the heart. It would be easy for us to find logical and sensible reasons to stay away from Viet Nam but it would be, I believe, inconsistent with the prospects which Canada holds for the world for Canadians to refuse to at least try to help the cause of peace in this or in any other part of the world.

• (1740)

I might say, in conclusion, that my conviction about our decision—and it was a serious decision—to send our Canadian forces to Viet Nam as part of the new International Commission is well expressed in the words from a play which some of you may remember; it was a musical called "The King and I". The words which the king applied to himself might also be applied to a country, particularly to our country, in the present circumstances. His words were:

This is a man who thinks with his heart
A man who is not always wise,
This is a man who stumbles and falls,

But this is a man who tries.

Only time can tell if our mission will be successful, but I am certain, as I stated at the beginning of these remarks, that it is characteristic of the Canadian people that our military forces should leave Canada, not to fight but to help prevent fighting. When we are asked to try to help maintain peace, I am certain there are very few Canadians who would say that we should not, at least, try.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

Mr. Sharp: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. gentleman would grant me a moment, because of the urgency of the matter and its interest to all members of the House, to say that the name of Mr. Lloyd Oppel whose whereabouts we had been concerned about is now on the prisoners' list provided by North Viet Nam, and we are trying to secure his early release.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I endorse the tributes paid by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to the armed forces and to the officers of the Department of External Affairs who are engaged in what we have all come to know as a difficult operation. I think that all hon. members appreciate the fact that it is because we share the gratification expressed by the two ministers that we want to make as certain as debate and discussion can that this special Canadian mission in Viet Nam is a productive and useful one.

Canada will have an opportunity to validate our involvement in Viet Nam at the time of the convening of the international conference under the provisions of article 19 of the agreement. The conference is to be held before the end of February. It has many more chances of success than did the one in Geneva in 1954. I suggest three reasons for optimism in this regard. Firstly, the Secretary General of the United Nations is to be a participant and this means that for the first time the United Nations will have a role in the tragedy which is Viet Nam. This is of fundamental importance. Secondly, the People's Republic of China has been invited to participate. This invitation acknowledges, albeit very late, that China has a stake in the future of Indo-China. Thirdly, Canada and the other three countries of the International Commission of Control and Supervision will be at the conference. Thus we have an opportunity to participate in decisions relative to the reconciliation and healing of a country which is exhausted by almost 30 years of fighting.

One of the most perceptive comments I have seen about the matter of our role was made by John Holmes, writing in the Toronto Star on January 24 last. Mr. Holmes was an official of the Department of External Affairs and has experience in Indo-China. He wrote:

> After almost 19 years, the parties are back to an agreement which looks a lot like that reached in Geneva in 1954.
> The hope is that everyone concerned, the great powers and the Indo-Chinese peoples, have digested a basic lesson about the validity of war and violence as instruments of policy. We have had a confrontation of two concepts of the just war: on the one hand the war of national liberation and on the other the principle of collective defence against aggression.
> Both concepts have their place but not when they are applied fanatically, simple-mindedly, and without discrimination. One side set out to overthrow the armistice and achieve its ends by guerrilla terror. The other responded with gross overconfidence in its ability to apply disciplined military force to defend a country whose internal conflicts it could not understand.

Mr. Speaker, anybody who wants to know the tragic story of this should read a book, which is perhaps the best one written on Viet Nam, called "Fire in the Lake" by Frances Fitzgerald. The author writes not only of the terrible destruction of a country but of 1,000 or 2,000 years of its civilization. The article by Mr. Holmes continues:

> The concepts seemed all very well in their respective textbooks, but the theories were mechanical not human. War fed on war. The sense of purpose was lost in insensate escalation.
> That the lesson may have been learned in Washington, Moscow, Peking, Hanoi and Saigon is our ground for hope. This armistice presumably has a better chance of holding than that of 1954 because the chastened powers may be more grimly determined to maintain it. Unless they do, there is no role for an international supervisory commission.
> The major lesson of the war is that foreigners, either with guns or with white armbands, cannot lead or drive the Vietnamese people to live with each other.

Mr. Speaker, this is a theme on which I want to make a few remarks about what I should like to call the internationalization of a war that has had tragically little internationalization up until now. No purpose would be served if I were to list the grim statistics of Viet Nam. Death and devastation no longer seem to shock a world which has body count totals tatooed into its very soul. Philosophers and poets can jog the conscience of men about what horror war has wrought in a cause which has been long since drained of meaning to all except the beleaguered Vietnamese.

I seek for Canada no ideological stance. We lost our virginity on the old International Control Commission when, perhaps unwittingly, we allowed ourselves to become identified with one side in the struggle. We cannot regain what we have lost, but we do have an opportunity to underpin the ongoing and continuing authority of the United Nations as a legitimate peacekeeper. There must be no slip up this time, Mr. Speaker.

This is what the debate is all about. Observing and reporting are not enough. After all, that role—this is in no way meant to disparage the Canadians who are on the spot—can be filled by the wire services and broadcast networks. If we were just observing the next withdrawal and the return of prisoners, one could say that such activities have been carried out for 20 years by the wire services and various broadcasting agencies. There is a terrible litany of observations; they have had decades of experience at observing.

What we must do is seize the chance offered by the conference to initiate certain objectives. The real question, after all, is not the interpretation of what to my simple mind is an Alice in Wonderland protocol and agreement. The real question is: Will there be peace in Indo-China at last?

During the next 60 days the United States will withdraw her troops from Viet Nam and, in return, American prisoners of war will be released. This is a bilateral bargain; this is peace with honour. One need not be very perceptive to predict that America will be extremely reluctant to renew her entanglement in Viet Nam. Now that the Secretary General of the United Nations will be a member of the conference, the Security Council can be the continuing political authority to which the ICCS can report. All the powers who want or have a vested interest in peace are on the Security Council. It is to the United Nations and its specialized agencies that we must look for leadership in the massive job of rehabilitation in Indo-China. I submit we must substitute statistics of tons of seed and fertilizer for tons of bombs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: We must transform body counts into lists of men—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: May I say this, Mr. Speaker; if man ever again is foolish enough to be engaged in war, I hope the scandalous term "body count" will be exorcised from our language. We must transform body counts into lists of men, women and children supplied with prosthetic limbs and rebuilt faces. We must reunite families and provide homes for refugees. We must do all these things, and more, through the agencies in the world already established to deal with these things. And thank God they are ready. I am referring to the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the Commission on Refugees, the United Nations Development Program, and even to the World Bank. Elections, I submit, must be supervised by a polyglot spectrum of the earth's peoples. Africans and Asians and others have a role to play here. Colour should mean more than ideology in choosing countries for various roles for ensuring political stability and peace.

Thousands of South Vietnamese civilians, Mr. Speaker, whose offence is that of being opposed to the government have been imprisoned for as long as American prisoners of war. The Americans are now to be released under the agreement signed also by Saigon. We have been reminded by the recently established international committee to free South Vietnamese political prisoners from detention, torture and death. This committee includes officials of many groups in Canada. The Canadian Council of Churches, the Anglican Church of Canada, the United Church, the Voice of Women, and Amnesty International are concerned, as I am sure we all are, about the fate of political prisoners held by the Saigon government.

Chester Ronning, about a generation ahead of his time and a distinguished retired public servant, writes that he "fully supports the initiative which the international committee is taking to draw the attention of Canada to the plight of these South Vietnamese people who continue to be punished for the crime of wanting peace in wartorn Viet Nam." Canada can do something about these political prisoners at the February conference.

Dr. Kissinger, at his press conference of January 24, said:

> Chapter III deals with the return of captured military personnel and foreign civilians, as well as with the question of civilian detainees within South Viet Nam.
> This, as you know, throughout the negotiations, presented enormous difficulties for us. We insisted throughout that the question of American prisoners of war and of American civilians captured throughout Indo-China should be separate from the issue of Vietnamese civilian personnel detained, partly because of the enormous difficulty of classifying the Vietnamese civilian personnel by categories of who was detained for reasons of the civil war and who was detained for criminal activities.
> And secondly, because it was foreseeable that negotiations about the release of civilian detainees would be complex and difficult and because we did not want to have the issue of American personnel mixed up with the issues of civilian personnel in South Viet Nam.

Canada has no such inhibitions. Canada will have the opportunity at the end of next month, along with other countries, to make very certain that the release of these prisoners takes place. Dr. Kissinger went on to say:

> This turned out to be one of the thorniest issues that was settled at some point and kept reappearing throughout the negotiations. It was one of the difficulties we had during the December negotiations.

Then he says the issue of Vietnamese civilian personnel will be negotiated between the two Vietnamese parties over a period of three months. Canada will be there and I submit that Canada has an urgent role to play. If Saigon and Hanoi cannot agree, Canada should insist that the human rights aspect of the political prisoners question must be protected by the International Committee of the Red Cross as part of the quid pro quo of our membership on the ICCS.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: We have the awful example of the failure of the old ICC to obtain the release of internees and prisoners of war and to exercise control over the movement of refugees. I do not want to be misunderstood; I make no charge against the old ICC. We have learned from it. We ought not to repeat the mistakes of the Geneva accord; the 1954 failure cannot be allowed to be repeated in 1973.

I seek, as one response of my party to the resolution we are debating, what I might call the internationalization of the rebuilding of peace. The Security Council can create the basic infrastructure upon which peace can be built. Viet Nam, both North and South, must solve the juridical problem; no outsider's writ can run here. After all, like it or not, civil war is the privilege of a people. The Americans have experience of this. Imagine what would have happened in the American Civil War if one of the great European powers had attempted to interfere. History is indeed a paradoxical part of man's story. I seek a latter-day UNRRA—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to let the hon. member finish.

Mr. Fairweather: I will take only a minute or two more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I think the hon. member for Gamelin (Mr. Portelance) also would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to an earlier item of business for the purpose of presenting the first report of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. I ask if there is consent that this be done.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and my colleagues. The interruption would have cut off my peroration. I am not sure how good a peroration it is, but none are good when they are interrupted.

I seek a latter-day UNRRA operating in Indo-China. First, there must be relief in the form of food and medicines for the hungry and the wounded; second, rehabilitation in the form of seeds and fertilizers to replant the lands poisoned and defoliated; third, reconstruction and development in the form of a Mekong Valley authority on the model of the Tennessee Valley authority in the United States so that Indo-China can use the water for energy and irrigation.

The people of Viet Nam never were the enemies of our country, Mr. Speaker. We are embarked upon another of man's quests for peace. The Canadian armed forces have again demonstrated their readiness to take on a tough and difficult mission. May I say, too, that the government and the country have been exceptionally well served by the officials of the Department of External Affairs throughout a difficult period. They have warned us of the pitfalls and frustrations. They have sought conditions and safeguards, not to frustrate a mission but to make it viable. We have an obligation to them to make sure that the February conference is the catalyst for a useful and productive United Nations and not one of a long series of exercises in futility.

The cold war, thank God, is in the last stages of being wound down. Even today nations of east and west Europe are meeting in Vienna to discuss mutual force reductions. In 1972 a United States president went to Peking and to Moscow, trips which came later than an American visit to the moon.

• (1800)

I sense in the young, if it is not too presumptuous of me to interpret their aspirations, a frustration with empty rhetoric and sloganeering. The UN has within its grasp an opportunity, now that it approaches the universalism so long sought, to transform a land which is the home of an ancient civilization. The mechanisms are in place and qualified people are ready in WHO, FAO and UNDP. Let us use them and the agencies that they represent.

This is what Canada must do as she takes her place at the conference at the end of this month, a conference that has as its purpose the guarantee of the end to the war and the maintenance of peace. I submit that to do less would be unacceptable.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp:

This House welcomes the conclusion of the agreements on ending the war and restoring peace in Viet Nam and notes the provision for an International Commission of Control and Supervision as part of the cease-fire arrangements, in which Canada has agreed to participate for the initial period of 60 days as provided for in the note, dated January 27, 1973, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the four parties to the Viet Nam cease-fire.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, after listening to two speeches by the official opposition this afternoon, I should like to express a wish: that if and when the official opposition forms the government their Secretary of State for External Affairs be the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) rather than the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), which would be unfortunate. Seldom have I heard two such contrasting speeches. The first was as positive, as marked with humanism, open-mindedness and international solidarity as the second was marked with pessimism, inconsistencies, naivety and, I dare not venture to add, inaccuracies which, in certain cases, seemed deliberate to me.

To start off with, Mr. Speaker, I shall give just one illustration of the inconsistencies in the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe's speech. He told us this afternoon, and I quote:

[English]

The international forces that we have been part of in the Congo, in Cyprus, in the mid-East have had measures of success worthy of note.

[Translation]

He said that this afternoon. I would like to recall, Mr. Speaker, what he was saying barely a few days ago, namely on January 24, and I quote from page 597 of Hansard:

[English]

We do not want Canada to go once more through what it has experienced on the International Control Commission since 1954 or what it has experienced in Cyprus.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the same researchers prepare the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, but such a glaring contradiction in less than one week on our peacekeeping participation in Cyprus is absolute proof that not only the argument of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is weak but that it crumbles under its own contradictions.

Let me review one by one the various remarks he made this afternoon and I think I am not distorting his thoughts when I say that basically his speech reflected the following point of view: We are not satisfied with the agreement signed by the four parties, particularly between North Viet Nam and the United States. We are not satisfied with the agreement signed between Mr. Le Duc Tho and mR. Kissinger. We would like the fighting to resume and when the powers that be will have signed a new agreement satisfactory to us, then we will be able to say we are satisfied. This I think is the essence of the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe this afternoon.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): This is distorting my point of view.

Mr. De Bané: At the beginning of his speech he went as far as to say that the government had not informed the House. Let me remind him that since January 1969, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) have repeatedly explained the Canadian position vis-à-vis this conflict which has upset the world's conscience. And last October when Canada was approached and requested to be a member of the control commission, the Secretary of State for External Affairs repeatedly stated publicly and through diplomatic channels Canada's conditions for participating in the commission. As someone said this afternoon, Canada is the most experienced country in the field of peace operations. This is the reason our services were requested once the agreement was concluded.

Furthermore, when Parliament met on January 4, the Secretary of State for External Affairs explained once more to the House the conditions under which we were ready to proceed to Viet Nam.

As I recall, Mr. Speaker, on January 5, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs was explaining our position with regard to Viet Nam, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe said, and I quote:

[English]

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I should have much preferred, and I know my colleagues would have much preferred, that our first business in this House should deal immediately with urgent problems.

[Translation]

—he then enumerated domestic problems. This afternoon, he said the government acted on the sly, yet we had this debate almost in spite of him. I say, Mr. Speaker, this is too much contradicting in a new career.

What hurts me most, Mr. Speaker, is this excerpt which I quote from the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe:

• (2010)

There can be no success—

[Translation]

I ask him why he is negative and why he shows so much despair:

[English]

There can be no success—

[Translation]

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we cannot guarantee that we are going to succeed. When he stated our position, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, and I quote:

[English]

It is no secret to anyone that we have serious doubts about what we are being asked to undertake.

[Translation]

He repeated it this afternoon and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) said it also. But why tell us, like an evil wisher:

[English]

There can be no success—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, for the great misfortune of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, I am going to tell him some thing. And since one hon. member of the opposition does not even bother to pick up earphone to listen to the French interpretationt—

[English]

I will say it in English. It is clear from the report of our ambassador to the ICCS in Saigon that three days is perhaps too short a time to form an opinion about the prospects of this commission; however, three days of intense activity is worth a month of experience under less pressing and demanding circumstances. At the first meeting of the commission the Canadian delegation proposed that the first task or goal should be to establish contact with our opposite numbers, the joint military commission in Saigon. At that meeting the Canadian representative, Ambassador Gauvin, opened the meeting by suggesting that while the joint military commission was apparently not yet in a position to establish contact with the ICCS, we are attempting to contact the two parties, the government of the Republic of Viet Nam and the U.S., who are themselves directly involved in providing logistics support for employment of the seven regional teams.

[Translation]

I could of course report other details to show that if indeed we are not sure of succeeding, there are still some encouraging signs which tell us not to despair.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe was telling us, and this in my view is what is most surprising, and I quote:

[English]

Yet, despite the difficulties with the task and the indirect nature of our function, Canadians are there.

[Translation]

But for heaven's sake, let us realize that with all the difficulties which arise from this, Canada has no interest in sending a surveillance team to Viet Nam. We do so only because, being as the rest of the world witness to the division which has been afflicting that country for some twenty years, we thought: It is our duty to do everything possible in order to try and restore peace as soon as possible.

Now, I would like to quote a sentence that I will not qualify—I leave that to everyone of you—in order to show to what extent one can play a double game.

[English]

While that commitment was hastier than it had to be and completely out of tune with our sorry experience in Viet Nam, it is a commitment that we in this House must consider positively.

• (2020)

[Translation]

He had just said, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

There can be no success—

He had just said that there could be no success. Now he tells us, to please I know not whom, that we in this House must consider it positively. I could quote you other examples of similar statements. For instance, today he told us that the agreement between North Viet Nam and the United States is one in which the Canadian government has no role to play and that, frankly, it is not up to us to supervise what goes on with regard to the implementation of the agreement.

I would merely like to remind him that if once again he is not happy with the agreement entered into by the two parties, Canada was not a party to it; he should direct his reproaches to Messrs. Le Duc Tho and Kissinger. Indeed, it is not our fault if they asked us to supervise the enforcement of the agreement.

This sentence struck me most in the speech of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner:

[English]

Our position at the international conference must be that of ensuring a viable machinery, both political and supervisory, to police and secure that four-power arrangement.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) put it very clearly. We are not in Viet Nam to police any of these four powers. We are there only to observe and to report if one of those powers is violating the agreement they signed in Paris. We are not there to secure anything or to police anybody, particularly when the United States, with half a million soldiers, did not succeed in policing that country.

Mr. Forrestall: The United States declared peace in Viet Nam.

Mr. De Bané: May I be allowed to complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

I think that it is a total failure to recognize the role assigned to the four parties involved and responsible for enforcing the cease-fire and, in my opinion, it is such a glaring mistake that since more than a week the Secretary of State for External Affairs provided each Opposition party with copies of the agreements which were concluded.

As for asking us to perform a military task, I will say to the hon. member that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has fully explained that our role over there is not to keep the peace, but to observe and report if one of the parties does not live up to its commitments.

The hon. member took the liberty to add in order to downgrade the role of Canada:

[English]

We were cast, in 1954, as the representatives of the western interest on the commission.

Mr. Forrestall: Oh, get on and tell us something positive.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Then I should like him to explain how it is that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) when he was in Hanoi a few days ago could state that Canada was very highly regarded by Hanoi? Why, Mr. Speaker, try to downgrade our country, a country which succeeded in the field of its foreign policy in carrying out peacekeeping missions, about 15 of them since 1945? Why try to depreciate what is one of the finest aspects of our foreign policy?

He repeated a little later in his speech, and I quote:

—we find it difficult to understand why the government has waited so long before informing the House—

Waited? I remind him that we did it 48 hours after this Parliament reconvened and at that time he taunted the government with having stated once again as late as January 5 and in detail, the terms of our participation. Why is he charging us with having "waited before informing the House", he who taunted us with doing so 48 hours after the Houses had reconvened?

Mr. Speaker, I could go on setting forth all the thoughts which come up in my mind following the speech of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe which differs greatly in its reach from that of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

I was surprised also by his indulging into reading and reminding us of the various questions he asked in the House a few days ago. I am surprised that he dared recall them today even though the Secretary of State for External Affairs has answered each of them. And with the indulgence of the House and its permission, I will gladly recall his answers when my time has elapsed.

Mr. Speaker, why did the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe take the liberty of saying: "There can be no success"?

As far as we are concerned, we cannot guarantee the success of our mission but, as we are jointly responsible for the fate of the whole world—and God knows how the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe reminded us of our joint responsibility—we said to ourselves, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs explained on January 24, that our duty was to go to Viet Nam not taking for granted that we would succeed but saying we would try for 60 days. Will that trial succeed or not? One point is certain, and it is that we the members of this government have decided not to be prophesiers of evil.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to take part in this debate on external affairs. It is certainly not the first in which I have engaged in my 15 years in this House. I would note at the beginning that the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has added perhaps more asperity to a debate on external affairs than I have been used to in this decade and a half.

Mr. De Bané: I was just quoting.

Mr. Macquarrie: If the hon. member wants to rebut it, he can change the rules. But it is my time to speak, now. I have always believed that while partisanship of itself is not the summum bonum of our existence here, especially in external affairs I have always tried to eschew partisanship. I should like to say, too, that I am proud of the statement made by the spokesman for our party, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who since he came to this parliament has revealed eloquence, wisdom and consideration which makes me extremely proud and happy to be a colleague of his. I hope we shall long remain together side by side and for a long time on the other side of this chamber.

I know my time is limited to 20 minutes. I want to use a good deal less than 20 minutes. I want to hear from the distinguished and learned hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse); I want to hear from my hon. friend from Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), from my hon. friend from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) and from other hon. members. So I will telescope my comments, not because of lack of interest, not became of lack of comments but because I want to hear from them.

I want to say at the outset that I join with those who applaud and salute the quality of the military forces of this country. I have always felt that way. I was honoured last spring to be on the committee which toured bases in the west, in the north and in the central part of this country and I have an even higher regard for those fine men who constitute the military of this country. If I were a nasty politican I might say that I would be surprised that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) would ever settle for anything which had the expression "60 days" in it, because I remember those famous 60 days of decision and what they did to a certain party. I remember that Mr. Pearson once said, "Perhaps the '60 days' elected us; I don't know. But it damned near defeated us; that I am sure of."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macquarrie: But this is a much more serious matter. This is an issue which concerns us all and troubles us all. God knows, there is not one member of this House who does not welcome the end of the war in Viet Nam. I don't want to sound like a genonton, Mr. Speaker, and with my youthful looks that would be a presumption on the acting profession, but in my first speech on foreign affairs I mentioned Indo-China, way back in July of 1958. As the minister said the other day, this is a war that had gone on for a whole generation. It has been a dirty war and, naturally, it is going to be a dirty peace.

We are not disturbed if things do not fit dutifully into the moulds which the idealists expect; we are not disturbed about that situation at all. But I do take exception to those who believe that this country of ours, faced with the challenge, with the question, had only one answer. I am not here to cavil. I am not here to belittle. I am not here to make difficulties. But I do not think we had only one answer. I think it would have been just as honourable, just as realistic, just as sensitive to have said that perhaps, in the circumstances, this was not the time for Canada to involve itself. I would not have been ashamed of any government which said, "In the circumstances, why not look to some of the other 125 independent countries in the world?"

I do not agree with those who say we had no choice. But the choice having been made by the government, precipitously perhaps, we must make the best of it. But I am surprised that anyone in government dealing with an issue as sensitive, an issue which divides the Canadian people so painfully, would not rejoice in the opportunity to share this challenge, to discuss the issue with the Parliament of Canada rather than keeping to itself the executive prerogative of making a decision and, after the fact, notifying the people's representatives.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is where my hon. friend from Saint-Hyacinthe was not only at his most eloquent but at his most precise in terms of parliamentary values, parliamentary rights, parliamentary rules and constitutional propriety. In the bitter days when Great Britain was almost overborne by the iniquitous and evil power of a terrible enemy, Winston Churchill, harrassed and burdened as no man probably ever was, told them, "It is a comfort to have the House of Commons in session so that the conscience of the nation can be expressed on the vital issues which assail us". And even Mr. Mackenzie King said during the war, and it is quite a move from Churchill to King, that it was a help, rather than an embarrassment, to have parliament involved.

So I say that the minister would have been far wiser, faced with an issue so delicate, where the dangers were so great, where the country was so uncertain, had he asked the House for its advice. He would have found every member in this chamber prepared to set aside partisan differences and deal realistically, honestly and decently with the question as to what Canada should do. There are dangers ahead and the government would have found itself strengthened had it confirmed its mandate by consulting with the people's representatives. We cannot go back on the decision which was taken, but my hon. friend from Saint-Hyacinthe has provided an opportunity for the government to assert the Canadian point of view, to strengthen the decision taken, to bring a greater degree of involvement, integration and understanding on the part of this country of what, let us face it, will be a protracted and, I am afraid, extremely difficult undertaking for many, many months ahead.

Not for one moment do I accept the idea that this country, and this country's representatives in Indo-China, can at some time hence, 60 days hence, casually say, "Well, the period has expired. We will go home." How, in the name of heaven, could we present ourselves to the international community under those circumstances? All these things should have been considered much more carefully.

I do not want to be critical of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). He is probably one of the most thoughtful, pleasant members of the cabinet and is trying to do his best. But I was not impressed when he was asked the question, "What should our boys do if confrontation came up?" and he replied, "Duck." This is hardly a thoughtful observation in a very serious situation.

I have said that we have taken the course. Now we have to make the best of it. I am not sure that eternally it is the course of wisdom for the Canadian government to say to every country and on every occasion, in Dickens' words, "Barkis is willing'!" or, as the Old Testament used to say, "Here am I, Lord. Send me." Perhaps a little more thoughtful observation might have been entered into, and considering what happened in the ICC, someone might have pondered whether or not on this particular occasion we were exercising the finest of wisdom on our own behalf and on behalf of world peace to say immediately, "We will go. Just call us."

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that one of the advantages of being a veteran—although I represent the cradle of confederation, I am not a father of confederation albeit some people think I look like one—is that I was here in 1964 when we were faced with the grievous challenge and the threat of Cyprus, a fellow member of the Commonwealth, a place from which the crackle of war could be heard thousands of miles away.

At that time the government was able to ascertain the views of parliament and to rest its case upon the people's representatives. And the people's representatives moved. This afternoon I was reading the eloquent speech given on that occasion by my former leader, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who stated clearly that our party and, as he rightly said, the people of Canada would do their part to have Canada assist.

I would commend the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). It clearly indicates that this is the way things should be done. I would implore the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who with all his faults is not a bad man, who wishes well for Canada and does his best for Canada, to take, adopt and accept the amendment so eloquently put forward by my colleague so that the people of Canada will know that the Canadian people's representatives have expressed themselves thoughtfully, with due consideration, on this important path which is hazardous, uncertain and divisive. And I appeal to my colleagues in a great gesture of Canadian unanimity to support what my colleague so eloquently and so thoughtfully has put before us all.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, in the 1970 review of its foreign policy, the government stated the following as recorded on page 20 of the English version of the booklet on Canada's Pacific involvement and I quote:

> When peace comes to Indochina, Canada, without diminishing its existing aid programme in the area, will wish to play its full part in special programmes of rehabilitation aid necessitated by the prolonged hostilities. The Government will be ready to move to meet immediate relief requirements and to make a contribution to longer-term reconstruction efforts.

As stated in this House last week by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), Canada is also anxious to participate in the immense task of assisting and rebuilding Viet Nam and although the government is still in the dark as to what it will be requested to do and as to how any extended Canadian program could be related to the efforts of other countries and of international organizations, I think we shall be willing and ready to contribute to this task through all of Indochina.

Therefore, if I am not mistaken, the government, from the remarks made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is considering helping the Vietnamese people restore their economy destroyed by war, and also helping to cope with the individual and social needs of thousands of people who have been torn away from their home, who have been displaced and who are now actually refugees often in their own country.

It seems that the government's intention is to contribute to the assistance and rehabilitation operations in Viet Nam after the war is over. They have repeatedly proclaimed this intention over the last few years.

I think the words I just quoted from the review of our foreign policy are, in my opinion, an official statement. Canada should be willing to extend any assistance we are in a position to supply to the Vietnamese people and to Indochina generally. However, in view of the uncertainty surrounding the general situation in that part of the world, it is premature, I believe, to stipulate the exact amount in dollars of the assistance we shall be supplying or shall be able to supply to the countries forming Indochina during the post-war period.

I understand that Canada plans to supply some types of assistance and to continue its current programs in that region of the world. But it goes without saying that the extent of Canadian assistance must, as much as possible, be in keeping with needs which it is not yet possible at the present time to identify or determine accurately.

Following remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), I should also like to point out that since 1955 Canadian development assistance to South Viet Nam has amounted to very little, for many reasons, namely some $14 or $15 million. This assistance was mainly of a humanitarian and social nature and was particularly geared to the areas of paramedical rehabilitation, of training and of assistance by way of food and shelter.

During the current fiscal year, Canada is supplying $3,100,000 worth of assistance to the Republic of Viet Nam, Laos and other neighbouring countries. In this regard, we must clearly consider that the implementation of the Canadian program was facilitated by our linguistic resources.

[English]

As I mentioned earlier, the level of the present requirement for outside support for the reconstruction effort in Indo-China is unknown. One dominant consideration in determining Canadian aid levels is the amount of assistance which can be expected from other donors. In addition, the government will wish to consider that because of its participation in international observer arrangements in Viet Nam, even for the initial 60 days only, it will be spending a substantial amount of money which might have a bearing on the aid funds we could provide. Therefore at this time, with so many imponderables, it would seem preferable and in fact more realistic for Canada simply to reaffirm its intention to provide assistance for relief and reconstruction, rather than to set any specific sum or target.

• (2040)

In any case, we must bear in mind that a number of factors which are intrinsic to the current situation in Indo-China will place limits upon the capacity of the recipients in the area to absorb dramatic infusions of aid. Recent events have demonstrated that those countries may in the short run be preoccupied with a variety of problems other than reconstruction and long-term development programs. We must also take into account the institutional capabilities and capacities of the governments concerned to identify and carry out the tasks of reconstruction and development.

From the point of view of the donors, there remain basic unanswered questions. One question which will have to be resolved is the need for co-ordination of effort. This is vital, as was recently shown in Bangladesh. But in the case of Indo-China no fully effective co-ordinating organization is yet in place. This also raises a unique consideration for Indo-China, namely, the willingness of North Viet Nam to accept the possible involvement of international development agencies operating on its territory to administer multilateral aid. The same consideration may also apply in any bilateral context.

It should be noted that in view of the financial limitations of the governments in that part of the world, that is Indo-China, the donor countries may have to set up extended programs to finance local expenditures if they want to achieve an efficient reconstruction program.

Indeed, and this is readily understood, there is no administrative mechanism at this time in that part of the world that could really launch a vast program. In addition, as I have already mentioned, the requests for assistance from Canada will have to be weighed against its present role as observer and those it may have to assume eventually in Laos and even in Cambodia.

Neither the extent, nor the duration of these needs, Mr. Speaker, have been identified yet. All these factors involve difficulties which are easy to understand, and perhaps even restraints on the Canadian program of assistance for the reconstruction of this part of the world which is commonly called Indo-China. However, the need does exist and one cannot deny it. Perhaps we shall have to wait quite a long time, unhappily, before long run projects are developed. To be realistic, we must now be satisfied with short-term projects, and I guess that the government will concentrate its efforts in areas where Canada has already proved that is has experts, resources, etc. These areas could be the following ones: supplies, including drugs and auxiliary medical services,—that is what has been done in the past in that country—shelters, emergency food for displaced people, medical equipment and aid to the organization of medical services, which will surely be necessary—as well as cheap basic building materials. After this war, it will surely be necessary to erect new buildings, as and when priority needs are identified. We will have to give our support to strengthen administrative, social and educational institutions.

Finally, we could concentrate our efforts on reconstruction and long rung economic development projects, as soon as they are identified, and that Canada decides that circumstances make it possible to carry them out and provide us with an efficient role to play. In view of the dislocation of the economic system, problems caused by this war and the unemployment one may expect especially in South Viet Nam, as a result of all these tragic events, labour intensive programs and projects will certainly have a particular importance and should be granted first priority.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have tried in these few minutes to emphasize that for Canada, as for other countries, mounting an effective and distinctive contribution for reconstruction and rehabilitation in the countries of Indo-China will be neither simple nor easy. It will present serious problems from the point of view of the recipients as well as the donors. The need is there. But simply pouring in resources will clearly not suffice. A considerable amount of planning and co-ordination is necessary. For the long term, some of the basic elements required for effective planning and implementation are still uncertain and difficult to determine. Therefore, initially I believe we should concentrate on reinforcing the present ongoing Canadian program while actively exploring the possibilities for future assistance.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada recognizes that Indo-China is in dire need of assistance. After all that was said today, I would add that we have at all times accepted our international duties and responsibilities in the past. I am hopeful that the people of Canada still want the government to co-operate with the Indochinese people towards the edification of a brighter future.

Because of its experience in peace-keeping, Canada must show leadership, Mr. Speaker, and that is what the world expects from us.

I can hardly share the opinion of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) when he suggests—if I understood him correctly—that Canada has started on this venture without taking the necessary measures of carefulness, security, and without the usual necessary safeguards.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is concerned about Canada's credibility. He should keep a count of the praise Canada has received on several occasions from the major foreign powers and international organizations, such as the United Nations, as well as from all the Secretary Generals of the United Nations and, even recently, in the report of the Secretary General on the Cyprus operations, at the General Assembly, on December 1, 1972.

I complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by suggesting that the government should refer to the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence tabled in the House in June 1971 following an extensive examination of international development assistance in the white paper on foreign policy for Canadians, examined by a sub-committee that I had the honour to chair.

I hope that the government will draw its inspiration from the recommendations of the above-mentioned report which was unanimously accepted by all members of the committee in which were represented all the political parties of the House.

I hope that the government will take inspiration from these recommendations to provide all possible assistance to that area of the world, Viet Nam, Laos, Cambodia, in order that Indo-China get over that unhuman and terrible conflict and proceed with restoration and development.

• (2050)

[English]

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that the House recognize the way in which the present debate has a context larger than the involvement of a peace supervisory mission in Viet Nam for a limited period of 60 days. Indeed, that context must include Canada's potential long-term commitment in Southeast Asia. It is true that we have a small contingent there for a very limited time. But who is to say with absolute assurance that the numbers will not multiply and the days lengthen? For example, we have been in Cyprus for many years. The cost of our contingent there, over and above pay allowances, has been $6.5 million. We may reckon that is a small dollar cost in relation to the achievement, but the experience is still instructive as to the magnitude an involvement may take on when we enter on an overseas mission.

In 1964, for example, when this House was debating the sending of a peacekeeping force to Cyprus, the then secretary of state for external affairs was asked if the Canadian force would be in Cyprus any longer than a matter of months. He replied that the resolution provided for a limitation of three months. He went on to say that he suspected, of course, that in the light of events this would be open to review but that a limited period of three months was provided in the resolution. That was in 1964, and in 1973 we are still there. Of course, we should be there. However, I point to that experience to indicate the way in which we may enter into an overseas commitment believing it will be small in size and short in duration, but then be surprised by the way in which circumstances lead us on. That is one of the reasons why parliament, being the elected representative body of the nation as a whole, must have a voice—indeed a deciding voice—whenever there is proposed a long-term commitment of Canadian personnel overseas.

We recognize that the government had to act swiftly in this instance and it had to be free to act largely on its own in order to send a peace supervisory mission to Viet Nam. However, before the 60-day period, which is part of the government's arrangement, expires there will be adequate time for the government to come before parliament, to report to this House on what has happened in Viet Nam and to consult with parliament on the implications of a long-term commitment, if such is deemed necessary. I recognize that the government must have some kind of primacy in external affairs, a primacy which may not be granted in all areas. However, primacy does not mean monopoly. Parliament does have a role. That role must include consultation before any government undertakes a long-term commitment of our armed forces overseas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: Indeed, the principle behind that which we are debating tonight goes back a long way in parliamentary history. The tension between the executive and the legislature over authority in foreign policy goes back at least to the Stuart kings of the seventeenth century. I suggest there might be some parallels between those kings and the present government. However, we believe, in the twentieth century, that it should be accepted as a commonly acknowledged principle that none of our armed forces will be committed for long term service overseas without the authority of parliament.

As support for that principle I could cite that eminent leader of Canadian public life of almost half a century ago, Arthur Meighen. May I, instead, repeat the words of another great prime minister, W. L. Mackenzie King who speaking in this House in 1938 said we may take the position that parliament will decide upon our course when and if an emergency arises, in the light of all the circumstances of the time. His critics may suggest that Prime Minister King used the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy in external affairs only when that suited his purposes. I think we must allow that any prime minister must adjust to circumstances. Of course, we have seen how a prime minister in the last three months can make a great many adjustments.

We recognize generally that there was something profound in the kind of policy Mr. King tried to enunciate, namely, his effort to assert the supremecy of parliament as a countervailing balance to what he feared would be the domination of the British cabinet, the League of Nations, or some other power outside Canada. That kind of hazard has largely passed. Unfortunately, we are still in danger of being dominated unnecessarily, against the interest of the people of this country, by our own cabinet.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Stackhouse: We must fear the danger of the cabinet thinking that it has an absolute monopoly in external affairs. In the interests of the people of this country we must assert the role of parliament in external affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: After all, not only do the people pay with money; they may pay with blood when we enter into commitments beyond our shores.

In the United States, for example, the president having assumed an absolute control over foreign policy and military policy, a control so great that the checks and balances asserted historically by the United States Senate have now all but been eclipsed, the United States government has been able to send over half a million troops to Viet Nam to wage brutal war, without needing to obtain any congressional declaration of war, without seeking any greater support than the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, and without needing to acknowledge even that there was a war in Viet Nam until peace was signed.

We would not in any way suggest that the government of Canada is anything but circumspect as it assumes this new role in Viet Nam. However, we suggest that the government of Canada would show a great deal of prudence if it were prepared to come to parliament and submit the results of the venture which it has undertaken in the name of Canada. When the 60-day period is over, or even before it is over, I hope it will seek authorization from parliament for what it would wish to undertake in the future.

We think, as challenges arise in this troubled part of the world and as they may develop in other troubled parts of the world, that parliament, as Prime Minister Mackenzie King said a generation ago, ought to decide our course. Twice in the last quarter of a century it has been Canada's role to send peace supervisory missions overseas and this has been done by order in council.

Mr. Sharp: But not the ICC.

Mr. Stackhouse: In both instances there was debate in this House following such order. We submit, Mr. Speaker, that that kind of debate, that kind of thorough discussion is fundamental to the right conduct of Canada's role in the world at large.

Viet Nam

• (2100)

In 1964, in the Cyprus debate, the then leader of the opposition, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said: "This action tonight is but one more step in the constitutional development and final establishment of the principle that we in this nation will not send our troops abroad without a decision by parliament." What we are asking is that this principle enunciated and upheld by distinguished leaders of more than one party and from both sides of this House should be recognized again. We invite members of all parties, including the government, to adhere to this principle once more and to say that again in this instance it will be parliament that will decide our course.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the conclusion of the agreement on ending the war and restoring peace in Viet Nam. One really does not have to spend a long time recalling the horror, devastation, brutality and futility of the long drawn-out war to be wholeheartedly in favour of steps to restore peace in Viet Nam. No doubt the agreement contains a lot of vague undertakings and ambiguous phrases. Nevertheless, it is an instrument by which it is possible to restore peace. I therefore support any Canadian initiative or any reasonable step designed to make the agreement work. For this reason I support Canada's participation in the International Commission of Control and Supervision.

It is not difficult to be sceptical. The agreement has been described as a fragile document, and so it is. It has been frequently said, and indeed it is obvious, that the good faith of the immediate parties to it is fundamental to its success. But given that good faith, I believe we should not be without hope that the agreement can be an instrument of establishing the general peace in Southeast Asia. I think it is essential that the four conditions laid down by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) be strictly adhered to and, as has been indicated by my leader in this debate, we in the New Democratic Party believe that certain other conditions should also be included.

There are two reasons for insisting on conditions. One is that the safety of Canadian personnel committed to the international commission is our responsibility, and conditions must be established to give reasonable security for their safety. Second, it is important that the commission be able to do the task assigned to it. We cannot afford to repeat the classical history of the International Control Commission which remained in being long after the parties had torn up and totally disregarded the agreement which they were supposed to be supervising. Indeed, it is that history that is responsible, in my judgment, for so much of the reluctance and doubt of the Canadian people about taking part in the present observer team operation.

However, I propose to concentrate my remarks on what I think is a vital condition required to demonstrate the good faith of at least one of the parties to the agreement, and essential if Canada is to continue to participate in the operation. I refer to the plight of the 200,000 or so civilian political prisoners detained in pitiful conditions in South Viet Nam. The subject has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and I wish to develop it.

Reliable sources, including representatives of the World Council of Churches, Amnesty International of England, and the Friends Service Committee have painted the picture in sombre colours. I take my account from the report of one David Tecwin made to Amnesty International of England on December 8, 1972, which says that underfed, overcrowded and often held in pitiful conditions, the civilians detained in South Viet Nam probably number well over 100,000. In addition, there are 40,000 prisoners of war held in Phy Quoc, an island off the south coast of Cambodia.

Many of the civilians are communists or communist sympathizers not eligible for prisoner of war status under the terms of the 1949 Geneva convention. Many are neutralists, members of that large section of the political community that does not wish to be governed by the National Liberation Front, the Viet Cong, nor by the current régime of President Nguyen Van Thieu. But a large number of those behind bars are simply the unlucky ones, men, women and children detained without trial because they were found in areas overrun by the communists and retaken by government forces. They are not interested in politics. Caught up in the mess of war, they happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Their plight is illuminated in a series of letters smuggled out of the largest and most notorious of South Viet Nam's civilian prisons, the huge camp complex on the island of Con Son off the southeast coast. Con Son prison made headlines two years ago when two American congressmen stumbled across the human "tiger cages". These are pits in the ground and are still in use. "Difficult" cases are, reportedly, still shackled inside and disciplined by having powdered lime poured down on them.

The smuggled letters describe with little evident emotion the chaos and confusion that reigned in Con Son in recent months as the fighting dragged on. In many prisons and interrogation centres spread throughout the country, torture and physical ill-treatment are common. Detailed reports have been received of the beatings, electric shock treatment and other more sophisticated methods used in the interrogation and detention centres in the country.

When I was in Hanoi I had the opportunity to talk to persons who had escaped from these detention centres and who gave their accounts of systematic torture. The agreement on ending the war contains certain references which establish, I believe, the responsibility of the government of South Viet Nam to release these civilian prisoners. It also establishes some responsibility on the part of the International Commission of Control and Supervision.

The agreement, of course, provides—and we rejoice in this—for the release of United States military personnel within 60 days, and this process is already under way. Article 8 of the agreement also provides for the return of Vietnamese civilian personnel captured and detained in South Viet Nam. It provides that this question will be resolved by the two South Vietnamese parties on the basis of the principles of article 21(b) of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities in Viet Nam of July 20, 1954. It goes on to say the two South Vietnamese parties will do so; in other words, deal with the question in a spirit of national reconciliation and concord, with a view to ending hatred and enmity, in order to ease suffering and to reunite families. The two South Vietnamese parties will do their utmost to resolve this question within 90 days after the cease-fire comes into effect.

Article 11 provides that immediately after the cease-fire, the two South Vietnamese parties will: (a) achieve national reconciliation and concord, end hatred and enmity, prohibit all acts of reprisal and discrimination against individuals or organizations that have collaborated with one side or the other; (b) ensure the democratic liberties of the people: personal freedom, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of meeting, freedom of organization, freedom of political activities, freedom of belief, freedom of movement, freedom of residence, freedom of work, right to property ownership and right to free enterprise.

It may surprise members of the House to know that such sweeping provisions were in the agreement that was signed. It must be admitted that these provisions sound somewhat utopian, but nevertheless they are part of the solemn agreement of the parties and it is obvious that the detaining of political prisoners and of those victims of the war who are not even political prisoners and have committed no offences is quite inconsistent with the spirit of the agreement.

Article 12 of the agreement provides for the setting up of a National Council of National Reconciliation and Concord of "three equal segments". The agreement does not define what the three segments are, but presumably they include the representatives of the National Liberation Front, the representatives of the Thieu regime in Saigon and the Third Force, largely consisting of buddhists and other religious elements. Obviously, if the Third Force is to be free to function as part of the National Council of National Reconciliation and Concord the detention of many of its members cannot be continued if the agreement is to be applied in good faith.

There is a protocol to the agreement concerning the return of captured military personnel and foreign civilians and captured and detained Vietnamese civilian personnel. The articles of this protocol which refer to Vietnamese civilian personnel are articles 7, 8 and 9. Article 7 reproduces from the terms of the main agreement the proviso that the question of the return of Vietnamese civilian personnel captured and detained in South Viet Nam will be resolved by the two South Vietnamese parties on the basis of the principles of article 21(b) of the agreement of July 20, 1954, which reads as follows:

> The term "civilian internees" is understood to mean all persons who, having in any way contributed to the political and armed struggle between the two parties, have been arrested for that reason and have been kept in detention by either party during the period of hostilities.

Subsection (c) of article 7 of the protocol provides that within 15 days after the cease-fire comes into effect the two South Vietnamese parties shall exchange lists of the Vietnamese civilian personnel captured and detained by each party and lists of the places at which they are held.

Article 8 deals with the treatment of captured persons during detention and provides:

> All captured . . . foreign civilians of the parties shall be treated humanely at all times, and in accordance with international practice.

They are to be protected against all violence to life and person, in particular against murder in any form, mutilation, torture and cruel treatment, and outrages upon personal dignity. They are to be given adequate food, clothing, shelter and the medical attention required for their health. They are to be allowed to exchange postcards and letters with their families and receive parcels.

The same provisions apply to all Vietnamese civilian personnel captured and detained in South Vietnam.

By article 9 it is provided as follows:

> (b) To contribute to improving the living conditions of the captured and detained Vietnamese civilian personnel, the two South Vietnamese parties shall, within fifteen days after the cease-fire comes into effect, agree upon the designation of two or more national Red Cross societies to visit all places where the captured and detained Vietnamese civilian personnel are held.

Under article 18 of the agreement the International Commission of Control and Supervision is also given certain responsibilities in this regard. Under article 18(c) it is provided that until the international conference makes definitive arrangements the International Commission of Control and Supervision will report to the two South Vietnamese parties on matters concerning the control and supervision of the implementation of the following provisions of this agreement. Included in these provisions is article 8(c) regarding the question of the return of Vietnamese civilian personnel captured and detained in South Viet Nam. It seems to me that these provisions impose a responsibility on the international community as well as on the parties to ensure that the provision in the agreement respecting civilian prisoners is carried out.

Article 19 of the agreement calls for the convening of an international conference within 30 days after the signing of the agreement to guarantee the ending of the war, the maintenance of peace in Viet Nam and respect for the Vietnamese people's fundamental national rights. Canada is one of the parties to participate in this conference. I would urge upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that the question of the plight of civilian refugees be brought before the conference and included in the agenda. The present intolerable conditions to which I referred earlier in my speech continue, notwithstanding the agreement. The moral authority of the whole peacemaking effort will be undermined if this situation is allowed to continue.

These provisions in the agreement, accepted by all parties, must be lived up to and Canada's participation in the supervision and control commission gives Canada a special responsibility on behalf of the suffering and innocent persons who have been detained. No doubt there will be difficult questions. It may be that it will be claimed that some of the people detained are detained for civilian offences and are not covered by the agreement at all. But this must not be allowed to rest on mere assertion. Adequate machinery should be set up to look at the actual facts and to obtain the release of those who are in fact not criminals but political prisoners or victims of the war. It would be nice if problems like this just disappeared and we could close our eyes to them, but these humanitarian problems will not disappear unless action is taken to solve them. We are committed to our part in seeing that this is done.

As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) mentioned, a section of the Canadian people have already shown their concern. An international committee to free South Vietnamese prisoners has been formed which includes officers from the Canadian Friends Service Committee, the Canadian Council of Churches, the Anglican Church of Canada, the United Church of Canada, the Voice of Women and, I have no doubt, many others. They will be making their representations to the government and no doubt they will be heard as speaking for the conscience of the Canadian people.

I want to add one other observation. May I say a word about the amendment of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner). I wholeheartedly support that amendment. It seems to me that an important decision on Canada's intervention in international affairs should be made by parliament, not by the executive alone. I think there is a basic question of principle involved here, and for this reason I would support the amendment.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think it would be very appropriate if I extended my congratulations to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) for the high level of the speech he made in this House prior to the dinner hour. Obviously he has a great deal of background information and knowledge of this subject.

I should like to commence my remarks with a quotation that I think is very apropos. It is entitled "Peace":

> The quest for peace is as old as mankind. For countless centuries man struggled to secure first his home, then his village, then his city. It is the unique heritage of our century that men must strive for a secure world.

• (2120)

Like many other hon. members of this House, it is with a great deal of satisfaction, a great deal of thankfulness and a very deep interest that I rise to participate in this debate on the ending of the war in Viet Nam and Canada's role in observation of that area in particular; it is also with a very deep sense of pride and tremendous respect for the individuals who have represented Canada abroad over the years of Canadian history when we have participated so actively in international affairs both at the diplomatic and the military level—and in most instances both have been intertwined. Those are only a few reasons why all of us should have an intensive appreciation for the role and the capabilities that Canadians have displayed in the past and which are still being displayed today.

As I started out to draft my speech for this debate I could not help but realize what a proud and satisfying moment this would have been for that great Canadian diplomat, soldier and statesman whom we lost just a short time ago in the person of the late Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. We can look back over the years of our history at his many great accomplishments in bringing warring peoples together, bringing them to the conference table to discuss the issues face to face, always in the best interests of humanity. We can recall many instances of somewhat the same nature as the present situation and the past situation in Viet Nam where his hand played a leading role in bringing disturbances in particular areas of the world to the same stage, hoping for the continued peace that we have in Viet Nam today.

It behooves all of us on both sides of this House, and it is the responsibility and should be the dedication of every Canadian, not only to retain the great image this nation of ours has had in world affairs in the past as a middle power and as a leading nation in the field of diplomacy, but to approach even greater respect, decor and success in the bringing about of peace. The major role of peacekeeping and truce supervision by our armed forces deserves much worthy and sometimes unsung respect. As parliamentarians, this is our challenge and our duty. Let us not take our eyes away from the subject of the world for a single moment.

All of us have heard comments from time to time, when issues of peacekeeping duties and international negotiation become the topic of the day, that these are too costly for us to undertake, that at times we spread ourselves too thinly and that we should not be participating to such a great extent in the problems of other peoples of the world at a time when we have problems of a more domestic nature. Domestic problems will be with us for decade after decade no matter what government or which men sit in the seats of power in this House. The scriptures tell us there will be wars and rumours of wars. This has in fact been so over the past years of world history and there is no particular reason for any of us to be so naive as to think it will suddenly stop.

Therefore, we as a responsible government and as a responsible parliament must consider each troubled spot in the world on its merits and decide what we can do to ease the situation and to prevent more suffering. To those who complain about the cost of our peacekeeping duties and other major responsibilities at the international levels of the world, I can only ask whether they prefer to pay for an attempted peace, whether they are prepared to pay for the retention of peace, whether they are prepared to pay for the future peacefulness of other nations of the world, or whether we on the other hand are going to go to our various churches each week, call ourselves dedicated Christians, dedicated members of the Hebrew faith, or dedicated members of any faith, and talk piously about peace and about being our brother's keeper and then go out during the week and take a "couldn't care less" attitude toward the major responsibilities of other peoples throughout the world.

Many of us in this House can remember the days when missionary societies used to come around from door to door to collect money to buy clothing and food for poor children in what were then the distant continents of Africa, Asia, South America, etc. Surely today, as we participate as an observer group and as people who are attempting to promote peace in an area of the world that has known nothing but war and devastation for years, we are to a great degree displaying an attitude of man's human feeling and sympathy for his fellow man and for a policy that we, as a peace loving nation, must continue to promote at all times and be prepared to contribute toward to the greatest possible degree in order to prevent minor struggles or greater than minor struggles from romping home into a theatre of full-scale world war and devastation.

The human suffering that the expertise of our Canadian military observers and peacekeeping corps have prevented on many occasions throughout the world can never be, and will never be measured in accurate terms, or in terms of measurable success. But our services in Kashmir, Korea, Palestine, Viet Nam and Laos, Egypt, Lebanon, the Congo, Cyprus, New Guinea, Yemen and Gaza can certainly be fully and favourably assessed by any sympathetic, understanding individual.

This is why I say that such achievements cannot and must not be measured in terms of dollars and cents. Surely the dedication of our diplomats and, indeed, the people in this House over the years, and in particular the members of our Canadian armed forces, is of extreme importance to the Canadian nation in international affairs at this time and we will continue to uphold the major roles we have played in those areas of the world which I have mentioned.

Perhaps I should state at this time that I had discussion with some of the members of the armed forces I knew personally before they went over to Viet Nam. They said this has brought about a feeling of importance to them as they feel they are doing something useful and are glad to be called upon to act on Canada's behalf and to keep up our image abroad.

I do not intend to deal with the dollars and cents aspect of the Canadian contribution to the ICCS. This matter has already been covered in the House and during this debate. It must be realized that the members of the armed forces, the aircraft and the ships are for the purpose of maintaining peace. They are being used for this precise purpose now. The Boeing 707s the Hercules of air transport command and the ships of the maritime command are today performing the basic function for which they were acquired some time ago.

We are always glad to call upon our forces in times of crisis, but there are some who have a tendency to forget their importance in between these crisis roles. The fact that our forces have performed many peacekeeping duties and observational duties means they are not only serving their country well and representing the people of Canada abroad, but they are in fact playing a role that undoubtedly saves thousands of lives in maintaining peace and preventing destruction.

Dollars spent on keeping up our Canadian armed forces could never begin to match the cost of destruction which might have occurred if it were not for the expertise of our armed forces and their ability to do jobs abroad on the international scene. At all times we must be mindful of the extensive training our armed forces go through to prepare themselves for the duties they are performing in Viet Nam today.

The armed forces train in many different climatic areas of the world to adapt themselves, adapt their equipment, and gain first-hand information on how to handle themselves if at any time during the course of a year they are called upon to go to similar climatic areas to perform observation or peacekeeping duties. Many people know that our forces have trained in Norway, in the Arctic, in Jamaica and in Australia. We have had observers and advisers in a military capacity throughout the world feeding information to the Department of National Defence. This information has been invaluable to the forces wherever they go.

This is what we talk about when we talk about expertise. Expertise to the armed forces does not mean just slinging a gun over your shoulder, wearing a pistol or being able to handle a particular piece of equipment. It also means that the forces are being called upon to be diplomats, to analyse exactly what is going on in an area of disturbance and to report accurately. They are there to observe and report on the implementation of the cease-fire agreement. They are not there for the purpose of becoming involved in a war.

Earlier in my speech I mentioned some of the areas in the world in which we have participated in efforts on behalf of peace. These missions have varied from membership of United Nations teams to tours as military observers, to peacekeeping in general. They include, of course, our participation in the international commission for supervision and control. Many of our men on the scene are experts in their own right and are quite capable of training those who are with them. In Viet Nam at the present time, out of the first group of 130 men, 20 officers and 22 men have had previous peacekeeping supervisory experience. Thus, 32 per cent of the first group already have peacekeeping experience. The others have been carefully selected.

In the second group of approximately 140, 21 officers and 4 men have all had previous United Nations peacekeeping experience. Experience counts, Mr. Speaker. As I say, 25 per cent of our military component in Viet Nam have had previous experience in the very duties they are being called upon to perform. Our Canadian forces received congratulatory messages from U Thant of the United Nations on the occasion of their leaving Egypt after ten and a half years service in that area.

At this point I should like to quote John W. Dafoe, who came from Winnipeg where he wrote for many years. In a speech to the Canadian Club there on April 8, 1919, he said:

> The making of peace is in fact more difficult than has been the winning of the war.

The making of peace in Viet Nam will be a real challenge to us as Canadians and to the other nations which are trying to bring it about. The following is a quotation from "The Eagle's Nest" by Ruskin:

> People are always expecting to get peace in Heaven but, you know, whatever peace they get there will be ready-made. Whatever making of peace they can be blessed for must be on the earth, here.

Let us hope that our armed forces are among those who are blessed on this occasion. We do not measure achievement by the size of the problem we are handling. In this particular case we shall measure achievement by the amount of progress we have made 60 days hence. In closing, I should like to quote another great statesman, Sir Winston Churchill.

Mr. Stanfield: Who was the first?

Mr. Hopkins: He had this to say in the British House of Commons on July 13, 1934:

I have been trying to seek out for myself what would be the best way of preventing war, and it has seemed to me that the League of Nations should be the great instrument upon which all those resolves to maintain peace should centre, and that we should all make our contribution to the League of Nations.

We know that over the years since then we have time and time again attempted to maintain peace in the world. Our debate on Viet Nam today is just another example of this. What really should be emphasized in this debate should be emphasized in every debate on peacekeeping duty and on settling conflicts in the world. First of all, the prevention of the destruction of life and the destruction of property. Second, the fact that even though men far greater than we are have failed in the past, as the minister stated this afternoon, is no reason why we should ever stop trying.

I am sure we all extend our very best wishes for success to our Canadian contingent in Viet Nam. We hope they will be successful in bringing all parties together in an amicable manner. As a member who has a large military establishment in his constituency, I should like to extend my personal thanks to the Governor General, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) and to the Chief of the Defence Staff for visiting Montreal on the weekend and giving our troops a good boost in morale before they left for Viet Nam.

I might add that the rumours we hear that this move by us has caused bad morale in the armed forces are rumours I cannot buy, because I have talked to members of the forces first-hand. If anything, it has increased morale in the armed forces; they feel proud to be called upon for duty and they feel they are performing a very useful role not only for Canada but for the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I must remind the parliamentary secretary before he finishes collecting his notes that if the members of the Canadian armed forces who have gone to Viet Nam do have a reason to feel good, it is because of the contribution they are making. No other group of Canadians has been so neglected in the history of this country than these people by this government. They have been deprived of the resources for adequate training, operating under a frozen budget for the last four or five years. It is no wonder they feel good about having something to do. What is regrettable, as my distinguished colleague for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) pointed out, is the haste with which and the confusion under which they have gone into what is in fact, a theatre of war.

• (2140)

Mr. Hopkins: There is no confusion with them. They are well organized.

Mr. Sharp: It is you who are confused.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

Mr. Forrestall: It is regrettable. I would like to remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that the government has made a deliberate decision not to let this matter come to a vote tonight.I would remind him that never before have Canadians been sent into a theatre of war without an opportunity given for an expression of opinion by the representatives of the people in this chamber.

Mr. Sharp: You are having your chance. Go ahead and express yourself.

Mr. Baldwin: We want a vote.

Mr. Forrestall: They are there to supervise a cease-fire, and I repeat that it is regrettable that the members of this House are not able to express an opinion. I do not mean express an opinion about the decision that has been taken. It is not in dispute. The government acted. It had to act. A basic decision was taken. What we are seeking is an opportunity for an expression of opinion by the people of the country on what happens in 60 days' time. I intend to sit down five minutes before ten o'clock to see whether anyone on the other side of the House rises to talk out this motion. If that happens it will be a matter of regret and shame, not only for the government benches but for the entire House. I would remind the cackling hens over there that this House is the voice of our country, not the 28 or 30 men who happen to sit on the executive benches. They took their decision. As I say, I do not dispute the necessity and urgency of their decision, nor do I question the confusion and uncertainty in which that decision was taken. I do not think anybody in the world does. As other hon. members have said, we welcome at least a semblance of determination to try and bring about a cease-fire in Viet Nam.

No one in this House or in the country has a greater love or deeper respect for the members of the Canadian armed forces than I do. But that is not what we are talking about now. We are talking about something else. I reiterate that it is now very apparent that members of the government do not want this matter to come to a vote, and I wonder why. We could go back to the war debates in 1914 and read the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the great and distinguished Liberals. As a matter of fact, we should all re-read the speeches made in that extraordinary session of parliament. We should also read the speeches of our late and loved Prime Minister Pearson, speeches made so few years ago.

All of these men, throughout all the opportunities and challenges that Canada had to go out into the world and assist in the maintenance of peace, brought the matter to this chamber and sought its direction, its counsel, its support and guidance. It is a matter of regret that this parliament has not had that opportunity.

I wanted to rise tonight and say a few words about several aspects of Canada's participation in Viet Nam. I wanted to regret, as forcefully as I could, the government's decision that it was necessary to send a provocative instrument of war, fully armed and carrying, if you will, missiles into waters contiguous to Vietnamese waters. I just wonder what else it carries. I regret that that had to be done.

But I do not deplore the fact that contingency plans have been made to remove our troops in the event that hostilities are not to come to an end. There is no doubt that if hostilities do erupt beyond the point of control, beyond the point where the safety of Canadians and of other members of the supervisory commission can no longer be guaranteed by those who have undertaken to assure their safety, they should be removed.

Nobody would argue against the commitment of planes, ships and any other means necessary to get our troops out of Viet Nam in the event that that is required. What is regretted is the displacement to that side of the Pacific of an armed warship for the purpose, to use the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson), of an extended training cruise. Why could we not have sent a couple of 707s over there, or a couple of Hercules, to be located at strategic points? I will never know the reasons for sending that ship.

Like most Canadians, I remain deeply concerned about peace. There is not a member of this party that is not concerned about peace. But our concern runs a little bit deeper than apparently the concern of the government. This afternoon we heard words that were sincerely uttered, that were considered words. I quote from the remarks of our lead-off speaker in this debate, the distinguished member for Saint-Hyacinthe, that it is sad but true that our present situation in Viet Nam is precarious, and that in contradiction of his own statements laying out the ground rules for Canadian involvement, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made the one decision he obviously did not want to make.

There are two different points at issue here. The lessons we learned in our history of peacekeeping operations around the world have not been made any clearer than they were during our involvement in the ICC. There it was made abundantly clear that you cannot operate without clear direction as to what you are doing, the purpose for which you are there and the body to whom you should report. Even now we have not arrived at a satisfactory authority to which we can report. I hope that in 30 days' time we will be able to sort out this final problem.

Again I trust that the government will give the House an opportunity to speak tonight, to enlarge upon the things that we would like to see Canada's representatives discuss at meetings of the commission, things such as the plight of the refugees, the plight of the children, the restoration of North Viet Nam. All of these things we must participate in, and forcefully. We are in Viet Nam to oversee the truce.

It is clear now to the world, I suppose, that North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam are indeed one country and that the demarcation line was a temporary instrument. If this is true, we are not in Viet Nam only to observe cease-fire arrangements but to help reunite a nation, to help re-establish its people, to show that we are concerned, are willing and indeed want to help, and that if we do not help it will be on our conscience.

The interjections this evening from the Secretary of State for External Affairs were highly partisan and not called for in the context of this debate. There is not one man or woman in this House or in this country who does not share the ideals of those who would help to restore, and want to restore, a lasting peace to Viet Nam, who does not want to participate in the restoration of that country and the rehabilitation of its children, its institutions and its systems of democratic government or whatever type of government they choose.

We are not there as observers of the cease-fire alone: this must be kept in mind no matter what we do. Every act and every thought that is voiced by Canadians in that country will be watched and listened to. As has been said, they bear a great burden not only to observe the truce, the cease-fire, but as well in the role of men of good will working toward a lasting peace in that country. That is why the government, in the next four or five minutes, should permit this matter to come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Let the people of this nation lend their strength and support to the government in this matter; let them express their will. We are asking only that the matter come back to the House prior to the expiration of the 60-day notice so that it may be debated. The government's failure to do that can only be construed as contempt for the voice of the people of this country who in their hearts all welcome the attempts at peace in Viet Nam and the role of the Canadian forces in helping to bring that about. Given the guidance and strength of this House, I think the troops that we have in Viet Nam will be the stronger.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I find it extremely unfortunate, as I wanted to exercise my privilege, which is equal to that of any other member, that I cannot say at great length how happy I am to see the end of that terrible conflict in Viet Nam. I would have liked to give some background of Canada's participation in the International Control Commission. I would have also liked to inform the House about the various steps that some Liberal members, with the support of colleagues from other parties, have taken.

As for myself, I have brought my indirect contribution by helping young draft dodgers who believed that this war was immoral take advantage of this haven that Canada could appear to be at this time. I am referring to American draft dodgers whom we have welcomed to this country.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to elaborate on this and explain that I, a pro-American, have contacted the United States ambassador, for instance, last week to ask him to inform the White House of the happiness that I felt at seeing President Nixon take a historic step by ending the war in Viet Nam, and ask him also to consider the possibility, from now till the end of his term of office, of showing generosity and allowing these young Americans to return home.

[English]

Is it the attitude of this member of the official opposition that it will be unfair for us to talk tonight? He said, in effect, "I will speak until five minutes to ten, and then you all shut up and we will vote". This coming from a member who sits in a party that always accuses us of arrogance, Mr. Speaker! I wonder what kind of arrogance these people display.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: It is my feeling that your party feels that they know best. Hon. members from the NDP, our friends, introduced a subamendment. Because there is an amendment, obviously they must introduce a subamendment. Their amendment says "or withdraw". Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, our troops being under fire in Viet Nam and saying, "We must not withdraw". The cabinet, the government, the minister cannot withdraw because there is a resolution of the House that says, "If you want to withdraw you must have a debate in the House".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I think it is unfortunate that the public might perhaps get the impression that we wanted to kill the debate. Members of the opposition would like to lay down the rules of debate in this House and decide until what time they can speak and whether we can speak or not. Mr. Speaker, I strongly object to that, because I believe that we have a right to speak as often as we want to if we think we must participate in this debate on such a horrible war, and we should also be grateful that our troops are the best ambassadors of charity, good faith and love. Mr. Speaker, I would wish—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would simply like to ask the minister if he is prepared to bring this debate back tomorrow, so that it can be concluded. Is this unfortunate motion doomed to wither on the vine as a result of spineless government action, or is he prepared to bring it back so that we can vote on it?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think we have had a very useful debate today by all hon. members who have participated. It will of course, be for the House leaders to agree when it might be brought back again.

Mr. Prud'Homme: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is after ten o'clock. The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege, but the Chair has no authority to entertain questions of privilege or points of order after ten o'clock. My duty at this time would be to leave the chair and go home, and invite hon. members to take up their points of order and questions of privilege at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. If the hon. member has a question of privilege it will be entertained tomorrow at eleven o'clock, as will all points of order. At the moment we have very important business to attend to, the adjournment proceedings.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIRPORTS—VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED RUNWAY—DATE OF COMPLETION OF EXPROPRIATION HEARINGS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in the chamber tonight. I appreciate his presence. We have a problem in the area I represent. It is not his fault; he just having assumed the portfolio of Minister of Transport. The people of British Columbia believe that we need more and larger airports, and they are necessary. What the government must remember is that the people elect the government of this country. We are here to represent the people, and the views they express must be listened to.

I should like to review for the minister some of the problems that the people of Sea Island have encountered. They date back to October 11, 1967, when the member representing Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, Bob Prittie, received a letter from the then minister of transport which said, among other things:

> I can also assure you that at the proper time we will advise all property owners concerned of our intention, our land acquisition program and approximately how long they can remain in possession. The program will be arranged to ensure all property owners will have ample time in which to relocate and we will do everything possible to ensure disturbance is kept to a minimum.

That was in 1967. I now move on to August, 1972. The minister of transport of that time wrote the following in a letter to the people:

> Treasury Board has approved the expenditure of funds for the acquisition of the land and I am sure you will agree that in view of the timing for runway construction, expropriation is the most expedient and beneficial way of proceeding for all concerned.

I now come to a letter from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the people of Sea Island, dated September 23, 1972. He also used the word "expedient" and said:

> I am confident that the difficulties your Association has encountered will now be overcome and that expropriation can go forward in a fair and expedient manner.

It took only five years for the government to decide that it would become expedient. I now go back to May, 1972, and will read the report of what the hon. member representing the riding at that time said to the meeting of the residents of Sea Island:

"... the Cora Brown area will be taken in the next month," he said.

"... residents will be allowed to remain by renting their houses as long as they wish or until the DOT needs the land, which is not likely for another five years."

At that time he gave the citizens 12 hours to make up their minds. I leave that area and go to the bridge which is also involved in the expropriations in that area. I have mentioned the problems that we had with tolls. It took letters from the Chamber of Commerce in Richmond and over 40,000 letters from the city of Vancouver to convince the government we did not want tolls on that bridge. There are still piles of sand sitting there, as anybody who goes to Vancouver international airport will see. They were there for the purpose of the tolls and they must be removed. The government has let contracts for removing those piles of sand. The pillars are still sitting in the water; they have been sitting there for some time. A headline in a newspaper of the area reads, "How not to go about building a bridge".

The people were not listened to. The government has made all kinds of promises but there has been very little action. It let contracts for the bridge but we only have the superstructure at the south end. It is true that the hearings have not been completed yet on the south end, but as any engineer knows you cannot build a superstructure without knowing what you will end up with. People sold their homes in the Lancaster area and they were supposed to be removed. The men who bought them rented the homes to the people in the area and only after pressure were those people made to leave.

The greater Vancouver regional board today asked the minister, Bob Strachan, in Vancouver to approach the government and ask that construction of the bridge be stopped so that they could look at it. In conclusion, I want to talk about the environmental impact of what is happening. On January 16 the minister's parliamentary secretary said, as reported at page 388 of Hansard:

We do not plan to make any report to the expropriation hearing, but if questions are raised on these matters, answers will be given.

The questions were raised but the answers were not given. How can we decide whether we ought to build an airport there if we do not know what its environmental impact will be? Why take the houses of people before you really know? The hearings were mysteriously stopped today and adjourned until Monday. I plead with the minister to take some time out of his busy schedule and be in Vancouver on Monday morning at ten o'clock, at the opening of the hearing, to listen to the people. I will be there on Monday morning and I will not return until the minister does. He will not be missed in the House if there is a vote. I plead with him to do this. The people of the area deserve it. They have been having a hard time since 1967. It is time the government listened and found out what the people in that part of the country really want.

Mr. Joseph-Phillippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) I wish to again make reference to my answer which the hon. member quoted a short while ago. It is found at page 388 of Hansard for January 16. The answer I will now make will give in detail what the minister meant as to what is being done.

The expropriation hearings involving properties required in the Burkeville area for road construction related to the Hudson Street bridge have been completed and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) will be announcing the government's decision tomorrow.

The expropriation hearings with respect to the land required for the new runway at Vancouver international airport were started on January 29. It is expected that the hearings officer will commence proceedings with respect to the lands involved in the Cora Brown and McDonald subdivisions in the near future. As the hon. member knows, by law, the government, after reviewing the hearing officer's report, is required to announce its intentions by March 4.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is arranging, and in fact has arranged, at the beginning of next week to provide all interested individuals and groups with information concerning the expansion plans for Vancouver international airport, including the new runway which will be required by 1977. Today, a short while ago, the Minister of Transport confirmed to me that officials from his department have now left for Vancouver. They will be in Vancouver to answer all questions and to give information to all interested groups.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Particular attention will be devoted to environmental and noise considerations which affect those closest to the airport. We are also aware that a broader spectrum of people in the greater Vancouver district and British Columbia generally will be interested in the plans envisaged to allow Vancouver to play its key role as an aerial gateway for western Canada, including domestic, transborder and international traffic. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, of the minister's concern in this regard. He has related this to me many times today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last week I raised the question of more funds for local initiatives projects which had been rejected by the ministry due to lack of funds. On January 22 the minister's parliamentary secretary stated that the total number of LIP projects was 15,053, for a value of $480.5 million. He also stated that 5,000 projects, for a value of $148 million, have been approved and that the monetary allotment for LIP was expended.

From the popularity of the response for LIP grants, it is fairly obvious that this partial solution to winter unemployment is what municipalities and groups of unemployed feel is suited to their particular needs. Last October, just before the election, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) saw the jump in unemployment he said he was puzzled and he further stated that maybe the solution was to attack the problem at the local level. Yes, the solution is at the local level and I give as an illustration the village of Killarney in Nickel Belt, which has an unemployment rate in the winter of 40 per cent to 60 per cent. This community has put in six applications for LIP grants which would employ most of their unemployed. Only two have been approved.

• (2210)

Killarney is not an isolated case. The municipal leaders in my riding have been on the phone constantly to me asking why their particular projects have not been approved. I think other hon. members in this House have had similar experiences.

I quote from a letter sent to me by Mr. Paul Engstrom, reeve of the township of Ratter and Dunnet:

> Thank you for sending me a copy of the letter you wrote to the Honourable R. K. Andras, Minister of Manpower and Immigration regarding our LIP project No. K1421.
>
> January 8, 1973 Kona Construction commenced erection of the shell for the arena and community hall—completion date of eith weeks. At present 10 men are employed.
> Had we in any way anticipated there would be no grant, we would not have proceeded with this construction during the winter months. The higher costs entailed will devour the $5,000 our fund raising committee raised last year, holding raffles, dances, beer fest and canvasses.
> The men presently employed on our arena building would most probably be drawing unemployment insurance and a vast number of men have visited the site seeking employment.
> All money allotted by the government towards this project would be at least visible, that something had been accomplished. I wonder if that can be said of all projects that have been approved by government.
> I do hope the minister will reconsider, and allot us the same as other municipalities are receiving, in all fairness.
>
> Yours truly,
> Paul Engstrom (Reeve)

It seems to these people and myself that the government is more interrested in paying them unemployment insurance benefits than stimulating employment in their community. In Nickel Belt riding there were 35 LIP applications and only six have been approved. There are about 7,000 persons registered with the Sudbury manpower office, indicative of the high unemployment in our area. Yet only one-sixth of our LIP applications have been accepted. The unemployed of Nickel Belt, not unlike the unemployed in the rest of Canada want jobs, not "pogey" and certainly not welfare.

I therefore suggest to the minister that, if he is really interested in reducing the number of persons on the UIC rolls, he should appropriate additional funds, probably from other less popular make-work programs, for financing more of the LIP applications.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this matter is not within my jurisdiction and I apologize to the hon. member that neither the minister nor the parliamentary secretary is here this evening. However, I have taken note of what he has said.

Mr. Rodriguez: Just approve my LIP applications.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Let me assure the hon. member that I will take this matter up immediately with the minister and the parliamentary secretary and give him the answers he requires as quickly as possible.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Rodriguez: You mean the approvals.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): The hon. member says "approvals." We would all like approvals for certain projects which we have, priorities that we as individual members have. As I say, I will provide the hon. member with the answers as quickly as possible.

SOCIAL SECURITY—OLD AGE PENSION—POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY TO 60

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, old age security is indeed a question of the highest concern for the people of this country.

Recently I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to find out from him whether the officials of his department were looking into the possibility of lowering the age of eligibility to 60.

The minister did not bother to answer my question and so I thought it was my duty to bring up the issue during the late show. Mr. Speaker, we are not here to play politics; nevertheless the silence the minister is keeping on this matter could be interpreted as a refusal to commit himself on account of political repercussions.

In fact, if the minister does answer in the affirmative, he will be agreeing with the Social Credit Party of Canada which advocated during the last election campaign, the necessity of lowering the eligibility age from 65 to 60. Conversely, if he replies in the negative, he will be revealing how little attention he pays to the claims of the people.

Mr. Speaker, if there is a political dilemma, it is out of place. I wish the minister would answer for the very simple reason that there is at the present time an absolute necessity for lowering the eligibility age. And I should like to mention three major reasons which, I think, support my plea of urgency.

Having studied hundreds of cases that were referred to us, we know very well that it is absolutely impossible nowadays to find a job at 60.

Mr. Speaker, when finding a job has become difficult even for young people aged 20 or 25, one must recognize that after reaching 60 it becomes impossible.

Those people are therefore unable to earn money. If people after 60 cannot find work, what else can they do? At the present time, they must apply to the Department of Social Affairs as far as Quebec is concerned. They are then given low hand-outs, since their needs are assessed—for example in the case of a couple of 60 to 65 years of age, $78 monthly, an amount which they must use for clothes and food as well as for small personal effects. In my opinion, the human being is being ridiculed.

If the old age security pension was granted at 60 years of age, we would settle the problem for all families where the head is 60 or over.

Mr. Speaker, there is another important argument: by allowing those people to draw an old age security pension, those who are still working at that age, in spite of some difficulties, would leave their job to younger workers.

It would be a way of clearing the labour market and making more jobs available to the younger people.

For all those reasons, I think that it is urgent for the minister to tell the House at least whether his officials are considering the problem. The people are waiting. Every day, hundreds of letters dealing with this matter are received from Créditiste ridings. Personally I receive at least some twenty letters a week from people asking: When shall we have pensions at 60? So, I have to reply to them: "When the Minister of National Health and Welfare makes up his mind". This is why I would like the Minister to tell the people of Canada at least whether he has started considering the possibility of lowering the age of entitlement from 65 to 60.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the comment made by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) on this matter which certainly concerns all hon. members as well as a great number of Canadian citizens.

He is wondering whether officials of my department are examing the matter or have done so. I believe there is nothing secret in this respect and if he did not get a reply in the House recently it was because of a technical or procedural problems and not because of a refusal or a failure on my part, since the reply I would have given at the time is that my department is indeed examing that matter, as it examines a great many others in the area of social security. In that field there have been many suggestions, hypotheses brought forward by all kinds of agencies, by politicians of all parties during the past few years and there is practically no subject raised in this country in the field of income security which has not been the object of careful and thorough study by officials of my department.

So, in this case, it is not merely a question of study; an important problem crops up with regard to the prohibitive cost of such a proposal. There is another important aspect to be considered and it has to do with that part of the Speech from the Throne dealing with federal-provincial relations. The fact that the provinces in some cases do not provide enough social welfare shows that at the present time they are having a hard time finding the money required. That is why we have called for the end of April a meeting where all aspects of social security will be reviewed. I think that before making any proposals in that field, I will surely have to consult with my provincial counterparts.

Furthermore, as early as to-morrow I shall attend a meeting with them and I am sure that the subject raised by the hon. member will be discussed.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. parliamentary secretary is now in the House. May I have an answer to the points I raised earlier?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather it is the wish of hon. members that the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Comtois) be recognized, and accordingly I now recognize him.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my apologies to my hon. colleague for being a few minutes late, but I was held up at the committee that is now sitting.

I merely want to say that it is not particularly useful to bring up the government programs one by one as the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) just did a while ago.

He said that the government should assign more money to LIP. It may be true, but I too could name you dozens of programs to which the government could allot more money.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt said that we should reduce the old age pensions, health benefits or the pensions to the blind to devote more money to LIP.

One of the problems the government has to face when it listens to suggestions from members of the opposition or even from its own members is that it hears on the one hand those who say that the government should do more and on the other hand those who say that the governemnt should reduce taxes.

I think it is more useful and more realistic to consider government programs as a whole.

The local initiative program is part of the economic and fiscal policy of the government. The government lays down its priorities from suggestions coming from all sides.

I should remind the hon. member that the budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has promised to bring down very shortly will give him a good idea of the government's priorities for the years to come.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

CONTROL OF GASOLINE PRICES—EFFECT OF ACTION BY COMPANIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House pursuant to Standing Order 43. The urgency and pressing necessity of this matter arises, so I am informed, from present and combined activity by some, perhaps all, of the major oil companies to change thousands of contracts with retail gasoline outlet dealers. The new contract provides that ownership of all gasoline delivered by these distributors to the retail dealers will remain with the distributors instead of the retailers. This means that control of consumer prices for gasoline will shift from the retailer to the supplier. With present concern over the cost of living at the stage where price controls may be necessary, the effect of such private and concentrated control over the price of a product that is a necessity to millions of Canadians requires action by this House. With unanimous consent, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the matter hereby raised be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and that it be an instruction to the committee to report back to this House as quickly as possible with its recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware of all the attention which this government brings to the financing of the Montreal summer Olympic Games of 1976.

More than four years ago, this government has clearly defined its position, namely that we would not make any special financial contribution to these games. In letters dating as far back as 1968 and since then, on the occasion of numerous public statements, Mayor Jean Drapeau has indicated that besides certain current federal-provincial programs, no financing was required on the part of the federal government.

While the organization of the games is the responsibility of the City of Montreal, the federal government has taken an interest in them by reason, on the one hand, of the international character of the undertaking and, on the other hand, of financing methods considered by the City of Montreal and the Olympic Games Organization Committee (COJO).

In fact, hon. members know that on announcing its $310 million budget last week, COJO proposed that except for the amount of $18 million, the total revenue expected be provided through fund-raising programs.

Although such programs are intended for the Canadian and the foreign public at large rather than the federal taxpayer as such, nevertheless they require the approval of federal authorities.

Besides the expenses covered by the City of Montreal budget, we must also expect that the Canada Olympic Games will cause disbursements for the various federal departments in the discharge of their usual responsibilities.

We are considering two main points: First, the government seriously wonders whether COJO can balance its budget. In November last, we received a copy of that budget and according to the appraisal conducted by federal officials, a deficit can be expected.

Mr. Speaker, may I stress that this is our own point of view. I know that the Quebec government and the Montreal municipality probably hold different views, which I respect. As concerns the cost of an event that belongs to a still distant future, of course, a possibility of disagreement exists but, as I said, we fear that a deficit might occur and this is one reason among others why we have taken precautionary measures with which I will deal in a moment.

Secondly, we fear that some unexpected contingencies might cause a considerable increase in the cost of the games, for this happened on the occasion of previous Olympic Games and of Expo 67. This is why we intend to do everything possible to help the games' organizers maintain the cost at the lowest possible level, as they themselves have stated they will.

Such, then, are the main facts that led to my statement before the House last week, to the effect that we wanted assurance that, if there were a deficit, it would be made good by a body other than the federal government. This guarantee was to my mind essential if parliament was to be called upon to look into the action suggested by COJO with regard to plans to secure funds, plans that the City of Montreal calls plans for self-financing, which are more likely to call upon the general public than on the taxpayer as such.

• (1110)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the government has now received a letter from the Prime Minister of Quebec containing a clear assurance that his government would not seek financial assistance from the federal government should a deficit arise.

The government has also received letters to the same effect from the city of Montreal and from COJO. With the permission of the House, I should like to table these letters now. The government considers that the agreements by Premier Bourassa in his letter, and by Mayor Drapeau and Mr. Rousseau in theirs, provide the assurances we have sought. Since we believe a deficit is a clear possibility, these assurances are important. These letters guarantee that any deficit would not be laid at the door of the federal government.

The government is now willing to act upon the request of the city of Montreal and COJO concerning the special issues of Olympic stamps and coins. And we are continuing discussions with the government of Quebec, the city of Montreal and COJO on the best way of answering COJO's request for an annual lottery.

Before I conclude, I would like to make very clear the nature of the federal outlays that may be involved in meeting the requirements generated by the Olympics for normal federal services. As I indicated earlier, these are not included in the budget presented by COJO.

One large cost item is the Olympic village. Between 2,000 and 3,000 dwelling units are contemplated. Funding by CMHC could range from $26 million to $54 million, depending on the number and costs of the units and the amount of commercial financing. We feel it is quite reasonable to consider that this could be handled between now and 1976 under the normal CMHC allocations for public housing, which go out to all provinces, since the share which has gone to the province of Quebec has been running at some $100 million annually. After the games, the Olympic village would become part of Montreal's housing stock.

Second, we must recognize that the large influx of Olympic participants and spectators will put particular pressures on various services which in the very nature of things would have to be provided by the government of Canada, such as personnel from the RCMP, the Canadian armed forces and customs and immigration. It is obvious that if the Olympics are held in Montreal, as they will be now, the federal government cannot stand aside and say: "We will not be involved in questions of security or customs or immigration." Yet, these are implied costs in the sense that they would not have occurred had the games not taken place. We anticipate this might involve some $20 million in increased costs, and we are determined to maintain a strict control over such costs.

Finally, there is a further cost increment which would be incurred if the CBC assumed the role of "host broadcaster" providing the basic television service at the games. In this event, net costs to the Crown corporation would be an estimated $25 million. Discussions are continuing on whether the CBC would or should undertake this function, and naturally the government will have to reach a decision in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government has a strong and legitimate concern over arrangements for the 1976 Olympics. This concern does not, however, diminish the warm welcome which will be extended to the Olympic games and its participants by the government and by Canadians generally. It is a challenging undertaking and I am sure that all Canadians wish it well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I begin by using the words with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ended his statement, that this is a challenging undertaking, one that all Canadians wish well. Speaking on behalf of my colleagues and myself, I can say that we certainly wish it well and we wish to be co-operative.

I must say that I have some concern following the Prime Minister's statement. One reason, though not the only one, why I wish the games well and wish to co-operate is that I believe that Canada's good name, as well, of course, as the good name of Montreal and the good name of the people of Quebec, is involved in this enterprise. I point out that in 1969 the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Mr. Brundage of the International Olympic Committee in which he said:

> The government of Canada warmly supports the application of the city of Montreal for the honour of being host to the 1976 summer Olympic games. I therefore offer you a hearty welcome and extend to all who are associated with the Olympic games a cordial invitation to visit us in Montreal in 1976.

At that time the Prime Minister made it clear within Canada that the government was not committing itself to direct grants to support the Olympic Games, but I believe the international Olympic community and other countries would be justified in feeling that the government of Canada was going to see that these games were warmly supported, were going to come off and come off satisfactorily and in a creditable way. I think I must also say that following that letter I do not believe that the Prime Minister has discharged his responsibility in allowing things to drift along the way they have drifted. So we have been confronted with this last-minute emergency, and a decision as to what we should do to make it possible for these games to be arranged and in fact take place. I have to say, Sir, that we have no firm assurance today that everything has been arranged.

It is true that the Prime Minister has received an assurance from the Prime Minister of Quebec, and I believe from the Mayor of Montreal and others, that the government of Canada will not be called upon to pay any deficit. But the Prime Minister has not received any assurance from the Prime Minister of Quebec that the province of Quebec is prepared or able or is undertaking to underwrite any deficit, or to give any assurance that in fact any finances will be provided if some of the Prime Minister's fears become realities and a deficit does become clear and looms very large. I emphasize that the Prime Minister has not arranged any assurance that this kind of situation can in fact be met. The guarantee and assurance from the government of Quebec do not amount to any such assurance. I think the House and the people of the country should understand that.

The Prime Minister has not given us any details this morning as to the proposals relating to coinage and stamps. In fact, I have to say that I have had no discussion with the Prime Minister about any of these matters except what I have heard here in the House, although I have been filled in by the mayor of Montreal and the COJO people in particular before Christmas, as a matter of fact as fully as I required, about their proposals.

I believe that how these coinage and stamp transactions are arranged is important. I believe it is important that the proceeds of the sale of the coinage come into the usual hands and that we do not get into the position where we are minting coins for an organization other than the government, however worthy that organization may be. It may well be that this is all going to be arranged through the Bank of Canada and that the bank will receive the proceeds from the sale and remit the difference between the cost of minting and the sale price to COJO. I would regard that as the correct procedure, but I presume legislation will be required to enable it to be done. Of course, it might be argued that this amounts to a grant, but I would regard it as preferable to simply minting the coins and turning them over to COJO or any other organization at mint cost. This, I think, would be a grave departure from our established traditions and procedures. I assume, as I say, that legislation will be introduced and, if so, we will want to examine it. We will also be concerned about the manner in which the stamps are to be handled.

• (1120)

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I have to point out that although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has received an assurance that his government or the government that may succeed it—the government of Canada, to be non-political—will not be asked to cover any deficit, he has not in fact received any assurance, except from the city of Montreal, about the actual financing of the games. I think I heard that the provincial treasurer of Quebec say that the Quebec government is prepared to meet a deficit of $5 million to $10 million. The House should understand there is no assurance that, if the games run into heavy weather between now and their opening, the government of Quebec will put up more money. I say that for clarification.

I think it is very important that the country as a whole be involved in these games, Mr. Speaker, and support them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: They are a tremendous undertaking and the good people of Montreal and Quebec deserve our compliments for their energy and initiative. One way in which the whole country can be thoroughly involved in this great undertaking, with leadership from this government, is through a program of training and preparation of athletes that will encompass the length and breadth of the country, involving young Canadians directly and older Canadians indirectly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The whole country must be involved so the games will not be regarded simply as something going on in Montreal and to some extent in Kingston but rather as something that involves all Canada and all young Canadians. I hope the Prime Minister will make absolutely certain that everything is done to involve the federal government in a proper way both financially and in terms of leadership to ensure that a national program for the training of athletes, with the games as an objective, is launched, maintained and pushed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my party welcomes the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) today in which he took some trouble to outline the parameters of federal involvement in Canada's first Olympic games. We wish our first Olympic games every possible success as a potentially great moment in the history of our nation.

We in the New Democratic Party, however, are not unmindful of certain criticisms and reservations that have been expressed about the games not only in Canada but in many other quarters. We have heard that the Olympics are not truly amateur in nature, that the recent games were far too costly, and that there are many other priorities for funds in this troubled world faced with problems of poverty, overpopulation and pollution. We have heard also that the games have been potentially too nationalistic in nature. Many other reservations have also been expressed. We hope, therefore, that the Montreal committee will be conscious of the original traditions of international athletic events and not turn the Montreal games into an extravaganza. We look forward to Canada leading the way in staging the games on such a budget scale that, in future, developing countries in Asia and Africa can also afford to act as hosts to the games.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, my party approves the concept of the issuing of special coins and stamps. We appreciate the assurance of the Prime Minister and of the Montreal committee that the people of Canada will not be asked to pick up any deficit. The Prime Minister himself has assured us that under no circumstances will Canadians be asked, through the federal government, to finance any deficit that may possibly accrue from the games. I will not emphasize this point because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) spent considerable time in discussing the matter in greater detail. We welcome the Prime Minister's assurance.

I now wish to mention our concern about federal involvement through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and I think it is opportune to raise a couple of points at this time. First, we believe that housing for the Olympic village funded through existing and proposed programs under the National Housing Act must be of such design as will meet the objectives under which those programs have been funded. We feel that the needs of the future occupants must be considered first, and not the temporary needs of visiting athletic contingents. The second point is that grants and loans similar to those made available to the city of Montreal through existing or proposed federal programs ought to be made available concurrently to other cities on a pro rata or population basis.

We suggest that if the coming event is to be justified from the standpoint of broad national interest and support it is essential that Canadians, above all, not be denied the opportunity to view the games in their own country. We recommend that tickets for prime events be distributed on a population basis. Between 10 and 20 per cent of the tickets for seats for prime events ought to be sold to average Canadians throughout the provinces and not sold in blocks to large dealers and corporations for them to give away as tax-assisted favours. We feel that the seats should go to the population at large as it is the people of Canada who will be asked to support the games.

Finally, we hope that the Olympics in 1976 will mark an end to some of the unfortunate trends evident in recent Olympic games and that the world athletic community will embark on a new Olympic spirit in Montreal, a spirit reflecting what is best in the Olympic ideal, a spirit that will rekindle interest and acceptance not just by the affluent industrialized nations of the world but also by the developed and developing nations which, together, make up the rich mosaic of our planet. We welcome the athletes who will visit Canada, many of whom will be visiting this country for the first time, and hope it will be a tremendous experience for them as they pace one another on the road to athletic excellence.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it would have been surprising to see the Canadian government ignore an event which interests all nations. So we were happy to see that a decision has finally been made on the subject, for a somewhat unhealthy atmosphere was starting to build up around that issue. There seemed to be a morbid fear that the country would be called upon to participate financially in that event which is of international scope. This is why one could perhaps be inclined to taunt the government with not having moved quickly enough.

Mr. Speaker, one had to be careful about the fertile imagination of Mayor Drapeau and his propensity for spending and I think that the final decision is good not only for the City of Montreal, Quebec and all the rest of Canada but that it will also show the whole world that Canada knows how to do things and it is for us a reason to rejoice.

A column in yesterday's La Presse suggested that this method of financing could well be considered by many as stemming from Social Credit. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if that might not bring the government to examine further what Social Credit actually is.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the House would agree to having the letters the Prime Minister tabled printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this the wish of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of letters referred to above, see appendix.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—AMOUNT OF POSSIBLE DEFICIT—AVAILABILITY OF FINANCING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of his statement with regard to his fears that the Olympic games may encounter a deficit. Can the Prime Minister indicate the parameters of the deficit that the government or its officials envisage as a result of examining the budget proposed by the city of Montreal and related matters?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I could do that. I believe the most satisfactory way of doing it would be to table the letters exchanged between Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Drapeau, Mr. Rousseau and myself. There is a question on the order paper requesting that this be done. I certainly plan to do it in the House in the very near future.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the deficit about which the Prime Minister is concerned and also his fears that the deficit might be considerable as a result of unforeseen events, what assurance does he have that the games will in fact be financed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition looks at the correspondence I tabled today—I only received the originals this morning from Montreal and COJO and yesterday from Mr. Bourassa—he will see that there is provision there not only for assuring that the federal government will not have to pay anything beyond the games, but even in terms of interim financing. There is a guarantee from Montreal, COJO and the province of Quebec that we will not be asked to provide for the interim financing. This is the nature of the guarantee. The letters speak for themselves.

I realize that the Leader of the Opposition indicated in his statement that these are not the kind of assurances he would have liked to see. If he can state the kind of assurance he would like to see, perhaps I can convey his thoughts to the premier of Quebec and the city of Montreal. Of course, he will have occasion to speak on that after the legislation on coins comes before the House. He will be free to vote for or against, according to whether he accepts the letters or not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, naturally I reserve any right to examine the legislation, but I have no hesitation in indicating that I will support the coinage proposal in principle if it is what I understand it to be. I asked the Prime Minister a perfectly direct question. I did not ask whether the federal government is off the hook. I am asking the Prime Minister what assurance there is that these games will proceed if, in fact, there is a very substantial deficit looming. The Prime Minister is going to put measures before the House with regard to coinage. Has he any assurance that the games will in fact be financed in the event they run into rough weather? There is no assurance in these letters to that effect.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the budget figures which have been proposed by the city of Montreal are to the effect that there will be no deficit. This has been their statement all along. This has been the statement of the city of Montreal and of COJO. It is because we are not certain this will be the case that we have made it clear to all those who are involved in the preparation of the games that the federal taxpayer will not be called upon. Apparently the Leader of the Opposition wants something further than that as to who will pay if the games run into rough weather, to use his own language. My only answer is that obviously the city of Montreal, COJO or the province of Quebec will have to pay since they have held us free from any deficit. Short of ourselves getting involved in the running of the games and the organization of them, I do not think it would be realistic to say: We do not want to pay a cent, but let us run them to make sure there is no deficit. We have to rely on the word of the mayor of Montreal, the premier of Quebec and the Commissioner General of COJO that they will be run in such a way that there will not be a deficit. I repeat, if the opposition is not happy with this commitment, they perhaps should not support the coin scheme because this is an indication that the federal government is co-operating in the holding of the games.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South. Order, please. Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stanfield: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. I have another supplementary on this very important matter. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact he obviously does not accept the view of the mayor of Montreal that there will be no deficit and has made it very clear that there may in fact be a very substantial deficit, he does not think he owes it to the House to give some explanation as to how he thinks the financing of these games will in fact be assured?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not organizing the games. We are not sponsoring them. We did not go after the games. The federal government is not going to be in any way involved in the holding of them. I repeat, I do not think we are in any position to tell the province of Quebec or the city of Montreal that there will be a deficit and they must pick it up. If the city of Montreal were to go into insolvency, under the constitution this is a problem for the province of Quebec, not for the federal government. I regret that the Leader of the Opposition is showing such a pessimistic approach to the whole matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously getting into a debate. I am not sure that this is what hon. members want, but I gather there are supplementaries. The hon. member for York South.

• (1140)

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—NATURE OF APPROACH BY ORGANIZERS TO EXPENDITURE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question without in the least being pessimistic about the games. Is the federal government trying to exert some influence on the organizers in Montreal to make sure that, instead of building a lavish $100 million stadium, for example, or undertaking other lavish projects in connection with the Olympic games, a more modest approach is taken by the organizers to ensure that there will not be a deficit due to the expenditure side?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can say that the mayor of Montreal, Commissioner General Rousseau and, indeed, the premier of Quebec have indicated to me that their intention is such as was expressed by the leader of the New Democratic Party and shared by us. There was in my statement to the House an indication that we would do our best to make sure that expenditures would be controlled. But, I repeat, we cannot do it directly since we are not operating the games. I imagine we would be willing to lend small numbers of personnel to assist them in budgeting or financing.

Mr. Stanfield: God forbid.

Mr. Trudeau: But we do not want to be involved as a government in the games. The House must realize that it is difficult for the federal government to say it does not want to pay a cent as is, apparently, the will of the House, and at the same time to say we will get in there and organize it for you. I hope the House will appreciate this dilemma. We got from the authorities the best statement we could, as in the letters tabled this morning. I repeat, if the Leader of the Opposition or any hon. member wants something more and can help us obtain it from the province, the organizers or the city of Montreal, we shall thank him very much for doing so.

Mr. Lewis: I ask the Prime Minister this question without his having to feel that anybody is going at him. In view of the fact that, even though the games are taking place in one city, Canada as a country will necessarily be associated with them in the minds of the people of the world, and in view of the fact it is important to make the games fulfil the objectives of athletics and all the rest of it, will the government indicate even more clearly to the authorities concerned the desire of the Canadian people that the games be carried on well but modestly from the point of view of expenditure?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have already expressed similar thoughts to Mayor Drapeau and Mr. Rousseau. They have now told me this is their intention. They have pointed out that the scale of their budgeting is very much lower than that of the Munich games and that they intend to create a new pattern for holding the Olympic games which would be, as I believe was suggested by the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, that the holding of these games should be accessible in the future to countries of more modest means.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—ISSUE OF SPECIAL COINS

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Olympic Games Organization Committee has earmarked in its estimates a substantial amount for the issuing of coins by the Canadian government. Now, the Prime Minister did not refer to this issuing of coins in his remarks. Could the right hon. Prime Minister give us some information in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right, I spoke very briefly about it; I only stated that we were prepared to answer the committee's requests about coins and stamps. I was happy as well to hear opposition parties say that they would support such action if it were introduced in the form of legislation and we are actually wondering whether we should introduce legislation or not. If so, we shall put it before the House as soon as possible; if it could be arranged through administrative channels alone, I would nevertheless wish to give the House the opportunity of approving or rejecting those measures we could take.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are two members seeking supplementaries. They will be recognized, but I should like to suggest that we not spend the whole of the question period on one subject. I will, of course, give priority to the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands on a point of order.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On a point of order, I should like to remind the hon. member for York South and others who have said these games are to be held in one city alone that these events are taking place both in the city of Montreal and in the city of Kingston.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—PROGRAM TO ASSURE NATIONAL SUPPORT

Mr. Roch LaSalle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition has referred to a national incentive program for a higher degree of involvement in the Olympic Games; could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House if he would agree, through one of his ministers, to develop a national program which I suggest would substantially increase revenues, a matter which many hon. members are concerned about?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, the government indicated that it was prepared to introduce measures in the areas of sports and physical fitness; the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that increased estimates were available for this purpose and the hon. member will see later on that we really intend to do something in this area.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are four or five members seeking to ask supplementaries on this subject. We have spent more than half the question period on it already. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a last supplementary, then try to finish the first round of questioning and, if necessary, return to this subject later.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—BROADCASTING COVERAGE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. In the portion of his statement having to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the right hon. gentleman said the net cost to the CBC of covering the games would be approximately $25 million. I should like to ask whether this is an estimate of the cost to the CBC acting alone. Does this mean that the concept of a joint effort by the CBC and the CTV to cover the games, using the best of both networks, has been considered and abandoned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I cannot say anything has been considered up to the point of having been abandoned. Apparently the delay in reaching a decision in this regard involves some 30 days or more. We are only now getting more details from the CBC on its discussions with the COJO people. The figure of $25 million I have given relates to a situation where the CBC alone would be acting as host broadcaster. I cannot say to what extent the suggestion made by the hon. member has been considered by them, nor the extent to which it would involve a differentiation in the projected figure, but I will gladly assure the hon. member that I want this question to be considered by them.

ENERGY

OIL—AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES—DISCUSSION WITH COMPANIES OF RESTRAINT ON EXPORT—STUDY OF PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct some questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the statement by the Minister of Mines and Minerals of the province of Alberta to the effect that discussions are being held with the oil producing companies regarding the possibility of voluntary restraints on oil exports for the purpose of guaranteeing Canadian supplies. In view of the fact that, while feed stocks appear to be ample for February, there is a good deal of apprehension about the future because a number orders cannot be met with present supplies, I should like to ask the minister whether any discussions are being held by him or the National Energy Board with oil producing companies regarding a restraint on exports, or whether the government is considering proclaiming section 87 of the National Energy Board Act so as to place some restraint upon exports in the same manner as has already been done with natural gas?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I am correct in saying that section 87 was proclaimed in 1970, and this is really a question of passing regulations to deal in detail with oil. I can confirm, as I confirmed for the hon. member on January 9, I think it was, that we have had close discussions with the industry, and the Alberta government, and the National Energy Board in particular with the Energy Resources Conservation Board of Alberta. As the hon. member has indicated, it is my understanding that the situation for February is assured. We are aware of the fact that there is pressure with regard to the oncoming situation in March. At the moment it is not clear whether the industry will be able, as I suggested, to solve the question themselves. I repeat that if they show themselves incapable of doing so or in any way put in peril Canadian supplies, we would not hesitate to take the regulatory action to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact we are exporting western oil to the full capacity of the pipeline, while at the same time having to make arrangements with the United States on a contingency basis to secure our oil supply for eastern Canada, and in view of the fact that any oil supplies from the Maritimes are a long way off with no proof they will be adequate, may I ask the minister again whether any study is being made with the purpose in mind of extending the pipeline to Montreal so that Canada may have full control of its own oil supply?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member a week ago, the current view is that we should probably not make a very substantial investment in facilities which could become obsolete in the event of success in the offshore field. I think it is also fair to point out that extension, in effect, of Alberta supply into the Montreal market would mean a very substantial increase in the price east of the Ottawa Valley line. I would think that in terms of security probably the best short-run solution is to arrive at a best efforts agreement with the United States in both directions and to await the hoped-for event on the east coast, expecting that we will develop a field there that could meet eastern Canadian requirements.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the apprehension being shown both by producers and consumers in respect of Canada's oil requirements and supplies, may I ask the minister whether he would be prepared to refer this whole matter to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works so that we may have the benefit of the minister's views in detail as well as those of the chairman of the National Energy Board?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to discuss that with the leader of the House, but I would make this comment. We would hope, and I realize these hopes have been held out to the hon. member for some years, to be able to put a comprehensive statement on the supply and demand situation before parliament a little later in the spring. If the House would generally find it useful to have this kind of a discussion in advance of a very comprehensive report, I personally would certainly be happy to have that forum.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN NUCLEAR POWER GENERATION CAPACITY IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and concerns the rising prices of natural gas and oil. In view of the rising prices and the energy crisis which affected the United States recently, is the minister considering increasing the thermal nuclear generating capacity in eastern Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that not only have we the world's most successful nuclear generator at Pickering, with the co-operation of Ontario Hydro under the leadership of AECL, but Ontario is extending the operation of its nuclear generator program and increasing the feed of nuclear energy to the grid, and, indeed, we expect to be putting the same type of program into effect with Hydro Quebec. I think it is perfectly clear that over a longer period of time nuclear power will provide a very substantial portion of Canada's energy requirements, a nuclear program to be supplied from the hon. gentleman's constituency.

Some hon. Members: Speech, speech!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again a number of members are seeking to ask supplementary questions on this subject. I suggest that perhaps we might move on to the next question.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANADA-QUEBEC AGREEMENTS—STATUS OF PROJECTS SUBMITTED

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

With regard to the Canada-Quebec agreements—under the Eastern Quebec Planning Bureau plan, are the projects being carried out? If not, who is putting spokes in the wheels?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, and I do apologize to the hon. member, but I did not catch his question. Would he be kind enough to repeat it?

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question because I think the minister did not understand me.

GRAIN

ACTION TO RE-ESTABLISH INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT WITH PRICE INDICATORS—SHIPMENT OF UNITED STATES GRAIN THROUGH CANADA

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the unprecedented demand for Canadian grain, will the minister tell the House what initiatives the government is taking toward the re-establishment of an international grains agreement with some price benchmarks in it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, over a period of time we have been in contact with some of our partners to the agreement and to former agreements, and it is certainly our intention to pursue this matter further. At the most recent meeting it was decided that it would not be appropriate to attempt to put in pricing arrangements during the remaining short period of the current agreement. But it will certainly be our intention to seize the opportunity to arrive at a new agreement in which the buyers of the world at last recognize the advantage to them of our holding supplies instead of always having, as in the past, treated these supplies as a glut on the market.

Mr. Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Now that United States grain is moving through Canada in Canadian boxcars through the Crowsnest Pass for export via Seattle, can the minister assure us that the interests of the western farmer and Canadian millers are being protected?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that in any discussions about such movements there were assurances that this would not interfere with the movement of Canadian grain, and it would certainly be the intention of this government to see that these assurances are in fact kept.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY ON GRAIN HANDLING AND RAILWAY RATIONALIZATION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. When will he be prepared to announce the government's position on the whole question of grain handling and rail rationalization on the Prairies so farmers may know exactly where they will stand before January 1, 1975?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has asked the Canada Grains Council to attempt to bring some consensus to this question, and also to put before the producers certain options or alternatives which may be available to them to choose with an understanding of the costs and benefits involved in the alternatives. This is difficult and complicated work. I, personally, am concerned about the time that may be required to do this work. On the one hand, we want the producers to see the alternatives clearly; on the other hand, we do not want the system to deteriorate while we are waiting for decisions. We are conscious of this and we constantly discuss with various sections of the industry on steps that can be taken to improve the system which are consistent with any configuration of the system for the future.

• (1200)

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): When will these studies be made public so that the producers can be involved in the discussions and offer some of their wisdom in this regard?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I believe the studies were made public last May or June and are now available to all interested parties.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Are they in the Parliamentary Library?

FEED GRAINS—INTENTION RESPECTING IMPLEMENTATION OF FAIR FORMULA FOR PRICING IN DOMESTIC MARKET

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. With respect to the reference in the throne speech to feed grains and livestock feeding in Canada, is it the government's intention to implement the so-called FAIR formula for the pricing of feed grains in the domestic market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the FAIR formula, and also the proposals which seemed to have the approval of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, are among the proposals being examined with a view to accomplishing the principles that were stated in the Speech from the Throne and agreed to by proponents of both formulas, indeed almost all formulas, namely, that feed grains for Canada be available at fair, reasonable and similar prices to all producers of livestock across the country.

FEED GRAINS—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICES AS INCENTIVE TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Would the minister indicate whether he is giving serious consideration to the suggestion put forth by the western agricultural conference held recently to the effect that initial prices for feed grains should be increased in order to serve as an incentive to producers and thus ensure adequate acreages of feed grains in the forthcoming year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government is at this time examining the question of initial prices with a view to making public in the last half of February, as has been our custom, on or before March 1, the initial prices for the next year. The balance between public information and differences in initial prices are naturally both elements that are being considered.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the potential shortage of feed grains, is the minister giving serious and priority consideration to some form of incentive in order to encourage producers to grow sufficient acreages of feed grains?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right in attaching a special position to the question of feed grains. This has been a shared concern of members of this government, the provincial governments and producer organizations. Already some concerted effort on the part of all of these to bring to the attention of the producers the desirability of remaining in the feed grain market has been an important step in preparing the right attitude to this. Our examination of initial prices and quota predictions, and so on, will continue to bear this need in mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this subject. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT CANADIAN RAILWAY EQUIPMENT NOT USED TO MOVE UNITED STATES GRAIN THROUGH CANADA

Mr. Lee Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the first question asked on this subject. In the event any grain movement originates in the United States and travels over Canadian lines to reach destinations in the United States, would the minister give a commitment that under no circumstances will Canadian railway equipment be used for such grain movement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Don Valley.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT AND APPEARANCE OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Now that we have a new governor of the Bank of Canada, will the minister assure the House that he will urge the governor to accept an invitation from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to appear before that committee at the earliest possible date?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have always had great respect for committees of the House and I will certainly take that under advisement.

Mr. Gillies: Will the Minister of Finance refer the last annual report of the governor of the Bank of Canada to the committee so that we may use that as a starting point to examine the views of the new governor?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a relevant question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: On a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker, I was not sure whether the Minister of Finance said he would or would not.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I guess I will wait until I hear from the committee.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURE—SETTLEMENT OF FISHERMENS' CLAIMS—ALLEGATION OF FRAUD

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries, just to change the diet of the House a little. Are there any fishermen in the Atlantic region who have not had their claims settled under the arrangements necessitated last year by the banning of salmon fishing on certain rivers along the Atlantic coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, to date there are approximately a dozen fishermen who have appealed the settlements that have been made. Otherwise, several hundreds of claims have all been settled.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that in a committee of the House yesterday the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries made a charge which cast aspersions on every fisherman of the Altantic region, namely, that fisherman were defrauding the federal government by—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must ask the question directly; he knows that he cannot make reference to proceedings in a committee as support for his question. Perhaps he would ask a direct question.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the widespread publicity given to a charge made by the minister about defrauding the federal government, would the minister be prepared to table documentation of the charge he made, or is he going to lay charges against the offenders, or is he prepared to withdraw his remarks and offer an apology so as to clear up his very serious statement which cast aspersions on every fisherman of the Atlantic region?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, in a few cases exaggerated claims have been made, but in no case is there any question of defrauding the government because we have not overpaid any fisherman.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURE—REQUEST TO MEET REPRESENTATIVES OF SAINT JOHN RIVER FISHERMEN

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In connection with the minister's not unappreciated offer to meet representatives of the commercial salmon fishery on the Saint John river, has the minister been able to make arrangements to see them, because apparently they are penniless, having lost their livelihood, and cannot come to Ottawa?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DANGER TO INDIANS IN NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO FROM CONSUMING FISH CONTAMINATED BY MERCURY—CONSULTATION ON ALTERNATIVE FOOD SOURCE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development may I ask a question of his parliamentary secretary. Is the department aware of the fact that Indians living along the English and Wabigoon rivers in northwestern Ontario are subsisting to a large extent on fish which are heavily contaminated by mercury? If so, is the department taking steps to alert the Indians to the danger to their health arising from this situation?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): We are aware of this situation, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure the hon. member that the Department of Indian Affairs and the minister are very concerned about it. We are doing everything we can, with the other parties involved to bring about a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Orlikow: May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the department is discussing with the Ontario government the possibility of providing alternative food sources to the Indians so they will not continue to be required to eat fish which is so dangerous to their future health?

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a specific answer but I will get one. May I assure him that it has always been the concern of the Department of Indian Affairs and of the government to make sure that the Indian people always have enough food. In the event that fish in this area is being eaten, I can give the hon. member every assurance that we will make sure that they have an alternative source of food.

POLLUTION

MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF ENGLISH AND WABIGOON RIVERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question which I should like to direct to the Minister of the Environment. Is the minister's department looking into the problem and the danger that has arisen in regard to mercury pollution in those rivers and seeing what steps can be taken to eliminate this pollution?

• (1210)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this was a matter to which we addressed ourselves three years ago, and we have been following it ever since.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are just a few minutes left before the end of the question period. Perhaps hon. members would allow the Chair to see some hon. members who have not been recognized in recent days.

INCOME TAX

DIFFICULTY IN GETTING HELP WITH FORMS THROUGH ZENITH TELEPHONE NUMBER—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN LINES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact many persons have had to try five or six times, and some have given up in despair, to get the famous Zenith line to secure help with their income tax returns, will the minister consider approaching Bell Telephone to increase substantially the number of lines available?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to look into that. I have asked that a close watch be kept on the availability of lines so that we can increase them as necessary. I thank the hon. member for mentioning the matter, and if he has any further details which might be helpful I would be glad to hear from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope there will not be too many supplementary questions. The hon. member will appreciate that an effort is being made, just as we reach the end of the question period, to bring in as many members as possible for these last questions.

Mr. Blenkarn: Will the minister perhaps arrange to get Mr. Fred Davis to do a tour to help people fill in their returns?

An hon. Member: Too expensive.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

SITE FOR DUMPING OF GARBAGE FROM METRO TORONTO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Three weeks ago, in response to a question from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, the Minister of Transport undertook to investigate and report back to the House on the location of the site to be used by Canadian Pacific Railway for the dumping of 400,000 tons of Metro Toronto garbage annually for the next 15 years. Has the minister investigated this and can he report to the House which site is the prime site under consideration and the locations of the other five or six sites being considered by the railway?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer that question. I have discussed this matter at length with the minister of the environment for Ontario. It is substantially a matter for the provincial authorities.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF FERRY, "BLUENOSE"

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, taking a lesson from a visitor we had in the House last week, I thought I might have to cry harder to get recognition. My question is for the Minister of Transport and it is one which is of substantial interest to a large number of my constituents. It has to do with the replacement of the ferry Bluenose which docks at Yarmouth. Last week a story in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald indicated that senior officials of the Department of Transport were then meeting with the premier of Nova Scotia and others. Is the minister able to assure the House and the people of South Western Nova that a new and modern ferry will be placed in service and whether in fact his officials have already been in Europe canvassing the prospect of buying a vessel?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that it is not the intention of the government to discontinue the ferry service which the hon. member mentioned. As to whether we are going to have a new ferry, this is under study now.

INCOME TAX

EXPLANATIONS TO AID FILLING OUT LONG FORMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that 90 per cent of those long form explanations which have been sent out to taxpayers are concerned with explaining how Canadians in the upper income group can take advantage of the tax system, would the minister consider writing another note to the vast majority of taxpayers, pointing out to them that they need not bother with the form?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

FISHERIES

POSSIBLE LATE SEASON BECAUSE OF ICE CONDITIONS—COMPENSATION FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. Has the danger of extremely heavy ice conditions off Atlantic Canada, which are going to deter the fisheries industry this year, particularly in Newfoundland, been brought to the minister's attention? What action will he take to correct the situation and, in the event it does deter fishing until later in the season, is any consideration being given to compensation to the fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): As the hon. member knows, the meteorological service is well briefed on the situation and does make reports to the fishing industry about prospects for ice and other environmental matters. I do not know whether the government has ever provided compensation to fishermen for hazards of this kind.

ALLEGED FAILURE OF LEADERS OF ORGANIZED CRIME TO FILE RETURNS—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue.

Following yesterday's investigation in Montreal on organized crime, serious accusations have been made that the "knights of crime" neglected to file income tax returns and were not sued by the department. Would the hon. minister inform the House whether he is aware of this accusation, whether a thorough investigation will be conducted and, should those accusations prove to be true, will court proceedings be undertaken?

[English]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have asked the officials of my department to take a special and intensified interest in the ill-gotten gains of illegal activities. I think that there are some difficulties in the way of "collaboration", which I think was the word used by the director of police in Montreal, because of the secrecy provisions in the Income Tax Act. However, we are anxious to work closely with the police in prosecuting those people who are gaining income through illegal activities and we are intensifying our plans and procedures for doing so.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUIT BY ALARME DE SÛRETÉ—NEED FOR CHANGE TO EXPEDITE GRANT PROCESS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since Alarme de Sûreté Inc., a Quebec manufacturing company, was allegedly promised an incentive grant and claims it was forced to close when the grant was not forthcoming, and is now reportedly suing DREE for $1.5 million, can the minister indicate whether he will institute procedural and administrative changes to expedite the grant process so that this unfortunate type of situation can be avoided?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are certain restraints in my answering the question since the matter is before the courts, but I do not think a change in procedure would have altered the circumstances in this case. Prior to legal action having been taken a statement was made, which I think I am free to quote, indicating that the applicant simply had not met the requirements that were set down before he could receive any assistance.

ACTIVITIES OF PROFESSIONAL DREE COUNSELLORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a supplementary question for the minister. Is he aware of professional DREE counsellors who are making substantial profits acting on behalf of DREE applicants who are apparently so confused and frustrated that they will avail themselves of this method to circumvent or cut through the red tape? If the minister is aware of this situation, does he propose to take any steps to correct it?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In reply to the second part of the question, yes, to the extent that it needs correction we will be providing additional information and help to anyone who wishes to apply for assistance from us. In so far as people who are professional consultants in the field are concerned, I suppose this is not vastly different from engaging a member of the legal profession or anyone else. Applicants are free to do as they wish.

COMMUNICATIONS

NATIONAL POLICY—NATURE OF PRESENTATION AND CONTENTS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. I have been trying all week to ask him this question. It has to do with communications policy. While I appreciate the fact that this government now wants to communicate, I wonder if the minister can tell us anything definitive about the proposals for a national communications policy which were referred to in the Speech from the Throne of last January 4. Does he intend to come to the House with legislation or a white paper, and is it just going to affect the merger of the regulatory agencies or does it involve cablevision, broadcasting communications and computers?

[Mr. Stanbury.]

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first question, I can only repeat what I have already said in answer to a similar question. What was announced in the Speech from the Throne was a document that will confront the country with several options concerning communications with a view to arriving at a national policy on communications.

I might add that the document will deal with all the main points, but not the details, that the hon. member brought up.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on this topic. Do I gather from the answer of the minister that it is going to be in the form of a white paper and that this will preclude discussion with the provinces before the white paper is put before the House, or will this come after discussions with the provinces?

• (1220)

Mr. Pelletier: No, it will be rather in the nature of a green paper, Mr. Speaker, which is a document whose usefulness is really to stimulate discussion. Discussions are taking place now and they will also take place after the green paper is published. This will lead eventually to legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before going to orders of the day the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Selkirk.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATIONS—INVESTIGATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE OF OPERATIONS AND DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. A couple of weeks ago he gave an undertaking to the House that there would be an inquiry by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry into the operations of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. Is he now in a position to indicate to the House when he expects this inquiry will begin, when the committee will be set up, and would he also give some indication of the terms of reference to be given to the committee?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make a statement to the House in this connection shortly.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ELECTION OF CHIEF OF KAMLOOPS NO. 1 BAND—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Resources I would like to ask his parliamentary secretary to what extent the federal government was involved in the unfortunate incident at Kamloops where there was a serious departure from the democratic process during the election of the chief of the Indian band of Kamloops No. 1?

Mr. Nielsen: Did you cast your ballot, Len?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, Kamloops is O.K. I do not know what kind of answer the hon. member might want with respect to involvement of the federal government. The government moved, and will move in regard to other similar band council elections and made certain amendments to the regulations, but this does not apply only to the Kamloops situation. We amended the Band Council Election regulations so that band councils will not be able to take office pending the outcome of appeals against elections. In this case the chief, or supposed chief, won by three votes and the dispute involved 11 votes, so the election might very well be overturned. I can assure the hon. member that we are giving this matter every urgent consideration and, as soon as the appeal process is completed, we will either reject the election result or confirm the new council, in office.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed a supplementary and then we must call orders of the day.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can assure me and the people of Kamloops that the appeal, first of all, will be heard in Kamloops so that the people can take part in this democratic process, and will he assure us, he being a member of the Indian band in Kamloops, that the Indians of Kamloops will not be trampled on?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order. The hon. member cannot ask a question of a member of the government or of a parliamentary secretary in his capacity other than as a parliamentary secretary or as a member of the government. Orders of the day.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would Your Honour or the Postmaster General investigate a letter I just received through the House of Commons Post Office? It is dated 1984. Would Your Honour check to see whether this is a sign of things to come or is it just a case of the Post Office unexpectedly moving too fast?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member gives me this opportunity of saying that our employees are the picture of enthusiasm and are already living in the future.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

INCREASES IN AUTHORIZED SHARE CAPITAL AND IN CEILING ON LOANS AND GUARANTEES BY CORPORATION

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-3, to amend the Export Development Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a very happy occasion for me when introducing my first legislation before the House of Commons. I think that the House should also be gratified with this legislation. We have moved early in this session, and in a positive way, to support the growth of Canadian jobs.

In my speech on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne I anticipated the amendments which are before us this morning. I stated that we would be bringing in further measures to increase the capitalization of the Export Development Corporation and to raise the financial ceilings for lending, guarantees, export insurance, and foreign investment insurance operations.

These amendments deal with the financial ceilings for lendings and guarantees. They do not deal with the other matters referred to in my earlier speech. At a later stage I would hope to introduce amendments dealing with export insurance and foreign investment insurance operations, and a number of other technical and housekeeping amendments.

I believe hon. members will find these amendments to be brief, simple and straightforward, and in my remarks I intend to be brief, simple and straightforward.

Let me introduce the subject by going back through the history of this act which, in my view, was one of the most successful acts of the 28th parliament. The original Export Development Corporation Act was passed in 1969. At that time it replaced the former Export Credits Insurance Act, the ECIC Act.

The ceiling in the original act passed in 1969 was $600 million for direct loans. Two years later in 1971 this was raised to $850 million, indicating the rapid growth in the financing of capital goods and related services by the Export Development Corporation.

I would like to emphasize that these loans are made not to Canadian exporters but to the buyers of Canadian export capital goods and related services. The loans are made to the buyers rather than the vendors.

The growth, as I have indicated, has been dynamic. In the early 1960's we were averaging something in the order of $50 million to $60 million of placements each year under the predecessor act. With the new Export Development Corporation Act the loans in 1970 increased to $96 million, nearly double the average of the previous several years, and since then they have continued to build.

Financing agreements signed by the Corporation with foreign buyers of Canadian goods and services rose dramatically, as I say, in 1970 to $96 million, in 1971 to $240 million, and in 1972 to $283 million. This might be translated as well in terms of jobs. All members of the House are concerned with the provision of jobs. As I said in my speech during the throne speech debate, the present level of the outstanding loans, $700 million, has the equivalent value in jobs of about 100,000 jobs. This dynamic growth is continuing and the prospects for 1973 are considerable. Based on requests currently under consideration by the corporation they may well exceed about $500 million; under the existing long term lending and guaranteed ceilings the Export Development Corporation has the capacity to sign agreements for over $200 million to provide for these requirements. This, then, is the background to these amendments, Mr. Speaker.

The details of the amendment I think I have already indicated—raising the loan ceilings from $850 million to $1½ billion and consequential amendments with respect to the capitalization of the corporation which provides for ten times the capitalization. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, the loan ceilings are related to ten times the capitalization of the corporation.

The export demand that I have referred to—this dynamic growth—should be seen alongside the export performance of the Canadian economy over the last four or five years. There was an increase between 1969 and this year of roughly $5 billion—from $14.9 billion to $19.9 billion. I think the important point with respect to the financing of the Export Development Corporation is that it is geared to and directed to capital goods, high technology and labour intensive projects. In other words, it is a major contributor to helping Canada diversify its exports from reliance on crude and unprocessed materials to the more sophisticated, more fabricated, more fully finished goods that we are anxious to promote. The expansion has been remarkable and I should like to give some examples of the industries that have been supported under this plan and the markets that have been purchasing Canadian goods and services under this particular provision.

A list of the projects shows steam generators for Mexico; turbines for Brazil; locomotives for Greece and Turkey; electrification equipment for Mexico and Brazil; a zinc and lead refinery for Turkey; telecommunications to the Philippines; hydro-electric project for Brazil; an airport project for Israel costing $10 million; locomotives for Yugoslavia; pulp and paper project for Kenya; a chemical plant for Yugoslavia costing $21 million; mining equipment, iron pelletizing for Peru and Argentina and an order for railway boxcars for Zambia. I would be pleased to provide the details of the amounts of these projects in Committee but I thought it might be a help to give the background of the kind of financing to indicate the markets and projects supported.

These loans are only granted to a foreign buyer in respect of Canadian capital goods if there is an 80 per cent Canadian content in the order which the foreign buyer seeks. The underwritings are arranged through export development offices in Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto and in other centres through the offices of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Generally speaking, these loans would be for something over five years and under 15 years at rates of interest competitive with those offered by other countries. I should like to emphasize that, Mr. Speaker, because other countries are offering this kind of supportive financing to their industries. At the same time, I should like to make it clear that Export Development Corporation loans do not compete with the private sector—indeed, they support the Canadian commercial banking institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I said that I would be brief and straightforward. I do not believe that on second reading I need to go into very much more detail as we will have opportunities for that at the committee stage. However, I should like to emphasize the point that I have already made: this is not an effort to compete in the sense of undercutting other types of financing activity but to support the commercial lending practices internationally, to support our exporters, to help them meet, in addition to questions of quality, price, service and delivery dates, the competition of other international financing agencies in support of their country's exports.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that hon. members should find these amendments controversial. I hope they will consider them quickly so that we can get on with the job of supporting Canadian export industry, thereby supporting the growth of Canadian jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on the face of it, Bill C-3 appears to be a very simple bill. The operative sections merely increase the capitalization of the Export Development Act from $75 million to $125 million and the loan limit under section 30 from $850 million to $1.5 billion. Actually, however, the issues are much more complex than the bill indicates. To investigate each aspect of the operations of the corporation would require more time than is available today. Consequently, I shall just content myself with a few preliminary remarks and suggestions and leave more detailed examination to the committee stage where my colleagues and I will have the opportunity to question directly the officers and directors of the corporation and to inquire into its activities and philosophy more comprehensively.

At the very outset, Mr. Speaker, the question arises as to why the bill is presented in this form at this time. The minister has just advised us that he proposes to introduce amendments to other sections of the act at an early date. We are at a loss to understand why, in that case, the whole package was not presented to us simultaneously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: The only apparent reason for this omission is the suggestion that the loan limit under section 30 has already been exceeded in fact. At least that would be the case if guarantees already signed are taken up. It appears obvious under the circumstances that the only reason the government is presenting the bill in this narrow form is in the hope of easy passage. They hoped that once again they could get away with something. They hoped that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition would not find out that they had exceeded the authority given them by parliament. They hoped that once again they would evade the charge that they are both extraordinarily bad planners and contemptuous of parliament.

• (1240)

If indeed this is the case, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason in the world why the government could not have anticipated the necessity of the increased loan limit last summer. It would have been a very simple matter to have introduced this kind of bill during the brief session in September. In the circumstances existing at that time, the full co-operation of all opposition parties would have been cheerfully given in expediting the bill. Having missed this opportunity, either through carelessness and bad planning, or else through a deliberate attempt to avoid getting into questions of this kind which might have opened up the Unemployment Insurance Act as well, the government waited until the situation had reached crisis proportions. It is a habit which is occurring all too regularly. The government is taking on the characteristics of a punch-drunk conglomerate staggering from crisis to crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: That is right. It is getting more drunk every moment.

An hon. Member: Then, it is staggering cheerfully.

Mr. Hellyer: Even in view of these extraordinary circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we have no intention of obstructing and filibustering.

An hon. Member: Go on!

Mr. Hees: We are always constructive and helpful.

Mr. Hellyer: I wish to serve notice, on the other hand, that we intend to pursue a full and complete examination of the philosophy and the operation of the corporation. Anything less would be unworthy of us as an opposition, and certainly not in the best interest of Canadian exporters and taxpayers.

The theoretical rationale of this act must clearly be that the encouragement of exports is an obligation upon the body politic and that the sort of machinery provided by the Export Development Corporation Act will fulfil that obligation. Yet surely the purpose of exports, the real rationale for policies of this type, is more complex. First, we sell abroad in order to achieve economies of scale. We want to make our manufactures and capital goods more competitive in domestic as well as in foreign markets. Second, we wish to earn foreign exchange in order to pay for necessary imports, both capital goods and current consumption. Third, we wish to help, to the extent that exports are a stimulus, Canadian firms develop and maintain the leading edge of technology. Fourth, we wish to assist foreign countries in some cases by the provision, on terms acceptable to them, of our goods and services. Fifth, and high on the priority scale in the minds of Canadians, we export in order to provide jobs for Canadian workers.

There is a widespread belief that it is necessary to export in order to achieve full employment at home. One must entertain this thought with caution, however, because it represents a considerable carryover from the economic thinking of the 1930's. More current economic philosophy would hold that it is possible to attain full employment domestically regardless of the level of exports. In other words, the total level of employment is a function of aggregate demand in Canada, and if the same amount of credit that we intend to make available for the finance of exports were made available to Canadians, for similar purchases, the net effect on employment in Canada would be the same. If this is so, then it should be borne in mind in our analysis of the philosophy and success of the Export Development Corporation and in our evaluation of priorities in the use of available credit.

In considering the philosophical and operational guidelines which might be taken into account, a number of questions arise. Are we making too many long-term loans, for example? Is it possible that we have been moving too quickly and too far in this direction? Would it be more advisable to concentrate to a greater extent on short and medium-term loans in order to achieve a faster turnover? Would this in the long run be more beneficial to Canadian taxpayers?

Should the Canadian commercial banks be allowed to participate more fully? Until the end of 1971, all capital required for the corporation's spending operations came from the Consolidated Revenue Fund; but with the requisite approval of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the corporation has since attempted to borrow the money commercially. How successful has it been? The minister neglected to inform us on that question this morning. The former minister of industry, trade and commerce said in February of last year that he expected, with a little moral suasion, the chartered banks would participate to the extent of $100 million in 1972. Was that goal achieved? To what extent has the corporation been able to cut down the calls on its own capital by arranging loans in concert with the banks? To the extent that the banks have participated, has this in all cases been on a last-in, first-out system whereby the bank advances its share at the last possible moment and is repaid first? If so, how is the system working? Certainly, in establishing guidelines we should consider the alternative uses of available credit.

In January, 1972, the EDC basic scheme of insurance was extended to the giving of unconditional guarantees for specific loans made by banks to exporters for the production of capital goods for export on medium-term credit. Similar guarantees may now be given to banks in respect of obligations issued by the foreign buyer. These new guarantees apply to both goods and services and they are of significant assistance to consultants, design and managerial businesses. As to manufacturing, the result is that EDC has stepped from the post shipment risk to guaranteeing loans for actual production.

While it may be argued that this is a logical extension of the facilities of the Export Development Corporation, it should be noted that the same terms and conditions are not available to those who sell domestically. It may be thought that tariffs, anti-dumping duties, quotas, and so on, are the domestic equivalent of the financial assistance given to exporters. On the other hand, it can be strongly argued that if there is an international competitive war in the concessional financing of the export trade, exports will aid the foreigner perhaps at the expense of the domestic consumer. How many Canadian producers of domestic products and consumers would be elated at the prospect of obtaining financing on the same favourable terms and conditions that they help to make available to foreigners through the Export Development Corporation?

Perhaps a more representative board of directors would help to weigh these questions more objectively. With the passage of the Export Development Corporation Act in 1969, representatives of the business and exporting world were induced to serve on the board of EDC along with members of the public service. Originally four, the outside representation has since been increased to five and the public service representation reduced to seven by an amending act of 1971. I would like to see the balance between the public and the private sectors at least reversed. Certainly, there is no requirement for seven civil servants. Half that number could ably represent the government's point of view. Freeing the others to concentrate on their primary responsibilities would certainly help to expedite the decision-making process in government. At the same time, the representation of the private sector could be increased in such a way that small business could be more adequately represented and greater diversification of interests be included in the nominees. I would hope that the government would agree to an amendment along these lines when the bill is considered at the committee stage.

Notwithstanding any changes which might be contemplated by the board of directors, it is still the responsibility of parliament to give guidance in respect of a number of important guidelines. Among the philosophical issues that we should discuss and express an opinion on is the desirability of Canada ensuring private investment in the less-developed countries. Is this kind of assistance really welcome in the host country? Should some form of domestic participation be required? Will the concern in these countries develop along the same lines that our concern in Canada has developed as the breadth and depth of foreign ownership of our industries and resources have increased? A government might welcome the investment despite the fact that opprobrium for Canada might still result among the citizenry. This is more than an academic question. It is a fundamental aspect of Canadian foreign policy which should be discussed and on which direction should be given to the corporation.

One of the most important policy guidelines which should be given the corporation by parliament is the extent to which the corporation should continue to finance the exports of foreign-owned Canadian industries and of foreign branch plants in Canada. In reviewing the operations of the corporation to date, one cannot help but be struck by the extent to which the Canadian taxpayers' money is being used to subsidize exports from foreign-owned industries situated in Canada. A very sizeable proportion of the total credit has been used in this direction. The long-term significance cannot be underestimated.

What if the Burke-Hartke Bill is passed and becomes law in the United States? Will jobs then be repatriated from Canada to the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the companies have enjoyed over a long period beneficial use of the Canadian taxpayers' money? Or even if the bill is not passed, and if some of the more contentious aspects of the bill are not incorporated in administration bills, and I am optimistic enough to think that we can persuade the Americans that it is not in their best interests to proceed, are we still not putting ourselves in an unnecessarily vulnerable position by making too large a proportion of our credit available to American and other foreign subsidiaries? It is worth noting that in the long-run, this policy produces less net inflow of foreign exchange which is one of the purposes of our export policy. To the extent that interest, dividends and royalties flow out of Canada in the direction of the head office of the corporations, our exchange position is worsened.

While it would probably be irresponsible to suggest an abrupt change in the existing patterns, I think it would be equally irresponsible not to demand a shift in emphasis. More credit should be made available, both in relative and absolute terms, for the export of Canadian manufacturers produced by Canadian-owned companies. This would give Canadians the extra benefit derived from the leverage accruing from this kind of loan. It would enable us to put fewer eggs in one basket. It would allow us to reduce our dependency on changes in policy outside our country which might affect employment inside our country and over which we have no control. Firm guidelines should be established because Canadians have the right to know that their credit is being used in a way which will maximize the long-term benefit to them as citizens and taxpayers. My colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who will speak next for the official opposition, will develop this argument in greater detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: The other area where urgent change is required is in the amount of effort and credit made available to small business as a proportion of that made available to big business. The allegation is often heard that corporations cater to large businesses and ignore the small. This appears to be particularly true in the export financing division where as the Financial Post, January 20, 1973, states:

> On average most contracts are for five or more years and valued at more than a million dollars.

Such allocation of funds makes it difficult for smaller companies to get their share of the action. The Export Development Corporation 1971 annual report illustrates this factually. The finance agreements signed from January 1, 1971 to December 31, 1971, totalled $240,034,634. Of this the smallest loan was made to the Dominion Road Machinery Company Ltd., for $225,255. More typical is the size of loans given to companies such as H. A. Simons (International) Ltd. $12 million; Marine Industries Ltd. $43 million; Telecommunications and Equipment Services, $6,329,353; MLW-Industries Ltd., $7,575,025; Davie Shipbuilding Company Ltd., $14.5 million and so on. The corporation is big business oriented and apparently does not have the facilities or inclination to service small business adequately. Noteworthy in this context is the fact that small business is more likely to be Canadian business whereas big business is more likely to be foreign-owned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: I recall the experience of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) when he was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He travelled across the country to tell small businesses that they should take advantage of the credit facilities that were available to them for exports. Many of them tried and had their application rejected. The then minister had to lay down the law and the corporation responded. Loans to small business enterprises increased dramatically.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Obviously, the aversion is deep-rooted and some radical change is necessary. The solution appears to be a new, small business section dedicated exclusively to the service of small business. It should be established as a matter of urgent priority. It should open regional offices in each district of Canada so that the small businessmen who are unable to afford the time and expense to come to Ottawa would be able to service their requirements close to home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Once the system was functioning adequately, briefings could be given to small businessmen in each district. They should be encouraged to use the facilities to the maximum extent possible and to expand their activities on an international scale. The results would be dramatic. The whole world would become the oyster of Canadian small business. To achieve this, however, would require a much more energetic and aggressive approach than has been achieved to date. There has been too much centralization in Ottawa. There has been too much concentration on the big deals and too little time and credit left for the average entrepreneur.

In summation, Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to do an objective evaluation of the success of the corporation to date. Most of the large exporters are quite well satisfied with the experience so far. Most of the small manufacturers, on the other hand, are less than satisfied. The popular press is quite optimistic and gives the corporation full marks. Certainly, if the criteria is spending money, they have done well. A dramatic increase in outstanding loans and commitments has gone a long way toward overcoming the attitudes expressed in 1969 that the Exports Credits Insurance Corporation had been excessively cautious and somewhat unmindful of the increase in assistance given to their exporters by other industrialized nations especially Japan and Western Germany.

How far have we gone in catching up? How are we doing in comparison with other countries? How far have we yet to go? These are some of the questions that will have to be answered.

It should be understood, of course, that this bill in itself, regardless of the guidelines that are applied, will not solve all of the problems of Canadian business, especially small business. Our tax laws, our death duties, the attitude of our government toward business in general, our financial institutions and the facilities available to Canadian businessmen are all amongst the questions that will have to be addressed. They are, in total, far more important than the bill we are now discussing.

But in so far as the Export Credit Act is concerned, it is obvious that we have come a long way in three years. Equally obvious, there is still room for improvement. The operations of the corporation can be more Canadian, more selective and, above all, more compatible to the needs of Canadian small business enterprises.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is now one o'clock. I will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) when the House resumes at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, the principle of it, certainly is really quite a good example of what John Kenneth Galbraith meant in his book, "The New Industrial Estate", by the partnership between government and private industry. It is usually the kind of partnership in which the government takes most of the risks and private industry receives most of the benefits.

The opposition is trying to embarrass the government because of the success of the Export Development Corporation. It is obvious that the requests reaching the corporation are beyond its financial ability to meet at the moment, and parliament is being asked that the ceiling be increased. I believe we should agree to these increases. However, there are some questions which ought to be asked about the whole concept of the development corporation as presently set up.

What it is, in our view, is largely a defensive reaction against what has been going on in virtually every country in the world. If anything, we were late in getting into the field. We found that in international markets other countries were subsidizing their exporters with various insurance projects, underwriting certain costs at interest rates lower than were available at any other source. Canada felt it had to get into that business. For a long time we were experiencing a great deal of difficulty in this country as a result of what is sometimes called the concessional financing of other countries. We ran into a situation in which we gave large grants under DREE or some other program to a province or to an industry, only to find that Canadian industry had been outbid or underbid by an offshore bidder. This was not necessarily because the Canadian price was higher or conditions were different; it was because the offshore bidder had arranged for special financing which made it more profitable for a Canadian buyer to buy offshore than domestically.

There were two directions in which we could have moved. We could have been tougher on this concessional financing and kept those goods out of the country by applying regulations against dumping, or finding some way of obliging them to offer terms in Canada on the same basis as they offered terms in their own country. The government chose not to take that approach. Instead, it said: All right, if they are doing it to us we shall go out around the world and meet five with five. It is an interesting question whether we ought to have proceeded along these lines. I think that in the interim, because this country does not have a real industrial strategy, or a real industrial development program, we probably had no choice but to take the course which was followed. Having said this, I believe a heavy responsibility still rests on the government to deal with concessional financing as it is applied to Canada.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). He said we go to great lengths to sell our products around the world yet we often lose out in our own domestic market. This is the case. We often lose orders in the domestic market as a result of concessional financing arrangements of other countries. I am not at all sure that the hon. member for Trinity really had much of value to contribute to the debate. I listened carefully to him, hoping that he would come up with some ideas which would change things. But I did not find any. I was interested in his comments about the need to get the banks, or private investors, involved. That is not going to happen until such investors can look forward to a much greater return on their money than is possible under the system set up by the Export Development Corporation.

• (1410)

The Export Development Corporation has in fact become a lender or an insurer of last resort. It exists because of a failure on the part of private banks and money institutions. If the marketplace were working as well as my hon. friends to the right would like to think, there probably would not be a need for an Export Development Corporation. The point is that it is not, and the government has had to step in and make up for the inadequacies of the marketplace.

I always believe there are some valuable functions that can be performed by the government, and, therefore, we acknowledge the necessity of what is being done rather than try to be cavalier about the situation.

Mr. Gillespie: That is pretty cavalier.

Mr. Saltsman: There is in existence a myth that we have to export everything in order to increase our balance of payments position, but very seldom do we hear the question raised as to whether we have to export as much as we do. Very often the consequence of exporting as a total policy is that we get into somebody else's market on a basis of concessional financing, and those people in turn do the same thing with us. The situation was reversed in this case because they started and we followed suit.

We had a minister of industry, trade and commerce at one time who never really understood the relationship between exports and imports. He was always congratulating himself and his government for having increased exports by some 16 per cent, for example, and would then follow up by saying that he had some bad news to report, that we also increased imports by 16 per cent. He could never see the relationship, or that you cannot export without importing for any period of time unless there is an adjustment in the dollar value or a compensation by way of inflows or outflows of capital. Over any period of time, exports and imports tend to balance each other.

What is really important about this relationship is not the amount of exporting we are doing, but the kind we are doing and whether it is beneficial to the country as a whole. Fortunately, I think most of the projects financed by the Export Development Corporation seem to be of a beneficial nature, particularly to industrial production in this country. Even then, some questions have to be asked about these things.

Let us consider the shipbuilding industry as an example. A great deal of the underwriting in respect of ships has been on offshore sales. What is of interest is that shipbuilding is one of the most heavily subsidized industries in this country. It may be that we have to subsidize the shipbuilding industry, but we find we then have to underwrite its sales and its financing around the world. At some point someone has to question whether in terms of the kinds of things we are doing we are getting much benefit from the shipbuilding industry, or whether this is highly desirable for Canada. We recognize that shipbuilding is centred in those areas where there is high unemployment and that we must maintain a reasonable level of employment there. To the extent there is no other industrial structure in these unemployment areas we probably have to continue this shipbuilding program, but as we look into the future we must ask ourselves whether we want to expand this program, particularly when there is so much risk and so much public money going into its support and development.

Another aspect can be found in the Export Development Corporation annual report. It contains a beautiful picture of a swimming pool beside a little hacienda on one of the Caribbean Islands. It contains a statement to the effect that we are helping to build or finance this. Is this the sort of thing the Export Development Corporation should be getting into with the taxpayer's money? It is one thing to say we are selling certain materials internationally and supporting these sales with finances because this provides employment opportunities in Canada, but what kind of employment opportunity does the financing of summer resorts in the Caribbean provide Canada? This may provide some profit for enterprising Canadians, but on the whole it does not seem to be of any great value to the Canadian public generally. As such, I do not think this should be underwritten by a public corporation. If there are Caribbean countries which want Canadian support, this might best be provided under CEDA rather than under a program of this kind. I am a little concerned that we may be following the path, albeit this is a very small step in that direction, which we deplore other countries following. It is a kind of imperialistic move into areas in which we may not want to be in the future.

There is a great deal of unrest in many developing countries about their land being bought up by foreigners, and there is a great deal of hesitation about their future desire to see this type of development. I do not think Canada should be involved in that kind of development, and it should not be aided and abetted by Canada unless there is a specific request from the governments of those countries for support of this kind. I would be much happier to see us support the government operations of those countries to develop the land under their own ownership and management. As a Canadian I would feel more comfortable about that, and I think most Canadians would feel the same way.

There have been allusions and much talk about industrial strategy. The government claims it has been caught up by an industrial strategy of some kind. If it has, this strategy is almost invisible and very ill-defined. Like so many organizations, the Export Development Corporation is operating in a kind of a vacuum or an absence of stated policy as to what the government is trying to do and what are its objectives. The government seems to be responding to the problems of concessional financing, but it is difficult to see this in the context of future strategy.

Some of the things being supported have a great deal of value to Canada, but there are some things that do not seem to relate to anything that has been carefully thought out for our future. Recently the government undertook a review of foreign policy and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) issued a statement which made reference to three options for Canada. It seems he was in favour of the third option.

The first option was to continue drifting, as we have been doing, although the minister did not put it in those words. That seems to be out of the question because the world is not going to let us drift. The second option seemed to involve a continental arrangement with the United States, but there is much public opinion against this. The minister seemed to say that this would not work and, therefore, we are left with the third option. That option was to develop some kind of policy for Canada which would make us more independent and our markets more accessible and, in some way, make us less reliant on foreign trade and international changes. We have seen very little effort in this direction by the government.

Admittedly, the government recently introduced a bill on foreign ownership which makes some move in the direction of future industrial planning, but again even that is not in any framework or context that is understandable. I suggest we must have some indication from the government of what its long-term plans are. I am not talking about rigid long-term plans; there is no such thing as an inflexible long-term plan for any country. Rather I am referring to some statement of principle as to how the government will respond in the future to the challenges around the world, such as to the fact that we are being cut out of the European Common Market, that the United States market is becoming more protectionist, that Japan really wants to buy only our raw materials. Increasingly, we are finding ourselves placed in an isolated position and we are badly in need of an over-all review of the industrial future of this country. An industrial future can only be realized if the government takes a definite stance and makes some plans, prepares priorities and outlines to the country the desirable direction in which we should be moving.

I was also interested in the comment of the hon. member for Trinity who expressed concern about multinational corporations. He said that the Export Development Corporation tends to support very heavily these international corporations and he would like to see more Canadian companies receive help. What I was waiting for him to say, but which never seemed to emerge from his statement, was that at some stage he was going to move an amendment excluding foreign held corporations from the benefits of the provisions of the Export Development Act. In the absence of that kind of suggestion, it is difficult to measure just how serious is the Canadianism of the hon. member for Trinity.

We do face a dilemma here, a challenge between the multinational corporation and a particular government, in this case the Canadian government. The multinational corporations have been using Canada in the same way as they have used every other country in the world. After all, they could just as easily export from Italy or France as from Canada. Multinational corporations ask Canada what kind of deal we can give them, and they indicate to us that the Italians have given them one deal and that they can get a better deal from the French; that the Germans have offered them so much concessional financing, and they ask us what we will put up. This country has never tried to grapple with the problems posed by multinational corporations. We have to establish an Export Development Corporation to match what other countries are prepared to offer. This is a nice arrangement for the multinational corporations, since they can hop around the world from one country to another getting the best deal they can. But I am not at all sure that is ultimately to the best benefit of Canada, except only in the most indirect way.

Therefore, while we have probably no choice at this time but to go along with and support something like the Export Development Corporation, since it does help in maintaining and keeping employment in Canada, I suggest it is not the most useful mechanism for the future. The most useful tool for the future would be giving greater government attention to the development of an industrial strategy to find some sense of purpose and control over our economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-3 entitled an Act to amend the Export Development Act.

Mr. Speaker on many occasions a similar bill was introduced, mainly to increase the credits, the funds of that corporation and to find ways of increasing our exports.

Mr. Speaker, since we have to actually subsidize exports there is surely something which is not working properly in the export-import system. Surely, there are questions to be asked. For example, why do foreigners hesitate to import Canadian products? Do they have doubts on the quality of our products or do they consider our prices prohibitive? I think that in the final analysis it is our prices which are slowing down our imports. This is due to our overall cost system which is related to our tax system at all levels of Canadian production. This results in almost prohibitive prices for our products not only for export but also for domestic consumption, to the point where competition with other countries is becoming more and more difficult.

In our export system the objective of the government seems to be mainly to export unemployment because we see that all the means used by the government to stimulate exports seem to be aimed at having industries operate fully to ensure employment for Canadian workers. This seems to be a good guideline but it is the worker who through the taxes he pays is partly financing government grants to stimulate exports, and so he is really the one who is paying to work.

In this country, we have been taught that we must export or die. Mr. Speaker, I think the principle of exports should consist in compensating for imports, nothing more. Our policy should be aimed at insuring production, at facilitating the finishing of raw materials and at encouraging as much as possible domestic production of consumer goods. I think we have a tremendous domestic market and I wonder whether we are developing it properly. I think that before attempting to encourage exports and foreign consumers, we should rather try to encourage Canadian consumers in order to enable them to use our own production for their own needs.

There is one particular method to achieve this objective. It would consist in granting a compensating discount on all Canadian products used in this country. This would enable us to use a good part of our production at the expense of import markets.

• (1430)

This would also increase production. It would enable our factories to produce more, and at the same time it would satisfy the Canadian consumer.

Trying to export means to some extent trying to export our unemployment. What we make for export will not be made in other countries, and so it is we who are working instead of others. When we import—for you cannot export all the time, you have to import too—the opposite takes place; we import unemployment.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I call on the government to seek a policy that will enable us to produce at home the consumer goods we need, and to promote this production by every available means so that it may reach the consumer. The aim of production, whether agricultural or industrial, is consumption.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, the few remarks I wanted to make about the bill now before us. I admit that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce requires further estimates to encourage even more exports. As long as we operate under the present system, I suggest that there may be no alternative. I think that we should get off the beaten tracks and find another way to meet at the same time the Canadian worker is and the Canadian consumer's needs.

[English]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the present bill which will augment advantages under the Export Development Act is one which I support wholeheartedly. The whole idea of increasing our trade with other countries is, of course, vital to the life of Canada. It means that what it takes to enhance our exporting is the difference between what one government can do as opposed to another or what certain individuals can do as opposed to certain other individuals, and this is one means that we have at our disposal to improve the export picture of Canada. There have been many occasions when I have visited other countries and when we have spoken about exports the idea of financing became a stumbling block. Certainly, experience has shown us that if there are competitive financing methods available in the international market, exporters will be able to do business much more easily.

I remember, for example, that a year and a half ago I was in Leningrad on a short visit and had the opportunity of meeting the pulp and paper people there. It was certainly a joy to me that, prior to that occasion, we had passed amendments to this act which facilitated further business with the Soviet Union in the field of pulp and paper. At that time the Soviets were negotiating for a very large new pulp and paper complex, and the help that Canada was able to give was beneficial, not only to them, but to Canadians because they insisted on using a Canadian company. Even though their principal consultants were a French firm, they insisted on the involvement of a certain Canadian company and we were able to discuss with them the possibilities which were enhanced through this act.

I think that everyone in the House is probably generally in favour of this act. It is a question of certain details being clarified. Various parties perhaps have different ideas about these details, and certainly it seems to me that the government is wide open to accepting suggestions from various people.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer)—for whom I have great respect and admiration—spoke this morning on the subject and made a couple of observations. In one instance he referred to the economic theory that if the same financing were available to Canadian industries, the end result by way of the creation of jobs would be the same as under the present system where the financing is available from abroad, and therefore jobs are created within Canada in order to fill those contracts. The hon. member did not say whether or not he espoused that theory as opposed to the other one, but he brought it forth as a cautionary measure in order to make us aware of the fact that this is an alternate theory which we should consider. Personally,—and I am certainly no economist—I do not think that that particular theory is valid, because when we provide this kind of financing to foreign governments to buy from Canada or to develop through the use of Canadian goods and talents, we are providing not only jobs here but also that other element in trade which is necessary. It puts the other country in the position of being willing to do more business with Canada when more goods are purchased from Canada because trade is always a two-way street. I suggest that when we take these steps in order to help another country, that country is better disposed to do more business with Canada. Therefor, I think that the comparison of the net results on a job for job basis is not valid, because there are other factors that are involved.

The hon. member also mentioned the fact that exporters are given advantages that are not available to other businessmen in Canada who are interested in the domestic market. This is true when we are talking about this particular bill, but it seems to me that other facilities are available to those who are interested in the domestic market. I come from an area which is very anxious to expand its industrial base, an area that is trying very hard to develop secondary industry in particular. We do have the facilities available to help these other domestic companies. Certainly, whether the program under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has or has not been effective, is another question. It is certainly there and available. Our problem has not been that these companies have not had something at their fingertips that they can use. Our problem has been that we have not been able to convince these people that it is more advantageous for them to go into these areas than into others.

The hon. member mentioned something else, with which I certainly agree wholeheartedly, namely, the matter of the composition of the board. This is a favourite subject of mine. The hon. member has suggested that the number of civil servants on the board should be reduced and that there should be other people—perhaps businessmen—who should be included instead. I could not agree more because, first of all, I think it is absolutely essential that people who deal with business matters should have a background in business.

I have seen so many instances of companies, in my constituency and elsewhere, which have been waiting for the government to make a decision, even though it may be a minor one. Probably the employees within the bureaucracy left that file in a basket over night, or while they went away on holiday, or while they were off sick, and all the time, each and every day that the file was there, it cost the company money. These people, although very efficient—I don't downgrade them—do not realize what it is to meet a payroll at the end of the week, or to meet such other problems as are related to dealing with the employees of companies. Therefore, I agree wholeheartedly that a minimum number of civil servants should be put on the board, and that generally its composition should be made up of business people who are familiar with the world of business.

Of course, I return to my old argument that there should be some representative on such a board from the people of Canada, or somebody who has a mandate from the people of Canada. We have lots of people in this House who have ample experience in business and who would be able to contribute. The hon. member for Trinity is an ideal example of someone who would be able to contribute that kind of experience and enhance the composition of the board.

The hon. member also talked about industries in Canada that are foreign owned, and suggested that the subsidization of these companies should be regarded with a jaundiced eye. This, of course, caught the attention of our friends in the NDP, who picked it up immediately. This subject has arisen frequently, and it is something that can be dealt with in another way. I would remind hon. members that we will be talking about foreign ownership when dealing with a separate bill entirely. It is an issue that can be dealt with separately.

I have never been afraid of foreign ownership in Canada. I have been afraid of foreign control. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, it is up to us as legislators to make sure that the laws are such that there is not control by a foreign power in Canada. I come from an area that does not disdain foreign ownership, simply because we know that probably most of Northern Ontario would not even exist without that kind of foreign investment. But that does not mean to say that we can allow foreigners to control our destiny.

Some of the help that we give to other countries has been badly interpreted by many Canadians. The kind of things suggested by the provisions of this bill are badly understood by Canadians in general. That is unfortunate. It is our fault, and not only that of members of the government. Members of the House on both sides have a duty to explain to the people of Canada what our legislation is all about.

For example, people will come up to me and say that this is the kind of thing that has to do with foreign aid. This is not directly foreign aid, Mr. Speaker. It is not foreign aid at all. Yet people time and time again come along and say, "This is foreign aid. You are giving it away. Why don't you do something for our poor people at home?" That is a fine argument for someone who is concerned only with cheap political advantage, but it certainly is not the way to be sincere with the people of Canada. So far as that goes, foreign aid itself has been badly explained, because certainly any time we help anyone else in the world it is also to our advantage.

Here we are, one of the richest countries in the world—I would certainly say the most advantaged country in the world, if not the richest. We have the potential to become the richest in the world. We have every possible advantage, but sometimes we take the attitude of a cheap country cousin who says, "There are many people who are poor in our own country. We should be helping them first." Of course, we should be helping our poor people, but we should also be helping people in countries far less fortunate than ours, not only from the point of view of morality but also from the point of view of good business. When we are helping other people, we also help ourselves. When we help other people through this kind of bill, we are helping them to do more business with Canada. We are helping to create more jobs in Canada, and this is the thing we want for Canadians.

The spokesman for the Creditiste party mentioned that our Canadian consumers should be helped first. Of course, we should be trying to help Canadian consumers and there are many ways in which they can be helped, but one is not by criticizing a bill such as this. There are other ways in which we can help the Canadian consumers.

I suggest that every time we talk about our poor people at home and our "bonnes mères de famille", who have large families and so on—I am No. 14 in mine and I know about this—it is great stuff on the hustings and great stuff in the local paper back home. However, let us not forget that when we help other people through a bill such as this we create jobs and increase Canadian production, and this is indirectly helping every "mère de famille" in Canada. This is what we should not forget, and this is what should be explained to the people. We should not have this kind of superficial thinking that instead of giving a loan to somebody outside Canada the money should all be given to the mothers of Canada. That kind of thing is ridiculous. Really it is a partisan political argument. It should not be used. We should be above that kind of thing in this House.

The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) also suggested that by importing we also import unemployment. Surely, he isn't serious! When we import sugar from some country which grows sugar cane, does that mean we are importing unemployment? Mr. Speaker, we import coconuts; we import oranges and other citrus fruit. Does that mean we are importing unemployment? Canada lives by trade. We export what we do best; we import what we cannot grow here or what we cannot develop here. So, this kind of an argument is hardly—

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order please. The hon. member for Abitibi on a point of order.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, when I listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), I suggest that he did not listen to my whole statement. I made a point of stating and demanding that we produce in Canada everything that we can produce. I did not say that we should produce citrus fruits or any other thing that we cannot produce, I simply stated that we should produce everything that we are able to produce.

[English]

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): I apologize to the hon. member if I did not understand him correctly, but the basic principle he seemed to enunciate was that by importing we also import—by importing something we also import unemployment. That is what I heard him say.

[English]

Now then, what we can produce is another story, but it seems to me we have to remember that this business of trade is always a two-way street.

When the minister made his presentation he spoke about a number of things, one of which was the various countries we had helped under the provisions of the act. One of the things he did not mention, although it is on the list that I have, is the pulp and paper mill in Kenya. The livelihood of the people in northern Ontario is mainly dependent directly on the pulp and paper industry and the forestry industry in general. There are some who feel that mining is very important in northern Ontario and of course it is, but pulp and paper is even more important. This industry has its ups and downs. It has been down during the last few years and recently has just started to come up again. This bill is the kind of thing the pulp and paper industry can use abroad but I wonder if the industry, which has not been aggressive, is aware of the advantages. This industry has been—

• (1450)

Mr. Stanfield: You had better offer your services.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): —content with the markets it has had in the United States and elsewhere. To get it to expand its markets is like pulling teeth. I have been trying for five years to get the pulp and paper industry of Canada to establish markets in other parts of the world, to establish joint ventures and new markets on a long-term basis. This becomes very difficult when the people at this end sit back complacently because they have a good market here. But in another year perhaps the situation will not be so good. The pulp and paper industry was in dreadful shape last year and the company representatives were here knocking at our doors. We were sympathetic and many of us worked on their behalf, but I think they should adopt a much more aggressive attitude toward foreign business.

Mr. Speaker, a favourite topic of mine is the matter of trade between the northern and the southern parts of this continent, and not only the continent but the western hemisphere. We have our own common market in the western hemisphere which we should be developing. I would encourage the minister to take more positive action in this regard. I have noticed, for instance, that from 1971 to 1972 we increased our exports by something like $200 million. Exports to Latin America, for example, increased by about $2½ million while imports from that area decreased by $6 million. Of course, we want to export more than we import but it is a two-way street. There is no doubt in my mind that we have many products in this country that no other country on the continent has and therefore we could end up with a favourable balance of trade providing we develop in a much more concerted way our trade with South America.

The Latin American countries stand ready to do more business with us. Of course, the United States is our traditional trading partner but now that Great Britain has entered the common market in Europe we should try to develop our markets in North and South America without, of course, abandoning our other markets. A few weeks ago I spoke about sugar going back and forth across the Pacific from Cuba to Malaya because we do not have arrangements with Cuba. We buy from Australia. Surely, this situation could be sorted out by a common market arrangement between North and South America. This is something I should like to encourage through this bill which is concerned with the development of trade. The bill would be useful in looking for new markets on this continent.

Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support the bill before us and want to see it go to the committee where amendments can be made. Certainly, we are all open to suggestions and everyone has good ideas to put forward. I know that the hon. member for Trinity has a few ideas that he would like to see incorporated in the bill and perhaps this can be done at the committee stage. I am sure the government will accept good ideas from both sides of the House. I am a non-partisan person and like to look at things on their face value; it pains me to hear people on either side of the House speak on a matter such as this from a partisan point of view. The trade of Canada has nothing to do with partisanship. Certainly, our friend the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) when he was the minister of trade and commerce, had good ideas about promoting trade in Canada. Everyone in Canada, whatever his politics, is interested I am sure in increasing trade and that is why I think it should be done entirely outside the realm of partisan politics. Mr. Speaker, I encourage the House to pass this bill on second reading so that it can go to committee and have any changes made which may be necessary for the benefit of Canada and Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before getting into more specific comments concerning the proposed legislation I should like to make some comments about the speeches of members who have spoken earlier. I listened with great interest to the minister who explained from his standpoint why he felt that parliament should accept this bill and give it second reading. I timed the minister; it took him ten minutes to explain why he felt the parliament of Canada should accept this bill. I thought that ten minutes was an interesting contrast to the time spent by the president of this corporation, Mr. H. T. Aiken, when he initially appeared before the Senate committee which incorporated the corporation itself, in 1969. The committee chairman at that time told Mr. Aiken that he had six minutes in which to explain what the bill was all about and what the Export Development Corporation would do.

Mr. Hees: Liberal arrogance!

Mr. Stevens: At that time, Mr. Speaker, the ceiling proposed for the corporation was $600 million; today we are being asked to raise the ceiling to $1.5 billion. It is interesting to note the contrast: in 1969 they spent about a minute to explain why the ceiling should be raised for each $100 million and today the minister took only ten minutes to explain why the ceiling should be raised to $1.5 billion.

• (1500)

An hon. Member: George Hees told you that.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I used to do a great deal of explaining.

Mr. Stevens: Let me be fair, Mr. Speaker. I have commented about the minister, but what surprised me more than anything this morning was that the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), was not in the House.

An hon. Member: Maybe he has become redundant.

Mr. Stevens: This is a bill which perhaps more closely than any other measure touches the issue the hon. member raised in the election campaign, that of corporate welfare bums, yet while the bill is being considered in the House he is nowhere to be seen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He was having coffee with Bob.

Mr. Stevens: I also timed the main spokesman for that party, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I wanted to see how long he would take to explain why his party would or would not support this bill. He spoke for some 20 minutes, twice as long as the minister spoke. I mention this because in speaking on this bill I feel I am greatly limited by the 40 minutes allotted to us.

An hon. Member: Forty minutes? Who gave you 40 minutes?

Mr. Stevens: I say that because I feel I could speak for much longer on this bill.

An hon. Member: Say something.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to this as a simple bill. Perhaps it is simple.

Mr. Goyer: Speak about specific problems and not generalities.

An hon. Member: And don't go on for 40 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I invite hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and permit the hon. member who has the floor to complete his remarks in such a way that everybody interested will be able to listen.

Mr. Stevens: I wanted to draw to the attention of parliament the fact that the minister suggested this is a simple bill. Perhaps it is simple in that it contains only two clauses. Let me assure hon. members, however, that when we deal with export financing we are dealing with the most complicated, dangerous and risky field in financing in the world.

Mr. Nowlan: It is even worse than unemployment insurance.

Mr. Stevens: Surely the minister realizes that, and knows that few chartered banks dare to go into long-term financing of the type the Export Development Corporation has undertaken. I am surprised at the minister's audacity in coming before parliament and spending a mere ten minutes explaining why we should permit the ceiling on one section of the corporation's activities—one section only; I emphasize that—to be increased to $1.5 billion in liabilities.

May I point out, as I think the minister knows, that the present ceiling of $850 million has already been exceeded, so that in many ways this is not an ordinary bill but an emergency measure. I believe the minister brought out this fact in his ten-minute speech when he indicated that on an earlier occasion he had said he planned to bring in certain other amendments affecting the operation of this corporation. However, he has chosen not to introduce those amendments at this time. I suggest to hon. members that what the minister suggested was significant. I should very much like to see undertaken a full and thorough investigation into certain aspects of the operation of this corporation with particular emphasis on activities in the foreign investments field and insurance on foreign investments.

In the brief time available to me I shall stick to the subject matter before the House as contained in Bill C-3.

An hon. Member: It's about time.

Mr. Stevens: The minister intimated that in 1972 some $283 million of financing agreements were signed by the corporation. I am pleased the minister referred to the 1972 figures. I wish he had gone further and explained more explicitly who was given the benefit of those agreements. It would have been interesting if he had spelled out, for example, that included in that $283 million are loans aggregating $40,781,000 to General Motors—

An hon. Member: Of Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Also, there are loans to M.L.W. Worthington of $22,904,000, for a total of $63,685,000.

Mr. Gillespie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member opposite. I wonder if he realizes that the direct loans are made to the buyer, they are not made to the vendor; therefore, no loans were made by the Export Development Corporation to the companies he mentioned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister is desperately trying to distract us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: Do not be confused with facts.

Mr. Stevens: If you wish, I will go into the financing arrangements step by step. I am quite willing to do that. I say to the minister that when he referred to $283 million in signed agreements in 1972, about $63,685,000 of that amount went to persons who in turn bought goods from General Motors and M.L.W. Worthington in Canada. The money substantially was used to purchase from those concerns diesel locomotives and other types of transportation equipment.

An hon. Member: Now you are getting closer.

Mr. Hees: Are you listening, Alastair?

Mr. Stevens: May I go further, Mr. Speaker, and remind the minister that those loans were made at interest rates of 6 per cent and 7 per cent. All one need do is telephone the corporations to find out. They are very happy with their lot, I can assure you.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

An hon. Member: No; let him finish.

Mr. Hees: The minister can ask his question later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Perhaps I should intervene at this time to mention that the point raised previously by the minister was more a matter of argument than a point of order. According to our procedures and the rules of this House, I think the hon. member should be allowed to complete his remarks. Then perhaps hon. members may ask questions or they can seek the floor and submit contrary arguments.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope I shall be allowed extra time to make up for the time lost through interference.

Mr. Nowlan: Through government static.

Mr. Stevens: I point out that the transportation equipment I have referred to ended up largely in Yugoslavia, Mexico, Portugal and Greece. There was $63 million worth of it. Let there be no doubt that we in the Progressive Conservative party are not arguing with the fact that this type of activity creates employment. However, this government that says they have no money for urban transit development in Canadian cities should explain how they could find some $63 million to lend to two subsidiary American concerns.

• (1510)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: If I may reword that statement, I ask why they will facilitate financing at between 6 per cent and 7 per cent interest for the purchase of transportation equipment from two American subsidiary companies to the extent of $63 million.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: Let me point out the significance of that amount of money. In the Toronto region the Ontario government have what they call GO transit. GO transit spent $25 million on equipment including locomotives, cars and switching equipment for the lakeshore operation that they run for commuters to and from Toronto. It is used by 20,000 people per day. Here we have $63 million of financing. If this government wished to do something for the urban areas of Canada they might consider, in their order of priorities, the possibility of making $50 million, $100 million or whatever figure they choose, available at 6 per cent to 7 per cent interest to some of these urban centres of our provinces to assist them in providing better urban transportation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I remind the minister of this because, naturally, in dealing with this corporation he likes to talk about far away places and foreign lands.

Mr. Gillespie: I like to talk about jobs at home.

Mr. Stevens: Coming from an area from which the minister also comes, I can say that we are a foreign land. Certainly the government in Ottawa has forgotten the region that I have the honour to represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Let me continue with the figure thrown out by the minister with respect to financing. I think it is very interesting to analyse the $283 million worth of financing. We find, for example, that they have certain categories totalling $58 million in financing called "various suppliers." Unfortunately, I cannot tell this House exactly who are these various suppliers. I can tell hon. members that there is a loan, which is like taking money from one pocket and putting it in another, to another Crown corporation for some $28 million. If you eliminate those two categories you find that the net amount of financing facilitated through this corporation was $197 million. When I analyse the $197 million worth of agreements, I find approximately $126 million that I can readily identify is to the benefit of subsidiary American concerns.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: I have heard comments from the other side that we need to expand export trade and create employment. I suggest that is not the problem before this parliament in this bill. We agree on expanding export trade. We agree on the value of creating employment in this country. But we simply say that when you are dealing in billions of dollars you can do it in a more direct and beneficial way for Canadians than the present government has chosen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Before getting into too much detail let me touch on another point in the minister's comments which I found very interesting. My colleague, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), pointed out that while there has been a great deal of talk about the EDC becoming active in the private sector and perhaps borrowing money from the private sector instead of coming back to parliament, the minister interjected that they had been very successful in the private sector. Out of curiosity, over the luncheon break I thought I would find out how successful the corporation really has been in raising money in the private sector.

I found that they attempted to raise—I would emphasize, not in long-term obligations but simply in obligations of a short-term nature that is, up to one year—$80 million. To date they have raised from $40 million to $50 million. I would point out that there is great resentment among some members of the investment community concerning what is described as the mother complex shown by the Department of Finance with respect to public financing through the private sector for EDC. It is pointed out that most of their money is not in fact for one year, it is for one to three months, and the Department of Finance has so restricted the raising of these funds that it has become extremely difficult.

I wish to point out the very odd requirements that have been insisted upon by the Department of Finance with respect to where this short-term money may come from. For example, notwithstanding the fact, as the minister points out so often, that this financing is for foreign concerns, the EDC has been specifically required not to borrow money from any foreign country or concern. They have also been told that they may not borrow money in the form of notes from Canadian chartered banks through any of the dealers. Surely this is strange. As the hon. member for Trinity pointed out, it is only 11 months ago that the former minister of industry, trade and commerce stated that the government anticipated $500 million worth of agreements would be signed in 1972 and he was very confident that $100 million of those agreements would be taken up by Canadian chartered banks.

What happened to the Canadian chartered banks? I understand they took up less than $20 million. The sad fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the government feels that perhaps the softest touch in the land is this parliament. Rather than attempting to raise money where I suggest the government should be raising money, it simply takes the easy way out by asking us to increase their ceiling so that the public treasury may pour hundreds of millions of dollars into EDC to support some of the corporations I have mentioned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I emphasize that while the minister referred to the financing figure of $283 million, it is also interesting to note who over the years since this corporation was formed, and its predecessor, has actually benefited and today is benefiting in the form of current financing or through agreements to finance. We find that almost 25 per cent of the total ceiling amount of $850 million has gone to the benefit of three corporations; $208.2 million has been earmarked for the three corporations two of which I have already referred to.

• (1520)

Mr. Hees: Shocking.

Mr. Gillies: Shocking.

Mr. Stevens: I seriously question whether the government needs to be so restrictive in the allocation of these funds. Naturally, one of the supporting points in favour of this bill is the question of helping Canada in her export trade.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: The minister looked at certain figures and told us that trade had increased during the last few years. I should like him to look at some of the other figures he has at his disposal. He will find that in the year to which he is referring, or at least for the year right after that, 1970, Statistics Canada has published a breakdown of the nature of the financing of the trade to which he referred.

I think it is significant that only .6 per cent of Canada's total trade in 1970 was financed with credit on the basis of five years or longer. I am suggesting that the corporation has chosen a narrow field of financing with respect to the long-term export finance sector referred to in Bill C-3. For example, we find it pointed out in the Statistics Canada publication that 87 companies with sales of over $25 million account for almost $10 billion of the export sales. Moving further down the scale, 426 exporters executed 92 per cent of the exports reported.

I am suggesting that rather than helping smaller businesses, the EDC has actually helped the large corporations to maintain their extremely high percentage of our export business. Dealing with the figures to which the minister referred with respect to financing during 1972, it seems clear that the money, indirectly if you like, some $283 million, went or could go to 13 companies, plus whatever suppliers are included. Of those 13 companies, eight are United States controlled. What the EDC issues, to use a term employed by one of the minister's colleagues, is "hunting money" or "hunting agreements." I suggest the department should recommend to EDC that they take a bit of that hunting money, maybe a quarter of a billion, to facilitate smaller businesses in Canada. Let them do a bit of their own hunting for markets. This would be much more worth while than giving 13 corporations the tremendous benefit they are now receiving, something over $200 million of financing in one year alone, indirectly, if you like, which the government is willing to put out at between 6 and 8 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, there are parallels for EDC. We are not in splendid isolation in this country when we consider this bill. EDC is a member of what they call the Berne union which is made up of 29 corporations very similar in many respects to the one whose affairs are now before us. I feel that before we rush to agree to raise the ceiling permitted for this corporation we should take a careful look at the position of these other corporations and decide whether EDC as it is presently administered and operated is doing the job for the average businessman in this country that it could be doing. That is the point. If this type of money is going to be given out to facilitate export trade, we must take a more serious look at the over-all question than was implied by the ten-minute speech made by the minister in describing the bill to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: If he were willing to give a million dollars of hunting money to each of 250 Canadian businesses, I guarantee that the minister concerned would be able to return to this House at a later date with a great deal more satisfaction and optimism than he can show today as a result of supporting 13 corporations the way he is doing.

Mr. Hees: Look after the little fellow.

Mr. Stevens: What is the attitude of the government? I think it is very interesting when we come to consider what steps have been taken directly to help small business. Look at the Industrial Development Bank. Granted, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is not with us today, and that bank answers directly to him. But I would point out that there are some interesting contrasts to be drawn between the operations of the IDB and the operations of the Export Development Corporation.

Let us start with rates. If you go to the IDB you will be quoted rates as high as 11 and 12 per cent, should you be lucky enough to be offered a loan. In the EDC it is about 7 per cent. Now turn to loan levels. The IDB is making loans at a level of $45,000 on average. The Export Development Corporation is making loans on average of over $10 million. What a contrast to see what can be done in the name of foreign financing and what can be done in the name of financing relatively small business in this country. Again, it is interesting to find that while the Export Development Corporation finances indirectly some 30 or 40 corporations in this country, the Industrial Development Bank has somewhere around 16,000 customers.

I would strongly recommend that in working out an industrial strategy, something which the government has failed to do to date, hon. members opposite should take a much closer look at ways in which the Export Development Corporation can fit into such a strategy and see whether the corporation cannot play a much larger role in two main respects, that is, in helping Canadian small businessmen get into or expand in the export field, and in counteracting the growing volume of foreign investment in this country.

I cannot agree with those who argue that we should endorse this type of proposal without giving the matter much more thought and closer investigation. We are being asked to lift the ceiling to $1.5 billion in favour of a Crown corporation without even having an audited statement. I hope it will sink into the minds of every member of this House that the last audited statement from the Auditor General of Canada for this corporation is dated December 31, 1971.

What would happen if any concern in the private sector tried to raise a few thousand dollars publicly in the absence of an audited statement or a prospectus? Yet we are expected to give second reading to a bill in the absence of an audited statement to the end of the corporation's last fiscal year. I would point out that not only is the ceiling to be raised, but the minister has in his possession a forecast showing where the money is actually to be spent in 1973 and 1974. He has in his possession a document showing how some of the $600 million extra money which will be within the $1.5 billion is earmarked. Two hundred and forty-three million dollars go out in 1973, and $401 million in 1974. I think we are entitled to an explanation as to why there has been such anticipation of the action to be taken in this parliament. Rather than an audited statement, we have been provided with a series of boasts from various ministers and officials that the long-term financial section of the EDC is having a fabulous time and is a great success.

I assure the minister that if he went outside parliament today with a bag of candy and offered it, he would get rid of it just as he has been getting rid of some of his long-term favourable financing at 6 per cent to 8 per cent. I should also mention that in delivering his argument the minister was in many ways serious in general, but in substance I do not feel that he put sufficient emphasis on the serious request he is making of this parliament. Long-term viable banking institutions do not stand on whether they can get money out, but whether they can get it back; and the viability of a public institution is not that it can disperse public money, but that it disperses public money in the public interest.

Long-term foreign financing is a risky and a costly business. A case has been made that public money should be used in this area because the private sector is unwilling to do the job. I am not certain that is the case. However, there are ways in which the public could be more active in this area, and I would suggest that the Export Development Corporation has not prudently explored this field.

In 1969, as I have already said, the president of the EDC argued that the new EDC would be different from its predecessor in two important respects. Mr. Aiken indicated that it would create new facilities to enter into private financing from bond and debenture sales. As I have indicated, that has not been realized other than to the extent of some short-term financing to the possible limit of about $50 million. Mr. Aiken also indicated that they would make a start in working out consortium loans with the private sector, including our banks. This action has not been taken to any extent and I feel we deserve an answer as to why not.

Recently the president of General Motors stated that this government was a bit chicken in dealing with the auto industry. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is chicken in its dealing with the Canadian chartered banks as well. While this government does not have the courage to get the chartered banks to pick up the $100 million the former minister so proudly boasted of, it has the gall to come into this House and ask that we increase the ceiling it now has in order that it can pour further hundreds of millions of dollars of public funds into this corporation.

Having said that, let us take a moment to compare the operation of the Export Development Corporation with roughly its counterpart in the United States, the Export-Import Bank. That bank has been in operation since 1930 and has financed some $30 billion on its own account in foreign trade. However, it operates quite differently from the EDC in Canada. Of the money used by the Export-Import Bank for financing, 50 per cent is picked up from the private sector alone, and the United States treasury is responsible for the other 50 per cent. I would emphasize the word "responsible". In June, 1971, the total advanced by the treasurer of the United States to that bank was only three-quarters of a billion dollars. Think of the difference! We are being asked in this House to agree to a ceiling under which the Canadian government could put in a billion and a half dollars to our corporation, when the United States counterpart has received loans of public funds from the treasury of the United States, as of June, 1971, amounting to only three-quarters of a billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stevens: The rest, I would emphasize, is raised in the United States from the private sector and not through a soft touch such as this government is trying to make of parliament. Are we not obliged to insist that the EDC do a better job before we provide it with larger sums of money? I feel we are, when we draw some comparison between the activities of the EDC and the activities of the Industrial Development Bank to which I have already referred.

I believe that the objectives of the EDC could be changed in order to greatly strengthen Canadian entrepreneurship in this country, especially in respect of the Canadian manufacturing sector which could expand in export fields. The Export Development Corporation makes loans, on average, of something over $10 million each which really finance a couple of dozen giant corporations that are mainly U.S. owned, at interest rates of between 6 per cent and 7 per cent. On the other hand, I have pointed out the cost of such borrowing to small businesses from the IDB is approximately 10 per cent.

I would also point out that, assuming the money we are contemplating today was one-quarter of a billion dollars, it would build 10,000 homes in this country. If the minister is looking for a way to get ready takers of his fund, I can assure him that if he pegs the rate at 6 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent he will have a queue of persons from here to the river waiting for this money with which to build these 10,000 homes.

In conclusion, I should like to ask the government about our priorities. Some $1.5 billion is at stake. The government has not made a good case for putting that amount of money into the EDC or for allowing that corporation to incur such a liability in this field on its present presentation. Would it not have been far more effective last year to have taken some of that money and helped the smaller Canadian businessmen in the ways they required? The minister has talked about the jobs that were maintained by a handful of corporations which received EDC financing. I would have some questions about that, but I see that my time is running short.

Let me finally state that I believe it is unfortunate this bill is in its present form. I believe long-term financing must surely be more effectively undertaken by the EDC before we provide more funds. Possibly a simple amendment to the Bank Act requiring chartered banks to provide funds specifically for long-term financing of export trade would help. Whatever the solution, I cannot see this House extending to the ECD this kind of money without a more impressive rationale in respect of our national economic objectives.

This government should have the courage to set its industrial priorities in such a way that we may know, the public may know—in short, that we all may know that public moneys are effectively serving public goals. By "public goals" I mean Canadian goals for Canadian people and Canadian companies. This bill is not the product of vision or courage; it is the product of aimlessness and timidity.

• (1540)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, one of the cliches or observations about history is that war should never be left in the hands of the generals. Having heard the Conservative spokesman for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) who preceded me, except for one very worthy suggestion about requiring our banks, through a change in the Bank Act, to assist in the financing of exports, which I think is a very excellent proposal, I would conclude from his remarks that financing is much too serious a matter to be left in the hands of the bankers.

Indeed, his speech was a very curious performance. I am tempted to ask him—indeed, I will ask him—what is the Conservative party's attitude toward this bill? Are they in favour of the Export Development Corporation, or not? Listening to the speaker who preceded me one would have thought that the only purpose of the bill was to provide assistance to large, foreign-owned corporations in Canada.

Let me inform the hon. member and others of his party that I would suspect that the farmers of Saskatchewan would not be entirely pleased to hear his comment since such a high percentage of financing last year was devoted to the export of agricultural products. I would further suggest that a lot of lumber workers in northern Ontario and British Columbia would not be entirely happy either, since a good part of the financial assistance devoted to exports of their products benefited both those provinces. In fact, there has been a rather significant distribution of benefits spread throughout every sector of the Canadian economy.

So what really is the position of the Conservative party? The hon. member was properly corrected by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) when he asserted that there were direct financial giveaways—which the New Democratic Party as a political party would have opposed—to certain corporations. It was made clear that there were no such direct giveaways.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are none in this bill.

Mr. Broadbent: As the hon. member says, not in the bill. What there was was a direct financing, if you like, of the purchasing power of exports to certain foreign countries.

I do not think that the Conservative party can have it both ways. On the one hand they say there should be no assistance given to purchases in an export industry if it is U.S.-owned. Indeed, they say no indirect financial assistance is to be given to a purchaser if the industry in Canada is foreign-owned. In other words, no assistance is to be given to virtually 90 per cent of those people in Canada who are employed in manufacturing industry.

Is the Conservative party willing to accept the consequences of that situation, since it would mean a reduction in jobs, certainly stifling the growth of those industries? If that is so, they would have logical consistency on their side if they opposed the bill. However, on the other hand, if they support the bill then I leave any rational man to his own conclusions concerning the consistency of the position taken by that party.

It seems to me that you can now well make the case—not entirely a strange case for members of the New Democratic Party to make—that we must do something to restructure the Canadian economy; that we must make a significant move to bring about a much larger percentage of wholly-owned Canadian enterprise in Canada, both public and private. However, in the interim it would seem to me to be absolutely ludricrous to argue that any assistance that we provide to other countries to enable them to purchase our products should discriminate as between an industry that is Canadian-owned and one that is foreign-owned, because all that this would do in the short run is to create unemployment. Or, as I said a minute ago, it certainly would not provide any expansion of job opportunities in the greater part of the Canadian economy. In effect, Mr. Speaker, I am saying that the Conservative party cannot be on both sides of the fence on this issue.

May I now turn to the general question of the export policy of the Canadian government. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said that there have been some encouraging developments in recent export trade which have tended to move favourably toward labour-intensive industries. He cited cases of some good sales being made of locomotives, of the products of chemical firms and pulp and paper plants, of railway boxcars, and so on. This is exactly the kind of shift that we need in Canada and it is precisely the kind of industrial development that has been neglected by the Liberal Party of Canada for decades. If the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce intends to encourage further development along these lines, it will certainly be of benefit to all Canadians.

I want to underline the point that the bill in itself is an extremely small part, almost an insignificant part, of what might be regarded a serious export or industrial policy on the part of the Canadian government. What is of greater importance is the kind of taxation policy that the government pursues in terms of favouring or not favouring industrial development as opposed to the export of raw materials. From the point of view of the New Democratic Party there is still much too high a percentage of exports in the resource sector, exports that are being encouraged not only by the Export Development Corporation but by other policies of this government. I refer to the export of unprocessed raw resources.

The taxation policy of this government, like the taxation policy of previous Liberal governments, still favours the export of these raw materials. This means that since manufacturing industry is much more labour-intensive and creates more jobs, in the long run our financial and taxation policies are still geared to the creation of fewer jobs in Canada than should be the case.

As a result of what is still a disproportionately low tax on the export of our resources, we do two things simultaneously. Firstly, we encourage Japanese, German and United States capital to come into the country and buy up our resources, paying, as I say, relatively low taxation; secondly, this massive infusion of capital in the resource sector drives up the value of the Canadian dollar, which in turn drives up the price of our manufactured goods. Thus they become more difficult to sell to countries such as West Germany, Japan and the United States.

Therefore, the kind of taxation policy favoured in the past and still favoured by the Liberal government—I have heard nothing to the contrary said by the Conservative party—is one that in the long run militates against the development of a significant export industry producing secondary goods in Canada. What we need, then, is a shift away from this low tax rate in the resource sector to bring it into equilibrium at least with taxation of manufactured goods in Canada.

We would benefit from that kind of shift. It would drive up automatically the cost of manufactured goods in Germany, Japan and the United States who would have to pay more for raw materials, and also it would have a positive effect on our own dollar value in the sense that it would keep our dollar at a lower value if it decreased consumption of our resources, and also would encourage more capital to go into the manufacturing sectors of the Canadian economy and therefore produce more jobs dependent on the domestic market and on exports.

I should like to say that in addition to the shift in taxation policy which would be required to encourage taxes, we must begin to insist, as a precondition for the export of raw materials to countries such as the United States and Japan, that they have to take as well a certain increasing percentage of our manufactured goods. This seems to be entirely reasonable because, as I said, the manufacture of goods provides more jobs per dollar. The Japanese and the Americans know this. We can say to them in straightforward terms that we think we should get a higher percentage of those jobs in Canada than we do at present. As a condition, before they can continue with a certain level of imports of raw materials from Canada, they would have to take an increasing percentage of our manufactured goods.

I think that in terms of the obvious need for our raw materials, amounting in some cases to the point of desperation in the United States, we are in a very strong bargaining position to make exactly this kind of precondition. I think, frankly, that that would do more to increase exports of manufactured goods from Canada and therefore would increase jobs in Canada than would the creation of ten Export Development Corporations in this country.

While I am on the point of the kind of preconditions that we should make to the export of raw materials to other industrial nations, I should also like to raise the question of the kinds of countervailing action which certain countries have taken, particularly the United States, with regard to Canada as a measure of discouraging our industrial development which would appear to them quite realistically to challenge one day their own industrial supremacy. I refer to the recent action of the United States in the Michelin tire case, in which situation a countervailing duty was imposed against that corporation.

I will not go into all the ramifications of the Michelin case, but one thing is quite clear. I think that that action by the United States contravened the GATT agreements, but also equally clearly, when the ruling comes down eventually, they will be able to bring forth a clause which allows them to opt out of whatever GATT decision is made because of previous economic policies established in their country prior to signing that agreement. There is that escape clause in GATT which the Americans will use, and I am sure the minister knows that very well.

The point I am raising is that the United States, vis-à-vis industrial countries around the world, is embarking on a major trade war policy. Now that Mr. Nixon, hopefully, has resolved that horrible war in Viet Nam he will involve the greater part of the energies of his government in this direction. Nowhere was this more clearly indicated than in the DISC legislation, and nowhere was the supine attitude of this government more clearly seen than in their reaction to the DISC program.

It seems to me that it is time the government, which during the course of this parliament has had it pretty soft, took some action. You will recall that during the concluding weeks of the last parliament scarcely a day went by in parliament without an expression of concern from members of the opposition regarding the effects of the DISC program. So far littl e has been said on either side of the House about the effects of this. I for one am quite concerned. There must now be established in Canada, or at least affecting Canada, some 1,500 or so DISC corporations exporting into our country. I know that in the automotive industry alone three companies have set up DISC and there are countless others in all other sectors of our economy.

The point I would like to make is that if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce takes seriously his role as minister of encouraging our exports, he must also take seriously his role as minister of being concerned with the export policy of other countries into Canada. Specifically, in this instance I think the government is obliged, first, to make known the list of DISC companies exporting into Canada and, second, to have the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce do a case study on each of them to show how the companies benefiting by this export subsidy provided by the United States in terms of their sales relate this to their export price in Canada.

Furthermore, in each and every case where a company is exporting into Canada under DISC at a price lower than before, thus taking advantage of the DISC subsidy offered by the United States, the government of Canada should levy a countervailing duty. This seems to me to be entirely reasonable and to entirely fit the logic of the Michelin decision in the United States. If they regard the Michelin financial assistance provided by the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia as a form of export subsidy, to understate it by about 1,000 per cent, the DISC program is exactly the same kind of program in the United States.

To protect our domestic industry both in terms of production for the domestic market and for the export market, I say that the government of Canada must now levy a countervailing duty on all of those exports coming under DISC where DISC has had an effect on improving their competitive position in the Canadian market.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House may I clarify the business of the House for Monday?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Faulkner: The first item of business on Monday will be the report stage of the Unemployment Insurance Act amendment, Bill C-124. On completion of that item we will proceed with supply.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

TRANSPORTATION

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL POLICY TO FACILITATE INTERPROVINCIAL TRUCKING

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the development of a national policy with regard to truck transportation that will allow for the movement of goods from one province of Canada to other provinces of Canada without trucking firms and manufacturers facing prohibitive costs associated with licensing, gas taxes and permits which could be eliminated through the issuing of federal licences for interprovincial carriers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since it is the first opportunity I have had to address this House, may I congratulate you and Mr. Deputy Speaker on your election to office and pay tribute to the manner in which you preside over our deliberations. May I also take this opportunity to thank the Clerk and the Deputy Clerk for the consideration shown me as a new member. Being a western member, you no doubt recognize that you will face no difficulty so far as I am concerned since I follow our tradition of being even-tempered and easy to handle.

The motion which I have presented deals with a problem that faces the trucking industry all across Canada and which, despite good intentions in the past, is still unresolved in practical terms. The basis of the motion is that there is clearly a need in Canada for a trans-Canada licence, that is, for a licence that allows trucks to travel from the Altantic to the Pacific with the payment of only one fee which would be distributed among the provinces.

That there is need for such a licence can be proven very simply by talking to any person who has been actively engaged in any manufacturing, agricultural or trucking enterprise that deals in interprovincial shipments. As a private citizen involved in a small manufacturing company in Alberta, wholly Canadian-owned, which purchases all Canadian components and is trying to compete in the markets of central Canada, it has been my experience that we have been unable to use an all Canadian route. Why, you ask, are we forced to head for the nearest exit point from Canada to the United States, travel for over 2,000 miles along American highways and only enter Canada again when we come to the Michigan-Ontario border? It is because of the very basic fact that each province has its own set of varying regulations and each demands payment of its own licences, gas taxes or permits, which again are in no way uniform and present the trucker with a maze of red tape.

To be more specific for the benefit of those who have not been subjected to the ridiculous complexities that truckers are faced with, here is one example of what the trucker has to deal with. At the present time, if we take the maximum length of a semi-trailer, we find there are seven different maximum lengths in the ten provinces. If we take the maximum height allowed, we find that there are four different heights in the ten provinces. If we take the maximum weight of a two-axle truck and one two-axle full trailer, we find that there are six different categories. And if you decide to drive a two-axle truck with full trailer across Canada, you had better stay home. There are five different categories and in four of the provinces these vehicles are not allowed to operate. How could you, Mr. Speaker, operate under such conditions?

A trans-Canada licence would remove these disadvantages. Our truckers would be spending their money in Canada, they would be using Canadian gas, Canadian restaurants and, in short, Canadian services of all descriptions. Having our truckers use our routes would stimulate employment in many of the communities through which they would be travelling. In total, there would be a positive economic gain to the provinces that is now lost to the United States.

The varying regulations and fees lay a heavy burden on the trucking industry, a burden that is passed back to the manufacturers and primary producer and is passed on to the consumer. It is unfair that only one sector of the transportation industry is faced with these disabilities. How can these private firms be expected to compete with the heavily government-supported railways and airlines? How can they compete with trains and planes that have only one set of regulations countrywide? The simple fact is that in large measure they cannot.

If they were able to highball their way unimpeded along the trans-Canada highway they could deliver many goods faster and in better condition. For those who doubt my words may I quote this specific instance. A carload of cattle, a perishable product and one that should be transported under the most humane conditions, is generally transported between five to eight days by rail. When carried by truck, the same cattle can leave Alberta and arrive in the feed lots of Ontario in no more than 60 hours after they leave the ranch.

The regulations mean that trucks must compete with government-supported carriers. Only a uniform set of regulations and a single licence valid all along the trans-Canada highway can compensate these firms and give them a chance. The reason the trans-Canada highway is mentioned in particular is that this is the longest paved highway in the world, which links us together from sea to sea and was constructed with a total input of more than $900 million of federal funds, funds which should not only be for the benefit of the Canadian and American tourist but for the Canadian consumer as well, for the families whose income is used in buying goods to live on, who may not have enough money to travel but whose tax dollars none the less helped construct this road.

Research that I have undertaken has brought forth the fact that there have been high-sounding phrases presented on this subject, but absolutely, positively, from a practical man's point of view, no action. What is the interpretation to be placed on the following statements found in the National Transportation Act:

The national transportation policy as set out in the National Transportation Act is intended to apply to all modes of transportation in Canada within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

The assignment of the federal jurisdiction over motor carriers to provincial boards does not provide for implementation of the national transportation policy.

Motor carriers cannot be considered in isolation but rather must be viewed as a part of the total transportation system. Motor carriers often complement or provide suitable substitutes for other modes of transport. These relationships demand a regulatory structure that will foster the achievement of the objectives of the National Transportation Act without prejudice to any one part of the transportation system.

• (1610)

What is the interpretation to be placed upon this section of the National Transportation Act? It is highly desirable that uniformity of regulation be achieved for interprovincial motor carriers and, if possible, for all motor carriers operating in Canada whether intraprovincial or extraprovincial. Uniformity is lacking under the present system of 12 jurisdictions and extraprovincial motor carriers must deal with several sets of regulations on such important matters as rates, operating authorities and documentation. Dissatisfaction with this lack of uniformity is shared by carriers, shippers and federal and provincial authorities. Surely, no other way is possible than a trans-Canada licence which has a set fee, which has standardized regulations and which is valid in any of our ten provinces. This must be brought into being.

I have said that there is dissatisfaction shared by carriers, shippers and federal and provincial authorities alike. As a shipper in private life, and as a member of the federal parliament, I have spoken of the dissatisfaction that exists and I urge that action now take the place of words. Is action such as bringing a number of different governments into agreement on a common policy impossible? It is not. And for once we can look to countries other than the United States for a most effective example. The states of western Europe, Belgium, the federal republic of Germany, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, France and Italy, who will be joined this year by Denmark, Norway, Great Britain and Ireland, which have not been noted until recently for being compatible, have developed a joint transportation policy. This common transportation policy of the countries of Europe, as stated in the report of the conference of Canadian national transportation policy, May 23-25, 1972, is as follows:

> The common transport policy is the means of pursuing the aims of the European Economic Community in the transport sector, both on the consumer and on the producer side; that is, to amalgamate the national economies and raise the standard of living.

Surely, if these diverse countries can agree upon and implement such a common transportation policy, the provinces of Canada, under the leadership of an enlightened federal government, can do no less. Mr. Speaker, until now, such leadership in practical terms, that is, in terms of allowing shippers to obtain a Trans-Canada licence such as has been mentioned, has not been provided.

The motion urges that such action be undertaken. It is my sincere hope that it will be the pleasure of this House to recommend to the government that a dominion-provincial conference be called that will undertake to arrive at the terms by which a trucking firm can obtain one licence valid throughout all of Canada, that will end the red tape of the multitude of regulations and allow an aggressively Canadian industry to develop. The trucking industry in 1970 had a revenue of $1,504 million, fully a third of which was from interprovincial operations. Surely an industry of this magnitude must be aided, rather than impeded, by government regulations.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) made several recommendations as he finished reading his written address. May I suggest to him that such federal-provincial meetings have been taking place for a number of years. May I also suggest that prior to the Common Market in Europe, the countries concerned held various meetings and came to an understanding on the question.

The hon. member's suggestion has merit but it is far from new. Back in 1954 federal-provincial meetings took place because of the federal government's concern at that time. Many meetings have taken place since then, and it is my intention to enumerate them. I might suggest, Mr. Speaker, that even when the Conservatives were in power in 1962—government with the largest majority ever to hold power in this country—at no time did such meetings take place: they only bring the matter up at times like this. But I should like to bring to the attention of the House the continuity of meetings exactly on this problem.

In answer to the motion before the House I should like to point out that with the exception of permits—I emphasize the word "permits"—the matters raised in the motion come under the jurisdiction of the provinces. With respect to vehicle licensing and other operating matters the federal government is performing a co-ordinating role with the provinces in an attempt to assist the development of uniformity in these areas. With respect to permits for extraprovincial motor carriers, this activity is currently assigned to the provinces under authority of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act and permits are issued either without charge or at a nominal filing fee.

With regard to that part of the motion which deals with permits, I might say that the federal government has delegated provincial governments to look after that matter. Of course, trucking firms and manufacturers are concerned about the high costs involved but, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the chronology of events concerning motor carrier regulation. In February, 1954, the first meeting took place and a decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council was to the effect that all extraprovincial motor carrier undertakings came under federal jurisdiction. A few months later, in June, 1954, the Motor Vehicle Transport Act was passed which assigned authority to regulate extraprovincial motor carriers to provincial highway transport boards. This was a request to the provinces to act on behalf of the federal government. From 1954 to 1967 no meetings took place. If we want to talk about leadership, Mr. Speaker, we should talk about leadership at the time these meetings bogged down.

In 1967, this government started to hold meetings with the provinces again and the National Transportation Act and its policy was passed. Part III of the National Transportation Act dealt with the regulation of extraprovincial carriers. In December, 1969, the first meeting of federal and provincial ministers took place on the subject of implementing part III of the National Transportation Act. There was a series of meetings, Mr. Speaker.

• (1620)

What came out of the meeting of 1969 was a proclamation relating to part III. As well, there was a joint federal-provincial study on regulations and a full exchange of views on the problems of implementing part III. In May, 1970, just two years ago last spring, part III was proclaimed. It was provided that no motor carriers were exempt from the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act.

In October, 1970, an outline of the regulations was sent to all provinces by the CTC. In November, 1970, there was a meeting of federal and provincial officials to discuss the outline of regulations. That meeting, apparently, did not work out very well. In April, 1971, the federal implementation plan for part III was sent to all provinces by the minister. In May, 1971, there was the second meeting of ministers on the topic of the implementation of part III. A federal-provincial advisory council on motor carrier regulations was created to draft a comprehensive set of uniform regulations and to advise on a means of implementing part III of the act. Last spring, in April, 1972, the report of the advisory council was submitted to the ministers concerned. According to the press release of May, 1971, there is a requirement for the ministers to reconvene within six months of that date to reconsider the report. This third meeting was not held owing to the federal election taking place in the fall.

At present the federal department officials plan to be in touch once again with the provinces for informal discussions. There will be a further exchange of views, and discussions pertinent to this matter will take place. After these discussions have taken place we hope that another federal-provincial meeting will convene. I agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt); the sooner it takes place, the sooner will the farmers, manufacturers and people of Canada benefit, because these matters are vitally important to all Canadians.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) for bringing forward this important subject. I am amazed at his knowledge of the subject and his interest in it. I was also interested in the parliamentary secretary's extensive knowledge of the subject. In view of the knowledge of hon. members on both sides of the House, perhaps we can do something today that would have been quite easy to do in the late 1950s when there was a court case on this subject. If I am not mistaken, the Supreme Court in 1954 or 1955 held that the subject the hon. member deals with in his motion is one of federal jurisdiction. The federal government promptly returned that jurisdiction to the provinces.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Peters: I believe we arranged to bring road transportation under provincial jurisdiction under part III of the act. As the parliamentary secretary has said, we have not been able to finalize negotiations with the provinces following that decision of the Supreme Court, so we are in exactly the same position as we have been on a number of occasions and it does not appear that we are really disposed to settle the problem at this time.

I think hon. members will agree that one of our greatest problems in Canada stems from our inability to administer properly or originate laws that will provide for reasonable transportation facilities. These remarks hold true in the case of the railways. There we face problems as a result of debts that Canadian National Railways have contracted. These work to the disadvantage of all Canadians, especially in the establishment of reasonably cheap railway operations. In the case of the airlines, although the CTC has authority we are not able to work out a domestic tariff structure that compares with international fares. It amazes me that you can fly to Europe more cheaply than you can to Vancouver. The fare from here to Vancouver is unrealistic and is not in the Canadian interest.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

There are several constitutional stumbling-blocks in the way of transcontinental trucking, a matter which will probably be discussed before the Canadian Transport Commission. Part of the problem stems from provincial legislation relating to PCV licences. I am always surprised at the way in which PCV licences are awarded. Take the case of the farmer who cannot farm in winter but who has a truck equipped to haul gravel from one place to another: the department of highways of the province of Ontario often will not grant him a PCV licence because it claims there are already too many such truckers in the community. No one argues that the man has a truck, that he knows how to drive and is equipped to haul gravel; the department just decides on the number of PCV licences to be issued. So it goes all down the line. The man who has a PCV licence for moving hay cannot bring back furniture for his neighbour because he has no PCV licence for doing so.

From my area of northern Ontario, trucks haul Rexwood products to southern markets in Canada and the United States. But those trucks must come back empty. So the trucker must charge enough to cover his costs both for carrying the load and for coming back empty. That would not happen if he had an "A" class PCV licence, but "A" class PCV licences are pretty difficult to come by in Ontario. You need to know somebody in the cabinet, have a highly placed friend or a lot of money with which to buy one. Really only the railways can afford to buy them. You will find that all the railways own their own trucking facilities. These trucking concerns are among the largest in Canada. The hon. member who proposed this motion should remember that we ought to consider the relationship between tariffs charged by the railways and tariffs that trucking concerns owned by the railways are able to charge. We must also consider that in many areas bus transportation is being provided. That matter should enter into consideration.

There is something else that one ought to consider when examining the question of trucks driving from one province to another. I live near the border, and it is not unusual to see on our roads many cars from out of the province. When cars enter our province and the neighbouring province they can stay for a number of months without changing their licence. On the other hand, as soon as a truck crosses the provincial boundary, no matter what it is carrying and whether it is equipped with a PCV licence, it will be stopped if it does not display the motor vehicle licence issued by the province in which it is then operating.

Truckers over the years have been able to establish a most enviable record of safety. All who drive on the highways of Canada must be aware that most large and responsible trucking companies have been able to build up an enviable record of safety and courtesy on the road. It is not the trucker who fails to dim his lights, give way and retain a very low speed when it is possible to do otherwise. In fact, the trucker has established a remarkable record. As more and more transporting is done by highway there are more trucks using the highways, particularly the trans-Canada highway both north and south.

I live on the north route of the trans-Canada highway. In the winter most truckers travel that route. In summer many take the scenic route along the north shore of Lake Superior, but that is a very difficult route in the winter.

• (1630)

Truckers form a large percentage of highway traffic. It is necessary to build additional facilities for them. In my opinion, this is good. In northern Ontario most hills have an extra, paved lane for slow-moving traffic. Ontario is very frugal. Other provinces pave the shoulders of the roads; Ontario paves only the portion for driving. Paving of a slow-moving lane on hills is a necessary expense.

This raises the problem of how the provinces should be compensated. I am sure the trucking industry would give consideration to this. The industry is well aware there are expenses for operating and maintaining any type of transportation facility. Obviously, there must be some way in which the provinces can be remunerated. The responsibility of the motoring public other than truckers will be increased if licence and gas fees are removed. The trucking industry is well aware it will have to make some kind of contribution on a mileage basis or in some other way. When some national trucking companies reach a border they must put on a new licence plate. In many cases they have to change or increase their insurance in order to travel in a different province. This varies according to the type of commodity being transported. This fact must be taken into consideration.

For many years we have been interested in the problems of national transportation. Transportation within the provinces has been highly restrictive. It has created undue difficulties in my part of the country because of the licensing procedures. We have been very concerned about PCV licences in their various forms. I recently attended a meeting in northern Ontario where the matter of transportation was discussed with provincial officials. Most communities were represented. We found that there was a considerable difference between the needs of southern Ontario and northern Ontario. In northern Ontario, the recommendation was that there be no PCV licence. If somebody had a truck and wanted to move a commodity from one place to another, it was felt they should be able to do so. If they could transport something on the way back, that would obviously cut down the cost for shippers in either direction. In southern Ontario, they reasoned for retention of some form of licence in order to ensure that places that were not considered economic for the companies would still be given service.

Everyone in the trucking industry in Ontario wants to haul goods between Hamilton and Toronto. They will haul goods between other places, but they want to haul them mostly between Hamilton and Toronto. They will pay a considerable sum for a licence to haul to London or Windsor, but they will not pay very much to service an area such as London to Stratford. This example was quoted by the Ontario minister. He stated that it was difficult to get goods moved from London to Stratford, or vice versa. I think that is probably not quite true. It is a surprising thing, but people who learn to drive trucks want to do so when they are four years old. If you ask a young, aggressive boy what he wants to be, he will not say a lawyer, doctor or politician; he will want to be a truck driver. If an aggressive young person were able to borrow money from Household Finance or IAC to buy a truck to move commodities from London to Stratford and vice versa, I am sure there would be no more problem.

When talking about the total transportation facility in Canada consideration must be given to restrictions inside the provinces. In my opinion, the Conservatives should be violently opposed to restrictions on PCV licences.. Without a doubt, free enterprisers are the most socialist of people. They want the monopoly, the socialistic life and they want the country to supply all the money possible for their socialist venture. I think a free enterpriser should get rid of all PCV licences. Let there be free trade. Let the guy who can drive the truck at the lowest cost haul the goods.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Is that the policy of your party?

Mr. Peters: I suggest it should be the policy of the Conservative party. I see no reason why there should not be some competition in this field. There should be the ability to transport goods across the nation by highway transportation the same as with air and rail. We should have licences to provide for these facilities.

It may be as it is in the United States. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) mentioned that he travels as far as possible in the United States before getting back into Canada. I am sure he was not talking about some of the roads in the United States. If he were taking a trip to New York he would not travel on the toll road. I made that trip one time in a Volkswagen. I found that the cost of the tolls was much higher than the cost of operating the vehicle. It was approximately $5 or $6 more than the cost of the gasoline required to operate the vehicle. I am sure he would find that in the United States in many cases they have been able to build highways at a profit on the old capitalist principle that he who uses the facility should pay for it.

I am sure we could work out for our national highway some arrangement which would allow maintenance of that route through national licensing and from other charges a trucker might be willing to bear in a fairly uniform way. We supported this idea at the time of the passing of part III of the CTC legislation and I am sure we would support its implementation. We cannot pass on to the hon. member for Lethbridge the sins of his forefathers in this place, though it is true that some of the fault might be on his side of the House. Today is a new day and this problem has yet to be solved.

Highway transportation is of growing importance to the unity of Canada. We should give consideration to making this form of transportation as easy as possible and removing restrictions which, I believe, truckers would find unenforceable in any case if they took the question to the courts. We should remove those restrictions as soon as possible in an effort to establish a reasonably economic and competitive transportation facility. This would assist us to utilize to the full extent the other forms of transportation which now, apparently, are setting the rate structure for all types of transportation in Canada.

Interprovincial Transportation

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this notice of motion I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) on a very knowledgeable speech on transportation in Canada and on the trucking industry in particular. It was a speech this House sorely needed. He delivered it well and appeared to know a good deal about the subject.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay). He acknowledged there was a problem but tried to become political and backed away from proposing a solution. In the course of some political manoeuvres he blamed us on this side for not having found a remedy. It is true the Conservative party was in power from 1957 to 1963. I apologize and express regret that we could not create a Utopia in every situation during that period. We tried, but we were not able to cover this particular area.

Why was this the case? Many hon. members have drawn attention to the difficulties caused by the British North America Act and the great need which exists for its revision. In 1954, this parliament passed the Motor Vehicle Transport Act which in essence ran contrary to the British North America Act. Looking back, it is easy to see which one was the best. The Supreme Court ruling that interprovincial trucking was the responsibility of the federal government was certainly a correct one; it is only right we should exercise jurisdiction over the delivery of food and other commodities across Canada.

The spokesman for the New Democratic Party talked about regulations affecting the trucking industry in recent years—regulations sanctioned by this House with regard to hours of work, and so on. These have greatly increased the cost of trucking but I am sure the NDP will support them. That is why I asked the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) whether he was announcing government policy or his own. Certainly the regulations we have imposed upon the trucking industry have made a contribution to the higher cost of the transportation of agricultural produce in this country. I notice the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) is in her place and I point this out to her. Certainly it is more difficult to get New Brunswick potatoes into other parts of Canada than it is to get them into the United States. It is difficult to get Alberta cattle into the feed lots in Ontario.

In my opinion, the Motor Vehicle Transport Act passed in 1954 was put forward by a government bereft of ideas and anticipating its inevitable death, death which finally took place in 1957. An administration bereft of ideas merely shelved the problem and passed the burden on to the provinces. What was the difference between conditions in Canada then and now? For the benefit of the hon. member for St. Boniface, let me say that we had a different transportation act. No major change could be made without the minister's approval. Today we have a transportation act, passed in 1967, which more or less takes the minister and the government out of the regulatory field connected with the transportation system. Hon. members will recall that every now and then in recent years the Minister of Transport has risen in this House to say that he will pass a message to the Canadian Transport Commission, but that there is little he can do because he has no authority; the CTC is the final authority.

[Mr. Peters.]

In the old days, freight rates were rigidly controlled. In fact, under the government of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) freight rates were rolled back. We brought in the Freight Rates Reduction Act which rolled back freight rates to a large extent—froze them, in fact, for a number of years. What effect did this have on the trucking industry? It restricted the growth of interprovincial trucking because freight rates were so low that only the railways could haul goods at those charges.

Since that time the railways have been granted about 15 rate increases. The CTC has allowed rates to go sky high and we have seen a gigantic expansion of the trucking industry as it moves into competition with the railroads. I believe this is good for the country. The whole concept of the National Transportation Act was that the basis should be competition. In fact, the preamble to the act itself states that competition should be the theme. Competition cannot be the theme as long as part III of the National Transportation Act remains unproclaimed. It is not good enough for the government to say this is all in the hands of the CTC. It is not in the hands of the CTC.

Why has part III not been proclaimed? Part III relates specifically to the notice of motion which is before us; it deals specifically with the trucking industry. It has not been proclaimed because the provinces have not wanted to agree to it. We hear much talk about how fragile our national unity really is. Yes, it is really fragile because no province has demonstrated a desire to create the one economic community which was envisaged back in 1867. We envisaged, then, one single economic community. That is not the case today and the reason is outlined in the notice of motion we are debating. We do not have free movement of goods.

It is true that the railroads can run across provincial boundaries without even slowing up, and that Air Canada and CP Air fly across the country without paying any attention to boundary lines. However, the trucking industry, which is the only real competitor in respect of l.c.l. freight and perishable commodities, cannot compete with the other two modes of transportation because of the desire of the provinces not to reach agreement. Each province is selfishly guarding its own domain. Each province thinks that its portion is of greater importance than the whole of Canada. This is completely wrong.

I do not think the government has done enough to get the provinces together. Certainly part III of the act should be proclaimed. We are here in this House with a minority position and no one knows just how long this government will last. I am sure it wants to show a spirit of co-operation because of its position. The very least it should do is allow this whole matter to be sent to the committee on transportation. That committee could then hear evidence from the trucking industry, the provinces and, the people producing food for consumption in Canada such as representatives of the vegetable and livestock industry, in order to see whether an agreement could be reached in respect of standardization of load limits, vehicle height and licensing. This might provide a cheaper means of getting our commodities to market.

Last fall a flourishing vegetables industry in my constituency found a market for carrots in Michigan. It shipped several thousand tons of carrots from Brooks, Alberta, to the state of Michigan using United States trucks because those are the only trucks that can haul such a shipment economically. Our trucks cannot use the trans-Canada highway for such shipments because they must cross provincial boundaries where there are restrictions in respect of licensing, load limit, vehicle height, and so on. Even across the flat prairie the powers that be are worried about the height of vehicles. It is a sin to allow this sort of thing to be continued in a country which from time to time expresses a desire for unity. I suggest this is just talk.

I sincerely urge that this matter be referred to the committee, if for no other reason than to air the question publicly and bring pressure on provincial governments to reach agreement on standardization. Perhaps then consumers would realize that some of our distribution costs are unnecessarily causing an increase in the price of food. If we talk out this motion, and I realize it will be talked out by five o'clock if I do not soon conclude my remarks, it will die and be forgotten forever. If we send it to the committee and this House happens to remain in existence for another month or two, the whole matter can be aired and public pressure can be built up. Following that perhaps we could get part III of the National Transportation Act proclaimed and then make greater use of the trans-Canada highway.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I have a couple of minutes more.

An hon. Member: You are talking it out.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, I am not. When the trans-Canada highway was built back in 1949, the federal government contributed as much as 90 per cent of the cost in some areas. It should have stated at that time that this was to be a turnpike on which produce was to move freely. There was never unity in the European Common Market, but the powers realized that in order to have one economic unit they would have to adopt a common licensing system for the movement of goods between countries. Such a common licensing bureau was established and 120 lorries, as they call them, were licensed to truck goods over certain roads. They are not licensed to deliver off the roads but to travel the major roads throughout the European Common Market. This is a sensible approach and perhaps one we should adopt.

I sincerely urge the parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Guay) to allow this matter to be referred to the committee. Perhaps some new members could be put to work on that committee where this question could be aired thoroughly. Witnesses from the trucking industry as well as consumers could appear. Perhaps in that way we could speed up the day when the provinces will agree to a standardization which would in the long run lower the cost of Canadian goods to the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is very good to have an opportunity to speak on the motion of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt) concerning the licensing of interprovincial trucks. It is interesting to note, as we look around the House this afternoon, that the hon. members who have spoken on this matter are from western Canada, being hon. members from Alberta, Manitoba and northern Ontario. Of course, we have also heard from the parliamentary secretary from St. Boniface.

It is appropriate that we are discussing this motion at this time because in the throne speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General there is mention of a proposed series of meetings to take place this year between federal and provincial governments relating to freight rates. It is proposed that these government representatives will discuss and study the effects of freight rates on the economy both in respect of consumer prices and economic development. It seems to me it would not be very hard to tell—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems to me it is five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Re: 1976 Olympic Games

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Following upon our previous discussions, I wish to inform you that the City of Montreal and the Organizing Committee for the Olympic Games have assured the Government of Quebec that the revenues received by COJO will cover its expenses and that no direct contribution will be required from the federal government provided that the federal government acts upon the request of the City of Montreal and COJO concerning the special issues of stamps and coins during the period indicated by them.

I understand, moreover, that the federal government is studying in concert with my government, the City of Montreal and COJO the best way of acting upon the request of the City of Montreal and COJO concerning an annual lottery.

Taking into account the benefits and advantages that the holding of the Olympic Games will produce not only for the City of Montreal itself but also for all of Quebec as well as all of Canada, the government of Quebec gives its support to the holding of these games provided the federal government accedes to the requests of the City and COJO that I have just mentioned.

The government of Quebec agrees that the federal government will not have to assume the interim financing of costs relative to the 1976 Olympic Games throughout the period leading up to and including the holding of the Games.

Provided that the federal government agrees to remit to COJO the net proceeds of the sale of special Olympic coins and stamps, the government of Quebec also agrees that the federal government will not be called upon to make any special contribution towards the payment of any or all expenses incurred in connection with the Olympic Games of 1976 and which would be in excess of the net proceeds mentioned above and of revenues from other sources.

Yours truly,
Robert Bourassa
Prime Minister of Quebec

The Right Honourable
Pierre Elliott Trudeau
Prime Minister of Canada
Parliament Buildings
Ottawa, Ontario
Mr. Prime Minister:

Confirming repeated discussions, I am pleased to inform you again that the City of Montreal intends to stand upon the position it adopted from the outset of efforts which resulted in obtaining for Canada the honour of hosting the world's best young athletes in Montreal to participate in the 21st Olympic Games. Indeed, the methods and programs of self-financing already submitted to federal government analysts and improved upon since our meetings in November enable us to affirm that the City of Montreal will not have to call on the federal government for a contribution from federal funds for the purpose of the Olympic Games.

An understanding has been reached to the effect that the methods and programs for self-financing approved by the federal government as requested in letters addressed to you by His Excellency Mr. C. O. Roger Rousseau, General Commissioner for the Olympic Games, will benefit by effective co-operation from the federal government for their best possible implementation.

The programs already submitted are in no way final as, once the self-financing principle has been accepted by your government through appropriate legislation, all abilities will be welcome to co-operate actively to further improvement of methods and programs conceived, to date, for the purpose of illustration. Implementation of the various programs will be spread over a period adequate to permit covering authorized expenditures.

Insofar as the national lottery is concerned, I understand that your officials and those of the Quebec government are trying to work out the best solution and I have no doubt of their success and of remittance of proceeds to COJO.

Provided, of course, the federal government agrees to remit to COJO the net proceeds from sales of special Olympic coins and stamps, and with the support of the Quebec government, which is well aware of the benefits and advantages involved in holding the Olympic Games and of the healthy stimulant these games will represent for young people throughout the country, both before they actually take place and for a long time after, the City of Montreal assures the federal government that it will not be called upon to grant special direct support for the holding of the 1976 Olympic Games or to assume interim financing.

Any surplus of income over expenditures will, under control of the City of Montreal, go into a separate special fund, the income derived therefrom to be used exclusively for the promotion of amateur sports and the training of young athletes.

I am firmly convinced that these considerations will allow you to make a proper assessment of the City of Montreal's stand relative to the financing of the 1976 Olympic Games.

I have the honour to remain,
Yours respectfully,
Jean Drapeau
Mayor of Montreal

Re: 1976 Olympic Games

Sir:

Further to our previous conversations, I wish to inform you that COJO has given the Government of Canada the assurance that revenue collected by COJO will cover expenses and that no direct contribution will be required of the federal government provided the federal government approves the requests submitted by the City of Montreal and COJO for the issue of special series of stamps and coins during a specific period.

I realize also that the federal government is engaged in consultations with the Government of the Province of Quebec, the City of Montreal and COJO in seeking the best course of action in connection with the request made by the City and COJO for a national lottery.

COJO agres that the federal government will not have to provide for the interim financing of costs incurred in relation to the 1976 Olympic Games pending the beginning of the games and until their completion.

Provided the Government of Canada agrees to pay COJO the net revenue from the sale of special olympic coins and stamps, COJO also agrees that the federal government will not be called upon to pay special contributions to meet any expenses incurred in connection with the 1976 Olympic Games and in excess of the net revenue mentioned above and income from other sources.

Yours sincerely,

AIR TRANSPORT

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the difficulties arising from the new regulations regarding air charter travel and the immediate effect upon the Canadian public. Inasmuch as the new advance booking charter regulations will have the net effect of making air charter travel more expensive, more difficult and discriminatory for large numbers of the travelling public, while at the same time failing to provide adequate safeguards for passenger funds, together with the prospect of driving a significant part of the air charter business out of the country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That the new regulations governing air charter travel be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and that the committee be empowered to call as witnesses representatives of the airlines, the Canadian Transport Commission, members of the travelling public, officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY FOR OFFICE BUILDING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the widespread opposition to a 20-storey complex in St. John's, Newfoundland, of which Canadian National is to be the principal tenant, and of the transfer of Canadian National property to the St. John's Development Corporation. This property, owned by the Canadian National, should be publicly advertised, with tenders called for its purchase.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. He is now submitting argument in support of his motion. The hon. member cannot do that. According to the practice relating to Standing Order 43, the hon. member should indicate what the motion is that he proposes for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Carter: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to have the CN defer all future negotiations or actions in this case; that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport; and that all agreements, correspondence and related material be tabled in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

Oil Supplies

ENERGY

OIL SUPPLIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I desire to introduce a motion arising out of the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the House last Friday to the effect that he would welcome an opportunity to discuss the whole matter of the availability of oil supplies in Canada. We would not ask for a debate on this motion, and if the government wants to leave the matter open until tomorrow I would be glad to move it again then.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the annual report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for consideration and report.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We on this side would be prepared to agree to the motion if the House generally would agree to pass it without debate at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I will ascertain first whether there is unanimous consent. The motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands requires unanimous consent under Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

• (1410)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be unanimity. I will therefore put the motion. Mr. Douglas seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That the annual report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for consideration and report.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEBT—INTEREST COST PER CAPITA

Question No. 37—Mr. Mather:

What was the interest cost of the national debt on a per capita basis in (a) 1968 (b) 1971?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Since the Public Accounts of Canada are based on a fiscal year ending on March 31 of each year, it is not possible to derive the cost of the national debt on a per capita basis in any given calendar year. The gross interest and related costs of the national debt on a per capita basis for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1969, and March 31, 1972, were $70.64 and $92.23 respectively. A major portion of these costs arises from the government's role as a financial intermediary extending loans to Crown corporations, agencies and departmental loan programs. These activities generate a return on investments which is recorded as a budgetary receipt. Although not netted out against public debt charges, the return on investments may be considered as an offset to the gross cost of the national debt. The per capita costs of the national debt, net of the return on investments, for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1969, and March 31, 1972, were $37.46 and $40.22 respectively.

3. Will these computer centres be established in existing office accommodations in either federal buildings or leased space that presently exists or will there be new arrangements for the establishment of these centres and, if so, in each instance (a) have the arrangements been made (b) will the centres be located in federal buildings and, if not (i) have lease agreements already been entered into by the Department of National Revenue for rented space (ii) what is the additional cost in dollars annually for this leased space?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Yes, for headquarters, on May 25, 1972.

2. INSTALLATION OF SEWAGE LINES AND TREATMENT FACILITIES IN EASTERN PASSAGE, HALIFAX COUNTY, N.S.

Question No. 146—Mr. Forrestall:

Is it the intention of the government to proceed under current arrangements with the Province of Nova Scotia for the installation of sewage lines and treatment facilities in Eastern Passage, Halifax County, Nova Scotia?

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary of Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows: The current Special Areas and Highways Agreement with the Province of Nova Scotia does not provide for the installation of sewage lines and treatment facilities to service the Eastern Passage area. The inclusion of such a project in a future agreement will depend essentially on provincial priorities. Discussions between the Department and provincial authorities about this matter are in progress.

Is it the intention of the government to release the Bryden Report and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Bryden Report was commissioned on the understanding that it was to be an internal, confidential document for the use of the Minister through whom the Public Service Staff Relations Board reports to parliament. It is for this reason that the Bryden Report has not been released. When the proposals relating to changes to be made in the Public Service Staff Relations Act are presented to the House, however, the government will then review the situation to determine whether it would be in the public interest to publish the report.

Have surveys been conducted to determine the need for bilingual facilities at Canada Customs Offices at the Ports of Lansdowne and Johnstown, Ontario, by the Department of National Revenue and, if so (a) on what dates were such surveys taken (b) by whom were such surveys taken (c) by what methods were such surveys conducted (d) what were the specific results of such surveys?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Yes. (a) (b) (c) and (d). Please see following statement.

August, 1969	Management of Central Ontario Region.	In accordance with Section 10 of the Official Languages Act a study was made of the English–French make up of the geographical areas served by the international bridges at Prescott and Lansdowne, using the 1961 Census figures.	The estimated demand for service in the French language warranted the provision of bilingual resources.
September 1969 to March, 1970	Uniformed Examining Officers	The number of occasions they were addressed in French or specifically requested by the travelling public to provide service in French.	Inconclusive due to the long standing habit of the travelling public only dealing with our officers in English at these centres.
April, 1970	District Collector (Ottawa)	A statistical study of returning Canadians based on the number of vehicles and passengers and the linguistic composition of the geographic areas served by the two bridges.	Extrapolation of this data indicates a significant number of French-speaking Canadians use the bridges at Prescott and Lansdowne annually.
October, 1971	District Collector (Ottawa)	Analysis of sampling of Exemption Entries (E. 24).	Of the total number of exemptions filed by returning Canadian Residents at Lansdowne and Prescott, approximately 25% were estimated to have been presented by French-speaking Canadians.

A total of 650,000 colour brochures were printed for distribution in 1971 and 1972 at an approximate cost of $10,555. In addition, 350,000 inserts were printed in 1972 with the current schedule and fares. This cost $2,065. There are four (4) permanent billboards advertising the Bluenose, two in Maine at Kittery and Brewer, and two in Nova Scotia at Annapolis Royal and Italy Cross. In addition, C.N. was able to obtain the use of temporary billboards in Maine for the promotion of the Bluenose service as part of an agreement with a national U.S. magazine. Total cost of the Bluenose service for this additional advertising was $50.

ENERGY

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBLE AGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether any agreement has been reached with the United States in the one area that the minister has said is under discussion, that is, assurance of a supply of oil to eastern Canada in the event of eastern Canada's sources of offshore oil being cut off?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, no agreement has been reached. At the moment we are looking forward to a renewed discussion of this question by officials.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister what the difficulty is in reaching an agreement and whether, before making any such agreement, the United States authorities are seeking a specific assurance with regard to a continued supply of oil and/or gas from western Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not a specific assurance, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister indicate to the House what sort of assurance the United States is seeking before entering into an agreement with Canada in order that we may have some assurance with regard to the supply of oil for eastern Canada in the event of an emergency?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House last week, their concern is with regard to the possible importation of oil, essentially into the mid-continental market.

Oral Questions

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC POWER PROJECT—QUEBEC INTENTION RESPECTING SALE OF POWER TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, would the minister confirm the statement he made yesterday to the effect that the government of Quebec has informed the federal government it does not intend to sell any power from the James Bay power project to the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, up to the present time we have had no indication that any part of that power would be sold either to Ontario or outside the country. Our understanding is that the site will be developed for the purpose of the Quebec load itself.

Mr. Hamilton: This understanding, then, is not based on any proposition that the federal government would resuscitate the old idea of a national power grid?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the question of a national power grid is another question. One of the objectives of an energy policy should be to promote, wherever possible, the interchange of electric power among the provinces of Canada. Specifically, with regard to the James Bay project my understanding is that it is for consumption in Quebec only that the project is being proceeded with.

OIL—AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES FOR MARCH, APRIL AND MAY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and arises out of his statement on January 9, found on page 87 of Hansard, that "there is apparently no problem in continuing supplies for refinery feed stocks", and his statement in the House on Friday last when in answer to my question he said:

> We are aware of the fact that there is pressure with regard to the oncoming situation in March. At the moment it is not clear whether the industry will be able, as I suggested, to solve the question themselves.

May I ask the minister what factor has intervened in the meantime to alter the situation from what it was on January 9, when there was no question about the adequacy of supplies, so that the situation now is that the minister and the industry are uncertain about the availability of supplies for March and the coming months?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the very sharp increase in the level of demand. As the hon. member will recall, in a statement about ten days ago the president indicated a further increase in the United States quota on the importation of Canadian oil.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the statement by the Minister of Mines and Minerals of Alberta, Mr. Dickie, in which he said that February would be the first month in the history of Alberta when there would be more consumers for the province's oil than it could supply, can the minister now assure the House that there will be adequate oil supplies to meet Canadian needs for the coming months, particularly March, April and May.

• (1420)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Sir, I will be glad to repeat that assurance. If the industry shows that it is incapable of meeting the prior claims of the Canadian refineries, the government will take action under the National Energy Board Act to make sure that happens.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister give us any comparative figures as to the amounts of oil we are exporting and importing? I am not asking for exact figures. Are they in balance, or are we exporting more oil than we are importing?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would say that there is an excess in one direction. The figures were roughly in balance last year. I could not give the current monthly figures, but I would say there is a slight excess, on balance, in favour of exports.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and to the question I put to the minister a moment ago when I asked the minister about the nature of any assurances the United States is requiring with regard to supplies of oil or gas in exchange for an assurance relating to the supplying of our market needs. Could the minister not be specific and indicate the nature of the assurances the United States is seeking with regard to the supplying of Canadian oil for the United States midwest?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can be specific as to their position right now. They adopted a certain position in the past which we felt was not in our interest. As I indicated, it would be useful to have another discussion between officials to find out specifically what their objectives are and to see if agreement can be reached.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT RESPECTING CONTROL OF OFFSHORE OPERATIONS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. In light of the statement made on Friday by the minister that investment in an oil pipeline from western Canada to Montreal could become obsolete in the event of success of an offshore field off the east coast, and in view of the importance of offshore exploration activities at this time, will the minister now consider repealing portions of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and substituting in their place more comprehensive and concise legislation concerning the operation of controls in offshore regions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think as an indicator, the activity off the east coast shows that the legislation is no kind of deterrent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NUCLEAR TESTS PROPOSED BY FRANCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS—PARTICIPATION IN POSSIBLE ACTION BEFORE INTERNATIONAL COURT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question on another subject and direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the government of France is preparing further nuclear tests in the South Pacific, what steps is the government of Canada planning in opposition to these tests beyond belated support of the New Zealand resolution at the United Nations last October 21?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to disabuse the hon. member's mind. Canada was the first to protest about these tests in the Pacific, and we will continue with this policy. We have been leading in the world in trying to bring nuclear testing to an end, whether in the atmosphere or underground.

Mr. Rose: Does Canada plan to join Australia in bringing a case against France before the International Court of Justice on the ground of pollution of the high seas and the temporary interruption of peaceful passage in international waters, as was occasioned last time?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had any definite news as to the position Australia will take. However, I can assure the hon. member that we will be joining with other likeminded countries in whatever is the most effective way of stopping the tests in the Pacific.

Mr. Rose: Since Canada did not support a Canadian vessel harassed by France during the previous French test, does Canada plan to provide such support at this time? Also, has there been any reply from France so far relative to the damage caused to Captain David McTaggart's Greenpeace III last summer?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on the final question, we have spoken to the French government on behalf of Greenpeace III. We understand that there may be a reply shortly but there has not yet been one. We do not plan to put any Canadian vessels into the area that may be affected by the forthcoming test.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the local initiatives program provides for an average weekly salary of $100 and some agencies whose projects have been accepted pay only $50 a week, could the hon. minister tell us whether there is an agreement with the department to favour certain people or whether the difference is just remitted to the electoral fund of his party?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he can give notice of his intention of discussing a matter later, only if it is in order. If the hon. member gives notice, then the Chair determines whether the matter respects the rules of the House, that is, whether it is in order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT STANDING COMMITTEE BE ORGANIZED TO DEAL WITH NISHGA LAND CLAIM

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the confusion and concern with regard to the land claims of the Nishga nation of Indian people, would the President of the Privy Council inform the House whether he is going to use his good offices to arrange immediately for the organization meeting of the standing committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development so that the committee can deal specifically with this issue?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the committee can move ahead with the organization meeting just as soon as it has some item of business that will allow it to deal with this matter. I am at present considering with the parliamentary secretary to the minister what the most effective way would be to bring this matter before the committee.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Would the President of the Privy Council undertake to do this immediately and report to the House tomorrow?

REQUEST THAT ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Privy Council. As a motion from the New Democratic Party was accepted today by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to examine the annual report of that department, will the minister cause the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to be referred to the committee so that it can start to get to work?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, that seems to be the most direct way of bringing this about, unless we wait a week or so for reference of the main estimates. However, either one will do it.

Oral Questions

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN NISHGA LAND CASE—
SUGGESTED RE-ARGUMENT BEFORE FULL COURT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice whether consideration has been given to the suggestion I made which, incidentally, has received pretty general support across the country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not from members opposite who do not know what we are talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has any consideration been given to discussing with the Chief Justice of Canada a re-argument of the question so that a final determination can be made, instead of the present uncertainty with three judges on one side and three on the other?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly my view that it would not be the role of the government or myself to make such a request in regard to this situation when we are not directly involved. I am sure the parties to the litigation heard the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman, and it might have been open to them to raise the matter in this fashion with the court. I do not know at this stage whether either party has done so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was there not a case in the province of Quebec some years ago in which a decision respecting civil liberties had been given by the Supreme Court and am I not right that the Department of Justice then got in touch with the Supreme Court of Canada with a view to having a re-argument of that particular matter? Indeed, on the re-argument the Supreme Court decided quite differently from what the court had decided earlier.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rather think the situation would still be unusual in a case like the present one. Here we have a situation where the government of Canada has not been involved in the argument of the case in any way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That answer shows the interest the government has in the Indians.

INCOME TAX

POSSIBLE ALLOWANCE OF COST OF CERTAIN
ADVERTISING BY DOMINION STORES AS DEDUCTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that during the past few days Dominion Stores has spent huge sums of money advertising in the press, can the minister advise whether this cost is allowed as a tax deduction, which means that the people of Canada are paying for it, or are we paying for it through increased prices of food?

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will hon. members kindly resume their seats? I always have some doubt whether it is in order to ask a supplementary to a question which is out of order. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would like to rephrase her question.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes Mr. Speaker. Very simply, can the minister determine whether we are paying for it both ways?

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN 1973-74 BUDGET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. As the defence budget has, with the exception of provision for a small pre-election pay raise, been frozen for the past five years, is it the intention of the government in the very near future to unfreeze the budget to make possible necessary upgrading of capital equipment to the required standards and allow for an improvement in the effectiveness of the training of our armed forces?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that the defence budget has been frozen. It is now the government's intention to unfreeze the defence budget for the fiscal year 1973-74.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: It is true that this is in part to meet capital requirements.

Mr. Hees: We are naturally very glad to get that news. I will ask a further question. Since our defence forces cannot remain effective unless their annual budget is increased every year in proportion at least to the increase in inflation in this country, would the minister bring this important fact to the attention of his colleagues and ask them to stop, in the future, trying to starve our armed forces as has been the Prime Minister's policy for the last five years?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

DECISION ON REPLACEMENT FOR ARGUS AIRCRAFT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Defence. Can the hon. gentleman tell the House when a decision will be reached concerning the replacement for the Argus aircraft which is long overdue in terms of lead time?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The government has decided to replace the Argus but we have not yet made a decision as to the type of aircraft to be ordered. We have sent out letters to five airplane manufacturers inviting them to make proposals against our specifications and we have requested that these proposals be in our hands by March 21.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the minister's answer up to a point. It is basically the same answer as we have been given for the last one and a half or two years. Is there any way in which the hon. gentleman, who is new to his office, can expedite the assessment of these proposals so that an early decision can be reached inasmuch as the present aircraft is fast getting to a point at which safety is becoming a large factor in its operation? Will the hon. gentleman also make sure that the plan to allow all parts of Canada to share in the replacement of the aircraft will not adversely affect the decision?

Mr. Richardson: I believe I indicated we were moving ahead. We have set a deadline for proposals to reach us from the manufacturers; their proposals are to be in our hands by March 21. We will also be looking at the regional aspects and, hopefully, this major purchase will bring industrial benefit to all regions of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: There are a number of hon. members wishing to ask supplementaries. We shall return to this subject in a moment.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—IMPORTS FROM NEW ZEALAND AND OTHER COUNTRIES—MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As Canada imported in the last few weeks several million dollars' worth of butter from New Zealand, can the minister tell the House whether he will recommend to the Canadian Dairy Commission that it take more adequate steps to protect our dairy industry in the coming months?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the import program of the Canadian Dairy Commission does protect the dairy industry, and the dairy industry has been more stable under that program than it has ever been before in the history of Canada. It is my intention to discuss with the Canadian Dairy Commission the program for production this year. I have already had some discussion with them.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. Can the minister tell the House whether, in addition to what it has imported from New Zealand, Canada has also imported butter—and I said "butter"—from other countries?

Mr. Whelan: None that I know of lately, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN 1973-74 BUDGET—POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER CUTBACKS IN MANPOWER OR BASE CONSOLIDATION—PAYMENT OF MILITIA UNIT PERSONNEL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Darmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of National Defence tell the House in connection with the unfreezing of the armed forces budget whether the extension of the budget is intended to cover capital costs only or whether the government has contingency plans for further cutbacks in manpower or base consolidation to meet annual escalation of costs, the point to which attention was drawn by my hon. friend earlier?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The figures for the 1973-74 budget will, of course, be revealed when the estimates for the department are tabled. I can only say at this time that the budget is unfrozen. It has been unfrozen in order to meet increasing costs and particularly to provide for new capital equipment. Expenditure on capital equipment will be greater than last year and will also represent a larger percentage of the total budget.

Mr. Forrestall: Would the House permit me to ask the minister whether he has taken any steps in the interim to offset the extraordinary difficulty which militia units across the country have faced in the last month or so with respect to cash on hand to meet payrolls?

Mr. Richardson: We shall perhaps never have all the funds we need in each area, but the unfreezing of the budget is in part to meet that requirement.

SUGGESTED REDEPLOYMENT OF ARMED FORCES ELEMENTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND TO CONSOLIDATE STRATEGY AND PROMOTE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): In view of the admirable intention of the Minister of National Defence to promote the decentralization of industrial development to assist western Canada, would the hon. gentleman advise us whether he is considering giving attention to the redeployment of elements of the Canadian Armed Forces to the province of Newfoundland in order to consolidate defence strategy and promote economic development where it is most needed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I stated in answer to a question a few days ago that I was looking at our search and rescue operation in Newfoundland, but I have nothing at this time to report to the House.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the fact that egg prices went up 16 per cent and bacon prices went up 46.5 per cent last year, and in light of the government's food supply policies last year, has the government shifted its priority from reducing cigarette consumption to forcing people to stop eating breakfast?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INCREASE IN 1973-74 BUDGET—AVAILABILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR CADET CORPS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. Will the unfreezing of the defence budget be reflected in additional funds available to cadet corps across Canada whose members are no longer permiteed to undertake familiarization flights?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Not specifically, Mr. Speaker. We are, of course, concerned about the cadet program—it is a major part of our work—but the unfreezing of the budget is not related directly to that program.

• (1440)

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

IMPLEMENTATION OF TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATION THAT NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCIL BE GIVEN GREATER RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the acting minister tell the House when his department intends to implement the recommendation of a Northwest Territories task force that the housing responsibilities of the Northwest Territories Council be increased?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not the acting minister but I will take that question as notice. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has indicated in some public statements that by and large he agrees with the spirit of the task force report on housing issued by the Northwest Territories Council, though he had some reservations.

Mr. Nielsen: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, my point of order refers to the question just asked, relating as it does to a question of policy. It has been the practice, experience and tradition of this House that acting ministers are appointed to assume the responsibilities of ministers who are absent for lengthy periods or are ill. While we all regret the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, there is ample precedent in this government for the appointment of acting ministers. For instance, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has acted on behalf of one of his colleagues in the past and similar examples can be given throughout the treasury benches. The parliamentary secretary, as able as he is, cannot answer questions calling for information about government policy; he is not a member of the cabinet and is not privy to their discussions. Surely we in the opposition are entitled to have an acting minister answer for the government on questions of policy.

[Later:]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister, who indicated the other day, whether intentionally or not, that there was an Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would it be too much to ask that the House be told who the acting minister is?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will do that very gladly, Mr. Speaker. The acting minister is the Minister of the Environment, Mr. Davis; the second acting minister is the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Daniel MacDonald; and the—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; he was minister of agriculture in that very excellent government of Premier Campbell. The parliamentary secretary is that very capable Member of Parliament for Kamloops-Cariboo, Mr. Marchand, who will continue to answer for the minister in the House, though of course he does not have the legal power to sign documents on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Nor to answer policy questions.

FAMILY COURTS—SUGGESTED DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIFIED SYSTEM

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Justice. Having in mind the statement made over the weekend by the Attorney General of British Columbia to the effect that that province is considering the possibility of provincial-federal co-operation toward establishing a unified family court system, may I ask the minister whether he is aware of the gravity of these broken home situations, and will he give consideration to the representations of British Columbia?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we will, of course, be very willing to have discussions with British Columbia or, indeed, with any province about methods of improving the settlement of family problems that become the subject of litigation. The whole question of family law is under consideration by this government as well as by the Law Reform Commission. I look forward to their recommendations which may also deal with the question of divided jurisdiction and the possibility of overcoming some of the problems involved.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF JOHNSTON COMMISSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether it is the government's intention to implement the recommendations of the Johnston commission on the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the second part of the recommendations, in terms of general application we are studying the recommendations and the department hopes to come to a decision on the matter within the next two weeks.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact the commission's report has been in the hands of the government since December, may I ask the minister when the government proposes to bring in amendments to the Canada Labour Code?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, we will first have to come to a policy decision whether to act on the general over-all recommendations to which the hon. member is referring. It will then be necessary for the cabinet to approve that decision and legislation might then be placed on the order paper. As to when such amendments will be considered in the House, the hon. member's guess is as good as mine at this stage.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO BAIL REFORM ACT AND LEGISLATION ON FIREARMS IN LIGHT OF SHOOTING OF POLICEMEN

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In light of the shooting down of a third Toronto policeman over the weekend, is the minister prepared (a) to reconsider his views on the need for amendment of the Bail Reform Act, and (b) to consider implementing the suggestions made by the police association regarding the ownership and registration of firearms in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it has been the clear view of the government from the time of the last changes in the bail law that we would examine the experience of this law and be prepared to make changes as a need became apparent. Certainly it is not yet apparent that the changes made to the law are the cause of any of the problems to which the hon. member is referring. He should be aware of the fact that many people were at large on bail under the previous law, and indeed it was simply a matter of the poorer people being kept in jail while those with money, whether their own or with the assistance of friends, criminal or otherwise, were at large. Therefore I think it is quite wrong to point the finger at the changes made in the bail law as being the cause of any of these troubles. Notwithstanding that, I believe that with additional experience more can be done to operate the bail system, or the freedom to be at large system, in a way that is more fully consistent with the defence of the subject in our society.

Mr. Stackhouse: May I ask the minister whether there is any possibility of bringing in legislation regarding the ownership and registration of firearms? I would appreciate his answering that part of the question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as has been indicated to the House previously, this is a question which is under consideration by the government. In effect, the problem is that regulations in relation to firearms most certainly interfere with the ordinary activities of a lot of law-abiding citizens, whereas in no way are they certain to interfere with the activities of criminals.

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION TO DETERMINE WHETHER DOMINION STORES ADVERTISING MISLEADING

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that today's advertising by Dominion Stores claims that Dominion Stores has "spearheaded an industry-wide downward spiral of pricing" at this time, is the minister prepared to investigate this statement in order to determine whether or not it constitutes misleading advertising, as articulated by the Criminal Code?

In view of the pressing need for improved ice surveillance in northern fishing waters as well as for monitoring the location and numbers of foreign fishing fleets and the provision of charts showing the exact location of wrecks and other bottom obstacles, has the minister taken any steps to provide this information to Canadian fishermen through the Bedford Institute of Oceanography?

Hon. Donald S. Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met a group in Manitoba that presented a paper to me. If that is the group of which the hon. member is speaking, we are studying their submission. They agreed that their plan would have to be a national plan and naturally it would be a plan that all hog producers in Canada would have to approve.

Mr. Murta: In view of the fact the minister has stated in various speeches that hog producers have shown an interest in a national marketing agency, is he just echoing his own wishes that this is the kind of thing he personally would like to see?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): None at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the undertaking by the former minister of agriculture that Canada would import more farm machinery from other countries, would the minister tell us what action has been taken to date on that commitment?

Mr. Whelan: I have met with two ambassadors from other countries who are trying to have us educate our farmers to use different kinds of machinery. Our farmers are not indentured in respect of the use of any kind of machinery. It is up to them to buy it if it is available to them.

COST OF FARM MACHINERY—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN AMOUNT AVAILABLE TO FARMERS UNDER FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—REVIEW BY MINISTER—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE FOR EXAMINATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister had a chance to examine the regulations proposed by the Canadian Transport Commission regarding advance booking of charters inasmuch as the net effect will be an increase in cost to the travelling public and much more difficulty in making arrangements? There is also the fact that some suggestion has been made that there are inadequate safeguards for the handling of passenger funds. Has the minister had an opportunity to examine the regulations and can he report to the House?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already tried to answer this question. The new regulations were published in the Canada Gazette on January 8. These are entirely new regulations. I should like to have some experience in the implementation of these regulations before we make any change. In the meantime, if the hon. member has any case of abuse I would be ready to look into it to see what can be done.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that large numbers of the travelling public have made representations to the Canadian Transport Commission and indeed, I believe, to the minister, would the minister consider having the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications examine the air transport regulations so that witnesses from all sectors of the travelling public could be called?

SUGAR BEETS—INTENTION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF MINIMUM PRICE PER TON AND PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the intent of the government to establish a minimum price per ton of sugar beets based on today's sugar prices and, if so, is the government prepared to support such a price by a direct cash subsidy if present market prices decline?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, our present stabilization program is still in force. It has not had to be used in the last two years. As long as the world price of sugar stays with that program we are not really that worried about where it is going to go or what it is going to do. I think this is why so many people are anxious to produce sugarbeets.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the Prime Minister publicly supported the resolution on an automatic surtax submitted by the Canadian Horticulture Council and supported by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, can the minister

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, as a result of a ruling by the Manitoba courts that Saskatchewan hogs cannot be marketed in Manitoba unless they go through the hog marketing board, he intends to intercede on behalf of Saskatchewan producers since this would seem to be in contravention of the British North America Act?

I think we could obtain agreement that hon. members would not participate further in the debate so the motion could be voted on. Would the government House leader consider that request?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, there are before the House on the order paper at the present time three notices of motion of which notice has been given pursuant to Standing Order (75(5). I have given very serious thought to the many procedural aspects of the three motions. I am not sure what the position of the House would be from a procedural standpoint in respect of these motions and I have the same qualms and reservations about the three motions. But perhaps I might, for the purpose of discussion, put for the consideration of the House from a procedural standpoint the first one which stands in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That Bill C-124, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be amended by deleting lines 4 and 5 on page 1 and substituting therefor the following:

"1. Subsection 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is repealed and the following substituted therefor: '(4) The total amount outstanding at any time of advances made under this section shall not exceed nine hundred million dollars except where an advance is approved by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House'".

If hon. members have procedural objections to this proposed motion, I will hear them and at the same time of course hear any arguments which might be advanced in support of this motion.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the motion stands in my name, I think it is only appropriate that I make some submissions with respect to the advisability of accepting the motion as it stands. We are very much aware of the fact that section 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act indicates that there is a ceiling, and if I am not mistaken, that ceiling is set at $800 million. What is occurring at present is that the government, has given any indication of its wish to remove that ceiling. I would say that section 137(4) presently provides that the total amount outstanding by way of repayable advances or loans by the government to the Unemployment Insurance Commission shall not exceed $800 million. If that is self-explanatory, it needs no further comment.

But at the same time, clause 1 of Bill C-124 would give the government the power to make advances to the commission unlimited in total amount. I should like to say at this time that there is a figure which is floating in the air but the government does not indicate what that figure should be. The message and recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General is to the same effect, and the relevant words are "to remove the ceiling on advances". Amendments No. 1 and No. 2, the first standing in my name and the second in the name of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), would set a new limit of $900 million. In this regard, I would point out to you for your deliberation and consideration, Sir, paragraph 251(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, 1958, which reads:

It may happen that the resolution sanctions some expenditure without fixing the maximum amount to be spent. If, for instance, the resolution recommends that adequate salaries be paid a newly constituted body and the amounts of the salaries are fixed in the bill based on that resolution, the committee on the bill has the right to increase those amounts, because, in doing so, it does not go beyond the scope of the royal recommendation.

I respectfully submit that the attitude that the Chair should adopt in discharging its function of protecting the rights of the non-government members with respect to money resolutions, is set out at pages 804 and 805 of May's Parliamentary Practice, seventeenth edition. The paragraph reads:

In view of the way in which the terms of a money resolution limit the scope and extent of the charging provisions of a bill, the Speaker has had occasion to deprecate an excessive amount of detail in the drafting of such resolutions as tending to restrict unduly the power of private members to propose amendments.

In this regard I would say that the right of this House to control supply is the reason for the existence of this House. Against the right of the Crown to demand supply in a specified amount is the right of this House to refuse to grant that supply or to reduce it in amount. To argue that the Crown, simply by asking for an unlimited amount of supply, can defeat the right of this House to refuse or reduce supply is to deny that the right of this House to exist, or, at best, that this House, on its first day of business, should vote the government unlimited supply and then go home for the next five years. I am not saying that facetiously, Mr. Speaker, I am stating this is all sincerity.

I would refer Your Honour to Clement Attlee's writings in the 1930's when he said that this was what the Labour Party in England would do when it took office. On the first day of business, he declared, the government would push a bill through all three reading stages in the House of Commons and the House of Lords, which would provide that the Labour government could do anything it wanted to do by order in council. That would dispose of the opposition and it would dispose of parliament. I respectfully submit that we are going to be placed in this bind or boxed in as a result of a general resolution which we are not given an opportunity to amend, except for the fact—and I know that Your Honour may bring this to our attention—that we would have the right to vote against it.

I think that the matter goes much further than this. I respectfully submit that the proposition which I placed before Your Honour should be treated with understanding, as I know it will be, because, as I stated—and I will not debate this any further—we do not have an opportunity to amend general, nondescript phrases. What the government is doing is removing the ceiling on advances. We are really talking about some limit, but because of the devious nature of the government, we do not get the chance to find out what the limit would be, whether in fact there should be a limit or what type of limit the government has in mind. I respectfully state that in these circumstances a favourable consideration should be given to the arguments that I have put forth with regard to the acceptability of the amendment proposed by the opposition.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising at the moment to participate in the debate on the question of order but would draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order 51 which states that:

Whenever Mr. Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament,—

I know Your Honour has not gone that far. You have merely stated some doubts.

—he shall apprise the House thereof immediately—

Which Your Honour has done.

—before putting the question thereon, and quote the Standing Order or authority applicable to the case.

I am wondering, in order that we might have some idea of Your Honour's doubts in this matter, whether the Chair would be prepared at this time to inform the House as to the root of those doubts in terms of which standing order or rule might be offended.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that the hon. member for Hamilton West was himself suspicious as to what the motives would be, and he dealt precisely with the points I had in mind. There are a number of them. Hon. members might like to look through citation 246(3) and also citation 250(4). It is my impression, my fear, that perhaps not only the hon. member's proposed amendment but the others also would suggest the importing of a new principle. I also suggest that they may infringe on the financial initiatives of the Crown. This is the area where I have trouble, and this is the area which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has covered.

• (1510)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit that the proposed amendment with which we are now dealing is not in order. I shall take the same position with respect to the other two, and for substantially the same reasons. Therefore I hope that if the debate on amendment No. 1 takes a bit of time, we might not have to repeat the arguments with respect to the other two.

Before I state, as succinctly as I can, my own reasons for regarding this amendment as out of order, may I comment briefly on two things that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has said. In the first place, I think he put himself right out of court in his opening paragraph by referring to the Unemployment Insurance Act as it now stands. He said that as it now stands, it provides in section 137(4) for a ceiling of $800 million. He made it clear that what his party would like to do would be to change that figure to a higher one. The reason I say that I think he has put himself out of court by making that reference is that, in making it, he has admitted that what he is trying to do is not to amend Bill C-124 which is now before us but rather he is seeking to amend the act behind the bill, in other words, the Unemployment Insurance Act itself.

The hon. member also referred repeatedly to the fact that the House of Commons must control supply. He said we must be in charge of expenditures and control those expenditures or there is no reason for parliament being here. I am sure I could find quotations in my name that would be along those lines, but I wish to point out that this is not a supply bill. This is not a measure in which we are providing supply or money for expenditure at all. This is merely a bill dealing with the question of advances to a commission to enable that commission to carry out a law which parliament has already passed, calling for the payment of unemployment insurance benefits. I submit, therefore, that the general rules about the voting of money and expenditures do not apply, and in that respect that citation 251(1), which he quoted, really has no bearing at all.

Citation 251(1) in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition deals with a measure which has provided for an expenditure, and indicates that under certain conditions—that is, if the Governor General's recommendation were in general terms—it would be in order to increase that expenditure. But we do not have before us a bill providing for an expenditure. Rather we have before us a bill concerned with advances of working capital to enable the Unemployment Insurance Commission to carry out the law as passed by this parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having made those comments on the submission of the hon. member, may I state my own two reasons for feeling that this amendment is out of order, and perhaps I have already stated those reasons by implication in what I have said.

In the first place the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton West, despite the fact that it is couched in terms of an amendment to Bill C-124, is not an amendment to that bill at all. It is an attempt to amend the act which Bill C-124 seeks to amend. In other words, he is trying to get behind the bill to the act itself. If he is going to bring in a bill to amend the act itself he has to meet the general rules about that, such as notice, getting the Governor General's recommendation, and all of that. I submit that that is a flaw that is almost fatal, the fact that he is trying to amend not Bill C-124 but rather the Unemployment Insurance Act itself.

The other objection to this amendment is of course the one that is brought out by a couple of citations to which Your Honour has already referred, citation 246(3) and citation 250(4), both in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. Let me read at least parts of those citations. No doubt others who take part in this debate will have to read them as well. Citation 246(3) reads:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the Royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

Citation 250(4) reads:

> The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the House with the Governor General's recommendation upon which a Committee of the Whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution.

Now, the Governor General's recommendation attached to Bill C-124 is very clear. It reads:

> His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 to remove the ceiling on advances under section 137—

There is more to that, but I shall read the rest of it when we are dealing with proposed amendment No. 3. At the moment, we are dealing just with proposed amendment No. 1 which relates to the question of the ceiling, and I submit it is very clear that the recommendation is that there be a complete removal of the ceiling on the amount that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) can advance to the Unemployment Insurance Commission to enable it to carry out its obligation. I submit that an attempt to substitute for that definite removal of the ceiling the reinstitution of a ceiling simply at a different figure is not in order, and I go back to the language of citation 250(4), is not an amendment that "falls within the terms of the resolution."

No matter how one dresses it up, as has been done in both the first and second amendments, by referring to the approval of parliament and so on, the fact of the matter is that the attempt to put in a ceiling is completely outside the terms proposed in the Governor General's recommendation, which is to the effect that the ceiling should be removed completely. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because this amendment—and I would make the same arguments with respect to the other two, perhaps with some slight additions—seeks to amend the act behind the bill rather than the bill, and because it proposes something that is completely outside the parameters of the Governor General's recommendation, I feel that it is not in order to be presented at the report stage of this bill.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, since I shall endorse the position which has been put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I may be able to spare Your Honour a rereading of some of the sections to which he has already directed the attention of the House.

It seems to me that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), in making his argument, has not only sought to amend the initial unemployment insurance commission bill but that he has also advanced arguments which relate to the wisdom of the policy which it is proposed to adopt in Bill C-124, rather than to admissibility. He spoke about the need for controlling government expenditure and things of that kind, which I submit are related to the wisdom of the matter before us and not related to the admissibility of the amendment.

There are two reasons it seems to me why these amendments in general, and the first amendment in particular, should be ruled out of order. The first of these is the one which has been so ably presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That relates to the financial initiative of the Crown and is found in the citations which he has already read, citation 246 section 3 and citation 250 section 4. Without reading these, I would just draw to the attention of the House that the principle with respect to any limit on the financial initiative of the Crown is outlined in citation 246(3) which reads in part:

> . . . the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

It seems to me this is exactly what the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West seeks to infringe.

Turning to citation 250(4), it is clearly stated there that the fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the House cannot be amended. I believe that is what this amendment seeks to do.

In addition to that argument, I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this amendment is a direct negation of the bill. In its recommendations the bill states very clearly that one of its two purposes is to remove the ceiling on advances. I believe that the amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West, in its substance, directly opposes the removal of a limitation and seeks to place a new ceiling in the act. This fact may be somewhat obscured by the words which are contained in the amendment. If I may direct Your Honour's attention to the amendment, there is what we might call a substantive section which proposes that:

The total amount outstanding at any time of advances made under this section shall not exceed nine hundred million dollars—

This is the substance of the amendment. Then, there is a procedural proposal:

—except where an advance is approved by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the words following "except" are purely a procedural proposal and the substance of the amendment is contained in its first clause. That clause is clearly and directly a negation of the purposes of the bill as set out in the recommendations.

If I may draw Your Honour's attention to citation 202 subsection (12). It reads:

An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

I would submit with all due respect to the hon. member for Hamilton West that there is verbiage which attempts to cover up the basic contrariety between the substance of his amendment and the bill before the House. Mr. Speaker, these are the reasons it seems to me you ought to rule this amendment out of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we have listened to junior counsel for the government who followed on the heels of senior counsel, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who made his arguments on behalf of the government, if I may put it that way.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Now, we are getting the paralegal service.

Mr. Baldwin: I see that the hon. members opposite do not like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to advocate their point of view. I am amazed at that. While he is not always right, and he is not this time, he very often is. I think the government needs a procedural expert to make arguments on their behalf from time to time.

Mr. Speaker, by simple process of reductio ad absurdum, which is the first point I am making to Your Honour—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are good at that.

Mr. Baldwin: —I hope to ask you to eliminate all this nonsense we have heard. If one examines the transcript of the proceedings before the committee in a case the government made when we were examing this bill in the House, the government was saying over and over again that what they were attempting to do by the first clause in this bill which my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is seeking to amend was in no way to deal with ways and means, in no way to deal with the amount of benefits of unemployment insurance but with the extent to which there may be a debit or credit position at the end of each fiscal year. They are simply saying, "Because we made such an awful mess of this act, and our estimates as to expenditures were so out of kilter, we found that this $800 million ceiling to provide for advances was no longer valid. Therefore, we are removing that ceiling." What remains, then, is ceiling unlimited—no limit at all on the ceiling or the extent to which the government may make advances. I would still argue that as strongly if what the government was attempting to do was to deal with the situation which related to the actual payment of benefits. But it is not that at all, Mr. Speaker.

If my hon. friend from Hamilton West, instead of moving this amendment, had simply moved to delete the clause in question, then Your Honour has already held that would be a valid amendment. But if that were the case, then what would the situation be? If the House saw fit to approve the amendment, we would then be back to the ceiling set in the original act of $800 million. If we can do that, then I submit we certainly can do what we are now attempting to do, that is place some hobbles on this spendthrift government and say to them "not an unlimited ceiling but a limited ceiling".

I dismiss out of hand, of course, the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the hon. member for Hamilton West is attempting to deal with the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. He is only attempting to restrict the government's capacity to make advances. This is not a money spending bill. The argument of the government, and they have repeated it ad nauseam, is that it is a question of making advances. If they asked for the right to make unlimited advances we would refuse, but would place a limit on what they could advance. Surely, that is the purpose of the amendment. If Your Honour rules us out of order, then he is saying, in effect, that all we can do is vote against the bill. That is the effect, as I see it. We are not interfering in any way with the actual expenditure of money.

I come back to this because I think it needs to be made plain to my friends opposite that we are saying there must be a limitation, for a number of purposes which I do not need to deal with now but will deal with if we get into the amendment. If not, then I will be compelled to deal with it on third reading. I say if we are deprived of this opportunity the opposition is then restricted to voting against the bill. I agree that we should move to delete clause 1.

The government has seen fit, if one accepts the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his assistant, to place an unlimited ceiling on the fund. That is what it wants to do. But we, on the other hand, want a limited ceiling. We want less, not more. If the government were to say, "We will limit the ceiling to $900 million," and if we were then to move a motion at the report stage to delete that clause and provide for a higher ceiling than the one the government wanted, we should probably be doing what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has argued should be done. So, on that basis I say we are really not dealing with the payment of moneys for a specific government purpose. We are dealing with the question of loans, and I ask the Chair to look at my argument in that light.

The citations mentioned so far have dealt with moneys being spent or bills which have been brought in to deal with actual expenditures by the government. I think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) mentioned Citation 251. May I mention Citation 270(1), which reads:

A private member may move that certain specified taxes be readjusted and that the scope of tax exemptions be enlarged . . .

That seems to me to involve not the same principle, but to permit a similar situation in that there may be a change in the incidence of certain measures proposed by the government. Citation 276(4) reads:

The House can make amendments which diminish the amount of reduction of taxation, or postpone the day when the reduction takes place, . . .

If the House can, without calling upon the government to take the initiative first, move an amendment which diminishes the amount of taxation, I argue by analogy that we can also move an amendment which diminishes the actual amount which the government seeks to use as advances.

Under the government proposal the government would, if the bill were to pass in its present form, be able to advance in the next year $3 billion; judging from the way things are going, that is a very plausible figure. In other words, the government could well advance $3 billion to the unemployment insurance fund. We say, no, not that much. We ought to come back to parliament and debate the matter if we want to lift the ceiling that has been set. I fail to see how that action would in any way interfere with the initiative of the Crown and, within the meaning of Citation 246(3), interfere with the rule that a bill such as the one brought in by the government deals once and for all not only with the amount involved but also with the objective for which that amount is provided. We are not interfering with that objective. We are not interfering with its purposes; we are not interfering with its conditions and we are not interfering with its qualifications. We are saying that the ceiling should not be as high as proposed until the matter has come to this House and been approved. If we are denied that right, I submit there is not much use in this House dealing with measures of this kind.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal for a moment with the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Either the hon. member has been here too long, or he is restricting his usually lucid arguments on the rules to give comfort to the government. I am not suggesting he has done this deliberately; but, really, he distorted the submission of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) when he accused him of trying to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act by means of the amendment that he put before the House. He said that he tried to do this by increasing the limit now existing under the Unemployment Insurance Act from $800 million to $900 million. I say, not at all, Sir. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were seeing things clearly, he would see that the attempt of the hon. member for Hamilton West is directed entirely, exclusively and solely at amending clause 1 of Bill C-124 which removes entirely the ceiling from the existing act. The hon. member for Hamilton West is not trying to increase the limit under the existing act but to limit the limitless ceiling with this amendment involving section 137. All this will become clear as I go along.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has tried to erect a straw man when comparing the amendment and bill before us with a supply bill. He tried to knock down the amendment on the basis that it might be proper if it related to a supply bill but that it is not proper with respect to the bill before parliament. The hon. member for Hamilton West tried, as he made clear in his argument, through his amendment to retain that parliamentary control over appropriations, which would disappear entirely if the ceiling of $800 million were allowed to be lifted, as proposed. This is what will happen if Bill C-124, in its present form passes. If C-124 passes in its present form without amendment, there would be no ceiling and there would be no parliamentary control. Actually, that would be putting a blank cheque into the hands of the government, and would permit the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to make as he pleases advances from time to time to the fund. There would be no restrictions whatsoever on the hundreds of millions of dollars or, indeed, billions of dollars, potentially, that could be advanced without a yea or nay from parliament.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asserts that the bill in its present form enables the government to give effect to the law now on the statute books concerning unemployment insurance by giving the Minister of Finance power to make the necessary advances and make available unemployment insurance benefits. That is what the hon. member asserts. I say, Sir, that Bill C-124 as it now stands goes far beyond the position asserted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It does not merely enable the government to carry into effect the provisions of the act as that now stands; it enables the government to go to limitless horizons in supplying moneys for the purpose of paying unemployment insurance benefits.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre referred to Citation 251(1) and cites, in support of his argument, the fact that we do not have a bill before us to provide for expenditures. Those, I believe, are his words paraphrased. Actually, there is before the House a bill to provide for expenditures. We have before us a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and that bill, if passed, would authorize the government to make limitless expenditures for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the act for making certain payments. We have heard, in two standing committees, of those variables that can occur and that can increase the demands made upon the Minister of Finance to supply advances under section 137.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made two points. The first was that the mover of the amendment, the hon. member for Hamilton West, is attempting to go behind Bill C-124 and amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that argument is not deserving of any merit at all because the amendment deals directly with clause 1 of the bill and attempts to limit the authority of the Minister of Finance to make advances under that section.

The second point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that the resolution which recommends the bill to the House cannot be amended. Of course, that is the general rule, but he states it very loosely. I find this rather surprising coming from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because normally he is very precise in advancing this type of argument to the Chair. We should look at it in some detail because, I suggest, that is the only real point of substance which Your Honour must consider.

I dismiss at once the argument raised by the previous speaker that the amendment is a negative. It is no such thing. It would be if the hon. member for Hamilton West had advanced an amendment that would have had the effect of negativing the bill, but this has not occurred. Citation 246(3) of Beauchesne's reads, and I quote:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all—

As pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, those last three words are in italics.

> —(unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

Those latter categories have been dealt with by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I draw Your Honour's attention to the use in that citation of the words "not only the amount of a charge". The citation is very specific on that point. The use of those words compels one to an inference that an amount of a charge must be set. In BillC-124, we are dealing with an unlimited amount. There is no stipulated amount. In fact, there is no ceiling at all.

With regard to citation 250(4), I think it would help to review that with Your Honour. I quote:

> The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the House with the Governor General's recommendation upon which a Committee of the Whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution.

In my submission, they do fall within the terms of the resolution. I think this point will be made even stronger by subsequent citations from May which I intend to draw to Your Honour's attention.

> The procedure in committee on those resolutions follows in principle the procedure of the Committee of Supply, and amendments are out of order if they are proposed with a view to substituting an alternative scheme to that proposed with the royal recommendation.

In my submission, this is not an alternative. If it were, the hon. member opposite, who argued well but weakly, would have been correct in urging Your Honour to find a negative, if it were a negative, but it is not. In support of my submission, I want to quote some citations from May to show that it does not offend the rule with respect to offending the resolution introducing the bill. I wish to cite first from page 514 of May's 18th edition under the subheading, Proceedings upon Italicized Words and Privilege Amendments. I quote:

> It has already been explained ... that any clause or part of a clause which imposes a charge is printed in italics. Italicized words cannot be considered by the committee, unless a money resolution authorizing them has been agreed to by the House. By S.O. No. 47 no question is put for inserting words already printed in italics, and, if no alteration has been made in such words and no amendment has been made elsewhere, the bill is reported without amendment. If it is desired to alter the italicized words, an amendment can be moved in the ordinary manner, provided that it falls within the scope of the money resolution; but any increase or extension of the charge authorized by the italicized words is only in order to the extent to which the scope of the money resolution exceeds the scope of the italicized words.

We do not follow the practice here of italicized words, but the important submission I have to make with respect to this citation is that this amendment, by inference, can be moved in the ordinary manner if it falls within the scope of the money resolution. I submit that the limitation of an unlimited authority falls within the scope of the resolution. Again, it sets out a negative position in that citation, "but any increase or extension", which the hon. member for Hamilton West does not seek to do, namely increase or extend the charge authorized. May states that any increase or extension of the charge authorized by the italicized words is only in order to the extent that it falls within the terms of the resolution.

Page 694 of the same edition of May, under Bills and Financial Resolutions, reads:

> In the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century, the royal recommendation under the Standing Order of 1713 was given to petitions, clauses of bills, instructions and motions moved in the House itself. Now it is only given to motions either relating to a particular bill or referring a particular matter to the consideration of the House. Here all that need be said is that the latter, which is the earlier form, is adapted to a generalized statement of the purposes of expenditure initiated by the Crown, and leaves a measure of discretion to the Commons; while procedure for financial resolutions relating to bills can be used to draft a motion, sanctioning expenditure recommended by the Crown, in almost as complete detail as the provisions of the bill which lay down the conditions under which this expenditure is to be administered. By this method the principle of the financial initiative of the Crown can be turned into a means of restricting the power of the Commons to amend financial legislation almost as completely as the form of the estimates restricts their power to adjust administrative expenditure.

I make this point to bolster my submission to Your Honour that by amending clause 1 of the bill to limit the authority sought by the bill, the amendment falls within the meaning of the phraseology in this citation of May, namely that the financial initiation of the Crown is not impaired if the amendment sought does not seek to limit or restrict the clauses in the bill.

Lastly, from page 750 of May under the subheading Proceedings on Financial Resolution:

> Debate on a motion for a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill nor to the merits of matters excluded from the resolution. The function of the House in financial matters being restricted to the approval or the reduction of the expenditure under consideration or an increase in the stringency in the terms and the conditions of the charge thereby created, amendments are restricted to these objects.

So, in substance the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are interfering in any way with the financial initiative of the Crown falls to the ground in the light of these citations. The amendment which my hon. friend from Hamilton West puts forward does not seek to expand the terms of the resolution; it does not seek to extend the authority requested by the government under the bill. Rather, it seeks to limit; it seeks to reduce. In bills with an appropriation aspect, such as this one, it has always been in order for hon. members to introduce amendments which seek to limit or reduce expenditure.

I agree readily with the argument that no amendment can be accepted which seeks to extend or expand expenditure. But this is not what is being done here. In these circumstances, I submit that none of the earlier arguments which have been placed before Your Honour in this discussion either by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or others, have any merit. I strongly submit on the basis of the citations I have put forward that Your Honour should find these amendments in order.

Mr. MacEachen: It is likely that none of us arguing the case against the hon. member who has just resumed his seat would qualify on the grounds of merit or substance in any of the arguments we might put forward. But we are arguing, hopefully, with an eye to the Chair rather than with an eye to the reaction of the hon. member and his friends. I found it difficult, really, to disentangle the politics from the procedure in the comments which have been made from the other side of the House. Hon. members can complain as loudly as they like about the fact that the ceiling is to be removed by the bill. They can argue that this is bad policy, and they are entitled to do so. They did so in the committee, and they failed to convince members of the committee that it was bad policy. Now, they have come back to the House, and in the guise of a procedural argument they have restated the same policy arguments against the proposal contained in the bill.

I believe that in some cases when a point of order is being argued in the House there can really be strong differences of opinion. But in this case it seems to me the inadmissibility of the amendment is crystal clear, not least on the ground that the royal recommendation is entirely explicit in stating that the bill is to remove the ceiling. Surely, when an hon. member comes forward with an amendment saying that the ceiling shall not exceed a particular figure of $900 million, the gist of the Royal recommendation is being very seriously challenged. This appears to me to be a conclusive argument against the amendment.

We are now engaged upon the report stage of the bill, a relatively new stage for this House of Commons, a new procedure. And we must bear in mind that what has passed earlier has a bearing on what can be done in the House at the present time. In a sense, the report stage, inasmuch as it enables members to deal with amendments to clauses of a bill with the Speaker in the chair, is an assimilation of the Committee of the Whole. This is probably only an argument by assimilation, but, certainly, whatever happens on the report stage must take into account the approval in principle which was given to the bill on second reading. It was clear at that time that the main principle of the bill was that the ceiling be removed. If there were any principle in the bill, if one could find a major conclusion, it certainly was that the ceiling on advances to the unemployment insurance fund be removed.

I refer to Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice which is constructive and helpful on this point. It states at page 550 in the discussion of admissible amendments—admittedly in committee but there is nevertheless similarity to our situation here, because in both cases the second reading stage has been concluded:

An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on second reading is not admissible. Where the scope of a bill is very restricted it is not always easy to grasp the full effect of this rule.

I make no aspersions in the direction of hon. members opposite. Two examples are given of the application of this rule. The first is as follows:

The scope of the Parliamentary Elections Bill, 1880, being restricted to the repeal of a section in a statute, an amendment which proposed the continuance and extension of that section was ruled out of order. The Chairman stated that, though the committee had full power to amend, even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of a bill, they could not insert a clause reversing the principles which the bill, as read a second time, sought to affirm.

Surely, what the second reading confirmed was that a ceiling of any kind was eliminated or removed. Any attempt, in my humble submission, to restore the existence of the ceiling would certainly reverse the principle adopted by the House on second reading. This same argument, if I might say so, would apply even more directly to the amendment in the name of the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). The final amendment, proposed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is really a total rejection of that very clause that he seeks to amend. He is asking us to regard the vote as an appropriation, though the bill asks us to regard it as an advance, and instead of voting against the clause which he dislikes so much, he bothers the House by this kind of silly amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: The trouble is you are afraid to vote on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their very interesting comments. As I indicated earlier this afternoon, I have given very serious thought to these several amendments. They have caused me a good deal of concern. I reviewed them, looked at May and Beauchesne and Bourinot and, of course, Standing Orders, hoping that I could see a ray of light which would make it possible for the Chair to allow them and hoping, also, that hon. members could convince me that these amendments were acceptable and would be a vehicle for discussion of this important legislation under Standing Order 55.

In spite of the arguments which have been advanced this afternoon, I find it very difficult to accept that these amendments are in order. I want to insist on the fact that I have gone out of my way to study the arguments that have been brought forward by those who have taken part in this debate in support of the acceptability of the amendments. I was particularly impressed by the argumentation of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). In citing the precedents he did, I had the impression that, were I sitting on the bench, I would have come to the conclusion that he has worked very hard to advance very cogent arguments in favour of what, basically, was a very weak case.

I think the hon. member will have to recognize, as will any member who takes an interest in precedents and in procedure, that these amendments are not even borderline. I would find it extremely difficult to reconcile my judgment of such matters with accepting the amendments. I was hoping that perhaps some accommodation could be reached, but as I say I would find it difficult to countenance accepting the amendments.

My objections to them are those that I indicated when, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon earlier in the discussion, I voiced my reservations about them. Arguments in opposition were brought forward and the hon. member for Yukon quoted a very interesting citation taken from chapter XXVII of the 18th edition of May. My impression is that what he referred to is more historical than anything else. He, himself, recognized that part of the citation to which he referred dealt with the procedure that existed in the 18th and in the first half of the 19th centuries.

This very interesting paragraph im May illustrates the evolution of the control of the treasury. Obviously, anyone reading these paragraphs will come to the conclusion that this control has not evolved in the direction that might be indicated by the first paragraph, but rather has gone the other way. The first paragraph reads as follows:

> When the increasing frequency of such amendments had familiarized the House with the nature of the machinery for expressing the financial initiative of the Crown, and it was appreciated that the terms of the financial resolution recommended by the Crown decided once for all the limits of amendment to the bill itself—

Then, later on:

> This change in procedure has not been accepted without protest by the House.

I can well understand that hon. members may want to protest developments over the centuries, but I find it difficult to accept the argument put forward philosophically by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to the effect that the Chair in some way should disregard or forget the rules so as to permit hon. members, as defenders of the rights of members against the Crown, to initiate amendments and to propose legislation which in some way infringes on the financial initiatives of the Crown. The hon. member for Hamilton West has put a very attractive suggestion to the Chair, but I am wondering whether the Speaker would end up, as Speakers in past centuries have, by having his head chopped off if it were accepted.

May I refer to one of the arguments made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) which I thought very interesting. He contended that the Chair had recognized in the past the acceptability of an amendment that deleted a clause. That is, of course, quite so, but it does not necessarily apply to a bill that consists simply of one clause, and that clause seeks to delete a section from the statute being amended. I think hon. members will recognize that at the point it becomes extremely difficult, if not impossible, to find an amendment that is procedurally in order.

I suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that, his argument might be acceptable in a case where there is more than one clause and the amendment seeks to delete but one of them. In a case where the motion, in effect, seeks to negative the bill entirely the situation is somewhat different. In this regard, I go to page 550 of May's seventeenth edition, which was quoted by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). That provision reads as follows:

> An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on second reading is not admissible.

I am afraid that that is an objection which is very difficult to overcome.

I doubt whether it is necessary for me to read once again the citations already referred to in Beauchesne, but I propose to refer to the first part of paragraph (3) of citation 246, which reads as follows:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

The hon. member for Yukon brought to my attention that the citation refers to the fact that an amendment cannot alter or amend the amount of a charge. However, the citation refers not only to the amount of a charge but also to its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications; these too cannot be changed. So even when there is no question of amount, I think the House is still bound by the principle that an amendment cannot be brought forward which in some way changes the objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications of the Royal recommendation.

Paragraph (4) of citation 250 was also referred to by hon. members. It provides:

> The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the House with the Governor General's recommendation upon which a committee of the whole is set up cannot be amended. Amendments will only be in order if they fall within the terms of the resolution.

I have the impression that the amendment proposed by the hon. member does not fall within the terms of the resolution. Indeed, it seems to me contrary to the resolution in that it appears to introduce an entirely new principle. I think it should be pointed out that, in addition to the words in the first part of the hon. member's amendment, the later words bring in an additional principle:

> —except where an advance is approved by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House.

This would be entirely outside the reference to the Royal recommendation and would appear to be a principle going beyond the principle of the bill itself, as agreed to by the House of Commons on second reading.

With respect to all hon. members, fully conscious of the importance of this matter and taking into account the very strong arguments put forward by various hon. members, I still do not see how I can in conscience, respecting my obligations to the House, accept amendments which might have made it a little easier for the House to consider the points made by hon. members. It is my hope that this will be done when we reach a later stage of the bill. Hon. members will then have every opportunity to move amendments which I hope will be in order. If we do eventually move on to third reading of the bill, and amendments are moved which will make it possible for the House to consider the very interesting aspects of the matters incorporated in such amendments, then I shall certainly look at the amendments objectively and, if they are within the rules, allow the House to consider them.

I regret very much that I have to reach this decision. It has caused me much anguish and pain, and I hope all hon. members will appreciate the difficult position in which the Chair is placed in such circumstances.

• (1610)

Mr. Andras moved that the Bill be concurred in.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise, on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We were addressing ourselves directly to the first amendment in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and Your Honour in the course of your address, I won't say disparagingly but without too much enthusiasm, expressed your sorrow about the matter. I am equally sorry, possibly even more so. I think possibly the remarks of Your Honour were particularly appropriate to the amendment of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) but I believe there might have been some debate in respect of the first amendment and my amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is well taken. I felt that the same difficulties applied, unfortunately, in respect of the three amendments. I did not intend to deprive hon. members who might wish to do so of the opportunity to submit arguments in support of the other motions. I believe the hon. member for Peace River will appreciate that. I did pause a moment before I proceeded with the next step of procedure in the expectation that someone might take up the other point relating to the other proposed motions. Without prejudice in respect of their acceptability, I would have no objection if hon. members would like to speak to these other motions. I am sorry I did not appreciate that the hon. member for Peace River wished to do so.

Mr. Baldwin: I think, Mr. Speaker, I would be inclined to agree that the remarks you made are applicable to the second amendment in the name of the hon. member for Yukon. However, I think there is this additional comment which might be made. I think we might examine the philosophy under which the new rules were brought forward. Let us look, for example, at clause 2. If we were in Committee of the Whole the clauses would be put by Your Honour one by one. If clause 2 were put, surely it would be within the competence of the members of the Committee of the Whole to vote against clause 2. They could vote for clauses as they saw fit, but could vote against clause 2. Your Honour will see the predicament in which the House is placed by the decision which has been made. Having examined very closely the decision of the Chair in respect of reasoned amendments, as I construe the situation it becomes virtually impossible for members of this House to deal with a bill in which there are two clauses which are completely separate and independent. Certainly, no one I am sure can argue that clauses 1 and 2 have any relation to each other. Members are placed in an unfortunate position. We have indicated our willingness to accept changes with regard to the ceiling, although we disagree with the government concerning the amount. However, we say there may be a need to establish some ceiling.

Then, we say we do not like what the government is attempting to do in clause 2 and we want an opportunity to explain our position and indicate our objection to clause 2. Certainly, in Committee of the Whole we could have done this. We might take as an example the amendment which stands in my name. Let us say that we eliminate the second part of it. Your Honour will observe that the amendment provides that we amend the bill by deleting lines 6 to 27 inclusive on page one and substituting therefor the following. Let us say that the substitution had not been included in the amendment and I had simply moved that we delete lines 6 to 27 which are, in effect, the entirety of clause 2. Then, we would have had a chance to challenge the government and give members of this House an opportunity to divide on this issue of the second clause. We do not like what the government is attempting to do. We say we may have to be prepared to accept the change in the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 which does something in respect of the ceiling, but that we do not like what the government is doing in respect of this other matter and we want an opportunity not only to speak to it but also to vote our opposition to it.

In the light of what Your Honour has ruled on other occasions we are deprived of the opportunity to voice our opposition. I know it is not for Your Honour to correct the defects in the Standing Orders, but I submit there is an ancient practice that in a situation of this kind the Chair should be vigilant in trying to find an opportunity for hon. members to have their voices heard and their votes noted. With respect, I suggest that this is a very serious matter. No matter what Your Honour may say about our opportunities during third reading, any opportunity to present a meaningful amendment in respect of this repugnant clause would not only be limited but would be eliminated. All through the course of this debate the government has been saying that this is not an appropriation but is an advance. The government is attempting to say it is an advance under clause 137 of the bill. Of course by so doing it is declaring that it never was an appropriation. If it had been declared to be an appropriation, certainly all we would need to do would be to vote against that clause, but we lose that opportunity because we would have to vote against the whole bill.

I submit to Your Honour, with a strong sense of urgency, that as ingenious as we might be it would be very difficult for us to find an amendment at third reading which would permit this House to divide on the question of the impropriety of what is proposed in clause 2 of this bill. I ask Your Honour to consider that particular suggestion.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the only difference between this amendment and the other two is the fact that this relates to clause 2 of the bill and the others relate to clause 1. With all due respect to the procedural knowledge of my hon. friend from Peace River, I may say that his talents have been much better employed on other occasions. In this case he has not attempted to make an argument in terms of rules or citations. He has rather made his argument in terms of "might have been". He is suggesting that if the rules had been different the result might have been different, or that if Your Honour's ruling had been different the result might have been different, or even that if his own amendment had been different and were not phrased the way it was but were phrased differently, the result might have been different. All those "might-have-been" arguments are interesting to listen to, but they contribute very little to the procedural discussion on this point. I would suggest that the ruling which you have already given applies in its entirety to this amendment.

• (1620)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I take it that when you were last on your feet you ruled out of order amendment No. 1 and that it is generally accepted that the same ruling applies to amendment No. 2. However, we are now discussing amendment No. 3. I would like to put in a word for the thousands of readers of Hansard who will be devouring the pages of this afternoon's debate to point out that thus far amendments No. 2 and 3 have not been put on the record. I think that at some point, either they should be read from the chair or some indication be made so that readers of Hansard will know what it is all about.

I wonder if I may comment briefly on the sad position in which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) says that he and his colleagues find themselves, namely, that they have no opportunity to vote directly on clause 2 of the bill. I am really amazed. All he needed to do was to file an amendment last Friday which would stop after the words "page 1" in the amendment that is now before the House. In other words, if he had simply said that Bill C-124, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be amended by deleting lines 6 to 27 inclusive on page 1—

Mr. Nielsen: That is negative.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a moment. Your Honour has already declared that if a bill has only one clause it is difficult to see how it is possible to put forth a report stage amendment to delete that one clause. It is just a negative of the proposition itself. But, Sir, you have allowed many times amendments to a bill at the report stage deleting individual clauses where a bill had more than one clause. If I may, for example, remind hon. members of the long debate we had on the Criminal Code amendments a few years ago where some of the clauses were offensive; we had votes on individual clauses simply on that kind of a motion, that clause such-and-such be deleted. Since there are two clauses and since, as the hon. member has said, they are different, they are not attached to each other, he could have done it that way.

If he missed that opportunity, and is a member without much experience in drafting such amendments, I can tell him that even today he can still draft an amendment when we get to third reading. I suggest that he can still draft an amendment which says that Bill C-124—is the hon. member taking this down—be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for the purpose of reconsidering clause 2. If he moves that amendment, he will get in the House, if he wants to, a recorded vote expressing the views of hon. members on clause 2. So I do not think we should waste too much sympathy on the hon. member being in a difficult position simply because he did not know how to draft his amendment.

With respect to the amendment itself—and I think we can be brief on it—I submit that it has the same flaws that amendments No. 1 and No. 2 had in that it goes beyond the bill to the act and that it goes beyond the confines of the Royal recommendation. When I was on my feet before, I read the first part of the Royal recommendation but I did not read the latter part because I was waiting until we reached amendment No. 3. The latter part of the recommendation reads:

> . . . and to provide that the amount authorized under Manpower and Immigration Vote L30a of Supplementary Estimates (A) 1972-73 shall be deemed an advance under that section and not an appropriation described in paragraph 133 (b) of that act.

That is a very clear recommendation. How you can propose an amendment that suggests the very opposite and say that that is within the terms of the Royal recommendation is really beyond me. So there are two points: first, that it goes beyond the bill to the act, and second, that it is outside of the terms of the Royal recommendation.

I submit that there is a third problem. My friend, the hon. member for Peace River, is still only a private member of this House. Things can change around here. He might be over on the other side some day, you know, but how can a private member move something that involves an appropriation—and that is what he is doing—asking that some $450 million which at the moment represents only a loan, be an appropriation charged to the Consolidated Revenue Fund? I submit that if he is going to do that, he has to have the Royal recommendation, but I do not think that he has as yet the authority to announce that he has the Royal recommendation. So, I think that this amendment is even more out of order than the other two and that the Chair should not be influenced by the plea that there is no way for members of the Official Opposition to show their displeasure with one or the other clause of the bill. It takes only a little ingenuity to achieve that situation.

Mr. Nielsen: I will not be making any submissions of length to you, Mr. Speaker, except to reserve a position which perhaps should be raised at this time so that on third reading I am not met with the same argument that I was met with on second reading before the bill went to committee. I refer to the resolution and its terminology and the clause in the bill itself and its terminology, the use in the first line of clause 2 of the word "authorized". Clause 2 uses the language of the resolution. It reads:

Unemployment Insurance Act

The amount authorized for the purposes of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 in the fiscal year ending on the 31st day of March, 1973, under Manpower and Immigration Vote L30a of the Supplementary Estimates A 1972-73 tabled in the House of Commons on the 8th day of January, 1973 shall, notwithstanding any other provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 . . .

The resolution uses the term "authorized" and Your Honour will recall that I raised the argument at the time that the bill was anticipatory of the work of the committee and that since the committee had not yet authorized the estimate, the bill could not be dealt with. On deeper reflection, I believe that the terminology used goes beyond the authorization which was granted on division in the committee and goes to the appropriation bill itself. I believe that the resolution which accompanied Bill C-124 contemplated that the authorization of which it spoke in the resolution was an authorization by the appropriation bill. In that sense, I believe that the consideration of this clause at this time is anticipatory and consequently out of order.

I raise the matter at this time because of something that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said. He said that the amendment of the hon. member for Peace River directed itself toward the Unemployment Insurance Act, when nothing could be further from the truth because what clause 2 of the bill seeks to do is to reverse the effect of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, and this has nothing whatsoever to do with the Unemployment Insurance Act. I raise the matter now, Your Honour, simply because when third reading comes along I do not want to be confronted with the admonition by Your Honour that it should have been raised at an earlier point.

• (1630)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in support of the submission made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on the point of order which he has now placed before the House, there can be no question but that this matter was dealt with earlier on second reading. At that time there was a certain hesitation displayed by many of us arising from a reading of Bill C-124, in particular of clause 2, which in effect anticipated the ending of something which was then occurring in another place, namely, the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee.

At that time the matter was dealt with in a very general way. As I recall, there were several cogent arguments placed before Mr. Speaker, both pro and con, with the ultimate result that there was no disposition of the matter.

As I say, at that particular time several arguments were placed before Mr. Speaker for his consideration, one of them coming from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, in his wisdom, indicated that the bill could be proceeded with on second reading, be dealt with in committee, returned from committee and be dealt with on report stage. However, there was some question in his mind, as there is still in my mind at this stage, as to whether we could approach third reading of the bill while we were still seized with the dilemma with respect to something occurring in another place.

Mr. Nielsen: That is what he said.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Alexander: I do not want to take the hon. member's words out of context. I am paraphrasing his contribution, but I think that he would say I am doing it correctly. The problem we are faced with here is quite simple. The Miscellaneous Estimates Committee did sit, and it dealt with many other votes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall allow the hon. member to continue, if he wants to, in a short while, but my understanding is that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was raising this matter by way of a caveat, at the moment, so that he would not be stopped from raising this very important and interesting point when we reach third reading, which we have not yet reached.

My understanding is that at this point we are considering arguments either for or against the procedural acceptability of the third motion under Standing Order 75, the one which stands in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). When we dispose of it and go to third reading, that is the point at which we would want to hear the arguments now being put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West in support of those which, I assume, will then be placed before us by the hon. member for Yukon. If the hon. member agrees, I think we might proceed on that basis.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly follow your suggestion, but I just wished to emphasize the point of order raised by my colleague as a caveat. In any event, I believe it was couched in such language that it could be interpreted as a point of order. I agree that we are now dealing with arguments with respect to the admissibility of the amendment standing in the name of my colleague from Peace River.

Mr. Speaker: Again I thank hon. members for their assistance to me in reaching a decision in relation to the motion which stands in the name of the hon. member for Peace River. It was my thought, as indicated a moment ago, that many of the comments and reflections put forward addressed themselves to all three motions.

I have the same difficulties, basically, in relation to the motion of the hon. member for Peace River, which is why I had assumed that I could at that point go ahead with the seeking of concurrence on the part of hon. members. I have heard the additional arguments suggested for the guidance of the Chair, and I would have to rule that what I said before in relation to Motions Nos. 1 and 2 also applies to the third motion.

Essentially, the motion of the hon. member for Peace River is a new proposition which he is submitting for the consideration of the House. I would quote citations 246(3) and 250(4), to which allusion has been made earlier, and an additional reference could be made to paragraph (5) on page 509 of May's eighteenth edition where it is stated:

An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on the second reading, is not admissible.

This is in relation to the principle of the bill. There are also the difficulties relating to the royal recommendation, to which I referred earlier, and which, it seems to me, still face use squarely.

I would like to suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that there is at least something to what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding the possibility of having this very important point considered on third reading. As I said before, I would certainly hope there is that opportunity. I would think it should be consistent with the rights of the House that we find, through our procedures, a method to have this matter put to a vote and I would hope that in the course of the third reading stage, whenever that is reached, a method will be advanced by hon. members.

This could be done by an amendment which would be acceptable to the Chair procedurally, which would make it possible to have debate on that specific point, and a division of the House, if that is what hon. members seek. For the moment, to make sure that everything is at least half clear, I will refer to motions Nos. 2 and 3 so that they can be placed clearly on the record.

Motion No. 2 stands in the name of the hon. member for Yukon. Mr. Nielsen, seconded by Mr. Wagner, moves:

That Bill C-124, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be amended by deleting lines 4 and 5 on page 1 and substituting therefor the following:

[Translation]

"1. Subsection 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(4) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, the total amount outstanding at any time of advances made under this section shall not exceed nine hundred million dollars.'"

[English]

Motion No. 3 is as follows: R. Baldwin, seconded by Mr. Wagner moves:

That Bill C-124, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be amended by deleting lines 6 to 27 inclusive on page 1 and substituting therefor the following:

[Translation]

"2. Such amount, if any, as may be authorized for the purposes of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 in the fiscal year ending on the 31st day of March, 1973, under Manpower and Immigration Vote L30a of the Supplementary Estimates (A), 1972-73, tabled in the House of Commons on the 8th day of January, 1973, shall, notwithstanding any other provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be deemed to be an appropriation described in paragraph 133(b) of that Act.".

I suppose that it is now clear that these three motions, namely Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3, were deemed out of order, and that the House is now proceeding to the next stage, that is consideration of the motion of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

[English]

Mr. Andras moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Andras move that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, without being repetitious I believe I laid the groundwork with respect to a caveat, and I should like to enter it now. I notice that in terms of height and personality, the occupant of the Chair has changed but I think that the wisdom that comes from the Chair is still with us. We now have a Speaker who was not in the chair about five minutes ago, but since it was he who dealt with this matter of the bill being anticipatory, we are glad to see him. I would remind Your Honour of the problem we brought to his attention on January 25 when we commenced second reading of the bill. At that time, a point of order was raised that we on this side of the House found some difficulty in proceeding with the bill. Arguments were presented, which Mr. Speaker followed in his usual courteous manner, to the effect that Bill C-124, in clause (2), deals with a matter which was before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee as Vote L30a. We all know what it is about.

• (1640)

Notwithstanding that the Vote was dealt with in committee, I submit it has not been authorized yet, that is the authorization of $454 million by way of Governor General's warrants which the government now wants to call an advance rather than an appropriation. I respectfully submit that until such time as Vote L30a is authorized, not only coming from the miscellaneous estimates committee by way of a division but authorized by way of the Appropriations Act, we are faced with a very peculiar situation. Apparently in error—I do not know whether it is in error or not—the government thought that this would be an excellent way of having the House deal with a bill which anticipates. I cannot see how we can go into third reading now unless a bill has been passed, of which I have no knowledge, which would then bring the word "authorized" into full play and acceptability. I respectfully state that the word "authorized" must have some meaning at this particular time. The proper interpretation of the word is that the appropriation bill has been passed; it is in order; that what is supposed to have occurred somewhere else has already occurred. I submit that it has not.

I am pleased to note what my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—whom I like to quote now and again because I say one should give credit where credit is due—said on January 25 as reported in Hansard in the right hand column of page 652. He made a very cogent argument—

Mr. Nielsen: Try where he starts wracking his brain.

Mr. Alexander: I see the hon. member has already found it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I told you where to look.

Mr. Alexander: There is one thing, Mr. Speaker, that we have not forgotten. We believe that when an argument is based upon wisdom, experience and knowledge of the House rules, one should never forget it. The hon. member was dealing with the problem he knew we would have to face because it seems to me that we cannot deal with an anticipatory bill and he said:

> Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point as to whether or not we should proceed with this bill, I confess I have been wracking my brain trying to recall something that has happened in this area but I am sure that the gentlemen at the table will be able to find it. I believe there have been rulings that would support the contention of my hon. friend to this extent—

With all due respect, I think he was not talking about me at this particular time. I have no expertise so I think he was talking about others who have the expertise, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Baldwin: He says I have not got it.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member continued:

> —that it would not be procedurally correct for the House of Commons to give the bill third and final reading—in other words, not possible to pass the bill finally—if it contained in it a reference to something that was not at that point a fact. I do not think we could give third and final reading to the bill until the House had authorized the supplementary estimate referred to therein.

What august thought do we have in this regard? He said it is questionable that we should even deal with it, much less pass it. I see my hon. friend is now wracking his brain, wondering how he could have made such a mistake.

I belabour the point, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is one of some importance. I do not want to get mean or nasty, but at times there have been some devious interplays taking place around here with respect to this and other bills and it is time this matter came to a head. Surely, we cannot deal with this bill when nothing has happened in terms of the final disposition or authorization Vote L30a. One has to admit being subject to error, but I do not think I am in this regard. With proper anticipation I can come to no other conclusion than that Bill C-124, clause 2 refers to the amount authorized. My point is that the amount was not authorized and we are estopped from dealing with this bill at this time, unless we can agree to sever it and deal with the part that eliminates the ceiling. There is some difficulty in reaching a consensus on whether there should be a ceiling or not but that can be dealt with easily. An easy way to get around this legal dilemma is to agree that we deal with one clause at a time until such time as we know that Vote L30a has been passed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have tried to follow the argument made by my hon. friend, but I must say that the more I listen to lawyers in the House of Commons the more I wonder why they go to law school.

Mr. Baldwin: Who is your counsel over there? Who is the dean?

Mr. MacEachen: I, of course, do not include you in that, Sir. I want to make it absolutely clear that I would not cast any reflections on any member of the legal profession. In this argument my hon. friend said that we are confronted with an anticipation. It is said that there are two bills—actually there are not two bills. There are notices of motions on the order paper and they have been considered by a standing committee of the House. They relate to the supplementary estimates. That is one proceeding to which my hon. friend referred. The second proceeding is the bill now before the House at the report stage. The argument of my hon. friend is that the bill now before the House anticipates the matter that is to be legislated following approval of the motion.

• (1650)

Mr. Nielsen: What motion?

Mr. MacEachen: The motion that constitutes the supplementary estimates. They are in the form of motions now, and will be concurred in as motions.

Mr. Nielsen: You hope.

Mr. Baldwin: The government already has that guarantee, has it? It has already worked out that deal?

Mr. MacEachen: The supplementary estimates are filed as motions. If they succeed in passing, they form the basis for an appropriation bill. At the moment they are in the form of motions.

Erskine May's Seventeenth Edition deals with the rule of anticipation. Page 399 of that authority reads:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already apppointed for consideration by the House . . . whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion.

Mr. Baldwin: But Erskine May did not contemplate a government like the present one.

Mr. MacEachen: If that wording makes any sense at all, it must mean that the motion which anticipates will produce the same legislative effect. If it is to have any meaning, it must mean that and nothing else. In other words, it cannot have a different legislative effect.

Mr. Baldwin: Better talk to Otto.

Mr. MacEachen: In my opinion, that is pretty sound logic, because the legislative effect of the motion that was passed for the supplementary estimates was not that of defining an advance or appropriation; the effect of carrying that motion was that of providing certain sums of money, nothing more and nothing less than that. That is what happened in that committee. What this bill is seeking to do—

Mr. Nielsen: It has not happened yet.

Mr. MacEachen: But it happened in the standing committee.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, but it has not happened here yet.

Mr. MacEachen: Not here, yet. What is proposed in this bill is merely to make it absolutely clear that that legislative effect in the standing committee will be defined as an appropriation rather than an advance. In other words, it is a clarifying and defining statement.

I simply say that the matters are not the same. They are different although related, of course. What matters in the legislative process are not related? Of course they are related, but they are not matters already appointed for consideration by the House and cannot be anticipated by a motion. I simply say they are different matters.

If I am to have really sound authority for validating my argument, I ought to go back to the ruling made from the Chair recently. That relied on the following words found at page 399 of Erskine May's Seventeenth Edition:

> ... the rule against anticipation ... is that a matter must not be anticipated if it is contained in a more effective form of proceeding than the proceeding by which it is sought to be anticipated ... but it may be anticipated if it is contained in an equally or less effective form.

It is obvious, if one goes that distance and concludes that the same matter is dealt with in both proceedings, that one must conclude with Mr. Deputy Speaker that a bill is a more effective form of proceeding that a motion. Certainly, that is my position and that is the gist of the conclusion arrived at by the Chair a few days ago.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to add anything further of substance to the point I raised on January 25 and again today. I do, however, want to comment on something the President of the Privy Council said. The more he listens to lawyers in this House, the more he wonders why people go to law school. Sir, the more I listen to the minister and the interpretations he places on May, Beauchesne and other authorities, the more I see the need for more lawyers to understand those interpretations.

Mr. MacEachen: Touché.

Mr. Nielsen: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre owes the House the obligation of participating in the debate of this point of order if for no other reason than that of explaining the position he took on January 25. I would think it has not changed, although perhaps between that time and the present there may be some results from that brain wracking he was doing when he made his remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that one is so warmly invited to take the floor. I am happy to respond to the invitation. May I say that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), when he quoted my remarks, quoted them in full and did not take any of them out of context. What he said I said, I said.

Mr. Nielsen: But?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And, there it is.

Mr. Nielsen: But?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, I point out that I made those remarks conditionally and, in particular I asked Your Honour to put the gentlemen at the table to work in trying to find the precedents I could not recall when wracking my brain, to repeat the phrase I used on January 25.

I must say, Sir, that since that date I have given this matter more thought and concluded that there were one or two flaws in my argument. For example, if it is true, and Your Honour may so find, that we cannot pass Bill C-124 because the estimate referred to has not been authorized, it means not just that the bill authorizing that estimate has to pass third reading in this House, but that it must also be dealt with in the other place and be given Royal Assent by His Excellency, the governor general, or his deputy. I think, if one were to push the things I said on January 25 that far, that would be the position, and it does raise certain questions. I am still convinced that there have been occasions on which we have had to stop something because of something else, and I was hoping that the gentlemen at the table might find them. Hence I am leaving this matter for Your Honour to rule on it.

Further, there is this point to be raised: the language of clause 2 of Bill C-124 refers to an amount authorized pursuant to supplementary estimates. Supposing we were to pass this bill, and supposing those supplementary estimates are never authorized. In that case this bill, even if it becomes law, would not have any effect. That must be a point Your Honour ought to take into consideration. I freely admit I said those things recorded in Hansard of January 25, although I submit they were said mainly to help us over the hurdle at that point, namely, the difficulty over proceeding with second reading. However, I think the matter must be given further consideration by Your Honour before Your Honour renders a final decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do other hon. members wish to make a contribution to this debate? May I have some indication whether other hon. members wish to contribute, before we proceed to our five o'clock business? I see the parliamentary secretary will participate. A decision will be rendered thereafter as to which comes first, the chicken or the egg, hopefully without the Chair laying the egg.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Veterans Affairs—Disability pensions—Request for statement on steps to expedite decisions on applications; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Harbours—Transfer of administration of small craft harbours to Department of the Environment; the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—Communications—Bell Canada rate increase application—Inquiry as to opposition by government.

It being five o'clock, the House will proceed to private members business, namely, notices of motions.

• (1700)

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, in order to be helpful, if you stand them all until item 13, this will meet with the approval of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreeable to the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPLICATION OF FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES PROVISION OF LABOUR CODE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce amendments to the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code to ensure that all the provision of the Canada Labour Code relating to fair employment practices will apply to the public service of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, I am mindful from reading the Canada Labour Code of the progression of history in labour relations that is evident from the pages of the Statutes of Canada, a history that began when there was no Labour Code or no such legislation, but carried itself through the years until the passage of this statute in the 1966-67 session of this House and its subsequent approval and coming into force.

The purpose of that statute was to govern equitably the relationships between employers and employees in this country, particularly with respect to those areas of jurisdiction which were within the competence of this parliament. In so doing, I think it commanded the respect of both employers and employees. As a result, it is fair to say, with some exceptions, that in so far as the statute applies, this is a reasonable Labour Code. It constitutes a reasonable step along the road to the point of perfection which all of us would like to reach and toward which all of us strive.

Section 2 of the statute is important. It defines the categories which are deemed by the statute to be federal words, undertaking or business. The unfortunate thing about the definition section is that nowhere is it specifically defined that employees of the government of Canada who are subject to the Public Service Commission are covered by the very worthwhile provisions relating to fair employment practices in the statute.

Section 5 is the next important section. It deals with what is generally called prohibited employment practices. It reads:

No employer shall refuse to employ or to continue to employ, or otherwise discriminate against any person in regard to employment or any term or condition of employment because of his race, national origin, colour or religion.

The next important section deals with equal pay. This is Part II of the statute. There is a provision in section 14 to establish a fair wage officer. The section on application is important. It applies to, and I quote:

(a) employment upon or in connection with any federal work, undertaking or business;

(b) employers engaged in any federal work, undertaking or business;

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

(c) employees employed upon or in connection with any federal, undertaking or business; and

(d) employment of employees by any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the Government of Canada;

In effect, it says that within all those matters within the jurisdiction of the federal government, even to that type of business which is done on behalf of the government by agencies of the Crown, the Crown corporations are covered by the Provisions of the Section but the Public Service of Canada is not so covered, at least with respect to equal pay.

Section 7 of the statute establishes penalties. The statute goes on to deal with hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacation, general holidays and all other matters.

I want to deal specifically with Part II of this statute which has to do with equal pay for female employees. Nowhere does this appear to apply to the Public Service of Canada. Section 16(1) reads, and I quote:

No employer shall employ a female employee for any work at a rate of pay that is less than the rate of pay at which a male employee is employed by that employer for identical or substantially identical work.

Section 16(2) deals with the criteria for deciding what work is, in fact, equal and how one would decide what work is substantially identical. There are exceptions, however, which do not apply to the matter before us.

Section 17 of the statute provides an important protection with respect to the discharge or some other form of discrimination against any person because that person has made a complaint, given evidence, or assisted in any way with regard to the initiation or prosecution of a complaint under that section of the act which is meant to protect with respect to equal pay. There is an adequate enforcement procedure set forth in section 18.

Section 23 permits the minister to make certain orders in an appropriate case for the establishment of equality in that particular field. With respect to the question of equal pay, the statute provides an admirable procedure for the protection of female employees of the government of Canada, but the application of Part II of the statute is very limited as I have said. It is limited because of the limitation contained in the definition section. I have searched to see whether there is some portion of the Public Service Employment Act in which this protection would apply to public servants and I am sorry to say I have failed to find any. I am satisfied it is not an omission which has been perpetrated for any bad purpose, but it is nonetheless an omission which is important for those who seek employment in the public service of Canada.

• (1710)

I had occasion when considering the matters we were about to discuss to review the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the impact of women in terms of numbers, output and ability on the public service of Canada. It is interesting to note that at the time of the publication of this report—no doubt the figures have changed since then—27.3 per cent of the public service was made up of women, a very high proportion. Approximately 42 per cent of these women were single, 43 per cent were married and 15 per cent were widowed, separated or divorced at the time of the Report. Of those women who were married, 55 per cent supported one or more children.

The government of Canada is the largest employer of women, and, indeed, the largest employer in Canada. At the time of the report there were some 475,000 persons employed by the government of Canada of whom 25 per cent were located in the national capital area, part of which I have the honour to represent. There is a statement in the report of the Commission which I believe to be extremely important. It sets forth more clearly than I could ever do the importance of women in the scheme of things for the government of this country. The following appears at page 105 of the report:

> The position of women employees in the Government of Canada deserves close examination, not only because the government employs a large number of women in a great variety of occupations but because government employment practices should demonstrate its principles. Since Canada has officially subscribed to principles recognizing women's rights to equality of opportunity, the Canadian government must ensure that its employment laws, policies and practices reflect and implement these principles. The government should also make its own adherence to principle conspicuous to other employers.

I am sure there is no one in this House who would disagree with that statement. I believe there is no better way of doing as the Royal Commission suggested than by the government making its adherence to principle conspicuous to other employers by establishing within the statutes governing employment, that at least as far as women are concerned there should be no discrimination on the basis of sex or any other aspect. Some may say provision for this is already in the statute. But I have examined the Public Service Employment Act, and I find that though there is some statement with respect to the question of discrimination on the ground of sex it is not as embracing as I think all of us would like it to be.

I am referring specifically to sections 10 and 12 of that statute governing the appointment and selection standards of the public service. It is stated that appointments within the public service shall be based on selection according to merit "as determined by the Commission and shall be made by the Commission at the request of the deputy head concerned." And so on. Section 12 gives the Commission the power to set selection standards. It reads:

> The Commission may, in determining pursuant to section 10 the basis of assessment and merit in relation to any position or class of positions, prescribe selection standards as to education, knowledge, experience, language, age, residence or any other matters which in the opinion of the Commission are necessary or desirable . . .

Then, with respect to selection, subsection (2) reads:

> The Commission, in prescribing selection standards under subsection (1) shall not discriminate against any person by reason of sex, race, national origin, colour or religion.

These are good phrases. But my point is that they only apply to one field of legislative protection, that is, in relation to selection. There is nothing in the act with respect to men or women in relation to sex, national origin, colour or religion to give them protection in carrying on their duties in the particular positions to which they are appointed.

There is, as well, in section 10 a bald statement that questions with respect to merit should be determined by the Commission. While I am prepared to say that the Commission ought to have the authority to employ reasonably, I am not prepared to say in the same breath that the employees of that Commission and the employees of the government of Canada generally ought not to be given the reasonable protection which is provided by the Canada Labour Code, protection which has proved effective on the industrial side, protection which is accorded in most of the provinces of Canada and which should be granted to women and to others in the public service of Canada. As I say, as the largest employer in the country, the government should be expected to provide leadership.

I recognize that this is a question which has been subject to some debate. I think its importance has been crystalized in the growing concern that has centred on the concept of delegation of authority. Section 31 of the statute deals with this matter. It reads:

> Where an employee, in the opinion of the deputy head, is incompetent in performing the duties of the position he occupies, or is incapable of performing those duties—

The section goes on to outline what may happen in that event. Mr. Speaker, justice can vary with the length of the chancellor's foot, so to speak and many instances of this unfortunate variation have come to my attention. With respect to this matter and many others, there should be incorporated into the statute the protection which is afforded under the Canada Labour Code. The statutes considered and passed by this parliament, as opposed to regulations which we as Members of Parliament never see, ought to be the basis for the rights I want to see protected, confirmed and advanced. I proposed this motion because I believed that the government should always be in the van of labour-management relations. It should always be pointing the way to the industries and other undertakings in Canada so that these industries and undertakings can look to the federal government for leadership and for example. I believe that by establishing in the acts set forth in the motion the fair employment practices as suggested by the motion the government would be providing this leadership.

• (1720)

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is significant that I rise following the learned speech of my colleague and friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who in his opening address to this House a few weeks ago was pleased to state that in one sense I am a constituent of his. And, indeed, that is so; but in another and very real sense the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is a constituent of mine. He comes to this chamber every day to perform his parliamentary duties, and in so doing comes into the riding I am very pleased to represent.

On many occasions in the past, the hon. member and I have practised our profession in a friendly or adversary way in this community, and I am sure that during our joint careers in this House we will have the same opportunity to engage in this type of friendly debate. It is the kind of debate that is designed for all hon. members of the House, and on this occasion seeks to provide for the public service of Canada the best possible fair employment practices.

The motion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should introduce amendments to the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code to ensure that all the provisions of the Canada Labour Code relating to fair employment practices will apply to the public service of Canada.

The hon. member is referring, I submit, primarily to part I of the Canada Labour Code, which is that part of the statute that deals specifically with fair employment practices. He has, of course, also referred to other parts of the act to which I shall briefly make reference. However, at the moment I should like to review the existing fair employment practices that are in fact now available to all public servants through the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and the board and commission set up under those acts to see that the acts are fairly and justly administered in the interests of all public servants across this country.

In addition to the acts I have mentioned, there is an order in council dated November 9, 1972. The intent of this Order in Council was to remove any vestiges of discrimination which might have theretofore existed with respect to employment practices within the public service. The order in council, P.C. 1972-2569, reads as follows:

His Excellency, the Governor General in Council on the recommendation of the President of the Treasury Board and the Secretary of State, pursuant to paragraph 5(f) of the Public Service Employment Act, is pleased hereby to assign to the Public Service Commission, the duty to investigate any complaint of alleged discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, national origin, colour or religion in respect of the application or operation of the act.

The order in council to which I have referred, together with the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act, indeed provide to the public servants of Canada and ensures to them fair and just hiring practices; and, after hiring, fair and just labour relations practices that are as good or better than those applicable to any other public service in North America.

Having said that, I believe, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has said, that no system is perfect, that we must strive to find perfection. We must continually scrutinize all our legislation to ensure it meets the needs of a rapidly changing society.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, today there was a release by the Public Service of Canada with respect to that specific order in council. The release stated that the Public Service Commission of Canada had recently been authorized to investigate complaints of alleged discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, national origin, colour or religion in respect of the application of the Public Service Employment Act. The public service of Canada is not covered by the Fair Employment Practices Act administered by the Department of Labour, and consequently the commission was assigned to this duty by the order in council which stipulates that the commission shall perform such other duties and functions with reference to the public service as are assigned to it by the Governor in Council.

The Public Service Commission has in fact established an investigation branch to carry out these responsbilities. The branch is autonomous and its officers will carry out their investigations wherever and however they consider necessary. The investigation branch will not, however, process complaints received from personnel employed within the Public Service Commission itself; such complaints will be investigated and dealt with by investigators from outside the commission who will act independently.

The responsibilities of the appeal branch of the commission remain the same and will not be replaced by those of the investigation branch. Where a person alleges that his or her failure to be selected for promotion, or that the decision to have him or her released or demoted, was due to discrimination and this person has the right of appeal under section 31 of the Public Service Employment Act, an appeal should be filed with the commission's appeal branch.

The appeal board established to conduct inquiries into such allegations will be able to call upon the investigation branch to investigate and report upon the matter. Upon receipt of the report of the investigation branch, the appeal board will render its decision on the basis of all the evidence available. Inquiries or complaints concerning the announcement that was made today may be addressed to the investigation branch of the Public Service Commission here in Ottawa.

This indeed provides additional investigatory powers so that those items of discrimination which might be termed unfair labour practices can be investigated by a body that has no allegiance to the employer or the employee, thereby ensuring that discrimination, or any act that may appear to be discrimination, is examined and the proper remedy applied.

It is a recognized fact that the passage of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act in 1967 was a major step forward in the general field of hiring practices and labour relations with respect to public servants in Canada. Indeed, it has been recognized and examined as a model to be followed by many other countries who have sent delegations to Canada to examine the workings of these two acts. This legislation has attracted international attention, and it is my understanding that the delegates who have examined the operation of these acts in Canada have in almost all cases commented favourably upon them as being bold, imaginative and progressive legislation.

However, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognized, as he stated on October 21, 1972, that during the five years since these acts were passed much valuable experience has been obtained in a relatively short period of time. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated:

• (1730)

In the light of that experience, many comments have been made about the strength and the weaknesses of the present system.

He went on to assure the public servants of this country that the government is prepared at all times to reconsider any legislation on the basis of experience.

I would like now to briefly examine the existing legislation I have referred to from the point of view of the objectives of that legislation and the manner in which those objectives are implemented on a day to day basis by the commission or the board set up under the respective acts. The Public Service Employment Act, which establishes the Public Service Commission, provides by section 8:

—the commission has the exclusive right and authority to make appointments to or from within the public service—

This includes the appointment, appraisal, promotion, demotion, transfer, lay-off or release of employees. The commission by legislation is under specific direction that it shall not discriminate against any person by reason of sex, race, national origin, colour or religion.

In addition to the mandatory obligation of the commission not to discriminate on the grounds I have just mentioned, order in council 1972-2569 has imposed upon the commission the additional obligation to investigate any complaint brought to the attention of the commission where there is an allegation of discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, national origin, colour or religion relating to the appointment, appraisal, promotion, demotion, transfer, lay-off or release of employees. Furthermore, any allegation of any discrimination resulting in disciplinary action may be the subject of a grievance, and if the employee's grievance has not been dealt with to his satisfaction he may refer the grievance to adjudication under the Public Service Staff Relations Act if the disciplinary action resulted in discharge, suspension or financial penalty.

Where any such grievance is referred to adjudication, the adjudicator is obliged to give both parties to the grievance an opportunity of being heard which, of course, includes the right of the grievor to be represented by counsel. After consideration of the grievance, the decision of the adjudicator is final and binding upon both parties. It may be trite to say, Mr. Speaker, that the adjudicators are completely independent of the employer or the employee and are appointed by the governor in council. Such appointment is made by the governor in council on the recommendation not of the employer but of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the legislation presently covering fair labour practices under the Public Service Employment Act and the Public Service Staff Relations Act provides all of the fair employment practices that are defined in the Canada Labour Code and to which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has referred. Therefore, the adoption by this House of the motion presently under debate would not provide any additional protection to employees of the public service with respect to fair employment practices, but would only serve to add confusion to an already complex situation.

If the motion were to be carried by this House it would add a conflict whereby a minister of the Crown, namely, the Minister of Labour who administers the Canada Labour Code, could find himself in a difficult position were a dispute to arise within the Department of Labour. Then the Minister of Labour who is charged with the administration of the Canada Labour Code would be charged with the additional responsibility of investigating the complaint where he or his department may be named as a defendant.

For example, a grievor may say he was unjustly dismissed from the Department of Labour. He might at that point name as defendants the Department of Labour and the Minister of Labour. The grievance might be such that it would be subject to investigation and examination by the investigators in the Department of Labour who are answerable only to the Minister of Labour. The Minister of Labour might also at this time be a defendant in the grievance procedure, in which case the Minister of Labour would be the investigating body which would have jurisdiction over the tribunal which would hear the grievance and might at the same time be a defendant himself.

Such a patent and obvious conflict of interest would cast suspicion upon the just administration of the Canada Labour Code in relation to the public service, and thus could bring into disrespect a system of fair labour practice presently existing within the public service without providing any additional benefit to the public service by implementation of the Canada Labour Code in relation to the Public Service of Canada. Such an obvious conflict of interest is clearly unacceptable and cannot be permitted to exist.

In the previous parliament this government proposed additional protections against discriminatory practices in the areas of marital status and age. This bill, unfortunately, died on the order paper. This proposal is one which I would support. I hope that the government would bring it in at the earliest opportunity, together with other amendments which in the light of experience would be advisable at this time. The bill presented in the previous parliament to which I have referred was Bill C-206 which provided for the following amendment:

The commission, in prescribing or applying selection standards under subsection (1) shall not discriminate against any person by reason of sex, race, national origin, colour, religion, marital status or age.

This, in effect, would add marital status and age which are not presently contained in the legislation. This would be a specific direction that the commission should not discriminate on these grounds. I would hope that that bill would be brought in again by this government. In addition, some improvement could be made to these acts by making other matters subject to arbitration. This House was advised in the Speech from the Throne as follows:

You will be asked to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has stated publicly that there will be proposals made to parliament for amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. He has stated that experience gained since the inception of the act has indicated that there are a number of subjects which cannot be arbitrated now but which in his view should be. There are some specific items that are not now subject to arbitration but which should be examined further to determine whether they should properly be made subject to arbitration under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The proper time to discuss the specific changes is when the government brings forth the legislation referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

Many items that have general application across the public service are referred, with the consent of both the union and the employer, to the National Joint Council for thorough examination and a recommendation is made by the NJC often leading to improved benefits or policy across the public service. This joint consultation has been a very satisfactory means of settling matters which would be extremely difficult to resolve at 80 bargaining tables. The recent medicare and hospitalization premium improvements are an excellent illustration of the product of effective and joint consultation.

I fully agree with the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that there should be no discrimination on the basis of sex or marital status within the public service. However, I would submit that at the present time there is no discrimination on the basis of sex or marital status within the public service under the existing legislation. Coming, as I do, from a house full of women, I am very conscious of the fact that there should be no such discrimination. Indeed, if I were to advocate or support it I would be in trouble in my own home.

Recently I had the opportunity as a member of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates to witness at first hand the excellence of the Canadian public service. Supplementary estimates were brought before that committee by many government departments. The Department of Agriculture provided information to the committee through senior public servants with respect to crop loss to farmers in eastern Canada as a result of adverse weather conditions. Their in-depth knowledge of the affairs of the department was of great help to me and to all who were sitting on that committee and it is indeed reassuring to know that the policies of this parliament are being executed by public servants of such high calibre.

The same can be said of the public servants who provided factual information to the committee with respect to their department, whether the Department of the Environment, the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Finance, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of National Health and Welfare; indeed, all of the departments which had supplementary estimates to be considered at the most recent sitting of the committee. On many occasions the public servants who were witnesses were subject to in-depth probing and cross-examination by members of all parties who were on that committee as well as other Members of Parliament who asked questions.

It was my observation that the public servants in all cases showed a mastery of the particular field in which they were interested and provided the committee with useful and factual information with respect to their particular subject. What I witnessed recently in that committee confirms again the true excellence of our public service. Such a public service should, indeed, have the benefit of fair and just personnel relations policies.

Although many of those who testified before the miscellaneous estimates committee were senior public servants and therefore not within the bargaining unit, I am sure they would be the first to acknowledge with me that they would be unable to do their job as efficiently or as well without the assistance of the majority of public servants who are within the bargaining unit.

In summary, therefore, it would appear from a review of the legislation respecting labour relations practices within the public service that amendments to these two acts to incorporate the provisions of the Canada Labour Code would, in fact, add no significant benefits to the public servants that do not already exist and are available to them under the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Public Service Employment Act, but that amendments such as suggested by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would only add, as I have indicated earlier, confusion to what is already a complex field of labour relations. They might, in fact, detract from the benefits now enjoyed under these acts and the order in council referred to and presently available to the public service.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my contribution to this afternoon's debate I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) on his maiden speech. I suggest that he gave us a very scholarly defence of the status quo; nevertheless, it does not take away from the kind of intelligence he put into the preparation and the presentation of his remarks.

I support the motion put before us by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I would like to say, also, that I was impressed by the kind of detailed information, deep thought and study that he has demonstrated before us this afternoon. We have had an afternoon in which we have been treated to the fascination of procedural debates which are a little like chamber music; they are great for the participants but sometimes they are hell to listen to. Nevertheless, I would say that this is not the first time I have interested myself in the concerns of public servants not only in the capital area but also in my own riding.

I can report with some accuracy, I think, that the morale of the many thousands of public servants we have in Canada is probably not at its greatest apex or peak, and this has been true for the last four or five years. I think the concern is real enough and it should be apparent to the government that the loss of three Ottawa seats last October 30 indicates that perhaps all is not well, as some of us may have been led to believe by the words of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, because these Ottawa ridings have heavy populations of civil servants.

While it is convenient, perhaps, to lay the blame on the loss of these three seats on some racist demagoguery of some candidates—I hasten to add that probably in the heat of the campaign some hasty and unfortunate statements were made—as one who supported, and still supports, the bilingual policy and the bilingual legislation behind that policy I think it is as accurate to say that there has been a heavy-handed implementation of that policy which has but added to the already massive frustration and uncertainty felt by many public servants.

If we as employers desire to be more civil to civil servants, we must be more sensitive to the legitimate aspirations of public servants and their demand for stable and enlightened treatment by the largest employer in the country—the government of Canada. In fact, the government of Canada has an obligation in my view—not just the responsibility, but more than that; an obligation—to be a model for the country on labour and management relations. This has not been the case in the past. It is responsible for the large amount of resentment which festers among an otherwise excellent group of public employees and causes them, I think, to perform in a less positive manner in many cases than if their sensitivity to some of the other problems that face them has been recognized by the government.

I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton was fairly accurate in pointing out at least what some of these problems might be. There is a good deal more behind the declining morale of public servants than the uncertainty caused by the bilingual program. I refer to the words related to the treatment of women within the public service dealing with promotional opportunities, which most times we can say are dubious at best.

I think we can also say that the hon. member's points related to equal pay and opportunities to proceed without the kind of male-female discrimination that abounds are well taken. We should recognize that discriminations exist. This is one of the reasons a woman was appointed not long ago to be one of the three commissioners; it was recognized that the opportunities for women in the public service were not equivalent to those of men, despite the fact that approximately one quarter of the government's employees are women.

However, I think there is much more to the problem than is stated in the motion and there are a number of other areas with which we should examine apart from the specific details cited as one act that relates to this act which relates to some other act. I think perhaps it is insufficient to get to a legal interpretation and hang one argument on one clause and then move to another clause. I am probably presenting this kind of defence because I am not prepared to do otherwise this afternoon. I do not, however, think that is the matter before us. Both hon. members have outlined the pros and cons and the details of the problem, one mildly defending the government and the other mildly attacking it.

There are a number of more general questions: for instance, reclassification has been going on since 1967 and has not yet been completed to date. Naturally, the delay creates a certain amount of unrest and instability among members of the public service. Even among members of the professional institute alone there is a tremendous reclassification backlog, stretching over a period of almost six years. We should not ignore delays like that. I repeat that I do not think we can lay the blame for all the uncertainty that faces public servants solely on the bilingualism act: that attitude is superficial; it is merely looking for an easy way out along the road toward some kind of bigotry and I do not think it is necessarily the case at all.

We must also face the question of bargaining rights. The dispute over clause 7 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act has gone on for years and years. For the sake of hon. members who do not know what clause 7 implies, I will read it. It provides:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the right or authority of the employer—

That is the government.

> —to determine the organization of the public service and to assign duties to and classify positions therein.

What kind of bargaining rights are those? Doesn't this place massive power in the hands of the government to control almost everything in the public service, everything related to decent kinds of employment practices and fair employment practices and leave virtually little of importance to the public servant? What happened recently in the postal dispute? In my view the government was unable to settle that dispute as quickly as possible because the arbitrator in his recommendations went beyond the terms of clause 7. As a matter of fact, he recommended that certain matters which had previously been completely within the prerogative of the government should henceforth be negotiable.

It seems to me that if parliament is going to give these awesome powers to the government to determine the organization of the public service, to assign duties and to classify positions, and after some time say that the crucial things are not negotiable, then the government can get away with murder. And it does. It gets away with such things as allowing for arbitration to provide for a raise in salary at a particular level and then a few weeks later reclassifying the position concerned so that the employee in effect gets a salary raise and a cut at the same time. This has happened in the corrections branch and in a number of other agencies of government. Such behaviour adds to the over-all uncertainty and resentment of many public servants.

The controversial clause 7 is a subject which I have raised previously, Mr. Speaker. I first raised it on December 7, 1970. At that time the answer was, "We are considering amending this." Surely the government should have reviewed this question a long time ago. I spoke again on the subject on February 22, 1971. At that time I tried to reconcile the statement of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) that the Public Service Staff Relations Act was under review, which he made on November 27 of the previous year, with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in a letter to the professional institute some time in December saying it was not under review. It simply could not be under review and not under review all within a matter of weeks. But after being around this place for four years I can readily understand the confusion that sometimes exists between the Prime Minister and other members of his cabinet.

Apparently that review was pursued later. On November 16, 1971, about six months later, I learned that indeed a review had taken place. But, Mr. Speaker, now it was an internal review headed by Mr. Bryden, a man who has and deserves the respect of a great many people. As a result, his report was preserved as an internal document. I submit that whenever the government wants to get credit for something, it becomes public; but if the government wants to check on something that is really "dicey", it goes to the extremes of furtiveness. For example I cite the case of the Bryden report. As I have said, I learned about it on November 16, 1971. Now here we are in February of 1973. Where is the Bryden report? It is still secret. This is the kind of procedure that contributes to the morale-shattering mood of too many public servants. That is why the appeals to public servants and why promises made to them fall on deaf ears. They have heard that song before.

There are a great many other problems related to the public service, but I notice the time is nearing six o'clock and I have no intention of talking-out the hon. member's motion. I want it to come to a vote. I am certain there is not anyone on the government side who wishes to stand up and talk it out. But, Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) getting ready over there, and his readiness destroys my confidence in him. He is an excellent medical man but on the matter of the public service I am afraid he is going to protect the government, as usual. At any rate, he is listening to the debate.

As I say, there are many other problems in the public service. There was the matter of the back-to-back casual employment in the postal service whereby casuals in many post offices in 1968 and 1969 outnumbered the permanent employees. In addition, tremendous lethargy has been displayed with respect to the superannuation act and improving pensions, particularly with the 2 per cent cost basis for benefits.

The Speech from the Throne promises reviews and amendments. I do not know what these will be but I would point out, in dealing with discrimination and other problems within the public service, that I have on the order paper a private member's bill which anticipates a separate appellate body. I have found that if an employee questions the decision of a superior in the public service, the matter goes right back down the line to the person who made the decision in the first place, so that there cannot be a fair and impartial hearing of a legitimate grievance within the public service.

When these matters are rectified we will develop better attitudes and morale in our public service which even now is recognized as one of the greatest in the world. And when matters of which I have spoken are rectified the Canadian public service will function unquestionably as the greatest public service in the world.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

[English]

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be read the third time and do pass.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, on January 25 of this year a point was placed before you which is almost identical to the point which you have now to consider. It would appear that the only substantial difference between that point and the one which you now have to deal with on the question of anticipation is that a different stage of the proceedings was in question. We were then at second reading stage of Bill C-124, and now we are considering a similar point at third reading stage.

The ruling which you gave at that time appears at page 661 of Hansard of that date, and makes the point that there is a descending order of values for matters in the parliamentary process. It was this conception which I believe you used at that time to enable you to decide that the most effective form of proceeding before the House then was Bill C-124 rather than the estimates. Mr. Speaker, I believe that is still the case. Although the estimates are now before the House, they have not been considered by it. This bill is in a more advanced stage and I believe this would still be considered to be the more effective form of proceeding before the House.

I would therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the basis for your decision of January 25 is still a valid basis; that the principle of descending order of values and of a more effective form of proceeding still applies. In light of this principle I believe Your Honour's ruling should be to the same effect today as it was at that time. It would be difficult indeed to see how this question could go any other way because the two proceedings are tied together, each is dependent upon the other and each could be said in a sense to anticipate the other. If we were not to establish one as having priority over the other, one could go to an infinite regression in attempting to decide with which one we should begin. I am sure that would not be the wish of Your Honour or the parliamentarians of this House.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) placed before us, I believe, the question of the state of the bill in the case that the estimates which are before the House would not subsequently be approved. In that case, Mr. Speaker, on the assumption that this bill is passed, but taking the hypothesis that the estimates would not subsequently be approved, we would have an act of parliament in proper order which would be entirely valid but one of the sections of the act might be rendered inoperative as a result of the fact that the estimates had not passed.

I think we have to read the second clause of this bill with a close eye to the grammar therein. There is no verb before the word "authorized". It is not a verbal phrase, it is a participle, and it would seem that the best way to understand this wording would be in the sense of "the amount when authorized" or "the amount if authorized". In other words, it is a clause which is dependent upon another happening, which is conditional upon it.

Mr. Nielsen: It does not say that.

Mr. MacGuigan: But one has to start somewhere; one has first to approve either the estimates or the bill. We are dealing with the bill, and on the basis of the principle which Your Honour elaborated at an earlier time the bill is to take precedence.

Mr. Nielsen: It does not say "if authorized".

Mr. MacGuigan: I know what the bill says, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Don't put an "if" in, then.

Mr. MacGuigan: Hon. members may have their own ideas of what the bill says. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has been giving his interpretation and putting in words, now I am giving my interpretation of what the clause means. I am suggesting there is no contradiction between the estimates and the bill; the two work together. There is no other way in which the two could work together. It is a simple question for the Chair to decide which has priority.

Mr. Speaker, in light of the principle which you have established I suggest that the bill which is now before us ought to be given priority, and the point of order raised by the hon. members opposite should be found to be invalid.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on the point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: There are just two points I should like to discuss, Your Honour. The hon. member opposite has spoken of a descending order of values in his attempt to equate what is happening now with your ruling of January 25. He has advanced to Your Honour the argument that the bill is a more appropriate instrument for dealing with the matter than is an estimate.

• (2010)

The point I made on the point of order, which he apparently fails to appreciate, is that the whole matter turns on the word "authorized". That has to do with the authority of this House which comes into effect upon passage of the appropriation bill that comes in with the estimates, and it has nothing to do with the estimates themselves. So we are dealing with two instruments that are equivalent, a bill which is an appropriation bill coming in with the estimates and, on the other hand, the bill now before us. There can be no choice about any descending order of bills when there are two bills to deal with.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. Baldwin: Why do you not deal with both together?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, as I did not hear that interjection I cannot deal with it. Also, one clause of Bill C-124 might be inoperative if the estimates fail to pass, as has been suggested. That argument bolsters what I have been saying, that the bill before us anticipates the appropriation bill being brought in with the estimates; that appropriation bill is an essential prerequisite before the bill presently before the House can be dealt with.

I urge strongly upon you, sir, the idea that Bill C-124 anticipates an authorization that has not yet been given. The resolution itself uses the word "authorized". The use of the word "authorized", regardless whether it is used as a participle, presupposes that the appropriation bill will authorize the expenditure of funds in a manner in which this bill seeks to do, namely, to change those expenditures from an appropriation to an advance. Therefore I submit that my hon. friend and the government are trying to put the cart before the horse. This is a totally irregular procedure and would cast doubt entirely upon the validity of Bill C-124, if it should ever pass in its present form.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, further to the point of order, we have reached the point in the debate this evening that was anticipated in the second reading debate on this bill.

An hon. Member: Keep talking. We can wait until Christmas.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At that time I indicated to Your Honour, in speaking on the point of order raised in the earlier debate by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), that the language of this bill, particularly with regard to clause 2 dealing with an item in the estimates, is total nonsense and an abuse of language in any way that one can reasonably consider it. With the objective of rescuing the government from its ineptitude with regard to unemployment insurance, some hon. members in the House are trying to hide behind the backs of the thousands of recipients entitled to unemployment insurance and, as a result, we have been taken to the brink of disaster because of that unconcern for the people.

The government, however, has chosen this method of asking the House for carte-blanche with respect to ceilings on loans or advances from the Minister of Finance. Having taken action through governor general's warrants, and having followed the requirements of the Financial Administration Act to convert those items which appeared on the governor general's warrants into advances—

Mr. Nielsen: Seduction with intent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):—the government has introduced this bill before the appropriation bill has come in, and the appropriation bill has not been passed by this House. I say this is a nefarious bill because it claims, in so many words, that this House has already authorized those advances. That is the point.

An hon. Member: True.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is what the bill says.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There has not been any authorized advance under any appropriation bill.

An hon. Member: Go back to law school.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No appropriation has been put through and therefore no advance has been authorized by parliament.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It has not been announced by parliament.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And yet the government simply says—

An hon. Member: Tell that to your constituents who want to collect benefits.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If hon. members opposite have dined well, perhaps they could go elsewhere and enjoy themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In that connection there was a great deal of argument in committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There was argument on that particular point. I know that hon. members opposite who find this situation amusing have not even looked at the proceedings before the committee. They have not even bothered to inquire. They want to be able to say as they used to, "Mr. Speaker, we want to pass this bill." But the bill must make sense, and it does not.

I invite Your Honour to consider the arguments we proposed the other night on a point of order. We were then told that perhaps we were anticipating something, but now is the moment of truth. I invite Your Honour to consider carefully the language of the bill and the language of the item in the estimates which will form part of an appropriation bill, because neither the Chair nor any member of this House can guarantee that the appropriation bill will come forward soon or next month. Actually, there is no indication that the appropriation bill will be brought forward at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Or the Senate could turn it down.

An hon. Member: It will be introduced next.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In short, we are asked to approve language saying that a certain item authorized in the appropriation bill shall be deemed to be an advance within the meaning of section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That part is an abuse of language and is totally out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I thank hon. members for their contributions. Earlier today, when Bill C-124 was called for third reading, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) raised a point of order to the effect that Bill C-124 could not be proceeded with at this time. It was the hon. member's contention that since certain moneys were to be provided under vote L30a, and since that money could not be authorized until the passage of a supply bill incorporating vote L30a, the wording of clause 2 of Bill C-124 was meaningless and invalid. The hon. member suggested that the word "authorized" as used in clause 2 of Bill C-124 meant authorized by an appropriation act. While the Chair dealt in a preliminary way with the point of order on January 25, as will be found at page 661 of Hansard, it should be said that the question of considering concurrent or interdependent bills, if that phrase may be used, has been raised on other occasions in recent years.

On April 20, 1970, as recorded in Hansard at pages 6046-7, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) raised a point of order relating to Bill C-204, an act to amend the Fisheries Act. He contended that it was defective inasmuch as that bill incorporated, by reference, certain provisions of two statutes which did not then exist, namely, the Canada Water Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act. The hon. member went on to say that presumably those references related to Bill C-144, an act to provide for the management of the water resources of Canada including research and the planning and implementation of programs relating to the conservation, development and utilization of water resources, and Bill C-187, an act respecting inland water resources in the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories, both of which were before standing committees of this House for clause-by-clause consideration.

"We cannot be asked," he said, "to assume that these bills will come out of committee unamended or pass through the necessary further proceedings in this House and in the other place unamended. We cannot even assume that the similar provisions in this bill and the other two bills will come out in the same legislative form. They will be dealt with by three different committees; the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. Until these other two bills are in perfect shape as statutes, this bill must be considered to be in imperfect shape". That is the end of the quotation from the argument of the hon. member for South Shore. It was suggested on that occasion by the Chair that the hon. member's point of order was very interesting and not without merit but, as suggested, it might have been premature. The matter did not arise again.

I might also refer hon. members to Hansard for July 30, 1958, at page 2872 to 2874 wherein a discussion is reported in relation to other companion bills, that is, bills with interdependent provisions. On that occasion, bills to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff Act were being considered, and while no decision was made by the Chair it would be fair to suggest, I think, that it was felt at that time that it was not a question of order but, rather, a matter of how best to achieve logical progression of companion or interdependent bills through the House.

There is little doubt in my mind that many examples could be found where companion bills were being considered concurrently by the House. For example, I am sure that interrelated provisions can be found almost annually in the budgetary taxation bills. Other recent examples would be the bills in 1967 relating to the revision of the Bank of Canada Act, an act respecting banks and banking, and the Quebec Savings Banks Act were being considered concurrently by the House at one stage or another.

In the same session, bills in relation to the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Statute Law (Superannuation) Amendment Act, all with interdependent provisions, again were being considered concurrently by the House. In that regard, I suggest that reference be made to the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Joint Committee on the Public Service of Canada in the 1966-67 session. In the 1968-69 session, reference might be made to amendments to the Financial Administration Act and an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada, both of which received royal assent on March 28, 1969.

I have spent some time on these examples because I was asked to do so by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I know other hon. members share his interest.

It could have been suggested that the bill and the related estimate, which in fact form an integral part of the preliminary stage in the passage of a supply bill now before the House, were not considered by the same committee and that substantive provisions of one of them could be or could have been altered or amended so that one would not have been consonant or consistent with the other. That question, I suggest, is one that could and must be resolved at the committee of the whole or report stage on the second bill to reach either stage.

What would be the alternative? It would be, surely, to set aside consideration of this bill and take in all its stages the item in the supplementary estimates. This would not only involve the approval of the estimate as it now exists as item 5 at page viii of today's Routine Proceedings under "Notice of Motion Pursuant to Standing Order 58(4)(a)." This would also in effect mean the amendment of a statute of parliament through an item in the estimates. This procedure in the past has always been vigorously resisted by members of the House of Commons.

That is, in effect, what the Chair was trying to say on January 25, as reported at page 69 of Votes and Proceedings—and I gave earlier the reference to the page in Hansard—when I stated, in part, "that the authorizing bill must become law before the authorization of the relevant estimate by the Appropriation Act". May I draw attention to the use of the words "authorizing" and "authorization" as used in that citation which was taken from May's eighteenth edition at page 731.

Given the choice, I feel that members of the House would expect that the Chair would favour the method that members themselves have advocated consistently on past occasions. The Chair has always agreed with this position, and it is to be consistent with past rulings that I suggest that the procedure now before us is the desirable one. Accordingly, the third reading will proceed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity of leading off this debate. Incidentally, we are all very pleased to see that the minister is back in harness. I understand that he had been affected by the flu. I am sure I speak for all hon. members when I say that we are very pleased to have him back in our midst.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Having said that, I want to know why the usual custom of the minister who is carrying the load is not being followed, that is, his making the necessary submissions in which he could perhaps discharge the heavy onus that is upon him as a result of requiring these changes.

I think it is quite irresponsible for the government to bring in this bill, have second reading, at which time the minister did speak, and take the bill to committee without making available the responsible minister. I do not blame him for that; we all understand that he was sick. The government brought in the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). If the minister is not quite up to it at this time perhaps we should have the Minister of Justice here to again give us his wisdom which most of us in committee, except for those on the other side, did not accept.

Many questions were raised during the committee stage which have been left unanswered by the fast-footing of the Minister of Justice who was sincere in his fast-footedness. We expected the minister to look at the proceedings to find out the several questions that we asked. Perhaps he thinks they were not asked correctly. I am at a loss to understand why the minister is not putting forward the position of the government at this time. Be that as it may, I do not see anyone jumping up to accept my challenge. I assume he does not wish to speak. If the minister wished to speak, he would have put a little something on the record so that the nation would know he is back, healthy and prepared to support this bill. I will certainly defer to him for as long as he wants. I will sit down, Mr. Speaker. I hope that as a result of my charity the Speaker will not look upon me as having lost my place. If we cannot have it that way, the minister can speak later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I should bring to the attention of the hon. member that following the rules and practices of this House, in moving third reading the minister is deemed to have spoken. That is the interpretation of the rule. As no one is entitled to speak in reply on third reading, the hon. member should complete his speech or give the floor to another hon. member.

• (2030)

Mr. Baldwin: We understood this. This is why my hon. friend suggested the House would give unanimous consent to the minister to answer the thousand-and-one questions which the people of Canada are waiting to hear answered. We are prepared to give unanimous consent to the minister to speak now and deal with this matter. I think he should.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. We all know the House is master of its own rules and that the minister may speak by unanimous consent. But the Chair could not permit, as suggested by the hon. member, some kind of an interrogation to take place on all subjects. If the minister wishes to speak and unanimous consent is given, the Chair is ready to recognize him; but I will find it difficult to allow all kinds of questions to be asked.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not my suggestion at all.

Mr. Andras: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise to say I accept the hon. member's kind remarks about my return to the House after a bout of 'flu. I regret the inconvenience which has been caused to hon. members of the committee. But I did present myself, with my officials, during two meetings of the committee for some six hours, for some six hours. Also, and a great deal of effort has been put forward this evening to establish that the subject matter which was then considered is somewhat relevant to that which is under consideration now, with which I agree. We did present ourselves for six or seven hours and I understand there were a further dozen hours or so of questioning. I suggest that if opposition members ask questions for between 12 and 18 hours on a bill which contains only two clauses—

An hon. Member: Why not answer them?

Mr. Andras: I have read the transcript and I have not seen anything in the questions which would suggest there was anything to be gained by rising now and speaking on the motion for third reading.

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order to which the minister has just spoken, I wish to point out that there were 19 members on that committee and the minister is accountable to the House of Commons, not to a standing committee. The very fact that he was absent for three or four of those meetings prevented us asking him many of the questions we wanted to ask as members of the opposition, so he cannot take refuge in the device of saying he cannot find anything intelligent in the committee proceedings. Again, perhaps this was because of his absence.

My second point is this. I was under the impression that my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was speaking on a point of order directed to calling attention to the ordinary custom in this House, that the minister make an opening statement when he presents a motion for third reading of a bill. Surely we are entitled to such an opening statement. The hon. member for Hamilton West will be our lead-off speaker after Your Honour has disposed of the point of order. I request that the minister make that opening statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) might wish the Chair to rule on the point of order he has raised. First, as to what took place in a committee, as far as the Chair is concerned it is not in a position to take into account such procedures or the absence of hon. members from committee meetings. Were it otherwise, we would get very deeply involved indeed. The fact that the minister may not have appeared in the committee to the satisfaction of hon. members—possibly for a good reason—or the fact that he does not elect to make an opening statement on third reading does not constitute grounds for a valid point of order.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

Mr. Reid: Why not listen to the hon. member for Hamilton West? He might have something to say.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, my dear colleague, I shall have something to say. There is one thing you cannot do in this place; you cannot prevent us from speaking, as you tried to do in the standing committee, by moving closure in an effort to prevent Members of Parliament doing their jobs.

This bill was supposed to be a panacea to cure all the ills of the original Unemployment Insurance Act. This was to have been the means of ensuring legislation which would work to the advantage not only of the government but of everyone else involved in the structure of the unemployment insurance scheme. We were led to believe that his was the answer; this was what the government had attempted to do with its former bill, Bill C-229. Who would have imagined that we would find ourselves in the terrible dilemma we face today?

The act was supposed to bring benefits of administration. Events have proved otherwise and the heartlessness of the government has brought frustration to many thousands of Canadians. In the last analysis it is obvious that the bill has not turned out to be a panacea as we were led to believe. Responsibility for the dilemma now confronting us can be placed squarely on the shoulders of the government. If we were to believe what we were told, the structure of the fund would maintain equilibrium provided unemployment was less than 4 per cent. In these circumstances there was a responsibility upon the government to develop the economy; to ensure that the economy reached full employment, if we can accept this phrase as being meaningful. In this case the contributions made by the government would beat the lowest figure.

What happened? The government attacked inflation by bringing about high unemployment. Hon. members opposite have since confessed that this was wrong. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sat in his high chair and said, "I will go to 6 per cent."

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that they should say "No, no" I say this is what he said. He said he was prepared, in order to cure inflation, for unemployment to reach at least 6 per cent. In doing so he caused a degree of frustration among thousands of Canadians which citizens of a civilized country should not have to endure. High levels of unemployment meant that the unemployment insurance scheme was hopelessly handicapped.

I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) realizes, at last, that it is necessary to produce a target figure for unemployment. After much prodding he has finally admitted that the government's goal for 1973 is a rate of less than 6 per cent. It is quite a challenge. We hope the government will accept the challenge, because if it is overcome there is no need for us to worry about huge advances being made to the unemployment insurance fund; we will not have to worry about a large amount being taken from the consolidated revenue fund as part of the government's share. This should be the government's goal. It should have been its goal in the first place, but it abdicated its responsibilities in this regard.

• (2040)

I am pleased that the minister made a small interjection, which was his speech. He said that he could not understand how such a small bill could create so much confrontation, so much debate. That shows that the minister does not really realize how devastating is the bill. I admit that it is a short bill: it has only two clauses. But their effect is devastating inasmuch as the consequences of the two provisions mean the removal of parliamentary control. I see the minister shake his head. The government are not only removing control but at the same time are asking us to give them a blank cheque.

Mr. Andras: No.

Mr. Alexander: I have heard the government say no before. Let hon. members opposite not get confused over advances, appropriations, funds and accounts.

Mr. Baldwin: They don't know the difference.

Mr. Alexander: No, they do not know the difference, though I will be charitable and say that a few may. The government is asking for a blank cheque so far as advances are concerned. They were limited at one time to advances of $800 million as working capital. This was money put at the disposal of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the event that the premiums paid by employers and employees were insufficient to carry on on a month to month basis.

Mr. Andras: And what else?

Mr. Alexander: The government said, "Let us put a ceiling on it of $800 million".

Mr. Andras: But what about the government's share?

Mr. Alexander: When the government brought in these amendments, firstly to remove the ceiling and secondly in an attempt to make legal that which was not legal in the first instance under clause 2 they assumed a tremendous onus to discharge the matter satisfactorily, not only as far as Members of Parliament are concerned but also the people of Canada. Hon. members on this side went to the committee sincerely, hoping, that for some reason or other the government would tell us that the reason they needed to remove the ceiling was so-and-so.

Instead, the reasons we were given were unacceptable; they were the same reasons the government had given for imposing the ceiling in the first place. These reasons stem from 1971, at which time the reasons were satisfactory to the government and should have been satisfactory to us and to the nation. And we bought those reasons, Mr. Speaker. But what we bought was one of the biggest messes this country has ever seen in terms of government expansion. At the same time, the workers attached to the labour force and who are entitled to these payments were not given a break.

The government are now asking us to buy a pig in a poke; we are being asked to give them a blank cheque. I resent this type of thinking. Surely, if someone wants me to buy something they have to give me a price, some sort of figure. Not one member of this House at this time knows what this scheme is going to cost during 1973, despite the excruciatingly persistent cross-examination of the officials in committee. Surely the minister should not come to the House with this bill unable to project what the scheme will cost. That fact alone means he is in trouble, at least as far as we on this side are concerned.

I know the government is able to make a projection because it did so with the governor general's warrants. The government between October 5 and February 8 projected two significant amounts; I believe the first warrant was for $234 million and the second was for $220 million. This covered a period of four months. We are now asking the government to make a projection for the future, but the government says it cannot be done.

What bothers me when we talk about money is that to this government any sum is just a drop in the bucket. The former minister asked, "What's $220 million?" and said it was only a drop in the bucket. Amazingly, the same minister said that the people of Canada did not care how much it cost so long as the unemployed got their money. I do not know where he developed this kind of reasoning, because I should like to tell him that the people of Canada do care. Certainly they are concerned about their tax dollars. and rightly so. Whether the government likes it or not, one of our duties is to be the watchdog of the public purse.

I hear one member over there laugh at that. I should like to know what his thinking is with regard to this matter. The role of the opposition is to criticize constructively.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is what I am doing. I am trying to make the government behave.

Mr. Breau: Who supported the bill? You did.

Mr. Alexander: My hon. friend across the way says I supported the bill. If he recalls, we supported the bill on division after such haranguing and harassing in terms of bringing in meaningful amendments. I will tell him about one right now, and that was the eight weeks attachment to the labour force. Why does the hon. member not talk about the amendments that we tried to bring in? There were several and various amendments that we said would make the bill much more acceptable, which would make it a true unemployment insurance bill. For example, we talked about attachment to the work force. Now the government is being subjected to all kinds of criticism.

Mr. Andras: This is only a short bill, you know.

Mr. Alexander: The minister had his opportunity to make a speech. His great contribution tonight now seems to be to try to interject, to talk about amendments that his government did not accept, and did not accept for reasons which even now I cannot accept. It seems to me that anything the government says about the bill just cannot be believed. What they said previously could not be believed; time has shown that. The government has given us no reasons for believing them now. I agree it is a short bill, but the minister does not understand why we are talking about it. We are talking about it because we were sent here to talk about it. I recall that during the last election campaign people asked me what was going on with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

• (2050)

The government said in 1972 there would be something in the order of $1 billion in terms of employee benefits. We know what it is now. It is almost $2 billion. Yet we are told that we do not have the right to probe into that matter and ask questions about it. Are we being told that we should be as irresponsible as members opposite have been and still are? As I have said, one of the prime functions of the opposition should be that of a watchdog on the public purse. We must not forget that. They may not like what we are doing, they nay not think it is necessary, but I say they must take their lumps. The minister said they must take their lumps. Certainly they do, because they were wrong then and are wrong now in attempting to remove this ceiling. In effect they are removing parliamentary control and are emasculating the supremacy of parliament in doing so. I say that no one should vote in favour of this bill without carefully considering the paramountcy of parliament in respect of government spending. Where are we going? Are we being told that the matter of spending should be left to the whims and fancies of cabinet? Surely that is not what this great institution is all about.

An hon. Member: What about the committee?

Mr. Alexander: The committee does not mean a thing when the government is still insistent on maintaining the principle of removing the ceiling. Should spending be at the whim and fancy of cabinet, or should it be on the direction and approval of parliament? I suggest it should be the latter.

The Minister of Justice, as a matter of fact—who played some role before the committee—indicated he agreed with the proposition that moneys which are appropriated from the consolidated revenue fund should be appropriated in accordance with the terms set out by parliament; he agreed with that. But for some reason or other he says that is what he would say in any other circumstance, but in this circumstance this is not needed and that they will do it on their own.

The former Minister of Labour, in one of his more exciting contributions when involved in this matter, said the opposition was not needed, that they could do it themselves without us. However, I say they need us to check them. I do not want anyone to make any mistakes. There are some members over there who are confused. What we are talking about are the advances, the working capital. It seems to me that in 1971-72 the working capital, or the advances were under control. We endeavoured with all our wherewithal to ascertain from this government why it had the control in the first place or why it had the limit in the first place. There was much speculation. The Minister of Justice, speaking on behalf of the minister who was ill at that time, said he thought it was useful, convenient and desirable. He did not say, however, that it was needed. I respectfully say that it was not only useful, convenient and desirable but that section 137(4) was needed on the basis of the information they had received from either the minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance, the Department of Manpower, or the Unemployment Insurance Commission and all the statistics that could be gathered together.

They decided they should be careful and place a limit in order to have some control. The Minister of Finance said he could not be paying out money helter-skelter at the whim of cabinet, but must have some control. What came out of all that? Here we have it. This was the bible at the time: it is a document giving facts and figures on unemployment insurance in the seventies. What a snow job that was! Now they discount it. They tell us to throw it away because they did not mean to say what is contained in this document. As a matter of fact, I believe the Minister of Justice said that it was sort of a guess. I remember that the unemployment insurance hierarchy indicated that under every circumstance which they could possibly bring forward, including consideration of all the variables, the amount that would be sufficient for the advances was $700 million. But they went one step further. They thought they would toss in another $100 million.

Is it not amazing that at that time they were so sure? They were absolutely positive that a ceiling was necessary in the new panacea for the ills of the Unemployment Insurance Act. What do we have now? We have the old flip-flop, the U-turn. As I look at this government, "U-turn and flip-flop" would seem to be its new name. When this government wants me to buy this nonsense, I say I am not buying it. They came to us in 1971 and asked us to believe them. We said we could not because we had figures which showed they were wrong. Then they told us not to believe our figures because they were wrong. They said that they had the expertise, the bureaucracy and the knowledge.

An hon. Member: And the computer.

Mr. Alexander: Let us not get involved with the computer. I say that controls are needed. I was convinced about this in the first instance. I say this is needed so that the people will have some indication of what is going on in terms of their money. This is the only protection the people have. We say that the government should come to parliament. We are not saying that the government cannot have any more money, but we are saying that it should come to us when it wants money. This is our responsibility; that is what section 137(4) is all about. Every conceivable argument was raised to have that provision included at that time. Now every conceivable argument is being projected in order to take it out. We cannot accept this flip-flop philosophy. It is not only unacceptable, it is irresponsible. It brings into question the competence and integrity of this government in enacting any of its policies, and especially its policy on unemployment insurance.

• (2050)

I am not saying that they did this deliberately, but perhaps they should get rid of all that staff because now we are questioning the government's intelligence. Perhaps they are the ones who should have gone. I see that a few of them are still around but I do not want to mention names. I will leave the poor former minister alone because he has been my friend over the years. He was sold a big bag of goods and he had to defend this bill for all its worth knowing that perhaps, as he said, he should have come to parliament and let us know earlier of the situation of the fund. He wondered whether perhaps he was not wrong in this regard.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that the government was wrong and stupid, but he goes along with them—he a man who cherishes the paramouncy of parliament.

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Alexander: An hon. member in the rear has made a remark. I do not know what his problem is. He has not had a chance to speak since January 4. This is his maiden speech.

Mr. Rowland: Not quite.

Mr. Alexander: The reason that they give now for removing the ceiling is the constantly changing situation. There is one thing about it—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I have heard the hon. member speak before but I have not heard him speak off the cuff. He reads his typed speeches word for word. If there is one thing that he should learn to do it is to rise and take part in the debate as Members of Parliament should. I am not mentioning any names but I am referring to the hon. member in the red shirt over there. If he wants to rise on a question of privilege, let him stand up and the whole nation will know who I am referring to when I speak about the hon. member who reads his speeches in the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are two members with red shirts over there.

Mr. Alexander: I am referring to the one with the loud mouth. Mr. Speaker, one would hope that this debate would be treated seriously and that we could score more serious points. But when you have buffoons interrupting you every five minutes it is not possible to have any continuity of thought.

Mr. Reid: You could not sustain it.

Mr. Alexander: I am still right on the road and I am speaking to the minister in charge of housing. We are waiting to hear from him. I am sure he has another panacea for the people of Canada. I know we will have to get involved with that matter sooner or later, and I hope he will not be smiling then as he is now; I hope he is deadly serious, because we are concerned about housing for low income people and I hope his bill will have some answers.

Mr. Basford: It has some of them.

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, the reason which they give for removing the ceiling is based on constantly changing and unpredictable factors such as national and regional unemployment rates, constantly changing average earnings and the growth of the work force, in other words, the added participation in the work force, as well as the length of the benefit period. All of those factors were known in 1971.

Since then we have solved these problems; we have reached our conclusions after deliberation on all those matters to which I have just referred. However, they were absolutely adamant that there should be a ceiling. What do they say now? They say that it does not matter what they did in 1971, they just do not have the competence to project. I do not know whether they are referring to the incompetence of the Department of National Revenue in their projections, the incompetence of their economic advisers, the incompetence of the UIC, the incompetence of the Department of Manpower and Immigration or the incompetence of the Department of Finance.

I cannot for the life of me understand why at one time they were able and willing to bring forth projected costs, but now in 1973 they say they cannot do it. Yet they expect us to buy this bill, this pig in a poke. We cannot do that. We would be irresponsible if we did. The government should tell us how much this is going to cost in 1973. If they could do it in 1971, they can do it in 1973. Not a soul throughout this great land of ours knows now, or will know until such time as this government wants them to know, how much this scheme will cost. This is irresponsibility at its worst.

I wish the government could take this matter seriously, because they have not discharged their responsibility. They stated that they are able to project costs for four months, but when it comes to projecting costs in order to satisfy the public with respect to their money they say they cannot do it. Not only do they say that they cannot do it, but they will not do it. The minister says that he cannot hazard a guess. No one is asking him to guess. We say to the government that they should put their economic advisers to work in the departments which I mentioned so that they can come up with a figure, because if they do not do so the Canadian public will not be satisfied that there is a necessity to remove the ceiling. I want the government to believe that. The public wishes to know what the scheme will cost.

We should know in fact whether the bill is worded in such a manner as to meet the administrative problems and the problems that will arise as a result of the financial situation, keeping in mind that control should be in the hands of parliament. We know that under section 133 the money comes from the premiums paid by the employer and the employee as well as from the appropriations. The minister can get more money at any time with the approval of parliament. Even though there is a ceiling under section 133(b), it is not as if there was no possibility of obtaining more money. Although you needed more money, you did not have to do anything as devious as asking for governor general's warrants rather than come to parliament. All the government had to do was to look at section 133(b) which reads:

> any other amounts provided out of the consolidated revenue fund for any purpose related to unemployment insurance that is authorized by an appropriation by parliament and the administration of which falls to the commission.

There is a ceiling, and if the government needs more money they can get it from parliament. If parliament is not sitting, they can apply for governor general's warrants so long as they do not make projections and resort to a devious scheme such as the government did and then attempt to have clause 2 of the bill passed. I see that the President of the Treasury Board has a perplexed look on his face. We said it before and we say it now; the government knew on August 15 that this fund was in trouble. If you didn't know, you should have known; and if you did know and did not attempt to pursue it further, then once again I say you were incompetent and irresponsible, because legal counsel for the Unemployment Insurance Commission had a meeting with the minister's officials shortly thereafter and met with a number of legal counsel for several departments, the names of which have not been revealed. I suspect that meeting was to determine how you were going to face that problem without telling parliament. That was the devious scheme; and finally someone said, "Let us grab them by governor general's warrants."

• (2110)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: They are oh-ing and ah-ing over there. This was your devious scheme to bypass parliament. And you expect us to stand here quiet, shackled and helpless. There is a parliamentary secretary laughing now.

Mr. Basford: Your own fellows are laughing too.

Mr. Alexander: There are four reasons why we need a ceiling. First, we need a ceiling because then the government will be so involved with the scheme, in terms of unemployment, that its whole fiscal and monetary policies will have to be directed to the development of the nation in order to reduce unemployment. A ceiling would give the government some impetus to work toward reducing the unemployment rate. I do not hear anybody questioning that so I suppose it is accepted.

Mr. Basford: If we interject, you criticize. If we don't interject, you still criticize.

Mr. Alexander: The second reason for a ceiling is to give some impetus to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in terms of administration. If you don't have a ceiling, who will care? There can be haphazard administration or no administration at all. As long as officials know there is a ceiling and they cannot grab a buck every time they turn around, this will make the commission think of what it should be doing to tighten up the administration, to eliminate abuses and to make the scheme work at the cheapest cost to the Canadian taxpayer. The Canadian taxpayer does not mind paying money when he sees it going for a good cause. But when he sees it going down the drain and is told it is only a drop in the bucket, then he becomes worried.

The third reason for having a ceiling—I think this is also of some importance—is that we must maintain parliamentary control, no matter who sits on the government benches. I would speak the same way if I were sitting on that side of the House, Mr. Speaker; and that is something we in this party will be doing in the very near future. We must give some semblance of strength to the House of Commons. Without that we might as well all go home right now. We might as well give up if we are simply going to spend money at the whim and fancy of cabinet without the consent of parliament.

I cannot understand how members of the government had the nerve to bring in this bill. The fourth and most important reason for having a ceiling is that the government has not given us any indication of what the cost of this scheme will be.

Mr. Basford: The money isn't for the government; it is for the unemployed.

Mr. Alexander: You say the money isn't for the government? I beg your pardon. You won't tell us how much the scheme is going to cost. We have a right to know. All of us were out on the hustings recently. We promised we were going to find out what was going on here. But I do not think many hon. members on the government side promised that. They don't give a damn. As a result, they are displaying the same old arrogant attitude. I thought they had learned a lesson.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Saltsman: Would the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Hamilton) permit a question?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, not on your life. The hon. member can get up in debate and do all the questioning and answering that he wants. I have given four reasons why I think it is necessary to have a ceiling in this bill. I have never been more serious in my life than when I stand here now and try to convince hon. members, both in front of me and to my left, that it is necessary to have a ceiling in the bill.

Clause 2 also bothers me. I know other hon. members will become involved in this argument. I listened to the Minister of Justice explain it in terms that he believed would be acceptable to the House and to the nation. Once again he did not leave us with anything we could grab on to, and all I can say is that clause 2 came about as a result of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act.

The government went to the Minister of Finance and to the President of the Treasury Board and said, "Let us get an appropriation." It was an appropriation then, and in my respectful submission this meant it was a grant coming from the consolidated revenue fund. But now the government says, "Oh, no. Even though we took it under section 23 and the following section, we don't mean that to be a grant. Even though most of it is our fault because of high unemployment, we are going to call it an advance so that it can come within the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and be paid back from premiums contributed by employees and employers."

I do not know what is wrong, but any time I see the words "deemed to be an advance" under section 137 of that act, something smells. Something smells when it says it shall be deemed to be this and not the other. It leaves me with the impression that in the first instance it was an appropriation. In order to clear up that ambiguity the government now introduces this bill, asking us to approve this type of nonsense that it has been projecting ever since October 5 last. If we pass clause 2, then we approve what the government has done in terms of governor general's warrants even though we argued for two days about the illegality of that. As a matter of fact, someone said it was one of the most unique situations, right on the border of illegality. We are being asked to give overt approval to something that we believe was definitely and drastically wrong.

If we approve this, it is also putting an added burden on those who contribute to the scheme, the employees and employers. The minister shakes his head.

Mr. Andras: You just don't understand.

Mr. Alexander: If it is going in as an advance, it has to be paid back on such terms and conditions and in such a manner as the Minister of Finance may prescribe. That is quite obvious. Whereas, Mr. Speaker, if this matter is left as a grant it takes on a different complexion entirely, because then it is out of the consolidated revenue fund; that is where it stays and the whole program is shared by the taxpayers, generally speaking.

• (2120)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am most surprised that a bill which I had thought would be meaningful and would solve the ills of the unemployed has led us into one of the most elite debates that I have encountered in my four and a half years in this House. It is a debate that I think we should all be very much aware of; we should all be cognizant of what this government is attempting to do in two areas. First of all, they are trying to remove the control of parliament on government spending and, secondly, they are trying to make us accessories after the fact. We do not appreciate either of these gestures, Mr. Speaker, and we do not endorse them. Accordingly, as on second reading, we take a very dim view of this bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was condemning the government for its failure to solve the problem of unemployment, and indeed for its deliberate policy of creating unemployment as its answer to inflation, I was with him 100 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In fact, Mr. Speaker, I wish he had spent more time dwelling on the way in which this government has let Canada down these last few years by its failure to come forward with policies that would produce full employment.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, you are supporting them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has pointed out on a number of occasions, the real scandal of this government is not with respect to its administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act; the real scandal of this government is unemployment itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If there is anything that we should be doing in this session of this parliament, we should be bringing home to the government the urgent necessity of dealing with the problem of unemployment. I wish my hon. friend from Hamilton West would use his debating skill and his loud voice not to flog a dead horse but to try to get the government to face up to what is the real scandal.

Mr. Woolliams: If I ever saw a dead horse, we have one now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I join with the hon. member for Hamilton West in his assertion that there are a number of weaknesses in the Unemployment Insurance Act. It may be that we would disagree about those weaknesses, however. I suggest that there are places where he would like to tighten the administration of the act, whereas some of us are more concerned that the people it covers really get the rights to which they are entitled.

The hon. member says that his party supported the Unemployment Insurance Act on division. Mr. Speaker, that statement shows that they are trying to have it two ways. When someone in this House, in response to a motion, says "On division" it does not mean that he is half for it and half against it; it means that he is against it but is not forcing a recorded vote.

Mr. Speaker, we found fault with the Unemployment Insurance Act, but on balance we felt it was an improvement over the previous act; that it was worth a try and that having tried our best in committee to get it improved, we should give it a chance. The trouble is that this Unemployment Insurance Act was put to a test by a level of unemployment far beyond anything that the government had contemplated and far beyond anything that we had considered when we had the bill before the committee. Let me say, at the risk of repeating myself over and over again, Mr. Speaker, that the scandal which erupted during the election campaign, and the scandal that is still with us, is not a monetary scandal, is not a case of misappropriating or over spending money; the scandal is unemployment itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Let's turn them out, then.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The entire opposition of this House, including my friends of the Progressive Conservative party, should be insisting on policies that will do something about unemployment itself.

Mr. Speaker, even after we have isolated the real issue, namely the scandal of unemployment, and even after we have pointed to some of the weaknesses in the present Unemployment Insurance Act, the fact is that Bill C-124 is here for one reason only. I suggest that it is the responsibility of the grown up members who sit in this House of Commons to acquaint themselves with what this bill is all about. This bill has nothing to do with the terms and conditions under which unemployment insurance benefits are paid; this bill has nothing to do with paying a deficit on the unemployment insurance account; the purpose of this bill is simply to cope with the fact that as the bill was set up certain working advances were required because unemployment got out of hand. The amount of working advances so required was greater than the $800 million ceiling that was put in the act. We are not talking about paying a debt of $800 million or a debt of $1,250 million, which is what the figure has grown to as a result of the governor general's warrants; we are talking about advances that had to be made so that the Unemployment Insurance Commission, as it was required to do, could carry out the law imposed upon that commission by this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend keeps saying that he is for the poor, that he is not anxious to interfere with the payment of unemployment insurance benefits; but, Mr. Speaker, if this bill is defeated or is not passed within the next two or three days, the payment of unemployment insurance benefits will halt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andras: Twenty-four hours.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The responsibility will be on my friends to the right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: By Wednesday!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of sounding like a school teacher, which I am not—

Mr. Woolliams: Take a chance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In any case, after the demagogic display we have had from my hon. friend from Hamilton West—

Some hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I think it is necessary ônce again to do a bit of what the hon. member for Verdun did when we were on second reading. May I therefore explain how the Unemployment Insurance Act now operates. There are paid into the unemployment insurance account premiums by employers and employees and, provided unemployment is under 4 per cent, something the Liberals know nothing about, that is all that goes into the account. But, if unemployment exceeds 4 per cent, and it has been away above that for a long time, when the calendar year is over and the computation can be made there must be credited to the unemployment insurance account an amount equal to the total amount of the unemployment insurance paid out because unemployment was above a 4 per cent national average. We do not yet know what that amount will be that the federal government must put into the unemployment insurance account for the calendar year 1972.

• (2130)

An hon. Member: Why?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That, really, is an irrelevant question. The fact is we do not know the total of the payments that will reach the unemployment insurance account from the Department of National Revenue and reflect the premiums that have come in from employers and employees.

It is in that interim period, when it has not been possible to credit the government's contribution that is required because unemployment is above 4 per cent, when it has not been possible to compute what the total premiums are for employers and employees, that the Unemployment Insurance Commission requires a working advance so that it can do that which it absolutely must do, pay benefits to the unemployed people of this country as required by the law of this parliament. We provided for that in the act, so that in this interim period when the books are not completed, when the moneys are not all in, the unemployed will not have to wait for their payments. The working advance is used for that purpose.

That is what the $800 million fund was for. That is why the government, when parliament was not in session, had to obtain money through governor general's warrants. It required a total of $1,250 million to finance the payments. But that does not mean, as my hon. friends on my right have tried to make out, that there is a deficit of $800 million or $450 million or $1,250 million in the fund. We will not know what the deficit is until the bookkeeping for the whole year has been completed. I understand that it may not be completed for some weeks or even months. So we are talking about a period in which all we are concerned about is working advances.

Conceivably, and I put it that way because I know that it will not work out that way, once the money and the accounts are all in there might be enough money to pay back the full $1,250 million, but I do not think there will be enough to pay it all back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Certainly, the amount of deficit at that point will be a lot less than $1,250 million.

If I may continue for a few moments longer in a school teacher's vein, what happens if after the bookkeeping is done for the calendar year it is determined that there is a deficit? Is the treasury called upon at that point to make an appropriation? No. In the meantime the Unemployment Insurance Commission has had the obligation to adjust the rates that it charges to employers and employees, in the hope that in the succeeding year or succeeding two or three years that situation will be overcome.

It is quite conceivable that in a run of two, three or four years the unemployment insurance account, as now established, could come out even steven. There is no guarantee of that, but that is the way it works. To talk of there being a deficit at this point, of there being a charge against the treasury or about the necessity for an appropriation, is to fail completely to understand how this act works. How could my hon. friends who have talked about the hours that they sat on the various committees still display such ignorance as to how this fund works. That really amazes me. We are not talking about a deficit; we are not talking about something that has to be charged to the consolidated revenue fund; we are not talking about something that needs to be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: Oh, come on!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are talking about a working advance that is needed because the money is not all in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: And about short falls.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are talking of a scheme that runs in terms of a three or four-year cycle.

Mr. Nielsen: We are talking about short falls as well; the minister said so himself.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is a short fall of revenue at the moment.

An hon. Member: And who is going to pay it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, do I have to go over all this again?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This afternoon I was invited to take the floor, whether I wanted to or not. Now I am getting the opposite advice.

An hon. Member: Some cannot understand the law, or will not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is a simple operation and is easy to understand if anybody really wants to understand it. I suggest that my friends of the Progressive Conservative opposition who continue to talk about this as if somebody was defrauding the treasury, or as if somebody was imposing an extra burden on the taxpayer, are misunderstanding completely or failing to understand how the present Unemployment Insurance Act works.

There are some other remarks I wish to make. I was not too happy—

An hon. Member: But you are happy now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —over the arrangement whereby employers and employees were required to pay the whole shot up to the 4 per cent rate of unemployment. I wanted the government to come in from the first dollar, as was the case under the old scheme where the formula provided for a sharing on a basis of 50-50-20; but that was overruled and the present act was put on the statute books.

I think we are under the obligation to give the Unemployment Insurance Act in its present form a fair trial. I do not think my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party want to give it a fair trial.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: Right on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They say they are concerned about the poor. I say they are yielding to the backlash against welfare and the backlash against the Unemployment Insurance Act. I can read editorials in the newspapers, too, but I hold that the idea of unemployment insurance for covering people who are without income because they are out of work is a social principle of the highest order. This parliament has supported it since 1940 and it was advocated for 20 or 30 years before that. I submit that any individual or party that stands in this House and tries to downgrade the principle of the unemployment insurance scheme does not deserve to be listened to at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let me say a few more words about this.

An hon. Member: I think the government had better listen.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I want to talk about this extra money that is supposed to be available as a working advance. I think the government was stupid for putting the ceiling in there in the first place. There is no reason why it was put there, and I think it is to be commended for admitting that was a mistake. Actually, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), speaking for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), before the standing committee used the term flip-flop. He said, "Yes, we made a flip-flop", and I commend him for his admission. As I say, the ceiling should never have been put there in the first place.

We have old age security in this country. We have an act which says how much our senior citizens are to be paid.

An hon. Member: It is not as good as it ought to be.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend says it is not as good as it ought to be. That is correct; and it had better be a lot better soon, or else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But there is nothing in the Old Age Security Act which says—

An hon. Member: But there soon will be.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —that if a certain level of money has been paid out, no more may be paid.

Mr. Basford: The Tories will put that in, if they can.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That legislation happens to be comparable to the act we are considering because there is an old are security account to which certain moneys are credited. If that fund is in the red, do old age security payments stop? No. The Minister of Finance makes the necessary advances. Similarly, we have a Family Allowances Act in this country: it states that children up to certain ages get a certain amount of money. We have a Youth Allowances Act as well. Do we have anywhere any provision that if the number of children gets so large that the total cost exceeds a certain amount, that it be stopped? There is no such thing at all. Why, then, do my friends to my right want to impose a ceiling on the amount that is available to unemployed people as long as they are getting their benefits under the provisions laid down under the act?

We have veterans pensions and veterans allowances. When veterans meet the conditions and pass the tests of the Canadian Pension Commission, they get the pension that is in the schedule. Nobody says, "Oh, but there must be parliamentary control. There must be a limit to how much we can pay out". We have war veterans allowances. If veterans meet the conditions of the War Veterans Allowance Act, they get their money. There is no Tory saying, "We must have parliamentary control. We must have a limit." Not at all.

The Canada Assistance Plan works much the same way. In that case the federal government even underwrites what the provinces do. As long as the provinces meet certain conditions laid down in the Canada Assistance Plan, they can pay supplements to their pensioners, get various programs under way in the social welfare field and collect 50 per cent of the cost from Ottawa. Nowhere is there any ceiling or provision that says they cannot get this when they exceed a certain amount of money. What is it that is wrong with unemployed people, in the minds of my friends to the right, that they must be pilloried in the way they are being pilloried in this House tonight and being told that they cannot get their money?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friends to my right do not like the reference to their not getting their money. They know that if this bill is not passed in the next two or three days, the money which the Unemployment Insurance Commission now has for the payment of unemployment insurance benefits will run out and there will be a cessation or a hiatus in the paying of unemployment insurance benefits.

A few years back there was a crisis with regard to unemployment insurance. Our friends in the other place held up a bill that had some extra money for the unemployment insurance fund of those days. They held it up for the weekend, that is all. The result was that some payments were delayed for a day or two. At that time I was able, as I have seldom been able in all the years that I have been in this House, to get unanimous consent to a motion to debate my bill to abolish the Senate. Why? Because this House was furious that the Senators took action that delayed the bill over a weekend which held up for a day or two the payment of unemployment insurance benefits.

The members of the official opposition are now taking a stand the result of which can be the cessation of the payment of benefits on Wednesday or Thursday of this week certainly until February 15, if not longer. I suggest this is an irresponsible position to take. It puts this House in the position where we ought as soon as possible to say that this bill is justified, it ought to be passed and the same principles that we apply to the payment of old age pensions, family allowances, veterans benefits, and so on, should apply here.

We are not giving the unemployed a chance to dip their fingers into any till. We are just saying that this sovereign parliament of Canada passed an Unemployment Insurance Act that states when unemployed people meet certain conditions, they shall get their benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No responsible Member of Parliament has the right to take a stand which interferes with those benefits. For these reasons we feel that this bill should be passed at this time. We will not lose parliamentary control. Parliamentary control was written into the Unemployment Insurance Act itself. Although my hon. friends may not know it, the Department of Finance has to report on these matters all the time. It reports appear in the Canada Gazette, part I, every month. These reports include the state of loans and advances that are made. These things are not done in secret. We know the state of the loans. We know the state of the old age security account. These things are all public. At budget time, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has to give a full accounting. We have control over supply. We have control over the government. We have far better control if it is done this way than the sort of blind and secret $800 million that the minister was able to use. I think that was a mistake and it is time for it to be put out.

In view of what happened this afterooon I thought my hon. friend was going to move an amendment to state their opposition to clause 2 of the bill. I even drafted it for him when I was speaking on a point of order earlier today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He did not move the amendment but he called upon the House to reject clause 2. I really become astounded at the way these people can go both ways. They talk about this whole business as though it is a monetary financial scandal. They say, "We don't know the cost. The people of Canada are having to pay for it." Yet when the government comes in with a proposal that the working capital necessary to keep the fund in balance should be an advance only, they say, "Oh, no; make it an appropriation." That would put it back on the taxpayers of Canada. I do not know what the Globe and Mail and some of the other papers would say then. They would probably wonder what happened to their Tory friends.

Let us give this new piece of legislation a decent trial. To take the Tory line would be not only to interfere with the unemployed getting their benefits but would bring an end to this fair trial. I think the position my friends to the right are taking is completely irresponsible.

I am as much for parliamentary control over the public purse in a real way as anybody in this House. I am for an Unemployment Insurance Act that is better than this one, but we have a particular and immediate situation. We have an act that is in trouble because unemployment got too high. All that is needed is that there be sufficient working advances so that the government can carry it. For the members to my right to block it is utterly irresponsible. It is not worthy of them. For our part, we believe in unemployment insurance. We believe the unemployed people of this country have their rights and that is why we are supporting this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to get sidetracked too much by the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who is using the word flip-flop as part of his vocabulary now. I do not think anyone in the House of Commons has done as many flip-flops as that hon. member has in the debate in recent weeks on unemployment insurance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I am more interested in getting on to the impression that the hon. member and other hon. members of this House have left, namely, that the worker of this country is lazy, that the plan has been abused and that there is some type of stigma about unemployment insurance. I think that the following facts, hopefully to be reported by the press and arising out of the evidence before the miscellaneous estimates committee and given to me by the present minister, will put to an end once and for all the concept that Canadians have abused this plan flagrantly.

• (2150)

In 1972, the year just completed—that is the first year under the new act—we had the concept of universality, which meant that over 7,150,000 workers out of close to nine million members of the work force paid into the unemployment insurance fund and were therefore eligible for benefit under certain conditions. In 1970, the last full year under the old plan, when we did not have universality, when coverage was restricted—as hon. members know, there were no school teachers, hospital workers or casual workers contributing—there were only 4,900,000 covered by the unemployment insurance plan. In 1972, 7,150,000 people were paying into the unemployment insurance scheme, and despite the high rate of unemployment there were 2,099,000 claimants.

In 1971, there were 2,092,000 claimants and in 1970, out of a work force of about 5 million, there were 2,049,000 claimants, a drop of only 50,000 compared with those drawing unemployment insurance this year despite the fact that the plan of two years ago required 30 contributions for eligibility and this year only eight were required. Where are the abuses that the people across the way are so prone to talk about?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said it much more eloquently than I can. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) knows as much about the Unemployment Insurance Act as the present minister or the former minister. Yet he has found it convenient to disown the very act he was so proud of—convenient to disown the steel workers of Hamilton.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mackasey: —and play up to the reactionary forces in this country in the most flagrant manner I have ever heard in debates in this House in recent years. He is responsible, intentionally or otherwise, for the distortion which has gone on in this debate about the $800 million.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has drawn attention to the fact, the minister has drawn attention to the fact and it has been stated ad nauseam before the various committees, that the $800 million is nothing more than a method by which the government lends money to the commission for day to day financing. And when it is accounted for in April, hon. members will find that the government owes all but $159 million. The rest is owed by employers and employees, and the act provides that the backlog must be picked up through increased contributions. And they will be picked up. There is no mystery about this. The hon. member for Hamilton West understands it. You see, he loves to walk along a tightrope, appearing to be a friend of the steelworkers on the one hand and passing as a great lawyer on the other. But he cannot have it both ways all the time and constantly be on both sides of the fence in Hamilton.

I know something about that city, as the hon. gentleman is aware. I can remember walking through Gage Park in the thirties. The unemployed were lined up in rows, passing a single newspaper from one to the other. We in this party don't want to get back to those days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Only once did the hon. member get on the right track. That was when he said the government had the responsibility to bring unemployment down to an acceptable level. In the interval, those who were unemployed through no fault of their own should not be forced, by the reactionary tendencies of the party opposite, to forgo benefits which are properly theirs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The defeat of this bill, as the hon. member who is a prominent lawyer knows, would make it impossible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission to pay to the innocent victims of unemployment their benefits next week, or the week after, or very soon. How it is wrong to have a ceiling of $800 million, and then propose an amendment that it should be $900 million when he says that $800 million is much too high—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: —is a technique I cannot possibly follow. He comes in with an amendment that it should be $900 million. That is a piece of logic I cannot understand.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind the ravings and rantings of the former minister, but I do not want him to put words into my mouth which have not been uttered by me.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Alexander: Just a minute.

Mr. Crouse: How about a little order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Alexander: All I would like to say is that I think the minister is very dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Alexander: He is less than honest.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Alexander: He is less than honest when it comes to interpreting my remarks to suit his own political expediency. My main point is that there should be a ceiling in this act—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It appears to the Chair the hon. member is simply making an argument now. He has made his speech and I do not think a question of privilege arises.

Mr. Baldwin: With great respect, Your Honour—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Baldwin: Would you ask the menagerie to be quiet? I simply say it is permitted under the rules, when an hon. member objects on the ground that another hon. member has attributed to him words he did not use, for the member who feels he has been misrepresented to rise and say so. That is all. It may simply be a misunderstanding. But this is the only opportunity available to my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to put the record right. He is entitled to make the statement he did.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I do not disagree with the point made by the hon. member, but neither do I think hon. members should take advantage of questions of privilege to make a second speech. The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey).

Mr. Mackasey: I regret it if my words were offensive to the hon. member, but I do know that an amendment was moved today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it is ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Alexander.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—DISABILITY PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON STEPS TO EXPEDITE DECISIONS ON APPLICATIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have raised this question out of concern for the backlog of applications by Canadian war veterans and their rights under the amendments to the Canada Pension Act to reapply for disability pensions.

• (2200)

On January 9, as reported at page 88 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), who today was referred to as the minister of agriculture, in view of the fact that the number of applications was increasing rather than decreasing, what steps he was taking to control the build-up in the backlog of applications, particularly in view of the fact, as I have said on many occasions, that the expected lifespan of Canadian war veterans is getting shorter and shorter as the years go by. The minister indicated in his reply to me that in a matter of days we would know what steps are being taken to rectify the situation and that pretty soon the trend would be reversed.

Subsequently, under questioning in the miscellaneous estimates committee the chairman of the pension commission said that while he realized these problems are of great concern across the country, he was rather pleased to say that the commission was making fairly good progress. He said that the backlog reached a peak of almost 9,600 cases at the end of September and that the commission were able to reduce that in January to just under 9,400. He said that the thing that was more important than having merely cut off 200 cases was the statistics themselves.

He went on to say that each month for the last seven months they found they had increased their production substantially. For each month of 1972, compared to each month in 1971, they increased their production. The incoming claims continued to go down. The curves on the graphs and the statistics showed a decided decrease, although there were individual months when they did go up. He said that in November and December of 1972 there was an increase but the over-all picture showed a decrease. Then he said that he was fairly confident that within the next two or three months we should be well on the way down.

I have every faith in the words of the chairman of the pension commission because I know he is as concerned as I am on behalf of the veterans that time is of the essence so far as the World War I and World War II veterans are concerned. I also know that the new minister, who certainly portrays an example by his contributions to the efforts made by veterans, feels that no stone should be left unturned either to increase the number of pension commissioners on an ad hoc basis, be it regionally or nationally, or to amend further the benefit of the doubt clause so that every benefit is directed toward the veteran who deserves, as of right, compensation for the sacrifice that he or she made to our nation in time of war.

We now have an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to open up the whole question of the backlog of applications. Therefore I request the minister to deal with the matter. A number of days have past since he indicated to me in this House that in a matter of days this situation would be rectified. Therefore, I ask him at this time what proposals he has to support the answer he gave me in the House on January 9, almost one month ago, and I look to him for that answer at this time.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I say that under the Pension Act pensions are paid in respect of members of the forces who have been disabled or died as a result of military service. At the present time the Canadian Pension Commission is paying pensions for disability to over 19,000 World War I veterans and over 12,000 of their widows. They are also paying over 1,000 disability claims to World War II veterans and to some 15,000 widows whose husbands' deaths related to that war. All told, there are over 150,000 persons receiving pensions related directly to injuries or death as a result of military service for this country.

World War II has been over for some 27 years, and World War I for over 54 years, but even now claims are being received at the rate of about 700 a month. The Pension Act was amended in the spring of 1971 and it provided many new extended benefits and has given many veterans or their dependants the opportunity to reapply for pension. The Canadian Pension Commission is dealing with these claims as rapidly and as sympathetically as possible. Members of the House will be interested to know that although the number of claims awaiting adjudication reached a peak of almost 9,600 by the end of 1972, the first reduction in the backlog was made in January so that there are now just under 9,400 on hand. This is the figure I was looking for when I told the hon. member I hoped I would have a more favourable report. So I am glad it has turned out this way.

One area in which there has been a good deal of interest lately is the basic rate of pension. Rates in the past have been set from time to time. Last year the government introduced a cost of living feature so that pension rates increased with the increase in the cost of living. The veterans' organizations were pleased with this but felt that the basic rate itself was too low. As a result, a study group was established jointly by the veterans' organizations and officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission under the chairmanship of Mr. A. O. Solomon. This group has now issued a report which was tabled in the House last week and which, briefly, recommends that the basic rate payable to a single, 100 per cent pensioner be related to the earning power of the single public servant. In doing this they took five categories and worked out an average take-home pay. They also recommended that the married pensioner should receive an additional 25 per cent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to him has expired.

HARBOURS—TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION OF SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS TO DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on January 16, as recorded at page 333 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) the following question:

Has responsibility for the administration of small craft harbours been transferred from his department? If so, when, and under what authority?

The Minister of Transport was somewhat vague in his reply so I transferred my question to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) who responded as follows:

Yes, Mr. Speaker. Responsibility for the administration of small craft harbours was transferred from the Department of Transport to the Department of the Environment in March of last year.

I was somewhat surprised by this answer, although in fairness I should say I was aware that some such idea was under consideration as a result of having been provided by the office of the Minister of the Environment shortly before the 1972 summer recess and the subsequent general election with a couple of documents. One is entitled "Interdepartmental task force on small craft harbours". In it, the following terms of reference are set out:

By cabinet document, No. 766-71 dated July 12, 1971 the cabinet committee on priorities and planning agreed under section (f) of this decision that a report on small craft harbours be prepared by the Minister of the Environment in consultation with the Privy Council office—

The terms of reference include some principles and guidelines one of which is a definition of small craft harbours as follows:

That small craft harbour be defined . . . as any sheltered area of navigable water, natural or artificial, where small craft may be moored or berthed and where the harbour's present primary use is one of or combination of commercial fishing, recreational sport fishing and pleasure craft activities.

• (2210)

Second, I would like to state that a small craft harbour may exist either at a separate dock contained entity or as a part of a larger multipurpose harbour. The second document I have is headed "A listing of the 131 small craft harbours in the Province of British Columbia presently vested with the Ministry of Transport and subject to further transfer considerations under the terms of reference of the inventory review—phase II."

The date of that report is April 17, 1972, and as I understood it the transfer considerations and the fact that the listing of harbours was presently under the ministry of transport made it clear, at least to me, that this was a matter under discussion and consideration within the councils of this government. Certainly my impression was that no such transfer had taken place, yet the minister said on January 16 that this transfer had in fact taken place in March. I find this puzzling to say the least.

The interdepartmental task force had another item under its principles and guidelines to which I would like to draw the attention of the House. It reads:

That small craft harbour component marine facilities be functionally considered in context of an integrated harbour system.

This led me to make an analysis of the harbours in British Columbia with which I am most familiar. Of the 131 harbours listed in this document, 53 are in Comox-Alberni. Because of some knowledge of those establishments I have had a look at them in relation to the criteria that were set forth. Of the 53 locations, I classify only 15 as exclusively fishing and/or pleasure harbours and only three as exclusively transport harbours. All of these in this listing of 15 plus three that I have given are relatively small. In fact, in the earlier report by Dr. Tom How they were classified either as C or D harbours.

This raises the whole question of what value if any there is in dual departmental responsibility respecting relatively small harbours along the coast of British Columbia. I will confine my discussion to that question because I am not familiar with those on the Atlantic coast. In other words, if this transfer has in fact taken place, it seems to me that it has raised more questions than it has answered about the whole question, the long standing dilemma of small harbour administration. This mixed jurisdiction is something that I find very puzzling and I wonder how it will work to improve a situation which Dr. Tom How in his report in 1967 described as a rather disastrous one to say the least.

I must say, in conclusion, that not the least of the considerations that are raised by this transfer is the deep-rooted mistrust which the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) has engendered among commercial fishermen who are still the principal users of most of these small craft harbours and for whom the harbours were primarily built in the first place. The agile and scheming mind of that minister who moves in such a mysterious way his wonders to perform, in the light of all his actions about licencing, buy-back schemes and herring regulations—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to provide an answer to the hon. member's original question. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) is responsible for the administration of federal harbours. The marine administration is established to administer commercial cargo shipping harbours within a network of marine transportation terminal and way facilities. Considerations governing the development and administration of these are based on user charges and cost recovery in so far as practicable in keeping with the national transportation policy as enunciated in the National Transportation Act.

Small craft harbour facilties are provided for the berthing of fishing and recreational craft and are accordingly not of basic interest to the ministry of transport as transportation facilities. There are some 2,700 harbours and facilities in Canada administered by the ministry of transport and of these 2,163 are recommended for transfer to the Department of the Environment. The Minister, in his dual capacity as Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries, is responsible for the fisheries industry in Canada. This transfer of responsibility will enable the minister to deal more effectively with the orderly development of the fishing industry.

The decision on the transfer—I believe this was the hon. member's original question—was made by the cabinet on March 2, 1972. However, the transfer has not yet been completely implemented due to considerations involving implications for other government departments. It is anticipated that the matter will be resolved before April 1, 1973.

[Mr. Barnett.]

COMMUNICATIONS—BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—INQUIRY AS TO OPPOSITION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, on January 18, as reported at page 430 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) the following question:

In light of the increased profit arising from last year's operations by Bell Canada, has the minister decided to make representations to the Canadian Transport Commission concerning their application for increases in rates?

Although the minister started to give me a reply to the question, he was ruled out of order by the Chair because the amount of time required by him to give the answer was longer than allotted. Primarily, my reason for asking for time in this adjournment debate was to give the minister time to explain the government's position on this very important matter. I do not want to take a great deal of time before the minister has an opportunity to do that, but I would like to make a few comments about the government's position on Bell before he speaks.

I think that each member of the House has had several complaints either about the quality of service provided by Bell or about the rates charged by Bell. At the present time the government is being asked to approve some very substantial rate increases for Bell which will directly or indirectly affect every Canadian family. Lord Thompson of Fleet once said that owning a television station is like having a licence to print money. In a very real sense having a monopoly, or quasi-monopoly in the communications industry is also like having a licence to print money because the use of these services is impossible to avoid by the average Canadian.

In a few minutes the minister will explain the government's unwillingness to appear before the Canadian Transport Commission by saying that it is due to the government's ability to overrule a decision by the CTC. In large part I agree with the minister's position. However, for the government to say this it must be prepared to take the extraordinary step of overruling the CTC if the decision it makes is not in the public interest.

There is another factor that must be considered by the minister and the government, and that is the role of the government as a customer of Bell Canada. For example, we are told that the government is the largest customer that Bell has in this country. As a customer whose bills are paid by the taxpayer, those of us who are here today have a responsibility to ensure that the taxpayer does not have to pay any more money than is absolutely necessary for these services. We also, as customers, have a responsibility to recognize the position which other customers are in, to make sure that their interests are also protected. In short, the government has a responsibility to ensure that the customers of Bell Canada do not have their voices go unheard.

What the government should do is make sure that counsel is freely available to customers of Bell so that their case can be put before the CTC. I will not personally take a position on the rate increase application because of lack of expertise and the facilities available to the government to examine Bell's submissions and operations. I would note a couple of things about Bell Canada, however.

The government's relationship with Bell is almost familial. It is incorporated by the government; it is federally regulated and the government is Bell's largest customer and as such has a vested interest in the quality of service provided and the rates it charges. Tax rates are determined by the government and the government has the ability to end the system of fast write-offs for capital expenses by Bell which serve to reduce its profits on paper.

Bell is the recipient of massive amounts of government assistance either directly or indirectly through its subsidiaries. For example, we know that the Export Development Corporation has Northern Electric Corporation as number two on its list of beneficiaries. Northern Electric is a subsidiary of Bell and it has received roughly $90 million from the government, which is roughly 10 per cent of the total given by the Export Development Corporation. In due course, Mr. Speaker, I will be asking that the government provide the House with a list of the amounts of money given be the Canadian taxpayer to Bell Canada. I think the public is entitled to have this information.

What I am seeking tonight is assurance from the minister that the government regards its role as regulator and supervisor of Bell seriously, that it will investigate thoroughly the concern I have relayed and that it will not hesitate to overrule the CTC if the award given Bell in the form of a rate increase is contrary to the best interests of the Canadian public.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government really cares about the protection of individuals and telephone users.

Indeed, as he mentioned himself, it is because of section 64 of the National Transportation Act and because of the powers that this section gives the cabinet to overrule decisions made by the Commission that I decided not to recommend to the government to intervene because that intervention—in the event of a possible second intervention by the governor in council—would place the government in the position of both judge and jury.

Like the hon. member my department received complaints from individuals and forwarded them diligently to the Commission, insisting that they be given the greatest attention. In conclusion, I should like to say that the idea of a government or department intervention in the business of the Canadian Transport Commission seems to me to be worthy of consideration.

This is why in the paper on a national communications policy—the publication of which was announced in the Speech from the Throne—we express the firm intention of bringing before the House proposals which would bring back some balance in the legislation and would allow the Minister of Communications to make representations to the Transport Commission or any other body responsible for regulations in order to fulfil the mandate of the Minister of Communications which is to protect as directly and immediately as possible the interests of telecommunication users.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, arising from the confusion and concern that exist in many parts of the country with regard to land claims and aboriginal rights of the native peoples of Canada. I would hope that the government would be disposed to accept this motion, particularly since it was so receptive to the motion put forward yesterday by the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is argument. The hon. member is not allowed to do that. The hon. member should indicate, as soon as possible, what the motion is.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Taylor):

That the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for consideration and report.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, exactly the same as that on which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) rose yesterday, I would suggest to the government that since it was so receptive yesterday to a motion exactly the same proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), this motion should commend itself to the government for acceptance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is not a point of order. The hon. member is arguing in favour of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands. I suggest to the House that if we get involved in a practice where members, on a point of order, argue in favour of a motion proposed under Standing Order 43, we will move forward only with pain and difficulty.

Mr. Nielsen: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I rose on a point of order which was exactly the same as that raised by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources yesterday. The Chair found no fault with it, so I presumed that my point of order today would be acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: I found serious fault with this procedure. Standing Order 43 does not make it possible for the President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or any other member to rise and say that he refuses or accepts a proposed motion under Standing Order 43. That is why I feel that such motions have to be proposed as quickly as possible without argument either from one side or the other. I agree with the hon. member for Yukon that it is irregular at this point either for a minister to stand and say he agrees to a motion or for a member to argue by way of a point of order that it should be accepted.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, and much more to the point, I think, than the preposterous stupidity we just heard from the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I suggest to the hon. member that his comments are irregular and certainly cannot be brought into a motion under Standing Order 43. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of indicating what his motion is.

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Howard: The motion, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), which, as I said, is much more to the point, is as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be authorized to investigate all aspects of the question of aboriginal rights of the native Indian and Eskimo people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of the most urgent and pressing necessity. Some 67,000 Canadians cannot find employment in the Atlantic provinces, and the rate of unemployment in the province of Newfoundland has climbed to 18 per cent, three times the national average. In light of the obvious failure of Department of Regional Economic Expansion programs to achieve any decent increase in employment opportunities in this region, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That in the opinion of this House the Prime Minister should immediately arrange a conference between the Atlantic provinces and the federal government on alternative economic opportunities for the region, and that the federal government outline its short and medium-term targets to reduce unemployment and to ameliorate the present disastrous situation in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

HARBOURS

SMALL CRAFT FACILITIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made last evening by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries to the effect that transfer of administration of small craft harbour facilities to his department from the Department of Transport will be completed before April 1, 1973, and in view of the fact that no proper parliamentary consideration has been given to policy changes in small craft harbour administration being instituted by the government, I ask leave of the House to move, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43:

That all matters pertaining to small craft harbour administration be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for inquiry and report, and that the committee be instructed to report to the House not later than March 15, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO RESTORE FORMER FORM OF BALLOT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-137, to amend the Canada Elections Act (form of ballot).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the number of spoiled ballots in the last federal election was almost three times the number spoiled in the 1968 election, the purpose of this bill is to restore the earlier form of ballot and eliminate the small circle or the form used in the last election.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF WEAPONS AND FIREARMS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-138, to amend the Criminal Code (control of weapons and firearms).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prohibit the possession of all hand guns and all weapons which under the Criminal Code are at present described as restricted. The bill also requires the registration of all rifles and makes all offences dealing with guns indictable offences. The bill also seeks to prevent those who have a history of mental instability or a history of criminal offences from obtaining firearms of any kind, particularly rifles. The last provision is included to give the Solicitor General an opportunity to reintroduce the legislation that he had intended—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

AMOUNT OF NINE-MONTH BUDGETARY SURPLUS—NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED IN JANUARY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and arises from the report by Statistics Canada indicating that some 688,000 Canadians were unemployed in January, or some 23,000 more than in the corresponding period last year. In view of these figures, has the minister any explanation for the fact that his budget, for the first nine months of the year, is showing a surplus over $600 million higher than the corresponding period in the previous year? In view of the minister's statement that he was going to produce an expansionary budget, has he any explanation why he has allowed this large surplus to accumulate during the first nine months?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the explanation is simple. The Leader of the Opposition is not taking into account all the figures. He knows that the draw-down on the cash position of the government comes in the next two or three months and that the budgetary surplus he sees at this time of the year will not exist at the end of the fiscal year. If he looks at the true fiscal position of the government he must take the budgetary and non-budgetary aspects of the fiscal stance of the government which, as I said on May 8, would amount to about $2 billion. It is likely to be very close to that figure by the end of the current fiscal year.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister what his current forecast is as to the budgetary surplus or deficit for the 12-month period? I am sure he must have at this time quite an accurate forecast.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that depends on the allocations in the next two months, but I have said in the House that I expect the total deficit or fiscal stance of the government in budgetary and non-budgetary terms to be about $2 billion, the amount I forecast on May 8.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister why, in view of the evident improvement in the budgetary position of the government—I remind the minister that he forecasted a deficit of some $450 million in the budgetary position of the government—and in light of these unemployment figures, he allowed this budgetary surplus to accumulate and why early last fall, for example, when it must have been apparent to him that this was going to happen, he allowed this to happen despite the unemployment situation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that the position of the government must be measured according to the total fiscal and capital needs of the government in budgetary and non-budgetary terms.

An hon. Member: But not in human terms.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The fact that our revenues are buoyant is a reflection of the strength of the economy, and he knows that as well as I do.

Mr. Stanfield: Tell that to your own caucus.

DATE OF BUDGET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in order to remove the uncertainty as to just exactly what is the nature of this budgetary surplus and what proposals the government is going to put forward to deal with the fantastic unemployment figures, may I ask whether the minister is going to present a budget, and when?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be very useful if the House had facts instead of proceeding on the basis of the conjectures that have been advanced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think we ought to take some encouragement from the fact that the seasonal figures have declined from 6.8 per cent to 6.2.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The same thing happened one year ago.

Mr. Hees: They have declined from the astronomical to the not quite astronomical.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: We want Walter Gordon back.

Mr. Hees: We saw the same sort of figures last year.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me—

Mr. Hees: Benson looked pretty good compared with you.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —that it would be very useful for the opposition to deal with facts. I would intend to bring down a budget on Monday, February 19.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The date is smoked out.

RECONSIDERATION OF CORPORATE TAX REDUCTION AND ACCELERATED WRITE-OFFS IN LIGHT OF EFFECT OF UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance one or two questions on the general subject that has been raised. May I ask whether, in view of the fact that the reduction in corporate taxes and the accelerated write-off for certain machinery and equipment which he proposed last May were justified by him on the basis of the need to protect Canadian manufacturing against the DISC program in the United States, and in view of the fact that all information so far has shown that the effect of the DISC program has been minimal on Canadian manufacturing, he is now reconsidering the corporate rip-off which he proposed last May?

• (1420)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to accept some of the rhetoric that the hon. member put in his question. The government remains committed to those provisions, Mr. Speaker. Those tax provisions, if approved by parliament, will not only have the effect of compensating for any program of DISC instituted by the United States Congress but any other measures that the United States, the common market or Japan might take in order to pierce and take advantage of a very competitive world market. In view of that, those budgetary provisions of last May are necessary to continue Canada's competitive position for manufacturing and processing industries. In that respect the government remains committed to those provisions.

Mr. Alexander: That's the end of the marriage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, one should never confuse a gentle courtship with marriage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether the statement he made is based on any information he has regarding the effect on Canadian manufacturing exports as a result of DISC, or any analysis which has been made by him or anyone else with respect to the possible effects of Britain entering the European Economic Community, or on what basis his statement, if he can put it briefly, was made?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will try to put my answer as briefly as the question was put by the hon. member. The budget of May 8 provided for a tax reduction as of January 1, 1973. Therefore it is still premature to assess the full value of that budget which on the corporate side had medium and long-term structural effects and, I submit, advantages for the Canadian economy. I do not think it needs much imagination to envisage what the position of Canada will be in a competitive world with a protectionist stance in the United States, with Britian, our second largest customer, entering the European Common Market, and with a rejuvenated Japan. I submit to the House, as I did on May 8—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South for a last supplementary at this time. We will try to continue with further supplementaries from other hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the Minister of Finance has announced that he will present his budget on Monday, February 19, but may I ask him even at this time whether the corporate concessions he announced last May are the only ones this parliament will be faced with or whether there are any others?

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has anticipated the difficulty I would have in answering that question at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Portneuf wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): No, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. member in a moment, after allowing a few other supplementaries on the subject now under consideration.

CORPORATION TAX REDUCTIONS—HIGHER PRICES FOR CARS PURCHASED IN CANADA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the minister gave the corporations tax credits and tax advantages in his May budget, will he explain to the House why he has not insisted that the car manufacturers sell cars made in Canada at the same prices as cars made in the United States?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I believe my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, was successful in his negotiations with the automobile manufacturers in getting a commitment from them, particularly from General Motors and Ford, that there would be no raising of prices on 1973 models to an extent that I expect we should see some narrowing of the present differential of 8½ per cent at the manufacturers' level between United States and Canadian prices. We should see some considerable narrowing of that differential in 1973. My colleague has also made it clear he will seek from the manufacturers a further narrowing of the differential in respect of 1974 models.

MANPOWER

INQUIRY RESPECTING EFFICIENCY OF CENTRES

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that since the beginning of December a new regulation compels the unemployed to take personal steps to find work, could he tell us if in his opinion the application of this regulation will be enough to boost the economy or if by setting that course he just wanted to prove that he no longer believes in the efficiency of the manpower centres in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, I would think the efficiency of the manpower centres is increasing regularly. While we are far from perfection, I do not accept the premise of the question.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—MEASURES TO ACCELERATE APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

In view of the increased number of unemployed, especially in the province of Quebec, does the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration intend to ask officials to proceed more rapidly with the study of local initiative projects so they can be undertaken as soon as possible thus creating jobs and decreasing unemployment?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been trying to speed this up regularly over the last month and a half. I think nearly all the decisions are made, although it is my intention to transfer some funds from the amount reserved for what we call the business, co-operative and entrepreneurial LIP program to the regular LIP program, plus the transfer of $10 million from the on-the-job training program to the local initiatives program, not because the on-the-job training program is not a good one but because we think we can put people to work faster under the circumstances through the local initiatives program.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley on a supplementary.

Mr. Gillies: My question is not exactly a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to put it anyway.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's honesty, but obviously there is no reward for that quality. I believe the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has a supplementary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You bet your sweet life he has.

MEASURES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT LEVEL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the Prime Minister in connection with a previous question. Since the Prime Minister has stated privately that it would be unrealistic to expect the government to be able to reduce unemployment below a 5 per cent level, is he now prepared to give consideration to the policies put forward by the Official Opposition for reducing unemployment well below that figure?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I wish, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member had shown more of that virtue that you recognized in the hon. member for Don Valley.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley.

An hon. Member: Honesty has its rewards after all!

FIGHTING OF INFLATION OR REDUCTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since there now seems to be a surplus in the budget, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the policy of the government has been to fight inflation rather than to solve the unemployment problem?

• (1430)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that my priority is jobs. When he refers to a surplus he is misleading the House in the sense that he knows that the surplus or deficit position of the government is measured by the total fiscal and monetary stance, namely, budgetary and non-budgetary. I have said to the House that the fiscal or budgetary stance of the government would be $2 billion, and that remains very close to the figure that I will be able to report to the House.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the Minister of Finance and the government that one can fight unemployment and really operate the economy, at a time of 6.7 per cent unemployment, with a balanced budget or a slight deficit?

SUGGESTED MEETING OF FEDERAL AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES FINANCE MINISTERS ON MEASURES TO BE INCLUDED IN BUDGET TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister meet with the finance ministers of the four Atlantic provinces before bringing down his budget so that he can discuss measures to be included in his budget that will do something about the stagnating economy in the Atlantic provinces, which I might say is a direct result of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: —and programs can be introduced by the government to alleviate the very serious and critically high unemployment problem in the Atlantic region?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, despite the argumentative nature of the hon. gentleman's question, may I say I do not minimize the problem in Newfoundland at all. I had some very good conversations with the Minister of Finance of Newfoundland both at the federal-provincial finance ministers conference on January 18 and 19 and again last week in a private meeting with Mr. Crosbie.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that there seems to be no change in the unemployment situation in the Atlantic provinces, and in view of the budget that is going to be presented to the House on February 19, will the minister meet with his counterparts in the four Atlantic provinces to discuss measures to alleviate the situation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we had a thorough review of the situation just two or three weeks ago. In the circumstances it will not be possible for me to meet with my counterparts in the Atlantic provinces until after the budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Drummond wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette wishes to ask a supplementary question.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTION THAT OLD AGE PENSION BE PAID AT AGE 60 TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

As unemployment still represents a very serious problem for the country, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he seriously considers an old age security plan where we would be eligible at age 60, which would allow the creation of thousands of new jobs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is using a rather unusual slant to bring up this problem, which, in fact, has already been dealt with by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I have nothing to add to the statement of the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENEWAL OF NORAD AGREEMENT—OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Was the Minister of National Defence stating government policy when he indicated to the Globe and Mail that the NORAD agreement would be renewed for three years and perhaps longer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to consult with the minister as to exactly what he said, but I believe it is true to say that we have not yet had negotiations with the United States about this.

Mr. Rowland: Will the Prime Minister assure the House that the House will have an opportunity to debate this question prior to the agreement, which is due for renewal on May 12, being signed? Will he also assure us that the terms of reference that are given to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence will be broad enough to encompass a complete study of the NORAD agreement?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question I think it is fair to assume, the House being willing, that there will be opposition days on which the subject can be debated at the suggestion of the opposition.

[Later:]

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him whether he could give his assurance to the House that, should the NORAD agreement be renewed, something I would not be very happy about, it would not involve this country in expenditures on equipment purchases such as AWACS, over the horizon backscatter radar and interceptor aircraft requiring sophisticated ground control equipment, expenditures that would have utility only within the context of the NORAD agreement and which would restrict the flexibility of our armed forces?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I have said and as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, we have not entered into formal negotiations with the United States concerning the renewal of the NORAD agreement. I stated the other day that, as our second priority in defence was the air defence of North America, it was unthinkable that we would not be renewing the agreement in some form. However, the terms have not been settled and I have made no recommendation to my colleagues concerning the terms.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF MAY, 1972, BUDGET ON ECONOMY AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of his statement that over all, on budgetary and non-budgetary account, things have worked out as he envisaged when he presented his budget. Is the minister satisfied with the effects of that budget on the economy and on unemployment, as things have worked out during the course of the year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the fiscal forecast. I was talking, as the hon. gentleman knows, of the fiscal stance, of the cash requirements of the government, in total budgetary and non-budgetary terms. Of course I am not satisfied with the present situation in terms of unemployment in this country. I take some comfort from the fact that the seasonally adjusted figures have come down, though I am disturbed about their erratic nature. In terms of my budget of May 8, the stimulus given at that time was in a period when there was a very buoyant first and second quarter, as the hon. gentleman knows, and the third quarter was flatter than we had expected. However, as the hon. gentleman knows, in terms of corporate stimulus the budget and the tax structure of the country were medium and long term in effect, to give us a medium and long-term competitive position on world markets as well as defending our markets at home.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the third quarter was as flat as this government's program during the election campaign. Since the Minister of Finance has said he is not satisfied with the effects of his budget on unemployment, may I ask him why he did not respond to the persistently high rate of unemployment during the year by increasing the expansionary effect of the economy and utilizing the obviously improved budgetary position, which for the first nine months is running at a rate of $600 million over the previous year? If the minister was not satisfied with the effects of his budget on unemployment, has he any explanation of why he did not act when it became clear that it was unsatisfactory?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be allowed to reply to the question, but I will then go to other questioners for a few minutes and return to supplementaries. The hon. member for Drummond wishes to ask a question and the hon. member for Selkirk had a supplementary to his question that he did not get a chance to ask. Therefore, when the minister has replied to the question from the Leader of the Opposition we will go to another subject for a few moments and I will return to this very important matter later.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this point thoroughly—

Mr. Stanfield: No, you did not.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The hon. gentleman was present so I will not repeat what I said. It is a debating point and we can take it up again during the budget debate. However, I will again draw to the attention of the House that when the hon. gentleman tries to isolate the budgetary position of the government from the non-budgetary he is giving a misleading impression to the House.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Can he tell us if the department he manages considers as the most important factor, with regard to the approval of a local initiatives project, the level of unemployment registered in the area where the project originates.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, we take this into consideration as a major factor.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—CONSIDERATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF SEATS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister let the House and the country know what progress, if any, has been made in connection with the matter of redistribution by way of an alternative to the present system and with particular reference to the number of members in the House? On January 11 this matter was brought to his attention and he indicated consideration was being given as to what might be done and later he repeated that. I know that members in all parts of the House are naturally interested in this matter as time is of the essence, having regard to the fact that committees in various provinces are already providing maps or getting ready to provide them on the basis of the present representation in the House.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question addressed by the right hon. gentleman. I believe the last time the question was raised the Prime Minister suggested that I might meet with the other House leaders and consider the matter with the objective that if it was possible to reach some consensus we might move on this matter. I have had a meeting today with my opposite numbers and we had a general discussion, with some explicit proposals that I expect will now be discussed among all parties to see whether some conclusion can be reached. I believe we all felt that at this stage this might be the most effective procedure to follow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given by him, as he has a general responsibility in this regard, or the cabinet to a constitutional amendment to bring about an increase in the number of seats in the House and also to provide a floor for some of the provinces where the population is decreasing very rapidly?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. member will refer to my previous answer he will see that a variety of ways have been considered by myself, and we have decided to proceed with this matter in the way just mentioned by the House leader.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to a constitutional amendment. That was my question and he cannot pass it off to one of the junior ministers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Poor old Allan.

An hon. Member: Hi there, junior.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the Prime Minister a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should ask the right hon. member to withdraw that comment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The facetiousness of the Prime Minister is exceeded only by his impertinence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The right hon. gentleman's facetiousness is demonstrated by what he—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I see that the Prime Minister is whispering his answer to the reporter. I remember other occasions when he whispered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will be interested to learn what he said when we read Hansard. Whispering is one of his highest qualifications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the right hon. member ask his supplementary question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether consideration is being given to a constitutional amendment. If it is not, it will be too late because at the rate these committees are meeting the whole matter will have been decided. Can he answer that?

Mr. Hees: Just yes or no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I refer to what the Prime Minister said on January 11—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman asked a question and there was no reply. As the right hon. member knows, that is the prerogative of the minister who is being questioned. I do not think that the matter can be commented on further.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know how this government treats the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know how contemptuous the Prime Minister is when he refers to members on his own side of the House as bums.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him whether it is in keeping with his position as the first minister of Her Majesty in the House to refuse—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to answer a question as to whether what he said on January 11, that it would require a constitutional amendment, is still his viewpoint and that he is doing something about it, or is he just whispering?

Mr. Hees: Just answer yes or no, if you please.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—COST OF CLEAN-UP—ACTION TO SEIZE VESSEL

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the west coast oil spill. Will he tell the House approximately what the cost of the clean-up is, and has he taken any civil legal proceedings to seize the vessel, Irish Stardust, which is still in the harbour at Victoria, before the vessel leaves?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the last report I had is that it is going to take about two weeks before the oil on the beaches is cleaned up, so we do not have any idea of the price right now. The hon. member knows that the master appeared before the court and that a bond of $20,000 has been deposited. I am waiting for the judgment of the court on this.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—SUGGESTED CONFERENCE OF GOVERNMENT, BUSINESS AND UNION LEADERS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As a quarter of a million Quebecers are now unemployed, has the government drawn up short term projects to reduce substantially the rate of unemployment in Quebec? If so, what are those projects and when will they be introduced?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the caucus leader of the two-member

Quebec section of the Progressive Conservative party, I could—

Mr. Hees: Where are the Alberta members?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

[Translation]

It seems the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe wants to put a supplementary. He may have the floor.

Mr. Wagner: I now wish to put a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the deplorable situation in Quebec, where a quarter of a million people are unemployed, is the present leader of the temporary government willing to look favourably on the initiative he casually brushed off a few weeks ago, namely an immediate federal-provincial conference in Quebec to discuss the economic problems of that province, to which all political leaders, leaders of intermediary organizations and representatives of both unions and employers would participate?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would suggest that federal-provincial conferences be held at that level for each province. He should be aware of the federal-provincial conferences which have already taken place between the ministers of finance, the ministers of health, and of those which are scheduled for the forthcoming months.

Concerning the particular conferences as important as those which have been suggested by him, the hon. member should remember that we of the Liberal party have rejected the associate states thesis.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe will excuse me but his colleague from Brome-Missisquoi has a point of order.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC—REVIEW OF REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Considering the figures relating to unemployment announced today in the province of Quebec, is this government prepared to drastically review its regional development policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wonder in what direction the hon. member would have this policy reviewed, but it seems that we heard some people state during the election campaign that too much was being granted to the province of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to ask questions, but I certainly did not say that there was too much going to the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Could we have order in the House, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: It is impossible to ask questions in this House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member will kindly resume his seat I will try to assist him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members are being unfair to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. He has the right to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Grafftey: I sometimes think I am in kindergarten, not in the highest court of the land. I now ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion the following question: in view of today's unemployment figures showing ever-increasing regional economic disparities, especially in the province of Quebec, will the minister now review the various policies that brought about such a situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are in the process, and have been for the last three months, of discussing with each of the provinces what variations they would like to see in regional expansion policies. I have had some consultations with officials of the government of the province of Quebec and we will be holding others in the very near future. We are quite open to changes in the present approach if these can be proved to be more effective.

INDUSTRY

MICHELIN TIRE COMPANY—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF PLANTS IN UNITED STATES—COMMITMENT REGARDING EXPORT OF CANADIAN PRODUCTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the government of the United States used the Department of Regional Economic Expansion program to justify its countervailing duty against the Michelin Corporation, in view of the further fact it was announced in Paris today that the Michelin Corporation has received credits of some $150 million to build two plants in the United States, can the minister assure the House that he has obtained assurances from the Michelin Corporation that they will live up to their commitment to export 80 per cent of their Canadian production to the United States?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the original plans of Michelin, nothing that has been conveyed to me with regard to their marketing intentions, and I understand that there has been no change either in their recruitment program with regard to employing Canadian workers in their Canadian plant.

INQUIRY AS TO PROTEST TO GATT CONCERNING IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Can the minister inform the House whether or not he or some other minister of the government has filed a formal protest to GATT concerning the United States decision on Michelin? If so, would he consider tabling that protest? Finally, would he inform the House when an answer or decision might be expected to be reached by GATT, if that action has been taken?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I explained to the House on an earlier occasion, we did file a formal protest with the United States government. We have not yet received a reply to that formal protest. We have not yet filed a formal protest with GATT.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES AGAINST PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY IN CANADA FOR POWER PROJECT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is some urgency because at the present time the United States Federal Power Commission is receiving briefs regarding flooding of the Canadian Skagit valley. In view of the stated opposition of the government of Canada, of the Official Opposition and of the New Democratic Party to the flooding of the Canadian Skagit valley by Seattle Light and Power, would the minister advise the House what action he is taking in this regard to save this Canadian valley from being flooded by an American power corporation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on January 9 a note was sent to the United States authorities requesting discussions on this question. This is the procedure that has been approved by both the government of the province of British Columbia and of course by this government. It seems to us the most effective way of getting action.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, again I stress the urgency of this matter. On December 17, 1971, the Minister of the Environment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his question as quickly as possible, because we have reached the end of the question period.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise the house whether in fact any formal protest has been issued by the government of Canada to the government of the United States saying plainly that we will not accept the flooding of this valley?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have made our representations to the United States government which I believe is quite happy to discuss them with us. The outstanding issue at the moment is not the question of the flooding but the question of the cost, and this is what we are discussing at present.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. The Chair will allow another supplementary question from the hon. member for Vancouver South, following which we will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reply by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can the minister tell the House why the Minister of the Environment recently stated that the Skagit was a dead issue when apparently this is not so?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, I suggest to the hon. member that this is hardly in order.

Mr. Fraser: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

The House resumed from Monday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, last evening at ten o'clock I had just begun my remarks on third reading of this very important bill. I am very pleased that I came into the House for the question period which I want to do more and more in the future. I am very happy that the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), who is a good friend of mine, showed as much concern as he did during the question period for the unemployed in the province of Quebec. I am wondering how he could possibly reconcile this concern for the unwilling victims of our fiscal and monetary policies with his vote later on when he votes against Bill C-124 which would indicate that he is quite prepared to deny to those unemployed the unemployment insurance benefits which would be due them next week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe on a question of privilege.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have no idea where the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) found the comments which he attributes to me, but with respect I must suggest to him that they are inaccurate. Moreover, I would suggest that he should wait for the vote to find out which way I shall vote.

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased that a one time protegee of mine has shown such humanitarian concern.

I have reviewed the debate on second reading, in committee and on third reading. It is not my intention—it is never my intention—to be partisan, of course, but I do think we have reached the moment of truth in Bill C-124. I think the new members, as do the old members, realize that we have advanced through all the various stages of Bill C-124. On second reading in this House, by the method of a vote, of course, we adopted the principle of the bill, which is very explicit and well thought out, namely, that the ceiling governing the advances which the government makes available to the Unemployment Insurance Commission shall be deleted from that act.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) raised an important point in the debate last night. He was concerned that the removal of the $800 million ceiling might in some way remove control over the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I think this is a vary valid approach to a very valid concern. This morning, Mr. Speaker, I took the trouble to check out the ways and means that are still left for exercising control over the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

First of all, every month the DBS publishes the benefit payments and the number of claimants on unemployment insurance. Then, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) publishes the amount of financial disbursements, including advances as well as payments of unemployment insurance benefits. Then, the statute which set up the Unemployment Insurance Commission demands a public annual report by the commission. Fourth, Mr. Speaker, there is a financial statement which must be certified by the Auditor General. There must be a detailed accounting of expenditures included in the public accounts. Then, the government's share of the unemployment insurance costs must be included in its main estimates. Then, the main estimates must be referred to the appropriate standing committees of the House.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the public accounts will be scrutinized by the Public Accounts Committee, as usual, and the Auditor General's report will be scrutinized by that committee. As well as that, there is the existence of a team of internal auditors of unemployment insurance, all of which indicates that the control over the expenditures, operations and administration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission does not rest solely on the existence of an $800 million ceiling.

With these ten points I have just explained, for the benefit of hon. members, that we have—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this point. I wonder if the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), the former minister of labour, could tell the House—I am sure he discussed it with his former colleagues in government—why Bill C-125 was withdrawn, because it was supposed to assist the hon. member in his argument?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would permit me, I intend to talk about Bill C-125 in a few moments. I intend to touch briefly on that point.

I have mentioned that in this House we have accepted the principle of Bill C-124. It may not have been unanimously accepted, but the fact remains that it was accepted. It was that the amount of $800 million specified in the original act be deleted as the sum of money to which the government is limited in making advances to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in order to finance its day-to-day operations. As I mentioned on second reading, and as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned last evening, the $800 million mentioned in the act is nothing more than a sum of money which the government is entitled to advance to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, not in the form of a deficit, not in the form of a commitment but simply in the form of a loan in the same sense, as I mentioned previously, that a bank will advance moneys to finance accounts receivable, or debts receivable, or inventory, in the case of a normal private enterprise.

Obviously, the $800 million has been inadequate for the purpose for which it was originally intended, but members on the committee, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows, accepted that particular amendment to the act rather reluctantly at the time. We felt it was the best way out at that time. Experience has indicated, however, that as long as this ceiling remains in the act it can be a hindrance or handicap to the government's main responsibility, the one that was outlined so often today in the question period, that is, the responsibility of this government, or of any government in the future if, as a result of fiscal or monetary policies, as a result of tariff policies, as a result of the relationship between the Canadian dollar and foreign currencies, or for one reason or another, the rate of unemployment in this country is abnormally high. The government of the day must then assume its responsibilities and commit itself, as the act stipulates, to absorbing the cost of unemployment insurance when the unemployment rate on a national level and on a regional level happens to be over 4 per cent.

Just to repeat, Mr. Speaker, the cost of the unemployment insurance plan when unemployment is below 4 per cent is borne by the employers and employees. The cost is met from weekly contributions, with the provision that by 1976-77 these particular contributions shall be in balance, in the sense that if there is a surplus in the fund of the Unemployment Insurance Commission it will be reflected in a lowering of the contribution rates, something which I think will take place in 1977. If the contributions are not sufficient, then the rates will be raised in order to eliminate any deficit. In the interval there is a deficit of $189 million which will be carried forward over the next few years, as the act provides.

When the accounts are balanced off in April, Mr. Speaker, and all the T4 slips are analysed, we will find that in effect the commission owes the government $189 million, which in effect is owed by the employers and employees of this country, and which will be absorbed and balanced off over the next few years by minor adjustments of a nickel or a dime to the weekly contributions. I cannot stress strongly enough that to defeat this bill, or even to postpone the passage of this bill, can have only one effect and that effect will be to deny to the unemployed of Canada the unemployment insurance benefits to which they are entitled, and to deny them as early as next week. That will be the general effect of postponing Bill C-124 or of defeating it in the House of Commons. The failure to carry out that responsibility and moral obligation is something that I do not think anybody in this House wants to have on his conscience. Certainly, the party with which I am presently allied does not want to be responsible for denying the unemployed of this country that to which they are entitled.

Constantly through the question period today there was concern shown by hon. members opposite for the unemployed, but it is very difficult for me to equate their concern during question time with their obvious intention to downgrade, to question, to defeat, if necessary, the Unemployment Insurance Act by postponing, delaying or defeating Bill C-124.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: It is all right for the members opposite to holler and take exception to my remarks but through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to them that you cannot have it both ways. You cannot on the one hand condemn the government, with justification, for the abnormally high rate of unemployment, if on the other hand you begrudge the cost of the plan to the government, out of the general revenues, for supplying financial assistance to the unemployed of Canada. You simply cannot have it both ways.

If you argue that they are unemployed through no fault of their own in the overwhelming majority of cases, and that seems to be the general theme that emerges from this debate, then how can you begrudge them sufficient income in order that in the interim, while they are looking for work, they can at least exist with a degree of dignity, a degree of dignity that was impossible under the old act because of the very small levels of weekly payments?

• (1510)

Another thing that caught my attention today, Mr. Speaker, was that hon. members opposite have said the latest figures show a great degree of regional disparity. This is a problem that has faced governments for a considerable number of years. How many members opposite in the debate on second reading, in their question before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, the Labour, Manpower and Immigration Committee or this debate on third reading, have bothered to pay token tribute to the economic advantages of the present act and the contribution that unemployment insurance has made to reducing regional disparity? I want to quote once again some of the figures that I quoted on second reading, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

In Newfoundland under the old act, $20,630,740 was distributed in unemployment insurance benefits in the first six months of 1971 and for the same period in 1972, $42,264,696 was distributed; in Prince Edward Island, $3,627,433 under the old act and $7,486,583 under the new act; Nova Scotia, $23 million, under the old act and $42 million under the new act; New Brunswick, $21,512,336 under the old act and $42 million under the new act; in Quebec, $156,518,741 under the old act and $308,663,331 under the new act; Ontario, $169,880,126 under the old act and $327 million under the new act. In case people out west think that they are not getting their fair share of this money that tends to reduce regional disparity, may I cite these figures? Manitoba received $25,604,776 under the old act and $37,564,287 under the new act; Saskatchewan, $15 million under the old act and $33 million under the new act; Alberta, $30 million under the old act and almost $62 million under the new act and finally, British Columbia $61,417,092 under the old act and $136,442,825 under the new act. I am sorry that I do not have the breakdown for the Territories.

The new Unemployment Insurance Act happens to be a good business instrument, both socially and economically, to reduce regional disparity. As I have pointed out before, the money I am talking about is one of the reasons we have had a certain degree of prosperity in Newfoundland this Christmas, as I am sure many hon. members opposite would agree. It has helped drop the unemployment figures we read today. The boom in retail sales is shown. It has arrested unemployment in this area by helping to reduce inventories of wholesalers and by providing work for the small industries in this country. I do not think anybody should discourage that, Mr. Speaker.

The question is, Mr. Speaker, what would the fate of the economy be at the moment if we had not distributed $2 billion through unemployment insurance benefits over the last year? What method would we have used to transfer this money from the treasury to the people of this country?

Mr. Mazankowski: Give them some work.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, members opposite can provide their own answers; I am only asking the questions. I am simply saying that the unemployment insurance fund this year has distributed $2 billion which does not vary too greatly, as hon. members know, from the concept of reducing personal taxes for precisely the same reason. Personal taxes are reduced in order to stimulate the economy and in order to provide more money for spending. An across the board reduction in personal taxes is not so effective in the sense that the wealthy get it; the person who has no income tax in which to reflect the reduction does not benefit. The wealthy may put it in the bank, not necessarily spend it, so it can have inflationary effects in the main cities. With this act we at least provide the people with money to spend in the regions of high unemployment, which at the moment are essentially the Atlantic provinces. I am surprised that any member of this House should disparage the $2 billion that has come from the federal treasury to be distributed to the unemployed in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I have tried to participate today on a certain level, and I shall try to stay there, but if hon. members opposite want to heckle I am quite prepared to get into a good debate. I enjoy a battle but if Your Honour should prefer that I desist, that is fine, too.

There are points that I should like to make. The hon. member from Alberta whose riding changes periodically—I shall describe him as a very wealthy lawyer from Alberta—he is a good friend of mine but he keeps shifting his role—

An hon. Member: And what happened to you?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member to whom I refer posed a very intelligent question, that is the question of abuse. The mail which I have been receiving, Mr. Speaker, which is pretty heavy, has shifted in tone somewhat in recent weeks. The mood now seems to be that we need unemployment insurance, that there is nothing to be gained by destroying what has been part of the social fabric of this country for 30 years.

An hon. Member: To get them back to where?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had occasion a moment ago when an hon. member was trying to ask a question to say that other hon. members were making it difficult for him to do so. I think I have to say the same thing to protect the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). It is entirely against the rules of this House and the long established practice for hon. members to heckle and make it difficult for another member to make his speech. It is extremely easy for hon. members to interrupt the member who is speaking, but it is against the Standing Orders of this House. I suggest to hon. members that they should be fair to the hon. member for Verdun and allow him to make his speech.

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I did not know better I would think the people who are heckling—who are in a minority in the opposition—are those so desperate to get into power that they want to ride on the backs of the poor. I am not going to fall into that trap, however; their speeches are on record and their efforts during the election campaign to destroy what is very progressive legislation is there for all to see. I can understand their dilemma in having to vote for or against the bill, thus showing their inconsistency with the approach they took during the election. I can resort to this kind of attack if they prefer or can continue along the lines I had decided. We are on third reading, not second reading, now and it is entirely up to the opposition to determine on what plane they want to continue the debate.

I received a lot of mail on this subject which all members of this House are welcome to read. In recent weeks the theme of the mail has shifted. No longer is it coming from unemployed people who are saying "What am I guilty of?" or "Find me a job".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: It is coming from people who are saying "We are amongst those fortunate people who can afford 90 cents or a dollar for someone less fortunate, but we want to be sure there are no abuses in the act". I think that is the point that the hon. gentleman wanted to make in all honesty and sincerity. The question of abuse is one that has bothered us all. Last night there were few people present and I did not have the opportunity of reviewing once and for all the argument regarding abuse. I think hon. members opposite are concerned. I know there are Liberals in the Conservative party just as there are Conservatives in the Liberal party.

• (1520)

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member is not talking about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is he?

Mr. Mackasey: I should like to make the following statistics clear, because they concern abuse. I want hon. members to think of 1970, the last complete year when we operated under the old act. Older members will know exactly what that implies. Under the old act the greatest pay-out was $53, I think, although on average the pay-out was $35. The maximum was raised to $58. In order to qualify one had to acquire 30 weeks attachment to a job over a two-year period, and eight weeks had to be acquired in the last 52 weeks. As there was no universality provision under the old act, only part of the work force was covered. School teachers were not covered, and it might be interesting to note that over 15,000 of them are unemployed in Canada today. Nurses were not covered. Certain public servants were eliminated. Casual workers were eliminated. Hospital workers were not included. People with salaries of over $7,800 were not included. So, the work force which was covered in 1970 totalled about 4,900,000. That meant that if those people became unemployed they were eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. This number also included so-called self-employed people, such as fishermen and other people in special categories.

One would think that with such a small work force, with difficulties regarding eligibility the provisions for which were very stringent, and with the lower rates of unemployment in 1970-72, there would have been a substantially smaller number of people on claim. Mr. Speaker, in 1970, of 4,900,000 people who were eligible for unemployment insurance and covered, at various times of the year 2,049,000 people were on claim. I now come to 1972. I shall skip 1971, for a very good reason which I can explain. In the first part of the year we operated under the old act, and in the second part under the new act. Universality did not apply, but at least I can give hon. members the following statistic: there were 2,092,000 on claim.

In 1972, the year we have just completed and, significantly, the first year in which universality applied and the first year when the overwhelming majority of Canadian workers were covered by unemployment insurance, the number of people eligible for unemployment insurance and entitled to collect if unemployed rose to 7,150,000. Even more significant is the change in the eligibility rule, which was reduced from 30 weeks over a two-year period to eight weeks in one year. According to what I learned from the astute questioning of opposition members in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and Labour Committee—and after all it is their job to ask these questions and that is why these committees are set up—2,099,000 people were on claim, only 50,000 more than in 1970. This happened when there was a much higher level of unemployment and when the work force covered totalled over 7 million, as opposed to a work force covered of slightly under 5 million.

Where is the abuse that we hear so much about? Where are the hundreds of thousands of citizens who, supposedly, are taking advantage of the eight-week eligibility provision, who are taking advantage of the higher benefits and who are taking advantage of the so-called breakdown in administration in order to collect unemployment insurance. I say that since only 40,000 or 50,000 more people claimed unemployment insurance in 1972 than claimed it in the year 1970, and in 1972, as a result of universality, the work force was almost double the size of that covered in 1970, is it not time people stopped presuming that the man who works for a living has a monopoly on honesty in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: How do the figures of about 3 per cent or 4 per cent of claimants who abuse unemployment insurance in this country compare with the figures recently released relating to doctors in Ontario? Their own association says that there is almost a 12 per cent, and certainly an 11 per cent, rip-off on medicare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: How many of our corporation lawyers will make a fortune pretty soon in finding loopholes in the income tax law in order to enable their clients to evade income tax legally? Mr. Speaker, the more proficient you become in finding loopholes in taxation laws the greater your chances are in this country of being named a Queen's Counsel.

There cannot be different standards for different types of people. Most certainly, within the work force there are people who deliberately set out to defraud the Unemployment Insurance Commission, just as there are people who deliberately set out to cheat under any particular type of social policy or any type of legislation enacted in this or any other country. The important point is that we have an obligation to those who are working, to those who obtain unemployment insurance, to keep those abuses to the very lowest possible figure. That is why I hope, despite the concern of the NDP, that Bill C-125 will be sent to an appropriate committee of the House before second reading, in order that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member for two purposes. First, I must remind the hon. member who has the floor that we should be discussing the bill before the House and not another bill which is on the order paper and which may or may not be considered by the House later. Second, I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can be allowed to continue only if he has the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I will take only a few minutes more. I appreciate the courtesy of the House, which is traditional I am glad to say. I have tried on third reading to make a case to opposition members who, on political grounds perhaps, might see some advantage in voting against the bill. If that were to happen, those on this side of the House would immediately let the unemployed of this country know that by that vote hon. members opposite are prepared to deny the unemployed their money.

Mr. Alexander: Oh, come off that nonsense, Bryce.

Mr. Mackasey: All parties agree on the basic principle of the act. Essentially, that has to do with removing one of the impediments to the unemployment insurance legislation that makes it difficult for the government to assume its main responsibility, that of providing the unwitting victims of unemployment a decent level of income to which they are entitled because they are unemployed through no fault of their own, because they are unemployed as a direct result of government action or government policy. I can visualize many occasions in future when, as in the past, governments will be forced into the position of creating temporary disruptions in the work force.

An hon. Member: It should never happen.

Mr. Mackasey: I have long felt that the high level of unemployment at the moment is due to a combination of factors, as I think many economists will agree. We have what is known as structural unemployment. There has been a shift in the Phillips curve. At the same time as we have experienced an abnormal growth in the work force we have been obliged by events outside this country to lower tariffs under the Kennedy Round, to meet competition from Japan, as the Minister of Finance said, to meet competition from Sweden, the United States and West Germany, and to attempt to invade the Common Market. We cannot do that by hiding behind high tariffs and encouraging labour intensive industries, especially if we expect to maintain our position as an exporting nation and create jobs for the future generations of this country.

Where I may differ with the NDP is that I say that accelerated depreciation, lower tariffs and incentives of various types are designed to make this country more competitive, to introduce new technology and to force inefficient industry to become efficient by purchasing new equipment. These things are bound to bring short range disruptive effects to the work force, but that is exactly the purpose of unemployment insurance, to help people who are temporarily unemployed for reasons beyond their control. However, it is the government's responsibility to force industry into a position of efficiency. Even then, it causes disruptive effects on the work force. I think the culmination of these reductions of tariffs as a result of the Kennedy rounds and the increase in productivity that is coming from machine rather than labour intensive industry at a time of abnormal growth in the work force has caused this lingering unemployment.

I simply say, because we have a decent Unemployment Insurance Act for the first time that helps people draw a decent income during this disruptive period, a period which will eventually result in new jobs, more jobs and an expanded industry, as is now happening in the textile industry, the lumber industry and the pulp and paper industry, the net result will be more jobs. In the meantime, we should not begrudge the unemployed people in this country what is justly theirs, a decent income at government expense because the reasons for their unemployment are reasons beyond their control. It is time we put an end to the accent on abuses. This plan is not abused.

In case people think I tolerate abuses, I want to say that in 1969 I expressed my concern about abuses in no uncertain terms. In that year I caused to be published a series of advertisements in the newspapers against abuses. I pointed out the consequences. The advertisements pointed out that if a person abused the fund, he was stealing from his fellow worker. They also pointed out the criminal aspects of defrauding the fund. What did this do? It prompted a beautiful column by Canada's answer to Zane Grey, Dalton Camp, who writes about the sun setting nationally. What did he say in analysing these thoughts, as he has a right to do? He reminded me how easy it is to become reactionary when dealing with people. He took me to task, not without a certain degree of justification, for these ads. What did he say? I quote from his column of January 19, 1970:

I feel it is a duty to point out that the unemployed have been recently summoned by the Prime Minister to a higher calling; they are no longer sitting idle, indeed no. They are fighting inflation. Seldom in our history has so much been owed so many by so many.

Churchill also spoke in that way. Possibly Dalton Camp wrote his speeches, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: The article continues:

It is not to end there. The silent, nearly invisible jobless are not only fighting inflation, they must also be singled out for prominence by their friend, ("If you're not working for someone, we're working for you."), the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which has proclaimed to the country through a half-page advertisement that some of the unemployed "deliberately cheat."

This is what was said all during the election.

Thus, the Canadian Government confirms what some have so long suspected—that it's high time somebody tried to make the poor and down and out an honest man. Like the rest of us.

Here we get the sarcasm. It is well deserved. He goes on to say:

Frankly, I am puzzled by the strategy. It may be that the Unemployment Insurance Commission has been overwhelmed by cheaters. It could be that the number of lazy, ingenious, jobless Canadians bilking the commission has become epidemic. And it may be, although it challenges credulity, that the effective way to remedy such a national scandal is to launch an advertising campaign, which, I am sorry to say, menaces those who will not read it and sanctifies the prejudices of many who will read it.

The point I am getting at, Mr. Speaker, is that this causes Dalton Camp to react. He goes on to refer to his concern about how alleged abuses can be equated with other programs if we pick on the helpless. The article continues:

A Day In Court for whom?

One thinks of old age pensioners, or war veterans, or children ravaging the Youth Allowance funds. Later on—much later—will they get around to a national advertising campaign of promised retribution for contractors on aircraft carrier repairs, or promoters of worthless merchandise, or unscrupulous landlords, or corporate thieves who swindle the life savings of the innocent?

That was Dalton Camp speaking in 1969. Would hon. members like to hear what he said in 1972?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Mackasey: After talking about a leaked document, Mr. Camp went on to talk about abuses of unemployment insurance and complained that to draw unemployment insurance is too easy. He endorsed Reuben Baetz who said that nobody should draw unemployment insurance unless he has 20 weeks attachment. Mr. Camp complained that the cost of the plan was astronomical and, therefore, we should be reducing the number of people drawing from it by making the eligibility more difficult. I quote from the article:

If we all search our minds, we might recall that Robert Stanfield said, many weeks ago, much of what Baetz has recently said, although, it turns out, Stanfield's estimated cost of this folly of government policy was conservative. Would you believe $2.2 billion?

What folly? Is it the folly that the federal government is responsible for providing a decent income to the unemployed of this country who are unemployed through no fault of their own? Is that supposed to be the folly of the Liberal government to which Dalton Camp suddenly takes exception? Why did he take exception? In this article he went on to point out that he takes exception because unemployment insurance had the effect of tranquilizing the poor, thus removing the problem of unemployment as an election issue. This was what was bothering Zane Grey II; nothing more, nothing less, namely that unemployment insurance was at least providing the unemployed with sufficient income, that they were not abnormally upset about unemployment, that they were not hysterical about the subject and that they were prepared to wait until the economy improved, as long as they at least had enough to pay the rent and groceries. This was hardly consistent with Mr. Camp's other concerns and ambitions. Obviously now for a little while he will have to limit himself to not talking about the sun setting nationally but provincially.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I have taken extra time. However, the time will come very shortly to vote and we must remember that we are voting for a continuation of the payments of unemployment benefits this week, next week and the following week, as well as the removal of a clause that can periodically interfere with the government's main responsibility, that is to provide unemployment insurance to the unwitting victim of a policy over which he has no control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hales: The hon. member was the minister responsible at the time the government found it necessary to put a ceiling of $800 million into the act. Less than 18 months later, he and this government recommend that that ceiling be removed. Why was it necessary in the first place, and why do they now want it removed?

• (1540)

Mr. Mackasey: That is a fair question and it is one which has been asked of the officials in the committee. I attempted to answer it on second reading. The original concept did not include the $800 million, or any ceiling. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made that point. The ceiling was introduced at the request of the Department of Finance which felt that, because of the number of variables in the future, it would be desirable to insert one rather than try to anticipate the sums of money which should be paid from year to year in anticipation of the rate of unemployment. They felt there were so many variables, they could hardly anticipate with a certain amount of accuracy the amounts which would be needed at various levels of unemployment. Events have proven that they have been unable to do this with any degree of accuracy.

The main point, as the hon. gentleman appreciates, is that this is an advance which must be repaid. As I mentioned, when the figures are totalled up in April we shall find that the government owes the government all but $159 million. What we felt, therefore, was that the inclusion of a ceiling was convenient and we could anticipate unemployment in the future. I think, upon reflection, that our original concept of not including a ceiling made sense. Obviously, it does to the government today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the hon. member's time has expired and there is an objection to another question being asked. I now recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today and yesterday we witnessed the most astonishing spectacle. We witnessed the return of the former minister of labour, who appears to be answering for the government. We have heard nothing from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) whose responsibility this bill is. There has been no statement from him. Regrettably, he was ill during some of the most important committee sittings and we had no opportunity of putting questions to him, or of getting answers. Not only were we denied that opportunity of questioning the minister, but having reviewed the record of the proceedings of the standing committee, as well as the debate on second reading, I can say we were disadvantaged by the tactics of members like the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who was constantly, in the standing committee, as is very apparent from a reading of the proceedings, intervening and preventing the witnesses before the committee from answering legitimate questions being put by members.

Moreover, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) acted as prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner. Does Your Honour think that one of the members on that committee, unless he was on the government side, or a member of the NDP, got any answers? They were prevented at every turn. Yet the former minister of manpower and immigration speaks of providing information; he speaks of the usefulness of standing committees in dealing with matters of this nature. We got nothing there and we are getting nothing here from the minister—nothing from the minister of manpower who has been sitting mute in his seat throughout this debate, except for one or two interjections.

I am surprised at the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). I have known him for many years and he has usually struck me as being a fair person. I believe he made a sincere effort when he was holding the portfolio, which I think he was forced to resign because of a fundamental difference with his cabinet colleagues. What really surprised me was his manner of approaching this debate. He did the same thing on second reading. On the one hand, he says he likes to be fair and non-partisan, and to discuss the merits of an issue such as this without injecting party politics. Yet he proceeds to do just that. He has been deliberately distorting the views expressed by my hon. friend from Hamilton West and deliberately distorting a position we made abundantly clear on the second reading of this bill, as well as during the debate now under way.

He accuses us on this side of adopting tactics of delay for the sole purpose of preventing unemployed persons from obtaining unemployment insurance benefits. That, Mr. Speaker, is as far from the truth as can be imagined. Persons legitimately unemployed are required to be paid benefits by the law, and we intend to see that they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Members opposite have no monopoly on desire to apply the law, certainly not hon. members to my left in their sanctimonious approach to this whole subject. The hon. member for Verdun says the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) voted against Bill C-124, indicating a wish on his part to prevent payment of unemployment insurance benefits. That is a paraphrase of what the hon. member said, but he did make that accusation. The hon. member for Verdun knows this is not the position. So why does he say such a thing? He says he reviewed the discussion in committee. He knows whereof I speak when I say that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville adopted delaying tactics, tactics deliberately designed to prevent us eliciting information from witnesses. At one stage, the chairman of the committee was asked question after question and on each occasion either the member for Windsor-Walkerville or the Minister of Justice intervened. This went on for over an hour.

The principle of the bill we are discussing today is not as the former minister stated it. The principle of the bill is two-fold. First, it would remove the ceiling, thereby, we say, removing parliamentary control. Second, it sets out to legalize what we say was illegal in the first place. I am referring to clause two. The hon. member for Verdun tries to destroy our position with respect to clause one of the bill by saying that we maintain control and that we do so in ten ways.

He says, first, that we are able to do so because figures are published by Statistics Canada every month. These figures, I may say, are normally about three months late in reaching hon. members. What measure of control does that offer? Second, he says the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) publishes a statement with respect to the situation of the fund. What control do we have over that? We do not debate the statement. In the third place, he says the Unemployment Insurance Commission publishes an annual report. How on earth can the publication of an annual report give parliament any control over what is spent? Fourth, he tells us that the financial statement is certified by the Auditor General. So what? What control does that give us over the expenditure of funds by the commission. Fifth, he says that a detailed financial statement is passed to the Public Accounts Committee for examination. This is normally done a year after the event. What control does that give parliament over the expenditure of funds? Sixth, he says the Minister of Finance inserts an item in his main estimates which includes the cost of the government's share.

I agree with the Minister of Finance that one of the requirements placed upon him is to put such an item in his main estimates, which are going to be before us very shortly. If the minister must make provision for the government's share of this fund, why on earth does the government not know now what will be the projected cost? They cannot take the position they have been taking, on the one hand, of not being able to supply us with information as to the projected cost, yet on the other hand take the position that they will give parliament a definitive and accurate estimate in the main estimates that will be placed before us in a matter of days.

Seventh, the hon. member said that one factor of control was that the main estimates were referred to the various committees. What control does that give parliament over the appropriation of the funds now being asked for in unlimited amounts? Eighth, the hon. member said that the public accounts committee examines the estimates. Again I ask, what control does that give parliament?

None of the ten points advanced by the hon. member for Verdun in support of his argument that parliament retains control over the appropriation of these funds is valid. The hon. member said that we were downgrading and defeating by relay. That is not so. The members of this party take second position to no one with regard to the philosophy of unemployment insurance. It was this party which designed the first unemployment insurance legislation under Bennett in 1935. He did not stay in office long enough to get the legislation passed; that occurred in a subsequent administration. These historical developments go back not 30 years, as the hon. member for Verdun said, but 42 or 43 years, and it was this party's philosophy that resulted in the unemployment insurance system in this country today.

The hon. member then took great satisfaction from citing the relatively higher benefits that had been paid out this year as opposed to those paid last year and the year before. I say that instead of taking satisfaction from the greatly increased benefits that were paid out, he and his government should be ashamed that billions of dollars have had to be paid to an unemployed work force, a condition brought about by the government's own deliberate creation of unemployment. The government and their supporters have nothing to be proud about in saying that huge sums are being paid out. It is rather sad that the economy of this country is in such a state today that we have such a large number of unemployed persons on the rolls as a direct result of government policy.

The hon. member put his finger on the root of the trouble when he said that this was the government's fault. Truly it is. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wholeheartedly and callously announced he intended to create unemployment in order to fight inflation. While he said that on the one hand, his other ministers on the other hand, namely the Minister of Finance of that day—a course that has been followed by the present Minister of Finance—ran about the country saying we were in boom times, that the economy was boiling, that we in this country were flush. And today we have mounting rolls of unemployed. What we on this side are objecting to on behalf, in my view, of the vast majority of Canadians is precisely the fact that we are being obliged to pay out such huge sums to the unemployed of the country, people who have become unemployed as a result of the heartless and inhuman policy pursued by the Prime Minister and his government.

The hon. member then took satisfaction from asserting that there has been a drop in the numbers of unemployed during the last month. The figures are exactly the same as the figures for last year. What satisfaction can the government take in having advanced not one inch toward reducing unemployment in this country over the course of one year, a situation created by their own deliberate tactics to cure inflation?

As hon. members pointed out during the question period today, the number of unemployed in the Atlantic provinces has shown a rather dramatic rise, a very tragic rise. What information were we given when hon. members on this side asked what would be the policies of the government to cure this sad state of affairs? The hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe asked what the government had in mind to cure the sad rise in unemployment figures in the province of Quebec, but he, too, received no reply. The government have no plans. They are as bankrupt as the unemployment insurance fund.

Then, we had this twisted philosophy of the hon. member for Verdun of adopting the position that somehow it is beneficial to the economy, in priority to everything else, to spend huge sums on unemployment insurance because, he said, it created jobs, because there would be more money in circulation to demand goods and services, which in turn created jobs. He accuses us, if we oppose that philosophy, of being against the poor, that we are trying to ride to power on the backs of the poor.

Surely, any rational person can see the argument that we on this side are advancing—the argument being advanced by the vast majority of Canadians—namely, that we do not want to live in a society that has to pull itself up by its own bootstraps. We do not want to live in a society where everyone is on unemployment insurance benefits. We do not want to live in a society where everyone is on welfare. Yet that is the philosophy being propounded by the hon. member for Verdun.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Alexander: Now, he is up on a question of privilege.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising on a point of order because a question may be simpler. Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that I said that unemployment insurance is preferable to work, to jobs? Have I not said that above all else people should be working and that the government should be reducing the numbers of unemployed? All I said was that, as an alternative to having no work, these people should have a decent income through unemployment insurance.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. gentleman had been as direct in his initial remarks as he has been now. From the words that he used on second reading, as well as the words he uttered a few moments ago, I drew the plain inference that somehow or other it was better for unemployed persons to receive benefits in preference to the creation of a society in which jobs would be provided; that somehow it was better to have welfare recipients than to create a society where welfare was reduced to a minimum. Then, at the end of that diatribe he accused the members on this side of attempting to ride to power on the backs of the poor—a very unworthy suggestion, I might say, coming from the hon. member for Verdun.

No accusation can justifiably be made by members opposite or by those to my left that we begrudge payments to unemployed people, because we do not. Neither do the vast majority of Canadians begrudge payments to unemployed people. What we do begrudge is the policy followed by the government, a policy that is still being followed by the government since it has effected no other programs, whereby unemployment is permitted to exist at such high levels. The hon. member for Verdun says there seems to be a somewhat changed mood in the country in that people are now in favour of unemployment insurance. My reading of the mood is that no one is opposed to the philosophy of unemployment insurance and that no one is exerting any effort to destroy the scheme. Not even the worst writer on the subject could be accused of that. Not even Zane Grey No. 2, to whom the hon. member for Verdun has referred, could be accused of propounding that proposition. That would be an unworthy accusation.

• (1600)

Surely, we can expect the unemployment insurance scheme to apply to those who are legitimately out of work and cannot find jobs. The hon. member for Verdun has made a great to do about abuses, and he is protected in his position by those to my left. It would be unrealistic for any member of the House to say there had been no abuses of the unemployment insurance scheme. There was a fellow in my constituency who was not a Canadian citizen but who will remain nameless. He came from the United States and, after getting a work permit, he worked for just barely the qualifying period, then left his employment and commenced drawing unemployment insurance benefits at the preferred rate.

When his period of entitlement ran out he applied for vocational training which is supported by federal and territorial government funds. He was being paid then to go to school. He was taking a course in welding and there was a workmen's compensation regulation which prohibited any welder having a beard. He was told he would have to terminate his attendance at school unless he shaved off his beard. He was rather attached to his beard and insisted upon keeping it, so he had to quit the course. He chose the beard over education and a living, but he figured out another way. He went back to school and took a carpentry course. He was allowed to keep his beard then because having a beard was not against workmen's compensation regulations for carpenters. After telling me this story he said: "You guys have got to have the greatest country in the world. I don't have to work."

An hon. Member: He should have taken a course in barbering.

Mr. Nielsen: This is the kind of abuse to which Canadians are objecting, and the ex-minister knows this. If the hon. member for Verdun says there are no abuses, was it announced while he was in office that there were going to be some 350 new personnel taken on in the Department of Manpower and Immigration specifically to investigate this kind of abuse and to enforce the law as it should be enforced? If there are no abuses, why all this concern?

I am not talking about fraudulent applications for unemployment insurance which are investigated by that branch of the department, I am speaking about legal abuse. I refer to people who come over to this country from the United States, for instance, and apply for unemployment insurance. It was quite easy at the time for them to do so, although it is a little more difficult now. These people came over and worked for a minimum qualifying period, then made arrangements with a friend to send their unemployment insurance cheques to them. The cheques were sent to a Canadian address, then cashed in Canada and the money sent across the line.

This is the kind of abuse that takes place because of the loose manner in which the administration has been handling the fund. As a result, there has been an expression of disgust by the ordinary working man of this country who has worked all his life and never drawn unemployment insurance benefits. I have spoken to many of them, as have other hon. members including some of those in that party to my left who are supposed to be the champions of the working man, but who support Clause 2 of this bill which imposes an extra financial burden on the shoulders of the working men of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: What extra burden?

Mr. Nielsen: I hear the minister finally saying something. I welcome him to the debate and hope that he says more than the few words he has just uttered.

Mr. Andras: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Surely.

Mr. Andras: Would the hon. member clearly define what he means when he says that the employees and employers who are contributing to the fund are bearing an extra burden in respect of these advances about which we are now talking, in addition to what was covered by the act as it was passed a year and a half ago? Would he clearly explain what he means by that?

Mr. Nielsen: The minister was at committee meetings and he heard me propound that theory when I participated in the debate on second reading. I would invite him to review the debates in order to find my answer. I made that statement and I stand by it. I may be wrong, but that is my conviction.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Nielsen: Of course, my friends to the left would say I am wrong because they have to be the big Wally for the government. They have to keep it in office and keep it clean, so they naturally are going to say I am wrong. As a matter of fact, I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) paying acute attention to my remarks. The efforts of the hon. member for Verdun to destroy the position of this party are only exceeded by the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If you review his participation in this debate, beginning at page 981 of Hansard, you will see that he is convoluting, squirming and wriggling in an attempt to justify the position he now takes. He even stooped to the level of providing us gratuitously with a 15-minute lecture on the bill and its effect. In effect, he suggests we are all stupid in this House because only he and those in his party understand what we are really talking about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he allow me to apologize to him for having tried to explain this bill to him, since he cannot understand it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I never ask any member to apologize to me in legitimate debate, and I never shall. I do think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre perhaps owes the collective House an apology for deigning to set himself up as an expert on all things, not only this bill but all bills. No one in the House knows more than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I say that he and those behind him are betraying the working man by supporting Clause 2 of this bill.

An hon. Member: Oh, get on with it.

Mr. Nielsen: I am right on it. They are betraying not only the working man of this country who is unemployed, but the working man who has worked 35 or 40 years, contributing throughout those years to this fund without drawing a cent. That is the guy who is really annoyed at what is happening, and that is the individual this bill is really hitting.

I have just been handed a copy of Maclean's magazine for February, 1973. At page 4, there is an article covering the farewell remarks of the hon. member for Verdun on leaving the Cabinet. It is headed "Farewell To Power. Departing Thoughts Of An Absent Cabinet Minister".

Mr. Baldwin: It should be Mackasey's eulogy.

Mr. Nielsen: This does not appear in quotation marks, but this is what is written:

> And the Unemployment Insurance Plan? I can't understand all the fuss. Do people want to go back to the Hungry Thirties, the labour camps, the bread lines? The problem with this country isn't unemployment insurance, it's unemployment.

• (1610)

We can find no greater supporter of that contention than I. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) wishes to ask a question and I invite him to stand on his feet and not be so cowardly as to interject while remaining seated. The article goes on to read:

> Seven per cent unemployment. And that's not the fault of the Manpower officials. The real culprits are those smug, arrogant civil servants in the Finance Department—

He chastised us yesterday for having been a little forceful with the chairman of the commission in the committee. He refers to the real culprits being "those smug, arrogant civil servants in the Finance Department". The article goes on to read:

> —superbly confident of their ability to manipulate the economy with methods that should have died with Lord Keynes. They created the unemployment.

This is quite correct. They created the unemployment, and they are allowing it to continue.

Again, I hear remarks from my left. May I remind those to my left of that great press release which hit the streets with such a force on November 15, published by their party and released by their leader. At the top of the list of eight priorities was that they would give this government a while—I think the word used in the press release was "immediately"—to do something about unemployment. Let the hon. members to my left tell me of one measure that this government has introduced—and we are in the second month of this session—that meets that condition in their press release. Not a thing.

What they have done has been to remove the $800 million ceiling because somehow, according to the hon. member for Verdun, if we pay out more money we are going to create more jobs. What they have done amounts to a big zero, and so much for the press release of the NDP whose bark is obviously a heck of a lot worse than their bite. They will find it very difficult to continue in this posture, supporting a government which they have condemned throughout the country and throughout the whole of the last parliament as well as in their press release of November 15. Now, they hang on like some desperate tail wagging the dog because they are frightened of going into another election. But in the meantime, the prostitution of their principles is not going unnoticed by the people of this country.

Mr. Alexander: Shame.

Mr. Nielsen: We have had at least an admission by the leader of that group to my left that there was some arrangement between his party and the party in power. It was not a marriage. I think the term he used was "a gentle courtship". We should not confuse gentle courtship with marriage.

Mr. Rose: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member suggesting that the New Democratic Party members would be unfortunate allies should the government be defeated and members of his party asked to form a government?

Mr. Nielsen: May I say in reply to that question that should that be the situation, of course not, and the legislation which would have been forthcoming last December rather than now, because that is when parliament would have been called, would have been of such an attractive nature that members to my left could not have possibly avoided supporting it. It would have been aimed at curing the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Next question.

Mr. Andras: A $900 million ceiling; that is the kind of legislation you would get.

Mr. Nielsen: They want unlimited access to millions upon millions of dollars. Also, with respect to clause 2, they distorted our position because what they wanted us to do, to which we objected on second reading, was to ratify an illegality, and it still remains that, notwithstanding the position taken by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). We remember last year we were debating the illegal position taken by the Minister of Justice. He involved himself in that debate, as did other members on the government side, and the members to my left then knew the government position was wrong because they were withholding lawful payments to the farmers for some 14 months. In the face of a mandatory provision in the bill, which could not have been clearer, the Minister of Justice said that they had the discretion to withhold those payments. He is taking the same sort of weak position today. There should be no clause 2. The provisions of the Financial Administration Act as they now stand should apply, and these funds should not be deemed to be an advance.

I think I have summed up the position of this party, certainly as I understand it, with respect to the two clauses of this bill. I think I have made it sufficiently clear now so that perhaps others might be dissuaded when taking part in this debate from accusing us, and continuing to accuse us on this side, of preventing unemployment insurance benefits from being paid. We object to the legislation, first, because it gives the government a blank cheque, and certainly the people of Canada want to see us adopt a positive stand to prevent that kind of thing from happening here. Second, we take the position with respect to clause 2 that it would be unconscionable for parliament to ratify something that was illegal. How, members say, do we assert control if not by taking off the ceiling?

The government had three choices open to it, and they still have those three choices, in order to obtain these funds in the proper manner and in order to allow parliament to continue its control over appropriations. First, they can bring in an appropriation and ask for a specific sum. They can do that, I say, because they know now what the Minister of Finance is going to put in his estimates with respect to government requirements in that regard. Second, they can bring in a supplementary estimate specifically for that purpose. Again, parliament would have to deal with it. Third, they can amend the act and provide specifically for the funds that they need. But going on in this fashion is taking all parliamentary control away from the members of this house and giving the government a blank cheque. It is wrong and it denudes the House of Commons of the traditional power to pass all appropriations and all money requirements of the government.

It is not enough for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to cite the legislation affecting pensions, the legislation affecting other matters similar to pensions, because those funds are not being abused. There are not billions of dollars being spent out of those funds in an abusive fashion. We know that the government is not controlling the operation of the commission properly. We know that they are not controlling the effective expenditure of these funds. That is all the more reason for parliament to retain that kind of control in the manner that I have suggested.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in speaking on this bill today is to try to dispel some of the misinformation that has been spread through the House in the last two days of debate. Certain hon. members in the House have continually tried to obscure the real purpose of this bill. They keep telling us that failure to pass this bill will destroy the Unemployment Insurance Act, and that failure to pass this bill is persecution of the poor. We have heard all these phrases about riding into power on the backs of the poor. We have heard this time and time again from government spokesmen, and we have heard from the NDP that this is just a bill to provide advances. Yet they say that if we do not pass it we will destroy the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I agree with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who expressed the hope that the minister would make some remarks on third reading. I was one of the members who sat on the Labour Committee. I realize it was not any fault of the minister that he was not able to be present. He sent in a substitute but, so far as I was concerned, the substitute might as well have stayed in bed because he either could not or would not answer any questions. Repeatedly we tried to find out from the minister why the ceiling was included in the act in the first place, and second, what had changed in the course of a year and a half that made it necessary to remove the ceiling. The minister's only reply was that obviously it should not have been in the act in the first place, and further he said that the government did not want it there now because things have changed.

A year and a half ago the department was able to estimate the costs of this program within $10 million over a full year's operation. That is what officials told us a year and a half ago in committee. Now, suddenly this department, with all its know-how and all its knowledge, cannot specify any amount that should be stipulated for advances. The officials say they cannot forecast with any reasonable accuracy because of the variables. Surely, those variables were there a year and a half ago? We pointed them out many times to UIC officials. We said, "Your figures are wrong. You are talking about 5.3 per cent unemployment. That should be closer to 7 per cent, between 6½ per cent and 7 per cent." Now, suddenly they admit that they cannot forecast even two, three or four months ahead. They cannot tell us how much money they need.

As the hon. member for Yukon said, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) still seems to be the spokesman for the department. I had hoped that when the hon. member for Verdun rose this afternoon he would give us some of the answers, but again he went into the same old diatribe that we heard on second reading. He told us what a wonderful Unemployment Insurance Act we had, that it was the best in the world, and that if we did not pass this bill we would destroy that act thus, in effect, riding into power on the backs of the poor. But he did not once tell us why, when he was the minister who piloted the original bill through the House, he found it necessary to put a ceiling in the bill. Why did he think at that time that there should be a ceiling on the advances? He did not mention that at all.

He went on to say that the unemployed would not get their benefits if this bill did not pass. He told us how heartless we all were. But he did not tell us the reason we are in this bind now is the incompetence and bungling of his department and his officials. They were the ones who got us into this mess. All he said was, "We are in a mess; we want carte blanche to get out of it." When the House granted him an extension of time, I thought he would get into the meat of this bill. But no, he talked for ten minutes on Bill C-125, and was completely out of order. However, the Speaker let him go and we still got no information.

It may be true that members of government have painted themselves into a corner, that they have exhausted all their means of getting money into the Unemployment Insurance Commission. But this is their own fault. There is no point in suggesting that we are destroying the act. There are ample provisions in the act to meet such contingencies as we have here.

The UIC could have sought help from the government as early as last September, when it knew the indications were that it was going to be short of money before the end of the fiscal year. Testimony given to us in the committee shows that officials did go to the government with that information. That is the time when the government should have acted to bring in the type of bill we have today, but instead of asking for a complete removal of the ceiling it could have asked for a special appropriation; it could have introduced legislation asking parliament to provide enough money to run the commission until the end of March. Now, members of the government come crying, "If you don't pass this bill it will be your fault if the unemployed don't get their money."

Mr. Andras: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Certainly.

Mr. Andras: In view of the very words that the hon. member has just uttered, in view of the fact that since he said the government was informed in September, would he not admit that the House was dissolved at that stage? If so, how could the government bring legislation before the House when at that stage an election had been called?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I did not say the government should bring in legislation then. In any event, the House could have been recalled in a matter of days. Then, the very type of bill that the government has introduced now, could have been introduced, but asking for a specific amount rather than for the removal of the ceiling. It was government mismanagement that got us into this mess.

Mr. Baldwin: The government also knew about it in August. That is on the record.

Mr. Reid: You put it there, Jed.

Mr. Baldwin: I have got it right here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Moncton has the floor.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I have until five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so if they want to yap let them go to it.

This bill proposes to amend legislation that was duly passed by the House of Commons. I had hoped that after sitting for I don't know how many months in committee on Bill C-229, after hearing the minister and all the UIC officials tell us that that bill was the ultimate, that this was the most wonderful plan in the world and that everything was fine, we would not be faced, within a year and a half with having to make changes in it. But now the government suddenly comes back within a year and a half and says, "We were wrong; we want to make changes." I do not know what other changes the government has in mind, but now we must discuss this wonderful plan all over again.

Because the government is asking parliament to change legislation already passed, I think I should briefly review the reason the legislation was passed in the first place. Why was this ceiling put into the act originally? I refer to testimony given before the Labour, Manpower and Immigration Committee as recorded at page 24:26 of its proceedings No. 24, on May 19, 1971, when clause 137 of the bill, dealing with advances, was under consideration. At that time we had before us Mr. Douglas, General Legal Counsel for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The vice-chairman of the committee called on Mr. Douglas to explain clause 137, and Mr. Douglas said:

> Clause 137 authorizes the government to advance to the Consolidated Revenue Fund or the Unemployment Insurance Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund sufficient to enable the Commission to pay benefits if the account is in a deficit position.

Then, he went on to say:

> This would be in an interim position when actual costs were being determined and before the money had been collected or the government advance had actually been made.

This is another aspect on which we got a lot of misinformation in the House and in the committee. I have heard government members ask, as well as hon. members to my left, "What is all this fuss about advances? They are only advances. They are not costing the country anything. They will be paid back. What are you worrying about?

This is only an advance." I would like to point out that these advances are, in part, to cover the government's costs after unemployment reaches a level of 4 per cent.

It is true that up to the 4 per cent level the employer-employee rates can be adjusted so that a deficit position is covered, but over 4 per cent the government has to foot the cost. This was brought out time and time again in committee and elsewhere. I don't know why people continue to say, "It is only an advance. I don't know what you are worrying about. It will be paid back." How is it to be paid back? The government gets a special warrant to get money into the account, let's say $400 million or $450 million, but this is repayable. How is it repaid? It is repaid when the government assesses the amount it owes, so it transfers money to the unemployment insurance account to cover the amount that it owes when unemployment rises above 4 per cent. Then, the unemployment insurance account pays off the debt to the Treasury Board. Where does that money come from? It comes out of the general tax revenue, out of the tax dollar. Why do we sit here and say that it does not matter, that it is only an advance and will be paid back? Yes, it will be paid back—by the taxpayer. I thought it was very well explained in committee when we were discussing Bill C-229.

• (1630)

Mr. Andras: But the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) confused it.

Mr. McKinley: I don't think you understand it; that is why you are not saying much.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Up to 4 per cent unemployment, the commission can adjust the premium rates to meet the deficit. But who pays these premium rates—the employer and the employee so what we have here is another indirect tax. The taxpayer has to provide the money.

When we were discussing Bill C-229 in committee several questions were raised, so I would dispute the statement of some hon. members who said there was not much discussion on it. On May 19, 1971, Mr. D. Allan, Director, Policy Analysis and Formulation with the Unemployment Insurance Commission was being asked about the reason for the advance. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) he said at page 27 of the proceedings:

> One factor is that there will be a delay between the incurring of benefit costs during a year and our ability to calculate what would have been the costs for that year had the unemployment rates been 4 per cent and our obtaining for the unemployment insurance account the credit from the government for its portion of the costs which were above 4 per cent.

He went on to say that there would be no problem with the first part, and then continued:

> So it is quite possible we would have a large cash outflow, but it would be because the unemployment rate had become very high and would not cause us to raise the premium rates for the employees and employers because this drain, this cash outflow would not affect the portion of the costs that the employees and the employers would eventually have to pay.

I cannot understand those members who say there is nothing to worry about because this situation will be covered by the adjustment of premium rates. This is not so. If unemployment rises above 4 per cent, the deficit is paid entirely by the government. Call it what you will, an advance or anything else, I say it is still an additional tax put on the taxpayer. In the committee that day the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) tried to find out how the commission arrived at the $800 million ceiling. Mr. Allan's remarks were very illuminating. He said, as recorded at page 29 of the same committee report:

> Mr. Chairman, the $800 million represented, as an upper limit on the amount of advances, presumably the worst possible case we could think of in terms of a deficit.

The worst possible case, Mr. Speaker. Then, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) asked:

> So you used 7 per cent then?
>
> MR. ALLAN: We used 7 per cent, and then some. We later calculated a figure that could represent the worst possible case and then we added another $100 million or so for good measure.
> MR. ALEXANDER: What is $100 million.

Here is the point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker. Just under two years ago in May, 1971 the commission stated in testimony that the worst possible eventuality would only lead to a drain on the cash advance account of $700 million, so they threw in another $100 million for good measure and that is how they got the figure of $800 million. This is an indication of the complete breakdown between 1971 and today. In 1971, we have officials estimating the cost of the plan and setting a figure which they said would be enough; today the same officials in that department cannot or will not give an estimate for two months ahead.

During the committee hearings there was a good deal of discussion about the cost of unemployment insurance. I suggest that one of the reasons the $800 million ceiling was fixed was that the government and the commission had estimated the cost of the liberalization of the plan and so had to put this $800 million which they felt would act as a control over expenditures. At that time I had some discussion with the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), the then minister, trying to find out the purpose of the ceiling and the purpose for asking for this advance. He inferred that the reason the government was taking up the total cost of the plan above 4 per cent was that it would be an inducement to the cabinet to keep unemployment down to that figure so, by inference, the $800 million figure was put in as a type of control. If unemployment were running too high and the costs were running too high, the government would have to come back to parliament to ask for more money. In his testimony, he referred several times to the fact that forcing the government to back the cost of unemployment above 4 per cent would be a strong incentive to the government to keep the cost of the plan within the $800 million ceiling. Rightly or wrongly, this was the impression given to members of the committee and we felt confident that there was a justification for the $800 million figure.

Now, it appears that for some reason or other the government finds that this figure is not enough. As the former minister said in the House today, this ceiling was not in the original act but was inserted after consideration. No one can convince me that this was not done for a specific reason. The government is now requesting that we remove the ceiling because they say it is not realistic.

I was interested in reading report No. 2 of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee when it was studying the supplementary estimates, in particular this $800 million advance figure. This happened after both the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) had told us that the ceiling was not realistic, should not be in the legislation, and that there was no reason for it. When the estimates were discussed before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, Mr. Nielsen was questioning the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) on the $800 million ceiling on advances. After remarking that advances had been made under special warrants over and above the $800 million ceiling, Mr. Neilsen remarked—

• (1640)

An hon. Member: Order!

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): —as follows:

There seems little purpose in having a ceiling at all in the act . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has just made a remark is not the only one who wishes to make the point that I am about to bring to the attention of the House. It is considered against parliamentary practice to refer to other hon. members by name. They should be referred to by constituency or, if they happen to be in the ministry or occupy some other position, they should be referred to as occupying that position in the ministry or elsewhere. They should not be referred to by name. I regret to make this point during the hon. member's speech, as he has not in any way used that ill practice with malice or intent. However, I must bring this to the attention of the House and ask for consideration of proprieties.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your admonition. May I point out that I was quoting directly from Issue No. 2 of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee proceedings, dated January 16. As Your Honour is aware, people asking questions in the committee are referred to by name and not by constituency. I thought what I was doing was permissible as I was quoting directly from the report.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is correct in referring to excerpts from reports of committee proceedings in that way. I did not understand at first that he was reading a question asked by an hon. member, or a comment made by an hon. member. However, there have been occasions when hon. members, including the hon. member who has just spoken, have referred to other hon. members by name rather than by their constituencies and at that time they were not dealing with quotations from committee proceedings. That practice is wrong and the Chair asks the co-operation of the House in avoiding it.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make clear when I am reading from the report. I am about to quote from Issue No. 2 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, dated January 16, 1973. In that particular committee the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was questioning the President of the Treasury Board and the following exchange is recorded on page 2:25:

MR. NIELSEN: There seems little purpose in having a ceiling at all in the act under those conditions.

MR. DRURY: No, Mr. Chairman, I suggest there is a very good purpose in having a ceiling. This particular ceiling, I suggest, was put in in order that Parliament would have an opportunity to examine the reasons for the circumstances surrounding any sums in excess of this, which is precisely what we are engaged in now.

After all our efforts to obtain some explanation from the responsible minister or his substitute as to the reason for the ceiling, those who served on the committee and who knew there had to be some reason for the ceiling learned, by inference, that it was included for the purpose of enabling parliament to exercise control. The President of the Treasury Board admitted as much when he said, as we had suggested all along, that the ceiling was put in the act in order to give parliament some control over the actions of the government.

On the next page we find the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) reported as saying that, in the circumstances, the ceiling was not necessary and was useless. The following exchange is recorded:

MR. DRURY: Let me put it another way, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to make a great thing of this. Parliament would have an opportunity . . .

MR. NIELSEN: Ex post facto.

MR. DRURY: . . . of inquiring into the operation of the fund if the amount of the advances exceeded $800 million. If the ceiling had been set at a hypothetical figure, $5 billion,—

Let me add paranthetically that the government is no longer asking for $5 billion. The sky is the limit now. I continue:

—there would have been no occasion for the issue of Governor General's warrants. There would have been no occasion for a parliamentary examination of the operations of the fund or the commission. By placing this limitation, the executive is required to come before Parliament to explain how and why it happened and what changes should be made.

Is that not what members of my party have been saying ever since second reading?

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I will entertain questions, if I have time, at the conclusion of my speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Does the hon. member agree to accept a question?

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): If I have time at the conclusion of my speech I will be glad to entertain questions, otherwise I am afraid I may not finish.

As I was saying, do the minister's words not confirm exactly the position that we, in the opposition, have been taking? The reason for the ceiling is obvious. It was included, as the President of the Treasury Board said, to permit parliament to exercise control over the actions of the government with respect to the operation of this account.

The minister now responsible for the act authorized, I assume, a news release dated January 17, 1973 which attempts to explain the purpose of Bill C-124. At the top of the new release one sees, "Unemployment Insurance, Canada". I apologize if I said, inadvertently, that the minister had issued this news release. Let me correct that. The minister's name does not appear on it; it is put out by the Public Relations Branch of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The heading of the communique reads: "Notes on proposed amendments to the U.I. Act concerning the ceiling on advances". Talking of the removal of the $800 million ceiling on advances, the communique says, "Such a ceiling is unrealistic in the light of constantly-changing and unpredictable factors . . .".

The second paragraph of the communique mentions that the government's share, payable when the national unemployment rate is over 4 per cent, is not paid until April 1 of the following calendar year. Then, farther down the page, there occurs a sentence which is most interesting. Although the minister's name does not appear on the communique, I assume that he cleared it before its release. The words I refer to are, "There are sufficient controls, through annual reports . . .".

In one paragraph the communique refers to taking off the $800 million ceiling on advances and in the next it refers to the controls that exist. Does that not imply that the ceiling was included for purposes of control? If the ceiling were to be raised, the matter would come before parliament. At any rate, that is how I see it. The full sentence in the communique reads:

> There are sufficient controls, through annual reports, Auditor General reports and Public Accounts to ensure an adequate review of the financial operation of the program.

The government, in this communique which must have been cleared by the minister, is saying in so many words, "Although we want to take off one control, do not worry; there are other controls which will offset that."

The former minister took some time talking about the ten different controls existing. Obviously, he was concerned. I assume he realized we were losing this control. He said, in effect, don't worry; we have other sufficient controls. My colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, reviewed these so-called controls very thoroughly. I will not go into them again other than to put on record that the so-called controls are not controls at all. They are not controls before the fact, they are controls after the fact.

• (1650)

In committee we questioned the minister who substituted for the minister responsible about these controls. He said, don't worry; you have the annual report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. What is a report? What controls are there? He ignored the fact that the report does not come out until the September after the fiscal year is over. He talked about the auditor General's report. What controls are there in a report that comes out a year or two after the fact? What can parliament do about it then?

I submit there is a very definite reason for this clause being in the original act. The reason is that this was the only way we could force a wild spending government to come back to parliament and justify their actions. I submit that the ceiling should remain. I do not buy the argument that we destroy the Unemployment Insurance Act if we do not pass this bill. As I said earlier, there are many ways in which the Unemployment Insurance Commission can get the necessary money to pay the benefits under the act. It is not legitimate to state that when we have passed legislation that guarantees benefits to the unemployed, we can put something in it to prevent the unemployed from getting those benefits. I submit that the act does not do this. The act states that the Unemployment Insurance Commission shall pay benefits at such and such a rate. It also contains special clauses which give the Unemployment Insurance Commission, through proper representations to the government, the power to raise all the necessary monies to pay the benefits guaranteed under the act.

This whole business is a sham. We listened to members on the government side say that we were ruining the act. The Unemployment Insurance Act is good. It is not the act that is on trial here. It is the government that is on trial because of its mismanagement, getting into this mess and now coming to us to get them out of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I have often pointed out to the House that most of the laws are drafted in a language which leads to confusion. The present example shows that long and quite costly studies were made, that commissions of inquiry were established, that white papers were published and that economists were hired who tried to estimate the approximate cost of the variations established about the rates of contributions and benefits, probable income and expenditures.

All this resulted in the presentation of Bill C-229 entitled "An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act", after unending studies in committee and debates in the House where a certain number of members seem more interested—and we have again noticed today—in hearing themselves talk rather than making practical suggestions.

The legislation was adopted on June 14, 1971. Since that date, various things occurred, none of which helped reduce unemployment. This is so evident that for the past few days, officials have been trying to find a way to pay advances to the commission to enable it to pay unemployed people the benefits to which they are entitled.

Answering some questions on January 31 last, during a sitting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, the minister said, and I quote:

> If it were to happen that the commission, as a result of failing to have the advances which this bill allows, be out of funds, the commission would simply have to stop issuing cheques for benefits so long as it was in that position.

—which period had been mentioned in the question.

Later, the minister said:

> Well, yes, the estimates at the moment, as precise as we can have them in terms of hours and timing, really mean that that is the critical day. I am quite satisfied that that estimate could be out an hour either way—that kind of thing.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked him:

> It could even be out a day, but a point would be reached at which unemployment insurance claims would not pe paid.

The minister replied:

Yes, that is right.

We are now discussing a bill which is indeed very short. I am used to criticizing the inordinate length of some bills which thus tend to be incomprehensible. Unfortunately, we are taking days to deal with Bill C-124. This procedure enabled some hon. members who spoke before—and I followed the debates in the House—to comment on the whole unemployment insurance legislation.

We shall have an opportunity to discuss the Unemployment Insurance Act when another bill dealing with it is brought forward. We shall then discuss the initial period, the waiting period, the reference period and the extension period and also the two kinds of unemployment, casual and hard-core or chronic unemployment. However, today we are dealing with a bill to enable the commission to pay benefits to unemployed people. It has been hard enough, since the beginning of the winter, to accelerate such payments without adding to that the creation of an atmosphere of hesitation among civil servants.

In view of the many delays unemployed people have been having in receiving their benefits, we should not add to that the encouraging of a hesitant attitude.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING MUNICIPAL WATER AND SOIL ANTI-POLLUTION PROJECTS

On the order: Public Bills:

January 15, 1973—Second Reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-6, an act to amend the National Housing Act (Municipal Water and Soil Pollution Projects)—Mr. Alexander.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Hon. members will recall that on January 18 Mr. Speaker made some reference to Bill C-6, and it was to the effect that the bill contained money provisions. Of course, if the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has any further explanation to offer, or has any further information to give, the Chair will certainly take the time required to pay attention to what he has to say.

• (1700)

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can appreciate the dilemma in which Bill C-6 has placed the Chair. But I believe it is the substance of the bill which should most concern us, and that is what I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention.

Bill C-6 is an act to amend the National Housing Act. It is concerned with municipal soil and water anti-pollution projects. A great deal of urgency attaches to it because of the rate of urban growth and corresponding problems related to sewage disposal arrangements. I know that when the bill was first brought to the attention of the Chair a caveat was expressed; it was pointed out that I was dealing with a matter involving the financial prerogatives of the Crown. This is something which immediately comes to the attention of the Chair in cases in which a bill originates with a private member. In other words, the Chair itself scrutinizes private members' bills to see that they comply with the rules, and, where justified, in the Speaker's opinion, initiates objections and rules a bill to be out of order.

I do not object to this practice. What I do object to is the fact that such initiative is not exercised by the Chair in the case of public bills, including those introduced by a minister of the Crown. Obviously, the Chair does not exercise this initiative where government bills are concerned. I need only refer to the Government Organization Bill, 1970, one which really contained about eight bills which should have been split. In this case the initiative, the raising of the point of order, was not undertaken by the Chair, but by Members of the Opposition. Again, in connection with the Income Tax Reform Bill, at least two points of order were initially raised by the Official Opposition, one of them so vital that the legislation could have been blocked for weeks while the Chair perused its contents, perhaps with the result that the measure would have been thrown out. The other defect was so serious that a special order of the House was required before the bill could proceed. There are other precedents in this connection, but the two I have mentioned are recent. And they were not latent defects, but patent. Indeed, they were blatant defects. My understanding is that except where Standing Orders provide otherwise, all members are equal in their rights. What Standing Order provides that the Chair shall not initiate objections on points of order against public bills introduced, or sought to be introduced, by ministers of the Crown? I shall say no more on this score for the time being, since before my time expires I must enter my response to the caveat issued by the Chair in connection with Bill C-6.

I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to clause 3 in this regard. I should like to point out that expenditures mentioned under this clause are to be provided only when, and as, moneys therefor are made available out of the public revenue by parliament in accordance with law. Thus, Mr. Speaker, even though I may be dealing indirectly with money, nothing whatsoever can happen until such time as the proper procedure is followed in the House of Commons and the necessary appropriation has been made according to law.

What really concerns me here is the difficulty in which municipalities are finding themselves as a result of urban sprawl. It seems odd to me that the definition of sewage treatment contained in section 50 of the National Housing Act should refer to sewage treatment projects as meaning projects consisting of:

> (1) (a) A trunk sewage collector system, a central treatment plant or both for the collection and treatment of sewage from one or more municipalities, or
> (ii) a trunk water main facility or system, a trunk storm sewage collector or system or both such facilities or systems, for serving one or more municipalities.

What happens if we extend that definition, if, in effect, we make loans in respect of trunk water mains and trunk storm sewage collectors, in addition? We now come to the gist of my submission; what I am talking about, now, is forgiveness. Forgiveness becomes extremely important in these days when the populations of our cities are growing so rapidly. I was speaking with officials in the City of Hamilton the other day. They were most concerned about the fact that they could not afford the services which a growing population requires for health and sanitation purposes. They feel it is time the government became aware of the fact that by the year 2,000, some 80 per cent of our population will be concentrated in cities such as Hamilton.

I mention Hamilton first because, as hon. members know, I have a special responsibility in that area. But what I say applies equally to Toronto, Winnipeg, Guelph, Calgary and our other major cities. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) wants recognition for his city in this regard. That is natural. These are our major cities. When we are talking about sewage systems, as we must, we are only talking about 25 per cent forgiveness. It is high time we recognized the serious financial plight of our cities due to the fact that their tax base is so limited. They cannot get more money from the provinces, and the federal government, rightly at times, is reluctant to reach directly through the provinces to the municipalities. So the municipalities are looking to us for the forgiveness of loans under the terms of the National Housing Act.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are consulting Erskine May and Beauchesne and it would not surprise me if you were almost prepared to rule me out of order. Still, it is private members' hour, now; we are not debating government policy or the incompetence of the government and its lack of appreciation for the frustrations felt by ordinary citizens. In these circumstances I should like to continue my remarks for your edification. I know all hon. members will appreciate that what I am talking about makes a great deal of sense. What I am attempting to do is to bring the problem of the municipalities to a focus in this forum where I know I can certainly count on a sympathetic ear, even from the Speaker, who seems prepared to allow me to develop my argument, at least to a considerable extent, even though I might stray from the point of order.

I might say that my clause three is a negation of an appropriation. If Your Honour is concerned with my tampering with public funds or with the financial administration aspects of the House of Commons, then clause 3 should allay your fears in this regard. As I have said, nothing can happen until a bill comes before the House and the moneys are appropriated in due course, something similar to the provision we will shortly be facing in the near future with respect to miscellaneous estimates. That is money that has been set aside, through Governor General's warrants, for expenditure on matters of transportation, agriculture and so on. Every department is involved, and this money has to be appropriated by this House.

If I am right in this respect, why should the Chair be concerned? It is right that the Chair should be concerned; all I am saying is that this is the negation of an appropriation. It would not take one cent out of the public revenues of Canada if the bill were enacted and received royal assent tonight. Unless and until the Governor General recommends to the House the expenditure of funds to fulfil the purpose of the bill, and unless this House passes a bill containing a vote for that purpose, no public moneys can be spent.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am making sense. I see Your Honour is still reading Beauchesne and May, but I hope my arguments are getting through to you. I submit this is nothing more nor less than a petition, and I would ask Your Honour to consider it in that light. This is a petition whereby I am bringing the plight of municipalities, both big and small, to the attention of the House and asking for the immediate consideration of the House. If the bill is adopted, then we can move ahead. If the bill is not adopted and there is no vote or royal assent, then nothing can happen. Therefore, why cannot hon. members discuss the bill?

There is no deeming clause in the bill, as there is in Bill C-124 in the name of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). Nor is there reference to a vote as authorized by this House. What I am trying to say, Mr. Speaker, is this. We are all aware of the plight we find ourselves in through pollution of the ecology. Indeed "pollution" and "ecology" are household words. An uncontrolled urbanization is playing havoc with our environment. This is so not only in the city of Hamilton, which is registering concern, but also in all the major cities to which I referred a little while ago. The accelerating congestion of human and industrial activity is threatening our existence. Little thought has been given to the dumping of waste. Water is the final receptacle for most waste materials resulting from human, industrial and agricultural activities as well as from transportation.

Therefore, why should we not discuss at this time questions such as these, notwithstanding the rules of the House which, I submit, do not apply in this area? As I have said, nothing can happen until such time as the House of Commons approves an appropriation act that will earmark funds for the purpose. I say that until that happens we are in order in discussing the bill.

May I go on record as saying that since the regenerative capacity of water is limited, the dumping of wastes directly or indirectly into water tables, rivers, lakes and oceans can—as it is today—overload the medium. The overloading of our water supplies will destroy our recreational facilities, wipe out our fisheries and drastically reduce the supply of water. This will pose direct health hazards, such as typhoid.

I am still not dealing with the expenditure of money, Mr. Speaker, even though it may appear that I am. In the final analysis, I am not asking for money to be spent right now.

Mr. Paproski: Not at this time.

Mr. Alexander: My colleague from Edmonton Centre helps me in this regard by saying, not at this time. I do not wish to belabour my point of order. I think that the Speaker in his wisdom, and in his ultimate compassion, will show me some mercy in this regard by ruling my bill in order so I can submit further arguments in support of the proposition that I have advanced.

If I may refer directly to the bill, the present section 36E(b) of the National Housing Act confines loans made to municipalities to trunk sewage collector systems and to central treatment plants. The proposed amendment permits loans for trunk water mains and trunk storm sewage collectors.

Then, the bill becomes involved in the aspect of forgiveness. My proposed amendment raises the forgiveness provision from 25 per cent to 50 per cent of the loan. Note that I am talking about forgiveness, Mr. Speaker, not about the spending of money. By the new subsection (3) the bill provides for 100 per cent forgiveness for works constructed during the winter months. The additional forgiveness is shared 25 per cent by the federal government and by the provincial government. The five month period may commence, at the option of the province, either on November 1 or December 1 to allow for regional seasonal employment; however, this option does not apply in 1974 since the assistance under the act expires in 1975 and a period commencing in December would extend past the expiry date of March 31, 1975.

I am very grateful for the indulgence that Your Honour and hon. members have exhibited, and I close by saying that the provisions of clause 3 of the bill are a negation of an appropriation. In this regard I hope Your Honour has followed my argument and will render a judgment in my favour.

Mr. Ian Watson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we all appreciate the initiative of the hon. member and the painstaking labour that I am sure he has expended in bringing forward his bill. It is a generous bill that has much to recommend it. I should have liked, in reply to this rather expansive enlargement of the discussion of the point of order, to go into detail on the newest federal initiatives taken in the area of sewage disposal systems which will have a beneficial effect on municipal pocketbooks, but I shall try to avoid that temptation.

However, I should like to mention that the new communities program, which is part of the measures that have been introduced into this House to amend the National Housing Act, and the neighbourhood improvement program, both include features that will allow for new forms of assistance from our level of government, in collaboration with the provinces, to be given to the municipalities by way of making available these extremely expensive services at the lowest possible cost to municipal taxpayers.

A number of discussions are now going on with the provinces and are contemplated to continue throughout 1973 in the area of sewage disposal systems and the means of financing such systems; and also, perhaps more importantly, it is contemplated during the year having discussions with the provinces in the whole area of public financing of services and how improvements can be made in this domain. This is a domain which over the years we have found—

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. While I allowed fairly extensive time to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I should remind the hon. member that he should speak to the point of order. The Chair has not put the question as yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) did.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the two points relevant here. The first is Standing Order 62(1) which reads:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

Clauses 1 and 2 clearly represent a charge upon the Crown and there has been no recommendation from the Governor General. The only person who could introduce such a bill in this House is a minister on recommendation from the Governor General.

Although I realize it is unnecessary to bring this to your attention, let me point out that Citation 249 at page 214 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, reads in part:

> "No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian Commons receiving the authority of the Crown, through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer."

I know you have studied these points in detail but I thought it useful to bring them again to your attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I have listened with great attention to the very interesting arguments put forward by hon. members in respect of Bill C-6. If hon. members will permit me, I should like to express my remarks in respect of the argument in French.

[Translation]

When he spoke, the hon. member for Hamilton West referred to a procedure that has nothing to do with the point of order. His remarks were very interesting but I do not feel that I should comment on them at this time. Still, some of his remarks were pertinent, and I shall make it my duty to submit them to Mr. Speaker.

With regard to the point of order, I shall read a few explanations and my ruling will rest on citation 246 (1) of Beauchesne's 4th edition, after which I shall refer to another citation.

The bill introduced by the hon. member proposes amendments to Part VIII of the National Housing Act which deals with loans for the financing of municipal sewage treatment projects.

The act stipulates that loans can be granted to facilitate the construction or expansion of sewage treatment facilities. Under clause 1 of the bill introduced by the hon. member loans could be granted in order to facilitate the construction or expansion of water mains and storm sewers. However, in the existing legislation, there are provisions for forgiveness of 25 per cent of the loan and interest, under certain conditions. Clause 2 of the bill would increase the percentage of this forgiveness to 50 per cent and to 75 per cent in certain cases.

As the legislation now in effect sets a limit to disbursements out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund with regard to these loans, the bill under consideration would abolish this limit.

Finally, clause 3 of the bill introduced by the hon. member provides that the required expenditures will be provided through appropriation acts.

The Chair is of the opinion that such works would entail a disbursement of public moneys. Therefore, this bill is actually what might be called a money bill.

Clause 1 of the bill would extend availability of loans for a further purpose. Clause 2 would provide for an easing of terms and restrictions governing loans. As for clause 3, it provides appropriation of funds by Parliament for the purposes of the bill and eventual elimination of limits on disbursements out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, allowing for loans of unlimited amounts.

The hon. member is raising a specific point when suggesting that a private member's bill can provide easing by the government of conditions governing loans.

I submit that the subject matter of the hon. member's bill includes points because of which it could only be brought forward by a minister of the Crown, and accompanied by a recommendation from His Excellency.

[Mr. Watson.]

I shall not refer to the arguments brought forward by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) referring to citation 249 from Beauchesne's and I shall confine myself to the Standing Orders.

Standing Order 6 2 (1) provides that:

This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

As for the particular point on forgiveness of loans, I shall refer to citation 246 (1) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th Edition, which reads as follows:

(1) The recommendation of the Crown is needed for such measures as Bills relating . . . to the repayment . . . or compounding of sums due to the Crown—

I shall also quote citation 256 (1):

(1) A resolution, imposing on the Dominion Government the obligation to carry out a compact not fulfilled by the Government of the late Province of Canada whereunder settlers were to receive moneys derived from Crown lands, was ruled out because it did not originate in committee and was not recommended by the Governor-General.

[English]

Under those circumstances, it is difficult for the Chair to make the decision to allow the bill to proceed. Therefore, it is the ruling of the Chair that the bill cannot proceed.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think there might be consent to take Bill C-13 in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) during the remaining time.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, let me say that the hon. member was ready to proceed with this important bill. However, at least half the private members' hour has been taken up with procedural matters, as well as with Your Honour's extensive and well researched decision. I hope there is agreement that we adjourn and not continue with the short time left of private members' hour. I hope this meets with everybody's approval.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): As hon. members have heard, there is a suggestion that we do not continue with private members' hour. I need the unanimous consent of the House to call it six o'clock. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.35 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

[Translation]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess, I was saying that we should not add another element which would result in creating a problem through some hesitation of issuing cheques for fear that the fund of the Commission be depleted. The unemployed have such a hard time getting paid nowadays that if ever some functionary—who decides to function from time to time—learned that there is no more money in the fund, we would be in great difficulty.

One must try to be serious especially after having adopted an act dealing with unemployment insurance which lacks flexibility and complicates the unemployed's life with administrative red tape which contributes in delaying payment of benefits. Futile discussions should not however delay the adoption of a bill tp grant cash advances to the commission and the payment of benefits to the unemployed.

Yesterday, a well qualified speaker, a parliamentarian who is much familiar with the Standing Orders and with procedure, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), after referring to various pension plans and to the possibilities of obtaining funds, stated as recorded in Hansard, and I quote:

> The Canada Assistance Plan works much the same way. In that case, the federal government even underwrites what the provinces do.
> As long as the provinces meet certain conditions laid down in the Canada Assistance Plan, they can pay supplements to their pensioners, get various programs under way in the social welfare field and collect 50 per cent of the cost from Ottawa. Nowhere is there any ceiling or provision that says they cannot get this when they exceed a certain amount of money. What is it that is wrong with unemployed people, in the minds of my friends to the right, that they must be pilloried in the way they are being pilloried in this House tonight and being told that they cannot get their money?

It is quite clear tough. What the government is asking for the time being is nothing outstanding, that is to advance monies to the fund. It is only a type of loan, something we are used to for we lend millions of dollars to almost every country of the world, and we would hesitate to advance money to Canada's unemployed! We find ourselves in a very uncomprehensible situation.

I understand that in the area of unemployment, it is sometimes difficult to establish everyone's responsibilities with accuracy; so many factors must be taken into account. However, no serious observer can help concluding that lack of money is the determining factor. The lack of money leads to unemployment. At the present time, we are faced with a shortage of funds to pay the unemployed! Under the circumstances, I am very pleased to say that all my colleagues from the Social Credit are ready to support the bill and to hasten its passage so that the unemployed will never suffer as a result of the late payment of their allowances.

Unemployment which has reached an alarming extent is due to a restricted monetary flow—but let us not take any action to restrict it further—in various fields of economic activities, as a result of which the unconscious supporters of the present unbalanced financial system, who are often represented in Parliament by a Minister of Finance who juggles with figures, taxes and exorbitant debts and loans, are responsible for those conditions.

If one asks the unemployed what is the cause of his constant concern, he will answer: I am not drawing enough income to ensure my livelihood and that of my family.

He lives from day to day with his fear of tomorrow. There are still people who take the means to create still more concern. This illness is spreading at such a vertiginous pace that a provincial minister of labour has once stated that he could see the end of the present unemployment crisis, which could put Canadians in the not so fortunate prospect of a revolution. These remarks have been published and commented by the media.

During this period, we see, one after the other, the defenders of the system which has resulted in unemployment resorting to every available means to make thousands of unemployed believe that the government is doing all it can to assist them, by considering development programs, readjusting rates of benefits and, since this is the fashion, publishing white papers or papers of any other colour, as required.

But for the time being the question of unemployment insurance will come back for discussion in the House and we shall talk again of the legislation and its necessary amendments. Right now, we must hasten to pass this legislation which would guarantee to the unemployed the income they need.

[English]

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious matter that we are discussing tonight and I hesitate to do what I am about to do. We have had caucuses on this matter and I have discussed it with my colleagues. I know that I will not make myself terribly popular by what I am going to say, but I must disagree with some of the remarks of my colleague from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who spoke in this debate last night. I am sorry to have to disagree with those remarks and I hope, while he might be angry with me for a while, that our friendship which has been of relatively long standing will not be permanently upset by what I now propose to say.

He said, among other things, that the government's demeanour in the handling of this bill brings into question its competence and integrity. I cannot agree with that, Mr. Speaker. I cannot agree with it because it is impossible to call into question something that never existed in the first place. This is true of the demeanour of the government in almost every undertaking that we have been exposed to in this House and it has been particularly true of the demeanour with which it has faced us and the Canadian people over this issue.

I came in here about two weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, fresh from conversations with my colleagues, convinced that I should vote against this bill. But then I confess to you, Sir, that I wavered; I was tempted. I listened to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey). We all know him to be a compassionate man. We know him to be a very warm-hearted man with a deep, abiding and sincere concern for those less fortunate than himself. Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, he is a very persuasive speaker. As I sat here the old silver-tongued devil from Verdun took me up on the mountain top and showed me all that lay below. And I was tempted.

• (2010)

I said to my colleagues, "Having listened to the hon. member for Verdun, the man who was the responsible minister before he was turfed out by his colleagues for his humanitarianism, I cannot see my way clear to vote against the bill." They said, "Vote against it. It will go to committee and there you will get a chance to find out everything you need to know about it." So I did: hanging my head as I rose in my place, I voted against the bill. I felt badly at the time but I took the advice of those with more experience than I have, and the bill went to committee.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the whole sordid story was spread before us, the whole tatty tale of how this government deliberately deceived the people of this country about the true story of unemployment just before the election campaign. This was unemployment which they had created deliberately and for which they probably took credit at the time. It became clear to me then how they were trying to cover up a course of action which one of the most responsible men in this country, the Auditor General, has said is of dubious legality and is unique in parliamentary history as far as his research carries him. This is a uniqueness so striking that he has asked for separate legal opinion on whether the government's course of action was legal.

The former minister, the hon. member from Verdun—I wish he had been here about five minutes earlier when I honoured and eulogized him—

Mr. Roy (Timmins): With knives in the back.

Mr. Reilly: The hon. member talks about knives in the back. That is a marvellous thing to hear from a Liberal in reference to the hon. member for Verdun.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Reilly: If I had hired as a straight man the hon. member who interjected, Mr. Speaker, I would sign the cheque right now because he has done the job for the week. But there is more to come.

I want to take hon. members back along memory lane to 1969, when this whole sorry mess began, and to bring them up to date on what has happened since. There has been an attempt by members of the government—the chief among them and the most eloquent, certainly, has been the hon. member for Verdun—to persuade people that because we in this party have stood from the beginning against a course of action that is clearly illegal, clearly fraudulent, clearly evasive, we are somehow arrayed in all our power against the poor, the unfortunate and the helpless.

If anyone on that side of the House has any doubt about where we stand, or if any of my easily pleased, well-heeled friends at the other end of the House have any doubts about where we stand, let them bring in an appropriation now for the money we need, and we will pass it in all three stages tonight. They will not do that, of course, Mr. Speaker, because that would be admitting that they were wrong—they were wrong when they began, they were wrong throughout and they are wrong now. And to admit to being capable of error is something that the Liberals never do. I repeat, in case there were some hon. members like the straight man who may not have heard me the first time, bring in an appropriation and it will pass in all three stages.

Mr. Baldwin: As long as they do not have computers to tell us how much.

Mr. Reilly: I want to go back to 1969 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told reporters hovering around him with microphones and pencils and pads at the ready that he had discovered the enemy of our society, inflation, and that the old people, the poor people, the people on fixed incomes and on pensions and all the others he held dear—all those people were suffering and he proposed to do something about it. In the same year he was warned by the Economic Council of Canada that if he pursued the course which he announced he was going to pursue, two things were likely to happen. First, there would be higher unemployment than that which we were already experiencing—and that was not a happy state of affairs in 1969—and, second, that inflation likely would not be halted at all. Despite that, he pursued his course and said that he did not care that unemployment went as high as 6 per cent. He said that to newspapermen and on television, Mr. Speaker.

Upon reflection, I have to conclude that it is a good thing that the Prime Minister was not scared of the figure of 6 per cent. If he had been, he would have spent a good part of the next couple of years hiding in the cupboard or under the desk because we have had 6 per cent unemployment for most of that time.

We all know how much it concerned him when the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) persistently sought day after day to find out if this bankrupt government had any plans to cope with the unemployment which it had created. We know what the Prime Minister mouthed across the House of Commons at the hon. member. We know what he told a group of unemployed workers in front of this House, Mr. Speaker. I will not repeat the words. I can only say that Marie Antoinette extended roughly the same invitation to the disgruntled masses in her time. She was a little more eloquent than the Prime Minister, but the effect was the same.

Moving on to 1970 and 1971, unemployment did reach 6 per cent, then went higher. Half a million Canadians were out of work. But still this government forged ahead. We heard at that time that inflation was licked. I remember that was around Christmas time. We all know how the prediction turned out. In 1971 the government had the answer to all these problems—the new Unemployment Insurance Act.

I remember well the pride with which the hon. member for Verdun introduced that plan. Wonders yet unheard of were to be enacted by the House of Commons to the benefit of the Canadian people. Pregnant women were to be able to collect unemployment insurance while they sat and gestated away—students, casual workers, professionals; all manner of people. There was even a time in the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration when it was suggested that Members of Parliament should collect unemployment insurance when an ungrateful electorate turned them out. That committee report makes fascinating reading, Mr. Speaker; I would recommend it to hon. members opposite as vocational training.

The hon. member for Verdun told us that with up to 4 per cent unemployment the fund would be financed by contributions from workers and bosses, and after that the government would pay. He repeated that phrase this afternoon—"the government will pay". I should like to know at this stage what his concept of the government is, if you except certain ventures of which my friends to his far distant right would probably approve, such as the minting of special money for special events. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that it is the people's pocket we are talking about and that is what the hon. member for Verdun was talking about; but he would never put it that crudely.

It became obvious at that time, as contributions from bosses and workers would not flow in at precisely the same time as it was necessary to pay benefits which were badly needed because of the unemployment created by the government, that a provision would need to be made for an advance to the fund so that the commission could make payments to the unemployed even though the commission had not yet received all the contributions from the workers and the bosses. A provision along these lines was duly incorporated into the bill which went to committee.

About that time, we do not know precisely when, there was inserted by the conservative wing of the so-called Liberal party a provision saying that at no time could the advance from general revenues to this fund total more than $800 million. Some members of the committee examining the estimates were confused as to why that $800 million limit was necessary. Mr. Allen, director of economic policy analysis, said that the $800 million figure represented the upper limit of the advance. Presumably he was talking in terms of deficits. The hon. member for Hamilton West asked if Mr. Allen had used a 7 per cent unemployment rate, to which Mr. Allen replied yes, he had used 7 per cent and that in order to cover the worst possible case they had added another $100 million to the $700 million for good measure. So, that is the scientific way in which the technocrats opposite arrived at the $800 million ceiling of advances to the unemployment insurance fund.

Now we move to May, 1972. The Unemployment Insurance Commission became aware it was running into a crisis. May I quote from the evidence taken before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee on January 18 of this year. Mr. Cousineau, the Unemployment Insurance Commissioner, said that in April the commission paid out $109 million, and $84 million in May. So based on the information that was available at the end of May, because there is always a time lag of approximately one month, the officials of the commission were expecting substantial—

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) is quoting from a committee report. I thought it was a previous ruling of the Chair that no proceedings in a committee or reports of a committee were to be dealt with in this House until the committee's reports had been adopted.

An hon. Member: You are totally wrong.

Mr. Paproski: Stick to your back bench.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I must point out to the hon. member that the matter he just raised answers exactly his question. In fact, as the committee has already submitted its report to the House, automatically nothing prevents hon. members from talking about what went on in this committee.

[English]

Clearly, hon. members are capable of commenting on the proceedings of committees.

Mr. Reilly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At any rate, when the figures for the month of May were tabled there was an indication that the level of benefits would need to be reduced unless the amount in the fund was increased. So they knew away back in May of last year that they were running into trouble.

I quote further from the evidence taken before the committee. Mr. Cousineau said:

> I reported to the commission on July 10, and, on the basis of the information that was supplied by my senior staff, I gave instructions for a review in its entirety of our financial operations. In mid-August, based on the first six months of operation, I came to the conclusion there was a possibility that we may be running out of money, in accordance with that ceiling. Our pessimistic estimate was early November but our optimistic estimate was some time towards the end of December.

There, again, we have it on record that the commission knew in the middle of August it would be out of money at the very latest by the end of December. Parliament was in session intermittently until September 1 at which time it was dissolved and the federal election called. You would have thought that the minister who knew while parliament was in session that the commission would be running out of money would have come to parliament and said, "The commission is running out of money. It needs more."

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Reilly: Certainly.

Mr. Mackasey: I know the hon. gentleman is quoting accurately from the committee hearings. I do not have a copy. Perhaps he would answer a question, since he has done some research. Did the head of the Unemployment Insurance Commission indicate to the committee when he notified me that he felt it was time for us to ask for warrants for more money? The hon. member omitted that, or perhaps ignored it unintentionally.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I have not ignored it; I am coming to it. I think the hon. member will find it interesting if he listens. In any event, one would have thought that at such a time the House would have been informed of the facts. In committee, before which the head of the Unemployment Insurance Commission appeared to answer, I asked why the minister had not come to the House. He replied that he had not told the minister about the situation until the middle of September.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Finance publishes a monthly statement.

Mr. Reilly: I am not aware of the vicissitudes of daily ministerial life. I know ministers of this government are busy men and have a great deal to do. But would you not think that some time after July 10, when this man took over, or even prior to that, some official of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, perhaps over a late night Dixie-cup of coffee in the minister's office or over at the Rideau Club, might have said, "Hey, Bryce. You know that $800 million? Well, it's gone."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reilly: "It's gone, and we need some more." I know that the problems facing gentlemen who operate on such an ethereal plane must be enormous. I know how difficult it must be to remember these little details. Only last week I was reminded by my secretary to pay the telephone bill—but, Mr. Speaker, it was $8, not $800 million. I suggest to you that someone was pretty lax in the performance of his duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: This House had every right to expect to be told, before it was dissolved on September 1 for a general election, that the $800 million advance fund would be dried up by the end of the year and recourse would need to be taken to other means of financing that fund. But the government did not do that. They waited around until parliament was conveniently out of the way and they avoided by that manoeuvre, at least temporarily, the bothersome and embarrassing chore of coming before the House, before hon. members and, thereby, before the people of this country and explaining how they had contrived to get rid of all this money that had been authorized.

They did not need to explain how they had allowed unemployment in this country to reach such incredible proportions that it was necessary to pay out that amount of money from the fund. They did not need to explain how the incompetence of their own forecasters had allowed them to run out of money six months ahead of time—to run out of all $800 million. That is an awful lot of money and they would have had to explain it away. They did not want to do that because guess what happened two months after parliament dissolved on September 1. Two months after that came October 30, and we all know what happened on that day.

I can only assume that they had hoped—I would not impute rotten motives to the government or any individual in it—to avoid unnecessary and embarrassing questions on this score, and they nearly got away with it. They would have got away with it if my leader had not broken the sad news that the unemployment insurance fund was in difficulty. Then the minister from Verdun, as my colleague put it so colourfully early this evening, went to confession. He called a press conference and explained why on October 5 a governor general's warrant was issued in the amount of $234 million to help finance this fund.

A governor general's warrant, as hon. members may be aware, can only be issued when two conditions are present: first, parliament must not be in session; second, it must be a payment urgently required for the public good. Obviously, the first criterion was met. Parliament—the government saw to that—was conveniently out of the way. That little number had been settled. Now we were left with the urgency of the payment. Well, we had hundreds of thousands of people out of work who needed their benefits, so we have to concede that they needed the money pretty urgently.

However, what does this tell us about the people responsible for the plan and its administration in this government? It tells us that they knew in May or June that they would be broke before December. It tells us that they pretended everything was just fine while parliament was in session until September 1. It tells us they sat on a situation which grew more urgent every day until they were able to dissolve parliament and were free to obtain the money they needed through the back door, without having to confess that they were bankrupt, that their predictions had been wrong and that unemployment was still disastrously high, even in the middle of the summer when it is supposed to recede.

In any event, warrants for $234 million and $220 million were applied for and granted. They total $454 million. In order to deal with this situation the government could have called parliament into session after October 30. It had all of November and December to call us here in order to cope with the situation in which it found itself. It did not do that. It applied for a second governor general's warrant. Two weeks later the government brought us back here and introduced this bill, Bill C-124.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) told us plaintively that he cannot see why all the fuss is being made over a bill with two clauses in it. I remind him that you can declare war with one clause. They gave us this bill, this obscene mess, to cope with on January 4. We met in committee on January 30. We were then told we had until February 7 to pass this bill through committee, the House, the Senate and all stages it needed to go through or else we would be responsible for depriving the poor and the unemployed of their incomes.

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. Reilly: Blackmail is a very mild word to use for that kind of procedure. We were told that unless we suspended all our critical faculties, we would stand convicted of taking away money from the poor. The government was joined in this gibberish by their friends down the way. Now we hear how they are being treated by the Social Credit party.

Having created unemployment deliberately because they did not know of any other way to deal with inflation, the government stubbornly persisted in its wilful ways despite the best economic advice in the country. Having manifested all the concern and compassion we might expect from a beetle in the face of repeated demonstrations of suffering by the poor people of this country, they now attempt to blame us for their own foolishness. The lawyers in this House know the story, but the demeanour of the crowd across the way reminds me of nothing so much as that of the young man who, having committed double patricide, comes into court pleading for mercy because he is an orphan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: We sought to maintain a limit on the amount that could be advanced from general revenues into this account. We sought to do that for very good reasons. First, there was one in the act. It was put in there at the behest of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) who did not trust his colleague the hon. member for Verdun. He thought he was too philanthropic, that he might give away all the money to the pregnant women and, therefore, had a $800 million ceiling put on by the Department of Finance.

I do not blame the hon. member for Verdun and the government for being caught with their nose in the jampot, but the ceiling was put in there, and apparently for good cause. The proof of that was given this afternoon by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas). This was during the miscellaneous estimates committee evidence on January 16 of this year when the President of the Treasury Board was asked why there was a limit on these advances. My colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), stated:

> There seems little purpose in having a ceiling at all in the act under those conditions.

The President of the Treasury Board replied as follows:

> No, Mr. Chairman, I suggest there is a very good purpose in having a ceiling. This particular ceiling, I suggest, was put in in order that parliament would have an opportunity to examine the reasons for the circumstances surrounding any sums in excess of this, which is precisely what we are engaged in now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: There he sits with his face averted. Well he might. He should turn his face to the wall. He should resign from the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: I do not know what he thought we were talking about that morning, but he was obviously in profound conflict with his colleagues on the front benches. Maybe they should take a little recess in order to get their facts straight. Here we have the President of the Treasury Board, the man who next to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is responsible for the regulation and being a watchdog of public expenditures, saying that the ceiling was a good thing. Why? So parliament can examine the facts if we go over the $800 million. It is a red flag. It is a check. We did not say it: we asked, and he told us. Why? We tried to find that out.

We operated under a massive handicap in that committee. First, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was laid up with the common cold. In his place he sent the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). There is a performer! I fear for the people of Canada if that man is going to be administering justice for the next little while. I really do. He has his back to me, as well he might. He came in there, danced around and tiptoed through the tulips. You never saw such a performance in your life. We could not get a straight answer out of him even if we tried to buy it.

Mr. Lang: You would not know one if you saw it.

Mr. Reilly: Now he speaks. That is the first simple, declarative sentence he has spoken in all the time I have known him. We tried for a variety of reasons but the chief among them was the reason given by the President of the Treasury Board. That was not on January 16, 1971; that was not on January 16, 1972; it was on January 16, 1973, just a few weeks ago, in the committee discussing the very thing we are discussing here. We tried to understand why the President of the Treasury Board was in such obvious and deep conflict with his colleagues. We could not determine why they wanted this clause to come out. The Minister of Justice said, while it had been thought at one time that a limit on these advances was desirable, more mature reflection had shown that it was no longer desirable.

Mr. Hees: I wrote that and rejected it ten years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reilly: In any event, Mr. Speaker, mature reflection persuaded them that it should now come out. The phrase "mature reflection", as we have seen by the obvious delight it causes some members, has a fine ring to it. As the British would have it, it is all swank and no knickers because it really does not mean anything. It does not tell us anything of what we should know, which is precisely why the government wants the ceiling removed. They never told us. The President of the Treasury Board gave us good cause for keeping it but there has been no spokesman for the government to tell us why it should be removed. I have to confess that I am perplexed by that kind of performance. The minister responsible for the bill does not mean to favour us with a statement in its defence. We were supposed to sort of absorb his philosophy by some process of osmosis. This might work as far as my colleagues way down on the left are concerned; they are close enough. But it does not work over here. We do not understand. It does not tell us what we need to know. Perhaps the phrase "mature reflection" means "second thoughts after you have been caught out," or maybe if you set a watchdog to watch, it is almost certain you are going to catch somebody.

• (2040)

The government tells us it cannot agree to any limit. At one stage another $100 million was suggested. Could they cope with that? What about a further $100 million? But they did not want to make any prediction. Why? Because they claimed they were not able to make any prediction. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in December when the Unemployment Insurance Commission, among other government agencies, was asked to forecast its requirements up to February 8—and it was precisely February 8 they were asked to forecast to, not some time early in February, or a few weeks hence, or whenever the government could persuade those bad hats in the Conservative party to vote the funds which were needed—they were able to do so. And with such claim to accuracy that the Minister of Immigration told us he was satisfied that their estimating was accurate to within an hour either way.

So evidently it is possible to forecast requirements. Here I renew my invitation to hon. gentlemen opposite. If they have a problem paying the unemployed whom they have put out of work on purpose, they should not try to hang it on us. All they have to do is to come here with an appropriation. They have proven they can forecast how much they need to within an hour on any given date. The hon. minister is waving his hands. I do that a lot. So, arriving at a figure should not be any problem for them. We, as I said earlier, speaking on behalf of all my hon. friends, will pass that appropriation right away.

I do not think there is any doubt that this bill will pass. I do not think anybody here seriously doubts that proposition. I shall not belabour the House with any more metaphysical talk about connubial relations between the Liberals and the NDP. I think that metaphor has been worked to death. I would not like to see any marriage really consummated because of the possibility that the offspring might be so hideous as to stagger the mind. The unemployed, there is no doubt, will get their money and I am as happy as anyone that they will do so. I think I have reasonably good credentials to come here and talk about this bill. I have been a labour union member and an organizer for unions. I have a great many friends in the labour movement and I have first-hand experience—

Mr. Olivier: Oh, yeah?

Mr. Reilly: Where did that sparkling bit of repartee come from? We are bubbling with wit in this House. I think we could probably spare some for the other place. As I was saying, there is no one on this side who is any more genuinely or sincerely concerned about the plight of the unemployed than I am.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reilly: I would expect that juvenility and cynicism from the back benches of the Liberal party. I have fairly good credentials, I think. But I intend to vote against this bill for the reason that it is a vehicle of shame, fraud, irresponsibility and incompetence on the part of the government and for the reason they have tried to blackmail me and others like me by this phoney concern of theirs about whether the unemployed will get their money. They are trying to shame us, though they created the mess.

[Mr. Reilly.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: It was they, on their own initiative, who created the mess they are in right now. It was the Prime Minister who conceived that ill-begotten scheme and who persisted in it despite the best advice offered to him. It was they who fumbled and flapped and fooled around through three years of disaster. It was they who deliberately created unemployment. It was they who foisted on the people of Canada a bill of goods about an unemployment insurance plan which would take care of itself by reason of contributions from the workers and the bosses and a minimum contribution from the government, that faceless nonentity which just produces money from its pocket.

It was the Trudeau government which ignored the sufferings of the people and used fraud to bail itself out of an unconscionable situation. And it continues tonight to insist that it cannot live with a reasonable limitation which would assist parliament in the control of its profligate spending habits despite the fact that the senior financial official within its ranks said not two weeks ago that this kind of limitation was a highly desirable thing.

This is the record of the government. It is a record of incompetence, of fraud, of shame, of total lack of regard for the unfortunate people of this country. And they are stuck with it and they are welcome to it.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to speak at great length tonight on Bill C-124 but I should like at least to make a few remarks that seem to me to be absolutely vital.

The government has introduced Bill C-124 to raise the ceiling that had been set by a previous bill to $800 million, to make up the deficit of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and pay unemployment insurance benefits after February 7.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I agree with my colleague the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) when he says that we are not here in this House to play politics or to use parliamentary procedures to run the fund dry and deprive the unemployed of Canada of their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is the duty of hon. members—even though this government is directly responsible for failing to foresee the situation when it had all the necessary data to do so—notwithstanding any political consideration not to reject the consequences on the unemployed but to allow them to get what they are entitled to.

One must remember the basic principle that those who contributed to the unemployment insurance fund did so out of their pockets in accordance with the act and that when they are out of work the government, in return, must pay them benefits.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to pass this opportunity to say to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) that he is incompetent and irresponsible and that he is deliberately misleading the House. I know what I am talking about, having already met managers of provincial unemployment insurance offices and having discussed week after week with more than 50 jobless who were complaining about not receiving the benefits they were entitled to.

And each time myself or my Social Credit colleagues raise this question in the House, the minister replies with a wide smile and does not say anything. I want him to know that it is not because he is a Liberal that I will support this bill but because the unemployed need money. I support this bill because we have no right to have the unemployed pay for the government's incompetence. But I also want the minister to know that the centralized payment system of the Unemployment Insurance Commission is absolutely inhuman, impersonal and inefficient. It has been obvious since it was put into operation that the system is not worth a penny.

We are about to pass this bill, to remove the ceiling and to increase without limit the Unemployment Insurance Commission's budget to cover unemployment benefit payments. But these benefits should reach the unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, I am disgusted—and I want to say it clearly—by the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Commission which acts like an ostrich, hiding its head in the sand and not paying benefits.

To speak in a "practical and concrete" way, I should give a specific example which occurs again and again in our province. Probably this happens elsewhere, but the Progressive Conservative members do not say a word about it; they say rather that the Liberals are not good; we were aware of this fact, but we should like them to mention as well the problems resulting from unemployment in their regions.

Mr. Speaker, if a worker becomes unemployed on November 1, and after two months has not received one cent in unemployment insurance benefit, is it because the fund is empty? No, it is not. At that time, it was not empty, according to the minister, if he is not lying to us. This means that the administration which deals with the payment of unemployment insurance benefits is unable to pay such benefits and therefore, it should be blamed by hon. members who are responsible before Parliament of the administration of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very good thing to vote legislation to enable the people to get better service in such or such an area, but such legislation must at least reach the people concerned. I should like to speak again of the head of a family who becomes unemployed on the November 1 and who, on January 1, has not received one cent yet.

The minister will find it funny; he is not even listening, for this is of no interest to him. But I say to him that the head of a family cannot afford to live on fresh air and he is not the one who should finance the Unemployment Insurance Fund. If the fund is empty and benefits cannot be paid or if the unemployed is not eligible to unemployment benefits, let at least someone tell him.

If my colleagues from the Liberal party, as well as those from the other parties, are honest they know that these unemployed ask their member of Parliament what is happening in their case. They tell him they are not receiving benefits even though they have contributed over twenty times and have completed all the cards. They say they receive their cards every week. Other people do not receive any card at all. Sometimes they are sent a heap of correspondence, sometimes nothing at all and, at the end of two months, these same unemployed that we tried to help with extraordinary legislation, the Unemployment Insurance Act, have not received one cent yet. That is when the member of Parliament must get into the picture. This problem is so serious that the former minister and the current minister have established administrative sections in each regional office to help hon. members. This indicates that the numerous cases submitted to hon. members do exist.

Therefore, I wish to draw the minister's attention to that problem. Tonight, or tomorrow, we shall vote on this legislation aimed at raising the ceiling on the advances in order to replenish the unemployment insurance fund. However, I wish to point out to the minister that if I were sure that the unemployment insurance benefits will not be paid faster once we have passed this legislation, I would definitely vote against this bill in order to disable the Unemployment Insurance Commission and make it unworkable.

Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to vote all the credits possible to allow the Unemployment Insurance Commission to operate but on condition that the benefits really reach the persons actually unemployed.

The situation is very serious. In fact, official statistics show that in Quebec, among other places, the unemployment rate may exceed 10 per cent. I realize that the Unemployment Insurance Commission cannot check unemployment, but it can at least alleviate the hardship suffered by the unemployed. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I consider that the process put in place by the minister and his predecessor in order to decentralize the payment of the benefits is outdated and inefficient, and should indeed be modified. Actually, the local offices should be set up again in order that the benefits might be paid to the recipient from hand to hand to make sure that he gets them regularly, as it should be.

Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance is like private insurance, health insurance or any other type of insurance. The person who pays a premium expects that the indemnity will be paid to him right away if he is entitled to it.

Unemployment insurance is a public insurance intended to provide the worker with some revenue when he loses his job. Consequently, for unemployment insurance to prove really valuable, its benefits should be paid while the beneficiary is unemployed and not when he has resumed work.

I have in mind at least ten cases where benefits were paid when the beneficiary had resumed work after two or three months of unemployment, which is revolting.

When we get in touch with the regional authorities, we usually get an answer because the officials are devoted. The problem is not there but solely in the impersonal, ineffective and stupid Montreal office and headquarters in all other provinces where everything is computerized. And even if a benefit has been authorized by the director of a regional office that payment will be made only two or three weeks later, unless they make a special payment, as it is called in administrative parlance.

What will happen if you make a "special" or "advance" payment? The card of the recipient will be pulled out and if he ever becomes unemployed again, there will be a problem because it takes at least two months to get the card back into the machine.

That is the information I was given by regional chairmen, and those in charge at the Montreal office, Mr. Speaker; and no one has ever contradicted them. I deplore, the fact that the minister misled the House and continues to do so. Before we past this bill I would very much like the minister to give us a formal guarantee that the benefits will be paid to those who are entitled to them, that the Unemployment Insurance Commission will become personalized, that the offices will be decentralized. For instance, Montreal serves the entire province of Quebec. Steps must be taken so that the unemployed in Victoriaville, Arthabaska or anywhere else in the province will receive their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, those were the few remarks I wanted to make. I made them sincerely, frankly. I want to say this to the minister: time has come for him to pull his hands out of his pockets, to assume his ministerial responsibilities and to see to it that the Unemployment Insurance Commission reaches in fact the people it claims it wants to serve.

Until the contrary is proved, I shall say that the UIC does not achieve its objectives that it is made up of both competent and incompetent people, but that one thing is sure: the overall administration of the UIC is inadequate and does not really achieve its goals.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, it will all be very nice to vote this evening or tomorrow to remove the ceiling and replenish the unemployment insurance fund. This demonstrates once more the failure of the government to stop unemployment. It will all be very nice to pass this legislation but if we vote millions of dollars to pay for benefits that will not be paid out in time, I say that this will have been a waste of time and the minister has misled us and is mocking this House.

I should also like to tell the Conservatives, while I'm in that vein, that I find their attitude concerning this bill absolutely inconceivable and irresponsible. They want to play politics on the government's back, but actually they are playing politics on the backs of the unemployed, because if they kill this bill, this will mean that the claimants will not receive their cheque because the fund will have run out.

Even if there are problems with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, let them rise, as I am rising, let them put pressure on the minister to make him stand up to his responsibilities, which he has not done to this day, in order at least that the benefits meet their purpose. Then we may think about changing the government, but let us not play politics on the backs of unemployed people who are utterly destitute.

I ask the Conservatives to show more decency than the Liberals do. Last year, the Liberals, seeing that the benefits were not being paid out, had the nerve to make an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec in order for the claimants to be granted loans by the welfare administration until the unemployment insurance cheques were sent out.

Mr. Speaker, this situation is absolutely revolting. The minister did not bother with solving the problem of paying unemployment insurance benefits. He was more interested in reaching an agreement with Quebec whereby the unemployed would depend on welfare allowances that had to be repaid.

Mr. Speaker, I say that this is grossly indecent on the part of the Liberals and I cannot see how the Progressive Conservative members can protect this system by killing the bill and making once again the unemployed foot the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I urge both old parties not only to pay the unemployed what is due to them but also to change either the act or the minister.

• (2100)

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on third reading of the bill. I would have much preferred to have spoken on the amendment which has been ruled out of order as I think the significant part of this bill is the amendment to do away with the $800 million statutory limitation placed on the fund by the government in 1971. It should be noted that it was not the opposition which set the statutory limit, but the government itself. It was obviously done because the government, through the then minister, now the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), made a solemnly declared statement before the committee that the actuarial figures were bona fide and that the government was quite sure the $800 million ceiling would not be exceeded as there was no way their calculations could be out that much. Even when it was suggested that the studies indicated some doubt about the figures of the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials, the suggestion was dismissed; yet it has been shown that the figures presented to the committee were in fact considerably closer to the final outcome than the government's own figures.

The hon. member for Verdun gave a list of reasons the statutory limit could be released or eased and indicated how the Unemployment Insurance Commission could be checked in a number of ways, but an example was given to show that these were not likely to be very effective.

We are only debating this bill tonight because the $800 million ceiling was put in to look after eventualities. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) suggested it was put in for a good purpose. There has been some intimation that unless this bill is passed, unemployment insurance recipients will not be able to receive their money. This seems to be a red herring because we know the government can make other arrangements, if necessary, to have the unemployment insurance fund balanced.

No one wants unemployment insurance recipients to go without the money allocated to them under the plan, but it speaks poorly of the government's planning if after six months with parliament not in session, from August to the end of December, it suddenly appears necessary to put through substantial changes to unemployment insurance legislation with little or no scrutiny by the House. I suggest that the removal of the ceiling of $800 million opens the way for a large charge on the consolidated revenue fund with little or no scrutiny by parliament for months or even years after the fact.

I suggest the $800 million ceiling was put in by the Department of Finance because it did not trust the estimates of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and wanted some sort of control and discussion in respect of expenditures when they exceeded the statutory limit. It is obvious that when expenditures get above the $800 million ceiling which, after all, represents about 5 per cent of the total federal budget, this is cause for at least discussion and survey at the national level.

It seems certain that the overrun of the unemployment insurance fund in the year 1973 will probably be as great or greater than that of 1972. There are substantial amounts of variables in the plan that may inherently increase the amount of money that will be necessary from the federal treasury. It would seem to me that the government should be more than willing to have the statutory ceiling remain, even if it were increased, because obviously with this Unemployment Insurance Act we are dealing with a plan which will be hard to estimate and in which the administration can make variations of up to hundreds of millions of dollars for which the federal treasury or the employer-employee fund will be liable.

It is interesting to note that in a document headed "Fact and Figures, September, 1970" presented by the government to the committee studying the Unemployment Insurance Act, the estimated contributions were very much on target but the pay-out was entirely off. At a 6.5 per cent rate of unemployment in 1972 the forecast of benefits was $875 million, with the sickness portion being another $142 million, making a total of $1,017 million. At that approximate rate of unemployment in 1972 we find that the actual cost was $1,900 million, with the charge on the government being in the neighbourhood of $800 million, when in fact the forecast was for $369 million at a 6.5 per cent rate of unemployment.

There was obviously a shortfall in contributions from the employer-employee segment which amounted to nearly $400 million. It is indeed fortunate there were $239 million held over from the previous year to be applied to the employer-employee account. In other words, in 1972 there was actually a shortfall in the employer-employee account of nearly $400 million if it was to be brought up to the same position at the start of 1973 as it was at the beginning of 1972.

Mr. Speaker, the employer-employee contributions have been increased to bring in $100 million this year, making it in the neighbourhood of $800 million. But based on the experience of 1972, well over $1 billion would be necessary in the employer-employee account to take care of the charges on the fund for the 4 per cent for which the employer-employee fund is responsible. This means that in 1973 there will have to be advances out of the consolidated revenue fund, if our experience is the same as in 1972, in order to meet this employer-employee share.

I do not quarrel with this, but I would like to point out that the Unemployment Insurance Commission can run a deficit for many years with the consolidated revenue fund which the federal treasury would carry for a long time. I do not see why the Unemployment Insurance Commission would have to set its rates so that the contributions reflect the 4 per cent rate on which they are presumed to set the tariffs for the employers and employees.

Specifically in this act, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has the authority to set the rates and conditions of both the repayment of principal and interest on the advances. In other words, the Unemployment Insurance Commission could be in debt to the consolidated revenue fund for years. When the unemployment rate is above 4 per cent and the consolidated revenue fund is responsible for the cost above 4 per cent, it makes little difference whether or not the unemployment insurance fund is in deficit with the government. When the consolidated revenue fund is in deficit for a long time for the part of the benefit costs that are 4 per cent and below, this becomes a matter of concern to parliament. At times there may be good reasons for the insurance fund being in deficit, but I believe that the country should be informed about it through parliament.

The imposition of a statutory limit is one method whereby parliament could have a check on the expenditures of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, because in 1972 the commission was obviously responsible for considerably more than 50 per cent of the total pay-out under the plan. There are other factors under this act, apart from the responsibility for the employer-employee share, which require close supervision of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In the white paper entitled "Unemployment in the '70's" on which this bill is based, the following statement is made:

> Benefits will be higher, more related to earnings and granted more on the basis of need than length of time in the work force.

Surely this implies that the old act was based on the principle of granting social assistance in times of need. The philosophy on which the act was based, of assessment on the basis of need rather than of insurance, implies that there are many open-ended commitments in the act which might result in a substantial increase of the cost without any basic changes having to be made to the structure of the act. Some of these come to mind. For instance, the inclusion of 96 per cent of the labour force has meant the inclusion of many people who were not normally unemployed.

It is my experience that this new group, consisting of teachers, nurses and professional people, has not yet learned how to use the act to its advantage. These people are making contributions so they will take advantage of the act in the same way as anyone else, similar to those who take advantage of the income tax regulations. This is obvious to every member of the House of Commons who finds that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is becoming more autocratic and bureaucratic in its decisions. The decision of the commission to attempt to cut the flow of funds certainly seems, at times at least, to be unfair to the individual and one-sided.

The Unemployment Insurance Act contains regulations which can be widely interpreted and this could result in a substantial drain on the fund while still being within the framework of the act. Any particular leniency in the application of the act or any restrictive interpretation of the regulations could vary the pay-out by hundreds of millions of dollars.

An automatic increase is built into the act in that we can expect the weekly wage rate to rise rapidly, and benefits are tied to this rise. According to the testimony presented to the committee on miscellaneous estimates, there was a rise of 10 per cent in the average weekly wage rate over that which was anticipated when the plan was set up. There was an increase from 13 to 17 weeks in the time during which unemployed recipients can receive benefits. This may have been due to the high unemployment rate and the consequent difficulty in obtaining a job, the failure of recipients to obtain work sooner, or other reasons. The whole thing seems quite obscure.

The decision whether to increase benefits from around 45 per cent of the weekly pay to 66 2/3 per cent of the weekly pay, and whether this should be a factor in increasing the length of time when a recipient who is off work will receive benefits is yet to be made. After all, there are many jobs in our cold country that are unpleasant and this factor will have to be taken into account.

Then there is the rise in the number of those leaving their jobs, from 5.1 per cent in 1970—the last year under the old plan—to 12.5 per cent now, which amounts to almost two and a half times the number of unemployed at a time of high unemployment. It would seem that people should not voluntarily leave their jobs at a time when the high rate of unemployment decreases the possibility of their getting another job. Then again, as has been pointed out by those studying the situation, after eight weeks of employment a minimum of 18 weeks of unemployment benefit is provided. The minimum, depending on the rate of national and regional unemployment, can be extended to 44 weeks as compared to the maximum duration of 51 weeks for any claimant.

In other words, the old act which tended to apply to those with a firm attachment to the labour force has been extended by the addition of people with minimum attachment to the labour force who are either on welfare or use the minimum attachment for their own ends, such as work on special projects and so on. The new Unemployment Insurance Act does not differentiate sufficiently between the worker with a long attachment to the labour force and the person who is either a welfare recipient with short working periods or, on the other end of the scale, the person who works for his own enjoyment or for a specific purpose.

The present Unemployment Insurance Act has a great many variables. The statutory ceiling provided a means for parliament to check expenditures in an obvious and discernible manner. I might point out that it is interesting that figures presented before the miscellaneous estimates committee showed, as the hon. member for Verdun pointed out last might, that the number of people receiving benefits in 1970 and 1972 was approximately the same, that is, in the neighbourhood of two million. If at this time of high unemployment there are many people who should be receiving benefits but are not, presumably this means that the act is not functioning in their interest and in such case it would be well for us to look into it.

I suggest that there is no justification for removing the ceiling after only one year's experience. If at some time in the future the plan shows stability and the charges to the federal treasury are kept in line with the economy of the country, then it might be time to consider the removal of the ceiling. We have to include, as well, the charges to the employer-employee segment because, after all, with 96 per cent of the working people included in the plan this virtually requires that everyone be taxed.

I have attempted to point out that the present Unemployment Insurance Act by its very nature contains many open-ended regulations. Time and time again the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) suggested in the committee that it contained so many variables that it was almost impossible to estimate the cost of the plan for 1973. It seems to me that parliament should err on the side of caution and that the ceiling should not be removed. We hope that the ceiling will not be surpassed, bearing in mind, however, that everyone would want the recipients to receive their just benefits under the act. I hope that the government will reconsider the removal of the ceiling at this time.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to ask him a question. I did not wish to interrupt his train of thought. He raised a very interesting point, that in 1972 the number of claimants was approximately the same as in 1970, even though in 1972 we had over seven million people covered by the act as opposed to four million in 1970. Am I correct that he is suggesting that people are being denied their benefits?

Mr. Ritchie: No. I do suggest that with a 4.5 per cent rate of unemployment in 1970 and 6.5 per cent now, with the same number of applicants, then presumably if there is more unemployment in our work force there should be more people applying. So if they are not applying, or are not receiving benefits when they do apply, it is because they are ineligible. In other words, there is a large number of people who are unemployed whom this act does not help.

Mr. Mackasey: I thank the hon. member, because he raised an interesting point about which I wanted to argue. How does he reconcile the fact that there are approximately the same number of claimants now as in 1970?

Mr. Ritchie: I am familiar enough with the workings of the old act, but I suggest that there is still a substantial group of people unemployed who are not covered by this act.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the main question with respect to the bill before us is the removal of the $800 million limit that was imposed on the government, by itself, to keep the Unemployment Insurance Commission in money. Some hon. members will recall that when I made my maiden speech in this House there were two things with which I found fault. One was the Unemployment Insurance Commission. At that time I cited a number of things. I made a special point of pointing out that this was not due, as some people suspected, to the inadequate work of some employees in the department. It so happens that in my riding there is a large section of this department. The people there work industriously and do a great deal of overtime in order to get the cheques out on time. I pointed out that the problem was the responsibility of the government and, in my opinion, of the senior staff of the government. I mentioned the chairman, and the minister saw fit to call me to task for belabouring senior civil servants in this chamber.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where else could I possibly bring to the attention of the people in my riding in particular, and of the country as a whole, the inadequacy of the government and of its senior employees in administering the Unemployment Insurance Act? At that point in time I made no mention of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) because he had been, shall I say, drummed out of his position in the cabinet. I am not in a position to know what happened, but in some way, shape or form he is no longer there and is no longer responsible. However, he has made a number of points in this House that I think should receive some attention.

I do not have copies of the proceedings of the committee with me, even though I participated in many of the meetings, nor do I have copies of Hansard to quote from, so you will have to take what I am about to say as being very, very close to the exact words of the hon. member for Verdun. I remember him accusing the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) of being a reactionary. Mr. Speaker, if Lincoln Alexander is a reactionary I am very proud to stand behind him as another reactionary, particularly in this matter. The hon. member for Verdun said that the $800 million was nothing more than a method by which the government lends money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Good gracious, what do we do with $800 million if it is nothing more than a method by which you lend money?

Shortly thereafter he said the $800 million was obviously inadequate. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have seen that it is inadequate. I think it has been quite well demonstrated this evening that the government knew it was inadequate long before the session last August. If the government did not know that, the senior civil servants knew it was inadequate and it was their responsibility to tell the government, as my colleague said earlier, perhaps over a paper-cup of coffee, but certainly the message should have got across.

I charged in my maiden speech that the extra ten cents contribution placed on employers and employees would not be enough to cover the deficit. I am intrigued to hear the hon. member for Verdun now say that the amount left over would be balanced to the nearest five cents or ten cents. Many of the employers who are paying contributions are small employers. They employ very few people. In fact, many of them really do not make as much as some of the people they employ. But they will have to pay that extra nickel or dime. I suggest that that is another method of taxation, and an unfair one to boot.

I was further intrigued by the rationale of the hon. member for Verdun when he said that the paying out of something like $2 billion could be equated to a reduction in taxes and in fact was reducing regional disparity. Perhaps it was balancing the money across the country, but once again it is the taxpayers, the 93 per cent who are employed, who are paying the shot. I suggest that they might well like a better way of having control over how the money is going out.

At the committee hearings I asked several questions and I have fairly good recall as to the dollar figures that were mentioned. When I questioned the cost of administration I was told that in 1970 the cost of administration had been proposed at about $59 million, and in fact had gone over by maybe 10 per cent and was about $65 million. I was told that the cost of administration in the calendar year 1971 had been proposed at about $70 million, and in actual fact had gone about 20 per cent over to $86 million. Perhaps those figures are not too unreasonable. But then I was told that in 1972, when the estimate had been $71 million, it had in fact gone to about $120 million. I was given the impression that really a million more or less does not really matter, but to someone coming from the county of Hastings in east-central Ontario I can assure you that $1 million more or less makes quite a difference.

• (2130)

The difference, though if it is $120 million, is $49 million—a difference of 70 per cent. In my maiden speech in the House I predicted that we would find that indeed we were over by something like 70 per cent. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) said I should leave personalities out of it when, in my maiden speech, I said that I would not wait to be fired if I had overspent by $50 million; I would quit. If I do not go after the chairman of the commission this evening—and I may—then I think it equally appropriate that he who would allow such extravagant expenditures should in all conscience give up his position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: If this was not an error, Mr. Speaker, and I think it was not, I strongly suspect that this $50 million was tossed into the kitty just to cover up some of the complaints we were getting that they were holding off an election. That $50 million was spent in putting people into jobs with the Unemployment Insurance Commission that they no longer hold. That $50 million was spent in trying to get some of these answers, to get some cheques out and to get people off their backs so that they could get on with an election. They knew the consequences of going into an election with that around their necks, and had to get out of it.

In the miscellaneous estimates committee I asked the chairman of the commission if he would break down the first half and the second half of the year. First of all he estimated a 50-70 break, but then he thought that the first half of the year was not any higher than the last half. I would have thought that the first half of the year might have been higher, but he might have misunderstood the answer I was looking for, in all fairness. In the first half of the year they were pouring money in, trying to stave off the consequences in view of the coming election.

There was a question of whether the number of unemployed was roughly the same in 1970 as in 1972. It is my recollection from statistics quoted earlier in the day that there were only 50,000 more unemployed in 1972 than in 1970. That is not a great increase, but if it is so, then where did we spend the extra $50 million? Did we actually spend $100 a head on each of those persons, for administration? I do not think we could possibly do that. I do not see how we had that extra expense of administration and suddenly found ourselves running out of money when we had an $800 million limit.

We in this party have been accused of being against the poor and against the unemployed. In the chief city in my riding the level of unemployment is a little below that of the rest of Canada. The United Empire Loyalists are very hard working people and work when many others do not. I have no hesitation in saying that this party of which I am proud to be a member is not in any way against the poor or the unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: We are fully cognizant of the problems of the unemployed and we think steps should be taken to find jobs for them, not unemployment insurance benefits. I am not going to deal with the legality of that question as other members on this side of the House have gone into it.

Mr. Speaker, I close with the thought that a tremendous hoax has been perpetrated upon us by this government in trying to get rid of a legal, logical limit that was self-imposed in the first place and now is being taken out to save embarrassment.

Mr. Mackasey: May I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Speaker? In light of the honest way in which the hon. gentleman quoted me without text—and I compliment him because he was fairly accurate—did he state that I suggested that the whole deficit of $189 million would be picked up at the cost of a dime per person over a one-year period? Is that what he suggested?

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I think at twenty minutes to ten in the evening we have debated this question sufficiently. The hon. member is quite capable of remembering what I said, which was that the figures given as to increases are not adequate and we will be faced with further increases which will have to be borne by the employers and employees in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, as I am under the impression that I will be one of the last to comment on this bill, I believe it is my duty to say a few words.

In my constituency, as, in fact, in all other constituencies, the number of unemployed greatly exceeds an amount we could call reasonable even though unemployment must be considered as a disease per se and should not exist in Canada.

I have listened to a few speeches with more attention and I realize that the government greatly exceeded last year's forecasts.

In my opinion, removing the ceiling is a sure way for the government of not having to give explanations to the House if it did exceed the set ceiling.

In fact it is quite logical to retain a ceiling as any administration must be very closely watched and I think that an administration which exceeds anticipated credits must come before Parliament to answer for its actions.

Even if the bill under study were not passed, this would in no way prevent the beneficiaries from getting their benefits, because if funds were lacking, measures should have been taken in September to remedy the problem.

In my opinion, a ceiling in itself is not so bad, on the contrary, and I think that the government should explain to the House, if it had to exceed the ceiling, even though the one presently suggested by the Progressive Conservative party is quite higher than the previous limit.

• (2140)

I would like also, like the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), on behalf of the unemployed in my constituency, to urge the minister to study a very important problem which is related to the services of the Unemployment Insurance Commission that should be improved in order to insure to the recipients that they will receive on time the benefits they are entitled to.

I think that in my constituency, as in all others, there is a serious problem about the Unemployment Insurance Commission services. In fact, there has been a lack of regional offices because of too much decentralization. I wonder whether efforts will be made in order to ensure better services so that recipients will receive their money on time. It has been said many times that these people have paid their contributions, as did those who never had to apply for benefits. I think it is important for the minister to consider improving this system by hiring additional personnel for the various offices and reverting to the previous administration which enabled the recipients to receive their benefits on time.

Many question have been put to the minister who always answered by saying that he would consider complaints made by hon. members on behalf of hundreds of unemplyed in my constituency and on behalf of thousands of others across Canada. I think that the importance of improving those services can never be stressed enough to the minister, in order that the unemployed can receive their unemployment insurance benefits instead of having to turn to social welfar payments as it happened again a few months ago.

I think that the problem is very serious and that, being aware of the situation, the minister should do more so that the unemployed can receive their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I should not like to deprive the House of the opportunity to vote tonight, but since the unemployed are not happy with the present administration of the plan, it would be desirable for the government to provide explanations when the ceiling set is exceeded. That seems quite fair to me, because the ceiling set last year was substantially exceeded. However, I believe that logically we must keep a ceiling, not only to make the government aware that it is being supervised, but so that it may be forced to give the House its reasons for exceeding the ceiling. That is the only way for Parliament to obtain the required information.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close these remarks by inviting the minister to greater diligence in carrying out his task and asking the government to improve the services that the recipients are entitled to expect.

		Woolliams
		Yewchuk—98.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now proceed with the adjournment proceedings. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I think in view of the lateness of the hour there might be a disposition to forgo the pleasures of the "late show."

Mr. Speaker: Of course, we are in the hands of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville who has already been given the floor. I am not sure that hon. members would want to forgo the pleasure of hearing the hon. member.

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because of the tremendous excitement in the House may we forgo this question until Thursday night?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ANDRAS—COMMENTS BY MEMBER FOR LOTBINIÈRE

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from certain comments by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) last evening during the debate, as recorded in Hansard on page 1024 on yesterday's proceedings. I would have raised the matter last night except that I was not listening intently at the moment he made these comments and, in fact, was not then using the translation equipment available. When the words were brought to my attention later I chose to wait until I could confirm them by reading Hansard today.

I do protest, through you, Sir, the use of certain words found in the following passage:

> Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to pass this opportunity to say to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) that he is incompetent and irresponsible and that he is deliberately misleading the House.

I would disagree but would not argue in terms of parliamentary usage with the use of the words "incompetent and irresponsible" but I most certainly do protest the words "he is deliberately misleading the House", which I on no occasion have done or would consider doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has given notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege. The hon. minister and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and their colleagues know that some expressions are deemed out of order in parliament, particularly if they are offensive and likely to give rise to debates and discussions not in keeping with parliamentary tradition. Of course sometimes, during a debate, some hon. members are prone to using expressions which not only go beyond their thought but may seem offensive to those involved. That is the opinion of the hon. minister. I must, however, point out to him that an objection of one hon. member to terms used by another is rather a point of order than a point of privilege. Usage is quite clear in this respect. A member can rise on a point of order concerning offensive language. There is no doubt that the language the minister has mentioned is out of order. I refer hon. members to citations 155, 156 and the following of the fourth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. Citation 156 reads in part as follows:

> The proper time for interference is when the offensive expressions are uttered, and not afterwards; and it may take place, either on the Speaker's voluntary motion, or on the call to order of the member assailed, or of some other member, or the general call of the House.

In any event, I shall have to study the words in question, and have a look at Hansard, after which I shall decide whether or not I should intervene. However, knowing the hon. member for Lotbinière and his respect for the rules of this House, I am sure he is not of those who, normally, would use offensive language or words which could be considered as such by the hon. member to whom they are addressed.

I thank the minister for having brought this matter to my attention. I shall study it at the first opportunity.

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—AVAILABILITY OF DOCUMENTS OF RIDING REDISTRIBUTION COMMISSION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question of privilege concerning the revision of electoral boundaries which has followed the census of Quebec in 1971.

The federal electoral boundaries commission for Quebec has published a notice that public hearings would be held in various locations in the province to hear representations from those interested.

Mr. Speaker, I consider that an hon. member is certainly interested in stating before this commission his viewpoint and that of his constituents. To do this properly it would only be normal that he be acquainted with the records of the commission and briefs submitted during the previous revision which has ended in the establishment of the electoral map which has been in force since 1968.

In fact, although elected by the people, a member cannot have access to the documents of the commission, which in my view denies him his privileges. I feel that if we expect a member to keep the people informed he should be able to delve into the major reasons warranting changes made in 1968 so as to be able to appreciate adequately the changes proposed by the commission.

For that purpose, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

> Than an Order of the House be given to the federal electoral boundaries commission in Quebec to make available to the members of the House the documents of the said commission since 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bellechasse has also given notice that he wanted to raise a question of privilege at the beginning of this sitting. I very seriously considered the point at issue and unfortunately I had to conclude that it is not essentially a question of privilege. I must say that I had some doubts in this connection and that I have given this motion a more serious and thorough consideration than I usually do under other circumstances because I thought that perhaps it was a borderline case which was perhaps a real question of privilege.

But after examining the motion moved by the hon. member, I think it is a substantive motion. The hon. member suggests that certain documents should be made available to members but the Standing Orders prescribe a procedure to be followed in such circumstances. The hon. member wants to move a motion for production of documents, a motion which could be in order, debated and voted on. It could even be carried unanimously by the House if the hon. member could convince his colleagues that this is a matter of interest to all of them.

In that sense, may I be allowed to suggest to the hon. member that his motion is a substantive one and that it should be moved as a motion for production of documents under the Standing Orders of the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF RECOGNITION OF DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF VIET NAM

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has decided to recognize North Viet Nam, the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam. I am pleased to announce that last night the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sent messages expressing his satisfaction at the signing of the Paris agreements to the Prime Minister of the Republic of Viet Nam, which Canada already recognizes as the sole legal government of South Viet Nam, and to the Premier of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam. The message to the Premier of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam, Pham Van Dong, and my statement today constitute our act of recognition of his government.

The effect of this decision is that Canada now accords equal status to the government of the Republic of Viet Nam and the government of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam, which should facilitate the work of our delegation to the new International Commission for Control and Supervision. It is not our intention, at present, to establish diplomatic relations with either.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has seen fit not to inform us of his statement before 1.55, which obviously makes more difficult the reply of the official opposition. I hope that this does not reflect the consideration given to the question by the minister.

Mr. Speaker, the decision of which we have just been informed by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) represents for our party a step which should facilitate the Canadian participation in the control commission in Viet Nam and make it more consistent with its role.

I think it is just and reasonable that our country entertain balanced relationships on the matter of the cease fire between North and South Viet Nam.

[English]

It is also appropriate, particularly in view of the need that Canada must face in the area of reconstruction of both Viet Nams, that we maintain relations with Hanoi and Saigon. Our country has long established the practice of recognizing countries of differing political ideology and regime in order to foster a more productive international climate in terms of peace and co-operation. As has been the case with the recognition of other countries, this particular recognition must not be seen as an acceptance, either implicit or otherwise, of the political practices or philosophy of the country involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wagner: Now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has addressed himself to one of the outstanding matters concerning our continued role in Viet Nam, my colleagues await his decision to allow parliament to establish its views clearly and concisely by allowing the Viet Nam resolution to be brought back before the House for a clear and forthright vote by members of all parties. The country and those who are serving us overseas have the right to hear and see that vote.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would have liked to have a little notice so that I could have collected my thoughts on this subject in order to make the few brief remarks the rules permit me to make. However, I have no hesitation whatever in warmly welcoming the statement that has been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

There are probably very few in this House who are sympathetic toward the political system and the ideology of North Viet Nam. There are also probably very few of us who are not aware of the fact that the people of that country are energetic, efficient and, some people would say, a heroic people who have suffered much. In our view, it is of the utmost importance that, in the period of reconstruction, in the period of pacification, in what we hope is a new era of peace in southeast Asia, Canada should be represented. I say once again that we warmly welcome this announcement and we believe it will be welcomed by the people of Canada.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

OPERATIONS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that in all of the provinces participating in DREE programs the joint planning committees are standing in abeyance, reportedly not to be reconvened nor replaced, in view of the impending major policy announcement to the premiers of the Atlantic region, scheduled for February 26, and in view of the fact that some of the consultants retained by DREE for formulating policies may have no contracts nor clearance under the Official Secrets Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Standing Committee on Regional Development be immediately convened and the above matters investigated thoroughly.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's proposed motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

TRADE

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This motion arises out of the revelation yesterday that the Michelin Tire Corporation is going to receive $150 million in assistance to build two plants in the United States and the further revelation yesterday that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has not yet moved on behalf of the government of Canada to protest the levying of a special countervailing duty against tires exported from Canada by Michelin. I therefore ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instructs the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to protest as soon as possible to GATT the American decision imposing a 6.6 per cent countervailing duty on Michelin tires exported from Canada to the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

MANPOWER

DELAY IN APPROVING LOCAL INITIATIVE PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave to move a motion on a very urgent matter, namely unemployment in Quebec. In this respect I wish that the House would consider the reason for the undue delay in implementing the numerous local initiative projects that have been submitted by people who are expecting a favourable reply from the department concerned which would reduce this serious unemployment problem.

Consequently, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That a special debate be held in the near future following an agreement between the House leaders so that the House can consider the problems of delays in accepting local initiative projects and the implications of this program on the distressing state of unemployment in Quebec particularly.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Rimouski cannot be put without unanimous consent by this House.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, this is really a point of order. I had intended today to seek unanimous consent to move a motion that the basic rate of pensions be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I see that the minister has given notice of a motion to this effect. We would agree that this motion be put today rather than on Monday, with unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Meadow Lake.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT BY RAILWAYS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports from Saskatchewan that many grain elevators in the province are filled to capacity and that no trains have passed on certain railroad lines to collect the grain since November 29, which appears to represent an effective abandonment of service on certain railway lines, I ask the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That this House instruct the government to refer the matter of grain movement for immediate consideration by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and that the committee report to the House within one week.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

IMMIGRATION ACT

REMOVAL OF BAN ON ADMISSION OF PERSONS WITH HISTORY OF EPILEPSY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-139, to amend the Immigration Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in line with efforts on the part of many members for a number of years to secure the entry of certain people to this country as landed immigrants, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Immigration Act so as to remove the ban on persons with a history of epilepsy from being admitted as immigrants to Canada, thus complying with the desire of the former minister of manpower and immigration when he announced last autumn that this would be achieved during the present session.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Statistics shown in the following answers cover the period from March 30, 1971, the effective date of the extensive amendments to the Pension Act, to December 24, 1972, the cut off date for preparation of monthly pension statistical returns. 1. (a) On March 30, 1971 there were 2,497 applications for disability pension before the commission. This included approximately 900 Appeal Board applications which had been pending and which were held for consideration as first applications under the more liberal provisions of the revised Pension Act. Between March 30, 1971 and December 24, 1972 an additional 15,412 applications for disability pensions were received; (b) Between March 30, 1971 and December 24, 1972, the commission received 2,108 applications for appeal of decisions on applications for entitlement to disability pensions; (c) (i) Statements of case are required only in respect of applications for appeal to Entitlement Boards of the commission. 1,515 applications for disability pension which had been turned down in whole or in part have had Statements of Case prepared for consideration by Entitlement Boards; (ii) Between March 30, 1971 and December 24, 1972, 7,515 applications for disability pension were refused by the commission at the first level. Some applicants had claims in respect of more than one period of service. (d) Between March 30, 1971 and December 24, 1972, 576 applications for appeal of entitlement decisions were decided by Entitlement Boards of the commission. Of this number 244 were wholly or partially allowed and 332 were disallowed. In addition 257 appeals on quantum of awards were decided as a result of personal appearances before two Commissioners under section 67 of the Pension Act. Of these 111 were wholly or partially allowed and 146 were disallowed.

2. As of December 24, 1972 there were 9,591 applications for disability pension awaiting a decision of the Commission at the first level. In addition there were 1,532 appeals to Entitlement Boards of the commission not yet decided on. NATIONAL DEFENCE—MANPOWER STRENGTHS

Question No. 417—Mr. Cossitt:

What was the numerical strength of the Canadian Armed Forces at the end of (a) April, 1968 (b) October, 1972?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Paid strength as of April 30, 1968, 100,897; October 31, 1972, 82,849.

ESTABLISHMENT OF TELESCOPE ON MOUNT KOBAU, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 430—Mr. Whittaker:

1. Was there a decision by the government to establish a telescope on Mount Kobau in British Columbia and, if so, when was that decision taken?

2. Was a subsequent decision taken not to go forward with the telescope on Mount Kobau and, if so, on what date and for what reason?

3. Was a telescope constructed for installation on Mount Kobau and, if so (a) by whom (b) at what cost (c) where is the telescope at the present time?

4. Has any reconsideration been given to the installation of the telescope at Mount Kobau, or at any other site, since the decision was taken not to install it on Mount Kobau and, if so (a) what other sites are being considered (b) on what date will a decision be rendered?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In so far as the National Research Council of Canada is concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. A decision to establish a telescope on Mount Kobau was taken by the government in September, 1964.

2. The government decided to discontinue the project in August, 1968. Revised cost estimates were far higher than earlier estimates and many scientists felt that the use of the telescope would be severely restricted by unfavorable viewing conditions.

3. Construction of the telescope had not begun when the project was discontinued. Feasibility studies only had been completed and the primary mirror blank and necessary polishing machines purchased. The blank and large polishing machine were turned over to WESTAR, a consortium of Canadian universities, in 1970 by the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

4. No further consideration has been given by the government to the installation of the telescope on Mount Kobau. Scientific appraisal has led to the conclusion that no site in Canada, including Mount Kobau, is as suitable as other sites such as Chile and Hawaii. The government has under consideration a proposal from France to share equally in the construction and operation of a telescope in Hawaii. No date has been set for a decision.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—REGIMENTAL BADGES AND BERETS

Question No. 502—Mr. Schumacher:

2. With what are they intended to be replaced?

3. Has any survey been taken on the effect of such removal of insignia and uniform on the morale of the men involved?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. No. It is not the intention to do away with regimental badges. Armoured Corps units have the option of wearing either the black or green beret.

2. Not applicable.

3. Field unit and individual preferences were considered in the decision to retain regimental insignia and other items that distinguish an individual's occupation or group affiliation.

The Corporation recognizes the difficulties created for some viewers and is studying various alternatives for future use.

Question No. 619—Mr. McKenzie:

HER MAJESTY'S CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

Question No. 665—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

Did the initial three minutes, 30 seconds speech of the Her Majesty's Christmas message televised by CBC at 11.00 a.m. PST, Christmas Day, 1972, reach Victoria, British Columbia and other western provinces without sound and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: The broadcast in question originated in Toronto. It was fed to our delay centre in Calgary for broadcast to Western regions at 10 a.m. local time. While it was being received in Calgary for recording, a break occurred in the telephone lines between Regina and Calgary, cutting off the sound portion. Alternative facilities were provided by the network carrier, Trans-Canada Telephone System, after a break of nearly two minutes. The interim was filled with music. A repeat of Her Majesty's complete message was offered the same evening.

2. (a) Brigadier-General and above, 110; (b) Officers of lower rank, 15,186; (c) Non-commissioned officers, 52,961; (d) Privates, 14,791.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—PUBLIC RELATIONS EXPENDITURES

Question No. 70—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What were the amounts of money spent by the Department of Manpower and Immigration on publicity and/or information in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72?

2. What were the names and addresses of firms or individuals who received these contracts, what amounts of money were spent in each case and what was the purpose of each contract?

3. What contracts for publicity and/or information were awarded in the current fiscal year, what are the names and addresses of contractees, what are the amounts of money involved in each case and what is the purpose of each contract?

Return tabled.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have on the order paper questions Nos. 425, 426, 427 and 428. They have been there so long that the conference mentioned in 426, about which I inquired as to the date, is already over. I would ask leave to withdraw that question, but I wonder whether I could get an answer to the other questions next time?

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will look into it.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 85, 124 and 131 are acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the government. Notice of motion for the production of papers No. 27 is acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we should try to take this in order. My understanding is that the parliamentary secretary is suggesting that motion No. 27 be adopted. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions for Papers

TABLING OF REPORT ENTITLED "TASK FORCE ON MUNICIPAL SEWAGE DISPOSAL"

Motion No. 27—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for the tabling of the report entitled "Task Force on Municipal Sewage Disposal" prepared by George Seaden under the authority of the Minister of Urban Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the hon. parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that notices of motion Nos. 85, 124 and 131 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING THE PEACEKEEPING ROLE OF CANADA IN SOUTH VIET NAM

Motion No. 85—Mr. Broadbent:

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENT OF THIRD NATIONAL PARK IN NOVA SCOTIA

Motion No. 131—Mr. Forrestall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of any correspondence exchanged between the province of Nova Scotia and the government of Canada, or any authority acting on their behalf, since December 1, 1969, together with maps and any other documents including the Memorandum of Agreement, and the minutes of any meetings that have been held by the Joint Federal Provincial Advisory Committee, with respect to the establishment of a third national park in the province of Nova Scotia along the eastern shore of that province.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago I asked about notice of motion No. 34. May I ask the parliamentary secretary again when action will be forthcoming on this motion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 34 that has been approved for agreement of the House subject only to the consent of the government of British Columbia. If the House is agreeble perhaps the order could go subject to the approval of the government of British Columbia with regard to the tabling of these minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MINUTES OF THE BRITISH COLUMBIA-CANADA LIAISON COMMITTEE ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER

Motion No. 34—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the Minutes of the British Columbia—Canada Liaison Committee on the Columbia River from 1958 until the signing of the Treaty with the USA in January 1961.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, earlier this session I raised a point of order regarding five notices of motions for the production of papers, numbers 36 to 40 inclusive, which are of a vintage long in advance of the commencement of this session. I understood that the parliamentary secretary was going to inquire about these motions. Could he now advise when we might expect them to be dealt with?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would hope by next Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions. Is the hon. member for Yukon rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), I wonder whether the House would be disposed to give unanimous consent to refer the item listed under notices of government motions today, the report of the joint study group on basic rate of pensions, tabled on January 31, 1973, to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, consent being required to refer it immediately rather than waiting?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether that is a point of order. I think it would have to be charged to the hon. member as a question.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that we hold this over to decide whether it might be useful to have a debate on this motion for at least a day.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF POLICIES OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON JOB CREATION AND ECONOMIC GROWTH

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any explanation, be it fear of inflation or something else, why he has not adopted a more expansionary stance when it has become apparent that the target he set in his budget last May for job creation has not been met? I ask this question in view of the minister's statement at that time that—"the growth of jobs should be considerably larger than last year", whereas in fact figures issued by Statistics Canada indicate that the number of jobs created in 1971 was 334,000 as against 220,000 in 1972, about one-third short of the minister's target.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will not object to the minister replying to the hon. member's question, but it seems to me that a question of this kind, while being of interest to all members, is so wide in its nature that it invites a somewhat lengthy reply which normally should be made on motions. The Chair will recognize the minister for the purpose of replying as briefly as possible to the question posed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has really brought up a debating point which I will deal with on another occasion. Job creation in terms of jobs created has been very encouraging this year, only outdistanced still by a rapidly increasing labour force which we have to expect for the next two or three years.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have to ask the Minister of Finance whether he feels he has met his target when he is 114,000 jobs short of it. Does he also feel he has met his target when he predicted an increase in the rate of growth in 1972 of between 6 per cent and 6.5 per cent whereas indications now are that the real growth figure will be in the range of 5 per cent to 5.5 per cent?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman does not know at the moment, nor do I, until the fourth quarter figures are available. We will not know until we get the final figures on the national accounts which will be published three or four weeks from now, and even after that they are subject to revision. The hon. gentleman is no more sure of his figure of 5 per cent to 5.5 per cent than I am of 6 per cent to 6.5 per cent at the moment.

Mr. Hees: What about jobs, John?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is aware that ministers of finance who take this attitude toward jobs are also subject to revision?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley in a moment. I thought I should caution hon. members that we should attempt not to get involved in a general debate as we did yesterday.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest we should not and should attempt to give an opportunity to other members who are anxious to ask questions. From the point of view of the Chair, that is the only consideration I have in mind. A number of hon. members are anxious to ask questions. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Don Valley.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. Have he or officials of his department calculated what the unemployment rate would be had the provinces of Ontario and Quebec not been following such expansionary fiscal policies?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISCAL MEASURES TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT IN AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that employment in agriculture is down by some 20,000 people compared with January, 1972, will the minister indicate whether he is going to undertake any new fiscal measures to stimulate employment in the Canadian agricultural industry?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am in touch with the very progressive and ambitious Minister of Agriculture who makes that point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And very talkative, too.

An hon. Member: Aggressive and confused.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He makes that point in far more succinct terms than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether there will be any specific employment measures for the agricultural sector in the budget, and whether the government has reversed its policy with regard to reducing manpower in agriculture?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to accept the argument within the question, but I hope the hon. gentleman is here on the night of February 19.

Mr. Baldwin: We will be here for the vote anyway.

Mr. Sharp: He doesn't care about the budget, he just cares about the vote.

UNEMPLOYMENT LEVEL IN NEXT FEW MONTHS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the disclosure yesterday that one of the reasons the unemployment insurance fund went over the ceiling was the inability of the minister's department to forecast the unemployment level properly, can the minister indicate whether he has corrected that situation and is now in a position to indicate what the unemployment level will be in the next few months?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have never been in the business of forecasting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who is the next leader of the Liberal party?

Mr. Peters: This is going to be some budget.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the disastrous consequences of the minister's complacency, will he give some attention to forecasting?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED ALLOTMENT OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT IN QUEBEC

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance.

After the publication of the latest figures on unemployment which indicate that unemployment is more than 10 per cent in Quebec, could he tell the House whether he intends to earmark additional funds for the Local Initiatives Program in Quebec in order to contribute with the people to stop unemployment?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am still considering the representations made by the hon. member.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Does the hon. minister mean, as I did not understand his answer, that he is agreeable that an increase of at least $10 million be included in the budget of the Local Initiatives Program in Quebec?

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT TARGET

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Now that his government has established a new all-time record of having an average of 564,000 Canadians out of work for 12 straight months—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member knows that questions should not be prefaced in this way. Hon. members know they should ask questions and not make statements. I invite the hon. member to do this and ask his question now.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the House what his actual target is in respect of unemployment in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As low a rate as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASED DEPRECIATION ALLOWANCES FOR CORPORATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance seeking clarification of an answer he gave yesterday to the hon. member for York South. Is it his intention to propose further increases in depreciation allowances in the corporate sector beyond the first six months of the present year, in terms of future budgetary policies of the government?

An hon. Member: They are as worried about this as you are.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will just have to wait and see.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS ON WHICH UNEMPLOYMENT FORECAST IN MAY, 1972, BUDGET BASED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Will he give consideration to placing before the House the internal or working documents on which he based his forecast in respect of unemployment, particularly in the context of a budget that was dedicated to reducing unemployment significantly, before the new budget is presented on February 19 so we may have some idea of just what priority the government accords employment in the country?

Mr. Baldwin: Benson left some of his papers behind.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the problem here is, as I tried to explain to the House on another occasion—

Mr. Fairweather: We know all about the problem.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —that we cannot look at individual targets separately. Our goals of full employment, growth and price stability are interrelated and, as the Economic Council of Canada pointed out in its ninth annual review, for the purpose of forecasting targets there has been too much emphasis placed on too few indicators. I say again to the House that targets cannot be stated with mathematical exactitude. The Canadian economy particularly is a vulnerable one, subject to world movement of trade and prices.

An hon. Member: Tell us on the 19th.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am just suggesting—

An hon. Member: Bring back Benson.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition for a last supplementary question on this subject for the time being and then go to the next matter. If we have time we will return to this subject which is obviously of interest to hon. members.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer just given by the Minister of Finance suggesting that unemployment and inflation are not all-important as priorities—I say all-important as priorities—

Mr. Sharp: You said that.

Mr. Stanfield: —and that other indicators ought to be upgraded, I should like to ask whether this means the minister has abandoned the statement he has made frequently that the creation of employment and the reduction of unemployment is his first goal?

• (1440)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is again playing with words. Of course the provision of jobs is my number one priority and will remain so. But in terms of the setting of targets and looking at the statistical targets about which I was asked in the House, I accept the advice of the Economic Council of Canada that a number of interrelated targets, 14 or 15 in number, must be considered in order to get an over-all view of the economy. That does not mean in any way that I have abandoned the human priority I set, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

GRAIN

PROVISION BY RAILWAYS OF SUFFICIENT CARS FOR MOVEMENT—UPGRADING OF TRACKS NOT ABLE TO BEAR WEIGHT OF HOPPER CARS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact the government has purchased 2,000 grain hopper cars and put them at the disposal of the CPR and CNR and that in spite of this they are still not providing adequate service in some of the major shipping blocks and elevator and grain delivery points are congested, will the minister bring pressure to bear on the railroads to provide the adequate service we deserve?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in terms of grain arriving at destinations for export, Vancouver and Thunder Bay, it is evident that the railways are in fact putting into service the equipment required to move the grain. There are, of course, individual points in the prairie region at this time of the year that are congested as a result of the rather rapid increase in quotas prior to freeze-up which the Wheat Board put into effect in order to offer the farmers an opportunity to deliver before they were snowed in. This congestion will certainly be removed rapidly as the record flow of grain for export continues.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, it would need to be rapid. May I point out to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask a question as much as possible.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the statements made in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee that over half the trackage in western Canada is of such a standard it will not carry the grain hopper cars the Canadian people purchased and gave to the railroads, will the minister hold discussions with the two major railroads and take up with them the matter of improving the condition of the railway tracks in western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has already been discussed with the railways. Of course, the question of whether certain trackage could carry hopper cars was not very relevant until we began to acquire this kind of equipment. The tracks that can carry hopper cars are numerous enough to make full use of all cars acquired to date. The railways appreciate that as this equipment of the future is used more and more there are certain stretches of track that must be brought up to standard, and we are pressing them for action on that.

ANALYSIS BY WHEAT BOARD OF QUESTIONNAIRE ON HOLDINGS SENT TO PRODUCERS—SALES ACTIVITY

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether the Wheat Board has yet analysed the questionnaire sent to 170,000 farmers to find out whether the results indicate some disparity between the estimates made and the actual holdings of grain on farms?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The Wheat Board has been analysing the returns as they flow in. Something like half of the returns had been received as long ago as two weeks. The Wheat Board does intend to retain as confidential the information in these returns. A number of farmers made this very express condition in respect of supplying information. Therefore the board does not intend to reveal the facts which are compiling but they will certainly make use of them for their own marketing guidance.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister whether as a result of the information received so far the Wheat Board is actively bidding on weekly tenders or whether, in view of the fact Commissioner Gibbings stated to the Palliser wheat growers that wheat stocks will be depleted by October, depending on deliveries by the farmers, the Wheat Board rather than seeking markets is twiddling its thumbs until October?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether a question asked in those terms is in order.

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister might be permitted to reply to my serious question concerning whether the Wheat Board is actually seeking new markets or is just biding its time.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell the hon. member that the Wheat Board is continuing very actively in the selling business on world markets, and that we do have adequate supplies to achieve a record for the movement of grain into export this year and to start next year with record volumes again.

PROVISION OF RAILWAY CARS TO POINTS WITH LARGE SUPPLIES OF NON-BOARD GRAINS

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Since the congestion at a number of points is due to very large supplies of non-board grains such as rye, flax and rapeseed which have accumulated because of the administration of the quotas by the Canadian Wheat Board, will the minister take such action as is necessary to provide additional railway cars to those points?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board through the block shipping system is placing the cars where the required grain can be obtained, with special attention to those areas where there is congestion. I drew this matter specifically to their attention. They agreed they would do everything possible within the block system to put the cars where they are needed. I do not agree with the hon. member's premise that it is non-board grains rather than board grains which are involved at this time.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell the House whether he is aware of the fact that, prior to the approval of a local initiatives project in Shefford, the municipal council or the individuals who are making an application must first obtain the blessings of the Liberal organization of the town or municipality?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that information. If the hon. member will give me the details I will look into it forthwith.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister and I thank him for his good intentions.

Is the minister ready to intervene with the municipal authorities involved to ensure that these problems will not be repeated and important projects will not be blocked because of local political manoeuvring?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These are representations. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre has a supplementary question.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in charge of the local initiatives program. In view of the minister's direct contribution toward a research program to establish the rate of incidence of child battery in Canada and in view of the fact that the program will investigate the socio-economic situation of the families in which child beating occurs, may I congratulate the minister on awarding a LIP grant to a very fine woman—

• (1450)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot congratulate the minister. He can ask him a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Paproski: I withdraw the congratulations. But may I say that the minister awarded this grant to a very fine woman who was shafted out of the Liberal nomination in Edmonton Centre in the last federal election.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: My question, Sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I still think you're a great guy!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should think that if the hon. member is not permitted to congratulate me he should not be permitted to congratulate anybody else in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED STATEMENTS BY MINISTER ON FOOD PRICES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Would the right hon. gentleman inform the Houses whether his Minister of Agriculture was expressing the policy and views of the government when he stated on February 3 in London, Ontario, that "I am pleased that food prices have finally started to turn the corner and are rising", and again in Ottawa yesterday, I believe, when he used words to the effect that he welcomes a rise in food prices because this will mean a rise in farm incomes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously not a matter of policy. The minister was expressing pleasure, and I think it is normal for a Minister of Agriculture to tell farmers that he is happy they are getting more revenue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, in view of the endorsation of those words by the Prime Minister, may I then ask him whether it is now the policy of the government to leave the impression that the blame for high food prices should be laid at the door of the farmers?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at no time did I say that the farmers were causing the high increase in the cost of food to consumers. I said that the farmers were now getting a fair return for the input for which they are responsible, and anybody who says differently is not stating the facts as I stated them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: You can suck and whistle at the same time.

INCOME TAX

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN EXPLAINING FORM FOR 1972—SUGGESTED EXTENSION TO WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of National Revenue advise the House why it was, in the current campaign on the part of his department to explain the unexplainable, that is, the difficulties in the income tax form, that while various media were chosen the weekly newspapers were not, a group that make a tremendous contribution not only to their localities but to Canada as a whole?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the same lack myself, and I have asked my officials to see whether it might be possible to find the money to extend this excellent campaign as the right hon. member suggests. As one who comes from an area where people rely very much on weekly newspapers for their information, I welcome his support of my efforts to extend this campaign into the weekly newspapers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that we have received convincing evidence that the government is starting to think about the subject, will the minister press forward to assure that many thousands of Canadians, who otherwise will not be acquainted with the intricacies of the explanations, will have them available to them?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes. As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to press for an extension of this highly informational campaign into those additional media.

TAXATION OF DIVIDENDS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it the intention of his department to use the Fred Davis close-up advertisements to explain to the Canadian people the facts about the income tax on dividends and why Canadians are being asked to pay tax on money they never received?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is one who took an active part in the debate on tax reform and he will know that the Department of National Revenue is administering and applying the law as he and other Members of Parliament passed it.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Wellington for a last supplementary on this subject and then recognize the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Hales: My supplementary will be brief. Does the minister propose to explain to the Canadian people how this comes about?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes. There have been some very excellent columns in some of the daily and weekly newspapers, contributed by chartered accountants and other professionals, on this subject, and I will send the hon. member copies of them.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF ABITIBI MILL IN SAULT STE. MARIE—USE MADE OF DEVELOPMENT GRANTS BY COMPANY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that officials of the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company in Sault Ste. Marie have openly threatened to close the mill unless the employees agree to certain conditions, would the minister inform the House what measures, if any, he contemplates taking to prevent such overt intimidation and what contingency plans he has for the 500 unemployed workers should the company close the mill?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this matter has just been brought to my attention by my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I will be looking into it from the point of view of the Department of Manpower and I think the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce may have additional information now or later.

[Later:]

Mr. Symes: May I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since Abitibi Pulp and Paper has received regional development grants in excess of $300,000, does the minister intend to investigate this urgent matter and tell the House whether or not Abitibi funnelled DREE grants into its other operations, concurrently allowing the Sault Ste. Marie operation to become inefficient and outdated?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to look into the question the hon. member has raised. I would doubt very much whether the last part of his question is correct, but I will refrain from being dogmatic about it until I have looked into it.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF CASINOS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General.

Following the efforts made by Quebec, does the minister intend to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code in order to allow the establishment of casinos?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think I would like to see the actual statement, if the hon. member would bring it to my attention. There has been an exchange in the House over the past months about the extent to which the law now allows for such things, and it may well be that it is provided for already.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PLANS TO ASSIST CANADIAN INDUSTRIES RECEIVING GRANTS IF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES WIDELY APPLIED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question either to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or to the Prime Minister. Could either of these two gentlemen advise the House whether the government has any contingency plans to assist Canadian industries if the imposition of countervailing duties is widely applied against products manufactured by Canadian firms which receive DREE grants or other aid, or will we be reacting instead of acting?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I heard this question but I thought it was directed to another minister. In reply and without being evasive, I think it is hypothetical at the moment. There is no evidence of any further application of countervailing duties, but we are watching the situation very closely and examining the incentives program with a view to achieving something along the line the hon. member has suggested.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ACTION TO ENSURE ADJUSTMENT BY NEGOTIATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware of indications in the United States that the U.S. government may resort to unilateral action to improve its trade position? If so, can the minister tell the House whether the government has taken any direct action to ensure that Canada-U.S. trade relations will be adjusted by negotiation, so that the Michelin case will not be a preview of things to come?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there will always be news reports speculating on what the United States may do or may not do. I consider that a hypothetical kind of question. The fact of the matter is that our two nations are enjoying trade of the order of about $23 billion. There will be irritants from time to time, but that is in the nature of things. In the meantime, we have made strong representations with respect to the Michelin case and we are awaiting the reply of the United States on that matter.

ENERGY

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC POWER PROJECT—QUEBEC INTENTION RESPECTING SALE OF POWER TO UNITED STATES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the Quebec National Assembly's Bill 82 of 1972 respecting Hydro-Quebec calls for exportation of power to Consolidated Edison or the New York State Power Authority beginning in June, 1977, for a period of 20 years, would the minister reconsider his answer to my question last Monday, namely, that Quebec does not intend to sell any power from the James Bay power project to the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to repeat the statement I made, which was that we have received no notification from Quebec that they have any intention to sell James Bay power in the United States.

Mr. Hamilton: I have asked the minister this but I will repeat it. Is it a fact that the minister has no knowledge and no information that the Quebec government has changed its position?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the information that we have from the Quebec authorities is that they intend to use the James Bay supply for the purpose of meeting the domestic load.

REQUEST FOR STUDY TO ASSESS RESOURCES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that there is considerable propaganda at this time to the effect that there seems to be a shortage of energy not only on the North American continent but throughout the world, will the government take the lead, separate from the National Energy Board which does not have the facilities, to study and reassess energy supplies, particularly natural gas, crude petroleum and electrical energy, so that we may know just what supplies are on hand?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, studies such as this have been under way for some time now and I expect to be laying them before the House in several months time.

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF FOREIGN STUDENTS—NECESSITY TO SEEK WORK PERMITS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration of which I have given him notice. What are the government's plans to alleviate the hardships that are being worked on a significant number of students from overseas who are in various stages of their university careers and are caught by the new regulations regarding applications for landed immigrant status and employment?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, foreign students who have come to Canada came on the basis and understanding that they were, unless otherwise declared specially exempted, capable of supporting themselves. Generally speaking, most of them will be required to seek employment visas. However, that is not to say that they will be unable to get employment visas, provided that the jobs they are seeking cannot be filled by Canadians. As I say, there are some exceptions to this. I cannot give them from memory, but special exceptions are made in cases where people were brought over under special international arrangements. Nevertheless, generally speaking we do require these non-immigrants to seek employment visas and I hope they are able to find work, provided Canadians are not displaced.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—ROLE OF CANADIAN RED CROSS IN RELEASE OF PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the House whether the Canadian Red Cross has undertaken a role in connection with the release of captured military and foreign civilian personnel in Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm the reports that have been made. At the request of the Canadian government the Canadian Red Cross is sending a team of ten members, led by the national commissioner, General Wrinch, which left for Viet Nam this morning. This comes about as a result of the wish of the parties to the Viet Nam agreement that the Canadian Red Cross should play such a role, which I am sure will be welcomed by everyone in the House.

NORTH VIET NAM—CONSIDERATIONS IN CONNECTION WITH DECISION ON RECOGNITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing the back row again. My question is also addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and arises out of his statement on motions relating to the recognition by Canada of the Democratic Republic of North Viet Nam. Can the minister assure the House that in reaching its decision the government took fully into account the many obstacles placed in the way of the activities of the International Control Commission in Viet Nam, and specifically the Canadian delegation on that and other commissions, in their search for missing Canadian civilians during the past 19 years, and particularly during the past ten years?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and as a result of our recognition we hope to do better.

CANADA LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

REQUEST THAT WESTERN MEMBER BE APPOINTED

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour and is one that I asked him a few weeks ago about the Canada Labour Relations Board. Has the government appointed a western Canadian member to the board and, if not, when does the minister expect to appoint one?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that there is latitude for further appointments at a later time. We did endeavour to seek out an appointee from western Canada for the position, but unfortunately at that particular time he could not accept. Of the members of the board, one was born in Manitoba, another was educated in that province, and another spent considerable time in British Columbia and was educated at the University of British Columbia.

Mr. Reynolds: Was there only one person in western Canada to whom the government felt it could offer the job?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ESKASONI RESERVE—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN CONNECTION WITH FLOOD DAMAGE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Indian Affairs. Is the minister aware of the flooding that took place over the weekend at the Eskasoni Indian reserve, resulting in the evacuation of ten families from their homes plus serious damage and loss of personal belongings? Would the minister investigate and ascertain what assistance, financial or otherwise, can be provided to assist these families?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware, and I do not think the minister is aware, of this regrettable situation but I will get the facts and will be happy to report to the hon. member as soon as I can.

ESKASONI RESERVE—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the right hon. member for Mount Royal went around this country tippy-toeing and pontificating about everyone never having it so good—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask his supplementary.

Mr. Muir: In view of the fact that there continues to be a rate of 80 per cent unemployment on this particular reserve, can we not get something better and have some action taken, instead of being told that notice will be taken of these serious problems?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the government has taken several measures as the hon. member would see if he would read the annual reports of the department. Although unemployment continues to be a very serious problem on a number of reservations across the country, I assure the House that some very substantive improvements have been made, particularly in the past four years.

Mr. Muir: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys on a point of order.

Mr. Muir: I do not know what the parliamentary secretary is talking about, but surely we do not have to listen to this drivel. That is not an answer to my question. The hon. member has not understood the question. He is pontificating in the same way as the right hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mr. Nielsen: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon rises on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I raised this point of order previously, namely, that there is no acting minister who is responsible for answering our questions. The Prime Minister told us the other day that the Minister of the Environment is the first acting minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is the second acting minister. Surely, there is some minister who is accountable to parliament and responsible for answering questions of this kind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena on a supplementary, and I think the House owes it to the hon. member for Bellechasse to give him the chance to ask his question.

INQUIRY RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF ICEBREAKERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

In an answer which appears at page 941 of Hansard of February 5, 1973, the minister states that the government intends to increase coastal protection by building new icebreakers.

Can the minister tell the House if the order for the first icebreaker has been given? If so, which company or which shipyard received this order?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, no order has been given and the transaction has not yet been approved by Treasury Board.

[Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo).]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1972-73

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the order of business that has just been called, namely, consideration of the business of supply. My point of order relates to the nine notices of opposition which are on today's order paper and which presumably would be called, if they are in order, at this time; of course, they would be called only in order that there can be votes on the motions to approve the particular items which are on the order paper in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). It is my contention, Sir, that there is no provision for such notices of opposition to be entertained in the rules under which we are operating today.

Perhaps before I develop that point, which I think is an important one, I might say that even if there were provision for such notices of opposition in the rules that govern us today, it seems to me that the nine notices of opposition are poorly, if not incorrectly, drawn.

As I understand the rules, it is only open to a member putting down a notice of opposition to indicate that he is opposed to an item in its entirety. In the case of each of these nine notices of opposition there is not any notice of opposition in entirety, but only notice of opposition to a portion of the estimate. I do not allege that that is an extremely important point of order, because what is voted on under the provision in our rules is not the notice of opposition but the motion put down by the President of the Treasury Board, which of course presents the House with the choice of voting either for or against the entire item. In any case, that is not the question I am concerned about. Rather it is my point that there is no provision at this stage for notices of this kind.

I remind Your Honour and the House that we are operating under a rule, namely 58, which came into effect only in 1969, so that there is not a great deal of jurisprudence on it. However, I think the wording of the rule and our practice with respect to it are clear.

In December, 1968, when we passed the new rules that came into effect in 1969, we provided for the first time for an arrangement under which it was possible for main estimates, supplementary estimates, interim estimates, or what have you, to be brought before the House under conditions that would provide for no debate at all on them. We have been through this a good many times, both on main estimates as well as on supplementary estimates and interim supply. The theory behind that was that we would have the opportunity on opposition days to discuss any matters we wished, but if we used our opposition days on other matters, we then would be obliged to deal with the estimates without entering into any kind of debate.

However, when we drew the rule that way we made the special provision that, although estimates could be dealt with in the House without any debate, nevertheless there had to be provision for voting, if hon. members so wished.

We also felt that it would be ridiculous to call every item in the estimates and spend all night voting, and we felt that members should be given the right, by putting down notices of opposition, to call for a vote on any particular items in the estimates, main, supplementary or interim. That was the entire purpose of the provision for notices of opposition, so that when Mr. Speaker cuts off debate and calls for the vote, the House can vote on the individual items to which hon. members have indicated their opposition. This is spelled out in Standing Order 58(10) which reads as follows:

On the last allotted day in each period, but, in any case, not later than the last sitting day in each period, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of daily adjournment, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and, if those proceedings are not in relation to a no-confidence motion, he shall put forthwith successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, main estimates, and supplementary or final estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the estimates—

And now come the words that are significant today:

—or any opposed item in the estimates,—

The Standing Order goes on to say:

—and for the passage of all stages of any bill or bills based thereon. If the motion under consideration at the hour of interruption is a no-confidence motion, the Speaker first shall put forthwith, without further debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of that proceeding, and forthwith thereafter put successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, main estimates, and supplementary or final estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the estimates,—

And again we come to the phrase that is significant today:

—or any opposed item in the estimates,—

I continue with the quotation:

—and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 72, for the passage at all stages of any bill or bills based thereon. The standing order relating to the ordinary time of daily adjournment shall remain suspended until all such questions have been decided.

I point out, Sir, that except for a reference in Standing Order 58(4) to the filing of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates, that is the only place in our rules where there is a reference to notices of opposition.

I point out, Sir, that certain conditions must obviously be met if opposed items are to be considered. In the first place, such opposed items can be considered either on the last allotted day in a period or semester, or on the last sitting day in such period or semester. This day is neither of those. This day is neither the last allotted day in a period or semester nor the last sitting day of the semester. We are not now operating under that rule at all.

• (1520)

The other thing I would point out is that the operation of the rules with respect to notices of opposition to items in the main estimates applies only when the Speaker is required to put questions without any opportunity for debate. I think we were wise in putting that device into the rules. It is very specific. It is only when those two conditions are met; (a) that it is the last day of the period or the last allotted day and (b) that we are operating under a system by which the Speaker puts the question without any opportunity for debate. It is only under those circumstances that there is any provision in the rules for using the device of putting down notices of opposition to items in the estimates.

Because those conditions are not met, because we are operating under Standing Order 58(18), these notices of opposition which are inscribed on the notice paper should not be considered at this time. We are operating under Standing Order 58(18). That has not been said as yet, but it is obvious to everyone.

Standing Order 58(18) provides that when there is an urgent necessity to deal with estimates, the government does not have to wait until we have had all of the allotted days in a period and do it in that normal way without debate, but it can at any time bring in a supply bill. However, if it does so, it must be treated as a government order and given all the treatment that goes with a government order. Perhaps I should put Standing Order 58(18) on the record. It reads as follows:

In the event of urgency in relation to any estimate or estimates, the proceedings of the House on a motion to concur therein and on the subsequent bill are to be taken under Government Orders and not on days allotted in this order.

When something is done under Standing Order 58(18) and a supply bill becomes a government order, there is no such thing as Mr. Speaker saying there is no debate. There is no time limit. The bill is treated as a normal government bill. Once it is introduced, it will have second reading which is debatable, followed by a reference to Committee of the Whole House where it is debatable both with respect to its various clauses and the schedule or schedules attached thereto and, finally, on third reading. There is no limitation in the rules. There is no provision to deny or cut off debate. If I may resort to simple logic, it would be ridiculous to import into a setup where we have debate a rule that is applied only when there is no debate.

For these reasons and one or two other comments I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, I suggest we should not proceed today by dealing with these nine notices of opposition. Rather, we should operate under the rule that says a report from a Standing Committee on Estimates shall be dealt with without debate and then, when the bill is brought in, we should proceed in the normal way which, as I say, includes freedom of debate and no time limit in order to deal with it.

I go a step further and suggest that if this practice, which as I say is not provided for at all, were followed, certain points of confusion would arise. For example, would these notices of opposition be debatable as is implied because we are under Standing Order 58(18) where there is no prohibition against debate or would it be required that they be voted on without debate as is set out in the only section of the rules that deals with notices of opposition, namely Standing Order 58(10)? What are we under, 58(18) or 58(10)? Are we under Standing Order 58(18) where there is debate or 58(10) where there is no debate?

Another point of confusion is, if we take these votes on notices of opposition that Procedure will not be quite correct because we do not vote on notices of opposition. We vote instead on the positive motions put down by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). If we do have these votes, with or without debate, then the House, not the committee, will have made a decision. If the vote is negatived, that is the end of the estimate. However, if the vote is in the affirmative, the House will have taken a decision and we will likely have trouble later on if members at second reading or in committee of the whole try to debate the various estimates.

These confusions, in my view, support the proposition that the whole provision for notices of opposition was designed to fit into one situation only, namely that occasion where, on the last allotted day in a period or on the last sitting day of the period, we are faced with the necessity of dealing with the estimates without debate. In that situation, we have the right to put down these notices of opposition and get recorded votes on any estimates about which members are concerned.

May I emphasize that in taking this stand, and I am sure my hon. friends in the Progressive Conservative party who put down these notices of opposition will realize how true this is, I am not interfering in any way with their right to have votes on the nine items to which they seem to be opposed, either in whole or in part. If these motions are not voted on, but instead we proceed in the normal way and have the second reading debate followed by committee of the whole, which would include a consideration of the schedule attached to the bill, they would be able, once that schedule is called, to single out every one of these nine items and any other items, move amendments that they be reduced to $1, move amendments that they be deleted or force votes on them. In fact, they would have much greater freedom in committee of the whole with respect to these items than they would have by taking votes now. If votes are called now, they cannot say a word, at least if we are under Standing Order 58(10). If the votes are taken now, Your Honour will have to rule that they be taken right away without debate. However, if we do it in committee of the whole, they can expand their reasons. They can get around the problem that is created by the faulty wording of the motion that it be reduced to a certain amount and so on.

At third reading, if they are not satisfied with what happened in committee of the whole, they can move a motion to have the bill referred back to committee of the whole to delete any of the items to which they may be opposed. I hope hon. members will believe me when I say that the purpose of this intervention is not to deny to my friends to the right their desire to debate these estimates or vote on them, but rather it is out of a desire that our procedures not become mixed up and confused.

As Your Honour and hon. members who have been around for awhile will recall, this is all new. This procedure was adopted in December, 1968, and came into effect in 1969. This is the first time this particular kind of situation has arisen. In almost all cases since the beginning of 1969, we have dealt with the estimates under what is sometimes called the guillotine of the last day. It was under that last day guillotine that we exercised the right to put down these notices of opposition. We have done it ourselves. Every time the estimate for the Senate was there, I put down an opposition motion and we got a vote on it. It is too bad there is not a Senate item amongst these votes. I could make a little speech on it.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The point is that today we are not operating under Standing Order 58(10). We are operating under Standing Order 58(18) which puts this supply bill in the category of being a normal government bill to be dealt with in government time with no time limit and no restrictions on debate. Therefore, I think the matter should be resolved in that way. Instead of dealing with these notices of opposition or the motions of the President of the Treasury Board, we should simply follow the provisions of Standing Order 58(16), have a motion to concur in the committee report, then bring in the bill and proceed with the bill as an ordinary bill on second reading, through Committee of the Whole and, finally, to third reading.

• (1530)

Mr. Nielsen: I do not see the same confusion as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre apparently sees in these notices. He suggests to Your Honour that the notices have been poorly drawn. I took the trouble to do some research on the procedure which has been followed since the introduction of these new rules. I followed precedents set by members of the hon. member's own party in the preparation of these notices. I shall be referring later in detail to a point of order which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised in this House on June 22, 1972. This is to be found at page 3415 of Hansard of that date.

Ordinarily, in my submission, the House would be proceeding under Standing Order 58(16) if we were to follow the full intent of the committee on procedure which brought forth the rules which were finally adopted by the House. We would be proceeding in that way because there would have been an established pattern which was spoken of in the Special Committee on Procedure which originally recommended the changes we finally adopted. I want to refer Your Honour to the proceedings of that Special Committee because I think it is necessary to go back that far. No doubt Your Honour has already dug them up. They are to be found in the Journals of December 6, 1968, at pages 429-464. These explanations for the rule changes appear at pages 430 and 434. I wish to review, just for a few moments, the proceedings referred to in the short report of the committee.

> The reforms related to supply procedure which are embodied in the recommendations contained in the fourth report of your Committee are based upon a number of crucial principles and assumptions which it would be convenient to list.

Your Honour will note the word "crucial" in that context.

> (a) A pattern of regular parliamentary sessions is assumed whereby a session would normally commence in September or October and the House would rise for the summer recess on or about July 1.

We are not in that situation today. The Special Committee on Procedure made that assumption, and on the basis of that assumption came to what it called a value judgment founded on a number of crucial principles. These crucial principles, in my submission, relate directly to the pattern the Committee tried to block out for the handling of parliamentary business. We are not in that situation today, by virtue of the fact that an election was called on October 30 and we did not find ourselves back here until January 4. In the meantime, one of the periods which the Committee had in mind had gone by.

(b) For the purposes of supply, the parliamentary session would be divided into three periods ending on December 10, March 26 and June 30, respectively.

Hon. members will see that the period ended December 10, which would normally have been the period in which we were considering these matters, had more than half gone by.

(c) The main estimates to be presented to the House as early as possible in February and certainly before March 1.

(d) The Committee of Supply will be abolished.

(e) All estimates would be referred to standing committees for detailed scrutiny before March 1.

(f) The Standing Order would provide that the supply resolutions and the bills based thereon would be disposed of by the House by the dates specified above. Interim supply to cover the months of April, May and June would be disposed of by March 26; the main estimates would be disposed of by June 30, the standing committees having reported by May 31 . . .

I shall be giving some citations from May in support of my submission to Your Honour, but at this point I should like to suggest that the design of these new rules was based liberally on the procedure which is followed in Westminster when fiscal matters are dealt with. But paragraph (f) goes on to say:

—and the supplementary and additional estimates would be disposed of by December 10, March 26 or June 30, depending on the periods in which they are presented.

We find these estimates, supplementary estimates (A) for 1972-73, presented to us in the period which would normally end on March 26. So, we come face to face with Standing Order 58(16) which contemplated precisely this procedure. But when referring to Standing Order 58(16) we find that the government faces problems, because that Standing Order stipulates there shall be no debate on any motion to concur in the report of any standing committee on estimates except on an allotted day. All right. The government does not want to wait for the stipulated number of allotted days to go by, because, in their view, that would take up too much time. So they look around to find some other order under which they can bring the report of the committee into the House to deal with the appropriation bill. Unfortunately, the only other order available to them is 58(18) and, for the reasons I intend to advance in a few moments, reasons which will be in opposition to those advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I submit that 58(18) does not apply.

We do not intend, however, to take the position that we should prevent the government from proceeding under 58(18) if that is what they desire. But in extending this co-operation to the government we must insist upon the right to a free and full debate of the notices which have been filed. As I say, we believe that 58(18) places no restriction whatsoever upon the debate of notices; it would be different if 58(16) were applied. I am reinforced in this belief. I would commend the reading of paragraph 19 of the Report of the Special Committee on Procedure from which I have already quoted. At page 435 of the report appears the following:

There are occasions when it is in the national interest that parliament should consider or expedite an item of business with the minimum of delay, and Your Committee believes that the standing orders should make provision for such situations. Two kinds of eventuality are envisaged. In the first place the House should be free to deal without delay with any item of government business calling for immediate consideration on the first day of a session or the resumption of a session following an adjournment.

Here we are getting at the historical roots of the reason for the existence of 58(18).

Secondly, it seems reasonable to expect that the normal requirement of a notice of motion in relation to the introduction of business or the hours and days of sitting might be dispensed with for the purpose of dealing with matters of urgency when the overwhelming majority of the House recognizes that it would be desirable to do so. It seems intolerable to your committee that a single dissenting voice should be permitted to frustrate the otherwise unanimous will of the House, although we recognize that an objection registered by ten or more members should carry some weight. Accordingly your committee has included in its recommendations a revised Standing Order 41 and a new Standing Order 42-A which are designed to achieve the desired purposes, and which are set out in the committee's fifth report.

Mr. Speaker, in the latest revision of the little green book, Standing Order 42 has become Standing Order 44. In referring to Standing Order 44 I am getting into the argument with respect to the use of the term "urgency" in 58(18). My friend from Winnipeg North Centre has urged upon Your Honour that because the government has decided that the report of the committee on Supplementary Estimates and the appropriation bill has some urgency to it, we can proceed on this option. I most strongly submit to you, Sir, that there is no way this decision can be made by the government. The Special Committee on Procedures made that quite clear in the report from which I just quoted when they used the words:

. . . it seems reasonable to expect that the normal requirement of a notice of motion in relation to the introduction of business or the hours and days of sitting might be dispensed with for the purpose of dealing with matters of urgency when the overwhelming majority of the House recognizes that it would be desirable to do so.

I submit that if the government does place us in the position of restricting debate on these nine notices, then we will have to pursue, with vigour, our point that Standing Order 44 should have been invoked, which would give rise to the whole question of not only the urgency of the matter but the validity of proceeding under Standing Order 58(18). For the benefit of members who do not have their little green book with them, Standing Order 44 reads:

(1) In relation to any matter that the government considers to be of an urgent nature, a minister of the Crown may, at any time when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, propose a motion to suspend any Standing or other order of this House relating to the need for notice and to the hours and days of sitting.

(2) After the minister has stated reasons for the urgency of such a motion, Mr. Speaker shall propose the question to the House.

(3) Proceedings on any such motion shall be subject to the following conditions:

(a) Mr. Speaker may permit debate thereon for a period not exceeding one hour;

(b) the motion shall not be subject to amendment except by a minister of the Crown;

(c) no member may speak more than once nor longer than ten minutes;

(d) proceedings on any such motion shall not be interrupted or adjourned by any other proceeding or by the operation of any other order of this House;

The other two subsections are irrelevant to the argument I intend to urge upon Your Honour.

In order to proceed under Standing Order 58(18), I submit that the government must establish a prima facie case of urgency. The order clearly, specifically and cleanly uses the words:

In the event of urgency in relation to any estimate or estimates, the proceedings of the House on a motion to concur therein—

This is where we are now, Mr. Speaker.

—and on the subsequent bill—

Which will be coming before us.

—are to be taken under government orders and not on days allotted in this order.

This is what is being done, so that the government must show some urgency. The very fact that they have not chosen to proceed under Standing Order 44 is strong indication to me that they do not consider the matter so urgent as to invoke this rule. The real reason they are proceeding under Standing Order 58(18) is the fact that they are caught outside the pattern set by the Special Committee on Procedures and so have fallen into Standing Order 58(18).

To deal with Standing Order 44, and I suggest to you, Sir, that if the government insists on proceeding under Standing Order 58(18) and restricting the debate as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests to Your Honour, at this stage, then they must go by Standing Order 44. This gives rise to Your Honour being required to permit debate for a period not exceeding one hour and the motion not being subject to amendment except by a minister of the Crown and the other concommitants which are set forth in that Standing Order, but certainly it is a condition precedent in my submission to the government proceeding under Standing Order 58(18) because that urgency must be established.

I was a little surprised when dealing with that point, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre say that what we should be doing by these notices, when he criticizes their form, is to eliminate the item entirely. I think I am paraphrasing him correctly when, making his point about the notice being properly drawn, he said that "notices such as these must oppose the items in their entirety". According to Hansard of June 22, 1972, this very question arose. At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was dealing with a situation when there had been an allotted day set aside for discussion under Standing Order 58(16), so there may be a distinction to be drawn. I submit not—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was 58(10).

Mr. Nielsen: There may be a distinction to be drawn, and maybe he is basing his argument upon such distinction, but my submission is that with respect to these notices and their treatment there can be no distinction save that in Standing Order 58(18) against any full debate on notices that have been filed.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Urging his argument upon Your Honour at that time, the hon. member said, as recorded at page 3415 of Hansard in the right hand column

What my hon. friend wanted this House to do—

And he is speaking of notices that had been filed here.

—was vote on the reduction of that $244,000 for the information branch in this particular department to $61,000.

Now, that was not a notice to oppose the item in its entirety. He quite correctly said on that occasion, and I submit his argument is still valid, that the notice means a notice to oppose the approval of the estimate and, in effect, reduce it. That is precisely what we are purporting to do in the notice I have filed. I draw particular attention to the notice dealing with the Department of Finance and the capital works project where we want to reduce the $350 million in the estimates to the $75 million which has been estimated by the minister to be this winter's requirement. He went on to say, when being critical of the strictures being imposed to prevent them from moving a reduction:

I suggest this is making a mockery of such rights as remain to us for the voting of supply as set out in Standing Order 58.

I submit to you, Sir, that it would indeed be making a mockery of such rights as remain to members in this House to control supply if we were denied the right to debate this notice in the clear absence of any prohibition to do so in 58(18). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went on to state:

• (1550)

But tonight, for the first time since this procedure came into effect, we are faced with a different situation because what we are asking for now is not the right to vote against an entire item . . . but for the right to vote for or against the reduction in the amount of an item.

I think that effectively disposes of the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre unless, of course, he has completely changed his mind between last June and today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question at the risk of leading with my chin? What was the ruling on that?

Mr. Nielsen: The ruling was unimportant because the point the hon. member on that occasion was making—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members laugh, yet if they listened for a moment they would get the explanation. If they went back and read these debates they would realize it does not matter, and I will explain why. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will remember that he insisted the notices filed on that occasion should have taken precedence over the motion by the President of the Treasury Board in presenting an estimate, and thus give rise to a debate. That was the point which was established. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in arguing that point made these other comments.

The ruling was that the motion of the President of the Treasury Board did take precedence, and the notice had to be voted on without debate under Standing Order 58(10), where a prohibition against debate is clearly laid out on an allotted day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Was it the notice for a reduction in the item that was voted on or the full item as proposed by the President of the Treasury Board? In other words, what did the Chair rule?

Mr. Nielsen: The Chair ruled that the item of the estimates must be called by the President of the Treasury Board first, and then when the notices affecting the items which were called eventually came up in the ordinary course, the motion was voted on which disposed of the notice. From reading these debates that is what I got from the Speaker's ruling.

There were three exceptions to that because, as the hon. member pointed out, in that debate three of the notices purported to delete the entire item. I have certain remarks to make about that procedure which I will not make here. I only refer to this debate to point out that on that occasion the hon. member took the position that it was quite proper to file a notice of opposition that had the effect of reducing but not entirely eliminating an item. Unless he has changed his position, we feel that the argument is just as forceful today as it was then. Merely because we are proceeding under Standing Order 58(18) does not alter the force of that argument in my submission.

I think I can leave those two points now, Mr. Speaker. The proceeding obviously is under Standing Order 58(18). I do not think there can be any suggestion that we are proceeding under Standing Order 58(10) because it simply does not apply. Standing Order 58(10) is thrown out the window on the very first five words. Those words are "On the last allotted day".

My submission is that the old Standing Order applies only in circumstances where we are dealing with the last allotted day, and we are not there. We are not proceeding under Standing Order 58(16) because that only applies on an allotted day. We must be proceeding under Standing Order 58(18), because that is the only other place in the standing order where we have a vehicle to deal with the report of the standing committee on the appropriations bill. There is nothing in Standing Order 58(18) which in any way restricts debate.

We are prepared to go along with the government's suggestion that we proceed under Standing Order 58(18) and deal with the report stage of the appropriations bill, but I want to make it abundantly clear that we are not prepared to go along with the government under Standing Order 58(18) if the government intends to impose restrictions on the debate on these nine notices, because if it follows that course we want to forcefully submit, Your Honour, that the government must establish the urgency and, in order to do that, go through the procedure which is set out by Standing Order 44.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I normally would be inclined to let Your Honour rule on this without any further intervention, but because of the importance of the issue and the fact that this is the first time it has been raised, I feel compelled to do so.

I think the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has disposed quite effectively of the laboured, forced, contrived and tortuous argument of my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend!

Mr. Baldwin: I know that Your Honour will probably smile to yourself and say that hon. members in procedural arguments sometimes do embark upon discussions which sound like that, and I suppose if I were to go back far enough in Hansard I might find some place where I, myself, was guilty of using expressions like that. If that is the case, I would plead in extenuation the fact that I was trying to widen the opportunity for divorce—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —for divorce between the two parties over there. I am sorry, I should have said "for debate". I am amazed by my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, with whom I have stood so stoutly on so many occasions in an attempt to find ways and means by which the House could widen opportunities for debate, to find him now attempting to foreclose, limit and restrict debate, and using arguments of this kind. I am happy to say, however, because of the attachment I have for him, that I will not have to deal with him as he has been effectively disposed of by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, indeed, I would be delighted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did he not hear me say that one of my main concerns was to get this supply bill into committee of the whole where we can have unlimited debate? Will he tell me how he can say I was arguing for restriction of debate when, in fact, I was arguing the very opposite?

Mr. Baldwin: It is quite plain because the hon. member is saying we are going to debate this particular notice, and if that is not an attempt to restrict the debate I do not know what is.

I should like to go a little further into the historical reasons behind this particular ruling and practice to which we are adhering. I think this is what the House and the Chair are interested in and should bear in mind. If we go back to the days when we had the committee of supply and there was unlimited opportunity to discuss supply, I suppose some would say those were the good old days, being in the opposition, but those in the Cabinet would probably say they were the bad old days. I can recall occasions when my hon. friend said exactly the opposite. The government House leader was not sitting in the House then, but standing in the wings preparing the bullets his friends were firing when the then Liberal opposition took up to 75 or 80 days to deal with issues of supply. It was for reasons of that kind the House decided to find ways and means of restricting debate, wrongly so as the facts have proven. The Committee on Organization and Procedure did in fact brood about this matter and came up with the recommendation that has been referred to in part by the hon. member for Yukon.

What was the case before that? On several occasions during the session, there would be a motion made that the House go into committee of supply. On those occasions there would be a two-day debate with an opportunity for amendment and sub-amendment. If I recall rightly, a government fell on one of those occasions. Mr. Speaker was in the Chair then, and there was a vigorous and forceful debate. Following that, we went into the committee of supply when there was an extensive opportunity for discussing the particular items of the estimates. Therefore, there was a great scope at that time, before we changed the rules and came up with the existing practice, for members of this House to debate extensively, compel votes to be taken and compel the House to divide on issues relating to supply.

• (1600)

The hon. member for Yukon referred to the third report of the committee. He quoted some pages from that report. I should like to go back to page 430 and quote paragraph 5 (g):

A total of 25 allotted days spaced throughout the session would be placed at the disposal of the Opposition. Five would fall before December 10, seven before March 26, and 13 before June 30. On these allotted days the Opposition would be free to select for debate any matter coming within the jurisdiction of Parliament, including the business of supply currently before the House, on motions of which notice would be required.

Then, it deals with a number of motions, so many of which would be motions of confidence and so many of which would be motions of non-confidence. The final sentence reads:

It is envisaged that during the latter weeks of a session these days . . .

That has reference to opposition days:

. . . would frequently be used for debating the reports on the departmental estimates presented by the various standing committees.

Then, we have paragraph (i) which states:

The final decisions in relation to the main estimates of each department of government would be held over until the end of the third supply period so that the opportunity to debate any department would remain open throughout the session.

Then, by analogy with regard to supplementary estimates, which almost invariably are brought in in this period, the final debate would have been left until the last of the seven opposition days.

Now, for various reasons which I shall not go into, this House has been deprived of the five opposition days it normally would have had in the period ending December 10 and will be deprived, so far as these supplementary estimates are concerned, of the seven days which would end on March 26. It is true enough that those days will be made available later on, unless some very fortuitous situation comes about and the members of this House go out to the happy hunting ground to engage in other activities. Normally, we would expect the seven days to be available, but for reasons of which I believe the Chair can take judicial notice the government decided to utilize this particular procedure in an attempt to secure expeditious approval of these estimates and the appropriation bill. Because of these facts, we are therefore prevented from engaging in debate, from putting down motions on opposition days, including motions of non-confidence, and from challenging the government on these estimates. By the time we have an opportunity to do so, the estimates will have been passed and the appropriation bill will have been passed.

I suggest it was with that possibility in mind that Standing Order 58(18) was brought in. If we do as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests, we will be limited to dealing with items of estimates only when we are in Committee of the Whole. There would be no opportunity to challenge the government with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, have a debate or discussion, and then have the House divide on an issue, an opportunity which we would have had had the government not seen fit for its own purposes to adopt the procedure under Standing Order 58(18).

I realize that the Chair cannot be bound by questions of equity and so on if the rules say otherwise, as often is the case, but where there is a freedom, as in this case, I believe the Chair should be vigilant in respect of equity, freedom and opportunity for debate to the fullest extent possible. This can be done only by allowing two things. First, it can be done by having a procedure whereby, as was argued by the hon. member for Yukon, there is an opportunity to debate in this House with Mr. Speaker in the Chair items such as those which are now dealt with and set out for debate today. Second, having done that, we then get into the appropriation bill and there would be some opportunity at least for debate and discussion of some of the items at that time. That is something we will have to meet later. Having this situation and being in the position where the scope for dealing with estimates and debating supply is restricted compared to the situation which existed prior to these rules, and then having the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who previously advocated eloquently and frequently the right of extending debate, tell us we cannot do this, I suggest is something which the Chair and the House should not tolerate.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I realize we are discussing a new situation and that, because of the adoption of the new rules, it is a situation which we have not faced precisely before. I wish to make a number of comments. First of all, I ask myself whether the form of the notices given by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) are correct. Secondly, I ask myself whether he is entitled to give these notices at this time. Then, finally, I must attempt to relate the situation in which we find ourselves today to the past parliamentary practice and the changing practice of supply in the House. In respect of point number one, which is not really the most important point, concerning whether the hon. member for Yukon has put his notices in a proper form, from my reading it would seem to me that all the Standing Order entitles him to do is simply to give a notice of opposition to any particular item. Once that notice of opposition is given to any particular item, it triggers the placing on the order paper of the motion to which that opposition is taken. It seems to me there is no provision whatsoever in Standing Orders for amendment, qualification or alteration of an item. There is provision solely and simply for opposition.

Having stated that, I have looked at certain situations which have occurred in the past and I agree with the hon. member that notices of motion in opposition to items which have done more than oppose have been put down. They have attempted to overmodify or amend. However, I do not rest my case on that. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the hon. member for Yukon is not entitled to put these notices of motion on the order paper at all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre presented the argument that such notices of motion could be put only on the last day of the supply period when the Speaker is obliged to put all outstanding questions at a final moment. I believe I would like to carry the argument one step further and say that what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is really asking is whether today is an allotted day. If it is an allotted day, then the proceeding that is suggested here by the hon. member for Yukon could be regarded as a proper procedure. But there is no provision for this proceeding under our Standing Orders except on an allotted day, and I challenge hon. members on the other side to indicate where, in the Standing Orders, there is a foundation for this proceeding, namely, the proceeding of opposing an item in the estimates, except on an allotted day.

• (1610)

Mr. Nielsen: I will.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that there is no such provision. I move on further, Your Honour, to draw attention to Standing Order 58(10), the reading and contemplation of which helped me to clarify in my own mind the exact nature of the problem that we are faced with procedurally. However, before I go to Standing Order 58(10) may I refer to 58(5), in which a discussion is conducted as to the number of sitting days to be allotted to the business of supply. That discussion ends by saying:

These twenty-five days are to be designated as allotted days.

I ask myself, when the Chair is tabulating the 25 allotted days under the Standing Order, is today an allotted day? If it is an allotted day, then at the end of this day there will be left 24 allotted days.

Mr. Nielsen: Of course, it isn't an allotted day.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member says it is not an allotted day. He has agreed that it is not an allotted day. So, Mr. Speaker, the argument is ended, because if it is not an allotted day there is no possible foundation for this particular proceeding. I leave that case on that very simple ground. It is either an allotted day or not an allotted day.

Then, I ask myself what of the proposition in Standing Order 58(18) in which it is provided that:

In the event of urgency in relation to any estimate or estimates, the proceedings of the House on a motion to concur therein and on the subsequent bill are to be taken under Government Orders and not on days allotted in this order.

Are we proceeding here on a day allotted under Standing Order 58? Obviously, we are not. The hon. member for Yukon has just said so. This is obviously taking place as a government order. In a sense, it is a government day because under the new dispensation all the allotted days are opposition days. That was the purpose of it.

I merely say that it is one or the other. If it is an allotted day, the hon. member has a right to put down these proceedings. If today is an allotted day, then there will be 24 left, or the allotted days in this period will be reduced by one. But I cannot see that as a reasonable outcome, because the reason we relied on 58(18) was that in order to bring these estimates under the so-called guillotine, or to have an allotted day to deal with them, it would mean having the House contort itself for a short period of time to clean up seven allotted days before February 7, and you can imagine the screams that would have been heard if we had attempted to do that.

We said, "Let us take our chance. We go to the House without any guillotine, and we treat this situation as any normal bill, without any time allocation." That is what we are doing. There is no question in my mind that if you rule that this is a proceeding under Standing Order 58(18), and not an allotted day, then on second reading there is no time limitation, in committee of the whole there is no time limitation, and on third reading there is no time limitation. I confess that the House is totally free to deal with the matter without limitation on any of these stages, although I would hope the House would take account of the necessity for replenishing the programs that are involved in these estimates.

That was a risk we took in making up our minds to proceed this way. The only question that bothers me at this point is, if the motions put down by the hon. member for Yukon are ruled as improper proceedings, then is the main motion put down by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) a debatable motion? It is obviously a votable one. It has to be concurred in or not concurred in. However, is it debatable?

Hon. members will recall that before we abolished the committee of supply, we would have discussed the estimates in that committee. But we abolished the committee of supply, and we used the standing committees to do the work that had been done formerly in the committee of supply. So, today we are in a sense at that stage following the completion of the work of the committee of supply, but in this case the work was completed by the standing committee.

Before we adopted the new rules there is no question as to what the situation would have been. The supply resolutions coming out of the committee of supply would have been concurred in without debate or without amendment, and if on this question we wanted to follow an exact parallel we would divide without debate or an amendment. But on that point, I really have not been able to reach a firm conclusion. It would be my feeling that it is somewhat incompatible with the over-all system of supply, incompatible with the regime we are following under Standing Order 58(18), to have an extended debate on a motion to concur in the estimates, which estimates have already been dealt with extensively in the standing committee. If the motion is not debatable and if it is concurred in, then it is clear that it will bring an appropriation bill before the House, and that bill is without time limit at any stage.

Further, when we go into committee of the whole on the supply bill, every item to which the hon. member takes exception will be before the committee, and all the others, for discussion and decision.

Mr. Nielsen: But no recorded vote.

Mr. MacEachen: And he will be able, if he wishes to follow the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to consider taking certain actions on third reading. He can have votes in committee, on second reading and on third reading. He has full parliamentary latitude. I would hope we would not find this was an allotted day and have a proceeding at this stage that I do not think is contemplated.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their very interesting comments. Hon. members who have not studied this interesting procedural point too closely, I think, will have reached the same conclusion as I, that the matter is somewhat confusing. As some of the hon. members who took part in this discussion have pointed out, this is actually the first time we have been faced with this situation, with this difficulty, so it does take perhaps a bit of imagination, and I would think a lot of good will on the part of the Chair, on behalf of hon. members, to interpret the rules and the Standing Orders in a way that will be fair to the House, and to all hon. members. It is perhaps in this light that I have tried to interpret the arguments put forth by hon. members during the course of this discussion.

I should like to refer at the outset to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He made reference, in the first instance, to the form of the notices which have been filed. The President of the Privy Council also referred to that point, and I think it also was mentioned by the hon. member for Yukon. All who referred to this point agreed that it was not the substance of the discussion, and with this I also agree. However, I would still like to enter the caveat that, although this form of notice has been used before, it was used in circumstances where there was not too much time for the Chair to object. It is always difficult for the Chair to declare such motions out of order, preventing hon. members from having the opportunity of voting upon them. That is why in all such circumstances the Chair must exercise leniency and bring to the attention of hon. members that what the Standing Order provides for is for a notice of objection, not a motion or an amendment as such.

If hon. members were to adopt the practice of making these notices motions rather than notices of objection to an item, importing argument and debate, then I can see that we would get into some difficulties because they would be more motions, on which actually we could not vote, than they would be notices. I hope the practice will develop in the other direction and members will make an effort to limit the wording of these notices to that of a notice of objection, instead of making the notices amendments which are put in the form of argument. Therefore, I agree on this point with hon. members that a ruling on such an important matter should not be made on the form of the notices that are before us.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

The second point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—so long ago that I forget whether it was his second, third, or fourth point, but I believe it was the second point he made—was to the effect that notices of opposition are intended to provide an opportunity to vote on certain items only at the cut-off time, or when the guillotine comes into play—if guillotines ever come into play. My impression is that this is the procedure that we have followed until now. Notices have been considered and a vote taken on the item opposed only at the very last moment when the guillotine came into play at the end of the period.

Actually, there is nothing to prevent the House from considering these motions outside of the provisions of Standing Order 58(10). I refer hon. members to the possibility of doing this under the provisions of Standing Order 32(1)(k), which reads as follows: "The following motions are debatable: (K) for the consideration of any motion under the order for the consideration of the business of supply." I have even wondered why the House has not taken advantage of these provisions to bring these items under consideration forward for debate before the House reaches the last minute on a finally allotted day. That is a possibility that is always open to the House, and for this reason I do not think I can accept the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on this particular point.

I was also impressed, if I may say so, by his argument with reference to the difficulty of following the procedure now proposed by hon. members who have brought these notices of motions, namely that the House might be called upon to vote twice on the same item. It could be said that this situation is hypothetical or that the objection is premature, that it would be at a later date when the matter came up for a vote the second time that that argument could be taken.

It may be an obiter dictum at this time to rule on this point, but I think it might be worth referring hon. members to May's eighteenth edition, the last paragraph at the foot of page 483 and the first paragraph at the top of page 484. I will not read it all because it would take too much time, but the suggestion made by the learned author is that there is nothing wrong with this kind of procedure. He says:

> The various stages through which a bill progresses (normally but not necessarily on separate days) are intended by the practice of Parliament to provide so many opportunities not only for consideration, but also for reconsideration. Such stages may be taken to include the passage of any necessary financial resolution. Thus an entire bill may be regarded as one question which is not settled until it is passed. And hence no objection can be taken to an amendment on any particular stage on the ground that it raises again a question decided on an earlier stage.

And the author continues along this line. I think this is a relevant citation and that hon. members would like to think about it. In any event, I do not believe that this was the main point of contention of the hon. member.

The President of the Privy Council, supporting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, said that this is either an allotted day or it is not an allotted day. I find it easy to rule that it is not an allotted day. My understanding of the rules presented to the House, and adopted by the House in 1968, is that they were intended to set up an entirely new supply procedure and eliminate all other supply procedures so that there was only one way to proceed on supply. The way to proceed on supply is either on an allotted day, which is a certain day called an opposition day, or on a government day, at a time when the government feels there is a matter of urgency and, in its own time, asks the House to consider a certain item. It does this in its own time, as I say, and to my way of thinking that is the only difference between the two proceedings. In the one case the House is considering an item in opposition time; in the other case, where there is urgency or, in the view of the government, an emergency—and that must be the decision of the government—the matter is proceeded with in government time.

I think the government would have to feel deeply that this is an emergency, because they would have to give up their time for the purpose of considering business that normally would be studied by the House in opposition time, in conformity with the dispositions of Standing Order 58. The Standing Order as revised in 1968 establishes, as I say, a mechanism for the consideration of supply, and essentially this procedure contemplates a reference of estimates to a committee or committees, their return to the House under a timetable, and debate on allotted days.

The interpretation of section (18) of Standing Order 58 must be that, in certain circumstances, consideration of supply must take place in government time rather than on allotted days, which are opposition days under the provisions of the standing order. The proceedings are identical, except that opposition days cannot be used for the purpose of the business of supply when the government brings forward supply outside the cycle contemplated by the Standing Order. Except for the time allocation provisions of the Standing Order and the use of certain days by the opposition, the same machinery must apply in both cases.

In this particular case notice of objection to the passing of the estimates has been given in conformity with Standing Order 58(4)(a). The conclusion is that those notices are properly presented to the House and that the required motions should be made in order to bring the business of supply under debate.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1a, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That vote 1a, in the amount of $200,000 of the Department of Finance for financial and economic policies—program expenditures in supplementary estimates (a) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, could we stand the first one, please?

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: It is a government motion, of course. Is the House ready for the question?

25714—68

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, is the House not willing to allow this motion to stand?

Mr. Speaker: That is obvious. This is a government motion and the government alone can ask that it be stood. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) appreciate that it is not for the Chair to determine whether a motion, if it is before the House, shall stand, unless there is unanimous agreement that the motion shall not be proceeded with.

• (1630)

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader for his co-operation in standing the first item and proceeding with the second item, Vote L12a to do with winter capital projects.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the hon. member's reasons, but since it is our desire to co-operate I will certainly extend that co-operation. I hope it will be reciprocated, and not in the usual manner.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that Motion No. 1 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE L12a. DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That Vote L12a in the amount of $350,000,000 of the Department of Finance for Winter Capital Projects Fund—Loans in Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, he concurred in.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am about to refer to the document that was tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) entitled "supplementary Estimates (A)" which, on its front cover, is said to be "for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973". I now refer to Vote L12a in the estimates, to be found at page 16. That item is described as a non-budgetary vote and is set out as being a request for funds for winter capital projects. The vote reads:

Winter Capital Projects Fund—Loans to provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities as defined in the Municipal Development and Loan Act in the 1972-73 to 1975-76 fiscal years inclusive for the purpose of creating employment through the construction, in the period commencing with December 6, 1972 and ending with June 30, 1975 . . .

I will not read the rest. The point I make is that this vote calls for authority to spend $350 million in three fiscal years, yet the supplementary estimate is described as being for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973.

As I said just now, this vote covers three fiscal periods or years. To that extent the vote, in my submission, unless there is some rational explanation, is not in order. I do not think the government should be asking in supplementary estimates which purport to cover the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, for authority to spend moneys as far in the future as 1975. To my knowledge, that kind of authority has never been asked for by governments in the past and, certainly, has never been granted by parliaments in the past.

I wish to make a further submission about the item which is described as being non-budgetary. The vote provides for the forgiveness of 50 per cent of the loans made. Actually, it reads that there shall be a forgiveness of, "50 per cent of normal direct onsite payroll costs". To that extent the vote, in my submission, is not non-budgetary, but is budgetary. These forgiven and to-be-forgiven amounts should be reflected in the accounts of government expenditures for each and every fiscal year in which they are incurred. This provision is set forth clearly in the treasury manual, which the President of the Treasury Board, who is intimately familiar with the treasury manual, will no doubt concede. Evidence that the forgiven amounts are continuing and immediate appropriations of public funds is contained in the words in the treasury manual, "Payment is hereby forgiven", rather than in the non-budgetary words "To be paid out of moneys to be appropriated by Parliament," under which a vote would have to be put in the estimates in each fiscal year and voted on by parliament in an appropriation act.

Clearly, the offence here is that of the government coming before parliament and purporting to ask for authority to spend money in one fiscal year, that ending on March 31, 1973, and smuggling into these estimates, by way of an expanded vote description, moneys to be spent during three other fiscal years.

In the case of the forgiveness provisions of the vote, that part, I say, would be non-budgetary, although the annual appropriations would be budgetary. In this supplementary estimate, the government is combining a budgetary element in the vote with a non-budgetary element. It has done something that is less than legitimate in calling this item non-budgetary, since it is a combination of budgetary and non-budgetary items. In my belief this is a misrepresentation of the true state of affairs and ought not to be accepted by the House. The result would be that the government would conceal expenditures of public funds which will be recovered from and paid for by the taxpayer. Both these points were raised in committee.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) appeared as a witness before that committee and attempted to explain his reasons. He did not satisfy me and I do not believe he really satisfied the members of his own party, even though they voted to pass this estimate out of committee, or at least voted that the government could proceed in this way. The minister's explanations were somewhat lengthy. The length of his argument belied the strength of it. It was because his argument was so weak that he had to speak so long. This matter raises the question of section 20 of the Financial Administration Act, which I quoted in committee. That section directly prohibits the government from proceeding in the manner which it now asks us to prove.

Section 20 of the Financial Administration Act provides:

> All estimates of expenditures submitted to Parliament shall be for the services coming in course of payment during the fiscal year.

Here we are being asked to fly directly in the face of that stricture in section 20 of the Financial Administration Act and approve amounts for services that will be paid during three fiscal years. I see the President of the Treasury Board is listening intently. How can the government justify requesting this House to approve moneys to be spent in three fiscal years in the face of that direct prohibition in section 20 of the Financial Administration Act?

It is inconceivable that there could be any other interpretation of that section than the one I have suggested. It reads:

> All estimates of expenditures—

This vote is an estimate of an expenditure.

> —submitted to Parliament—

It is now submitted to parliament.

> —shall be for the services coming in the course of payment during the fiscal year.

That means the fiscal year to March 31, 1973. The section, in effect, prevents the government from asking parliament to provide moneys for services coming in course of payment during any other fiscal year. However, the description of the vote asks for $350 million for three fiscal years. When asked a question in this House by an hon. member, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said he expected a cash flow during the first winter of operation of this project to amount to something in the order of $75 million. When pressed in committee, he gave us ball park figures for the second and third years. If my recollection is correct, it was $170 million and $105 million for the second and third fiscal years respectively.

• (1640)

In committee, what we suggested by way of compromise in order to legalize what the government is trying to do with this project, was to reduce the amount of $350 million to $75 million and to report back to the House that a separate appropriation be brought in by the government for the next two following fiscal years. That suggestion was not accepted. The answer of the Minister of Finance was, if we did that the provincial governments could not plan sufficiently far ahead because they would be uncertain about getting the money. That was a rather empty argument because if parliament appropriated moneys for the second and third fiscal years as well as passing an estimate for $75 million for this fiscal year, they could plan ahead just the same as they could if this unlawful, in my view, estimate were to be passed in this form. That argument really did not hold any water.

There is no restriction on the future planning capability of the provincial governments for these projects if we proceed in a proper way by appropriating the two fiscal years separately. I mean doing this now, not waiting for the second and third years to accomplish this. There is no reason why we cannot do it now. However, proceeding in this fashion is simply not correct. The law exists for a reason. The law is being flouted. I say to the Minister of Finance through you, Mr. Speaker, that we are talking about old Section 20 of the Financial Administration Act which, as I have been saying, places a direct prohibition against the government proceeding in this fashion.

Having made that point, I want to assure the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), the Minister of Finance and the government House leader that we are perfectly prepared to give our consent to the minister's own estimate of $75 million now in this estimate. We urge the government to bring in separate appropriations for the years 1973-74 and 1974-75. I take it we will give our projected consent. In that way, the government will be acting within the terms of the Financial Administration Act and not flying in the face of it. Those are my three points on this item, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the government is being damned because of its complete mishandling of the economy which has produced the highest rate of unemployment of any country in the western world. In reply to a question asked during today's question period, the Minister of Finance said that he was not in the business of making forecasts. I suggest to the minister that he reread his budget speech of May 8, 1972 where he made a number of forecasts. He said, and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, my first words to this House as Minister of Finance last February were that my most urgent priority was jobs. This remains my first priority. No economy is working as well as it should if there are men and women in this country seeking work who cannot find it. . . .
> I mean real jobs, not temporary jobs. I mean jobs that last and satisfy. . . .
> —the first priority of this government is to bring about a further substantial reduction in unemployment.

The minister has now been Minister of Finance for almost a year. He has failed completely, because the rate of unemployment today is almost exactly what it was when he took on the job of Minister of Finance. I predicted then that unless the government was prepared to change its policies, this minister would be the same as the previous minister except that he did not smoke a pipe. The figures which were released yesterday—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but the debate that is now taking place is squarely confined to Vote L12a concerning the amount of $350 million of the Department of Finance for winter capital projects fund. The hon. member should relate his remarks to this particular item.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the purpose of the capital works fund is to do something about unemployment. That is simply the point I intended to make before coming to the specifics of the proposal.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the hon. member will not mind because I am really on his side in this issue. I refer Your Honour to the wording of the vote. I quote:

> Winter Capital Projects Fund—Loans to provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities as defined in the Municipal Development and Loan Act in the 1972-73 to 1975-76 fiscal years inclusive for the purpose of creating employment through the construction, in the period commencing with December 6, 1972—

I recognize that we must confine ourselves to the vote, but nevertheless the words "creating employment through the construction" entitles the hon. member to speak on that aspect of it. I am sure that members of our party will follow along this line. It should give the hon. member some scope in that regard.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the unemployment figures which were released yesterday indicate that in January, 1973 there were 688,000 Canadians unemployed compared to 665,000 in January, 1972. The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment for the country was 6.2 per cent in January 1973, almost the same percentage as in January, 1970. According to the regional breakdown, the number of unemployed in the Atlantic provinces has increased from 85,000 in January, 1972 to 87,000 in January, 1973. In Quebec, the figure increased from 233,000 in January, 1972 to 247,000 in January, 1973. In British Columbia it increased from 79,000 in January, 1972 to 95,000 in January, 1973.

Today's Montreal Gazette headlines the unemployment figures for Quebec. This should be of concern to the Minister of Finance who first came to this House as a member representing a Quebec constituency. The headline reads "One out of every ten Quebecers reported out of work".

I submit that the Minister of Finance was wrong a year ago when he said that his first objective was to provide jobs. It may have been his first objective, but he certainly did not do anything about it. He ought to be criticized. Opposition members have been calling on the government to take action for the past two years. The provinces and municipalities have been calling on the government to take action. Month after month we get the answer from whoever is Minister of Finance that things are getting better; next week or next month we will turn the corner and the rate of unemployment will decrease.

• (1650)

In his budget speech on May 8, the minister predicted that the rate of unemployment would decline. I quote from that speech as reported at page 2,010:

> I expect that unemployment will fall, on the average, in the course of this year, although the extraordinary month to month fluctuation in the size of the labour force will likely continue and be reflected in an uneven movement in the unemployment rate.

The minister, who said earlier this afternoon that he is not in the business of making predictions, made a prediction. The only mistake he made earlier this afternoon was this: He should have said "I am not in the business of making accurate predictions." That would have been correct, because he did make a prediction and it was all wrong.

Finally, concern about unemployment, or, possibly, concern about a possible election and public reaction to this high rate of unemployment, prompted the government to bring forward a plan to put people to work through a winter capital projects fund program, a program which would commit the government to lending to the provinces and the municipalities in respect of approved projects $350 million over the next three years. And, as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has pointed out, 50 per cent of the labour costs of most of these projects are forgiveable to the provinces and to the municipalities.

The provinces and municipalities greeted this announcement with considerable enthusiasm. It is true they had certain reservations, certain criticisms to make. One of them was that the program was not big enough. Another was that notice was too short to enable them to undertake projects on which they felt it desirable to proceed. I am sure that criticism on these lines could be directed against governments generally, whether formed by Liberal parties, as in Quebec and Nova Scotia, or the NDP, as in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, or by the Conservative parties, as in Newfoundland and Ontario. Time is needed. But this program we shall eventually vote on says the federal government is prepared to put into this winter capital projects fund program the sum of $350 million over the next three years.

I submit we can fault the government of Canada for being late with its proposal, a delay which means that not very much will be done to alleviate the unemployment crisis in the winter of 1972-73. But if this proposal is approved, the provinces and municipalities will be given notice that they can now begin to make their plans for the winter of 1973-74 and for the winter of 1974-75. This is precisely what they have sought—time to consider their requirements, time to prepare detailed plans, time to set up an organization to administer the plan and get the projects into operation.

But what do we find this afternoon? We get from the hon. member for Yukon the usual cynical, opportunistic speech I have come to expect from him, a speech in which he suggests it is somehow illegal or improper for the government to be committing money for the next two fiscal years. I shall not deal with the legality of his proposition; I shall leave that to the lawyers or to those who have learned a great deal more than I about the rules of this House. But I suggest it comes with ill grace from the representative of a party which has been beating the drums against the government because it has not done enough to counter unemployment to come out now with a legalistic argument and propose, in effect, that the government should not proceed with a program which would give the provincial governments and the municipalities the assurance that in the next two years they would have in the neighbourhood of $175 million to $200 million to spend.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a distortion; a deliberate distortion.

Mr. Orlikow: I listened to the hon. member for Yukon in committee. I have listened to him this afternoon—ad nauseam, if I may say so. I think he was all wrong, but that is my right. I am sure he thinks I am wrong. That is his right. I suggest that if any member of his party wishes to speak after I am finished he can rise and make a speech. But I suggest it is a cynical and shabby bit of business for the lead-off speaker for the Conservative party, which has been quite properly castigating the government for not facing up to its responsibilities of devising programs to deal with the serious unemployment situation, to say: Yes, we want you to deal with it, but you should not commit money for the next two fiscal years. This despite the fact that only in such a way can programs be arranged which would put the maximum number of people to work under this proposal on the most worth while projects.

I want to say to the hon. member for Yukon that if he is serious in his attitude toward unemployment he ought not to come here with what I consider to be spurious, legalistic arguments.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I make a correction as I am entitled to do under the rules? The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has deliberately and grossly distorted what I said in my participation in this debate and in committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: If hon. members will consult the rules, they will find I am entitled to rise on a point of order to correct grossly inaccurate and misleading statements. That is exactly what I am doing.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have heard before, in committee, the argument put forward by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and I have dealt with one aspect of it. I should like to deal with another aspect of it this afternoon. No one doubts that section 20 of the Financial Administration Act is, indeed, the law of Canada. Nevertheless, I think it is also a parliamentary axiom that one parliament cannot bind or commit subsequent parliaments. In other words, it is always open to parliament to override any provision of the Financial Administration Act or any other legislation by means of subsequently enacted legislation.

• (1700)

Mr. Alexander: Why did you not tell us that the other day?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I introduced the argument the other day in the committee but hon. members of the Conservative party were not in a mood to be convinced no matter how cogent the arguments.

Mr. Alexander: We were willing to listen, but you did not make sense.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Vote L12a, which is before Your Honour, is set out in supplementary estimates A for 1972-73 as are the other items to which reference is made. When these are annexed as an addendum to the supply bill, that bill will pass and will become an act of parliament, as any other bill of this House, and in the same way as the Financial Administration Act itself. What parliament, therefore, does on any supply bill and what it will do on a supply bill that follows these estimates is override any contrary provision, including the provision of section 20 of the Financial Administration Act.

One does not have to say directly in the supply bill or estimates that this overrides section 20 of the Financial Administration Act; that is the clear effect of any subsequent piece of legislation that is drawn in more distinctive or specific terms. In other words, I am submitting to Your Honour that there is nothing illegal in what parliament has over and over again provided for in supply bills and has indeed effected through this vote in question.

I have some precedents for the House but I do not know whether they will convince the opposition because they seem to be dug in on a legalistic game. Take the estimates last year for the previous parliament—take the estimates of 1970-71 for the Department of Finance which show, for instance, provincial employment loans program, 1971 and loans to provinces, provincial agencies and municipalities as defined in the Municipal Development and Loans Act, 1971 through 1973 fiscal years. It extends beyond one fiscal year as this does. It was for those three fiscal years and that was in the previous parliament. Take external affairs, the supplementary estimates (A), 1970-71—Canadian International Development Agency, vote 20A—the grants listed in the estimates—to extend the purposes of the special accounts established by Vote 33d of Appropriation Act No. 2, 1965 to provide for payments out of that account in the current and subsequent fiscal years for social development assistance. That is a clear precedent for what we are doing here. Or take the supplementary estimates, 1971-72 for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, nuclear research and utilization program. Vote L51a—loans in the current and subsequent fiscal years to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, to finance the rehabilitation of the Glace Bay heavy water plant. Again, that is extending a vote beyond the fiscal year which was being reviewed in the estimates.

I want to go back to the years in which the government was under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I should like to submit to the House a few precedents where authorization was granted beyond the fiscal year in question.

Mr. Alexander: With or without argument?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let me turn to further supplementary estimates for 1958-59 for the Department of Transport for air services, civil aviation division, vote 793 for airways and airports—construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment. There is a further amount required including authority to contribute during the current and fiscal years amounts not exceeding in the aggregate $196,000 and so on. Or look at the estimates for 1959-60 for loans, investments and advances for the Department of National Defence. Vote 475 was to authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces. That is in the amount of $10 million. Or take the estimates for 1958-59. Vote 285 relates to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for the northern administration and lands branch, Yukon Territory. It authorized payments to be made in respect of each of the fiscal years for the period commencing April 1, 1957 and ending March 31, 1962—a five year period, well beyond the fiscal period reviewed in the estimates. I submit to the House and Your Honour that I could introduce at least 100 precedents completely within the four corners of the item now before Your Honour.

May I say that the suggestion made in the House and before the committee by the hon. member for Yukon to the effect that the estimated cash flow—which may be more now because the provinces are applying pursuant to agreements to be signed, for an encouraging amount to meet winter unemployment this year—against the substantial amount of $350 million, were it divided into three, would completely destroy the purpose of the three year fund. The purpose, which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has suggested, is to allow the provinces and municipalities to plan, to allow the municipalities who have limited resources in their budgets for future years to count on the fund as a continuing $350 million fund to meet winter unemployment so that they can plan ahead. The provinces can do likewise.

I went across the country in June, meeting my counterparts and their colleagues who were dealing with manpower and employment. Each of them stressed to me the importance of special planning and a sufficient period of time, consecutively taken, so that they could mount a consistent, logical and effective attack on winter and seasonal unemployment. This is the purpose—

Mr. Alexander: I wonder if the minister would permit one question in order to clear something.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Certainly.

Mr. Alexander: Is the minister now telling the House that if this is passed it is a definite commitment. I get confused when I remember the failure of this government regarding certain commitments on urban renewal. Is this a definite commitment in the event that this vote is passed?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This is a definite commitment. It will have two controlling authorities, the ultimate authority being parliament, if parliament should authorize the loan provision in the total amount over the three year period of $350 million, these loans to be forgiven at the rate of 50 per cent or 100 per cent labour intensive depending on the period the work is done. First, the authority is the authority of parliament pursuant to approval of this item and subsequent approval of the supply bill; second, individual contracts between the Minister of Finance of Canada and each of the provincial governments for the amount of their allocation and setting out the criteria under which the provinces are to disburse and later seek forgiveness. As I said, these contracts are reviewable by this House. Disbursements in future will be shown in future estimates before this House.

Mr. Alexander: I was just a little concerned with respect to urban renewal, Mr. Speaker. I thought definite commitments had been made and, all of a sudden, the government did a flip-flop and frustrated a lot of cities across the country. I want to elicit from the minister whether this is a definite commitment. I understand now that it is; it is in writing and is subject to the approval of parliament on a year to year basis.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The commitment will take—

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order and, with apologies to my hon. colleague. The hon. member's comment on urban renewal, with which I was associated at the time is really a misinterpretation of the type of commitments made to the municipalities. There was no legal commitment made at that time.

An hon. Member: No legal commitment, but there certainly was a moral commitment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think we are straying from the subject of the debate before us. I would recognize again the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nielsen: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I think—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order. I recognize the hon. Minister of Finance.

• (1710)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am perfectly willing to continue the conversation with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) after hours, and I will do so in the appropriate way.

Mr. Alexander: I want to talk to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras).

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister permit a question at this stage?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I wonder if I might just finish the argument, and then certainly I will entertain a question from the hon. member for Yukon.

In other words, the provinces asked for, and we are providing, a three-year program that will allow them to undertake global planning and to mount a consistent and effective attack against unemployment. Any slashing or dividing of this authorization will completely destroy the effectiveness of the program. It would convert it into a short-term plan, a stop and go work-related program and would have a disruptive effect on the planning of municipalities which will receive federal funds through provincial governments.

I say this new long-term program will give the provinces and municipalities more time to plan properly and to implement employment programs, avoiding inappropriate use of funds which sometimes results from shorter one year programs. That would be the result of the suggestion of the hon. member for Yukon. Frankly, we consider this to be a major attack on seasonal winter unemployment in this country, and whether or not some hon. members consider it to be sufficient is a matter of argument. If the opposition wants to cripple it, that is the business of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on; get off it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is the business of the government.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a gross distortion.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The provinces need this authorization before the contracts within the authorization are valid and before any loans can be offered. Frankly, I think the people of this country ought to recognize that this is just legalistic tinkering by the Conservative party with the lives of the unemployed of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Andras.]

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and to those of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

What is the essence of vote L12a, which the House is being asked to pass to the amount of $350 million to create a Winter Capital Projects Fund? In his speech, the minister gave no details on the administration of this program. This is the only thing that troubles our party. We are told that the government is to spend $350 million for a Winter Capital Projects Fund. This money will be distributed among the provinces on a per capita basis. The type of assistance will be a loan, the purpose will be the creation of jobs and the period will be December 6, 1972, to June 30, 1975.

The minister would like to be granted a three-year mandate to fight unemployment in Canada. However, the government has been trying for four years to fight it and has met with no success. Still they are to be granted a three-year mandate.

Mr. Speaker, everything the minister has just said is very fine; it is extraordinary to see his determination to fight unemployment, for once, in co-operation with other levels of government, and this is appreciable. But from the moment he wants to co-operate with provincial and municipal governments to lick unemployment in Canada and at the same time promote investments and the implementation of long-desired projects, the minister who is concerned about public finance should at the same time be preoccupied about the financial situation of provinces and municipalities.

Mr. Speaker, in the detail of vote L12a, on page 16 of Supplementary Estimates, it is stated that the government shall grant loans to the provinces under the following conditions: every one of these loans must be secured by the obligations of the province or municipality—their indebtness is still increased—and the obligation shall be issued to or payable to the credit of the Receiver Genral for Canada.

Which means, as stated in sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (b) of this vote, that through the Department of Finance the federal government becomes some kind of finance company for the provinces in order to create employment.

This vote provides also that the term to maturity is 20 years or such lesser period as may be fixed by the Minister of Finance.

About this matter, I would like the Minister of Finance to take the trouble of giving us an example or the result of discussions that he is deemed to have had with his provincial counterparts, in order that we may know what term the provinces have asked for to repay these loans.

Mr. Speaker, what concerns me most is the following paragraph, and I quote:

(iii) the obligation bears interest payable annually at the rate applicable pursuant to Subsection (1) of Section 113 of the Canada Pension Plan, at the time of the issue of the obligation for obligations issued pursuant to that Act at that time to the Canada Pension Plan;

Such is, Mr. Speaker, the crucial point of this program. Here is a specific example: one or two years ago, Victoriaville wanted to develop some parks but did not have the financial means to do so; it had to resort to a loan bylaw which in the end was rejected by a majority of citizens. The municipal council found another procedure to carry out its project, but it remains that at the present time, the municipal councillors, the mayor and the people are aware of the financial condition of the city. Let us say that it is no better or no worse than elsewhere.

In short, Canadian municipalities—including those in Quebec which concern me and which I have at heart—are head over heels in debt and the minister would like to obtain the co-operation of provinces and municipalities to set up a system increasing their public debt in order to create the jobs which he has been unable to provide in the past four years. All that because he was trying to check inflation.

Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit has been suggesting for a long time that public plans in the public sector of the economy should be financed interest free or at a rate of interest which should not exceed the administrative costs of the loans granted through the Bank of Canada or its branch at the provincial level.

• (1720)

Our Liberal colleagues come to us begging support in order to avoid the defeat of the government but when we talk about the Bank of Canada, they find us funny. I want to take the opportunity to tell them that I am a Social Crediter and that I am not ashamed of the Creditist theory and that if they were men they would listen before laughing.

Mr. Speaker, I will say to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet)—I understand that he is not interested in the financial problems of municipalities—that the municipalities of my constituency as everywhere else are indebted. His attitude is wrong to the point that he deprives the population of several desirable and necessary projects of public interest.

Provinces and municipalities endure hardships. The idea behind these $350 million is extraordinary in the sense that the provinces and the municipalities will receive some help at last.

But I draw the line, Mr. Speaker, when the government contributes to increase provincial and municipal indebtedness by charging high interest rates and by demanding the issuance of obligations when they borrow and even by requesting them to invest twice what they invested if the loans came under the second class, that is if they have been granted after December 6, 1972.

Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues and other people consider interest-free loans as a very funny thing. However, the Minister of Finance or anyone who will replace him will have to think someday and tell us if our solution is that funny. What is the solution he proposes to stop the alarming indebtedness of provinces and municipalities? He will have tell us some day.

Mr. Speaker, I will give the example of Parisville, a very small municipality in my constituency. The hon. member for Quebec East does not talk about his constituency's problems; anyway, he does not have the right to rise and take the floor. Just today at noon, I was talking to the Mayor of Parisville who told me he submitted a local initiatives project for setting up a community leisure centre at the end of December. He has had no news about this project although it would create jobs. Having had no reply, he telephoned me at his own expense to solicit my assistance and the co-operation of the department.

His municipality spent $25,000 from its savings in a bank account in order to supplement the financial participation of Parisville citizens toward this centre. Might there be higher priorities in Parisville? That is not our problem, nor that of the Minister of Finance. We must abide by the choice of municipal or provincial authorities.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the government really means what it says about creating jobs. I have just heard the hon. Minister of Finance state that it is urgent that jobs be created. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) should express the same opinion and start action, replying to applications submitted on the government's invitation in order to create jobs. He should at least have the decency to reply to those people, whether at the local or municipal level. Then, the government's good faith would find credibility.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the government should strive very seriously for a solution to the problem of public financing in our country. What sources have provinces or municipalities for their financing? Would they be bond issues and foreign loans?

When a municipality or a province borrows, what does that involve? It must reimburse twice or three times the amount of the loan in interest, and once in capital. Who does this reimbursing? The taxpayer, who is taxed, bled white.

In order to finance itself the municipality may have recourse to the second expedient, namely taxation. No need to talk about it since all my colleagues who consider themselves honest will admit like me, I think, that Canadians are overtaxed.

Mr. Speaker, it is expected that the government will have a huge deficit. What will it suggest to make up for it? A tax increase, I am sure! We shall wonder whether to tax the rich, the poor or take from the rich to give to the poor, but the fact is, however, that the funds of the federal, provincial and municipal governments show a deficit.

As for private business, it is being bled white to pay for administrative mistakes and the mismanagement of our administrators who failed to develop a modern way of financing the growth of the public sector, thus enabling the Canadian people not only to take part in the growth of our country and to work, but to be able to make savings.

Mr. Speaker, some of my colleagues from the Liberal party find it funny, but when we come to the point of taxing the taxpayers' savings, it is no longer funny. This means that there is a problem in financing the public sector and one day the federal Minister of Finance will have to study the proposals of the Social Credit Party or any other proposal in order to assist municipalities to create jobs without hopelessly sinking into debt.

Mr. Speaker, the principle of appropriating $350 million presents good aspects, but the terms and conditions of the repayment are dangerous, to such an extent that they will contribute to create at least $350 million of debts, in capital only, for municipalities and provinces. The hon. minister should be brave and frank enough to tell the House what interest rate will be charged, on the repayment of this $350 million loan granted by the federal government. My colleague from Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) says one billion, and I do not doubt it because he is usually good at figures, and I believe him. And who will reimburse that billion? Of course, the good old "milch cows" of the federal government and the same "milch cows" with regard to the municipal and provincial governments; in other words, the average Canadian, whose taxes are pounced on.

Fiscal federal-provincial conferences are held not to find new ways of fincancing the public sector, or creating new jobs, or meeting the requests of the municipalities, but to find out who will be taxed.

Now, the Social Credit has a realistic solution. We ask the Minister of Finance to tell us, before this vote is passed—if he is honest enough to do so—how those $350 million will be reimbursed over 20 years and at what rate of interest. If he is honest enough to answer, then he will have proved to the House that there is no other solution to creating jobs in Canada and realizing long awaited municipal and provincial projects than by financing them through the Bank of Canada or its branch office in each one of the Canadian provinces with loans bearing no interest or at cost for the administration of the loan, so that the Canadian taxpayer, while finding employment through those projects, might reimburse only once what they cost to the financiers in Ottawa.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the suggestion of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) concerning the method of financing this particular program. Who knows, it might well have some attraction to hon. members opposite. I regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is not here now, so did not hear the proposal and did not react to it. However, if I recall correctly the Minister of Finance was a member of this House on the opposite side when his colleagues voted for a proposition put forward by the Social Credit Party advocating interest-free money and the dealing with propositions of this kind. I cannot say for certain, because I do not have the record before me, whether the Minister of Finance voted for it, but certainly his party voted for it. The present distinguished Leader in the Senate, and all the rest of his colleagues stood up and voted for a proposition akin to that advocated by the hon. member for Lotbinière.

I hope the answers will be given by the Minister of Finance before this proposition is completed so far as our debate is concerned. I see that the Minister of Finance is here. That is good. Before he assumed this portfolio, the Minister of Finance was Minister of Justice. As Minister of Justice he should have acquired a healthy and fundamental respect for the law. Yet we have heard him today propose a proceedure in which he says in effect we should ignore the law or jump over it if it gets in our way. Then, he cited the improprieties of the past.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière is rising on a point of order.

• (1730)

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Since he said at the beginning of his speech that it was regrettable that the Minister of Finance was away and could not answer my question, would he allow me to ask a question to the hon. Minister of Finance with the consent of the House?

Could the Minister of Finance tell the House what will be the interest rate the provinces and the municipalities will have to pay in connection with the reimbursement of the $350 million?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we might get ourselves into difficulty if we stray back and forth and deal with this as if it were a matter being debated in Committee of the Whole House. If the measure is adopted and it subsequently forms part of a bill which is being considered in the Committee of the Whole House, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and other members will have full opportunity to ask questions with respect to detail of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and other members of the ministry. I really think that, with members having limited time when taking part in the debate at this particular stage, it would be better if one were recognized and allowed to have his say. All these interesting questions could be stored up until we get ourselves into the committee of the whole at some future time. The hon. member for Peace River.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On this same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I will respectfully obey your instructions. However, this will be in co-operation with my hon. friend from Peace River and with the minister who seems anxious to answer. Why not allow him to take a minute to answer my question which is surely of interest to all hon. members and which he forgot to discuss in his speech?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am tempted, but I think not. I prefer that the debate proceed in the regular way at this time. Otherwise, we might get ourselves into all kinds of difficulties. I think hon. members will realize that they are dealing with a rookie Speaker at this stage, and I want to appear as exact as possible considering my awesome responsibilities. May I now call on the hon. member for Peace River.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), I would like to add that if we consider as a matter of no importance the interest rate which will be charged to municipalities and provinces, it is sufficient to refer to the item of the budget to find out that it is hardly irrelevant because the interest rate—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a speech and not raising a point of order. I ask the House to co-operate with the Chair and proceed in the regular fashion. There will be opportunities to ask these questions of the Minister of Finance in due course. I now recognize the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think your decision is very reasonable.

Mr. Fortin: Will you ask the question?

Mr. Baldwin: It has been suggested to me that I can relay the question to the Minister of Finance, if he did not hear it. At this point I would ask the Minister of Finance if, in the course of this debate, he would indicate not only to my hon. friends in the Social Credit party, but to all members of the House, what the interest rate will be?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Baldwin: No, I was asking the Minister of Finance a question. I asked him a question, and I hope that by the time I have completed my remarks he will have the information with which to answer. If not, he can take two days more to come up with the answer.

Mr. Drury: You haven't read the bill yet.

Mr. Baldwin: What bill? Mr. Speaker, this brings me to a very interesting point. That was a Freudian slip on the part of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). We are not dealing with a bill. This is one of the complaints I am going to make about the way we are dealing with this issue.

I was just getting to the very interesting stage in my remarks where I was complaining about the attitude of the Minister of Finance who, as the first law officer—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Former.

Mr. Baldwin: —who at one time was the first law officer and constitutional adviser to the cabinet. I was complaining about the very light way in which he now accepts his responsibility as a member of the Treasury Board when he advocates that we disregard the laws of this country. He cites improprieties in the past. He goes back to improprieties that were committed in a number of instances. Mr. Speaker, I don't care which party is in power, I take the position that there is a right way and a wrong way to proceed when we come to take tax money from the people of this country. No matter what was done in the past, the Minister of Finance would be well advised in this period in his career, which may very well shortly be curtailed—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You were a parliamentary secretary to the then Prime Minister when all those things went through in 1959 and 1960.

Mr. Baldwin: In the very limited time left to him to hold his office, he would be well advised to comply with the law. I would suggest to him that he should remember the phrase, "Oh, what a tangled web we weave when first we practise to deceive."

An hon. Member: That is what he gets for following your practice.

Mr. Baldwin: This government has done this. If this were the first instance, I would take no account of it. A certain amount of ignorance goes hand in hand with the operations of the Minister of Finance and all hon. members opposite. But now it has become more than ignorance. It has become a stated method of proceeding. We have the case which the hon. member for Yukon so well illustrated.

We have some lawyers in this chamber. Some of us were lawyers before we progressed to become members of parliament and went upwards in the scale of society. But there is a very interesting proposition scienter, that every dog is entitled to one bite. However, having made that bite, he ought to be destroyed if he bites a second time.

Let me chronicle a few of the things that the government has done in this respect. We had the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and the Unemployment Insurance Fund, where we caught them out cold with their hands in the taxpayers' pockets, without licence to do so. Then, we had the case of the CNR which engaged an auditor for a year without any legal obligation to pay him. Then, we had the Export Development Corporation, and one of my colleagues who participated in that debate convinced the House that the government had exceeded its commitment under a legal ceiling at that time. I could go on, Mr. Speaker. This dog has been biting so often that it is about time it was put back in its kennel. A dog catcher will get him in the next election.

My hon. friend from the Yukon has well made his case with respect to illegality. I don't need to enlarge on that, but I want to deal with this issue in other areas of substance. I was shocked to see the Minister of Finance stand in his place today and, in his most pitiful and inadequate way, attempt to defend the program outlined in this estimate, saying, "Last June I went around the country. I went to the provinces and found out that measures of this kind were required." What a shocking admission that is. That was in June of last year. Obviously, the House was still sitting. We were attempting to drum the facts of life into the government. We were attempting to show the government what the situation would be in the fall and this winter. My hon. friends in the NDP were associated with us in our endeavours at that time. But in the face of all that, in face of these trips that the minister had taken in June, in face of the fact that he had come to the conclusion that measures of this kind were required, what happened? Nothing was done. The House recessed at the end of June or at the beginning of July, against our protests.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We came back for two days in September to deal with a special problem at that time. We vigorously pressed for action to provide measures for the winter unemployment which circumstances at that time indicated would occur in Canada. But we were met with the story that everything was fine, everything was good, everything was rosy.

The Minister of Finance admits having gone around the country in June. He admits he knew what the problem was. But because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other hon. gentlemen opposite decided to call an election, then just as with the case of the Unemployment Insurance Fund, they hid the problem and did nothing about it. You do not turn on a winter works program like you turn on the tap on a beer keg. It takes time, it takes preparation, it takes notice. I come from a part of the country where there are a great many small communities that have to struggle desperately in order to provide the budgets they need for the social amenities for the people who live in them. In order for them to take advantage of a program of this kind they require several months notice. June, Mr. Speaker, is not too early at all. I say, shame on the government for its failure, having full and adequate knowledge of the facts, to act when it had an opportunity to do so.

There were as of January 688,000 unemployed people in Canada. How many will there be in February? What are the government's expectations that a program of this kind will have any alleviating effect during the balance of this winter? I suggest there will be very little indeed. It is true that, hopefully, this program might have some effect next year, but I think it is a shocking and shameful thing that it is February before we become involved for the first time in attempting to provide some measure of assistance through programs of this kind to the unemployed of this country. It is obvious—it has to be obvious—that the programs that will be engaged in will have little remedial effect during the balance of this winter, and the responsibility for this lies squarely at the door of hon. members opposite. The people of this country will not lightly forget that.

There are many other areas with which I could deal. The fact that this measure could well have been brought in in the form of a bill is one. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) thought it was a bill. This government has become accustomed to dealing with matters of this kind in the estimates with all the particulars, exceptions and provisos. I suggest it should have been brought in as a bill last spring or summer. An opportunity should have been given the House to send the measure to a standing committee composed of Members of Parliament with far more knowledge of the needs and requirements of the people of Canada than have my hon. friends opposite. There could then have been included as input to the bill the views and representations of constituents all over Canada.

It is manifestly wrong to attempt to provide measures dealing with unemployment though items in the estimates. Fortunately, through our ingenuity and because of a very wise decision which was made, we now have a little better opportunity to discuss the matter than we otherwise would have had. If that were not so, there would have been some limited debate in the committee, and if the matter had been taken up at the end of the period of allotted days an item involving $350 million would have received no debate at all. This is no way to deal with such an important measure as this.

I have so many more things to say, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that hon. members on both sides of the House want to discuss the matter so I will reserve any further comments until such time as we go into committee of the whole.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have often been asked whether, if a particular party were to take over the government, we would be able to do many of the things that are promised. Having watched the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), I think we would have to come to the conclusion that that would not be likely. I was very surprised this afternoon when he said that what he was doing was all right because his advisers had told him so. These were the same advisers who told the previous government that it was all right to do this, and probably they also told the government before that. I am equally sure they will tell the government yet to come the same thing. It is time we took a look once more at the rules of the House so as to give Members of Parliament the chance to make some input, instead of having civil servants who do not really care about how legislation is developed as long as it is developed along their own lines provide the input.

I do not agree with the argument of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Perhaps he did have to take advantage of the opportunity of putting down a notice, for the simple reason that this has been the precedent that we have recently developed. But I think the real problem with this piece of legislation is that which was outlined in the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). This estimate really is a bill. It has the power of a statute and it will be a statute because it will come in as another bill. It will become a statute following passage of the supplementary estimates. I say that is a lousy way of doing business; it is a terrible way to introduce legislation. This piece of legislation will be lousy legislation, and it will be bad for a number of reasons.

I totally agree that we need winter works projects. I have discussed this matter with a number of municipalities in my area and all agree they could probably scrape up some money if they could be given a long-term loan—which probably they cannot afford. If Members of Parliament would really think about supplying capital for winter works projects I am sure they would agree that there have to be certain criteria, and these cannot be outlined in supplementary estimates.

For example, let us suppose that the province of Ontario wants to use its three-year contribution of approximately $100 million to do something at the proposed Pickering airport. It is possible that the province of Ontario will find this a very useful winter works project in that area. Although the Minister of Finance said that he had discussed this proposition with all provinces six months ago, the fact is that in Ontario to the best of my knowledge there are no application forms yet available for these projects. We are already well into the month of February, and the maximum advantage to be derived from this legislation will end in the latter part of May.

Mr. Drury: You have not passed the bill.

Mr. Peters: We do not have a bill. What we are talking about here is an estimate that seeks to provide $350 million over a three-year period. I do not know that it is a good idea to do this in the form of an estimate and for a period exceeding one year, but I am not prepared to argue that point. What I am prepared to argue is that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is right and that there should be a bill. All Members of Parliament should know what are to be the criteria governing the expenditure of this money.

In some of the communities I represent in the province of Ontario there is an unemployment rate of 25 per cent. I suggest that if any capital works projects are to be started in those municipalities, one of the criteria should be that there be a reasonably high level of unemployment in the area. A sum of $100 million over a three-year period is roughly $30 million a year, and this will probably allow 300 communities a $10,000 grant for each of three years. Thousands of communities in northern Ontario have an unemployment rate of 25 per cent.

It has been mentioned that Quebec will receive $113 million and that the province has a total over-all unemployment rate of 10 per cent. If that amount is divided up among the municipalities of Quebec, then there will not be much forthcoming in the form of capital grants. The same can be said of the local initiatives program. When we ask people to submit good LIP programs, there is not nearly enough money to cover the majority of them. There is nothing wrong with the projects; it is just that there is not any more money.

If we are to be fair to Members of Parliament and to the country, and if we are to be fair to municipalities, which really will be the ones to take advantage of this provision, we will need to spell out how the municipalities are to apply, on what grounds they can apply and who is to get the money. Toronto, in Ontario, hogs practically all the money available. If the people there decide to build a subway, they do so. Whatever they decide to build or do, you name it, they do it. Anything they decide to build may not do the rest of Ontario much good. It is my opinion, and I am sure it is shared by most hon. members present, that if this measure were to be introduced in a bill, in the normal way, most hon. members would stipulate as one criterion to be followed, the level of unemployment existing in those municipalities which apply for these loans. As the amount of money involved is so small, I suggest that the level of unemployment in those communities would need to be rather high, probably over 30 per cent.

I am violently opposed to legislation of the type now before us. We tried to get rid of what are referred to as dollar items in the estimates. They were statutory items and legislative items. I think most people agreed when the committee changed the rules that those items ought not to be included in estimates. Legislation ought not to be introduced in the form of dollar items, because major amounts should not be spent without Members of Parliament being given an opportunity to discuss the issues involving those particular items. We have now passed that stage, and most Members of Parliament welcome that.

I do not agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he suggests that because someone else did this before or because we may list a number of projects that have been introduced in a similar manner that this is the right way to introduce the project being considered. He knew about this in June of last year and discussed it. I say this because I received, as all hon. members did, a sheaf of papers the other day indicating how the winter capital projects program would operate. The senior officials of municipal departments have known about it, as have officials of the province of Ontario. The matter has been discussed by some municipalities for some time. However, I did not know what was involved. I did not know who was going to make decisions and I did not know what the criteria were to be. I still do not know what the criteria are.

I suggest that we are not very honest in this House if we pass this kind of legislation, important though it is, and it is important. I agree that the three-year provision is necessary, because nothing will happen this year and the money will be applied to projects in the next two years. It takes that long to plan capital projects in most municipalities. However, I think we are dishonest if we pass this kind of legislation as a substitute for normal legislation introduced in the normal way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: This, Mr. Speaker, is a civil servant's dream, because he can make any kind of arrangement he wants with his provincial counterparts. He can make any kind of pork-barreling arrangement he wishes. Believe me, pork-barreling is not exclusively the prerogative of members of any legislative House, federal or provincial. The civil servants scratch each other's back all the time and this is an excellent opportunity to scratch somebody's back. Also, passing this item will not mean that winter capital projects will go to those municipalities most in need. They may not go to those municipalities that can provide the best type of permanent community activity, in view of the size of the expenditure to be made. Projects will be awarded to certain areas after provincial civil servants, in conjunction with their federal counterparts, have decided what is of most advantage to them.

I do not know why the Minister of Finance, who is a progressive, young and energetic person, even though he has been given a huge portfolio, has fallen into the trap of allowing the introduction of this type of legislation by estimate rather than by a bill. Surely, he agrees that criteria ought to be set out by Members of Parliament so that the municipalities can get the maximum benefit from the money. As I see it, we are putting up the money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Why should we allow the provinces to decide what the criteria are to be? Why should we allow civil servants to decide what those criteria are to be? Why should we operate this winter works capital project by regulation rather than by legislation? On those grounds, Mr. Speaker, I do not support this type of legislation by estimate.

The minister said this type of program is required. Sure, it is required; there is no argument about that, but it is wrong to legislate this way. This is the same as passing a dollar item. It is wrong to enact legislation by the device of using dollar items in the estimates. We agreed it was wrong and we got rid of that practice; yet we are doing exactly the same thing under this supplementary estimate. I do not know whether the House would be agreeable to standing this particular item, in order to give the minister an opportunity to bring in a bill to implement the objective of the estimate. Obviously, he must know what that bill would contain, because if we pass this estimate, it would be as if we passed a bill which would become a statute. That bill would have no more in it than you see in the estimate. It will not deal with criteria; it will not set the levels of unemployment in municipalities that may take advantage of this measure. The estimate does not say how much the interest rate is to be.

Mr. Drury: Yes, it does.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Peters: Well, I do not read it that way, but it may say that. Certainly, my Social Credit friends who may be more interested in interest rates than I am do not read it that way. I do not think the Minister of Finance said what the rate is to be. In this item of the estimates we are not told what the basis of the winter capital works project is to be. I think it is wrong to do it this way. I do not think this item meets the needs that I should like to see met in these kinds of projects.

Let me add this, however. I believe the idea is excellent. I believe the proposition is good and I think the three-year provision is to be commended. All the same, I believe we ought to know how the money is to be spent. I am sick and tired of seeing money given to the provinces and seeing them pork-barrel it among themselves, if one may use that expression. This, apparently, will be another instance of that. Let the federal government be given some of the credit for the program. We ought to set the criteria; we ought to decide interest rates and, certainly, we ought to have some input in these programs. Every time I discuss a LIP program I hear officials in Toronto say, "We have to talk to the people in Ottawa before any decision can be made." We do not really make the decisions, Mr. Speaker. The same thing will happen with the winter capital works projects, and I think it is wrong.

May I call it six o'clock in order to give the minister an opportunity to consider a very serious proposition.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may we have an indication, possibly from the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance, as to whether we are to continue with this matter?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

At 6.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LEGAL RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the delegation from the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs that "perhaps you have more legal rights than we thought you had when we did the white paper". I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Taylor):

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be convened immediately and that the Prime Minister be asked to appear before the committee to clarify the government's position with regard to the legal rights of native people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

AIRPORTS

RECONSIDERATION OF PROTESTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. It may be that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) or one of his colleagues would like to second it. If so, I should be glad if he would so indicate. I would move, as follows:

The landing of STOL aircraft in Rockcliffe having been stalled as the result of a citizen protest headed by Mrs. John Turner, this House calls on the government to indicate that it will reconsider the protests with respect to Sea Island Airport and the proposed Pickering Airport when it learns that those protests are headed, respectively, by Mrs. Ron Basford and Mrs. Alastair Gillespie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair heard two or three members say no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER PROTECTION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 with respect to the continuing danger of flooding in the lower mainland of British Columbia. Therefore I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the Minister of the Environment be urged to give priority to discussions with the province of British Columbia for the purpose of developing and financing a program on the Fraser River that would remove this annual fear and safeguard the property and lives of residents of the valley and lower mainland area.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I solicit unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of very urgent importance to all eastern producers concerning feed grains.

Since the hon. minister had committed himself to setting up a new policy in this field through consultation and that this morning the Union des producteurs agricoles and the Coopérative fédérée du Québec seceded from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, thus breaking off any possible negotiations, the matter seems to me so urgent and important that it should be dealt with as thoroughly as possible.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault):

That a special debate take place following an agreement between parliamentary leaders in order to deal as soon as possible with the new situation related to the development of a nation-wide feed grain policy giving fair consideration to the rights of all producers, in all parts of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimity, the motion cannot be put.

GRAIN

SURVEY FIGURES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pertaining to the refusal of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to disclose figures, when available, in the Canadian Wheat Board's current grain survey. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That this House instructs the minister to forthwith direct the Canadian Wheat Board to make available the information in the grain survey undertaken by it and to make public that information as to grain supplies on hand at the present time of the survey.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the item "Motions" on the agenda. My point of order is that this is the first opportunity available to the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), following the meetings he had yesterday with representatives of the Nishga Tribal Council and the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs, to make a statement to the House about the government's position with regard to aboriginal rights. I rise on this point of order not only because it is the first opportunity but especially because there is public indication that the position of the government and the Prime Minister has definitely shifted on the question of aboriginal rights and specifically because a letter was addressed this morning by my leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether this is a point of order. The hon. member might indicate how it is a point of order. It seems to be a question the hon. member might want to ask later.

Mr. Howard: I wish you would not have asked me to do that, Mr. Speaker. The point is that the Prime Minister has not taken this opportunity to disclose his feelings about aboriginal rights to the House and the public, and I think that is shameful.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ABSENTEE BALLOTING

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-140, to amend the Canada Elections Act (a form of absentee balloting).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, there is a provision in the Canada Elections Act now whereby a resident in a rural polling division may vote by swearing in and being vouched for, even though his name may not appear on the voters' list. The purpose of this bill is to extend that provision to people ordinarily resident in urban polling divisions and also to permit a person to vote by using in effect an absentee ballot or swearing in within his own constituency.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO REFER REPORT OF JOINT STUDY GROUP ON BASIC RATE OF PENSION TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Government notices of motions:

February 6, 1973—The Minister of Veterans Affairs moved:

That the report of the joint study group on basic rate of pensions, tabled January 31, 1973, be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 26 to ask leave to move a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the question of aboriginal rights. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the House do now adjourn and that a discussion on aboriginal rights in Canada be held.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request an opportunity to debate, under the provisions of Standing Order 26, the question of the aboriginal rights of Indians.

Hon. members know how difficult it is for the Chair to reach a decision under the terms of Standing Order 26, and in view of this I have given the usual very serious consideration to a notice given under the terms of that Standing Order. As hon. members know, it is only in very special circumstances meeting the specific requirements of the Standing Order that the ordinary business of the House can be set aside for the purpose of an emergency debate. The Chair has to take into account, particularly, whether the situation sought to be debated is one which is in the nature of a sudden emergency requiring the immediate consideration of the House and, in addition, whether there might be other opportunities for debate.

On the first point, the fact that the matter has been referred to in debate on so many occasions during the past weeks suggests that the situation is not one which would normally justify an adjournment under Standing Order 26 in spite of the special circumstances referred to in one of the motions under Standing Order 43 earlier this afternoon. Hon. members may have noted that there is a notice of motion dealing with essentially the same question standing in the name of the hon. member for the Northwest Territories. It may also be recalled that the hon. member for Skeena as well as the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands have proposed motions under the provisions of Standing Order 43 dealing with the same question. Such a motion was proposed earlier today by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands and a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Skeena. These motions, and the point of order, dealt essentially with the same question. On several other occasions this session questions have been put forward leading to an exchange of views seeking ways and means of arriving at a solution to this problem.

The Chair recognizes that there are unique circumstances attendant upon this question, and while it is not my intention to close the gate on the possibility of a debate on this subject it is my feeling that a more effective vehicle could be found for a debate. I regret to say that the nature and the complexity of the many aspects of this problem, as well as the requirements of the Standing Order, suggest to me that the matter should not be put forward for debate at this time under the provisions of the Standing Order.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED ALLOWANCE AS DEDUCTION OF FEES PAID CONSULTANTS BY INDIVIDUAL TAXPAYERS—REPRESENTATIONS FOR POSTPONEMENT OF DEADLINE FOR FILING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he is prepared to permit individual Canadian taxpayers preparing their forms to deduct reasonable fees paid to tax consultants in view of the severe difficulty ordinary income taxpayers will encounter when they face the nine-page challenge that his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, is trying to persuade people is really quite simple?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Is the Minister of Finance prepared, because this comes under his jurisdiction, to recommend to the House that arrangements be made to permit deduction for income tax purposes of reasonable fees paid to tax consultants by the ordinary Canadian?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble to the hon. gentleman's question. The answer, of course, would be a budgetary item in any event.

Mr. Stanfield: I suppose this is such a big step for the government to take that it has to wait for the budget. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue whether representations have been received from firms of accountants or tax consultants seeking the postponement of the deadline for the filing of tax forms in view of the complexity of the forms and, consequently, the additional demands for their services which they are unable to meet within the deadline?

• (1420)

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): As I have said previously, Mr. Speaker, there has been some suggestion that there might be an extension of the date for filing income tax returns, but I do not think there is any precedent for this and no decision has been taken on the matter. I might say that I am sure that the hon. Leader of the Opposition would not want to encourage most Canadians to think that it will be a difficult task to complete the tax form.

Mr. Hees: You do not have to encourage them; they know perfectly well it is.

Mr. Horner: Why advertise it so much if it is not difficult?

Mr. Stanbury: I think hon. members might take note of the analysis by Mr. Ken Hall, I think it was, in the Calgary Herald, who said that after looking at the form he found that it was no more frightening than Brigitte Bardot in a bikini.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, now that the minister has repeated his indication that he is considering a deferment of the deadline for the filing of these tax forms, can he tell the Canadian people whether there will in fact be a deferment of the deadline, or does this too have to wait for the budget? Or is the minister really indicating to the House today that he has been thinking about it but in view of the fact that it shatters all precedent he is not in fact prepared to recommend an extension of the deadline?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I think what I said was that it had been requested, but one of the bases for the request was that at that time it was expected there would be some delay in distributing the personalized forms. Actually they went out at about the same time this year as they have in the past.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, my question is in the general area but is not supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary South on a supplementary.

COST OF ADVERTISING RESPECTING 1972 FORM

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of National Revenue. Would the minister indicate to the House the ultimate cost to the taxpayer of the tax advertisement, "It's new and easier than it looks", and what it has cost to date for television, radio and so on?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question could be placed on the order paper. The hon. member for Moose Jaw on a supplementary.

Mr. Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Moose Jaw but the hon. member for Calgary North is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I think that ruling may have been made in a little haste.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Woolliams: Surely hon. members are prepared to hear me out. With the greatest respect, this is a very serious matter. These are difficult forms. We have seen today a misrepresentation of the facts about those forms, as has been the case for weeks. What we are looking for from the government are forthright answers on this subject. I would ask Your Honour to permit the hon. member for Calgary South to rephrase his question so that we can get some answers on this very serious matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Moose Jaw. The hon. member for Calgary South did rise, obviously wanting to ask a supplementary, and he will be given that right in a moment.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING CLAIMS FOR DEPRECIATION BY FARMERS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the 1972 farmers' and fishermens' tax guide could create some misunderstanding on the part of farmers with respect to their claiming depreciation, would the minister undertake to inform farmers that they may continue to use Part XVII of the regulations for depreciation of assets acquired prior to December 31, 1971, and that it is only with respect to assets acquired after December 31 that Part XI should be used?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to have that looked into.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON COST OF ADVERTISING RESPECTING 1972 FORM

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Would he be prepared to make a statement on motions as to the cost of running these advertisements across the country?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): That would be rather odd, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member's own colleagues have quoted a figure in the House. There is no secret about it. It is about in proportion to the amount spent by the governments of Ontario, Manitoba and Quebec on advertising their new tax departures this year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, will the minister advise the House how Mr. Fred Davis is qualified to advise Canadians on their tax matters?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this question is not in order. I recognize the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF OFFICE HOURS TO ASSIST TAXPAYERS SEEKING INFORMATION

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Give it to him, Joe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Sock it to him, Joe.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would he now give consideration to the possibility of extending the office hours of income tax offices throughout the country so it will be more convenient for citizens to appear at these offices to get the additional information they require?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an excellent suggestion.

An hon. Member: And a necessary one.

Mr. Stanbury: I have asked my officials to give it careful consideration. I just want them to try to be sure that the cost of doing it does not add to the burden of Canadian taxpayers too greatly.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

BODY RESPONSIBLE FOR FORECASTING TRENDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement made in the House yesterday by the Minister of Finance that he has never been in the business of forecasting, would the right hon. gentleman please inform the House what ministry or other body or unit within the government is responsible for forecasting economic trends in order to assist policy-making in this area?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, the Economic Council of Canada under its legislative authority has a mandate—

Mr. Hees: You have never paid the slightest attention to anything they have said to you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but the ebullience of some members of the House made it impossible for me to hear the Prime Minister's answer. With your permission, perhaps he might repeat it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I indicated that under its legislation the Economic Council of Canada was involved in the business of looking at the medium and long-term trends of the economy. Of course, the government is not without advice from its own internal advisers. We discuss these problems in cabinet and, indeed, I am sure the minister discusses them with his officials. When a budget is brought down they give the House and the country as much knowledge as possible about the economy, past, present and future.

SHORT-TERM MONETARY AND FISCAL TARGETS OR OTHER TOOLS USED IN ARRIVING AT POLICIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance arising from the fact that he seems to me to be confusing forecasting with prophesying, and no one is asking him to prophesy. I should like to ask him to indicate to the House what short-term targets he has set for his monetary and fiscal policies and, in particular, the rate of unemployment in the short term? If he has decided not to set targets, would he please inform the House what other tools he and his advisers are using for arriving at policies to manage the economy?

An hon. Member: The NDP.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this again is a debating point. I said yesterday that certain hon. gentlemen look specifically at some of the important targets in respect of unemployment and prices but, as the Economic Council of Canada pointed out, they are all interrelated and we really should be speaking in terms of targets over a range of 14 or 15 indicators. I said as well that there is a risk that targets might be confused in the public mind with forecasts. This is very difficult to do in a vulnerable economy like Canada's where we are so influenced by interrelated trade and price movements.

An hon. Member: A vulnerable government, you mean.

• (1430)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget, will talk a little more sense. May I ask him whether he can give the House the reason for the resignation from his department of Cyril D. Hodgins, who was director of economic analysis, and particularly—I ask this seriously—whether his resignation was a consequence of the minister's attitude toward economic targets and guiding the economy on the basis of having the courage to set economic targets?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That assertion of the hon. gentleman about Mr. Hodgins is unworthy of him. Mr Hodgins left because of other opportunities and, as a matter of fact, remains in close touch with the department on a contract basis. I deny that assertion very strongly. As for my speaking sense on budget night, I will do so if the hon. member can give me the same undertaking.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the Minister of Finance a moment ago that it is difficult to make forecasts and that he was reluctant to make them, I should like to ask the minister why he forecast with such emphasis during the budget speech that more jobs would be created during 1972 than in 1971 and that food prices would go up less in 1972 than in 1971?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. gentleman play with his selective memory in the hope that he can influence the House and the country with selective recall of facts and statistics. As a matter of fact, I find that the Leader of the Opposition is playing a rather cynical game of distorted numbers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members who wish to ask supplementary questions. They will be recognized, but first the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse and then return to this matter in a short while.

AGRICULTURE

DISSENSION WITHIN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE ON FEED GRAIN POLICY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board.

As the minister in charge of the board recently gave an outline of the government feed grain marketing policy to the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and since Quebec producers were represented by the Union des producteurs du Québec and the Coopérative fédérée, is the minister aware of the scission recently brought about by the departure of the representatives of the UPA and the Coopérative fédérée from the ranks of the CFA over a difference of opinion on the important matter of feed grains?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been following very closely the differences of view in the country both within different regions and between different regions with regard to this question. What I did indicate before the Canadian Federation of Agriculture yesterday was the confidence of the government about implementation of the principle with which all parties involved agree, namely that feed grains ought to be available to producers of animals across the country at prices which are equitable from one region to another. All parties agree with that and the Speech from the Throne adopted that principle. We also indicated that prior to the beginning of the next crop year we would have in place a solution that would stop the situation of several years ago from occurring again. So far as I know that is accepted by the Co-op Fédérée, among others, as a very important step in ensuring the principle to which, as I say, all parties in fact agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

In view of the encouraging answer the minister has just given the House, can he tell us whether he intends to introduce legislation, as announced in the Speech from the Throne, to remedy a situation that is growing more serious every day?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as regards the immediate situation I think most persons, including the producers and the organization to which the hon. member refers, realize that we are not in the difficulty we were in a year or two ago and, indeed, that the Canadian Wheat Board has been offering feed grains to eastern Canadian producers at prices below the prices they could have obtained from foreign sources. They do this in recognition of the importance of the eastern feed grain market to the western producers. Of course the Minister of Agriculture and I will be discussing the particular solutions we propose with the various interested agricultural groups. I do not expect that a bill will be involved in the solution, but that is still a possibility.

FEED GRAIN—SUGGESTED ADDITIONAL SUBSIDY TO ASSIST FARMERS IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Minister of Justice has reaffirmed the federal government's commitment to solve the feed grain marketing issue before the end of July and has stated that Ottawa is considering easing Wheat Board control over the interprovincial movement of feed grain and that a bill would not be presented, is the government considering additional subsidies to defray expenses so that farmers in Atlantic Canada may buy feed grains at prices in line with those presently being paid in the west?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is in fact the situation at the moment. I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding in different regions of the country about the great cost involved in transportation, handling and, indeed, in the cost of services like storage or taking the risk of carrying grain. Those differences naturally are reflected in price differences between one region and another. The government will be looking at the whole range of alternatives in an attempt to improve the situation and essentially to ensure that the situation of a year or so ago does not occur again, namely, that distress priced grain is available in one region and only much higher priced grain is available in other regions.

FEED GRAIN AND MILK—INCLUSION IN AGENDA OF NEXT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is it his intention to follow up on the statement made yesterday night by the Quebec Premier that he intends to move that the matter of feed grains and of milk prices be included in the agenda of the next federal-provincial conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is possible, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec Premier has made such a statement but I am not aware of it; he will undoubtedly write to me about it. The House knows that when the agenda of these conferences is established, any reasonable request by the provinces is taken into account.

FEED GRAIN—SUGGESTED ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO WESTERN PRODUCERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat

Board. In view of the fact that the western grain farmer is now subsidizing the eastern feeder to the tune of about eight or ten cents a bushel, does the government intend to compensate the growers of feed grains in western Canada for that loss?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it would be wrong indeed to refer to the pricing practice of the moment as a subsidy by anyone to anyone else. The Canadian Wheat Board, which the hon. member certainly ordinarily supports, has made a decision about the selling practices it ought to adopt in order to protect the market in eastern Canada for western Canada feed grain as one of the most important markets in fact available to the western producers of grain.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again there are a number of members seeking to ask supplementaries. I think I owe it to hon. members to indicate there must be a limit to supplementary questions because from day to day we manage to consider only two or three matters. I know I hear from other members who are deprived from day to day of an opportunity to ask questions, and we perhaps are being unfair to these hon. members. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my question is not a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

URBAN AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMUNICATIONS SPIRE IN PROPOSED TORONTO METRO CENTRE—POSSIBILITY OF FLIGHT HAZARD

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question with regard to the 1,800 foot thing that is going to be built in Toronto. I do not know whether it has been named. Has the minister assured himself through his departmental officials that this does not in fact constitute a very serious flight hazard, particularly for Toronto Island airport but also for the main international airport at Malton? Specifically, has the Department of Transport given the planners authority or approval for a structure of this height?

• (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, ever since it has been announced that a tower would be built in Toronto, first by the Canadian Pacific and then by the Canadian National, contacts have been made with our department, studies have been carried out not only about Malton, but also about the Hamilton airport and the one which is planned for Pickering. It has been concluded that the tower will not be a hazard for air traffic.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—MAINTENANCE OF RIGHTS OF CULTURAL GROUPS FOLLOWING TAKEOVER OF RADIO STATION CKSB BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism. Can he give us his assurance that the takeover by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of radio station CKSB in Winnipeg, which until now has been functioning as a multilingual station, will not result in the loss of the customary rights enjoyed by other cultural groups than those using the two official languages?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with my colleagues in the cabinet and everything possible is being done.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would the minister ensure that the hearing on the application to take over CKSB, now scheduled by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to be held in Montreal on February 19, will be transferred to Winnipeg so that the people concerned can be heard?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I have made representations on this matter to the chairman of the CRTC.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the electrifying and earth-shattering statement by the head in the Prime Minister's office that the Prime Minister has formed a new emotional attachment with the Canadian people, will the Minister of State not discuss this matter with the Prime Minister, or is this posture merely related only to the statement made last month by the Prime Minister that the primary responsibility of the government is to stay in office?

An hon. Member: Valentine's day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MULTICULTURALISM—POLICY OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and it is in respect of the change in radio station CKSB. Will the Secretary of State ask the Commissioner of Official Languages to investigate the report that it is CBC policy not to allow languages other than French and English to be used over its facilities and whether this is in keeping with rule 38 of the Official Languages Act?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that any citizen can make such a representation to the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Oral Questions

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

APPROVAL OF CAPITAL BUDGET FOR 1972-73

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister yet approved the capital budget for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the fiscal year 1972-73?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice so my answer can be entirely accurate.

[Later:]

Mr. Grier: My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and it is further to the question I asked the Minister of Finance. Will the minister assure the House that he will see to it that capital budget is approved and tabled in the House before Bill C-133 comes up for second reading?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to do that, but the capital budget would be examined in the committee when the estimates of the corporation are examined, and I would not want the passage of Bill C-133 delayed for that purpose.

FISHERIES

HERRING—ESTABLISHMENT OF CLOSING LINES IN PLACENTIA AND ST. MARY'S BAYS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. In view of the importance of the herring fishery to Newfoundland and to parts of my riding and in view of the fact insufficient research has been carried out to determine the quantities of stocks, will the minister say whether it is the government's intention to impose closing lines in certain bays—I am thinking primarily of Placentia Bay and St. Mary's Bay in my riding—to protect the existing herring stocks against possible depletion?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have set up a herring management committee for that area which is comprised of fishermen, representatives of the industry and so on, and I am awaiting recommendations from that committee, in the very near future.

Mr. Carter: I wonder if the minister would assure the House, again in view of the importance of this industry, whether sufficient data does exist and sufficient research has been carried out to enable the department to set quotas in these bays?

Mr. Davis: We have set over-all quotas, but I am looking to this industry committee for specific recommendations on quotas for individual bays.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HULL, QUEBEC—MEASURES TO RESPECT BILINGUALISM IN NEW DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT OFFICES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Minister of Environment.

Can he tell the House if he has taken steps so that bilingualism will be respected among civil servants working in the Fontaine Building in Hull and to make sure that the French-speaking employees of that department may work in their mother tongue?

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER—DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON PROTECTIVE WORKS

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the annual fear of those on the lower mainland of British Columbia regarding the flood situation, may I ask whether there have been any recent discussions with the government of British Columbia on the question of diking, dredging or other works on the Fraser River to offset the flood danger?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had a meeting with the minister of lands, forest and waters from British Columbia. I have also sent him several letters offering to extend the agreement, both in terms of dollars and in terms of the percentage of the federal contribution to the total cost of these dikes.

Mr. Patterson: May I ask whether there has been any agreement between the federal and provincial governments on the request that the two senior levels of government share the capital cost of any such works on a 50-50 formula?

Mr. Davis: The 1968 agreement adopts a 45-45-10 cost sharing formula. It is the local 10 per cent share that is at issue. We are prepared to go as high as 50 per cent of the total amount at the federal level.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

INCREASE IN DEPARTMENTS AND BUILDINGS IN OTTAWA—FUTURE POLICY

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. I want to assure him that in light of the forthcoming budget I consider it an important question. In view of the proliferation of government buildings and departments throughout Ottawa, which shocks me as one who has returned to this city after several years absence, and in view of the government's stated intention to buy more property on Wellington Street, will the Prime Minister state what, if any, are the limits to government growth in Ottawa?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that if the Prime Minister is going to give this information he would give it by way of a statement on motions. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase his question along those lines.

Mr. Roche: May I ask the Prime Minister, in light of the increase in the civil service by 10 per cent over the past year, whether this is an influencing factor in determining taxation in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might attempt to answer in the way you indicated would be in order, I will not be making a statement along those lines, but perhaps the Minister of Public Works might take it into consideration.

OPENING OF NEW BUILDING IN HULL—HIRING OF CONSULTANTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Public Works. Can he explain why he hired outside consultants for $120,000 to open a new government building in Hull rather than using the services of Information Canada?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is not correct to assert that it was merely for the opening of the building. The money will be spent on promotion of the shops, boutiques and restaurants which will bring in money to the government of Canada and make the building very interesting.

Mr. Paproski: This is not the first time that the services of this company have been engaged. Is the department following a policy of bypassing Information Canada? After all, they have been spending millions of dollars and nobody wants to use them. What is the matter with them?

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM—POLICY OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the government's repeated statements about its desire to encourage multiculturalism in this country, would the minister discuss with the senior officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation their policy of banning broadcasting of programs in various languages on stations which are or will be purchased by the CBC?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the CBC's operations are governed by the Broadcasting Act. We did receive a letter. The Minister of State responsible for multiculturalism received a copy of the letter from the Ukrainian community to the president of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. I take it that in time it will be replied to, but I suggest that the most—

• (1450)

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Faulkner: —correct course would probably be to raise this matter, following the reply of the president of the CRTC, in the committee when the CBC appears before it.

Mr. Hueglin: In view of the fact that CKSB—I am sorry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North who raised the question should be allowed the first supplementary.

Mr. Orlikow: Is the minister suggesting by his answer that he has no right to discuss government policy in regard to broadcasting with the CBC and the government's desires and the desires of all the people of Canada?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, if it is simply a question of whether or not I am prepared to discuss it with the CBC; of course, I am prepared to do that.

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom that CKSB has been a functioning multilingual station in Winnipeg. Would the minister assure us that when it is taken over it will continue to be so rather than being forced to be French and/or English?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Boniface rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the House that station CKSB is situated in the centre of St. Boniface and has indeed for several years provided services not only to French Canadians in the west, but also to all other ethnic groups.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING LEGAL RIGHTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. the Prime Minister. In view of the right hon. gentleman's statement to a delegation of the Union of British Columbia Indian Chiefs that "perhaps you have more legal rights than we thought you had when we did the white paper", can the Prime Minister now tell the House whether the government has changed the position it took in the 1969 white paper and, if so, when will a formal statement be made to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the quotation by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands is reasonably accurate in the sense that it did reflect some of the things said yesterday. I should point out, however, that I indicated also that if one aspect of the opinions expressed by the court was to be accepted by the Indian people and the rest of Canadians it would be to the effect that they were claiming not aboriginal rights but legal rights and this would be the case with the Nishga Indians. To that degree the position we put forward a few years ago on aboriginal rights is not affected by this judgment. It is true to say, however, that the judgment has indicated new possibilities for their legal rights, and we have asked the Department of Justice to advise us further on the consequences of some of the opinions expressed. As for the statement requested by the hon. member, we would plan some time in the future to make public the position on the whole matter of Indians, which we think would be updated by the experience we have had in communicating with them over the past few years and by the various briefs they have submitted to various courts.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister's remarks with respect to the legal rights, as he calls them, of Indians be confined only to the Nishga people or would they be applicable to all Indian people? If the answer is yes, would they be applicable to the whole of the native population?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the statement referred to by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands was an opinion I expressed to the Nishga people, and the judgment that they were referring to of course concerns the Nishga tribe in their dealings with the government of British Columbia. I believe it would be the intention of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, assisted by his able parliamentary secretary, to meet with the government of British Columbia to see how they react to the opinions expressed in the judgment brought down by the Supreme Court.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Because this matter takes on additional urgency every day, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could be a little more precise in terms of an announcement by his government on the question of aboriginal rights generally? Could he inform the House with more precision when that statement might be made?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I could not honestly think that the statement to which I referred would be forthcoming before at least a couple of months. We are, of course, prepared to have the minister and other officials deal with all aspects of the Department of Indian Affairs when the estimates come before the parliamentary committee. I understand that will be reasonably soon.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST THAT SPECIAL COMMITTEE BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary. Inasmuch as the Prime Minister is going to get some advice from the Department of Justice about the Supreme Court decision, may I address my supplementary to the government House leader and ask whether he is in a position to adopt the suggestion made by my colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories, that a special committee be established to examine the question of aboriginal rights so that this type of input will be considered as well and not just the narrow one of the Department of Justice?

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite prepared to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Northwest Territories but if it will facilitate the early discussion of the question that has been raised I would be prepared, instead of waiting for the reference of the estimates to the standing committee, to consider the possibility of sending the annual report to the committee, which would give the members on the steering committee the opportunity to decide the framework of the discussions that might take place within that committee. I have not undertaken that action up to the present time because of the developing situation and especially in view of the comments made yesterday by the Indians in question that they were not keen or did not want this matter to be examined at the present time by a parliamentary committee. That was very much in my mind in not reaching a decision to refer the report to the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: That is just the Nishga.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I do not make this remark in an unkind sense but I think the last statement of the President of the Privy Council should certainly carry with it the thought that the expression attributed to the delegation that met with the Prime Minister arose because they thought the Prime Minister was on their side.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands for a last supplementary and then we will try before the end of the question period to have two or three quick questions.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Privy Council. Would he now give consent to the motion I moved the other day under Standing Order 43 that the annual report of the department be referred to the standing committee?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to put it down as a government order at this stage.

SPORTS

ASSURANCE THAT MONTREAL OLYMPIC STADIUM WILL NOT BE USED FOLLOWING GAMES BY POSSIBLE TEAM IN UNITED STATES FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. the Prime Minister. If one can accept the principle that the Canadian Football League is a unifying force in Canada, and in light of the proposed 80,000 seat stadium to be built in Montreal, can the right hon. gentleman give an assurance to the Canadian people that in the aftermath of the Olympic games the stadium will not be used as a point of entry for the American football league?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a sort of hypothetical question but in so far as it is based on facts I would point out to the hon. member that the matter of amateur sports and physical fitness comes under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

HEALTH

ACTION TO ENSURE TESTING OF DRUGS BY MANUFACTURERS TO DEMONSTRATE SAFETY AND EFFICACY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He may want to take it as notice or answer by a statement on motions. In view of mounting evidence of the existence of questionable drug manufacturers and questionable prescription products on the market in Canada, and in view of the tendency of provinces to allow pharmacists to substitute on prescriptions without the permission of the physician or the patient, can the minister assure me that the health protection branch will take action to ensure that prior to the initial distribution of a drug product or modification of an existing product every manufacturer will be obligated to perform tests which are appropriate and sufficient to demonstrate the clinical safety and efficacy claimed for the product?

• (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to thank the hon. member for raising this question with me earlier. I had the opportunity of discussing it with him. As he knows, the department has very elaborate control procedures at present with regard to drugs. However, in the light of the recent articles that have been published I have asked for a full report on this question and I might be able to give further information to the hon. member later.

As a result of the decision taken by the Union des producteurs agricoles to withdraw from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture concerning the problem of feed grain does the minister intend to receive the representatives of the Union des producteurs agricoles and the Coopérative Fédérée in order to clarify the feed grain situation as soon as possible?

URBAN AFFAIRS

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMUNICATIONS SPIRE IN PROPOSED METRO TORONTO CENTRE—REQUEST FOR DELAY

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and is supplementary to the question asked earlier on the construction in Toronto of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific communications needle. As development agreements between the city of Toronto and the developers, that is to say, CN and CP, with regard to Metro Toronto Centre in which the needle will be found in future, have not been finalized and as, particularly, there have been extremely significant changes in the composition of the council of the city of Toronto over the past few months, would the minister give serious consideration to having the start of construction of the communications tower delayed until further deliberations can take place between the developers and the city of Toronto?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the City of Toronto and the CNR are having constant consultations on this matter. At first the contacts were between the CPR and the corporation which these two companies had created, and I cannot see why at this time we should delay the building of the tower.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the end of the question period. Perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River on a quick question and then close the question period with a question from the Leader of the Opposition.

IMMIGRATION

ALLEGED PLAN TO ATTRACT IMMIGRANTS TO THE LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the fact that there seems to be no let-up in the high unemployment statistics, can the minister tell the House if he has any plans at this time to accelerate his recruitment program to attract a larger number of new citizens to Canada, in particular workmen who would be employed in the lumber industry?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. This report, which I believe was in a west coast newspaper, is erroneous. It arises from the fact that in the ordinary course we are training foreign service officers, that is to say, immigration officers, for work abroad. There are 25 such foreign service officers just returned or on rotation leave in Canada and they are to be oriented toward Canadian industry so that they may do their jobs better in their assignments abroad. However, there is no special program to recruit immigrants with any particular skill at this time. Actually, we are adopting a rather low key approach abroad to immigration at this time. This hiring and training happens every year. We think it is rather good practice to have our people reoriented toward Canada after they have been away for some time or before they go abroad.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST THAT MINISTER ATTEND AT RICHMOND, B.C., TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ON EXPROPRIATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is he prepared to go to Richmond, British Columbia, and, if so, when, to answer questions of concerned citizens who are disturbed about the airport expropriation proceedings? I ask this question particularly of the minister because officials have indicated there are certain questions they cannot answer as they are only civil servants. If the minister is prepared to go we would be prepared, of course, to allow him pairing privileges.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, last night there was a public meeting attended by more than 100 people, in the Sea Island area more precisely, to allow public servants to answer questions. Some of these were of a very technical nature, such as the explanation of the CNR system, that is Composite Noise Reading and another called NEF, or Noise Exposure Factor which is also quite a sophisticated system. All the computations must be redone for each request in order to explain one system in relation to the other.

This is the question which officials of the department could not answer immediately. This is strictly a technical question. As to the other answers, these people were able to get them.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader about the business of the House for this week and next week, bearing in mind the announcement of the Minister of Finance that, finally, he will be able to make the budget speech on Monday night which would take us right up to next Monday, the nineteenth.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue today with the business of supply. If we conclude that today we would continue with the amendments to the Criminal Code followed, probably, by the bills on housing, on foreign investment and on crop insurance. If the business of supply is not completed today, I may feel obliged to vary the order in which I may call the other items.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, as a further question, could I ask the minister when he will take steps to activate the various standing committees? I particularly bring to his attention the need to activate forthwith the new joint committee on statutory instruments in light of the very large task that the committee will have in dealing with the large number of orders in council, regulations and decrees that are being issued.

Mr. Stanfield: Secretly.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will take steps to activate the joint committee, although I am surprised that my hon. friend would consider having such a joint committee in view of his recent estrangement from the other place.

Mr. Bell: They are doing a good job now.

Mr. Baldwin: It is provided for in the Standing Orders.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the President of the Privy Council if he could indicate to the House if he intends to start other talks as early as this week so that the House will be able to decide about the new electoral map proposed by the commission?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I take a risk in even discussing this subject, in view of my junior status in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I have already had discussions with the other juniors who sit with me in that room and I am awaiting a response from them as to what the next step might be. If there is need for a discussion, I will have it at an early date.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on another point of order? The question period has ended and I think other questions cannot be permitted at this time.

However, as the Chair has allowed the hon. member to ask his question, he may now ask a supplementary and I will then recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

A meeting of House leaders took place this week and I was told yesterday by the hon. minister that a second meeting would be organized to take action on this matter. My question is as follows. Does he intend to officially call for a new meeting of House leaders so that this matter can be settled as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will try to organize that meeting as soon as possible; tomorrow, if possible.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I follow up the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River and direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance, as the case may be. Since the budget date has been announced and since the Standing Orders normally require the estimates to be brought before the House before March 1, can the President of the Treasury Board indicate when we will get the main estimates for this year?

• (1510)

Mr. Drury: I hope before March 1, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we normally get them before the budget as well. Will we be getting them before the budget?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will recognize that the budget this year is earlier than usual and, consequently, there is some confusion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise with respect to the business of the House that was announced by the President of the Privy Council. May I ask him whether the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act will be tabled in the House next week so that we will know the amount by which pensions are being increased before we get to the budget?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already discussed this question with my colleagues. There is a possibility but not certainty that it will happen next week.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to get your eye for the past two days. I appreciate the difficulty, but as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has asked the House leader about a matter of order of government business, I feel I can ask just as basic a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I am coming to it. I have been waiting for two days and I can wait a lot longer. In view of the fact the Minister of Communications made a very interesting speech last night, the first real policy speech he has made in four years, and it is four years late, will the House leader consult with the Minister of Communications to find out when that minister intends to lay before the House the green paper setting out proposals for telecommunications and a communications policy?

While the House leader is discussing that with the Minister of Communications to try to clarify this House business, can he also find out from the Minister of Communications whether the rationalization of the legislative and regulatory authority for broadcasting and telecommunications means there will be one authority merging the CRTC, the CTC and DOT? If he can do this, Mr. Speaker, it might save some questions next week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously a question. Hon. members will appreciate that the question period expired more than 10 minutes ago. The Chair was lenient in allowing points of order which were not really points of order. The hon. member for Peace River rose on a point of order to ask about the House business. If every Thursday this is going to bring on an additional 10 or 15 minute question period, these matters will have to be asked as questions and not as points of order. The question has been asked. If the President of the Privy Council can reply briefly, he will be allowed to do so.

Mr. MacEachen: With regard to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that that document will probably be laid on the table in the spring.

An hon. Member: Which spring?

Mr. MacEachen: In connection with the second part of the question, I am afraid I cannot answer that.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Oh,oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member wants to ask a supplementary question. Obviously, he was asking a question. This was done with the indulgence of the House. If the hon. member wants to ask a supplementary question, the House must allow it.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would not mind waiting until tomorrow. I will give him some kind of priority so that he can ask all his supplementaries then.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a question of privilege, in a sense. You have me out of the way today but I do not think I am going to be here tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I know that makes you happy. However, since I have started, may I just finish with one supplementary?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously when the Chair attempts to be helpful and lenient to hon. members we get into so many difficulties that there is not much inducement or encouragement for the Chair to do this.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I quite agree with the dilemma and the difficulty in which the Chair finds itself. I do not mind getting up all during the question period for the exercise and training for the Olympics. I am prepared to accept that the same as all members are prepared to accept it, but I am not going to sit here—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: —and have other than the House leaders ask the government House leader to try in a normal way to outline the business of the House for the following week. I am not going to have other Members of Parliament rise on false points of order or questions of privilege to get their pet bills laid on the table when I have been trying to get Your Honour's eye for two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1972-73—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE L12a—DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury:

That Vote L12a in the amount of $350,000,000 of the Department of Finance for Winter Capital Projects Fund—Loans in Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I made some remarks on this supplementary estimate yesterday. I indicated to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) that I, and I expect most other members, are not opposed to developing an extensive program that will affect a large number of people who are out of work this winter and will be out of work next winter and the winter following through Winter Capital Projects Funds. The funds for these projects have been distributed by the provinces and administered by the municipalities. Not being in the form of a bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May we have order, please? There are so many conversations going on in the House at the moment that it is highly unfair to the member who has the floor. Can we have order, please? I suggest to hon. members that these numerous conversations might take place outside the House. The business of the House is now continuing, and the hon. member for Timiskaming has the floor.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that some members are not particularly interested in this subject. It only affects unemployed people and municipalities with very high unemployment. It also affects a program that will be in effect for the next three years. Therefore, the subject matter probably is not important to many members, although some of them may become unemployed much faster than they anticipate. It is interesting to look around the House. Although I have not been here very long, most members who were here when I arrived and many who came subsequently have become unemployed. Perhaps some of these members should look at this proposition as well.

This is an important piece of legislation. It involves a long-term program. This estimate contemplates a program that will extend over the next three years. When I first came to this House, I supported the proposition of emergency assistance to gold mines. The emergency had developed a few years previous. During this session, we will be asked to extend for another period of time that same emergency legislation. I presume that unless something drastic happens in this country, such as the election of the New Democratic Party—

• (1520)

An hon. Member: That would be drastic, all right.

Mr. Peters: I am not saying this will happen. But unless it does, it is very likely a critical situation will be faced in the area covered by this estimate for many years to come. I expressed my view to the Minister of Finance that these measures should not be introduced by way of an estimate. Since making my comments yesterday I have had an opportunity to look at a sheaf of papers provided to all Members of Parliament, setting out what this program is intended to achieve, and, in general terms, the manner in which it will be operated. But the papers do not tell us in what directions the funds are to be spent; they merely say they will be spent over a three year period.

My province is no more fair than other provinces. I know it is true to say of the Province of Quebec and of the Province of Ontario, certainly, that there is no equality between opportunities in various parts of those provinces. A large proportion of the unemployment in Ontario occurs in your area, Mr. Speaker, and in my area—both in eastern and in northern Ontario. The measure we are considering by way of an estimate does not say that any criteria will be laid down by the federal government to ensure that areas of high unemployment will receive special consideration. The decision has been made by the federal government simply to allocate the money to the provinces. If the province does not express a direct interest, projects can be initiated by the municipalities themselves, with provincial agreement.

In my own area, as in other parts of Ontario, there are pockets, municipalities, where the unemployment rate is between 35 and 40 per cent. I will give an example. Probably 40 per cent of the work force in Cobalt is unemployed at the present time. Those who are working are willing to go out and raise money through the municipality for worthwhile projects, and I am sure they will be highly interested in getting some kind of capital grant in addition to the labour costs in connection with any project they might desire to undertake. Your Honour may be aware that the federal government did make an offer to the people of Cobalt under the terms of a DREE grant of $750,000. But because there was hanky-panky between officials of the federal government and officials of the company concerned, this offer was withdrawn. This was a calamity; the total loss to the community amounted to some $2.5 million.

I am sure the people of this community, as in others, would be pleased to take advantage of the government's proposals if they were to be made available to them on the basis of need for greater employment opportunities. They should be given preference when it comes to deciding the areas in which these funds are to be spent. I have in mind another community which has already raised $7,000—it is a very small community—toward constructing a skating rink and a municipal hall. I suppose they are thinking in terms of around $25,000. I appreciate that under the winter works program they can get assistance as far as the cost of labour is concerned. But it is the capital cost, in projects of this kind in rural communities which present the greater problem. Each Member of Parliament who has any interest at all in helping communities where there is an abnormally high level of unemployment should insist upon the inclusion within this program of a proviso which would oblige provincial governments to allocate funds to those communities whose need is greatest and whose interest in doing something for themselves is strongest.

I said yesterday, and it is true, that Toronto, for example, might decide to build what it might consider to be a vitally necessary road to the Pickering Airport. Or they might decide to build a trail over to Malton. Remember, we are talking about $100 million over three years. This is peanuts for projects of the kind I have just mentioned. But a fund of this size could be used to great advantage in many of the remoter areas of Ontario by smaller communities which want to help themselves and get men off the unemployment roll. The Town of Cobalt will probably get considerably more out of the unemployment fund and out of the welfare fund than will be necessary to enable them to embark on a substantial works project provided the capital required in connection with that project could be financed over a period of years.

If we pass the estimate in its present form, as we are invited to do, we are saying that the civil servants know best and that the civil servants, both federal and provincial, are to be allowed to make the decisions. I am shocked that members of the cabinet should pay no attention to running their departments and seeing what happens after they get bills passed by this House. But in this case, of course, they are not even bothering to bring down a bill which could receive some consideration. They are asking the House to pass an estimate. Of course, every reasonable effort to deal with unemployment ought to be supported, and I do not propose that hon. members should consider killing this proposal, but they should really give consideration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I am advised his time has expired. He can continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall close by saying that other hon. members, particularly those who have not been here very long, should consider carefully the effect of legislating in this way. They will have no opportunity to make an effective input in connection with the program. They will be unable to influence the criteria set. The ability of the provinces to do whatever they wish with these grants is in no way limited; there is no means of ensuring that those communities in the various provinces whose need is greatest will benefit from the money.

I sincerely hope other hon. members will concern themselves about the difficulties which arise when legislation is introduced by way of estimates, particularly since the programs introduced seem likely to last for many years to come. At least, if a bill had been introduced to provide for a winter works capital projects fund, rather than an estimate, a useful discussion could have taken place.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): May I first of all comment on the concluding words of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters)? He shares the view held by myself and, I believe, by most members of the House, that the type of project envisaged by this vote is beneficial for the people of Canada, especially because of the high rates of unemployment which exist in so many parts of the country. After all, the primary objective of this fund is to reduce the high rate of unemployment which is apparent in certain areas. Unlike the hon. member for Timiskaming I do have great confidence in the public servants of this country who are going to be asked to administer these projects should this vote be approved by the House.

• (1530)

I do not think it is the obligation, or indeed the duty and responsibility, of this House to write contracts entered into between the provincial governments and this government. Sufficient be it that the program is outlined in specific enough detail so that we can honestly and accurately appraise it and see that it is indeed for the benefit of the people of the country in the area it is intended to assist.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), in his remarks both before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates and in the House yesterday, indicated that following consultations with the various ministers of finance across the country, agreements were entered upon which would be reduced to contract form indicating the rights and obligations of the provinces in the event that they do take the amount of money that would be theirs if this appropriation is approved.

It seemed to me that some members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition appeared to agree in principle that this project is worthwhile and of benefit to the nation, specifically in areas that suffer from a great deal of unemployment. They felt that unemployment should be alleviated as quickly and efficiently as possible in every and all such areas. However, notwithstanding that fact, they seemed to get caught up in a legalistic argument in order to defeat this vote, thus preventing the provinces, in co-operation with the federal government, from making global plans over the course of the next two to three years in regard to on-going projects that would ensure, so far as is possible, the alleviation of unemployment in those areas.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had something to say about section 20 of the Financial Administration Act. He said that section 20 of the act makes illegal what this vote is attempting to do. This vote is attempting to place money in the hands of the provinces for worthwhile winter works projects. It is within the competence of this parliament to pass a law to this effect, thus providing funds for on-going projects, not just in this fiscal year but also in ensuing fiscal years.

Yesterday in his remarks the Minister of Finance mentioned many precedents that had been created over the years—precedents that in my submission to Your Honour become part of the law of the land—whereby the very same vehicle has been used to provide funds for worthwhile projects beyond the specific fiscal year in which they were voted. Indeed, the Minister of Finance referred to the same procedure being used during the period when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was leader of the government. Surely, those precedents which were legal and which were followed at that time are no less legal today.

I suggest that attempting to bring forward in this House this kind of legalistic argument so as to defeat or to delay the passage of a vote that is needed immediately in order to ensure that the program gets underway at the earliest possible moment is unworthy of the hon. member's previous actions, and indeed his many other fine and worthwhile submissions to the House.

The objectives of this program are to bring about an increase in capital spending in order to sustain a high level of employment, particularly during the winter and especially in those areas of the country where there is at the present time, and where there can be anticipated to be in ensuing winters, a high level of unemployment. If we are to deny to the provinces and municipalities the financial means to plan, over a sufficiently lengthy period of time, on-going winter works projects, then we are not doing our duty in this House. We should make financially possible all the winter works we can in order to alleviate the high unemployment existing in some areas of this country.

Guidelines and administrative procedures have been set down to administer funds if parliament votes such funds. These guidelines are easily understood and can be easily administered by public servants. When each year the forgiveness clause contained in this vote comes before a parliamentary committee for approval, and before parliament itself, I understand, hon. members will have an opportunity to examine it in detail and either grant or not grant forgiveness of the loan, in accordance with the contract with the province or municipality concerned. As I understand it, what we are asking parliament at this time to do is not to spend money but rather to authorize a loan. According to my interpretation of section 20 of the Financial Administration Act, authorization of a loan in this fiscal year is not an expenditure. As the Minister of Finance clearly demonstrated, it is only upon the operation of the forgiveness feature that there is an expenditure in that fiscal year.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in my submission the legalistic argument that has been raised really carries no weight whatsoever. It attempts only to detract, and to some extent does detract, unnecessarily from the most worthwhile objectives of this program. I would urge the members of this House to join with me and vote for this item in its entirety, thus providing to provinces and municipalities $350 million to enable them to plan long-range projects to aid in alleviating unemployment in this country.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the matter which is before us I should like to make it clear, particularly with reference to the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), that what we are suggesting is that rather than voting $350 million at this stage the amount should be $75 million. I point out that this amount is actually the amount the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated would likely be the top amount to be spent by this government in the current year. This House should always remember that we in the Progressive Conservative party, and certainly I personally, believe that the on-going program should be put on a more practical basis than is being proposed at the present time in this House.

• (1540)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I come from a riding which has had many problems over the years concerning winter works programs. Those problems are largely ones of not having sufficient lead time. This House should consider the possibility, and I emphasize that the government should consider this, of setting up a much more workable mechanism to ensure that the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government can plan ahead year by year in respect of what funds may be available from time to time for this type of approach.

In saying that, however, I should like to emphasize that it is totally unacceptable for the Minister of Finance and for the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) to, in effect, say that parliament should delegate the direction of that on-going program to the public service. It is important that we keep control of the current year's expenditures in this House. I would suggest, and in this I think perhaps the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) is in agreement, that it is absolutely essential these funds be administered in a way that will be of maximum advantage to the municipalities and provinces concerned in this country.

If you take a look at the vote itself, you will see there are certainly some unanswered questions. For example, you will find that, while most members have referred to this as being a three-year program involving $350 million, the fact is the vote does not make it clear that the $350 million will be spread over three years. Our Minister of Finance has indicated that this year he feels the top amount which may be expended will be $75 million; next year, he thinks it might be $170 million, and the following year $105 million.

While the minister will not answer our questions concerning what rate of unemployment he finds acceptable, perhaps we can use as a barometer the fact that there are 688,000 people out of work today, and he anticipates substantially more unemployed next winter because he suggests there will be more than twice as much money used from this fund next winter. Let me emphasize that there is nothing to prevent the government, through the Minister of Finance, expending the entire $350 million within two years. There is no guarantee that this amount is going to be spread over three years, and I think the House should understand that.

When the hon. member for Ottawa Centre and the Minister of Finance continue to say that all we are talking about is a loan and that we are going to have a chance to speak later on expenditures when we decide how much is to be forgiven, I think they are taking an extremely legalistic approach. Rather than our group presenting legalisms, I believe if you read his evidence given before the committee which considered this matter, you will find that the Minister of Finance was extremely legalistic in his approach.

Mr. Baldwin: What a great slush fund it would be in an election.

Mr. Stevens: I would also point out that the wording of vote L12a has some small print. It sets out the various amounts of the $350 million that will be apportioned to the provinces, and then it provides that if the provincial ministers indicate in writing they will not use a portion of any allotted amount, that amount may be allotted to other provinces. I feel this is not a decision which should be left in the hands of civil servants.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre, and I agree with him, has great confidence in public servants. However, I believe they must be given direction and leadership because this government is more in the hands of civil servants than directing them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Another thing that worries me a great deal about this vote is the fact that it will really be the wealthier municipalities and provinces that will get to the trough first in order to make use of the funds made available. I say that because if you read paragraph (b) in the vote you will notice a convenant is required from a province or a municipality. There may be small municipalities or smaller provinces which will find that, because of their own peculiar financing problems, they will not be in a position to take advantage of these funds to the extent that the more wealthier municipalities and provinces will. This I feel is one reason that, rather than having this type of approach, it would be more satisfactory to work out an on-going conference-like arrangement with the provinces and municipalities to make sure that the funds available, $75 million if you like this year, will in fact be available to the municipalities that need it most.

I am afraid that under the present wording of this vote the reverse will be true, and the wealthier municipalities and provinces with relatively low debts will be able to make the fastest and greatest use of these funds.

Mr. Stanfield: The same old gang.

Mr. Stevens: For example, in my own area, it is not the larger municipalities that have the greatest difficulty. I spoke to the chairman of York Region who pointed out that, although they have a great number on staff, they find it difficult to meet the deadlines generally set concerning winter works programs. He pointed out that if this is so at the regional level it is particularly so at the lower level where you are dealing with small towns or townships which do not have the staff to cope with the amount of red tape which is usually generated prior to one of these grants being approved.

I feel a much more satisfactory program has to be worked out by the government and accepted by this parliament. I am really puzzled as to why the government has chosen this approach. Oddly enough, there is reference in the vote to an existing act, namely the Municipal Development and Loan Act. I suggest that before we go too far in voting the $350 million suggested figure, those in this House should take a look at the Municipal Development and Loan Act, particularly Section 30 thereof, which set up in 1966 a process that could easily be amended to give effect to that which the government is proposing here today.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, when one begins to read that act I believe it gives one a few clues concerning why this vote L12a has been proposed in this form. You will notice that section 13 refers to a limit being placed on the amount which should be used for this type of activity. There is a limit of $400 million. Subsection 2 of this section points out that no portion of the $400 million may be used in a province in a ratio higher than that province's ratio is to Canadian population figures of 1961. If you apply that formula to this amount, to arrive at the provincial figure you will find a ratio has been used, I suggest, which indicates that the government is attempting by a kind of back-door approach to reactivate a statute which is already on the books and yet it will not openly come to this House with an amendment to this statute, or be candid with regard to what it proposes in the future in respect of the fund for this program. I am particularly disturbed by this approach.

My apprehension was certainly confirmed by the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa-Centre who spoke before me. He suggested that we should pass the vote and let the civil servants handle the program because they will do a good job. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), when appearing before the committee, agreed that this is a non-budgetary item about which we are talking. I feel we have had too many non-budgetary items in this parliament produced by this government. I know it is very convenient to speak of a net liability in the country and whether we happen to have a deficit or whether we happen to have a surplus. However, I think it is also important that we should look at the total debt position of this country which in 1972 was $42.7 billion. That was an increase of $5 billion in one year and an increase of $15 billion since 1962. I feel that if one analyzes the main reason for such a substantial debt increase in this country one will find it is because of the so-called non-budgetary items, which have been channelled by the Minister of Finance into a Crown corporation or into a special fund such as he wishes to set up here. Certainly in such a case parliament would have very little opportunity to analyze what has happened in respect of such funds.

I feel very disappointed about the fact that neither the Minister of Finance nor the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) happen to be in the House today. Here we are dealing with an item of $350 million. We say we have no objection to an amount of $75 million because it is indicated that there is a need for this amount in the current year. However, for the reasons I have given, we do object to having our right to analyze how the government intends to spend the balance of that money taken away from us. We find that at the moment these two ministers do not have the courtesy to even be in the House in order to find out what members of this parliament think about this issue.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre has said we should trust the public servants. There is a parallel situation I would like the hon. member to look into and then perhaps next time he will not be so keen to say that. I suggest the Minister of Finance who is proposing this vote today is certainly cognizant of what is transpiring with regard to certain other non-budgetary items which this parliament has very little opportunity to examine. For example, the Minister of Finance has indicated he feels may be spent in the current year something in the order of $75 million on behalf of winter works activities in the provincial or municipal field. I would point out that the vote refers to December 6. I believe it is interesting to remember that under another non-budgetary item the Export Development Corporation has spent, with no sanction from this Parliament, $90 million since December 7, including $26.5 million in the form of a loan to Brascan Limited of Toronto in respect of one of its subsidiaries in Brazil.

I would also point out that that same corporation has offers outstanding to three companies in Brazil which, if accepted by those companies, would mean that we are committed to another $75 million in long-term loans to Brazil. Those offers, for example, are good until June 30, 1973. But, when we take a look at this vote it is evident that they must be accepted by May 31. I suggest that not only has something in the order of $100 million been committed since December 7 to Brazil, but that through offers to five companies in Mexico there is an amount of $95 million outstanding in the program again until June 30. It is my understanding that this corporation alone, in a non-budgetary sense, has some $360 million outstanding until June 30 at least of this coming year. This is the situation in spite of the fact that parliament in its wisdom, placed a ceiling on the maximum amount that the Export Development corporation could lend of $850 million. I emphasize that that ceiling has already been violated, and I feel that we in this House must insist that a minimum of non-budgetary items be tolerated.

We owe it to the people of Canada to manage their funds better. I suggest if would be wrong to allow this vote to go through which would empower the government to get at another $350 million in the terms suggested. When the government has done this type of thing in respect of non-budgetary situations connected with the Export Development Corporation, I do not feel we should expect it will not do things we would find unacceptable in connection with this $350 million fund. That is why I believe our suggestion is reasonable that the amount of $75 million might be approved which the government says it intends to spend in the current year. In fact, I would suggest it is not only reasonable, but it is extremely difficult to identify the rationale behind any other suggestion.

If we look at the estimates we are discussing, we find that the title reads "For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973". Why should there be any suggestion that in those estimates we would find amounts for 1974 and for 1975. Surely, that is most irrational. The suggestion that "we are just lending now and you are going to get your chance later" is a very poor answer because the fact is that the money will be expended and all that this parliament could do would be to meet some kind of a pressure play at that point, much as has happened with respect to the unemployment insurance fund.

• (1600)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He can only continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blais: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time? The hon. member made quite a to-do about the question of civil servants handling all those funds. I recall the evidence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) before the committee in which there was an indication that there was a pending agreement between the federal government and the provinces interested. I was wondering whether the hon. gentleman took the trouble to ask the Minister of Finance for a copy of that agreement or any of those agreements to find out what the terms of those agreements might have been.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister cannot produce them because he does not have them.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure my hon. friend that if the Minister of Finance were here right now I would be more than willing to ask him whether I could see any agreements that he can produce of the nature to which he referred.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did indicate, according to the committee's proceedings, that that agreement was available to all members at any time. Surely, the hon. member knows of the offer made by the Minister of Finance. That agreement would have been available, notwithstanding the fact that the minister is not here at this time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister was never before the committee.

Some hon. Members: He was.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: He was there in spirit only.

Mr. Stevens: In conclusion, may I emphasize that I feel this is one more example of the government trying to cut down the right of this parliament to examine expenditures. There is no question, and let there be no doubt, that we are in favour of a winter works program, but surely that does not mean that fact can then be used as a lever to have us accept something that is so totally unacceptable as this present procedure. I would also emphasize that we in the House have ample evidence to justify a lack of confidence in the government's handling of such money matters and that we would be irresponsible if we did not object, as we are doing, to this blanket endorsation of the $350 million.

If we are to learn any lesson, let us take a look at what has transpired in one Crown corporation, namely the Export Development Corporation. May I point out that that corporation, for example, with no reference to this House, has $1 billion of outstanding financing contracts, 50 per cent of which are for the benefit of eight corporations in this country of which 50 per cent are subsidiaries of foreign concerns. This is the way in which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) have been handling funds of a non-budgetary nature, and I feel it is time that parliament, and certainly the people of Canada, dug in their heels against this irresponsible management of finances.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, we have now before us a very important budget item according to the statement made jointly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) on December 6, 1972.

So we have the impression that the government realized that there was to be an increase in unemployment during the first months of 1973. Yet, former federal minister Kierans had predicted a high rate of unemployment and stated that not only would employment become a very crucial problem but that there would also be a strong increase in inflation.

We realized one day that Mr. Kierans' predictions were accurate. And, on September 7, the government published a release announcing that a new local initiatives program would be set up in the first days of December to allow the creation of a number of jobs and also to reduce the scourge of unemployment.

The process is excessively slow although it had been announced at the time that the required forms would be available starting October 1 and several people realized that a few days had elapsed in October before the forms were available to allow the promoters of projects to submit them early enough to be activated and create a certain number of jobs.

Mr. Speaker, at December 31, according to the information published, 13,163 projects had been submitted under the local initiatives program. This shows that Canadians believed very seriously in the worthiness of the program and the good intentions of the government since this figure exceeds by far the number of projects submitted during the last fiscal year.

• (1610)

Mr. Speaker, of the 13,163 projects submitted, only 1,400 had been approved on December 31, which means that very few projects had been carried out before the end of 1972. In Quebec, also according to my information, only 427 projects had been accepted as at December 31. This is probably the explanation for the figures relating to unemployment then, because of the delay in the execution of these projects, the number of jobs available was of course decreasing and, automatically, the unemployment rate increased.

On December 6, the Minister of Finance had his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced a special program for municipalities and provinces, requiring $350 million. The department involved had issued a most elaborate press release to invite provinces and municipalities to participate in a most active way in order to help the federal government reduce unemployment.

But most municipalities are indebted to the extreme and one only has to meet municipal administrators and talk a little about their problems to find out very rapidly that the same problem faces all municipalities. In fact, the rate payers are asking for improved public services; they want to get better water, sewer, depollution and road services, but municipalities do not draw the required revenues to meet immediately this demand and the needs of rate payers.

I have often pointed out in the House that the federal government should pay more attention to municipalities and their sources of revenue and transfer as soon as possible the sources or revenue which would allow them to provide the services for which they are responsible as the government closer to the people.

According to the statistics for Quebec in 1970, 1652 municipalities had a debt of $2,083 million with annual interest of $232,470,000 seriously affecting their budget.

For example, the budget of Trois-Rivières is burdened with interest on the public debt of 28 per cent, while that of Cap-de-la-Madeleine reaches 34 per cent and that of Trois-Rivières Ouest 57.4 per cent.

We could draw up a very long list of municipalities affected by the very heavy burden of interest on the public debt to which they must devote a considerable amount of their revenue.

Now, the government is introducing supplementary estimates to give effect to the statement of December 6, 1972 restating the contents of the press release and allotting the share to each province, provided they sign the agreements with the federal government to carry out some projects which were also listed in Annex I to the press release of December 6.

At first glance, it seems advantageous; one has the impression that the government is very generous, but on reading page 16 carefully, one realizes the government is using the provinces and the municipalities, under the present financial system, to mortgage the Canadian taxpayer even further for the benefit of those who control credit.

The federal government is placing $350 million at the disposal of the provinces but it has yet to decide to obtain that money from our banking institution, the Bank of Canada. In fact that money represents loans from those who control credit or taxes on the income of workers and corporations.

The cost of financing in the public sector is thus doubled, because the federal government itself pays interest, and then lends to the provinces and municipalities at an unknown interest rate, since the credit under study states, and I quote:

the obligation bears interest payable annually at the rate applicable pursuant to Subsection (1) of Section 113 of the Canada Pension Plan, at the time of the issue of the obligation—

If you get down to the bottom of things you discover that again we cannot base ourselves on a predetermined rate of interest because under the paragraph I have just quoted the Minister of Finance is authorized to set the rate under certain circumstances.

Further on, it seems an attempt is made to gild the pill; it is said that the federal government will be generous provided the municipalities are willing to invest in public works.

Municipal projects usually cover water and sewage works, road building, paving, etc., difficult to carry out in our province during the winter months because of our country's very severe climate.

I feel the program should not be carried out exclusively during the winter months, from December 1 to May 31, but during a more favourable season, which would bring down the cost of operating machinery and result in better work. After all, it is not only in winter that the unemployed eat. So it would be normal that they be given the opportunity to work in more human conditions so that they can be shown that they are not considered as slaves but as full citizens who have a right to the benefits of modernism.

It is said in paragraphs d, e, f and g that the government will forgive that portion of the principal amount in a proportion of 50 per cent of the normal direct costs of labour hired locally during the period commencing December 6 1972 and ending May 31, 1973. And it will be repeated until the end of 1975.

Everyone knows today that in the building industry, and mainly in the area of the works I mentioned earlier, less and less labour is used. The job is performed mainly by heavy machinery; one operator with his machine can do the work which would have required hiring 25, 30 or 40 men 15 or 20 years ago.

On this 50 per cent forgiveness the municipalities should be allowed to include the operating cost of machinery used to carry out these investment works. I could go further but I think that the time has not come yet. Hopefully the day will come when we will have progressed to the extent of using, as I said earlier, our national financial institution to finance the public sector at the level of the municipalities, of the provinces and of the federal government, at administration cost. The Bank of Canada should be able to create the required credit to grant loans at cost to these various government levels, loans refundable at the rate of depreciation which we shall have created when spending this money.

I think we are appreciably moving in this direction since the Canadian Union of Mayors and Municipalities has already presented two briefs to this effect to the federal government. In time and with up-to-date members—because there are many young members in this House and they are willing to put progress at the service of society—for progress to be put at the service of society we shall have to modernize our financing system. We shall have to give up this outdated financing system which was suitable a few years back but does not fit at all our modern techniques, the quick rate of production which we know now and which we will know even more in the years to come because progress is with us to stay.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that we should try to have our whole society benefit from the advantages provided by that progress, instead of having it become its victim, this being contrary to reason.

Therefore, in order to have such progress really serve society, we must very seriously consider the principle that everything materially possible for men—because men exist, as well as materials, but funds are lacking—should be possible financially, because finance is an artificial creation. I have never seen dollars growing in my fields; yet, I have tilled them for a long time, and I was doing it seriously. I have not seen dollars growing behind my plough. I have not seen the thing happen either inside industries. Money is made somewhere; the point is to know where and how it is controlled. More and more people realize that the dollar is an artificial creation and that it should exist in quantities sufficient to allow men to trade or to create services useful to society.

Evidently, this budget provides some benefits, for instance, funding investments aimed at helping the municipalities to do something. I am sure, and I am saying it now, that the greater obstacle the municipalities are bound to encounter will not be planning, because they have had projects in mind for a long time, though being unable to carry them out. And a date is being set. The thing should not be considered before December 6, I believe that we must show some leniency on that point. Nonetheless, we must give municipalities a chance, even though they have put their projects on paper before December 6, though they were not in a position to carry them out; we must be generous and not unduly hinder the municipalities willing to take part in those programs.

Mr. Speaker, if the government worked seriously to deal with the unemployment problem, we should not always be starting all over again. We are going to have to think about setting up an income security plan as soon as possible in order to enable individuals—no matter how old—to meet their essential needs.

Mr. Speaker, this morning I received a letter from an unemployed worker who would like very much to work so as to be able to build a house. He tells me in his letter that his rent is $130 a month and that if there existed a program to help low-wage earners to build a house, this monthly rent could be used to meet the cost of building the house, on really favourable loan terms. If the government really wants its program to be effective, the hon. Minister of Finance is going to have to be mindful of what he has promised to announce when he will be tabling his estimates on February 19. It will be realized then . . .

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the hon. member be permitted to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friends for allowing me to conclude . . .

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker . . .

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Laurier rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Before allowing the hon. member for Bellechasse to continue his speech, I would ask him to confine his remarks to the subject now under study and not discuss housing, because this subject is not being debated. Therefore, I would rather see him stick to the item under study.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. No strings can be attached to the consent. The Chair will have to determine whether the hon. member is in order. I must ask again whether it is agreed that the hon. member may continue his speech. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that I was in order as I was discussing the causes of unemployment. It is not only a matter of applying a band-aid on a wooden leg, but of finding ways to avoid a repetition of this situation.

Furthermore, taxes on building materials are interfering with the construction of a great number of housing projects, which results in many workers being unemployed. In fact, such taxation is only an indirect cause of unemployment and it is my opinion that this problem should be settled, not only for months but for the years to come.

I believe these supplementary estimates have some value though I would have preferred to see more included in them. This is the reason for the suggestions made in my comments. I understand that we might not be able to do it in the next following weeks. In any event, however, it is a member's duty to make really serious suggestions to improve the situation.

• (1630)

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be quite brief, but I still would like to make a few comments on the matter now before the House.

We seem to forget that the $350 million fund for winter projects will simply allow the government to grant loans to the provinces and municipalities until May 31, 1975. And what surprises me, Mr. Speaker, is that for once the official opposition seems in agreement with the government estimates, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said in committee last week that he estimated at $75 million the needs of the provinces until March 31, 1973, and we see now the opposition for once agreeing with the estimates and ready to grant its support for this amount of $75 million.

Mr. Speaker, we want to allow the provinces and the municipalities enough leeway to present projects which will really meet their needs and which, at the same time, will reduce unemployment especially during the winter months.

In order to promote this concentration of supplementary works during the next two years, this same program includes an important stimulus providing for the forgiveness of an amount equal to 50 per cent of the direct onsite payroll costs until May 31, 1975.

And in answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), I must remind him that this forgiveness applies 12 months a year and not only during the winter months.

As for the second part, this is a supplement of 50 per cent of the direct onsite payroll costs from December 6, 1972, to May 31 of the 1972-73 winter, and from December 1 to May 31 of the 1973-74 and 1974-75 winters.

Now, what do we want to do here? We simply want to allow the provinces to better plan their works. In my opinion, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who wondered how this money would be administered, should have read the guidelines and the administrative forms that the Minister of Finance was kind enough to send to all members when the statement was made. He would have seen then what the controls are and which way these funds are administered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that several provinces have already submitted their projects to the federal government and that the whole thing will be late owing to objections encountered in this House and in committee.

I would like only to remind opposition members that as far as New Brunswick is concerned, it has submitted projects for more than $3 million and so did Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland submit projects for some $2 million. I believe that Manitoba will come to Ottawa tomorrow with its list of projects. Quebec also has already prepared a long list of similar projects and it will give it to federal government for approval.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of this House for seven years and always heard opposition members say "too little, too late" about anything the government might introduce, including legislation and estimates. And for once the opposition has changed its position. Now $350 million is much too much and it is too early to bring it before the House.

I would like the opposition to make up its mind once and for all on what it wants and on its priorities since this is what we have been attempting to learn for a long while.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the eligibility of a project is being discussed consideration is given to the additional direct or indirect employment which will stem from the suggested expenditure. Particular attention is paid to areas where the unemployment rate is high. And if all the loans requested by a province and its municipalities exceed the amount awarded to that province, they must give preference to projects which are labour intensive or which will be carried out in sectors where unemployment is at the highest.

The unemployed seem to be forgotten in this debate, because they are indeed the ones we want to help and, whatever the reasons for this unemployment, I suggest that we must not delay the passage of such an important measure which will enable the various provinces and especially the municipalities to undertake works deemed essential.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay unduly this debate because I suggest that the only objective of the government is to help provinces and municipalities. As someone said earlier, some municipalities are over-taxed and it is that very assistance from the federal government which enables several small municipalities to implement some works for the welfare of their citizens. Anyone with a bit of experience can see that the labour used in municipal projects, in road works carried out by provinces or in building construction are very often difficult to place; I refer to those people who are 40, 45 or 50 years old who could easily be employed in such municipal or provincial undertakings.

I suggest that we are dealing with a need which must absolutely be met now in Canada. We must encourage these people to find a job. I do think that for once this program is neither too early nor too late, but just in time. The amount of $350 million, when one considers that it will be for a three year period, is very realistic and reasonable. I will wonder why the opposition seems to be willing to freeze these credits, for this project only represents the authorization to lend money to provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I think that when the House is asked to vote, most hon. members will approve the amount $350 million which I hope will be loaned as soon as possible to provinces and municipalities to enable them to create jobs, something every member of this House must wish.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter the discussion on these estimates with a combination of concern and some sanguinity. My sanguinity comes from the fact that I do not believe I am detracting from other urgent business that the government may have by participating in this debate at this time.

I have been singularly unimpressed by the fact, possibly because I am a new member having been here only five weeks, that parliament has been able in that period of time to put through only the Pilotage Act, a housekeeping bill, establish a food prices committee and pass Bill C-124 which was needed because of the government's incompetence of the past, but absolutely nothing else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: In spite of all the efforts we in this party have made to try to progress and move forward, it has been very, very difficult to do so. My concern about this matter before us arises, not so much for the reasons that have been raised by my colleague and the members to my left, but because these supplementary estimates, and the way in which they are presented, tell us an enormous amount about the manner in which the government is attacking the two basic economic problems which face this economy, unemployment and inflation.

We are being asked to approve these estimates in order to do something about the unemployment situation in this nation. Certainly, everyone agrees something has to be done about it. I have argued in this House and elsewhere, many times, that the economic performance you have is a result of the economic policies put forward. Unfortunately, we have not had any new economic policies proposed by this government to deal with the problems of unemployment and inflation in any meaningful way whatsoever. This is the first item that has come to this House that we can take a look at in terms of the government's approach to the problem of unemployment.

I need not reiterate that Canada has the highest rate of unemployment of any industrialized country in the world, and the way we are going we may set a record in terms of inflation. However, let me say that I reject totally the idea that we cannot do anything about these problems. Unfortunately, we cannot do much about unemployment through the estimates that are before us today, but surely we can no longer hide behind the fiction that is impossible to do anything about the unemployment situation. We have had a demonstration that something can be done about economic problems by our neighbours to the south. Two years ago, the United States unemployment figure was approximately 6 per cent. It is now heading toward 5 per cent while ours may be going to 7 per cent. Two years ago the rate of inflation in the United States was rising rapidly. It is now almost 3 per cent while ours is going toward 5 per cent. It is irrational, improper and a fraud on the Canadian people to suggest that nothing can be done about the problems of unemployment and inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1640)

Mr. Gillies: It seems to me that the record shows that the policies which have been followed by the government over the last three years have been highly ineffective. In fact, the Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, speaking at the finance ministers' meetings recently, said that the total effect of the last three budgets on our economy has been perverse—that they have probably done more harm than they have done good. I would not care to debate that point particularly, but the point I do want to make, one which I think is relevant to the issue we are discussing here today, is that forecasts made in the last budgets have been wrong. I want to suggest to hon. members that there is no way in which we can make proper economic policy in this nation unless we are organized in such a manner as to have proper information and proper data upon which to make it.

I cannot say how concerned I was to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stand in this House yesterday and say he is not in the business of forecasting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: May I say that the shock I felt yesterday was only a continuation of the shock I have felt for the whole period I have been here because it has not been possible to get the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government, to say what are the goals of economic policy for this country. We must be the only country in the world with a government which will not say what it is trying to do in connection with economic policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Only a few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States stated, not in secrecy but openly and with press releases, that the economic goal for that country for 1973, in terms of price increases, was an inflation rate of around 3 per cent. Now, why did he do that? He did it because he wanted every single person in that country to know that this was what the government intended to aim for; he wanted everybody negotiating contracts to know this was what the government was aiming for, he wanted people to know, when talking about price increases, that this was what the government was aiming for. I do not believe that what we are trying to do in this country in terms of economic policy should be a secret held within the breast of the Minister of Finance, the Department of Finance or anybody else. After all, everyone wants to work toward achieving satisfactory economic performance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Unless we know what our goals are, how on earth are we going to be able to reach them? It is my opinion that the reason the government does not want to give these indications, to tell us what its goals are, is that in the past the figures they have given us have not worked out. Perhaps they feel embarrassed and are not prepared to make economic forecasts. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, with due respect, that to follow such a course is an abdication of responsibility. Surely, we should not play politics with the amount of unemployment we have in the country and with the amount of inflation which exists in the country. What we really should be doing is trying to solve the problems, and to do so it is necessary for everyone in the country to get behind the goals of economic policy.

I am sure Canadians would not care—I do not suggest that they would be very happy—if the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government were to say that unemployment this year will reach 6 per cent or 6.2 per cent. At least, we would know where we were going. We would know what the goals were. I think the fact that these estimates have been brought in for us to look at without any idea of what the economic policy of this country is in terms of fighting unemployment or in terms of fighting inflation, makes it impossible for anybody to give really serious consideration to them in any effective fashion.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that to ask us to approve an estimate for three years of $350 million for a winter works program, without any other policies being brought forward by the government with respect to unemployment or inflation, is asking us to do something which we can do only with the greatest reluctance, if it can be done at all. If one looks at these estimates, one cannot help but wonder at them. The Minister of Finance has said that probably this year $75 million will be drawn for winter works programs by municipalities through the provinces. That, of course, leaves $275 million to be drawn down in the two later years. I can only ask myself: does the Minister of Finance expect that unemployment will be higher in 1974, and higher in 1975, if he is asking for that kind of appropriation? I also realize that the $350 million will be worth 10 per cent less, unless we have new policies with respect to prices, because of our rate of inflation each year. But basically what I am saying is that this type of policy making is ad hocery of the worst sort. And I say that ad hocery in the making of economic policy certainly is not good enough, especially when our country is suffering from unemployment and inflation at the rate it is at the present time. I suggest the estimates simply reinforce the fact that the government should take a really good look at the way in which economic policy making is organized in this country.

I have said before, as has my party, that we need a short-term economic forecasting unit in this country in order to keep track of what is happening. The provincial premiers have said that the program now being discussed is being introduced too late to be effective. They asked for it many months ago, and I can only presume the reason the government was not willing to meet their request earlier was that it was confident that the unemployment situation would not be as bad as it is, or that the inflation situation would not be as serious as it is. How could the government be so wrong? The reason it could be so wrong is that it is not organized and has set up no organization to look at economic problems on a short-term basis. If there had been operating effectively in Canada, a short-term, independent, economic forecasting unit, we would not be sitting here today trying to approve estimates without any framework within which to know they could work. It seems to me, then, that asking for approval of these estimates in this ad hoc way is an inappropriate and a most unsatisfactory method to approach such an important matter.

The case we have presented many times in favour of a short-term, independent, forecasting unit has set out the ways in which such a unit could be established easily and effectively. Even, a simple amendment to the Economic Council of Canada Act would allow the council to involve itself in independent, short-term economic forecasting. Again, I find it somewhat incredible that the Minister of Finance should say he is now depending heavily on the Economic Council of Canada for economic advice with respect to trends and forecasts, since their findings are medium and long-term; the Economic Council does not look at short-term forecasting. I am also amazed when I recall that though Dr. Arthur Smith, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada some time ago, predicted with great certainty what was going to happen he was completely disregarded and absolutely no attention was paid to what he was saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: I have no other course but to think that this great interest on the part of the Minister of Finance in the Economic Council arises because he has nowhere else to turn. What we must have—and we must be among the last major countries in the world which does not consider it—is a budget on a full employment budgeting basis so that we know exactly what our revenues and expenditures need to be to sustain full employment in this country.

In addition, it seems to me we ought to know, if we are going to look at these appropriations—and we are asked to look at them in terms of an unemployment situation—what the other parts of the package really are. What is the government going to do to solve unemployment and inflation? Is it willing to accept the suggestion we have made that there be substantial personal income tax cuts? Does it intend to adopt the constant dollar proposal in taxation, a proposal which would at least help take some of the edge off inflation, a policy which would make parliament more responsible because the government would always have to come back to parliament to get approval for expenditures instead of itself benefitting from inflation which all of us know is partially generated by excessive government expenditures? What policies are ahead of us? Is there a program for improving the operation of small business in Canada? Are we to have an investment credit program?

[Mr. Gillies.]

I do not wish to wander too far afield, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to make clear that no matter what major indicator one follows, the Canadian economy is in a distressful situation. I am told there are 16 indicators, but the suggestion that the number of freight car loadings, for example, is as an important indicator as the amount of unemployment, for policy making seems to me to be demonstrably incorrect. Our economy is in trouble, and we have this band-aid to help take care of unemployment. And in terms of its relation to total policy we do not even know where the band-aid is to be applied.

• (1650)

Are we to understand that the government has adopted the philosophy that a public works program is an integral part of a full employment program? Or has it been brought in at the last minute to take care of a temporary situation? You can cure the unemployment problem in a variety of ways: you can cure it by putting money into the hands of consumers so that they can go out and buy the goods they want, and the best way of doing this is through cutting taxes and raising old age pensions; or you can cure it by direct expenditure programs. This is a direct expenditure program.

Does the government believe that through direct expenditures of this kind the economy can be effectively stimulated as rapidly as would be the case if they were to cut taxes and increase old age pensions? It seems to me that no government should bring in a policy that has something to do with unemployment in such an ad hoc fashion as this, outside of any framework of policy and without forecasts as to what is going to happen in the economy. I suggest that parliament is being asked to do something it should not have to do. I therefore respectfully say that this parliament should give thorough consideration to the way economic policy making is conducted before approving these expenditures.

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour to follow my distinguished colleague from Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). I may say at the outset that, like so many members of this House, I, too, have learned to respect his judgment in these matters. I hope that the government will be cognizant of some of the excellent and substantive polices that he has outlined.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the ramifications of supplementary estimate L12a. I do not wish to suggest to the House that the theory behind it is all that bad, but what does appal me about is that, like so many government programs, it seems to me hastily contrived and that there is no assurance that its application will achieve lasting benefit or that the program will even be operated efficiently.

In discussing this matter today, I wish to point out that this government's performance in terms of legislation passed so far this session is, in my humble opinion, and to be most charitable, nothing less than dismal. Only one item, Bill C-124, has been fully disposed of, and we all know how that was disposed of. To be perfectly frank about it, those who accuse our party of being obstructionist should be told simply this, that there has been nothing to obstruct. That shows how barren and unimaginative the government's program has been.

I should like to refer briefly to some comments made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) last night. I was quite impressed with his remarks, and since, in effect, we have a coalition government I think hon. members opposite could derive some input from hon. members like the hon. member for Timiskaming, though he is probably a bit too practical to suit their taste. May I briefly refer to something that he said, as reported at page 1072 of Hansard:

> Why should we allow the provinces to decide what the criteria are to be? Why should we operate this winter works capital project by regulation rather than by legislation?

In discussing items such as this it is time we realized that, in effect, the government have been doing this sort of thing a great deal lately. They operate by decrees, by orders in council, by regulation; and they are not even dealing in a meaningful way with their own Members of Parliament, much less other members of this great institution who are entitled to the fullest consideration on matters of policy, and to the opportunity to express their views.

It seems to me that, in effect, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has abdicated his responsibility for setting the financial direction this country should take. The provinces, as the hon. member for Don Valley pointed out, are in many cases following budgetary measures that are designed to create full employment, at the same time operating at a deficit, whereas the Minister of Finance is showing a surplus of $600 million. In many ways the Minister of Finance reminds me of another great explorer, Christopher Columbus. He, too, left his destination not knowing where he was going; when he arrived there he was not sure where he was; and when he returned he could not say where he had been. And like the Minister of Finance, he did it all on borrowed money. I say that this government cannot forever continue to do things by regulations, orders in council and so on. It must do these things through legislation, and it must have meaningful consultations with the members of this House.

When one considers the aims and objects of winter works and provincial participation, it seems to me very strange that there is another government department that has not been allowed apparently to have much input. I refer to the department that is most responsible for our regional development plans and which, by its very nature, participates in infrastructure programs, industrial incentives and capital works programs. This much heralded department, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to my mind is one that should be taken into account and whose aims and objects should be blended and integrated with any meaningful winter works or capital expenditure program in this country.

In connection with DREE, I should like at this point to refer to some of the policies that we in this party have put forward in what I hope is a constructive manner to further winter works programs, to resolve unemployment problems, and to try to bring some sense of co-ordination and direction to the economic management of this nation. Unfortunately, to this point the policy pronouncements by the minister have been so negligible as to amount to practically nothing. I do not entirely blame the minister; I realize that he has a vast, complex department to administer and that there is great unhappiness, upheaval and dissatisfaction in his department. But surely by this time we are entitled to have on the record of this House some indication of just exactly what the minister intends to do with regard to constructively reorganizing and defining this great new concept of decentralization which he borrowed from our party.

I see it is now five o'clock, Mr. Speaker. Will there be private members' hour or shall I continue?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should call it five o'clock at this point.

NATIONAL YOUTH APPRECIATION WEEK ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH OBSERVANCE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-13, respecting National Youth Appreciation Week, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that hon. members will agree with me that we hear much more about the troubled youth in our society than we do about all the good things that youth are doing today. On November 14, 1972, I attended an Optimist Club meeting in my riding. Four young people were being presented with plaques which read:

> Youth Appreciation Week Citation for upholding the dignity of youth, for sincere devotion to our welfare and for generous and unselfish contributions to our society.

This ceremony was not only taking place in my riding, but also across Canada and the United States. On that same day, a boy in St. Catharines received a plaque and 10 students in the city of Vanier, in the province of Quebec, also received plaques, as well as many others.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said:

> I think that as life is action and passion, it is required of a man that he should share the passion and action of his time at peril of being judged not to have lived.

We can be proud of the extent to which our young men and women today are playing an active role in the continuing growth of our country. In organizations as diverse as student governments, vocational education, civic, social, business, religious and social action groups, these young citizens are learning the ideals of Canada by putting them into practice. Hard work, co-operation, patriotism and individual excellence; all of these come to be cherished by those who participate constructively in this building of Canada, and often this learning has expanded the ideals and consciences of Canadians, refreshing our spirit.

As we move into the second century of our country, the mantle of responsibility and leadership will be passed to this generation of young Canadians. I am convinced that the youth of today will wear that mantle proudly, carry out the responsibilities of adulthood and leadership with conviction and concern for their fellow man, and reflect great credit on their country.

In recognition of the natural resource Canada's youth represents, and to promote a greater understanding between our generations, I strongly urge the members of this House to allow this bill to go to the committee, and declare that throughout Canada, in each year, the third week in the month of November be known and observed as National Youth Appreciation Week.

I could continue, Mr. Speaker, but I understand some other members wish to speak on this bill. I understand the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) will be making his maiden speech. I am very happy that he thinks so much of my bill that he is addressing his maiden speech to it. I ask hon. members on both sides not to take the usual course in respect of private members' bills. Let us show the youth of today that we do care. I know all members are in favour of the bill, but let us not be so much in favour of it that we talk it out. I invite hon. members to speak their piece and then sit down so that we can get this bill to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, since I am delivering my first speech in the House, I wish to congratulate you on your election to the important position of Speaker of this House. The tributes paid to you and the praise given to you by the various party leaders during the debate on the Address in reply to the Throne Speech as well as by those who spoke during the different discussions which followed show how much you are appreciated by the members. We know quite well that your position is sometimes thankless and always exhausting. I therefore congratulate you for having accepted at such a trying time to conduct the proceedings of the House, a task which you perform with so much tact.

When I was approached to speak on Bill C-13, I accepted with no questions asked, as it were, because I had no idea what it was all about, not even knowing the number of the bill. And I realized later that the number of the bill was C-13. Since I am the thirteenth of a family of fourteen one can imagine how happy I was about that coincidence since I take deep interest in youth.

A short survey among hon. members would indicate no doubt that most of them approve of a youth week. If we recognize, as pointed out by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), that the first resource of a country is its people we will agree readily that, surely, the most important part of that resource, without any prejudice to the others, is its youth.

In the explanatory notes to the bill one can read:

> The purposes of this Bill are:
>
> To recognize the accomplishments of youth in the home, school, church and community;
>
> To promote more active participation by members of families—
>
> To encourage organizations and other groups to publicly show their respect for youth;

At a time when what is going wrong in society is overstressed, I find it entirely in order for an hon. member to recognize the merits of such a proposal and ask his colleagues to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity in recent years to work very closely with youth particularly in the riding I have the honour to represent, the riding of Sherbrooke, and even though it is mainly in the field of sports that I was privileged enough to be associated with youth I think it is still one of the fields where one is in the best of positions to appreciate the real merits of Canadian youth.

However, I should like to suggest to hon. members that the Canadian government has done a lot for youth in the past few years. I should like to list a few of these accomplishments.

• (1710)

For instance, just three or four years ago the Canadian government lowered the voting age from 21 to 18. It has also created summer jobs under the Opportunities for Youth program launched three or four years ago and established youth hostels throughout the country. Interprovincial exchanges also receive some financial assistance from the federal government. These exchanges are made between the various provinces and the two territories of this country, not to mention the contribution of the federal government in the field of international exchanges. Study trips abroad and through this country are also paid by the federal government.

We could also mention the role of the government in the field of amateur sport which was given considerable grants. There is also a national housing policy aimed at helping the students who, in certain cases, have enjoyed preferential interest rates. The loans the students were eligible for have been raised from $1,000 to $1,400, with a $50 monthly tax exemption for a post-secondary full-time student.

Mr. Speaker, we have 84 federal assistance programs for youth in Canada. It would be impossible for me to describe them all at this time but I would like to mention one of them which I think is essential. It is the Young Travellers Program.

This program concerns students who have been selected to travel to various provinces. The federal government, in co-operation with the Secretary of State, the ten provincial governments and those of the two territories and also with several Canadian municipalities undertook a few years ago to organize these travels. Reports published after those travels have demonstrated just how much the students did appreciate those travels and the annual reports express their wish that the government continue this program.

The federal government also intends to implement additional programs even though this is not quite within the scope of Bill C-13 whose purpose is to proclaim a National Youth Week in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I only have one objection: as can be found in the explanatory notes of the bill this youth appreciation week would be the third week of November. As far as French-Canada is concerned, you know that the month of November has always been associated with the deceased and this is why I would not want youth to be associated with November. I should prefer that week to be in April or May, a period of the year more readily associated with the concept of youth.

Another point perhaps worthy of consideration, Mr. Speaker, is that if we have a National Youth Week there is a risk that youth might be neglected during the 51 other weeks of the year.

I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta that during at least one week of the year emphasis should be placed on young people and their role in our country.

There is also another aspect to this matter, Mr. Speaker. Young Canadians work not only in Canada; they also work in other countries. I am thinking of those who work within Canadian programs such as CUSO, for instance, and who do a lot of good. This is seldom pointed out. In some countries, our young people have worked with considerable success, as the leaders of those countries have pointed out; but unfortunately, the Canadian people are often not even aware of their work. I feel that an appreciation week like this one, while stressing what our young people do in Canada, could also stress what they do abroad.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that during my years as a teacher, there was a poem about youth which always interested me greatly; it was written by Kipling and translated by a famous French writer. I do not know if it is in order in the House, but anyway, I find it is closely related to the point made by hon. member for Richmond-Delta, and I want to recite it. Here it is:

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you;
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
But make allowance for their doubting too;
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or, being lied about, don't deal in lies,
Or, being hated, don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise;

If you can dream—and not make dreams your master;
If you can think—and not make thoughts your aim;
If you can meet with triumph and disaster
And treat those two impostors just the same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with wornout tools;

If you can make one heap of all your winnings
And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
And lose, and start again at your beginnings
And never breathe a word about your loss;
If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
To serve your turn long after they are gone,
And so hold on when there is nothing in you
Except the Will which says to them: "Hold on";

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with kings—nor lose the common touch;
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you;
If all men count with you, but none too much;

If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run—
Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
And—which is more—you'll be a Man, my son!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order please. Before I recognize another member, I would like to point out to the hon. member for Sherbrooke that under the rules it is allowed to recite poems but not to read them. Therefore, the hon. member was in order.

Youth Appreciation Week

[English]

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, since we are involving ourselves in a great-to-do about youth, I thought as a youth perhaps I should make a few remarks in respect of this suggestion concerning a national youth appreciation week. With due respect to the hon. member who has introduced this bill, may I say that I believe it is a lot of nonsense. It is pure unadulterated crap. We could have an appreciation of old people week, or we might have an appreciation week for this group or that group. There are many appreciation weeks, weeks about this and weeks about that. The mayors of towns proclaim such weeks as do the premiers and others. The result is that no one knows what he is appreciating. Now, we are faced with the prospect of establishing a national youth appreciation week to show that the kind of society and policies we develop are in tune with what is desired by the young people in our society, to take some action so that they are not walking the streets as many of them are between the ages of 20 and 30. In effect, we are to say, "We appreciate you, gang; you are a nice bunch; we raised you to concern yourselves about morals and so on".

There is a great deal of truth in the statement of the hon. member that the youth of this country are often misinterpreted in our society. I agree that often we are too critical of one group and tend to lump them altogether. In other words, if one person does something bad then all in that group are bad. However, we do this about other people also. But I do not believe the members of the Parliament of Canada should be involved in setting aside a week to appreciate youth or anything else. I believe this is a waste of our time. I wish to state very clearly that I am presenting the opinion of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I do not know what my colleagues think about this.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: I see there is one agreement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That makes it unanimous.

Mr. Knight: I cannot possibly conceive of the logic of such a suggestion. I suppose if one were to send the speech home it would be well received. I suppose I could move a motion to have an appreciate farmers week. We should appreciate farmers.

• (1720)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or appreciate members of parliament week.

Mr. Knight: Yes, for all the mail we are handling. We should have the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) move a motion to appreciate members of parliament for all the work they are doing on behalf of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Perhaps we could establish a national holiday and let members of parliament have that week off so they would not have to handle the cases for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I can tell him that I am getting terribly sick of handling them.

An hon. Member: We could have a week for the whips.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Mr. Knight: Yes. Members could move a motion like that after the whips had given them trouble over not showing up for certain votes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

Mr. Knight: That shows the utter stupidity of such a motion. We can probably get four or five members to say they will talk it out. I say, quite frankly, that we should talk out this motion. If we are going to do something for youth in this country, this parliament must deal with real issues which affect young people, real issues which affect their future, such as whether this country become economically independent or whether this country will have a full employment economy. That is what affects young people, not setting up a week to appreciate them. Nonsense—that is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure for me to take the floor, especially during the private members' hour. I must congratulate the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier) who requested permission from the Chair to recite a poem. I think he will realize, especially by listening to the speeches—what is worse is that they are written for future generations—that everything is allowed in the House. The reading of that poem was just like a whiff of oxygen in this majestic and austere assembly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I should like to point to the hon. member for Hull that the hon. member for Sherbrooke did not read but recite a poem.

Mr. Isabelle: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I saw him bend his head from time to time, I did not think he was reciting, but it was so beautiful that I was under the impression that he was reading it with much feeling.

And as far as I, a former youth, am concerned, it is always a pleasure to talk about youth. The definition of youth in the dictionary is the following:

The period of life between childhood and maturity

I did not think that, by extension, for instance, one can always remain young, for to keep eternally young is to keep young in one's heart and one's life. This is why while many people are senile today, many others will keep eternally young.

As I said before, this august and austere assembly puts up with speeches of all kinds and patterns. I can even quote examples showing that pollution is not to be found in the air, nor in the fumes from the chimneys, nor in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver or Los Angeles, but rather in the speeches. I believe that more pollution is to be found in speeches from speakers whose brain cells seem confused and whose product is at best quite hazy. Of course, life is often dull and superficial for hon. members, especially nowadays.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) for the generous thought he has expressed concerning young people. But young people need more than concern. The standards set for admission to some universities, particularly the medical art faculties, are much too rigid. Yet, medical doctors are needed all across Canada. Our country ranks 26th in the doctor-to-population ratio. Therefore, I wonder whether there are any possibilities of making representations to university faculties and medical colleges in Canada since, in my opinion, they have gathered more dust than prestige over the years and an effort should be made to make admission standards more flexible. For admission to medical faculties, the requirements are 80 per cent marks, which leads us to believe that those who get 80 per cent marks in pre-med are no doubt geniuses, whereas the same students, on completing their classes, will be less interested in practising medicine than in doing scientific research, so that future generations will build robots to look after the citizens' health needs, and that will be rather unfortunate.

All sorts of faculties should also be helped in their planning activities. In the province of Quebec, when only a few teachers were needed, lots of them were trained, with the result that teachers will be unemployed. A few sociologists were needed, thousands of them were trained, and many of them are now jobless.

Miss Bégin: There is one of them here.

Mr. Isabelle: There are some of them everywhere. This is why, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of my colleague is excellent, but I suggest that more than pious wishes are needed to help our young people. All they want is to be helped. Of course love, whether in novels or in real life, is very important in the life of teenagers. It carries them into another world. Of course some are more mature and since youth is the best time in one's life, it is important to make young people understand that they must not waste those years.

It is often said that it is possible to make a career in politics. But politics is a passing thing which is just a stroke of luck, except for some people, like Sir John A. Macdonald, for instance, who said after the Speech from the Throne in 1867: We have built Canada, we shall now have to build Canadians.

We are now in 1973 and heaven knows how far we still have to go before reaching that objective. Youth can cause problems that affect us directly.

In the national capital area the issue of bilingualism is an important one, but I do not wish to stir up the fire. We will be talking about it in due time. I simply wanted to say to my colleagues representing ridings west of Toronto or from Ottawa to Vancouver that what has been lacking perhaps in the education of Canadians is that they could never understand each other because they could never get together. One must not forget that the jet service between Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal is in operation only since 1960. We can thank Air Canada for offering today cheap excursion fares to western Canada which are going to give us the chance to meet those we never knew, at least in the case of the young. It is less expensive to spend 15 days in Europe than in western Canada. So nobody wants to go there. This might come later; exchanges have already started and I know that this can continue because it means survival for Canada. If we want survival we will have to get together and it is by talking to one another that we get to know one another better.

And I think we have failed miserably since 1867 by not trying to stimulate youth to bring about a united Canada. And when I say "united" I am not trying to play politics because I know that others have different opinions on the subject but I simply want to say that perhaps we missed the boat by not thinking about that.

This is so true that I have met people from Vancouver who were very quite excited about meeting French Canadians in Montreal; they had never set foot in Montreal. Then, all that they had heard had come from the news media and we know that even though they are not biased, they do not always faithfully report the news.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order please. The hon. member is delivering a very interesting speech but I wish to point out to him that the bill before us is not a bill related to the official languages, but Bill C-13, respecting national youth appreciation week.

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the news media because they are referred to in the explanatory notes of this bill.

Therefore, I would invite you, Mr. Speaker, always to wear your glasses, which will make it easier for you.

I do not wish to take any more of the time of the House, but I would like to quote a word from Titus: "I lost my time today". He used to say that in particular when he had spent one day without finding an opportunity to help someone.

As a conclusion to my remarks, I wish to invite my colleagues to think over these words in the evening, when they get home. Perhaps we shall have, from now on, stronger speeches and perhaps our sessions will be shorter, more interesting, more practical for many Canadians.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is an excellent former Liberal but, unhappily, he made a mistake, and I am sure that he is sincere when he speaks about Canadian unity.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate my hon. friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta for his excellent speech and in particular for the bill he brought forward, but as I said earlier, we should attempt to find other ways and means to help the young rather than to praise them for a week and forget them afterwards.

[English]

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to speak on this bill, not because I shall support it but because I recognize much of the good that is intended in it, even if I do not believe it should be before the House for decision. I should like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier), for his excellent maiden speech. It makes some of us who have already spoken feel that perhaps we should wait a little longer before speaking again. The hon. member's speech was very good.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) said he raised the subject as one of that group called youth. When my imagination runs wild I think I, too, can make that claim. Then I realize the facts on my birth certificate and refrain from making the claim. However, I am not too far past the age of being trusted and I hope the hon. member will trust in some degree the points that I wish to make. I express some disappointment in the fact that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) did not go into greater detail. When a matter with such merit as the explanatory notes of this bill would suggest is presented to the House I think there must be good reason for it. I would have liked from him more examples of fine work of the type done by the Optimists Clubs of Canada. I am a little disappointed that the hon. member has received singular lack of support from his own benches. In all fairness, he has one advantage which is that 50 per cent of his Quebec caucus is present whereas we have only about 15 per cent of ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: If the purpose of this bill is to try to bring together our young people and those especially amongst them who are alienated with society, then there is some point in discussing it. The explanatory notes of the bill set down a number of purposes of the measure. I should like to skim over a couple of these areas and suggest useful things that could be done. For instance, parents who are proud of their children often fail to express that pride. If we had the kind of week envisaged in this bill, parents could show their children that taking care of them and loving them has not just meant buying them cars and giving them an education, but real love and affection is there also.

Lions Clubs, Rotary and Kinsmen clubs and similar organizations could include sons and daughters in a program and teach them what these clubs are all about. The more mature people of our country also could do a great deal of work on behalf of Canadians generally. Take business and industry for instance: when we speak of youth we tend to mean those in university or those doing social work, but the greatest number is in industry doing their best to earn a living and pay their taxes. Sometimes these young people of 18, 19, 20 or 21 are supporting a wife and family. I think a very great effort must be made to reach this group of young people who are often overlooked. Then there is the role of religion. Many of us believe that even though some churches in our society have improved their relationship with the community, they still have a special opportunity to project their teachings and encourage their own young people to go into the community and to show that useful things are being done within the church.

What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, is that although we are talking about a national youth appreciation week, really there is opportunity for all sorts of liaison among parents, youth, industry, business and service clubs as well as religion. Perhaps we should be working in the general area where there is a breakdown of communications as between all age groups and sectors. Perhaps this bill should not centre on one specific area.

My colleague, the hon. member for Sherbrooke, gave an excellent portrayal of the many programs for youth, but I should like to mention the LIP program which has offered many jobs to young people who feel alienated. Many of these programs give young people an opportunity to test their mettle, to put their ideas into action and to experience what it means to earn a dollar, pay taxes, and to become involved members of society. They have been very successful in breaking down the alienation that some young people feel.

Politics, of course, is something close to all of us. When we look within the ranks of our own parties I think we will agree that some of the brightest organizational work is done by young people. They keep us fresh and alive, aware of new ideas and approaches. They do a lot of research not only within university communities but within the more traditional communities of our society. University lecturers, the ones that are Canadian, are very often young people, and that is most encouraging. I read an article the other day which pointed out that many business executives in Canada are in their thirties or early forties, so that is another area where younger people are playing an active role.

I hope, however, the bill before us does not imply that there is inequality in this area. I do not suggest that is what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta had in mind, but there are problem areas and I have touched on some of them. The hon. member for Assiniboia wondered what would happen if we carried this idea to the extreme. I will not call it crap, as he did. I will not use that word because the intent of the bill is good. We ought to remember that a service group, the Optimists, which works in communities across Canada, is involved and we should treat them with respect.

I agree that it would not be productive if we were to carry this idea forward as an act of the Parliament of Canada because then we should become involved in projects such as senior citizens' week, which might be developed in conjunction with the New Horizons program, or national housewives' week, national workingmen's week, national working women's week or middle-aged people's week. We might even have an hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) week, as he so often sits here through private members' hour, although he is not here now.

I think the cause is good, although I am not sure that by incorporating it in an act we would accomplish the spirit of this bill. I am afraid I cannot offer the excellence of poetry such as several of my colleagues offered earlier. However, perhaps I can offer these few lines, hastily but together, to make my point:

Roses are red,
Violets are blue,
Kids are great,
Other people, too.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on the bill now under consideration. I should like in the first place to say to the hon. member how much I appreciate the fact that he introduced a bill for the establishment of a youth appreciation week.

As the saying goes, Mr. Speaker, if youth but knew, if old age but could. If we could put that proverb into practice, we would give far more experience to youth. Our young people are like those of yore. They are born with needs to be fulfilled. Those are human needs as all others, but since the beginning of things, there have always been young and old people. Youth has surely the right to hope in its own country.

Youths live on hope and this must be proclaimed by senior people, those who know what life is about, who have the experience of life. This experience must be transmitted to youth. This is the responsibility of all.

Through technology and universities, youths do not lack information on technical matters, the philosophy of life, etc. Youths have just about everything.

Nowadays youths lack initiative from the moral point of view, as it is stated in the bill, and I quote:

. . . on the influence religion and morals have on the lives of youth and to encourage youths to actively participate in spiritual activities; and

Mr. Speaker, I feel there is now a lack of morality in our universities, in our schools and in our country for the guidance of our youth. If we want to build up a strong country, inhabited by just people, a developing country where we can tell our young people to hope, we should give them the means required for hope, in other words, ethics. Now, morality has to a certain extent been set aside in our universities and school. In my opinion it is lacking in our young people. Why? Because there are not enough "moralists". If a number of them met all the needs of our young people, we could entertain hopes of creating a more just society.

Today's youth do not hope for a just society because they pretend that injustice is everywhere. Youth is given rustic means to earn a living, youth is educated in universities. They come out of there with many degrees; many young people with degrees cannot find their place in life, they are unable to develop naturally as they would have wished, to be in the areas where they would have liked to develop. In summary, they are unable to find their way.

In universities and schools, youth have to be developed in the same way as steel or furniture are produced in any industry, by mass producing them. In universities as in any other institution of higher learning education is mass produced just as steel is.

Mr. Speaker, we are not giving enough consideration to vocations springing up in each individual. Every human being should be individually educated in universities and other places of high learning. People now are mass-educated and thus we are going through a dreadful experience. Many young people are far from being adapted, far from being in the sphere they would like to be. This is due to the economic, social and spiritual lack of balance.

Spiritually we lack balance because when all the young people get their degrees from these institutions of high learning we can well realize that in respect of morals there are many deficiencies. We realize that they did not get a proper moral education, and this has resulted in the uneasiness we see in our society, especially among young people.

• (1750)

Also in the economic area, we have many reforms to make for young people. They cannot find their role in society, cannot get married, cannot take up a career of their choice, because the economy no longer lets them. Thousands and thousands of dollars are needed to start any small business. But young people lack capital and cannot face up to the situation and the blame must not be laid only on them but also on the system in which we live. They should have the right to live, to get married and to have a home of their own.

But today, this is practically impossible, because they must pay four or five times the price of a house, because of the present system, where we cannot even give young people the hopes they should have.

If we are to give young people any hope, we are going to have to reorganize our whole economy. We are going to have to adapt our economy to the latest technical and ideological developments. We are going to have to give the young of today and tomorrow access to all that if we are to build a just society where man will be recognized and respected, as it is not the case presently, because initiatives are lost and many young people could do much better in society but in the context I have described we make slaves of them at best.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-124, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1)—Chapter No. 2

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Supply

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1972-73

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury:

That vote L12a, in the amount of $350,000,000 of the Department of Finance for winter capital projects fund—loans in Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was commenting on this government's financial policies in relation to item L12a and mentioning that I personally found it incredible that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) does not believe in forecasting economic conditions. If he truly believes this, then he must be alone among his contemporaries in other nations who hold similar office to his.

I thought that the leader of the New Democratic Party in this coalition government put it pretty well when he said that there was a difference between forecasting and prophesying. With deference, I would say that the Minister of Finance has a duty to forecast and to take the nation into his confidence. Then once having set his goals publicly, he would be able to count on the support of labour, management, provincial and civic administrations, amongst others, to help him achieve what should be common goals for the benefit of all Canadians.

We have had no comment on the policy requests and projections made by organizations such as APEC and the Atlantic Development Council who suggest that a reasonable goal in this region would be 4½ per cent unemployment by 1981. I think that would be a reasonable figure. However, as I was mentioning at five o'clock, we have had very little in the way of policy from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). All we have had so far in this session, and indeed for years, from this government, are catch phrases.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was minister of justice a few years ago he caught the public's imagination when he said that the state had no business in the bedrooms of the nation. This got him a certain amount of prominence. We now have the Minister of Finance saying that in order to define policies, and so on, he prefers to avoid statistics and to talk in human terms. That sounds good, Mr. Speaker, but what does it mean? I suggest that, like so much of the government's policies, it sounds good but it does not mean very much. If I may quote a phrase used by my colleague for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly), like so much this government does it is "all swank and no knickers".

My party is on record as having made constructive proposals. In a small way, I made some policy proposals myself twice in the month of January since this parliament opened. But we have had no policy commitments or policy objectives put forward by the government, and I suggest that we are not likely to get any.

The current policy for DREE, which is by its very nature vitally interested in capital works projects, and the type of endeavours that this government is attempting with projects in many ways similar to vote L12a about which we are speaking tonight, is formulated, I fear, by bureaucrats. Let me illustrate what I mean by quoting from a report that is, I submit, very relevant. It covers a matter that is being currently considered by policymakers in DREE and relates to Atlantic Canada's housing policies and what should be done in a meaningful way to implement, shall I say, some of the aims and objectives of the government. Let me quote from the report, which is a current one and which I shall call simply the "Scanada document", to show the House what I consider to be a very good example of what is the ultimate in bureaucratic jargon:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Having realistically primed the Atlantic Canada housing network—

Just get that, Mr. Speaker—"the Atlantic Canada housing network"!

—with demonstrated, "regionalized authoritative responsibility" the federal government would proceed to implement stage two of the proposal. In view of its multiple input, second stage implementation will require skilled timing and sensitive manipulation.

It sounds more like a Masters and Johnson report so far, Mr. Speaker.

Besides majority funding, the federal government's participation will range from firm insistence at one extreme to negotiated compromise at the other.

Isn't that nice?

The report continues:

Under directional control of the newly formed federal-Atlantic Canada Housing Policy Implementation Authority—

Isn't that a nice mouthful?

—teams of proven top flight industrial and financial, managerial and technical skills will be assembled.

This document that I am quoting, as will later appear, has extreme relevance because it is being prepared for government use by highly paid consultants, some of whom, I am led to believe, are not properly authorized under or pursuant to the Official Secrets Act. I also intend to find out what the document cost. I suggest the cost will be very great. However, the best has yet to come. If I may continue to quote from this so-called "Scanada document":

For purposes of this submission, the teams will be referred to as "The Dam Busters" since the name aptly describes their proposed function. Selection and acquisition of the right type of individual will not be cheap or easy, it may even be necessary for the federal government to turn to non-regional-based organizations for assistance.

Now listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

Secondary and/or sub-standard individuals will have to be ruthlessly rejected since under-par performance by the teams will negate the entire revitalizing concept. In scope the "Dam Busters" will represent every direct and indirect activity associated with the housing industry. At predetermined point in time "The Dam Busters" would be simultaneously injected into what there presently "is" of the industry in Atlantic Canada.

That is the type of policy that we are paying to have injected into government policy so as to deal with the very real situation that Atlantic Canada is facing in terms of winter works, housing and so on. If I may just continue to quote this document, it is illustrative of the type of input that is going into DREE as far as regional development policies are concerned. It continues:

Hopefully occupying managerial positions, it is reasonable to assume that respective members of "Dam Busters" would quickly assess weaknesses within their areas of expertise. Reacting instinctively to challenge, I believe corrective planning would be fast and effective. Equipped with positive planning, supported by federal funds, and stimulated by competitive complementary interaction from their peers in support activities, revitalization is inevitable. Dams will be broken and the flow of viable production will be firmly established.

This report, as near as I can figure out, proposes to make a General Motors out of the Atlantic housing industry. If this is the type of policy input that we are going to be fed as far as the federal government's current DREE program for decentralization is concerned, then I think we in the Atlantic region are in for more trouble than we realize.

However, coming back to the guidelines, if any, in respect of this $350 million expenditure under vote L12a, I wonder if we are not justified in asking for a little more explanation about the benefits that will accrue to the people most affected by an expenditure of this kind. Are there going to be any lasting benefits? Will there be municipal and civic improvements? Will there be wharves, roads, and so on, constructed? I hope so. However, I am afraid what we will have is just another LIP program.

Surely winter works capital programs deserve more careful regulation and policy guidelines than the somewhat impromptu method used by the department in determining who should receive LIP grants. Unfortunately, very often the people who receive these grants are those who have the biggest "lip". Down in Nova Scotia we know where most of the LIP grants go, as does the government House leader. I hope that the $14 million of this $350 million, which is the proportion coming to Nova Scotia, will be spread around a little more. It seems obvious that we need, when considering proper guidelines and the scope for large-scale capital works projects such as these, government-planned, integrated projects. All federal department projects and not just winter works projects necessarily, well intentioned as they may be, should be integrated.

It is incomprehensible to me that the item we are considering has to be dealt with in this particular way as a mere designation namely, vote L12a. I think we are entitled to something better than that. We as Members of Parliament are entitled to participate in establishing some of the guidelines and objectives.

As I said earlier, I agree with the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that the provinces should not be given all the responsibility of deciding how this money should be spent. Our federal prerogative, in this particular instance, is neglected. I can only deplore that and suggest that any government which proposes to spend this kind of money should listen to the suggestions of members in this House. If this government has demonstrated nothing else, it has demonstrated a great propensity for misspending money in many fields, including export development. It has demonstrated its ability to allow the UIC fund to get completely out of control. Unless some guidelines are established with the assistance of members of this House, I fear that the winter works program will be no better managed than some of these other programs, and later on we will be looking at the results of the expenditure of this $350 million as we have looked at the results of other programs wondering why so many went wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the objective of the motion under consideration is to make credits totalling $350 million for a three-year period available to the provinces, provincial agencies, cities and municipalities so as to help them to undertake winter works and at the same time to fight unemployment.

Firstly, $350 million divided over the three-year period involved, represent about $116 million per year. In my opinion, $116 million per year is a drop of water in the ocean, all the more so if the needs of the cities, municipalities and provincial agencies throughout the country are taken into consideration.

As a comparison, I would mention that the budget of the Olympic Games alone amounts to $350 million, for an event which will last about three weeks. The Olympic Games budget is as high as the grants we are asked to vote for three years to help the municipalities, the school boards and the provincial governments and agencies to fight unemployment.

Some Liberals think that such a small amount will perform economic miracles in Canada. I repeat that this is a drop of water in the ocean. Moreover, until now on the basis of government statements, we have no indication that the provinces will not keep this money for themselves to meet their needs and, for example, to finance the construction of hydro facilities, roads and other projects. Will the provinces be able to keep that money for their own purposes only, or will they have to give up part of it to the municipalities or other provincial bodies? To this day, there is no guarantee that they will not keep it all.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, why is there a three-year period? Because the government goes ahead haphazardly, because it has no stable financial policy with regard to municipalities and provincial governments. Why does it not evolve a permanent financial policy, that cities and municipalities might be able to plan their development and know where they are going?

Some hon. members said that the federal government should plan the development of municipalities, cities and provincial governments. To my mind, as far as planning is concerned, provincial bodies, cities and municipalities have nothing to learn from the federal government because it operates without giving any thought to the future. It patches things up, but too late unfortunately. When there is unemployment, for instance, it wakes up and tries to find temporary solutions to the problem.

When there is unemployment, Mr. Speaker, the government also tries to create credit, like today, to change the plans of the provincial governments, municipalities or provincial bodies.

As we have been telling the House for years, unfortunately the federal government has not adopted a permanent and stable financial policy in connection with provincial agencies and governments, cities and municipalities, the latter never knowing what is in store for them.

When is the government going to establish a scientific financial policy? This is why I consider that the federal government should draft, as we have been suggesting to the House for a long time, a financial policy which will enable municipalities, cities and provincial agencies to plan ahead at all times and not for a three-year period. In fact there will be further developments in the next three years in Canada. There will be other projects of construction of water mains as a result of an increase in population, cities will expand, municipalities will become bigger, pollution problems will still exist and if the present government is still in power, we will be talking about it yet. There still will be several public investment problems. Then, why a three-year period?

Why did the government fail to come up with a stable, permanent and serious financial policy so that municipalities and cities might be able to plan not for three, or four years but for 20 years instead for their water mains construction projects, their rebuilding of streets, their construction or other public works?

These credits of $350 million are further evidence that the Creditistes are right when they ask for the services of the Bank of Canada in granting interest-free loans to provinces, municipalities and school boards so they may finally plan for a long time ahead the development they need. These credits would be put into circulation as and when the projects are carried out by the various public bodies and they would be reimbursed by means of taxes from the taxpayers as and when depreciation, consumption or use of the projects realized with the help of credits granted for development occur in the public sector.

This means that the money or credit would be put into circulation in accordance with the development of public resources; for example, a credit of three million used for the construction of municipal water works would be valid for 50 years and reimbursed only in capital at the annual rate of 2 per cent of the original capital in such a way that in 50 years the original capital invested would be reimbursed. Thus, the taxpayers of municipality "X", the taxpayers of province "Y" would have reimbursed only once their public works, while today we pay 9 or 10 per cent interest to high finance to which the present government, as the preceding ones, gave in exchange for donations to the electoral fund the power to extend to this country the necessary credit instead of doing it itself through the Bank of Canada, as the latter has the power to create the necessary credit for the development of national resources.

The Bank of Canada should finance without interest public developments of provinces, municipalities and school boards. And the savings or loans made from the chartered banks or elsewhere should finance with interest private investments.

Mr. Speaker, here is a financial policy which would allow the government to know where it is going, and would also allow us to know where the municipalities can go with regards to their public investments or capitalizations. Such a financial policy would put a stop to the stifling of the provinces, the municipalities and the public bodies as we have it today.

I have before me the March 17, 1971 edition of the newspaper Le Nouvelliste in which it is said that 48 per cent of the appropriations of Trois-Rivières-Ouest, that is $494,600 on a budget of $993,700 are earmarked for servicing the public debt.

I have also before me another newspaper showing that the same problem exists all across Canada, and not only locally. It is the Globe and Mail, dated Thursday, February 4, 1971. On page 84, one can read the following, and I quote:

• (2020)

[English]

Charlottetown's problem is how to maintain, expand its services.

Debt service charges are a special burden . . .

Expenditures were budgeted last year at $3,230,000 with $1,042,000 for debt charges . . .

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have before me still another newspaper, the Victoria Daily Times, edition of July 23, 1969, in which we find the following, and I quote:

[English]

The Crippling Interest Burden.

School board chairman Dr. Carron Jameson's troubled comment . . .

It must come as a shock to most taxpayers to learn that, at present high interest rates, the borrowing of $300,000 for school purposes will entail a repayment of $628,445. But is this adequate justification for arguing that the board should pay its way with cash? Schools are built to last for longer than one year. They will be assets to the children of today's pupils. Since this is the case, why should a generation of taxpayers in 1969 shoulder more than its share of the burden to meet requirements of the next generation?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the Official Review of Ontario Hydro for the month of January 1969, one can read this:

[English]

Another figure which is difficult to appreciate is the cost. Estimated in 'today's terms' the combined price tag works out at $1,035,000,000—

Interest is something else again. If the full amount was financed over 20 years at 7 per cent interest would amount to $1,449,000,000—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this illustrates that in the matter of public finance, this government does not know where it is heading for. Here is another disgraceful example, that of the construction in Moncton, N.B., of a city hall that cost $1,200,000 to the builder, whereas the city of Moncton has rented the building for $329,924 a year, which means that after 40 years the building will have cost the ratepayers $13,196,960 and the city of Moncton will be destitute, having paid $13 million in rent for a building whose cost was only one million dollars.

That, Mr. Speaker, goes to show that all over Canada, in all the provinces, in all municipalities, in provincial agencies, there are urgent, essential needs to be met. The population has great needs to be met. Mayors, aldermen, administrators of provincial agencies are plagued with just one problem, that of financing. As a solution, the federal government brings forward the motion now before the House as stupid as can be imagined.

I have here the statistics regarding the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, showing that the federal government has made loans under this Act in Canada from 1938 to 1968 totalling $7,035,783.86, demanding reimbursement from Canadian taxpayers of 2,500 million dollars interest over and above the original capital.

Today the government is proposing the same gimmick as the one which was proposed to the Canadian people in 1938. The Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938 is reproduced exactly in the bill under study. That act had forced the Canadian taxpayers to pay over $2.5 billion in interest alone to finance public investments in Canada, in order to encourage the world of high finance, to elect members of Parliament who only know how to say "amen" in the House of Commons, to kowtow to the big financier come election time, just like Premier Bourassa who, come election time, goes and visits the electorate of the province of Quebec and goes to the high financial circles in New York to obtain loans in order to get the citizens of the province of Quebec deeper under.

Mr. Speaker, we advocate in the House today what we have advocated for 20 years; other non-Crediters have claimed it also.

On November 16, 1963, the mayor of the town of Bedford in the Eastern Townships, on this subject of public capital financing, was asking the same thing we now ask the House. He was attending the Canadian congress of mayors and municipalities and he asked for the establishment of a municipal bank that would pull out of their indebtedness provincial agencies, municipalities and school boards. He said and I quote:

1. The institution, by both the federal and provincial governments of some credit or bank, called provincial-municipal credit or provincial-municipal bank as directed by our provincial government.

2. The central government should provide capital investments equivalent to two thirds under the form of decreasing participation.

It would be one of the easiest things for the government through a reduction to the minimum of the National Defence program which is very expensive for the country—

Mr. Speaker, there was also a request for the granting of interest-free loans for the financing of public capital. This was published in the newspaper La Voie de l'Est on Saturday, November 16, 1963.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote an excerpt from a telegram, which is in agreement with Creditiste thinking, that was sent to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) by a Toronto Liberal MP. I quote:

• (2030)

[English]

It seems to me the Canadian people have had a bellyful of you chaps jetting around the world spending and offering millions of our tax dollars in foreign aid while we who pay the freight have a tough time watching unemployment take its toll in our have-not areas. It's time you called Mr. Sharp home and called off these Santa Claus junkets by diverting some of these millions to give us back our railways and putting our people back to work. I have a sure-fire plan if you will direct your people to study it for a crash program. As far as we are concerned the honeymoon is over and it's time for action for Canadians, not Africa or Timbuktu. If I am wrong, let me know because I speak for a lot of Canadians. Awaiting your reply,

Respectfully,

Eddie Sargent, MPP, Grey-Bruce.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this shows that some people are starting to think like us and to understand that public and private finance are two quite different things, that savings produce capital and that loans must be reimbursed with interests, that capital invested in the construction of sidewalks, schools, town halls, water mains or other projects not yield interest and should not be expected to. This is why we, Créditistes, have a novel solution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him is now expired.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Nipissing on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that because of the Speaker's ruling of yesterday we are to debate each of these individual votes in the same way as we have done today, so that after the vote on each of these items there will be a referral to the committee of the whole House, at which time all these comments will again be made? Is that the procedure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Am I further to understand, Mr. Speaker, that we are to spend two days arguing the same motion, and that although the Conservative members during the committee hearings took up more than three-quarters of the time questioning these individual votes, that procedure will continue here?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I have to make a decision on the point of order. I hope the hon. member will state his case and limit his remarks to the case which he is trying to make. The Chair has accepted the procedure which is recognized as being the practice. We are now studying a different motion to accept the supplementary estimates, which will bring us to the bill on which we will have a debate on first, second and third reading.

Mr. Blais: In view of the fact that I have received an answer from the Chair, and although I was to speak on this motion, I will forgo the pleasure for the benefit of the hon. member opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I must point out to the hon. member that the point he raised was not a point of order. He stated an argument regarding the limitation of speeches of other members who have the right to speak in this House.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, we are to receive in this House a new piece of legislation following the passage of vote L12a. It is a new kind of legislation concerning the expenditure of money over a three-year period and it calls on us to vote money which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when speaking in the committee clearly indicated he would not need in 1973. The minister said he might need $65 million, perhaps $70 million or perhaps $75 million. Our party is prepared for stopgap measures and this is what we are talking about, a vote for $75 million. However, to talk about voting $350 million over a three-year period on what are called supplementary estimates is surely an abuse of the proceedings of the House and is no way to enact legislation involving a problem on which I will speak later.

It is totally irresponsible on the part of the government to ask parliament to vote $350 million for a further three-year period when the government, of its own volition, stated that it does not need the money. Apparently the government is going to put it in the bank. As the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) said, the government will then be able to use the money as it sees fit without having to account for it to the House. Under no circumstances could a responsible parliament contemplate voting for this measure as presented, in view of the obvious fact that the minister declared at the committee hearings that he does not even need the money.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) once said that $500 million was only a drop in the bucket. In referring to some of the problems we have heard the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) say that this is a small amount of money compared to the cost of the Olympic games. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that even if $350 million is only 70 per cent of that "drop", this party recognizes its responsibility to the taxpayers of Canada. This party is not going to vote money that a government clearly says it does not need this year, money that it can come back to parliament and get when it needs it. To set aside money for this year and the year after that under what are called supplementary estimates is clearly an abuse of the process of responsible government and the handling of public funds.

Mr. Speaker, the measures taken in the past regarding winter employment have been stopgap measures, and I understand that the minister is now trying to get away from that practice by attempting to provide for a three-year period. To that extent I compliment the government for looking ahead, but this is not the method by which it should be proceeding. The government should be introducing complete legislation to deal with winter works and winter employment problems.

Since the day Jacques Cartier landed on the shores of this country we have had winter. Winter is not a new phenomenon in this country. As long as statistics have been recorded we have heard about winter unemployment: it is not a new phenomenon and it is high time a government produced a bill on a long-term basis to deal with it. To produce a bill to deal with winter unemployment in a three-year supplementary estimate is a disgrace to this parliament and to this government's attempts to govern.

This whole procedure indicates lack of planning which has produced an inept economy and it would be impossible for this party, and I am sure for members of the party to my left, to vote for such an incompetent proposal.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

Mr. Lachance: Would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes.

Mr. Lachance: Would the hon. member tell the House when the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) said that $500 million was a drop in the bucket?

Mr. Blenkarn: He was reported in the campaign recently—

Mr. Lachance: When and where did he say that?

An hon. Member: Don't you read the newspapers?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Hon. members know that they must always address the Chair, even if they want to ask a question. I think the hon. member should abide by the rules.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, before supper this evening I had an opportunity to talk to some municipal officials in connection with winter works programs that have already taken place. They say, quite frankly, that if the government of Canada is going to give them money they are certainly not going to look a gift horse in the mouth. I understand that. However, they also told me of the wastage in winter works projects because of the way they have been handled in the past. I understand that there are communities which organize their winter projects in the summertime in the hope that there will be a winter works program. If it comes through, it gives them a few more dollars for the next year's finances but it does not do anything to further employment; the people would be employed anyway, so it does not mean that any new people are employed.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Blenkarn: I understand that when the program is announced in November, applications are then made for grants. When the people finally hear about the grants there is a great rush to do something. They tell me that they could do a great deal better if they had a long-term plan. In the past these winter works programs have been stopgap measures developed after the snow has started to fly. They are certainly not an efficient way of solving unemployment problems in winter.

I suggest that this government should contemplate some kind of long-term program and bring legislation before the House to cope with the problem of winter unemployment which is continually with us. I suggest that the government should look at arrangements whereby municipalities can apply for grants for projects that will stretch over two, three or sometimes five years; that when the municipalities apply for the projects there should be a termination date of the following June or July. Upon advice that they would receive money, the municipalities could then organize and arrange to employ people whom they would not otherwise employ. The problem is that in the past these programs have only been stopgap measures. It is high time the government recognized winter as an annual occurrence and made arrangements for long-term grants or long-term loans, or both, to municipalities to enable them to undertake the necessary projects.

I was happy to hear the hon. member for Compton say there is a lot of work to be done in this country, because there certainly is. A lot of work could be done in the municipal field, but unfortunately in the past municipalities have been short of money and have had to depend upon assessment against real property for their funds. This is really a cost-shared program, Mr. Speaker, and some of these cost-shared programs have a tendency to be more advantageous to municipalities that are financially well-off and less advantageous to the poor municipalities.

Vote L12a contemplates that 50 per cent of the direct labour costs will be absorbed by the federal government by way of loan or grant. The problem is that the municipalities must contribute the other 50 per cent of the direct labour costs. We know very well that any project requires more than labour; if it is to be worth anything it will require a great deal of material and machinery. Whilst there is a tremendous advantage to the municipalities, this program does not go far enough. It is certainly discriminatory in that it only looks after those municipalities which can afford to cover half the direct labour cost; but on any project the cost of materials and hiring equipment is almost the equivalent of the total direct labour costs.

I am very happy to see the federal government proposing a three-year program for winter works. However, we should have legislation to handle winter works programs over a long period of time. I cannot possibly accept this method of municipal financing, Mr. Speaker, or this method of legislating by supplementary estimates over three years. Under no circumstances could this party—nor could this House if it were really honest with itself—accept this method of legislating.

I implore members of this House to vote against the estimates. The money is not required; the Minister of Finance says that he does not need it this year, so there is plenty of time in which to present proper legislation. If the suggestion of this party is accepted, $75 million is more than enough to cover the requirements for this year and there is no way that parliament should vote money that is not required.

• (2050)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I feel sorry for the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) who a few moments ago cried out in anguish because the milk from his sacred cow was drying up. I feel sorry for any member on the other side of the House who came here expecting the government to take the lead in long-range economic planning only to find, instead, that the government is dealing in sticky plaster; it is running from problem to problem and trying to patch them with band-aids. That is exactly what this program is.

When one considers that the government ignored the forecast made by the Economic Council of Canada, that in January there were 668,000 Canadians out of work, an increase of 104,000, or 15 per cent over December, and that this government mentions unemployment in terms of percentages and does not think of unemployment in human terms, one can understand why the hon. member for Nipissing expressed such discouragement and why he does not like hearing statements such as those made by members of the opposition.

What this government has forgotten is that behind those statistics, behind the words "in due course", there are men and women and families who live in degrading conditions in this country. This program which the House is considering tonight is just a band-aid being used in a situation which needs major surgery.

They plan for three years, those far-thinking men on the government side, and then say they will give this country a winter works program involving $350 million over three years. They have been warned of impending disaster for four years. The problems of the municipalities of this country will not be solved in three years, or even in five. The government of the province of Ontario, which so many people on the other side of the House like to chide, plans its capital needs five years ahead when forecasting. This government's vision extends only to three years.

Some hon. members have mentioned anti-pollution programs. In my constituency the Rideau River has been neglected for 30 years, and the Ottawa River area for 50 years.

An hon. Member: Even between 1957 and 1963.

Mr. Baker: The government countenances in the capital of this country a transportation system which in some ways is one of the most inadequate in North America.

An hon. Member: What happened between 1957 and 1963?

Mr. Benjamin: It's the same old bunch.

Mr. Baker: Our problems will not be met with short-range programs. I am not suggesting the program under consideration is all that bad; I am suggesting only that it is not long range enough, that the period it covers is insufficient and that not enough money is provided if municipalities are to solve problems occasioned by their shortage of finances. For that reason I say this program is a farce. We need more. We needed more four years ago. We needed better planning four years ago. There is no evidence of that planning and that is why we in the opposition find it difficult to accept the program.

An hon. Member: What, another one?

Mr. Baker: An hon. member comments, "What, another one?". He had an opportunity to speak. The difficulty is that the bigger provinces are likely to take a bigger bite of the pie. The large municipalities, with officials who are administratively competent and can deal with other government officials, are more likely to benefit from this program than smaller municipalities, although unemployment difficulties seem to be greatest in the smaller municipalities, at least in my riding. The largest number of complaints regarding unemployment insurance claims arising out of maladministration that come to my attention come from a small town, Prescott, with 5,000 inhabitants. The greatest number of problems to do with relief comes from the small municipality of Marlborough, with 800 or 900 inhabitants. The program we are considering will not solve the difficulties of these people. That is why I describe it as a band-aid although major surgery is required.

In a press release dated December, 1972, the government suggested that "the objective of the program is to bring about an increase in capital spending and to sustain a high level of employment." Where is the man who wrote that? This program is merely a baby step in meeting the problems of our cities. And, Mr. Speaker, to take even that step the government comes to parliament and asks us to sell our birthright as a parliament to deal with matters of finance and abdicate our responsibility for considering these matters in later years. It is not worth our while abdicating this responsibility for the sake of this program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: It is necessary for us to remember that governments must be responsible. Governments cannot ask parliament for blank cheques. Governments cannot ignore parliament—and we in this party do not intend that to happen. When necessary we intend to raise our voices so that this government may understand that from now on there is to be a new era of governmental responsibility to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: Although well intentioned, I think this program was ill-conceived and may well turn out like the LIP program. During the question period I have heard the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) make excuses for that program. Letters have come from his department which have been full of excuses. We know that good projects have been ignored because no criteria were set. Ultimately, this House must bear the responsibility for lack of criteria with respect to such programs.

It was been suggested that this program originated in the minds of bureaucrats. I do not credit the public servants of this country with conceiving such an ill-conceived program. The public servants of this country will function best when properly led. The public servants of this country recognize that they are led by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who is the arch-conservative member on the government benches and perhaps the most conservative man in this House. The problems of our country demand action, imagination and full-time leadership by the minister. And what does he do? He falls back on band-aid remedies; he falls back on sticky plaster. One cannot criticize public servants for being concerned about such programs. With respect to this particular program, the public servants involved are leaders. Perhaps their problems with regard to the present program represent only the tip of the iceberg. Because of such difficulties morale has been low in the public service of this country.

Just look at the problems of our cities, Mr. Speaker. Look at the transportation problems of this city and others. Look at our housing problems. Look at transportation difficulties in general, and at water pollution difficulties. Look at the difficulties encountered with respect to the redevelopment of our parks and the provision of recreational land. Although the present program has been designed to develop employment, it will not solve such problems as I have enumerated. This program enunciated in the press release with such an air of euphoria will not do the job that the government salesmen, those new salesmen, would like to see done.

There is no imagination here. For a program that lacks such imagination I do not believe the government ought to be allowed credit beyond that which they say will be required for this year. There is a necessity for these programs. They are not the answer to everything, as this government says they are, but they will work as an adjunct to an active industrial society, a society where there is high employment, people can find gainful work and their wages are not drained off to meet the costs of enforced idleness.

These programs can work, but they must be started sooner than this one was started. We should not be debating the matter in February when we could have been debating it in December. As a matter of fact, the last parliament should have debated it in June. It is a slothful government that has put forward this matter. It is a delayed government, a late government and a government that will not be with us very long.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we have here the presentation by this government of a form of legislation, a bill in fact, under the guise of a supplementary estimate. My colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), traversed this point at considerable length yesterday. I do not want to go into the complexities of the Financial Administration Act in great detail, but at a moment's glance it invites one to look at the item in extenso as it appears in Supplementary Estimates A, laying down all the conditions, the allocations, how the allocations are to be secured, the types of projects and the forgiveness feature.

However, the strangest point, and I think the totally illegal point, is that it makes reference to a bill that has been wiped off the statute books. If one looks at Revised Statutes, 1970, in which should be incorporated the 1963 act, it cannot be found. It has been totally eliminated because the 1963 act terminated in 1966. It was dead. This item could have been introduced as a $1 item. However, for personal aggrandizement the government said, "We are going to make it $350 million."

Maybe this is a clarion call to the voters. Some will say it is a trumpet call. I would say it is whistling past the graveyard. However, there is this trumpeting call of $350 million that members opposite may say they have provided for the coming year. It is going to be something over three years. There is perhaps some $65 million for this year.

I will not repeat the argument of my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, with regard to the fact that this is contrary to the Financial Administration Act, an act of which I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has never heard.

Mr. Whelan: Oh, yes; I heard you mention it before.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am glad. Perhaps the minister will invite his colleagues to acquaint him with the contents of it.

Mr. Whelan: I have enough trouble now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We in this House cannot make an appropriation this year to cover expenditures for years to come and include therein provision that some of the moneys that are to be spent this year shall be forgiven this year by way of an appropriation next year. That is totally contrary to the workings of the Financial Administration Act.

I want to give the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) and a few others a little reading lesson. I wish the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) were here. He reads beautifully. He does a real job when he reads, but sometimes those words stick around in Hansard. On October 8, 1968, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) asked the Prime Minister the following question:

When does he intend to introduce his just society policy to replace the winter works policy, in view of the fact that municipalities are now in a very difficult situation?

Can the house expect an early statement from the right hon. Prime Minister in this connection?

The Prime Minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, the policy in this regard was launched before cancelling the winter works program; this the member should know.

The winter works program has been put aside. On December 13, 1968, as recorded at page 3906 of Hansard, my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), asked the Prime Minister the following question with regard to the amendment of the winter works program:

Is the government considering a suggestion I made to the Prime Minister at the time the winter works program was abandoned, that it might be employed in areas where unemployment in the winter months reaches or surpasses 8 per cent?

The Prime Minister replied:

When we abandoned the winter works program we did so because we felt there were other ways in which to ensure prosperity.

He talked about FRED, ARDA, AIDA and things like that. The Prime Minister then stated:

These are all ways in which we try to alleviate the economic situation. Of course we do not have a system of government in which we have entire jurisdiction over the whole economic policy.

Mr. Whelan: He does read well.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On October 5, 1970, as recorded at page 8758 of Hansard, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) asked the Prime Minister the following question:

Since most of the unemployed will not be very fully satisfied or their hunger assuaged by lists, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to announce any specific undertakings, intends to increase the money available for housing or intends to enter into any negotiations with provincial governments regarding winter works programs, antiquated or modernized?

Just prior to that the Prime Minister had said:

Mr. Speaker, we are not reviving the antiquated methods recommended by the leader of the New Democratic Party, but there have been a whole host of measures taken over the past year and indeed in recent months.

On November 5, 1970, as recorded at page 904 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) asked the following question:

• (2110)

May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to a winter works program supplemental to the regional development programs in order to help to alleviate some of the very substantial unemployment we have and will have this coming winter?

MR. TRUDEAU: No, Mr. Speaker. As I have pointed out before, the winter works program totalled something less than $50 million. We have replaced it by manpower retraining and mobility programs to the tune of several hundreds of millions of dollars. It is typical of the NDP that they would want to go back to solutions which were discarded and discredited some time ago.

Then on September 28, 1971, as reported at page 8229, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asked the Prime Minister a question with regard to winter works. He asked:

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the previous municipal winter works program which was very valuable, as everyone knows, was discontinued without reference to a federal-provincial conference would the Prime Minister consider reinstituting it and making an announcement about it within the next few days?

The Prime Minister replied:

I do not believe the assessment made by the hon. member that the previous program was very valuable is shared by everyone in this country, least of all by the municipalities themselves. They found that very often it was a wasteful program and asked the federal government to bring in better measures, which we did, and we have the manpower retraining program.

Yet the answer today is: Back to winter works for $350 million. As far as the NDP is concerned, the Prime Minister says he is bringing back antiquated provisions which were discarded. I recognize that the NDP were in favour of winter works programs; everyone was until the right hon. gentleman came to power. The previous administration had brought in winter works' programs. But when the just society came in, winter works went out of the window.

Today, though—and here we must believe the words of the former minister of labour—the Prime Minister is communicating with the people and he is finding out that winter works programs are programs which the people want, programs which many of the municipalities want. The Prime Minister told us in 1971 they were wasteful programs. Are these to be wasteful programs now? Why are they being reintroduced? You see, Mr. Speaker, members opposite cannot be credible in this situation. They have carried out a complete about-turn. Of course winter works programs were helpful. They did a lot of good. All I am quoting is what the Prime Minister has been saying about them.

Mr. Whicher: Anybody is entitled to make a mistake.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, so he made a mistake? Up and down these rows, everyone on this side of the House, Conservatives, Créditistes and NDP members said winter works programs were the answer. Unemployment was just as difficult in 1969, 1970 and 1971 as it is today. Were there any winter works programs in operation? Not a bit of it. All members opposite said was: We have our just society. We shall retrain people, recycle them.

What has happened? The sum of $350 million is to be advanced. This is strictly window-dressing. This winter they hope they can entice the municipalities and the provinces, even at this later date, to come in with programs of $160 million. Then we have to consider the conditions. They are not the conditions of the Municipal Development and Loan Act which was passed by Walter Gordon, though reference is made to that act. It is a dead act, one which does not appear on the statute books. One has to go back to the old statute books to find out details as to definitions. The program comes before us by way of a supplementary estimate and we are asked to rush it through.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Because the provinces want it quickly.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is required is a proper act of parliament, not just a few lines in a supplementary estimate. Such an act should have set out a winter works program adequately so that we might know precisely what are the conditions to be satisfied and be assured that it is a continuing program, not just a bunch of "ad hockery."

We would then have something on the statute books; there would be no need to keep questioning and badgering the government about a winter works program and risk getting the smart answers we have been given over the years by the Prime Minister. They were shocking answers. According to him, these were programs which were obsolete. But, my goodness, when they got into trouble and found their new-fangled programs were not working, what did they do? They went back to tried and true programs, such as winter works. Sure, winter works are only a palliative, but if the municipalities and the provinces were properly approached and allowed adequate time in which to make their plans, excellent results could be expected.

Nobody will be satisfied with the measure we are asked to approve. I would suggest to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) that he consult the city of Winnipeg to find out whether that city alone can undertake in this coming year to account for at least $4 million. Is $4 million going to help the city of Winnipeg? Well, that is all Manitoba will get this year—$4 million for the whole of the province. Will that be sufficient? I think not.

Will this amount be sufficient to share among the municipalities? Consider the situation in the province of Quebec. Some $40 million is to be shared this year among all the municipalities of the province. Give them a pittance, as somebody said earlier. Not more than a nickel—pas plus qu'un gros cinq sous. That is the extent of this program. To deal with unemployment on the present scale through winter works, at least half this amount should be taken for the first year.

Mr. Speaker, I object strongly to the action of the government in bringing forward this proposal in its present form, referring to an act which is no longer on the statute books and embodying the terms of the obligations under the municipal works program beneath a heading in the supplementary estimates. Mind you, I am sure the municipalities will welcome any money they can get, but it certainly will not do the job held out for it. It will prove a bitter disappointment. As far as winter works for 1972-73 are concerned, I do not think their value will reach $65 million for the entire country before the period one might call winter expires in this country.

• (2120)

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to this debate. This afternoon I heard the dual leader of the financial chieftains of the Tory party, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Tonight I have listened to the second-in-command of the financial chiefs of that party. I understand that the real financial chief is their leader.

An hon. Member: And who is that?

Mr. Whicher: My hon. friend asks who that might be. In any event, it is always very interesting to listen to these criticisms that are made of a government that is trying very hard to do what it can for the unemployed in Canada. The Liberal party takes second place to no one in helping the unemployed of Canada. Back in the Diefenbaker years when the hon. member who has just spoken was part of the government I remember the whole western world was shown who were the champions as far as unemployment was concerned. There was far more then, on a population basis, going right back to the depression years, a period of which none of us is proud.

For that matter, I do not think any Liberals sitting here tonight are particularly proud of the unemployment situation that we have in Canada. On the other hand, we are willing to admit our faults and that we have made mistakes. My hon. friend who has just spoken, as well as all the Conservatives who spoke this afternoon and yesterday, said that they never made any mistakes in the past. Their memories only go back to the Liberal government which took power a few years ago. They forget what happened when they controlled the purse strings around here.

Let me remind the House that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said to this parliament and to the people of this country that his first priority is to create jobs and get the unemployment figures down.

Mr. Orlikow: What were they last year?

Mr. Whicher: Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is a justifiable enterprise. Surely it is one my hon. friends opposite desire, even though some of them—not all by any means, but certainly some—had the unmitigated nerve to vote against the unemployment insurance bill the other night. I am glad to say three of them did have enough sense to stand up and vote with the government. We on this side are willing to admit our mistakes, and we have made plenty of them.

Mr. Hees: I'll say.

Mr. Whicher: My hon. friend from Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) never made any mistakes.

Mr. Yewchuk: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Whicher: When I am finished I will be glad to answer questions. Everybody likes the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, but the fact is that he never made a mistake in his life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: He was in the midst of a mistake when he went skiing in Europe but he was caught by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Some of the members who came here only last month do not remember, but let me remind the House that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings made many mistakes and he tried to rectify them by going on a skiing holiday in Europe at a certain period of time.

Mr. Paproski: Tell us about the trips you took, Ross.

Mr. Hees: You will make a mistake in the next election.

Mr. Whicher: When it comes to an election, George, you have only half a chance of winning.

Mr. Hees: That is grade 3. I must say you have a great memory for your old schoolroom chums.

Mr. Whicher: You do not bother me at all, George. I have been insulted by experts, and I really do not regard you as one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let the Chair remind the hon. member that it is customary to refer to other members by their ridings, not by their names. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher).

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: It is always a pleasure to listen to my hon. friend when he makes his bi-weekly parade and is given the opportunity to speak in the House, but it would help us a lot if he would just mention once that we are dealing here with vote L12a.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bruce.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased my hon. friend brought me back to reality when he said we are talking here about a $350 million vote. I am very pleased to talk about it.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) has a point of order.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the point raised by my good friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has very much bearing, I think. But on the other hand, I think that yesterday and today you were very lenient in regard to the relevancy of what was said. I think that Mr. Whicher—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): —who has the floor is in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has a point, but I count on the experience of the hon. member for Bruce to bring us back to the straight and narrow of debate.

Mr. Whicher: What is it that we are voting on here tonight?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: That is a good question.

Mr. Whicher: The fact is that we have before us a $350 million estimate. What is it for? I will be very frank with my hon. friends across the aisle and say that in my belief the Liberal Party over the last two or three years did make mistakes and that we do have too many unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: At every opportunity the members of the government have agreed with that. But they intend to do something about it. By bringing this estimate before the House tonight they have shown that they intend to do something about it. This afternoon I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley. He is an old constituent of mine who has strayed from the narrow path. Nevertheless, I thought he made a very good speech. My advice to some of my Conservative friends is that they should read it because they will learn something from it. One of the hon. member's criticisms was that there was not enough economic planning in Canada; that we did not—

Mr. Hees: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) on a point of order.

Mr. Hees: I wonder whether the hon. member would be kind enough to bring us up to date on his call for a leadership convention.

• (2130)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I would ask hon. members to give the hon. member for Bruce an opportunity to make his reasoned contribution.

Mr. Hees: Tell us about the convention.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say that if I did call for a convention I would be copying somebody, because I remember not once but many times when my friend the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) called for a convention. As a matter of fact, I would not be surprised if he is calling for one right now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whicher: If I ever saw a party that needed one, that hon. member belongs to it. If he needs any help, I am sure there are many over on his side who would be glad to arrange such a convention.

Mr. Hees: How soon do you think a convention should be held? What was the date you had in mind for a convention to replace your leader?

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say—

An hon. Member: You were much better when you were sitting in the rump.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You have one of the biggest to sit on that I have ever seen.

Mr. Whicher: My hon. friend is very good when he is sitting down.

Mr. Hees: He is better sitting down than you are making a speech.

Mr. Whicher: It doesn't matter which side he is sitting on because nobody would notice the difference.

Mr. Paproski: I want to thank my hon. friend.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my friends will let me continue for a few minutes. I do not mind these interjections.

Mr. Paproski: I hope you are going to send this back to your riding.

Mr. Hees: Tell us about the leader you are challenging.

Mr. Whicher: When my hon. friend has been sent back to his riding as many times as I have, he will be able to boast about it.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to be serious for a moment and I would appreciate not being interrupted for just a few minutes. When we vote on this large amount of $350 million I think we must get right down to basic foundations and ask ourselves where this money is to go.

An hon. Member: Don't you remember?

Mr. Whicher: The answer to that question is that the money is going to ten provinces and two territories in Canada. It is not going to any country in Africa—God bless them, and we try to help them—it is not going to an Asiatic country, to the United States or to South America; it is going to Canadian provinces and we should be proud of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: In addition, Mr. Speaker, one might very well ask why this money is going to the provinces of Canada. Let me say that a certain situation has developed. There is too much unemployment in Canada and this government is going to do its best to rectify that situation.

I am somewhat amazed that members of the Conservative party are opposed to this program because it has been brought in by way of supplementary estimate. One hon. member on the other side—I regret I cannot remember his riding—made a very reasoned speech this afternoon. I excuse his lack of knowledge because he came here only after the last election and perhaps his memory does not serve him well. Supplementary estimates were not put into use just when the Trudeau government took over. The winter works program really started during the Diefenbaker years. I do not want my hon. friends to be cross with me when I tell them that the winter works program came into effect then because there was more winter unemployment than ever in the history of Canada and that government had to do something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: May I remind my hon. friends through you, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he was prime minister of Canada did not bring in the winter works program as a budgetary measure; he brought it in through supplementary estimates. We are now copying what he did. Even the Tories do some things that are good.

Mr. Hees: Better than anything you have ever done.

Mr. Whicher: This afternoon the hon. member for Don Valley said that this government did not do enough planning. Even some of us on this side might agree. But the provinces of Canada have complained not just about this government but about various governments over the years. They have said they do not know what is being done down here, and they have asked for planning. This government has planned and has agreed to the expenditure of $350 million over the next three years, not just for this winter but for next winter and the winter following. The provinces will know exactly what they are going to get and they can plan their itineraries for winter works not just for this year but for the next two years.

This is a program which must be put into effect. My hon. friends on the other side continue to talk about the unemployment problem in Canada. We admit there is a problem and we want to do something about it. We are asking our Conservative friends to help us do something about it; that is why we are asking for this $350 million.

An hon. Member: Cut taxes or resign.

Mr. Hees: God knows, somebody has to help you.

Mr. Whicher: What is the purpose of the $350 million?

An hon. Member: Don't you know?

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I generally do not use notes, but I should like to quote one paragraph of a statement that was provided to each member of this House. It has reference to the winter capital projects fund and in the introduction it is stated that the purpose is as follows:

To encourage a concentration of additional activity during the next two years there is an incentive providing for forgiveness of a loan to an amount equal to 50 per cent of total direct on-site labour costs incurred up to May 31, 1975; and to encourage construction during the winter, a further incentive allows for forgiveness of an additional 50 per cent of direct on-site labour costs between the December 6 to May 31 winter period for the 1972-73 winter, and the December 1 to May 31 winter period for the 1973-74 and 1974-75 winters.

I suggest that is something every member of this House should stand up and support. It is something that my friends on the other side have been complaining about ever since we came here on January 4. They have said the unemployment situation is intolerable. It is intolerable, and we want to do something about it. All of us in this government ask you to do exactly the same. Let me conclude by asking every member to think about the province from which he or she comes when voting on this motion. The provinces have asked for this program and for more planning.

Mr. Hees: They started asking eight months ago and they have asked and asked and asked.

Mr. Whicher: They asked us to plan this program, not just for this winter but for the next two winters. I suggest that by voting for this motion we will give the provinces exactly that for which they have asked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca wishes to ask a question. He may do so with the consent of the hon. member for Bruce. Is it agreed?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bruce said that this party voted against unemployment insurance when it voted against Bill C-124. It seems to me that he does not know what the bill was all about and I should like to ask him whether he has read it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to hon. members from both sides of the House speak on this item since yesterday but I have yet to make up my mind whether members of the official opposition are for or against it. They have complained that this program should be in the form of legislation. I have not been here very long, but I have the impression that when a supply bill is passed it becomes a statute or an act of parliament. Some of the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the previous speaker from the official opposition would not seem to indicate that fact. If I am wrong I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, or someone else will correct me.

• (2140)

Since this is in fact an act of parliament, when we are through with this debate and these estimates we will have a piece of legislation. I do not know what the members of the official opposition are complaining about. I agree with a number of things they have said. Of course, this is 8, 10 or 12 months too late. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) some time ago wiped out winter works, members of the opposition and of our party complained bitterly. There is nothing new about that.

I agree with members of the official opposition that in this area the government has been incompetent. What else is new? When I listen to them I am reminded of the farmer that had two skunks in the chickencoop: it was twice as bad as having only one skunk. When one thinks of the winters of 1959, 1960, 1961 and 1962 one realizes, as my friend the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) said, the government headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did the same thing. We were months behind. Even though the old parties have been around here for 105 years, they do not seem to realize that Canada happens to be a country which has a northern climate and long winters. This is a country in which we should plan what we will do in the winter, but both the Liberals and Conservatives could not find their backsides in the dark even if they used both hands.

Mr. Paproski: I do not think that is very nice.

Mr. Benjamin: I was able to find my backside in the dark a long time ago with either hand. The members of the official opposition have been getting up and bellowing like a moose at fly time in respect of this supplementary estimate. It is the same kind of estimate they brought in in the late fifties, early sixties or in the 1890s. They have not changed. They keep on damming the waters under the bridge. I just do not understand why they find it so necessary to berate the government for doing exactly what they did. This is the kind of thing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) complained about 25 years ago, whether it was the Liberals or Tories in power.

An hon. Member: Fifty years ago.

Mr. Benjamin: He could have been here then too. This is really a charade. When one listens to the members of both these old parties with their nineteenth century concepts and methods, we find that when one mentions economic planning or a planned economy they say it is socialism and is not democracy. However, when they are in opposition they say it should have been planned and brought forward months before.

When my friend, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), said this very thing, particularly in respect of winter works every year for the last four years, members of the government and the official opposition said that you cannot have planning ahead because that is socialism. Now I hear some of my right-wing friends saying the same thing. Why? I say it is not because they believe in this but because there is some noise to be made in their frantic efforts to shove the Liberals away from the trough and get the Tories up to it. They should be patient and wait a little while.

There is no argument about the necessity for planning winter works. The government, private enterprise, the trade union movement and the farm organizations should sit down and plan for one, two or five years ahead; there is so much to be done in this country. There will be municipalities which by the end of May or June will not have been able to complete projects. I will make a prediction that by the deadline for the completion of these projects there will be scores of municipalities in this country which will not have been able to complete their projects whether we have a Liberal or a Tory government.

The members on this side of the House will succeed in getting them to extend the deadline as we were able to do in respect of winter works in previous years. So again I fail to understand why members of the official opposition are so upset.

The panic button will be pushed by members of the government, no matter which party occupies those benches, and the deadline will be extended. You can bet on that. On the one hand, the Conservatives have talked about waste, extravagance and abuse in respect of unemployment insurance. My hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) spoke very well about all those who are unemployed in his riding, particularly in Prescott. This is good. This is the nicest thing I have heard a Conservative Member of Parliament say about the unemployment situation for quite a while. I take it he will be voting for this estimate. I am sure the municipal council of Prescott will come up with some projects to put people to work. I am sure, also, that Prescott will try to get more than its share of the money. I wish them well. It will put some people to work and reduce unemployment and the number on the welfare rolls in Prescott. So I can assume that the hon. member will support this supplementary estimate.

The Prime Minister spoke about all the alternatives available when they stopped the winter works program and brought in manpower training, and so on. The hon. member for Bruce admitted that this was a mistake. I ask him to read some of the speeches he made when he said two years ago that was a mistake. It reminds me of the travelling salesman of 1922, with a straw hat and a cane, who said that you had to sell to make work and had to turn business free all by itself so that there would be no unemployment. If he had been selling soap or patent medicine, I probably would have bought some that night. But since then he has turned around 180 degrees. I was glad to hear that admission from the hon. member for Bruce. I never thought I would live to see the day.

Of course, this estimate is a frantic, last minute effort. Everybody here and everyone in this country knows this. But at least it is finally being made. At least some jobs will result by the end of May or June. I suggest that we pass the estimate and get on with it. We must recognize the kind of country we have and that we have difficult winters. Let us call on the resources of the people and of the business interests in this country in co-operation with the government to plan what we are to do. There is so much to be done. Every winter we have these old-line parties hollering at each other, bitterly complaining and attacking the other for doing the same thing they did a generation or 100 years ago. Surely all they are really doing is frantically struggling while being brought into the twentieth century and a planned economy. Even though they are making a great deal of noise and are engaging in a struggle, I hope they will pay attention to the lessons we have learned.

An hon. Member: Then it will be the twenty-first century.

Mr. Benjamin: They are still in 1890. Unless we learn from our mistakes and do the kind of planning in respect of an industrial and economic program which takes into account our winter and our geography, we will have this kind of situation every winter. You can be certain of it if one of these old-line parties happens to be governing. But at least they have come around sufficiently to throw in patchwork stuff, even though it is much too late. They have gradually learned.

• (2150)

I think that if we were unfortunate enough to still have an old party government ten years from now, we would find them bringing in an industrial and economic plan laid out for the next ten years regarding the number of homes, the miles of roads, steel production, automobile production, farm production, you name it. When this was mentioned in the House by members of my party in the 1940s there were members of the official opposition who behaved as if they were back in 1890 who said that members of my party should be deported because they were subversive. Tonight I heard one of them talking about planning—only one of them.

This vote is, in concept and in theory, the proper kind of thing for parliament to adopt. It is in fact a statute, in spite of the wailings of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and we should have adopted it sooner. Parliament could and should have met in late November or early December. In fact, it could have provided these extra funds last June in preparation for the present winter; but we did not, and I will not stand here, as did hon. friends to my right who tried to dam waters that have already passed under the bridge. Let us pass this estimate. Let us get on with putting as many people to work as we can for what is left of the winter. I hope that members of the official opposition will then rise and educate me further about a planned economy and planning work for our people.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to place a few remarks on the record, particularly after hearing the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) speak and I looked at vote L12a. I was immediately struck by the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), uttered some time ago, that his policy which the people could lump or otherwise, is just a regrettable side effect of the war against inflation. I think of the frustrations, the anger and the displacement of people which result from such a policy. They say, "Yes, we admit our mistakes." But they admitted them after October 30. It was then that that party came to life and said, "Yes, we are wrong, because we have to listen to those who are really our masters, namely, the people." It is the people who told them that they must be concerned about unemployment, about environmental malaise and all that goes with it, the suffering, the alcoholism, the drug addiction, the murders and the abuses to the person.

When I heard the Prime Minister say today that his government takes direction from the Economic Council of Canada, that they are the people who give him forecasts regarding the direction in which this country should be going, I wondered why the expertise and the wisdom of the people who form the Economic Council of Canada is suddenly being accepted. I should like to put on the record a statement which appeared in the ninth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada, page 89, where reference is made to long-term goals.

I have heard so much said by my friend the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) who asked to hear more about long-term planning. Obviously we must have long-term planning if this nation is to be strong, and we must create an atmosphere so that equality of opportunity can exist. We cannot have ad hoc measures brought in through fright and fear, as is vote L12a. The Economic Council of Canada has been giving direction not only to the government but to members of the House, to the people of Canada and to the private sector so that certain goals can be reached. Rather than adopting band-aid measures which in my opinion just add to the frustration when they are brought in late, the Economic Council of Canada said this at page 89:

> In our First Annual Review of 1964, we formulated five general goals for the Canadian economy: (1) a relatively high and stable rate of growth; (2) a viable balance of payments; (3) an equitable distribution of rising incomes; (4) a high level of employment, defined as a situation with a maximum of 3 per cent unemployment; and (5) reasonable price stability defined as a maximum increase of 2 per cent per year in the gross national expenditure price deflator. These goals did not reflect the historical experience of the Canadian economy. Rather, they were intended as ambitious but attainable targets that would provide direction to policy-makers over the long term. Their achievement remains highly desirable to this day.

Let us look to the south of us and see what they do rather than adopt band-aid measures such as we find in vote L12a. On February 2, 1973, a significant event occurred, namely, the announcement that the United States of America had a rate of unemployment of 5 per cent, which means nearly full employment. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) looks at me with surprise. I am saying that this is just what it is. In our terms this would be reaching a full employment figure. The rate of unemployment in the United States is drifting down, but here it is drifting up. I wonder why this is so.

Why has the United States been so successful in dropping their rate of unemployment, while we have been so unsuccessful? As a matter of fact, our effort has been dismal. I will tell you why. It seems to me that the United States has accepted the fact that high unemployment is a national problem and that they should use all the expertise and wisdom they can muster because they realize the frustrations that occur as a result of high unemployment, the possible revolt and in the long-run, perhaps, the possibility of civil war. The United States has faced the problem. What do we hear from our government? On one hand we hear that the land is strong, on the other we see procrastination, waffling, sliding away from responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to bring to the attention of hon. members that in accordance with Standing Order 40 a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, before we go on to the "late show" may I ask whether I am correct in understanding the House leader as saying that we will be going on with the business of supply tomorrow? Do we also have an understanding that we will defer the votes on all of these motions and take them at a later date?

Mr. MacEachen: That is agreeable, if it is agreeable on all sides that when discussion is completed on any particular item the vote will be deferred until all the items are ready to be taken at one time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There have been discussions and I think it correct to say that this is acceptable. Perhaps it should be made an order of the House now so that we will all know it, namely, that the votes on each of the nine motions occasioned by the notices of the opposition will be taken when the debate on those nine motions has been concluded.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Is it unanimously agreed? It is understood that an order of the House cannot be issued without unanimous consent, and I would invite hon. members to indicate immediately if they agree.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—POSSIBILITY OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SASKATCHEWAN LAND BANK PROGRAM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, tonight I shall try to pursue my question on the "late show" over the enthusiasm of members of the House. What I want to pursue is the question I asked of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on January 12 regarding arrangements between the federal Department of Agriculture and the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture concerning the land bank program. At that time I asked the following question:

> In view of the need for assistance faced by young people who start farming and in view of the representations made to the minister by the government of Saskatchewan for financial assistance for its land bank program, can he say if any financial assistance for this program will be forthcoming?

The minister said that he was considering this, but there would be no special arrangements with the province of Saskatchewan over those with any other province. I do not think that the province of Saskatchewan wants any special or particular status. I think that what we are saying is the federal government should consider the wishes of provincial governments in their planning whether it be agricultural, economic or social.

Since the federal government is determined to go ahead with the small farm development plan and have signed over half of the provinces, I think they should perhaps take a different point of view for a province like Saskatchewan. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are opposed to the plan as it now stands because they feel quite sincerely, as I and many others do, that it is not going to aid and assist farmers to stay on the land, or young farmers to get started. Rather, it is going to speed up the demise of the small farm all across the Prairies. It is going to take three farms to make two, and two farms to make one, and farms taken from older farmers will be sold to those who can afford to buy them.

I feel that the efforts and energies of the federal Department of Agriculture should be directed to aiding and assisting provincial programs. The provincial land bank will also be purchasing land from farmers, but in contrast to the small farm development plan will be channelling that land into the hands of younger farmers who want to start out, or into the hands of small farmers who need more land in order to make viable farming units. The only major difference between the two plans, as I understand it, in negotations between the two departments is that the small farm development plan is strictly a development agency whereas the land bank plan in Saskatchewan is a Crown authority. It leases land to the farmer for five years when he is starting out and he has the option to purchase the land at an interest rate of 5 per cent. Because of the option to purchase clause, land is available to those without much capital, to young people starting out and to small farmers who need more land to make their operations viable.

I urge that the government and the Minister of Agriculture take into account the points of view of the Saskatchewan government and look at the merits of the provincial land bank scheme. I think they will come to the conclusion that they should be helping farmers by funds and by organization. There are two or three benefits. First, there would be more funds which could be borrowed in a more efficient manner. Second, there would not be any duplication of service and a greater amount of expertise would be available to the provincial land bank personnel. Finally, a provincial land bank program as presently constituted would be more localized than it would be if run federally. Governments in this country must move in the direction of more local autonomy. We must localize government administration and make people feel they are closer to the decision makers rather than farther away.

I hope the government will take these three points into consideration. The entire question of the transfer of farmland on the Prairies as well as across the country is important. The number of farms in this country is decreasing rapidly. According to the census, between 1965 and 1971 the number of farm units in this country fell by 15 per cent. The populations of our small rural towns and cities and other rural areas are diminishing instead of growing. If we are to keep Canada alive and flourishing, our farming community must be viable. One way of doing this is by helping farmers with schemes such as the land bank scheme of Saskatchewan. The federal government must be flexible in this area. It must begin listening to the provinces and regions if it is to keep this nation together as a viable country in the years to come.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) expressed his concern about the young people who want to settle on the farm, and about federal help to the Saskatchewan land bank program.

I share his concern for the young people who would like to make a career of farming and earn a living from it.

As the hon. member doubtless knows, the federal small farms development program is now in force in several provinces, including Alberta, Ontario, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It is of considerable help to the young farmers.

I trust that, in spite of difficulties, an agreement can be worked out with Saskatchewan so that the two programs might complement each other.

Negotiations are underway with Saskatchewan, and I hope that a quick agreement can be reached, in order that the young people of Saskatchewan may benefit from the same advantages of the small farms development programme as their friends from the other provinces.

PUBLIC WORKS—ALLEGED DISPOSAL OF OLD BARGES BY DEPARTMENT IN LAKE OKANAGAN—STEPS TO REMOVE

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) in the House the other evening made the statement that it pays to be clean. This prompted me to ask the minister during the question period whether it is government policy with regard to the environment to bury old barges and other refuse in beautiful Okanagan Lake. Mr. Speaker ruled this question out of order on the basis that it was not urgent. But because of the urgency that was contained in this question, which Mr. Speaker did not understand, the question was rephrased the following day to point out the immediate hazard to navigation and safety caused by the attempted disposal by sinking of these barges.

Three old barges had been floating in Okanagan Lake and the Kelowna and District Safety Council, deeming them a hazard to navigation, asked the Department of Transport to take them out of the lake a few years ago. They were towed to a shallow part of the lake and beached, where they were left for some years. This still did not satisfy the safety council, as in their opinion the barges were still a hazard to navigation in the lake. They therefore kept pressing the Department of Transport to have them removed from the lake.

These barges were derelict in nature and their ownership was questionable. One was 170 feet by 50 feet, another 60 feet by 30 feet and another 80 feet by 50 feet. The Department of Transport convinced the public works department to call for tenders for the removal of these barges from their resting place in the lake. It is understood that two tenders were received, one for removing them entirely from the lake and the other for towing them out into the lake and sinking them. On hearing about the sinking, the Kelowna safety council immediately raised objections as this would create some form of pollution in the lake, which of course was not in the best interests of environmental control and the ever pressing attempt to keep this beautiful lake from becoming polluted in any way.

However, because the tender to sink these barges was lower, the Department of Transport accepted this tender without any consultation with people in the area concerned about these matters. The first the safety council, or anyone else for that matter, knew of what was happening to these barges was when they discovered that they were no longer in their former resting place. Interested citizens then went out in their boats to see if they could find out what had happened to the barges.

They were able to discover them by sighting, from boats on the surface of the lake, drums that had been attached to the barges to float and then had been sunk with the barges. Apparently the company which contracted for the removal had gone around Kelowna buying up all the old drums they could, taken these out and attached them to the barges so they could float, then pulled them out in a straight line about 300 yards off shore and sunk them by taking some of the drums away. Many of the drums were still attached and some local skin divers went down to inspect what had really happened. These drums were attached with flimsy ropes. They let five of them go and the five drums came up out of the water like torpedoes.

The minister said that the barges were not a hazard to transportation, nor were they a contaminant. Because of the questions raised by people in the area in the past few days, the drums have now all been released from these barges but this has in no way satisfied the people of the area. They believe this to be a shocking display, by supposedly responsible departments of the federal government, to be contaminating the lake with these old barges in what may prove over the years, as they continue to disintegrate and dead-heads appear on the lake, a certain hazard to transportation. It is also a shocking example and the setting of a terrible precedent at this time when people are crying out for environmental control. People are now saying that if the federal government can dispose of garbage in the lake, why can't they?

I call on the departments responsible in the federal government to practice what they preach, to become responsible and remove these barges from the lake. This is the kind of thing that should be happening, in my opinion, in make-work programs. Let us mean it when we say it pays to be clean. Let us not be secretive about what is going on. I ask the government to consult with people and organizations such as safety councils. They are responsible; they want to help; they want things done properly.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé). I am pleased for another reason as well. I was born and raised on the shores of Lake Okanagan. My ancestors were there to greet many of those who came later. When the hon. member speaks of the beauty of this area, I can with some knowledge agree with him.

There are two points I wish to make tonight in connection with the question raised by the hon. member. First, a contract has been let, funded by the Department of Transport, in the amount of $2,745 for the removal of loose or potentially hazardous material from the barges. Second, the removal of the air-filled barrels is being carried out by the original contractor at his own expense. It was felt that this was his responsibility because this method of sinking the barges was originally adopted by him.

The work commenced on February 5 and a Department of Public Works engineer inspected the progress being made on February 6. I do not have an up to date report but I am advised that the removal of the barrels should have been completed in one day and that the entire work should have been completed within one week.

It is a regrettable situation, as the hon. member stated, but I should like to remind the House that this problem goes back about 12 years. It is not new; it is one which existed when another government was in power, so let us not introduce any political partisanship here. Mistakes were no doubt made along the way, but another government also had a chance to correct them. I intend to pay personal attention to this question. I think it is a wrong practice to sink barges in water as a means of getting rid of them. It is a practice which really ought not to be followed.

INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF ABITIBI MILL IN SAULT STE. MARIE—USE MADE OF DEVELOPMENT GRANTS BY COMPANY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to elaborate a question which I addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in the House yesterday in relation to the threatened closure of the Abitibi paper mill in Sault Ste. Marie. A few days ago the following notice appeared in that paper mill; it was addressed to hourly-rated employees.

Effective February 18, 1973, the following conditions must be agreed to in order to protect the operation of the mill at Sault Ste. Marie:

1. When the mill is operating less than seven days per week, we will revert to all clauses in the six day agreement as to hourly rates, statutory holidays, wire time, premium pay and working conditions.

In the event continuous operations are resumed, the continuous operation rates and conditions applicable will apply during such period of operation.

2. The floating holidays to be reduced by three.

3. The premium costs for the Abitibi disability benefit plan will be shared on a 50-50 basis by the company and the employees on the actual rates projected by the insurance carrier for this division.

4. Remove the upgraded classifications from the papermakers wage scale for running groundwood specialties and double stacks.

5. Extend the present agreement for one full year to April 30, 1974. The situation will again be reviewed on February 1, 1974.

This notice has been given to the workers and to the union and the company refuses to discuss what in effect amounts to an ultimatum. I am frankly appalled by the attitude of the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company in a day and age when supposedly we have progressed to enlightened labour-management relations. As I say, it amounts to an ultimatum to the workers, instituting a pay freeze for one year, extending the old contract and reducing fringe benefits. No discussion has been permitted. The company will not talk to the union nor will it make any public statement.

In effect, the workers are being made the scapegoat for what the company claims are the marginal profits at Abitibi or Sault Ste. Marie. Yet the company provides no proof of this claim. I call upon it to open its books for public scrutiny so that the public and the workers can compare the figures of costs and profits. Is it only labour costs which have given rise to the predicament in which this plant finds itself? Can it be the inefficiency of the mill due to outdated equipment which Abitibi failed to modernize? Has the company been reinvesting its profits in the mill in order to keep it a viable or competitive operation? Or could it be market conditions? And are those conditions temporary or long term?

What choice do the workers have, confronted with this ultimatum? To accept it is to accept the blame for the problems of Abitibi without any proof. Naturally, the workers rejected the terms of this ultimatum. Had they accepted this ultimatum to stay on the old contract under threat that the mill would be closed down, what is to say that next year the company would not pull the same trick and say to the workers, "Stay as you are or we will close the mill"?

• (2220)

The company will make a unilateral decision on February 16. The board of directors will meet on that date and decide the fate of 500 employees and their families in Sault Ste. Marie; they will decide whether they are to continue working or be thrown out of work and into the unemployment lines. This could be an economic catastrophe of major proportions in my constituency. I am afraid that it appears to me and to many people in Sault Ste. Marie that the company's policy appears to be "profits before people".

Therefore I put these questions to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Firstly, what measures does his government plan to take to prevent such overt intimidation? Secondly, what contingency plans has his department, should—and perish the thought—the company close the mill and throw 450 men out of work?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and share the concern which the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has expressed about this serious problem in his constituency. I am sure he realizes that the company and the unions in this case are engaged in some kind of collective bargaining, however free or unfree it may be in these particular circumstances. I think the important point that should be made is that all matters of this kind fall entirely within provincial jurisdiction. The federal government has no authority whatsoever to intervene in this labour dispute, nor has it in any other labour dispute except the few that involve workers under federal jurisdiction, largely in the transportation industry.

As to possible action by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in this situation, that will have to await the unfolding of events. The department's officers are following the situation closely and are prepared to act immediately in any problem requiring assistance in the adjustment of any workers who might be affected. Until the parties have resolved their differences, however, and pending the emergence of a real or anticipated lay-off situation, it would be impractical and improper for the department to attempt to intervene in any manner. Should a need develop for the services of the department, all applicable programs and services will be made available to assist in any way we can.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

POSSIBLE FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity relating to the present heavy expenses being incurred by the citizens' groups preparing their case before the United States Power Commission in opposition to the flooding of the Canadian Skagit Valley by Seattle City Light, which expenses could now be terminated if the government of Canada will confirm the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to CKWX radio newsman Doug Taylor on February 6 that "nobody believes now the Skagit Valley will be flooded". I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt):

That the House direct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to immediately convey to the citizens' groups fighting the flooding that they now have the assurance of the government of Canada that the flooding will not occur and they may therefore safely withdraw from the costly hearings before the U.S. Federal Power Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Bell: They won't say no to this one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I have the floor, may I go on? I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 arising out of the disastrous rise in the cost of living, particularly the rise in the cost of food. With the unanimous consent of the House I wish to move, seconded by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the government to introduce without delay its legislation to increase the amount of old age pensions and also its legislation to implement the guaranteed income proposals set out in the Speech from the Throne, to enable Canadians to cope with the crippling rise in the cost of living, particularly in the price of food.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the House that 105 students of the Charlebois secondary school are here today—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are considering a motion under Standing Order 43. The Chair has to inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: It looks like the shacking-up is close to being over.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Concerning the point of order raised by the hon. member for Ottawa East, I must suggest to him that it is not in order. I must also tell him that it is against the practice of this House to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence of visitors in the galleries, except in very special circumstances, such as the visit of parliamentarians. I realize that it was hard for the hon. member to resist the temptation of drawing attention to the presence of certain students from his riding in the galleries, but I invite hon. members to follow the practice of this House.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SUGAR BUSH WORKERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for adjournment of the House in order to deal with a matter which I consider to be of urgent and pressing necessity, namely unemployment insurance benefits.

During the maple sugar season, owners of maple sugar groves find it difficult to hire supplementary labour because those who are unemployed do not want to lose their benefits. Could the House examine the possibility of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act in such a manner that those now receiving benefits are enable to work during the maple sugar season without loss of benefits?

Mr. Speaker: I take the liberty of pointing out to the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) that a motion for adjournment of the House should normally be presented under the provisions of Standing Order 26, rather than Standing Order 43. At any rate, I shall ask the House whether there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Compton.

• (1110)

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and the motion therefore cannot be put.

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMUNICATIONS SPIRE IN PROPOSED METRO TORONTO CENTRE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the citizens of Toronto are just now beginning to react to the construction of the Canadian National communications tower and the implications it has for development in the metropolitan Toronto harbour area, in view of the fact that the development agreements between the developers, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, and the City of Toronto with regard to the entire Metro Centre project have not been completed, and also in view of the fact this needle may be used as a lever to rush the finalization of these agreements relating to what will be, after all, one of the major developments on the continent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport to order the CN Tower Company to postpone the beginning of the construction of the CN tower so that further consideration can be given to the tower aspect of this Metro Centre project by the council and citizens of the city of Toronto.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—ACTION TO EXERT CONTROL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In light of the information released today by Statistics Canada showing an increase of 5.7 per cent in the consumer price index between January of 1972 and January of 1973, can the minister tell the House what action he proposes to take to bring the increase in the cost of living under control?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the rise in the cost of living continues to cause me and everybody in the House concern. It is primarily induced by a sharp rise again in food prices which I think adds urgency to the task of the House committee investigating food prices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As I have said before in the House, the increase in food prices is primarily attributable to a world shortage of many staples which is affecting Canada as well. It is primarily a supply problem which was complicated in this country by the adverse weather that destroyed a good many of the vegetable and cash crops in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure the minister will agree that it is not altogether a question of food prices. But since food prices have obviously increased much more than the minister expected last May when he brought down his budget and said, "we do not expect food prices will rise as fast this year as last", whereas they have in fact risen substantially faster than in 1971, does the minister intend to take any action with regard to food prices other than just leaving the matter in the lap of the special committee?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are looking at ways to see what we can do to increase the supply of food. As for what I said last May, the hon. gentleman may be armed with a little hindsight but the forecast that I made last May could not, of course, have taken into account the shortages that developed on a world basis in grain as well as the demand that developed for meat. Nor could I in any way predict, and I do not think the hon. gentleman could, the weather which crippled our crops in parts of Ontario and the west.

Mr. Baldwin: So it is an act of God, is it?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is because prices obviously increased much faster than the minister estimated or expected that I asked him whether he is going to take any new action. My supplementary question is simply this. Is it still the minister's view, as he expressed several months ago, that the only way he knows of handling the food problem is to ration food?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not what I said, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows. I suggest he is again exercising that selective memory for facts which is beginning to distinguish his performances in the House. What I said was that if the country were to accept a proposal for price controls over food, that might well involve at the same time food rationing, particularly if the problem were shortage of supply.

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—EMERGENCY MEASURES PENDING COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask one or two supplementaries. I direct my first supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact the increase in the cost of living has gone up really disastrously, as I am sure he and every other member of the House will agree, and in view of the fact the rise in the price of food has been particularly high and affects the nutritional level of lower income families, is the government now considering some emergency, even if temporary, measures to halt the rise at least in the price of food?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is, of course, considering every way in which a successful attempt might be made to halt increases in the cost of living. In the case of food in particular we hope we will receive some insight from the committee that has been set up and in which members of all parties are participating.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Prime Minister whether in the interim, until the committee reports and action is taken by parliament on any recommendations that the committee may make, which obviously is at least two, three or four months away, the government is considering some arrangement whereby a cash payment to pensioners can be made to make up for the increase in food prices as well as, in collaboration with the provinces, some general increase in payments to low income families across the country in order to protect the lives and future of the adults and children who constitute the 20 to 25 per cent of the people in Canada who are living below the poverty line?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a mix of schemes that would alleviate the hardship suffered by some of the people hit by inflation. The answer that has been given in the Speech from the Throne is that the whole system of welfare, even including a guaranteed annual income for people in certain categories, will be discussed with the provinces in the near future. If the hon. member is talking about something even more immediate, I would suggest that he wait until a week Monday night, when the budget will try to alleviate some of these problems.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South on a last supplementary question on his part, and then the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his answers mean that the government is not now considering some emergency steps in the interim until longer term policies may be developed? Is that the effect of his answer?

Mr. Trudeau: Not exactly, Mr. Speaker. When I referred to the budget, which is 10 days away, the hon. member is, of course, free to consider this as an interim step, but it is conceivable, without going into the details of the budget, that there will be some measure of relief for Canadian citizens in that budget. Of course, I cannot say more at this time, but the hon. member is welcome to take that as an interim step.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As he has said on many occasions that the government would take positive action to curb and alleviate rising prices if it considered the situation were serious enough, in view of the fact the cost of living has been going up at an annual rate of just under 10 per cent a year during the past month and gives every indication of rising at a similarly high rate in the future, does the Prime Minister consider that that time has now arrived?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the implication of the statistics just quoted, I would say that our position is not dissimilar to that of his leader who said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What is your position?

An hon. Member: Tell us your position.

Mr. Fairweather: You are the government.

Mr. Trudeau: What do you say about yours?

An hon. Member: Less double-talk.

Mr. Trudeau: Our position is not dissimilar to that of his leader who says that price and wage controls will be brought in, if necessary.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the positions of the two gentlemen are quite dissimilar in that the Prime Minister is the head of the government, has the responsibility to act and has said he would bring in positive measures if the time came when it was necessary. Does he now consider that the time has come for action?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: The answer is that the government does not have the guts. It is as simple as that.

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—POLICY OF CONSUMER AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, since we cannot get anything out of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I stress the word "consumer". In light of the very real crisis in respect of food prices, can the minister announce today any specific government policy to counteract the fact that today the Canadian housewife is having to spend $1.10 for every dollar she paid last year for food?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, even though the hon. gentleman is a newcomer to the House I am sure he realizes that any government policy to be announced will be announced formally on behalf of the government in the usual way.

Mr. Hees: Wow! Isn't that a policy? Have we ever got a policy now.

Mr. Fairweather: We don't even get a weather report from this minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: At least Turner gives us a weather report.

Mr. Hees: At least give us something.

Mr. Crouse: There are three blind monkeys over there.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Even if he is an oldtimer in the House, surely he knows that ministers of the Crown should be responsible for announcing policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs today announce the policy of his department in respect of food prices?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. gentleman was so busy phrasing his next question that he did not hear my previous answer.

Mr. Hees: He did not miss a thing; there was no answer.

Mr. Nielsen: What an arrogant bunch!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary question he will be recognized for this purpose, and the Chair will then recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a further supplementary.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I think we are entitled to a simple yes or no answer. Therefore I merely repeat the question in the hope that the minister will give an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, he has the right to ask a question but according to the rules there is no obligation on the part of the minister to reply.

Mr. Lawrence: If he does not know the answer, I guess that is it.

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—ESCALATION OF PENSION PAYMENTS BY SAME AMOUNT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious effect of rising living costs on pensioners and in view of the fact that on January 24 the President of the Treasury Board said that any action to raise or remove the ceiling from the escalation of pensions of retired civil servants would be related to the taking of similar action in respect of the Canada Pension Plan, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare say whether this matter will receive immediate attention, namely, the escalation of Canada Pension Plan pensions at least by the full amount of the rise in the cost of living?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, amendments to the Canada Pension Plan must have the previous concurrence of at least two-thirds of the provinces with two-thirds of the population. We have already had a meeting between officials of the federal government and officials of the provinces at which various proposals have been discussed and considered. The view of the provincial officials was that they wanted any change to wait for the broader review that has been discussed in the field of social security. Despite the representations of the federal government, we have been unable as yet to obtain the concurrence of the necessary provinces in such changes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the delay that seems to be in prospect in this area, will the President of the Treasury Board take action on the matter I referred to on January 24 and will the Minister of Transport make sure that railway pensions are properly escalated? In other words, will steps be taken so that all pensions will escalate not just by 2 per cent but by the actual rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before pursuing this matter with further supplementaries the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Shefford.

IMMIGRATION

BILINGUALISM—OBLIGATION FOR HAITIAN IMMIGRANTS TO USE INTERPRETERS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if he intends to take the necessary action to ensure that French-speaking Haitian immigrants can use the French language in their dealings with the officials of his department? They must now utilize the services of interpreters as was revealed recently by a committee on human rights.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into this and take the representation of the hon. member under consideration.

PUBLIC WORKS

MEASURES TO IMPROVE BILINGUALISM WITHIN DEPARTMENT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Could the Minister of Public Works tell us if he foresees a possibility of improving the services offered in French by the marine works division of his department with which it is now impossible to communicate in French?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is the first time such a complaint has been directed to my department. I can assure hon. members that I will take every appropriate action in order that both official languages be available for those who call at my department.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

COST OF LIVING INCREASE—RATE OF FEDERAL TAXATION AND COST OF GOVERNMENT AS FACTOR

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the federal government made any study of the impact of the high rate of federal taxation coupled with the general rapidly rising cost of government on all levels as a factor in the rising cost of living?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have analysed the effect of taxation on every aspect of the economy, including the cost of living.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he has concluded from his study that action should be taken by the government to do its part directly in lowering the cost of living by lowering taxation rates?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I have certainly got the point of view of the hon. member, but this is not quite the appropriate occasion on which to answer his question.

• (1130)

INCREASE IN COST OF HOUSING—ALLEGED CONSENT BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. In view of the fact that the cost of shelter has increased by 5.3 per cent within the last year and therefore the cost of housing has reached crisis proportions, would the minister take into consideration the fact that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is consenting to an increase in the rents for various accommodation and housing units in the largest urban centres of Canada and by that consent is increasing the cost of shelter which has contributed to the present position of the index that has just been quoted?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to housing that is owned or managed by CMHC, I answered the question the other day by saying that I am reviewing the rent policy and no increases are taking place while that review is going on. I understand, however, that the hon. member's question probably concerns limited dividend housing which is not managed by CMHC and, in fact, where the owners negotiate an increase in rent commensurate only with the increase in costs. Those arrangements are constantly under review.

Mr. Woolliams: I am referring to those leases that govern the cost of renting various types of accommodation across the country where increases can only take place with the consent of CMHC. Will the minister now agree to freeze any further increases so far as CMHC is concerned to help pensioners and others on fixed incomes?

Mr. Basford: I just made it clear that I have frozen the rents of those buildings that we manage until we can review them.

INCREASE IN COST OF FUEL OIL—COMPOSITION OF GROUP STUDYING SUPPLY SITUATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I now want to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the fact that fuel has gone up by 3.9 per cent, would the minister, who stated in the House that a study is being carried out on the shortage or the propaganda on a shortage of energy, advise us who is heading this study and whether the members of this task force study group are members of the public service or of government agencies rather than people from private corporations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the studies are being carried out by my own department and by the National Energy Board. If the hon. gentleman is objecting to increases in the cost of energy, he might direct himself to Premier Lougheed in this context as well.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact the Minister of National Defence has agreed with the policy of Premier Lougheed, this is government policy? Is that the policy of the government now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no policy position has been taken on this question by the government, but the Minister of Defence was speaking with courage as a westerner. I would hope the hon. member would have the same courage.

Mr. Stanfield: How many policies have you?

AIR TRANSPORT

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE DECISION ON PRICES

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport.

[Translation]

I would like to tell the minister that I do not always pay attention to what lies within his jurisdiction, but as he keeps giving general answers I am compelled most of the time to direct my questions to him.

[English]

In view of the fact the Canadian Transport Commission is still stalling on a decision with regard to charter prices, in view of the fact that under the present rules advance booking calls for a 90-day prebooking period in Canada, and in view of the fact all of this uncertainty regarding bookings on Canadian charter flights will drive about 300,000 Canadians to using foreign carriers operating from United States airports, would the Minister of Transport instruct the Canadian Transport Commission to come to an immediate decision on the matter of charter prices so that Canadian travellers can have some assurance with regard to their plans for this summer?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I read the report in a Toronto newspaper this morning. I regret to say it is unfounded. The policy on prices was established by the commission on February 1. The people who are going to Niagara now have been doing the same thing in the past. There is nothing new. The pricing policy has been established and is in force right now.

Mr. Harney: May I ask the minister whether the pricing policy has been announced to the Canadian travelling public?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will have to check how the commission does it, but I know that the policy is in force and I know that the charter companies know about it.

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO KEEP BUSINESS IN CANADA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's reply to my question, as recorded on page 951 of Hansard, to the effect that he would like to have some experience in the implementation of the new advance booking charter regulations before recommending any changes, and also in view of the fact there is new evidence to the effect that the new regulations proposed by the Canadian Transport Commission will literally drive the air charter business south of the border, will the minister now take it upon himself to intervene and to recommend to the Canadian Transport Commission an amendment to the ABC regulations? Will he also take into consideration the representations made by the general public and the air charter industry?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I do not know how I can consider false news as a basis for reconsidering the policy. A few moments ago I said that the news has no foundation and the people who are going south have been going there in the past in the same way.

Mr. Mazankowski: Can the minister indicate to the House whether in fact he has received representations from the air charter industry and the travelling public rejecting and opposing the new ABC regulations, and will the minister take those representations into consideration so that the travelling public can be assured of reasonable charter travel?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I have not received any personally but I will check with the department and report to the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that United States airlines are now imposing retaliatory action in so far as removing the primary rates policy as it relates to Canadian airlines is concerned, would the Minister of Transport also take this matter into consideration when reviewing the new ABC regulations?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING—LEVEL AT WHICH USE OF GOVERNMENT CONTINGENCY PLANS JUSTIFIED

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question which might give a little direction to the country as a whole. At what level would the government consider the rise in prices would justify use of the contingency plans about which he has been telling us since the days of John Young?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would have to recall the way in which we were answering this question in the past. It is not necessarily defined by an absolute rate. It would be a rate which would put Canada in the situation where, on the one hand, we would be pricing ourselves out of world markets because our competitors would be doing so much better than us, which, as the hon. member knows, has not been the case, and, on the other hand, a rate at which we would be unable to satisfy the legitimate demands of those sections of the population that are not protected against rising costs.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact the Prime Minister could not answer the question, would he like to take this opportunity to outline very briefly the government's contingency plans about which he has been telling us for a year? I am sure the House would even be agreeable to reverting to motions so that he could outline them in detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member appreciates, I am sure, that the question is in order only to the extent that he is asking the Prime Minister whether he will make a statement on motions.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member was obviously unable to understand my previous answer, so I do not think we would be able to understand the complex answer to the question he is asking.

Mr. Lundrigan: I agree with the Prime Minister. I cannot understand him and the Canadian people cannot understand him—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: —especially people on fixed incomes. Would he take this opportunity to express to the 22 million Canadians, excepting myself, the contingency plans the government has to deal with the rise in the cost of living which is making it difficult for many people, even people above fixed incomes, to survive, especially in view of the high food costs?

• (1140)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has repeated the question that he asked in the first instance. Perhaps he was not satisfied with the reply but it was the same question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Certainly I am not satisfied with the information we have been getting. Apparently the Prime Minister did not understand my question. For over a year the government has been saying that it has a contingency plan. How high must prices rise before the government tells the Canadian people exactly what its plan is?

MANPOWER

REFUSAL OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO PERSONS TAKING COURSES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is it the policy of the government to refuse unemployment insurance to people who are taking manpower courses, giving as a reason that because they are taking the courses they are not available for work?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, that is correct.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): When was this new policy adopted?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is hardly in order.

FOOD PRICES

AVAILABILITY TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF STUDIES AND REPORTS BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the government places so much emphasis on the Special Committee on Food Prices, and in view of the alarming 10 per cent increase in the cost of food, is the Prime Minister now prepared to reconsider the government's position and make available all the papers and complete findings of the Prices and Incomes Commission to the special committee?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may attempt to answer that question, as I already did in the House earlier, I think I explained to the Leader of the Opposition that some of this material had already been published and other material will be published. I will be advising the committee of this information when I appear before it on Tuesday.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact the committee has an order from the House to report in two months, and in view of the number of witnesses who have already asked for permission to appear before the committee, is the minister prepared to have all the papers and all the findings of the Prices and Incomes Commission made available to the committee immediately?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the hon. member feels so pressed, but I would remind him that he wanted the whole committee to be wound up permanently in three months.

[Later:]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with regard to what he proposes to do before the Special Committee on Food Prices on Tuesday. Does he intend to turn over to the committee the actual work of the former commission under the direction of Dr. Young? Does he intend to turn over the papers, the information and the recommendations, or does he simply intend to give his version, his interpretation, his summary of these findings?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I intend to make available to the committee first of all the reports that have already been published.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: We have seen those.

Mr. Gray: Second, I intend to advise the committee of the reports which the commission had arranged to have published before it went out of existence so they will be made available to the committee as soon as this material can be published.

PENITENTIARIES

HIRING BY PAROLE COMMISSION OF PSYCHIATRIST DISCHARGED BY PINEL INSTITUTE

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, if the music can stop I might be able to ask my question. Furthermore, I regret that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has not already asked the question I now wish to direct to the Solicitor General.

Would he know if the psychiatrist dismissed by the Pinel Institute because of his shady part in the Réal Chartrand case is now employed by the National Parole Board? If so, how can he explain such a situation?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this situation but I will inquire into it as quickly as possible and report to the House.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. Further to the question of the hon. member for Charlevoix, I would like to know if the Solicitor General apprised himself of the conclusions of the investigation concerning the Pinel Institute before hiring this psychiatrist, and could he tell the House if the department has established basic criteria for hiring personnel, and if this new psychiatrist, fired by the Pinel Institute, has been hired according to his department's criteria, if any?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I have not received such a report. I should point out that the Pinel Institute is a provincial institute, although we have referred certain people there. I will look into this and report to the House as soon as possible.

TAXATION

POSSIBILITY OF REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister changed his mind about removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials in view of the alarming increase in housing costs for ordinary citizens?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kent-Essex.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. Just a few days ago the minister said he was not intending to remove this tax. My supplementary is—

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Who said?

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Hellyer: You did. You said you had no intention of removing the tax.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister think it is fair that Americans can buy Canadian lumber cheaper than Canadians can because their taxes are less oppressive than ours?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is clearly argument. I do not think a question asked in those terms is in order.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER POLICIES TO LOWER CONSUMER PRICES AND INCREASE PRODUCER RETURNS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the government's twin policies to lower consumer prices and increase producer returns by the extermination of millions of laying hens, fining dairymen for producing milk and paying farmers for not producing have not been successful in either direction, can the minister indicate whether the government is considering any more policies of this kind?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government is constantly attempting to develop and put into place policies that will serve the interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Baldwin: What you want is non-laying hens.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSIONS—PRESENTATION OF AMENDING BILL

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As today's announcement about prices deeply affects old people and those living on a fixed income, can the minister tell the House if the new Old Age Pensions Act has been prepared, when it will be introduced and what immediate measures can be expected concerning food and drug prices, for those who are affected?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government leader has already indicated the government's intentions concerning the presentation of legislation on this subject.

HEALTH

PLANS FOR PROVISION OF LOW-COST DRUGS TO PERSONS ON FIXED INCOMES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer on pensions, but in light of the 3.8 per cent increase in the cost of health supplies from a year ago, and because of the extreme importance of the availability of drugs to all Canadians, especially those on low incomes, can the minister now assure the House that he has plans formulated to provide that all Canadians, especially those on fixed incomes, have access to low cost drugs?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, health falls primarily under the jurisdiction of the provinces with which we have, in fact, discussed every matter of concern to them. Indeed, a few weeks ago we met the provincial ministers of health to discuss a new mode of financing health services, and another meeting is planned for the end of March.

INCOME TAX

INTENTION RESPECTING REVISION OF FORM FOR 1972

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I noticed that yesterday in my absence he described the income tax return form as no more frightening than Brigitte Bardot in a bikini. Has he found it more frightening, having regard to the number of complaints he has received as to the impossibility of interpreting the income tax return in its present form, and is there any intention of revising it so that it would become understandable?

• (1150)

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would welcome the suggestions of the hon. member for improvement of the forms—

Mr. Stanfield: It needs improving.

Mr. Stanbury: —but the description of the form which I gave yesterday was not mine but that of Ken Hall of the Calgary Herald. I might refer the hon. member to those other great Conservative newspapers, the Toronto Star and the Ottawa Journal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stanbury: —which state—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Stanbury: —that as far as—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the minister kindly resume his seat?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that type of red herring really will not get the minister anywhere. Will he give the assurance that amendments will be made to the new income tax form if I or other members on this side of the House suggest changes that ought to be made?

An hon. Member: They were not suggested back in 1962.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has invited me to make suggestions, and I do so. I ask him why it is that the prescribed forms are not now available? Why is it that chartered accountants are being advised by information officers in district taxation offices to dream up their own forms until the government finally gets off its posterior?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I will not suggest that that allegation has been dreamed up—

Mr. Stanfield: It is true.

Mr. Stanbury: —but if the right hon. gentleman has any details about particular cases I will be glad to have them looked into.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Turning aside from the minister's appreciation of female forms, as evidenced by his having accepted the suggestion of a commentator in Calgary, may I ask whether the minister is now giving reconsideration to bringing back the new Income Tax Act which parliament never had the opportunity to consider, not having dealt with more than one half of it because we were shut off by closure—

An hon. Member: You were away on vacation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in view of the fact that Mr. Thorson, the Associate Deputy Minister of Justice has stated—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to the tax foundation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether that was a question or whether the question is coming, but what is coming quickly is the end of the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, then I will simply ask the minister this: Is he aware that the Associate Deputy Minister of Justice, when asked about this conglomerate mess, the Income Tax Act, in speaking to the Tax Foundation said that there were only six people in Canada who clearly understood the new act and the other "five" were his employees?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister not add his own name as one who understands it?

An hon. Member: Poor John.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. I will recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia and then call orders of the day.

ENERGY

VOLUME OF OIL EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister inform the House whether he has received any reports in the last few days regarding a rapid increase in the volume of exports of Canadian oil to the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to the situation which has existed for the last several months, there has been a substantial increase in exports from western Canada to the United States. As I indicated to the hon. gentleman's colleague several days ago, we are paying very close attention to this and if there is any prospect of Canadian refineries going short we will not hesitate to impose export controls.

Mr. Knight: To be more specific, can the minister advise the House whether he has received recently reports from his own senior advisers or officials of a major increase in the volume of exports of Canadian oil to the United States?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I told the House about that last week.

Mr. Knight: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary. We have gone beyond the end of the question period and I will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Knight: Is it the minister's intention to have the National Energy Board investigate this situation and establish export quotas in line with the policies affecting natural gas?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have told the House several times already that the National Energy Board has had this matter under investigation and, indeed, has made very full reports on it. I also indicated that if the industry indicates it is not capable of handling the increased volumes we will not hesitate to impose export controls.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have noted with a great deal of concern, both today and in recent days during this session of the present parliament, that a great many hon. members are not finding it possible to participate in the question period. In saying that I am not casting any reflection on the Chair. I do say it, however, because I have watched the proceedings very carefully during the question period and have noted that a great many new members who have tried valiantly to be recognized in an attempt to have their voices heard in this chamber have not been successful.

It has always been my opinion, Sir, that the 264 members of this chamber are equal. You, Sir, have been appointed especially to look after us to the best of your ability. I have always believed that you have looked after us as best you can and I am sure all new members appreciate that fact. At the same time, because of the system under which we operate at present and the length of the question period, it is not possible for a great many members to participate in the question period. I am referring as much to hon. gentlemen on the back benches on the government side as to those in this party. I think every member should have a chance to ask his question if it is urgent and important. I know that a great many urgent and important questions go unanswered.

I believe that we must look very carefully at the system under which we now operate to see whether all members are being given equal treatment. I suggest, Sir, that on Mondays and Wednesdays, when written questions are answered, we might adopt a procedure similar to the British system whereby on those two days members who have questions on the order paper, even if they are in a somewhat different form, might be given an opportunity to ask a supplementary question. In that way hon. members would be given a better opportunity to participate in what I consider to be a very exciting form of proceeding if it is carried out in the right way.

There are at present many new members in the House and there will probably be many more new members in the days ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: They should be made to feel that they are part of this institution and be given every possible chance to take part in its proceedings and represent their constituents in a proper manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in this regard I should like to make a suggestion to Your Honour. Obviously, it is impossible for all hon. members to be heard within one hour. I therefore wonder whether the Chair might not, all other things being equal, allow a small number of government members to put questions. I noticed, for instance, that over the past hour the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) has tried desperately to get the attention of the Chair, and that no government member has managed to put a question.

I sympathize with Your Honour in his extremely difficult duties but humbly suggest, if it is at all possible, that he allow government members to put just a few questions at each sitting.

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, on the same point may I make a suggestion that I hope would assist Your Honour in the difficult time you have during question periods. It has been noted by many members, not just in the present parliament but in the previous one as well, that there are some members who continually abuse Your Honour's patience and misuse their colleagues' time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: For example, today at least four hon. members felt they had the privilege of asking four or five supplementary questions, denying some of their own colleagues an opportunity to ask even one question. May I respectfully suggest, with regard to those members whom we all know who continually follow this practice, that the Speaker would have the complete support of other members if he did not see them.

• (1200)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member to the south of us on this situation, particularly as I believe his party harbours within its ranks most of the questioners of whom he speaks. As one who has risen in his place fully 200 times in three hours and 20 minutes this week, I urge upon Your Honour the adoption of the system suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North as a kind of clemency for those who labour in darkness in the back row.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Last night I heard the hon. member for Don Valley say when he appeared on television that the question period was organized by the opposition parties. I therefore, suggest to hon. members that they organize themselves better.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has heard the suggestions made by hon. members on both sides. I appreciate the points that have been made. The Chair tries fairly, in my view in any event, to give an opportunity to all hon. members. There are a number of difficulties. One is purely physical in that if 100 members want to ask questions it would never be possible for them all to do so even if we had a two-hour question period. I have very often suggested that perhaps an effort should be made by hon. members, in co-operation with the Chair, to give the newer members a chance.

I am in full agreement with the point made by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North that under the system that has developed we are not giving some of the new members an opportunity to ask their questions. I am very anxious to co-operate with any kind of system that would make that possible. As we know, there is a Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization that looks at these very important matters. Perhaps that committee should look at this situation. I gather it will be convened in the near future. There are a number of problems the Chair would like to refer to that committee. I would certainly be pleased to refer this problem. I can assure hon. members that I will again try to give an opportunity to all hon. members, with perhaps an eye peeled in the direction of hon. members behind the front row.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you would examine the list. There was a list that the Chair made last year of matters that might be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. With Your Honour's consent, that list might be advanced and the House leaders might look at it with a view to submitting this issue, along with several others, to the committee. The government House leader might also possibly organize a question period in the government caucus so that some of the uninformed Liberal members might be informed.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that one reason questions are repetitive and there are so many supplementaries is that the ministers try to evade the questions put to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure at this point whether we are getting into an aspect of the debate which will be of much assistance to the Chair. I would hope hon. members would take that into account at this stage and try to be of assistance to the Chair.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, perhaps one way around the problem during the interim period until the matter is resolved by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization would be for Your Honour to turn a blind eye toward the clock.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, mention was made a moment ago of the fact that there are some physical difficulties because of the large number of opposition members who wish to ask questions. I fully agree with that, but beyond the physical difficulties there are traditional difficulties. I refer to the system of precedence which I feel should not extend beyond the leaders of the various opposition parties. I suggest that the reason we have so many supplementary questions is that when a backbench member finally catches Mr. Speaker's eye he has to make up for lost time by asking two or three supplementaries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1972-73—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE L12a—DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drury:

That Vote L12a in the amount of $350,000,000 of the Department of Finance for Winter Capital Projects Fund—Loans in Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had an opportunity of discussing the business of this debate with the government House leader. I apologize for not having had the time to have a similar discussion with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the House leader of the Social Credit party. We are prepared to agree to the following method of handling the conclusion of this debate. We have one further speaker on this item and we are prepared to terminate it at that. We would then like to move today into a discussion of the three notices together dealing with the estimates of the Department of Health and Welfare, that is items Nos. 6, 7 and 8 on the order paper. I hope that the government House leader and the other House leaders will agree that, since we are prepared to deal with these three items together, we might have general agreement to extend the normal 20 minute limit on speeches to 30 minutes for this debate.

We are then prepared to let all the other notices go at this stage, saving only item No. 3 which we propose should be dealt with and completed on Monday. We would then be prepared to have the appropriation bill introduced on Tuesday. Further, we would be prepared to allow all notices, including the appropriation bill, when we get to second and third reading go without recorded divisions. This is in that spirit of co-operation that the government House leader requested of us yesterday or the day before. If that is agreeable, we are prepared to proceed along those lines.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. member's apology for not having spoken to the rest of us about this matter, but I suggest it is the sort of matter we ought to discuss among the four of us. Perhaps we can do so during the lunch hour.

I suggest, however, that if the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is in a mood to co-operate, he should go a little further and develop a scheme under which we might dispose of all these nine opposed items not later than the first thing Monday. Let us get to the bill by Monday. In making that suggestion, I repeat that I am not cutting off anybody because on second reading of the bill and in committee of the whole on the bill, particularly on the schedule, the field is wide open.

My suggestion is that we proceed as we were until one o'clock and that we try to meet during the lunch hour to come up with something, but our aim should be to get to second reading of the bill just as soon as we can.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if that is the only point that is concerning the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we will concede it and get these notices out of the way on Monday. Then, we could get to the bill sometime early on Monday, if that is agreeable.

• (1210)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is agreeable, but I do not think the hon. member should make a decision for the House on the floor. I think the matter should be discussed among the parties.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Nielsen: I was making no decision. I was simply agreeing with the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Obviously, everyone is agreed on the point, but the suggestion has been made that there should be meetings outside the House. It is my feeling that it is always somewhat difficult to reach agreements of this kind in the chamber by questions and answers when four parties are concerned. I notice there is no one here at the moment to speak on behalf of the other party in the House. I am, of course, entirely in the hands of hon. members but it seems to me at this point that though there appears to be agreement it would be difficult to make an order. If hon. members wish me to inquire whether an order should be made, as suggested by the hon. member for Yukon, I am prepared to do so, although obviously the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre feels there should be discussion. So, I shall not put the question at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Supplementary to what has been said, and in an effort to make some progress, I think we can agree that immediately the discussion is over on notice of opposition No. 2 we would discuss notices 6, 7 and 8 in one debate. That would take care of things for a little while.

Mr. Nielsen: Normally, members would be allowed to speak for 20 minutes on each item. I am suggesting 30 minutes on the three.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will agree with almost anything these days to get progress in the House, to be quite frank about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: What Stanley wants, Stanley gets.

Mr. MacEachen: I hope the latter suggestion will be accepted, because I shall not be able to meet with the House leaders until some time after 2.30. If we can agree that when the debate is finished on the present item we shall go on to the health items we can meet later and decide on the next step.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: We have agreed on that point, I am sure. But I am not sure there is agreement on the 30 minute limit suggestion. Is that agreed, also?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I had completed my few remarks in the time allotted to me last night and, reluctantly, I discontinue.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, there is such great co-operation being shown here that it is with some reluctance I rise as, I believe, the final speaker on this item. I should like to say I am in agreement with the aim of this vote, in the amount of $350 million for the winter capital works fund. I feel it is one of the better programs the government has put forward to deal with unemployment. It is the type of program which was originated, I understand, under the Conservative administration of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert who called it a winter works program. It was discontinued by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1968, when he made the following statement about it;

> The tendency for the program to involve 'make work' activities has always created problems, and it has proved increasingly difficult to control this undesirable feature of the program.
> It is the government's intention to continue emphasizing those programs that are developmental rather than short-run.

Our disagreement relates to the manner in which this program has been put forward and described as a non-budgetary vote extending over three years beginning in December of 1972 and ending on June 30, 1975. I can only reiterate what has been said by many speakers, namely that this vote seeks authority to spend $350 million over three fiscal years, yet the supply estimate is for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973. It seems inappropriate that the government should be asking for supplementary estimates for the year ended March 31, 1973. The passage of this vote will give it authority far into 1975. I do not pretend to be an expert on parliamentary rules but this procedure seems highly irregular. In addition, the item described is not budgetary because there will, in effect, be a forgiveness of 50 per cent of normal on-site payroll costs if certain conditions are met by the provinces and the municipalities. To this extent, it seems to me that the vote contains conditions under which money spent over three years will, in effect, be a budgetary item which the government is combining in this vote with non-budgetary element, and it would appear to me that is contrary to section 20 of the Financial Administration Act.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was giving evidence before the committee he seemed quite sure that the amount of $75 million was a reasonably accurate estimate of what will be required this year. There is substantial evidence to support his estimate. But for the second and third year, the best he could do was to give a ballpark figure of $170 million and $105 million. In my opinion, the $75 million should have been brought forward as a supplementary estimate and the other sum should have been provided for by way of legislation. What would be the advantage of this course? It is that the legislation could have been debated in this House and commented upon appropriately.

There are many portions of this worthwhile program which could be significantly improved. To be effective, a winter works program requires a great deal of foresight and planning. Careful advance work enables the program to be put into practice quickly. There ought not to be dependence upon approval at a late stage, as is the case now. There is need for great flexibility both in the areas in which it is applied and in the level of effort. Earlier and effective research must be done with a view to determining the areas most meriting concern. The goal should be to meet local and regional conditions. In order to avoid unnecessary waste we should have taken a degree of care in the selection of suitable projects which will be impossible, now, in many cases. There is need for decentralization of program decisions so that there may be greater sensitivity to local and regional requirements. And it would be wise, I think, to make sure that employment is offered as far as possible to those who are presently unemployed.

One important consideration is that programs of this type should deal fairly with poorer and less endowed regions. A debate in the House would doubtless bring to light means by which the winter works program could be improved. Had this program come about by way of a bill we would have been in a much better position to make it effective. This is one program of which I am in favour and I think it is extremely useful.

As one who has always been interested in statistics, I should like to point out that in a release issued a few days ago it is stated that persons in the labour force aged between 14 and 25 in January, 1973, numbered 2,261,000. There were 300,000 unemployed within that age group, whereas in the age 25 and over group there were three times as many employed persons, namely 6,620,000. There were only 388,000 unemployed persons in this age group. In other words, although those in the labour force 25 years of age and over number three times those in the labour force between the ages of 14 and 24, the number of unemployed in both groups are approximately the same. I suggest that this is due to what everyone perhaps knows is the reason but which I should like to reinforce, namely the large number of young people coming on to the labour market in this particular age group.

In the Canada Year Book 1970-71, it is pointed out that between 1961 and 1966 there was a gain of 400,000 in the numbers of people under 15 years of age, whereas between 1956 and 1961 there was a gain of 967,000. In other words, there were a gain of almost two and a half times as many people in this age group in the period 1956-61 as in the period 1961-66. Based on the definition used by Statistics Canada of the time when people enter the labour force at the age of 14, a large number of young people are coming into the labour market.

For this reason, it seems to me that at this stage in our economic history we might take a very careful look at projects that would be of some help. During the years 1956-61 the number of births rose from 461,000 to 471,000. The rate dropped rapidly after 1965 and we are now down to about 360,000. What does this mean? It means that in the next five to six years we will have a large number of young people coming into the labour force, and therefore it is time we adopted a policy that will set up the infrastructure that this nation will need during the next decade or so.

I think this type of capital works project is very useful and perhaps should be expanded. Since within the next seven to eight years the number of new entrants to the labour force will diminish, I am sure we shall find there are many things that we would like to do as a nation but that there will be insufficient people to do those things. Therefore, I suggest we examine the infrastructure of our cities and towns, that we construct highways and railways to selected points in the north, which would be extremely useful in the coming decade. Since within the next five to seven years we will have the labour force available to do these things, let us make use of that force.

At the conclusion of the debate on this item we will be debating LIP and youth program. Many of them are very valuable but some are also of a service nature. I endorse the idea of capital works programs and hope they are successful, but I reserve my opinion on whether, had this money been brought forward in a different manner, it would have provided a better vehicle for debate and given members an opportunity to make suggestions to bring about that expansion in the next four to five years that I believe will be necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Nielsen: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding of the order passed earlier today is that we will now call motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8.

MOTIONS FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTES 35a, 40a, 45a—DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That vote 35a, in the amount of $850,000 of the Department of National Health and Welfare for income security and social assistance—Operating expenditures in supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

That vote 40a, in the amount of $2,685,000 of the Department of National Health and Welfare for income security and social assistance—Contributions in supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

That vote 45a, in the amount of $1,000,000 of the Department of National Health and Welfare for fitness and amateur sport—Operating expenditures in supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973, be concurred in.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising to speak in this debate since while I've often been on my feet of late it is not often that I have a chance to orate. I am much concerned with these items, as are my colleagues who know me and my interests. I should like to speak first on the item dealing with fitness and amateur sport, which is a field in which I have shown, if not great prowess, great interest. There is a very large vote under the heading of income security and social assistance program and this is a matter of immense concern to the people of this country, certainly to the members of the House.

I will not reiterate the arguments in connection with whether these items should or should not be in their present form. However, if we look very carefully, or even casually, at some of the statutes relating to the whole question of fitness and amateur sport, it will be noted therein that there is a requirement for the filing of reports of various properly constituted bodies, and that there is the stricture laid upon the minister to have these reports laid on the table at a given time. We can doubtless find much room for very serious argument, perhaps to make some very serious allegations, regarding the nonfeasance of duty in relation to these reports submitted by bodies that are charged with very serious responsibilities.

We in this country have become concerned lately about a somewhat dramatic event ahead of us in the field of amateur sport, namely the summer Olympics of 1976. However, it is not that dramatic incident that I think should concern us here but rather the preparation of the Canadian populace, especially the youth, for this kind of event. In this regard, the fitness and amateur sport program should be very seriously thought about as Canada prepares not only to host the Olympics but to take its place there. Another reason I am concerned about this aspect of the vote is the quite shocking news feature story in a magazine which has just hit the streets today. This great national news magazine indicates that there is, in fact, in this country today a very serious drug problem and that indeed it has not at all evaporated no matter how many commissions we have had. It indicates there are serious problems facing the youth of Canada. In so far as a wholesome, properly directed and adequately funded program on fitness and amateur sports can alleviate such things and mitigate their baneful influence, then we should be concerned and we are very properly discussing the matter to which this vote draws our attention.

I should like to come a little more seriously to the matter of physical fitness. Many members know that in a recent, and I believe thorough, analysis and survey of physical fitness this country or ours ranked 21st on the scale of physical fitness of all the countries participating in the Olympics. This should bring home to us the fact that something pretty serious is lacking. Whether the problem is inadequate funds, inadequate facilities, inefficient or insufficient leadership, I do not know. We do vote large funds and we are voting additional funds here. This is what this is all about, yet we ranked 21st.

I see the former minister across the way. He and I might well say to the youth of Canada: Do not do as I do, do as I say, in some of these matters. I suppose if one wanted to personalize, had this country provided better facilities in that part of the country from which I come I might not at this middle age period of 53 have to say: Do as I say rather than do as I do. The majority of the grants which the Department of National Health and Welfare has distributed are under the sports directorate, and perhaps we are more concerned about the word "sports" than about the concept of the word "fitness". Here is where I think we have to take special note and have particular concern.

In 1970-71 $1,490,000 was given in grants to 59 national sports bodies. A further $286,927 was granted to 21 other national sports associations, and $2,089,833 was spent on such projects as Hockey Canada, the Canada Winter Games, Cross Canada sports administration and so on. I think that the failure of the federal government's fitness and amateur sports policy lies in the fact that the fitness part of it is virtually left out. More money has been given to sports associations and athletic organizations than has been relegated to the average physically unfit Canadian. Here is where other countries set an example which we should follow. It seems to me that if federal moneys have been given to promoting physical fitness there have been great gaps. I am told there is a city in the western part of this country, that rediscovered part of our domain, where the church bells ring at a certain hour in the evening to remind people to go out and take a walk. Well, walking is something that does not require a tremendously elaborate program on the part of government at any jurisdictional level.

I am convinced that not only do we tend to emphasize those sports which lead to competitive excellence, and tend to emphasize competitive sports themselves, but we do not sufficiently assist and encourage the generality of participation not only of the potential winners of gold, silver, or bronze medals, but the potentially healthy Canadian. This should be our goal. This is what our physical fitness education people and our health and sports leaders, assisted by the government, must move toward. We must promote physical fitness for all the population. We must, it seems to me, encourage not only those sports which can lead to the winning of medals, but those healthy physical activities which can indeed be called lifetime activities; the kind of things which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and I, at the mid-century mark, could engage in hopefully to the benefit of ourselves and to the country. It seems to me that the whole concept of fitness involves just such consideration. Then, I would hope that we will surpass the 21st mark on the scale of physical fitness.

Recognizing that something must be done I would invite the minister—I am not all that upset about this item and how it came about—for so long as he is there to utilize the pre-Olympics period as a great opportunity to bring to all Canadians a price in healthful living, a stimulus toward physical fitness and encouragement to our young, not only those with the capacity for potential excellence in international or national competition but those in the schools of the land. I do not limit my suggestion to the great and shining composite high schools in great cities, but all schools. Prizing as it does, and prizing as it must, the health and wellbeing of its people, the government must decide that we shall move forward along these lines with the knowledge that physical fitness has and must be a major national goal, and that health and physical fitness are tied together. I think we can encourage such things as regional training centres which would encourage and stimulate greater activity in this matter of such tremendous importance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to the other vote, one of tremendous importance; income security and social assistance programs. Compared to many countries in the world I think Canada has a reasonably good record in this regard. I do not know that anyone has taken a poll as to where we stand in the matter of income security and social assistance, but I think we would not stand as low as 21st in that regard. I think we would do much better. As the economy develops particular problems for the poor, the handicapped and the aged, we have constantly to review the goals. In the last report of the minister's department, a section under economic security sets out a very simple statement at the beginning with which we all agree and with which we can not take exception. It reads as follows:

Canada's federal welfare benefit programs were initially designed to ensure that everyone has an adequate income and, over the years, they have been redesigned to meet changing demands.

Item 40a is one of these sudden moves to bring about something, not, I presume, under income security but in the realm of social assistance. I refer to the New Horizons program. The minister has just arrived. He may be somewhat surprised by the laconic brevity of the debate, but I can tell him I did not expect to begin this part of the debate until after the noon hour. However, I am glad to have the minister here where he will at least be a captive audience for the next few minutes. The New Horizons program is new all right. Some nasty people might say it was conjured up just because of the event that took place on October 30, which we all remember well with somewhat different emotions. But in so far as it was thought inspired in an age when the youth cult was very much the "in thing", I commend the idea that those who have reached the golden years deserve special attention.

There are great times and great things for those who are no longer young. In our openness and concern, and indeed our priority, for the young we should not forget those on the other end of the spectrum. Certainly, I think this is commendable. So far as I have been able to study the program, I am not at all sure it has been overwhelmingly successful. I would say probably it is a little early to make any kind of a judgment. If it was necessary that it be introduced when it was—and I make no reference to the October 30 deadline—it would have had to come in as a supplementary estimate. But far more important—and I do not hesitate to say this—than the development of the New Horizons program and the creation of interesting things for senior citizens today is the statement in the first part of the paragraph which I read from the minister's report. I repeat the words:

... programs were initially designed to ensure that everyone has an adequate income ...

I know many of the people of Canada who are in their late sixties, seventies or eighties who are living in homes or attend senior citizens clubs. One of the most pleasant evenings I spent in September was when I attended a gathering of this kind. The evening started with the 70-year olds step dancing. This is a great pastime in Prince Edward Island. The 80 year olds were a bit miffed at the 70-year olds taking over and they did their stuff. The last performers were 92 years of age. They were having a good time. This sort of thing is important. We have reached the stage where no longer do senior members of society remain within the family unit. The state has recognized this fact and has built special homes for these people. Because of the social, intellectual and recreational aspect this is all to the good.

An hon. Member: Did you take part in the dancing also?

Mr. Macquarrie: I was too young. As a matter of fact, it was said that no one under age 60 could attend that particular meeting. I asked if they would make one exception and they said I didn't need to worry because no one would stop me if I came. I wonder how many of these people would have been happier if, in addition to or perhaps instead of, a vote for recreation there had been a review followed by action concerning what these people receive in their pay cheques. We spent the interesting part of today, the question period, largely on a discussion of rising food costs. When these people went back to their apartments in subsidized senior citizens homes or to their private apartments and thought about their expenditures for such things as groceries, shelter and so on and considered their pensions which have become painfully out of line with the realities of the inexorable rise in the cost of living, I feel that some of the happiness they shared in the dancing and singing faded into insignificance. They are very much aware of the ceiling on their pension cheque and the seemingly unending rise in the expenses they face.

The senior citizens of this country have been held in a bind and have become the unwilling victims of a cruel inflation which is hard on all but too painful, and undeservedly painful, on those who are in their declining years and who have been presented with what is in effect a deflated pension by the government. I thought that before now the minister would have presented to this House legislation to increase old age security payments. The pensioners of today are receiving less in terms of real dollars than they were a few years ago, certainly at the time when the present government took office. It is a cruel and callous injustice to go on week after week and month after month failing to make a significant increase in the old age security payments. As I say, not only has the pension not been increased significantly, but there has been a cruel and callous failure to take note of the increase in the cost of living which in effect is a deterioration in the actual return which these people have every month.

I do not know why the minister waits. It is now a quarter of a year since something happened on October 30. No one can analyze with precision and clarity why the election went a particular way. I used to tell my students in my political science class at the university that the one thing that is more difficult than predicting an election outcome is to explain it after it has taken place.

• (1250)

Mr. Bell: You were a good professor.

Mr. Macquarrie: One of my former students, the whip, speaks up. When he was a student in my adult education classes in New Brunswick I also thought he was quite a good student. We are becoming almost genial here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us what you did in Brandon.

Mr. Macquarrie: The chancellor of Brandon University wants me to talk about my career in Brandon, but this might be irrelevant and therefore I will resist the temptation, except to say to the chancellor, if I had the opportunity, when it comes to honorary degree time he should remember some of his friends from the Progressive Conservative party who used to sit very near to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I will take a moment for the conviviality to subside. The crying need for an increase should have been made apparent in October. The party of Mackenzie King at its best, in a political sense, was pretty faithful to its father but on a couple of occasions it strayed from the teachings of the sage of Kingsmere. One of those times was in 1957 when they forgot Industry and Humanity and they came out with a $6 increase in pensions. They were knocked all over the country as the six buck boys. It is strange to think that after that painful lesson—and I know it was painful for them because I was here—they would get into a more egregious error and think that 82 cents a month—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): 42 cents.

Mr. Macquarrie: —would be acceptable to the Canadian people. I thank the chancellor. With my usual generosity, I was giving too much to the people across the way. The lesson was there. The minister has had all sorts of time to prepare this legislation. He has had consultations with the provinces. Why is the legislation not before us? How long are we to wait, how long are the people of Canada to wait and how long are the senior citizens to wait? I say to the minister: how long, O Lord, how long? What now is there to wait for? We are in the middle of the winter of discontent for these people. We read the figures on the increase in the cost of food, but the people who are the recipients of old age security do not need Statistics Canada to tell them that. They know every day what the problem is. I wonder if in all the negotiations and convolutions that are going on between the government and another party some arrangement has not been made to make the budget more palatable by injecting directly some increase in the old age security payments. If the minister believes in it, it should not be delayed. It has already been delayed far too long.

The minister must know the needs of senior citizens. He was one of the able men in the kitchen cabinet and has now been brought forward into the real cabinet. Let his voice be heard and let him say, even to his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), that older people need help and they need it now. It is a great honour for the minister to be chosen, I am sure. Recently his chief has evoked Napoleonic examples. I say to the minister: he who has been chosen as one of the marshalls to accompany the chief to St. Helena should not hasten the day of that exile by delaying this legislation on behalf of the senior citizens a day longer. I tell him that if he will come forward with his legislation, he will see the greatest of co-operation from this side of the House because it will be a genial person like myself who will do his best to assist him to overcome his own dilatory neglect of the older people. So, in that one area at least, we will be moving back toward that forgotten ingredient in the political lexicon, the expression—who remembers it—"the just society." I think the President of the Treasury Board did recall it with a little help from me. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, having spoken at such length, with perception and persuasion, before lunch, I rest my case.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise, really in amazement, to speak with respect to motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8. I cannot understand how the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) can really expect the Canadian people to believe that it is sensible to move a motion to reduce the funds to $1 in respect of the New Horizons Program, not only in terms of administrative expenses which are dealt with in Vote 35a, but in Vote 40a which deals with grant funds totalling $6,150,000. This program is clearly in the interests of the elderly citizens of Canada, not only by providing them with a method and a technique for improving their lot in life but by giving them some degree of interest in working on projects which will help them and their communities.

To be more specific in relation to Vote 35a, which is for the sum of $850,000, I just do not understand the purpose of this motion because in the past—

Mr. Nielsen: It isn't a motion; it is a notice so that we can debate the item.

Mr. Cafik: In the recent past there has been considerable discussion about the Opportunities for Youth program and LIP, in terms of whether they were administered in the best possible way. This $850,000 is provided for proper administration of the New Horizons program. I suppose if the Conservatives had their way on this particular motion we would vote the $6,150,000, with no one to administer the program because they would wipe out the $850,000 for administration.

The ratio of operating expenses to grant contributions in this program is 12.14 per cent. This is not an abnormal amount for overhead, especially in the start-up phase when heavy expenditures can be expected for staff, capital outlays and advertising. Originally a figure of less than 15 per cent was aimed at in order to try to contain these expenses. Actually, 12 per cent was provided, and this was rounded off to $850,000. It must be stressed that the department does not have previous experience in this particular type of program upon which it can draw in reaching groups of elderly people, to assist them in becoming involved in community activities. In addition, the program had not yet begun to operate, and there was no practical experience respecting such operating costs. It could well be that once the peak of initial expenditures has been reached, the ratio of operating costs to contributions may be considerably less. However, I think it is only realistic to understand that it could even be more.

In my opinion, 12 per cent in operating costs does not seem unreasonable. This covers such things as overhead, salaries and wages. It is anticipated that there will be a staff of about 15 people involved with an average wage of $11,000 per man year. The estimate provides for $72,000 for transportation and communications cost and $172,000 for information programs involving the publication of bulletins and advertising in newspapers, on radio and television so that our elderly people will know about this program and be able to take advantage of it. There is provision for $425,000 for professional services. That sum will provide for highly qualified staff to be retained, whose services will cost between $12,000 and $20,000 per year in salary. Such persons will be chosen as have skills in working with retired persons' groups to assess the value of projects and assist in their planning. In addition there is a budget of $17,000 for the rental of equipment. Materials and supplies to equip regional offices amounts to $63,000, and other expenditures are provided to the extent of $12,000, with a view to helping local national groups to formulate objectives and policies with respect to the program.

• (1410)

Vote 40a, in the amount of $2,685,000, supplies the balance of funds that were not previously allocated, to make up the total budget under the New Horizons program for the balance of this year to $7 milliom. Such programs are very worthwhile for the elderly people of this country. So far this year 53 grants have been approved for $293,000, involving 7,500 retired persons. Last December the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) announced 78 grants which involved $578,486 and covered some 10,000 people. So, the total number of people deriving benefit from this program now is in excess of 17,000.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: It is anticipated that this program will be used in all provinces of Canada. May I dwell on that point for a moment. The anticipated expenditures by provinces, are as follows: In the Yukon and Northwest Territories, in excess of $4,000; in British Columbia, in excess of $722,000; in Alberta, $418,000; in Saskatchewan, $333,000; in Manitoba, $337,000; in Ontario, $2,271,000; in Quebec, $1,456,000; in New Brunswick, $193,000; in Nova Scotia, $255,000; in Prince Edward Island, $43,000; and in Newfoundland, $113,000, for a total of $6,150,000. It is estimated that this amount will be paid by the Department of National Health and Welfare to provide meaningful activities for our elderly people right across Canada.

I cannot understand how anyone in this House could suggest that this item ought to be reduced to $1.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Cafik: Such suggestions make a mockery of all the talk one hears about increasing the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement. All members, on both sides of the House know of the need in this area.

Mr. Nielsen: Then bring in the legislation.

Mr. Cafik: And that is not all the elderly need. They also need—

Mr. Nielsen: Understanding.

Mr. Cafik: —funds, to enable them to take the initiative with their own projects and make their lives fuller and richer. It is very important that we take cognizance of that, now.

Mr. Nielsen: Bring in the legislation.

Mr. Cafik: I think it is important that we, in this House, subscribe to projects that will benefit these people.

Mr. Nielsen: We do.

Mr. Cafik: I am astonished that those on the other side of the House can question the value of the New Horizons program.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

Mr. Cafik: It is clearly in the interest of people in the senior age group.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

Mr. Cafik: I notice the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) says this is rubbish. In that case I suggest—

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member's speech is rubbish.

Mr. Cafik: —that he vote against the New Horizons program.

Mr. Nielsen: Of course, we will not.

Mr. Cafik: I am confident that they would not support him in his motion to scrap these two programs— nor will I.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand that, by agreement, we are now debating in one package notices Nos. 6, 7 and 8 on today's notice paper having to do with certain supplementary estimates for the Department of National Health and Welfare. Notices 6 and 7 relate to the general heading of income security and social assistance. I shall have a few words to say on this topic. Notice No. 8 has to do with fitness and amateur sports. My colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), will speak about that a little later this afternoon.

It could be contended that the money being asked for under the votes covered by notices 6 and 7 is for a specific purpose, rather a narrow one, as it were; however, since the heading on this vote is a general one, to do with income security and social assistance, I felt that the Chair had no option this morning but that of allowing the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) to range generally over the subject. I am glad the hon. member established that precedent, so that I can do it, too.

I have been impressed with the attention that the new Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has given to the responsibilities of his department. All the noises he has made thus far have been in the right direction. I commend him for his activity. However, Sir, I must impress on him the urgency of getting moving with some of the programs for which he is responsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I have suggested that he should get moving—even though my next remark may be lifted out of the logical order in which I try to make my speeches—I wish to say to him that he ought, this afternoon before five o'clock, to file with the table the notice of introduction of the government's bill to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was promised in the Speech from the Throne and it has been confirmed every time the minister has been questioned about it. We are told that there is to be an increase in the old age security pension; we are led to believe that the increase will be in the basic amount. We have been told it will be a substantial increase. We are further told that the government is concerned about those under 65 years old. We, therefore, hope that the bill will do something in that area, either by lowering the eligible age generally or by providing for the pension to be paid to spouses under 65 in cases where one spouse is already a pensioner.

I do not know how we can get it across to the government that every day counts. Every day on which an old age pensioner tries to make out on his meagre income, every day on which a pensioner learns that the cost of living is going up, is a catastrophe. It is a crisis for those people. I trust that the government is not putting off helping those people until February 19.

Mr. Nielsen: That is exactly what it will do and that will be your carrot.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the minister is not planning on that, so that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) when he makes his budget speech, can announce what the Minister of National Health and Welfare is going to do for senior citizens.

Mr. Nielsen: That will be your carrot.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is ten days away.

Mr. Nielsen: That is going to be your carrot.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Our older people cannot buy carrots unless they are given an increase in their pensions.

Mr. Nielsen: I am glad to hear the hon. member say so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say that it would boost morale and lessen some of the anxiety and suffering of our senior citizens in these difficult times if that notice were filed this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It should be done at five o'clock at the latest, because that is the deadline under the rules for such notices to be given on a Friday. If that notice were filed this afternoon the bill would be on the notice paper, and on the order paper right away. It would be printed tomorrow and the people of Canada would know that this promise is being translated into reality. I plead with the Minister of National Health and Welfare not to play the budgetary game and hold it off, but to bring it on right away.

• (1420)

The life of this parliament is not secure. The life of this parliament is in balance. One of the things that will determine whether this parliament will go on, certainly under its present structure, is whether the government acts on this important question. I call for that kind of action this afternoon. I said earlier that I am impressed with the attention the minister is giving to the responsibilities that are his. I suspect that if he were on his own and did not have to get the consent of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), his colleagues and so on, he would have done some of these things long ago.

The same urgency that I have applied to the question of old age security applies to a number of other things that come under his responsibility. During today's question period, I asked him about the range of escalation of the annual increases with respect to Canada Pension Plan benefits. In his reply, the minister indicated that the government was sympathetic to the idea of raising the present ceiling of 2 per cent to a higher figure but, as he put it, the federal government does not yet have sufficient concurrence from the various provinces. If that means there has to be a federal-provincial conference going into the whole area of social security, for heaven's sake, speed up the holding of that conference and, for heaven's sake, in the meantime do everything that the government can possibly do on the basis of its own federal authority and responsibility.

There are other ministers in the chamber. First, there is the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I say to him that he has no excuse for holding back on the escalation of the pensions of retired civil servants and keeping it at that 2 per cent ceiling. On January 24, he told me that had to be tied in some way to the question of its relationship to the Canada Pension Plan. If that is going to be delayed, why should retired civil servants have to wait all this time for this increase?

I say to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), as I said this morning, that he should talk turkey to Canadian National Railways and talk the same kind of language to the Canadian Pacific Railway also. He should tell these organizations that they should not leave this question of the escalating of their pensions in the state of limbo that it is in at the present time. This whole principle that pensions should be increased, not by some fixed limit as 2 per cent, but enough to enable people to keep up with the rising cost of living, has to be applied to all pensions across the board. I call on the appropriate person, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has more to do with pensions than anyone else, to press this point for all he is worth.

I was delighted to read the document tabled a few days ago by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), the report of the joint study group on the basic rate of pensions under the disability act. That joint committee, God bless its members, is not satisfied with an increase equal to the rise in the cost of living. That committee says that as veterans grow older, they are entitled to share in the increases in the standard of living that others are able to enjoy because of the growth in our economy, the rise in the gross national product, the rise in the wage index and the standard of living. It is a principle that members who have been around here for awhile have heard me proclaiming for a long, long time.

I insist that we will not have pensions that are worthy of the name until there is built into them provision to escalate in such a way that our retired people will be able to keep up, not only with the rising cost of living, but be able to participate in the rising standard of living.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Minister of National Health and Welfare has had a real promotion from the kitchen cabinet, as the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) described it this morning, into the cabinet itself. It is a real promotion to be made minister of this department. I insist that he is in one of the most important portfolios in the cabinet, because the whole question of developing some kind of income security and certainty for the lives of our people, particularly in their later years, hangs on what he will do. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I call upon him to add to the good image he has created and the good impression I get of him. I call upon him to do that with some expedition. He can show this by tabling the notice of his bill to amend the Old Age Security Act this afternoon and moving on some of these other matters as well.

I hope the minister will move as quickly as he can on the escalation of the Canada Pension Plan benefits. Right now, people living across the river in Quebec receive an escalation of 3 per cent per year whereas under the Canada Pension Plan it is 2 per cent. Somehow or other they have managed that without any increase in the premiums that people must pay. There is one province that started it. I do not shout with great joy about 3 per cent because I do not think it is enough, but at least Quebec has established that it should not stay at 2 per cent. I press for zeal and determination on the part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in this whole field of the escalation of benefits.

I will now get back to the bill that I think we should have in this House on Monday. As we are now going to get rid of the supply bill a lot sooner than we thought would be the case, the coast will be clear. There is no reason to delay dealing with it next week before we get to the February 19 budget and the budget debate. I urge that the effective date in the bill be retroactive to January 1. In the middle of last year, when an election was in the offing, pension increases were made retroactive, so that precedent has been established. I think that should be done now. Many senior citizens have already had their rents increased because the news is there will be a pension increase. They need a retroactive payment in order to cover some of the increases they have already had to pay.

On another occasion I will have something more to say about retired civil servants, veterans and those who receive pensions from the private sector. It is appropriate to mention these matters here because this is where the lead must come from, from my good and earnest friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I also remind the minister that every time we have done something about old age pensions in recent years, we have overlooked certain other things that ought to be done. It used to be that whenever there was an increase in old age security, shortly thereafter there was an increase in old age assistance. There was also an increase in the blind persons allowance and the disabled persons allowance. Those ceilings are still at $75 even though the Old Age Security pension has been increased to $82.88. The government argues that those are federal-provincial schemes and that the provinces have the right under the Canada Assistance Plan to supplement them if they want.

However, I have the terrible feeling that in this change, the blind people of Canada have been forgotten in this place. It is not good enough to say to them that a pension of $75 for a blind person is enough because he can get additional so-called welfare that is financed under the Canada Assistance Plan. I agree with those who speak for the blind that they ought to be paid a universal pension as of right, and that the amount ought to be adequate. Likewise with the question of disabled persons allowances. I know some people are covered under the Canada Assistance Plan, and that some people get disability benefits under the Canada Pension Plan.

However, that old disabled persons act is still around, and we still run into people who encounter difficulty getting pensions or allowances to which they are fully entitled because they are not able to prove they are totally incapacitated. We often run into cases where it seems that to get a pension or an allowance under this legislation a person has to be unable to move, unable to feed or look after himself.

I welcome the proposal in the Speech from the Throne to make a beginning on a guaranteed annual income. Although I want to see the day come when it is universal, I am prepared to start with a guaranteed annual income for certain categories of people, namely the categories mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Speaker, let us not anticipate that this will not come about until after another election or another two elections. This is needed now. It is one of the reasons this parliament is being kept here at all—so that action will be taken on these various things. And I plead that this action take place without delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: How long are you going to wait?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member asks his political question, and I don't mind it. We are asking ourselves how long we should give these people to come through with what they themselves have promised. As for the pension, we think it should be $150 a month. I suppose they will not go that high. We think the age qualification should be lowered.

The important thing is that the older people of Canada are feeling the pinch; they are feeling it even more today because they have been told what has happened to the cost of living index and they are wondering what parliament intends to do. It would be a real boost to them if the news tomorrow is that there has been filed on the notice paper of the House of Commons an appropriate bill to amend the Old Age Security Act. I have enjoyed saying nice things about the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I think he knows I meant them. I would mean them all the more if he would do as I have suggested—file notice of that bill this afternoon so that tomorrow the older people of Canada might know that their pensions are to be increased on a certain date to a much more reasonable level. This is the sort of thing which should be done without delay.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask the hon. member a question? If the government does not bring in the legislation requested by the hon. member on Monday, would he and his party vote against the appropriation bill on Monday, amounting to expressing non-confidence in the government?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would be much more interested in answering that question if it had come from a representative of a party which had taken a firm stand with respect to old age pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was asked during the election campaign whether he would support the payment of $150 a month across the board as a basic old age pension. And he said, no.

An hon. Member: He said $175.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He said no such thing. When he was pressed as to how much of an increase he would support, he said: Enough to cover the full cost of living. The highest figure that was ever extracted from the Leader of the Opposition in the election campaign was the figure of $10 a month.

An hon. Member: Answer the question!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now, why should we throw the Liberals out when we are still trying to get $150, or something like it, from them, while from this side of the House we have no promise at all? Two or three Sundays ago, the Leader of the Opposition was on one of those afternoon television programs and the question was put to him again. He dodged it. He was not prepared to commit his party to an increase in the basic old age pension beyond $10 a month. He and his friends talk a lot about what they are prepared to do for old age pensioners—they are willing to set aside the business of the House to deal with the question of pensions, and so on. I do not know what we shall get from from the Liberals. But it has been promised that the increase will be substantial. The pension amounts to $82.88 at the present time. We shall have to decide, when we get the bill, what "substantial" means. But at least there is a clear indication from that side of the House that we will get something. There is no indication from the Progressive Conservative party that they will do anything at all beyond $10 a month.

The hon. member for Yukon wants to know whether we would vote those people out and put him and his friends in on the basis of their $10 a month.

Mr. Nielsen: Oh no, that was not the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): While the hon. member is trying to formulate his question, may I say that I hope the question by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) got on record in Hansard. He wants to know if we have found the money for $150 a month, which is a clear indication that he does not favour the $150. There is one thing about the hon. member for Edmonton West: he honestly states the position of his party. And he is not in favour of the $150.

Mr. Nielsen: May I address my question again to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask both hon. members to resume their seats. Since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not prepared to yield to the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for Yukon cannot be recognized.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was prepared to yield. I just wanted first to comment on the interjection from the hon. member for Edmonton West. I am quite happy to take a question from the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: My question to the hon. member—and he appeared to miss it, judging from the breadth of his comments—was this: if the government does not act as suggested, and bring in by Monday legislation along the lines he proposes, are he and his party prepared to vote against the appropriation bill? This would have the effect of turfing out the government, but not necessarily of putting this party in power.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We shall be happy to let the Official Opposition know our strategy when it is time to make it known. The hon. member cannot get away with these indirect questions. He tries to tie the question whether or not we get the notice by tomorrow to the way in which we shall vote on the supply bill. The question of the supply bill stands on its own. We happen to think that this parliament should be made to work. We happen to think that the business of government should carry on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Don't evade the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute; I did not come here yesterday. You can't get me that way. If the government lets us down on old age pensions we will deal with the government when we decide to do so, and in the right way. But that is a different thing from withholding this money which is intended for unemployment insurance payments, LIP payments, New Horizon programs, fitness and amateur sport and all the other things.

Mr. Danforth: Money for agriculture?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, money for agriculture. The hon. member for Yukon does not know about western farmers. We are not like hon. members to our right. We are not prepared, as they are, to attempt to bring a halt to the ongoing business of government just in the hope that they might get over there on the treasury benches and make a worse mess than is being made by hon. members sitting there at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I can congratulate the hon. members from the Conservative party for curtailing the week's filibuster they had planned to carry on with respect to these nine motions, so that we may get at the supply bill today or Monday. But I say to them that the supply bill stands on its own feet. It represents the ongoing business of government. There are the programs in it which I have mentioned, and which need to be financed, and we intend to vote for each of these items.

Mr. Hees: We know how you feel. Do not bother with the alibis.

• (1440)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do not talk to me about alibis; my friends make them by the thousands. We are not going to vote for reducing the "New Horizons" item to $1. We are not going to vote for reducing the fitness and amateur sport item to $1. We are not going to vote for reducing the agricultural items or any of the others. We think the business of government must go on, and therefore we are prepared to vote this money. However, we are saying to the government—and I think the government knows this—that they have to act on pensions in a proper way or they know what will happen.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise to participate in this debate. In fact, when I come to think of it, it doesn't give me very great pleasure, since the purpose of the motions proposed by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is to delay funds for very worthwhile programs, something that I do not approve. If the hon. member would pause to think about it when he comes back into the chamber, the effect of his proposals would be to kill these programs.

Let us think for a moment what these programs really do. They are extremely worthwhile. The hon. member opposite is sitting down at the far end of the chamber trying to make deals with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and is playing little games with the lives of senior citizens. There is one of those organic relationships going on down there at the moment.

Mr. Hees: You mean playing games with the life of the government, don't you, Barney?

Mr. Danson: The effect of these motions, as I say, would be to kill these worthwhile programs which are primarily directed toward our senior citizens, people who have my highest priority and I think the highest priority of all members of the House. We do not play games or play politics with our elderly citizens.

Mr. Hees: You only play games with the NDP.

Mr. Danson: Neither do we engage in auction sales with the old age pensioners.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Are you trying to be a prophet, Barney?

Mr. Danson: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) may think we are not being serious about this. He was a member in the last House and he knows that my priority, the priority of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, indeed I think the priority of all members of the House, was the senior citizens. We have to think about them in a very selfish way. It does give more dynamism to our lifestyle if we live in a society where, as senior citizens, we know that we are looked after in security and with dignity; we can then live a more free-style life and take our chance when we are young and are somewhat more flexible.

Mr. Hees: Aren't you flexible now?

Mr. Danson: Yes, I am, and I am sure I will be for a long time. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that I am not flexible. But the point is we are still able to control our options. No one has ever suggested that life is easy, but when we are older we do not have the same chance as when we are young. That is why the old people must be looked after now. Therefore, I do not think we should play games by delaying legislation and embarrassing the government on a matter as important as this, and this applies particularly to the New Horizons program.

I do not say that because it is the most important program or the most significant thing that has ever happened in the history of this country, but because it is a very precious program. The greatest priority of all is the fundamental economic security of our senior citizens. But there is a lot more to it than that. There is a life style, a richness of life, which allows these people to do things they were not able to do before. I happen to think that it is a great program.

I was delighted to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Cafik) say that some 17,000 people are now involved in the program. I was glancing at the minister's press release of December 18 last, which outlines some of the programs that are to be implemented right across the country. They are not massive programs. For example, there is a grant of $5,100 for a program in St. John's, Newfoundland; a grant of $3,900 for one in Whitbourne; another for $1,170 for Kensington, P.E.I.; another for $1,765 for Miscouche in P.E.I. There are programs right across the country. For example, in my own riding there are one or two small programs, but there are programs from coast to coast for small groups of people.

We also have to look at these programs in human terms. During the last election campaign—or, rather, during the last election; I do not recall there being a campaign—I was called down to Willowdale United Church in my constituency to meet a group of senior citizens there. They were not all members of the church because the group was non-denominational and used the church facilities to play card games such as euchre to reminisce. They had some interesting stories to pass on and they told me they would like to put them in a book. They wondered if somehow, through some government program, they could secure the services of a stenographer or secretary who would type these stories so they could be mimeographed. There were about 100 people there and none of them knew about the New Horizons program. It is, of course, still fresh in our minds and we still have a lot to learn about it from experience. So, for a very small sum of money, here would be an opportunity to engage a lot of people in a project that might prove very worthwhile. The stories and reminiscences that they have might be very valuable to our generation and future generations. But there is another dimension to it. These people who presently wake up on a Monday morning and ask what they are going to do until their euchre game on Wednesday are going to be able to say that they have to be ready for their project on Wednesday. Each day, therefore, is no longer a dull day, another day waiting for the euchre game on Wednesday. They will have a different focus each week, which is something that is very worthwhile.

There is another town in my riding, the town of Vaughan, which is really a township made up of a lot of small towns and farming area. The senior citizens there have formed a Senate. We have our own Senate of senior citizens, too, but this is a different sort of Senate. They have representatives from the towns of Woodbridge, Maple, Thornhill, Concord and Nashville who come together and decide among themselves what kind of programs are needed in the area. So that they do not duplicate the work, the group from Nashville takes on one program and the group from Woodbridge takes on another. This is a great idea and prompted me to suggest to the minister that it would be very worthwhile to have an advisory council such as in the town of Vaughan for all of the senior citizens programs.

A lot of benefit can be derived just from meeting and talking about problems. This provides input and the whole thing is co-ordinated by the director of recreation in the municipality, who is probably in his mid to late twenties. He is as excited about the program as are the old people themselves. It appeared to me that we could expand this idea even further and get our senior citizens more involved in the program if we had a national advisory council so that the thrust of the program is maintained and oriented in ways with which the senior citizens can identify. Then, perhaps regional advisory boards of senior citizens could be set up to provide a channel of communication with the minister who is primarily concerned with their interests. This is very important, not only to the success of the program, but so that the senior citizens themselves feel tuned in to the institutions of their country as well as to their government.

We have tried to do the same sort of thing with your young people through the Opportunities for Youth program and local initiatives programs. People who were trying to destroy the institutions of our society a few years ago now feel for the first time that society cares about them, is interested in them and that our institutions are relevant to them. I am not really too concerned about senior citizens coming to Ottawa to tear down the Parliament Buildings or to start bonfires at city hall. We are talking about an enriching program that is important to them in later years when often they feel shunted aside. Through these advisory groups they are given a channel of communication to their government. We are representing them and they no longer feel alienated. They do get their message through. There is an interplay and a connection between senior citizens and their governments, as there should be between all citizens. Let us not forget them. The New Horizons program offers that potential, and I hope the minister will take this as a suggestion and establish these advisory groups of senior citizens.

It was rather interesting to meet with senior citizens. They are a great bunch. We had a couple of meetings and they talked about some interesting programs they wanted to undertake, such as travelling to Niagara Falls, Quebec City, and some even wanted to go to Vancouver. I thought that was great. Those are things they should be able to do. I agree with the purpose of the program itself, and feel that perhaps we should help them organize. It also helps put their problems into perspective. They thought life had been pretty tough on them.

We had one meeting at the church and one at the town hall in Maple. They said that everyone there got there by car. This was true. I suggested that perhaps they should start thinking about this method of travelling to Niagara Falls, Quebec City and Vancouver. We have another section in Woodbridge which is made up of summer cottages in which a lot of the older people are now living. It is a big event for these people to get to downtown Toronto, and for some even to get to the post office in Woodridge. Perhaps there is no problem for some of these senior citizens in getting out, but for others it is a big event to even get out of their homes and down the street. They do not have cars.

These are the same people who are making the trade-offs that many senior citizens have to make today between nutrition and medicine. I spoke a couple of weeks ago in the House about this. These meetings had a strange effect on other senior citizens. They began to put their problems in some sort of perspective, and began to realize that they were not so badly off. They began to talk about doing something for other senior citizens who were in worse shape than they were, perhaps because of this trade-off between medication and food. These people would get together and make a deal with a few of the local druggists. They would actually get into the auction business and play one against the other, trying to find the one who would give them the best deal on drug costs. These people have become quite excited about this program.

This is the potential of the New Horizons program. This is the sort of thing it is doing, and this is the sort of thing to which these motions are intended to apply. It saddens me to think that a man such as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who has had such experience in this House, would stoop to this type of tactic.

No one can question the credentials of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in respect of his experience with senior citizens. I am sure he is as impatient as all of us, but I am sure that if we really think about this in all fairness and in an unbiased, non-political way, he and others will appreciate the record of the Liberal government as far as senior citizens are concerned.

When I heard I was to speak this afternoon on this matter I looked up the record and reviewed it. I wanted to refresh my mind as to some of the things that happened in respect of old age security. When the Liberal government was formed in 1963 under Mr. Pearson, the universal old age security pension was $65 a month and was paid to a person aged 70 or over. In 1964, Mr. Pearson's government raised the old age pension to $75 a month and a 2 per cent escalation clause was included to offset the cost of living. That was done in 1966. In 1970, the old age security pension was set at $80 per month, and in the same year pensions became payable to persons 65 years of age and over. That was as a result of the action taken in 1966. This year the government introduced an escalation clause to fully adjust the old age pensions to increases in the cost of living. I think this has been a major and a significant move. People speak about the small amount of money involved, but the principle is extremely important. This escalation was built in, just as the member for Winnipeg North Centre says it should be built into other areas of our pensions system.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member now addressing the House would accept a question?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to accept a question from the hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would give us any idea of his estimate of the amount of increase in the old age pension that would be needed to obviate the necessity for the trade-offs he has spoken of between nutrition and medicine?

Mr. Danson: It would be significant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I have never been satisfied, and I suppose I never will be in this area, but I hope I will be satisfied that we have done all we can as a government. I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) knows my feeling and the feeling of many members of our caucus. We have to do the best we can. There are other trade-offs in taxation, and as to whether we look after people on a universal basis or on a selective basis. These are trade-offs that we have to make.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would you go for $150?

Mr. Danson: The amount must be significant and you can read anything you want from that statement. I am confident that the amount will be significant, but I must say that I have no prior knowledge.

In any event, we introduced the guaranteed income supplement and provided for a maximum payment of $30 a month to old age pensioners having no other income. As in the case of old age security pensions, this was indexed, for cost of living purposes, at 2 per cent per year. In 1970, the maximum guaranteed income supplement was increased to $55 a month, and this year the government both increased the maximum to $70 per month and indexed the guaranteed income supplement payment to fully reflect increases in the cost of living.

Since 1963, therefore, under the combined headings of old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, Liberal governments have increased benefits payable to a single old age pensioner from $65 a month to $150 a month plus full cost of living adjustment if she or he has no other income. Several other benefits and programs, all of them introduced by Liberal governments, enabled retirees and senior citizens to look forward to a dignified life in old age.

Mr. Woolliams: We remember six-buck Harris.

Mr. Danson: We have come a long way since the six-buck days, and compared to the days of 10-buck Bob, I think this was very generous.

There is the Canada Pension Plan, for example, which was introduced in 1966 and will be fully operational by 1976. The plan will pay out a retirement benefit of 25 per cent of a worker's annual average earnings up to $5,100, in addition to providing a disability pension, a benefit for dependents for those disabled and unable to work, a pension for widows, orphans and disabled workers, and a lump sum death benefit. This plan guarantees for the first time that pension benefits will be payable to all Canadian workers, over and above the old age security payment, regardless of the vagaries of coverage under private pension plans. In its white paper on income security, the government announced its intention of keeping the Canada Pension Plan consistent with the growth in wages and salaries in the Canadian economy.

There are also the medical care program and the Canada Assistance Plan, both initiated by Liberal governments. These are the first things we have done with a degree of consistency, if not with all the haste that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would want, and that many of us would wish. I think we are making considerable progress and the pace of it is accelerating. I think we can be grateful for that without, at the same time, ever being satisfied.

I suggest that we get on with the business of the House and with the legislation that is before us, because there are things to be done. There is good legislation and we are proud of the performance of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a new member of the House, since he assumed that portfolio. I think all of those on this side of the House, and the people in Canada, can be grateful for having him serve in that role. I think we should get on with the job.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal at great length with the matter before us, because, after all, the supplementary estimates being discussed at the present time are highly justifiable.

Although one may criticize the purposes for which such estimates are earmarked or say that too much or too little money is provided, I find it quite ridiculous that the Progressive Conservative party should want to reduce some one dollar items. I sincerely believe that the members of that party would be the last to support such a proposal. In fact, their main purpose, and that is unfortunate, is to play politics. Their purpose is not to get good administration but rather to create confusion among others and achieve some political gains.

For my part, I only ask that the government have these items disposed of as soon as possible in order to be in a position to introduce adequate bills, and that not only for purely political purposes, but rather in consideration of the rights of the old people for whom those estimates are intended.

Mr. Speaker, is there anything to prevent the government from introducing such bills as soon as possible? The members of the Liberal party are keen to blame the Progressive Conservative members, telling them: You are delaying the business of the House, you do not want us to act quickly. This results in a deplorable waste of time because nothing more than motions or innocuous bills are put before the House.

As far as we are concerned, we are waiting for the government to take unequivocal positions, especially on old age security pensions. We can never pin them down about the amounts to be paid to the old people; they rather enjoy, every four or five years, introducing bills intended to create political pressures on individuals, instead of discussing the amount of the votes or the real solution to the problems.

I wonder why the government does not introduce bills stipulating, for instance, that the old age security pensions be increased to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living. Instead, it prefers to introduce the same old bills, postponing their adoption to introduce others later on, but refusing to take positive steps. In fact, the present budgets are another crushing proof that the governments, past and present, are incapable of setting up sensible estimates.

They still enjoy throwing figures around from time to time, but never taking into account concrete facts, that is the increase in the cost of living. For instance, the old people could be given the right to automatically higher pensions, based on rising costs.

Mr. Speaker, we are still discussing the supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31 and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg-North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said a while ago, we are waiting for the government to take a position and quickly. Decisions will not be made easier nor will the Canadian people live any better because things are dragged out and deadlines are postponed. Decisions must be made today, as soon as possible. We must stop arguing about minor problems such as that which is before us now because we know that money has already been or soon will be spent. We must also—I refer to the Progressive Conservatives in particular—we must also stop playing petty politics.

Hon. members should act as administrators, they should deal effectively with the needs and claims of their electors and the government should introduce positive bills.

We are once more discussing the New Horizons Program and in view of the imitation of an administration that may exist at present, I wonder whether we can be assured that the appropriations will be better administered than those concerning the Local Initiatives Program. One asks questions. It is all very fine to put out a political feeler by suggesting that these are necessary credits, but when we come to the administration or to the distribution of these credits, we find that never, in any area, they do really serve to help the people.

We want the government to do positive work, progressive work which respects the needs of the individual not 10 years later, but at the moment when it is necessary to meet these needs. We are waiting with impatience for the government to introduce bills which will respect the needs of individuals when individuals have those needs and not on a delayed basis as has always happened in the past.

Mr. Speaker, these were the simple remarks I had to make on these estimates and I hope especially that the Progressive Conservatives will stop their petty political manoeuvring and allow the government to pass these estimates as soon as possible so that we may really be able see if the government intends to introduce positive bills.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as I look around the House on this quiet Friday afternoon I would suggest we could obviate the problem raised in respect of the question period this morning if we gave Mr. Speaker discretion to call the question period occasionally on Friday afternoon. The front bench on the government side is fairly empty, but those members do not contribute a great deal to the question period in any event.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. parliamentary secretary who introduced the debate for the government. He was ably supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I listen with great interest every time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks. I admire his humanitarianism. I agree with his feelings about the plight of the aged people in this great country. I was surprised, however, at his sudden conversion in wanting the old age pensioners' case brought forward now. We wanted it brought forward a month ago, and nothing has happened in this parliament in the last month which I would place in a higher priority than the Old Age Security Act.

I would also support the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wishes to put his money where his mouth is and come forward with a statement that he will not support the supply motion unless an amendment is brought in in respect of old age security, I think he will receive agreement from this side of the House and again will be able to have his way with the House. It always alarms me when a discussion occurs such as that between the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I assume they were debating who would be House leader next week.

I believe that an amendment to the Old Age Security Act should be brought in immediately. Early in the session we heard that it was to be brought in very soon. It has not yet been introduced. We are wondering if this urgent legislation is not being debated because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) want to have it contained in the budget, or not passed until the budget, in order to try to blackmail opposition members into accepting the budget of the Minister of Finance.

Now I shall refer to the statements made by the party opposite about our $1 motion. As they well know, and I wish they would stop trying to misinform the people of Canada in this regard, this is a procedural motion which is the only way open to the opposition to ensure that supply estimates are discussed. It seems to me that it is the duty of all members of the House to discuss how the taxpayers' money is to be spent. It is a pleasure for me to speak in this debate on the supplementary estimates concerning welfare. As I have said, this motion gives parliament an opportunity to discuss welfare in both a broad and a narrow sense. There may be those in the House who do not agree that welfare or other areas of finance should be discussed. They believe we should agree to whatever is put before us by the bureaucrats, that it is not our business and one must be a professional even to discuss our society and its present ills.

Needless to say, such are not my thoughts. Programs involving the spending of tax dollars and involving the people of Canada are our business. The business of parliament is whatever parliament decides it is, and parliament has decided that this is the matter we should discuss now.

During the September-October, 1972, period which had been decreed to be a time of dialogue between the Prime Minister and the voters, several other non-establishment characters got into the act and discovered inter alia that the people of Canada were very interested in the subject of welfare and particularly in the maladministration of public disbursements in this field. They were concerned that welfare was costing the taxpayers of Canada, at all levels, over $6 billion per year with no apparent remedial result.

It is most of all the fact that there is no apparent remedial result accruing from this enormous expenditure that gives us all a feeling of helplessness and hopelessness with this government. All their measures concerning the poor and the needy are on a palliative basis. No cure is ever contemplated or attempted. This government is actually a kind of Typhoid Mary going around infecting people and then trying to alleviate their disease whilst infecting still more.

I believe that the most devastating fault among the legion of faults of this administration is their inability to produce any incentive to get the welfare recipient off welfare and give him back his self-respect. The head of a household cannot hold his head high when he is not in fact the breadwinner. Yet the current rules in many cases penalize the citizen who tries to supplement the family income by working. It simply results in a net loss of income.

Perhaps this might be a propitious time for me to decry the unfortunate habit that more and more people, among them some of the media, are adopting in referring to the unemployment scheme as welfare. One hears all too often reports about "unemployment insurance and other welfare projects". To those who take anything other than the most cursory interest in the unfortunates of our society, it is crystal clear that unemployment insurance is totally different from welfare. For one thing, the benefits are much higher. I hope that this slight digression will be forgiven, but it always bothers me when these two schemes, quite dissimilar in concept, are considered to be similar. It distresses me particularly when it appears to be part of an over-all plan to have them considered of the same genre. It is, of course, symbolic of the floundering and confusion of the self-appointed elitists of the treasury benches that they are confused when faced with the realities of life in the real world, the working world.

I realize that trying to sort out the crazy-quilt, the overlapping of one scheme with another of the alleged social programs of this government, is not easy and I should like to see this government present a plan to simplify the mess. May I suggest that the Progressive Conservative income development plan should be studied. There are many distinguished observers of the economic and social scene who are writing learned papers concerning such concepts as the income development plan.

Methods of achieving the goals of the income development plan are sometimes different. The one that seems to me to be the most promising if one values simplicity, and I do, is the negative income theory. It seems to me that if a simpler system were devised we could then redeploy our scanty numbers of trained social workers into the fields for which they are trained. These specialists should be free to counsel those who need conselling, to help the helpless, to encourage the discouraged. Skilled social workers at present spend far too much of their valuable time assisting the less fortunate to decipher, to decode the latest ukase from Ottawa to determine under which rule the needy can be kept warm, the hungry fed.

When considering what may be to this government the problem of the poor and, to more understanding members, the plight of the poor, the House should bear in mind that the poor do not live under rules and laws devised by the poor. They live under laws and rules devised by other people. They do not ask or wish to be poor. I have no doubt that all the poor people would prefer not to be so. But they do not make the rules of the game. We do. If our country is as rich as we like to boast it is, we are doing a remarkably bad job of handling its finances.

We simply must find a way to enable these people to break out of the financial ghetto in which we incarcerate them. They do not want, and surely we do not want, merely to keep them existing in perpetual poverty. Can we never find a way to give them what is most needed—which is hope, not charity? They do not ask to live in idleness; they do not want to be considered different and inferior; they want to join the rest of our society. Let us help them.

I would now like the House to consider for a few minutes the leverage effects that welfare costs have on the municipalities, towns and cities that are required to find part of the money needed to finance welfare, although their role is so proscribed as to make them unable to do anything about the primary root cause of it all which, of course, is the ailing economy.

Under the present financial agreements and arrangements, municipal authorities' taxing fields are so narrow, and within their narrow confines are now so high that extraordinarily heavy burdens fall upon home owners and small businesses. When an emergency situation exists, as it does at present, and welfare costs rise and the cost of municipal sharing rises, where are the municipalities and small towns to raise funds? Traditionally, their revenue comes from property taxes and business tax. Many of them are too small to be able to put on sales taxes. The cost of administration requires a larger base.

Municipal revenues do not rise automatically as the federal government's revenues rise. The federal government can now count, or almost count, on having a substantial increase in revenue without raising taxes at all. The increased revenue will flow in automatically due to the inflation that they have brought about and we are fast approaching the stage at which the federal government will feel if they need more revenue they simply have to increase inflation.

As was pointed out by our leader during the recent campaign, the government is the only organization in this land that has a vested interest in maintaining an inflationary spiral. I know that their cost-sharing arrangements and grants do help in a sense and that the federal government always keeps the lower levels of government in a subservient position. The lower levels of government always must come like children, cap in hand, to the rich uncle in Ottawa to beg, wheedle and negotiate for next year's allowance. "Big Daddy" here in Ottawa decides how much he will dispense, always on a short-term basis.

• (1520)

Anyone who has been involved in the collection and disbursement of funds at the municipal level—and many of us in this House have—and those who have apprenticed on school boards or city and municipal councils soon realize that there are at least two kinds of money in this country. There is the very hard money, the closely accounted for money, the money whose expenditure requires full explanation. That is the kind of money that municipalities get from their ratepayers. Then there is the other kind, the kind that has a sort of unreal quality similar to Monopoly play momey. It is collected in ever increasing quantities without any relevant requirement ever being considered or discussed. That is the automatic inflation that causes the increase and is never approved.

It is disconcerting, to say the least, to pare a school district budget by enlarging the pupil-teacher ratio, a Draconian measure indeed, and then suddenly to discover that a spur of the moment federal program will pour money into less worth-while projects in the same district. While a school board is letting go one or two school teachers because of the lack of $20,000, someone will be getting a cheque for $20,000 to paint a mural in the school hallway. Here I am speaking generally and not of any particular case. But we could mention a hundred projects of no appreciable value to our society that, if dispensed with, the money provided for them could help children receive a decent education through the normal channels. It is hard to believe that the municipal dollar and the federal dollar are each worth the same 100 cents.

I have introduced the picture of municipal financing so that hon. members might realize what a shattering blow it is, to those charged with financial responsibility at lower levels, to be required to pay any part of welfare costs when such costs rise rapidly as the economy falters. The costs of welfare in small cities take up such an enormous proportion of their budgets that budgeting becomes a farce. If the federal government's budget indicates that we are in for another round of inflation or a further increase in unemployment, the unemployed of course may first collect unemployment insurance benefits but when their benefits run out they go on welfare. That is something not budgeted for.

We have been told that in holding this debate we are voting only a dollar for several plans. That, Mr. Speaker, is utter rubbish. It is this extreme dissatisfaction with the present financial and taxing methods that causes me to look with considerable favour upon the income development plan. The government must know that an entirely unfair burden is placed upon the lower levels of government. I do not have a closed mind about the income development plan. If the government is able to devise a better plan, I hope it will not hesitate to bring it forward. What is important is that the government should realize that the present system is unfair, undemocratic and guarantees that all Canadians do not and will not have equal opportunities in this land.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, this morning an editorial in the Globe and Mail was titled, "If necessary, an election." I do not wish to read the whole of it, simply because it is too lengthy. Nevertheless, there are a couple of paragraphs in it that should be read for the benefit of hon. members. And, Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that this was written by the chief editorial writer of the Globe and Mail. It reads in part as follows:

> Conservative leader Robert Stanfield made the unemployed one of the principal themes of his speech—

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is not that I have any objection to listening to this editorial in the Globe and Mail—I read such editorials, just like everybody else—but it is a rule of this House that editorials should not be read in debate. I think that should be brought to the attention of the distinguished hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The point of order is well taken if the hon. member is referring to an article that he has called an editorial. However, I think I should listen a little longer to know what is being quoted.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, you are very fair. As a matter of fact, the hon. member who brought this matter to your attention was very fair. I have nothing against his interrupting, but I wish he would interrupt some of his own colleagues whenever they read much more than I did. It is not necessary that I quote this editorial; as a matter of fact, I think I could almost quote it from memory, verbatim. But because it is an article in the Globe and Mail and because it refers to the leader of the opposition I want to be correct in every detail. Therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall continue to read. It reads as follows:

> Conservative leader Robert Stanfield made the unemployed one of the principal themes of his speech in the throne speech debate. He offered to shelve temporarily that debate if the government would immediately bring in legislation to increase old age pensions and clarify the Unemployment Insurance Act. His verbal concern for the unemployed has occupied him urgently since.
> Those were the words. The performance has been to delay, often with time wasting and childish tactics, the bill to provide the money to pay unemployment benefits. This delay was carried to the point where—the Senate insisting on some time to consider the matter—benefits actually were delayed for Canadians who needed them.
> Such behaviour so disregarded the needs of the country that three Conservative Members of Parliament broke with their party to support the government's bill. This in spite of the overwhelming desire of the Conservatives to bring down the government.

I do not think any more need be said about that matter. These are not my words; they are the words of one of the chief editorial writers in Canada, certainly one of the chief editorial writers in the great city of Toronto. So far as I am concerned, not only with regard to the debate during the past month but with regard to the present debate those words put the cards squarely on the table. The fact is that our hon. friends in the opposition—and of course they are our friends—accuse of us of not knowing what is going on in the country, and probably too often we accuse them of the same thing. In this particular instance they have obstructed the government in every possible way and have obstructed it in every possible way since we returned here last January 4.

The statement by my hon. friend opposite that the amendment introduced by one of the Conservative members, asking that these votes be reduced to $1, was the only way that they could discuss these measures in the House of Commons is 100 per cent nonsense. They brought in this delaying tactic so they could obstruct the government in every possible way. There is no other explanation.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that on October 30 last a large percentage of the people of Canada voted for the great Conservative party and the Conservatives were successful in obtaining 107 seats. But sometimes the way they talk and criticize the government would lead one to believe that they had won about 135 seats and were the party in power instead of the one that sits to the right of Mr. Speaker.

• (1530)

May I remind you, Sir, and all hon. members present, that Liberal members do not sit in the House today with their heads down. If anybody won the election, we won it because we obtained more seats than any other party in the House and a greater percentage of the vote than any other party in Canada. The government is attempting to govern in an organized fashion, not just for the Liberal party, not for the socialist party, not for the Créditistes, but to the best of our ability for all Canadians from Vancouver to Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Don't speak nonsense.

Mr. Whicher: That is why we are here today voting on such great programs as the New Horizons program involving senior citizens, a program that was not even dreamed about when my friends to the left of Mr. Speaker sat in the seats of government some years ago.

Provision is made for amateur sport, which will benefit the youth of this country, not the youth of the United States or of other countries. This money will not be spent on Viet Nam or for sending wheat to India; it will be spent on young Canadians in their teens and on those perhaps as old as 30 or 40 so that we can develop better fitness and amateur sport in Canada. I think such a program is good.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You should; you have agreed to support it.

Mr. Whicher: The Conservative motion in opposition to vote 45a seeks to reduce to $1 the $1 million program of the Department of National Health and Welfare for fitness and amateur sport. This is how much that party wants to make available to our youth.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nonsense. The money is already spent.

Mr. Whicher: I hear the hon. member say it is nonsense.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes. It is already spent.

Mr. Whicher: May I remind you, Sir, that yesterday evening I heard the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) say, when talking about the large sums of money which would be lent to the provinces and municipalities of Canada, that the money was not spent. He was complaining because it was not spent. That is what he suggested yesterday. He suggested that this government has no right to vote moneys for two or three years ahead.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Whicher: Why did he say that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member is rising to ask a question. Does the hon. member who has the floor agree to accept it?

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to answer as soon as I have finished.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All right. The hon. member does not seem to know the difference between governor general's warrants and estimates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Whicher.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Hon. members have behaved well so far. The hon. member who has the floor has a very special way of expressing himself, but the Chair is experiencing some difficulty in following the discussion.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So is everybody else.

Mr. Whicher: The hon. member suggests I do not know what I am talking about. But I do know the difference between relevant and irrelevant facts and I suggest the hon. member should study that question.

Mr. Danforth: Here we go again with the same old argument.

Mr. Whicher: If I may continue speaking about this grant for our athletes, its purpose is to assist the better Canadian athletes who wish to continue both their educational and competitive careers. As athletes move into higher levels of competition, more and more time must be spent on training: this leaves little opportunity for working in order to raise funds for educational purposes. Surely that is self-evident, Mr. Speaker. We hope that athletes from all across Canada will take part in the Olympic games to be held in Montreal in 1976. It is our duty, surely, as legislators—not as Liberal legislators but as Members of Parliament—to help all the young people of Canada so that they can put on a creditable showing in Canada or anywhere else in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Completed applications are received in duplicate by Sport Canada. Approximately 16,000 application forms were distributed to national sports governing bodies, educational institutions, provincial governments and previous applicants, relative to the 1973 grants. Perhaps I ought to remind hon. members that those grants do not go to any particular area of the country; they go to our athletes in the ten provinces and two territorial districts; they are for our sons and daughters, grandsons and granddaughters. Conservative members who have spoken against this proposal are obstructing to the nth degree. I do not include all Conservatives because many have not spoken. The Conservatives who have spoken do not support this opportunity that the government has brought before parliament.

Much has been said about the Olympic games which will be held in Canada in 1976. I know this subject is controversial. As a Canadian, I hope that the city of Montreal is very successful in its endeavour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: If it is successful, and surely we all hope for that, that city may have the laugh on the rest of the country. Montreal was not awarded the Olympics just by accident; the city officials went out and worked for it and the city evidently was prepared to finance the games. I say, God bless them in their endeavour. We are obligated to provide athletes not just from Montreal but from Vancouver, Hamilton, Galt, the Northwest Territories, Newfoundland and all across Canada. This grant will help our athletes and allow them to continue training.

I do not intend to talk much longer about these votes. I listened with attention to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who this afternoon lambasted the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) for not bringing forward the old age pension legislation today, or one month ago or whenever he felt it should have been introduced.

I listened carefully as my socialist friend suggested that the minister should name the figure that the old age pensioners are to receive. I do not blame government officials for not mentioning the amount of money that senior citizens are to receive. However, as a backbencher of the Liberal party I am by no means afraid to mention figures. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that our senior citizens deserve every cent that Canada can afford. But I say to my socialist friends, when they say the pension for people 65 years of age and over should be at least $150, that they are whistling Dixie; that Canada cannot afford it; that some of our senior citizens are quite wealthy.

Surely the hon. member knows that Canadians cannot afford to pay such a sum. Whenever somebody suggests such programs for Canada I wonder where the money is to come from. I appreciate the sentiments of my friend from Winnipeg North Centre when he advocates increased old age pensions, additional funds for CNR pensions, improved Canada Pension Plan payments, and so on—we all agree with those sentiments—but sympathy in the heart of mankind is not confined to members of the socialist party; it is to be found even in Conservatives and certainly exists in the hearts of Liberals because they have done more for pensioners than any other party in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whicher: Having said that, I impress upon my friends across the way and upon those in my own party that we can only afford to give what our younger people can afford to pay. At the present time the old age pension system in Canada is better than that of any country in the world. Tax exemptions in Canada are higher than those of any country in the world. Hospitalization and medicare provisions are just as good as those of any other country.

Having said that, I would be the first to agree that pensions should be increased. However, I suggest—I suppose I will be the only Liberal backbencher to say this—that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare brings in the bill to provide additional funds for our senior citizens he must remember that somebody has to pay for the increase. I hope he will use judgment and remember that the sons and daughters of senior citizens must pay for increased pensions.

• (1540)

In conclusion, let no one say after I have finished or at any other time that I am against additional benefits for our senior citizens. My mother, father, mother-in-law and father-in-law are senior citizens and pensioners. Naturally, no one would like to see them receive more pension than I would. Therefore my sympathy is with pensioners. However, as the father of five children my sympathy is also with the youth of this country. Having said that, I am very pleased to be able to vote for a bill that provides $1 million not just for my children but for all children across Canada in order to make them more fit and also to improve amateur sport across this great nation of ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the $1 million supplementary estimate put forward by the government for the fitness and amateur sport program, as well as the Conservative motion that no more than $1 be spent on this program.

I have found the debate very interesting, especially the earlier debate on the supplementary estimate for the $1 million New Horizons program. I discussed this issue with a number of senior citizens last weekend. They were quite keen and enthusiastic about the program. They have some plans ready. The friends of the pensioners and the old age people in Canada, the Conservatives, have moved that no more than $1 be spent on this program. Not only have they slapped the faces of the pensioners but they have moved the same type of motion in respect of the program for the young people of Canada.

I find this very ironic, especially in the context of the issue of fitness and amateur sport, because it was a Conservative government in 1961 that introduced the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act. The purpose of the act was to encourage, promote and develop fitness and amateur sport in Canada. What has been the success of that act? The act was instigated from the revelation of lack of physical fitness among Canadians of all age groups, especially the young. It was designed to alleviate this problem in Canada. If you look at the breakdown of expenditures under the act since 1961, you will see that most of the money has gone to the top; in other words, in financing competitions rather than going down to the base, that is, broadening participation in amateur sports.

We have the problem of lack of physical fitness in Canadians. We have a problem with sports in general. There is a conflict between professional sports in this country and amateur sports and which is to have precedence in government priorities and the support of the Canadian people. We also have the problem that we are fast becoming a nation of spectators with regard to sports.

I would like to examine for a few minutes some of the reasons for this problem. One reason can be traced to the school system throughout this country. I was formerly a school teacher. I observed the physical education programs in the schools. I noted that their primary emphasis was not on the student body as a whole but on developing students who could excel in team sports such as football and basketball. The ordinary student who does not have great physical or sports prowess is soon discouraged; all the attention is lavished on those students who can excel in these sports. The extracurricular sports activity in schools is downplayed and downgraded.

Another problem is lack of opportunity for the public to make use of sports facilities, especially those in schools. Only recently did local boards of education open up the schools in the evenings in order for the general public to participate. Many school boards are still reluctant to do so. There is lack of opportunity with regard to available facilities. We have only to think of many of our summer sports: where are the facilities for year around training or opportunity to enjoy these sports?

Another problem in this whole milieu of sports in Canada has to do with the commercialization of sport. All too often sport is run as a business in Canada. The guiding motive is not excellence but profit. One need only look at the hockey industry to see what I mean. What started as Canada's game is now controlled by foreign investors. We can recall the difficulty of the World Hockey Association in trying to wrest players from the National Hockey League. That in itself is a misnomer; it should be called the "American hockey league."

We can think of the problems of the city of Vancouver in trying to obtain a hockey franchise. The early applications from Vancouver noted that they could attract sell-out crowds if they had a hockey team. However, the reason given for not getting the franchise until much later was that there was not a large enough television audience. In other words, the profit came before the sport.

Decisions regarding our national game are made outside Canada. This commercial aspect of sport, including hockey and other games, also dominates and controls our national amateur sport. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association is still dominated by the National Hockey League. Young boys playing organized hockey still have to register with the CAHA. Through the sponsorship of amateur teams and associated activities we still see the overriding control of the professional clubs in the area of amateur sport.

We should examine the contracts into which some young players are forced. I know a young lad in Sault Ste. Marie who had a contract that was approximately akin to slavery. If my memory serves me correctly, we abolished slavery in Canada in the 1830s. When you look at the fine print clauses in this young man's contract you can understand why he had to spend a lot of money on a lawyer trying to break that contract in court.

Another reason the amateur sport situation in Canada is not as good as it should be is the scholarship program. We must ask ourselves what we put first, academics or sports. Is the student who excels in sport to be denied a scholarship to a university or elsewhere because of his academic ability? The government should rethink its position on this matter. The government in 1971 initiated a grant and aid program to help those who could not qualify for a scholarship. There were 392 students who received grants and aid. Hockey Canada received over 1,000 applications in 1971 from hockey players who wished to continue their studies. But because of these academic sports qualifications only 85 of them were granted scholarships. So we find more and more Canadians every year going to the United States and taking up sports scholarships from American universities in order to further their studies and their sports careers.

I understand the government currently has before it over 3,500 applications from young people desiring scholarships and other forms of aid so they may participate in sports activities such as the Pan-American games and the Olympics. The value of these scholarships ranges from $600 to $1,800. Many of the scholarships have been put to good use even though they fall far short of what young athletes require. I have heard of athletes who have lived in university residences in order that they might have more time available to swim in the university pools, to save travel time back and forth to these facilities.

I have heard of students who have hired private tutors so that they can accelerate their studies and spend extra time in Australia where better facilities for swimming are available. This is indicative of a fault in our whole amateur sports program. We lend money to young athletes and then expect them to find the facilities of which there is such a desperate shortage in this country. I hope the government will reconsider its position and try to build more of these facilities so as to help people who obtain scholarships or grants.

The government has not come to terms with amateurism or professionalism in this country and I think it is about time it did. Thank goodness, last year the Olympic oath was changed so that young people who obtain scholarships can register for the games. Before the rule was changed, it was an offence to do so. But when we are talking about scholarships we are talking about an elite group, those who are going to universities. Why has the government not experimented more with grants to those outside the universities? Today such grants make up only a marginal part of the program. Under the present arrangements, working-class children who do not attend universities are discriminated against. Although they may excel at certain kinds of sport, these young people are handicapped because they do not possess the wherewithal to go on to higher education.

Attention should also be paid to the neglect of coaches in this country. Many of our coaches operate on a part-time, volunteer basis. It is not possible to find more dedicated people anywhere. At the same time, they lack the training which is desired. One has only to compare the hockey program in Russia with the hockey program in Canada for this to become clear. These volunteer coaches often find that a family situation develops which makes it no longer possible for them to devote their time to young people. We spend money to encourage young people to advance in amateur sport, yet we neglect the vital question of who is training them and how qualified these trainers are.

To be successful, athletes need support programs; they need coaches, facilities, medical advice. And by failing to grant money to these aspects of sport, to the provision of these facilities, the government has created a program which is not living up to our expectations. Why should a sprinter at Carleton University, for example, be obliged to sprint up and down the halls because there is no indoor track at the college? Athletes have to do their own work. The government hands out money but it does not provide the required facilities.

The expectations placed today on athletes in our society is extremely high. Many athletes do not know how to go about living up to them. There is a high dropout rate and the public becomes enraged and discouraged by Canada's performance in world competition. The government has provided the stimulus but it has failed to provide adequate support. I hope to see this amateur sport effort moving toward an integrated program. What we are doing now is jumping into the fray and learning from our mistakes, instead of seeking advice first from the athletes themselves and others with expertise.

I support the supplementary estimates. I think the program is a beginning. But I urge the government to widen the opportunities available to students and to non-students. I urge the government to finance necessary support programs such as coaching and the provision of physical facilities such as I have mentioned. Finally, I would ask the government to seek advice from those involved in this field so that it may produce a comprehensive, progressive and planned program for sport in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) wish to speak to the motions now before the House?

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I would be glad to say a few words about the expenses indulged in with the savings of Canadians. We are now considering supplementary estimates amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars with a view to straightening out our economy.

Mr. Speaker, our economy is becoming more and more complicated. However, we have to find out where funds are most needed and then meet those needs. In that regard my colleagues of other parties have talked about the old age security pension.

I am—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before we leave government business may I ask the acting House leader, whoever he or she may be, whether the arrangements agreed to earlier in terms of concluding the notice stage and moving to committee of the whole still hold good as far as Monday is concerned?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

An hon. Member: Oh, oh! There he is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I, as one of those who was a party to those discussions, indicate that there was agreement that early on Monday we would finish the debate on these nine notices and move to second reading of the bill.

Mr. Lang: I thank the hon. member for that information. I did not understand the earlier discussion about what the agreement was and I do not understand it now. But I am glad agreement has been reached.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I add there will not be any recorded votes on the nine notices. If any vote is desired it will come later on, on the bill itself or in committee.

• (1600)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, we are grateful for these comments from the "government House leader" to my left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is the Chair to understand that this is to be made an order, or that an order be made on Monday?

Mr. Lefebvre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this was made a House order at the request of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) earlier this day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being four o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT TO LOWER VOTING AGE TO EIGHTEEN FOR BAND ELECTIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved that Bill C-16, to amend the Indian Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment before the House this afternoon in the form of Bill C-16, I am very happy to be able to have the bill before the House. Although it has been listed on the order paper during the two previous sessions, this is the first time it has had an opportunity to be debated.

The purpose of this bill is very simple. It is to lower the voting age from 21 years to 18 years in elections for positions of chief and band councillor on Indian reserves. The idea behind the bill is so straightforward and logical that I am confident the debate will be brief and to the point and that the House will give its consent to sending the bill to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for study and report.

I say that the idea behind my bill is straightforward because in Canada today the legal voting age for federal elections and for most provincial elections is 18 years. Three years ago, in June of 1970, we amended the Canada Elections Act and thereby lowered the voting age for federal elections from 21 to 18 years. At that time we recognized that such a reform was long overdue. The young people who were then unable to vote were considered adults for many other purposes, such as marriage, having families, driving cars, even serving in the Canadian armed forces, as well, of course, as paying taxes. They were also subject to the laws of criminal prosecution in this country. Yet up to that time they were cut out from the decision-making process in that they could not vote in federal elections.

Recognizing this inconsistency, and realizing that young people have become politically more mature, more aware of society and the world around them—in large part because of our modern technology and communications—we accorded them the privilege of expressing their voice in a federal vote. In 1971 the province of Ontario likewise passed legislation to lower the voting age for provincial elections to 18 years. More recently it has passed legislation to provide for citizens to vote in municipal elections at 18.

This means that young adults of Indian bands are free to mark their ballots in federal elections and in provincial elections but not in their own band council elections. They are not allowed to participate in this democratic process on their own reserves. Surely the anomaly is obvious. Why should young band members on Indian reserves be prevented from voting for the representatives of their band councils when they are viewed as responsible enough to vote for their Member of Parliament? As of December 31, 1971, the latest official figure available, I understand some 10,000 Indians between the ages of 18 and 21 years who were registered band members were not permitted to vote. The figure is undoubtedly higher today. Over 10,000 young people who are considered adults in almost every other way, including being able to vote federally and provincially, have no voice in their own reserve elections. What kind of equality is this, Mr. Speaker?

The native people have not been silent on this subject. Let me relate to the House an incident that occurred in my own riding in the fall of 1971, shortly before I introduced this bill for the first time. The young adults of the Mississauga Indian reserve voted in the provincial election of 1971. However, when they came to the polling booths for their band council election they were turned out and were not allowed to vote. Naturally they were very upset and wrote to me, to the department and to the Minister of Indian Affairs asking why they were not granted the right to vote.

The native people of Algoma are not alone in recognizing this discrepancy. Numerous inquiries and letters have been sent to Members of Parliament and to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, queries from Indians and non-Indians alike, asking when further voting reforms will take place in this area.

I understand that several bands have taken formal action by sending petitions to the federal government, including the Saugeen reserve, the Six Nations reserve, the Thames and Chippewas of the Thames, from Ontario, the Montreal Lake and Beardy's band from Saskatchewan and the Ermineskin band from Alberta. All these bands passed council resolutions asking that the voting age be lowered to coincide with provincial and federal voting ages. Individual representatives of Indian associations have also discussed this proposal on numerous occasions.

It is only logical to allow these 10,000 young adults this democratic right to vote in elections on Indian reserves. For it is only when they are given the opportunity to participate that they can prove that they are responsible, mature citizens. It is time we eliminated the contradiction that must be in their minds, namely, why in some situations they are adults whereas in others they are viewed as not being adults.

The intent of the bill is to resolve this anomaly and to give these young citizens their democratic voting rights. I would ask the House to support the bill that is before us this afternoon.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to see the democratic process observed for the largest number of Canadians possible and I commend the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for introducing this bill. However, I want to see that democratic process exercised with the full consent of the Indian people themselves.

We have all seen and know the outcome and effect of legislation that has been introduced in this House without the views of the Indian people having been canvassed or consulted. We know the reaction to the white paper of 1969. It seems to me that once again we are perhaps being presented with a piece of legislation that did not originate with the Indian people or in which they were not asked to participate.

• (1610)

The Indian people of Canada are not limited to one band or to one region. They and their rights exist across the entire nation. It seems to me that this bill could have the effect of interfering with the internal workings of the band councils without their views being presented or without an opportunity for them to be heard. I should like to know whether the National Indian Brotherhood has been consulted on this matter and whether there has been consultation with member organizations in the various provinces. Are they all in agreement that this is what should happen in respect of local council elections, or is this just a view presented here this afternoon?

Hon. members of this party would readily accept a move to have the voting age in respect of band councils lowered to 18 provided we have the assurance that this is the wish of the Indian people. Too often in the past we here have been guilty of proceeding with legislation which we thought was in their best interests, without having made sure that this was so and that it was being introduced with their agreement. I believe the principle should be established once and for all in this House that any changes to the Indian Act and any moves that might affect the fundamental rights and practices of the Indian people should be carried out only after the widest opportunity has been given them to express their views and to formulate their position.

I would therefore ask the hon. member for Algoma to seek the consent of the House immediately to have this bill referred to the standing committee in order that representatives of the Indian Brotherhood all across the country can make their views known in order that we can be reassured once and for all that this is the wish of the Indian people. Perhaps the hon. member would amend his motion and ask that this bill be referred to that standing committee.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am most interested in this bill presented by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), and I should like to speak in favour of it. At the same time, let me say to this House that I think it is disgraceful that in 1973, in the House of Commons of Canada, the Indian people must have an act passed to give a basic human right. In this day and age this is a disgrace.

I agree in some measure with what the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) has said, in that this bill perhaps may not be the result of negotiation or consultation with Indian people in this country. To repeat, I think it is a disgrace that a House of Commons act must be passed before the Indian people are given this democratic right.

The Indian people of North America have a terrific democratic system which has been in operation for thousands of years. Some constitutions in this part of the world have adopted ideas from the democratic process enjoyed by the Indian people of the Six Nations. Let me give you an example. One of the largest villages in the Northwest Territories, Fort Rae, has a population of approximately 1,000 to 1,200 Dog Rib Indians. They practice a democratic process from which most of us could learn. This is true not only of elections of chiefs but in respect of the passage of important matters.

The white society does not seem to realize the position of an Indian chief. It is my understanding, having been raised in an Indian village, that the chief is a servant of the people. He does not make decisions on his own and cannot come forward and say things shall be done. He can make decisions only after he has consulted with all his people.

The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands does have a valid point. However, I think at this time it would be silly to delay this matter longer in order to have consultation. This question involves a basic human right of which these people should not be deprived. The Indian people of this country have made many contributions in many areas of society. Pharmaceutical societies in America recognize that there are about 400 drugs used in medicine on the market today that were discovered and first used by the Indian people. I suggest these people can make further contributions to society if given the opportunity.

Canada has the second or third highest standard of living in the world, yet we have a situation in which the Indian and Eskimo peoples are the poorest of all the poor in Canada. We should all work together to remedy that situation. I suggest the Indian people can make further contributions to society if given the opportunity but it is not very easy for them to do so in their present poverty-stricken situation. These people must use their energies in order just to survive.

I commend the hon. member for Algoma for bringing forward this bill. I support it fully, not because I have consulted with the Indian people about this matter but because I know, having been born and raised an Indian, that this is a right of which they have been deprived. I have been an Indian all my life and will remain an Indian. I think the only time one has a true understanding of the feelings of Indians, Eskimos or other peoples is when they learn their language, appreciate their customs, their foods and other aspects of their culture. In speaking with 38 years' experience as an Indian, my feeling is that this is an important bill and I call upon members of this House to support it.

Indians have made many contributions in the areas of medicine, democracy, value of life, unity of brotherhood and sports. Perhaps I should give a further example of the democratic process at Fort Rae. When a major decision has to be made, the chief puts the situation to the people. He allows three or four days, or perhaps a week, for every member of the band to express his view before any decision is taken. This puts the chief in the position of being a servant of the people. In many cases he is looked upon as a ruler or a dictator, but the fact is completely the opposite.

I do not intend to take up any more time of the House. I hope hon. members will give their full support to this bill.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on this bill. First let me say I am in full agreement with it and believe it should be referred to the committee as soon as possible. I have contacted the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) who has indicated his agreement and that he thinks it is a very good move. I have also contacted the president of the National Indian Brotherhood on an informal basis. He also indicated full agreement and said he would like to see this measure enacted into law.

I know there has been a commitment by the government to consult with Indian people about any major changes in policy and legislation. That commitment still stands. The consultation process is being carried on actively in so far as major policy areas are concerned.

• (1620)

I feel this is an area in which many young Indian people, as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) pointed out, are being denied a basic right. They can vote in provincial and federal elections at age 18 but cannot vote in their own band elections. I know the young people in my home area on the Vernon and Kamloops reserves, including the people in the 12 bands I represent, feel very strongly that they should have the basic right to vote in their own band elections. So this is a very popular issue. It is not one involving a major change to the Indian Act. I believe it is something we could accomplish very quickly in this House.

I should like to give an undertaking to hon. members, including the hon. member for Algoma, that when this matter goes before the committee I shall take it upon myself to see that there is consultation with the National Indian Brotherhood and other organizations across the country in a formal way in order to find out what their views are in respect of such a bill.

After consultation with a number of people, I believe this measure would be a very positive response to enable the young people to take part in the basic democratic process of electing councillors and chiefs of their bands. It seems ludicrous to the young Indian people of 18 years of age and over that they can vote in federal and provincial elections but cannot vote in their own band elections. Therefore, without any further comment I hope that this bill will be referred to the committee.

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up very much of the time of the House. I am totally in favour of this bill. As one who comes from a very progressive province where the voting age has been lowered for some years to include persons 18 years of age, I think the same privilege ought to be accorded to the Indian people of Saskatchewan and across the whole of Canada.

The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) was a little concerned about the fact that Indian people were not consulted. This is not a compulsory act. If the voting age should be lowered to 18 it would not mean that in effect they must vote if they do not wish to do so. I know there are people in my province of various religious denominations who do not vote in any election. This is their privilege and prerogative. In fact, when I visited various homes during the last election campaign many people told me that they did not intend to vote for any of us because they did not believe any of us were any damn good. I suppose there are Indian people, whether 18, 19 or 25 years of age, who would not vote in any event.

This is merely a right and privilege which all Canadians have. It is not mandatory. This is a very simple amendment which I hope will pass. I wish, however, that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) had gone a little deeper into the Indian Act and suggested other amendments such as amendments which would lay some basis for aboriginal land rights, which would lay some basis for better protecting and developing their treaty rights, which would lay some basis for a full and equal settlement of their land claims, and amendments which would perhaps provide for native control and development of projects with the help of federal funds and resources but under the control of the native people. Perhaps there could be amendments which could deal with the whole issue of education so far as the native people are concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I do not wish to limit or restrict the hon. member, but I have difficulty following him and relating his remarks to the bill that is under consideration at this time. Of course, the bill relates to Indians but it concerns the lowering of the voting age. I do not think this debate should provide an opportunity for general argument or the suggestion of other solutions to different problems.

Mr. Nesdoly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid I was carried away a little. However, I am totally in favour of lowering the voting age to 18. It is a right which every Indian should have, just as every Canadian has. They would still have the privilege of not exercising this right if they did not wish to do so. With that note I shall sit down and take part in the vote.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, we are greatly pleased to support Bill C-16, to lower to 18 the voting age of Indians.

We agree that all Indians whatsoever should enjoy equal treatment. It is unfortunate that this should not always have been the case. In fact, they should enjoy the same rights as all other Canadians and we do not see how they should be denied such rights.

Today, Indians have developed much more than they did in the past. We find among them, as in all other groups, people of great culture and highly developed skills.

I believe they should be granted every advantage of which others have availed themselves. They should enjoy them and we are happy to give unqualified support to the bill before us, bringing a little more justice to a class of society which has not fared as well as it should.

We would like them to enjoy the same advantages as the other Canadians and have the right, at election time, to say what they think through the exercise of their franchise. We cannot deny them this right, because it is only fair. We must be fair to all groups of citizens; the Indians must enjoy the same rights and prerogatives as the other citizens.

I shall not say any more. I thank the hon. member who has kindly introduced Bill C-16 which we support fully. I conclude my remarks so as to let others participate in the debate. We agree that this bill should be referred to committee or passed immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, because of the progress that has been made, unless the House disagrees I would suggest that since this bill has been referred to the committee the House might agree to call it five o'clock.

Mr. Bell: That is a very good idea, Mr. Speaker. I hope the government has noticed that the progress was made because of co-operation here and that they will co-operate when we have private bills before the House which should go to committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I just say, "Hear, hear!"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 4.35 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
