PREFACE TO FIRST EDITION

T a time when the systematic study of English history is every day attracting the interest of an ever-widening circle of readers, it is somewhat remarkable that there should be no convenient handbook to the whole subject. The present publication is an attempt to supply this deficiency, so far as it can be supplied by a work which is intended to be useful rather than exhaustive. It is scarcely possible that everything relating directly or indirectly to a subject so vast and so ill-defined as the history of a great people and a great empire could be included within the compass of eleven hundred moderate-sized pages. The compilers of a concise historical dictionary must be content to make a selection from the materials at their command. The present work is not an encyclopædia, and the editors are aware that many things are omitted from it which might have been included, had its limits been wider, and it aim more ambitious. But they hope that the general reader, as well as the special student of the history of the British Empire, will find this volume a convenient auxiliary to his studies; and they are sanguine enough to anticipate that it will fill a gap on his bookshelves not at present occupied by any single book of reference. Dictionaries of biography already exist in abundance; handbooks of dates and chronology are common and familiar things; manuals of English history, political and constitutional, of all sizes and all degrees of merit, are at the easy command of the reading public; and it is possible, by diligent search, to discover works on English bibliography, and even on the bibliography of English history. But if a great book is a great evil, a great many books are assuredly a greater. The most earnest student cannot be expected to read his history with a dozen manuals and works of reference at his elbow, in case he should be in doubt as to a fact, or should require to verify a date, to gain some information on a constitutional point, to satisfy himself as to the sequence of events at one of the epochs of our annals, or to find out the authorities for a particular period. To produce a book which should give, as concisely as possible, just the information, biographical, bibliographical, chronological, and constitutional, that the reader of English history is likely to want, is what is here attempted.

In deciding what should or should not find a place in these pages, the Editors have tried to keep in view the probable needs of modern readers. Practical convenience has guided them in the somewhat arbitrary selection they have been compelled to make; and with a view to this end they have not hesitated to make some slight changes of plan which suggested themselves in the course of the work. In the biographical department names of purely personal and literary interest have been omitted, and the biographies have been written throughout from the historical standpoint. No attempt is made to supplant other Dictionaries devoted solely to biography; but the reader will, it is hoped, find sufficient information about every prominent personage to be of use to him in historical studies, while the references to authorities which accompany all the more important articles will show him where to go if he desires to pursue his inquiries further. In the older "Helps to English History," such as that of Heylin, space equal to the whole of this work is devoted to genealogies and to the lists of the holders of public offices and dignities. In the present volume relatively little space is given to these subjects. The genealogies of the great families and the order of official succession are very fully worked out in many well-known and easily accessible works. A modern student is likely to have more occasion for the accounts of the growth of English institutions, and for the summaries of great epochs in our history, and of the relations of the country with foreign powers, which occupy a considerable portion of these pages. In these instances it is hoped also that the bibliographical notes, supplemented by the special article on AUTHORITIES ON ENGLISH HISTORY (page 105), will be found of considerable value, even by those who can lay claim to some historical scholarship.

It is perhaps necessary to say that though "English" on the title-page of this work is to be understood in its widest and least exact sense: and though the doings of Englishmen, Scotsmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen at all places and periods nostri est farrago libelli, yet that very much more attention is devoted to the history of England than to that of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the Selection being inevitable if the book were not to sacrifice its chief recommendation, that of practical utility, it is felt that the rule adopted, though illogical, is the one likely to promote the greatest convenience of the greatest number of readers. It has been thought advisable to bring the book down to our own day; but very recent events have been treated more briefly than those of more remote periods, and only those living and recently deceased statesmen have been included, concerning whom there can be no reasonable doubt that their names have a right to appear in a Dictionary of English History. For obvious reasons no articles on living historians have been given, though it is hoped that full justice is done to their works in the bibliographical notes.

To save space, and to secure somewhat more adequate treatment, it has often been thought better to group the various divisions of a large subject into one article, rather than to discuss them seps ately in a number of short ones. Here, again, the rule followed is somewhat arbitrary. But a reference to the Index will generally show the reader where to look in case he does not find the title he is in search of in its proper place.

Such merits as this volume may be found to possess are due in great measure to the able staff of contributors who have given it their invaluable aid. To all of them the Editors have to render their grateful thanks. For many useful suggestions and much kindly interest displayed in the progress of the work, they have to acknowledge their obligations to Dr. Mandell Creighton; Professor Rowley, University College, Bristol; Mr. Arthur L. Smith, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford; Mr. Lloyd Sanders, M.A.; Mr. W. J. Ashley, M.A.; and Mr. T. A. Archer, B.A. Their special thanks are due to Mr. T. F. Tout, M.A., whose assistance throughout has been of the greatest value, and who has constantly and most kindly placed the benefits of his extensive knowledge of modern history at the service of the Editors.

Know ye, that we, from our regard to God, and for the salvation of our own soul, and of the souls of our ancestors, and of our heirs, to the honour of God, and the exaltation of holy church and amendment of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church, Henry archbishop of Dublin, William of London, Peter of Winchester, Joceline of Bath and Glastonbury, Hug' of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rochester, bishops, master Pandulph, the pope's sub-deacon and familiar, brother Eymeric master of the knightstemplars in England, and of these noble persons, William Marischal eari of Pembroke, William earl of Salisbury, William earl of Warren, William earl of Arundel, Allan of Galloway constable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerald, Peter Fitz-Herbert, Hubert de Burgh, steward of Poitou, Hugh de Nevil, Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas Basset, Allan Basset, Philip de Albany, Robert de Roppel, John Marischal, John Fitz-Hugh, and of others of our liegemen, have granted to God, and by this our present charter, have confirmed, for us, and our heirs for ever :- First, That the English church shall be free, and shall have her whole rights, and her liberties unhurt; and I will this to be oo erved in such a manner that it may appear from thence, that the freedom of elections, which was reputed most necessary to the English church, which we granted, and by our charter confirmed, and obtained the confirmation of it from pope Innocent III. before the rupture between us and our barons, was of our own free will charter we shall observe; and we will it to be observed, with good faith, by our heirs for ever. — We have also granted to all the freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the underwritten liberties, to be enjoyed and held by them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.——If any of our earls or barons, or others who hold of us in chief by military service, shall die, and at his death his heir shall be of full age, and shall owe a relief, he shall have his inheritance for the ancient relief, viz. the heir or heirs of an earl, a whole earl's barony, for one hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a baron, a whole barony for one hundred pounds *; the heir or heirs of a knight, a whole knight's fee, for one hundred shillings at most; and he who owes less, shall give less, according to the ancient custom of fees. - But if the heir of any such be under age, and in wardship, when he comes to age he shall have his inheritance without relief and without fine. — The warden of an heir who is under age, shall not take of the lands of the heir any but reasonable issues, and reasonable customs, and reasonable services, and that without destruction and waste of the men or goods: and if we commit the custody of any such lands to a sheriff, or to any other person who is bound to answer to us for the issues of them, and he shall make destruction or waste upon the ward-lands, we will recover damages from him, and the lands shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer for the issues to us, or to him to whom we have assigned them: and if we granted or sold to any one the custody of any such lands, and he shall make destruction or waste, he shall lose the custody; and it shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer to us, in like manner as was said before. —Besides, the warden, as long as he hath the custody of the lands, shall keep in order the houses, parks, warrens, ponds, mills, and other things belonging to them, out of their issues; and shall deliver to the heir, when he is at age, his whole estate provided with ploughs and other implements of husbandry, according to what the season requires, and the profits of the lands can reasonably afford.—Heirs shall be married without disparagement, and so that, before the marriage is contracted, it shall be notified to the relations of the heir by consanguinity.—A widow, after the death of her husband, shall immediately, and without difficulty, have her marriage goods and her inheritance; nor shall she give any thing for her dower, or her marriage goods, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held on the day of his death. And she may remain in her husband's house forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned. No widow shall be compelled to marry herself while she causes to live without a husband, but so, that she shall give security that she will not marry herself, without our consent, if she holds of us, or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another. -- Neither we nor our bailif hall seize any land or rents for any debt, while the chattels of the debtor are sufficient for the payment of the debt; nor shall the sureties of the debtor be distrained, while the principal debtor is able to pay the debt: and if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, not having wherewith to pay, the sureties shall answer for the debt; and if they please, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until satisfaction be made to them for the debt which they had before paid for him, unless the principal debtor can show that he is discharged from it by the said sureties. -- If any one hath borrowed any thing from the Jews, more or less, and dies before that debt is paid, the debt shall pay no interest as long as the heir shall be under age, of whomsoever he holds; and if that debt shall fall into our hands, we will not take any thing, except the chattels contained in the bond.—And if any one dies indebted to the Jews, his wife shall have her dower, and shall pay nothing of that debt; and if children of the defunct remain who are under age, necessaries shall be provided for them, according to the tenement which belonged to the defunct; and out of the surplus the debt shall be paid, saving the rights of the lords of whom the lands are held. The same rules shall be observed with respect to debts owing to others than Jews. --- No scutage or aid shall be imposed, except by the common council of our kingdom, but for redeeming our body,-for making our eldest son a knight, and for once marrying our eldest daughter; and for these only a reasonable aid shall be demanded. This extends to the aids of the city of London. —And the city of London shall have all its ancient liberties, and its free customs, as well by land as by water. Besides, we will and grant, that all other cities and burghs, and towns and sea-ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs. --- And to have a common council of the kingdom, to a ness an aid, otherwise than in the three foresaid cases, or to assess a scutage, we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, earls, and greater barons, personally, by our letters; and besides, we will cause to be summoned in general by our sheriffs and bailiffs, all those who hold of us in chief, to a certain day, at the distance of forty days at least, and to a certain place; and in all the letters of summons, we will express the cause of the summons; and the summons being thus made, the business shall go on at the day appointed, according to the advice of those who shall be present, although all who had been suramoned have not come. We will not give leave to any one, for the future, to take an aid of his freemen, except for redeeming his own body, making his eldest son a knight, and marrying once his eldest daughter; and that only a reasonable aid.——Let none be distrained to do more service for a knight's fee, nor for any other free tenement, than what is due from thence.—Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some certain place. - Assizes upon the writs of Novel desseisin, Mortdancester (death of the ancestor), and Darrein presentment (last presentation), shall not be taken but in their proper counties, and in this manner.—We, or our chief justiciary when we are out of the kingdom, shall send two justiciaries into each county, four times a-year, who, with four knights of each county, chosen by the county, shall take the foresaid assizes, at a stated time and place, within the county. ---- And if the foresaid assizes cannot be taken on the day of the county-court, let as many knights and freeholders, of those who were present at the county-court, remain behind, as by them the foresaid assizes may be taken, according to the greater or less importance of the -A freeman shall not be amerced for a small offence, but only according to the degree of the offence; and for a great delinquency, according to the magnitude of the delinquency, raving his contenement: a merchant shall be amerced in the same manner, saving his merchandise, and a villain, saving his implements of husbandry. If they fall into our mercy, none of the foresaid amerciaments shall be assessed, but by the oath of honest men of the vicinage. -Earls and barons shall not be amerced but by their peers, and that only according to the degree of their delinquency.—No clerk shall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the manner of others as aforesaid, and not according to the quantity of his ecclesiastical benefice.—Neither a town nor a particular person shall be distrained to build bridges or embankmen i, except those who anciently, and of right, are bound to do it. - No sheriff, constable, coroner, or bailiff of ours shall hold pleas of our crown. ——All counties, hundreds, wapontacks, and trithings, shall be at the ancient rent, without any increment, except our demesne-manors. --- If any one holding of us a lay-fee dies, and the sheriff or our bailiff shall shew our letters-patent of our summons for a debt which the defunct owed to us, it shall be lawful for the sheriff or our bailiff to attach and register the chattels of the defunct found on that fee, to the amount of that debt, at the view of lawful men, so that nothing shall be removed from thence until our debt is paid to us. The clear overplus shall be left to the executors to fulfil the last-will of the defunct; and if nothing is owing to us by him, all the chattels shall fall to the defunct, saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares. — If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by his nearest relations and friends, at the view of the church, saving to every one the debts which the defunct owed to him. --- No constable or bailiff of ours shall take the corn or other goods of any one, without instantly paying money for them, unless he can obtain respite from the free will of the seller. --- No constable (governor of a castle) shall distrain any knight to give money for castle-guard, if he is willing to perform it by his own person, or by another good man if he cannot perform it himself, for a reasonable cause. Or if we have carried or sent him into the army, he shall be excused from castle-guard, according to the space of time he hath been in the army at our command. No sheriff or bailiff of ours, or any other person, shall take the horses or carts of any freeman, to perform carriages, without the consent of the said freeman.-Neither we, nor our bailiffs, shall take another man's wood, for our castles or other uses, without the consent of him to whom the wood belongs. - -We will not retain the lands of those who have been convicted of felony, above one year and one day, and then they shall be given up to the lord of the fee.——All kydells (weirs) for the future shall be quite removed out of the Thames, the Medway, and through all England, except on the sea-coast.——The writ which is called Precipe for the future shall not be granted to any one concerning any tenement by which a freeman may lose his court.—There shall be one measure of wine through all our kingdom, and one measure of ale, and one measure of corn, viz. the quarter of London; and one breadth of dyed-cloth and of russets, and of halberjects, viz. two ells within the lists. It shall be the same with weights as with measures. --- Nothing shall be given or taken for the future for the writ of inquisition of life or limb; but it shall be given gratis, and not denied. -If any hold of us by fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, and holds an estate of another by military service, we shall not have the custody of the heir, or of his land, which is of the fee of another, on account of that fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, unless the fee-farm owes military service. We shall not have the custody of the heir, or of the land of any one, which he holds or another by military service, on account of any petty sergeantry which he holds of us, by giving us knives, arrows, or the like. --- No bailiff, for the future, shall put any man to his law, upon his own simple affirmation, without credible witnesses produced to that purpose. -- No freeman shall be seized, or imprisoned, or disseised, or outlawed, or any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him, nor will we send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. -To none will we sell, to none wil! we deny, to none will we delay right or justice.—All merchants shall be safe and secure in coming into England, and

But as soon as we shall return from our expedition, or if, by chance, we shall not go upon our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice therein. —But we shall have the same respite, and in the same manner, concerning the justice to be done about disforesting or continuing the forests which Henry our father, or Richard our brother, had made; and about the wardship of lands which are of the fee of some other person, but the wardship of which we have hitherto had, on account of a fee which some one held of us by military service; and about abbeys which had been founded in the fee of another, and not in ours, in which abbeys the lord of the fee hath claimed a right. And when we shall have returned, or if we shall stay from our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice in all these pleas. --- No man shall be apprehended or imprisoned on the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other man than her husband.——All fines that have been made with us unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land; and all amerciaments that have been imposed unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land, shall be remitted, or disposed of by the verdict of the twenty-five barons, of whom mention is made below, for the security of the peace, or by the verdict of the major part of them, together with the foresaid Stephen archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he may think fit to bring with him; and if he cannot be present, the business shall proceed notwithstanding without him: but so, that if one or more of the foresaid twenty-five barons have a similar plea, let them be removed from that particular trial, and others elected and sworn by the residue of the same twenty-five, be substituted in their room, only for that trial.—If we have disseised or dispessed any Welshmen of their land, liberties, or other things, without a legal verdict of their peers, in England or in Wales, they shall be immediately restored to them; and if a question shall arise about it, then let it be determined in the marches by the verdict of their peers, if the tenoment be in England, according to the law of England: if the tenement be in Wales, according to the law of Wales: if the tenement be a the marches, according to the law of the marches. Alexander king of Scotland, concerning the restoration of his sisters and hostages, and his liberties and rights, according to the form in which we act to our other barons in England, unless it ought to be otherwise by charters which we have from his father William late king of Scotland, and that by the verdict of his peers in our court.—But all these foresaid customs and liberties which we have granted in our kingdom, to be held by our tenants, as far as concerns us, all our clergy and laity hall observe towards their tenants, as far as concerns them. But since we have granted all these things aforesaid, for God, and to the amendment of our kingdom, and for the better extinguishing the discord arisen between us and our barons, being desirous that these things should possess entire and unshaken stability for ever, we give and grant to them the security underwritten, viz. That the barons may elect twenty-five barons of the kingdom, whom they please, who shall, with their whole power, observe and keep, and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties which we have granted to them, and have confirmed by this our present charter, in this manner. That if we, or our justiciary, or our bailiffs, or any of our officers, shall have injured any one in any thing, or shall have violated any article of the peace or security, and the injury shall have been shown to four of the foresaid twenty-five barons, these four barous shall come to us, or to our justiciary if we are out of the kingdom, and making known to us the excess committed, require that we cause that excess to be redressed without delay; and if we shall not have redressed the excess, or, if we have been out of the kingdom, our justiciary shall not have redressed it, within the term of forty days, computing from the time in which it shall have been made known to us, or to our justiciary if we have been out of the kingdom, the foresaid four barons shall lay that cause before the residue of the twenty-five barons; and these twenty-five barons, with the community of the whole land, shall distress and harass us by all the ways in which they can, that is to say, by the taking of our castles, lands, and possessions, and by other means in their power, until the excess shall have been redressed, according to their verdict; saving our person, and the persons of our queen and children; and when it hath been redressed, they shall behave to us as they had done before: and whoever of our land pleaseth, may swear, that he will obey the commands of the foresaid twenty-five barons, in accomplishing all the things aforesaid, and that with them he will harass us to the utmost of his power: and we publicly and freely give leave to every one to swear who is willing to swear; and we will never forbid any man to swear. But all those of our land, who, of themselves, and their own accord, are unwilling to swear to the twenty-five barons, to distress and harass us together with them, we will compel them, by our command, to swear as aforesaid. And if any one of the twenty-five barons shall die, or remove out of the land, or in any other way shall be prevented from executing the things above said, those who remain of the twenty-five barons shall elect another in his place, according to their pleasure, who shall be sworn in the same manner as the rest. But in all those things which are appointed to be done by these twenty-five barons, if it happen that all the twenty-five have been present, and have differed in their opinions about any thing, or if some of them who had been summoned, would not, or could not be present, that which the major part of those who were present shall have provided and decreed, shall be held as firm and vatid, as if all the twenty-five had agreed in it. And the foresaid twentyfive shall swear, that they will faithfully observe, and, to the utmost of their power, cause to be observed, all the things mentioned above. And we will obtain nothing from any one, by ourselves, or by another, by which any of these concessions and liberties may be revoked or diminished. And if any such thing hath been obtained, let it be void and null; and we will never use it, elther by ourselves or by another. And we have fully remitted and pardoned to all men, all the ill-will, rancour, and resentments which have arisen between us and our subjects, both clergy and laity, from the commencement of the discord. Besides, we have fully remitted to all the clergy and laity, and as far as belongs to us, we have fully pardoned all transgressions committed on occasion of the said discord, from Easter, in the sixteenth year of our reign, to the conclusion of the peace. And, moreover, we have caused to be made to them testimonial letters-patent of my lord Stephen archbishop of Canterbury, my lord Henry archbishop of Dublin, and of the foresaid bishops, and of Mr. Pandulf, concerning this security, and the foresaid concessions. Wherefore, our will is, and we firmly command, that the church of England be free, and that the men in our kingdom have and hold all the foresaid liberties, rights, and concessions, well and in peace, freely and quietly, fully and entirely, to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever, as aforesaid. An oath hath been taken, as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all these things mentioned above shall be observed in good faith, and without any evil intention, before the abovenamed witnesses, and many others. Given by our hand, in the meadow, which is called Runingmed, between Windsor and Staines, this fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH HISTORY.

Abbeville, Treaty of (May 20, 1259), was concluded between Louis IX. of France and Henry III. of England, after the abortive attempt of the latter to recover the provinces which John had lost. By this treaty the English king relinquished all claims to Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Poiton; but was guaranteed the possession of Guienne, which he was to continue to hold as a fief from the French crown. His territories in the south of France were to be further increased by the three blshoprics of Limoges, Perigneux, and Cahors; and he was to receive from Louis a grant of money sufficient to maintain five hundred knights for two years.

The text of the treaty is given in Bymer, Federa, i. 675 (ed. of 1704). See also ib, 668; and Pearson, Hist. of Eng. during the Early and Middle Ages, il. 193, 228.

Abbot (abbas, literally "father") was a title of respect applied in early times to all monks, but was afterwards specifically restricted to the superior of a monastery. The abbot was elected by the brethren of the monastery, subject to varying and Ill-defined rights of the crown and the bishop; but, on the whole, as the position of abbot was one of comparatively small political importance, freedom of election was allowed to a degree very rare in bishoprics, and the power and influence of the great orders freed them also in most cases from episcopal jurisdiction. Thus chosen, the abbot held office for life, unless canonically deprived by the bishop. In the carliest days of the English Church, the a bots, like other monks, were very commonly laymen, but later it became usual for them to neceive priest's orders; and an early instance of a series of presbyter abbots is to be found in the great foundation of Iona. In Ireland, aboots were either themselves bishops, or usurpers of episcopal functions. In the monastic cathedrals which form such a peculiar feature in English Church history, the bishep was also abbot. The power of the abbot varied with the order to which he belonged, but it was always very high. In theory, as the name denotes, it was paternal: and, in early times, this paternal authority is the same as absolute power. The abbot was П19T. − I to be feured as lord as well as loved as father. No one was allowed to act without his orders and the whole management of the monastery ultimately depended on him. But Bene-dletine abbots were restricted in various ways by their obligation to observe the rule of their founder. The practical limitations to the power of the abbot were: (a) the prior; (b) the decent and centenarii chosen by the monks; (c) the general chapter of the monastery (by the rule of St. Benedict, the abbot was obliged to take counsel with all the manks, juntor as well as senior, though the final right of decision rested with him, and not with the brethren); (d) the bishop, though exemption, after the 12th century, generally took away this check; (c) the advocatus, an influential layman, who was appointed owing to the inability of the abbot to interfere in person in civil suits, and who consequently largely limited the power of the abbot over the property of the abbey and secular matters generally. But, with all these deductions the abbot held a most imposing position. As practical landlord of a large district, he had much social influence and political con . 'eration. In England the position of the abbot was especially important; for, introduced by monks, English Christianity had from the first a monastic aspect. Thus half the English cathedrals became Benedictine abbeys, of which the canons were monks and the bishop abbot. As magnates, or as king's chaplains, few abbots sat in the Witenagemot; and, fer the Conquest, many of them attended

Great Council, as holders of feudal onies, and were ranked after the lords firitual. Under the early Norman kings, Norman abbots were set over the English monasteries, and in many cases met with determined resistance from their monks. They organised the monastic system more strictly than before; and each new order found a home in England during the twelftl. and thirteenth centuries. Some abbots were called mitred, because they received from the Pope the right of wearing the mitre and other vestments proper to the episcopal office. This did not, however, affect their constitutional position, for abbots were summoned to Parliament as holding baronies under the Crown. The smaller abbots felt attendance at l'arliament to be a strain on their resources, and during the fourteenth century many of them executed deeds declaring that they did not hold their estates by any tenure that involved the duty of parliamentary attendance. In Edward I.'s model Parliament of 1295 there were present 67 abbots and priors; but this number rapidly declined, and in 1341 the number had become 27, which seems to have remained fixed. The abbots summoned in 1483 may be mentioned as showing the chief amongst the body They were: Peterborough, St. Edmunds, Colchester, Abingdon, Walth im, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Gloucester, Westminster, St. Albans, Bardney, Selby, St. Benedict of Hulme, Thorney, Evesham, Ramsey, Hyde, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Crowland, Battle, Winehcombe, Reading, St. Augustine's, St. Mary's York, and the priors of Coventry and St. John of Jerusalem. As the average number of lay lords attending Parliament was about 40, the proportion of 27 abbots was large. The monasteries, however, represented the influence of the papacy as against the bishops, and were left unmolested both by pope and The elections of abbots were rarely interfered with by the crown, and in the later middle ages abbots did not take much part in political affairs. They were chiefly busy with the administration of the secular business of their monasteries. Whon once the work of civilisation had been accomplished, monasticism drifted apart from the general current of national life, and its abuses became increasingly manifest. The religious reformers found little difficulty in calling attention to the slothand uselessness of the smaller monasteries, and in 1536 the temporalities of all that did not exceed £200 a year were given by Act of Parliament to the king: their number was computed at 380. The greater monasteries followed by process of compulsory surrender, and by 1540 all had been suppressed. They took no common action to avert their doom; the abbets in the House of Lords did not raise their voices against the measure for vesting in the crown the property of monasteries which should be suppressed. the disappearance of the abbots from the House of Lords, the preponderance of lay over spiritual peers was established, and the subsequent work of the Reformation of the Church was rendered more easy. Lay abbots, or advocati ecclesia, were common in the abbeys of Irish origin from the 8th to the 12th centuries. They were commonly the descendants of the founder or of a neighbouring lord, and were originally the lessees of the abbey lands. In some cases, the coaro, or abbot, chosen by the monks retained his spiritual position, but, in temporal matters, he was quite superseded by the advocatus. [CATHEDRAL; MONASTI-CISM.]

The ecclesiastical and social position of an abbot can best be gathered by reference to the history of some monastery, such as Walanis G. sta Abbatum Monasterie S. Albani, Riley, 1863-72. The constitutional questic concerning abbots are discussed in the Lo Report on the Dignity of a Peer, 1829. See a art. Abbot, by Mr. Haddan, in the Dict. Christian Actiquities; Montalembert, The Mo of the West; and for the Celtic abbots, Ske Celtic Scotland, vol ii., and Dr. Reeres' edition Adamnan's Life of St. Columba.

Such a position coi cided with the wishes of James 1.; but Abba though a man of earnest piety, was narrow minded, stern, and lacking in geniality. I 1621, at a staghunt at Branishill Park, Abbo accidentally shot a keeper. This raise the question among canonists whether, i consequence of having shed blood, he habecome legally incapacitated from the epis copal office. A commission of bishops an judges appointed to determine this point wer divided in opinion, but advised the king the it was desirable that the archbishop should ask for pardon. Though Abbot was greatly shaken by this untoward event, he still wa beld enough to express his disapproval of th Spanish marriage of Prince Charles. On the accession of Charles I., Abbot found that hi influence at court was gone, and that Lauc was the favourite. In 1627 he incurred Charle I.'s displeasure by manfully refusing to license a sermon by Dr. Robert Sihthorpe, in favour of passive obedience. He was ordered by the king to betake himself to his house as Ford, in Kent, and there remain in confinement, while the archbishopric was put into the hands of a commission, with Laud at the head. He was, however, restored to some degree of royal favour next year; but, suffering from disease, and embittered in temper, he was helpless against the influence of Luud. His last years were spent in the indolence of sickness and despair, and his death made way for the undisputed power of his rival. He was buried in Trinity Church, Guildford, where his monument still remairs. Abbot was munificent in his benefactions, and built uch as Walsing-rice S. Abel, Thomas (d. July 30, 1540), chaplain to Catherine of Arragon, strongly opposed the divorce of that princess; and was attainted for his share in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, and found guilty of misprision of treason. He was subsequently imprisoned and executed for denying the king's supremacy, and affirming the legality of the marriage with Catherine. He carved the famous punning inscription (an A upon a bell) on the walls of the Beauchamp Tower in the Tower of London.

Abercorn, Peerage of. In 1603 James Hamilton, Master of Paisley, grandson of James Hamilton, second Earl of Arran and Dake of Chatelherault [Douglas; Hamilton] was created Baron Abercorn, and in 1606 Earl of Abercorn. John James, ninth Earl, was created Marquis of Abercorn in 1790, and his successor James (b. 1811), Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1866—68, and 1874—76, was created Duke of Abercorn and Marquis of Hamilton, Aug. 10, 1868. The title is derived from the Castle of Abercorn in Linlithgowshire, a stronghold of the Douglases, taken by James II. in the Douglas rebellion of 1455. Abercorn was the seat of one of the earliest monasteries in Scotland, and of a Pictish bishopric.

Abercromby, SirRalpi (b. 1734, d. 1801), born at Tullibody, Clackmannanshire, entered the army as cornet in a dragoon regiment in 1756, and was gazetted to a colonelcy in 1781. He had, however, seen scarcely any active service, on account of his opposition to the government while in the House of Commons, and the sympathy hemanifested for the American Colonics. In 1793 he commanded a brigado under the Duke of York in Holland, and was wounded at Nimeguen. In the winter of 1794-5 he showed great skill in protecting. as far as possible, the British forces during their disastrous retreat. After the close of this expedition, he was appointed commanderin-chief of the forces in the West Indies. He returned in 1797, and held the chief command in Ireland during that and the following year. There he showed much talent in re-organising an undisciplined army, as well as statesman-like tact. Thwarted, however, by the Irish government, he reluctantly resigned his office, and accepted the chief command in Scotland, whence he was called to serve again in the disastrous expedition to Holland under the Duke of York. In 1801 he was appointed to command the expedition against the French in Egypt. With wonderful skill and daring he disembarked his forces at Aboukir in the face of the French army. On March 21, the two armies met near Alexandria. Abercromby gained a complete victory; but the battle, which saved Egypt from the French, cost the English the life of their commander. acknowledgment of Sir Ralph Abercromby's services, his widow was created a Peeress of the United Kingdom, with the style and title the United Ainguoin, with the Aboukir. Aberdeen, was an important place even before its elevation to a city in the twelfth century. It was made a royal burgh by William the Lion, and received a charter from Robert Bruce in 1319. The University was founded in 1494 by Bishop Elphinstone, and Marischal, about a century later. They were united in 1860. In 1336 the greater potential of the town was burnt by the English, and when rebuilt was called New Aberdeen.

Aberdeen, PEERAGE OF. John Gordon of Haddo, Lord Chancellor of Scotland, was created Earl of Aberdeen in the peerage of Scotland. George, fourth Earl, was made a peer of the United Kingdom in 1813, and in 1818, on his marriage with Lady Catherine Hamilton, assumed the additional surname and arms of Hamilton.

Aberdeen, George Hamilton-Gordon, 4th Earl of (b. 1784, d. 1860), in 1801 began his diplomatie lifo as attaché to Lord Cornwallis at Paris when engaged in negotiating the peace of Amiens. In 1806 he was elected a representativo peer of Scotland. In 1813 he was employed on a mission to induce Austria to break with Napoleon, and in this ho was highly successful. He followed the allied armies; was present at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Leipzig; was employed to detach Murat from Napoleon; and was the colleague of Lord Castlereagh at the Congress of Chatillon. He took no further share in public life until 1827-28, when he was offered the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster by the Duke of Wellington with a seat in the Cabinet, and shortly after was promoted to the Foreign Office. In this capacity he took a prominent share in the management of the Greek question, and the formation of the Hellenic Kingdom, recognised by the Porte in 1829. In general, however, he was in favour of a policy of neutrality in contineutal questions. He recognised Louis Philippe inimediately; he refused to employ the English power to dispossess Don Miguel of the crown of Portugal; and ho strongly objected to the Quadruplo Alliance which Lord Palmerston negotiated. His first tenure of office ended in 1830. Ho was Colonial Secretary under Sir R. Peel in 1834-35, and Foreign Secretary to the same statesman in 1841. He assisted in carrying the repeal of the Corn Laws and the commercial reforms of Peel, and on the death of that statesman he became the acknowledged head of his party. When in succession both Whigs and Tories had failed to carry on the government, and there was no course left but to apply to the Peelites, Lord Aberdeen was invited to form a government, 1852. He formed a coalition ministry, embracing " men of all parties, from the extreme Tory to the extreme Radical." It was his misfortime to be met by the complications in foreign politics which led to the Crimean War. It was thought at the time, and the opinion has been frequently expressed since, that a greater display of rigour on the part of the ministry might have averted the war. The mismanagement of the campaign completed the unpopularity of the ministry. On January 25th, 1855, Mr. Roebuck moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the army and the conduct of the war. On the motion being carried Lord Aberdeen resigned, and during the remainder of his life took no further share in public affairs. In his home policy Lord Aberdeen represented the advanced section of the Conservatives, regarding Catholic Emancipation and the repeal of the Corn Laws as advantageous measures rather than as necessary evils. In foreign polities he was the advocato of the principles of friendship with foreign powers, and non-intervention, which ho per aps attempted to apply too indiscriminately. Lord Aberdeen, "the travelled thane, Athenian Aberdeen," of Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, was an accomplished scholar, specially learned in Hellenic antiquities.

The policy and administration of Lord Aberdeen are discussed in Kinglake, Invasion of the Crimea, esp. ii. 62.

Aberdeen Doctors, was the name given, in 1638 -9, to six elergymen of Aberdeen—John Forbes, Robert Baron, Alexander Ross, William Leslie, Alexander Scroggie, and James Sibbald—who strendonsly opposed the compulsory administration to all persons of the oath to preserve the Solend League and Covenant.

Abergavenny, Prename of. Nov. 23, 1392, William Beanchamp was summoned to Parliament by writ as Lord Bergavenny of Abergavenny. The peerage passed to a branch of the Neville family on the marria of Sir Edward Neville (second son of Ral Neville, Earl of Westmoreland, by Joa daughter of John of Gaunt) with Elizabet heiress of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Wocester, Baron Bergavenny. George, fifteen Baron, was created Earl in 1784, and Willian fifth Earl, was advanced to the dignity Marquis in 1876. [Neville.]

Abergavenny, George Neville, 3 Baron (d. 1536), was one of the noblarrested in 1502 on suspicion of being engagin a conspiracy with Edmund de la Pole, Earl Suffolk. He was, however, soon restor to liberty, and eventually came into grefavour with Henry VII. and Henry VII During the Cornish revolt of 1497, it we partly owing to Lord Abergavenny's locinfiscace that the insurgents met with encouragement from the people of Keut.

Abinger, James Scarlett, Lord (b. 1769, 1844), the second son of Robert Scarlett of Jamaica, after gaining great reputation as an advocate, entered Purliament in 1818 as member for Peterborough. He resisted the plans of Castlereagh and Vansittart for increased taxation, and supported Romilly and Mackintosh in their attempts to ameliorate the l'enal Code. He also unsuccessfully endeavoured to bring in a bill for amending the Poor Laws. In 1827, when Mr. Canning sought the assistance of the Whigs, Mr. Scarlett became Attorney-General. He now gradually drifted over to Conservatism. lle retained his office under Lord Goderich, and, on the dismissal of Sir Charles Wetherell by the Duke of Wellington, took office again under the latter. In 1830 he resigned with his party. In 1834 he was made Chief Baron by Sir R. Peel, and raised to the peerage.

Abjuration Oath, The (1701), was a pledge of renunciation of the exiled Stuart dynasty, exacted from time to time after the Revolution of 1688. It first appears in 1690, embodied in a proposed "Aet for the further security of his Majesty's person, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders and their abettors." Every person who held any office, civil, military, or spiritual, was to solemnly abjure the exiled king; the eath of abjuration might be tendered by any justice of the peace to any subject of their Majesties; and, if it were refused, the recusant might be sent to prison, to lie there as long as he continued obstinate. The influence of William caused this bill to be rejected, as well as a less severe measure, imposing a declaration on all office-holders that they would stand hy William and Mary against James and James's adherents. In the last year of the reign, after Louis X1V. had acknowledged the Pretender, it was again introduced in the "Act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line." After a long debate in the Commons, the abjuration oath was made compulsory; but the provision was only carried by a majority of one. William gave his assent to the measure on his death-bed. On the accession of Anne a new Act was passed, applying the oath to the new reign. The oath was taken freely by the Tories, and even hy noted Jacobites, the Pretender having, it was said, sent instructions to that effect to his adherents. It was renewed on the occasion of the union with Scotland, when the Scottish elergy petitioned against it, but without result. The bill was subsequently re-introduced on the accession of George I., and on the death of the old Pretender (1766). The eath was not finally abolished until 1858. "The definition of persons required to take the Abjuration Oath," says Mr. Burton, "is an attempt, and a successful attempt, to exhaust the gentry and the educated community." It included the holders of all public offices, members of the universities, and all teachers, clergymen, and legal practitioners; and as a general remedy of omissions, the eath might be tendered "to any person or persons whatsoever."

Abjuration Oath for Scotland, The (1662), was imposed on all persons holding public office, and consisted, among other abjurations, of a declaration that the Covenant and Leagne "are of themselves unlawful oaths, and were taken by and imposed upon the subjects of this kingdom against the fundamental laws and liberties of the same." The oath was modified in 1716, when it became a simple declaration of allegiance to the Hunover settlement and a rennuciation of the Stuarts. [Covenant.]

Abjuration of the Realm, The Oath of, was the oath to quit the country, which might be enforced on any felon who had taken advantage of the privilege of sanctuary. Such a person was bound to leave the kingdom within thirty days, und if he returned he might be put to death. The practice was abolished, in company with the privilege of sanctuary, by James 1., cap. 28. [Sanctuary.] By a statute passed in the 35th year of Elizabeth, Protestant Dissenters who had failed to attend divine service, and Roman atholics, might be compelled to abjure the realm, and if they refused, or returned without licence, they were adjudged felons, and might be hanged. Dissenters were relieved of the necessity of abjuration by the Act of Toleration; but as regards Roman Catholics, it was not finally removed from the Statute Book till 1791.

Absenteeism, owing to the churacter of the conquest of Ireland, and the lapse of many great Irish fiefs to English baronial houses, early became a crying evil in that country. In 1331, Edward III. called on all absentees to follow him to Ireland and defend their estates. When Lionel of Clarence went out in 1361, the same demand was made. In 1374, toc, they were called up to go in person or send substitutes. The first statute on the subject was passed in 1379 in an English Parliament, ordering all proprietors who were absentees to contribute two-thirds of their means to the defence of Ireland. In 1413 all Irisbmen were, with the same object, ordered to leave England, and were excluded from the Iuns of Court. In Henry VI.'s reign, legislation against absenteeism was also frequent. James Il. in 1689 summoned all absentees to join him. Under George 1., absenteeism having much increased, iu 1729 an absentee-tax of four shillings in the pound was imposed on all moneys paid out of Ireland; but the king being allowed to grant exemptions, it did not do much good. In 1767, this law was renewed, and the exemptions done away with, or, at least, only maintained for members of the royal family and distinguished officers. But an attempt to increase the tax in 1773 had to be given up, owing to the opposition it aroused in England. In 1783, a like attempt failed in Iroland. In 1796, an absentee-tax was defeated in the Irish Parliament by English influence, and after that no such mensure was mooted, though the evil continued to increase. In 1779, Arthur Young estimated the amount of rent annually sent out of the country, at £732,000.

Almost every Irish historian, statesman, and economist, has had something to say on the subject of absenteeism. The reader will find it referred to, at some length, in Froude, The English in Ireland, passim; Lecky, Hist. of Eng., vol. ii.; the works of Swift and Arthur Young; and The Report of the Select Committee on the State of Ireland, 1828.

Abyssinian Expedition, Tue (1867) Theodore, King of Abyssinia, fancying that he was slighted by the British Government, who had refused to assist him against the Egyptians, had seized and imprisoned in his fortress of Magdala all the British subjects within his reach. Among others was Mr. Cameron, British Consul at Massowah. An embassy was sent to the king, beaded by Mr. Rassam, British Assistant-Resident at Aden, to expostulate. The mission was at first well received and cajolod by the crafty king, but wentually seized and imprisoned Lord Stanley's remonstranco with the rebeing disreg_rded, war was declared. It was waged from Inlia, and the expedition was despatched from Bombay in the winter of 1867 under Sir Robert Napier. The campaign was conducted under difficulties, which arose from the varying nature of the climate and the natural impediments of the ground. The difficult task of transporting the military steres and artillery in a country where roads were unknown, and which bristled with lofty and rugged mountains, was performed with complete success. The baggage-elephants were especially useful, and greatly facilitated the progress of the expedition. Little resistance was experienced from the natives. There were one or two straggling skirmishes, and a wild battle was fought, in which the reckless bravery of the Abyssinians proved ineffectual against the serried masses of the English bayonets, an the deadly fire of the English artillery Theodore, at last, sent back all the prisoners and offered to treat. Napier, however, refuse to listen to any terms short of a total surren der, and to this the king refused to agree lle shut himself up in his eitadel of Magdala which was perched upon a lofty rock, and de fended not only by the natural difficulty of the ascent, but also by walls of great thickness and gateways strongly fortified. The Eng lish, with great bravery, surmounted the difficulties of the ascent, forced their way through the gate at the top, and fought from post to post till the position was won Theodore was found dead inside the gate slain by his own hand. The town and fortress were destroyed, and within a weel the troops were on the sea returning home Sir Robert Napier for his services was created Lord Napier of Magdala, with a pension and received the thanks of both Ilouses of Parliament. He died in 1890.

Acre, or St. Jean D'Acre, a town ou the coast of Syria, anciently called Ptolemais, is connected with three episodes in English history:—(1) The Siege of Acre, In June 1191, Richard I. arrived before the town which had already been besieged by the Crusaders for more than two years, with the loss, it is said, of over 120,000 men. A series of assaults was immediately made on the town, but these were seriously impeded by the attacks of Saladin on the Christian lines. At length, however, the garrison offered to treat; they were allowed to retain their lives and (July 12) the Crusaders marched into the town. (2) The Defence of Acue. On March 16, 1799, Bonaparte's Egyptian army appeared before Acre. The town was held by a Turkish garrison, under Yussuf Pasha, aided by Sir Sidney Smith, who commanded the English squadron in the roads, and a French engineer, Philippoteaux, who had once been a school-fellow of Bonaparte. Animated by these leaders, the Turks held out with great bravery for sixty days of open trenches; and on May 20 the French were compelled to retreat. "That miserable fort," as Napoleon ealled it, was thus the means of causing his Syrian expedition to be aban-doned, and his great projects of Oriental eonquest to be altogether hopeless. Alluding to Sir Sidney Smith, he is said to have frequently remarked: "That man made me miss my destiny." (3) The Bomrandment of Acre, Nov. 3, 1840. Act of Parliament. [STATUTES.]

Acton Burnel, Parliament or (1283), was the name given to one of the sessions of Edward I.'s great council, reinforced probably by the merchants who had previously met in the Parliament at Shrewsbury. The presence of so many representatives of the commercial classes was taken advantage of by the king to issue the ordinance known as the Statute of Merchants.

Adamnan, St. (b. 624, d. 704), Abbot of lor i, was converted, while on a mission to Alufrid of Northumhria in 688, to the custom of the Roman Church with regard to the observance of Easter—a conversion which unbroiled him in disputes with the monks of lona. In 692 he attended the Synod of Tara, and successfully urged, on part of the Irish Church, the necessity of conformity to the rest of the Church. Adamnan wrote in Latin the Life of St. Columba, which although conraining some elements of legend, is the great athority for the history of the old Celtic Church. It has been edited hy Bishop Reeves for the Irish Arch. Soc. and the Bannatyne Club. This edition has been re-issued with an English translation in the Historians of Scotland. He also wrote De Situ Terræ Sanctæ.

Adams, John (b. 1735, d. 1826), second President of the United States, was a lawyer in Boston, and took an active part in the measures of the colonists to defend their rights against the English Government. In the Philadelphia Congress of 1774 he was delcgate for Massachusetts, and he was one of the members of the "Continental Congress' of 1775. In this assembly he advocated immediate and vigorous hostile measures against the mother country, being convinced that any further attempts at reconciliation were hopeless. Adams was a skilful practical lawyer, as well as an earnest student of the philosophy of politics and jurisprudence; and much of the shape which the national and state constitutions assumed, as well as the curious basis of speculative legal theory on which the acts of the earlier congresses were grounded, was largely due to his influence. He was a declared opponent of the "pure democracy," advocated by a large section of the American leaders, and favoured the system of government hy double chainbers and "checks and balances," which was often stigmatised as aristocratic. In 1777 he was sent as diplomatic agent of the new government to Paris, and for the greater part of the next ten years was engaged in political and financial missions to the courts of France, Holland, and England. Or his return to America in 1788 he was chosen Vice-President of the Union, and was immediately involved in the bitter party contests between the federalists, who followed Hamilton, and the republicans, who were now led by Jefferson. ln 1797 Adams was chosen President hy a slight and doubtful federalist majority. His term of office was not altogether a successful one. The southern federalists were only lukewarm supporters, and the republicans hitterly assailed him in public and private. Like Washington, Adams hold to the principle of neutrality in the contest between France and the other European states; but this made him very unpopular with the powerful body of republicans within the States. In the presidential election of 1801, Adams was defeated by Jefferson, and retired from public life amidst a storm of very undeserved obloquy. Adams was a voluminous writer of political and quasi-political treatises, and his works are very valuable for a correct understanding of the views and principles which actuated ono large section of the founders of the United States.

Adams, SAMUEL (b. 1722, d. 1803), a distant relation of John Adams, was a leading member of the Boston "Caucus" Club, and took a considerable part in founding similar associations elsewhere. He was one of the first to oppose the measures by which the English l'arliament attempted to raise revenue from the trade of the American colonists, and he did, perhaps, more than any other man to rouse the people of Massachusetts to open resistance. In American politics he was by no means a devoted follower of Washington, and was in many respects an opponent of the federalist constitution. In 1797 he retired from the governorship of Massa-chusetts, when the federal party were pre-dominant. It is in a (probably spurious) speech of Sumuel Adams, printed in London, and purporting to have been delivered at Philadelphia, August 1, 1776, that the famous phrase, "a nation of shopkeepers," is applied to England. The speech was translated into French, and Bonaparte probably borrowed his use of the appellation from it.

Adamson, Patrick (b. 1537, d. 1592), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was educated in France, and returned to Scotland in 1573, when he entered the ministry. In 1575 he was one of the commissioners employed to settle the constitution of the Church of Scotland, and soon after was appointed by the Regent Morton Archhishop of St. Andrews. His life thence-forward was a long course of opposition to the Presbyterian party, who lost no opportunity of taking proceedings against him, and finally succeeded in getting him excom municated, and deprived of the revenues of his see, so that, it is said, his last years were passed in actual want. He was the author of a poetical version of the Book of Job, and other works in Latin verse.

Addington, HENRY, Viscount Sidmouth (b. 1757, d. 1844), the son of Anthony Addington, Lord Chatham's family physician, was called to the Bar about the same time as Pitt, whose milimate friend he was. By Pitt he was persuaded to leave the Bar, and to turn his attention to political life. He was accordingly returned to Parliament as member for Devizes, and soon became conspicuous as a devoted follower of l'itt. In 1789 he was elected Speaker, and presided over the House until, on Pitt's resignation in 1801, he was invited by the king to form an adminis-It was very feeble, and would tration. scar Ly have lived a month if litt had not for a timo given it his protection and advice. Addington's ministry was chiefly signalised liv the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens; but when Pitt withdrew his support, the utter weakness of the Cabinet became very clear, and Addington was forced to make way for his former leader. There was now a complete breach between the two, and Addington, who had been created Viscount Sidmouth, attacked Lord Melville, and through him the Prime Minister, with great vehemence. After Pitt's death, Addington became President of the Council in the Grenville and Fox administration. In the minis. try of Perceval and the Duke of Portland he had no place; but, when Lord Liverpool came into office in 1812, he was appointed Home Secretary. In this position his repressive policy, and the hostility he showed to popular movements, made him remarkably unpopular with the nation at large; but he maintained his post for several years, until he resigned it to Sir Robert Peel, 1822, after which he took but little share in polities. His administration has been described by Macaulay as one which, in an age pre-eminently fruitful of parliamentary talents, contained hardly a single man who, in parliumentary talents, could be considered as even of the second rate. "He was," the same writer says, "universally admitted to have been the best speaker that had sate in the Chair since the retirement of Onslow. But nature had not bestowed on him very vigorous faculties," and his long occupation of the Chair had unfitted him for the task of heading an administration.

Addison, Joseph (b. 1672, d. 1719), was the son of the Reverend Launcelot Addison, afterwards Dean of Lichtield. Joseph Addison was educated at the Charterhouse and Magdalen College, Oxford, where his Latin compositions gained him considerable reputation. He was elected to a fellowship in 1699. Soon after leaving Oxford, he became acquainted with Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax, and subsequently with Lord Somers, through whose influence he received, in 1695, a pension of £300 a year. In 1699 he left England, and travelled over France and Italy, until the death of William III. In 1704 his Campaign, a poem on the battle of Blenheim. written at the request of Godolphin, was highly successful, and at once brought its author into note. Henceforth his rise was rapid. He became Commissioner of Appeals, Secretary to the Legation at Hanover, and in 1708 Under-Secretary of State. In 1708 ho entered Parliament as member for Lostwithiel. In the autumn of the same year, Lord Wharton, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, appointed him his Chief Secretary and Keeper of the Records. From Ireland Addison sent his contributions to the Tatler, the first of the periodical publications, which his friend Steele projected. With Steele he was one of the founders of the new literary school of the Essayists, who introduced into English Prose a remarkable simplicity and purity of style, and in whose light and graceful publications modern periodical literature had its source. On the fall of the Whigs in 1710, Addison was dismissed from office. During the General Election he contributed some violent party papers to a political journal, entitled the Whig Examiner. In March, 1711, the Spectator appeared, under the conduct of Steele, and during the years of its existence (March, 1711—Dec., 1714), Addison was the principal contributor. In 1713 Addison's tragedy, Cato, was put on the stage. Political feeling was high at the time, and the opposite principles appealed to in the play caused it to be highly successful, both with Whigs and Tories. On the death of Anne, Addison was made Secretary to the Lords of the Regence: On the accession of George I., he again became Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant. In 1715 he published the Freeholder, the ber'c' his political writings. The next year he ried the Dowager Countess of Warwick, ad in 1717 became Secretary of State. But his health was failing, and his marriage was unhappy. He finally quitted office in 1718, with a pension of £1,500 a year. In 1719 his defence of the Pecrage Bill involved him in a quarrel with Steele, whom he attacked in a party journal called 1 .: Old Whig. This was the last of Addison's literary efforts. He died June 17, 1719, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Addison's importance in the political history of England is not great, though he held high office, and his personal career was remarkably successful, even for an age when literary merit, aided by a certain amount of

In principles he was a strict Whig of a somewhat narrow cast; and in the schism which took place in 1717 it is notable that he supported the "old Whigs," Sunderland and Stanhope, against the more progressive section of the party which Walpole headed. It is as an essayist that he won his title to famo, though his political writings are valuable, as exhibiting the doctrines and principles of the earlier Whig statesman of the Revolution school, set forth with the skill and finish of a consummate literary artist. His chief political writings are The Present State of the War (1707), The Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff (1713), and the Freeholder (1715—16); and his contributions to the Whig Examiner (1710) and the Old Whig (1719).

The Works of Addison were published in six volumes, with Notes by Bishop Hurd in 1811. There is a good Life by Miss Aikin, published in 1843, and a lengthy memoir in the Biographia Britannica. The famous character of Addison, under the name of Atticus, in Pope's Episile to Dr. Arbuthnet, and Macaulay's account of the relations between Addison and Steele in his essay on the former are well known. Addled Parliament was the name given to the Parliament which sat from April 5 to June 7, 1614. No Parliament had been in session since 1611; but in 1614 the condition of the finances, and the unwillingness of the people to pay the Customs levied by the king without the sanction of Parlia-ment, made it essential to assemble one. James hoped that, by employing "under-takers" or intermediaries, between himself and the Commons, he might obtain a considerable grant in return for the renunciation of some small portions of the royal pre-But when Parliament niet, it rogative. showed itself determined not to grant any supplies until the king's claim to levy Customs been surrendered. Addresses to the Crown are (1) from Parliament, (2) from the people. (1) Since the time of Edward I., Parliament has exercised the privilege which it inherited from the Great Council of the Baronage, of treely offering its advice to the crown, and demanding the abolition of grievances. Nearly all the legislation of the fourteenth century is based upon the petitions of Parliament. From the reign of Henry VI., the petitions and addresses began to assume the form of actual statutes, and were called bills. In later history, Parliament asserted its right to address the Crown on subjects of wider policy, such as the settlement of the succession under Elizabeth, and recommendations to the queen to marry (1562 and 1566); whilst advice on questions of peace and war has often been tendered to the Crown by Parliament. Thus the House of Commons presented a remonstrance against the continuance of the Americ a war, and on receiving an unsatisfactory answer, declared that it would "consider as enomies to his Majesty and this country all who should advise or by any means attempt the further prosecution of offensive war on the continent of America, for the purpose of reducing the revolted colonics to obedience by force." Addresses to the Crown are always moved in both Houses in answer to the Royal Speech at the beginning of the Session; and the Debate upon the Address has become the formal opportunity for approving or challeng-ing the Ministerial policy put forward in the Royal Speech. (2) Addresses from individuals have been offered to the king from the earliest times, usually in the form of petitions for pardons, or redress of private grievances: and though these petitions were subsequently usually made to the House of Commons, they were occasionally laid at once before the sovereign himself, as in the case of the petition of the clergy in 1344. The practice of addressing the Crown on political matters had, however, no precedent until the time of Charles I. (1640), and in 1662 was restrained by an Act against tumultuous petitioning. In 1679 the Whig petitions for the assembling of Parliament were met on the part of the Tories by counter-addresses from the Abhorrers (q.v.). In 1701 petitions were presented, praying for the dissolution of Parliament, and again in 1710; whilst in 178; numerous addresses to the king set forth that the people were willing to support Mr. Pitt and the prerogative. The constitutional character of the addresses of 1710 were supported by a vote of the House of Commons, which affirmed "that it is the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king for the calling, sitting, and dissolving Parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances." [Crown; Pentions.]

Aden, an important military position on the south-west coast of Arabia, was taken by the English in 1839, and, in spite of attacks made npon it by the Arabs, has ever since remained under British rule. Its position gives it a great importance as a coaling station for the Indo-European steamers. Aden is governed by a Resident, and forms part of the Bombay presidency.

Adelaide, Queen (b. 1792, d. 1849), the daughter of George, Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, was married to the Duke of Clarence, 1818. On the accession of the Duke of Clarence as William IV., a bill was pussed [REGENCY BILLS] appointing her Regent, in case any child of the king's succeeded him during minority. She scrupulously abstained from interfering in politics; but in spite of this, the dissolution of the Melbourne Cabinet in 1834 was attributed to her influence. After the accession of Queen Victoria, her life was chiefly spent in works of charity and benevolence.

Adelais of Louvain (b. 1103) was the second wife of Henry 1., to whom she was married in 1121. She survived her husband, and subsequently married William de Albini, ancestor of the family of Howard.

Adjutators, The (sometimes erroneously styled Agitators), were representatives elected by each regiment of the Puritan army in 1647, to act in concert with the officers in compelling Parliament to satisfy the demands of the army before disbanding it. They presented a petition to Parliament, in which they complained of "the ambition of a fow men, who had long been servants, but were degenerating into tyrants." The Parliament, finding it impossible any longer to refuse to listen to the demands of the army, sent a eommittee, consisting of Cronwell, Ireton, Skippon, and Fleetwood, to head-quarters to pacify the soldiers. But the army mutinied, seized the money intended for their pay, and expelled the officers whom they suspected. On May 29 a great meeting of Adjutators, under the authority of Fairfax, was held at Bury St. Edmunds, and a rendezvous of all the troops called at Newmarket. On June 2 the army leaders sent Cornet Joyce to remove the king out of the hands of the Parliament. This having been done, on June 10 a great rendezvous of the army was held at Triploe Heath, near Cambridge. Here the army refused to accept the conditions of Parliament, demanded the dismissal of eleven of the most obnoxious Presbyterian leaders, and began to march on London. On the approach of the army the cleven withdrew, and the Independents became for a time the majority in the House. But the City of London was strongly Presbyterian, and on July 26 a large muster of apprentices and others came unto the House, and compelled the recall of the eleven members, and the replacing of the London militia in the hands of the Presbyterians. Thereupon the army, which had been encamped close to London, entered the city (August 8) and again expelled the eleven members. The power was now entirely in the hands of the army, and the Adjutators were busy holding meetings, and urging ferward extreme measures, and demanding vengeance on the king.

Cromwell and the officers began to grounxious to restore discipline in the army and when some of the regiments showe signs of acting independently, vigorous measures were taken, one of the ringleader shot, and others placed under arrest. Liburne and others attempted to revive the Adjutators in 1649; but the attempt was frustrated by Cromwell. [Cromwell; Fair Fax.]

Admiral, THE LORD HIGH, was one of th great officers of State who was specially con cerned with the government of the navy an the administration of maritime affairs. Th name is derived from an Asiatic word corresponding to the Arabic Amir, and the Turkis Emir, a commander or general; and it was pro bably adopted by the English either directly from the Saracens, in the course of the late Crusades, or from the Sicilians or Genoese We hear of the appointment of officers calle "costodes maris" from time to time under th Norman and earlier Angevin kings, but th definite organisation of the Admiralty date from the reign of Edward I., who in 129 appointed William Leyburne "captain of al tho postnien," and in 1306 appointed three the postnien," and in 1306 appointed threadmirals, with jurisdiction over the eastern western, and southern coasts respectively. In 1360 a single High Admiral was first appointed From 1404 till 1632 there was an uninter rupted succession of Lord High Admirals o England, whose duties were not only to ac as Naval Commanders-in-Chief, but also a Ministers of Marine and Presidents of the Court of Admiralty. In 1632 the dutie of the office were entrusted to a commission of the great officers of state; and under the Commonwealth naval affairs were managed by a Committee of Parliament, and afterwards by Cromwell. After the Restora tion, the office of Lord High Admiral was held by King Charles II., and by James as Duke of York and as King, and by Prince George of Denmark, the husband of Queer Anne. Since 1708, however, the office has always been in commission, with the exception of a short period (May, 1827—Sept. 1828), when the Duke of Clarence, afterwards King William IV., was Lord High Admiral. By the Acts 2 Will. and Mary, c. 2 and 1 Geo. iv. c. 90, the authorities, jurisdiction, and powers of the Lord High Admiral were vested in the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The chief of these commissioners sioners is styled the First Lord of the Admiralty. In modern times he has become practically sole and responsible Minister for the Navy, and is now always a member of the Cabinet. The title of Admiral, has also been used continuously since the 13th century to designate the highest grade in the Royal Navy; but it does not appear to have come into general use in this sense till the latter part of the 16th century. There were formerly three classes of Admirals, those of the Red, the White, and the Blue squadrons, but this distinction was abolished in 1864. [Navy.]

Admiralty, Court or, is the Court of the Lord High Admiral in his judicial capacity. The early admirals and custudes maris, from the time of Henry !. onwards, had the prerogative of judging on all disputes between merchants and sailors, and on offences committed on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of the Common Law Courts. These privileges prevoked the jealousy of the Common lawyers, and, in 13 Rich. II., a statute limited its procedure to matters transacted on the seas. When there was a Lord High Admiral the judge of the Admiralty Court was generally appointed by him; when the office is in commission the Crown appoints him. The criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is now no longer exercised, and offences committed on the high sens are tried at common law. By an Act of Henry VIII. all such offences were to be tried by commissioners of over and terminer under the great seal. When the Central Criminal Court was ostablished in 1834, the judges were authorised to decido on all offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admirulty. The civil jurisdiction of the court is important, and, by 3 and 4 Vict., c. 65, comprehends all causes arising out of questions of the title to or ownership of vessels, maritimo contracts, salvage, and cases of collisions and damages on the high seas. By the Judieature Act of 1873, the Admiralty Court was united with the Court of Probate and Divorce to form one division of the Supreme Court of Judicature. At the breaking out of war, a commission is issued to the judge of the Admiralty Court constituting him president of a Prize Court, to decide as to what is or what is not lawful prize. Property captured from the enemy is held not to have absolutely ceased to belong to its former owner till condemned by the sentence of a Prize Court The proceedings in this court are supposed to be conducted according to the law of nations, and the decisions of its judges, and notably of Lord Stowell during the carly years of the French revolutionary war, form very important contributions to international Courts of Vico-Admiralty, having analogous powers to the Admiralty Court, are established in most of the British colonies. The Chief Justice of the colony is ex-officio judge of this court, and there is an appeal from his decision to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Admiratry Court for Scotland retained its separate existence at the union, though the Scottish Lord High Admiral was abolished. In 1831 the Scotch Admiralty Courts were abolished, and their functions entrusted to the Courts of Sessien and Justiciary. [Navy.]

For the early history of the Admiralty, the best anthority is The Black Book of the Admiralty, a m 'important collection of documents bearing car as subject, chiedy in the 14th and 15th centuries, with the valuable prefaces of Sir Travers Twiss in the Rolls Series, 1871. &c. It is a doc ment full of gross and offensive attacks the Queen, and may be considered as ono the most indecent political libels that ha over appeared. The effect of the Admoniti was to disgust not only all Protestants, h also a great many Catholics. In 1158, on condition of the payment of Peter's Pence, the Pope Issued a bull which handed over the sovereignty of the islan. I to Henry II. The enterprise was prompted, it was stated, by "the ardour of faith and love of religion," and there is indeed no doubt that the laxity of the Irish clergy, and the looseness of the connection with Rome, had much to do with the eagerness with which the Pope acceded to Henry's request for the bull.

Adullamites (1866) was a name derisively applied to those Liberais, about forty in number, who opposed the majority of their party on Earl Russell's proposal for a further Reform of Parliament. Their leaders were Mr. Lowe, Mr. Horsman, and Lord Elcho. Mr. Bright, on the 13th of March, compared this party to the assembly which came to the cave of Adullam, when David called about him every one that was discontented. The defection of the Adullamites led to the overthrow of Lord Russell's ministry.

Adventurers. [See Merchant Adventurers.]

Adventurers of 1642, Tax. The English Parliament having confiscated between two and three millions of acres in i.elan, in consequence of the Rebellion of 1641, debenture bonds were issued made payable in land after the reconquest of the country. About a million acres were thus disposed of, the original idea being that the money thus obtained should actually be employed in suppressing the rebellion; but the ontbreak of civil war in England prevented this. When in 1653 the conquest was finally accomplished, the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in Munster; King's and Queen's County, East and West Meath, in Leinster; Down, Antrim, and Armagh, in U...er, were set aside for satisfying these claims, and those of the Puritan soldiery. Many of these Adventurers were subsequently deprived of a large portion of their lands by the Act of Settlement and Explanation in 1665, and a considerable number emigrated to America.

Advertisements Duty on. Advertisements in newspapers appear to have first come into used uring the period of the Commenwealth, the first being, it is said, an announceinent of an heroic poem on the death of Cromwell. Advertisements became common during the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in the reign of William III., a gratuitous paper of advertisements was started and existed fer some time. By an Act of 1712, a duty was imposed on each advertisement published. In 1838 the tax was reduced from 3s. 6d. in Great Britain, and 2s. 6d. in Ireland, to 1s. 6d. in the former and 1s. in the latter country. In 1851 the tax brought in over £175,000. The duty was abolished in 1853.

Advertisements (1565) was the name of a book of discipline issued by Archbishop Parker. It marks the beginnings of the persecutions of the Puritan clergy, and has in recent times excited much controversy. The Archbishop had previously endeavoured in vain to induce Cecil to consent to an official promulgation of these "udvertisements;" but as Cecil was not anxious to provoke opposition by too rigid an execution of the Act of Uniformity, he had refused to authorise or publish them, and Parker was consequently left to issue them on his own responsibility. Their title ran: "Advertisements partly for due order in the public administration of Common Prayer and using of the Holy Sacra ents, and partly for the apparel of all persons ecclesiastical, by virtue of the 'dueen's Majesty's letter commanding the same." The points especiall insisted on are the wearing of the surplice and cap; and generally they enforced rigid bedience to the mere obnoxious portions of the Act of Uniformity. Much controversy has arisen as to the precise validity of these Advertisements. On the one side it has been maintained that the royal authorisation gave binding force to the Archbishop's injunctions, and that they were the "other order" which the Act of Uniformity of 1559 half anticipated as likely to supersede the "Ornaments Rubric," which enjoined that church ornaments should remain as in the second year of Edward VI. This view. which was adopted by Lord Selborne in the "Ridsdale Case," has been attacked by Mr. J. Parker in his "Ornaments Rubrie, where it is maintained that the advertisements were simple archiepiscopal injunctions, and that their enforcement of a minimum of ritual did not aim at abolishing the vestments, etc., of Edward VI.'s First Prayer-Book.

Advocate, The Lord, also called the King's or Queen's Advocate, is the chief law officer of the crown in Scotland, and corresponds, roughly speaking, to the English Attorney-General. The King's Advocate is found in existence in 1479, in 1540 he became one of the officers of state, and in 1587 he is first mentioned as Lord Advocate. The origin of the office is extremely obscure; it has been supposed that, with the title, it was derived from the French; and the duties of the earlier Kings' Advocates, of whom there is a fairly full list from 1483, are equally ill-defined. They appear to have been com-prised in the prosecution of state officers, and the inquiry into the extent of the feudal forfeitures arising from those offences. In the middle of the sixteenth century it is possible to gain a clearer idea of his tenctions; the Lord Advocato was public prosecutor, he conducted all cases in which the sovereign was concerned, which, from the reign of Queen Mary, have been pursued in his name, and in the latter part of the century appears to have occasionally combined the offices of advecate and judge in the court of sessions. Previous to the Union, the Lord Advocate sat in l'arliament in virtue of his office, but now has not necessarily, though he is generally, a member of the Lower House. He is appointed by the Crown, and tenders his resignation when the administration When the Duke of Newcastle changes. abolished the office of Secretary of State for Scotland in the reign of George 11, the duties of that'minister were transferred to the Lord Advocate. In Parliament he answers all questions relating to Scotland, and undertakes all measures of Scottish legislation; but he is not a member of the Privy Council, and is called right honourable by courtesy only. Outsido Parliament he acts as public prosecutor, in which duties he is assisted by the Solicitor-General and four advocates-depute, and appears for the Crown in all civil cases. llis warrants for searching, apprehending, and imprisoning run in any part of Scotland; he is allowed to sit within the bar of tho court of session, a privilege enjoyed by peers of the realm.

Advowson is the right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice vested in a man and bis heirs for ever. The word is taken from Lat. advocatio, for he who had the advowson was the protector or patron of the church. As the perochial system was grafted on the township, it might be contended that the right of presentation would at first be in the lord of the manor; but as a fact, the early parish priests were in a great proportion of cases appointed by the bishops. An advowson is presentative when it is the right of presenting a clerk to the bishop for institution; collative when the bishop ls patron; donative when by royal foundation or licence the patron can present witbout reference to the bishop. An advowson is regarded by the law as a trust. Yet advowsons, and the power of exercising tho right of presentation for one or more terms,

India, Afghanistan k , from the carliest tlmes, figured conspicuously in the history of Hindostan and of Central Asia. Its first connection with English history dates from the year 1809, when the rumour of a joint invasion of India, determined on by Napoleon and the Czar Alexander, led to the despatch of the Ilon. M. Elphinstone as envoy to Shah Shujah, then ruler of Cabul. A treaty was concluded between the two at l'eshawur. The subsequent events, fraught with intestine broils, do not call for detailed review, though we may note the visit of Lieut. Alexander Burnes to Cabul, on his way to Bokhara, In 1832, for the mass of interesting information collected thereby. In 1834, Shah Shujah, who had been dethroned, endeavoured to regain his power, and advanced on Candahar, but was defeated by Dost Mahomed, ruler of Cabul, and Kohandil Khan, who reigned at Candahar. He took refuge eventually with Nasir Khan, of Khelat, who enabled him to return to Ludiana in a manner suited to his dignity. In 1837, the slege of Herat by Persia, encouraged, as believed, by the Russians, and the defeat of the Sikhs by Dost Mahomed, led the English to despatch Burnes as resident at the court of Cabul. But the suspension of the negotiations then existing between Dost Mahomed and the Russians being refused by the Amir, the resolu-tion was formed of placing the ex-king, Shah Shujah, on the Afghan throne. An army of 21,000 men was assembled on the indus (16th January, 1839), and, advancing on Candahar through the Bolan Pass, took possession of that city, where Shah Shujah was crowned on the 8th May. Ghazni fell next, the gate of the city being blown in by Lieut. (afterwards General Sir Henry) Durand. Dost Mahomed, finding his forces melting away, fled beyond the Hindu Kush, and the British entered Cabul without opposition. sition. Shah Shujah's restoration was at first popular, but the people, soon finding how completely this was due to English support, incensed at the reduction of subsidies to the chiefs, and inflamed by the mullahs or priests, began to gather in insurrection. The British authorities neglected warnings, and on the 2nd November, 1841, rebellion broke out, and Sir Alexander Burnes and other officers were treacherously assessinated. Disasters followed thickly on one another, and General Elphinstone, on whom the command had been thrust, was in the feeblest health. At a conference with Akbar Khan, Dost Mahomed's son, Sir W. Macnaghten, the British envoy, was murdered by that chief; and on the 6th January, 1842, the British garrison of 4,500, with nearly three times that number of camp followers, proceeded to evacuate the country, but perished miserably in the mountain passes between Cabul and Jellalabad, a single survivor, Dr. Brydon, alone reaching the latter city. Ghazni fell to the Afghans on the 10th December, some hundreds of Sepoys being carried Int. captivity, while ninety-five hostages, left by the British, were in durance near Cabul. Candahar and Jellalahad, however, were held firmly by Generals Nott and Salo respectively. A strong expedition, under respectively. A strong expedition, under General Pollock, was prepared in India, and after forcing the Khyber Pass relieved Jellalabad. After halting two months at this place, the time being spent in negotiations, General l'ollock advanced and inflicted a severe defeat on Mahomed Akbar Khan entering Cabul a few days later. The cap-tives were recovered, the principal bazar of Cabul razed to the ground, and General Nott, who had advanced from Candahar and captured Ghazul, beheld, on his arrival at Cabul, the British flag floating over the ramparts. Soon after the departure of our troops Shah Shujah was assassinated, and Dost Mahomed Khan was restored to his former power. During the Sikh revolt, in 1848, he joined them against the British, but a friendly understanding was arrived at and a treaty concluded in 1855. The same year saw the acquisition of the Candahar province by Dost Mahomed, and the second l'erslan advance on lierat; its capture and final cession, through fear of the English, who had sent an expedition to the Persian Gulf, are the subsequent events of note.

(2) Shere Ali Khan, who ascended the Afghan throne in 1863, passed through great vicissitudes of fortune, but eventually over-came his rivals and foes in 1868. An arrangement was arrived at between the British and Russian governments in 1872 that Afghanistan was beyond the field of Russian influence, and the practical violation of this under-standing in 1878, coupled with the repulse by the Afghans of a British mission, led to a fresh Afgha war. The victories at Ali Musjid and Pewar, and the capture of Can-dahar and Kelat-i-Ghilgal by Sir Donald Stewart, placed all the important vantage points of Eastern Afghanistan (Cabul excepted) in our hands. A treaty was con-cluded at Gandamak with Yakub Khan, who had succeeded to power on the death of his father, Shere Ali, but all its provisions were scattered to the winds by the murder of Sir L. Cavagnari, who had been deputed as English envoy to Cabul. Sir F. (now Lord) Roberts promptly advanced on the capital, and defeated the Afghans at Charasia. For some months, however, fighting went on, till, at the close of 1879, the total defeat of Mahomed Jan effectually dispersed the insurgents. These successes were worthily supported by Sir D. Stewart's victory at Ahmed Kheyl, he having advanced to Cabul from Candahar. Matters were now settling down, but the approach of the Sirdar Ayub Khan from the side of Herat kindled anew the flames of rebellion. This pretender, having defeated General Burrows at Maiwand, proceeded to invest Candahar, but was utterly routed in his turn by General Sir F. Roberts, who had effected the difficult march from Cabul with much skill and generalship. In September, 1880, the British troops were withdrawn from the Kurram and Cubul valleys, and in the following April from Candahar, leaving the government of the ccuntry in the hands of Abdur Rahman, whose authority as ruler of the country had been recognised by England in July, 1880. After that date the Amir gradually established his power, he and his successor remaining on excellent terms with Britain. The delimitation of the N. frontier led in 1885 to a collision between Russian and Afghan troops at Penj-deh (q.v.), and almost to an Anglo-Russian War.

The chief authorities on Afghanistan are given in Sir Charles MacGregor's admirable Gazetteer, published at Calcutta in 1871. The leading events of the subsequent campaigns are briefly chronicled in Robertson's Three Campaigns in Afghanistan (1881). For the later history cf. Wheeler, the Ameer Abdurrahman, 1895.

Aghrim, BATTLE OF (July 12, 1691), fought in the campaign between William III. and James II., in Ireland, resulted in a victory, gained by Ginkel, over the Irish and French troops, under St. Ruth. The French general had allowed Athlone to be taken (June 30). Ho then fell back about thirty miles to the hill of Aghrim. He drew up his army on the slope of a hill almost surrounded by a deep bog. A wooden breastwork had been constructed in front, near the edge of the morass. Ginkel started from Ballinasloe, four miles from Aghrim, on the 11th, and reconnoitred the lrish position. Next day at five in the evening the battle began. The English first struggled through the bog and attacked the breastwork, only to be driven back again and again. Ginkel was meditating a retreat. But Mackay and Ruvigny led the cavalry through a narrow pessage in the morass, and turned the Irish tlank. At this crisis St. Ruth was killed. His officers foolishly kept his death secret, so that Sarsfield, who might have taken tho command, remained with the reserve. At length the breastwork was carried. The Irish retreated step by step, but, after a while, broke and fled. Then the conquerors began to kill without merey. For miles around the naked bodies of the slain lay on the fields. Sarsfield did his best to cover the retreat. One body of fugitives wont towards Galway, the other towards Limcrick.

Agincourt, BATTLE OF, fought October 25, 1415. Henry V., in attempting to regain the ground which Edward III. had lost in his first campaign against France, took Harfleur, but finding his army greatly diminished by sickness, was unable to undertake any great expedition. Ho resolved to nake his way to Calais through the hostile provinces of Normandy, Picardy, and Artois. His army consisted of about 15,000 men, of whom 5,000 were urchers, and 700 knights. A French army numbering at least 50,000, under the Constable D'Albret, was gathered to cut them off. The English were allowed to cross the Somme, and Henry was courteously asked to name a day for battle. He answered that he was always to be found in the field. For four days the French marched by the side of the English. At last the Constable chose his position a little to the north of Crecy, so as to cut off the English from the village of Agincourt. The battle-field was a somewhat narrow valley, surrounded by woods on the east and west, while through it ran the road to Calais. The French were drawn up in three massive lines. The first two lines fought on foot; the third was mounted. The confined nature of the ground gave no chance for the use of artillery, and the heavy-armed French were at a disadvantage in the soft ground, as compared with the light-armed English yeomen. The English were drawn up in three divisions, but ull close together. While their lines were only four deep, the French were massed thirty deep. Before the battle futile negotiations were carried on, and Henry V. used the time to send some archers secretly through the wood to watch the left flank of the French. It was eleven o'clock when the order was given to the English to advance. The archers ran forward armed with stakes, which they fixed in the ground so as to form a palisude in front of them. Darting forward, they fired with splendid aim at the French men-atarms, who were unable to advance quickly in the soft ground, and fell in numbers. Meanwhile the French cavalry attempted a flank movement, but were taken unawares by the archers in ambush; their horses soon became unmanageable, and they were thrown into confusion. The French infantry, finding themselves unsupported, broke, and the English archers, seizing their swords and maces, rushed into their lines and turned them to flight. Then, reinforced by the English nicn-at-arms, the archers attacked the second division of the French. Here the battle was fiercer and more equal. The Duke of Alençon on the French side, and Henry V. on the English, fought desperately, and for two hours the victory was uncertain. At length Alençon was slain, and the French gave way. A ery was raised among the English that a new French army was coming up in their rear. In the panic Henry V. gave orders thut all prisoners should be slain. it was discovered that the supposed army was only a band of peasants who had eellected te lunder. Meanwhile the third division of the French wavered, and, at last, field. After three hours' fighting the victory of the English was assured. The French losses were very heavy. More than 10,000 men fell on the field, amongst them 8,000 nobles, knights, and squires.

Agra is a strong and ancient town on the river Jumna, in the North-West Previnces of India. It was fermerly one of the chief cities of the Mogul dynasty, and in the wars of 1803 it was held by the Mahrattas, from whom it was captured by General Lake after a day's bombardment, and ceded to the English by Scindiah at the peace of Surge Aujengaom. Agra then became the capital of one of the eight commissionerships into which the Nerth-West Provinces were divided, and the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor: but since the mutiny of 1857, when the European residents were menaced by the insurgent sepoys, and had to take refuge in the fort, the provincial seat of gevernment has been transferred to Allahahad. Agra centains the old palace of Shah Jehan, a mosque which is one of the most beautiful in India, and the famous Tajmahal, a magnificent mausoleum built by Shah Jehan over the remains of his wife.

"Agreement of the People" was ene of John Lilburne's numerous pamphlets, and was published in 1648. It was received with great enthusiasm by the Levellers; and at a meeting held between Hertford and Ware, for the purpose of restoring discipline to the army, and satisfying the claims of the soldiers, a large number were this pamphlet in their hats. Fuirfax and Cromwell ordered them to remove the pamphlets. All the regiments except Lilburne's ebeyed; and Cromwell, perceiving the necessity of at ence stepping the insubordination, caused one of the ringleaders to be shet, and had all the others imprisoned. [LILBURNE; LEVEL-LERS.]

Agricola, GNEUS JULIUS (b. 37, d. 93), Roman governor of Britain (78—84), had, previous to his appointment, served in the island under Cerealis. During his governorship he endeavoured to subdue the tribes in the north, and to conciliate the British to the Roman rule by making them acquainted with the advantages of civilisation. He enceuraged them to come to the tewns, and had many of the sons of the chiefs instructed in literature and science, and he succeeded so well "that they who has a tely scorned to learn the Reman language were becoming fond of acquiring the Reman eloquence." In 78 he reduced Mona: in 79 he subdued the north of Britain to the Tweed; in 80 he advanced as far as the Firth of Tay; the year 81 was employed in constructing a chain of forts between the Clyde and the Forth; in the root year he explored the north-west part of the island, and planned a descent upon Ireland, but the rising of the Caledonians, under their enter of Algaeus, prevented this project being carried out. After some severe fighting, he deteated Lalgaeus, and thus subdued the world of the caledonian, and discovered the Orkneys; and in the same year he returned to Rome, where a triumph was decreed to him.

The Life of Agricola was written by his sonin-law, the historian Tacitus. The Agricola is the best extant account of the condition of Britain in the early part of the period of the Roman rule.

Agriculture. The history of agriculture in England is derived from two sources; the literature en the subject, which is scanty in the earlier period, but becomes cepious as time goes en, and centemporaneous records, which are exceedingly abundant and exact in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and part of the fifteenth centuries, but are scarce after this time. The fact that so great a mass of domestie archives has been preserved is due te the importance the rules of law gave to all decuments which could be alleged in proof of title. Besides, it was at an early period the custem with nearly all proprietors even the sovereign and the great peers-to cultivate their own estates with their ewn capital, and under the superintendence of bailiffs, who regularly drew up an annual balance-sheet, which was submitted to the audit of their lerds. Hence it is possible, by invertigating these accounts, to discover how land was stocked and cultivated, and what was the amount of produce which agriculture secured from land.

Generally, during the medieval period, the greater part of the land in a parish er maner was possessed by the lerd and the tenants, free and serf, in the shape of strips er furrows in a common field, separated by a narrow boundary of untilled ground. These fields were private property during part of the year (as a rule, from Lady-da, to Michaelmas), and common pasture for the rest. Sometimes fields—generally pastureland-were held in abselute ewnership, and the value of such closes was great. Besides the cultivated land and the closes, there was always a more or less considerable area of cemmon pasture, and generally a wood in which hegs were fed, a small charge being paid for each head. English agriculture from very early times always looked to the raising and maintenance of live stock as a most important industry, and the success with which stock-breeding was handled is proved by the great value of English wool, and by the numerous qualities of this product. The keeping of sheep in connection with arable farming has always been a special characteristic of English agriculture, and for several centuries this country had almost a monopoly in the supply of wool.

Early agriculture in England was very rudo. The plough was clumsy, iron was exceedingly dear, draught-eattle, horses and oxen, were small, and the ground was only scratched on the surface. The husbandman had but little farmyard manure, and the only artificial fertilisers which he knew of were marl and lime. The seed was thrown broadcast on the land, about two bushels to the acre of wheat, rye, and peas, and about four bushels of barley and oats. Four times the seed sown was thought to be a fair crop, and five times was seldom obtained even on the best land. The husbandman knew nothing of winter roots, or of artificial grasses, as they are called. Henco his cattle were starved in the winter, and always stunted. Under this imperfect cultivation, he was forced to let at least a third of his land lie in fallow every year. The corn was reaped by cutting off the ears, the straw being suffered to remain on the field at least for a time, often permanently, in order to restore the ground. The whole of the population, town and country, generally took part in the harvest, for the number of residents in the country was insufficient for gathering even the scanty harvest. The stock on the land was far more valuable than the land itself. It has been proved that the stock on a well-tilled farm was worth three times as much as the land. The rent of good arable land was for three centuries about sixpence an acre.

It is not likely, even if the great landowners had continued to cultivate their own estates, that much progress could have been mado in agriculture, for the inventive faculties of Europe were almost stagnant up to the end of the sixteenth century. But owing to the ravages of the Black Death, the great land-owners abandoned cultivation on their own account, and let their land and stock to tenant-farmers, a stocked estato being found to be the most profitable employment of capital, even though the landlord did all the repairs, and made good the losses of his tenant's sheep. It was quite out of the question that a tenant should make agricultural discoveries and improvements, and it is certain that from the reign of Henry III. to the death of Elizabeth, some 350 years, no material alteration was made in English agriculture, except in sheep-farming, and certainly no appreciable progress.

Small as was the produce of the land in comparison with that which has been obtained at later periods, it is very likely that nearly as much land was cultivated in the Middle Ages as is in modern times in England. Certain counties, especially the north and the west, were very backward, as we learn from those few valuations of counties for taxing purposes which are still extant, and are probably the only genuine valuations in existence. But the towns were much smaller, and the space occupied by human habitations in such counties as Middlesex, Oxfordshire, and Norfolk, the most opulent of the English counties, was far less than at present. Ornamental grounds were wholly unknown, and the land was ploughed up to the noble's castle and the farmer's homestead. One can constantly see in parks, which are now ancient, and surrounding residences which are still more ancient, the signs that cultivation had formerly been carried on over places which are now either ornamental only, or arc devoted to pasture. In the description given of ancient estates, we may often find that land was ploughed and sown up to the gates of the manor-house, and over spaces which have long been streets in busy towns. Our ancestors had poor gardens, and no pleasure grounds. In the more fertile counties, which are now known by the absence of byroads, it is likely that more land than is now cultivated was, in the poor fashion of those times, tilled, under the disadvantageous system of frequent fallows and common fields. For as ploughing was merely superficial, and the number of crops was very limited, land was early exhausted, and had to rest in fallow. As the ownership of several lands or closes was rare, and was generally confined to the lord of the manor, the furrows in the common field, with the scanty pasture of the manor common, were the holding of the small agriculturist, i.e., of the mass of the people, since nearly all possessed land; but were held, as far as the first portion of the holding was concerned, under the least advantageous form. Nor was the use of common land for pasture as profitable as it might have been. Generally the right of pasturage was without stint, that is, each occupier had the right of putting as many cattle or sheep as he could get upon the common pasture; and as the lord, who possessed, as has been said, closes from which he could make hay, or could devote to forthcoming stock, had many more cattle than the tenants, he could make the common pasture of comparatively little value to them by overstocking it.

Nothing better illustrates the character of medieval husbandry than the extreme rarity with which prices of hay are recorded in early times, and the excessive rent which was paid for enclosed pastures. The rent of arable land being about sixpence an acre, that of natural moadow is constantly sixteen times as much, and the aftermaths over four or five times. In our day, the best natural meadow does not command a rent of more then twice the best arable. During the tharteenth and fourteenth centuries, it is rare to find, in the examination of many thousand accounts, the prices of hay given. In the fifteenth and sixteenth, during which time enclosures were frequent, and many of the common lands were encroached on, occasionally to the great discontent of the farmer, and even to the employment of violent remedies for the wrong which they felt had been done them, prices of hay are very commo:

Under so imperfect a system of agriculture as the people were fed on unwholesome salted food during half the year, and cattle were starved during the same period, disease was common in man and beast. Scurvy, the inevitable consequence of the use of salted meat, and a deficient vegetable diet, was endemic. Leprosy, which an abundant vegetable food has banished, was as common as it now is in the basin of the Po. The unclean habits of our forefathers added to the general unhealthiness of their lives. Few people lived beyond fifty, when they were old. Plagues of terrible deadliness attacked the people. It is probable that one-third of the population perished in 1349, when the Black Death appeared among us. [Black Death.] The Plague continued to appear at intervals, till its last visitation in 1665, when it seems most terrible, because it has been most minutely described. After the battle of Bosworth, a new disease, the sweating siekness, appeared, and for a long time was the special scourge of the English people. Like the plague, it was very destructive; but, unlike it, does not appear to have been a foreign importation, but the result of dirt, privation, and unwholesome food. It is only by the study of contemporaneous evidence, and by inquiry from undoubted facts, that we can discover the real extent of the loss. So it is not likely that we should get evidence of the occasion on which plagues have visited animal and vegetable life. It is curious to find that two diseases, scab in sheep and smut in wheat, were first noticed at periods which can be almost defined. The former appears about 1288, and was par-ticularly dreaded, because it imperilled the principal source of English opulence during the Middle Ages, and, indeed, for long after, English wool, in the cloth produced from which a large part of Western Europe was clad. The other was smut in wheat and the allied grains, which was first noticed in 1527, a year of comparative famine. The art of the agriculturist has long been engaged in combating these two pests of his calling. Other serious diseases, the rot in sheep, and pleuro-pneumonia in horned cattle, are described so precisely that there is no doubt of their identity with modern cattle-

mon practice to let live and dead stock with land, in other words, to stock a farmer's land as well as let it to him. The monasteries continued the practice up to the dissolution. The leasing of stock was the best part of the landlord's profit on his property, and by implication the least profitable form of holding to the tenant. Hence, in order to induce tenants to accept this kind of occupancy, the landlord not only covenanted to do all repairs, great and small, on the holding, but to insure the tenants against the loss of their cattle by disease. In the rent-rolls of great estates, the costs of tenants' losses by cattle disease form a very serious item, and throw a plain and characteristic light on agriculture and its customs in England, while they show how it came to be an English custom that landlords should improve land. The first change in this prolonged system began with the discoveries of the Dutch. When that people had, by almost superhuman efforts, obtained their political freedom, they began to cultivate Holland on new methods, and to instruct Europe. The impulse which was given to the human mind in the seventeenth century reacted upon husbandry. The discovery of the process of reducing iron by pit-coal cheapened the tools of the husbandman. The Dutch discovered and improved winter roots, the turnip and carrot. It is estimated that the turnip has doubled the productiveness of land. For a century and a half the Dutch were the see : en of Western Europe. Then they cultivated clover, and other so-called artificial grasses, and English agriculturists and landowners soon saw that greater profits and larger rents would accrue from these new inventions. The effect of these improvements was, that the numbers and the quality of cattle and sheep were greatly increased, the agriculturist being enabled to find them food in winter, and keep them at least in some condition. Till winter roots were discovered, surplus stock was killed in November, and salted for winter provisions, and it is obvious that this system was injurious to health. as well as a great hindrance to agricultural progress.

During two epochs of English history, the fifteenth and the eighteenth centuries, agricultural products were abundant and cheap. The seasons appear to have been continuously favourable, while the result was aided by the creation of estates in severalty, by enclosing portions of lands on which there were certain common uses, and by similar expedients. The loss was considerable to the general body of occupiers, but the aggregate food product was greatly increased. During the eighteenth century Enclosure Acts were exceedingly common. Between 1726 and 1796, 1,761 such Acts were passed, dealing with nearly three million acres. From this date to 1850, 2,365 more Acts were passed, under which six million more acres were thus appropriated. Most of this area passed from common pasture to arable, and as it may be reasonably coneluded that the agriculturist would not cultivate new soil except with the prospect of increased profit, the quantity of food produced must have been greatly increased. Towards the atter end of the 18th century great attention was given to the improvement of breeds of sheep, by the selection of those which had the best points. This development of agricultural art was due to Mr. Bakewell, and even more perhaps to Mr. Coke, afterwards Lord Leicester. The economy of such a selection was rapidly extended to cattle, and up to recent times stock in Great Britain has been better than in any part of the civilised world, pedigree animals being exported to all coun ries from this. Nor were the discoveries it practical science made during the eighteenth century without their significance on agriculture. With cheaper iron came better and cheaper tools, a deeper and more thorough manipulation of the soil, and consequently a higher rate of production from the soil. Writers on mediaval, and even later agriculture, counsel the use of wooden harrows on stony ground, because iron was too costly for such tools, and with reason, for while wheat during the greater part of Elizabeth's reign was worth about fourteen shillings a quarter, iron cost about - 26 a ton.

The last improvements in agriculture are due to chemical science and machinery. The agricultural chemist, by the gift of artificial manures, by the .malysis of artificial food, and by the examination of soils, has been a great benefactor of the farmer, and these inventions have been eminently of English growth. The Americans are to be credited with many labour-saving machines, adopted in order to reduce the cost of wages, for the problem before the agriculturist has always been how to get the greatest possible amount of nutritive matter out of the soil for man and beast, continuously, and of uniformly good quality.

Ahmednuggur. Atown of British India, capital of a province of the same name in the district of Gujerat. It passed from the hands of the Peishwa to those of Seindia in 1797. During the Mahratta war of 1803 General Wellesley invested and captured the town. It was restored to the Mahrattas at the end of the war; but in 1817, after the treaty of Punnah, again passed into the hands of the British. A number of Boer prisoners were quartered there during the South African war.

Aid was a term which included all customary payments by a vassal to his fendal superior, but which was applied especially to the forms of taxation employed by the Crown from the Norman Conquest to the fourteenth eentury. It is therefore applied to the military tenants' payment of scutage, the freeholders' carucage, and the boroughs' tallage, as well as to what may be called the ordinary feudal aids. The word aid (auxilium) expresses in itself the very theory of the feulal relation-viz., that it was a voluntary relation. The tenant made gifts in aid of his lord, as the lord himself had accepted homage from the tenant. Taxation, therefore, as long as it consisted chiefly of feudal aids, required the formal grant of the feudal tenants. but when it becomes national taxation, it requires the grant of the representatives of the nation—i.e., of the Estates in Parliament. Thus it is that Bructon's statement, that "aids depend on the graco of the tenant, and are not at the will of the lord," grows into the principle enunciated by Lord Chatham: "Tho taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone." early even as Henry I., the words of the king's writ are—"The aid which my barons have given to me." And on the same principle, in the thirteenth century, grants are seid to be made hy "chief tenants, freeholders, and villeins." The very villeins, in order to be taxed, must be supposed to join in the grant, if only through the lords and the freeholders, or their representatives in the national Parliament. The evolution of a national Parliament is, therefore, a logical consequence of the theory of the aid.

The word "aid" applied originally to the three occasions on which the lord could demand contributions from his tenants-viz., for his own ransom, or for the expenses of making his eldest son a knight, or of marrying his eldest daughter. It was due, therefore, equally from the barons who were tenants of the erown, and from the tenants of those barons. Thus Henry I. took, in 1110, an aid pur fille marier, three shillings from every hide in England, and a similar aid pur faire fitz chevalier; and the amount raised for Richard I.'s ransom was enormous. But the word "aid" includes also what may be called the extraordinary aids - the scutage, the hidage or carucage, and the tallage, which together made up the Anglo-Norman schemo of direct taxation. Scutage, the composition in lieu of military service, fell properly on the military tenants of the crown alone. But when th' king demanded scutage from them, they would make up the amount by aid from their tenants. Hidage, or in the later and stricter form which it took carucage, fell on the freeholders. Tallage was the similar burden on the royal demesne, and fell ehiefly on the towns. The great struggle in regard to all aids was to fix the rate. Thus Henry I.'s charter promises to take only "reasonable" aids, and that the barons shall do the same. In Glanvil the amount is settled between king and baron, as between baron and vassal, by bargaining. In Magna Charta, art. 12 and art. 14, consent of the Common Council of the realm is required for all but the three ordinary aids, and these aids are to be "reasonable" in all cases, whether taken by the crown from the barons, or by the barons from their own men. And in the Confirmatio Cartarum of 1297 it is enjoined: "Aids henceforth shall only be by the common assent of the realm, saving the ancient aids and prises due and accustomed." Already by statute, in the third yeur of Edward I., the rate at which lords might take aids of their vassals was fixed at twenty shillings the knight's fee (i.e., about 5 per cent. of the annual value); the same rate in the twenty-fifth year of Edward III. was fixed for the feudal aids of the erown. It only remained to make the extraordinary aids, and especially tallage, dependent upon the assent of Parliament. This, after a long struggle, was effected by the concession made by Edward III. in 1340: "No aid to be henceforth but by assent of Parliament." The struggle was decided, though it was still necessary to guard against royal eva-sions. But after the Good Parliament, in 1376, it is not till national liberties were sileneed by the Yorkist and Tudor despotism that the old theory of a voluntary offering was again made a cover for arbitrary taxation, under the new name of benevolences.

But the crown, by working the theory of voluntary offerings, had also been able to negotiate with the merchants for large grants by way of increased eustoms, especially on wool; and to humour the clergy in their device to cvade the Bull Clericis Laices by accepting their tenths or fifteenths as free gifts. Parliament, therefore, had to take under its control these two great sources of revenue also, if it was to make the voluntary theory of taxation a reality. And so, in 1362, it is at last enacted that the merchants are to grant no charge on wool without assent of Parliament. The elergy, however, in their two Convocations, were wise enough to forestall direct interference on the part of l'arliament, which on its side accepted the compromise, as the erown had done. Thus, by the Lancastrian reigns, the class-taxation of the land-owners, merchants, and clergy was becoming harmonised into a simpler system of taxation, which should fall upon the whole nation rather than upon classes, and on personalty rather than mainly on As the subsidy on movables and the customs on exports and imports came in, the old aids died out. The last feudal aid was that taken by Edward III. in 1346, for knighting the Black Prince, which was protested against by the Commons Of the extraordinary aids, seutage was last taken in 1314. Seutages, indeed, were part of a military organisation of society that was now obsolete, as was that division into knight's fees, which were the basis on which they were assessed. Moreover-and this applies also to carucage and to tallage—they were bound up with a very imperfect method of representation, in which the class highest in the feudal scalo was supposed to speak for all. They required laborious collection by old and wasteful methods. But, above all, the two former were assessed on land, and let personalty escape; while tallage was peculiarly unprofitable, because a tallage by the king from his demesno had to be purchased by allowing his barons simultaneously to tallage theirs. The development of the wool-trade, and the existence of a national Parliament, alike necessitated the substitution of a simple national system; and the old, irregular, and imperfect system of aids disappears, not, however, without having bequeathed the great principle to our constitution—that taxation requires assent, and therefore must come through the Commons.

Aidan, Kino (b. 532, d. 606), the son of Gabran, succeeded Conal (574) as King of Dalriada. Aidan was crowned by St. Columba, in the island of Iona, and soon proved himself to be a ruler of energy and ability. In 575, at the Council of Drumscat, he successfully asserted the independence of the Scotch kingdom of Dalriada, throwing off the yoke of the Irish Dalriada. In 583 he defeated the English invaders at the battle of Manau, but in 596 was defeated in Kincardineshire Ly the Piets, four of his sons being slain. In 603 Aidan was again defeated by Ethelfrith of Northumbria at the battle of Dagsastan.

Aidan, St. (d. 651), was a monk in the Columban monastery of Iona. Upon the failure of a mission sent into Northumbria at the request of the King Oswald, who had learnt something of Christianity in Scotland, Aidsn was sent and was at once installed as bishop, with his see at Lindisfarne. He established Christianity, and was one of the most zealous snpporters of the unreformed Paschal Cycle; despite which Bede fully recognises his piety and integrity. To St Aidan many miracles are ascribed, the most remarkable of which is, perhaps, his reputed power of stilling the most violent tempest by the use of consecrated oil.

Aids, The Voluntary, was the name given to a grant of £120,000, made in 1628 by the Irish Parliament, payable in instalments of £40,000 a year in return for certain "Graces" or concessions from the crown. These payments were afterwards, especially by Strafford's action, renewed, and altogether continued for ten years. The Graces were never actually granted.

Aiguillon, Siege of (1347), was the most famous siege of the French wars of Edward III.'s reign. The fortress of Aiguillon was strongly situated on the borders of Gascony and Agenois, between the Lot and the Garonne, and it was bravely defended by Sir Walter Manny against John, Duke of Normandy, from May till the end of August. The duke had sworn never to quit the siege till the place was taken; and, finding his assaults ineffectual, resolved to reduce the place by famine. But the great victory of the English at Creey imperatively called for the presence of the duke's army in the north of France, and he was compelled to raise the siege.

Ailesbury, TROMAS BRUCE, 2ND EARL OF, and 3rd Earl of Elgin in Scotland (d. 1741), was present at the death-bed of Charles II. He took the oath of allegiance to William III., but, nevertheless, played a prominent part in the Jacobite conspiracies against the king. He was present at a meeting of Jacobites at the Old King's Head in 1695. He was sent to the Tower for his complicity in the Assassination Plot, and, in conjunction with Fenwick, attempted to bribe the witness Porter to leave the country. He, however, always denied that he had been privy to the criminal designs of the plotters. Macaulay remarks that "his denial would be the more creditable if he had not, by taking the oaths to the government against which he was so constantly intriguing, forfeited the right to be considered as a man of conscience and honour.'

Ailmer, Sir Laurence, was Sheriff of London in 1501, and subsequently Lord Mayor. He resisted the exactions of the king's rapacious minsters, Empson and Dudley, and was committed to prison in the last year of Henry VII.'s reign for refusing to pay the fine of £1,000 imposed upon him.

Airds Moss, Fight of (1680), in Ayrshire, was a small skirmish in which the royal troops routed a party of the extreme Scotch Covenanters, who had signed the "Sanquhar Declaration" (q.v.), or Cameronians, as they were subsequently called. Richard Cameron, the leader of the sect, fell in this encounter.

Aislabie, JOHN (b. 1670, d. 1742), was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Lerd Stanhope's ministry of 1717. In 1719 he defended the Peerage Bill. In 1720 he, with Sunderland, was requested by Stanhope to consider the proposals of the South Sea Company. They accepted them; and, accordingly, all the is ensity of popular indignation fell on them when the scheme fsiled. The inquiry elicited the fact that an extensive system of bribes had prevailed, and that large sums of fictitious capital had been invented and distributed among leading members of the Government. Aislabie's case was so flagrant that no one rose to defend him. He was expelled the House, and sent to the Tower. [South Sea Company.]

Air-la-Chapelle, TREATY OF (April 18, 1748), closed the War of the Austrian Succession. The initiative came from France, strengthened by her recent successes, and the strong desire for peace felt by England and Holland eventually forced the treaty on Austria and Sardinia. The principal articles were: -The renewal of all former treaties, and the mutual restoration of all conquests, England giving hostages for the restoration of Cape Breton; the fortifications of Dunkirk on the sea-side were to be demolished; the Duchies of Parma, Guastalla, and Piacenza were assigned to the Infant, Don Philip, but if he succeeded to the throne of Naples, the two first reverted to the house of Austria, and Piacenza to Sardinia; the Duke of Modena and the republic of Genoa were reinstated in their former territories; the Assiento Treaty with Spain was confirmed for four years; the Protestant succession in England was guaranteed according to the treaty of 1714, and the Pretender was to be excluded from France; the Emperor was to be acknowledged by France, and the Pragmatic Sanction guaranteed; the Duchy of Silesia and the county of Glätz were guaranteed to the King of Prussia, and the portions of the Milanese held by Sardinia were permanently surrendered by Austria. It resulted in the breach of the Austrian and English alliance.

Ajmeer, the chief town of a district in Rajputana, lying south-east of Jodpore. It was taken by the Mahrattas from the Moguls in 1770, and was for nearly half a century alternately in the hands of the Mahrattas and of rival Rajput princes. In 1818 it was finally ceded to the British in return for a payment of 50,000 rupees. The town contains the ruins of a very fine Hindoo temple.

Alban, St. (d. 305?), is generally held to be the proto-martyr of Britain. His story, as related by Gildas, is that Alban, being then a Pagan, saved a confessor, who was being pursued by his persecutors, and was at the point of being seized, by hiding him in his own house, and by changing elothes with Alban was carried before the magistrate, but having in the meantime become a Christian, he refused to sacrifice to the gods, and was accordingly executed just outside the great city of Verulamium (St. Albans). Numerous miracles are related of him, but, putting these aside, there seems no reason for doubting that he is a historic personage. The date of the martyr's death is a difficulty, as in 305 Constantius, the father of Constantine. was Caesar in Britain, who is known to have been very favourable to Christianity; perhaps we may place the event in 283, the dato assigned to it in the Saxon Chronicle.

Albany, Perrage of. In 1398 Robert Stuart (second son of King Robert II. of Scotland) was created Duke of Albany. On the execution of his son, Murdoch, second Duke of Albany, in 1425, the peerage was forfeited to the crown, but revived by James II. of Scotland, and conferred on his second son Alexander, who transmitted it to his son the Regent (1515—1523), John, Duke of Albany. In 1565, the title, being again extinct, was granted to Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley [Darnley], husband of Mary. Green of Scots. In 1772 the title of Counters of Albany was assumed by Louisa Maria of Stolberg-Gedern (1754—1823) on her marriage with Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender. Sbe quitted her husband in 1780, and after his death married the poet Alfieri. On being doserted by his wife, the Pretender affected to create his natural daughter, by Cleu ientina Walkinshaw, Duchess of Albany. The title of Albany was added to that of York in the peerages of Ernest Augustus, brother of George I., Ernest Augustus, brother of George II., and Frederick, second son of that king. By letters patent, May 24, 1881, Prince Leopold, fourth son of the Queen, was created Duko of Albany and Earl of Clarence. He died in 1884. [Stuart.]

Albany, ROBERT STUART, LET DUKE OF (b. 1339, d. 1419), the second son of Robert II., and the brother of Robert III., of Scotland, during his brother's later years practically governed the kingdom. His inertness on the inva-sion of Scotland by Henry IV. gave rise to the suspicion that he was plotting for the death of his nephew, David, Duke of Rothesay, wbo was besieged in Edinburgh Castle. That there may have been some truth in the supposition is likely; for soon afterwards Rothesay was seized at Albany's instigation, and imprisoned in Falkland Castle, where ho died of starvation, 1402. On his nephew's death Albany became governo. of the kingdom, and in that character gave support to a man whom he declared to be Richard II. of England, and whom he heped to be ablo to make use of against Hem, iV. The capture of the young Prince James by the English was also ascribed to his intrigues, whether justly or not is uncertain. On the death of Robert III. Albany continued to govern the kingdom as regent, until his own death, Sept. 3, 1419. In spite of his odious private character, Albany seems to have ruled Scotland with vigour, justice, and moderation.

See the Scotichronicon and Wyntoun, bk. ix., for different views of his character; and Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Albany, Murdoeh, 2nd Duke of (d. 1425), succeeded his father, Robert, as governor of Scotland, 1419, during the captivity of James I. in England. Upon James's return he was condemned and executed at Stirling, May, 1425, together with two of his sons, for having misused his power as regent.

Albany, Alexander, 3rd Duke of (d. 1485), was the second son of James II., and brother of James III., from whose jealousy he was compelled to take refuge in France, 1479. In 1483 he joined Edward IV. of England, executing a secret deed, in which he acknowledged the feudal supremacy of England over Scotland. After the affair at Landerbridge (q.v.), Albany returned to Scotland and assumed the government for a short time; but on the terms of his socret treaty leaking out, was again compelled to seek an asylum in England. Here he joined the Earl of Douglas in an invasion of Scotland, which failed, Albany being obliged to go to France, where he became a great favourite of Louis XI. He is described in the Chronicle of l'ittacottie as "verrie wyse and manlie, and loved nothing so weill as able men, and maid great coast and expences theirupoun."

Albany, John, 4th Dike of, Regent of Scotland from 1515 to 1524, was the son of Alexander, Duke of Albany, and nephew of James III. On the death of James IV., Albany, who was Lord High Admiral of France, was summoned to Scotland to assume the regency, a position which his French education had by no means fitted him to fill. He arrived in Scotland in 1515, and one of his first acts as regent was to crush the power of the Earl of Angus, whom he managed to get conveyed to France; his next, to bring to trial all whom he conceived to be in league with the Douglas party. In September, 1522, he collected an immense army for the invasion of England, to realiate upon Henry VIII. for having demanded his expulsion from the Scotch Estates. Henry, however, contrived by diplomacy to stay the blow before it had fallen, and Albany shortly after returned to France, where he collected an auxiliary force, 1523. Compelled, however, to raise the siege of Wark Castle, he retired to France in disgust, May, 1524, and never returned.

Albemarle (or Aumale), Peerage of. Odo or Eudes, a claimant of the county of Champagne, held considerable possessions at Albemarle, in Normandy. He married Adeliza, sister of William the Conqueror, and his wife, styled in Domesday Book "Comitissa de Albemarle," obtained large grants of land in England. Her son Stephen (1127) is called "Comes Albemarlensis," and the title was inherited by his son William, who greatly distinguished himself at the battle of the Standard. (See Sir Harris Nicolas' note in his Historic Peerage.) His heiress Hawisia carried the title to William de Fertibus (d. 1195), from whom it passed to their son, William de Fortibus, one of the twenty-five barons named in Magna Charta. His granddaughter Avelina married Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, second son of Henry III., so that the title and honours of Albemarle became sunk in the royal house. In 1397, Edward, Earl of Rutland, son of Edmund, Duke of York, was created Duke of Albemarle (or Aumale), but forfeited the title in 1399. In 1411, Thomas, second son of Henry IV., was created Duke of Clarence and Earl of Albemarle; he was killed at Beauge in 1421, when the peerage became extinct It was revived in 1423, in favour of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, who was grunted the title for life. It again became extinct on his death in 1439. In 1660

General George Monk was created Duke Albemarle. The title passed to his Christopher, and expired with him in 16 In 1696 the earldom of Albemarle was reviand conferred on William III.'s faith follower, Arnold Joost van Keppel, in whdescendants it has since remained.

Albemarle, Geonge Monk, Dike (b. 1608, d. 1670), was the second son of Devonshire baronet, entered the army as volunteer, and took part in the expedition the Isle of Rhe in 1628; and after per was made with France joined the Earl Oxford's regiment, which had been raised to the support of the Protestants in Germa and Holland. He remained abroad for t years, returning to England in 1639, in til to take part in the Seotch war. Afthesitating for some time between kin and Parliament, Monk decided on joining the forces which had been sent over fro Ireland by Ormond to Charles's assistance As major-general of these troops, Mor took part in the battle of Nantwich, whe he was taken prisoner and committed the Tower. Hore he remained for mo than two years, but in 1646 he was liberate and placed in command of the English force in Ulster. He was so badly supported the under Owen Roe O'Neil, for which he wa censured by Parliament, although the Inde pendent leaders had advised the treaty. Bu Monk had convinced Cromwell of his ability and on the latter being appointed, in 1650 to the command of the parliamentary force in Scotland, he made Monk lieutenant general of artillery. At the battle of Dunbar, Mon showed great bravery, and on Cromwell' return to England he was left to complet the reduction of Scotland, which he speedily effected, though not without considerable cruelty. In 1653, on the outbreak of the Dutch war, Monk was appointed one of the admirals of the fleet, and had a share in the great victory off the Texel. He returned to his command in Scotland in 1654, and re-mained there till the death of Oliver Cromwell when he acknowledged Riehard, and advised him to rely on the Presbyterian party, and endeavour to gather the old nobility and the country gentlemen round him. But during Richard's short reign anarchy prevailed in England. The Parliament had been forcibly dissolved by the army, and the Rump restored, only to be dispersed a few runths afterwards by the soldiers. Having tained a grant of money from the Scotch Estates, on New Year's Day, 1660, Monk crossed the border, and on February 3rd entered London. All opposition to him proved fruitless, and the Rump, which had been hurriedly resuscitated, hailed him as their deliverer. Perceiving the strength of the royalist reaction he determined to restore the monarchy, and sent an invitation

Albert, Prince (b. 1819, d. 1861), the husband of Queen Victoria, was the second son of the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and nephew to King Leopold of Belgium, and the Duchess of Kent. The prince was admirably and carefully educated, and in November, 1839, formally betrothed to his cousin, the Queen, to whom he was married February 10, 1840. By an Act passed just before this event, a sum of £30,000 a year was settled on the prince for life, the grant having been reduced from £50,000, the sum proposed by the Minlstry, by the efforts of the Radicals and the Opposition. By a subsequent Act of this session the prince was named regent in the event of the Queen's death before the heir to the crown attained the age of eighteen; and in 1857 he was designated "Prince Consort" by letters patent. He died, to the universal regret of the nation, of typhoid fever, Dec. 14, 1861. The prince's position, as husband of a constitutional sovereign, had been a peculiarly difficult and trying one. Apprehensions were frequently expressed in the earlier part of his married life that his influence would be too extensively exercised in matters of state; and during the years of the Crimean war it was asserted and popularly believed, though, as it was proved, without a shadow of foundation, that the prince had taken an undue share in the management of the army and the disposal of patronage. It was, however, gradually acknowledged that the difficult circumstances of his situation could hardly have been met with greater tact and conscientionsness, and with more thorough appreciation of the theory of constitutional monarchy. The prince The prince found a more congenial sphere than politics in the encouragement of the arts and in the promotion of social and industrial reforms, and to his efforts the inauguration and successful establishment of the Great Exhibition of 1851 were in great part due.

Albinus, CLODIES (d. 197), commander of the Roman forces in Britain, was proclaimed Emperor by the legions of the province on the assassination of Pertinax (193). His rival, Severus, who was declared emperor by the troops of Pannonia, at first attempted to win him over by favours; but in 197 marched against him and defeated and slew him at Lyons. This buttle of Lugdunum, or Lyons, is interesting as being the first recorded battle fought by a British army on the Continent.

Dio Cassius, Izziii. -v.

Albion was perhaps the oldest name for Britain. It occurs in a treatise once ascribed to Aristotle (Do Mando, c. 3, in Mon. Hist. Brit. i.), " ἐν τοὐτψ (κc. τψ 'Ωκεανψ) νῆσοι μέγισταί τε τυγχάνουσιν οδσαι δύο, βρεταννικαί λεγόμεναι, 'Αλβίον και 'Ιέρνη'' (cf. Bede, Hist. Ec., i. 1., in Mon. Hist. Brit., 108 A). "Rex Albionis insulæ" was a very favourito title of the more powerful Anglo-Saxon kings (see example in Freeman, Norm. Conq., i. 548-551), but in later times Albion mainly occurs in poetry. The word means "white," and its use was, perhaps, suggested by the chalk cliffs of the south-east coast. It is etymologically connected with "albus," "alp," &c., and is the Brythonic (Cymric) form of the Goidelic (Gaelic) "Albun," c.g., "Drum Albin" is "Dorsum Albionis" (Mon. Hist. Brit., 175 m).

Albuera, Battle of (May 16, 1811), during the Peninsular War, was fought by Beresford to check Soult, who was advancing to the relief of Badajos. Soult had with him 20 000 vets ran troops, while Beresfor hough he had nominally 30,000 men, ... 1 only depend on the handful of 7,000 Bri and troops. Ho had, however, taken up a strong position on a range of hills, in front of which ran the Albucra River; the British being in the centre, with Blake and the Spaniards on the right. During the night of the 15th Soult massed his men with a view to carrying the table-land which threatened the English right and rear, and on the morning of the 16th directed a feint attack in front. Beresford ordered Blake to change front, to guard against an expected flank attack on the right, but that general for a long time refused to obey orders, and the inovement was only at length carried out by Beresford in person, who, evon when he had changed the front of the Spaniards, could scarcely induce them to movo. Beresford was already thinking of retreating, when Colonel Hardinge with the 4th division, and Abercrombie with a brigade of the 2nd division, which had only been slightly engaged, pushed on to the high ground. The crowded formation of the French prevented them freexecuting any rapid movement; and, spite of a storm of grapeshot, the Briti infantry irresistibly pressed on till, "slow and with a horrid carnage, the French we pushed by the incessant vigour of the attack to the farthest edge of the hill The attempt to bring up reserves "on increased the irremediable confusion; and the mighty mass, breaking off like a loosem cliff, went headlong down the steep, an 1,800 unwounded men, the remnant of 6,00 unconquerable British soldiers, stood trius phant on the fatal hill." In four hou nearly 7,000 of the allies and 8,000 French had been struck down. tribes as described by Tacitus before the migration, and it continued to be occasionally used vaguely as an equivalent to loru or noble; but in all public documents the word is evidently taken in the strict sense of the chief magistrate of the shire or group of shires, and was not necessarily connected with nobility of blood, service, or large estate. This restriction of the title may be dated about the beginning of the ninth century, in the days of Egbert. The endorman was, in theory, elected in the Witenagemot, but the office became practically hereditary. As the power of the kingdem of Wessex 10se, and the smaller kingdoms were absorbed by it, the descendants of the royal houses often became hereditary ealdormen in almost unbroken succession; and when their lines became extinct, the caldormen appointed by the king, with the implied, if not expressed, consent of the Witan, transmitted the office to their des-Their jurisdictions became encendants. larged, probably by the aggregation of several shires under one rule. The position of the great caldormen was a high one; they were practically independent of weak kings. Their wergild, the fine exacted from those who killed them, was equal to that of the bishop, and four times that of the theyn, the king's being six times. The duties of the caldormau consisted in administering the shire conjointly with the sheriff, who represented the royal as opposed to the national authority. He commanded the military force of the shire, in which capacity he was sometimes called heretoga, the leader of the host (here); and he sat with the sheriff and the bishop in tho shiremoot, receiving a third of the fines levied in the jurisdiction. The ealdormen also attended the central Witenagemot, together with the bishops. In Ethelred's reign the name ealdorman began to be supplanted by the Danish title, sart, and this process was completed when Canute divided the kingdom inte four great ear loms. From that date the title sank to its eartier meaning of headman, and was applied to almost any local officer. Thus, in the thirteenth century there is an caldorman of the hundred, who represents his hundred in the shire moot. [See also EARL; SHEBIFT.

(2) Alderman, in its mediæval and modern sense, means an official invested with certain numicipal powers and duties, and associated with the mayor in the government of a city or town corporate. The word caldorman, or alderman, had, as has been shown, become applied to any headman or local officer, and accordingly, in the reign of Henry II., we find that the headman of a gild is called alderman. When, as happened in some of the great towns, the English system of a gild, or trade corporation, gradually lost its identity in the communa, or municipal corporation, the presiding officer of which was the mayor, the mayor and aldermen became associated in the government of the new munlcipalities. The first mayor of London was appointed in 1191, and the institution of mayor and aldermen in the large towns was pretty general by the end of the reign of John. The authority of the aldermen was, at first, by no means secure, and throughout the reign of llonry '.' the populace of London protested against their claim to assess taxation and elect the mayor. However, we find them, with four mon from each ward, sending members to Parliament in 1297, and their appointments, which were annual under Edward 11., were for life under Edward 1V. Under the Lancastrian kings, the mayor and aldermen are associated with the town conneils, relies of the carlier town government, which first consisted of twenty-four, and afterwards of larger numbers, and became prominent from the decay of the machinery of the local courts; the mayor, aldermen, and town council forming the elements of the municipal corporation. The numbers and sometimes the functions of the aldermen were settled in the charters of incorporation granted to the towns. Under the Stuarts, their powers were frequently tampered with from above by the forfeiture and alteration of the charters of incorporation, and the appointment of individual aldermen by royal authority; while they in turn usurped the privileges of the burgesses and freemen, became self-elective, and in some cases obtained the exclusive right of electing members of Parliament. Their electoral power, however, was taken from them by the Roform Bill, and 1835 the Municipal Reform Act and a subsequent Act in 1859 did nway with the old order of aldermen (except in London), and enacted that their successors were to be elected for six years instead of for life, one-half of their number retiring every third year; and that they should form one-third of the town councillors, from whom and by whom they were to be chosen. Under the Local Government Act, 1888, county aldermen are one-fourth of the members of county councils, and are elected by the rest from their own number or from outside. The alderman is represented in Scotland by the bailie; in Ireland he is elected by the burgesses. [Gild; Town.]

Aldfrid (EALDFRITH), King of Northumbria (685-700), was the son of Oswy, and brother of Egfrith, whom he succeeded. He was well instructed in theology and secular learning, and acquired the title of "the wiscet of kings." His territory was curtailed by the conquests of the Picts, but on the whole his re gn was prosperous.

Aldhelm, or Adelm, Sr., Bishop of Sherborne (b. circa 640, d. 709), was born in Wiltshire, and appears to have been connected with the family of the West Saxon kings. Early in life he was sent to study in Kent, and afterwards joined the community of scholars who had stadied under the Irish hermit, Meidulf, at Mahaesbury; of which monastery Aldhelm became abbot. He afterwards made a journey to Rome, and took part in the dispute with the British clergy about Easter. In 705 he was made Bishop of Sherborne. Aldhelm's learning was greatly celebrated. He wrote in the vernacular as well as in Latin, and has been called "the father of Anglo-Latin poetry." King Alfred considered him as among the best of English poets. He wrote a prose trentise, De Laude Virginitatis; and a poem, De Laude Virginum; some . Enigmata in verse; and some letters to Aldfrid of Northumbria and others.

Aldred (EALDRED), (d. 1069), Archbishop of York, was a monk of Winchester, who became Abbot of Tavistock, and in 1046 Bishop of Worcester. Like many of the native English prelates he travelled much on the Continent. Besides journeying to Rome, in 1050 he traversed Hungary and visited Jerusalem; and subsequently was sent by Edward the Confessor on a mission to the Emperor Henry III. In 1061 he became Archbishop of York, retaining the see of Worcester on commendam. The Pope refused to bestow the palliam on him till he gave up the see of Worcester. On the death of Edward, Aldred crowned Harold; but on the death of that princo he submitted to William, and in fact became a strong supporter of the new dynasty. He performed the coronation ceremony for the Conqueror, in default of Stigand. Several legendary tales are told of the latter part of his life, among which is the striking story that he cursed William for his evil deeds, and caused the king to fall trembling at his feet.

Ale-Taster, ALE-CONNER, or ALE-FOUNDER, was an officer appointed formerly in every manor and borough to examine and assay the beer and ale, and present dishonest ale-vendors to the next court-lect or borough-court. The assize of bread and ale (panic cerevisite), 51 Henry III., regulated the sellinand inspection of these two chief articles of food. The ale-tasters were chosen and sworn in the court-lect once a year. The office, which is of very great antiquity, still survives in some parts of England. It has been thought to owe its origin to the convivial feasts in which the business of the primitive Tentonic comunities was largely transpeted.

Alexander II., King of Scotland (a Dec. 5, 1214, d. 1249), was son and successon to William the Lion. The young king who was on friendly terms with the English barons, had to maintain a border army to frustrate the attacks of John until 1217. Carlisle surrendered to the Scots, and the Castle of Tweedmouth was demolished in 1217. In June, 1221, Alexander married Joanna, sister of Henry III. The next year Alexander entered Argyle, drove out all those who had been engaged in insurrections against the royal power, and turned the whole district into the sheriffdom of Argyle, creating also the bishopric of the same name. After a struggle of some years' duration he succeeded in 1235 in finally bringing Gallow y into subjection to the crown. The following year Alexander refused to do homage to the English king, and laid claim to the northern counties of England; at a conference between the two kings, at Newcastle, war was only averted by the strong inclination which the English barons showed for peace. In 1244 there was another rupture between the two kings, and war was imminent; but it was averted by the mediation of Richard of Cornwall and the Authbishop of York. In 1248, Alexander, after trying to induce llaco, King of Norway, to surrender the sovereignty of the isles, made an expedition to the Sudreys. He died, however, before accomplishing his object, near Oban, July 8, 1249, and was buried at Melrose. He married, as his second wife, Mary, daughter of Enguerrand de Couey. Alexander III., King of Scotland b. 1241, s. 1249, d. 1286), was the son of Alexander II. and Mary de Concy. In 1251, in accordance with the terms of the Trenty of Newcastle, he was married to his cousin Margaret, daughter of Henry III. In 1255, Henry procured the appointment of the Earl of Dunbar, who was favourable to his interests, as regent in the place of the Earl of Menteith, who, however, recovered his power. la 1263 a war broke out between Alexander and Haco of Norway, for possession of the Sudreys and the Norse districts on the mainland, which ended in the victory of the Scots at Largs (q.v.), and the consequent nanexation of the Isles to Scotland, 1266. In 1274 Alexander and his queen were present at Edward I,'s coronation; and in 1278 th-Scotch king did homage to his brother-in-law at Westminster, for lands held in England. On the death of his second son, Alexander, January, 1284, the king, left childless, sun-moned a meeting of the Estates at Scone, and caused them to recognise his grand-daughter, Margaret, the Maid of Norway, as their future sovereign. Shortly afterwards he married Yolande, daughter of the Count of Dreux, but died owing to a fall from his herse, near Kinghorn, in March, 1285. "To judge from the events of his reign," says Mr. Robertson, "he was an able, upright, and high-spirited sovereign."

Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln (d. 1148), was one of the family group of episcopal statesmen of Stephen's reign, of which Alexander's uncle, the Justiciar, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, was the head. By his influence he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and probably also held some office in the royal court. He was one of the bishops attributed by Stephen in 1139, and was kept in prison some considerable time. After his release he retired from political life, and was appointed Papal I vie in England. Henry of Huntingdon are lated his history to Alexander, and speaks of him in terms of the highest praise. He began the erection of the present cathedral of Lincoln, to replace the former one, which was destroyed by fire.

Alexandria, BATTLE OF (21st March, 1801), was fought by the British force under Sir Rulph Abercromby, which had been sent out to complete the destruction of the diminished remnant of Bonaparte's army after he had effected a landing in Aboukir Bay, in the face of a large French force, on the lat of March. During the next three weeks the French gradually fell back before the British, till they retired rato Alexandria. cromby now stationed himself to the east of Alexandria, with his right resting on some Roman ruins on the sea-shore, and his left on the Lake Mayadieh. Deprived of its general, the army was handled with an excess of caution. The French finally capitulated.

Alexandria, Bombardment of (1882). In May, 1882, owing to the disturbed state of Egypt, where the so-called "National Purty," under Arabi Pasha, had obtained a complete control of the government, and seemed bent on dethroning the Khedive, an English and French fleet was ordered to enter the harbour of Alexandria. An attempt of the Khedive to dismiss Arabi failed. On June 11th a fanatical outbreak occurred, and several hundreds of Europeans, including an officer of the fleet and the British consul, were killed or injured. The fortificatione of Alexandria were being constantly strengthened, till they menaced the safety of the British fleet. The English admiral, Sir Beauchamp Seymour, demanded that these works should be discontinued. On the 9th and 10th the foreign ships, including these of France, steamed out of the harbour. Eight ironelads and five gunboats began the bombardment on the 11th, destroying the forts and causing the garrison to evacuate the town. The loss of the English was trifling, though the Egyptians fought with bravery. Sir Beauchamp Seymour was raised to the peerage eader the title of Lord Alcester.

Alfred (b. 849? d. 901), called in his own times Elfbed Ethelwifing, in later, Alfred the Great; King of the West-Saxors between 874 and 901, was born at "the royal town that is called Wanating" (Wantage), in Berkshire. The date asually given on the authority of Asser is 849. But an earlier date, 842 or 843, for his birth would remove at least one difficulty in the story of his life, without raising, so far as the present writer can judge, any others that cannot be explained. Ho was the youngest son of King Ethelwulf and his wife, the Lady Osburgh, and the grandson of Egbert, and of Oslae, the pincerna, or cup-bearer, of Ethelwulf.

We are fold nothing of Alfred's childhood, and but little of his boyhood. In 853, says the Chronicle, his father sent him to home, when Leo (IV.) was Pope; and the Pope there consecrated him king, and took him as his spiritual son. The well-known account given in Asser of the way in which his lifelong love of letters was first kindled is now looked upon with considerable doubt. There is certainly more than one fatal objection to it, on the supposition that Alfred was born as late as 849. In 861 his mother had been dead at least six years; his father, who had taken as second wife a girl not much older than Alfred himself, and his chlest brother, who had married this some girl on her widowhood, were also dead, and another brother was king in the elder's place; but if we can bring ourselves to believe the date of Alfred's birth, as now printed, a blunder for an earlier, we can safely acquiesce in the literal truth of the beautiful story.

When we add to these scraps of information the facts that he lost his mother about 855, and his father in 858, we possess all that can be received as certain or admissible knowledge respecting his youth. The story that he went again to Home, as his father's companion, in 855, is discredited by the silence of the Chronicle on the subject. In 868 he married Aleswith, the daughter of Ethelred, surnamed Mickle (the Big , Earl of the Gainss, in Lincolnshire. If Asser's Life speaks the truth, the wedding festivities were not yet over when he was seized by a malady of so strange and mysterious a nature that the simple folk of the time suspected it to be the work of the devil. This would seem to have been some peculiar form of nervous disease. Its most painful feature was its periodic recurrence; it sometimes came upon him without a minute's warning, and paralysed powers on occasions that demanded t fullest exercise. In the same year, wit a fer weeks, perhaps, he was called n to face, for the first time, what proved be the one mighty task of his life. Danes had fallen upon the land of the M cions. Nottingham was won back, by force, but by a treaty-which proba meant a bargain that gave the English breathing space, and the Danes u fair pr on their adventure. Three years later (871) Alfred was su

At Easter Ethelred died; and Alfred was made king. In another month he was again at handgrips with his dogged foes—this time at Wilton—and was again beaten. Thus Alfred's reign began with defeat. He now either lost heart, or concluded that further fighting was useless; for in a short time he came to terms—perhaps struck a bargain—with the men he had failed to overcome; and early next year the Danes marched away from his kingdom.

If it was his design to gain time to repair his strength, he was wise to make peace. After 871 the land had entire rest for four years, and comparative rest for three more, though other parts of England were smarting under the rapacity and ferocity of the merciless strangers. Some use of this respite the king must have mado: he is recorded as having, in 875, attacked and put to flight seven Danish ships. During the next and following years (876-877) he was also strong enough to force a treaty upon a powerful force that had landed in Dorset, and exact oaths and hostages from them. He found it no casy matter to get rid altogether of the intruders; but in the autumn of 877 they at length sailed away from Exeter to the land of the Mercians. But this deliverance almost brought his kingdom to the brink of ruin. In the first week of 878 the Danish army stole up from Gloncester, and, coming upon the West-Saxons unawares, seized Chippenlam. The surprise was complete; so sudden and so swift was the movement, that they had ridden over and taken to themselves the greater part of the kingdom before a sufficient force could be brought together to make head against them at any point. Many people fled beyond the sea; Alfred alone refused to despair; "uneasily, with a little band of warriors, he went along the woods, and into the moor-fastnesses." In one of these he at last halted, and began, with the faithful few that followed him, to throw up a defensive work—thrice-famous ever since as Athelney, the Isle of Nobles, called so, no doubt, from the trusty handful of high-horn men that plied the mattock around the king. It covers a few acres it little south of Sedgmoor, in Somerset. To i's narrow compass the last English kingdom had shrunk.

But it was a brief agony, after all. The Danes would seem to have been drawing their toils round Athelney; they threw a considerable detachment on the neighbouring coast, which was beaten with great loss, and Alfred was untiring in his assaults upon them from his stronghold. The country recovered from its surprise, and, some weeks after Easter, Alfred quitted Athelney, and met the levies of the three shires at Eghertstone, on the eastern skirts of Selwood Forest. With these he went straight upon the enemy, met them at Edington (a place that, like Egbertstone, has not been identified with certainty), overthrew their host, and chased weeks into their fortress. A siege of fourteen days ended in the Danes engaging to withdraw from Wessex, and their king, Guthorm, consenting to become a Christian. These pledges were punetually kept. At Aller the buptismal ceremonies were begun; at Wedmore they were completed; and soon after, the army of the invaders marched away from Chippenham. Thus was Wessex snatched from destruction, and, with Wessex, the destiny of the English race. Never, perhaps, had a nationality eome so near, and yet escaped, extinction.

The next lifteen years (878-893) may be called a time of peace for Alfred and his people. During them the flame of war left the ancient kingdom untouched; such fitful bursts of fighting as broke the general stillness either fell upon the outlying districts, as Kent and Surrey, or had the sea as their scene of action; and the king was successful in all. But to these years almost certainly belong the great measures that make the second half of England's debt to Alfred-the effacement of the ravages of war, the restoration of material prosperity, the re-invigoration of the national defonces, the improvement of the laws, the rekindling of religion, the "relighting of the lamp of learning." The first two of the above damage done to towns and cities, raising public buildings, reclaiming waste lands, and making or renewing roads and bridges, Our knowledge of the third is vague; but to the fyrd, or levy en masse, of the people, he sought to give greater rapidity and flexibility of movement; and he reformed the naval system by making the ships themselves instruments of war, not mere platforms for fighting from. As a legislator, he added nothing to existing laws, but simply revised those of his predecessors, keeping "those that seemed to him good," rejecting "those that seemed to him not good," and combining the former into a single code. Religion and letters had sunk so low among the West-Saxons that he had to seek the agents of their regeneration in foreign lands. From Wales he drew Asser; from Mercia, Werfrith and Plegmund; Grimbald and John the Old Saxon from the Continent; and with their help reanimated the services of the Church, founded schools, and encouraged literary composition in the native tongue. At this last he was himself a diligent worker, as translations (that are not mere translations) of large portions of the writings of Boethius, Orosius, Bede, and Gregory the Great still survive to prove. Men in later times loved to dwell on this feature of his career; in a mediceval list of West-Saxon kings, his name is specially distinguished as "litteratus." But in 893 the dogs of war were again let slip on his kingdom, and the old hideous scenes of pillage, slaughter, and havoe wero renewed. The chief leader of these fresh swarm of marauders was the terrible Hastings. For four years ho dragged Alfred up and down, across and along, the country, making treaties and breaking them, getting again and again ceaten, both by land and by sea, hut recovering himself after every defeat, and refusing to be driven from the land. The value of the king's military reforms was thus effectually tested; and they muy be said to have fairly stood the strain. In every recorded encounter -as at Farnham, Benfleet, Buttington—the West-Saxons over-threw their foes. The upshot at length was that the Danes, beaten, out-generalled, and checked at every turn, got weary of an unprofitable enterprise, broke up into several bands, and went off in different directions, leaving Wessex at peace. The heroic king's work was now done. "Six nights before Allhallowmas," in the year 961, he died.

Alfred is one of the few historical characters that all writers delight to honour; almost with one consent historians have pronounced that he comes pretty nearly as close to perfection as a man and a king as any ruler of whom there is record. This verdict may be accepted as final; it is certainly not likely to be ever successfully impeached. To his goonness, nobility of character, moral greatness, heroism, his whole life is a testimony. Alfred the Good and Steadfast he assuredly was; and if it may be plausibly hinted that he was a little lacking in the sagacity, originality, forecast, and efficient provision for the future, without which no human greatness is complete, it may yet be pleaded that such a raro combination of moral and intellectual excellence amply justified the writers of the seventeenth century in styling him ALFRED THE GREAT.

No collected edition of these exists; but the Preface to St. Gregory's Pastorals has been three times published (by Archbishop Parker in 1574, by Sanden in 1603, by Wise in 1722); the translation from Bede twice (at Cambridge, in 1643 and 1722); the translation from Boethius twice (at Oxford in 1698, and at London in 1829; Alfred's Will twice (at Oxford in 1768, and at London in 1838; his translation from Oronius once (at London in 1773); and of the Metres of Boethius once (at London in 1835). There is a Life of Alfred the Great by Dr. R. Pauli (translated by Wright, London, 1852).

Alfred (or Alured) of Beverley, Treasurer of the Clurch of Beverley in the first half of the twelfth century, wrote nine books of Annales, which were first printed by Ilearne, in 1716. A very large part of Alfred's work is mere compilation from Geoffrey of Monmouth and Henry of Huntingdon. It is evident, therefore, that must have written at least as late as year 1138—9, about which time the Bri History of Geoffrey is supposed to happeared, and that the dates usually gi for his death (1126 or 1136) ure erroned It is probable that the Annales were written about 1143.

Alfric (ÆLFRIC), surnamed Abbas as Grammaticus, was an ecclesiastic of the tercentury, and the writer of numerous wor in Anglo-Saxon. He received his early eccation from a secular or "mass-priest." was a pupil of Ethelwold at Winchest and he became Abbot of Evesham. Ælfric works, which include a grammar, a number sermons, a treatise on astronomy (see Wrigh Popular Treatises on Science during the Mide Ages), and some Canons, are interesting the student of Anglo-Saxon literature, as have considerable importance as regards that of the English Church in the tent century both as to doctrine and disciplin The writer has often been confused with another Alfric or Ælfric, Archbishop (Canterbury, who died during the closin years of the tenth century.

Alfred (ÆLFRED) the Etheling (d. 1036?), was the son of Ethelred II. an Emma. On the death of his father he flee to Normandy, where, together with hi brother Edward (the Confessor), he seems thave remained till the reign of Harold, 1036 when, either alone or accompanied by Edward he made an expedition to England for the purpose of obtaining the crown. Ho was entrapped, together with his Norman followers, by means of an ambuscade near Guildford, and conveyed to the monastery of Ely; by the orders of Harold, he was either blinded and died of the pain, or was actually murdered. The question whether Godwine had any share in this is a vexed one, but it is certain that he was at the time suspected of being an accomplice; and it was also suspected that Emma was privy to the treachery and violence which brought about the end of Alfred, in order that the crown might be assured to his half-hrother Harthaknut.

Harold was sent against them, and peace was quickly made, one of the conditions being that Algar should be restored to his earldom. In 1057, on his father's death, he succeeded to the carldom of Mercia. Algiers, Bombardment of (1816), was conducted by the English fleet in consequence of the ravages made by the Algerine pirates on the commerce and coasts of the Mediterranean. The work was entrusted to Lord Exmouth, who at first attempted by negotiations to unite the states of Barbary in an effort to suppress the pirates. In May, 1816, while Exmouth was absent in England, pending the result of his negotiations, 2,000 Algerine troops attacked the Italian coralfishers, who were attending mass under the protection of the British flag, and massacred the whole of them. Exmouth at once set sail, with a force of five ships of the line, five frigates, and some bomb-vessels. At (iibraltar Lord Exmouth received a reinforcement from the Dutch admiral, Capellen, who desired to be allowed to join in the siege. On the 27th of August the fleet reached Algiers, and a messenger was at once dcspatched with an ultimatum to the Dey. This the Dey refused to receive, and Lord Exmouth, at once leading the way towards the harbour, anchored as close as possible to the mole, and opened fire. The battle lasted from two o'clock in the afternoon till ten o'clock when, the batteries having been nearly all silenced, and fearful destruction wrought in the town, the British fleet ceased firing. Next day Lord Exmouth sent off a despatch, offering the Dev peace on the conditions of the ultimatum. The chief of these related to the abolition of the slave-trade for the future, and the immediate restitution of all Christian slaves without ransom. The conditions were immediately agreed to.

Alien Priories. [MONASTICISM.]

Alienation of Land. [LAND, TENURE

Aliens. By our Common Law, nationality depends on the place of birth. Every one born in a land not subject to the sovereign of this country was an alien. Jews also, though born in this kingdom, were regarded in the same light. [Jews.] This H18T.-2 doctrine has been modified by statute. By 25 Ed. III., st. 2, all, whose father and mother at the time of their birth were in allegiance [Alleolance], were so far to be held natural-born subjects as to be capable of inheritance. And it was held that the nationality of the mother mattered not, if her husband was a British subject. Aliens could become subjects by denization, which conferred a kind of middle state between a natural-born subject and an alien. position was sometimes obtained (temp. Hen. VIII.) by Act of Parliament, but as a rule by letters patent. Naturalisation was obtained only through Parliament until the reign of Queen Victoria. All children born in Scotland after the accession of James I. to the throne of England (post-nati) were held, by the decision in Calvin's case, to be natura'-born subjects of England. [Post-Nati.] In the same reign it was determined (7 Jas. I., c. 2) that no alien should be naturalised until he had taken the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and conformed to the sacramental test. From a desire to strengthen the Protestant interest, an Act was passed (7 Anne, c. 5), naturalising all Protestant residents on their sing the oaths, &c., and declaring the children of all naturalised British subjects to be naturalborn. This statuto was repealed, as regards its earlier provision, shortly afterwards. Seven years residence in the American colonies was made (13 Geo. II., c. 7) to confer naturalisation on a Protestant alien. During the war consequent on the French Revolution, various statutes were passed, as 33 Geo. III., e. 4, placing aliens under supervision, and giving the Secretary of State power to remove them, if suspected, out of the kingdom. The demand of the First Consul, in 1802, for the expulsion of the French emigrants was one of the causes which led to a renewal of the war. The 7 and 8 Vict., e. 66, allowed naturalisation to be conferred by the certificate of a Secretary of State. By the Naturalisation Act (33 and 34 Viet., c. 14), a woman, who has become an alien by a foreign marriage, may, after her husband's death, be re-admitted to nationality, in this case her children, though born of her alien husband, will also gain the position of British subjects. By naturalisation in a foreign state, British subjects are allowed to become aliens. This Act also provides for the grant of certificates of naturalisation to aliens who have resided within the kingdom, or served the crown, for five years, and for the grant of a limited nationality by the legislature of British colonies within their own borders. Aliens have been regarded with jealousy both for political and commercial reasons.

During the fourteenth century they were often made the subjects of special taxation. By the Great Charter, art. 41, alien merchants were allowed to trade freely. The privileges of the mercantile statutes of Edward I. were extended to them. The king favoured them because they granted him customs. Parliament, however, interfered with these grants in 1303, and at other times. [Customs.] English merchants were jealous of these foreign competitors. In 18 Edward I. the citizens of London petitioned that they might be banished. This was refused. Vexations restrictions were laid upon alien merchants in the reign of Richard III., and were increased by 32 Hen. VIII., c. 16. Aliens are subject to, and under the protection of, the criminal law. By express provision, they also are subject to, and have the advantages of, the Bankruptcy Acts. Aliens by the Common Law lay under great disabilities. An alien could not take nor transmit land by descent. He could not hold land either for his own benefit or in trust. Until 8 Hen. V., c. 16, the alien wife of an English subject could not demand her dower. Aliens might, however, hold benefices, for the Church was Catholic. An alien could not have an action for land in his own name, but he might have an action for personal property. His witness was received, but he could not serve on a jury, except on one partly composed of aliens for the trial of aliens (de medietate linguæ). These disabilities have to a great extent been removed by statute. By 33 and 34 Vict., c. 14, an alien may acquire by inheritance or purchase. He may hold any kind of property in this kingdom, except a share in a British ship; and title to land may be derived from or through an alien, but no property confers on him a qualification for franchise or public office. An Aliens Act was passed in 1905 to eheck the immigration of undesirable aliens. It came into operation on January 1, 1906.

Aligurh, Capture of (Aug. 29, 1803), occurred in General Lake's campaign against the Mahrattas. Aligurh, the great military arsenal of the French army of Dowlut Rao Scindiah, in Hindostan, was very strongly fortified, and further protected by a ditch, 100 feet wide, and 30 feet deep, containing 10 feet of water. General Lake, however, was determined to take it, and it was captured by the irresistible gallantry of the 76th Highlanders, commanded by Major Macleod, who blew pen the gate, and forced their way in through the most intricate and loop-holed passages, raked by a destructive fire of grape, wall-pieces, and matchlocks. The number of guns captured was 281. The Duke of Wellington called it "one of the most extraordinary feats he had ever heard of."

All the Talents, MINISTRY OF (1806), was the name given to the administration which was called into existence on the death of William Pitt. An attempt was made to include in the new government representatives of all the three parties—the Tories, the Moderate Whigs, and the Extreme Whigs, whose sympathies had all along been with France. Lord Grenville became Prime Minister; Fox, Foreign Secretary; Erskine, Lord Chancellor; Lord Fitzwilliam, President of the Council; Lord Sidmouth, Lord Privy Seal: Windham, Minister of War; and Lord Spencer, Home Secretary. Lord Ellen-borough, the Lord Chief Justice, was also, by a somewhat startling innovation, admitted into the Cabinet. In spite, however, of this singularly imposing array of talent, the Cabinet was composed of elements much too discordant to admit of any perman-ent harmony; and Fox's carly death removed the commanding mind which alone could possibly have held together men of such different views. One great measure was passed, which will always be associated with this ministry — viz., the abolition of the slave-trade. Little clse of permanent interest was effected. Foreign politics were of too vital an importance to admit of any progress in domestic reform; and Fox himself devoted all his ability to negotiating a peace with France, and too late learned to gauge the restless ambition of Napoleon, with the result of being convinced that his long-cherished hope of peace was in vain. On March 25th, 1807, the ministry, which had been greatly weakened by the disaffection of some of its members, resigned office, on being required by the king not only to drop the Catholic Relief Bill they had brought in, but also to piedge themselves never to introduce any such measure in the future. They were succeeded by the administration in which the Duke of Portland was Prime Minister. [Fox, C. J.; GRENVILLE, LORN.]

Allahabad, the capital of the North-West Provinces of India, was one of the strong towns of the old Mogul dynasty. At the break-up of the Mogul empire it fell under the yoke of the Vizier of Oude, by whom it was ceded to the Company in 1765, and handed over to the dethroned Mogul Emperor, Shah Allum. In 1771 it was, however, handed to the Nawab of Oudh, by whom it was ceded back to the English in 1801. The town contains the remains of a magnificent palace of the Emperor Akbar.

Allegiance (Lat. alligo, through Low Lat. ligancia, and Norm. French, ligeance), means the tie which binds each man of a nation to its head in return for the protection allowed him. The idea of allegiance existed in England at an early date. The duties of the king towards the subject were expressed in the promise of Ethelred to govern righteously; those of the subject towards the king in the treason-law of Alfred, and in the laws of his son Edmund (about 943) we have the first recorded oath of allegiance. "All shall swear, in the name of the Lord, fealty to King Edmund as a man ought to be faithful to his lord, without any controversy or quarrel in open or in secret, in loving what he shall love, and not willing what he shall not will." It was to counteract the disruptive tendencies of feudalism, and to assert the royal power, that William I., at the Council of Salisbury, A.D. 1086, caused "all his witan and all the land-owners of substance, whose vassals soever they were," to swear an oath of allegiance to him, which in form was a modification of that of Edmund; and there is a clause directing every free man to take the oath in the so-called Laws of William. Nevertheless, from that date, inasmuch as ownership of land was the sign of the relative to the control of land was the sign of the control of land was the control of land was the sign of land was the sign of land was the control of land was the sign of land was the control of tions between ruler and subject, and all land was held of the king, the idea of allegiance became, as far as he was concerned, identified with those of fealty and homage, though the two last concerned in reality owners of land in the connection of vassal and lord, and had no necessary connection with kingship. This change is to be found in the oath of allegiance to Edward I., which was imposed on all over the age of fourteen. With the growth of the idea of loyalty and legitimacy under the Lancastrian and Yorkist kings, the theory became prominent among legal writers. Meanwhile another idea had been growing up—that of the oath of office; it was asserted in the reign of Henry III. by the Provisions of Oxford, and probably existed even earlier in the case of sheriffs and the king's councillors, and in the reign of Edward II. the Despencers were banished by Parliament for misapplication of allegiance. It was not, however, imposed by statute on all persons holding office until the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the promise then being "to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honour, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him without defending him therefrom." This outh might be exacted when necessary from all persons over the age of twelve. James I. also imposed a special oath en Roman Catholics, in which he bound them to disclose conspiracies against him, in spite of any excommunication by the Pepe, thus attacking his supposed deposing power. The oath of allegiance was imposed afresh after the Revolution by the Declaration of Right; but as the form enjoined by it differed from the form imposed by statute, it was determined, in 1689, to pass an Aet abolishing the old oaths, and determining by whem the new oaths should be The form agreed upon was much the same as that at present in use, but a violent controversy arose as to the class of men who should be required to take it. It was should be required to take it. It was unanimously agreed that it should for the future be applied to all who were admitted to civil, military, or academical offices; but it was felt that to make it retrospective would be to make large bodies of the clergy, who believed in the doctrine of the divine right of kings, resign their livings. On this point the House of Lords and William III. were disposed to be merciful, and exempt the clergy from the oath; but the Cemmons refused to give way, and finally it was decided that all those who refused to take the eath by February, 1690, should be deprived of office. The ferms of the oaths of abjuration and supremacy were also settled at the same date. A single oath was, however, substituted for the three in 1858, and in the same year this was adapted to the use of Catholies and Jews. By the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, the form of oath was fixed as follows:—'1, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to the law. So help me God!" The oath of allegiance is imposed on all officers of state, holders of appointments in the Supreme Court of Judicature, and justices of the peace, though in some cases a simple affirma-tion is allewed; but members of Parliament, on whom the obligation to take the oath of allegiance was imposed in 1679, and again in 1714, now use a special form of oath provided by the Parliamentary Oaths Act of Alleluia Victory, The (429?), is the name given to a victory of the Britons over the Picts and Saxons. The story, as told by Bede (whe copies from Constantius, Sanci. of Easter, placed himself at the bead of Britons, and drew up his troops in a valencompassed by hills, in the way by what the enomy was expected. As soon as they appeared, Germanus, bearing in his heads standard, instructed his men to repeat words in a loud voice, and as the enemy vanced securely, thinking to take them surprise, the men cried three times aloue "Alleluia!" Allen, John (b. 1473, d. 1534), had bee Archbishop Warham's agent at Rome, an was afterwards employed by Wolsey i visiting the smaller monasteries, with a viet to their suppression. In 1528 he was mad Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor of Ireland. In these capacities he headed the opposition to the Earl of Kildare. In 153 he was seized by Kildare's orders, and brutally murdered.

Allen (or Allan), Cardinal William (b. 1532, d. 1594), was at one time Principal o St. Mary Hall, Oxford, and Canon of York during the reign of Mary. In 1568 he estab lished a seminary at Douay, in order to train priests fer England. Subsequently he founded a college at Rheims, and another at Rome. Becoming closely connected with the Jesuits, he entered into various schemes for the subversion of Elizabeth's throne, and advocated a Spanish invasien of England. In 1580, by his aid, a number of Jesuits were dispatched to England to prepare the people for rebellion; and, until the destruction of the Spanish Armada, Allen continued to inveigh against Elizabeth in the most virulent terms. In 1587 he was made a cardina, by the Pope, in aeknowledgment of his services to the Roman Cathelic cause, and received a rich abbey from the King of Spain. In 1588 he published at Antwerp his violent and scurrilous pamphlet against Queen Elizabeth, entitled An Admonition to the People of England (q.v.). Alliance, THE GRAND, THE HOLY, &c. [GRAND ALLIANCE, HOLY ALLIANCE, &c.]

Alma, BATTLE OF THE (Sept. 20, 1854), fought during the Crimean War. After their landing at Eupatoria, the allies marched southwards along the coast, meeting with no resistance. The allied srmy consisted of 27.000 English, 22,000 French, and 5,000 Tarks. Princo Mentschikoff, the Russian general, had determined not to allow them to march without opposition on Sebas-topol. He entrenched himself strongly on the heights which overlook the river Ahna, about sixteen miles to the north of Sebastopol, with the river between him and the foe. The allies came up under a heavy fire, forced their way through the river, and struggled bravely up to the Russian entrenchments, which, after a slight momentary waver along the whole line, they carried at the point of the bayonet. The Russians retreated slowly, with their usual dorged persistency, in spite of their heavy losses. The sllies were too much fatigued and too weak in cavalry to be able to follow up the advantage they had gained. The victory was in great part due to the determined advance of the British up the height in the face of a terrible fire.

Kinglake, Invasion of the Crimea,

Almansa, Battle of (April 25, 1707), was one of the battles of the Succession War in Spain. Peterborough, who had been most successful, was superseded by Lord Galway, an experienced veteran, " who thought it much more honourable to fail according to rule than to succeed by innovation." On the plain of Almanza he encountered the French, under the Duke of Berwick. As Berwick was stronger than the allies in cavalry, it was rush in Galway to act on the offensive; but he wished to drive the French from Valencia. Berwick had drawn up his troops with his infantry and artillery in the centre, and his cavalry on the flanks. The English commander committed the grave mistake of drawing up his infantry in line close in the rear of his cavalry. Galway's attack on the French right was at first successful, and the French centre was for a moment driven back. On the right of the allies the Portuguese cavalry, under the Marquis de los Minas, as usual turned and fled; their infantry were cut to pieces. The English centre was and thus completely ronted, they were com-pelled to surrender. The victory was decisive and important. Valencia and Arragon were at once reconquered by the French. "The battle of Almanza," says Macaulay, "decided the fate of Spain."

Almenara, Battle of (July 10, 1710), resulted in a victory for the allied armies in Spain. Through the month of June the two armies were engaged in marches and manceuvres. At length General Stanhope overruled the scruples of his colleague, the Imperial general, Staremberg, and advanced across the Segre. He also secured the passage of the Noguera, the Spanish general being too late to intercept him. The two armies were face to face near the village of Almenara. Staremberg was still averse to an engagement; but the spirits of the English regiments had been roused by the sight of the cnemy, and they murmured loudly at their forced inactivity. At length, two hours before nightfall, Stanhope obtained permission from the Archduke Charles to attack some Spanish regiments who had attack some Spanish regiments who had advanced in a spirit of bravado. He charged at the head of the cavalry. "The allied squadrons on the right had easy work in routing the left wing of the enemy; but opposed to the English and Dutch was the splendid body-guard of Philip, regiments of picked soldiers, not inferior in courage or discipline to the renowned household troops of the French king." A furious struggle ensued, Stanhope himself slaying the com-mander of the Spanish cavalry. The king's troops at length gave way, and had a few hours of daylight remained it is probable that the whole army would have been destroyed. Philip hastily retired on Lerida, and fell back first to the line of the Cintra, and then to the line of the Ebro.

Almon, John (b. 1737, d. 1805), after an adventurous career in early life, became acquainted with Churchill and Wilkes, and published a defence of Wilkes's "Essay on Woman." In 1763 he set up as bookseller and publisher. He published "The Foundling Hospital for Wit," a collection of party squibs, and "The Parliamentary Register," an account of the debates in Parliament. In 1765 he was tried in the Court of King's Bench for publishing a pamphlet, "On Juries, Libels, &c.;" and in 1770 he was again tried for publishing Junius's Letter to the King, and was fined ten marks. He amassed a large fortune in his trade, much of which he lost by an unfortunate newspaper enterprise. To add to his misfortunes, he was again prosecuted for libel, and afterwards was proclaimed an outlaw. The rigour of the law, however, was soon relaxed, and he retired once more to his villa at Boxmoor, from which, in 1792, he sent forth a work called "Ancedotes of the Life of the Earl of Chatham." In 1805, he published "Tho Life and Letters of Mr. Wilkes." He died on the same day as Woodfall, the publisher of Junius.

Almorah, CAPTURE OF (April 25, 1815), took place in the Goorkha War. Colonel Gardner, with a body of irregular troops, occured the Chilkeenh pass, and proceeded to Almorah, the eapital of the province of Kumaon, along the Cosillas river. The Goorkhas withdrew as he advanced. Being reinforced by 2,000 regulars, under Colonel Nicolls, on April 25 the heights and town of Almorah were attacked with rapid success. Two of the enemy's breastworks on the Sittolee ridgo were carried by the regular infantry, and the irregular troops attacked and carried the remaining three. During the night an unsuccessful attempt was made to dispossess the victors of their advantago. In the morning the fort was vigorously attacked, and by nine in the evening the Goorkha commander agreed to terms, by which the province and fortresses of Kumaon were surrendered to the English. Alnwick, Northumberland, in 1093 was besieged by Malcolm Canmore, of Scotland, who was slain before its walls. In 1135 it was taken by David, of Scotland. In 1174 it was besieged by William the Lion, who was taken prisoner in a battle fought under the walls. In 1215 Alnwick was destroyed by John. In 1310 it passed into the hands of the Percies. In Northumberland's rebellion in 1403, the castle was temporarily seized by the king; and about the middle of the fifteenth century it was burnt by the Scots. During the rebellion of the Northern lords, in 1569, it was fortified by the Earl of Northumberland for the asurgents. Alnwick Abbey was a priory of Premonstratensian canons, founded by Eustace Fitz-John, and riehly endowed by tho De Vescies and the Percies.

Alodial Land is land which is the absolute property of its occupier, and is not held by rent, service, or other obligation from a superior. The "alod," which name occurs in Anglo-Saxon documents of the eleventh century, and in its Latinised form, is found in the Salian and other Continental codes and documents, was land held in full ownership, whether derived by inheritance, or created from the public land by grant or charter. In the latter case, as deriving its title from some book or document, it was called Booland (q.v.). In England, as in other countries which came under the effects of feudalism, the smaller alodial proprietors found themselves pracally obliged, for the sake of security a protection, to commend themselves to so neighbouring lord, surrendering their last to him, and receiving them back again some feudal tenure. Thus the alodial latended to disappear, and in England the process received a great impetus by the Norm Conquest, and the theoretical transfer of land to the crown, which followed. According to the theory of English law, there therefore no alodial land in Great Brita and Ireland, all land being occupied by tenurand held either directly or indirectly from the crown.

The derivation of alod has been much decussed. Grimm, Deutsch. Wörterbuch, associatit with the root od, wealth, found in A. ead, and Lat. ops; others take it as connect with lot, and as meaning primarily that which obtained by lot, or division of the original tribland. It is not improbable that there is connection between allod and edd, or edd the word signifying inheritance, and special the inherited homestead, with "the share arable and appurtenant common rights" (Pr. Stuhhs), and which also came to mean nobilit of hlood and race. (See Skeat, Etymologic Dictionary.)

Ambassadors. Different ranks and titles exist among the diplomatic representatives of states. Ambassadors hold the first place. Next below them are Envoys and Ministers Plenipotentiary. In the third rank are Residents and Charges d'Affaires. The distinction between these classes is one of dignity, and depends on the nature of their commission, or the fulness of the representative character with which the agent is invested by his court. This representative haracter exists in perfection in the office of an ambassador. There is, however, no distiuction between these agents as to their rights and privileges. From the time when England, by the conversion of ita people, became part of European Christendom, its sovereigns have from time to time sent embassies to other lands, and received the representatives of their rulers. While, however, the mediæval system continued, and Christendom was regarded as one body politic under the Emperor and the Pope, the mission of ambassadors was occasional, and unregulated y law. As the medizeval polity gave place to a system of independent states, the matter of ambassadors received the attention of jurists. Ambassadors were at first sent only on special occasions. Long residence was regarded with jealousy by the state which received the embassy, e.g., Coke praises Henry VII. because he was too predent to allow ambassadors to reliability. prudent to allow ambassadors to reside within his realm. This feeling died out in the seventeenth century. After the Peace of West-phalia, 1648, resident ambassadors were generally employed by most of the nations of the civilised world. Ambassadors may therefore be classed as either ordinary, resident, or extraordinary. Every sovereign state has a right to send and receive ambassadors, unless it has renounced that right. Mazarin, in 1659, received the ambassadors of Oliver Cromwell at the Congress of the Pyrenees, and rejected those sent by Charles II. A prince who has lost his sovereignty cannot claim to be represented by an ambassador; and so far at least the civilians of Elizabeth were right when, in 1567, they refused to recognise the Bishop of Ross, the agent of the Queen of Scots, as an ambassador. The right of rebels to embassy must be decided by circumstances. To avoid difficulty, a foreign country in such cases sometimes receives from an insurgent state agents invested with the immunities, but not with the representative character of ambassadors. The right to do this was asserted by Lord Russell, in 1861, in the Trent affair. A state cannot reasonably refuse to anair. A sate can be an embassy, though it may make an objection to receive any particular ambassador. In 1625, Louis XIII., not without reason, refused to receive the Duke of Charles I Buckingham as ambassador of Charles I. The right of inviolability attaches to all ministers representing their sovereign or their state, not only in the country to which a representative is sent, but in any other through which he may have to pass. In 1587, Anbespine, the French ambassador, was found to have been privy to a plot against the life of the queen. Burleigh, however, did not bring him to trial because of his right as an ambassador. The inviolability of an ambassador extends to his snite. It is doubtful, however, whether in this case it is equally full in respect of gross crimes. For, in 1654, Dom Pantaleon Sa, brother of the Portuguese ambassador, was executed in London for murder. He pleaded that he was accredited as an ambassador, but could show no credentials. Had he been able to prove that he was a representative of his sovereign, he might have escaped. Certain privileges of ambassadors are established by custom. An ambassador is exempt from civil jurisdiction, unless, indeed, he so far forget his character as to engage in trade. In consequence of this exemption having been violated in 1708, in the case of an amhassador of the Czar, it has been enforced by our municipal law, 7 Anne, c. 12. An ambassador is also exempt from taxation, and enjoys other like immunities. Akin to these was the privilege of asylum attaching to his house, which is now generally renounced. An ambassador receives instructions from his own government, and carries with him eredentials to the govern-ment to which he is sent. He also carries the full power, which is his authority for negotiation. After he has delivered his letters of credence to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, he has a right to an andience of the sovereign to whom he is accredited. The death of either of the sovereigns between whom he negotiates ends his embassy. He may, however, be re-accredited; and if this is likely to be the case, his embassy is held to be suspended, and relations are continued in the expectation of confirmation.

Amboyna, one of the Molucca Islands, was captured by the Dutch, from the Portuguese, in 1607. The English, after having been expelled from Amboyna by the Dutch, obtained in 1619 the right of trading there. The treaty was badly kopt on both sides; and in Fobruary, 1623, the Dutch tortured to death several of the English factors, under pretence that they had intrigued with the natives. In 1654, after the war with Holland, the Dutch agreed to pay a sum of £300,000 to the descendants of the victims, as compensation for the massacre. Amboyna has since this been twice captured by the English—in 1796, and again in 1810—but on both occasions subsequent treaties of peace restored it to Holland.

Ambrosius Aurelianus (d. circ. 450) is said to have been a prince of the Damnonii, and appears to have been the chief leader of the Britons against the English invaders under Hengist. He was very probably a rival of Vortigern—whom he is said to have defeated in battle—and the representative of the Roman party in Britain. According to Gildas, he was "a modost man, who, of all the Roman nation, was then alone in the confusion of this troublous time left alive. His parents, who for their merit were adorned with the purple, had been slain in these same broils." Geoffrey of Monmouth makes him the brother of Uther Pendragon and father of Arthur, and states that he built Stonehenge.

American Independence, Declai TION OF (July 4, 1776), was a manifesto issu by the representatives of the thirteen Unit Colonies assembled in Congress, and sign by all of them but one. The original dr was the work of Thomas Jefferson of the St of Virginia, which had in the preceding M issued a Declaration of Rights, and the alter tions made were only matters of detail. began with an imaginary picture of "natura society, and an assertion of the original righ of man. The inference it drew from t hypotheses was that man has a right to upo any form of government which violates the "natural" conditions. The Declaration we on to enumerate "the repeated injuries as usurpations, all having in direct object t establishment of an absolute tyranny over the States." The last paragraph sums up to position which the colonies claimed to ho in the future: "We, therefore, the represen tatives of the United States of America, general Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by tl authority of the good people of these colonic solemnly publish and declare that these unite colonies are, and of right ought to be, free an independent States." Jefferson, in his indic ment of George III., had inserted a paragraph charging him with waging "c-uel war again human nature itself" by oncouraging th slave-trade. This clause, however, was struc out, on account of the disapproval expresse by some of the Southern members; and thu Congress committed itself to the inconsistence of asserting in one paragraph that all me are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable right that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; while in the rest of the Declaration it tacitly recognised, since it did not prohibit, the slave-trade. "The Declaration," says Bancroft, "was not only the announcement of the birth of a people but the establishment of a national govern ment. Every former subject of the British king in the thirteen colonies now owed primary allegiance to the dynasty of the people, and became a citizen of the new Republic. Except in this, everything re-mained as before." In the history of political thought, the Declaration has an important place. It embodied in a formal state-paper some of those theories on the equality of man, and the origin sud character of human society, which were thrown into a popular shape by Rousseau. And the influence which this enunciation of the freedom and equality of all men exerted on the European peoples was immediate and profound, as well as lasting. The Americans largely owed their political theories to France; but the Declaration of Independence gave form and expression to the theories, and was thus a distinct step in the direction of that attempt to realise certain a priori political theories which formed one element in the French Revolution.

American Independence, WAR OF (1775-1783).For some time before the spring of 1775 the relations between the colonies and the mother-country were such that they were in a state of virtual hostility. Aetuni warfare began in April, 1775, when the first blood was shed at Lexington, near Boston. Colonel Smith had been sent to destroy a magazine at that place, but was met by unexpected opposition. He sucdesultory skirmish retreated with considerable loss. In the north, Fort Ticonderoga, on Lake Champlain, was surprised; and its garrison surrendered the fort and its copious stores. On May 10, the Congress assembled for its second session at Philadelphia, and prepared for war by voting 15,000 men as the "continental" army. While it was still sitting, an English fleet appeared in Boston Roads, and its arrival was the signal for General Gage to declare martial law. On June 17 was fought the battle of Bunker's Hill, which bad been occupied by the Americans, and was carried on the third assault by the British troops, with great loss of life. Washington arrived soon after the battle to take command, and found the difficulty of the situation increased by went of ammunition situation increased by want of ammunition and the insubordination of the men. The English were masters of the sea, and held Boston and Charleston, but were surrounded by the blockading lines of Washington.
After the battle, Penn carried to England the Olive Branch Petition, the last aftempt at reconciliation on the part of America. In the meantime an expedition was sent to Canada, which proved a total failure, and sacrificed many valuable American lives. In H187.-2●

Virginia, Lord Dunmore exasperated public opinion by his many crucities, and by offering inducements to the slaves to join the British side. Howe evacuated his position in March, and while he sent Clinton to co-operate with the fleet at Charleston, in Carolina, he himself threatened New York from Sandy Hook. The attack on Charleston was gallantly repulsed; and Clinton brought back his division to take art in the operations against New York. Or July 4, the American Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence. The attack on New York was long delayed; but on August 27, the British troops drove the defenders from Long Island; and it was only Howe's dilatoriness that allowed Washington to withdraw unmolested from New York. The English withdrew into winter quarters, and left Washington free to take advantage of their inactivity by surprising the garrison of Trenton, and soon afterwards acquiring nearly all New Jorsey by winning a decisive battle at Princeton. Howe remained idle till June, 1777, when he organised a threefold expedition, which was so far successful that after defeating Washington at Brandywine Creek, in September, he advanced unopposed into l'hiladelphia. "It is not General Howe that has taken Philadelphia; it is Philadelphia that has taken General Howe," sald Franklin; and so it proved. While Washington pessed the winter in his camp at Valley Forge, with resources gradually dwindling, his forces weakened by privations, fevers, and insubordination, and himself harassed by the petty jealousies of the government and his own officers, Philadelphia became "the Capua of the British army." Meanwhile, in New York State, Clinton captured Forts Clinton and Montanesery on the Hudger. Clinton and Montgomery, on the Hudson; but he did not advance fast enough to cooperate with Burgoyne, who was advancing from Canada. On August 16, a detached division of his force had been destroyed at Bennington, and Burgoyne himself, after being defeated at Stillwater, on September 19, was compelled to capitulate, w'h 3,500 men, at Saratoga, on Oct. 16. The immediate result of Saratoga was a treaty between France and America, which was virtually a declaration of war by France against England. In June, Clinton, who had succeeded Sir Wil-Howe as commander-in-chief, evacu-Philadelphia and retreated on New York. Washington opposed his march at Monmouth, and finished a severe contest master of the field, but not strong enough to offer any further resistance. Iu the north, operations were at a standstill through the embarrassed condition of both commanders, and the interest of the war centred in the south. In December, Savannah was taken by Colonel Campbell; and in January, 1779, Lower Georgia was reduced by Colonel Prevost. In February, South Carolina was overrun, and Charleston was again threatened by the British, who spent the summer in alienating by their ravages, the few loyalists that remained. In September a combined French and American force failed to take Navannah. In the mountime, Washington had tided over hls difficulties by maintaining a strictly defensive attitude. A large armamont sent by Massachusetts to destroy a British outpost an Penobecot Bay was signally defeated and ulmost destroyed. In October, 1779, Rhode Island was evacuated, and Clinton carried the troops, thus set free, to the attack of Charleston. It was not, however, till May, 1780, that General Lincoln surrendered the town Clinton returned to New York, leaving 5,000 men with Lord Cornwallis, who by the end of June reported that all resistance was at an end in Georgia and South Carolina. But strenuous efforts were made to save the South, and General Gates, with story reinforcements, met Lords Cornwallis and liaw. don at Camden, on August 16, and was sign nally defeated, with heavy loss. A smail detachment, under Sumpter, was also cut to pieces by Colonel Tarleton's cavalry, and the American army of the South seemed to be annihilated. But the severity of Cornwallis and Rawdon had alienated the population, and the inhabitants rose on all sides to oppose the advance of the fermer into North Carolina. During the winter Washington and Chnton maintained a passive attitude, each watching the other, and neither strong enough to take the offensive; and Washington's difficulties were increased by the disaffection of the troops, who had roceived no pay for ten months. On March 1, 1781, a crisis was averted by the signing of the Articles of Confederation, which united all the States by a common bond of union. In the South, Greene, who had succeeded Gates, put a new aspect on the war. In January, 1781, he defeated Tarleton at the Cowpens; but, notwithstanding, Cornwallis assumed the offensive, and advanced northwards. Greene retreated 200 miles before Cornwallis, who was gradually leaving his base of supplies farther and farther in his rear. On March 15, Greene gave him battle at Guildford Court House, and atter a fierce struggle was driven from his position, but Cornwallis was so weakened that he retreated to Wilmington, though in April he again advanced to Petersburg. in Virginia. Meanwhile, Meanwhile, Greene had organised a combined movement against South Carolina and Georgia. He himself was attacked and defeated by Lord Rawdon, who, however, was compelled by the simultaneous advance of Lee and Marion to retire to Charleston, and the greater part of South Carolina was again in American hands. In September the battle of Entaw Springs ended in a victory for the English, which was as disastrons as a defeat; and the British forces in the South were henceforth pent up in Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah.

He had no sooner assumed the government than he found himself involved in hostile discussions with the Burmese, which terminated within five months in a declaration of war. After two campaigns, the first Burmese War ended in the Trenty of Yandaboo. The progress of the Burmese War also gave rise to the Barrackpore Mutiny, which was violently suppressed, and to several seditious manifestations in India. The Governor-General was created Earl Amberst of Aracan in 1826. [Burmese War.]

Amhurst, Micholas (d. 1742), was a writer of satires and political papers of considerable ability. He published a caustic series of papers in 1726 under the title, Terræ Filius, intended as a satire on the University of Oxford. After quitting Oxford, Anhurst devoted himself to political journalism, attaching himself to the opponents of Walpole. He conducted The Craftsman, a political journal, to which Bolingbroke and Pulteney contributed largely. Amhurst was, however, neglected by his influential friends, and died in poverty and distress.

Amiens, Mise of (January 23, 1264), was the award pronounced by Louis IX. of France, to whom the question as to the obligation of Henry III. to observe the Provisions of Oxford had been referred, on Dec. 16, 1263. Since 1261 the baronial party had been reduced by desertions, and distracted by Prince Edward's attitude towards their cause in 1262, and by disputes and jealousies among themselves. This, with the fear of Louis openly supporting Henry III. with troops, explains their forced assent to an arbitration which, from Louis' character and frequent services to Henry, could only issue one way. Influenced by his strong views as to the kingly office, and by the authority of the papal bull, possibly also by the negotiations already on foot for the papal appointment of his brother Charles to the crown of Naples, Louis, after some days' hearing of the pleadings on either side, and perhaps some hesitation, decided completely for his brother sovereign, annulled the Provisions of Oxford, especially as to the employment of aliens in England and the royal sppointment of sheriffs; but after all left to the barons a loophoic in declaring that his decision was not to annai any of the ancient charters or liberties of the realm. In March the warfare broke out which ended for the time in Simon's victory at Lewes. Similar arbitrations were frequent about this period: even the day before Lewes, the barons offered to submit all, save the aliens question, to a new body of arbitrators; and a striking political song of the time shows the general feeling, even in the national party, that some compromise must be accepted. The award had the effect of still further reducing and weakening Simon de Montfort's party.

Amiens, TREATY OF (March 25, 1802), between England and France, put an end for the time to the great war which had lasted since 1793. The mutual losses during the precoding years, the complete supremacy of the English fleet, and the blow given to the northern alliance by the battle of Copenhagen, and, on the other hand, the defeats inflicted on England's Continental ally, Austria, in 1800, and the Treaty of Luncville, which sho concluded with France, Feb. 9, 1801, led both governments to desire a cessation of hostilities. The treaty was the work of the Addington ministry. In the previous October the preliminarios had been agreed to and signed, but some troublesome negotiations had to be gone through, before it was finally ratified at Amiens, by Lord Cornwallis on the part of England, and by Joseph Bonaparte, assisted by Talk wand, for France. According to it, England gave up all its conquests but Trinidad and Ceylon. The Cape e. Good Hope was restored to the Dutch, but was to be a free port. Malta was to go back to the Knights of St. John, under the guarantee of one of the great powers. "Cet article est le plus important de tout le traité, mais aucune des conditions qu'il renferme n'a été exécutée; et il est dovenu le pretexte d'une guerre qui s'est renouvelée en 1803, et a duré sans inter-ruption jusqu'en 1814" (Histoire des Traités, vi. 149). Porto Ferrajo was to be evacuated. On the other hand, the Republic of the Ionian Islands was acknowledged; the French were to withdraw from Naples and the Roman States; the integrity of Portugal was to be guaranteed; Egypt was to be restored to the Porte; and, finally, the Newfoundland fisheries were to be placed on the same footing as they held before the war began. These terms, as noticed above, were not considered sufficiently satisfactory by the English; consequently the peace was of very short duration, war being declared against Bonaparte in 1803.

The English were completely beaten, owing to their desertion by the Borderers who had joined them.

Anderida (Andredes-ceaster), the name of a Roman fortiess and settlement on the Sussex coast, which Camden placed at Newenden, in Kent, and others have considered to have been situated at Hastings, Chichester, or under the downs near Eastbourne, where, in 1717, Roman pavements, baths, and other remains were found. Most modern authorities agree in placing it on the site of Pevensey. The town was taken and burnt by the Saxons, under Ella, in 491, and the site was a desolate ruin in the time of Henry of fluntingdon. The Forest of Anderida (Andredes-weald) was the great belt of wood which stretched across south-eastern England through Hampshire, Kent, and Surrey, having a length of more than seventy, and in some places a breadth of over thirty, miles. The district still called the Weald may 1 held to mark out roughly the extent of the closer portions of this forest. [FORESTS.]

In 1586 he tried the conspirators in Babington's plot, and was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, in Oct., 1586. Anderton, William (d. 1693), was a violent Jacobite pamphleteer, in the reign of William III. For two years he evaded the government agents, but was at length traced to a house near St. James's Street. He attempted to conceal his press, but it was discovered, together with a tract called Remarks on the Present Confederacy and the Late Revolution. He was indicted for high treason before Treby at the Old Bailey. He denied that he had printed the libels. It was argued in his favour, moreover, that, as printing was unknown in the reign of Edward III., it could not be construed into an overt act of treason, and that, under the statute of that sovereign, a further distinction ought to be made between the author of a treasonable pamphlet and the man who merely printed it. He was, however, found guilty, and after being kept for some time in suspense, in the hope that he would betray his accomplices, was executed.

André, Major John (b.1751, d.1780), was the son of a London merchant. Entering the army, he rose rapidly. He was appointed to serve under General Howe in America, and, when Sir H. Clinton succeeded Howe, was made adjutant-general. His tart and ability in this position caused him to be selected, in the month of September, 1780, to superintend tho negotiations for the surrender of West Point, on the Hudson River. The man he had to deal with on the other side was Arnold, an American general whose ambition was not satisfied with his position. An arrangement was made between the two for a meeting, to take place on the 17th, when Washington would be absent. The sloop which was carrying André to the meeting place ran aground, and Arnold, on hearing of the mishap, refused to come down himself, but sent for André to come to him. André, on his return, found the sloop gone, and could not induce the boatmen to put off to her. He accordingly returned to Arnold, who persuaded him to exchange his uniform for a countryman's dress, and go back to the British lines by land. He accomplished the greater part of the journey in safety, and was already in sight of the British lines, when he was arrested, and, in spite of Arnold's passport, carried back to Washington. A court of inquiry was forthwith held; André was found to be a spy, and sentenced to death. Washington was most unwilling to carry out the sentence, and he endeavoured to seize Arnold, the real offender, in order to be able to release André. But Arnold was not to be found; and on Oct. 2, André met his fate with perfect composure. Washington himself declaring that he was more unfortunate than criminal. His bones were afterwards brought to England, and have been interred in Westminster Abbey.

Andros, Sir Edmund (b. 1637, d. 1714), became governor of New York in 1674, and in 1685 was appointed governor of New England by James II. His administration was so unpopular with the colonists that, in 1688, all the colonies subject to him revolted, and he was sent back to England for trial, but acquitted. In 1692 he went out as governor of Virginia, holding the office with credit to himself and advantage to the country until 1698.

Angel was the name of a gold coin, first introduced into England in 1465. The value of an angel was originally 8s. 4d., but in Edward VI.'s time it was mised to 10s. It derived its name from the representation of the Archangel Michael which appeared on it.

Angels continued to be coined down to the reign of Charles I. [Coinage.]

Angevins, The, sometimes called Plan-TAGENETS. Anjou first became connected with England by the marriage, in 1127, of Matilda, daughter of Henry I., with Geoffrey V., Count of Anjou. Their son Henry became King of England, as well as Count of Anjou. Anjou remained united to England till 1205, when Philip Augustus conquered it, and annexed it to the French crown. For a short time, during the reigns of Henry V. and Henry VI., it was again united to Engknd; but in 1444 the latter king, on his marriage with Margaret of Anjou, ceded his claims. The Angevin rulers filled as great a space in the history of the Middle Ages as the Hapsburgs have done in more modern times. The first Count of Anjou was Fulk the Red, who at the end of the ninth century was thus rewarded for his services against the Northmen. But by the twelfth century, when the petty counts had added Saintonge, Maine, and Touraine to their territory, men began to throw their origin further back, into gends of an heroic champion, Ingelger, son of the wild Breton hunter, Tortulf; and accounted for that fitful energy and successful unscrupulousness which marked the whole race, by tales of an ancestress, who had beeu an evil spirit or a witch in guise of a lovely countess. In Fulk the Good there appears the other side of the Angevin character: the literary, poetie, and artistic tastes strong in Henry III. and Edward III., in Richard I. and Richard II., and partly shared hy Henry II. and John; the capacity for business and the organising power which distinguished Henry II. and Edward I. So, too, the physical prowess of Richard I. was an inheritance from his ancestor, Geoffrey Greygown, the third count; while the fourth count, Fulk the Black, in his successful adventurousness, his restless pilgrimages to Jerusalem, his cruel revenges on his wife and son, seems to anticipate familiar stories of our own Flantagenet kings. With Fulk's son, (icoffrey Martel, the original Angevin line ends, to be continued by his daughter's marriage with Geoffrey of the House of Orleans. Their son, Fulk Rechin, to whom alone it is due that the charge of trickery is urged against this family,' brought upon himself many enemies and some disasters. The next count, Fulk the Young, had already secured Maine by marriage; and his successor, Geoffrey the Handsome, called Plantagenet, by his marriage with the Em-press Matilda, heiress to Henry I. of England, raised to its climax the long advancement of his house. Their son, Henry II. of England, succeeded, in 1151, to Anjou, Maine, and Touraine from his father, and Normandy from his mother, and received, in 1152, Poiton, Limoges, Auvergne, Guienne, and Gascony, with Eleanor, the divorced wife of Louis of France. He was crowned King of England in 1154, made himself Lord of Ireland in 1171, exacted full homage from the eaptive King of Scots in 1174, and obtained for his second son, Geoffrey, the succession to Brittany by marriage. In 1170 Anjon was set apart, with Maine and Normandy, to form a temporary dominion for his cldest son, Henry, as Aquitaine was for Richard, Brittany for Geoffrey, and Ireland for John. But with the accession of John "Lack-land," Anjou, like most of the other French possessions of the English crown, passed to Philip of France in 1202. Before this, Ralph de Diceto, finding a pious explanation for the success which had now reached such a height, had declared "the prophecy made to Fulk the Good by the leper whom he earried so piously (and who was none other than the Saviour Himself), that his seed should prosper to the ninth generation, is being fulfilled." But most men spoke otherwise of the Angevins. Thus Giraldus Cambrensis, not content with recounting their diabolic origin, St. Bernard's prediction of their curse, and Richard Cœur de Lion's gloomy acceptance of it (" Let us fight; son with father, brother with brother; it is instinct in our family: from the devil we all came, to the devil we shall all go"), draws out furthermore the calamitous end of all the offspring of Eleanor, as a vengeance foretold for her parents adulterous union; he recites the visions which warned holy men of the punishment reserved for Henry II.'s sins against the Church, and points the moral of the breakdown of that great king's empire, after all his subtle schemes and his toilsome, gainful life, before the divinely-favoured royal house of France. This indeed was the feeling which many men had about the Angevins; not without some reason. "They remind us," says Dr. Stubbs, "of those unhappy spirits who, throughout the Middle Ages, were continually spending superhuman strength in building in a night inaccessible bridges and uninhabitable castles, or purchasing with untold treasures souls that might have been had for nothing, and invariably cheated of their reward." There is, indeed, in all the English kings of this race, even in Edward I., something of this waste of vast energies upon futile results, which are no sooner grasped than they crumble in the hand. They had not, with all their insight, that rare gift of penetrating to the real heart of their age, the gift that only sympathy with it can give. Even Edward I. could not see that he was, in his own despite, making of Scotland what he had already made of England—a self-governing patriotic nation. Yet to this dynasty England owes much. Henry II. not only finally defeated the feudal class by superseding its privileged jurisdiction, by subduing it to his strong centralised system, by withdrawing its military basis, but he also set up a counterpoise to it in the revived popular courts, in the developed use of local juries, in the reconstituted national militia, in the legalised liberties of the towns. In a word, he began the varied training of the English people to co-operation in the work of government, which Edward I. took up and carried on to its completion. the very tyranny and neglect of the other kings were direct instruments of benefits never intended. Richard I.'s careless absence and heavy exactions left his ministers free to expand the principles bequeathed them from Henry II.'s reign. A still greater debt of gratitude we owe to the misgovernment of John, the worst of the line, inasmuch as it alone supplied the pressure which could force the baronage for the first time to act with and for Church and people, and produced the coalition which extorted the Great Charter. Henry III.'s shiftiness recalled this coalition into action so often that it became a permanent union. The second Edward's failure taught the nation that a vigorous kingship was still a requisite of political stability, to control the baronage, and to be the working head of the government. Edward III., in his selfish haste for the means of warfare and ostentation, sold away the crown's power of extra-parliamentary inter-ference in taxation and legislation. And Richard II.'s unsuccessful attempt at absolutism precipitated the downfall of prerogative, and gave constitutional government sixty years in which to strike its roots down too deep even for the destroying hand of Yorkist, Tudor, and Stuart kings to kill their latent life. And it is to the stern peace kept by the Angevin kings, to their repression of private justice and private war, to their firm but prudent attitude to the Church, that we owe the early rise of English literature and philosophy, the great age of the English Church, the enfranchisement of the peasantry, the populous independence of the towns, the growth of wool-trade and maritime commerce. All the Angevins were men of strong but conflicting character; none were without physical bravery, bodily activity, passionate emotions. Even 'e worst were men who superstitiously respected some forms of religion. while they violated its spirit: like Henry II., jesting and drawing pictures at mass, but dying before the chapel altar at Chinon; or Richard, after an agony of repentance for his sins, recovering, to plunge into them sh. [A. L. S.] Angles, THE. If identity of name and reneral probability be held fair proofs of identity of race, the Angles (Angli, Anglii), after whom this land is called, are first mentioned in the Germania of Tacitus (written about A.n. 98), seemingly as dwellers on the farther side of the Elbe. But in Tacitus's page they are merely one among a num-ber of obscure names of German peoples. They would seem, however, to have been then in motion westwards; fifty years later Ptolemy found them on the left bank of the same river, in occupation of a territory conjectured to be in the neighbourhood of the modern town of Magdeburg. But neither did they remain here; by the fourth century, if not earlier, they had established themselves on the neck of the northern peninsula, now Jutland, and filled the district that is now known as Schleswig, but which an English writer of the tenth century (Ethelward) names Anglis Vetus, or Old England. And Bede, in calling this country of theirs Angulus, suggests a hint regarding the origin of Guest, has not scrupled to take, speaking of their Continental home as "Ongle," and apparently looking upon them as "men of the corner." Next to nothing is told us of the Angles in written history. Scholars are, however, satisfied that they were of the Low-German stock, and were closely akin to, yet distinct from, the Saxons, having a speech that, though essentially the same as the Saxon, was not so far removed from the High-German, and showed more frequent marks of Scandinavian influence. But, like the Saxons, they were of pure German type; Roman civilisation had never reached them. A legal code, the Laws of the Anglii and Werini, presumably belonging to them, and as old as the eighth century, survives as a record of native usages in an intermediate stage between those of the Germania and of the earliest-known English system. In the sixth century, at various but unknown dates, and by many but unconnected expeditions, the Angles crossed over to Britain, and conquered to their own use the whole of the rast coast, from the Stour to the Forth. Pushing steadily their encroachments westwards, and slaying, expelling, or enslaving the bulk at least of the natives, they eventually formed several powerful kingdoms, and not a few smaller statesfought and prospered until two-thirds of the conquered hand had passed into their possession. This great movement is believed to have caused an exhaustive migration of the race; Bede is our authority for a report that their fatherland was without inhabitants even in his time. Yet some will have it that their name still abides there in the local term, Angeln. In Britain, though they just missed winning political supremacy, they fixed their name ineffaceably on the wholo German population and the land it lived in. Many have speculated upon, but none gained any solid knowledge of, their distinguishing characteristies; it would seem, however, that wherever they differed from their axon brethren, they more nearly resembled their Danish cousins.

Anglesey (Latin, Mona; Welsh, Mon), an island and county of North Wales, was in the earliest times celebrated as the headquarters of Druidism, and therefore of resistnnce to the Romans. It was conquered by Suctonius Paulinus in A.D. 61, and again more thoroughly by Agricola in 78. On the withdrawal of the Romans, it became the centre of the power of the kings of North Wales, or Gwynedd, and Gildas calls the famous Mael-gwn "insularis draco." Yet it was conquered, with much other Welsh territory, by Edwin of Northumbria (Bede, ii. 5), and perhaps this Anglian conquest explains Nennius-"Mona insula quæ Anglice Englesei vocatur id est insula Anglorum" (Mon. Hist. Brit., 52 D.). But Northumbria soon fell, and the "isle of the English" became Welsh again. It contained Aberffraw, the chief palace of the kings of Gwynedd. During the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, it was rematedly ravaged by the Danes, who very probably effected permanent settlements in it. After the Norman Conquest, it became the battleground of Irish Dane, native Welsh, and Norman adventurers. Under William Rufus, it was more than once captured by Earl Hugh of Chester, when "the French reduced all to be Saxons" (Brut-y-Tys., sub an. 1096). Again, in 1098, it was the scene of the exploits of Magnus of Norway, and of the death of Hugh. But it soon got back its liberty, and has retained to this day that intensely Welsh character ("Môn mam Cymru") which makes its name so misleading. It continued the home of the princes of North Wales until the fall of Llewelyn ap Gruffydd annexed the principality to the erown, and it was erected into a regular county by Henry VIII. Anglesey, PEERAGE OF. In 1628 Sir Francis Annealey, of Newport Pagnell, Bucks, was created Baron Mount Norris in the peerage of Ireland, and Viscount Valentia. It was this nobleman who was arbitrarily tried and condemned to death by Strafford, when Lord - Deputy in 1635. Arthur, second Viscount Valentia (1614—1686), was, in 1645, sent as Commissioner to Ulster to oppose Owen Roe O'Neil. After the death of Cromwell, he was President of the Council of State, and took a considerable share in bringing about the Restoration. In 1660 he was created Earl of Anglesey in the peerage of England. During the life of Richard, sixth Earl of Anglesey, the title and estates were claimed by James Annesley, who asserted that he was the son of the fourth Earl. [For the litigation which ensued on this claim, see Annesley's Case.] As a result of this litigation, it was held that the earldom of Anglesey became extinet in 1761, on the death of the sixth Earl. In 1815 the title of Marquis of Anglesey was conferred on Henry Paget, Earl of Uxbridge.

Anglescy, Arthur Annesley, 57th EARL or (d. 1737), held several posts in Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne. In 1711 he hastened from Ireland to take part in the debates on the war, and commented severely on the exhaustion of the country, hinting that Marlborough had averted peace from interested motives. But on a subsequent occasion he attacked the ministry, and publicly apologised for the part he had played in politics. During the last years of Queen Anne, he was one of the leaders of the faction of Hanoverian Tories, whom Swift calls the "Whimsicala." He was one of the Lords Justices appointed to administer the kingdom between the death of Anne and the arrival of George I.

Anglesey, Henry William Paget, 1st Manquis or (b. 1768, d. 1864), eldest son of Henry, first Earl of Uxbridge, in 1794 served under the Duke of York in Flanders, and again in Holland in 1799, as colonel of a dragoon regiment. In December, 1808, he joined Sir John Moore's force as a majorgeneral, and greatly distinguished himself by the manner in which he covered the dis-

In the campaign of 1815 the Earl of Uxbridge was appointed to the command of the cavalry. At Water-loo, where he led the heavy brigade in the terrible charge which overwhelmed D'Erlon's division, he distinguished himself by the utmost intrepidity. In the battle he was wounded in the leg, which was obliged to be amputated. For his services he was created Marquis of Anglesey, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. In 1827 he was appointed Master-Genoral of the Ordnance; and in 1828 the Wellington Cabinet made him Vicercy of Ireland. His advent was looked forward to with much dread in Ireland, owing to some thoughtles. remarks he had once made as to using military force to quell disturbances. But he very much belied the anticipations that had been formed of him, and by his impartial conduct and strict justice, gained great popularity. His views on Catholic emancipation, of which he was a strong advocate, entirely differed from the policy of the Cabinet, and he was summarily removed from his post, to the great regret of all classes in Ireland. In 1830 he was again appointed Lord-Lieutenant, and carried on the government of Ireland till the dissolution of Lord Grey's government in 1833. In 1846 he was made a field-marshal, and in tho same year once more became Master-General of the Ordnance, which office he held till 1852, when he retired into private life until

Anglia, East. [East Anglia.]

Anglia Sacra is the title of a miscellancous collection of ecclesiastical momorials, published by Dr. Henry Wharton, in two vols. iolio, Lond., 1691. These volumes contain Eadmer's "Life of Anselm," William of Malmesbury's "Life of Aldhelm," John of Salisbury's "Life of Anselm," and other works relating more particularly to the early history of English dioceses, and the biography of English bishops.

Anglo-Saxon is a word which has been commonly applied to the aggregate of the Teutonic inhabitants of Britain who lived under native institutions, up to the date of the Norman Conquest; to the earliest form of the English language of which memorials survive; and, by a curious modern usage, to the sum total of the men of English speech and origin, to whatever nation they may belong, who are now scattered over the globe. The exact meaning of the word is not obvious. Mr. Freeman rules "Anglo-Saxon" to be a condensation of the phrase "Angles and Saxons," construing both its component parts as nouns: whilst the ablest of his predecessors has taken the compound to mean "properly Saxons of England, as distinguished from Saxons of the Continent," in which case the former half must have the force of an adjective. A scrutiny of the oldest forms of the word, whether English or Latin, would seem to justify the latter conclusion rather than the other. These forms are: in English, Ongol-Sazna and Angul-Seazna; in Latin, Angul-Sazones and Angli-Saxones. Now, if Ongol cyn and Angel cyn be as they usually are—construed into "English kin," we cannot easily escape the necessity of construing Ongol-Saxe, Angul-Sease, and Angul-Saxones into "English Saxons." And the Latin form seemingly admits of the same construction more readily than it does that of "Angles and Saxons." Camden, therefore, and Mr. Kemble would appear to have had some show of reason, the first for naming (Remains concerning Britain, pp. 24, 25) the inhabitants of England before the Norman Conquest "English-Saxons," and their tongue "English-Saxon," the second for calling his great work "The Saxons in England." On the other hand, Mr Freeman's explanation would unquestionably, if language permitted it, be a far more satisfactory one. An Anglo-Saxon king was certainly a king of Angles and Saxons; the population he reigned over was composed of Angles of the north and east, as well as Saxons of the south and west. It is noteworthy, however, and perhaps significant, that the word was barely recognised by the men of the time to which it is now so often given; neither in the Chronicle, nor in Ethelward-nor, indeed, in any purely native English historical record—is it once found. So long as these men were distributed into separate states, they looked upon themselves as Saxons or as Angles; when they fell into political unions they became, when contemplated as members of one community, Englishmen. When native writers would contrast West-Saxons, East-Anglians, and Northumbrans with their insular fees or Continental neighbours, they had no other designation for them than "Engle," no other for their speech than "Englisc." This is the first reason that has moved some scholars to drop this and every cognate word altogether in writing, and use "English" as a descriptive epithet of every next of our history and avery form of our part of our history and every form of our language. The men whom Edgar and Harold ruled called themselves "English kin;" even Alfred, mere King of West-Saxons as he was, is represented in the Chronicle as having been "King of all the English kin except the part that was under the wield of the Danes."

It is thought better to call the people as they called themselves. And undoubtedly the name has led to misconceptions. It has misled people into thinking that their forefathers were not their forefathers, that the nation which was (temporarily) overthrown at Senlae was not the same nation that, 750 years later, overthrew Napoleon; into thinking the language of the Chronicle a different tongue from the language of Carlyle. "The unhistorical and conventional term Anglo-Saxon conveys," says Sir F. Palgrave, "a most false idea of our civil history. It disguises the continuity of affairs, and substitutes the appearance of a new formation in place of a progressive evolution." On the other hand, it is urged that as regards the language, at least, the name is necessary. To insist upon calling both the earliest and latest forms of our literary language "English," is to assert identity where there is no identity: to prevent misconception, therefore, we must alter the name either of our own or of Alfred's tongue. To do the second were not But those earlier were the days of Angles and Saxons, if ever Angles and Saxons were; it surely ought to be at least fairly accurate to speak of their written language as the Anglo-Saxon form of English. And as to the people—seeing that during those days the Angles and Saxons, though coalescing, had not yet coalesced into a wellblended national unity—there is perhaps no intolerable error in describing their era as the Anglo-Saxon stage in the history of the English nation.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is the name given to an historical document of the very first importance for the whole earlier portion of English history. It is in the form of annals, beginning with the Christian era. and terminating at various dates in the various copies, the most prolonged ending with 1154.

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is sometimes spoken of in the plural, as the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles; and each form of expression may be justified. The extant copies are so far alike in their contents that they can be regarded as variations of a common original, such hypothetical original being a compilation made in the ninth century. But the divergences are great even within this earlier part, and they tend in the continuations to a separation so wide as to produce in some cases a total independence of one another before the close. No one can really study this document without finding that there is at least equal propriety in the plural designa-

Manuscripts: There are six manuscripts, and some fragments of a seventh. These manuscripts have been designated by the letters A. B.C. D. E. F. G. They have each and all been identified (at least proximately) with one or other of the great religious houses of the southern part of the ivi nd. The first (A) has been assigned to W. achester; the second (B) was probably compiled at St. Augustine's, Canterbury; the third (C) is manifestly from Abingdon; the fourth (D) from Worcester; the fith (E) is from Peterborough, and is the most distinctly local of the whole series; the sixth (F), in the two lenguages Latin and Saxon, is from Canterbury. The seventh (G) is little more thau a late copy of A. Of this last manuscript only three leaves have escaped the fire of 1731; but this loss is alievisted by the fact that this manuscript has been printed in full, and without admixture, by Wheleo (Cambridge, 1643). The places of deposit of these manuscripts are as follows:—A, in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; B, C, D, F, G, in the Cotton Library, British Museum; E, in the Bodieian.

Of all these manuscripts, the Peterborough Chronicle (E) is the one of which the date and occasion of its production has been most satisfactorily made out. There was a great fire at Peterborough in August, 1116, which destroyed all the monastery except the chapter-house and the dormitory; most of the town was burnt also. All the books were probably lost. Five years later, in 1121, we find this new Chronicle, which must have taken time to collect and compile, brought down to the date of the current year in one handwriting. A new hand continues the history in 1122. We know from other sources that this was counted an epoch at Peterborough. The Latin Chronicos Petroburgense (Camden Society), of which the object was to describe the administration of Abbot Eobert, which dates from 1374, begins with 1122.

Division of Contents: The first five hundred years is a literary compilation, made at a comparatively late date, from Latin authorities; then follows a mixed period down to A.D. 735, in which the greatest part is from Bede, with a few original annals interspersed. These annals are the earliest material proper to the Saxon Chronicle. From this "ve onwards, our Chronicles are the higher in the first that only one Chronicle (D) describes the battle of Hastings. A new and peculiar interest attaches to the later continu

The next edition appeared in the folio Monumente Historics Britannica (1848); and here the plan of a composite text was carried to its extreme perfection. Anglo - Saxon Kingdoms. Much that specially distinguishes the development of our national history is due to the fact that the English Conquest was carried out, not by a single people or confederation of peoples, but by independently-acting bodies of adventurers who were sprung from a common stock, and had been living for ages under similar institutions. For thus it came about that, when the success of the long series of separate invasions was assured, and at least half of Britain south of the isthmus of Forth and Clyde had received an English population, and passed under the sway of the English system of rule, this newly-subjugated land was necessarily divided among a large number of distinct, almost isolated, kingdoms and states. By the last quarter of the sixth century, all the eastern and southern coast, from Queensferry to Portland Bill, formed an exclusive sea-board for an Anglian, Saxon, Frisian, and Jutish territory, while a traveller might still make his way from Stirling to the shores of West Bay entirely through Celtic land, without having once to cross tidal water save at the point where the Severn broadens into the Bristol Channel. But the line that parted the two races was somewhat irregular, and, owing to incessant warfare between them, continually changing. In the upper reaches of the English side of the island, two kingdoms had established themselves - Bernicia (Welsh, Bryneich, the country of the brace) and Deira (Deifyr), stretching, the former from the Forth to the Tees, the latter from the Tees to the Humber. These are both usually reckoned among the states founded by the Angles, though certain inquirers profess to have detected a Frisian element in their population. Below the Humber a cluster of Anglian settlements - Gainas, Lindiswaras, Mercians, Middle Angles, and others—covered a broader area of considerable but indefinable length, and would seem to have been already consolidating into the great kingdom of the Marchland, or Mercia. East Anglia filled the space between the lower half of the Mercian land and the eastern sea, and had the Stour as its southern boundary. Between the

Stour and the Thames dwelt the East and the Middle Saxons, already, it would appear, united into a single kingdom. Westward to the lower Severn and the Forest of Selwood, and southward to the English Channel, spread the kingdom of the West-Saxons, in which Surrey had probably been already included. The belt of cleared land that ran, thrust in between the huge forest of Anderida and the sea, from Chichester harbour to the Rother, formed the territory of the South-Sazons; and the Kentish kingdom must have had pretty much the same limits as the presecounty of Kent. Though the men of Ker Wight, and the part of Hampshire that benround the Southampton Water, are called Jutes in early authorities, the distinctive name was not long maintained; and the four southern kingdoms may be taken to compose the Saxon constituent of the English race in Britain. It must also be borne in mind that, scattered over the newly-conquered country, there were not a few smaller states, such as the Hwiccas, the Gyrwas, the Meanwaras, either independent or owing an incomplete allegiance to one or other of the kingdoms; that Deira and Bernieia showed a disposition to combine into one state, had already once combined, and were sure to become soon permanently incorporated into a Northumbrian kingdom, while the co-existence of the two dioceses of Rochester and Canterbury, from the first organisation of the Church in England, has led to the belief that there may have been originally two kingdoms in Kent, the earliest dioceses being generally co-extensive with kingdoms. As yet these several kingdoms and states—at any rate, the greater among them-held aloof from one another. Nor had they yet learned-perhaps the resistance of the natives did not allow them the necessary leisure—even to quarrel among themselves. In fact, each, as a rule, went about its business of fighting with the Welsh, of settlement and apportionment of the soil, of general organisation, on its own forces only; loosely speaking, they had no relations with one another; the conditions that made the first step towards union possible did not exist. It is true that Ella, the first king of the South-Saxons, is represented by Bede as holding a sort of imperium, or military overlordship, over the "provinces" south of the Humber; but Bede's statement must be either an exaggeration of some insignificant fact, or altogether baseless. An imperial king of the South-Saxons in the fifth century is inconceivable. In another century (eire. 685) a great change had taken place. The southern part of Northumbria now stretched from sen to sen, its western border-line joining the coast at the head of Morecambe Bay. Mercia had grown considerably towards the south and the west; part of the lower Dec and half the Wye flowed within her confues, and her kings had pushed their conquests from Wessex almost to the Bristol Avon and the upper Thames. But Wessex had helped to make up for these losses by extending her western frontier to the mouths of the Parret and Exe, and by taking Wight within her kingdom. East Anglia, Essex, Kent, and Sussex, having no weaker race in their neighbourhood to eneroach upon, were substantially unaltered.

Among these kingdoms a state of things had arisen which Milton in his ignorance of the real facts of the case only caricatures when he calls their mutual dealings "the wars of kites or crows, flocking and fighting in the air." Strife and bloodshed were universal; no kingdom escaped them; even Christianity brought a sword; by far the greater number of battles that are henceforward recorded wero fought between English-Indeed, the several peoples seldom came together save as enemies. And in the course of this warfare the vicissitudes of success were many and sudden; the irresis-tible conqueror of one day was the hunted fugitive or mangled corpse of the next. Ceawlin of Wessex, after years of nearly unbroken success, in which Briton and Jute went down before him, was, in 591, himself besten down by his own subjects, and driven from his kingdom. Kent then rose to great-ness under the guidance of Ethelbert, who won a sort of supremacy that is stated by Bede to have reached the Humber, at the same time that another restless warrior, Ethelfrith, was making the might of North-umbria terrible to the north and west of that But Ethelbert shrank back, and Ethelfrith fell in battle before the growing power of Redwald, King of the East Angles; and for a few years Redwald held the foremost place among the kings that ruled south of the Humber. Then the turn of Northumbria came: in 630 the authority or influence of her king, Edwin, bore undisputed sway from the Forth to the English Channel, save in Kent alone. Then Penda of Mercia vanquished and slew Edwin (634), and seized a part of his supremacy; but was himself vanquished and slain in 655 by a successor of Edwin's, Oswy, under whom Northumbria regained a fair share of her former ascendancy. But with the death in battle of her next king. Egfrith, in 685, the glory and greatness of the northern kingdom passed away for ever. For a hundred and forty years longer she kept her independence, and at times acted with vigour to the north and west; but her part in determining the destiny of England was played cut. These were not futile fightings, after all. The kingdoms were merely taking the best way they knew of settling among themselves which was the most worthy to fulfil the trust of making England a nation. To bringing about this end, the newly-founded Church proved an effective ally. Her authority, being an undivided force that proceeded from a single centre, and her organisation covering the whole land, gently drew the separate communities together, made the idea of unity familiar, and must have fostered a vague longing for political union. And the practical effacement of all the smaller kingdoms except East Anglia minst also have done something to smooth the way towards this consummation. Easex sank, first into a Mercian, then, seemingly, into a West-Saxon dependency; in the last quarter of the seventh century Ceadwalla of Wessex and his successor, Ina, reduced Sussex and Kent beneath their dominion; and these states, without as yet losing their separate existence, never again enjoyed a separate political life.

In the rivalry that was thus narrowed to Mercia and Wessex, the tide of success, during the greater part of the eighth century, rau decidedly in favour of the former; one of the Mercian kings, Ethelbald, was strong enough to fasten his yoke on the neck of Wessex itself. And, though the stubborn land succeeded in shaking off this yoke by a decisive victory at Burford (752), Offa, a later Mercian king, managed in his long reign (755—794) to raise his power to an unexampled height. Wessex was beaten in battle, and driven below the Thames; Essex and Kent had become almost parts of the Mercian kingdom; and in 792 a deed of the foulest treachery gave Offa the command of East Anglia. From the Welsh, too, the masterful king wrested the wide sweep of scrub-land that lay round Pengwern, and on the site of this place built the town of Shrews-bury (Scrobbesbyrig, Scrub-bury), and made the dyke that is still called after his name the western limit of his kingdom, thus bringing the area of England almost to its furthest expansion on the side of Wales. But the sceptre was destined for Wessex, notwithstanding. Pressed down from her northern frontier, and forced, as it would appear, to give up Surrey and Sussex also, she never paused in her alow advance towards Cornwall. Somerset was completed, and the making of Devonshire begun; by the end of the ceriory the Exe, from source to sea, was a West-Saxon river. With the first years of the next Egbert, a wise and valiant descendant of earlier kings came from exile in Charlemagne's court, to take on himself the rule of the kingdom; and under his direction the West-Saxons went stadily forward on the path that led to national greatness. Egbert was long content to repel Mercian invasion, and to push his conquests further into the Cornish peninsula; in his reign Devon reached its final limits, and the men of Cornwall were driven to accept him as their overlord. At length, in 823, on the field of Ellandune, Mercia and Wessex measured their strength for the last time: Her uuthoproceeded rganisation drew the made the have fosical union. the smaller t also have ny towards first into a Vest-Saxon the seventh his succesnt beneath without as nee, never ife. arrowed to of success, and there the might of Mercia was broken. Ere the year was over, Sussex and Surrey had rejoined, Kent and Essex been added to, the victorious kinguon; and the East Anglians had successfully revolted from Mercia, and put themselves under the protection of Egbert. The erowning your of triumph for Wessex was 827; then a single campaign made her king master of Mercis, and awed Northumhria into submission; from Edinburgh to Land's End he was supreme lord or immediate king. Of the nature and measure of this West-Saxon supremacy, no exact knowledge can be gained; doubtless it gave the right to demand help in war, and a commanding voice in the higher concerns of each kingdom. An unlooked-for force created the conditions that converted this supremacy into actual kingship. Northumhria, Mercia, and East Anglia, though bound to Wessex, still remained distinct kingdoms, each with its dependent king. These kingdoms the Danes laid in ruins; and after the narrow escape of Wessex from the care of the line of the of Wessex from the same fate, the line of the Lea, the Ouse, and Watling Street divided England into two political systems, Wessex and the Danelagh, that were practically two hostile camps. Between these, after Alfred's death, the battle was fought ont to the hitter end: and this end, when it came—as it did in the reign of Edgar (958—975)—made the whole of England a single kingdom. But either in this or in Canute's reign, the country between the Forth and the Tweedthe Lothians, as they are called—fell, or was torn, away from England: under what circumstances there is no record can tell us.

The Anglo-Sazon Chron., Beds, and Ethel-ward, are our chief authorities for the history of these kingdoms. See also Lappenberg, Anglo-Sazon Kings, vol. i.; J. R. Green, The Making of England.

Angria was a pirate-chief, who occupied the rock of Gheriah, off the Malabar coast of India. His depredations had caused him to be regarded as the scourge of the adjacent cass. Clive, on his return to India, in 1756, and Admiral Watson, with the English fleet, attacked and destroyed his station.

Angr.s (the older name of the county of Forfar) was the territory of one of the great Pictish tribes, or snb-kingdoms, and was governed hy a succession of Celtic "maormors," one of whom, Dufugan, is styled

After him there is a further succes-After him there is a further succession of four Celtic earls from father to son. Mand, the hoiress of the last of these, carried the earldom hy marriage first to the family of the Comyns, then to that of the Umphravilles. In 1297 Gilbert de Umphraville was summoned to Parliament as Earl of Angus. It is somewhat doubtful thether this was not merely a courtesy-title, and whether Umphraville was not in reality summoned in virtue of his barony of Prudhoe, in North-umberland (see Sir H. Nicolas, Historic Peerage); hut his descendants were, at uny rate, regularly summoned as Earls of Angus. By the marriage of Margaret, Countess of Angus, with William, first Earl Douglas (as his third wife), the earldom passed into one hranch of the house of Douglas. In 1633 William, eleventh Earl of Angus, was created Marquis of Douglas. In 1700 James, third Marquis, was created Duke of Douglas Archibald, son of the first Marquis, was ereated Earl of Ormond in 1651, and his son Archibald was created Earl of Forfar in 1661. His title and estates devolved, in 1715, on the Duke of Douglas, on whose death, in 1761, the honours of this family passed to the Dukes of Hamilton, for whom, and for the eelehrated lawsuit which arose out of this succession. Angus, Archibald Douglas, 5th Earl or, quarrelled with his kinsmen of the royalist party, and at the head of the partisans of James II., defeated them at Arkenholm (1455). At the siege of Roxhurgh, 1460, he was wounded by the hursting of the same cannon which killed James II. He was the leader of the baronial party in the conspiracy against the ministers of James III. at Lauderhridge, and from his famous remark on that occasion, "Heed not, I am he who will bell the cat, was ever afterwards called Archibald Beilthe-Cat. He commanded one wing of the insurgent army at the battle of Torwood, where James 1/1. was killed. He became Chancellor of Scotland, and in 1488 was one of the leaders of the barons at Sauchichurn. In 1491 he entered into a private treaty with Henry VII. hy which he agreed to do his utmost to promote harmony between the kings of England and Scotland.

Angus, Archibald Douglas, 6th Earl or (d. 1556), was the grandson of Earl "Bell-the-Cat." In August, 1514, he married Margaret, the Queen Regent of Scotland, and mother of James V.; hut was shortly afterwards carried off to France at the instance of John, Duke of Albany. Returning to Scotland in 1519, he defeated his enemies, the Hamiltons, in the following year, in the battle of "Clemse the Causeway," and seized Edinburgh, though he soon found himself compelled to seek a temporary asylum in France. In 1525 he returned, and became guardian of the young king, whom he kept in close restraint for three years, until one of his many attempts to escape proved successful (1528). On the death of James V., he returned to his native country, after coming to a secret understanding with the English king that he would do all in his power to serve his cause in Scotland. In 1543, he received Sir Ralph Sudler, the English ambassador, at his Castle of Tantallon; but in the following year Angus with the Assured Lords threw over Henry, and joined the national party, an act which drew down on his lands the army of Lord Hertford. Shortly afterwards he defeated the English at the battle of Ancrum Moor.

Angus, MeFerious (d. 761), obtained the Pictish throne, 731, after defeating the previous king, Alpin, at the junction of the Tay and the Earn, and aunihilating the forces of Nectan MacDenli at Loch Inch. In 732 Angus invaded Dalriada, and drove its king to Ireland. In 736 he again laid waste the kingdom of the Scots, taking the capital, Dunad, and throwing Dungal into prison; this devastation was repeated in 741, when Dalriada for some years sank into the position of a Pictish dependency. Shortly afterwards Angus entered into au alliance with Eadbert of Northumbria against the Britons of Strathelyde, who submitted in 756.

Animals, CRUELTY TO. In 1822, chiefly owing to the exertions of Mr. Martin, M.P., an Act was passed to repress the practice of cruelty to animals. Subsequently Acts with the same object were passed in 1827, 1835, and 1854, in great part through the efforts of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, instituted in 1824. In 1875 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the question of the vivisection of animals. In 1876 an-Act was passed regulating (but not abolishing) vivisection, and compelling physiological demonstrators and others to take out a certificate to vivisect.

Anlaf (or Olaf) Cuaran (d. 980), was the son of Sihtric, Danish King of Northumberland. After his father's death, Anlaf went to Dublin, but soon left Ireland for Scotland, where he married the daughter of Constantine, King of Alban. It was this match which probably provoked Athelstan's invasion of Scotland in 933. Anlaf next appears as his father-in-law's ally at Brunauburh in 937. In 943, after his cousin Anlaf Godfrithsson's death, we find him ruling in Northumberland with Ræginald diodrithsson. When Edmund conquered the five boronghe, Anlaf opposed him, and took Tamwoth by storm, but being beset in Leicester he made peace with the English king. In 944, however, Edmund drove both his godsons from their kingdom. But Anlaf again appeared in arms in 949, and was received by the people, till in 952 he was driven abroad for the last time by his turbulent subjects. He now ruled in Dublin for several years, and commanded at the great battle of Tara; but his defeat there by the high king of Ireland seems to have wrought a change in the old warrior, for he started the same year on a pilgrimage to Iona, where he died.

The famous legend of Hevelok the Dene, extant in old English and French, contains a romantic account of the early years of Aniaf Cvaran, and long served to keep his fame alive in Northern England, especially in Grimeby, the port of Scandinavian shippers, which is fabled to have derived its name from one of the characters in the story. See the poem edited by Sir F. Madden and Mr. Sheat for the Early Eng. Text Society; Ang.-Sax. Chron.; Florence of Worcester, Chron. sub an. 1937, &o.; Skene, Celtic Scotland, i. 352, &o.

Anlaf (or Olaf) Godfrithsson (d. 941), King of Dublin and Northumberland, succeeded his father as King of Dublin in 933. He came with a great force of Irish and Danes to the assistance of his cousin Anlaf Cuaran at the battle of Brunanburh, whence he fled, as the English song of triumph tells us, "over the dark water Dublin to seek." On the death of Athelstan he was called by the Northumbrians to rule over them, but he perished soon after of a grievous disease.

Annates, or First-Fruits, was the first year's income of newly-appointed archbishops and bishops which was exacted by the Pope before he would confirm the election. According to Blackstone, these payments were part of the papal usurpations over the clergy of these kingdoms, first introduced by Pandulph, the Pope's legate, during the reigns of King John and Henry III." Frequent attempts were made to check the payment of such large sums to the court of Rome, and in 34 Ed. I., when there was great complaint of the oppressive manner in which the papal legate exacted them, the first-fruits were granted to the king for two years. It was not, however, until 1532 that a bill was brought in declaring, that whereas "annates had risen, grown, and increased by an uncharitable custom, grounded upon no good or just title, and the payment thereof was enforced by the restraint of bulls, against all equity and justice," the payment of such annates should be discontinued, and that any bishop making such payments should forfeit all his lands and goods to the Reginald quered the i, and took beset in iglish king. e both his But Anlaf and was 52 he was s turbulent Dublin for the great ere by the ve wrought he started ona, where

The operation of this Act, however, was suspended for a time, as Henry waited to see whether the l'ope would grant him the wished-for divorce from Catherine of Aragon: on his refusal the rupture with Rome took place, and the statute was re-enacted 1534, whilst a clause was introduced providing that archbishops and bishops should not "be presented to the Bishop of Rome, otherwise called the Pope, for confirmation, or sue out any bulls at his court; but that they should be elected by congé d'élire." In consequence, the payment of episcopal first-fruits to the l'ope ceased from this time.

Anne, Queen (b. Feb. 6, 1665, s. Maich 8, 1702, d. Ang. 1, 1714), the last of the Stuart sovereigns, was the second daughter of James II. (while Duke of York) and Anne Hyde. She was bred a Protestant by the express command of Charles II., under the care of Dr. Henry Compton, afterwards Bishop of London. While still very young, her hand was sought by George Louis, electoral prince of Hanover, who eventually succeeded her on the English throne; but in 1683 she married George, brother of Christian V., of Denmark. Prince George was a personage completely without talent, capacity, er ambition, so that throughout his life his political position was altogether insignificant. Already, before her marriage, Anne had conceived what were, perhaps, the two strongest emotions of her life. The teaching of Compton, a zealous Anglican, who had suffered for the cause of Church and King in the rebellion, had made her a steadfast and devoted adherent of the Church of England. The design of altering the succession to the throne, on condition that Anne would become a Roman Catholic, entertained by the French and English courts, was nullified by the steady attachment of the princess to the Protestant faith; and Anne had already conceived that violent affection for Sarah Jennings, who became in 1678 the wife of John Churchill [MARLBOROUGH], which lasted during the greater portion of her life. It was owing to the Churchill influence chiefly that Anne consented to notify to William of Orange her approval of his landing, and that in the crisis of affairs she fied from Westminster to Dorset's house in Epping Forest. In spite of the efforts of her nucle, Clarendon, she made no objection to the accession of William III. and Mary. She was herself declared heir to the throne, failing issue to the sovereigns, and an allowance of £20,000 settled on her. Soon after the Revolution she gave birth to William, Duke of Gloueester, the only one of her numerous children who survived Infancy and he died in 1700 at the age of sleven. Anne gradually became completely estranged from the king and queen, and a party, of which the Churchills were the heads, was formed about her in opposition, and came to be known as the "Princess Party." One of the points this party constantly pressed forward was an increase in Anne's income. In 1691, Anne's estrangement from the king went so far that she wrote a letter to James II., begging his forgiveness. On the dis-grace of Marlborough, in 1692, Anne quar-relled with her sister, the queen; her guard of honour was taken from her, and she was treated with injudicious coldness and disrespect. After the death of Mary a formal reconciliation was made, through the mediation of Somers, but there was little friendship on either side. Anne resided at St. James's l'alace during the remainder of William's reign, with some of the state befitting the heiress to the throne.

With the death of William, Anne became queen, and reigned over England during a period of twelve years crowded with important events, and singularly distinguished by illustrious men. The earlier portion of the period is that in which the influence of the Marlboroughs prevailed; in the second that of their opponents was predominant. By the year 1702 the Torica, Godolphin Nottingham Normanhy, and Godolphin, Nottingham, Normanby, and Pembroke, had supplanted the great Whig ministers, who were chiefly responsible for the Revolution settlement. The war was The war was entered upon with vigour, under the auspices of Marlborough and Godolphin; a commission was appointed to draw up terms of union between England and Scotland; and the union of the two rival East India Com-panies accomplished. The chief military events of the year were the capture of Venloo, Ruremond, and Liège, and the expedition against Vigo Bay. In 1703 violent opposition was offered in the Scotch Parliament to the Union scheme. The Methuen Treaty was concluded with Portugal. Queen Bounty, for the augmentation of the livings of the poorer elergy, was instituted. Next year some changes occurred in the ministry. The High Tories, Nottingham, Jersey, and Seymour, who thwarted Marlborough's war policy, were dismissed, and their places supplied by the Moderate Tories, Harley and St. John. In July Gibraltar was captured, and Marlborough won the great battle of Blenheim in Angust. An attempt to tack the Occasional Conformity Act to the Land Tax Bill was defeated in the Commons. The Aylesbury election case threatened a permanent breach between the two bodies of the Legislature. In 1705, Peterborough, in Spain, captured Barcelona, and established the authority of Charles II. in Catalonia and Valencia. Commissioners were appointed by the Scotch Parliament to discuss the terms of the l'nion in London It was gradually becoming evident that Marlborough would have to rely on a Whig ministry. In 1706 the chief event was the consummation of the l'nion with Scotland. The labours of the commission lasted through the year, and the royal assent was given in March of the following year. Marlborough gained the battle of Ramillies, thereby driving the French from the Netherlands; but in Spain Charles II. began to supplant the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour, and the influence of llarley commenced to be appreciable. He instituted a series of intrigues in company with St. John, with a view to drive the Whig ministers from office. Meanwhile, Louis had made offers for peace, which were rejected. In the following year, Harley's intrigues, which took the form of an attack on the naval administration, were discovered, and he was forced to resign. On the failure of a composite ministry, the Whig junto came into power. The military events of the year were unfortunate. In Spain the allies were utterly defeated at Almanza; nor was Engene's attack on Toulon successful. In 1708 the Pretender made an unsuccessful expedition to Scotland; and Marlboreugh, in Flanders, gained a great victory at Oudenarde. The queen suffered great grief from the loss of her husband, to whom she was sincerely attached. Meanwhile, it was evident that the Whig ministry was insecure. Once more Louis offered to treat. His terms were rejected; and Marlborough won a bloody victory at Maiplaquet. In 1710 important changes took place at home. Mrs. 11ill, now Mrs. Masham, had completely supplanted the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour. The nation was weary of the war; and the injudicious prosecution of Dr. Sacheverell by the Whig ministry produced a violent outery against them. Sunderland and Godolphin were dismissed, and Harley was entrusted with the formation of a Tory ministry. The conference at Gertruydenberg resulted in nothing. In Spain the allies gained victories at Almenara and Saragossa, and Charles was once more established in Madrid; but these results were neutralised by the defeat of Stanhope at Brihuega. It soon became evident that the new ministry had determined on a peace policy, and that some of them, at all events, were willing that the Stuarts should be restored. The chief event at home in 1711 was the formation of the South Sea Company. Harley, now exceedingly popular on account of Guiscard's attempt to stal him. rapidly opened negotiations for peace. Marlborough's campaign in the year was resultless. On his return he was violently attacked in Parliament, and deprived of his offices. Twelve new peers were created, in order to "swainp" the majority in the House of Lards. In 1712 Ormonde was placed in com mand of the army, with Instructions tattempt nothing. The conference was opened at Utrecht, and the terms of peace were laid. before the Ilouse. In July Ormonde separate from the allies. Marlborough quitte England in November, and remained abroa until the queen's death. The Treaty of Utrecht was signed in March, 1713. Mear while, the failing health of the queen mad the succession question open. Harley wa evidently unwilling to consent to a return c the Stuarts; but no such scruples restraine St. John, now Viscount Bolingbroke. Th remodelling of the army was entrusted t Ormonde, but the scheme failed owing to the neglect of Harley to supply the necessar As a blind, Bolingbroke introduce into the Heuse a proposition that the Protestant succession was in no danger. Ti design of the Whigs to bring the Electors Prince over to England was thwarted by th wise caution of George, and hy the evider dislike of the queen to such a step. Boling broke now saw that he must drive Harle from office; and he therefore introduced h Schism Bill, which Harley, who was of Lo Church principles, could not support. H was accordingly dismissed. Everything wa now in Bolingbroke's favour, but his plan were foiled by the fatal illness of the queer As she lay on her death-hed, she was induce by a deputation of the Council to entrust th Lord Treasurer's staff to Shrewsbury, now fire in his at achment to the house of Ilanove There is considerable reason, nevertheless, the believe that Anne would have consented to her brother's succession to the throne if onl he would have changed his religion.

Anne was very popular with the nation but this, perhaps, was rather due to the far that she was the last of the dynasty, which in spite of its faults, retained a strong hol on the sympathies of Englishmen, than t any special merits of her own. She was woman of somewhat narrow intellect, vicient prejudices, and weak judgment. He strongest political passions were devote attachment to the Established Church, an dislike to the Whigs, whom she regarded a the enemies of legitimacy and of royalt itself; but, except when her prejudices an her obstinacy were roused, she had litt strength of will, and was easily led by he female favourites. While she was under the fascination of the Duchess of Marlborough she lent herself readily to the great scheme of the duke; when, subsequently, the influence of Abigail Hill was completely estal lished over her, she allowed herself with r less willingness to countenance the project of Harley. Of taste and wit she had little and she showed scarcely any conception of the great intellectual movement which he rendered her reign an illustrious period i English literary history. She had, however aced in comsome compensating qualities. Her private life was exemplary and excellent; she was a good wife and a devoted mother. Her long and much-tried friendship with her haughty favourite was, at any rate, a testimony of the goodness of her heart and the strength of her affections. "Scarce any person," says Lord Stanhope, "ever endured more for a friend, or from a friend." As applied to her private character, at least, the familiar appellation of "good" Queen Anne is, perhaps, not undeserved. he necessary

Anne Boleyn, Queen, second wife of

Anne Boleyn, QUEEN, second wife of llenry VIII. (b. 1507, d. 1536), was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, who married the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. She was in her youth taken by her father to the French court, but returned in 152. She is described as a little lively brunette, with long black hair and beautiful eyes. She was the object of much flirtation in the English court, and Henry VIII., beginning from idle gallantry, advanced to an uncontrollable passion for her. Honours and emoluments were showered upon her father. At last, in 1527, Henry VIII. resolved to divorce Catherine that he might marry Anne, whom he lodged magnifi-cently in his palace. The momentous proceedings to obtain a divorce were entrusted to the charge of Wolsey, and when, in 1529, his failure was manifest, his fall rapidly followed. llenry VIII. still pursued his efforts to obtain a divorce, and meanwhile went about the country in company with Anne Boleyn. This created much indignation amongst the people, and the mode of life of the King and Anne Boleyn was generally regarded as dishonourable. The vacillation of Pope Clement VII. had lasted too long for his firmness to be succussful; when, at the end of 1552, he issued a brief, bidding Henry to take back Catherine, and forbidding him to marry Anne Boleyn, llenry VIII. had gone too far to retrace his steps. On Jan. 25, 1533, he was privately married, and the new Archbishop (Cranmer) pronounced his divorce from Catherine. The marriage with Anne was then avowed, and confirmed by the archbishop, and the new queen was crowned in June. On Sept. 7 ab-gave birth to a daughter, Elizabeth. But Ann. Boleyn had but a brief enjoyment of the position for which she had waited so long. January 7th, 1536, Catharine of Aragon dled. and Anne Boleyn could not conceal her delight Shortly afterwards she brought into the world a dead child, to the king's great disappointment, as he wished for a male heir. He looked on Anne's conduct with suspicion. The lightheartedness and brilliancy which had once attracted him now seemed to be culpable frivolity. On May-day the king abruptly left some games at which he was present with the queen, and on the next day Anne was committed to the Tower on the charge of treason and adultery. Her brother, Lord Rochford, Sir Henry Norris, Smeaton a musician, and Brereton and Weston, gentlemen of the bedchamber, were apprehended as her accomplices. Smeaton and Norris made some confessions of guilt, but it is hard to estimate how far they were true. That Anne was frivolous, and had behaved with some indecorum, may be admitted; but opinions must continue to differ as to the degree of her guilt. She was arraigned before a commission of twenty-seven peers, presided over by the Duke of Nerfolk. The evidence of the confessions was regarded as sufficient for her condemnation. Cranmer was induced to declare her marriage null and void, and on May 19, 1536, Atme Boloyn was beheaded.

Anne of Bohemia, Queen (b. 1366, d. 1394), wife of Richard 11., the daughter of the Emperor Charles IV., was married to Richard in 1382. Her sweet and gentle disposition carned for her the title of "Good Queen Anne," and her influence seems to have had some effect in mitigating the violence and disorder of her husband's reign. It is said that the cruel reprisals taken on the Kentish revolters were discontinued at her intercession; and thet the quarrel between tho king and the citizens of London, which culminated in the riot of 1392, was healed by her mediation. In one instance only does her influence appear to have been bad. She took an active part in attempting to bring about the divorce of the king's favourite, De Vere, Earl of Oxford, from his wife, who was connected with several of the great noble families, in order that he might marry one of her German ladies, "the landgravine," as Froissart calls her. Anne of Bohemia was said to be well versed in the Bible, and to have read it in a Bohemian or German version; and she and her attendants, English and Bohemian, are said to have looked with considerable favour on Wiclif. The proscript as of the "merciless" Parliament of 1386 were specially directed against the queen's attendants, and King Richard afterwards declared, at the trial of the Earl of Arundel (see State Trials, vol. i.) that the queen was three hours on her knees before the earl, pleading with tears for the life of John Calverley, one of her esquires. There is little doubt that the connection between England and Bohemia, brought about by Anne's marriage, must have done much to make the writings of Wielif better knewn on the Continent, and especially in Germany.

Anne of Bargundy (d. 1432) was the daughter of John Sans Peur and sister of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. She was married in 1423 to John, Duke of Bedford (q.v.).

Anne of Cleves, Queen (b. 1515, d. 1557), fourth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of John, third Duke of Cleves, by Marie, daughter of William, Duke of Jülich, Berg, and Ravensberg. Auxious to secure for England the goolwill of the Schmalcaldic League, Thomas Cromwell, after the death of Jane Seymour, proposed to Henry an alliance with the Geruau Protestant princes by means of a marriage with Anne of Cleves; and the king, who was greatly pleased with a portrait he received of his intended bride, willingly lent himself to Cromwell's proposition.

Landing at Deal Dec. 27, 1539, Anne proceeded to Rochester, where Henry first saw her. Her person, however, failed altogether to come up to the expectations he had formed from her portrait. He called a council to consider if there was any possibility of getting out of the marriage engagement to her without involving himself in a quarrel with her family. A sort of prior contract between Anne and Francis, son of the Duke of Lorraine, was, however, the only respectable objection to the marriage that could be raised; and this, when named to the Duke of Cleves's ambassadors, was completely disposed of by an offer on their part to produce a formal renunciation of the contract. Henry was therefore obliged to submit to the distasteful marriage, which was celebrated at Greenwich on January 6, 1540. For a time Henry was able to treat his queen with a fair show of respect; but after the execution of Cronswell, the original proposer of the marriage, he sought no longer to conceal his feeling of aversion for her. The marriage was finally annulled, and the decision to that effect duly ratified by Parliament, on three grounds, viz. (1) that she had been previously contracted to the Duke of Lorraine: (2) that he, Henry, had not inwardly given his consent; (3) that the marriage had never been consummated. As some consolation to Anne for this loss of position, it was arranged that sho should be treated as an adopted sister, and that she should enjoy the honours of precedence next to the queen and the king's daughter. These terms, and the further promise of an annual settlement of £3,000, procured Anne's willing assent to the proposed divorce. She passed the remainder of her days in England. where she died at her palace of Chelsea, July 16, 1557. By Queen Mary's orders her funeral was solemnised in Westminster Abbey with regal splendour.

Anne of Denmark, Queen (b. 1574, d. 1619), wife of James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, was the second daughter of Frederick II., King of Denmark, and was married to James in 1589. She seems to have been at one time a Roman Catholie, and at her coronation as Queen of England she refused to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the English Church. But she took little part in polities, and the Roman Catholic party quickly found it was uscless to hope for anything from her. With the exception of some occasional interference in the cause of a favourite, she seems to have contented herself with entertaining the king and his courtiers with balls and masques. Her character has been very differently represented, hut perhaps Hume's estimate, that she was "a woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues," is on the whole the fairest one.

Strickland, Queens of Eng.; Jesse, Mem. of the Stuarts; Aikin, Court of James I.

Annesley Case, The (1743), arose out of a disputed claim to the honours and estates of the Anglesey peerage. Soon after the assumption of the title by Richard, sixth earl, James Annesley, who professed to be the son of Lord Altham, elder hrother of the earl, laid claim to the title and estates. The claimant, who was popularly known as "the unfortunate young nobleman," stated that he had been kidnapped in infancy by his uncle's orders, and sent to the American colonies. On November 11, 1743, he commenced an action against his uncle in the Irish Court of Exchequer. The result of the trial (which was said to have been the longest known up to that time) was that he gained a verdict, but made no further effort to obtain his title. On the death of Richard, sixth earl, in 1761, the right of his son Arthur to succeed him was disputed. The Irish House of Lords confirmed his title. The English House of Lords, however, held that the earldom of Anglesey had expired with the father of this nobleman, who, however, continued to sit in the Irish Parliament as Viscount Valentia, and was subsequently created Earl of Mountmorris.

Annesiey's Case (1719) produced an important constitutional dispute between the English and the Irish Houses of Lords. suit for the possession of certain lands in Kildare, between Hester Sherlock and Maurice Annesley, had been decided in favour of the latter by the Irish Court of Exchequer. On appeal, the Irish House of Lords reversed the decision. This might have been considered final; but Annesley appealed to the English House of Lords, who affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, and ordered Annesley to be put in possession of the estate. The court made an order accordingly, hut the Sheriff of Kildare refused to executo it. He was thereupon fined £1,200, and hrought his case before the Irish House of Lords. That body resolved, after taking the opinions of the judges, that the final right of appeal trom the Irish courts lay with them, and ordered the Barons of the Exchequer into custody for acting on the decision of the Euglish House. The latter, however, caused a Bill to be brought in (which passed hy a majority of 63), asserting the inferior position of the Irish House of Lords, and depriving it of all appellate jurisdiction whatsoever. This Act was a mere stretch of power, for the Irish Lords had frequently entertained both writs of error and appeals in equity.

Annuities are certain sums of money paid yearly, and are charged upon the person or personal estate of the individual from whom they are due. If an annuity is charged upon real estate it is called a rent charge. Before the reign of Anne the annuities which had been granted by the crown as a reward for services performed, or for other reasons, had been charged upon the hereditary revenues, and it had been held that the king had power, in law, to bind his successors. On the accession of Queen Anne an Act was passed to restrain the alienation of any portion of the hereditary revenues for a longer period than the life of the reigning sovereign; so that it became the practice to re-grant annuities and pensions at the beginning of a fresh reign. On the establishment of a civil list under George III., government annuities were charged on it instead of on the hereditary revenues; and the indiscriminate granting of pensions by the crown was checked by Act of Parliament, 1782, the Irish annuities being regulated in 1793, and the Scotch in 1810. In 1837 the right of the erown to grant pensions was restricted to £1,200 a year, and to "such persons as have just claims on the royal beneficence." The system of granting annuities as a political bribe, which had been much in favour under the Stuarts, was done away with in 1705, when holders of government annuities were declared incapable of sitting in Parliament, though the Act was occasionally evaded by the granting of secret pensions. The system of raising government loans hy means of annuities began in 1692, when the "Million Act" empowered the raising of that sum for the expenses of the French war by means of a tontine annuity, and several similar statutes were passed during the war of Queen Anne's reign. During the Austrian Succession and Seven Years' Wars, government annuities were frequently granted by way of bonus or premium to the subscribers of government loans. In 1773 a measure was passed through the Nouse of Commons, under the auspices of Burke, to enable the working classes to invest their savings in the purchase of deferred annuities, but it was rejected by the Lords. In 1779 the government was authorised to raise £7,000,000 by annuity. nuity. "The government of that period," says Mr. Walford, "was driven to great extremities for raising money; nearly every session one or two Annuity Acts were passed, generally accompanied by a lottery." Acts were passed on the subject in 1808, 1817, and

Angelm, St. (b. 1033, d. 1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at or near Aosta. His father, a vassal of Maurienne, was a man of some wealth and position, but of unthrifty habits and violent temper. When only fifteen Anselm ardently desired to enter the monastic life, but his father refused his consent. A severe illness did not soften the old man, and when his mother's death removed the last barrier to the father's tyranny, Anselm crossed the Alps with a single attendant to seek a career and escape his father's oppression. He spent three years in Burgundy, and was thence attracted to Normandy. After a sojourn at Avranches, where Lanfrane had once taught, Anselm removed to Bec, now flourishing under Lanfrane as prior. After a severe course of study and discipline he took the vows, at the age of twenty-seven. Three years later he was elected prior on Lanfranc removing to Caen. His administration made Bec inferior only to Cluny in general repute and superior to it in learning. Not only did Bec turn out great scholars, but Anselm infused a high intollectual tone into the whole monastery. He now published his famous Prostogion and Monologion, and in 1078, when Herlwin died, was made abbot. This office led to several visits to England, to look after the estates Bec had obtained from the Conqueror. These visits made him widelyknown among all classes of Englishmen. He renewed his connection with Lanfrage, now archbishop, became acquainted with Endmer of Canterbury, his future biographer, and established cordial relations with Earl Hugh of Chester. He had a good word to say for English saints like Alphege when Lanfrane denied their claims to martyrdom. Lanfrane died in 1089, and everyone recognised in Anselm the one man who could, as at Bec, continue Lanfranc's work and keep William II. in check. But William kept the see vacant four years, to secure, with the rich temporalities, freedom from unpleasant advice. In 1092 Anselm again visited England, very unwillingly, lest he should be accused of ambition, but overcome at last by the importunity for spiritual consolation of Earl Hugh, now very ill. Anselm was still in England when a sudden illness stirred Rufus's sluggish conscience, and he resolved to atone for his past erimes by making the Abbot of Bec arch-Anselm was almost dragged before the sick king's bed, and after a show of resistance, ludierous if not sincere, was positively forced to accept the office. But if archbisho he would maintain all the rights of his church Only on William's promise to resign the tem poralities, to listen to Anselm's advice in thing spiritual, and to acknowledge Urban II. instead of the imperial anti-Pope Clement, did husubmit to consecration (Dec. 4, 1093). William soon recovered, relapsed into his old ways and quarrelled with Anselm. Anselm's pre sent of 500 marks was scornfully rejected a His desire for the convocation of a council to check the tide of profligac and profanity was equally unheeded. At las William's refusal to acknowledge Urban, o to allow Anse.m to go to Rome to receive the pallium from that Pope, led to a definite rup ture. The Great Council of Rockingham faile to make Anselm give way to William; bu the king ended the dispute himself by secretly acknowledging Urban, and getting from hin Anselm's pallium. Tho fresh difficulty o Anselm's refusal to accept it from lay hand was got over by his taking it himself from the high altar of his cathedral. But within year William brought him before the Curi: Regis on a charge of inadequately fulfilling his feudal obligations in the Welsh war Anselm now appealed to the Pope, wrung from Rufus a licence to travel, and left Eng land in October, 1097. William at once seized on the estates of his see. At Rome, Anselu soon found that Urban, though very friendly was too wary to quarrel with the English While in Italy he took part in two conneils. At Bari he defended the double Procession against the Greeks. At the Lateran he shared in excommunicating al concerned with the sin of lay investiture Tired of fruitless waiting, Anselm left Italy in the early summer of 1099, and lived chiefly at Lyons, till William's death and Henry's need of friends recalled him from exile. But though Henry had urged Anselm's immediate return, he required him before long to renew his homage, and be again "invested" with his archbishopric. Thus the investiture con test at last crossed over into England, but was conducted in a spirit different from that displayed by Gregory VII. and Henry IV Anselm absolutely refused to yield; Henry insisted on prerogative and precedent; but king and prelate always treated each other with the utmost courtesy. An agreement to refer the matter to the Pope led only to Pas chal II.'s strong support of Anselm; and a Henry would not give way, the primate went into exile a second time, in 1103. In 1103 Anselm felt compelled to threaten excommunication, but his altimatum led to an interview and reconciliation with Henry, where the famous compromise was devised which half a generation later was accepted at Wormby Pope and Emperer. In 1106 Anselu returned. He gave canonical consecration to the bishops irregularly apr inted during the rupture, and efficiently aided Henry against f archbishop the feudalists. He found time to compose a treatise on the Agreement of Grace and Predestination with Free Will. He died April 21, 1109, aged seventy-six, and was buried next to Laufrane at Canterbury. Not till the end of the fifteenth century did he receive formal canonisation from the worst of popes, Alexander VI.; but long before this Dante had placed him in paradise among the greatest saints of Christendom. Anselm's personal character was lofty and pure. But the saint in private life was also a churchman and a politician of high rank, a churchman and a politician of high rank, the successful governor of a great abbey and greater see, and the author of the investiture compromise. He represented the highest ideals of mediæval Christendom. His contest with William and Henry was to him a struggle for principle and divine law against mere force and worldliness. That it involved the subordination of hudding patiencial to the subordination of hudding patiencial. the subordination of budding nationality to dying cosmopolitanism, the subjection of the state to a spiritual tyranny as ruthless as that of William, could not be seen by Anselm.

As the precursor of at least one side of scholastic philosophy, Anselm has an equal claim to fame. Although his unsystematic treatises became unduly neglected when brought into competition with the vast and methodical tractates of the later schoolmen, he, more than anyone else, gave that impulse to justify Scripture and the Church by reason and dialectic, which was the dominant idea of the most characteristic school of mediæval philosophy. In the Monologion, he tried to "elicit from the necessity of reason, without the aid of Scripture, the idea of God and the real foundation of it," by recourse to the Platoric theory of "ideas," as expressed by St. Augustine. In the Proclogion he pursues the samo line still further, and anticipates Descartes' famous principle "that the idea of God in the human mind necessarily involves the reality of that idea." His Cur Iteus Homo attempts to establish a logical and rational theory of the Incarnation, and has profoundly influenced all subsequent speculation on that subject. His crude realism passed away with the advent of more systematic thinking, but the impulse he gave remained permanent.

The best editions of Anselm's works are those of Dom Gerberon (Paris, 1673) and Migne (Patrologier Cureus Completus). Cur Drus Homo has been translated into English (Oxford, 1862), and the Monologion and Prologion into Francis, and the Monologion and Prologion into Francis, and the Monologion and Prologion into Francis, is Bone-lite's Retinations have been done into English by Dr. Passey.

Eadmer's Vita Anselms and Historia Movella (printed in Migne, Patrolog., v. 189) are car great rources for the gerammal and political career of Anselm. After 1089 his history is the history of the time, and much time down can be got from the steneyal anthorities for the period. They are fully and claborately worked up in Mr. Freeman's William Rujus. Dean Church's Stulid Anselm is the heat general account of him in English, better than that in Dean Hook's Lives of the Archbishope of Centerbury. Church's preface enumerates the chief modern works on Anselm. Professor Hisse's Anselm von Centerbury is full and careful. Professor Franch's work is shorter and more meagre. M. Charles de Rémusat's Saint Anselme de Canterbiry is of great importance. There are other accounts by Möhler, Baisset, and Mon alembert. An elaborate, though not altogethe satisfactory, Life has been published (1963) by h. M. Bule.

Anson, George, 1st Baron (b. 1697, d. 1762), in 1716 became second lieutenant of H.M.S. Hampshire, and during the two following years sailed under Admiral Byng in the Mediterranean. In 1724 he attained the rank of post captain. He visited South Carolina, and founded the town of Anson (1733). In 1740 he was despatched with six vessels to sail round Cape Horn and rifle the shores of Peru. Beset by terrible storms, he appointed the island of Juan Fernandez as a rendezvous for his ships. Next scurvy broke out. The vessels at length arrived at the island, except the Wager, which was wrecked. The Spanish fleet sent to attack them was driven back into the Rio de la Plata. Foiled in his attempt to catch the Spanish treasure ship, Anson sailed westward from America with the Centurion, his sole remaining ship, and arrived at Spithead in June, 1744, after an absence of three years and nine months, during which he had circumnavigated the globe. He was at once appointed Rear-Admiral of the Blue and Commissioner of the Admiralty. In 1746 he was made Vice-Admiral. In the following year he commanded the Channel squadron, and defeated De la Jonquière off Cape Finisterre. For this exploit he was raised to the peerage. In 1749 he became Vice-Admiral of Great Britain, and in 1751 First Commissioner of the Admiralty. He commanded at the descent on Cherbourg in 1758. Anson's talents were of a rather mediocre order, and scarcely bore a proportion to the honours and success he attained. He was dull and somewhat nn-ready in business, so that it was said of him after his famous expedition that he had been round the world but never in it. He was, however, a man of great courage, coolness, and determination.

Antigua, the most important of the Leeward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1493. In 1632 an English settlement was founded in the island by Sir Thomas Warner, a further influx of colonists from Britain taking place in 1663, in which year a grant of the island was made to Lord Willoughby. In 1666 it was ravaged by a French expedition from Martinique, but by the Treaty of Breda, in the same year, was formally ceded to Britain. In 1710 an insurrection caused by the misconduct of the governor, Colonel Park, took place, and the governor was slain; in 1737 a preposed rebellion of the negroes was crushed before it came to anything. The emancipation of the slaves in 1834 was effected without any of the disturbances which took place in Jamaica. In 1871 Antigua became part of the Federation of the Leeward Islands, and is the residence of the governor-in-chief; even before that dato it was a representative colony, its affairs being administered by a governor, a legislative council nominated by the crown, and an elective legislative assembly of fourteen members.

Anti-Jacobin, The, was a magazine established in Nov., 1797, and brought out weekly until the following July, under the editorship of William Gifford. The object of the paper was mainly political, being intended to satirise the Jacobin principles of the Fox section of the Whigs. The most distinguished of its contributors were John Hookham Frere and George Canning, the latter of whom was the author of the celebrated story of the "Needy Knife Grinder." Though its object was political, it contained much parody of the literature of the day, especially of Southey and Darwin, both of whom afforded fertile subjects for Canning's wit. The Anti-Jacobin as at first projected had but a short life. The first number was published Nov. 20, 1797, and the last on July 9 in the following year. It was, however, continued on a new plan, with less of a political and more of a literary character, until 1818. Some of the papers that appeared in it have frequently been reprinted.

Antrim, ALEXANDER MACDONNELL, 3RD EARL OF (b. 1615, d. 1699), was a Roman Catholic, and an active supporter in Ireland of James II. after the Revolution. He was sent with 1,200 men to occupy Londonderry, but the inhabitants shut the gates in his face, and he thought it prudent to retire to Coleraine. At the battle of the Boyne his cavalry fled, without striking a blow, before the enemy. Lord Antrim was attainted of high treason, but was subsequently included in the provisions of the Treaty of Limerick, and his honours and estates were restored to him.

Antrim, RANDAL MACDONNELL, MARQUIS OF (d. 1682), was employed in 1641 to gain over the Irish army, and he greatly ingratiated hlmself with the Catholics. Though a Catholic and a Cavalier, he was eager to fight the Ulster rebels, and offered is aid to Monroe, who, however, treacherously seized him, and kept him a prisoner for eight months, when he escaped, joined Owen O'Neil, and became one of the Kilkenny Council, pretending that he would bring 10,000 men over to England. The 1,500 men under Kolkitto who joined Montrose in 1644 were sent by him. Clarendom says of him that he was a narrow-minded and vain man, and aspired to supplant Ormonde as a commander, though whelly unfit for the post.

Antwerp, THE SURRENDER OF (1706), was an important advantage for the allies in the War of the Spanish Succession. The town was the key to the Scholdt fortresses, and in fact commanded the whole of Brabant and West Flanders. "It might otherwise be described," says Mr. Burton, "as representing in enlargement the relation of its own citadel to the minor fortified works attached to its walls, since it was the centre of converg-ence to a group of fortified towns bound to it by an apparatus of dykes and canals." Marlborough was so convinced of its importance that he termed his plans against it "the great design." The fortress had previously been occupied by Boufflers, who had driven Opdam from it. After the battle of Ramillies Cadogan was sent to summon the town. Marlborough awaited the news with anxiety. as a siege would cause great dolay. The inhabitants were, however, to a man in favour of their new king, and the French wore therefore compelled to give up the town. For the remainder of the war it remained in the hands of the allies.

This actually took place soon after, and was followed by the gullant defence of the Tula-buldee hills by the British against the forces of the rajah, which terminated in his complete defeat. On Dec. 15 the Resident was able to require the rajah to surrender at discretion, on the understanding that his throne would be restored to him. Appeal of Treason. [TREASON.]

Appeals to Rome. [PAPACY.]

Appellants, or Lords Appellant, was the name given t: the nobles who in 1387 "appealed" of treason Richard II.'s ministers, De Vere, Neville, Do la Pole, Tresilian, and Brember. When it was known that the king, with the aid of his supporters in various parts of the country and the citizens of London, was attempting to resume the full exercise of his authority, of which he had been deprived by the commission forced on him the previous year, the Duke of Gloucester, with a large body of troops, marched to London, and compelled him (Nov. 17) to receive a petition of complaint against the royal counsellors. On this proceeding he immediately fled. The Appellants exhibited the bill of impeachment in the Parliament in t which met in Feb., 1388, and, in spite of the protests of the judges, it was carried. Three of the ministers had already escaped from the kingdom; but Tresilian and Brember were arrested and put to death. The Appellants were five in number—the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Derby, Nottingham, Warwick, and Arundel. [RICHARD II.; (LOUCESTER, THOMAS, DUKE OF.

Appellate Jurisdiction is "the jurisdiction exercised by a court of justice at the iustance of a person complaining of the decision of another court called, in reference to the court of appeal, the court below." Before the Norman Conquest no suit could be carried to a higher tribunal until it had been first heard in the Hundred Court; thence an appeal lay to the Shire Moot, and thence to the Witenagemot, which was the final court of appeal. Under the Norman kings, appeals were decided in the Curia Regis; while the appeal from the ordinary law courts under Henry II. lay to the sovereign as the source of justice, and to the Concilium Ordinarium. By degrees, however, petitions for redress were addressed to the Chancellor rather than the king; and in the reign of Edward III. the Court of Chancery was constituted as a Court of Equity, but not of appeal. The Concilium Ordinarium (and not the Commune Concilium) was for long the only court of appeal; by degrees its appellate jurisdiction passed to the House of Lords, whose power to hear common law appeals has never been questioned. In 1661, however, in the famous case of Shirley v. Fagg, the Commons denied that the Lords could hear appeals from equity; but this right, first asserted in the reign of Charles I., has never been attacked since. In 1358, the Court of Exchequer Chamber was created as an intermediate court of appeal between the Common Law Courts and the House of Lords; the powers of this court were extended in 1585, reconstituted in 1831. Under Henry VIII., appeals from the ecclesiastical courts to Rome were forbidden under the penalty of præmunire, and appeals from the arch-bishops' courts were declared to lie to the king in Chancer, who was to appoint Lords Delegates of Appeals to hear appeals from the Admiralty, ecclesiastical, and baronial courts. In 1832 this appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict., e. 60) of 1873, the appellate functions of this committee, and of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, were transferred to the High Court of Appeal constituted by that Aet, with appellate jurisdiction from all courts of common law and equity, and from the Palatine Courts of Durham and Lancaster. The final appeal was still left to the House of Lords. [CHANCERY; EXCHEQUER CHAMBER; LORDS, HOUSE OF.]

Apprentices are persons bound by indentures to zerve a master for a certain period, receiving in return for their services maintenance and in truction in their master's craft. The system of apprenticeship in England is of very ancient date, and probably was instituted as carly as the trade gilds themselves. In medieval times the principle of combination amongst members of one trade was universally recognised, and in order to practise any eraft it was necessary to become free of the company or gild of that craft. This freedom was obtained by serving an apprenticeship of so many years; and as the number of apprentices which each master was allowed to take was usually limited, a material check was placed upon the numbers of those who were privileged to exercise each trade. Although the system of apprenticeship existed in England from about the twelfth century, and is occasionally referred to in Acts of Parliament (e.g., 12 Rich. II., c. 3), it was not until 1563 that the famous Statute of Apprentices was passed. By this Act no person was allowed to exercise a trade unless he had previously served a seven years' apprenticeship to it, though trades which were established in England after the passing of the statute. This Act after the passing of the statute. was found very burdensome, and although it was judicially interpreted to apply only to towns, it was repealed in 1814 on the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons; some reservations were, however, made "in favour of the customs and hy-laws of the city of London and of other cities, and of corporations and companies lawfully constituted." In 1601 it was enacted that the overseers of a parish might hind pauper children as apprentices until their twentyfourth year, but in 1728 the age was reduced to twenty-one. In 1845 an Act was passed which regulated the hinding of boys apprenticed on board vessels, such boys to be between the ages of twelve and seventeen. The terms of apprenticeship in Ireland and Scotland were much less than in England, varying from five to three years, and in Scotland, says Adam Smith, "the corporation laws are less oppressive than in any part of Europe."

Apprenticeship, though not now necessary, except in a few cases (as that of solicitors and the like), is frequently entered into by contract, the master being in all cases bound to provide necessary food, elothing, and lodging. The apprentices of the Elizabethan and Stuart periods were usually the sons of eomen or tradesmen, and, being forbidden to wear the genteel rapier, carried a stout bat or club. Hence the ery when an uproar commenced of "'Prentices! clubs!" From the time of the Tudors the apprentices of London were the special "champions of mercantile jealousy arrayed against aristocratic arrogance; and are to be found in almost every London riot, until they were finally the conquerors at Marston Moor and Nasehy."

Macpherson, Annals of Commerce, iii. 441, 607.

Appropriation of Supplies. The successive maxims, the enforcement of which finally secured to the Commons the complete control of taxation, were: (1) that the Parliament alone could grant supplies, and the Commons alone originate such grants (2) that their petitions for redress must b answered before supplies should be granted (3) that the right to grant includes the righ to decide the appropriation of the grant fo definite purposes, and to demand the audit of its expenditure. The Parliament of the six teenth century saw the two former of thes claims constantly evaded by the arbitrary of underhand action of the crown. They began also to see that the way to connteract this, and t counteract at the same time the extravagance or dishonesty of the minister of the crown, wa by putting in force the third claim. This ha been suggested in the early struggles of th thirteenth century; as in 1237, when th crown offered to allow a committee of th Great Council to supervise the expenditure of the grant then asked for. The plan come forward again in 1262 and in 1266; its im portance, however, was not yet realised. N doubt under Edward I. it was felt to b enough that Parliament alone should mak grants, while under Edward III., l'arliamen advanced to the principle of redress befor supply; yet the principle of appropriation was even in these reigns, plainly exhibited in th custom of explaining to the country in th writ of summons to Parliament what th specific purpose was of the grant about to b demanded, whether for a French, a Welsh, o a Scotch war, or for defence of the seas, o for protection against invasion. Indeed under Edward III. the grant was commonly stated to be made for this particular purpose while in 1377 the grant for defence of th seas is put hy the Commons into the hand of the London citizens, Walworth and Phil pot, to expend: and in 1390 is clearly dis played the distinction between the ordinary and the war expenditure, ten shillings and thirty shillings respectively being allotted to each, out of the forty shillings tax on ever-sack of wool. The principle thus established was fully accepted in the Lancastrian reigns Tonnage and poundage, for instance, became the recognised appropriation for defence o the seas, as the household expenses were supposed to be provided out of the crown lands and Fortescue wished the principle carried further, so that the erown lands should be redeemed, and inalienably set apart for sucl extraordinary expenses as embassies, pensions protection against invasion, &c. It was, in act, the increasing poverty of the crown tha directed attention to the distinction of the various heads of expenditure, and the need of a strict system of appropriation; and it wan natural, therefore, that when the crown, in Yorkist and Tudor hands, became wealthy as well as despotic, these distinctions, and the appropriations among them, should be loss sight of. Parliament met but rarely; ton nage and poundage were granted for the king's life; benevolences filled up the roya coffers, already enriched by forfeitures; and Aquablanca, Peter of (d. 1268), was one of the numerous foreign ecclesiastics who thronged to England in Henry III.'s reign. In 1240 he was made Bishop of Hereford, and was one of the most obnoxious foreign advisors of the king. He was driven from his see by the barons in 1262, and his goods were sequestrated.

Aquitaine, THE DUCHY OF, in the south of France, which comprised Guienne, Perigueux, Limoges, Auvergne, Saintonge, La Marche, Poitou and Gascony, besides smaller territories, was first brought into connection with England by the marriage of Henry II. with Eleanor, heiress of the last Duke of Aquitaine. John lost Poitou, but the rest of the province remained in the hands of the English king. By the Treaty of Abbeville, in 1259, Aquitaine became a flef, held by the King of England as a vascal of the French crown. For a short while in Edward I.'s reign, Aquitaine was occupied by the French; and one of the chief causes of the war with France in the reign of Edward III. was the attempt of Philip VI. to regain possession of the duchy. In 1360 the Treaty of Bretigny once more secured Aquitaine to the English king, with the addition of Poitou, but not including Auvergne. But the renewal of the war brought defeats and losses on the English, with the result that in 1374 nothing remained to them of Aquitaine but some small pieces of territory round Bayonne and Bordeaux. Henry V. won back the province, only for his son to lose everything; and the final result of the Hundred Years' War was the incorporation of Aquitaine into the French kingdom.

Arabella Stuart, LADY (b. 1575, d. 1615), was the daughter of the Earl of Lennox, brother of Lord Darnley. Thus she was first cousin to James I. and great-granddaughter of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. During her early life, Queen Elizabeth often spoke of Arabella as her possible successor, in case James did not conduct himself according to her satisfaction; and though on Elizabeth's death James I. succeeded to the English crown without opposition, there were some who maintained that Arabella, having been born in England, had a better title to the crown than James, who was an alien. [STUART, AMILY OF.] One of the objects of the Main Plot would seem to have been to depose James and place Arabella on the throne, though it is very improbable that Arabella herself knew anything of the designs of the conspirators. She continued to live at court till 1610, when, contrary to the king's wishes, she privately married Sir William Seymour, afterwards Marquis of Hertford, and a member of the Suffolk branch of the royal family. This union of two possible claimants to the threne was regarded by James with great apprehension; Seymour was at once sent to the Tower, and Arabella confined at Lambetb, to be shortly after conveyed to Durham. While on her way thither she managed to escape, and took ship for France, her husband having got out of the Tower and fled to Ostend. But before Arabella could reach Calais, the vessel was captured, and she was committed to the Tower. Her reason gave way, and after four years' imprisonment she died. Her character was remarkably amiable, and sho never appears to have engaged personally in the intrigues carried on in her name.

Aracan is a division of British Burmah, lying along the eastern coast of the Bay of Bengal, extending from Chittagong to Cape Negrais. The district at one time belonged to the Moguls, and was subsequently partly in the hands of the Portuguese. In 1783 it was conquered by the Burmese, by whem it vas ceded to the English, as a result of the first Burmese War in 1826.

Arbuthnot, John, M.D. (b. 1667, d. 1735), author, wit, and physician, the son of a Scottish Episcopal clergyman, after taking a medical degree at Aberdeen University, came to London in search of a fortune. He acquired some literary reputation by a criticism of Dr. Woodward's Account of the Deluge, and Tables of Grecian, Roman, and Jowish Measures, Weights, and Coins, a work of considerable research. About 1704 accident threw him in the way of Prince Georgo of Denmark, Queen Anne's husband, and he became the queen's physician, and tho intimate friend of the foremost political writers of the Tory party. In 1712 ho wrote a political allegory, The History of John Bull, which Macaulay calls the most humorous political satire in our language. Its object was to throw ridicule on the War of the Spanish Succession, and he represents John Bull, the Englishman, Nick Frog, the Frenchman, and Louis Baboon (Bourbon), the Spaniard, as tradesmen squabhling over a lawsuit, Marlborough being the Attorney Hocus, who tries to prolong the contest. On the death of Queen Anne, in 1714, Arbuthnot joined Swift, Pope, and other Tory men of letters, in founding the Scriblerus Club, the object of which was to chastise literary quacks. The first book of their uncompleted work, The Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, was undoubtedly by his pen, and it is a very fine piece of light satire. Arbuthnot wrote besides many works on medical subjects, which had great reputation in their day.

Archbishops. The territorial extent of an archbishop's authority is called a province, from the name of an administrative division of the Roman empire. Archbishops do not form an order apart from bishops. An archbishop in England has a hishop's authority within his own diocese, and is also chief of the clergy, and has power to correct the faults of bishops throughout his province. When, in 597, at the bidding of Gregory the Great, Augustine was on his way to England, he received episcopal consecration at Arles. The design of Gregory was that there should be two metropolitan sees in England—at London and York—following the twofold division of the Roman province. Augustine, however, dwelt at Canterbury, which thus became the seat of the southern metropolitan. England was not wholly converted from Kent. Different missions succeeded atvarious dates in the kingdoms into which the land was divided. and in consequence a danger arose from lack of unity in the Church. From this she was saved by Archbishop Theodore (668-690). His plan was that there should be only one archbishopric, and he gathered all tho bishops together in one synod. After his death his scheme perished. Pope Gregory's plan was revived as more in accordance with national feeling, and in 735 the see of York was made an archhishopric. Offs, King of Mercia, similarly attempted to give expression to the brief period of Mercian supremacy by setting up a third archbishopric at Lichfield, which lasted from 787 till 803. In 1143 Henry of Blois, Bishop of the royal ci of Winehester, applied to Pope Innocent 1 to convert his see into an archbishopric and i him of the authority of Canterbury, but d not obtain his object. Before the Conque the archbishopric of York was below th of Canterbury in dignity. In 1093 Thom of York objected to the title of Metropolit of Great Britain being applied to the Arc bishop of Canterbury. The objection w bishop of Canterbury. The objection wheld good. The Archbishop of Canterbu was declared to be Primate, first in rank, t York was and is also a metropolitan s though the Archbishop of Canterbury I all England. In 1119 Thurstan of Yo defeated an attempt to make him profe obedience to the Archivishop of Canterbus The Welsh bishops owned the authority Canterbury. An unsuccessful attempt w made in 1199 to restore to St. David's t archiepiscopal dignity which it had in t time of the British Church. Until 1152 t Irish bishops recoived consecration from t Archbishop of Canterbury; and in the twelf century his authority in Scotland was d puted by the Archbishop of York, until, 1188, the Scotch Church was made imm diately dependent on Rome. The Archbish of Canterbury had a kind of patriarchal a thority, and Archhishop Anselm was greet by Pope Urban II. as the Pope and Patriar of a second world. His position in the sta was one of great importance, and he has alwa stood next after the sovereign, whom it is I duty to erown. The right of electing the arc bishops pertains, as in the case of bishops, the Chapters of their churches. The digni of the see of Canterbury caused freque interference with the right of the monas Chapter of Christ Church. A voice in t clection was claimed by the suffragan bishop hut their claim was disallowed by Innoce The crown interfered oftener and mo directly in the appointment of one who w its constitutional adviser than in the case other elections. The Pope managed in ma instances to secure the election of his nomine His influence was insured (1) because it w held necessary that the archbishops show receive from him the pall, an ecclesiastic vestment, without which an archhishop d not consecrate bishops; (2) and because later times) the Pope also granted to tarchbishop the authority of a legate. Tright of the Archbishop of Canterbn to the legatine commission was ascert by Archhishop Anselm, and finally gain by Archhishop Langton in 1291. T right did not preclude the visits of spec legates a latere, but it was an infringement it to grant a permanent legatine commissi for England to any one else, as in the case Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winehester, sin the Arch bishop of Canterbury was legatus nat The Archbishop of York also had the pa

Aro tho royal city and from about 1350 the legatine commission. Innocent II The provincial jurisdiction of the archbishops hopric and rid was exercised in their Provincial Courts. In the Court of Arches, so called because held in St. Mary s below that 1093 Thomas le llow (de Arcubus), the Deen of Archee exercised the archbishop's jurisdiction over Metropolitan to the Archcertain peculiars, or parishes exempt from the ordinary episcopal jurisdiction. As the offices objection was of Canterbury of Official Principal and Dean of Arches were t in rank, but usually vested in the same person, the Court ropolitan see, and Dean of Arches came to be inexactly spoken of as if they signified the court and interbury has etropolitan of judge of the archbishop's provincial jurisdiction. The final appeal from this court lay, after the breach with Rome, to a body called stan of York him profess f Canterbury. the High Court of Delegates (25 Henry VIII., c. 19). By 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 41, the authority of attempt was appellate jurisdiction of this court was cont. David's the ferred on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The office of Official Principal, both t had in the Until 1152 the of Canterbury and York, is now, by the Public tion from the Worship Regulation Act (37 and 38 Vict., c. in the twelfth 85), merged in that of a judge appointed by and was disthe archbishops, subject to the approval of the Sovereign. Architecture. In England there are many remains-chiefly of a sepulchral character-of the people who dwelt in the land before the coming of the Romans. These pre-historic relies may be roughly classified as (1) monoliths, single stones standing upright; (2) cromlechs, or table stones, conmisting of one large stone supported by others, as at Kit's Coty House, near Maidstone; (3) stone circles, as at Stonehenge, Avebury, und Long Meg and her Daughters, near Penrith. (4) barrows, oblong or round, which consist of mounds of earth containing These barrows are sepulchral chambers. scattered over the country, but are generally found on moorland. Besides these, there are traces of lake dwellings - houses built on wooden platforms supported by piles driven into the bottom of lakes, accessible by planks from the mainland. There are also traces of sculptured ornaments on boulders of stone, which are especially frequent in Northumberland. There are, again, earthworks of campa and the foundations of fortified villages to be found in many places amongst the hills.

When the Romans came to Britain they brought with them the art of building in stone. They built towns and houses, which, however, were all destroyed, though the sites of Roman villas, their mosaic pavements, the hypocausts, or cellars with flues to warm the house, may be still traced in many places. But the greatest memorials of Reman building are their military works, especially the great wall extending from the Tyne to the Solway, whose course muy still be traced, with its military stations and remains of buildings outside. The station of Housesteads, near Hexham, has been called "the English Pompeii." After the departure of the Romans the English conquest drevo the Britons from the cities, which fell into decay. The English themselves lived in villages, in houses built of elay, or wood, or wattles. After their conversion to Christianity they began to build hurches, of oaken planks, sometimes covered with lead. Benedict Biscop, a Northumbrian thegn, went over to Gaul and brought back workmen, who, at the end of the seventh century, built a stone church, or basilica, for the monastery of Wearmouth. Wilfrid followed, and built churches at York and Hexham, remains of which may still be seen. Still, before the Norman Conquest architecture did not make much advance in England. Stone towers were built with wooden naves, and the remains of what is called Saxon architecture are few. The tower of Earl's Barton Church, in Northamptonshire, is one of the most important examples.

The Norman Conquest gave the signal for a great age of ecclesiastical architecture in England. Vast cathedrals were built in the massive, round-arched style which had gradually developed from the Roman constructions, and which is known as Romanesque or Norman. Of this style, very striking specimens are the cathedrals of Norwich, Peterborough, and Fly, and Malmesbury Abbey. The cathedral of Durham shows an attempt at emancipation from the traditions of the Norm a builders. The introduction of the pointed arch, which was probably first employed la rebuilding the east end of Canterbury Cathedral after the fire in 1174, made a great change in architectural construction. The activity in the way of church building in the north, as shown in the Yorkshire abbeys, still further developed an English style of architecture, which first made ltself manifest in Lincoln Cathedral (1200), and Salisbury (1220-1258). This style, which is known as the Early English, is remarkable for its lauvet windows, which are either single or grouped in graceful designs. The increase of the use of painted glass as a necessary part of church decoration led to an adoption of French principles and the introduction of geometrical tracery, which marked the architecture of the reigns of Edward I. and The Angel Choir at Lincoln, Edward II. the abbeys of Tintern and Gainsborough, and the chapel of Merton College, Oxford, may be given as examples of the progress of this geometrical style. It lasted, however, but a short time; the restleasness which marked the reign of Edward III. was expressed in the desire for new inventions, and geometrical tracery gave way to flowing or curvilineal tracery of the style that is called Decorated, specimens of which may be seen in Carlisle Cathedral. It would seem that the vagaries of the Decorated style awakened a reaction. In the flowing tracery strength and construction were alike lost sight of, till the Perpendicular style was hailed with delight as being sounder. This style was first made popular by William of Wykeham, In his buildings at Winchester and at Oxford, and pre-vailed for above a century, during the four-teenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries. Its characteristics were a stern regard to the needs of construction. Straight lines ran from the bottom to the top of the window, which was regarded as merely a frame for painted glass. Regularity and proportion were everywhere insisted upon, and fancy wan no lenger allowed a place. The chapel of King's College, Cambridge, is a good example of the Perpendicular style, but there are many instances to be found in every locality of a style which was so long in use.

The development of ecclesiastical archi tecture was the chief feature of this period England produced no great municipal build ings. The towns did not rise to the same in dependent position as that which fostered th development of municipal architecture on th Continent. The dwellings of the barons wer military fortresses, and were at first reproduc tions of the castles of Normandy. Castle-build ing, however, soon became an entinently Eng lish art. The massive keeps of the Norma castles were surrounded by custein walls cor necting one towor with another, and weavin the whole pile into a strong and pieturesque mass of buildings. In the reigns of the Edwards these castles assumed their largest proportions, and their remains are to be seen most clearly on the Welsh and Scottish Some may be traced in ruins, marches. others have been altered into modern dwellings, but still retain many of their ancient features. The castles of Alnwick, Berkeley, Chepstow, Kenllworth, Warwick, Rochester, and Windsor are amongst the most striking examples. Another class of medieval buildings peculiar to England is found in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and the schools of Eton and Winchester. Taking as their model monastic buildings, the architects adapted them to the conditions of secular life, and built quadrangles round the chapel and common hall. The great hall was, moreover, a feature of the castle, and received the greatest architectural care, particularly in the construc-tion of the roof. The halls of the royal palaces of Westminster (Richard II.) and Eltham (Henry IV.) still remain as examples of the constructivo Ingenuity of their builders.

The Tudor reigns saw a great increase in the material prosperity of England and in its internal quiet. The suppression of the monasteries removed one of the principal supports of ecclesiastical architecture. Tho comforts of domestic life increased. castles and fortified manor-honses of tho tronbled times of the Middle Ages were either abandoned or were converted into dwellinghouses more snitable for peaceful times. At first this was dono in accordance with tho principles of Gothic architecture. But the movement of the Renaissance towards a revival of the classical style had begun in Italy, and spread over France. It was long in taking possession of England, but it affected it unconsciously in details. The style known as Jacobean was Gothie in feeling, but adopted with some timidity classical ornamentation. It corresponded to the change through which England was passing in religion and literature alike. The memorials of this style are chiefly to be found in dwelling-houses. were not required, as the number already existing was more than ample for the population. The University of Cambridge, which was at that period very flourishing, has some excellent examples in Caius and Clare Colleges. and in Neville's Court in Trinity. The great houses that were now bullt served for some time as models for English houses. They differed from the designs in vogue on the Continent, and showed an adaptation to the needs of English climate. They were built round courtyards, after the old fashion; but the entrance was on the outside, and the windows of the main rooms looked ontwards to the country, not into the courtyard. Knowle may be taken as an example of the Gothic tyle of dwelling-house. Longlest, Temple Newsam, Longford Castle, Hardwicke Hall, and Hatfield House are examples of various forms of classical adaptations. All of them are plctnresque, graceful in proportions, and comfortable in their arrangements, though their ornamentation shows learning misunderstood and improperly applied. The most conspicuous instance of this is the gateway of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, where the five orders of classical architecture are piled one npon another, and the whole is crowned by

In the reign of Charles I., the architectural style of the Italian Renaissance found its full development in England under the infinence of Inigo Jones, an architect of great ability, who studied in Italy under the last great Italian architect Palladio. On his return to England, Inigo Jones designed a mighty palace for the king at Whitehall. The Banqueting House was executed from his designs, but the troubles of Charles I. prevented the plan from being carried out. Jones's scheme was conceived on a gigantic scale; had it been executed, the Palace of Whitehall would have been the most splendid in Europe. Jones showed the possibility of dignified simplicity in a Protestant church, by the building of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, the first ecclesiastical buildlng of any importance since the Reforma-tion. The Restoration found its architect in a man of real learning and cultivation, Sir Christopher Wren, whose carliest work is the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford. The Great Fire of London, in 1666, gave Wren an opportunity, such as few architects have enjoyed, of modelling the architectural aspect of a great city. He prepared a plan for the rebnilding of London, which unfortunately was not carried ont. However, he was asked to rebnild St. Paul's Cathedral and nearly fifty other churches. In St. Paul's Cathedral Wren built the largest and most splendid church, after St. Peter's in Rome, that had been attempted in the classical style. Besides this, he studded the city with graceful steeples, that lent dignity to the proportions of St. Paul's dome, which towered above them. The chief of these are the spires of Bow Church; St. Bride's, Fleet Street : St. Michael's, Cornst. Bride s, Fleet Stephen's, Walbrook; and St. Dun-stan's-in-the-East. In all his buildings Wren showed great constructive ingennity and a delight in solving difficult problems, though at times he has allowed this to overcome his artistic taste. Few cities bear so clearly the impress of one man's architectural genius as does London that of Wren.

The successors of Wren in the beginning of the eighteenth century were Hawksmoor, who built the chnrch of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and Sir John Vanbrugh. Vanbrugh, a Dutchman by descent, was happy in the opportunity of having entrusted to him a monnmental work of national importance. He was commissioned to build Blenheim Palace as a gift of the nation to the Duke of Marlborough. His plan is vast and grand. He certainly aimed at giving enduring stability to his work. But though the general design was dignified, there is a clumsiness and a want of proportion in the adaptation of details that leave an impression of heaviness and gloom. In the building of Castle Howard, Vanbrugh shows the same attempt at grandeur, but with more sobriety. An architect whose work shows more artistic feeling is James Gibbs, whose most important buildings are the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields and the Radeliffe Library at Oxford.

The middle of the eighteenth century saw a development of the study of classical arehæology, which immediately reacted on architecture. Especially Stuart's work on The Architecture of Athens, commenced in 1762. affected popular taste. The architecture of the Italian Renaissance, which had hitherto been pursued in England, was classical in centiment, and used classical details while freely adapting them to its own purposes. The end of the eighteenth century saw a learned revival of pure classical architecture, freed from its Italian adaptations. absolute copying of classical antiquity became a fashion. Churches were built like Grecian temples, as, for instance, the church of St. Pancras, with its carvatid porticoes and model of a small temple erected by way of a spire on a larger onc. No large building was erected except in the severest classical style, with portico, whether needful or not. The British Museum is one of the least successful of the buildings of this school; St. George's Hall at Liverpool is one of the most happy. But this classical revival in architecture was soon met by a Gothic revival, which may be said to date from Horace Walpole, but took a great hold on popular taste after Beckford's revival of Fonthill Abbey in the shape of a gentle-Its architect, Wyatt, was man's house. entrusted with the restoration of several of our cathedrals. Houses were built in tho form of Gothic castles or abbeys. The rage for strictly classical imitations was succeeded by a rage for exact reproduction of Gothic designs. The writings of Britton, Rickman, Pugin, and many others lent the resources of careful archaeology to this revival, which corresponded also with the Tractarian movement within the English Church. In obedience to the desire of restoring the assumed reverence and faith of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, churches throughout England have been "restored," or brought back, to what some ingenious archaeologist guesses to have been their original aspect. Innumerable churches have been built in imitation of Gothic models; and in secular buildings, the Houses of Parliament, and more recently the Law Courts, were erected in Gothic style, and have taxed the ingenuity of their architects to find the accommodation necessary for modern purposes in buildings constructed in the style of an age when such purposes were unknown.

Arcot, Defence of (1751). The victories of the confederation formed by Dupleix against the English were checked by the expedition to Arcot under Clive. Chunda Sahib was obliged to detach a large force, thereby relieving the pressure on the British garrison-cooped up in Trichinopoly. The fort of Arcot was defended only by a low and lightly-built parapet; several of the towers were decayed, and the ditch was partly choked up. From the day of its occupation, August 30, 1751, Clive had been incessantly employed in repairing the defences, but the place seemed little capable of standing a siege. Of his eight officers, one had been killed, and two wounded, in successive encounters with the enemy, and a fourth had returned to Madras. The troops fit for duty had been reduced by casualties and diseaso to 120 Europeans and 200 sepoys, and it was with this small body that Clivo sustained for seven weeks the incessant assault of 10,000 native troops and 150 Europeans. On the last day of the siege the enemy endeavoured to storm the fort, but, during a conflict which lasted more than cighteen hours, they were repulsed on every point, and next morning retired from the town.

Ardanesbi, Battle of (719), was a naval engagement fought between the two branches of the Scots of Dalriada—the Cinel Gabran and the Cinel Loarn. Dunchadt, King of Kintyre, was chief of the Cinel Gabran, and Selvach, at the head of the Cinel Loarn, the latter being defeated. Ardanesbi, according to Mr. Skene, is "probably the point of Ardminish, on the island of Gigha."

Arden, Edward (d. 1583), was implicated in a project for the assassination of Elizabeth, by the confession of his son-in-law, the conspirator John Somerville. He had incurred the enmity of the Earl of Leicester, and, after an unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, December, 1583. His guilt, however, is very doubtful, and he probably fell a victim to the enmity of Leicester.

Ardwalf (EARDWULF), King of Northumbria (798—810), was placed on the throne after the interregnum which followed the murder of Ethelred. He found anarchy throughout the kingdom, but eventually succeeded in restoring something like order by making a treaty with Cenwulf of Mercia, whose kingdom had been the refuge of all Northumbrian conspirators. Argaum, Battle of (Nov. 28, 1803), was fought during the Mahratta War, between General Wellesley and the Rajah of Berar. The rajah, who had been long pursued by Wellesley, attempted to raise the siege of Havilgur, a strong fortress in tho Berar territory, and was caught by Welles-ley on the plain of Argaum. Though late in the day, Wellesley resolved to engage, but his troops had no sooner como within range of the cuemy's guns, than three battalions, who had behaved with distinguished gallantry on the field of Assayo under a far hotter fire, broke their ranks and fied. Fortunately the general succeeded in rallying them, or the battle would have been lost. They returned to the field, and after some hours of severe fighting, the Berar troops were compelled to retreat. The rajah abandoned all his cannon and amnunition; and few of his troops would have escaped, if there had been an hour of daylight left.

Argyle, Archibald Campbell, 5th Earl or (d. 1573), although a member of the Congregation, attached himself to the side of the Regent, Mary of Guise, and was of great service to her in averting a collision between the Reformers and the French troops in 1559. He was said to have formed a plot to carry off Mary Queen of Scots almost on the evo of her marriago with Darnley; and he acted as president at the mock trial of Bothwell for Darnley's murder, in 1567. On the abdication of the queen he was appointed one of the Commission of Regency during Murray's absence, but on her escape, 1568, joined her party, and commanded her troops at the battle of Langside. A year or two later, however, he submitted to the government of Morton and obtained an indemnity. He married the widow of the Regent Murray, and thus became possessed of some of tho crown jewels, his enforced restoration of which by Morton caused him to head the party then forming against the Regent.

Argyle, Archibald Campbell, 8th Earl, and also Marquis of (b. 1598, d. 1661), succeeded his father in 1638, and at once joined the Covenanters, whose forces he commanded when they were defeated by Montrose at Inverlochy and Kilsythe. His cruelties towards the Royalists in 1640-1 earned him the bitter hatred of all his opponents, and in 1641 a plot to murder him, known as the Incident, was formed. The same year he was created a marquis, and in 1651 supported the cause of Charles II., whom he crowned at Scone. Immediately afterwards, however, the marquis was taken prisoner at Worcester, and was supposed to have entered into close relations with Cromwell. In Richard Cromwell's Parliament of 1659 he represented Aberdeenshire. As a consequence, he was impeached for high treason immediately after the Restoration. He was executed at Edinburgh, suffering as much for his great power, which was an object of dread to Charles II., as for his treason.

S. R. Gardiner, Hist. of Eng.; Burton, Hist. of Scotland, vi. 205, vii. 149, &c.

Argyle, Archibald Campbell, 9th Earl of (d. 1685), was the son of the preceding. He was restored to his estates and earl-dom in 1663, which had been forfeited by his father's treason, and joined the Royalist party in Scotland. On the passing of the Scotch Test Act, in 1681, Argyle refused to take the required oath, except with a reservation, stating that he did not thereby debar himself from attempting any amendment in Church or State. For this he was brought to trial, and being found guilty of "leasing-making," was sentenced to death. He, however, managed to escape to Holland, where ho remained till 1685, when he joined Monmouth in his attempt to dethrone James. But thero seems to have been no sympathy between the two, and Argyle was suspected and distrusted by the English. Argylo landed in Scotland in May, 1685, but found himself joined by very few followers except his own clansmen. Divisions were rife in his councils, and after an abortive march on Glasgow, his followers dispersed without striking a blow, and he himself was captured in the disguise of a carter, taken to Edinburgh, and executed on his former sentence of death.

Burton, Hist. of Scotland; Macaulay, Hist. of England.

Argyle, George Douglas Campbell, 8th Dune of (b. 1823, d. 1900), was, as Marquis of Lorne, prominent in the controversy in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland relating to patronage. In 1852 he accepted office under Lord Aberdeen as Lord Privy Seal, and retained the same office under Lord Palmerston. He was Lord Privy Seal again under Lord Palmerston in 1859, Postmaster-General in 1860, and Secretary of State for India in Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet from 1868 to 1874. He joined Mr. Gladstone's second administration (1880) as Lord Privy Seal, but retired owing to a difference of opinion with his colleagues on their Irish policy.

Argyle, John, Marquis, afterwards Duke of (d. 1743), as Lord Lorne, was made commander of a regiment of foot by William III. In 1692 he, together with his kinsmen Breadalbane and the Master of Stair, planned the infumous massacre of Glencoe. The greater part of the troops employed

In 1703 in that affair wero Campbells. he succeeded to his father's honours and estates, and was sworn of Anno's Privy Council. In 1705 ho was appointed Lord High Commissioner to the Scottish Parliament, in which he zcalously advocated the Union. For these services he was created a peer of England and Earl of Greenwich. In 1706 he fought under Marlborough at Ramillies, and commanded in the attack on Menin. He returned to Scotland, where he supported the efforts of the Commission for the Union. He fought at Oudenarde and Malplaquet; but was at enmity with Marlborough, his commander-in-chief. At this time he was closely connected with the Tories, and was appointed to the command in Catalonia in 1710. The army was demoralised by the defeat at Almanza, and he could obtain no snpplies. He returned to England, and was made commander-in-chief of the land forces in Scotland. He was soon at variance with the ministry; and opposed, in the Upper House, a motion to the effect that tho Protestant succession was in danger. Queen Anne lay dying, Argyle entered the Council with the Duko of Somerset, and proposed that the queen should be requested to make the Duke of Shrewsbury Lord Treasurer. It was done; and it was owing to this vigorous action that Bolingbroke's plans at once fell to the ground. On the accession of George I., Argyle was continued in his employments, and on the outbreak of Mar's robellion, in 1715, Argyle, as commander-inchiof in Scotland, met the rebels at Sheriffmuir, where Mar was defeated. But the conduct of Argyle caused it to be suspected that he was un willing to drive the Jacobites to extremities. Cadogan was sent to reinforce him. As soon as the duke marched forward, the Jacobites retreated before him; the Pretender fled to France, and the rebellion was crushed. Argyle was a follower of Walpole during the greater part of his long ministry, but in 1739 he distinctly joined the Opposition. Walpole, wishing to preserve so powerful a support, kept him in his places, but at length was compelled to dismiss him. On the resignation of Walpole, Argyle was again placed in offico; but he was dissatisfied with the arrangement of the ministry, and resigned. Towards the end of his career, he intrigued with the Jacobites. It was only after Sir John Hindo Cotton, a noted Jacobite, had been placed on the Board of the Admiralty, that the duke condescended to join Polham's administration. He was a brave soldier and an able orator; but his political career was a series of inconsistencies.

Argyle, Perrage of. (The more usual modern spelling is Argyll.) In 1445 Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow, the head of the great Argyleshire family of the Campbells, was raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell, by James II. of Scotland. His grandson, Colin, was created Earl of Argyle in 1464. He married Isabel Stewart, daughter of the Lord of Lorne, and added to his titles that of Lord Lorne. Archibald, the eighth earl, who was subsequently executed for treason in 1661, was created a marquis in 1641. His son Archibald, ninth earl (who was restored to the family estates and the earldom), was attainted for treason in 1685. The attainder was reversed at the Revolution of 1688, and Archibald, the son of the last-named carl, was advanced to the dignity of Duke of Argyle. His son John, second duke, received a British peerage as Duke of Greenwich in 1719. He left no male issue, and his English honours ceased; but his daughter Caroline was created in her own right Baroness of Greenwich. His Scotch honours devolved on his brother Archibald, third duke, from whom they passed to his nephew Archibald, the ancestor of the present holder of the title. John, the fifth duke, was created a peer of England as Baron Sundridge in 1766.

Arikera, BATTLE OF (May 13, 1791). After the capture of Bangalore, during Lord Cornwallis's campaign in Mysore, the English army marched to Seringapatam, and (May 13) reached Arikera, about nine miles from that city. Tippoo was encamped between them and Seringapatam, with his right resting on the Cavery. Lord Cornwallis hoped on the Cavery. by a night march to turn the enemy's loft before daylight, and cut off his retreat. A terrific storm arose, and delayed the march by repeated halts, till it became impossible to carry out the original plan. In the morning Lord Cornwallis determined to gain a hill commanding the left of the enemy, and organised an attack in front, under cover of which Colonel Maxwell was to seize the hill. Tippoo perceived this, and made his preparations accordingly; but in spite of this Maxwell crossed a difficult ravine and gained tho hill. The attack became general along the front, and was assisted by Maxwell's flank attack along the hill, and Tippoo's army was already wavering when Colonel Floyd and the cavalry charged his rearguard and nearly destroyed it, nothing but the unwieldy move-ments of the Nizam' horse, which now came up, allowed Tipp .'s army to escape a total rout.

Arkenholm, Battle of (May 1, 1455), was fought in the valley of the Esk between the supporters of James II. of Scotland and James, Earl of Douglas, and his brothers. The rebels were defeated. Archibald Douglas, Earl of Murray, fell in the combat; Hugh Douglas, Earl of Ormond, was captured and beheaded; and James Douglas was forced to take refuge in England. [Douglas.]

Arklow, The Battle of (1798), was feught during the Irish rebellion. The town was defended by General Needham with 120 Ancient Britons, 800 Irish militia, 300 Durham Fencibles, and some yeomanry, against Father John Murphy, who led some 27,000 rebels with a few guns to the attack. In spite of the determined fury with which they came on, the rebels were beaten back with great loss, and had to give up the idea of marching on Dublin.

Arlington, HENRY BENNET, EARL OF (b. 1618, d. 1685), was originally intended to take orders in the Church, but on the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the Roy list army as a volunteer. After the death of Charles I., he joined Charles II., and was employed by him as ambassador to Madrid. In 1662 he was made one of the Secretaries of State, and in 1664 was created a baron. In 1667 he joined the Cabal ministry. In 1674 he was impeached by the House of Commons, and sold his office to Sir J. Williamson, purchasing in his turn the post of Lord Chamberlain, which he held till 1681. Arlington was a Catholie, but never showed himself very zealous for his religion, though ready to sign the secret clauses in the Treaty of Dever. Sharing the want of political principle, and "the cosmopolitan indifference to constitutions and religions" which distinguished the politicians with whom he was associated, Arlington was nevertheless in many respects superior to most of them. He was resolved to maintain himself at court, and in the pursuit of this object he displayed great subtlety, resource, and flexibility of temper; but "he was regarded as the man in England who least overstepped the line of good conduct. He possessed the culture of European society at that time; by the excesses which were in favour at the court he was little affected; his hours of leisure he devoted to the study of the literary products of that fruitful age." Ranke, Hist. of Eng., vol. iii., p. 517. See also Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., vol. i., p. 212. [CABAL.]

Arlington's Letters to Sir W. Temple (published posthumously in 1701) are of some importance for the diplomatic history of Charles II.'s reign.

Armada, The Spanish, is the name usually applied to the great military and naval expedition despatched by Philip II. of Spain against England in 1588. The equipping of his great ficet was protracted by his incorrigible habits of delay and hesitation, but it is prebable that it was ready to sail in 1587. It might in any case have been kept waiting one year more till the Prince of Parma had his army ready in Flanders, but, however that may be, it was delayed by Drake's vigorous action on the coasts of Portugal and

Andalusia. Early in 1,797 the damage he had done was repaired, and the Invineible Armada sailed from Lisbon in the latter days of May. It was commanded by Don Alonso de Guzman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, who succeeded to the command on the death of Don Alvaro' de Bazan, the Marquis of Santa Crnz. It consisted of 130 vessels, manned by 8,450 sailors, and 2,088 galley-slaves. carried 19,295 soldiers, and 2,680 pieces of artillery. The provisiens of food and ammunition were abundant, but the ships were ill-fitted for the navigation of the Channel, of which the Spanish sailors knew nothing. From the beginning it met with losses and misfortunes. It was scattered by a gale immediately after leaving Lisbon, during which one galley went dewn, and two were seized by the slaves who revolted, and overpowered the soldiers. It was not till Friday, July 22 (N.S.), that Medina Sidonia could rally his ships, and sail frem orunna. On Thursday, July 28, the fleet was off the Lizard, and had its first sight of the English fleet on Saturday the 30th. The English Lord High Admiral, Lord Howard of Effingham, had thirty ships of the Royal Navy, and a large number of volunteer ships, with him, and was assisted by Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Winter, Raleigh, and other seamen. The Armada was steered for Calais Road. On Snnday, July 31, some fighting took place, in which the unwieldy Spanish ships were completely outmanœuvred. They were built so extremely high, and drew so few feet of water in proportion, that they could not carry enough sail. The handy English vessels closed and drew off as they pleased. Our seamen, acting on the principle which has always been followed in the English navy, trusted to their rapid and accurate artillery fire, and refuse 1 all temptations to board the enemy, whose vessels were crowded with soldiers. The first encounter proved the wisdom of this system of tactics. The flagship of the Andalusian squadron was disabled, and fell into the hands of Dre .. after a long fight. The Armada, arrangeu in the half-moon formation which had been adopted at Lepanto, continued its way through the Channel, keeping indifferent order. On August 2 there was another indecisive cannonade off Portland, in which the English seamen followed their usual system of attack; and though they did not do the Spaniards any considerable damage, they further proved their superiority in seamanship, and convinced the enemy that he could only hope to fight them on their own terms. By Saturday the 6th, the Spanish Armada had reached Calais, and waited for the Prince of Parma, who was to join it from Flanders. But the prince, by one of the extraordinary oversights which ruined all Philip's plans, had no armed ships, and was closely blockaded by the Dutch. On Sunday night (August 7) the English admirals sent fire-ships among the Spaniards, who cut their cables and stood to sea in a panic. On Monday they were fiercely attacked, and soon became utterly disorganised. On Tuesday, August 9, the Armada, greatly diminished by loss of vessels, which had been sunk or compelled to strike, or driven on shore, was drifting helplessly on the coast of Zeeland. A sudden change of wind saved it for the moment, but the crews had no more stomach for the fight. By the next day they had quite lost heart and begun to fly to the north. They were followed for some distance by a few English vessels, but there was no effectual pursuit. Elizabeth's ficet had been ill-provided with powder and shot, and still worso with food. They had put to sea in a hurry, and they had moreover been now engaged almost incessantly for days. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that after three general engagements and numerous skirmishes the ships were out of ammunition. The want of provisions is less excusable. It appears, however, that the volunteer vessels were almost as badly found as the queen's, and that what is often called Elizabeth's parsimony was in fact want of experience in equipping a large force. The brunt of the fighting fell on the vessels of the Royal Navy; the volunteers, though they proved the spirit of the nation, and helped to make a moral impression on the Spaniards, did comparatively little of the real work. The preparations on shore were probably dis-tinguished more by spirit than efficiency, but they were never tested, and it is impossible to know what they would have done. It must not be forgotten, that though the Prince of Parma had a veteran force in Flanders, the majority of the soldiers on board the Armada were as raw as the English militia. The Spaniards straggled home round the north of Scotland, through continual storms, in which the greater part of their vessels went down or were driven on shore. Only fifty-three ships reached Spain, and the loss of life was so terrible, that it was said that every family in the country lost a member.

The standard historians of Elizabeth's reign, and Camden, Fuller, or Haklnyt, need scarcely be mentioned, and the same may be said of Fronde or Motley. There is a very good account of the Armada in Southey's Life of Lord Howard of Efingham, in the Cabinet Cyclopedia, with copions citations of authorities; and a French writer, M. Forneron, has told the story very fully in his recent Life of Philip II. On the Spanish side, may be mentioned Strader, Herrera, and Cabrera, in their Lives of Philip. Cabrers was an official historian, who wrote nuder royal dictation, and gives, of course, the royal view. He is chiefly valuable as showing what the Spanish government wished to be believed. Several accounts by eye-witnesses are to be found in the Documents Incidios (Spanish State Papers), particularly in the fourteenth and forty-eighth volumes. (See also the publications of the Navy Records Society.) [D. H.]

Armagh, THE SCHOOL (or UNIVERSITY) or, was the centre of early Irish monastic civilisation and earning. It was from here that the scholars who made Ireland famous in France, and those who founded Glastonbury, came. The most famous among the Irish scholars trained at Armagh is of course John Scotus Erigena, whose death may be placed in the year 875. Ever the capture of Armagh by Olaf's Danes was not sufficient to destroy entirely its school and its fame for learning. The continuance of the existence of a school there is couched for by the proceedings of a synod in 1158, which decided that no one was to be instituted as a professor of theology who had not completed his education at Armagh. The presence of foreign students can be traced at least as far as the eleventh century. The existence of a learned body in Armagh is all the more remarkable as the see was, after the arrival of the Ostmen, almost always in the hands of laymen.

Armagh, THE SYNOD OF, was held in 1170, when the Irish prelates, alarmed at the English invasion, which they regarded as a divine visitation, determined that all English slaves should be set free.

Armed Meutrality. In 1780 a coalition known as the First Armed Neutrality was entered into by the northern powers, who resented the right of search which was claimed by England in respect of all neutral vessels. In the treaty then made between Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, the principle was proclaimed that "free ships make free goods," that the flag covers the merchandise, and that a port is to be considered blockaded only when a sufficient force for its blockade is in front of it. There was some ground for the contention that the rights of neutrals on the sea should be the same as on land. At this time Great Britain was in the midst of the war with the American colonies; France and Holland were also at war with her; and the right of search was indispensable, if she was to make any use of her naval superiority. Nevertheless, pressed as she was, it was impossible for her to take any active steps in opposition to the treaty, the gh she continued to exercise her right, which had been admitted by the several powers in former treaties. The armed neutrality was abandoned by Sweden in 1787; in 1793 Russia entered into a treaty with Great Britain, which expressly recognised the right of search on neutral vessels; and in the same year America made a similar treaty with Great Britain. But in 1799 Napoleon, by a remarkable exercise of diplomatic skill, induced the Americans to adopt a maritime code on the basis of the Armed Neutrality of 1780; and at the same time the other powers saw an opening for a profitable trade with France, if the right of search were abolished. The principles of the Armed Neutrality were accordingly

VERSITY! revived, and the determined persistence of the British government, combined with the skilful diplomacy of Napoleon, induced the northern powers again to enter into a coalimonastic om here mous in tonbury, tion, known as the Second Armed Neutrality he Irish (1800), to enforce its principles. The English government acted with decisive energy. A fleet was despatched to the Baltic; and the rse John placed in Armagh bombardment of Copenhagen, followed by the destroy death of Czar Paul, effectually broke up the earning. northern coalition. On June 17, 1801, the Maritime Convention of St. Petersburg was a school opened; and finally a series of treaties was made between Great Britain and the northern ngs of a one was theology powers by which the Anned Neutrality was abandoned, but the right of search was ation at students strictly defined, and it was agreed that blockeleventh ades must be efficient to be valid. Arminians was the name sometimes given to the High Church party in the reign of Charles I. Strictly speaking, the Arminians were those Dutch Protestants who followed Arminius (Harmenssen), in opposition to the more rigid followers of Calvin. The party was the fruit of the reaction which had arisen in the beginning of the seventeenth century in the minds of many men against what seemed the bigotry of extreme Protestantism, and which made them inquire whether the Reformers, in their desire to get rid of the evils of Popery, had not also destroyed much that was vital in Catholic Christianity. In the Netherlands the controversy between the Arminians and "Go-marists" led, early in the 17th century, to violent commotions. To disputes of dogma were added those concerning the rights of the Church with reference to the authority of the civil government in ecclesiastical affairs. The Arminians, with their leanings to the doctrines of Zwingli, maintained the right of the State to conduct the government of the Church, in conformity with the model of Scripture, and urged that, by the independence claimed by spiritual authority in the Reformed Church, a new popedom was being The Gomarists, on the other hand, strictly adhering to the principles of Calvin, demanded the complete autonomy of the Church. This schism spread to the political world. The heads of the municipal oligarchy sided with the Arminians. The leaders of the popular party, nnder Maurice the Stadtholder, declared against their rivals for the Gomarists. At the national Synod of Dort, which commenced its sittings in 1618, the victory rested with the latter in regard both to doctrine and Church authority. The Synod declared its adherence to the strict Calvinistic views on unconditional election by grace, and the independence of the Church. Silenced in Hoiland, Arminianism took firm root in England, and was welcomed by many who shared in the reaction against Puritanism. A violent controversy began between Calvinists and Arminians. James I. attempted t. silence it (1622); but, in fact, in his later years, the king, who had been a Calvinist all his life, and had even written a book against Vorstius, the successor of Arminius, leaned towards Arminianism. For the Synod of Dort, by ascribing equal authority to all ministers of God's Word, no matter what their position, indirectly condemned the English Church. The Puritans and Presbyterians regarded the spread of Arminianism with great dislike, and on March 2, 1629, the Commons resolved that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to introduce Popery or Arminianism, shall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth." But Armirianism continued to gain influence among the High Churchmen, and the term came to be applied generally to all those who objected both to the Roman and Calvinist doctrines and theory of Church government (though they considered the Roman Catholic Church as corrupt and unsound), and who wished that the English Church should occupy a middle position between Rome and Geneva. Charles I. and Laud were claime' by this party as its champions. They were supposed to be equally averse to Romanism and Puritanism, and they were regarded by the English Arminians as the great defenders of the Church from the dangers which threatened her on both sides. After the Restoration the name "Arminian" fell into disuse. [LAUD.]

Armstrong, Sir John, of Gilnockio d. 1528), was the head of a powerful family, which held practically independent power on the borders of England and Scot-land and the "debateable land." The Scots government, however, regarded the Armstrongs as robbers, and James V. determined to suppress them. In 1531 the king entered the border country at the head of a powerful force. Sir John Armstrong came to meet the king in great state, and attended by a train of gentlemen. He was immediately seized and hanged, together with his brother Thomas. The Pitscottie Chronicle represents him as saying to James, when his entreaties for mercy proved fruitless, "I am but ane fool to seek grace at a graceless face; but had I known, sir, that ye would have taken my life this day, I should have lived upon the borders in despite of King Harry and you both; fer I know King Harry would downweigh m best horse with gold to know that I was condemned to die this day."

Army. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Army Plot (1641) was an attempt to use the English army, which had not been disbanded after the Scotch War, to coerco the Parliament. There were two distinct plots for this purpose: (1) Perc, Wilmot and other officers and members o' Parliament proposed to induce the officers of the army to sign a declaration that they would stand by the king: (a) if parliamentary pressure were put upon him, either to compel him to assent to the exclusion of the hishops from the House of Lords, or to force him to disband the Irish army before the Scots were disbanded: (b) or if the full revenue he had enjoy d for so many years were not placed in ds. At the same time, a plot somehis nilar, hut contemplating the direct ment of force, was being contrived W1 ir John Suckling and Henry Jermyn with the approval of the queen. Thoy intended to commence operations by placing the command of the army in the hands of the Earl of Newcastle and George Young. Charles at first endeavoured to get the two parties to work together, and finding this impossible, decided again Suckling's plan. Young, seeing no I t of becoming was also arranging an attempt to rescue Strafford from the Tower. Pym made use of his knowledge of this double plot to secure the agreement of the two Houses, and the support of the people. On May 3, the Protestation was drawn np, on the next day it was taken by the Lords, on the 5th it was agreed that a Bill should be brought in to provide against the dissolution of the Parliament, on the 8th that Bill and the Attainder Bill both passed their first reading in the Lords. The king, left without any support, gave his assent to both Bills on the 10th. Percy, Jermyn, Suckling, and others fied to France, but were declared guilty of high treason. Thus the first attempt to use the army against the Parliament gave fresh strength to the popular party. (2) At the end of May or the beginning of June, Daniel O'Neill was sent by the king to sound the officers of the army as to the feasibility of hringing up the troops to London if the neutrality of the Scots could be secured. At the same time, one of the officers was entrusted by the king with a petition, to which he was to obtain signatures in the army. The petition protested against the unreasonable demands of the popular leaders, the diminution of the king's "just regalities," and the tumultuous assemblies round the Houses of Parliament. It concluded with a promise to defend King, Church, Parliament, and Laws. The leaders of the army repudiated the petition, and O'Neill was obliged to fly, but the king still persisted in his intrigues for this purpose both during his journey to Scotland and his stay in that country. The knowledge of this new plot made Pym, on the outbreak of the Irish Rebellion, demand that the king should employ only such ministers as Parliament should approve; otherwise the Commons would be obliged to provide for Ireland without the king. He followed this hy bringing the evidence before the Commons, who passed a resolution affirming that there was "a second design to hring up the army against the Parliament, and an intention to make the Scottish army stand as neutral." This event did much to secure the passing of the "Grand Itemonstrance."

He was the descendant of Sir Paul Gere, captain of a troop of horse in Elizabeth's reign, who urrived in Ireland and obtained large grants of land in County Mayo.

Arran, James Hamilton, 2nd Earl of and DUKE OF CHATCHERAULT (d. 1575), the head of the hou. of Hamilton, and a near relative of James ... of Scotland, acted as Regent for some ime, until he was displaced by his rival the Earl of Angus, the head of the house of Donglas. On the death of James V. he again became Regent. The confirmation of a treaty with England, 1543, was quickly followed by a league on the part of the Regent and Cardinal Beaton against all English interference, and soon afterwards the English ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler, was requested to withdraw. In 1847 Arran was defeated at l'inkie, and in 1554 the regency was transferred to Mary of Guise, Arran being rewarded for his acquiescence by the dakedom of Chatelherault, conferred on him by the French king. He joined the Lords of the Congregation and supported the Reformers; and by his opposition to the Dernley marriage, incurred the resentment of Queen Mary, so that he judged it prudent to retire to Enghand. Returning some time afterwards, he was reconciled to the queen, and during the Civil War he and the rest of the Hamiltons supported her against the Reforming Lords. On the abdication of Mary, 1567, he was named one of the Council of Regency. In 1569 he was imprisoned by Murray in Edinburgh Castle. He was a man of fickle and vacillating character, of courteous manners, and pleasant address, but by no means fitted to fill the high position to which he was called Having 1 it France, where his life was in danger from the Guises, he became one of the numerous suitors of Mary Queen of Scots, whom he planned to carry off in 1561. His failure in his suit seems to have affected his reason. He became mad, and continued a maniac till he died.

Arran, James Stuart, Earl of (d. 1596), was a son of Lord Ochiltree, and a brother-in aw of Knox. In 1581 he received the estates and title which the house of Hamilton had forfeited, as the reward for his zeal in procuring the condemnation of the Regent Morton. He aided Lennox in compassing the ruin of his enemy Morton; a prisoner at the "Raid of Ruthven," Avran quickly revenged himself by collecting an srmy in the interest of James VI., and by taking the lead against the conspirators; and having exto ted a confession from Gowrie by fair promises, used it against him to his ruin. He became Chancellor and Lientenant-General of Scotland, and on the strength of the king's favour, set himself in opposition to the rest of the Scotch barons, rousing their hatred by his arrogance. The English government found means to accuse him of instigating a border raid, and he was ordered to withdraw from the Scottish court in 1584. Shortly afterwards, on a combination against him of the Hamiltons (whose estates he held), and the banished lords, Arran had to escapo as best he could to the hills of Ayrshire. He was slain by James Douglas of Torthorwold in revenge for the death of Morton.

Arras, The Conoress of (1435), was assembled for the purpose of making peace between England, France, and Burgundy. Ambassadors came from England, France, Burgundy, the Pope, the Council of Basle, Castile, Arsgon, Naples, Portugal, Sicily, Cyprus, Navarre, Poland, Denmark, Milan, and Brittany. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the English, but this was indignantly refused, and the Treaty of Troyes was insisted upon, certain territories south of the Loire being offered to Charles of France. This being rejected, the English representatives withdrew, and a treaty of peace and alliance was signed between France and Burgundy, by which the latter power agreed not to treat with the English without the sanction of the King of France.

Array, Commessions or, first issued under Edward I.—though their germs may be traced as early as the reign of William Rufus—were commissions given to certain individuals called Commissioners of Array to press a number of men in their district, or sometimes all men capable of bearing arms for the king's service, and to train them in military duties. Under Edward I. the forces thus raised were paid by the king, but under Edward II. and Edward III. the cost usually fell on the townships which furnished the men. There was no doubt that these commissions, when issued without the consent of Parliament, were unconstitutional, and Edward III. had to promise that all troops levied by this means should be paid for by the king-a promise which, however, was not kept. In 1352 and 1403 it was provided that "the common assent and grant of Parliament" should be obtained before these commissions were issued, and the latter of these statutes further provided that, "except in case of invasion, none shall be constrained to go out of their own counties, and that men chosen to go on the king's service out of England shall be at the king's wages from the day they leave their own counties." Commissions of Array, which were frequently issued under the Plantagenet kings, and were not uncommon under the Lancastrians and Tudors, ceased on the creation of the office of Lord Licutenant in the sixteenth century. The latest bears date 1557. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Stubbs, Const. Hist.

Arrest, FREEDOM FROM, is the special privilege of members of both Houses of Parliament, and is enjoyed by them during the session, and for forty days before and after, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The earliest mention. I an analogous privilege is in a law of Ethelbert in the sixth century, which provides that "If the king call his people to him, and any one there do them injury, let him compensate with a twofold 'bot,' and fifty shillings to the king." In 1290 this privilege was confirmed by Edward I., who, in reply to a petition from the Master of the Temple that he might distrain for the rent of a house held of him by the Bishop of St. Davids, replied, that "It does not seem fit that the king should grant that they who are of his council should be distrained in time of Parliament." So too in the Prior of Malton's case, in 1315. The first recognition of the privilege by Act of Parliament was in 1433, when it was enacted that any assault on a member on his way to Parliament was to be punishable by a double fine; though in 1404 Henry IV. had replied to a petition that a threefold fine might be inflicted for such an offence, that though he admitted the privilege, the existing remedy was sufficient. The existence of the privilege was thus, by usage and by statute, clearly established; but frequent violations occurred under the Angevin and Lancastrian kings. In 1301 Henry Keighley was imprisoned by Edward I. after the Parliament of Lincoln. In 1376, Peter de la Mare, the Speaker of the Good Parliament, was imprisoned at the instance of John of Gaunt; whilst in 1453 occurred the famous case of Speaker Thorpe, who was imprisoned during the prorogation of Parliament at the suit of the Duke of York. The Commons tried to obtain his release "for the despatch of the business of l'arliament," but falled, though the judges held that "If a member were arrested for any less cause than treason, felony, breach of the peace, and sentence of Parliament, he should make his attorney and he released to attend in Parliament." Thorre, however, was not released, owing to the in-fluence of the Duke of York. In 1460, Welter Clerk, member for Chippenham, was arrested "for a fine to the king, and damages to two private suitors," whereupon the Commons demanded and obtained his release. In 1477 John Atwyll, member for Exeter, was imprisoned for debt, but was released on the petition of the House. Up to the relgn of Henry VIII. arrested members had obtained their release either by special Act of Parliament if they were imprisoned in execution after judgment, or by a writ of privilege issued by the Chancellor if confined on mesne process (i.e., after the commencement of a suit but before judgment); but, in 1543, in the case of George Ferrers, who had been arrested as surety for a debt, the House demanded his release by virtue of its own authority, and on the refusal of the sheriffs to liberate him committed them to prison for contempt, their proceedings being confirmed by the king. From this time members were usually released by the Serjeant by warrant of the mace, not by writ. In 1603 occurred the case of Sir Thomas Shirley, whom the warder of the Fleet refused to release for fear of becoming personally liable for his debt. This led to an Act disliable for his debt. This led to an Act discharging from all liability the officer from whose custody a person having the privilege of Parliament has been delivered, and enabling the creditor to sue out a new writ on the expiration of the period of privilege. The privilege of freedom from arrest for some time belonged not only to members of Parliament but also to their servants (as in Smalley's case, 1575, and Johnson's case, 1621), but in 1770 was confined to the persons of members, owing to the frequent abuse of the privilege, which was used as a means of escape from debt. As lately as 1880 it was decided on precedents that the duration of the privilege is forty days before and after the meeting of Parliament; on the ground that the time must be clearly defined. The House of Commons has always maintained its powers of imprisoning its own members for contempt, as in the case of John Stone in 1547, and Arthur Hall in 1581. The right of a member of Parliament to claim freedom from arrest has nover been allowed to extend to criminal offences; and though in 1572 Lord Cromwell obtained his release after committal for contempt of court, in make recent times, members committed by courts of law for open contempt have failed in obtaining release by virtue of privilege. "though," observes Sir Erskine May, "each case is still open to consideration when it arises."

J. Hatsell, Precedents, vol. i. (ed. of 1818); Sir E. May, Perliamentary Practice; Hallam, Const. Hist. [F. S. P.]

Arthur, King, the famous British and Christian hero of romance, had already become the centre of much Celtic legend, especially in Brittany, when Geoffrey of Monmouth published, in 1130, his Historia Britonum. This work, though it poisoned the very formtains of history, acquired, in spite of protest e.g., by William of Malmesbury), wide popularity, and became the source of that elaborate legend of Arthur and his Round Table which has inspired so much that is best in literature. Geoffrey's fictions were largely regarded as history, uutil, by an inevitable reaction, Milton and most of the eighteenth century writers were led to disbelieve that any Arthur had really lived. Gildas, nearly a contemporary, makes no montion of him, though the frequent allusion to him in the obscure utterances of the Welsh bards, edited by Mr. Skene, may be set against this. But many deny the historical value of the Four Books, and the earliest really historical notices of Arthur are found in "Nennius" and the Welsh tenth century chronicle called Annales Cambria (MS. A.). Nennius says (Mon. Hist. Britan., 73-4), "Artur pugnabat contra illos [videlicet Saxones] cum regibus Britonum; sed ipse dux erat bellorum, et in omnibus bellis victor exstitit." He then gives a list of Arthur's twelve victories, ending with the battle "in monte Badonis." This the Annales Cambrica pla o in a.D. 516, and make Arthur a Christian hero. The same authority places his death at the battle of Camlan, in 537. Will this evidence compensate for the silence of Gildas? All really depends on our estimate of Nennius. Many, like Milton, repndiate Nennius as a "very trivial author;" but others, including Dr. Guest and Mr. Skene, fully accept his authority, though recognising the fragmentary and unequal character of the series of treatises that collectively go by his name. Mr. Skene (Four Ancient Books of Wales, i. 50-89; Celtic Scotland, i. 152; cf. Glennie's Arthurian Localities) claims that Arthur was the leader of the Northern Cymry of Strathclyde and Cumbria against the Saxons; and identifies places in those regions as the scenes of the twelve battles-Mons Radonis being Bouden llill, near Linlithgow. Arthur, according to this view, is not a king, but a temporary general, the "Gwledig," who led the combined hests of the princes of the Northern Britons to unwonted victories. He was the successor of the Roman generals of the legions encamped dong the Pictish wall. His victories led to the restriction of the Saxons to the country east of the Pennine range, and so created the Cumbrian kingdom. He died defeated by a evolt of the heathen British, perhaps in alliance with the Saxons. The great authority of Dr. Guest (Archeological Journal, Salisbury volume, 1849) also accepts Arthur as a real person, but places the scene of his victories in the western border-land of the growing State of the West Saxons (r.g., Mons Badonis is Badbury, in Dorsetshire). Mr. Elton (Origina of British History, p. 362) doubtfully fellow Mr. Skene; while Professor Rhys (Critic Britain, p. 231) regards Arthur as the "ideal hampion of the Brythonic race," whether in Wales, Cumbria, Cornwall, or Brittany. "Whether he was from the first a purely imaginary character, in whom the best qualities of his race met, or had some foundation in the facts of long forgotten history, it would be difficult to say." Perhaps nothing more decided than this can safely be said.

Besides the above-mentioned authorities, the Myeyrian Archaology of Weise may be referred to as containing the texts of the Weish legends of Arthur. Geoffrey of Monmouth's British History is translated in Bohn's series, and the Mabinogion has been translated by Lady Charlotte Guest. For the influence of the Arthurian legend on the literature of Germany, France, and Scandinavia, see an eemy by Albert Schulz (Lindovery, 1841). There are many editions of Les Romens de la Table Ronds (e.g., Paris, 1860), and Malory a Morte d'Arthur has been reprinted, in 1817 by Southey, in 1853 by Wright, and by Walter Scott, 1863. The literature on the Arthurian legend is almost endless. [T. F. T.]

Arthur of Brittany (b. 1187, d. 1203) was the on of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Constance, Duchess of Brittany. His mother's championship of the independence of her duchy no doubt damaged her son's chances of succeed-ing to the crown of his uncle. She had, more-over, completely slienated Richard and Queen Eleanor, so that, on Richard's death, John was unanimously accepted as king. Arthur's only hope lay in gaining the assistance of Philip Augustus, who at first seemed willing to help him; and the Barons of Arriou. and Touraine, declared for him. War broke out between Philip and John, but the former was more eager for his can interests than for Arthur, and very soon peace was concluded, by which Philip's eldest son Louis was to marry Blanche of Castile, John's niece, John giving her the county of Evreux as a marriage portion. Arthur, who was betrothed to the of Philip's daughters, was forced to do homage to John for Brittany. Quarrels very shortly broke ont between John and Philip, wh offered to receive the homage of Arthur for the county of Anjou, and allow his knights to join him in conquering it. Arthur commenced operations by attacking his grandmother Eleanor at Mirabel; but he was captured by John, who imprisoned him, first at Fslaise, and afterwards at Rouen, where he died. The manner of Arthur's death is unknown, nor is it ever likely to be determined with certainty. All that the historians of the next reign could say was that Arthur disappeared. "Elapso igitur aliquanto tempore Arthurus evanuit." (Matt. Paris, Chron.

The generally received account of his death, which has been consecrated by tradition and poetry, was, that he was murdered by his uncle's own hand, and his body thrown into the Seine. The peers of France found John guilty of the murder, but it is doubtful how far this can be held as confirmatory of the accusation.

Arthur, Prince (b. 1486, d. 1502), was the eldest son of Henry VII. His nurriage with Catherine of Aragon was first agreed upon between the Kings of Spain and England in March, 1489, when he was not yet three years old, and he was little more than fifteen when the actual wedding ceremony was celebrated at St. Paul's, Nov. 14, 1501. Bucon describes the young prince as a studious youth, and learned beyond his years. His name of Arthur was a graceful acknowledgment on Henry's part of his own British descent through Sir Owen Tudor.

Articles, LORDS OF THE, appointed first in 1369, in the reign of David II., became gradually a recognised part of the legislative machinery of Scotland. The "Lords" consisted of a committee chosen equally from each estate to prepare the various measures, which, when completed, were laid before the Estates for final adoption or rejection. William III. endeavoured to remodel the system in 1689, and ordered that the Lords should consist of twenty-four persons, eight being chosen from each estate, and took away their power of rejecting absolutely any motion laid before them. The Estates, however, voted that a permanent committee was objectionable, and in 1690 William gave his assent to a measure abolishing the Lords of the Articles, and providing for temporary committees, to be elected as occasion might arise. [Estates.]

Articles of Grievances, voted April, 1689, by the Scotch Estates, protested against sundry laws which were held to be burdensome and dangerous, and were intended to show William III. in what cases reforms were needed. The Estates complained chiefly of the laws passed in the Parliament of 1685; of the reference of legislative proceedings to permanent committees to the injury of free parliamentary discussion; and of the Act of 1669 which made the Sovereign head of the The Articles of Grievances differed Church. from the Claim of Right in that the former laid down fundamental rules of the constitution which had been violated by James II.; the latter merely petitioned for certain necessary reforms.

Articles of Religion. In England, as in other European countries, the Reformation period was marked by sc. al attempts to codify or embody in an authoritative form the articles of religious belief. With a view to putting an end to discussion, Henry VIII., with the aid of his theological advisors, compiled a Book of Articles, which was laid before Convocation in 1536, and subscribed by all its members. These Articles established the Bible, the three Creeds, and the first four Councils as the basis of belief; limited the Sacraments to three, baptism, penance, and the Eucharist; declared that, though the use of images, the worship of saints, and the ritual of the church services had not in themselves power to remit sins, yet they were useful to lift up mon's minds unto (lod, and masses for the dead. These Articles pleased neither the Roform . s nor the Romanists, and were accepted merely at the king's command. In 1539 Henry VIII.'s policy led him to check the growth of the reforming doctrines, and Parliament passed the Bill of the Six Articles, which affirmed transubstantiation, the reception of the communion under one kind, the celibacy of two clergy, the binding power of yows of chastity, private masses, and auricular confession. Soon after the death of Henry VIII., in the Parliament of 1547 the Statute of the Six Articles was repealed. In 1551 an order of the Council was issued to Archbishop Cranmer bidding him frame Articles of Religion. This task the archbishop discharged with cantion and deliberation. He consulted with others, circulated a rough draft, and laid it before the Council. After many revisions it was handed for final consideration and emendation to five of the royal chaplains, and to John Knox, the Scottish Reformer. Though it was thus discussed and revised, the draft was in the main the work of Cranmer and his friend Bishop Ridley, who is said to have supplied the greater share of learning. There is some doubt whether or not these Articles were submitted to Convocation; but the evidence seems to show that they were. Finally, they were issued in 1553, with the royal mandate to all the bishops ordering them to call on all clergy, schoolmasters, and churchwardens, to sub-scribe. These Articles of Edward VI., from their number, are sometimes known as the Forty-two Articles. They show that Cranmer in framing them used the Lutheran Confessions of Faith, especially the Confession of Augsburg, though he did not merely copy them. The accession of Queen Mary within two months of the publication of the Fortytwo Articles did not give them much time to sink into the minds of the clergy. On the accession of Elizabeth, Archbishop Parker was called on to provide for the troubled condition of ecclesiastical matters. In 1559 Eleven Articles were issued by authority, to be held by all clergy. They were limited to the definition of fundamental truths, and the points in which the Church of England held the Itoman ttempts to practice to be superstitious. It struck reforming out the end of the third Article, concerning the preaching of Christ to the spirits in prison, and entirely discarded three articles— "The souls of them that depart this life do the Bill of ansubstanom nunion ters clergy, neither die with the bodies, nor sleep id'y;"

binding only as occlesiastical law on the clergy, not on the laity. As regards the legal aspect of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Act of 1571 enacted that no one should be admitted to a benefice till he had subscribed the Articles in the presence of the Ordinary, and publicly read them in the parish church, with a declaration of his unfoigned awent. The Canons of 1603 further enacted that 1.0 one should teach, either in a school or in a private house, unless he subscribed the Thirtynine Articles and obtained a licence from a bishop. The Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, embodied this provision. The Toleration Act of 1689 exempted from the penalties of existing statutes against conventicles such dissenting ministers and teachers as should submitted the Thirty-nine Articles, omitting

This Act was the beginning of a period of indulgence and security from persecution to Dissenters, which went on till in 1779 was passed the Dissenting Ministers' Act, enabling Dissenters to preach and act as schoolmasters without any subscription to the Articles. From this time forward subscription to the Articles ceased to be a test for the exclusion of Dissenters, except in the Univer-sities. At Oxford, the Earl of Leicester as Chancellor had, in 1581, imposed subscription to the Articles before matriculation. At Cambridge, subscription, since 1616, was required of all who took a degree. Thus, Dissenters could not enter the University of Oxford; they might be educated at Cambridge, but were not admitted to any of the endowments. These disabilities were not removed till the passing of the University Tests Act in 1871, which exempted laymen from any religious test. Thus the Articles have ceased to be used as a standard of orthodoxy for any save the clergy of the Church of England. Even in their case it was felt that subscription to a body of doctrinal statements was an excessive obligation, if it was meant to imply literal agreement with every sentence contained in them. To avoid further ambiguities, and to reliove scrupulous consciences on this point, the Clerical Subscription Act of 1866 did away with subscription in the case of the clergy, and substituted a declaration of assent to the Thirty-nine Articles and the Prayer Book.

Act, the Articles of War for the Navy being based on a Bill passed in 1749. The Articles of War, "which are to be obeyed as being the commands of a superior officer," are divided into sections, some of which correspond to clauses in the Mutiny Act; others, however, though they relate to subjects in the latter, are occupied with definitions of the crime and the punishment appropriate to it. There are some Articles, moreover, which have no counterpart in the Act. is to be observed that the legality of the Articles of War, as of other orders, may itself become the subject of examination and eontroversy in a court martial; but the Mutiny Act, being part of the statute law, must be obeyed without question. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Articuli Super Cartas were certain articles, twenty in number, which were added to Magna Charta when it was confirmed by Edward I. in the Parliament which met, 1300. The most important clauses are those which appoint commissioners to investigate all cases in which the charters had been infringed; those which reform and regulate the jury system; those which remedy the abuses of purveyance and jurisdiction of the royal officers; and those which order that no common pleas shall be held in the Exchequer contrary to the form of Magna Charta, and forbid the issue of common law writs under the Privy Seal. Ono article, which Dr. Stubbs calls "a eurious relic of the ideas of 1258," allows the office of sheriff to be elective in counties where the office is not of fee or heritable. There were also articles regulating administration of tho forests, and limiting the royal jurisdiction over them.

Arundel, PERAGE OF. Roger de Mont-gomery, one of the most trusted followers of William the Conqueror, besides grants of land in Shropshire, received vast estates (seventy-seven lordships) in Sussex, including the castle of Arundel. In 1102, upon the forfeiture of Roger's son, Robert de Belesme, the castle of Arundel passed to the crown, and was settled by Henry I. on his second wife, Adeliza of Louvain, who, after the king's deuth, conveyed it to her second husband, William do Albini. It is doubtful whether William de Albini, the son of this marriage, received a grant of the third penny of the county of Sussex; but he is styled Earl of Sussex, as well as Earl of Arundel and Chichester. In 1243 Hugh do Albini, fifth Earl of Sussex, died without issue, and part of his estates, togother with Arundel Castle, passed to John Fitz-Alan, a descendant of Isabel, daughter of the third Earl. He and his sons are frequently styled Lords of Arundel. Richard Fitz-Alan (d. 1283) is the

In 1580 Henry Fitz-Alan, twelfth Earl, died without male heirs, and the earldom and estates passed to Philip, son of Thomas fourth Duke of Norfolk, who had married Mary, daughter of this earl. Philip was summoned to Parliament as Earl of Arundel The earldom has since continued in the line of the Fitz-Alan Howards, Dukes of Norfolk Howard.] The peerage of ARUNDEL OF WARDOUR was conferred in 1605 on Si Thomas Arundel, a distinguished soldier, who had fought in the wars against the Turks and had been created a Count of the Holy Roman Empire by Rudolph II.

Arundel, EDMUND FITZ-ALAN, 2ND EARS OF (d. 1326), was one of the Crdainers appointed in 1310. He was one of the few nobles who remained faithful to Edward II after the landing of Isabella and Mortimer He was seized by the latter at Bristol, and hanged with Hugh Despenser.

Arundel, RICHARD FITZ-ALAN, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1397), was the son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and Eleanor, daughter of Henry Earl of Lancaster. He succeeded his father in 1375, and served in the French and Scotel wars; but he was chiefly remarkable for his valour and conduct at sea. He was for several years admiral and captain of the east south, and west, gained several naval victories and captured Brest. He joined Glouceste against De la Pole and De Vere, and was on of the first Lords Appellant. In 1397 he was involved in Gloucester's fall, and was seized tried, and beheaded.

Arundel, Thomas Fitz-Alan, 10th Earlof (d. 1524), was one of the chief nobles at tached to Henry VII.'s court. On the occasion of the shipwreck near Weymonth, in January 1506, of the Archduke of Austria, Philip, and his wife, the Earl of Arundel was the royal messenger sent to congratulate Philip upon his recent escape, and to welcome him to England. The Earl of Arundel had also don the king good service as a soldier in Flanders during the wars in aid of Maximilian.

Arundel, Henry Fitz-Alan, 12th Ear of (d. 1580), was in 1547 appointed one of the twelve councillors who, under the will of Henry VIII., were to assist the executor in carrying on the government during the minority of Edward VI. He was one of the chief promoters of the attack on Somersel which ended in his downfall; and laving given an unwilling assent to the alteration of the succession of Edward VI. in favour of Lad.

However, ho managed to escape to Baynard's Castlo, and at once, with the rest of the Council, declared for Mary; shortly afterwards he arrested tho Duke of Northumberland at Cambridge, and conveyed him to London. After the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Arundel became one of her councillors, "feared hy all men, trusted hy none," and was even named as a probable suitor for her hand, a fact which led to a bitter quarrel with Leicester in 1561. In 1568, as the leader of the old nobility and the Catholic party, he showed himself violently opposed to Cecil and the Reformers, and was present at the Westminster Inquiry as a partisan of Mary Queen of Scots; in the following year he was placed under arrest for complicity in the northern rebellion, and in 1571 was privy to the Ridolfi conspiracy.

Arundel, Philip Howard, 13th Earl of (d. 1595), son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, who was attainted and beheaded in 1572, inherited the earldom of Arundel in right of his mother. Ho was restored in blood and made privy councillor in 1580. On his first appearance at court he won the favour of Elizabeth, but quickly lost it through his immeral life. In 1583 he was charged with complicity in the plot of Francis Throgmorton, having incurred suspicion hy becoming "reconciled" to the Catholic Church in 1581 on the solicitations of the Jesnits; hut though there was no doubt of his guilt, he was speedily released. On attempting to oscape from England, in 1585, he was captured and again sent to the Tower, where he remained until his death. In 1589 he was found guilty of high treason on a charge of having prayed for the success of the Spanish Arnada. He was also charged with corresponder ce with Allen and other Catholic conspirators. He was condemned to death, but by the advice of Cecil and Hatton was not executed. "In her conduct towards this unfortunate nohleman," remarks Mr. Lingard, "the queen betrayed an unaccountable spirit of revenge. He seems to have given some deep but secret offence which, though never divulged, could never be forgotten."

Arundel, Thomas (b. circa 1352, d. 1414), was the third son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and was made Bishop of Ely in 1374. He joined Glouester in his opposition to De la Pole and other ministers of Richard II., and in 1386 was appointed Chancellor. On the banishment of Neville he received the archbishopric of York, and retired from the Chancellorship in 1389. He was Chancellor again from 1391, till his appointment to the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1393. Shortly afterwards he was accused of treason, and at the king's request translated by the Pope to the see of St. Andrews. He was banished from the realm, and concerted with Bolingbroke plans for regaining power in England. He accompanied Henry on his expedition to England, and on the deposition of Richard received the archbishopric once more. He strenuously supported the rights of the Church during the remainder of his life, and was instrumental in getting the statute De Hæretico Comburendo passed. He held the Chancellorship again from 1407 to 1409, and from 1412 to 1413.

Asaf-ul-Dowlah (d. 1797) succeeded his father, Sujah Dowlah, as Vizier of Oude, in 1775, and was ultimately recognised by the Emperor. A treaty was concluded with the English, by which the Vizier agreed to surrender Benares and certain other districts of the annual value of twenty-two lacs. This Vizier misgoverned, as his father had done, and by 1781 was in a state of the greatest pecuniary embarrassment. Hastings therefore con-cluded an arrangement with him, one main object of which was to relieve him from hurdens which he professed himself totally unable to bear. It was provided by the new treaty that a portion of the British forces should be withdrawn, that the Vizier might resume all jaghires on payment of compensation. second article enabled the Vizier to dispossess. the Begums (his mother and grandmother) of Oude of their jaghires, and was the prelude to the cruckies exercised to compel them to surrender their treasures, 1782. The impoverishment of the Vizier, however, continued steadily, owing to his misgovernment and debauchery, and in 1786 his repeated requests that the British force should be removed induced Lord Cornwallis to make a fresh treaty with him, by which the money paid for the support of the brigade at Futtygurh was reduced from seventy-four to fifty lacs on the condition that it should be punctually paid. The misgovernment, however, continued, and the Vizler passed the rest of his life in oppressing his subjects, and indulging in boundless sensuality.

great strength and importance in the earlier Crusades. It was to this town that Richard I. led the crusading army after the fall of Acre in the early part of 1192. On the way his troops were intercepted hy a great Saracen army, under the command of Saladin, said to amount to over 300,000 men. The two wings of the Christian army were hroken; hut the centre, commanded hy Richard him-self, held firm, and at last drove back the enemy in great disorder. 40,000 of the Saracens are said to have perished. The victory threw the town of Ascalon into the hands of the Crusaders.

Ascham, Antony (d. 1650), an author "of much reputation," was sent hy the Commonwealth, in 1650, as amhassador to Madrid. A few days after his arrival there, he was assassinated by some refugee Royalists. The murderers, with the exception of one who was executed, were allowed to escape, public opinion in the Spanish capital being entirely in their favour. [DorisLAUS.]

Ascham, Rooen (b. 1515, d. 1568), one of the earliest of English Greek scholars, and at one time public orator at Cambridge, became successively Latin secretary to Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Elizabeth, and was also tutor to the last-named princess in 1548, being eharged with her instruction in the learned languages. In 1550 he accompanied Sir William Morysine in the capacity of secretary to the court of Charles V. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Ascham was, in 1559, made a canon of York. As a writer of English prose Ascham deserves high praise. His style, though semewhat rugged, is pithy and vigorous. His work on education, entitled The Schoolmaster, is interesting and valuable. He also wrote Toxophilus, a treatise on archery, and A Report of the Affairs and State of Germany, which is of some historical value.

Ascue (Askew, or Ayscough), ANNE (d. 1546), daughter of Sir Thomas Ascue, of Kelsey, in Lincolnshire, was arrested as a heretic for denying the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Sacrament. From her intimacy with Catherine Parr, Anne Ascue's prosecution for heresy is memorable, ss it instanced, among other things, the hostility of Bishop Gardiner and Lord Chancellor Wriothesley to the queen; for before being handed over to the executioner for the punishment of hurning, Anne, in spite of her sex, was made to undergo in the Tower the torture of the rack, with a view of extorting from her in her agony some avowal implicating other court ladies, and possibly the queen, Wriothesley's efforts are generally thought to have been entirely fruitless; though Parsons, in his "Examen" of Foxe's account of her, states that she actually did so: "By her confession, he (the king) learned so much of Queen Catherine Parr as he purposed to have her hurned also, had he lived."

Asgill, John (b. 1659, d. 1738), was the author of various pamphlets, including a trea-tise, published in 1698, on the possibility of avoiding death. He was elected to the Irish Parliament, and subsequently to the English Parliament, but was expelled on account of the blasphemy of his book. The character of the treatise was animadverted upon in the trial of Dr. Sacheverell. Asgill wrote also a tract, De Jure Divino, on the hereditary elaims of the House of Hanover; The Succession of the House of Hanover Vindicated; and an Essay for the Press.

Asgill, SIR CHARLES (b. 1762, d. 1823), in 1780 was a lieutenant in the army of Lord Cornwallis in North America, when that general capitulated at York Town. In the following year the Americans, to revenge the death of a certain Republican officer, cast lots for a victim among their English prisoners. The lo fcll on Asgill; hut his mother went over to France, and persuaded Marie Antoinette to interest herself on his behalf with the Ameri can envoy. The intercession of the French queen was successful. Asgill was released continued in the army, and in 1794 served under the Duke of York in the Low Countries In 1798 he was placed in command of a large body of troops for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, and after the Union was for many years employed in various offices in Ireland.

when its king, Sy Tutu, attacked Annamaboe, a fort on the coast built by the English after the settlement in 1661. Soon afterwards peace was concluded on disgraceful terms, and it lasted until 1824, when, the Ashantees having attacked tho Fantees, over whom the English had established a protectorate, Sir Charles MacCarthy, governor of Cape Coast Castle, advanced with a handful of men against the king, but was surprised and slain at Esmacow. In 1826, the death of MacCarthy was avenged at the battle of Dudowah. Though there were one or two skirmishes between the Ashantees and the English troops, peace was, on tho whole, maintained from that date until 1863, when on the refusal of Governor Pine to give up some runaway slaves to the King of Ashantee, war was begun by the latter. The governor drove the savages back to the Prah, but his West Indian troops fell victims to the climate, and he was compelled to withdraw. Once more peace was pro-claimed. In 1871 the question whether England or Ashantee should rule the territory between the Prah and the coast, was brought to a final issue by the cession to England by the Dutch of al' their claims on the Gold Coast on condition that they should be allowed to annex lands in Sumatra. Thereupon King Coffee Calcali, who had ascended the throne in 1867, objected to the transfer of the town of Elmina on the ground that it always paid him a fixed annual tribute; he had also taken captive some missionaries, whom he did not wish to ransom. He therefore decided on renewing the war, and his general, Amanquatia, accordingly crossed the Prah, and drove the cowardly Fantees before them to the coast, but was himself driven from before Elmina by Colonel Festing. Sir Garnet Wolseley was sent out in October to take civil and military command of the Gold Coast, while Captain Glover, R.N., who had been sent out by the Colonial Office, made an attempt to raise a native force at the mouth of the Volta. Native troops were, however, very untrustworthy, and pending the arrival of some English soldiers, Sir Garnet Wolseley could only occupy and stockade the advanced posts on the road to the Prah. With the arrival of English troops in December, Sir Garnet was able to invade Ashantee; and on Jan. 31 he encountered the Ashantees at Amoaful, and defeated them. On Feb. 4 the English reached Coomassie, which they fired. The army was overtaken on its return march by envoys from King Coffee, and a treaty was concluded, by which the king agreed to pay 50,000 ounces of gold, to renounce all rights over the tribes formerly under the protection of the Dutch, to allow free trade, to keep the road between the Prah and Coomassie open, and to discontinue human sacrifices. In 1895 these engagements were broken by King Prempeh, against whom

British expedition was sent under Sir F. Scott. It entered Coomassie without opposition on Jan. 18, 1896. To enforce pa, ment of the fine imposed, the king and other host-ages were taken to the coast, and a iterident was appointed at Coomassie. In 1900 a rising broke out, but was suppressed by Sir James Willcocks. In 1901 Ashantee was definitely Ashburnham, Sir John (d. 1671), a descendant of an old Sussex family, sat in the Long Parliament, and took a prominent part on the Royalist side, and at the out-break of the Civil War joined the king, and was appointed treasurer and paymaster to the army. He attended Charles I. when he gave himself up to the Scots, and immediately afterwards fled to France. In 1647 ho returned, and became one of the king's personal attendants, and was the chief contriver of Charles's escape from Hampton Court. The business was mismanaged, and Ashburnham was accused of treachery by the Royalists; for which, however, there seems to be little ground. He remained in England after the king's death, and compounded for his estate, but being detected in sending money to Charles II., he was in 1654 imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till Cromwell's death. At the Restoration he received large grants of land, and was made Groom of the Bedchamber to the king.

Ashburnham's Narrative of his Attendance on King Charles the First was published by his descendant, Lord Ashburnham, in 1830.

Ashburton, John Dunning, 1st Lord (b. 1731, d. 1783), was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After being articled to his father, he came up to London and was called to the Bar. In 1760 he made a great reputation by the defence which he drew up on behalf of the East India Company against the Dutch elaims. In 1763 he still further increased his fame by his eloquence in the cause of Wilkes against the legality of general warrants. In 1766 he became Recorder of Bristol; was appointed in the next year Solicitor-General; and obtained, in 1768, a seat in Parliament as member for Calne. In 1770 be went out of office, and throughout Lord North's long administration, vigorously opposed the government policy.

He warmly maintained the legality of the Middlesex election, opposed the Test Act, seconded Sir George Savile's motion for an inquiry into government pensions, and was one of the most persistent opponents of the policy pursued towards the American Colonies. In 1782, when the Marquis of Rockingham came into power, Dunning was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and raised to the peerage.

Ashburton Treaty, THE (1846), was concluded between England and America for settling the frentiers of the two countries. It defined them to ran along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude from the great lakes to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of that channel to the Pacific. It neglected, however, to define the middle of the channel, and in consequence a dispute, which was settled in 1872 by arbitration, arose as to the ownership of the little island of San Juan.

Ashby, Sir John (b. 1642, d. 1693), a distinguished naval officer, was appointed captain of the Defiance, and took part in the engagement with the French fleet in Bantry Bay. In 1692 he fought in the battle of La Hogue, and, together with Delaval, was entrusted with the pursuit of the French ships. Nottingham attorwards accused him in Parliament, together with Admiral Russell, of negligence in the latter part of the engagement, and though triumphantly acquitted, Ashby seems nover to have taken active scrvice again. Ashdown (Æschun). The name of the place on the Berkshire downs, near Didcot, where was fought, in 871, a great battle between the West Saxons, led by Ethelred and Alfred, and the Danish host, which had spread over East Anglia and invaded Wessex this year. The Danes had seized Reading, and before this town the Saxens were badly beaten. A few days later they again attacked their fees at Ashdown. A desperate battle was fought, lasting all day, and ending in the flight of the Danes. One of their kings and five of their "jarls" fell in the battle. The victory was in great part due to the vigour and promptitude of Alfred, who led one of the two divisions of the Wessex army. [Alfred.]

Ashtee, The Battle of (1818), was fought between the English treops under General Smith and Bajee Ikao. The latter, after the battle of Korgaom, retreated, pursued by the British, who on the 19th of February came up with him at the village of Ashtee, and prepared immediately for the attack. The Peishwa, heaping reproaches on his brave general, Gokla, for this surprise, fled at once, leaving his army to cover his retreat. Gokla, stung by the insult, placed himself at the head of 300 horse, rushed on the sabres of the British cavalry, and fell covered with wounds. After his death the Peishwa's army was easily discomlited, and fled in hopeless confusion.

Aske, Ronert (d. 1537), was a gentleman of Yorkshire, and the chief organiser of the famous rebellion of Henry VIII.'s reign known as the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.). His sympathies with the prevalent discontent seem to have been excited originally by his accidental sojourn at Lincoln during the disturbances there in September, 1536. While the various leaders of the movement were executed, Robert Aske had the distinction of being hanged in chains on one of the towers of York. Aske's talents for organisation and command, and his moderation and integrity, make him a very remarkable character.

Asquith, The Right Hon. Herbert Henry (b. 1852), was educated at the City of London School and at Balliul College, Oxford. He was called to the Bar in 1876, and took silk in 1890. He entered the House of Commons as Member for East Fifeshire in 1886, was one of Mr. Parnell's counsel before the Commission, and first took office as Home Secretary under Mr. Gladstone in 1892. After the fall of the Ministry in 1895 he returned to the Bar. From 1903-5 he vigorously opposed Mr. Joseph Chamberlain's fiscal policy. In 1905 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Liberal Ministry. On the resignation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman he was summoned by the king (April 5, 1908), and formed a new Cabinet, himself becoming P. ime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury.

Assam. A province of British India lying along the upper valloys of the Brahmaputra, and extending from the frontiers of Bengal to Northern Burmah. The country was conquered in the early Middle Ages by tribes from Burmah, who, however, gradually assi-milated in language and religion with the Hindoos. The Mohammedans never succeeded in conquering the country, though they frequently attempted it. In the early part of the nuneteenth century the Assamese became closely connected with Burmah, and their hostile attitude to the East India Company brought about the First Burmese War, the result of which was the annexation of Assam in 1826. It was placed under the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal; in 1874 it was made a separate Chief-Commissionership, and in 1905 was with Eastern Bengal constituted a Lieutenant-Governorship. [Burmese Wars.]

Assandun, The Battle of (1016), was the last of the battles between Edmund Ironside and Canute. Owing to the treachery of Edric, the English were defeated. Assandun is identified by Mr. Freeman with Aslington, near Rochford, in Essex.

Assassination Plot, The, was an attempt on the life of William III., first designed in 1695, but postponed by William's departure for Flanders. It grew up side by side with Berwick's plot for the invasion of England by a French army. It was entrusted by the court of St. Germains to Sir George Barclay. It was determined to attempt the life f the king on Turnham Green, on his way back to Kensington after hunting in Richmond Park, on the 15th of February. Assays. [Assye.]

Asser (d. 910) was a monk attached to the famous monastery of St. Davids, of which his uncle was bishop. The fume of his learning led King Alfred in 855 to invite him to assist him in his studies. He was made by that mouarch Bishop of Sherborne, but seems to have resided a great part of his time at the court, assisting the king in the revival of learning, which he brought about. His name occurs in some catalogues of Bishops of St. Davids; but their historical value is smail, and his occupations in England make it highly improbable that he ever attained the bishopric of his native place. His Life of King Alfred (De Rebus Catis Alfred) was long considered thoroughly trustworthy authority. There is however, little doubt that the work, as we have it now, contains large additions from the hands of later copyists, the great Camden being among the number. Some scholar have even gone so far as to declare the Life entirely spurious. This seems an extreme conclusion; but there is little doub' that the work cannot be relied on as a thoroughly authentic contemporary biography. Accepted with these qualifications, the work is valuable and extremely interesting. [ALFRED.]

No MSS. of Asser are in existence, nor any printed copies earlier than Elizabeth's reign. The work is printed in Monumenta Histor. Britann.; and translated in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Assessment. The assessment of taxation begins to be important when direct taxation itself as once so much more importance with the Norman reigns. For the century and more during which taxation was looked for only from the land, Domesday remained the great rate-book, and its assessment remained unaltered. A township was rated in Domesday at such and such a number of hides, and paid its Danegeld or hidage accordingly. The towns arranged with the sheriff or the itinerant justices what sums they should pay. Only as the knight's fee became the universal mode of reckoning the liability of military tenants, this liability had to be expressed in a new compilation—the Black Book of the Exchequer, or rate-book for tenants-in-chief; which again was revised more than a century later in the Testa de Nevill. But Domesday itself was a return sent in to royal commissioners by each hundred and township, a joint work of the royal and popular powers. When, after the Saladine tithe of 1188 upon movables as well as rents, taxation began to fall more and more on personal property, and to advance towards the subsidy of the fourteenth and succeeding centuries, then more than ever the assessment of a tax required tho free cooperation of each locality. Only from a jury of neighbours could a due estimate be reached of a man's property. The assessment of taxation was committed to representatives in each district, and taxation itself was rapidly becoming a function for the united representatives of the whole nation. When this latter point is reached in the Parliamentary system of Edward I., the matter of assessment loses its main constitutional importance, having already done it work. Tho knights of the shire, who in 1220, for instance, assess the average on their neighbours, in 1295, assembled in one body, grant the tax, and in the Good Parliament of 1376 demand the right to settle its appropriation. And indeed as early as 1334, assessment becomes little more than mechanical when the rating of the fifteenth, made in that year and recorded in the Exchequer, was thereafter taken as a standard. Henceforth tho only question which remains to give trouble is concerned with the assessment of the When, from the date above given (1188), their "spiritualities," i.e., revenues from fees, &c., came under contribution, the assessment was carried out by the samo method of juries of neighbours, until, in 1256,

Nor vich taxation made by order of Pope under IV., and in 1291 the valuation reeding it, which was made by order of ancholas IV., and which covered both "temporalities" and "spiritualities," gave the clergy a permanent independent rate-book, which was acted on till the Reformation. But it left an opening for constant disputes in the next two centuries as to the mode and rate of assessment to be applied; first, to lands acquired by the Church since the valuation of 1291, and secondly as to the large class of chantry priests and private chaplains whom that valuation had left out of account. This elerical valuation and the lay assessment of Domesday, as well as the rating to subsidies of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, were probably far below the real value. Not only were exemptions wide and numerous, but the rating itself was The evidently at a nominal valuation. Domesday hide, for example omitted unproductive ground: and the later subsidies did not fall on a knight's equipment or a peasant's implements. The lightness of the assessment must, in fact, be set against the hurdensomeness of early taxation due to its uncertainty, its wasteful needes of collection, and its suicidally short-sighted principles. When the methods of assessment ceased in the fourteenth century to have a formative effect on the constitution, their chief importance is over. But here, too, the Tudor and Stuart kings, going back for precedents to an age before the national liberties were set on a firm constitutional basis, revived on several occasions more arbitrary methods, and disregarded the valuations which had been accepted for two centuries. Thus the com-missioners under Wolsey's great scheme of taxation in 1522, and again in 1525, were to assess each man, elerk or lay, to the value of his chattels. In 1621 the assessors were to disregard old rates, and to rate every man according to their own knowledge, not even accepting his own declaration, and such was the precedent followed in the raising of ship-money. The whole practice, too, of benevolences and of forced loans levied according to official estimates of the individual's property, was an application of arbitrary assessment. Again, in the seventeenth century, with the establishment of the excise arose a question of some practical moment, how this was assessed. Similar points of social intorest are connected with the injurious effects of certain taxes. assessed on a false principle, as the windowtax; or the introduction of the income tax, in which recourse has to be made to a rude method of joint assessment by the payer himself and by an official commissioner. But these mothods are, as a matter of fact, guaranteed against unjustly operating, by the right of appeal to a higher body or a court

Assiento, The (1713), or the "contract" for supplying the Spanish colonies in the Western world with negro slaves, was at first an arrangement between France and Spain. After the merchandise had been carried on by Genoa and Portugal, it had been undertaken in 1702 by a French company. By one of the stipulations of the Treaty of Utrecht, this right was surrendered to England, and confirmed by a special treaty of forty-two elauses. After France had resigned the Assiento, Spain was to convey it to England for thirty years, at the end of which period, and a further term of three years, the traffic was to be wound up. England was to furnish 4,800 nogroes annually. With the Assionto England was to have the right of sending two ships a year, each of five hundred tons burden, to-America with negroes. A contest for this profitable monopoly soon arose between the African and the South Sea Company; the latter were successful, and obtained the fourth part reserved for the queen by the terms of the treaty. On the outbreak of war with Spain, England lost the Assionto, but it was once more renewed in 1725, and was again restored to her by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), for the remaining four years which it had to run. "Not one person," says Mr. Wyon, "seems to have imagined that there was anything immoral or unjustifiable in the business itself."

Assize (assisa-assisia) is a word of doubtful etymology; probably at least two words have converged to create the ideas underlying the various senses of the term; viz. (a), assido or assideo, to sit down—i.e., a session or a settlement, the notions perhaps common to most meanings of assize; (b) accido, to tax (cf. oxeise and assisus redditus). Besides these (c) there must be some connection with the Anglo-Saxon asetniss, a law (cf. établissement de S. Louis); and (d) Ducange's editors can explain assisia only by reference to Arabic.

Meanings — (1) Session, and, specially, Judicial Session.—This meaning, which is found so early as in the Pipe Roll 2, Henry II., may possibly be the original one; cf. Watsius, De Jure Vet. Munic. Norm., i. 56; "assize est une assemblée de plusieurs sages hommes en laquelle ce qui y sera jugié doit avoir produrable fermeté." From this come the "Grandes" and "Petites Assises" of France, and the Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, called "Cours d'Assises," in the Code Napoléon. The modern English use to denote the court of the justices on circuit is, perhaps by an accident, an example of this use of the word. A spec. iised case is the old use of assize for—

(2) The Select Body Engaged in Administering the Trial—e.g., Provisions of Oxford, in the "provisum est quod nullus miles non ponatur in juratis vel assisis"—i.e., all knights are liable to be jurymen. The words are clearly synonymous, though the old law books make a distinction. The "sworn men" are also the "men settled" to try a case.

(3) A Law or Ordinance—i.c., the "lex assisa," the settled edict of the king. In reality a law, the "Assize" in this sense professed to be rather an occasional enactment, valid during pleasure, an executive, not a legislative, act. Thus, the mediæval reverence for the "written law," which sprang from the solemn sense assigned to "lex" in the Bible and Roman Law, was respected, and real legislative changes produced by a legal fiction—cf. the Practor's Edict, the Capitularies of the Carolingians, the Pro-visions of Henry III., the "Establishments" of St. Louis, all of which had the same object. In tances of such assizes are the "Assises de Jérusalem," a code for the Frank kingdom of l'alestine, drawn up by Godfrey of Bouillon and his barons (1099), Henry II.'s Assizes of Clarendon, Northampton, Woodstock, Arms, Essoines, &c. ("novas leges quas assisas vocavit"), for which see below; the Assizes of Antioch, Sicily, Roumania, and in Brittany the Assizes of Count Geoffrey in 1185, and the Assize of Count John (against the Jews) in 1239. Wherever Norman or Frank influence went, twelfth-century law assumed the form of assizes.

(4) State Regulations of the Price, Quality dr., of various Commodities. - A sense kindred to previous paragraph. These were the "assiste rerum venalium" of old English and French law. Richard J. aimed-not very successfully —at uniform weights and measures (Assize of Measures in Hoveden, iv. 33). John "fecit generaliter acclamari ut legalis assisa panis inviolabiter observaretur" (Matthew Paris, A.D. 1201). This points to pre-existing a.p. 1201). This points to pre-existing custom. There were also assizes of wine, ale, s. , boards, timber, wood, coal, butter, and cheese. These restrictions on trade and on adulteration were kept up quite late-e.g., there were three editions of the assize printed in 1528, 1530, and 1580. In 6 and 7 Wm. IV., Acts regulating the assize of bread were formally repealed. They were carried into New England and long kept up there.

(5) A Mode of Trial prescribed by an Assize (in sense of law)—e.g., the Grand Assize of Henry II. and the other "real actions," the assizes of Mort d'Ancester, Novel Disseisin, and Darein Presentment (see below). Spelman calls them "brevic regia et litigandi formulæ." Assize here ...eans (a) the law;

(b) the rule instituted by it.

(6) The Trial itself—e.g., in the assize of Northampton the royal direction to the justices to try robbers (ut faciant assisam de latronibus); cf. "cum brevibus assisarum et placitorum" in reval writ of 1231.

(7) Assessment-i.e., the settlement of the incidence of a tax-e.g., Dialogue De Scaceario, i. 8. "Fiunt per comitatas communes assisæ a justiciis errantibus—qua ideo dicuntur communes quia cognita summa quæ de comi-tatu requiruntur," &c.

(8) A Tax-e.g., Liber Niger Seaearii, cap. De Danegelde "ex constitutis duobus soliais summa una esse communis assisa nuncupatur excrescit;" e "levare assisam," to levy a tax. HIST-4*

(9) Fines.—Fixed by courts of justice—e.g., in Brittany, "le seigneur peut demander pour son betail l'essise ou le dedommage a san choix."

(10) Assisus Redditus.—The fixed rent which customary tenants paid to the lord of the manor, beyond which they were free. This is analogous to the preceding.

The various law glossaries, such as Spelman and the modern works based on him, collect the chief uses of assize; cf. Ducango's Glossarium Medic et Infime Latinitatis, and the old law bookr, Britton, Bracton, &c. [T. F. T.]

Assize, Justicus or, were originally the judges commissioned to try the special assizes or real actions mentioned in Assizz (5). By 27 Ed. I., s. 1, c. 3, it was ordered that Justices of Assize should, if laymen, also make deliverance of the gaol; and before long, the common law judges always were laymen. Gradually various other commissions were iven to them, as it was a main object of Edward I.'s judicial reforms to simplify and consolidate the too numerous Acts which had oppressed the nation under his father. So the commissions of nisi prius, of oyer and terminer, and of the peace, were added to those above mentioned; until the judge, with his five commissions under the Great Seal, vas on his provincial circuit generally called the Justice of Assize, though, properly speaking, that was only one of his commissions. By 3 and 4 Wm. IV., the actions of "assizes" were abolished, so that the present commission is only fourfold, but the name has survived the fact, and their courts are still generally called the "assizes," and the town of their meeting the assize town.

Assine of Arms, The, was an ordinanco issued by Henry II. in 1181. It revived and organised the old national militia, based on the obligation of all freemen to serve in the fyrd. Henry hol d it would be a safer support to his thruse than the feudal levies or the unpopular mercenaries. By this assize all freemen were required to provide arms suited to their rank and means. knight, or possessor of over sixteen marks yearly, provided a coat of mail, helmet, shield, and lance: the freeholder of ten marks, a hauberk, iron cap, and lance; and all burgesses and "tota communa liberorum hominum" a gambeson, iron cap, and lance. Doubt al cases were decided by a jury. Elaborate provisions were annexed for the enforcement of the law. Paralleled in most other European countries, this assize was renewed by Henry III.'s system of watch and ward, and by Edward I.'n Statute of Winchester.

Stubbs, Select Charters, 155-15.

Assize of Clarendon (1166), Henry II.'s first great measure of judicial reform, was remarkable as formally instituting, and giving legislative recognition to, the jury system in criminal trials, as connecting the local with the central jurisdiction, and as the first effort to constitute a great administrative system. Henry I. had probably borrowed the institution of justices itinerant from the Carolingian missi. His plan was now enlarged and made permanent. A commission was sent round to each shire, to whom, in conjunction with the sheriffs, grand juries of the county were to present accused or suspected persons. The ordeal by water furnished a further means of discrimination. This now system of presentment and ordeal abolished com-Other provisions required all qualified persons to serve on juries, opened every franchise to the sheriff, regulated the treatment of waifs and strangers on purely Anglo-Saxon principles, directed sheriffs to help each other, to make lists of fugitives, torbade religious houses to receive "aliquem de minuto populo," unless sick to death or of good repute, and forbade hospitality to the heretics condemned at Oxford.

Stubbs, Select Charters, 140-146.

Assize of Darrein Presentment. An action to determine the lawful patron of a benefice. "If a tenant in fee or in tail had himself presented, or if his ancestors had presented, to a benefice, or if a tenant for lifo or years had himself presented and the nominee had been duly instituted, but afterwards the old possessor of the advowson had been debarred from exercising his right. he could institute a recognition of darrein presentment." This inquest was originated by Henry II., and is alluded to in Glanvil. By Magna Charta (art. 18) it was to be held, along with the assizes of mort d'ancester and novel disseisin four times a year, by two justices in the county court, in conjunction with a jury of four knights of that county; but the Charter of 1217 reserves cases of darrein presentment to the Justices in banco (art. 15). By the Statute of Westminster the first (3 Ed. I., c. 51), the assize was again assimilated to the other two, and directed to be held every Advent, Septuagesima, and Lent. It became early obsolete, as the writ quare impedit gave an easier means of prosecuting claims to advowson, and was abolished, with all "real actions," by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 27.

Assize of Mort d'Ancester. the heir to an estate was deprived by a stranger of part of what had been in the possession of his predecessor (antecessor) at the time of the latter's decease, he could apply for a possessory writ de morte ante-essoris. Glanvil, to whom we owe our earliest knowledge of what was probably then one of Henry II.'s novelties, describes the process of the inquest. The sheriff empanels a jury of twelve lawful freeholders of the neighbourhood, and the suit is determined by their testimony. It was held by the justices in the shire, mostly with a jury of four knights four times a year, according to Magna Charta, § 18. But the Charter of 1217 directs the assize to be used only once a year. By the Statute of Westminster the first, it was held thrice in the year. It became obsolete, and was abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV.

Assize of Worthampton (1176). A re-issuo and expansion of the Arsize of Clarendon, marked by the increased severity of the punishments, the lessened trust reposed in the sheriffs, and the gradual limitation of the ordeal. Those presented by the jury who escaped on the ordeal, had to find bail for good behaviour if accused of a small offence; but if felony or "murdrum" had to abjure the realm. Confessions before the jury must not be revoked before the judge. Some new legal articles are of great importance in relation to land tenure, reliefs, dowor, and feudal obligations. The concluding political articles require, in reference to the 1173 rebellion, oaths of fealty even from villains, the destruction of castles held against the king, the safe custody of all others, the registration of fugitives and outlaws. The justices are to make exhaustive inquiries of all kinds, hold all pleas, and look after the royal revenue. The country is divided into six circuits, to be visited by six commissions.

Stubba, Select Charters, 143-145.

Assize of Novel Disseisin. An action that lay with a tenant unjustly dispossessed of his lands, tried by the itinerant justices before a jury of the neighbourhoo. The importance attached to this assize illustrates the widespread lawlessness of the times. Its limitation to recent disseisins is equally significant. The Assize of Northampton (chap. 5) directs "Ut Justitiæ Regis faciant recognitionem de dissaisinis factis a tempore quo dominus rex venit in Angliam post pacem," and this seems to be the original text of the assize. The assize is called by Bracton "Summaria cognitio absque magna juris solennitate," and by the Statute of Westminster the second "festinum remedium." Its history is the same as the history of the assizes of mort d'ancester and darrein present-ment. Analogous to it was the assize of fresh force, so called, because the plaint was to be within sixty days of the injury. It was a writ that lay by custom of a town when a man was disseised within the borough. Similar also was the assize of nuisance.

Assize of Utrum lay with the possessor of an ecclesiastical benefice to recover lands of the Church alienated hy his predecessor. The term "utrum" was the emphatic word which directed the jury to inquire whether the tenements or lands were in frank almoign of the descendant's church, or the lay fee of the tenant. It was instituted by statute 14 Ed. III., c. 17, and practically ended by the restraining statute 13 Eliz., c. 10. ng to Magna 1217 directs year. By first, it was ne obsolete, 1. IV.

Assise of Woodstock, or the Assise of the Forest, drawn up by Henry II. ln 1184, was the first code of any elaborateness for the government of the forests, which, from the time of the Conquest at least, were regarded as specially subject to the uncontrolled jurisdiction of the monarch. The forest jurisdiction is arranged on just the same lines as the county jurisdiction, just as the manor organisation was based on that of the free township. The punishments are said to be milder than those in vogue under llenry I., but the whole assize is full of vexatious clauses, which must have been very irksome to dwellers in the forest. No one can possess a dog or a bow and arrows without a royal licenco. Elaborate regulations have reference to the woods and clearings within the forest that belonged to private individuals. All men, from archbishop and earl down to the simple freeholder, are required to attend the forest courts on the summons of the master forestor (this was repealed by Magna Charta). All persons over twelve years old dwelling within the forest are to swear to keep the peace of the forest. Hounds are to have their foreclaws cut off, and no tanners or bleachers of hides are to dwell therein, beyond the limits of a borough. [Forests.]

Sclect Charters, 150-152; Reeves' History of English Law and Blackstone's Commentaries give a full account of this and most of the above assizes. Most of them are printed in Dr. Stubbe's Sclect Charters (with invaluable comments). See also his Const. Hist., vol. i.

Assize, The Grand. A form of inquest by sworn recognitors in cases of suits to determine the possession of a freehold, instituted by Henry II. as an alternative to wager of battle, which, since the Conquest, had been the ordinary way of trying such suits. The procedure, according to the assize, was as follows. On the motion of the possessor, the Curia Regis stopped proceedings in the local courts until after the inquest. On the claimant's command, four lawful knights were selected and summoned, through the sheriff, to Westminster, where they elected twelve lawful knights of their neighbourhood, before whom, and the king or his justices, the trial comes off. If the jury know the facts, they have only to declare their verdict. If not, those ignorant are replaced by better informed witnesses. Their decision is final. Long obsolete, the Grand Assize was only abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., cap. 27. The text of Henry II.'s ordinance is lost, but a copious account of it is given in Glanvil, with much about its equity and superiority to the "duellum."

Assizes, The Black. A name often given to the assizes at Oxford in 1577, when "a pestilent savour" rose either from the noisome smell of the prisoners, or the damp of the ground, owing to which all present were seized, within forty hours, of fover, and many died (some accounts say, with probable exaggeration, 300), including the chlof baron, the sheriff, and a large number of the Oxfordshire gentry.

Assises, THE BLOODY. A term often applied to the summer assizes of 1685, held in the Western Circuit after Monmouth's rebellion; when Chief Justice Jeffreys sentenced more than 300 rebels to death for treason after the berest mockery of a trial.

Macaulay, History, ii., chap. 5. A tract called The Bloody Assiss contains contemporaneous accounts of the executions.

Associated Counties was the name given to the counties of Essex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Hertford, to which were subsequently added Huntingdon and Lincoln. These counties formed an association in 1642 to keep the war out of their own districts and raise an army for the Parliament. The Association was first commanded by Lord Grey of Wark, and subsequently by the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell. Other counties formed similar associations, "but," says Carlyle, "the 'Eastern Association' is alone worth naming. All the other associations, no men of emphasis being in the midst of them, fell in a few months to pieces; only this of Cromwell's subsisted, enlarged itself, grew famons: and, indeed, kept its own borders clear of invasion during the whole course of the war."

Association in favour of William III., (1) (1688), was devised by Sir Edward Seymour after the prince had landed in England, in o er to bind his supporters by some mutual obligation. It was signed first at Exeter and then in all the western eounties. (2) Tho more famous association, that of 1696, was formed on the discovery of the Assassination Plot. The idea was proposed by Sir Rowland Gwyn, and eagerly adopted by Montague. The members of the House of Commons, each for himself, solemnly recognised William as rightful and lawful king, and bound themselves to stand by him: and they vowed that, if his life should be shortened by violence, they would avenge his murder, and support the order of suc-cession settled by the Bill of Rights. The measure was opposed by the Tories in tho Lower House, headed by Musgrave, on the ground that the formula implied an abjuration, and that William could not be properly described as "rightful and lawful king." Leeds, in order to conciliate opposition in the Upper House, proposed the verbal alteration that it should be declared that William had a right by law to the English crown, and that no other person had any right whatever to that crown. This quibble satisfied nearly all the Tory peers. The country in general was seized with great enthusiasm. The municipal corporations all over the country appended their signatures to similar documents. Everywhere orange ribands were worn, on which were written in letters of gold the words "National Association for King William."

Association Project (1582) was the name given to the proposal, emanating from France, for associating James VI. anhis mother, the Queen of Scots, together in the government of Scotland.

Association to Protect Queen Elizabeth, Bonn or, 1584, was an attempt to organise all English Protestants into "a universal vigilance committee" (Froude). to defend the queen against the plots of the Papists. In Nov., 1584, Burleigh and Walsingham framed an instrument declaring that the signers of it bound themselves together on oath to withstand any attempt against the queen's person, and it any such attempt should be made and should be successful, to pursue to the death the person or persons who had been concerned in it. The association was primarily directed against Mary Queen of Scots, and was meant to show her partisans that her own death would follow closely on the assassination of Elizabeth. The oath of association was taken with enthusiasm by the nobility, privy councillors, judges, the clergy, and all who hold office under the erown, and a large number of private persons throughout the country. Many of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry were among those who signed the Bond.

Associations (Ireland) Bill (1826), 6 George IV., c. 4, was directed chiefly against the Catholic Associations. It forbade periodical sittings of political associations, the appointment of committees for more than fourteen days, the levying of money to redress grievances, the administering of oaths, the exclusion of men on account of their religion, and the affiliation of societies. It lasted for three years, but failed to crush O'Connell's agitation.

Assured Lords, The consisted chiefly of Scottish nobles taken prisoners at the battle of Selway Moss, Nov. 25, 1542, who, from a long sojourn at the English court, had become to a certain extent ideatified with English interests. On their return to Scotland after the death of James V., they undertook to serve Henry VIII. at the Scotch court, giving hostages to the English king for their fidelity. Henry, however, soon found that their good faith was doubtful, and in 1544 they openly joined the national party. The assured Lords consisted of the Earls of Cassilis and Glencairn, Lords

Fleming, Somerville, Maxwell, and Oliphant, taken at Solway Moss; together with the Earl of Angus and his brother, Sir George Douglas, who had long been refugees at the English court.

Assye, THE BATTLE or (Sept. 23, 1803), during the Mahratta War, was fought between an army of 4,500, commanded by General Wellesley, and the great army of Dowlut Rao Scindish and the Rajah of Berar; which, after the capture o' Jalnapoor on the 2nd, was retreating towards the Adjuntee Pass, while the English, in two divisions, under Wellesley and Colonel Stephenson, were attempting to intercept them. The Mahrattas were strongly entrenched, with their left resting on Assye, when Wellesley came up with them, and without waiting for Colonel Stephenson, resolved to attack them. Wellesley had given the most resitive in lesley had given the most positive injunctions to the officer commanding the pickets to avoid the cannon planted in the village, but in spite of this he led his troops directly up to the muzzles of the guns, which poured an incessant shower upon the assailants. The 74th Regiment, which supported them, was thus exposed to a hotter fire than any troops had ever before encountered in India. To save it, more troops had to be moved up amid this terrific fire. The indomitable courage and energy of the British troops, however, bore down all resistance, and Scindiah's infantry gave way. The English cavalry then charged, and forced them off the field. The victory was complete; but it was dearly gained by the loss of one-third of the army.

Astley, Jacob, Lord (d. 1652), had served in many foreign countries, and had distinguished himself in Germany under Gustavus Adolphus. He joined the army of Charles I., and, having taken part in the battles of Edgehill, Brentford, and Newbury, was raised to the peerage. At the battle of Naseby, Astley commanded the infantry, and in 1646 he mado a last stand at Stow-on-the-Wold against the Parliament. Here he was defeated by Brereton and taken prisoner. He compounded for his estate, gave his parole not to serve any more against Parliament, and spent the rest of his life in retirement.

Aston, Sir Arthur (d. Sept. 12, 1649), was a distinguished soldier, who had acquired military experience abroad. He was governor of Oxford at the beginning of the Civil War, but was soon after disabled by a wound. At a later period he was governor of Reading. In 1649, Ormonde made him governor of Drogheda, hoping that he would be able to hold out till the rains. This he was unable to do, and on the taking of the place he was literally hacked to pieces by the Puritan soldiers.

In the earlier period, the Eorles and Athel are used to designate the class spoken of by Bede as nobice, in all probability "the descendants of the primitive nobles of the first settlement, who, on the institution of royalty, sank one step in dignity from the ancient state of rude independence" (Stubbs). As the nobility of blood became superseded by the nobility of service, the title of Atheling was gradually confined to the princes of the blood royal, and in the ninth and tenth centuries is used exclusively for the sons or brothers of the reigning king. Though he seems to have held no official position in right of his birth, the atheling was superior in dignity to all men but the king and the great functionaries of the Church, as shown by his "wer-gild."
In the "north people's law" of the tenth century, the gild of the atheling and the archbishop (and in this case of the "eorl" who corresponds no doubt to the Danish "jarl", is 15,000 thrymsas, while that of the bishop or ealdorman is 8,000. So too in the laws of Athelstan of Wessex. The atheling attended the Witenagemot as one of the magnates of the kingdom, and was one of those who were least seldom absent from it. The name was kept up after the Norman Conquest, and is applied not only to the young princes, the sons of Edmund Ironside, but also to William "Cuto," the son of Henry I. and Matilda, and possibly to Henry himself.

Atheling, EDGAR. [EDGAR ATHELINO.]

Athelney (Aethelinga eigge), the Isle of Princes, is situated about seven miles from Taunton. Hither, in 878, Alfred the Great repaired after his defeat by the Danes, and here he remained concealed for nearly a year, when, sullying forth, he defeated the invaders and compelled them to make peace. At that time Athelney was a veritable island in the midst of fens and marshes, but it has since been drained and cultivated.

Athelstan (ÆTHELSTAN) (b. 895, s. 925, d. 940) was the son of King Edward, and grandson of Alfred. According to William of Malmesbury, his mother, Ecgwyn, was of humble origin, and it has been thought that he was illegitimate. On the death of Edward, the Mercians and West-Saxons chose Atheastan as their king, and he was crowned at Kingston-on-Thames. There appears to have been some opposition to his accession, and it is probable that a conspiracy was formed against him by some of the leading robles and princes of the royal house. The plot, however, was suppressed, and Athelstan speedily attained to a position of greater power and dignity than that of any of the preceding West-baxon sovereigns. One of his sisters married Sihtrie, the Danish King of Northnmbria, and on his death Athelstan invaded the territories of his successor, Guth-frith, and compelled him to hold his kingdom as a tributary state. Subsequently he made several expeditions against the Welsh of Wales and Cornwall, and reduced their rulers also to the position of subject princes. Thus under him the state of Wessex became one of the great powers of Western Europe, and was held in high estimation by foreign governments. Of Athelstan's sisters, one. governments. Of Athelstan's sisters, one, Elgiva (Ælgifu), married Otto the Great, Duke of the Saxons (afterwards Emperor), and another Ethilda (Eadhiid), Hugh, Duke of the French, and father of Hugh Capet. Athelstan took a considerable share in the politics of northern France, and it was chiefly by his efforts that Louis d'Outremer, the son of Charles the Simple, was restored to his throne. In 937 a formidable league was formed against the power of Wessex, between the Danes, Scots, and Britons. Constantine, the King of Scotia, Anlaf (Olaf), the son of Guthfrith of Northumbria, and Anlaf (Olaf) Cuaran, the Danish King of Dublin, together with Owen of Cumberland and other British chieftains, united their forces. A great battle was fought at Brunanburh, in Northnmberland, in which the invaders were completely defeated, with terrible loss. [BRUNANBURH.] Athelstan's subsequent years were peaceful and uneventful. Athelstan is greatly praised by the chroniclers, and he appears to have been a wise and vigorous ruler. Such of his laws as remain show that his wars and foreign policy were far from absorbing the whole of his attention. His ordinances are more particularly directed to the enforcement of the system of mutual assurance and association, which hel. so great a place in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. One of the mest important of his acts was that in which it is law that every landless man shall have a lord; and the "Judicia Civitatis Lundonia," attributed to Athelstan, are highly valuable in connection with the history of gilds and civic associations. The chief imputation on Athelstan's character is chief imputation on Athelstan's character is the alleged murder, by drowning, of his hulfbrother, Edwin, on the pretoxt that he was engaged in a conspiracy against the king; but the story is donbtful. It is told in the Chronicle, but is not accepted by William of Atherton Moor, or Adwalton, The Battle of Juno 30, 1643), was a skirmish fought between the Royalista, under the Earl of Newcastle, and the Parliamentarians, under Fairfax. The latter were completely routed, and the capture of Bradford (from which Atherton Moor is some four miles distant) by the Royalists was the immediate result.

Athlone, GODART DE GINKELL, EARL OF (b. 1640, d. 1720), was one of the Dutch officers who accompanied William of Orange to England. In 1689 he reduced some Scotch regiments who had mutinied at Harwich when under orders to be in ...uiness to cross to the Continent. He accompanied William to Ireland, and commanded a body of horse at the battle of the Boyne. When William left Ireland, Ginkoll was appointed com-mander-in-chiof. He reduced Ballymore without difficulty and proceeded to lay siege to Athlono, which he carried by assault, and subsequently won the victory of Aghrim over St. Ruth. This victory completed the conquest of Ireland (July 12). Ginkell then besieged Limerick, which he captured (Oct. 2), and granted fairly favourable terms to the dofenders. A violent dispute arose between Ginkell and Sarsfield, the Jacobito leader, as to the destination of the Irish troops; till at length it was decided that they might make their choice between England and France. For these services Ginkell was created Earl of Athlone. The small estate that was given him in Ireland for his services was one of the objects of the Commons' attack in 1700. [RESUMPTION BILL.] After the declaration of war with France he competed unsuccessfully against the Duke of Marlborough for the position of commander of the Dutch forces. Before the arrival of the great duke in Flanders, his clever occupation of Nimeguen prevented its seizure by Mar. hal Boufflers. Ginkell had little knowledge or understanding of English feelings and institutions; but his abilities as a general were certainly above the average.

Athlone, The Capture of a tree 19—30, 1691), was Ginkell's first important success over the Irish followers of James II. under the French general, St. Rath. After the fall of Ballymore the whele army moved westward to Athlone. "It was, perk.ps," says Macaulay, "in a military point of view, the most important place in the island." The town was surrounded by ramparts of earth, and lay partly in Leinster and partly in Connaught, the English quarter being in the former and the Celtic quarter in the latter. The Shannen, which is the boundary of the two provinces, rushed through Athlone in a dee and rapid stream, and turned two larg mills which rose on the arches of a ston bridge. Above the bridge, on the Cornaught side, a castle towored to the height of seventy feet. Fifty or sixty yards below the bridge was a narrow ford. On the 20th, Ginkeil assaulted the English quarte and mastered it with trifling loss. On the 22nd he opened fire on the castle. struggle now began for the possession of the bridge, resolutely defended by the Iris under Maxwoll. St. Ruth, thinking the position perfectly secure, had not yet comup, but lay about two miles off, sending has bordinate, D'Usson, to conduct the defence On June 30th, Ginkell resolved to try the ford. With Mackay, Talmash, Prince Georg of Darmstadt, and the Duke of Wur, emberg at their head, the soldiers dashed into the water The Irish, greatly to the disgust of the French commander, offered but feeble resistance, and the town was taken.

Attacotti. The, were an ancient Celtic trile who inhabited a portion of Arayleshire and the greater part of Dumbartonshire.

Attainder. "Attainder imports that extinction of civil rights and capacities which took place whenever a person who had committed treason or felony received judgment of death or outlawry," whether such judgment were pronounced by a royal justice after trial and conviction, or were decreed by a legislative Act of l'arliament, called a Bill of Attainder. In ancient law this invoived (1) Corruption of Blood, and (2) Forfeiture, complete or partial.

1) The blood of the attainted criminal was held to be corrupted and stained, and the virtue by which he could inherit, and transmit and even hold, property destroyed. Attainders operated, in fact, oxactly like a sudden discovery of illegitimacy in the possessor of property; the stream of inheritance was at once cut off, and could be re-established only by a special grant of the Legislature. From this it followed that the lands of the criminal reverted back or escheated to the lord of tho fee, in subordination, however, to forfeiture to the crown: and that any title of his de-scendants which had to be traced through him to a remoter ancestor was obstructed and barred. This was felt to be such a hardship that, in the creation of new felonies since the reign of Henry VIII., Parliament has always provided that they shall not in-velve "corruption of blood." The statute 54 Geo. III., c. 11', still further limits its operation to treach and murder. The Inheritance Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 106, gave further relief by enacting that the attainder of an intermediate ancestor should not obstruct the tracing of the descent through him if his death took place before the property

(2) Forfeiture for treason transferred to the crown the entire property of the traitor. Unlike escheat, it was no feudal innovation, but dates back to Saxon times, and, indeed, has been the rule in the early legislation of most nations. So foreign to early society is any compunction against punishing the son for the father's crime that some ancient codes, not content with reducing a traitor's children to beggary, involve them in the same capital sentence; and the Golden Bull declares that the sons of a subject who kills an elector have their lives spared only by the imperial bounty. The two kinds of property recognised by English law, lands and chattels, were both forfeited absolutely to the crown for treason, but the forfeiture of the former followed on judgment, and its operation went back to the moment at which the treason was committed, making void ail silenations which had been effected in the interval; the forfeiture of the latter followed on conviction, and, from obvious motives of convenience, had no such retrospective force. The wife's dower was untouched by the husband's attainder till expressly included in the forfoiture by the merciican statute 5 and € .d. VI., c. 11. In the case of counterfeiting the coin, the statutes which made the offence treason limited the forfeiture to the life of the offender, and expressiy guarded the wife's dower (5 Elis., c. 11; 8 and 9 Will. III., c. 26; 15 (teo. II., c. 28). The celebrated statute of Queen Anne (7 Anne, c. 21) extended the same principle to all treasons by enacting that after the decease of the Pretender 'no attainder for treason should extend to the disinheriting of any heirs, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of "" person" other than the offender hime. this humane provision was first doing c. 39, and finality 17 Geo. II., jor felony was only III., c. 93. For partial, and seems ave arisen from an old right of the crown . mmit unlimited waste on the lands of a felon. So detrimental did this prove to the interests of the lord of the fief, and of the country at large, that in the reign of Henry I. it was commuted for the right to the profits for a year and a day, a rule confirmed by Magna Charta. The statute 17 Ed. II. confused the two, enacting that the king should have his year and a day and waste, and this remained the law till the Act 54 Geo. III., c. 145, which limited forfeiture to cases of treason and murder. But attainder, along with its effects of corruption of blood and forfeiture, was finally swept away by the Felony Act, 33 and 34 Vict., c. 23.

Attainder, Bill or, was a legislative Act of the two Houses, introduced and passed exactly like any other Bill, and requiring the royal assent, which declared a person or persons attainted. Originally aimed against offenders who fied from instice, and analogous to the Bill of Pains and Penalties, it was soon perverted to secure a more certain and speedy destruction of political opponents than could be hoped from the impartiality or the routine of the law courts. No restriction was possible in such a mode of procedure. Evidence was usually heard, but not invariably; and even the presence of the accused was decided by the lawyers of Thomas Cromwell con-suited on the state of the con-the ground that here of the accuracy on the ground that here of the accuracy of authority superior to during The first accorded instance of its amployment is in the violent banishment of the Despensers in 1 21 by the Parliament of the Despensers in 1 21 by the held by Trussel, the justice who delivered judgment on the younger Hugh, to have involved attainder. With the deposition of Edward II. the appearance of the more regular niethod of impeachment attests a less savage spirit in political parties, till the outbreak of the Rose wars in 1459. In that year hostilities broke out on an attempt of the queen to have the Earl of Salisbury, the head of the Yorkist Nevilles, arrested. He completely defeated the force seut against him, and both sides rushed to arms. But the Laneastrians were better prepared; the Yorkist leaders had to fly the kingdom, and a Parliament met at Coventry which attainted them in a body. Two years later, after the decisive victory of Towton, the Yorkists retaliated by a similar proscription of all the prominent Lancastrians, Parliament, by the restriction of the franehise to 40s. freeholders (1430), and by tho terrorism exercised through the system of Livery and Maintenance, having become a mere tool in the hands of the dominant Yet a petition, so late as 1432, faction. praying that trials touching freehold or inheritance should not be held in Parliament or equieil, shows that the Commons had still independence enough to display their sense of the danger. The new monarchy, which rose on the ruins of self-destroyed nobility, was strong enough to content itself as a rule with the ordinary methods of indictment and impeachment. But in 1539 the kinsmen of Reginald Polo, including his aged niother, the Countess of Salisbury, daughter of Edward IV., were cut off by Bill of Attainder, and the same fate overtook, in the following year, the disgraced minister Cromwoll, condemned by a singular retribution without being heard in his own defence. Revenge in the one case, the preservation of the royal popularity in the other, demanded the employment of a procedure which could dispense with legal proof of guilt. The attainder of Strafford, however, in 1641 marks the trimmph, not of a political faction, but of a constitutional theory. By the letter of the Statute of Treasons (1352), which condemned attempts on the king's life and honour only, the earl was innocent; but the Parliament maintained that the spirit of the statute saw in the king the majesty of the state, and so, by implication, condemned all attempts to overthrow the existing constitution. last instance in English history is that of Sir John Fenwick attainted and executed in 1697 . for participation in the Assassination Plot.

Attainder, THE GREAT ACT OF (IRELAND), was introduced into the Irish Parliament on Jan. 25, 1689, and the debate on it lasted some time. James II. gave his consent to it with great reluctance. It naturally had a very bad effect on the English Jacobites. Between 2,000 and 3,000 names, including half the Irish peerage, and even many prominent Jacobites, were included in the Bill. All those who were in rebellion against the king (James II.) were to sur-render and take their trial before August 10, otherwise they were to be deemed guilty of high treason. All those who had left Ireland before Nov. 5, 1688, were to appear for the same purpose before Sept. 1, 1689. Those who had loft Ireland before Nov. 5, 1688, and were then in England, Scotland. or the Isle of Man, were allowed till Oct. 1. In ease of a valid excuse for not presenting themselves, the estates were to be placed temporarily in the hands of the king, but to be restored on the accused person's return. The king's pardon granted before Nov. 1 was to be valid, otherwise to be of no avail. Macaulay asserts that care was taken to keep the list of attainted persons secret, but the evidence adduced seems inconclusive. same author calls it an "Act without parallel in the history of any civilised country." In excuse for the Irish wo must look to the history of Ireland since 1641, and to the conduct of the English Parliament at the same time.

Atterbury, Francis (b. 1662, d. 1732), Bishop of Rochester, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and distinguished himself with his pen as a defender of the reformed religion against the attacks of James II. After the Revolution he took the oath of allegiance to the new government He took orders, and, after being preacher at the Rolls Chapel, became one of the royal ehaplains (1702), but resided at Oxford. There he helped Boyle in his edition of the spurious Letters of Phalaris, and revised his Answer to Bentley. He now wrote several pamphlets in support of the powers of the Lower House of Convocation. In 1704, he beeame Doctor of Divinity and Dean of Carlisle. In 1710, however, he seized the opportunity of the Sacheverell prosecution, and framed the speech which that divine pronounced at the bar of the House of Lords. [SACHEV-ERELL.] He became Dean of Christ Church, and subsequently (1713) Bishop of Rochester, "because he was so bad a dean." He espoused the Jacobite cause, and on the death of Anne implored the ministry to proclaim James III. Disliked by George I. because of his refusal to sign the bishops' declaration of fidelity, he began, in 1717, to correspond directly with the Pretender. On the failure of Atterbury's plot to restore the Stuarts (sec below) he was imprisoned, and a Bill of Pains and Penalties being introduced, he was forced to leave England, professing his innocence. For a time he resided at Paris, and was chief adviser of the Pretender. He became "the phantom minister of a phantom court," and engaged in the schemes for a Highland rebellion (1723). Atterbury was the type of the High Church clergy, most of whom were Jacobite at heart, and he "would have made an admirable bishop," says Lord Stanhope, "had he been a less good partisan." He was a clever, versatile, but somewhat fussy politician, always full of daring schemes and speculative adventures.

Atterbury's Plot (1721), a Jacobite conspiracy, was occasioned by the confusion in England owing to the failure of the South-Sea Scheme and the revival of Jacobite hopes on the birth of the Young Pretender. It was concected by a council of five-Atter-bury, Bishor of Rochester, the Earls of Arran and Orrery, Lords North and Gowerwho constantly communicated with James the Old Pretender. They quarrelled a good deal amongst themselves, and offered their leadership to Lord Oxford, but he declined it. They intended to procure a force of 5,000 men from abroad, and, failing that, as much arms, money, and men as they could. They then proposed to seize the Bank, Exchequer, and other places where money was lodged, and to proclaim the Pretender during the absence of the king from England, when James was to embark for this country. Unfortunately for the success of their scheme, they applied for 5,000 men to the Regent of France, who promptly betrayed their design to the English envoy, Sir Luke Schaub. They were allowed to continue for some time longer, their communications being opened by the government; ultimately, the leaders were arrested and the conspiracy was frustrated.

Attorney-General, THE, is the chief law officer of England, who is appointed to represent the crown in all matters affecting The meaning of the term is its interests. thus explained in the early text-book, Les Termes de la Ley: "An attorney is one appointed by another man to do something in his stead, and is either general or special. Attorney-General is he that is appointed to all our affairs or suits, as the attorneygeneral of the king, attorney-general of the duke." In modern times the Prince of Wales is the only person besides the crown who appoints an "Attorney-General," who, however, is usually spoken of as "the Attorney-General for the Duchy of Lancaster or Tho ('ornwall" (as the case may be). Attorney-General must be a party to all actions affecting the erown; and, as representative of the crown, he prosecutes for crimes, and also brings actions for revenue causes. Until comparatively recently, the income of the office was derived for the most part from putent fees. Now, however, it is fixed at £7,000 per annum, exclusive of fees for legal advice and services. The first record of the designation "Attornatus Regis" occurs in the 6th year of Edward I. The second named is William de Giselham (a.b. 1278), who two years afterwards is called "king's serjeant." In A.D. 1315—16, three Attornati Regis are mentioned in the same year as king's serjeants. It was probably during the reign of Mary that the person who had been originally chosen to represent the king generally became a royal officer with that par-ticular function. In 1614, a question was raised as to whother the Attorney-General (Sir Francis Bacon) could legally sit in the House of Commons, "because hy his office he is an assistant of the House of Lords." Bacon was allowed to retain his seat, but in 1620, 1625, and 1640, on the bestowal of tho office on members of the House, they vacated their seats. On the appointment of North in 1673, ho retained his seat, and his successors have continued to sit without hindrance. [SOLICITOR-GENERAL.]

Attwood, Thomas (b. 1784, d. 1856), was a banker, of Birmingham, and Gracechurch Street, London, and first attracted public attention by his vigorous opposition to the Orders in Council of 1812. He condemned the return to cash payments after the war, and wrote some pamphlets advocating paper money in 1815 and 1816. He was a vigorous advocate of parliamentary reform, and the chief founder in 1829 of the Birmingham Political Union. He was one of the first members for Birmingham after the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

Auchmuty, Sir Samuel (b. 1762, d. 1822) entered the army at the age of fourteen, and was despatched on active service to America under Sir W. Howe. He was present at most of the principal engagements in the earlier years of the war. In 1778 he returned to England, but almost immediately left for India, where he remained for nineteen years. He served in the campaigns on the Malabar coast, and in Mysore and against the Rohillas, and he also took part in the siege of Seringa-patam under Lord Cornwallis. Returning in 1797, he was gazetted to a brevet-colonelcy, and in 1801 joined Baird's Indian force in Egypt, and became adjutant-general. After the surrender of Alexandria in 1802 he returned to England, and four years later was sent to command a division of the troops in the Rio de la Plats, which is found in a daugerous position. By his skill and energy he restored confidence to the army, and on the 3rd February, 1807, carried Monto Video by storm. Auchmuty, on his return, was appointed to the command in chief at Madras, and in 1811 gave valuable assistance in the reduction of Java. Two years later he returned to England, and was appointed to continuand the forces in Ireland, which post he held till his death at Dublin in August, 1822.

Auchy (Eocha, Achaicus), King of Dalriada, was the son of Aodhin, whom he succeeded, 796. He was on friendly terms with Charlemagne, to whom he rendered great assistance in the establishing of universities in France. He is said to have married Erfusia, a Pictish princess, and thus to have bequeathed to his grandson Kenneth a claim to the Pictish crown.

Auckland, William Eden, 1sr Lord (b. 1743, d. 1814), the third son of a Durham baronet, Sir Robert Eden, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, and was called to the bar in 1769. In 1771 he published "Principles of Penal Law," which brought him into notice, and he was appointed auditor and one of the directors of Greenwich Hospital, and in the following year an Under-Secretary of State. In 1774 the Duke of Marlborough gave him the family seat of Woodstock. Two years later he was appointed to the Board of Trade, and, again, after two years, one of the commissioners for making terms with the American colonics. mission was unsuccessful, but it made him acquainted with Lord Carlisle, who, in 1780, appointed him his secretary in Ireland, where Eden remained until the Rockingham ministry came into power in 1782. He conducted an active opposition to that government, and on their fall was made a privy-councillor and Vice-Treasurer of Ireland—an office, however, which he soon resigned. In 1785 he went over to Versailles with plenary powers to negotiate a treaty of commerco with France, and was most successful. In 1788 he was appointed ambassador to Spain. On his return a year later, he was raised to an Irish peerage, and was almost immediately afterwards sent out to Holland as ambassador. He held this position until, in May 1793, he was raised to the British peerage. In 1798 ho was appointed by Pitt to be joint Postmaster-General, and only gave up the place when Pitt went out of office in 1801. He was a warm supporter of most of Pitt's measures, and especially of the union with Ireland, the scheme for which he had himself helped to prepare. Lord Auckland was the author of measures for bettering the condition of criminals, for erecting penitentiaries, and for substituting hard labour for transportation.

Auckland, George Eden, 1st Earl of b. 1784, d. 1849), the second son of the first Lord Auckland, entered Parliament as member for Woodstock, and in 1814 he succeeded to the peerage. In 1830 he was appointed President of the Board of Trade, and in 1834 was for a fow months First Lord of the Admiralty. On the return of his friends to office, Lord Auckland was appointed Governor-General India, and quitted England (1835) for the administration of affairs in that country. At dinner given to him by the Court of Directors before his departure, he assured them that "he looked with exultation to the new prospects before him as affording him an opportunity of doing good to his fellow-man, of promoting education and knowledge, and of extending the blessings of good govern-ment and happiness to millions in India." But before he had been six months in Calcutta, he perceived a storm gathering in the North-West. The complications which arose brought on a great political crisis with which he was not competent to deal. He had little relian to on his own judgment, and acted for the most part under the influence of those who surrounded him. His administration is almost exclusively comprised in the fatal expodition to Afghanistan. [Afohan Wars.] In February, 1842, the arrival of Lord Ellen-borough at Calcutta brought Lord Auckland's admiri ration to a close. It comprised a single series of events-the conquest, the occupation, and the loss of Afghanistan. For administrative or material progress he had no leisure. Lord Auckland on his return was created an carl. On the accession of the Russell Cabinet, 1846, he was once more placed at the head of the Admiralty Board. Annual Register; Kaye, Afghanistan.

Audley, James Touchet, 12th Lord (d. 1459), served under Henry V. in the French wars. In the reign of Henry VI. he took part with the Lancastrians, and was in command of the army which intercepted Salisbury at Blore Heath, in which battle Audley was defeated and slain.

Audley, James Touchet, 14th Lord (d. 1497), a man of broken fortune, was famous in the reign of Henry VII. for his ill-advised leadership of the Cornish rebels, and for his adherence, generally, to the cause of Perkin Warbeck. In the conflict that took place at Blackheath between the rebels and the king's forces under the command of Lord Daubeny and the Earl of Oxford, Lord Audley was taken prisoner, and was soon afterwards beheaded.

Audley, Thomas Audley, Lord (b. 1488, d. 1544), was a lawyer, appointed in 1529, at the king's request, Speaker of the Honse of Commons. In 1530 he became Attorney for the Duchy of Lancaster, and, in November, 1531, he was made King's Serjeant.

Augmentations, COURT OF. This court was instituted on the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII.'s reign, and was established to secure to the crown the rich revenues belonging to suppressed religious houses. Its business was strictly limited to the consideration of questions connected with the confiscated Church property, and as this property was granted away with lavish liberality, the court speedily became a nullity and ceased to exist.

Augustine, St. (d. 604), first Archbishop of Canterbury, was prior of the monastery of St. Martin, in Rome, and was selected by Gregory the Great as the head of the band of monks who were to preach Christianity in England. After a difficult journey they landed in the Isle of Thanet, in 596, and obtained the protection of Ethelbert of Kent. Ethelbert's marriage with Bertha had familiarised him with the idea of Christianity, and he immediately gave permission to the missionaries to you hand convert his people. In the next year Ethelbert himself became a Christian, and in 600 Canterbury was made an archiepiscopal see, with Augustine as its archbishop, with authority to consecrate twelvo bishops under his primacy. Kent seems to have become cor crted rapidly, and on Christmas Day, 597, no less than 10,000 persons are said to bave been usptised. Pefore his death Augustine was able to see almost the whole of Kent and Essex Christian. Augustine's ministry was largely occupied by a contest with the British bishops. Their differences were nominally on questions of ritual, but the real question at issue was whether or not the Celtic bishops should acknowledge the supremacy of the l'ope and the Italian Archbishop of Canterbury. Conferences with the Welsh bishops were held at Augustine's Oak (probably Aust, on the Sovern), in 603, but to no propose, and the breach between the two Churches was only widened. Augustine was a man of somewhat narrow, pedantic, and unconciliatory character—tendencies which the monastic training of his early and middle life probably did much to confirm; but his firmness, his integrity of life, and his singleness of purpose, are undoubted. The work he did might have been greater, if he had possessed a wider culture, a greater insight, and a more powerful influence over men's minds and hearts. Still, as far as it went, it was in the highest degree important. "He had," says Canon Bright, "rooted in Canterbury a definite centre for any future amount of Church extension."

Auldearn, The Battle or (May 9, 1645), was fought between the Covenanters and the Royalists under Montrose, during the latter's irregular campaign in the north-eastern Highlands. In May, 1645, he found himself near Auldearn in Nairn, in presence of the Covenanters, led by John Urry or Hurry. A mistake made by one of the latter's officers led Montrose to make an attack. The Highlanders' rush carried all before it, and Urry's force was broken and scattered.

Aulus Plautius was the commander of the Roman forces which Claudius despatched against Britain in the year 43. Among the distinguished officers who served under him were two future emperors, Vespasian and his son Titus. With their aid he defeated Caractaens, and reduced the north-eastern part of the island. In the year 50 he was recalled. Rumour makes him the founder of London.

Aumale, WILLIAM OF (d. 1179), was the son of Stephen, Count of Champagne, and therefore a kinsman of King Stephen. For his valour in the battle of the Standard, the carldom of York was given to him. He held out in Scarborough Castle against Henry II., but in 1155 was compelled to surrender.

Auray, The Battle of (1364), was fought between the English, who were capouring the claims of Montfort to the dukedom of Brittany, and the French, who supported his rival, Charles of Blois. The English, who were commanded by Sir John Chandos, were completely victorious. Du Guesclin, the French commander, was taken prisoner, and Charles of Blois was slain.

Austin, John (b. 1790, d. 1859), was the first systematic English writer upon the formal science of positive law. At an early age he entered the army, in which, however, he remained only five years. In 1818 he was

In 1826 he was appointed Professor of Jurisprudence in the newly founded University of London (afterwards University College), where his lectures were attended by numerons men of future eminence, including Lord Romilly, Grote, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, and J. S. Mill. The text of many of the lectures has been recovered from notes taken by the last named. But in spite of this appreciation by the few, the majority of students could not afford to pay attention to a study which was not professionally lucrative, and in 1832 Austin resigned his chair. In 1833 Lord Brougham appointed him a member of the Criminal Law Commission. In 1834 the Inner Temple engaged him to deliver another course of lectures upon the principles and history of law. But, as before, it was soon apparent that there was no demand for a scientific legal education. In 1837 Mr. Austin was sent to Malta as a royal commissioner to inquiro into native grievances, an which capacity he was highly successful After a prolonged sojourn on the Continent, he returned to Weybridge, where he died in 1859. As a jurist, Austin owes his rank to the fact that he was the first to define the Australasia. At what date Australia was first discovered, and whether by the Portugueso or Dutch, are questions which may possibly never be answered. Certain it is that, whatever may be the probability of a concealment, from supposed commercial interests, of an earlier knowledge of a southern continent, the discovery was not disclosed earlier than 1511, nor later than 1542. Between those years the Portuguese published the existence of a southern land. corresponding to Australia, which they termed Great Java; and subsequent Sparish explorers, among whom was Torres, the discoverer of Torres' Straits (1606), confirmed the correctness of the Portuguese maps. Upon the decline of Spanish maritime supremacy, the Dutch became the chief explorers of the southern seas, using their colony of Java as a starting-point. Through their efforts the Gulf of Carpentaria was surveyed and named, with many other places on the northern coasts, which retain their Dutch names up to the present day. Indeed, such was the extent of Dutch influence that the whole continent was called "New Holland"-a name which is even yet not quite supplented by Matthew Flinders's more happy appellation of "Australia." The southern coast remained undiscovered until 1627, when a Dutch vessel, bound for Japan, being driven from her course. sailed along the shore of the Great Bight for npwards of one thousand miles. Tasman (1642) was the first systematic explorer of these shores; and to him is due the discovery of New Zealand, and of Tasmania, the latter of which was called by him Van Diemen's Land, after his betrothed. The first Englishman who touched Australian shores was Dampier, the buccancer (1688), whose ac-count was so favourable that the English government placed him in command of a national expedition. After this expedition, by means of which the north-west coasts wero first surveyed, there are few records of discoveries until the first voyage of Captain Cook (1770). This voyage marks the beginning of Anglo-Australian history. For, although no permanent settlement was made until 1788, Cook saw enough of the country to convince him that settlement was desirable: and moreover, by sailing along the eastern coast, he completed the outline of the continent. In his second (1773) and third voyages (1777), he visited New Zealand and Tasmania. The news of his discoveries, and of the further discoveries of Barr and Flinders, induced the English government to take possession of the country; and on Jan. 20, 1788, the first English fleet, under the command of Captain Arthur Phillip, anchored in Botany Bay, a locality which was soon abandoned for the more sheltered Cove of Sydney. Inland exploration was first cheeked by the chain of mountains which runs, under various names, along the greater part of the castern coast at a distance from the sea of from fifty to a hundred miles. These were crossed in 1813, under the necessity for finding new pasture during a long drought. The great rivers were next explored, and attention was directed to the possibility of After various traversing the continent. attempts, this feat was successfully accomplished by Stuart in 1860, fourneying from south to north, and in the following year by the ill-fated expedition of Burke and Wills. Included under the designation of Australia, or Australasia, are 'be colonies (now donominated original States) of (1) New South Wales, (2) Victoria, (3) South Australia, (4) Western Australia, (5) Queensland, (6) Tasmania, (7) the Dominion of New Zeiland. These (except New Zealand) combined to form, from Jan. 1, 1901, a Federal Commonwealth, under the title of the "Commonwealth of Australia." Legislative power is vested in a Federal Government, consisting of the King, represented by a Governor-General, a Senate, and a House of Representatives.

(1) New South Wales (cap. Sydney) was at one time used as a penal settlement by Britain. Governor l'hillip, however, perceived the necessity for encouraging another kind of immigration, and through his efforts a settlement of freemen was established on the llawkesbury River (1802). In 18'3 Governor Bligh was deposed by a successful mutiny of the New South Wales Corps; but the vigorous measures of his successor, Governor Macquaric, restored order, and rapidly advanced prosperity. After the introduction of morino sheep by Mr. John Macarthur, and the distovery of the pasture-lands beyond the Blue Mountains, the progress of the colony was very rapid; and the arrival of a Chief Jus-tice in 1824, with all the apparatus of a Court of Record, marks a more settled order and vigorous society. Free immigration, which his immediate predecessors had discouraged, was revived under Gover-nor Brisbane (1821). In 1840 an Order in Council suspended transportation to New South Wales, although an attempt was made to revive the practice by Earl Grey in 1846. This, however, was met by the colonists with the threat of secession; and, after a violent dispute, the English government gave way (1852), and agreed to send no convicts to any Australian colony which should object to receive them. Western Australia was for a long time the only colony which gave consent, but since 1864 transportation has been discontinued. In 1842 municipalities were first established, and in 1843 the Legislative Council was made partially elective; but government by responsible ministers was not introduced until 1856. The most important political questions in New South Wales, as in all the Australian colonics, have been the questions of labour and land. In the earliest days of the colony, the demand for labour was met by hiring out convicts to the free settlors; but from 1821 onwards, the system of free immigration was largely ex-Not only was every immigrant entitled to a free passage and a grant of land, but the shipper also received a bounty for every person whom he landed in the colony. In consequence of this practice, the country was crowded with paupers and incapables, who had often disposed of their land-grants to speculators before they had landed. After the establishment of responsible government, the bounty system was abolished until 1905, when the policy of assisted immigration was revived. The questions connected with the settlement of the land still cause grave political difficulties in New South Wales, as in other Australian colonies. The community is divided into two classes—the "squatters" (or lessess of large pasture-runs) and the small farmers. The former class desires that every facility should be given to the acquisition of large landed estates, while the other side maintains that the alienation of the national land is a policy of suicide. The disposition of the land was vested originally in the Governor; but in 1831 it was ordered that every alienation of Crown land should be by sale at a public auction, and that a minimum price should be fixed of five shillings an acre. In 1846 the influence of the squatters culminated, and a measure was passed, known as the Squatters Act, to secure fixity of tenure to Government lessees, with an option of purchase. Since the introduction of representative government, the tendency of legislation has been in the opposite direction. At present any bona fide settler can "select" not more than 640 acres out of any unoccupied land or leasehold pasture "run," and can become the absolute owner of his selection by residence and small yearly payments. Great attention is paid in New South Wales and throughout Australia to education. Elementary schools and universities are supported by the state, and the colony is well furnished with technical and secondary schools. The legislative power in New South Wales is vested in the Governor, as representing the crown, and a Parliament of two Houses, under Stat. 18 and 19 Vict., c. 54. The Upper House, or Legislative Council, consists of not less than twenty-one members, who are nominated by the crown; while the Legislativo Assembly or Lower House consists of 90 elected members. There is no property qualification for voters, and the votes are taken by ballot. The colony sends 27 memhers to the House of Representatives. The population of New South Wales in 1908 was 1,582,619. The colony originally embraced all the territory from Cape York to the South Cape; but its area has been greatly reduced by the creation of the separate colonies of South Australia (1836), Victoria (1851), Queensland (1859).

(2) VICTORIA (pop. 1,258,140, cap. Melbourne) is the smallest of the Australian colonies. It rose into importance after the discovery of gold in 1848, and in 1854 received a constitution (18 and 19 Vict., c. 55). This measure was drawn up on similar lines to the Act conferring a constitution upon New South Wales, the main difference being that the Upper House was elected by voters with a high property qualification. In this respect the constitution was altered in 1881. By an Act of 1906 the Legislative Conneil consists of 34 members elected for six years by citizens possessing or occupying property worth £10 per annum, or leasehold of £15. The Legislative Assembly, composed of 65 members, is elected triennially by uni-Victoria senda versal manbood suffrage. 23 members to the House of Representatives. All the land of the colony has been disposed of, greatly to the benefit of those who are deseended from the earliest settlers. The accumunation of land in the hands of single proprietors has been such that an attempt has been made to break up the large estates by the imposition of a progressive land-tax. The commercial policy of Victoria has been strongly Protectionist.

(3) SOUTH AUSTRALIA (founded 1836, pop. 392,431, cap. Adclaide), originally part of New South Wales, obtained responsible government in 1856. The Parliament consists of two elected Houses. The Legislative Council is composed of eighteen members, half of whom retire every three years. A property qualification is required in the electors. The House of Assembly consists of forty-two members, elected for three years by universal adult suffrage. The executive is vested in the Governor and an Executive Council, consisting of the cabinet and specially-appointed ministers. The colony sends seven members to the House of Representatives. The South Australian territory now extends over the whole of Central Australia, and a great part of the north-western coast of the island.

(4) WESTERN AUSTRALIA, first called the Swan River Settlement, was founded in 1829, mainly under government auspices. To induce settlement, enormous grants of land were made to men of influence and capital. who in return were to import labourers. The result was disastrous. Labourers, who are the settlers most needed in a new country, regarded the colony as closed to them, while those who were brought out preferred to work upon their own account. In 1850 the colony received a fillip of prosperity by ac the convicts which the rest o. Austra. cluded. (5) QUEENSLAND (pop. 546,467, cap. Brisbane) as separated from New South Wales in 1859. Its constitution does not essentially differ from that of the mother-colony. The colony serus nine members to the House of Representatives. The climate is tropical, and sugar is a staple product. The demand for labour has been met by the importation of South-Sea Islanders (Kanaks), the traffic in whom has caused grave scandals, which have been the subject of investigation. Queensland has of late years developed an extensive trade in wool. In 1883 this colony took the initiative in pressing upon the imperial government the creation of an English protectorate over the southern part of New Guinea.

(7) New Zealand (pop. 1,021,000, cap. Wellington), a group of islands 600 miles to the eartward of Australia, was established as self-governing colony in 1852. In 1907 the designation of colony was changed to Dominion. The country was divided into six provinces (afterwards increased to nine), each of which was governed by an elective Superintendent and Provincial Council. The provincial system was abolished in 1875, and the legislative power vested in the Governor, appointed by the Crown, and a General Assembly of two Chambers, a Legislative Council and a House of Representatives, both paid. The Council formerly consisted of life members: those appointed since Sept. 17, 1891, sit for a seven years' term. The House now consists of 80 members, four seats being reserved for Maori districts. Women may vote at elections and hold municipal office, but cannot sit in either House. [Maori Wars.]

Australian Colonies Act, The, was passed by Lord John Russell's government in 1850. It created Victoria a distinct province from New South Wales, and conferred on the four colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia the power of choosing their own constitution, "by means of popular assemblies, composed of all the inhabitants who were £10 householders or £100 freeholders."

Austria, Relations with. Before the sixteenth century, Austria was merely an imperial duchy, too remote and insignificant to have important dealings with England. Under the Bamberg line, the captivity of Richard I. in consequence of his quarrel with Leopold V. is the only important exception. Rudolf of Hapsburg, who in 1278 granted Austria to his son Albert, was a good friend of Edward I., but friendship for actual Bavarian and Luxemburg emp.rors mado England necessarily cool to Austrian aspirants to that dignity. With Frederick III. (1439—1493) and Maximilian I. (1493—1519), the empire became practically hereditary in the Austrian house. The traditional friendship between England and the empire [EMPIRE, RELATIONS WITH] now necessarily involved closer relations with Austria. Maximilian I. acquired, with the Burgundian Netherlands, the advantages of the old commercial and political connection between England and Flanders. Charles V. united Spain. England's third mediæval ally, with the imperial crown. But it was rather with the Austrian house than Austria, with Spain rather than the distant "Erblander," that England now becomes closely involved. On Charles's abdication, the Austro-Spanish llouse split up into two lines, but the solidarity between them was such that the intimate relations of alternato friendship and hostility between England and Spain practically actermined her relations with Austria until the death of the last Austrian King of Spain in 1700. [Spain, Relations with.] Up to that date it is only necessary to note any peculiarity of relation between England and Austria. For instance, when the Catholic Reaction ended for a time the Anglo-Spanish alliance, the superior moderation of the imperial branch produced friendly relations between Elizabeth and the liberal and tolerant Maximilian II. (1564 --1578). Again, in the Thirty Years' War, close relations with Ferdinand II. (1619—1637) resulted from James I.'s persistent efforts to obtain the restoration of the Pfalzgraf Frederick, his son-in-law, to his hereditary dominious. For some years he hoped to get this by Spanish mediation. But when he and his son Charles found they were being played with, they turned to that alliance with France which lasted with partial breaks till 1688, and much longer than the political balance demanded. Fear of Louis XIV. led even Charles II. to the TRIPLE ALLIANCE, which saved Austria Franche Comté; and again, in 1677, he began to incline to the imperial side. With William III. the whole influence of England was thrown against France, and in the wars of the League of Augsburg (1688-1697) and of the SPANISH Succession (1702-1713) England fought in close alliance with Austria. The substitution of a Bourbon for a Hapsburg monarch in Spain led to a closer union of interests between England and Austria than before. Yet there was a constant strain in their relations in the early half of the eighteenth century that led to absolute hostility in the second half. In the TREATY OF UTRECHT (1713), the Tories abandoned their Austrian ally. The accession of George I., the head of the house whose long attachment to the empire had been rewarded with a ninth electorate, made relations easier. But the commercial restrictions imposed on Flanders in the interests of the maritime powers, and the BARRIER TREATY, negotiated through English mediation, that handed over that country to Austria, with its fortresses garrisoned by Dutch Protestants, were warmly resented by Charles VI., who had not forgotten the failure of his Spanish hopes. Very unwillingly he made a defensivo alliance in 1713, and when Alberoni's intrigues against the Utrecht settlement produced the Trip e Alliance of 1717, it was only immediate fear of losing Italy that prevailed on him to make it a Quadruple Allianee, by joining with Franco and the maritime powers to uphold the treaty. In 1722 his Ostend India Company was established in direct contravention of the treaty, and in 1725 Ripperda negotiated the first Treaty of Vienna, that re-united Austria with Spain against England, even more than France. Charles secured a further triumph when Prussia deserted England [Treaty of Hanover, 1726] for his alliance, and open war between England and Spain ensued. But in 1727 peace was patched up [Paris, Prace or], and in 1731 the second Treaty of Vienna restored peace with England, and Charles renounced his commercial schemes for a guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. His subsequent misfortunes in the Polish and Turkish wars did not prevent England from loyally supporting Maria Theresa in the War of the Austrian Succession (1741-1748). But English help was given in an overbearing and insolent spirit that destroyed all feelings of gratitude. Robinson, the English ambassador at Vienna, made himself most obnoxious, and England compelled the empress, much against her will, to surrender part of the Milanese to Sardinia (Treaty of Worms, 1743), and Silesia to Frederick II. of Prussia, and the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) confirmed these cessions, and created a patrimony for Don Philip at the expense of Austria. This treaty, coming after thirty years of friction, produced a definite rupture. Count Wenzel Kaunitz became Maria's adviser, and negotiated that alliance between France and Austria that continued with partial breaks till the Revolution. Hence, in the SEVEN YEARS' WAR (1756—1763), Austria did its best to ruin Prussia, England's constant ally. But George III., intent on the restoration of personal government. paid but slight attention to foreign politics.

Eastern powers, and in 1772 shared in the partition of Poland. Joseph II. became completely fascinated by Catherine II.'s schemes of Eastern empire, and his sister's marriage keeping up his friendship with France, he availed himself of England's difficulties with America to repudiate the Barrier Treaty (1781), and an attempt to reopen the Scheldt. At last the younger l'itt's vigour restored to England its true position in Europe by forming an alliance against the Eastern powers, which in 1790 compelled Leopold II. (Joseph was just dead) to accept the Convention of Reichenbach, and withdraw from the Turkish War. The French Revolution completed the rapprochement of England and Austria. A close alliance was cemented by heavy subsidies, and in 1793 England joined the war against France. The alliance continued till 1815, only broken when Napoleon forced a peace on Austria, and was renewed again at the earliest opportunity. The THEATY OF VIENNA was succ safully negotiated (1815); if England did not accede to the HOLY ALLIANCE, it did not purgo itself of association with its authors until the great ministry of Canning. Since 1827 the two countries have pursued very different directions. While Austria, under the guidanco of Metternich, was the representative of reaction and absolutism in Europe, the two powers could hardly be on other terms than those of distant courtesy. In 1848-9, when Italy and Hungary tried to realise their independence, English sympathy was largely enlisted on the side of the wronged nationalitics; but the sympathy took no active shape, and Austria was allowed to subdue the Hungarians by the aid of Russian armies. The close alliance with Russia was, however, severed by the Crimean War, in which Austria took no part. The everthrow of Austria by Prussia in 1866—her consequent exclusion from German affairs, and the liberal institutions which she found herself compelled to set up-seemed to have removed nearly all possible grounds of difference. Since 1867 the political intercourse between English statesmen and those of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, has been almost confined to questions connected with the condition of the Balkan peninsula, [Berlin Treaty.]

Coze's House of Austria, largely drawnfrom deepatches, is the best general authority. Ranke, English History in the Sevententh Century, is excellent on all foreign relations: Arneth's Prins Eugen and Maria Theresa are indispensable for the eighteenth century. [T. F. T.]

Austrian Succession, The War or The (1741—1748), was caused by the death of Charles VI., Emperor of Germany, without male issue. There was thus thrown open the question of the succession to the empire, and to the Austrian dominions. The latter had previously been secured to Maria Theresa by the Pragmatic Sanction. The chief claimant to both was the Elector of Pravaria; the next important candidate was Philip V. of Spain. As both these princes were allies of France, it was necessary for England to oppose their designs. Walpole, therefore, had tried to found a grand alliance between Hanover, Prussia, and the maritime powers with Austria; Frederick, however, would recognise the Pragmatic Sanction only if his claims to Silesia were neknowledged. This was refused by Austria, and immediately the French and Prussian armies crossed to the frontier (1741) Hanover was obliged to declare neutrality for a year. In 1742 England and Holland joined Austria, and an army of 30,000 was sent into the Lew Countries. In the Mediterranean Commodore Matthews, with the fleet, forced the King of Naples to neutrality, and allowed Sardinia to side with Austria. Frederick acquired Silesia by the treaties of Breslau and Berlin, and withdrew from the contest. The chief event of 1743 was the battle of DETTINGEN, which, though nearly resulting in a disastrous defeat for the English, forced the French to retire into Alsace. Negotiations for peace were begun. George II. being willing to recognise Charles of Bavaria as emperor if he would renounce his claims on Austria. They were, however, broken off, and the Treaty of Worms, including England, Holland, Austria, Saxony, and Sardinia (Sept., 1743), was met in October by the League of Frankfort, the important members of which were France and Prussia. Thus both England and France were now the respective heads of two great leagues, and the question at issue was really that of the naval supremacy of one or the other power, rather than the Austrian succession, the ostensible cause of the war. In 1744, after an attempted invasion of England in favour of the Pretender had been thwarted by the elements, a formal declaration of war was made. The general war, in which the English troops were not concerned, need not bo discussed hero. Frederick of Prussia was not well supported by the French; and in 1745, on the death of Charles of Bavaria, ncis, the son of Maria Theress, was ted emperor. It was then possible to made some general negotiation. The tunity passed. Large subsidies were sted to German troops, and 18,000 Hanoverians were taken into English pay. In Dec., 1745, Frederick made a separate peace with Austria, know as that of Dresden.

Meanwhile the allies, under the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Waldeck, were disastrously beaten by the French at FONTENOY (May, 1745), and had to retire to Brussels and Antwerp. They had been much weakened by the necessity of with-drawing troops to defend England against the invasion of the Young Pretender. [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD.] In 1746 Marshal Saxe became master of the Austrian Nether-lands. Deserted, however, by the Prussians and Bavarians, the French began to make offers for peace. In 1747 the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Orange were defeated with great loss at LAWFELDT. Bergenop-Zoom fell, and Maestricht was besieged. These disasters were counterbalanced by the Austrian successes in Italy, and by the capture of Cape Breton Island in America. At length the struggle was brought to a close by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct., 1748). The results of the war, as a whole, were not unfavourable to Fingland. She had done much te secure her maritime supremacy, while her rival, France, had displayed a growing weakness and incapacity.

Authorities on English History. In the present article the leading authorities are briefly considered under the following nine periods:—(1) Before the English conquest; (2) from the English to the Norman conquest; (3) from the Norman conquest to the close of the 12th century; (4) the 13th century; (5) the 14th and 15th centuries; (6) the 16th century; (7) the 17th century; (8) the 18th century till 1789; (9) from 1789 to the present time.

1. Feriod before the English Conquest.—Contemporary Writers: Cæsar, de Bello Gallico (bks. iv. and v.); the Agricola of Tacitus and pussages in the Germania of the same writer are the principal sources. To these must be added numerous scattered passages in various classical writers, enumerated in Sir T. Hardy's Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland (vol. i.), and printed in the Monumenta Historica Britannica (fol. 1848). The Itinerarium of Antoninus supplies an enumeration of the chief towns and roads in Roman Britain; the Notitia I ignitatum an outline of the organisation of the country.

outline of the organisation of the country.

LATER WRITERS: A few notices of the condition of the native population before the middle of the 6th century, may be gathered from Gildas, de Excidio Britannia. The Ecclesiastical History of Bede, commencing at the same time, but coming down to A.D. 731, is then the chief authority. The Historia Britannia of Nennius preserves some important fragments of earlier writers, and affords illustrations of the early Welsh traditions, but is otherwise of little value. The work hearing the same title, by Geoffrey of Monmouth, although worthless from an historical point of view, is valuable as a source of numerous legends.

Modern Writers: Britannia Romana, of J. Horsley (1732); Dr. Guest, Origines Celtica, 1883; H. C. Coote, The Romans of Britain (1878); J. C. Bruce, The Roman Wall (3rd edition, 1867); C. Elton, Origins of English History (2nd edition, 1890); W. E. Hearn, The Aryan Household (1873); Rhýs, Celtic Britain; W. F. Skene, Celtic Scotland (1880).

2. From the English to the Norman Conquest.—Contemporary Writzes: Bede and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles (R.S.*) new edition, edited by G. Gomme, 1909; Asser, Life of King Alfred (probably in part a grantine contemporary narrative), new edition edited by Stevenson, 1904; the Chronists of Ethelward; the Encomium Emme (Life of Ethelward; the Encomium Emme (Life of Queen Emma), and Life of Edward the Confessor (R. S.), have both a certain though secondary value. Other Lives are those of St. Culmbert, by Bede; St. Columba, by Adamnan; and that of Wilfrid, Bishop of York, by Eddius; and the later onesof Aldhelm, by Fabricius, a foreigner, used by William of Malmesbury in his account of Aldhelm in the Gesta Fontificum; an anonymous Life of Alcuin, the foremost English schelar of his age, whose Letters are also of considerable value; and the Life of St. Dunstan, by Adelard. The Chronicles and Historica Britannica.

LATER WRITERS: Among these are the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus; the Historia Regum and Historia Ecclesiæ Dunstmensis (R. S.) of Simeon of Durham; the Historia Anglorum (R. S.) of Henry of Huntingdon; and the Chronicles of Ralph of Diceto (R. S.) and Peter Langtoft (R. S.). These all, however, yield in value to William of Malmesbury, whose Gesta Regum Anglorum, Historia Novella, and De Gestis Pontificum (R. S.)—a history of English bishops and monasteries from the time of Augustine—are the best sources for the period. The Chronicon of Florence of Worcester is also of considerable importance. The principal biographies are the Lives of Edward the Confessor, by Ethelred of Ricvaulx, and of St. Dunstan, by Osbern and Eadmer.

Modern Writers: J. M. Kemble, Saxons in England, 1849; E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, which to a great extent, but not altogether, supersedes The History of England and Normandy by Sir Francis Palgrave; Lappenberg, History of England under the Anglo-Saxon Kings; Dr. W. R. Gardiner, History of England from 1603 to 1649, 14 vols. and Constitutional Documents of the Puritan Revolution (1628 - 1660). Ranko's History should also be systematically consulted. Avesbury, Robert of (d. 1357), registrar of the archiepiscopal court at Canterbury, wrote a History of the Wonderful Deeds of Edward III., extending from the birth of Edward to the year 1356. It gives us a short detail of public events, with transcripts of original documents and extracts from letters. It was printed by Hearne in 1720.

Avranches, a small town in the extreme west of Normandy, was the seene of Henry II.'s reconciliation with the Pope after the marder of Beeket.

Aylesbury Election Case, THE (1704) for the case of Ashby v. White), produced a violent collision between the House of Commons and the Lords. The vote of a burgess, Matthew Ashby, had been rejected by the returning officer, William White. Ashby brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench. There a majority of the judges, contrary to the opinion of Chief Justice Holt, decided against him on the ground that no harm had been done to him, and that decisions on the right to vote belonged to the Commons alone. Ashby's supporters thoreupon brought the case by writ of error before the House of Lords. Here the judgment given at the Queen's Bench was reversed, and, by this important decision, franchises were placed under the common law. In spite of the wise advice of the Whig lawyers, William Cowper and Sir Joseph Jekyll, the Commons proceeded to pass resolutions to the effect that (1) neither the qualification of any elector nor the right of any person elected was eognisable elsewhere than before the House of Commons: (2) that Ashby, having in contempt of the jurisdiction of the House prosecuted an action at common law against William White, was guilty of breach of privilege. The Lords passed contrary resolutions, and the quarrel became so serious that early in April Queen Anne put an end to the session. Ashby, however, sued out execution for the damages awarded him at the County Assizes against the returning officers who had refused to receive his vote. In addition, four other burgesses were put forward to sue the officers. The Commons promptly committed the plaintiffs and their attorney to Newgate. The prisoners, after two months, moved the Court of King's Banch for a habeas corpus; but these judges, contrary to the opinion of Holt, who was for the discharge of the prisoners, decided that the court had no jurisdiction in the matter. It was determined to bring this by writ of error before the Lords. The Commons foolishly voted an address to the Queen praying her not to grant a writ of error. Her reply, that the matter required careful consideration, was looked on as equivalent to a refusal. The Lords thereupon passed some important resolutions: (1) That neither House of Parliament could arrogate to itself any new privilege; (2) that the Commons had assumed an unwarranted legislative power by attributing the force of law to their declaration; (3) that they had thereby subjected the rights of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons; (4) that every Englishman who is imprisoned by any authority whatever, has an undoubted right to his writ of habeas corpus; (5) that for the Commons to punish any person for assisting a prisoner to procure such a writ is a breach of the statutes provided for the liberty of the subject; (6) that a writ of error was not one of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to

The Queen, therefore, prorogued Purliament (March 14th), thus leaving a great constitutional question wholly un-decided. Hallam thinks that "the House of Commons had an undoubted right of detormining all disputed returns to the writ of election, and consequently of judging upon the right of every vote. But as the House could not pretend that it had given this right, or that it was not, like any other franchise, vested in the possessor by a legal title, no protest or analogy could be set up for denying that it might come, in an indirect manner at least, before a court of justice, and be judged by common principles of law." Aylesford, in Kent, is generally supposed to be the place where, in 455, Horsa fell in a battle against the Britons. Near this is Kit's Coty House, a cromlech said to have been erected to Catigern, one of the British commanders, who was slain in this battle.

Aylmer, John (b. 1521, d. 1594), the tutor of Lady Jane Grey, was one of the most zealous reformers of Edward VI.'s reign. In 1576 he was made Bishop of London by Queen Elizabeth, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Puritans. He published an Answer to Knox's celebrated Blast of the Trumpet against Monstrous Regiment of Women; but having offended the queen by preaching against dress, she requited him by vowing that, "If he held more discourse on such matters, she would fit him for heavon; but he should walk thitier without a staff, and leave his mantle behind him."

Ayscough, or Ayscue, Sin George (d. 1673?), was the son of a Lincolnshire gentleman. He entered the naval service at an early age, and was knighted by Charles I. In 1648, when the fleet revolted to Prince Rupert, Ayseough secured the Lion for the Parliament. He was appointed to the com-mand of the fleet which had to watch the eoasts of Ireland, and in 1651 to reduce the Scilly Islands. In 1652 ho took Barbadoes for the Parliament. He was engaged, in company with Blake, in the desperate naval battles against the Dutch in 1652; but he was so much annoyed at Blake's retreat before Tromp, after the action of Nov. 29 in that year, that he laid down his command. and remained in retirement during the remainder of the Commonwealth. In 1665, on the renewal of war with the Dutch, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and bore a principal share in the great victory obtained over Tromp and Ruyter on June 3. In the great four-days' battle of the following year, Ayscough behaved with distinguished bravery; but his ship ran upon a sand-bank, and he was forced to surrender. The Dutch were so elated at the possession of this formidahle antagonist, that they exhibited him in triumph in several of their towns. He was afterwards confined for some time in the Castle of Leevestein. He was subsequently released, and allowed to return to England; but he took no further part in public affairs

Azores, Expeditions to the, took place (1) in 1572, when Sir John Hawkins, with twenty ships, sailed to lie in wait for the Mexican gold fleet. (2) In July, 1587, when Sir Francis Drake took the Spanish treasure-ship San Felipe, doing so much to damage the Spanish prestige, and to inspirit the disheartened ministers of Elizabeth, that the expedition is said to have been "worth at the moment to Protestant England more than a general engagement fought and von." (3) In 1597, when a fleet was sent out under tho Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Lord Thomas Howard to capture the Spanish vessels returning from the Indies. Raleigh, having arrived first, took the Island of Fayal without waiting for Essex, and a serious quarrel arose between the two admirals. Essex subsequently took Flores and Graciosa, but from his bad management allowed the Spanish treasure-ships to escape, taking three only. On the return of the expedition to England, Essex was severely blamed for its failure.

Babington's Conspiracy (1586) originated with Ballard, a Jesuit, and "a young man of family and fortune" named Anthony Babington, of Dethick. Three elements may be traced in this conspiracy: the devoted adherents of the Papacy; English Catholics whom zeal and harsh treatment had driven to desperation; and lastly, the paid agents of Walsingham. Babington—who, whilst a page at Sheffield, had been fascinated by the charms of the Queen of Scots-was easily persuaded by Ballard, after the latter's tour through England in 1585, to enter into a scheme by which Elizabeth was to be assassinated, and the country then raised for Mary. The conspirators, who numbered several gentlemen of position, chose six of their number to commit the crime - namely, Savage, Salisbury, Abington, Tilney, Barn-well, and Tiehbourne—and felt confident of success, ignorant of the fact that, through the elaborate system of espionage established by Burleigh and Walsingham, agents of the government had actually been admitted to a share in the secret. Unfortunately for the Queen of Scots, Babington revealed the whole plot to her in a letter, which, like all his others, passed through Walsingham's hands; and her reply, encouraging the conspirators, and urging them to immediate action, ultimately sealed her fate. Proof sufficient having been obtained, Ballard was arrested Aug. 4, 1586, and Babington, with four others, was captured ten days after in a barn at Harrow, whilst the papers of Mary Stuart were seized during her temporary absence from her room on a hunting party. On Sept. 13th the conspirators were tried by a Special Commission at Westminster, and fourteen were executed at Ty-burn on the 20th and 21st of the same month. Lingard regards the plot as in very great measure set on foot by Walsingham's spies:-"There was much in the fate of these young men to claim sympathy. Probably had it not been for the perfidious emissaries of Morgan and Walsingham—of Morgan, who sought to revenge himself on Elizabeth, and of Walsingham, who cared not whose blood he shed provided he could shed that of Mary Stuart—none of them would have even thought of the offence for which they suffered." On the other hand, Mr. Froude says :- "It is false, absolutely and utterly, that the plot was set on foot by agents of Walsingham to tempt her to join it in her desperation and then to destroy her."

Bachelor, or Knight Bachelon (bachelarius, bacealareus), was a simple knight, one who had received knighthood, but had obtained no further honour, such as that of being made baronet or Knight of the Bath. The word was also used to denote a squire, or armour-bearer not of the degree of knight, "bachalarii armorum nuncupati," says Spelman, "ut sic innotescerent, a litterarum bachalariis." A knight was required to have ten of these before he could be made a baronet. "Becheleria" is also occasionally used to designate apparently the whole gentry, or the whole body of military tenants below the degree of baron. Thus the "communitas bachelerise totius Anglise" (Annal. Burton., p. 471), in 1259, complains to Prince Edward of the conduct of the barons.

Bachelors, Taxes on. By the Act 6 and 7 Will. III., a tax was imposed on unmarried male persons above the age of twenty-five, varying in amount from £12 10s. to 1s. according to the taxpayer's status. It was repealed in 1706. In 1785 bachelors servants were subjected to a higher tax than those of other persons. In Mr. Pitt's graduated Income Tax, in 1799, the rate was higher for bachelors than for married men.

Back Lane Parliament was the name given to an assembly of Catholic delegates from all Ireland, which met in Dublin in Dec, 1792. They drew up a petition professing loyalty and demanding the franchise. The bishops signed it for the clergy, and the delegates for the laity. Five gentlemen, among whom were Byrne and Keogh, went over to present it. Dundas presented them, and they were assured that their wishes would be considered.

Bacon, Francis. [St. Albans, Viscount.]

Bacon, Sir Nicholas (b. 1509, d. 1579), was born at Chislehurst and educated for the law, obtaining in 1537 the office of Solicitor to the Court of Augmentations. During the reign of Mary, Sir Nicholas, like many others, conformed to the Catholic religion, although he had been, under Edward VI., an active supporter of the Reformation. Having married a daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, he became Cecil's brother-in-law, and by the latter's recommendation obtained the post of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal on the accession of Elizabeth. He speedily won the confidence of the queen, and became famous for his decisions in equity. In 1561 he did his best to bring about an alliance with the Huguenot leaders in France, and subsequently strongly supported the marriago of the queen, whose favour he lost for a time in 1564, owing to his having participated in the publication of John Hales's book on the succession. The Lord Keeper was for this offence struck off the roll of Privy Councillors, at the instance of his enemy, the Earl of Leicester, and "strictly enjoined to meddle with no business whatever except that of the Court of Chancery." Shortly afterwards, however, he recovered his position at court. In 1568 he was one of the com-missioners to inquire into the guilt of the Queen of Scots in the matter of the Darnley murder, and he superintended the trial of the Duke of Norfolk in 1572, although he took no active part in it. Lord Keeper Bacon had a great infinence over his brother-in-law Cecil, and is said to have framed the Acts aimed at the Queen of Scots and her supporters. He died Feb. 20, 1579, having held his office for twenty years. His son says of him: - "He was a plain man, direct and constant without all finese and doublenesse," whilst a contemporary describes him as " a man of greate diligence and ability in his place; whose goodnesse preserved his greatness from suspicion, envye, and hate."

Bacon, ROOER (b. 1214, d. 1294 ?), studied at Oxford and Paris, and took orders as a Franciscan friar. His proficiency in natural science exposed him to very severe treatment on the part of his superiors. Accused of dealing in magie, he was prevented from lecturing at Oxford, and ordered to go to Paris, where he remained several years. Clement IV., in 1266, interested himself in Bacon, induced him to publish his works, and procured his release and return to Oxford. In 1271, in the Compendium Studii Philosophia, he made a violent attack on the monks and clergy. In 1278 he was again imprisoned, and remained in confinement for fourteen years. As a philosopher and man of science, Roger Bacon is a personage of the first importance in the history of mediæval thought.

Bacon's chief work is the Opus Majus, an encyclopedic survey of existing knowledge, which has been compared with the great work of his later namesake. It is printed by Jebb, Lond., 1733. Some of Bacon's minor philosophical treatises are published in the Rolls Beries, 1859. A very large number of his writings a estill in manuscript. For accounts of Bacon's life, and estimates of his position in phil sophy, see E. Charles, Reger Bacon, 1861; Schneider, Roger Bacon, 1873; Mr. Srewer's Prefaces to Bacon's Opera Insellia (Rolls Series).

Badajos was the scene of the fiercest struggles in the Peninsular War. Originally in the hands of the Spaniards, it was surrendered, by the treachery of its commander, in Febrnary, 1811, to the French; and on the 5th of Muy following the first English siege was begun. Owing to false information as to the movements of the French army, the siege was raised, after the operations had been carried on for a week; but, when the battles of Fuentes d'Onoro and Albuera had ehecked the armies of Massena and Soult, Wellington began his preparations for the second siege. Circumstances, however, prevented him from taking as much time as he really required for the siege; and after two desperate assaults on San Christoval, an outlying fort, in June, the siego was again raised. But in the next year the two previous failures were avenged. The place was very strongly fortified. On the north it was washed by the Guadiana, with two outlying forts thrown across the river, one of which defended the only bridge. At the north-east corner of the town, the Guadiana is joined by the Rivillas. On the south-east beyond the Rivillas an isolated hill was occupied by a strong fort, called the l'ienrina. Within the walls, the town was defended by four chief fortresses, the castle at the north-east corner, the Trinidad bastion at the east extremity, with that of St. Maria close to it on the west side, and at the extreme north-west corner, by the castle of St. Vincente. Wellington's works were begun on the 17th of March, and on the night of the 25th the Picurina was assaulted and taken after a desperate conflict. On the 6th April the assault was made. Picton crossed the Rivillas and attacked the eastle on the right, while Major Wilson stormed the smaller fortress of San Roque; Colvill+ and Barnard assaulted the breaches; Leith was to make a feint against l'ardaleras, while Walker made the real attack at St. Vincente. The troops ut the breaches displayed the most undannted courage and resolution, but the terrible defences devised by Philippon, and the steru resistance of the defenders buffled all their efforts. In two hours 2.000 men had fallen without result; and Wellington sent orders to the party to retire and re-form. Meanwhile Walker's party had succeeded in effecting an entrance through an empty embrasure into St. Vincente. By sheer hard fighting they carried bastion after bastion, till the rumour of a mine caused a panic, and they were temporarily driven back. They soon recovered, however, and sweeping everything before them took those who were defending the breaches in the rear. and in a very short time made themselves masters of the whole town. This was the most bloody of all the struggles of the Peninsular War, and the English lost 5,000 men in killed and wounded.

Badby, Thomas (d. 1410), was a tailor or blacksmith of Worcestershire, and the first person executed under the statute De Hæretico Comburendo, for denving the Real Presence. The Prince of Wales, who was present at his execution, made a vain attempt to save him by inducing him to recant. But Badby remained firm to his convictions, notwithstanding the entreaties and promises of the prince.

Badges, Royal, are distinguished alike from crests and coats of urins. They were intended to be worn on helmets, banners, or caparisons, as well as on the breasts of soldiers, retainers, and attendants. William II.'s badge is said to have been an eagle gazing at the sun; that of Stephen was an ostrich plume. Henry II. used the badge of his house, the planta genista, or broom plant, besides the carbunele und a sword with an olive branch. Richard I. had a variety of badges: a star issning from between the horns of a crescent: a mailed arm holding a broken lance; and a sun on two anchors. John seems to have adopted the first of these as his special badge, and Henry III. used the same device. The badge ascribed to Edward I. is "a rose or, stalked proper," while Edward II., in token of his descent from the kings of Castile, used a castle. Edward III.'s badges were very numerous; amongst them were rays descending from a cloud, the stump of a tree, a falcon, an ostrich feather, and a sword erect. Richard II. likewise had a variety of badges, such as the sun in its splendour, the sun behind a the cloud, and a white hart. By Henry IV. numerous badges and devices were employed, such as an eagle displayed, a fox's tail, a panther crowned, and a crescent. Henry V. hore an antelope, a swan, and a beacon. llenry VI. also used the antelope, as well as the feather. The Lancastrian party, how-ever, adopted the red rose as their emblem, in opposition to the white rose of the Yorkists. Edward IV. had numerous badges, such as a black bull, a white wolf, and a fetterlock; but the most famous badge of the House of York was the sun in its splendour, to which Shakespeare alludes at the beginning of "Richard III." This king's peculiar badge was a falcon with a woman's tace, holding a white rose. In memory of the finding of the erown in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth Field, Henry VII. adopted a crowned hawthorn bush as his badge, besides which he used the red dragon of Wales and a white greylound, which last was also used by Henry VIII. Edward VI. bore the sun in splendour. The general badge of the House of Tudor was a rose, which Queen Mary frequently used, besides the pomegranato and a sheaf of arrows. Elizabeth also used the rose, as well as the falcon, and James I. the rose and the thistle. Since this time royal badges have not been used, but the rose has come to be considered the emblem of England, the thistle of Scotland, the shamrock of Ireland, and the harp of Wales.

Badon, Mount (Mons Badonieus), is the name of the place where King Arthur is said to have defeated the Saxons in 520. Its position is unknown; one school of historians identify it with some place in the south of England, as Badbury, in Dorsetshire; another with towns in the district between the Forth and Clyde, as Borden Hill, near Linlithgow. [Arthur.]

Bagemond's Roll was the valuation by Boeamund de Vicci, the Papal Commissioner, in 1275, of all benefices in Scotland, a tenth of the revenues of which were to be devoted to the recovery of the Holy Land. This roll was the basis on which ecclesiastical taxation in Scotland rested down to the time of the Reformation.

Bahamas, The (or Lucavos), consist of a number of small islands in the North Atlantic Ocean, lying to the north-east of Cuba. The principal islands are New Providence (in which is situated Nassau, the capital), St. Salvador (the first land sighted by Columbus on his voyage in 1492), Great Bahama, long Island, and Eleuthera. Although the Bahamas were discovered by Columbus in 1492, no attempt was made to colonise them until 1629, when an English settlement was planted in New Providence. In 1641 the English were driven out by the Spaniards, but returned again in 1666, and held the islands until they were compelled to retire by a combined French and Spanish attack in 1703. For some years after this the Bahamna were chiefly resorted to by buccaneers, who were, however, extirpated in 1718 by Captain Rogers. In 1781 the islands were taken by a Spanish force, but were recaptured by Colonel Devereux, and finally given up to England by the Treaty of Versailles, 1783. The government, which is representative, is vested in a Governor, an Executive Council of nine, and a Representative Assembly of twenty-nine members, which meets at Nassau, and which is elected by the people of eleven different islands.

Bail (Fr. bailler, to hand over, deliver; or Lat. bajulare, to take up a burden) is used in English common law to denote the freeing of accused persons from imprisonment, on security being accepted that they will appear to stand their trial. Mainprize has much the same meaning as bail, and the two terms are used almost promiscuously in the old law books. by the common law all offences were bailable except murder. By the Statute of Westminster, 1275, the power of granting bail in cases of felony and treason was taken away. Common Bail or Bail below was often required for the release of persons charged with trifling offences; but the bail was entered in the names of John Doe and Richard Roe, and was therefore merely formal. This was abolished by 2 Will. IV., formal. This was abolished by 2 Will. IV., c. 39. By 7 Geo. IV., c. 64, justices of the peace might release persons charged with felony if the evidence were not such as to raise a strong presumption of their guilt. The modern practice is regulated by the Act 15 and 16 Vict., c. 76.

Bailiff, a word cognate with Fr. bailli, from Old Fr. bailler, to carry or govern, and Low Lat. ballious, or bajulus, a governor, is a person who is entrusted with power of superintendence by a superior. The term was in common use among the Normans both in France and in Sicily, and accordingly, after the Conquest, we find it applied loosely to many officials: thus the sheriff was called the king's bailiff, and the district over which his jurisdiction extended was called his builiwick; so too is the jurisdiction of the chief forester in Henry I.'s charter; the keeper of Dover Castle was also called bailiff, and later on the word is used of elective functionaries. The burgesses of Colchester could elect bailiffs in the reign of Richard I., and under Henry III., when the right of choosing their mayor was taken away from the Londoners, they were allowed to elect bailiffs instead. Gradually the word became attached to definite offices: (1) The presiding magistrate of a town, who assumed the functions of the English reeve, called in mercantile towns port-reere, whose Latin title prepositus was applied to him-with this essential difference, that the reeve before the Conquest might be, and in the old free towns frequently was, chosen by the citizens, while the Norman bailiff was almost invariably appointed by the lord-e.g., the bailiff of Beverley by the Archbishop of York. His duties were to preserve the king's peace, and to proside over the chief court of the town. Thus in Leicester the bailiff was the constituting officer of the portmaniinte until the middle of the thirteeuth century, and in Beverley the archbishop's bailiffs held the court in his name until the reign of Henry VIII. By the end of the thirteenth century, however, the mayor had supplanted the bailiff nearly everywhere; the summonses of borough members to a national council are addressed to the mayors of the towns more frequently than to the bailiffs, and in cases where both are mentioned the mayor is placed first. Later on, the citizens of Poole, iu 1371, were allowed to call their chief magistrate mayor instead of prepositus. Nevertheless, the idea of the bailiff being a great town -official still lingered on, and the inquiries of the Corporation Commissioners in 1835 showed that there were 120 officers of this nature in the corporato towns. [REEVE.] (2) The bailiffs of the liberty and the manor, and closely connected with them the bailiffs of the royal demesne, were officials of higher position than those of the towns. may be conjectured that the latter are the balliri mei mentioued in Magna Charta on terms of equality with the sheriffs, and they are mentioned as officers of importance in Henry Il.'s Inquest of Sheriffs. Before the Conquest the presiding officer of the Courts of the Liberties, which were jurisdictions exempt from that of the hundred, and of lands held in sac and soc, which corresponded to a certain extent to the Norman manor-system, was the reeve, whose subordinate was the hudel, or beadle. The bailiffs of the liberty or honour and of the manor, represented their lords in the court-baron, or ancient assembly, of the township where by-laws were made, in the court customary, where the business of villanage was transacted, and in the court leet, which had criminal jurisdiction; in the great baronial honours, whose system corresponded to that of the shire, the bailiff attended the sheriff's tourn or court for the view of frankpledge. On a liberty the lord and the bailiff, as his lerd's representative, were the only persons whe could execute the king's writ to the exclusion of the shcriff until the Statute of Westminster the second (1295), when it was provided that if the bailiff neglected to execute a writ within the liberty, a writ, with a clause of non omittas, should be issued authorising the sheriff himself to enter the liberty and execute the writ. During the reigns of the Edwards, and subsequently, the power of these bailiffs was narrowly watched; they were to be sworn to make distress, and punished for malicious distress by fine and treble damage; to truly impanel jurors, and to make returns by indenture between them and the sheriffs. They could not arrest with-out order of the sheriff. The exclusive jurisdictions of the liberties still exist in many parts of England, and in 1844 the power of the bailiffs was regulated by placing their appointment in the hands of the judge of the courts, i.e., the county-clerk or under-sheriff before whom they are held, and subjecting them to severe penalties for mishomeanour. the decay of feudalism the bailiff of the manor became an unimportant functionary who looked after his lord's interests in the matter of collecting rents, surveying improvements, &c. (3) The bailiff of the hundred presided, after the Conquest, in the smaller court of the hundred, the chief business of which was to settle disputes about small debts. He represented the king's interest, and was probably the same as the gerefa, or reeve of the hundred, of the laws of Edward the Elder and Ethelred. He was supposed to execute all process directed to the sheriff, to collect the king's fines and fee-farm rents, and to attend the judges of assize and gaol-delivery. From Bracton we learn that another of his duties was to select four knights of the hundred, who were in turn to choose the jury of inquisition. These jurisdictions of the hundreds fell, under the Norman kings, into the hands of great landowners, in which case the bailiff was appointed by the lord, and presided in the manorial courts as well as the hundredcourt. The functions of the bailiff of the hundred were, therefore, gradually absorbed by the bailiff of the manor on the one side, and on the other by the improved machinery of the county courts, which, in the days of Henry III., began to obtain in England. These functions were also, to a certain extent, represented in later times by (4) the sherif's bailif, who is, however, mentioned as early as 1170 in Henry II.'s Inquest of Sheriffs. The office can hardly be said to be of constitutional importance; bailiffs executed writs and made arrests within the sheriff's bailiwick, and they were usually bound, in an obligation to the sheriff, for the due execution of their offices, whence they were called bound bailift (vulgarly corrupted into bum bailiffs). Special bailiffs may also be nominated at the request of the suitor in a case, and approved by the sheriff, for a particular occasion. Their persons were protected, and severe penalties laid on them for misdemeanour by the Inferior Courts Act (1844).

Bailiwick signifies either a county in which the sheriff as bailiff of the king exercises jurisdiction, or the liberty or franchise of some lord, "who has an exclusive authority within its limits to act as the sheriff does in the county." [BAILIFF.]

Baillie, ROBERT (b. 1599, d. 1662), minister of Kilwinning, was one of the leaders of the Covenanters, and a voluminous writer. He was one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and in March, 1649, was one of the commissioners sent to Charlee II. at the Hague.

Baird, SIR DAVID (b. 1757, d. 1829), entered the army in 1772, and in 1776 obtained a company in a new regiment, raised by Lord Macleod, and destined for India. He arrived at Madras in Jan., 1780, and shortly afterwards had active employment made for him by the irruption of Hyder Ali into the Carnatic. While proceeding with his regiment, under Colonel Baillie, to join Sir Hector Munroe, he fell into an ambuscade which had been set for the detachment. Baird, wounded in four places, remained a prisoner till he was released in July, 1784. In 1789 he went on leave to England, but returned two years later as licutenant-colonel of his regiment. After this he was continually employed in some active service in India, being present at the siege of Pondicherry in 1793, and leading the storming party at Seringapatam in 1799. In 1800 he was appointed to command tho expedition to Egypt, where he acted in con-junction with the army which Abercromby had commanded. Taking umbrage at Wellesley's promotion, Baird came to England in 1803, and two years later was patched to the Cape of Good Hope, which in reduced and formed into a colony. On his return to England in 1807, he was sent under Lord Catheart to Denmark, and was twice wounded at the siege of Copenhagen. had no sooner returned from that expedition than he was despatched with 10,000 troops to reinforce Sir John Moore. Having effected a junction, Sir David shared in all the hardships of the dreadful retreat, and finally rendered excellent service as second in command at Corunna, where he lost his left arm.

Bajee Bao, the son of Ragoba, became, on the death of Madhao Rao II. in 1796, the natural heir to the office of Peishwa. On acceding to office, Lord Wellesley made it his great object to conclude a subsidiary alliance with Bajee Rao. The march of Holkar on Poonah (1801) so alarmed the Peishwa that he began to treat, while the total defeat of his own and Scindiah's troops at the battle of Poonah, Oct. 25, 1802, drove him to the English residency, and from thenco to the coast, where, at his own request, he was transported by an English ship to Bassein. He was now eager for the English alliance, and on Dec. 31, 1802, the memorable Treaty of Bassein was concluded. Peishwa himself, however, repented of the treaty as soon as he had affixed his real to it, and commenced a series of intrigues with Scindiah and the Bhonslah to render it ineffectual. The treaty, howover, had effectually curbed his power, and the victories of the English in the war which followed set a seal to this by complotely breaking up the Mahratta Confederacy. Under the rule of Sir George Barlow, Bajee Rao made a vain attempt (1806) to ressert his lost power. The l'eishwa, however, waited anxiously for a chance of revenge on the English. A general confederacy of Mahrattas and Pindarries was organised against the English in 1815. The next year Bajee Rao's attitude became more hostile, and he began to intrigue with Scin-Ameer Khan, and Holkar, and assembled a large body of troops near his capital. A British force was ordered up to Poonah, and the Peishwa was compelled to accept the treaty of June 5th, 1817, which bound him to dismiss his mischievous minister Trimbukjee, the great opponent of the British; to renounce the formal headship of the Mahrattas for ever; to dismiss all foreign ambassadors, and refer all communications from foreign states to the Company's government. Bajee Rao had no sooner signed this treaty than he proceeded to hasten his intrigues, and, in the full assurance of powerful support, he plunged into hostilities Nov. 5, 1817. The defeat of Kirkee was immediately followed by the surrender of Poonah and the retreat of the Peishwa. He was again severely defeated, by General Smith, at Korgaom, on Jan. 1, 1818, and at Ashtee, soon after which battle he was forced to surrender. He was taken to Bithoor, sixteen miles from Cswnpore, where he received an annuity of eight lacs of rupees for the rest of his life. He died in 1853, leaving an adopted son, Nana Sahib.

Balaclava, The Battle of (Oct. 25, 1854), during the Crimean War, was brought on by the Russian general, Prince Mentschikoff, who moved a body of 30,000 men on Balaclava, hoping to get possession of the harbour, and to cut the allies off from their supplies. The Russians first attacked the redoubts in the valley of Kadikoi, defended by the Tucks, who fied almost immediately. in confusion. The main body of the English and French now came into action, and the fighting about the captured redoubts began to thicken. Lord Raglan, thinking the enomy were retiring with the guns from one of the redouhts, sent orders to Lord Lucan, in command of the cavalry, to follow and harass their retreat. But by the time the Light Brigade was prepared to carry out the order the broken Russian cavalry had re-formed, and the main body of Liprandi's corps d'arm's had advanced and formed at the bottom of the valley. Notwithstanding, Lord Lucan-" from some misconception of the order given," as Lord Raglan's desputch said, and of the verbal instructions of Captain Nolan, the aide-de-camp-"considered that ho was bound to attack at all hazards," and, in spite of Lord Cardigan's remonstrance, insisted that the charge should be carried out. Accordingly, the Light Brigade (consisting of the 5th and 11th Hussars and the 17th Lancers), in all 673 men, commanded by Lord Cardigan, rode down upon the whole Russian army. They broke their way right through the enemy's lines, and struggled back again through the valley, in which the Russian guns played on them from front, flank, and rear as they rode, with the loss of 113 killed, 134 wounded, and 15 prisoners. Except for some desultory cannonading, this ended the battle. The Russians had not effected their object, but they kept possession of the ground they had won in the valley, so that the victory may be said to have been indecisive.

Balance of Power may be defined as the existence of such a connection and such relations of power among a majority of neighbouring states, that no one of them can endanger the independence or the rights of any other state without effectual resistance, and without danger to itself. The term seems to have come into existence at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The Duc de Rohan's work, Trutina Statuum Europæ, was published in 1645. The first attempt towards establishing a balance of power in Europe was probably that of Henry IV. and Sully, which dates from 1603. Their idea was to create a confederation in Europe under 'ae title of the "République très chrés ane." It was to contain fifteen states: five elective monarchies—the Pope, the Emperor (the ancient freedom of election being restored, with a provision that no two successive Emperors were to be chosen from the same house), the Kings of Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia; six hereditary monarchiesthose of France, Spain, England, Denmark, Sweden, and Lombardy, the last a new kingdom created for the Duke of Savoy: four republies - Holland, Venice, a republie containing Genoa, Florence, and Central Italy, and Switzerland, which was to be considerably enlarged. Each of these states was to have its limits so well defined that it could not exceed them without being attacked hy all the rest. There was to be liberty of conscience—Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists were to be on an equality; there was to be a general federal council, to keep peace at home, and to make war upon the infidel. (See Sully, Economies Royales in Petitot's Collection of Memoirs.) The plan of Henry IV. came to nothing, and the Peace of Westphalia (1648) is generally rogarded as the foundation of the modern political system of Europe. It established a modus vivendi between Catholics and Protestants; recognised the Republics of Switzerland and the United Netherlands; placed the German Empire on a firmer footing; and raised a bulwark sgainst the ambition of the house of Austria. The second great settlement was that of the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), which put an end to the war of rivslry between France and Austria for the throne of Spain. Since the Peace of Westphalia the equilibrium of Europo had been more seriously threatened by the house of Bourbon than by the house of Hapsburg; but the Treaty of Utrecht gave Spain to a younger branch of the Bourbon line. England was the principal power in the negotiation, whereas she had taken no part in the Treaty of Westphalia. The third great settlement of Europe was in the Peace of Vienna in 1815. This was designed to restore to Europe the tranquillity which had been broken by the wars of the French Revolution and of Napoleon. Its arrangements were based on calculations of the balance of power, but many of them have been falsified by events. The theory of the balance of power may at one timo have been defensible, but it has often given rise to spoliations and violations of justice. It is impossible to restrain every state within the limits which once sufficed for it. The growth of wealth, of population, of celonisation, the inevitable facts of annexation and conquest, are witnessed in all ages of the world. Peace is destroyed if each of these increments is held to justify a similar addition to neighbouring states. The law of progress determines the shifting of the balance; but there is no reason why each of these changes should be the signal for a European war. The modern law of nations depends rather on securing the equality of all states, great and small, before the law, and the protection of the weak against the violence of the strong. The growth of one state in power and prosperity is not necessarily a danger to the rest. It may even be sometimes regarded as an additional guarantee for peace.

Baldock, Robert (d. 1327), was Chancellor of England from 1328 to 1326. He was one of Edward II.'s chief supporters, and shared with the Despensers the hatred of the heronage. In 1326, on the landing of Queen Isabella, he fled with the king and the Despensers into Wales, where he was seized and sent to the Bishop of Hereford's palace in London. Hence he was dragged by the mob and thrust into Newgate, where he shortly afterwards died.

Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury (1185-90), born at Exeter, was educated at Ford Abbey. He became Bishop of Worcester in 1180, and in 1184 was Archbishop of Canterbury. He preached the second crusade in England and himself took the Cross.

Bale, John (b. 1495, d. 1563), one of the most zealous of the Reformers under Henry VIII., was made Bishop of Ossory by Edward VI., 1552. He was compelled to leave England luring the reign of Mary, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made Prebendary of Canterbury. Bale was a voluminous writer, and wrote, besides several miracle plays, a work of British biography, entitled Illustrium Majoria Britannie Sorij torum Catalogus, which extends from Japhet to 1549.

A selection from Sate's Works was published by the Parker Society in 1849. The fullest ac-count of him is given in Cooper, Attente Cantab.

Balfour, THE RIGHT MON. ARTHUR J. (b. 1848), a nephew of Lord Salisbury, educated at Eton and at Trivity College, Cam bridge, first sat in the House of Commons in 1874 as member for Hortford. For a time he was one of the members of the "Fourth Party." In Lord Selisbury's first administration (1885) he was President of the Local Government Board: in 1886 he joined the Cabinet as Secretary for Scotland; in 1887 he became Chief Secretary for Ireland; in 1891 he succeeded the late Mr. W. H. Smith as First Lor.! of the Treasury and Loader of the House, resuming these positions when his pa ty returned to power in 1896, and again on the reconstruction of the Ministry in 1900. In July, 1902, on the retirement of Lord Salisbury, he became Prime Minister, and held office until his Cabinet resigned at the end of 1905. In January, 1906, he was defeated at Manchester East, but was elected the following month for the City of London, and became Leader of the Opposition.

Balfour, John (of Burley), in conjunction with Hackston, his brother-in-law John Henderson, mnrdered Archbishop Sharp, 1679. He made his escape after the murder, and was at the battle of Drumclog (q.v.).

Baliol, THE FAMILY OF, was one of the wealthiest in Normandy, being possessed of the lands of Nyvelle and Bailleul; the house also acquired considerable estates in the north of England after the Conquest, and held Hurcourt and Barnard Castles. Its memberwere found taking an active part on the side of England in all the Border wars. John de Baliol having married Devorguilla (grand-daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon), transmitted to his son, John Baliol, a claim to the Scottish crown, 1291.

Baliol, John DE, one of the regents of Scotland during the minority of Alexander III., was deprived of his office hy the English party, 1255.

Baliol, Jonn, Lord of Galloway, was the son of John de Baliol, regent of Scotland, and Devorguilla, granddanghter of David of Huntingdon, from whom he derived his claim to the Scottish throne. On the death of the Maid of Norway in 1290, and the consequent failure of heirs to Alexander III., a host of minor competitors, laid claim to the Crown of Scotland. Together with other Scotch nobles, he was summoned by Edward I. to a conference at Brigham, 1291, where the succession to the Scotch throne was to be settled. The meeting was adjourned to June. 1292, when the arbiters announced that Baliol's claims were preferable to those of Bruce. Baliol was accordingly declared King of Scotland by Edward, and did homage to him, Nov. 20, 1292; he was crowned at Scone ten days afterwards, and renewed his homage to Edward, Dec. 26, at Newcastle. Edward soon began to exact the rights of an over'ord, encouraging appeals to his own courts from those of Baliol; on the appeal of Macduff of Fife, the Scotch king was summoned to appear in London, and though he disobeyed this summons he went to the English court on the appeal of Sir William Doug-las in 12 3. Little by little Scotch feeling against the action of the English king was aronsed; in October, 1295, Baliol, urged by public feeling in the country, concluded an alliance with Philip of France, and in March of the following year invaded England, laying wa-te the northern counties, and also sent a document renouncing his allegiance to the Eng ish king. Edward at once marched northwards at the head of a large army, and took Berwick, Dunbar, and Edinburgh. On July 10, 1296, Baliol seeing that further resistance was useless, made his submission at Montrose, renouncing to his liege lord the kingdom of Scotland. Edward ordered his imprisonment in England for a short time, after which he was permitted to retire to France.

Baliol, EDWARD, the son of King John Baliol, was in 1324 brought over to England from the court of France, and, on the death of Bruce in 1328, secretly encouraged by the English government, and joined by the "disinherited burons," he put forward his claims to the throne of Scotland through hereditary succession (although his father had resigned all connection with the kingdom). In 1332 he landed with an army in Fifeshire, and won the battle of Duplin; shortly afterwards he successfully held Perth against a besieging army, and was crowned at Scone, Sept., 1332. His first act was to render homage to Edward, who at once sent an army to assist him, but the national party gradually gathered strength, and Baliol found himself compelled to retire to the English court after a defeat at Annan. Having obtained the aid of some English barons, he returned to Scotland, where he met with a few successes in the sonthern part of the country; in 1338 he went to reside in England, where he remained for some time; in 1346 he ravaged the Lothians with an English army, but gained little advantage; in 1356 he resigned absolutely his claims to the crown and kingdom to Edward III.

Ball, JOHN (d. 1381), one of the leaders of the Peasant Revolt [WAT TYLER], is said to have been one of Wiclif's "Poor Priests," and at all events he preached doctrines very similar to theirs. He had been notorious as a wild fanatio for many years and was im-wild fanatio for many years, and was imprisoned by the Archbishop of Canterbury in Maidstone gaol, whence he was released by the insurgents, to whom he preached a famous sermon on Blackheath full of socialistic dectrine. He took for his text the popular Ballads are of great historical importance, for they were the literature of the people, and give indications, which can be obtained nowhere else, of the popular feeling in stirring times. They were numerous in the old English days, and were snng in the thegn's hall and in the churl's cottage. Some specimens, chief of which is the song of the Battle of Brunanburh, were so popular that they were embodied in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. After the Conquest, the songs of the people no longer circulated amongst the Norman basons. Not till barons and people were united in the attempt to assert their common liberties did a ballad literature arise which breathes the spirit of all classes. In the reign of John, we again find political songs, and in the times of the Barons' War they were numerous. There are French ballads which were sung in the barons' halls,

Latin ballads which were current among the educated class, and rude but spirited English ballads which were sung by the people. Chief in importance amongst these is a Latin "Song of the Battle of Lewes" (Wright, "Political Songs," p. 72), which is a remarkable assertion of constitutional principles, and might have been written by a Whig in 1688. The reign of Edward I. awakened a national it, which found its expression in national and martial songs, accompanied by others which grumble at oppression. In the reign of Edward II. the latter kind prevail, while under Edward III. the balance is restored by the patriotism kindled by the French war. The number of English songs becomes greater; the French and Latin sink into the background. The end of the reign of Edward III. saw the English songs disappear, and the others became less spirited. The national impulse was spent, and the problems of the succeeding period awakened no popular expression. Ballads gradually coased to have a direct bearing on politics, and were con-cerned with chivalry and romance. They satisfied the popular desire for adventure, but did not deal with current events. The minstrel became a recognised personage, and was generally said to come from "the north countrie," the land where border-raids still kept alive the adventurous spirit. The ballads of Chevy Chase, Edom o' Gordon, and Adam Bell, all show their northern origin. It is of them that Sir Philip Sidney wrote, "I never heard the old songs that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet."
During the Reformation period ballads dealt with polemical topics, often in a coarse and irreverent manner. However, the influenco of ballads naturally declined before the growth of other forms of literature. The stage and the pamphlet afforded other means of expressing popular opinion. The struggle between the Stuarts and the Parliament did not give rise to much ballad literature. But the u popularity of James II. was sung and whistled all over England in Wharton's "Lillibullero." A vein of very beautiful ballad-poetry was struck in Scotland by the Jacobite risings of the eighteenth century. In Ireland also ballads survive to the present day as a political power. The songs written for the Nation newspaper, collected under the name of "The Spirit of the Nation" deserve their popularity by their poetical merits. At the present day there are nu-merous collections of old ballads, but it is difficult to determine their date, and, in many cases, their gennineness.

Ballard, John, or Fortescue (d. 1586), a Jesuit priest of Rheims, and the original instigator of the Babington plot (q,v.), landed in England (1685), having previously obtained the ametion of the l'upe to the queen's murder. He made a tour or the north and west of England, and subsequently reported to Mendoza, who had been ambassador at Elizabeth's court, that the death of the queen was necessary to the success of an insurrection. In 1686 Ballard returned to England, and was in close communication with Babington. On Aug. 4, 1586, he was arrested, and executed at Tyburn in the following month.

Ballinamuck, Surrenner of the French at (Sept. 8, 1798). The French force under General Humbert, which had landed at Killala and routed the troops sent against them at Castlebar, found their way to Longford barred by a large force under Lord Cornwallis, while General Lake with fresh troops was close behind, so that Humbert had no alternative but to surrender. Eight hundred French, and 1,500 Irish surrendered. Many of the latter were at once hanged.

Ballot, Vote By. The ballot is properly a mode of voting in which little balls are used, but it is employed to signify any kind of secret voting. The vote by ballot for members of Parliament appears to have been first proposed in the reign of William III. In 1710, a Bill authorising vote by ballot passed the Commons, but was rejected by the During the agitation for Parliamentary reform, which resulted in the Reform Bill of 1832, it was not lost sight of as a remedy for bribery; and some disappointment was felt, on the introduction of the Reform Bill by Lord J. Russell, that provisions for secret voting were not contained in it. It was replied that the reason why a ballot clause was not introduced into the Bill, was because it was desirable that the two questions should be kept distinct. When it was found that the ministry did not intend to follow the Reform Act by a Ballot Act, the matter was taken up by independent members of the Liberal party. Mr. George Grote made his tirst motion in favour of the ballot on April 25, 1835. He repeated it every year till 1839, on which occasion the ayes were 216, the noes 333. Mr. Grote's place in moving the adoption of the ballot was taken by Mr. Henry Berkeley, who in 1851 carried his motion in spite of the opposition of Lord J. Russell and the government by a majority of fifty-one. It was, however, rejected on several subsequent occasions. Vote by ballot was one of the points of the People's Charter, and perhaps the one to which the greatest importance was attached. It was advocated on the ground of its being the only efficient safeguard sgainst bribery and intimidation: it was opposed on the ground of the safeguard being itself founded on falsehoods, and the probability of a man promising to vote in one way and voting in another. The revelations made before a select committee of the House of Commons convinced many states. men, Mr. Gladstone among others, that the step could not be long delayed. This committee reported, in 1869, that the ballot presented many advantages—that it would put an end to some of the evils in our electoral system, and that it would tend to mitigate rather than to aggravate those which it would not entirely remove. In 1871, the matter was referred to in the Queen's Speech, and a Bill was introduced by Mr. W. E. Forster (q.v.). It passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords on the ground that it was brought before them too late in the session. In 1872 it again passed the Commons, but an amendment was introduced in the Lords making secret voting optional. Th's the House of Commons would not accept, and after a struggle the Lords yielded the point. With the establishment of secret voting, public nominations of the candidates, which had frequently been occasions of serious disorder and rioting, were abolished.

Ballymore, The Battle of (June 3, 1798), was fought during the Irish Rebellion between Colonel Walpole and Father Murphy. The former, marching carelessly towards Enniscorthy with some 500 royal troops, was surprised in a defile by a body of insurgents under Father Murphy. Colonel Walpole fell with a considerable portion of his force, and his guns were captured.

Balmerino, ARTHUR ELPHINSTONE, LORD (b. 1688, d. 1746), was a noted Jacobite. He early entered the army, and held command of a company of foot in Lord Shannon's regiment under Queen Anne; but on the accession of George I. he resigned his commission. Elphinstone took part in the Jacobite rebellion of 1715, and fought at the battle of Sheriffmuir. He escaped to France and served in the French army until 1733. He was one of the first to repair to the Young Pretender's standard in 1745, and at once became colonel, and captain, of the second troop of Charles Edward's life-guards. Early in 1746 he succeeded to the title of Balmerino on the death of his brother. Taken prisoner at the battle of Culloden he was tried for high treason before the Lord High Steward's Court in Westminster Hall, found guilty, and executed. He maintained his principles to the end, and his last words were, it God bless King James."

Baltic Expedition, THE (1854-55), occurred during the war with Russia. On March 11, 1854, a strong squadron, consisting of eight screw line-of-battle ships, and eight frigates and paddle-wheel steamers, sailed for the Baltic under the command of Sir Charles Napier. Previous to the departure of tho fleet .. banquet was given to the admiral at the Reform Club, where speeches calculated to increase the war feeling in the country were made by Lord Palmerston and Sir James Graham, and provoked much animad-version in Parliament. In April Sir Charles Napier, strongly reinforced and accompanied by a powerful French fleet, established a blockade of the Gulf of Finland, and captured many Russian prizes. In August Bomarsund was bombarded and taken; but except that a large Russian army had been kept inactive in the Baltic forts, and the Russian flect had been driven from the sea, nothing further of much importance was done this year. Consequently the government evinced dissatisfaction that more had not been effected, and on the return of Sir Charles in December, ho was treated with great coldness, and finally deprived of his command. Rear-Admiral Dundas succeeded him in 1855, and in the summer of that year there were eighty-five English war vessels, besides a large French fleet, in the Baltic Seas. The fleet consisted entirely of steamers, and was accompanied by a flotilla of floating batteries, mortar vessels, and gunboats. Some delay occurred in consequence of a collision between one of the squadron and an American emigrant ship. On ana 1st, however, the allied fleets mct in the Baltic and proceeded to bombard Sveaborg This place was battered with shot and shell for three days, with an immense destruction for three days, with an inthout any apprefleets then retired in consequence of the unfavourable weather, and returned home, having effected nothing in proportion to the expense which they had involved, and the expectations to which they had given rise.

Baltimore, GRORGE CALVERT, 1st LORD (b. 1580, d. 1632), was Secretary of State to James I., but was compelled to resign his office in 1624, in consequence of having become a Roman Catholic. He had always taken a great interest in colonisation, and obtained in the year of his death the charter of Maryland from Charles I. An expedi-tion was sent out in 1633 under the patronage of Cecil Calvert, second Lord Baltimore (who died in 1676), and the colony of Maryland was successfully planted. The capital was named Baltimore in honour of its patron.

Bamborough, anciently "Bebbunburgh," is mentioned by Bede, and is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been built by Ida, King of Northumbria, about the year 547, and named in nonour of his children is a very strongly-situated eastle, some portions of which possibly belong to a period heron the Norman Conquest. The castle 547, and named in honour of his wife Bebbc. was besieged by Penda of Mercla In 642, unsuccessfully defended by De Mowbray against William Rnfus, and it played an important part in the civil wars of the fifteenth century. In 1720 it passed into the cosession of Nathaniel, Lord Crewe, Bishop of Durham, who turned it into an institution for various charitable purposes, and fitted up apartments for shipwrecked seamen, a library, schools for poor children, an infirmary, &c.

Banbury, judging from the number of Roman remains which have been discovered there, was probably a place of importance before the English Conquest. It appears in Domesday Book as Banesberie. In the reign of Henry I. a great castle was erected by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln. In 1469 a battle was fought near the town by the troops of Edward IV., under the Earl of Pembroke, and a strong body of northern insurgents, in which Pembroke (weakened by the desertion of Lord Stafford) was defeated, and subsequently beheaded. [Engr-COTE.] In the Civil War the inhabitants of Banbury were specially zealous for the Commonwealth. After the battle of Edgehill the town was taken by the king, and stood a desperate siege in 1644, for fourteen weeks, when the garrison were reduced to the last extremity before they were relieved by the Earl of Northampton. It was again besieged by Whalley in 1646, but hold out till the king had surrendered to the Scots army. The castle was subsequently destroyed by order of the Parliament.

Bancroft, RICHARD, was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1604 to 1610. He was born in Lancashire in 1544, and was educated at Cambridge University. Canon of Canterbury (1594), and Bishop of London (1597). He had already made him-self very popular by his denunciations of the Puritans, and Archbishop Whitgift, who was old and unfit for work, entrusted the sole management of church affairs to him. Three years later he was employed on an embassy to Denmark. Bishop Bancroft took an active part in the Hampton Court Conference between the representatives of the Establishment and the Puritans, at Hampton Court in t604. Later in the year he succeeded Whitgift as Archbishop of Canterbury, and at once proceeded to compel the clergy to subscribe the articles imposed in the new book of canons which he had compiled, tho result being that some three hundred of the l'aritan clergy were ejected from their livings. At the same time he was engaged in superintending the present translation of the Bible. In the following year he presented to the king a series of articles of complaint against the judges, who, acting on the advice of Coke, had issued prohibitions in the Ecclesiastical Courts in order to stop the cases before them; hut the judges declared that they would submit to an Act of Parliamer and to that only. The undaunted who in the meantime had been HCL. curing the condemnation of the l'uritan . aller, renewed his appeal in 1608, but James, who was inclined to support him, after a violent altercation with Coke, thought it best to reserve his conclusion. The same result happened in the following year, when he, urged on hy the prayers of the eccle-siastical lawyers, brought forward his com-plaint a third time. Bancroft is said to have used his influence to soften the rigour with which Parliament was inclined to treat the Papists after the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot; but he could not prevent the passing of a Bill of Pains and Penalties. In 1608 he was made Chancellor of the University of Untord, and just before his death took great interest in James's scheme for an episcopal church in Scotland. Archhishop Bancroft was a remarkably sincere though perhaps a narrow-minded man, never deliberately cruel; but a firm believer in the divine origin of the Episcopacy—a doctrine which he was one of the first to assert—he suppressed the l'uritans mercilessly, and they, in return, never ceased to abuse him. He has been called covetous, but probably without much foundation.

Bangorian Controversy. [HOADLY.]

Banished Lords (1583) was the name given to the nobles of the Ruthwen party who seized Stirling Castle, but were compelled by Arran and a large royal army to fice across the border. They formed a small community, which they attempted to regulate on strict religious principles at Newcastle. The Scottish government outlawed them, and demanded their surrender; this was, however, refused. In 1585 the banished lords, with the Hamiltons and Maxwells and a strong force, marched to Stirling, captured the king, and procured the reversal of their outlawry and the restitution of their estates.

Bank Charter Acts, Bank of England, Bank of Ineland, &c. [Bankino.]

Bank Holidays Act, The, was brought in by Sir John Lubbock (afterwards Lord Avebury), and carried in 1871. It declared that Easter Monday, Whit Monday, the first Monday in August, and the day following Christmas Day should be public holidays.

Banking (1) seems to have originated in modern Europe among the Italian meneylenders, especially those of Florence, of whom the Bardi and Peruzzi, who were ruined by the inshility of Edward III. to pay his debts, most concern English history. Banking was first practised in England during the reign of Charles II. by the goldsmiths of Lombard Street, and it soon became an important trade when the advantages of cheques over ready memey payments became known, in spite of its cangers as displayed by the frequent bankruptcy of the goldsmiths. Private banks sprang up, such as those of Messrs. Child at Temple Bar, and of Messrs. Hoare in Fleet Street, and the question of a national bank began to be eagerly discussed.

(2) THE BANK OF ENGLAND was projected by a Scotchman, William Paterson, who suhmitted his plan to the government in 1691. It was well received, but was allowed to lie dormant until 1694, when Montague, the ahlest financier in William III.'s ministry, suddenly determined to establish the Bank in order to relieve government of its many difficulties caused by war and misapplied taxation. He borrowed £1,200,000 at eight per cent., and formed the subscribers into a company, who treated the loan to government as part of their capital, the interest being secured upon the taxes. By their charter, which was granted for eleven years, from July 27, the government of the bank was entrusted to a governor and twenty-four directors, who were to be elected annually hy such members of the company as possessed £500 capital stock. Sir John Hornblow was the first governor. The company was restrained from trading in anything hut hullion, bills of exchange, and forfeited pledges, and from lending money to the crown without the consent of Parliament. In spite of the popularity of the Bank of England, the government loan of which was raised in ten days, it had at first to encounter much opposition, and several crises occurred, especially during the year 1696. The goldsmiths, who hated the Bank of England, attempted to destroy it by buying up its paper, and suddenly demanding immediato payment. The directors, however, referred them to the courts of law, and, during the time thus gained, managed to restore their credit by extensive calls on their subscribers. They were strengthened by the fall of their rival the Land Bank, whose brief popularity had seriously affected their opera-tiens during the crisis. This was the idea of twe men named John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlayne, who thought that a bank reuld be formed to lend money on landed security, their doctrine being that every one who had real property ought to have besides paper money to the full value of their property. The scheme was adopted in a modified form by Harley; he promised to advance two millions and a half to government at 7 per cent., the interest being secured upon a new tax on salt. If a quarter of the money was paid in by the 1st of August the subscribers were to be incorporated under the title of the National Land Bank. William, urged by want of money, grasped at the idea, and headed the list with £500, but the scheme proved an utter failure. The subscriptions never rose to more than £7,500. Thereupon the government turned in despair to the Bank of England; the subscribers, in full court, resolved to lend it £200,000, and thus began the alliance between the Bank and the Whig ministries. In 1708, the Bank capital was doubled, and in the same year an important Act was passed forbidding the issue of notes by associations of more than six persons, which checked the formation of joint-stock banks. In 1720 came the second great crisis of the Bank's existence. The South Sea Company then proposed to take over the government debt, consisting of about thirty-two millions, to its capital, receiving in return interest at 4 per cent.; but such was the anxiety enter-tained by all public companies to have the government for a creditor that the Bank of England contended against the Company for the privilege, but was, fortunately for itself, outbidden. In a few months the bubble burst and the Bank stood secure, though it was compelled by government to pay up two millions out of the £3,500,000 which in a wear moment it had promised to lend its tottering enemy. With the exception of a run on the Bank during the Jacobite rebellion of 1745, which was only averted by payment in sixpences, and a violent attack upon it by the mob during the Lord George

especial moment in the history of the Bank of England until 1792, when a violent commercial panic occurred chiofly owing to the reckless use of paper by country banks, some fifty of which failed totally. The Suspension of Cash Payments in 1797 was caused chiet. the drain of bullion due to the war, subsidies to foreign allies, the exclusive purchase of provisions abroad owing to bad harvests, and the hoarding of coin owing to fear of invasion. A run on the Bank set in from all sides, and on February 25th, when little over a million remained in its cellurs, a proclamation was issued forbidding it to issue cash in payment. This was followed by a Bill prohibiting it to pay more than 20s. in cash, or to advance more than £600,000 to government; at the same time the Bill of 1777 which prohibited notes for less than £5, was suspended. This measure, by which Bank of England notes became inconvertible, though intended to be temporary, lasted until 1821, during which period the value of paper varied very considerably. The Resumption of Cash Payments was proposed by Mr. Peel in 1819; the Act was to have come into effect in 1821, but its provisions were adopted by the Bank two years earlier. In 1825 another crisis occurred. During the last six weeks of the year seventy houses failed, and the Bank itself was only saved, it is said, by the discovery of a cluster of 700,000 £1 notes. The measures of the government were prompt; notes for less than £5 were suppressed, and the law of 1708 repealed, banks with any number of partners being permissible beyond sixty-five miles from London, while the Bank in return was allowed to establish branches to be carried on by its agents. The Bank Charter Act of 1833, framed on the occasion of the renewal of the Charter at the instance of Sir R. Peel, Lord John Russell, and others, attempted to stop runs on the Bank by enacting that notes of the Bank of England were to be made legal tender, whereby the country banks would be enabled to meet a panic with notes instead of gold. A deduction of £120,000 a year was to be made in the sum allowed by government to the Bank for the management of the National Debt, while in return a quarter of £14,686,800, the sum due, was paid br.ck. The principle that the paper issued and specie kept in hand should bear to each other the ratio of three to one was established, and the Bank was compelled to publish a general statement of its condition quarterly. In spite of this remedial measure, bullion was continually lacking in London, and in 1839 the Bank ef England was in imminent canger of stopping payment, so that Sir R. Peel brought forward the Bank Charter Act of 1844. Its object being to regulate the issue of notes, it enacted that the Bank should not be allowed to issue more than £14,000,000 in notes, unless a corresponding amount of specie were retained. Further, no new banks established after the measure became law were to issue their own notes, and the old banks were not to increase their issue. Sir R. Peel's great Act was the last important pieco of legislation affecting

(3) JOINT-STOCK BANKS were rendered possible by the Act of 1825. They increased largely in numbers after 1836. By Sir R. Peel's Bank Charter Act of 1844 they were allowed to accept bills of any amount date and could sue or be sued. Banks other than the Bank of England are regulated by the Companies Act (1862). This Act provides that no association of more than ten persons can carry on a bank nnless registered under the Companies Act, that an unlimited company may convert itself into a limited one, that a bank of issue shall, with certain relaxations, though registered as a limited company, have unlimited liability with respect to its notes, and that accounts must be audited and published once a year. There is also the law of 1867, which provided for minute registration with regard to the sale or purchase of shares in a joint-stock banking

(4) THE BANK OF SCOTLAND Was established by Act of the Scottish Parliament in 1695. Its capital was £100,000 sterling, of which about £10,000 was paid up, and it had the exclusive privilege of banking in Scotland for twenty-one years. Its capital was intact from state loans, and it was also temporarily exempt from public burdens. Nevertheless, the great African Company started a banking branch in rivalry, but they soon abandoned it for the more exciting pur-suit of trade. The bank began to issue notes and establish branches in 1696, and in 1704 it issued £1 notes, and still continues to do so. After the union of England with Scotland it undertook the re-coinage, and conducted it with great success. Its capital was increased to £2,000,000 in 1774, and to £2,500,000, its present amount, in 1804, with power, if necessary, to raise it to £3,000,000. It established an office in London in 1867, the restriction of English joint-stock banks not affecting Scottish. After the monopoly of the Bank of Scotland expired, many unchartered banks started, of which the Royal Bank of Scotland (1727) and the British Linen Company (1746) were the oldest and most successful. The smaller banks, were, howover, absorbed in the earlier part of the century into seven or eight large banks with constantly increasing branches still in existence. In 1844 Sir R. Peel's Bank Charter Act allowed the Scottish banks then issuing notes to continue to do so, provided that for every note issued above the average issuo of the previous year, a corresponding amount of specie should be kept in stock.

(5) The Bank of Inelann was established in 1783 by charter in pursuance of a request from the Irish Parliament, with the same constitution and privileges as the Bank of England, and a capital of £600,000, incressed to £1,000,000 in 1809, and lent to government at 4 per cent. It was prohibited from lending money on mortgage, and this re-striction was not repealed until 1860. The restrictions on joint-stock banks as to paper issues caused such distress in Ireland, that in 1821 government allowed the Bank of Ireland to increase its capital to £3,000,000, while joint-stock banks were to be established beyond fifty miles from Dublin.

Bankruptcy Legislation. In the English Statute Book almost the first recognition of bankrupts as distinguished from fraudulent debtors is the Act 13 Eliz., c. 7, by which the goods of a trader who failed to meet his obligations were to be sold for the benefit of his creditors. By Acts passed in the fourth and tenth years of Queen Anne, bankrupts who had paid a dividend might, with the consent of their creditors, obtain their discharge from the Court of Chancery. Bankruptcy inrisdiction belonged to the Court of Chancery, but by the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 56, proposed and carried by Lord Brongham, a special Court of Bank-ruptcy was established. It provided that six commissioners and four judges should be appointed to try all cases of bankruptcy. The commissioners could adjudicate only in cases where there was no dispute; if the matter was disputed it was to be referred to a judge. By an Act of 1849 fraudulent bankrupts were rendered more certainly liable to punishment, and composition by arrangement made possible. In 1861 the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts were extended to others besides traders. The most important of the numerous Bankruptcy Acts of the nineteenth century is that of 1869, which remodelled the Court, and made important changes in the law. The commissioners were abolished, and there were to be a Chief Judge (usually a Vice Chancellor) and a number of registrars. The county courts were constituted local bankruptcy courts with an appeal to the Chief Judge. The property was to be placed in the hands of trustees appointed by the creditors instead of official assignees, and there were provisions by which the bankrupt could not obtain his discharge, except with the consent of a majority of the creditors, nuless he had paid ten shillings in the pound. The Act also provided for "liquidation by arrangement," with the con-sent of the creditors; and repealed or consolidated all former enactments on the subject of bankruptcy. In 1883 a new Bankruptcy Act was carried by Mr. Chamberlain. It enacted severe punishments against fraudulent bankrupts, and abolished the system of trustees, substituting for them a staff of official receivers appointed by the Board of Trade. In Sectland bankruptcy was placed on a legal footing by the Act of 1696. There is no separate Bankruptcy Court, but by 7 Will. IV., c. 56, the Sheriffs have jurisdiction as well as the Court of Session. In Ireland, by an Act of the year 1872, the law of bankruptcy was assimilated to that of England. [Deet.]

Banneret, or Knight-Banneret, was a degree of knighthood superior to that of knight bachelor. Bannerets were privileged to carry the square banner instead of the pointed pennon borne by other knights. The distinction was originally awarded for special bravery on the battle-field, and the ceremony of cutting off the corner of the pennon so as to make it a banner was performed by the king in person standing beneath his own royal banner. Bannerets ranked before all other knights except those of the Garter. The dignity was altogether personal, and was never hereditary. It has been sometimes regarded, but erroneously, as a rank of peerage inferior to a barony. It conferred no right to sit in Parliament. The conferred no right to sit in Parliament. order gradually died out, and in modern times has become extinct; but a knight-banneret was created by George III. ns late as 1797.

The name is, of course, derived from banner; but it was sometimes supposed to be a derivative or diminutive of baron, and the Latin form haronatus occasionally occurs in some writers and old State-names.

and old State-papers.

Bannockburn, THE BATTLE OF (June 24, 1314), one of the greatest defeats the English ever suffered, was fought near Stirling, on the attempt of Edward II. to relieve the castle of Stirling, which was being besieged by Robert Bruce. The Scots were far outnumbered by the English troops, who, including a large body of Welsh and Irish auxiliaries, may have numbered nearly 100,000 men. Bruce, however, gained the victory in great part by having previously dug holes in the ground so as to impede the magnificent cavalry of the enemy, and by massing his foot into solid squares and circles—a system of receiving cavalry hitherto nnpractised, except at the battles of Falkirk and Courtrai, where it had been signally successful. The belief on the part of the English that the camp followers of the Scottish army formed part of a reserve completed their discomfiture; the rout was thorough, and an immense booty fell into the victors' hands. The Scotch generals, in addition to Brurs, who slew in single combat Henry de Bohun, one of the bravest of the English knights were Rando'ph, the king's nephew, Edward Bruce, Walter Stewart, and James Douglas; the English were led by Edward II. in person, and the Earls of Pembroke and Gloucester. Edward narrowly escaped being taken prisoner, and had to rido at full speed to Linlithgow, hotly pursued by Douglas; his privy seal fell into the hands of the victors. The result of the battle was a futile meeting of Scotch and English commissioners with a view to bringing about a better understanding between the two countries.

Bantry Bay is a deep inlet on the west of the county of Cork. Here, on May 1st, 1689, Chateau Renard anchored with a French fleet and put on shore a quantity of stores. Admiral Herbert followed him; but an engagement, claimed as a victory by both parties, was all that took place. In Dec., 1796, a large French fleet of seven sail of the line, three frigates, and seventeen transports, sent to aid an Irish rising, anchored here for a week. They did not immediately land their men, owing to the absence of General Hoche, their commander, who had got separated from the squadron; and subsequently a storm arose and drove them back to France. In 1801, the fleet under Admiral Mitchell mutinied here. Twenty-two of the ringleaders in the mutiny were condemned to death at Portsmouth in Jan., 1802, but only eleven were Baptists, The, are a sect of Protestant Nonconformists who hold that the baptism of infants is invalid. On the Continent, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, a body of men with similar views were known to their opponents as the Anabaptists, or rebaptisers. They spread over Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands, but, in consequence of the violence of their religious and social doctrines, were forcibly suppressed (about 1535) by the governments of those countries. Some of the Dutch Anabaptists fied to England, and were put to death by Henry VIII.; but the true sect never existed here in large numbers, and the name was vaguely applied to all who insisted on sdult laptism. The Anabaptists or Baptists suffered for their faith under the Tudors, by whom their secret conventicles were forbidden. The last of them who was burnt alive was Weightman, in 1612. During the next few years their views were, in part, adopted by the Brownists or Independents, and it is difficult to draw a distinction between the two sects. In 1633 the Peculiar or Calvinistic Baptists separated from the Independents, and founded a church of their own, and in 1644 the London Baptist Churches published a Confession of The story of their persecution after the Restoration, and of the gradual removal of their religious disabilities after the Revolntion, does not differ from that of other dissenting churches. During the seventeenth century the differences between the Peculiar and General Baptists, principally on the doctrine of the Redemption, became wider, and in 1770 the latter body became separated into the General Baptists' New and Old Connexion. The Scotch Baptists appear to have become a recognised body about 1760. As each church is complete in itself and the form of government is congregational, considerable differences of opinion prevail among the Baptists on minor points. As a rule, neighbouring churches unite into associations, and the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland connects them all together. The Baptists have displayed much energy in mission-work, chiefly in India and the East.

Barbados, one of the Windward Islands, is supposed to have been discovered by the l'ortuguese abont 1518; it was first colonised by an English expedition under Sir Oliver Leigh, 1605, and in 1624 was granted by James I. to Lord Ley, who sent out a number of colonists. Shortly afterwards the whole of the Caribbean Islands was made over to Lord Carlisle, and a long dispute ensued as to the ownership of Barbados; the quarrel lasted for some years, and frequent collisions between the two parties took place in the island. In 1647 Lord Carlisle granted a lease of the island for twenty-one years to Lord Wil-loughby, who fortified the island for the king, and in 1651 defeated a large Parlia-mentary force which had been sent out from England nnder Admiral Ayscue. The Barbadians, however, were shortly afterwards compelled to capitulate, though many or the leading men subsequently received from Charles II. substantial rewards for their loyalty. In 1663 the sovereignty of Barbados became vested in the crown, and the proprietary government was dissolved; in 1675 and 1692 slave insurrections broke out, but were speedily suppressed. In the next century, especially during the administration of Lord Howe (1733-35), the condition of the Barbadians was much improved, both socially and politically, though property in the island

On the assumption of the sovereignty of the island by the crown in 1663, a tax of 41 per cent. was imposed on all native produce exported. This tax proved a great burden upon the planters, and was abolished in 1838. The governor of Barbados is governor-in-chief of the Windward Islands; the administration. is representative, and is vested in a legislative and executive council nominated by the governor, and a house of assembly of twentyfour members elected by the freeholders. It is owing to the opposition of the Barbadians that it has hitherto been found impracticable to form a federation of the Windward Islands, as has been done in the Leeward Islands. Barbados was divided into parishes as early as 1629.

Barbour, John (d. 1395), was the author of the great national Scottish epic, The Bruce. Of his life little is known. He was probably born about the year 1316; studied at Oxford, and became Archdeacon of Aberdeen, Clerk of the King's household, and one of the Auditors of the Exchequer in Scotland. The Bruce extends from the death of Alexander III. to the death of King Robert. It is a noble epic, full of spirit and vigour, and true chivalrous feeling; and is, moreover, highly interesting historically, as being almost the only Scottish anthority for this period. Barbour also wrote a book of Legends of the Saints, and The Brute, dealing with the story of Brutus.

The earliest edition of The Bruce was printed at Edinburgh in 1870. The poem has been carefully edited by Mr. Innes for the Spalding Cinb (1886); and by Mr. Skeat for the Early-English Text Society (1875).

Barcelona, the chief town of Catalonia, played an important part in the Spanish Snecession War. In 1704 an attempt was made upon it by Sir George Rooke, who landed the Prince of Darmstadt with some marines, relying npon co-operation within the city. The design, however, was betrayed by some of the conspirators, and the prince hastily re-embarked. In 1705 the allies, under the Prince of Darmstadt and the Earl of Peterborough, appeared before the town. The fortifications were ancient, but they had been repaired and strengthened, and the natural advantages of the town and the strong castle of Montjuich were very great. The besieging force was weak, and the Spanish auxiliaries showed little disposition or capacity for regular siege operations. After a fortnight the troops prepared to embark; but Peterborough suddenly an-nounced his intention of attacking Montjuich. Ascending the hill at dawn with 1,400 men, he surprised the garrison and captured the fortress. The castle of Barcelona, now exposed to a fire from the hill, soon surrendered, and on Oct. 3rd the town capitulated. The Archduko Charles was besieged in Barcelona in 1706, by a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, and an army of 20,000 men undor Marshal Tessé. Sir John Leake, with thirty ships, came to the relief of the town, but hesitated to attack the French fleet till Peterborough, who had put off in an open boat, arrived on board his ship with instructions to supersede him. The French army retired, and the fleet followed its example. the Peaco of Utrecht the Catalans refused to surrender Barcelona to Philip of Anjou; but the place was captured by the Duke of Berwick in Sept., 1714. In the Peninsular War, Barcelona was occupied by the French, Feb. 13, 1808. In March, 1809, an attempt on it was made by Lord Collingwood, in conjunction with the Catalan levies and Somatenes; but the French continued to hold it till the end of the war.

Barclay, William (b. ?1546, d. 1608), a Scotchman by birth, after serving many years in France, came to England in 1603, and was well received by James I. He had quarrelled with the Jesuits, and, though still remaining a Roman Catholic, was strongly opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. He had also written a work in favour of extreme views of royal authority, which recommended him to James I. His Catholicism, howev -, prevented his preferment, and after spendi. g two years in England he returned to France just before his death. His controversy with Bellarmine respecting the Papal power earned him considerable fame, and his views as to the limits of the Pope's authority were adopted by a large number of English Catholics. In politics he was a vigorous upholder of extreme monarchical principles.

Barclay's chief works are De Regno et Regali Potestate Adversus Buchananum, etc., and De Potestate Pape, printed together at Hanover, 1617. See Locke, Treatise on Government.

Barebones' Parliament (July 4th to Dec. 12th, 1653) was the nickname given to the Assembly summoned by Cromwell and the council of officers after the expulsion of the Rump (q.v.). It derived its name from a certain Praise-God Barbon, or Bare-bones, a leatherseller of Fleet Street, who took a somewhat prominent part as a member of this Assembly. It consisted of 139 persons summoned as representatives—122 for England (including 7 for London), 6 for Wales, 5 for Scotland, and 6 for Ireland who were chosen by Cromwell and his officers from lists of persons "faithful, fearing God, and hating covetousness," furnished to them by the various churches. Amongst them were Blake, Montague, Monk, Ashley Cooper, and other men of position and influence. They began by electing Cronwell and four other officers to be members of their body. They set to work to reform the administration of the law, relaxed imprisonment for debt, passed a Civil Marriage Act, commenced the codification of the law, and began the process of abelishing the Court of Chancery. They decided to abolish the power of patrons to present to benefices, and the institution of tithes. These resolutions, especially the latter, would have rendered the existence of a State Church impossible, and Cromwell and the country at large were not prepared to go so far. A sudden stroke solved the difficulty. On Dec. 12th Sydenham, one of the members, having mustered his friends before many of the other party had arrived, suddenly proposed, with the concurrence of the Speaker, that the Parliament (which he described as useless and injurious to the Commonwealth) should resign its power into the hands of Cromwell. This motion was at once carried, and those who dissented were expelled by a company of soldiers under Colonel Goffe and Major White. The "sober men" of that meeting, as Cromwell called them, resigned their power into his hands. He accused the other party of an intention "to set up the judicial law of Moses," and to abolish all magistracy and ministry as anti-christian. Some historians, objecting to the somewhat ludicrous title of Barebones' Parliament, have called this Assembly "The Little Parliament," while others prefer to style it "The Assembly of Nominees." It has been described as an assembly of obscure fanatics, assembly" were "persons of fortune and knowledge."

Barillon, French ambassador in England (1677—1688), was employed by Louis XIV. to keep Charles II. and James II. in dependence upon France, or, at any rate, inactive in European politics. With this object he fomented the quarrel between the court and the country party, writing to his master in 1697, "It may be held as an indubitable maxim that agreement between the King of England and his Parliament is not for the interest of your Majesty." When early in 1688 the national opposition seemed likely to endanger James's position, it was Barillon who advised the bringing over of Irish troops. Yet he allowed himself to be duped by Sunderland's assurances; and it was for this reason that, after he had been obliged to leave England by William, he was not appointed to attend James in Ireland.

Barking Abbey was one of the oldest and richest numeries in England. It was said to have been founded by St. Erkenwald, Bishop of London, and after being sacked by the Danes in 870 was restored by Edgar. The revenues of the convent were very large, and the abbess, holding more than thirteen knights' fees and a half, held her lands from the crown as a barony. The nuns were of the Benedictine order, and after 1200 exercised the right of electing their own abbess. The convent was surrendered to Henry VIII. in 1539.

At the Restoration he fied to the Pontinent, but was betrayed, brought back, and executed at Tyburn.

Barlow, Sin George (b. 1762, d. 1846), a civil servant of the Bengal establishment, by meritorious service of twenty-eight years obtained a seat in the Council, under Lord Wellesley. His industry and official experience were great, but he was unequal to the responsibilities of empire. On the death of Lord Cornwallis, the government of India was temporarily (1805—1807) in Sir George Barlow's hands. The result of his determined non-intervention policy was the restoration to Scindiah and Holkar of many of the advantages which England had gained by the Mahratta Wars. He was a great opponent of missionary enterprise in India, and caused the Company to assume the whole management of the temple of Juggernaut, including the three hundred dancing girls. In spite of the favour of the Directors, Sir George was not appointed Governor-General, but was nominated Governor of Madras in 1807. His want of tact made him very unpopular in this position, and he was involved in bitter disputes with his subordinates. His obstinacy and violence did much to produce the Madras mutiny, but he displayed much firmness while it lasted. The result of the mutiny was his recall in 1811.

Barnard, Sir John (b. 1685, d. 1764), was an eminent London merchant who became Lord Mayor in 1757. He sat for London from 1722 to 1758. He was a vigorous opponent of Sir Robert Walpole's, and in 1733 attacked that minister's sinking fund and the excise scheme, which he declared "could not, even by malice itself, be represented as worse than it really was." In 1737 he introduced a Bill (which was rejected) to lower the interest of the National Debt by borrowing money at three per cent. to redeem the annuities for which a higher rate was being paid. In 1742 he declined to attend the secret committee appointed to inquire into Walpole's administration. He attempted, but without success, to moderate the outery raised against Admiral Byng. He was a man of high character, and was much respected by all partics.

Barnet, The Battle of (1471), was fought between Edward IV. and the Earl of Warwick and the Lancastrians. On March 14th Edward landed at Ravenspur and marched towards London, no attempt being made to check him. Having been welcomed by the citizens of London, Edward, learning that Warwick was posted at Barnet, marched out to meet him, and drew up his army on Hadley Green. The fight commenced at five o'clock in the morning of April 14, which that year was Easter Day. The Lancastrian right wing under Lord Oxford was at first victorious, and drove in Edward's left; but a heavy fog occasioned them to mistake a part of their own army for the Yorkist force; confusion ensued, of which Edward took advantage to retrieve the fortune of the day. After very severe fighting, in which no quarter was given on either side, the Yorkists were completely victorious, and Warwick and his brother Montagu were slain. It is impossible Baroda Commission, The (1875). The Guicowar, Mulhar Rao, was in this year accused of attempting to poison the Resident, Colonel Phayre. He was tried by a mixed commission of three English and three natives. The commission failed to come to any satisfactory conclusion, as the English members considered the case proved, while the natives thought the charge had not been substantiated. Lord Northbrook, the Governor-General, however, held the former opinion. The Guicowar was therefore deposed by proclamation of the Viceroy, and his widow allowed to adopt an heir.

- Baron. The history of the word baron is one of those cases in which questions hotly disputed may be virtually settled by strict discrimination of the meaning of a name. The word, which originally meant "man" or "freeman," has now come to mean the simplest grade of the peerage. Between these extrome points, it passes through im-portant alterations of meaning. The word first occurs in England after the Norman Conquest. When William the Conqueror's "barons" are spoken of, it is quite clear that this means all who held lands directly of him -that is, of course, if they held by mili-tary service. In this large body of chief tenants-some 1,400 in number, including ecclesiastics-there was naturally from the first a tendency to a practical division between the great lord, who had knights holding under him, and the simple knight, who held but his own small estate. But it is unnecessary to say with Madox that this was also a clear legal distinction, "an original difference between tenure by barony and tenure by knight service;" and it would be impossible as yet to find any principle on which to base such a legal distinction. But already, under Henry I., tho practical distinction had become accentuated, and it soon came to be the custom that the greater "baron of the king" should treat for payment of his relief and aids directly with the king, instead of paying through the shcriff; that on the rates becoming fixed his relief should be 100 marks, while ordinary chief tenants paid 100s.; similarly, that he should lead his own tenants to the host, while the other served under the sheriff's banner; that he should be amerced by his equals in the King's Conrt, not by the sheraff; and, most decisive of all, that he was summoned proprio nomine by a special writ, not, like the "lesser barons," by a general writ to the sheriff for each shire. From the biography of Becket and the Dialogue de Scaccario, we see that this last distinction was recognised and customary early in Henry II.'s reign; while in Magna Charta it is claimed and conceded in the Article 14, which deals with the mode of convoking the Great Council; and it is acted on thereafter, even though this article was dropped in the later re-issues of the Charter. The greater barons had, in one sense, a qualification by tenuro; they would all be holders of a barony, not (that is) a definite number of knights' fees, as was sometimes stated—for some baronies consisted of no more than one or two such -but holders of some group of knights' fees which had at the Conquest been endowed with such a special character, or had since come to be so regarded; and in this sense the word is used in the Constitutions of Clarendon, and as early as Henry I.'s Charter. These leading landowners, with the earls, could not well be left unsummoned. But outside this inner necessary body, the king had a wide circle of holders of baronies out of whom to select those whom he should by his writ call to special attendance in host or in council. And here a further exclusion went on. For throughout the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I., special summonses to the host were sent to more than 100 barons; while to Edward I.'s Parliaments the number so called was hardly half as great. And even so, many of those who were called were not holders of baronies, but of much smaller estates; many, too, were called only occasionally. Here, then, is to be seen Edward's steady design of "eliminating the doctrine of tenure from the region of government." The reluctance of all but the greatest lords to attend co-operated in this direction; and "Edward I. is the creator of the House of Lords almost as truly as of the House of Commons," in the sense that to him was due the smallness of its numbers, the selection (to a great extent) of its members, and the final establishment of the principle that it is constituted by writ of summons, not by tenure. Nor would it be against the desires of the great barons themselves to see the substitution of summons for tenure as the qualification. For mere tenure-in-chief, if accepted, might have flooded the House with the lesser chief tenants, and have brought into it any mero purchaser of a haronial estate. During the ceased to attend as barons, and merged into the mass of the county freeholders, whom they inspired with their high spirit and traditions of constitutional resistance, and to whom they acted as leaders in shire moot and in national Parliament. Under the policy of Edward I. and the operation of his statute Quia Emplores, and with the introduction of the new idea—representation for all below baronial rank, whether chief tenants or not tenure-in-chief lost its constitutional value, and the separation of chief tenants into barons and knights, or nobles and gentry, was ac-complished. To complete this, it was only required that the right to receive the special summons should be regarded as hereditary; and this too, as a legal principle, dates from Edward I.'s reign. A further limitation in the sense of the word baron was effected when the crown created barons hy letters patent, tirst in 1387; hut the instances are very rare till the close of Henry VII.'s reign. In these patents the right is limited, as a rule, to heirs male, while the older baronies, by writ of summons, could descend through females (so Sir John Oldcastle became Lord Cobham in right of his wife). The mere personal summons, not inheritable, continued under Lancastrian kings, hut definitely ceased under the Tudors. The attempt to create a life peerage was disallowed as obsolete in the Wensleydale case, 1856. Since the Earl of Bristol's case in 1626 the receipt of such a writ is an inherited right which cannot be denied. Thus, out of the great mass of "barons" of the Conquest, the leading families were gradually selected (as it were) by the crown. These families have long since disappeared; the crown has supplied their place with a body four times as numerous; but this body has now a right with which the crown can no longer interfere. When the kings of the fourteenth century introduced new grades (duke, marquis, viscount) beside the old baronial body of earls and barons proper, the word baron sank to its narrowest meaningthat which it now hears, a peer who sits hy no higher title. The bishops, till the Reformation, sat both in their Old English character and in their new character as barons. But VIII.'s new sees had no baronies attached. The number of abbots who sat had fallen from 100 or more in the thirteenth century to a fixed number of 27 nnder Edward III.; those who could claim that they did not owe the service of a whole barony were glad to be excused. At the Reformation. when the abbots were excluded, the balance of numbers, for the first time, was left with the lay lords.

The political history of the baronage may be hriefly summed up in three periods:—(1) The feudal baronage, whose policy was the weakening of the central power, and whose alliances and hahits were those of Normans, was nearly eliminated by forfeiture before Magna Charta. The last great baron of this type may be found in Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who died in 1232. The dispersed character of their estates, the vigorous resistance of the Old English spirit, the strong arm of the Norman king, made this feudal class less formidable than it proved on the Continent. (2) On its ruins had been rising the new families of the ministers rewarded by Henry I. and Henry II., out of which was formed the national baronage which took the lead in winning the Charter, which defeated Henry III.'s plan of personal government, and which finally secured from Edward I. the results of a struggle of a century. Their typical representative is Richard, Earl Marshal in Henry III.'s reign. (3) As the great flefs began to fall in to the crown, and as the constitutional leadership passed on to the knights, the baronage turns from national aims to dynastic partisunship, family aggrandisement, and the ostentation of chivalry. The people are still only too ready to believo in and to accept them as champions. But they become more and more a narrow class, bound up with one or other of the two royal houses; and they are left alone at last to fight out the Wars of the Roses hy the aid of their own retainers, and to be almost Yet when exterminated in the struggle. they were gone, and the Church was powerless in its anti-national Romanism, the nation was helpless at the feet of the new despotism. For England still required its nobles, and in their worst phases they had played a necessary part on the political stage. Even the selfish factiousness of the fourteenth and fifteenth century nobility had been obliged to adopt national grievances for its faction cries; the traditions of noble leadership had been found still to have invaluable strength for the purposes of the Hundred Year? War; and for the rest, the nobles, busy with place-hunting and court intrigues, left space for the silent growth of literature, of commerce, and of municipal life.

The great barons may be roughly reckened at 400 in Domesday, nearly half of whom held estates in two or more counties. The number of lesser barons was rather smaller. By the thirteenth century both classes have decreased in numbers, but the former have increased the average size of their estates. By the end of the next century the baronial body has sunk to something less than 100 families, still holding, however, a vast proportion of the land of Eogland. Soon after, the two representative estates of clergy and the Commons had risen up to share with them the functions of legislation. The baronial body retained separate and inde-pendent privileges. They constituted a great part of the standing council, which took upon itself the administration when They held with the king was a minor. the king the supreme judicial power, both original and appellate. They could be original and appellate. They could judged only by their brother peers. Till nearly the Yorkist period they were called to give counsel and consent for legislation, while the Commons only had the right of petition. For general administration they were called to "treat and give counsel;" the Commons only "to execute and consent."

Baronets were first created by James I. in 1611, when, being in want of money for the support of the army in Ulster, he offered the title of baronet to all "who would pay into the Exchequer £1,080, in three annual payments, being the sum required for tho pay of a hundred foot soldiers for three years." In Ireland baronets were instituted in 1620, and in Scotland by Charles I. in 1625, and called baronets of Nova Scotia, because it was originally intended to establish them for the encouragement of the settling of Nova Scotia. The principle of this dignity was to give rank, precedence, and title without privilege. A baronet was to remain a commoner, but his title (unlike that of a knight) was to be hereditary. Since the time of Charles II. it has been usual to remit the payment due to the crown on creation of a baronetcy. It was intended that the number of baronets should be limited to 200, but the number was exceeded even before the death of James I.

Barons' War, THE. The first distinct appeal to arms of this war was made in 1263 by Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. Five years before, the incurable misrule of Henry III. had provoked the more publicspirited of his barons to place him under the control of a commission of reform, and then of a council; from this control he had now been for three years struggling to free himself, but with little success. The situation grew daily more distracted; England had two rival governments, the king and the Baronial Council, each claiming obedience, and forbidding what the other commanded. From time to time efforts had been made to arrange the points in dispute, but in vain. Of these points the principal were: the observance by the king of the Provisions of Oxford, the right of holding the royal castles, the power of appointing and removing the state officials and counsellors, and the exclusion of all foreigners from places of trust and profit. Not one of these demands of the barons could Henry be brought to loyally concede. Accordingly, in June, 1263, the smothered disgust of the barons burst into open war. But the campaign had barely begun when Henry's astute brother Richard, King of the Romans, interposed and patched up a kind of reconciliation. Some months of troubled peace followed, which both parties spent in diligent search after the means of getting a lasting peace. In December they agreed to submit their quarrel to Louis 1X. of France (St. Louis); and the chief men of both sides swore solemnly to abide by his decision, whatever it might be. At Amiens, in Jan., 1264, St. Louis heard the case that the king in person and the barons laid before him, and gave judgment. This was in favour of the king on every one of the points specified above, though the "liberties, statutes, and laudable customs of the realm of England that were before the time of the Provisions" were left intact. [AMIENS, MISE OF.] Notwithstanding their oaths, the earl and his party easily found an excuse that satisfied their consciences for refusing to be bound by this decision. War was now entered upon in earnest; and in March the hostile armies were lying within a few miles of oach other — the king's at Oxford, the earl's at Brackley. Here a last attempt at a pacification proved fruitless. Then the combatants parted, the king marching to take Northampton and Nottingham, the barons to add the array of the Londoners to their own, and to lay siege to Rochester. This operation brought on the battle that decided the campaign. For the king, alarmed for Rochester, hurried to its relief, and finding the siege raised on his arrival, went on to the reduction of the Cinque Ports. De Montfort cautiously followed, and on reaching Fletching learned that the royal army was but ten miles off, in and around the town and Cluniac Priory of Lewes. Thither, on May 14, he led his followers, full of religious enthusiasm and patriotic ardour, along the slopes of the bushless downs, and, almost with sunrise, burst in upon the half-prepared Royalists. The fiery onset of Prince Edward routed and made havoc of the earl's left wing, where 'ie Londoners fought, but only rendered the baronial victory more sure. Carried off the field by his fury, Edward left his father and uncle to be crushed by the right and centre of the attacking force. Next day the two kings, Edward himself, and his cousin Henry, were prisoners in the earl's hands. De Montfort was now master of king and kingdom. He strove hard to effect a settlement; called a Parliament of the imperfect type then in use; drew up a new scheme of government; and was diligent in framing measures of reform. At the end of the year he took the step that has made him immortal: he summoned in Henry's name a national assembly that was the first to contain all the elements of a Juli Parliament, duly chosen citizens and burgesses, as well as knights of the shire, barons, abbots, and bishops. This body began its sittings at London in January, 1266; and did its best to strengthen the position of its creator. But this position was already undermined. Tho baronial party had split into sections, one of which, under Gilbert, Earl of Gloucester, openly thwarted Earl Simon's designs, and at last broke away from the old leader altogether. The end came swiftly on. While De Montfort was suppressing disturbances in South Wales, Edward escaped from his guards, gathered round him his father's friends and De Montfort's foes, and by rapid marches secured the line of the Severn. Early in August, however, the slow moving earl had forced a passage across this barrier, and, with the king still in his possession, had reached Evesham, hoping to meet his son Simon, who was leading the levies of the south and east to join him. With this object, on Aug. 4, 1265, he was starting from Evesham when he was caught by his active opponent, who had shortly before suddenly fallen upon and destroyed the younger Simon's force at Kenilworth. By wise and well-executed dispositions he now enclosed the old warrior on every side; and after a stubborn contest, the great earl and his bravest followers perished, fighting des-Yet the war lingered for two years perately. longer. The harshness of the victors, who pronounced the lands of the rebels forfeit, drove the vanquished to despair. The siege of Kenilworth was prolonged till late in 1266; and at Axholm, in Lincolnshire, another obstinate band of outlaws held out stiffly against the assaults of Edward. At length Axholm was taken; and by this time experience had taught its eaptor moderation. In the Dietum of Kenilworth he offered milder terms to the defenders of the castle; and it surrendered at last (Dec., 1266). In the meantime others of "the Disinherited" had seized Ely, and one more siege became necessary. This lasted till the summer of 1267, when Edward forced his way into the place, and thus ended the Barons War. [Mont-FORT, SIMON DE.]

Barosa, THE BATTLE OF (March 5, 1811), was fought between the English and Spaniards, and the French, during the Peninsular War. General Graham, who had been blockaded through the winter in Cadiz, learning that Soult had marched to Badajos, resolved to rid himself of Victor's besieging force. To effect this purpose he embarked 12,000 men, who landed at Tarifa, in the rear of the French. But with an ill-timed modesty Graham gave up the chief command to La Pena, the Spanish general, who systematically neglected his advice. The low ridge of Barosa was the key both to offensive and defensive movements, and Graham was very anxious to hold it; but La Peña ordered him to march through a thick wood to Bermeja, and left the heights of Barosa erowded with baggage and defended only by a wholly inadequate force. Victor no soouer saw Graham's corps enter the wood than he attacked and took Barosa, cutting off a Spanish division which was on its march. Graham, on hearing of Victor's tactics, at once faced about, and, marching back to the plain, without a moment's hesitation resolved to attack, although the key of the field of battle was already in the enemy's possession. He accordingly despatched one body of troops to attack Laval, who was on the flank, while Brown and Dilke attacked the heights. "The English bore strongly onward, and their incessant slanghtering fire forced the French from the hill with the loss of three guns and many brave soldiers." Victor was soon in full retreat, and the British, having been twenty-four hours under arms without food, were too exhausted to pursue. In the meantime La Peña looked idly on, so that the remains of the French army, retreating in the greatest disorder, were allowed to escape.

Barrackpore, an important military station in Lower Bengal, fifteen miles from Calcutta, was the place where, during the First Burmese War (q.v.) the 47th Native Regiment, who were ordered for service, presented a memorial (Oct., 1824), setting forth the extreme difficulty of procuring cattle, and begging to be relieved of the burden of providing means of conveyance. The sepoys were informed that they would receive no assistance. It was at Barrackpore that the first mutinous demonstrations took place during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857. In February of that year the native troops quartered at this place refused to bite the ends of their cartridges. On Mar. 29 the 34th Native Infantry mutinied; it was disbanded May 5, the 10th Native Infantry having been previously disbanded Mar. 31.

Barré, Isaao (b. 1726, d. 1802), in 1746 entered the army, and served in Flanders and Canada. In 1759, he was present, and everely wounded, at the storming of the heights of Abraham. In 1761, Lord Shelburne gave his vacated seat for Chipping Wycombe to Barré. Two days after taking his seat, he made a most violent attack on Pitt. He strongly supported Bute's overnment in the debates on the Peace of Paris in 1762, and was rewarded for his services by being appointed Adjutant-General to the British Forces, and soon afterwards Governor of Stirling Cartle. But on the retirement of Lord Shelburne from the Board of Trade, Barré voted in opposition to the Grenville ministry in reference to the prosecution of Wilkes for libel, and was summarily dismissed from his military appointments and reduced to half-pay in Dec., 1763. He continued strenuously to cppuse the ministry in their action with regard to Wilkes and general warrants, and his ability as a debater became more and more conspicuous. On the introduction of the Stamp Act in 1765, he was one of the "two or three gentlemen who spoke against the Act, and that with great reserve and remarkable temper." He was a firm supporter of the policy of the Rockingham government, and on Pitt's taking office in 1766 he received a minor appointment. But in Oct., 1768, he retired with Lord Shelburne, on account of differences with the Duke of Grafton, whom he forthwith attacked in Parliament. During the long period of Lord North's administration Barré was out of office, and was especially active in advocating the cause of the revolted colonies in America, and the right of Wilkes to his seat. In the second Rockingham administration in 1782, Barré was appointed Treasurer of the Navy; but while Burke was proposing his Economical Reforms, and before the contemplated enactments could have come to his knowledge, Barré accepted an enormous pension of £3,200 a year, which, however, he was subsequently induced to resign in return for the clerkship of the Pells. It has been attempted to identify Barré with the author of the Letters of Junius; hut the assertion rests on ne sufficient evidence. The closing days of Barré, like those of his old adversary, Lord North, were darkened by hlindness.

Barrier Treaty, THE (1715). project of giving the States-General a "barrier" against France by means of a line of fortresses along the frontier had been raised in the Grand Alliance negotiations of 1701, and again in 1703, hut was defeated hy the hostility of Austria. In 1709, however, a treaty was concluded between England and Holland, hy which the former bound herself to ohtain for the Dutch the right of supplying garrisons for the Flemish fortresses, including Ypres, Menin, Lille, Tournai, Condé, Valenciennes, Charleroi, Namur, Damm, and Dendermonde. The treaty was signed by Townshend on the part of England, as Marlborough refused to be a party to it. The arrangements were ravised and considerably altered, much to the disadvantage of the Dutch, hy a second agreement which was come to in 1713, in which the number of barrier fortresses was greatly curtailed. The treaty was, however, not definitively signed till Nov. 15. 1715. The chief provisions were that the Low Countries were sugranteed to the house of Austria, and were new to be alienated on any conditions whatsoever. The Dutch were to garrison Namur, Tournai, Menin, Furnes, Warneton, Ypres, and Knoque; and Dendermonde was to be garrisoned jointly by Dutch and Austrian troops. The Dutch were very disentiafied at this curtailment in the number of towns ceded to them, and still more so at the commercial stipulations by which England was put on the same footing with Holland, as regards the commerce of the Belgian towns. But the treaty was altogether a disturbing element in European politics, and an especial source of friction in the relations of England and Austria. It was one of the causes of the alienation of England and Austria previous to the beginning of the Ceven Years' War. The Barrier Treaty annulled by the Treaty of Fontainebleau, 1785. Barrowists, THE, who derived their name from one of their leaders, Henry Barrow, a lawyer, were a sect of Separatists in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, closely allied in their doctrines with the Brewnista. Henry Barrow was examined before the Conrt of High Commission in 1587, for his "schismatical and seditious opinions," imprisoned, but continued to issue inflammatory pamphlets urging the abolition of episcopacy; he was found guilty of "writing and publishing sundry seditious books and pamphleta tending to the slander of the queen and government, and was executed at Tyhurn, April 6, 1593. The Barrowists shared the aversion of the Brownists to legal ministry; and were deemed still more proper subjects for persecution. They refused to hold any communication with the Church on the grounds: First, that the worship of the English Church was idolatrous; second, that unsanctified persons were admitted into the Church; third, that the preachers of the Church of England had no lawful calling; and fourth, that the government was ungodly. For these views many of them were imprisoned, and in 1593, on the passing of the Act making a monthly attendance at chnrch compulsory, a great number of the sect went with the Brownists to Holland, and subsequently founded a new home in America.

Barton, Andrew (d. 1511), was a contemporary of Sir Andrew Wood, and one of Scotland's first great naval commanders. In 1497, he was in command of the escort which accompanied Perkin Warbeck when he left Scotland. In 1512, after doing considerable damage to the English shipping, he was killed in an engagement with two ships that had been expressly fitted out against him, and had fallen in with him in the Downs. His death was one of the grievances which led to the invasion of England by James V., and the buttle of Flodden Field.

Barton, ELIZABETH (d. 1534), better known as the Nun, or Holy Maid of Kent, was the servant of Richard Masters, incumbent of the parish of Aldington in Kent. The awe excited by the moral tone of some of her ravings when under the influence of epilepsy suggested to her master and others the possibility of making her a means of fanning the growing discontent against the king. She was accordingly taught to counterfeit a state of trance, and then to give utterance to prophecies respecting matters declared to be revealed to her by the Holy Ghost. As her words were all in support of the clerical party and against the king's recent legislation, she was regarded with great favour by the clergy generally; she corresponded with Queen Catherine and Charles V., and became in a short time a dangerous power in England. When, however, she boldly declared, among other things, that if Henry divorced Catherine, and married again during her lifetime, he should not be a king a month longer, but die a villain's death, it was thought high time to take particular notice of her madness, and by the king's orders she and her more prominent accomplices were arrested. Having confessed their imposture upon examination in the Star Chamber, Elizabeth Barton and her fellow-conspirators were ordered to read their confession the next Sunday at St. Paul's Cross, immediately after the sermon. The whole matter of the imposture was then brought formally before the Parliament, and Barton and six others were attainted of high treason, and executed May 5, 1534.

Basilicon Doron (The Royal Gift) is the title of a work written by King James I. in 1599, and addressed to his eldest son, Prince Henry. In this work he maintains that the kingly office is ecclesiastical as well as civil, and therefore the king is necessarily head of the Church; and that equality among ministers is inconsistent with monarchy. The truct advocates the establishment of episcopacy, and the banishment of the principal Presbyterian ministers in the country.

The Basilicon Doron was printed at Edinburgh in 1603.

Basing House, the seat of the Marquis of Winchester, was one of the Royalist strong-holds in the Civil V a. Standing as it did a short distance from Basingstoke, it commanded one of the principal roads to the West. It was several times attacked by the Parliamentarian forces without success. Finally, after a long and brilliaut defence, it was taken by Cromwell, October 16, 1645, and burnt to the ground. "The jubilant Royalists had given it the name of Basting House," on account of the difficulty experienced by their opponents before it.

Bassein, The Treaty of (Dec. 31, 1802), was concluded between the English and Bajoe Rao, the Peishwa. Its stipulations were that a British force of 6,000 infantry, with a suitable complement of artillery, should be stationed within the Peishwa's dominions; that districts in the Deccan, yielding twenty-six lacs of rupees a year, were to be assigned for their support; that the Peishwa should entertain no Europeans in his service belonging to any nation at war with the English; that he should engage in no hostilities or negotiations without their concurrence, and should refer all his claims on farat, the Nizam, and the Guicowar, to the arbitration of the Governor-General. Basset, Philip (d. 1271), was a member of the great judicial family which furnished so many judges and ministers to the Augevin kings. In 1233 he joined in the revolt of Richard Marshall, but quickly returned to his allegiance, and was one of Henry's staunchest supporters against the barons. In 1261 he was appointed Justiciar of England, seemingly in conjunction with Hugh le Despenser, and held the office till 1263. He fought most bravely in the battle of Lewes ("Sir Philip Basset, that brave knight, worst was to overcome," says Robert of Gloucester) but was eventually taken prisoner. The king's victory at Evesham released him, but he was not restored to his office, though constantly employed in the royal service tili his death.

Bastwick, John (b. 1593), a physician, published in a work entitled Flagellum Pontificis (1635), attacks which he declared to be directed solely against the Pepe and the Roman Catholic clergy, but which were considered by the English bishops to reflect on themselves. For this he was condemned by the High Commission Court to fine and imprisonment. While in prison he wrote two other works, Apologeticus ad Presules Anglicanos (1636), and The New Litany (1637), in which he accused the bishops of an inclination to Popery. For this he was sentenced, in 1637, to a fine of £5,000, the loss of his ears, the Bastwick was alive in 1648, but when died is uncertain. In 1740 he was one of those who seeded from the House—an unwise step which he attempted in vain to excuse. In 1741 he cond sted that last grand attack on Walpole's foreign policy which drove him from office. Pulteney, however, declined to form a ministry, and retired into the Upper House as Lord Bath. He gradually sank into insignificance, and his popularity waned. In 1743 his friends succeeded in persuading him to come forward as candidate for the premiership in opposition to Pelham; he failed, however, although supported by the splendid talents of Carteret. In 1746, he and Granville (Carteret) were commissioned by the king to form a ministry. This, the "Forty hours Ministry," was an egregious failure, and the Pelhains returned to power. Long before his death Pulteney h. become altogether forgotten by the politica. Forld. Bathurst, ALL ST EARL (b. 1684, d. 1775), entered Tri College, Oxford, in the borough of 1699. He was retur Circucester in 1705, a in 1711. As a Tory animosity against their be politician, he supported the n of Bolingbroke to be restored to his seat in the House of Lords. During Walpole's administration he was an active member of the opposition. From 1757 to 1760 he was Treasurer to George, Prince of Wales, and in 1762 was created Earl Bathurst. A somewhat acrimohious politician, his speeches were marked by caustic wit and brilliancy of metaphor.

Bathurst, Henry, 2nd Earl (b. 1714, d. 1794), the son of Allen, first earl, entered Parliament for Cirencester in 1736. He was a steady opponent of Sir Robert Walpoie, and in 1745 was made Solicitor-General to the Prince of Wales by the Leicester House party. On the death of the prince, he took steps to conciliate the court, and was rewarded in 1754 by a puisne judgeship. On the death of Charles Yorke in 1770, he was appointed one of the three Commissioners to hold the Great Seal. "No one of the three," says Lord Campbell, "had any confidence in himself or in his colleagues. And after the learned trio had gone on for a twelve-month floundering and blundering, the public dissatisfaction was so loud that some change was considered necessary." The change made was the appointment of Lord Bathurst to the Woolsack. Left to himself, he got on better than he had done with his two colleagues, and relied with such modesty on the help of better men that he made few mistakes. In 1778 he resigned the Great Seal into the hands of Lord Thurlow, and became President of the Council, which office he held till Lord North's resignation. His last years he spent in retirement in the country. He has been justly called "one of the weakest, though one of the worthiest of our Chancellors."

...athurst, Henry, 3rn Earl (b. 1762, d. 1834), was the son of the second Earl Bathurst. In 1804 he was appointed Master Worker of the Mint. In 1807 he became President of the Board of Trade. In 1809 he was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, which he held only from Oct. 11 to Dec. 6. On June 11, 1812, he was appointed Secretary of State for the Colonics, and discharged the duties of the office for nearly sixteen years. In 1828 he was appointed President of the Council, which office he retained till the resignation of the Wellington administration in 1831.

Bats, The Parliament or (1426), was the name given to the Parliament which assembled in this year when the quarrol between the Duke of Gloncester and Cardinal Beaufort was at its height. It received its name from the bats or bludgeons carried by the hostile and excited partisans of the rival statesmen.

Battle Abbey was founded by William the Conqueror on the site of the battle of Hastings, the high altar standing, it is said, on the very spot where Harold planted his banner. It was not consecrated till 1094. The abbey, which was dedicated to St. Martin, and filled with Benedictine monks from Marmoutier in Normandy, was richly endowed by the Conqueror, and enjoyed many privileges, including that of sanctuary. The abbot was mitred and was a peer of Parliament. At the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII.'s reign, the income of the abbey was estimated at £880 14s. 7½d. The buildings of the abbey, which are partly convert dwelling-house, show that the struanciently have been of great magnificence. The Roll of F which was lodged in the k abbot, contained a list of a babot, contained a list of a babot, contained a list of a fonght on the Norman side in the Hastings. and is of comparatively little value as an authority. A remnant of the exceptional position of Battle Abbey is to be found in the fact that the incumbent of the parish is still included among the Deans of Peculiars, though he does not appear to have any special duties.

Baxter, RICHARD (b. 1615, d. 1691), a celebrated Nonconformist divine, was in earlier life a clergyman of the Church of England, and in 1640 was presented to the living of Kidderminster. During the Civil War he was chaplain to Whalley's regiment, and in this capacity was present at the sieges of Bridgewater, Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. He was a very moderate supporter of the Presbyterian church polity, and in temporal matters an adherent of limited monarchy; so that ho was a strong opponent of Cromwell during the later years of the Protector's life. At the Restoration Baxter was appointed one of the royal chaplains, and took a leading part in the Savoy conference. He was even offered the bishopric of Hereford, which he refused. In 1662, however, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, Baxter quitted the Church and remained for some years in retirement. In 1672 he settled in London, and lectured at several Dissenting places of worship. Subsequently, however, he was much harassed by legal proceedings under the Conventielo Act, and in 1685 was brought before Jeffreys, who, treating him with his usual brutality, sentenced him to eighteen months' imprisonment, and fined him 500 marks. Baxter was an extraordinarily prolific writer of polemics and works on divinity, and is said to have composed over 160 treatises. Some of them, e.g., The Saints' Everlasting Rest, and Reasons for the Christian Religion, are still widely popular.

Bayeux Tapestry, The, was in all probability the idea, and possibly, in great measure, the handiwork, of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It is a long narrow strip of tapestry or needle-work representing, in a number of pictures worked in woollen thread, the battle of Hastings and the events which led to it. It is twenty inches wide and two hundred and fonrteen feet long; and is divided into seventy-two compartments, with Latin superscriptions indicating the objects represented. The Tapestry is an authority of the utmost value for the period with which it deals. It was presented by Matilda to the cathedral of Bayeux, of which see her brother-in-law Odo was bishop, and it is to

The Bayeux Tapestr, has been reproduced in engravings by Stothard, folio, 1747, and in photographs by J. Comte, 4to, 1879. It has also been engraved by the Antiquarian Fociety, with elucidations by G. C. Bruce, 1855. For an exhaustive and valuable discussion of the character, origin, &c., of the Tapestry, see Freeman, Norman Conquest, iii. 533 seq.

Beachy Head, THE BATTLE OF (June 30, 1690), fought during the war of the Austrian Succession between the English and Dutch on the one side and the French on the other, terminated in a victory for the latter. Lord Torrington, who commanded the combined English and Dutch fleet, had abandoned the Isle of Wight to the French, under Tourville, and retreated np the Channel, when peremetery orders from the Privy Council to engage till enemy were sent him. Accordingly, when the enemy were sighted, he bore down upon them, placing the Dutch ships in the van. He had less than sixty sail of the line, and the French had eighty. But his ships were superior in equipment and crews to those of the enemy. The Dutch, under Evertsen, fought bravely for several hours, receiving very little assistance from the rest of the fleet, and they finally drew off in a shattered condition. Torrington thereupon sought refuge in the Thanes. His conduct and motives on this occasion were loudly condemned, and the action was looked upon as a highly disgraceful one for England. The only use Tourville made of his victory was to burn Teignmouth. [Torrington, Viscount.] Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., iii, 608.

Beacons, or signal-fires on the coast and on conspienous positions in the inland country, intended to give notice of the approach of an enemy or of other danger, have been ased from an early period in England. According to Stow, beacons were set up by Edward II. when the landing of Mortimer and Queen Isabella was expected. They were regularly used at stated places along the line of the Borders, to give warning of raids of the Scots. Lord Coke says that regular beacons, "pitch-boxes as they now be," were established only after the reign of Edward III. Inland beacons were erected by the sheriffs at the expense of the country; beacons on the coast were originally under the superintendence of the Lord High Admiral, and subsquently, by 8 Eliz, chap. 13, transferred to the corporation of Trinity House.

Beaconsfield, Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of (b. 1804, d. 1881), was the eldest son of Isaac Disraeli, the author of the Curiosities of Literature. In 1827 he published his first novel, Vivian Grey, and subsequently travelled on the Continent and in the East for some years In the year 1832 he appeared as the Radical candidate for High Wycombe. His opinions were gradually changing, and in 1836 he published a series called The Letters of Runny. mede, which was a violent attack on the Liberal party. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for Maidstono. His first speech in the House was a conspicuous failure; it concluded with the well-known words: "I have begun several times many things, and I have often snoceeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." During the first years of his parliamentary career he was a supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when l'eel pledged himself to abolish the Corn Laws in 1845 Mr. Disraeli turned towards the Protectionists, and at once became their leader. In December, 1852, Lord John Russell resigned, and Lord Derby entered office with Mr. Disraeli as Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1858 he returned to office and brought in a Reform Bill, which, however, did not meet with much support. The Liberals again returned to office, and for ten years longer Mr. Disraeli led the opposition, and severely criticised Lord Palmerston's foreign policy. In 1867 the Liberals once more resigned, and Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli came into power. They immediately brought in and carried a Reform Bill on the basis of household suffrage, which was carried after a violent and bitter struggle. In Feb., 1868, Lord Derby retired and Mr. Disraeli became Prime Minister. His tenure of office was, however, very short. Mr. Gladstone carried his Irish Church Resolutions against the government, and in the general election which followed the Conserva-tives were completely beaten. Mr. Disraeli declined to take office in 1872, but in 1874 Mr. Gladstone dissolved, and when a general election returned the Conservatives with a majority of fifty, Mr. Disraeli became Prime Minister, holding office for six years. Several measures of domestio legislation were passed during this period, including a Factory Act (1878), an Artisans' Dwellings Act, and the Agricultural Holdings Act. In March, 1876, public indignation in England was violently excited by the reports of atrocious cruelties practised by the Turks on the Bulgarian Christians; and the support given by the government to the Porte was made the text for vigorous attacks by some of the leading Liberal statesmen. In Aug., 1876, Mr. Disraeli was raised to the pacrage by the title of Earl of Beaconsfield. Throughout 1876 and 1877, the Prime Minister, in spite of much opposition in the country, and the withdrawal of two of his own colleagues, Lord Derby and Lord Camarvon, continued to maintain a guarded and even hostile attitude towards Russia; and when the Russians seemed about to enter Constantinople, the British fleet was ordered to the Dardanelles, and an Indian contingent was brought to Malta. When a treaty was someluded between the belliserents at San Stefano, Lord Beaconsfield insisted that the document should be submitted to the great powers. A general congress at Berl r. followed, which Lord Beaconsfield himself attended as one of the representatives of England, and in the summer of 1878 the Eastern Question was temporarily set at 1est by the Treaty of Berlin (q.v.). In the general election of 1880, the Liberals were victorious by an enormous majority, and Beaconsfield resigned. In the early weeks of 1881 he was prostrated by a complication of maladics, and succumbed, after a severe struggle, on April 19th. He was buried at Hughenden, in Buckinghamshire, and a memorial was voted to him in Westminster Abbey by Parliament. Lord Beaconsfield was the author of a poem, The Revolu-tionary Epic, a Life of Lord George Bentinck, several political pamphlets, and a number of novels, in which many of his ideas and theories on politics may be traced. The best known of these brilliant political romances are Sybil, Coningrby, Tancred, and Endymon, which last was published within a few months of the writer's death.

Beadle, or BEDELL (Old-Eng. bydel, from Anglo-Saxon, bodan, to bid), properly means the apparitor of a court who summoned persons to appear in answer to charges brought against them. Bedella seem before the Conquest to have occupied a position on the jurisdictions of the liberties, and lands held in sac and soc, corresponding to that of under-bailiff. The estate of Leominster had, according to Domesday Book, eight propositi, or reeves, and eight bedelli. Their privileges were, to have a little land of their own, and to be exempt from anual labour. The king's bedells were per a ages of considerable importance, and are mentioned in the lists of tenants-inchief in Bedfordshire. After the Conquest the office sank in importance, and the bedells ppear as criers in the manor courts, and in Shakespeare's time as petty village functionaries; in the forest courts they made proclarations and executed processes; while rural deans employed bedells to cite clergy to visitations, whence came the present parochial At Oxford University there is one esquire bedell and three yeomen bedells, each attached to the faculties of law, medicine, and arts; they are elected in con-vocation, and can be forced, if necessary, to resign at the end of the year. Their duty consists chiefly in bearing the maces before the Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor. At Cambridge, where there are three esquire bidells and one yeoman bedell, they are supposed to attend professors as well.

Beaton. David, Cardinal (b. 1494, d. 1546), the son of James Beaton, of Balfour, was educated at the University of Paris, where he became intimate with the Duke of Albany, and in 1519 was appointed ambassador from Scotland to the French Court. He was employed in various negotiations at Paris and Rome, in which he acquitted himself so well that he was made a cardinal by Paul III. in 1538. On the death of his uncle, Archbishop James Beaton, in 1539, he succeeded him as Archbishop of St. Andrews, in which capacity he showed much zeal in the persecution of the Protestants. Three years later, on the death of James V., he endeavoured to get possession of the infant Queen of Scots, and to obtain the regency by means of a forged will, but failed, and was for a timo imprisoned. On his release he became Chancellor of Scotland in 1546, and distinguished himself by his zeal in bringing to the stake those Protestants on whom he could liv hands. His cruelty towards the members of the Reformed party, together with his French and Italian sympathies, caused the cardinal to be bitterly hated by the Refermers. A plot (to which Henry VIII. and the English Privy Council were probably parties) was concocted for his assassination. On May 29, 1546, his castle of St. Andrews was seized by Norman Leslie, the Master of Rothes, with Kirkaldy of Grange, and others, and he was murdered. His character is thus stated in the Iconographia Scotica: -" The cardinal was by nature of immoderate ambition; by long experience he had acquired address and refinement, and insolence grew upon him from continual success. His high station in the Church placed him in the way of great employments; his abilities were equal to the greatest of these, nor did be reckon any of them to be above his merit.

. . . He was one of the worst of men—a prond, cruel, unrelenting, and licentious tyrant."

Beaton, James (d. 1539), was made High Treasurer of Scotland, 1505; in 1509 he w. appointed to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and in 1523 was translated to St. Andrews. He took part in the fray of "Cleanse the Causeway" (1520) between the Donglas and Hamilton factions, and subsequently became an object of intense interest to English politicians, who sought to win him over to an English alliance. He is said to have been 'very crafty and subtle," and he certainly managed to evade Wolsey's elaborate plans for getting possession of his person. At last, in a rash moment, the archbishop quitted the castle of St. Andrews, and was seized and imprisoned for a short time. He finally became an ally of England and a great friend of Wolsey.

As Chancellor of Scotland, he granted Queen Margaret a diverce from her husband, the Earl of Angus, though she found it necessary to obtain a papal dispensation as well.

Beaton, James, a pephew of Cardinal Beaton, obtained the archbishopric of Glasgow, 1552. He was secretary to Mary Queen of Scots, in whose behalf he pressed on an alliance with Spain, 1565. In later years he became Mary's ambassador in France, where he unsuccessfully attempted to obtain aid for her.

Beauchamp, The Family of, was founded in England at the Norman Conjuest by Hugh de Bello Campo or Beanchamp. The earldom of Warwick was conveyed to the family by Isatella, sister and heiress of William de Mauduit. She married William de Beauchamp, Baron of Elmsley (d. 1268), the seventh representative of the family from Hugh. Their son William was first Earl of Warwick, and Gny, the second earl, is known to history as "The Black Dog of Richard, the fifth earl, married the widow of his uncle, Richard Beanchamp, Earl of Worcester, and their son Henry was created Premier Earl of England and Duke of Warwick; but he died without male issue in 1445, so that the dukedom and the male line of this branch of Beanchamps expired. But his other honours passed to his daughter Anne, and on her death at the age of six they reverted to her aunt Anne, who married the great King-maker, Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, subsequently created Earl of Warwick. [Neville.] On the death of her daughters, Anne's inheritance was restored to her, and by her transferred to King Henry VII. The present F rl Beanchamp is descended from the second son of William de Beauchamp, Baron of Elmsley, in the female The peerage was created in 1815.

Beaufort. THE FAMILY OF, was descended from John of Gaunt and Catherine, widow of Sir Hugh Swynford. He married her in 1396, but all their children were born before this marriage. These children were four in number: John, created Earl of Somerset and Marquis of Dorset; Henry, afterwards Bishop of Win-chester and cardinal; Thomas, Chancellor and Duke of Exeter; and Juan, married to Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland. The name of Beaufort which they bore was derived from a castle belonging to the Duke of Lancaster in Anjon. They were all legitimated by a statute passed : by royal letters patent and a papal The letters patent were confirmed ry IV., who, however, introduced a restric.... clanse "excepta dignitate regali," which now appears as an interlineation in the patent roll of 20 Richard II. From John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, was descended Margaret, the mother of Henry VII., and thus arose the 'l'udor claim to the throne. [Tudon.] Charles Somerset, the illegitimate

Beaufort, HENRY, CARDINAL (b. 1377, d. 1447), was the natural son of John of Gaunt by Cather ne Swynford. Iu 1398 he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1405 translated to Winchester. In 1403 ho was appointed Chancellor, but resigned the Great Seal on his appointment to Winchester. During the latter part of Henry IV's reign, Beaufort sided with the Prince of Wales, and was accused, apparently not altogether without reason, of urging him to compel his father to abdicate in his favour. On Henry accession he once more received the Great Scal, which he retained till 1417, when he proceeded to Constance to attend the Council which was endeavouring to heal the great schism in the Church. Beaufort exerted his influence to induce the Council to elect a Pope before proceeding with the reformation of the Church. In gratitude for his assistance, the new Pope, Martin V., offered him a cardinal's hat, which, however, the king refused to allow him to accept. the accessior of Henry VI., Beaufort was appointed one of the members of the Council of Regency, and, in 1424, was for the third time invested with the office of Chancellor, which he held till 1426. Throughout the whole of Henry VI.'s minority, Beaufort's great aim was to counteract the dangerous influence of Gloucester, whose selfish schemes both at home and abroad threatened the greatest danger to the State. The first great quarrel between the rivals took place in 1425, when riots occurred in Loudon, and things were such a serious aspect that Bedford had to return from France and effect a reconciliation. In 1426 Beaufort committed the great mistake of his life in accepting the cardinal's hat; it laid him open to suspicion, and caused him to be regarded with distrust by many who had previously sided with him. In 1427 he led a futile crusade against the Hussites in Bohemia, and in 1429 he preached a crusade with the same object in England, got together troops, but took them to the assistance of the English in France instead of to Bohemia. From 1430 to 1434 Beaufort was for the most part abroad, and the next six years of his life were chiefly occupied in labouring for peace with France, Gloucester boing the leader of the war party. One result of his efforts was the assembly of the Congress of Arras, which, however, failed to effect anything. In 1440 he attempted to accomplish the same object by the release of the Duke of Orleans, who had been a prisoner since the battle of Agincourt, on the understanding that he should do his best to bring about a treaty. This was one of Beaufort's last public acts; he gradually retired from political life, and em-ployed his last years in the affairs of his diocese. In 1444 he had the satisfaction of seeing a truce made between England and France, and thus his policy was at last successful. He died peacefully very shortly after his great rival, Gloucester, and the legends which make him the murderer of the "Good Duke Humphrey," and paint the agonies of his death-bed, are unsubstantiated by the smallest particle of evidence. He had been for many years, certainly since the death of Bedford, the mainstay of the house of Lancaster. "It must be remembered in favour of Beaufort," says Dr. Stubbe, "that he guided the helm of State during a period in which the English nation tried first the great experiment of self-government with any approach to success; that he was merciful in his political enmities, enlightened in his foreign policy; that he was devotedly faithful and ready to sacrifice his wealth and labour for the king; that from the moment of his death everything began to go wrong, till all was lost,'

Beaufort, MARGARET (d. 1509), was the daughter of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and great granddaughter of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford. Left by the death of her father in the guardianship of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, she was married by him to his son John at the early age of nine years. Suffolk, however, was soon afterwards attainted and murdered at sea, and Margaret's marriage with John de la Pole was, as a consequence, pronounced a nullity. In 1455, when barely fifteen years of age, Margaret Beaufort married Edmund Tudor, Earl of Richmond, eldest son of Sir Owen Tudor, a Welsh knight, by Katherine of France, widow of King Henry V. This husband died in 1456, before her son Henry, afterwards Henry VII., was born, and she then, in 1459, married Sir Henry Stafford, a younger son of the Duke of Buckingham. In 1481 Margaret was once more a widow and in the following year, 1482, she married for the third and last time, her husband being Thomas, second Lord Stanley. By the Yorkist princes Margaret Beaufort appears to have been treated with an unusual degree of leniency, considering the prominent position she occupied among the Lancastrians in virtue of her son. Her wealth, which was great, was simply transferred, by Richard III., from her own direction to that of her husband, Lord Stanley, whose control over its disposal appears to have been merely nominal. She was the foundress of St. John's College, Cambridge, and gave many other benefictions to the two universities, and to many religious houses. The Lady Margaret Beaufort is the reputed author of The Mirronre of Golde to the Soul, adapted from a French translation of the Speculum Aureum Percatorum, and printed by Wynkin de Worde; and of a translation of the Imitation of Christ attributed to Gerson.

Beauge, THE BATTLE OF (1421), fought between the English, under the Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V., and a combined force of French and Scots, under the Dauphin and the Earl of Buchan. English were completely routed, and Clarence was slain. The effect of this battle in strengthening the Dauphin's party in France was very great, and Henry had to undertake another expedition to France to restore the prestige of the English.

Beaulieu Abbey, a famous abbey and sanctuary in Hampshire, was founded by King John for Cistercian monks in 1204. There Anne Neville, widow of the King-maker, took refuge after her husband's defeat and death at Barnet m 1471; and to Beaulieu it was that Perkin Warbeck fled in 1497, after the failure of his attempts to seize the crown.

Beaumont, The Families of. (1) Turolf, descendant of one of Rollo's comrades, married the sister of Gunnor, wife of Duke Richard the Fearless of Normandy. From this marriage descended Robert de Bellomonte, or Beaumont, who inherited the county of Meulan, in Normandy, from his mother, and, following the Conqueror into England, obtained there ninety-one manors. In reward for the support he gave to Henry I., he received the carldon of Leicester. His eldest son Waleran succeeded to the county of Meulan; his second son Robert to the English earldom. With the death of the fourth earl, Robert. without issue, 1204, the earldon expired. Simon de Montfort, afterwards leader of the crusade against the Albigenses, having married Amicia, eldest sister of the last earl, received a grant of the earldom from John. (2) Henry de Beaumont, styled in 1307 "consanguineus regis," and possibly a descendant of a natural daughter of Henry I., was summoned to Parlinment in 1309 as a baron. His descendant, John Beaumont, sixth baron, was created viscount 1440, being the first of that dignity in England. His son, a partisan of the house of Lancaster, was attainted 1461, and his estates conferred on Lord Hastings. In 1485 he was restored in blood and honour, but on his death without male heir the viscounty became extinct. In 1840 the abeyance of the burony was terminated in favour of Bliles Stapleton, a descendant of the last viscount's sister.

Beaumont, HENRY DE (d. 1340), was the son of Louis of Brienne, and grandson of John of Brienne, King of Jerusalem. Ho was employed by Edward I. in Scotland, and became one of Edward II.'s favourite advisers. . In 1311 the Ordainers demanded his banishment, but this does not seem to have been carried out, as we find him subsequently enjoying the royal favour. He deserted Edward in 1326, and joined Isabella and Mortimer, who confirmed him in his possessions, and gave him some of the confiscated lands of the Despensers.

Becket, St. Thomas, Archeishop or CANTERBURY (b. 1118, d. 1170), was the son of Gilbert Becket, a native of Rouen, a merchant. and at one time port-reeve of London. His mother was a native of Caen. Thomas was put to school-first at Merton Priory, and then in London. He was trained in knightly exercises in the household of Richard de L'Aigle at Pevensey, and grew tall and "rong. His father lost monoy, and Thomas b. came a clerk in the office of Osbern Eightpenny, his kinsman, and there gained a good insight into business. He was introduced into the household of Archbishop Theobald, and took minor orders. As Theobald introduced the teaching of canonical jurisprudence into England, Thomas, who soon became his favourite, devoted himself to that study. He went to Bologna, where Gratian was lecturing, and stayed there a year, and then went to Auxerre. On his return Theobald employed him in some important negotiations. In 1152 ho prevailed on Pope Eugenius to forbid the coronation of Eustace, and thus paved tho way for the success of Henry of Anjou. The urchbishop richly rewarded Bocket's services. He was made rector of St. Mary-le-Strand and of Oxford in Kent, and prebendary of St. Paul'. and Lincoln; in 1154 Archdeacon of Canterbury and Provost of Beverley. When Henry succeeded to the throne he made Thomas his Chancellor. The early years of the reign must have been full of work for the new Thomas was zeelous for his When Henry levied scutage on Church lands the Chancellor approved the step, while his old patron Theobald opposed it. The scant regard which he had for ecclesiastical pretensions is proved by the part which he took in the suit between the Bishop of Chichester and the Abbot of Battle (Chron. de Bello. pp. 88-104). Much of the time of the Chancellor was taken np with hearing causes, and he visited some counties as an itinerant justice. His style of living was splendid, and many young nobles were educated in his household, among whom was the king's eldest son, Henry. This splendour was remarkably displayed in his embassy to Louis VII., in 1158, to arrange the marriage of the young Henry. In the expedition to Toulouse the next year, he fitted out and maintained a large force at his own expense, and, clad in armonr, led his troops in person, and distinguished himself in the field.

In 1161 Henry was anxious to make his Chancellor archbishop. Thomas was unwilling to accept the office, and told the king that it would cost him the royal favour. The mext year he was elected by the monks of Christ Church and by the suffragan bishops and clergy of Canterbury. He was ordained priest, and the following day received conscration. From that time the life of Thomas was changed. Till then his sympathies and efforts had been wholly for the king; henceforward they were devoted to the Church. The man remained the same-impulsive, vigorous, obstinate, and sensitive. He was not such as would serve two masters, and soon resigned the Chancellorship. He made somo devoted friends, and already had many enemies. Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London, a strict occlesiastic, disliked the appointment of one who had led so secular a life, and this feeling was probably shared by many. In reclaiming the property of his see, Thomas made other enemies, and seems to have acted with impolitic violence. In 1163 he attended tho Council of Tours, and came back filled with thoughts of the power of the Church. He soon increased the feeling of distrust awakened in the king's mind by the resignation of the Chancellorship, for he excommunicated one of the tenants of the crown, contrary to the rule haid down by the Conqueror. He also opposed a change which the king wished to make with reference to the assessment of a tax, which Dr. Stubbs has thought (Const. Hist., i. 462) to have probably been the Danegeld, and high words passed between the king and the archhishop. The same year (1163), in a Council at Westminster, Henry proposed his plan of bringing criminal clerks under the jurisdiction of the lay courts. Though this change was necessary for the welfare of the state, it was naturally offensive to churchmen. Thomas was not alone in objecting to it; he was alone in daring to withstand it. Henry complained of the exactions of the ecclesistical courts, and demanded whether the hishops could agree to the enstons of his grandfather. By the advice of the archhishon they answered that they would do so "saving their order." This answer enraged the king, and Thomas was called on to sarren ler the honours of Eye and Berkhampstead. In Jan., 1164, at a Council at Clarendon, the famous Constitutions were brought forward which purported to be declaratory of the ancient customs of the kingdom. These Constitutions, by bringing the clergy under secular jurisdiction, by their settlement of the election and status of bishops, hy taking away the right of free appeal to Rome, and by other provisions, tended to destroy all clerical immunities. Thomas was persuaded to consent to them. After he had done so he repented, withdrew his consent, and begged the Pope to pardon him for his weakness. October the same year the archbishop was cited to a council at Nerthampton. He was not summoned personally, as was his right, but through the shoriff of Kent, to answer a plaint made against him by John the Marshal. At this council a violent attack was made upon him, and he was commanded to render an account of his chancellorship, though he had received an acquittance on his resignation. The hishops did not stand hy him. Some, like the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Chiehester, were his enemies; others were afraid of the king. The archbishop saw that the king was determined to crush him. He fled, took ship, and, landing near Gravolines, found shelter in the Abbey of St. Bertin. Flanders was, however, no safe place of refuge. Louis, glad of an opportu-nity of embarrassing Henry, welcomed the archbishop to France. Alexander III. was at Sens, having been forced to leave Italy by the Emperor Frederic. His fear of turning Henry wholly to the side of the Emperor made the Pope half-hearted and vaciliating in his support of the archhishop, and he commanded him to take no steps against the king for awhile. Henry confiscated the revenues of the see, and banished ull the kindred of the archbishop. His violent measures were carried out with great brutality by Ranulf de Broc. Thomas found shelter in the Cistercian Abbey of Pontigny. There he led a life of ascetic severity, and gave himself to the study of the Canon Law, which must have strengthened his resolution to de and the rights of the elergy. In 1166 Alexander was able to return to Rome. Freed from the papal prohibition, the archhishop at Vezelay sclemnly excommunicated his most violent enemics, and, with a voice broken with emotion, declared that, unless the king repented, he would excommunicate him also. In return Henry, by threatening the Cistercians, compelled them to cause the archbishop to leave Pontigny. He took shelter at Sens. The Pope was still in danger from Frederic, and disapproved the Vezelay excommuni-cations. In 1167 he thwarted the archbishop by sending legates to Henry, and thus sus-pending his legative power. The destruction of Frederic's army hy pestilence did not enable the Pope to act more firmly, for he was forced to remain in exile. In 1169 a meeting took place between Henry and the archhishop at Montmirail in the presence of Louis. The archhishop refused to submit to the judgment of the two kings, except with the condition "saving the honour of God," and no good was done. The same year another meeting took place at Montmartre, and ended in failure, for Henry refused the archbishop the kiss of peace. Alexander was anxious to end the quarrel. He was annoyed by the violence of the archbishop, and excited his indignation by absolving the Bishops of London and Salishnry whom Thomas had excommunicated. Henry, in 1170, caused his eldest son to be crowned by the Archbishop of York. This was a violation of the rights of Canterbury, and Thomas threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, which he now had power from the Pope to pro-nounce. Louis was enraged with Henry, and formed a combination against him. [HENRY II.] A reconciliation was effected at Freteval, July 21. Even after this the king and the archbishop were on anything but friendly terms. The king complained because Thomas delayed his return to England, for he was anxious to get him out of France. The archbishop complained of the injuries done to his see. Henry still put off the kiss of peace. The archbishop landed in England Dec. 1, and was greeted with delight by the people. A morbid desire for martyrdom had taken hold of his mind. He came back with no intention of living in peace with his enemies; he would withstand them to the end, and lay down his life for the cause of the Church. He sent before him papal letters suspending and excommunicating the bishops who had taken part in the coronation. He went to London to see his former pupil, Prince Henry, and all the city was moved with joy at his coming. Young Henry refused to see him, and bade him return to his see. His enemies, and especially the family of De Broc, annoyed him in every way in their power; and, on Christmar , he uttered a violent anathema against them. When the king heard of the excommunication of the bishops he spoke tho well-known hasty words of anger against the archbishop. Four of his knights, Hngh de Morville, Reginald FitzUrse, William de Tracy, and Richard Brito, acted on these words. They crossed to England, took with them Ranulf de Broc and a band of men, and murdered the archbishop in Canterbury Cathedral, Dec. 29, 1170. The Archbishop was canonised 1173, and his festival was appointed for the day of his martyrdom. The impression that the martyrdom made on the popular mind was very deep, and for three centuries after his death his shrine was the favourite place of pilgrimage for Englishmen.

Beckford, ALDERMAN (b. 1709, d. 1770), was an extremely wealthy merchant, owning large estates in the West Indies. through the regular steps of municipal dignity, he became an alderman, and was also returned to Parliament for the City of London. Both in Parliament and in the Common Council he was a firm and enthusiastic supporter of Lord Chatham. In 1768 Beckford became Lord Mayor, and in the following year he was re-elected—an almost unprecedented honour. With the Cityanthorities the government was very unpopular, nor had it a flerer opponent than the Lord Mayor. A petition from the Corporation of London to the king had been treated as unconstitutional and unworthy of an answer. A remonstrance was next sent, to which the king replied with a dignified rebuke. Nevertheless, Beckford, on May 23rd, laid another remonstrance before the king, and, when the king had expressed his annoyance and displeasure, "The inproceeded to argue with him. "The in-solence of Beckford," says an eye-witness, "exceeded all his or the City's past exploits." Within a month he was dead of a fever, which common report said was caused by the excitement of his interview with the king. Beckford's enormous wealth descended to his son William, the eccentric author of Vathek.

Bedchamber Question, THE (1839-1841). On the resignation of Lord Melbourne in 1839, Sir Robert Peel was summoned to form a ministry. On his mentioning incidentally to the Queen the changes which he thought it necessary to make in the royal household, he received a letter from her Majesty saying that the removal of the ladies of her bedchamber would be repugnant to her feelings. Finding that Sir Robert would not give way on this point, the Queen summoned Lord Melbourne to her aid. Lord Morpeth's sister and Lady Normanby were the two ladies to whom Peel specially obected. The desire to support the Queen induced the Whig statesmen, in spite of their previous humiliations, to return to their posts. In 1841, on the downfall of the Whig ministry, the question arose again. The Prince Consort, however, arranged that three great Whig ladies should resign the situations which they held in the Household of their own accord. This prudent compromise settled the difficulty, and saved the assertion of Peel's principle.

Bede (BEDA) (b. 673, d. 735) was born probably at Jarrow, in the territory of the abbey of Wearmouth, founded by Benedict Biscop. By this learned man Bede was educated, and eventually entered the monastery of Jarrow, an offshoot of the Wearmouth foundation. Here Bede spent the remainder of his life, dividing all the time not engrossed by religious teaching between learning and teaching. He was a very prolific anthor, as is sufficiently proved by the long list of his writings which he appended in his fifty-ninth year to his Reclesiastical History, and even on his death-bed he was busy with literary labour. work is the Historia Ecclesiastica Gentie Anylorum, on which his fame rests. It is divided into five books. The first twentytwo chapters of the first book form only an introduction, wherein, after a short description of Britain and its ancient inhabitants, we have the history of the country, reaching from Julius Casar to the introduction of Christianity among the Angles by Gregery's missionaries. From this point only (chap. 25) begins the independent research The Church history of the Eng carried down in this book to the Gregory the Great (604). The r begins with a long obituary of this I. ..., so important for the English Church, and ends with the death of Edwin, King of North-umbria (633). The third book reaches to 635. Here begins the fourth book, extending to the death of Cuthbert (687), the famous seint already twice celebrated by Bede himself. The last book (to the year 731) concludes with a survey of the several sees, and of the general state of Britain in that year. Bede's History is our main and, indeed, almost our only authentic source of information for the century and a half that followed the conversion of the English to Christianity, and is therefore a work of much interest and importance, apart from its attractions of Besides the Historia Ecclesiastica, which was translated into Anglo-Saxon, it is said, by King Alfred, Bede wrote a very large number of minor works, among which are a Life of St. Cuthbert; a Chronicon, or general summary of history up to the year 729; The Lives of the Abbots of Wear-mouth and of Jarrow, and An Epistle to Egbert, Archbishop of York, which gives an interesting account of the state of the Church. All are of considerable historical importance, though they yield in interest to the Ecclesiastical History. The greater number of Bede's com-positions—said to have amounted to nearly 150-were probably theological treatises or commentaries on the Scriptures.

The best edition of Bede is that of Dr. Gilse, in six vols., Lond., 1848, &c.; and there is a good edition of the Historical Works by Mr. Stevenson (Eng. Hist. Soc.), in two vols., Lond., 1841. An edition of the Hist. Eccle. Anglor. has been published by the Clarendon Press, and there is a translation in Bohu's Antiquarien Library. A scholarly edition of Books iii. and iv. of the History has been published by the Pitt Press, under the editorship of Prof. Mayor and Mr. Lumby, which contains a vast amount of learning and research, and is enriched with a translation of Ebert's account of Bede, from which the main facts stated above have been gathered.

Bedford first appears in history in 571, when the Britons were defeated there by the Saxons, under Cuthwulf. The castle underwent many sieges. In 1138 it was taken by King Stephen, and in 1215, during the war between John and the barons, it was captured by Falkes de Breauté, who continued to hold it till 1224, when he took one of the justices prisoner. Thereupe an force was levied against him, and Bedford was besieged. On its capture, the castic was dismantled. During the Great Rebellion Bedford declared for the Parliament, but in 1643 was captured by the Royalists.

Bedford, PENRAGE OF. In 1415, John, third son of Henry IV., was created Duke of Bedford. In 1549, John Russell, Lord High Steward of England, who had received the lands of the Abbey of Woburn, in Bedfordshire, was created Earl of Bedford. In 1694 William Russell, fifth earl, was created Duke of Bedford.

Bedford, John, Duke of (b. 1389, d. 1435), was the third son of Henry IV., and was created Duke of Bedford in 1415. In 1416 he distinguished himself by defeating the French fleet, and in the next year commanded an expedition to Scotland to avenge the "Foul Raid" (q.v.). During Henry V.'s absence in France, Bedford was appointed Licutenant of England, and on his death-bed Henry constituted him Regent of France. To cement the Burgundian alliance, Bedford, in 1422, married the sister of the Duke of Burgundy, and by the vigour and ability of his administration the English not only succeeded in maintaining their conquests for several years, but even gained ground upon their enemies. In 1424 he won the great victory of Verneuil; but the relief of Orleans interfered with the progress of the English arms, and in revenge for the powerful aid she had given to the enemy, Bedford caused Joan of Arc when she fell into his hands to be burned to death as a witch. 1432 his wife died, and in the next year he married Jacquetta of Luxemburg, thereby increasing Burgundy's estrangement from the English. In home affairs Bedford was always ready to act as the mediator between Gloncester and Beaufort, and ty his influence over the former was able to restrain his reckless and extravagant disposition to a certain degree. The latter years of Bedford's life were embittered by the follies of Gloucester, the successes of the French, and the defection of Burgundy. With him perished all hopes of English supremacy in France, and all chance of retaining even Normandy and Gnienne. A brave soldier, a skilful general, a prudent and far-sighted politician, and, taken altogether, a just and merciful governor, Bedford had in him many of the elements of greatness. "He was certainly equal," says Mr. Stevenson, "possibly superior, to Henry the Fifth. But for the treacherous friendship of the Duke of Burgundy, he would probably have overrun France and expelled Charles the Seventh. It is questionable whether the hero of Agincourt would have been able to effect to much as the hero of Verneuil did." His misfortune was that he was the champion of a cause which was radically unjust, and which was destined from the beginning to ultimate failure. The greatest blot on Bedford's memory is his treatment of Joan of Arc, which it is difficult to palliate; it was equally cruel and impolitic. But, if we except this episode, Bedford was seldom guilty either of harshness or impolicy.

Bedford, JOHN RUSSELL, 1ST EARL OF (d. 1555), was a gentleman of Dorsetshire attached to the court of Henry VIII. Russell obtained considerable grants out of the monastery spoils, and thus laid the foundation of the wealth of his family. In 1536 he co-operated energetically with the Duke of Suffolk in repressing the first seeds of discontent in Lincolnshire. Later on in his career Russell again distinguished himself by the complete suppression of the revolutionary outbreak of 1549 in the western counties. Defeating the insurgents in a pitched battle at St. Mary's Clyst, he succeeded in relieving the city of Excter, which had just previously been hard pressed by the rebel forces; and in entirely destroying their hopes in Cornwall and Devonshire, which were at once placed under martial law. In the Council, Russell, after these events, took part with Warwick against Somerset, and materially contributed to hasten the Protector's fall. Wor his services on this occasion Russell, who had been made a peer in 1539, was now, in 1550, created, by Northumberland's influence, Earl of Bedford. On the death of Edward VI. Russell thought it prudent to conform to the Catholic mode of worship. He continued accordingly under Mary to enjoy the royal favour, and he was employed by her on several embassies of importance.

Bedford, Francis Russell, 2nd Earl of (b. 1528, d. 1585), was one of Elizabeth's most trusted counsellors in the early part of her reign. In 1561 he was sent on a special embassy to the Court of France, and three years later to Scotland in conjunction with Sir Thomas Randolph. He subsequently commanded the Northern army at Berwick, and in 1566 was sent to represent Elizabeth at the baptism of James VI. In the course of his negotiations in Scotland he managed to incur the displeasure of the queen, who accused him of taking part with the Scotla lords against Mary, whose marriage with the Duke of Norfolk he subsequently opposed.

In politics he occupied a moderate position. He was a personal friend of Pym, but was desirous of devising a modus virendi between king and Parliament. He was the head of the Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Ripon with the Scots in 1640, and in the early part of the next year, when Charles conceived the idea of forming a ministry from the more moderate of the opposition leaders, he offered Bedford the post of Lord Treasurer and practically that of Prime Minister. This scheme, which seemed to promise success, was frustrated by the sudden death of the Earl of Bedford from small-pox. Clarendon sums up his character thus:—"He was a wise man, and would have proposed and advised moderate courses; but was not incapable, for want of resolution, of being carried into violent ones if his advice was not submitted to; and therefore many who knew him well thought his death not unseasonable, as well to his fame as his fortune."

Bedford, WILLIAM RUSSELL, 1ST DUKE OF (b. 1613, d. 1700), was the son of the fourth Earl of Bedford. He was an opponent of the arbitrary policy of Charles I. and Strafford. and a moderate supporter of the Parliament. When the Civil War broke out he joined the Parliamentary standard with a body of horse, and took part in the battle of Edgehill; but he separated from the Parliament in 1645, and joined the king. He was present at the battle of Newbury, on the Royalist side, and greatly distinguished himself. His estates were confiscated, but he succeeded in making his peace with the Parliament and getting them restored. He took some part in the Restoration, and was a prominent supporter of William of Orange at the Revolution of 1688, after which event (in 1694) he was created Duke of Bedford.

Bedford, John Russell, 4th Duke of (b. 1710, d. 1771), succeeded to the dukedom in 1732. Ten years later he took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole. In 1744 he was appointed a Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, and a member of the Privy Council. He was soon afterwards appointed First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1748, on the resignation of Lord Chesterfield, he was appointed Secretary of State for the Southern Department, but resigned in 1751, on the dismissal of Lord Sandwich. Five years later he was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant. In that office he did not succeed, and exasperated the Irish by asking for his sisterin-law a pension on the Irish establishment. His principle of government was to silence opposition by donatives: nor did he forget his friends, especially Rigby, in the general distribution of Irish money. In 1761 he of the Iraining resigned on Bute's accession to power. In the following year he went to Paris as plenipotentiary to negotiate for peace. In the Grenville ministry he became President of the Council. vards, in vel. In on. Bedford Level is the name given to a flat district in the east of England, which comprises the Fen country, and includes parts of Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdonehire, Northamptonehire, and Lincoln-ahire. During the earlier Middle Ages this district was a vast swamp, partly inundated by the sea. Attempts were made to reclaim it in the reigns of Henry VI. and VII., and an Act was passed for this purpose in 1601. In 1634, Francis, Earl of Bedford, and a number of other landowners of the eastern counties, obtained permission from the crown to drain the district on condition of receiving 95,000 acres of the reclaimed lands for themselves. The works, however, owing to disagreement with the crown, and the Civil War, were suspended for some years till 1649, when the undertaking was renewed. In 1664 the company was incorporated by royal charter, and it still exists. The operations of the original projectors have been largely supplemented by drainage works undertaken in more recent times.

on his Crusade (1271). On his return he took orders, and was made Archdescon of Durham in the year 1279, and bishop in 1283. In 1290 he was sent by Edward to act in concert with the guardians of Scotland, and with the advice of the Estates as lieutenant for Queen Margaret and her husband; and in 1294 he was employed as ambassador to the Emperor. He accompanied the king in his expedition to Scotland in 1296, commanded a division of cavalry at Falkirk in 1298, and was present at the siege of Caer-laverock in 1300. In the same year he be-came engaged in a quarrel with the monks who constituted the chapter, which lasted the rest of his life. His first quarrel with Edward was occasioned by his refusal to show his franchises to the royal officers, but this difference was soon compremised, and in 1295 Bek was appointed one of the guardians of the counties beyond the Trent. He obtained the empty but high-sounding title of Patriarch of Jerusalem from Clement V., to which he added the title of "King of the Isle of Man." After he got possession of the island by mertgage, Edward I. compelled him to hold it "as of the him?" site" and the him? it "as of the king's gift," and deprived him of his palatine rights over Durham; these were, however, restored by Edward II., with whom he was a great favourite, and he enjoyed them till his death in 1310. Bek represented the Baronial party in the Church, which saw in Edward I.'s consolidating and centralising policy the overthrow of its own privileges.

Bekeagsog, The Convention or (Oct. 3, 1805), was concluded between Great Britain and Sweden, in order to enable Sweden to oin heartily in the European coalition against Napoleon. The terms of the convention Napoleon. were very much the same as those of the Convention of Helsingborg, which had been concluded in the preceding Angust, and consisted in an arrangement as to the subsidy to be supplied by Great Britain. Sweden agreed to empley 12,000 men in Pomerania, for whom England was to pay at the rate of £12 10s. annually for each man. Pay for five months was to be handed over to Sweden in advance, and £50,000 was to be paid down at once for the purpose of putting Stralsund into an efficient state of defence.

Belaz , John. Lord (d. 1689), was the second son of Lord Fauconberg, and, like his father, took a prominent part on the Royalist side in the Civil War. He took part in the battles of Edgehill, Newbury, and Naseby, and the sieges of Reading and Bristol, and subsequently was made Governor of York. He was wounded several times, and three times suffered imprisonment in the Tower. He was raised to the peerage in 1644, and at the Restoration was appointed commander of the force in Africa and governor of Tangiers, which offices he held till 1667. In the reign of James II, he was appointed one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Belesme, ROBERT OF, one of the Norman followers of William the Conqueror, and eldest son of Earl Roger of Shrewsbury, was created Earl of Montgomery. He was the leader of the disaffected barons against tho Norman kings. In 1077 he joined Robert against his father, in 1087 he opposed William II.'s accession to the English throne, and in 1101 supported Robert's claims against Henry I. On this latter occasion ho was benished from England, to the great joy of the people, and sought refuge in Normandy. In 1112 ho was sent to Henry as an ambassador by the French king, but Henry served him as a rebel and kept him a prisoner till his death, the date of which is unknown. He stands out as the very worst example of the feudal noble. "His contemporaries," says Lappenberg, "are unanimous in descrioing him as one of the most detostable characters known in history, to whom the most unheard-of barbarities were not merely acts of revenge, but an insatiable enjoyment." Ordericus Vitalis exclaims, when mentioning his banishment from England in 1101, " Rejoice, King Henry, and give thanks to the Lord God, for you became a free ruler from the day when you banished Robert of Belesmo from your realm."

Belfast was the site of an important Norman castle which was in the possession of the De Burghs, Earls of Ulster, in the thirteenth century. In 1333, William de Burgh was murdered there by the rebellious English of the Pale. The castle subsequently fell into the hands of the O'Neils, from whom it was taken after the rebellious of Shane O'Neil, and forfeited to the crown. In 1604 the castle and district was granted to Sir Arthur Chichester, who settled there numerous colonists from Devonshire. The castle was rebuilt, and a town speedily grew up round it. In 1611 the town was constituted a borough. In 1637 Strafford gave it certain trading privileges which did much to increase its prosperity. The city has become the chief manufacturing and commercial town in Ireland. By the Irish Universities Act of 1908, Belfast was granted a University.

Belgs, The, were the inhabitants of part of the south and south-west of ancient Britain. Their districts included the modern counties of Hants, Wilts, Dorset, and part of Somerset. They were in all likelihood closely connected with the Continental Belgs and are generally considered to have belonged to the Gallic branch of the Celtic stock, and to have migrated to Britain from north-eastern Gaul. It is probable that they contained a very considerable intermixture of dermanle elements, and Mr. Wright, and some other authorities, have maintained that the Belgae were, in fact, a Teutonic tribe, and were comparatively late settlers in this island. A directly opposite opinion has, however, been maintained by other Celtic scholars. [Batrons; Celts.]

Belgian Question, THE (1830-32). The effect of the French Resolution of July, 1830, in Europe, was to cause a general uprising of nationalities. Belgium, among others, threw off the yoke of Holland, and all Europe now became interested in the settlement of the difficulty. The Dutch government applied to Lord Aberdeen for troops. Thereupon he summoned the London Conference. This Conference in vain uttempted to solve the question. It lingered on till Sept. 30, 1832, and then separated, having effected nothing, the final cause of separation being a difference of opinion between the three Northern and the two Western powers as to the employment of force. A convention was immediately concluded between England and France for carrying out the stipulations of the treaty of November. This treaty was signed Oct. 22, and on the 6th Nov. an embargo was laid on all vessels bearing the Dutch flag in British ports. A French army entered Holland and captured Antwerp; and the war was over. Belgium gained her independence with the capitulation of Antwerp.

Belleisle, (1) THE BATTLE OF, was fought Oct. 25, 1747, and resulted in the defeat of the French by the English fleet commanded by Admiral Hawke. Early in the day Hawke fell in with a large fleet of merchant ships bound for the West Indies, and convoyed by nine men-of-war. Without waiting for his ships to fall into line of battle, he vigorously attacked the enemy, and was rewarded with the capture of seven out of the nine men-of-war. The French were completely defeated, and the admiral received the honour of knighthood for the exploit.—(2) THE CAPTURE OF, took place during the Seven Years' War. In 1761 (June 7), a fleet under Admiral Keppel, conveying 8,000 troops under General Hodgson, arrived before the south-east point of the island. The troops, after being once re-pulsed, made good their landing, captured Palais, the chief town of the island, and compelled the garrison to capitulate. The island was held till the close of the war (1763). Bellingham, Sin Edward (d. 1549), was sent to Ireland as Lord Deputy by Somerset in 1548, having previously won fame for himself in Hungary and at Boulogne, as well as in the Isle of Wight, where. I his capacity of governor, he defeated the Inch in 1545. His short period of rule in Ireland was eminently successful, and was marked by strong, wise, and vigorous administration.

Benares, The Treaty of (Aug., 1773), was concluded between Warren Hastings and the Vizier of Oude. Its stipulations were that Hastings should lend the Vizier an English force to be used against the Rohillas, and should code the districts of Corah and Allahabad; that the Vizier should give a donation of forty lace of rupees, and a monthly payment of two lacs for the services of the troops; and that he should pay fifty lacs additionally for the ceded districts. Benbow, John, Admiral (b. 1653, d. 1702), entered the merchant service very early in In 1680 he was master of a ship which traded in the Mediterranean. He is said to have pickled the heads of a crew of Sallee pirates, which he threw down as salt provisions on the table of the Cadiz magistrates. On his return James II. placed him in command of a ship in the Royal Navy. William III. employed him in checking the Dutch privateers, and in bombarding the French ports, duties which he carried out with courage and success. In 1698 he was sent with a squadron to the West Indies. There he attempted to settle the disputes which had broken out between the Spanish and English settlers owing to the attempted colonisation of the isthmus of Darien by the Scotch. On nis return ho was made Vice-Admiral (1700). He was sent out again in order to engage the Spanish colonies to disown Philip, the French claimant to the crown of Spain; or, if they refused this, to seize their galleons. arrived at Barbadoes in 1701 and sailed thence for Jamaica, where he heard that Du Casse had arrived with a squadron of French ships in order to crush the English slave trade. On August 19th, 1702, Benbow, while c.uising off St. Domingo, came in sight of Du Casse. He resolved to attack, but the captains of his three best ships, from motives of personal dislike, refused to bring their vessels into action. Benbow, however, with his own ship, fought the enemy for four days. At last the captains addressed a written remonstrance to him, in which they declared that the odds were too great for a continuance of the conflict. Benbow, who was badly wounded, returned to Jamaica to die. Before his death he had the satisfaction of procuring the condemnation of two of his captains, and the dismissal of the third from the service.

Benburb, THE BATTLE OF (June 5th. 1640), was fought between Owen Roe O'Neil and General Monroe with the Scottish and English troops. O'Neil had his rear protected by a wood, and his right by the Blackwater. Monroe had ordered his brother to join him with a considerable force, but this O'Neil prevented, while he amused the Scots by feints till his own forces, detached for this purpose, had rejoined him. Monroe now tried to retreat, but was at once charged by the Irish, his horse fled, and the only formidable stand was made by an English regiment under Lord Blaney; when they had been cut to pieces the rest of the Scots fled in disorder. Lords Montgomery and Blaney, with 21 officers and 150 men, as well as all the artillery and ammunition, were captured, Monroe himself escaping with difficulty. Altogether, 3,243 of the English and Scots fell, while the victors lost 70 killed and 200 This battle was the last great wounded. victory achieved by an Irish general on Irish Bencoolen, in Sumatra, was held by the East India Company as a trading settlement from 1682 to 1824. It was attacked and laid in ruins by the French in 1760. In 1824 it was given up to the Dutch in exchange for their Malacca settlements.

Benedict Biscop was born of a good Northumbrian family, and was in the service of King Oswy. In 653 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return laboured hard in missionary work in the north of England. After two years he undertook a second journey to Rome, and subsequently entered the Benedictine monastery of Lerins, where he took the tensure, and remained some time. He then went to Rome again, and was commissioned to return to England as assistant and interpreter to Archbishop Theodorie. On their arrival in England, Benedict was made abbot of the monastery of St. Peter's, at Canterbury. At the expiration of two years he abandoned this office, and undertook another journey to On his return he received from Rome. Egfrith of Northumbria a grant of land at the mouth of the Wear (674). Here he founded a monastery with a church of stone, and glass windows, and endowed it with numerous books, pictures, and relics, obtained by him on his journeys to Rome. In 682 he founded a second monastery at Jarrow, where Bede spent most of his life. By the impulse he gave to monasticism and to ecclesiastical Benedictines, THE, were the most important of the monastic orders, founded 529 by St. Benedict of Nursia (480-542). Up to this time there had been neither uniformity nor permanence in monastic societies. Benedict's work was that of organisation; instead of fluctuating assemblies of individuals, there was to be a careful gradation of ranks and duties; and though the abbot was bound to consult the monks, his authority was supreme. Moreover, though the Benedictine rule was milder than previous practices, the vow was rendered irrevocable. Instead of devoting themselves entirely to contemplation, the monks were to busy themselves in manual labour or in reading. Soon most of the monasteries of the West were subject to the Benedictine rule. There is some doubt as to the exact date of the introduction of the Benedictine rule into England. Probably it was introduced by Augustino, whose companions were in all likelihood Benedictine monks, but the first introduction is also claimed for Benedict Biscop, and for Wilfrid. The order is mentioned in a charter of Kenred's to the monks of Evesham in 709; but Bedo has no reference to it, nor is it alluded to in the act regulating the English clergy at Clovesho in 747. It was not till the time of Edgar that the strict Benedictine rule, under the auspices of Ethelwold, Dunstan, and Oswald (himself a Benedictine of Fleury), became generally prevalent in England, and a "Concord of Rules" was promulgated by Dunstan for the guidance of English monks. Henceforward the Benedictines became by far the richest and most powerful of the monastic orders in England. All the cathedral convents, except Carlisle, and four of the cathedrals instituted by Henry VIII., namely, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, and Peter-borough, and all the English mitred abbeys except Waltham and Cirencester, belonged to the Benedictino order. So important are they in comparison with all other orders of monks in England, that the history of English monasticism is to a large extent the history of the English Benedictines. [MONASTICISM.] At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, the number of Benedictine abbeys and colls was 113, with revenues amounting to over £57,000, besides 73 Benedictine nunneries with revenues of nearly £8,000.

Benefice denotes "the right which a clerk has to enjoy certain ecclesiastical revenues on condition of discharging certain services." For the enjoyment of a benefice four things are necessary:—(1) Ordination as a priest: a deacon or a lawman may be presented, but he must be ordained priest before he can be instituted. (2) Irecentation by the putron. In theory, a patron, himself a clerk, may petition for his own admission; but the usual plan is to make over the right to some other person before the benefice becomes vacant. (3) Institution to the cure of souls by the bishop, if satisfied of the sufficiency of the clerk. If the bishop refuse, the patron has a remedy by quare impedit in the common law court, and must show satisfactory reasons for his refusal. When the bishop is himself patron, there is neither presentation nor institution, but collation. (4) Induction to the temporalities by the archdeacon or a neighbouring clergyman upon the hop's mandate. The papal power of grantius dispensation from that canon of the Lateran Council of 1215, which forbade the holding of two benefices by the same person, was transferred at the Reformation to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But the evils of pluralism were so great that by the Acts 1 and 2 Vict., c. 106, and 13 and 14 Vict., c. 98, it was forbidden to hold two benefices unless the churches were within the miles of one another, and the value of one was not greater than £100. Vicarages, rectories, perpetual curacies, and chaplaincies are termed beneficies, in contradistinction to dignities such as bishoprics, etc.

Benefit of Clergy was the right claimed by the clergy to immunity from secular jurisdiction in certain cases. Cases in which it might be urged were such as affected the life or limbs of the off-uler, with the single exception of high treams was at first restricted to bond-fide cleries, but subsequently got ext nded to all who could read a verse ir the Palter, known as "neck-verse," generally ont of the lar Palm. Should it be declared by the bishop's commissary that the prisoner read it like & clerk, he was delivered over to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was, however, an indictable offence at common law to teach a felon to read in order that he might claim benefit of clergy. The abuse of this custom was very great, and in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries it produced constant disputes between the judges and ordinaries. Henry VII., in 1488, restricted it by declaring that it should not be allowed more than once to persons not actually in orders, and in Queen Anne's reign the neck-verse was no longer required to be read. Benefit of clergy was not finally abolished till the reign of George IV. Benefit of clergy never extended to women till they were included by the Statute 3 and 4 Will. III.

expecting and even asking for "free-will offerlngs" was not unusual on the part of kings. Edward 11, and Richard I. seem to have nade some use of this method of levying money. But Edward IV. ra sed it to a system, and by his popular manners was wonderfully successful in dealing with that large number of his subjects who did not know how to refuse a king's request. Such a method of using personal pressure was, of course, un-constitutional, and gave the king a dangerous means of mising money without Parliament. Under Richard III., in 1484, an Act of Parliament was passed abolishing behavolences as "new and unlawful inventiors;" but in spite of this, Richard 111, continued to exact them. Henry VII. also revived them, and obtained a quasi-parliamentary sauction by an Act of 1492, which enforced the payment of arrears of money promised by private persons to the king. It was often argued seriously that the law of Richard III., being the act of a "usurper," was not valid. Henry's Chancellor, Archbishop Morton, used to beg for his master, and invented a dilemma which was known as "Morton's If a man lived handsomely he told him that he clearly had money to spare; if he lived plainly, that he was saving money, and must be rich enough to help the king. Heury VIII., in 1545, appointed commissioners, who, under the name of a benevolence, were to move men to grant to the king twenty pence in the pound on the value of their lands: those who refused were to be summoned to answer before the Privy Council. Elizabeth at times solicited loans, but sho was frugal, and generally repaid them in time. James I., in 1614, had recourse to this, amongst other schemes for raising money. Council wrote to the sheriffs in uesting them to solicit subscriptions in their counties. Bacon defeuded the week dirg, saying that it asked for a free of and la nothing in common with the entire of previous times. So many protests, however, were made against this exaction, and so little money was raised by it, that it was not again used by the crown Even Charles I., in his worst straits, rejected proposals for reviving so unpopular a usage.

Bengal. The province of British India which lies about the lower portions and the deltas of the Ganges and Brahmaputra. It includes the provinces of Bengal Proper, Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur, and has a population of over sixty-six millions. Pengal was conquered by the Mohammedans in the thirteenth century, and was subsequently ruled by Mussulman viceroys appointed by the various reigning dynasties. In the eighteenth century the Nawab of Bengal was a deputy of the Mogul at Delhi. The first English settlements were formed between the years 1620 and 1640. In 1696 the English bought a small district at the mouth of the Ganges, on which Fort William (Calcutta) was erected. For many years the English were involved in frequent disputes with the native governors, culminating in Suraj-ud-Dowlah's massacre of the Europeans in 1756. [Black Holk.] This was followed by Clive's great victory at Pleasey, and some years of fighting. [CLIVE.] In 1765 the dewanny of Bengal, lichar, and Omesa, was ceded to the East India Company, and the Nawab, Meer Jaffier, was pensioned off. A native dewan was, however, appointed to collect the revenues. In 1773 Warren Hastings abolished the double government, and placed the administration directly in the hauds of the Company. The Governor-General of India was also Governor of Bengal, till 1854, when the offices were separated, and Bengal was placed under a Lieutenant-Governor. In 1793 Lord Cornwallis effected the "l'ermanent Settlement," by which the zemindars, or tax collectors, were recognised as proprietors on payment of a land tax to the government; but the rights of the cultivators were recognised and extended by the Bengal Land Law of 1859.

Bengal Mutiny (1795-6). One of the chief results of Lord Cornwallis's administration had been the abolition of ainccures and perquisites in both branches of the service. The civilians had been compensated by increased salaries, but this was impossible in the army, and though the pay was very high, it was disproportionate to that of the civiliana. Sir John Shore therefore found he had to deal with a widespread spirit of mutiny. Delegates were elected from each regiment to form an executive board, and the terms offered by it were that the Company's regiments should not be reduced; that the king's troops should be limited by law; that promotion should go by seniority; that all the old allowances should be restored. If this was not granted, they were prepared to assume the government themselves by violence. The matter was entirely mismanaged. At one time obnoxious regulations were issued, which merely enraged the mutineers; at another the greatest concessious were made, one of the ringleaders being promoted to a confidential post in the India House. The arrival of Lord Wellesley ended this. Seeing a number of malcontent commanders congregated at his first levée, he peremptorily ordered them to rejoin their regiments within twenty-four hours. His commands were oboyed, and the mutiny was at an end, quelled, it was said, hy a glance of Lord Wellesley's eye.

Bennington, The Battle or (Aug. 16th, 1777), fought during the American War of Independence, took place at Bennington, in New Hampshire, where the Americans had stored large supplies. Burgoyne had detached a considerable force, under Colonel Baum, to seize the magazines at Bennington, and thence to march on to Albany and join the main army there. Finding the place stronger than he expected, Baum entrenched himself, and sent for reinforcements. General Stark, with the New Hampshire men, in vain offered him battle, and on being reinforced, determined himself to attack. The movement was con-ducted with great skill, and Baum's position was secretly surrounded before he was aware of an intended attack. The entrenchments were gallantly held until ammunition failed the defenders, who then made a bold attempt to cut their way through the American lines. Baum, however, was shot, and the rest of the force laid down its arms.

Bensington, in Oxfordshire, near Wallingford, although now a village, was in early times a place of considerable importance. It was one of the four towns that Cutha took from the Britons in 571; and in 775 Offa defeated Cynewulf of Wessex here, and took the town from him.

Bentham, JEREMY (b. 1748, d. 1832), educated at Westminster and Queen's College, Oxford, was originally intended for the bar, but being possessed of privato means, he determined to devote his life to the reformation, rather than the practice, of the law, and wrote numerous works with this object. In spite of their unequal value, his books remain a storehouse for the politician and the law reformer. Indeed, there are few administrative reforms which have not been suggested wholly or in part by Bentham's writings. But his value does not only consist in being a suggester of reform on the details of legislation and procedure; he is also one of the fathers of English jurisprudence. His place in that science is midway between Hobbes and Austin. Hobbes had first discerned the doctrine that who tever be the form of government the sovereign authority is ultimately absolute; but he had deduced from this the theory of non-resistance. Bentham perceived the fallacy in this deduction, and separated clearly the legal necessity for obedience from the political duty of resistance. The test of the propriety of political resistance Bentham held to be "Utility," in the sense of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This maxim, whatever may be its value as the basis of a philosophy, furnishes an excellent rule for practical action. In fact, as Sir Henry Maine has pointed cut, by thus making the good of the community take precedence of every other object, Bentham offered a clear rule of reform, and gave a distinct object to aim at in the pursuit of improvement. In this respect his influence may be compared with that of the jus natura in Roman law.

Homan law.

Bentham's works, which are very numerous, have been collected by his disciple, Bowring (London, 1837), who has prefixed to the collection a sketch of Bentham's method. Those of his writings which will best repay perusal are The Fragment on Government (1770), in answer to Blackstone; The Book of Fallacies, and The Tract on Usury. His theory of punishments is contained in The Principles of Morels and Legislation (published separately by the Clarendon Press), and in a translation from the French of his disciple Dumout, entitled The Theory of Legislation. For criticisms of Bentham's philosophy, see preface to Green and Grose sedition of times, and W. L. Courtney, Criticism on the Philosophy of J. S. Mill.

Bentinck, Lord George (b. 1802, d. 1848), acted for some time as secretary to Canning, and in 1828 entered Parliament for Lyme Regis. He was chiefly occupied in sporting matters till within a few years of his death. He came prominently forward in the ranks of the Opposition in 1846, after Sir Robert Peel abandoned the eause of Protection. Identifying himself with the Protectionists, he quickly became their chief, and led them in the bitter campaign which followed against Peel. In this position he displayed an energy, determination, and organising power which seemed to mark him out for high distinction as a political leader. He, however, died suddenly from heart disease, within three years of the time when he had first come prominently before the publie.

B. Disraeli, Lord George Bentinck: a Political Biography (1851).

Bentinck, Lord William (b. 1774, d. 1839), entered the army in 1791, and was attached to the headquarters of Marshal Suvaroff during the campaign of 1799-1801. In April, 1803, he quitted England as Governor of Madras, which post he filled till Jan., 1808. In August of that year he was appointed on the staff of the army in Portugal under Sir Harry Burrard. He was at the battle of Corunna, and later was appointed minister at the court of Sicily and Commander-in-chief of all his Majesty's forces in the island. At the head of an expedition he landed in Catalonia (1813), and, after some successes, was repulsed at Villa Franca. In 1814 he left Sicily, repaired to Tuscany, and ineited the Italians to throw off the French yoke. In 1827 he went to India as Governor-General. He arrived in 1828, and was compelled to enter at once on the unpopular duty of retrenchment, owing to the deficit caused by All allowances were the Burmese War. reduced, and an order was issued (Nov. 1828) to curtail the batta allowances at all stations within 400 miles of Calcutta. This impolitie and unjust order nearly pro-dneed a mutiny, but was forced on Lord William by the Directors. The revenue was augmented by increasing the opium trade, and by resuming all lands fraudulently alicnated from the state. In 1832, on the murder of the Rajah of Cachar (a little province on the north-east frontier of Bengal), Lord William annexed it, in accordance with the general wish of the people; and in 1834 Coorg was also annexed. In other respects Lord William based his policy on the principle of non-intervention. The assumption of the government of Mysore was, however, forced upon him by the incompetence of its ruler. Attempts were also made to establish a connection with the independent states beyond the Company's torritories, and to form defensive alliances with the Ameers of Scinde and Runjeet Sing, of Lahore, with whom Lord William concluded îreatios in 1831. The civil administration of Lord William stands high in the history of British India as an cra of progress. The reform of the law courts and the laws, the admission of native Christians to office, the settlement of the North-West Provinces, the abolition of suttee and the suppression of the Thugs, the introduction of steam communication, and the encouragement of education, serve to mark the period of his rule with distinction. In 1835 Lord William returned to England. He was elected M.P. for Glasgow in 1837, but he did not take any prominent part in home politics.

Beorn (d. 1049) was the son of Ulf, and consequently the nephew of Gytha, wife of Earl Godwine. He attached himself to the fortunes of his uncle, and probably about the year 1045 received an earldom which seems to have included the counties of Hertford, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Buckingham. On the outlawry of Swegen in 1046, part of his earldom was granted to Beorn. On Swegen's return Beorn consented to intercede for him with the king, but Swegen, having lured him on board his ship, murdered him and buried his body at Dartmouth. His remains were subsequently translated with great pomp to Winchester.

Berengaria, Queen (d. circ. 1230), was the daughter of Sancho VI. of Navarre, and in 1191 was married at Cyprus to Richard I. She accompanied him to the Holy Land, and it was owing to discourtesy shown to her at Cyprus that Richard I. attacked and conquered the island. After the death of her husband, she resided chiefly in the dower city of Le Mans, and compounded with King John for her dower lands in England, receiving in return a promise of 2,000 marks a year, which was very irregularly kept. She retired in 1230 to the abbey of L'Espan, to which she was a great benefactress, and here she is supposed to have died shortly afterwards.

Beresford, Admiral Lord Charles WILLIAM DE LA POER (b. 1846), entered the navy at thirteen. He accompanied the Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward VII.) to India as naval aide-de-camp. As commander of the Condor he rendered brilliant services at the bombardment of Alexandria in 1882. Three years later he took part in Lord Wolseley's expedition for the relief of Gordon. In 1886 he was made a Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, but resigned in 1888 on the question of the strength of the fleet. He commanded the Mediterranean linet, 1905-6, was made Admiral and Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Fleet in 1906. In 1909 he resigned his command, and a Committee of Inquiry on the question of Naval Administra-tion followed his resignation.

Beresford, WILLIAM CARR, 1st VISCOUNT (b. 1763, d. 1854), a natural son of the first Marquis of Waterford, entered the army in 1785, and first saw active service at the siege of Toulon in 1793. In 1799 he went to India and took command of a brigade of Sir David Baird's army, which was on its way to oppose Napoleon in Egypt. In Egypt he remained as commandant of Alexandria till its evacuatiou, when he returned home, and was sent to Ireland. In 1805 he shared in the conquest of the Cape of Good Hope, whence he was despatched as brigadiergeneral with a small force against Buenos Ayres, which he took, only, however, in turn to be compelled to surrender to an overwhelming force. After remaining a prisoner for six months, he managed to escape, and on his return to England was sent in command of an expedition against Madeira, of which, on its capture, he became governor. In 1808, with the rank of major-general, he joined the British armies in Portugal. In the spring of 1809 he was appointed marshal and generalissimo of the Portuguese armies, and proceeded But in May, 1811, he rashly engaged the French at Albuera, and by good fortune, rather than skill of his own, gained a victory. In the year 1815 he was appointed to the command of the Portuguese armies by the King of Portugal, and for some time held that office, until he came into political conflict with the people, when he threw up his appointment, and returned to England in 1822.

Berlin, THE TREATY OF (1878), was concluded between Great Britain, Germany

Austria, France, Italy, Russia, and Turkey, for the settlement of affairs in the East after the war between Russia and Turkey. Its chief provisions were, that Bulgaria should be an autonomous and tributary principality under the suzerainty of the Sultan, to be ruled by a Christian government and a prince freely elected, and provisionally administered by a Russian commissary; and that Eastern Roumelia should remain under the direct political and military authority of the Sultan, under conditions of administrative autonomy, and should have a Christian governor-general, to be nominated by the Porte with the assent of the powers. In the event of the Porte and Greece being unable to agree as to the rectification of their frontier, the powers Bosnia and Herzegovina would mediate. were to be occupied and administered by Austro-Hungary. The independence of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro was recognised. Ardahan, Kars, Batoum, and other portions of Armenia, were ceded to Russia, as was also the part of Bessarabia ceded to Roumania in 1856. [CRINZAN WAR.] Complete toleration, equality, and protection of all religions was guaranteed in Turkey. The plenipotentiaries who represented England in the Congress held under the presidency of Prince Bismarck, which preceded the treaty, were the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury. Despite this treaty, by an autograph letter of Francis Joseph I., dated Oct. 5, 1908, addressed to the Premiers of Bosnia and Herzegovina, these two provinces were annexed to Austria-Hungary.

Bermudas, The, or Somers Islands, were discovered in 1527 by a Spaniard named Bermudas, who gave his name to the islands. They are about three hundred in number, though some twenty only are inhabited. In 1609 Sir George Somers, who was wrecked there on his way to Virginia, took possession of the Bermudas for the Crown, and settlers soon began to arrive from England. In 1616 a Bermuda Company was formed, and after the Civil War many Royalists came out to settle. The government, which has been representative ever since 1620, is vested in a governor, an executive council of nine members appointed by the Crown, and a House of Assembly of thirty-six members. The convict settlement was abolished in 1862.

Bernard's Case (1858). On January 14th, 1858, a desperato attempt was made by a man named Orsini, and others, to murder the Emperor of the French, by throwing bombs filled with explosives at him near the Opera-house in Paris. The attempt failed, but many persons were injured and winne killed. Dr. Simon Bernard was indicted in England as an accessory before the act. He was probably an accomplice. fint a good deal of political feeling had been imported into the matter. The French Foreign Office had addressed a despatch to England on the subject of the conspiracy; this had caused great irritation, which was increased by the insulting language towards England used by some of the French officers in their address of congratulation to the Emperor Napoleon. It was felt that the conviction of Bernard would be a mark of subservience on the part of England, and a triumph for the unconstitutional government of the French Emperor. The trial took placo at the Central Criminal Court on April 14; and after a six days' hearing the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

Berners, Sir John Bourchier, Lord b. circs 1469, d. 1532), the holder of many important state offices during the first part of the reign of Henry VIII., and the best of the early writers of English prose, was born at Therfield in Hertfordshire, and probably educated at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1474 he succeeded to the title of his grandfather - John Bourchier - who had been created Baron Berners in 1455. In 1496 Berners aided in crushing the rebellion of the Cornishmen, who had risen against Henry VII.'s tax-gatherers, and after fighting with the army in France at the taking of Terouenne (1573), he accompanied the Princess Mary to Paris, as her chamberlain, on the occasion of her marriage with Louis XII. (1514). In 1515 he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was subsequently English envoy in Spain, attended Henry VIII. at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and was installed in the office of Deputy of Calais in 1520. Although in ill-health, and embarrassed by debt, he zealously performed the duties of the position until his death in 1532. It was at Calais that he undertook a translation of Froiseart's Chronicles. The translation was so skilfully executed in idiomatic English that it might have been easily mistaken for an original work, and to its popularity has been ascribed the promotion of a taste for historical reading and composition in England in the sixteenth century. His other works include translations of several French and Spanish romances, and of the Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius.

The edito princeps of Berners' Prousart was printed by Pynson in London in two vols., 1523 and 1525. After passing through many editions in the sixteenth century it was reprinted by Mr. Utterson in 1812.

Bertha (Bercta), Queen, was the daughter of Charibert, King of Paris and the wife of Ethelbert of Kent. Her influence was of great service to Augustine in his missionary work. [Augustine.]

Bertric (BEORHTRIE) (d. 802), King of Wessex, succeeded on Cynewulf's death. He married Eadburgh, daughter of Offa, and is said to ave met his death by drinking a cup of poison prepared by her hands for another person. His reign is chiefly remarkable for the banishment of Egbert and the first appearance of the Danes on the English coast. Peace was secured by the practical acknowledgment on the part of Wessex of the supremacy of Mercia.

Anglo-Sazon Chron.; Henry of Huntingdon.

Berwick was one of the fortresses delivered to the English in 1174, as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Fainise, and it remained in their hands till 1189. It was one of the four burghs (Edinburgh, Roxburgh, and Stirling being the other three) having a parliament, or court, of their own, and from its importance and wealth was for centuries a thorn in the side of England. In March, 1296, it was token by Edward I., and most of the townsmen put to the sword, but was recaptured by Wallace in September, 1297. Having fallen again into the hands of the English, it was taken by Bruce in 1318, and held by the Scots until after the battle of Halidon Hill, 1333, when it was seized by Edward III. From this time it was rarely in the hands of the Scots until it was surrendered by Henry VI., in 1461, in order to secure a refuge in Scotland. It became again an English possession in 1482. It was made independent both of England and Scotland in 1551. In 1836 it was created a county Berwick, James Fitz-James, Duke of (b). 1670, d. 1734), was the natural son of James II., by Arabella Churchill, the sister of the Duke of Marlborough. At an early age he was sent to learn the art of war under Charles of Lorraine, and was present at the siege of Buda in 1685. In 1687 he was created Duke of Berwick. After the Revolution of 1688, Berwick fought for his father in Ireland, and was present at the battle of the Boyne. He accompanied James to France, and served under Marshal Luxembourg in Flanders. He was taken prisoner at Neerwinden, hut exchanged. In 1696 Berwick took a very prominent part in the unsuccessful plot for a Jacohite insurrection, which was to have been aided by a French force; but it is probable that he knew little of the darker schemes of some of the plotters, who aimed at removing William III. by assessination. In 1704, Berwick, whose military talents were now highly esteemed, was appointed to the command of the French army in Spain. In 1705 he suppressed the Camisard insurrection in Languedoc. In 1706 he was again sent to Spain, nd he did much to restore the French cause, which previously appeared almost desperate. In 1707 he completely routed the English and Imperialists at the great buttle of Almanza, in which his opponent was a Frenchman, Ruvigny, Marquis of Galway. In 1709, and the following years, he was employed in Dauphiny, and conducted a skilful defensive campaign. In 1713 he returned to Spain and captured Barcelona. In 1716 he was appointed commandant of Guienne; and in 1718 he once more led a French army into Spain, this time in opposition to Philip V., whom he had done so much to place on the throne. At the conclusion of the interval of peace, which terminated in 1733, Berwick was called to superintend the operations on the Rhine. He was killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Philipsburg. Berwick was ereated a peer of France and a grandee of Spain. One of his sons was created Duke of Liria, in Spain, and the other Duke of Fitz-James, in the peerage of France. Berwick's military talents were of a very high order, and perhaps not altogether unworthy of comparison with those of his celebrated uncle. In some other respects his characteristics were not unlike those of Marlborough. He had the same coldness, and could be disturbed neither by excitement nor by danger. His integrity, piety, and high sense of duty were unquestioned, and his character has been very highly praised by Montesquieu. Bolingbroke called him the best great man that ever lived.

Berwick's Mémoires, written by himself down to 1716, and continued to 1736 by the Abbé Hook, were published in 1778, with an Eloge Historique by Montesquieu.

Berwick, The Pacification of (1639), was the name given to the agreement concluded between Charles I. and five Scotch Commissioners, the terms being that the Scottish and the Royalist armies should be disbanded, ecclesiastical matters referred to a free general assembly, and civil matters to a parliament.

Berwick, The Treaty of (January, 1560), was concluded between Queen Elizabeth (represented by the Duke of Norfolk) and the Lords of the Congregation (q.v.). Its object was the expulsion of the Freneh garrisons and troops from Scotland, Elizabeth engaging to send troops to the North for that purpose.

Bessborough, John William Ponsonhy, 4th Earl of (b. 1781, d. 1847), better known as Lord Duncannon, entered Parliament for Knaresborough in 1805. He was an active member of the Whig party for many years, and had a considerable share in drafting the Reform Bill. In 1831 he was made Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, in 1834 he received the seals of the Home Office, and in 1835 the Privy Seal. In 1846 the Earl of Bessborough was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland by Lord John Russell. His accession was very popular, as he was a resident Irish landlord, and had always displayed a patriotic and liberal interest in Irish affairs. His viceroyalty extended over the period of the great famine, and his efforts were earnestly directed to the alleviation of that calamity. He died in May, 1847, during his tenure of office.

Bexley, Nichelas Vansittant, Lond (b. 1766, d. 1851), the son of an East Indian Director, was educated at Oxfool and called to the bar in 1792. In 1795 by was returned to Parliament for Hastings. February, 1801, ho was sent with plenary powers to detach the court of Denmark from the Northern Alliance. Returning to England he was elected for Old Sarum, and supported the Addington ministry, under which he held the office of joint Secretary to the Treasury. He continued in effice when Pitt again resumed the I'rendership, and, in 1805, was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. This place he resigned in the same year through some difference with Pitt in regard to Lord Melville's conduct. In the ministry of Lord Grenville ho again became Secretary to the Treasury. In 1812, having published some letters on financial questions, he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer by Lord Liverpool. In this important office he remained cleven years, and on his resignation was raised to the pecrage with the title of Lord Bexley, and was at the same time appointed to the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which he held for nine years. "Industrious and plodding," says Mr. Walpole, "he had made an excellent Secretary to the Treasury; but he had neither the knowledge of finance nor the dexterity of debate which would have qualified him for the post which, by a strange fate, he occupied for a longer period than any of his successors."

Beymaroo, The Battle of (Nov. 23, 1841), was one of the disasters which befell the English during the first Afghan War. The English were in cantonments near Cabul; and on the 14th of November a large force of Afghans, which had assembled with cannon on the Beymaroo hills, was disledged with some difficulty by Brigadier Shelton. On the 22nd they appeared again at Beymaroo. On the 23rd a strong force set out before daybreak to dislodge them. The hill was carried without difficulty, but thousands of men quickly swarmed out of the city, and the English were overmatched, with only a single gun to answer the long-rango matchlocks of the Afghans. The troops, shot down like rabbits, pining with cold and hunger, lost courage and refused to follow their officers. Finally, the whole body of English soldiers abandoned the field and took to flight. Beyrout, THE BOMBANDMENT OF (1840). A joint British, Austrian, and Turkish squadron in this year sailed to the coast of Syria, and proceeded to bombard Beyrout, a sea-port at the northern extremity of the Pachalic of Acre, which was held by the troops of the rebellious Pasha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali. The town was quickly reduced to ruins.

Bhawulpore, or Doodpoutra, is a native state of the Punjaub governed by a prince called the Bhawul Khan, with Bhawul-pore as his capital. The Bhawul Khan's dominious extended at one time across the Sutlej to the Upper Indus, but he was a tributary of the Doorance monarch. Runjeet Singh demanded the same tribute, and, on failure of payment, seized the territory between the rivers. The Ameers of Scinde also took from the Bhawul Khan a large district on the left bank of the Lower Indus. Thus pressed, he readily accepted, in 1838, the protection of the British, by whom his dominions were guaranteed against further encroachments on the part of his powerful neighbours.

Bhopal is a small Indian native principality in Malwa, in the valley of the Nerbuddah. In 1778 the reigning prince was the only chief in Central India who afforded any support to General Goddard in his adventurous march across the peninsula. This created an undying friendship between tho Bhopal dynasty and the English, who protected Bhopal against the Mahrattas. In 1817, during the Mahratta War, Lord Hastings concluded a defensive alliance with this state, and granted it five valuable provinces which had been taken from the Peishwa. The Bhopal state has long been governed by female rulers or Begums, who have displayed great capacity for administration. The principality is said to be the best governed of the Indian native states. In the Indian Mutiny the Begum of Bhopal gave great assistance to the English, and both she and her daughter and successor were created Knights of the Star of India.

Bhotan War, THE (1864-1865). In the year 1862 a quarrel arose between the independent Bhotan state in the Eastern Himalayas and the English government with reference to some frontier territories in Assam. Various outrages were committed by the Bhotias on English subjects, and in 1863 an embassy under the Hon. Ashley Eden was insulted and ill-treated. War was declared in Nov., 1864. It was badly conducted, and the country was unhealthy. The Bhotias struggled desperately, but finally were compelled to sue for peace. The Bhotias ceded the frontier districts of Assam, for which the English agreed to pay a yearly grant of 25,000 rupees.

Bhurtpore. A native state of Rajputana. The town of Bhurtpore has been twico besieged by the English. (1) In 1805, the Bhurtpore Rajah having taken part with the Mahrattus, General Lake determined on investing the place. It was a town and fortress, eight miles in eircumference, surrounded by a lofty mud wall of great thickness, and proteeted by numerous bastions, and a deep ditch filled with water. It was garrisoned by about 8,000 of the Rajah's troops and the remnant of Holkar's infantry. Without a sufficient siege train, without an engineer officer of any experience, without even a reconnaissance, Lako resolved at oneo to earry the town by assault. Four unsuccessful assaults were mado, entailing the loss of 3,200 men in killed and wounded, and the British finally were compelled to withdraw. This memorable siege lasted from Jan. 4th to April 21st. (2) In the year 1825, a disputed succession to the throno of Bhurtpore occurred. The expelled prince had been under British protection, and so, though Lord Amherst was at first inclined for non-intervention, Lord Combermere, the commander-in-chief, undertook to reduce the hitherto impregnable stronghold. Having demanded the dismissal of the women and children, which was refused, he proceeded to bombard the town. After two months' siege, tho assault was given, and in two hours the town was taken; the fortress was then razed to the ground, and the rightful prince restored.

Bible, English Translations of the. In the early times of English Church history translations of portions of the Scriptures were undertaken for the use of the less learned priests. Bishop Aldhelm, of Sherborno who died in 709), is said to have translated tho Psalter. Bede translated the Gospel of St. John, and finished the work on his death-bed in 735. King Alfred encouraged, if he did not actually undertake, the translation of the Gospels, which was current in the tenth century. Towards the end of that century, a Benedictino scholar, Ælfrie (who died Archbishop of Canterbury in 1005), translated parts of the Books of Moses, together with Joshua, Judges, Kings, Esther, Job, Maccabees, and Judith. After the Norman Conquest, the early form of the English language gradually altered, and these translations became obsolete. In the middle of the thirteenth century a version of the whole Bible in Norman-French was current amongst the nobles. In the fourteenth century, about 1325, two translations of the l'salms into English appeared almost at the same time. One was by William of Shoreham, a Kentish priest; the other by Robert Rollo, who is known as the Hermit of Ham-pole. The ond of the fourteenth century saw the first completo version of the Bible into English, a work directed by John Wyelif. Besides being a philosopher and theologian, Wyelif was also a fervent and diligent paster. He was struck by the popular ignorance of the Biblo, and resolved to remedy it. He himself undertook the New Testament, and his friend and follower, Nicolas of Hereford, began the translation of the Old Testament. Nicolas advanced in his work as far as the Book of Barneh, when he was called to account for a sermon which he had preached at Oxford. Wyclif, most probably, completed the unfinished work. It would seem that this translation was done by the end of 1382, and was rapidly disseminated among the people by itinerant preachers. The translation was made from the Latin version of St. Jerome, known as the Vulgate. There was a great difference in style between the work of the two translators. Nicolas of Hereford gave a literal rendering of the Latin in a stiff and bald manner. Wyclif Latin in a stiff and bald manner. was less a slave to the original, and showed s power of forcible and idiomatic writing which sets his translation as the highest point in the development of Middle English prose. No sooner was the work dono than Wyelif was aware that it needed revision. task he at once began, and it was carried on after his death by his follower, John Purvey, who finished the revision in 1388, and thereby gave greater uniformity and precision to the The eirculation of the Wyclifite work. versions in manuscript amongst the people did much to prepare the way for the doctrinal changes which the influence of the German reformers introduced amongst a growing party in the English Church. But Wyclif's translation existed only in manuscript, and the printing-press had begun to work its change in the spread of literature. A printed Bible was necessary, and this work was undertaken by a Cambridge scholar, William "vndale. Ho did not adopt Wyclif's version, because its language was by this time antiquated, and it was a translation of the Vulgate, whereas the knowledge of the Greek text had in his day made considerable progress amongst learned men. Tyndale translated the New Testament from the Greek text of Erasmus, but was obliged to withdraw to the Continent for the purpose of printing In 1526 this translation, which was printed at Worms in 1525, was secretly introduced into England, and was largely eirculated, though efforts were made by the bishops to seize the copies and commit them to the flames. Tyndale next began the translation of the Old Testament, and published, in 1530, an English version of the Pentateuch. He was continuing his labours when, in 1535, he was imprisoned at Antwerp, and was put to death as a heretie in the following year by the order of the Emperor Charles V. At his death his translation had advanced as far as the end of the Books of Chronicles. His work was revised by his friend and fellow-labourer, John Rogers, and its publication, under the name of Thomas Matthew (probably a wealthy merchant who found the funds for the undertaking), was begun secretly in Autworp. Meanwhile, another English translation of the Bible was in progress at the hands of Miles Coverdalo, who was favoured by Cromwell. This translation was not made from the original, but was the result of a comparison of the Vulgate and the German translations. It was published secretly (probably at Zurieh) in 1535, and dedicated to Henry VIII., to whom it was presented by Cranmer and Cromwell. Tyndale's version, as edited by Rogers, was completed from Coverdale's translation. was published by Graftou, an English printer, in 1537, and received the king's licence. The royal sanction given to this translation marked the final victory of the party which was in favour of doctrinal reform. From this time the knowledge of the Scriptures was no longer regarded as dangerous for the people, but was expressly sanctioned. The circulation of translations of the Scriptures was eagerly promoted. In 1539 was published at London an edition of Matthew's Bible, slightly revised by R. Taverner. In 1540 a considerable revision of this version was made under Cranmer's direction, and Cranmer's Bible, known also as the Great Bible, was the first "appointed to be read in churches" by royal command. In 1542 a reaction set in. The Roman party objected to Cranmer's Bible, and endeavoured to ebtain a revision in their own favour. Henry VIII., by Act of l'arliament, forbade the perusal of the New Testament in English to women, labourers, and uneducated persons. During the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary nothing more was done in the way of translation. But at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth appeared a new version, known as the Genevan Bible, because it was the werk of English exiles at Geneva, where it was first published in 1560. Chief among the translators were Goodman, Whittingham, and Knox. It was translated from the Hebrew and the Greek, but, as was to be expected, betrayed leanings towards the theology of Calvin. In consequence of the existence of these various translations, Archbishop Parker thought it desirable to establish a uniform and amended edition. He accordingly distributed the various books of the Bible, as they stood in Cranmer's edition, amongst the bishops for revision, desiring them not to change the text save where it varied manifestly from the Hebrew or Greek original. The result of two years of revision was the publication, in 1568, of the Bishops' Bible.

The Convocation of 1571 ordered that all Church officers should provide copies for use in their churches. Finally, the English Bible assumed its present form in the roign of James I. For the purpose of securing a complete revision, forty-seven of the most learned men in the kingdom were selected for the task. They divided themselves into three companies, which met at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. Twenty-five undertook the Old Testament, fifteen the New Testament, and seven the Apocrypha. They worked under rules laid down by the king for their guidance. They were bidden to take as their basis the Bishops' Bible, and depart from it only when necessary. work done by the separate committees was afterwards supervised and reduced to regularity by a committee of six persons. After three years' labour the version known as the Authorised Version was produced. Some doubt, however, exists as to the nature of the authorisation. It hears on its title-page the werds "appointed to be read in churches;" but there exists no record of any authoritative or exclusive authorisation. However, either by royal authority or by natural selection, the version of 1611 has ousted its predecessors, and for two centuries and a half has been exclusively used in England. In 1870 the conviction that increased knowledge both of the text and of the language of the original required an alteration of the Authorised Version, found expression in the Convecation of the Province of Canterbury. Two companies for the revision of the Authorised Version were appointed, one for the Old Testament, the other for the New. The members were chosen from Biblical scholars of various Protestant denominations, and committees were formed in America for the purpose of acting with the English revisers. Following previous precedent, the object of the revisers was the revision of the Authorised Version with as few changes as was consistent with faithfulness. The revised version of the New Testament was published early in 1880, of the Old Testament in May, 1886.

Bidassoa, THE PASSAGE OF THE (Oct. 7, 1813), by the English in the Peninsular War, was a well-planned surprise of a remarkably strong position. The French held the heights of a lofty mountain group-the Rhune, the Commissari, and the Bayonette-and they had also strengthened their position by artificial works. Wellington, with great skill, concealed the real point of his attack. Suddenly, in the early morning of the 7th, the columns of attack forded the river with such celerity that the French had not even fired a gun before the troops formed up on the right bank. One after another the three ridges - the all Bayonette, Commissari, and Puerto de Verawere successively carried; but Clausel fell back on the Rhune, the strongest of all, and held it during the night. On the next day, afraid of being cut off, he retreated, and concentrated his forces on the ridge behind Sarre. The loss of the allies was 1,600, that of the French 200 loss; but many of the reported losses among the former were really stragglers, who were becoming more numerous every day.

Bigod, FAMILY OF. Roger Bigod, a poor Norman knight, entered England with William the Conqueror, and in 1075 received a grant of a large part of the confiscated lands of Ralph of Wader, Earl of East Anglia. His elder son William was drowned in the White Ship, 1120: his younger, Hugh, obtained the earldom of Norfolk from Stephen (date uncertain), was confirmed in it by Henry II., and took part in the revolt of 1174. His son Roger, second earl and godson (afterwards third earl), was among the twenty-five executors of Magna Charta. Hugh, third earl, married Maud, eldest co-heiress of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, and had two sons-Roger, fourth earl, who inherited the Marshalship of England through his mother, and died without issue; and Hugh, who was appointed Justiciar by the Barons in 1258, and whose son Roger succeeded his uncle in the earldom in 1270. It was this Bigod who helped to secure the Confirmation of the Charters. He surrendered his earldom and estates, in 1302, to the king, and received them back for life only; and though he left a brother, upon his death in 1307, the earldom became ex-tinct in the Bigod family.

Billeting seldiers in private houses had become such an oppressive burden under Charles I. that one of the clauses in the Petition of Right is expressly directed against the practice of quartering soldiers or mariners on private individuals against their will. The practice, however, still centinued until an Act passed in 1681 provided that "no officer, military or civil, or other persons, shall quarter er billet any soldier upon any inhabitant of the realm of any degree, quality, or profession without his consent." This Act is suspended annually by the Mutiny Act, which allows soldiers to be billeted on innkeepers and victuallers.

Bills, Parliamentary, are either public, dealing with matters of public policy, or private, being such as concern personal or local interests. The system by which legislation was founded on petition made it possible to alter the terms of the petition so that the statute should not really answer to the request, and even to found a statute on a petition in which the Commons had not concurred. These evils were remedied in the reign of Henry VI., when bills in the ferm of statutes began to be passed by both Houses. As the Commons have the sole right of taxation, the larger number of bills must originate with them. Bills on certain subjects, such as religion and trade, must originate in Com-mittee of the whole House. The mode of procedure with reference to bills is nearly the same in both Heuses. In the Commons, however, a member has to obtain leave to bring in a bill, but this is not the case in the Lords. When leave is moved for, the title of the bill is read and its object is usually stated. If the motion is agreed to, the bill is ordered. It is then presented, and the question is put that it be now read the first time. This question must be decided without amendment or debate. If it is negativea, the bill disappears from the orders, but the question may be again brought forward. If it is carried, the question is put that it be read a second time, a day is fixed for the second reading, and the bill is printed. When the day comes the bill appears in the orders, and the question is put that it be new read a second time. This is the critical stage, and the whole principle can now be made a matter of debate. A bill may be opposed at all its stages, but as it is at this point that opposition is generally made, it is well to speak of this subject here. It is usual, in opposing a bill, to do so by an amendment of postponement for three or six months, or by some resolution contrary to the tenor of the measure. "The previous question" may also be moved. By this means, however, the bill is not extinguished and can be ordered for another day, while the postponement of a bill to a time when Parliament will not be sitting, or the adoption of an adverse resolution, puts an end to it for the session. It is unusual to reject a bill in direct terms, and such a course would imply that it contained matter offensive to the House. When the bill has been read a second time, it is brought before the Committee of the whole House, and receives any amendments which may be made to it. When it has received its final shape it is reported to the House. It has then to be read a third time, and after that the question is put "That this bill do pass," and on this it is not usual to divide. It is then sent up to the Lords or down to the Commons, as the case may be, and may be amended or rejected by the House which receives it. If it is amended, it is again sent to the House in which it originated, and if the amendments are disagreed upon, it is usual to send a message to state the reasons of the disagreement, or to desire a conference. When the bill is passed by both Houses it receives the royal assent, which may be given by commission, in the words, "La reine le veult." The form of dissent, "La reine s'avisera," has not been used since 1707, so that the crown may perhaps be said to have relinquished its right in this matter. All money bills must originate with the Commons, and, though the Lords may reject a money bill, they may not amend it. This gave rise to the unconstitutional practice of "tacking," by which, when the House of Commons wished to force a measure on the Lords, it was tacked on to a money bill, so that the Lords had to pass the bill entire or refuse the supply. This plan was adopted on the questions of the Irish Forfeitures, 1699, and of the Occasional Conformity Bill, 1705. The rejection by the Lords of the bill repealing the paper duty, 21st May, 1860, was viewed with much jealousy by the Commons. Such rejection is now made almost impossible by including the whole financial scheme of the budget in a single Act.

Petitions to Parliament on private matters occasioned the appointment of Receivers and Triers of Petitions. These officers, if they found no redross for tho wrong complained of in the Courts, referred the matter to Parliament. Petitions to the Commons are frequent from the reign of Henry IV. From these petitions private bills took their rise. These pass through the same stages as public bills. In dealing with them the judicial functions of Parliament are especially prominent. Privato bills are brought in on petition and at the expense of the promoters. Before a private bill is brought in, it is subjected to Examiners of both Houses, who see that the standing orders are complied with. Tho second reading of a private bill affirms tho claim, but only on the supposition that the facts stated in the preamble can be made good. It is referred, if opposed, to a Select or Special Committee to decide on this, and by this Committee the question between the petitioners and their opponents is heard and determined. [Parliament.]

Bingham, Sir Richard, who was employed in Ireland, 1580, was one of Elizabeth's most able naval officers. In 1586 he was enaployed on service in Ireland, and cut to pieces a Scetch force which had landed to join the rebels on the banks of the Moy. Ho was subsequently made Governor of Connanght, and, whilst holding that office, gained considerable notoriety by putting to death all the Spaniards who were wrecked on the coast of Ireland after the dispersion of the Armada in 1588.

Birinus (d. 650), the apostle of Wessex, was probably an Italian by birth, and was commissioned by Pope Honorius to "scatter the seeds of the hely faith in those farthest inland territories of the English which no teacher had yet visited," but landing in Hampshire in 634 he found that Wessex was still in heathenism, and accordingly preached the Gospel there, meeting with immediate success. The two kings, Cynegils and Cwichelm, were baptised, and Birinus was made first Bishop of Dorchester (on the Thames), whence he "went up and down among the West Saxons—that is, from Dorset to Buckinghamshire, from Surrey to the Severn—preaching, catechising, baptising, calling many people to the Lord, and building and dedicating churches," Birmingham, John, Earl of Loute (d. 1329), was descended from the Lords of Athenry, and was nominated, in 1318, commander-in-chief of the Euglish forces in Ireland. Ho won the battle of Dundalk, and sent Edward Bruco's head to Edward III. As a reward for this service, and for his prowess in fighting the O'Connors, he was made Earl of Louth. He was afterwards engaged as the ally of the Butlers and of the Earl of Desmond in their feud with the houses of De Burgh and Poer. In 1329 he, together with some 160 noblemen and gentlemen, was treacherously murdered by the "Germans and savages."

Birmingham, as a market town, is of considerable antiquity. Previous to the Conquest it formed part of the possessions of a family of the same name, and the manor continued to belong to the Birmingbams till the sixteenth century. In Leland's time it was already known for its cutlery and hardware manufactures. During the Civil War Prince Rupert's passage through the town, in 1643, was resolutely opposed by the inhabitants, and a sharp skirmish took place. Birmingham shared largely in the industrial movement at the close of the 18th century, and rapidly reached a position of importance among English towns. Its inhabitants took a very prominent share in the transactions which led to the Reform Bill of 1832. It received the franchise by that measure, a municipal constitution by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, was granted a University in 1901, and created a bishopric in 1904. Birmingham sends seven members to Parliament.

Birmingham Political Union, The, was an association formed in the beginning of 1830. Its original purpose was to obtain a repeal of the Act of 1819 for the resumption of cash payments; but it soon adopted the programme of Parliamentary Reform, and became the centre of the agitation for that purpose. As early as Feb., 1830, it was noticed and denounced in the House of Commons by Huskisson. Its leading member was Mr. Attwood, who afterwards sat in the reformed Parliament for Birmingham. The original design was "to form a general political union between the lower and middle classes of the people;" and as the political unions of many other places were affiliated to that of Birmingham, it may be said that the reform agitators of that town were practically at the head of the movement. When the House of Lords showed a disposition to reject the Bill, immense meetings were held under the auspices of the Birmingham Union, in which threats of refusal to pay taxes, and even of open violence, were freely used. In 1831 a proclamation was issued against political unions, and, in consequence, the Birmingham Union considerably modified its organisation. It continued, however, to display great activity, and on the 7th of May, 1832, all the Unions of the Midland Counties assembled at Newhall Hill, Birmingham, to the number of 150,000 members. Such proofs of the determination of the country had their effect on the House of Lords, and brought about the final acceptance of the Bill.

Birmingham Riots (1791) arose out of the intolerant party spirit which was largely evoked in England by the events of the French Revolution of 1789. In many places associations had been formed for the celebration of the 14th July, as the anniversary of the Revolution. The extreme Tories, who styled themselves "the friends of order," everywhere took alarm; and in Birmingham handbill was circulated in which the principles and objects of the association were grossly exaggerated or misrepresented. The association at once denied its authenticity, and at first thought of giving up the meeting in consequence of the feeling excited by the circular. This opinion was, however, overruled; and the meeting took place on the 14th July. While the members of the association were at dinner, the hotel was surrounded by a meb, who, after shonting, "Church and King!" for half an hour, retired only to return in redonbled force. They then broke into the house, but found that the members had fled. Baffled and disappointed, they diverted their fury npon two Dissenting chapels, which they demolished. They next attacked the house of Dr. Priestley, and setting fire to it burnt it, together with the valuable library of its owner; and for two days and nights they carried on the work of destruction against the property of prominent Dissenters. On the third day their efforts slackened, and on the fourth several squadrons of cavalry coming into the town soon restored order.

Bishop. The highest order of clergy in the Church. The early British Church was organised under bishops, three of whom were present at the Council of Arles in 314. Christianity, which died away before the invasion of the English, was brought back in southern England by the Roman missionary Augustine, who, under the direction of Pope tregory I., established bishops to direct the ecclesiastical affairs of his converts. In Northumbria the Columban missionaries had monastic bishops after their custom. When the conversion of England was comleted, and the Church united under the Roman organisation, Archbishop Theodore (669-693) carried out the work of diocesan arrangement. The whole of England was divided into dioceses which were the sphere of administration of a bishop. England was also divided into two ecclesiastical provinces, over each of which was set an archbishop. The mode of electing bishops seems to have varied; sometimes the clergy appointed, sometimes the king in the Witenagemot. The bishops sat in the Witenagemot, and also in the shire-moots; they had temporal jurisdiction within their own lands; moreover, they exercised a penitential discipline over moral offenders, and judged the offences of the clergy. The connection between Church and State was close, and we find no disputes between the ecclesiastical and secular juris-Similarly, national or provincial councils made canons for the Church, frequently in the presence of the king and ealdormen. Bishops soon showed themselves statesmen, and Dunstan may be reckened as the first great English minister. After the Norman Conquest William I. recognised the political importance of bishers by dispossessing the English occupant of their sees and setting Normans in their seed. Archbishop Lanfranc was in all thine William I.'s chief adviser, and by his influence the ecclesiastical courts were separated from the secular courts. The bishops no longer held pleas in the hundred court or shire court, but in courts of their own, which alone decided spiritual cases according to canon law. William II. applied to the lands of bishops the full rigour of feudal extortion, and kept bishoprics vacant that he might himself receive their revenues. Under Henry I. Anselm raised the question of investitureshe refused to receive at the hands of the king investiture to a spiritual office. The result of this conflict was a compromise, by which it was agreed that bishops were to receive the emblems of their spiritual office from spiritual persons, and were to do homage to the king for their temporalities. By this change the bishops were not really benefited; their constitutional position was made more like that of berons, and lost much of its distinctive character. The election to bishoprics, according to the canons, was invested in the chapter of the cathedral churches; but practically their right wes exercised in accordance with the royal will. The methods of capitular elections frequently led to disputes, which were referred to the decision of the Pope. In 1206 Pope Innocent III, rejected both the nominee of the king and of the Chapter of Canterbury, and appointed Stephen Langton archbishep. From this time the Popes frequently appointed, and appeals were common. The system of provisions was in the next century extended to bishopries. But as the crown grew stronger in the next century the king nominated, and the Pope appointed the same person by provision. Papul interference was strong enough to overthrow the rights of chapters, but was powerless against a strong king.

The bishops of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were a strong element in the resistance to the royal oppression, and rank amongst the staunchest upholders of English liberties. But the growth of Lollardism in the fourteenth century led them to support the crown, and under Henry VIII. they were unable to oppose the royal will. The alternations of religious policy in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, led to frequent deprivations, imprisonment, and ln the case of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, to the execution of bishops. In the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth the rapacity of courtiers despoiled the sees of many of their possessions. Elizabeth showed her bishops scant courtesy, suspended them at her pleasure, and even threatened them with deposition. From that time, with the exception of the reign of Charles 1., bishops exercised little political influence. Under the Commonwealth episcopaey was abolished and bishops were dispossessed of their sees till the Restoration. The petition of the seven bishops to James 11 against his declaration of indulgence, and then subsequent trial for libel and acquittal, is the last time when tho action of bishops materially affected the course of English history.

At present a bishop is the head of the clergy within his diocese. He has the power of ordeining priests and deacons, of consecrating churches, and performing certain ecclesiastical acts secording to the law of the Church; he is an ecclesiastical judge in certain cases within his diocese, and exercises disciplinary power over his clergy. There are two arch-bishops and thirty-five blahops in Eng. and and Wales. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, always sit as lords spiritual in the House of Lords; of the other bishops, twenty-one are summoned (apart from Suffragane) in order of seniority of creation. The Bishop of Sodor and Man is in no case a lord spiritual, and by an Act of 1847, it was enacted that the number of lords spiritual should not be increased by the creation of new bishoprics. election to bishoprics was settled by an Act of 1544; providing that the king send to the dean and chapter his licence to elect, called his congé d'élire, which is always accompanied by a statement of the person whom he would have them elect; if they delay above twelve days the king may nominate. Ir the year 1848 the Dean and Chapter of H reford elected, according to the royal congé d'clire, Dr. Hampden; but at the time of his confirmation objections against him were tendered. The Court of Queen's Bench decided that these objections need not be received, as the congé d'élire was imperative. Thus the appointment to bishopries is practically vested in the crown. Bishopric. The sphere within which a bishop exercises his authority. In the British Church there seem to have been three bishoprics corresponding to the three provinces into which Britain was divided by the Romans. When in 597 Pope Gregory I. sent Augustine to evangelise England, his scheme for ecclesiastical organisation was that London and York should be the centres of the island. Augustine was to be Bishop of London with twelve suffragans, and was to send another to York, who was in turn to have twelve suffragans. This scheme was not fully carried out; but the formation of sees marks the progress of the conversion of England, and the sees followed the divisions of kiugdous or tribes. Augustine at Canterbury was Bishop of Kent; in 604 he set up Justus at Rochester as Bishop of West Kent, and Mellitus at London as Bishop of the East Saxons. In 625, Paulinus was ordained Bishop of the Northumbrians with his see at York; but the work of Paulinus did not last, and Northumbria received Christianity from the Columban monks of Iona, one of whom, Aidan, was made Bishop of Lindisfarne in 635. In 630 Felix created the see of East Anglia at Dunwich. In 635 the West Saxons received as bishop Birinus, who fixed his seat at Dorchester. The see of Mercia was, in 650, set up at Lichfield. Thus the early kingdoms received bishops, and were converted into ecclesiastical dioceses. The further organisation of England was due to the energy of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Theodore, a monk of Tarsus, who laboured from 669 to 693. He broke up the large dioceses, but in so doing followed the lines of tribal arrangements that were earlier than the seven kingdoms. He divided East Anglia into north and south, and set a bishop over the northern part at Elmham in 673. He established a see for the Hecanas at Hereford in 676, and for the Lindiswaras at Sidnachester in 678. The Northumbrian Church had before this conformed to the Roman use. Its large extent was divided by the recognition of York as the see of the Deirans, while Bernicia was divided between Lindisfarne and Hexham, which was made a see in 678; in 681 the Northumbrian dominions in Strathclyde received a bishop at Whithern In 680 the Hwiccas had a bishop at Wor cester, and the Middle Angles at Leicester

In 705 Wessex was divided by a new see at Sherborne, and in 709 a mission see for the South Saxons was set up at Selsey. In 909 King Edward the Elder divided the see of Sherborne, and gave the men of Somerset a bishop at Wells, and the men of Dovon a bishop at Crediton. The troubles of Northumbria affected its episcopal arrangements; after 814 no Bishop of Hexham was appointed, and through the ravages of the Picts the bishopric of Whithern ceased about 810. In 875 tho monks of Lindisfarne were driven to quit their monastery, carrying with them the body of St. Cuthbert. In 882 they settled at Chester-le-Street, whence they were again driven in 990, and finally settled at Durham in 995.

At the time of the Nerman Conquest episcopal sees were transferred from villages te cities, as being moro convenient. Already in 1050 the see of Crediton had been changed to Exeter. In 1075 the see of Sherborne was removed to Old Sarum, that of Selsey to Chichester, and that of Lichfield to Coventry. The see of Dorchester was removed to Linceln in 1085. In 1088 the see of Wells was transferred to Bath; that of Elmham, which had been transferred to Thetford in 1078, was finally established in Norwich in 1101. With the gradual conquest of South Wales the British Church lost its independence, and received Norman bishops. The Archbishop of St. David's (who had never perhaps exercised any practical authority over the other Welsh bishops) became a suffragan of the province of Canterbury in 1115; Bangor and Llandaff soon afterwards; and the see of St. Asaph was established (or possibly only re-established) in 1143. Moreover, Henry I. cared for the interests of the Church in England by subdividing the huge diocese of Lincoln in 1109, and setting a bishop over the great minster of Ely. In like manner the allegiance of the new English possession of Cumberland was strengthened by the appointment of a Bishep of Carlisle in 1133.

From this time till the Reformation no new sees were created. After the dissolution of the menasteries, Henry VIII. made some show of restoring the goods of the Church by the creation of six new bishoprics-Westminster in 1540, Gloucester, Chester, Peterborough, and Oxford in 1541, Bristol in 1542. The see of Westminster did not long continue. Its first occupant, Thomas Thirlby, wasted its possessions; he was translated to Norwich in 1550, and the see was dissolved. In 1542 the ancient see of Sodor and Man, which was founded by Pope Gregory IV., was annexed to the province of York; but as the island of Man did not come into the possession of the crown till 1825, its bishop was never a peer of Parliament. No further creations were hade till the increase of population in the nineteenth century led to the formation of the see of Ripon in 1836, and of Manchester in 1847. In 1836 the sees of Gloucester and Bristol were united, but were again separated in 1897. Recently new sees have been created by voluntary effort, according to the provision of an Act of Parliament. The sees of Truro and St. Albans were founded in 1877, that of Liverpool in 1880, that of Newcastle in 1882, that of Southwell in 1883, that of Wakefield in 1883, that of Southwark in 1904, and that of Birmingham in 1504. [M. C.]

Bishopric, The. A special title given to the patrimony of St. Cuthbert, which was-ruled by the Bishops of Durham. On Cuthbert's consecration as Bishop of Lindisfarne in 683, Egfrith, the Northumbrian king, made him large grants of land round Lindisfarne, as well as the vill of Craik near York, and the town of Carlisle. In 883 the menks of Lindisfarne were fleeing with the body of their patron saint before the Danish invaders. The Danish king was dead, and his host was without a leader. St. Cuthbert appeared in a vision to Abbot Eadred, and bade him tell the Danes to take as their king a young captive who was a slave. The Dancs obeyed the admonition, and their new king Guthred, aided by the advice of Alfred the Great, showed his gratitude by conferring on St. Cuthbert the land between the Tyne and the Tees. Over this new grant, and the old lands of the church of Lindisfarne, the bishop was given the rights and dignities of the king. Bishop Cutheard (900—915) purchased the ancient parish of Bedlington north of the Tyne, with an area of thirty square miles, and received a grant of similar jurisdiction over it. It is probable that William the Conqueror finding this state of things the Conqueror, finding this state of things, considered it desirable to leave it unchanged, and recognised the lands of the church of Durham as a county palatine. [PALATINE Counties.] The Bishopric was not co-extensive with the diocese of Durham. It consisted of the modern county of Durham, and the districts known as Bedlingtonshire, Islandshire, and Norhamshire. Within this the bishop held his own courts and appointed his own officers; writs ran in his name, and he had his own mint. The men of the bishopric were similarly privileged, and went by the name of Haliwerefule, men for the defence of St. Cuthbert and his patrimony. ceptional position continued till the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended its abelition in 1833, and with the death of Bishop van Mildert, in 1836, the bishopric came to an end.

Bishops, The Seven, is the appellation usually given to the prelates who were tried for their resistance to James II.'s

Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.). On April 25th, 1688, the king issued his second Doclaration of Indulgence, and on May 4th an Order in Council enjoined that it should be read in all churches on two successive Sundays, the bishops being required to distribute copies of it in their dioceses. The Primate Sancroft and six bishops (Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Trelawny of Bristol, Lake of Chichester, and Turner of Ely) drew up and presented a petition, declaring the loyalty of the Church, but begging to be excused from reading in Divine service an illegal declaration, since l'arliament had declared that the sovereign had no power to dispense with statutes. "This is the standard of rebellion," James said as he read it; and, when only four churches in London obeyed the order, ho determined to take his revenge by trying the bishops for publishing a seditious libel. The bishops, after having at the king's command acknowledged their writing, were committed to the Tower, where they were visited by many Whig peers and a deputation of icon-conformist sympathisers. When the trial cainc on, the handwriting was proved by the evidence of the clerk, who had heard the bishops' confession; and Sunderland, whom they had begged to present it, proved the publishing. Among the counsel for the defence was Somers, afterwards Chancellor, whose speech on this occasion created his reputation. After some hours' disputing, the king's brewer, who was on the jury, was persuaded to risk the loss of royal patronage, and a verdict of Not Guilty was returned (June 30th). The action of the king in this matter lost him the active support of the Church, and disposed it to at least acquiesce in the measures of William of Orange.

Black Act, The (1722), was the name given to an Act passed to check the outrages committed by persons with their faces blackened or otherwise disguised, who appeared in Epping Forest, near Waltham, and destroyed the deer. The penalty of death was imposed on all such transgressions of the law. The Act was made perpetual in 1758, but was repealed in 1827.

Black Assize. [Assize.]

Blackburn Riots, The (1826), were a demonstration by the weavers of Lancashire against the use of machinery. In April a large number of persons assembled at Henfield and proceeded to Accrington, where they demolished the machinery in several mills. The mob then proceeded to Blackburn, and, though a party of dragoons arrived there as soon as the rioters, they could not prevent them from breaking into the factory of Messrs. Bannister, Eccles and Co. A collision occurred; stones and firearms were freely used by the mob; and the Riot Act was read. A great deal of Messrs. Eccles' machinery was destroyed, and much damage done all through tho town; and the excitement became so dangerous that the dragoons were ordered to clear the streets. The following day a great deal of destruction was completed, and another collision occurred between the rioters and the military, in which the former were finally routed by a discharge of musketry, nine persons being killed and several wounded. Similar riots broke out next day in Manchester. Troops, however, quickly poured into the disturbed districts, and the riotous assemblages were at an end.

Black Death, THE. This name has been given to an epidemic disease of fearful destructiveness which devastated England, in common with the rest of Europe, in 1348-9, and, burst forth anew in 136i-2 and again in 1369. In contemporar, and later literature it is usually called the "Pestilence," or the "Great Pestilence," under the former of which expressions it is mentioned by both Chaucer and Langland. It is regarded as having bee: merely an aggravated outburst of the ordinary plague, which had been smouldering among the population since 1342, and was suddenly kindled into fatal activity by the working of special causes, due to natural phenomena of rare concurrence and exceptional power. The forces of nature, we are told, had been let loose; for several years mighty earthquakes, furious tornadoes of wind and rain, violent floods, clouds of locusts darkening the air or poisoning it with their corrupting bodies, and other abnormal manifestations of elemental strife, had been, from China to Europe, destroying men and their works, blighting vegetation, turning fruitful lands into noxious swamps, and polluting the atmosphere. Whether these disturbances of nature were answerable for the visitation may be questioned; but there is abundance of evidence to prove their actual occurrence, and the ablest scientific writer on the subject-Hecker-has no doubt of the connection between the adulteration of the air that followed them and the virulence of the pestilence. "This disease," he says, "was a consequence of violent commotions in the carth's organism-if any disease of cosmical origin can be so considered." It would be safe at least to suspect that the lingering traces of the epidemic of 1342, and the general physical demoralisation produced by the disturbance of the conditions of life, left men's bodies an easier prey to the malignant agency. The quickening power, however, came from the East. Carried by commerce across the Black Sea from Western Asia to Constantinople, the disease spread widely and swiftly from that centre, and early in 1347 fell upon Sicily, Marseilles, and several tewns on the coast of Italy. After a brief pause at these places, it broke out with unsparing fury at Avignon in January, 1348; advanced thence to Southern France, to Spain, to Northern Italy, and early in April appeared at Florence, where it came under the observation of Boccaccio. who has left a detailed account of its action. l'assing through France and visiting, but not as yet ravaging, Germany, it made its way to England. This country it entered at some point in Dorset, where it cut down its first English victims in August, 1348. Thence it travelled-by way of Devon and Somerset, of Bristol, Gloucester, and Oxford -to London, but so slowly that winter had begun before it reached the capital. Soon it embraced the whole kingdom; no spot, however isolated, escaped its rage; England became a mere pest-house. Its chief symptoms in this country were spitting, in some cases actual vomiting, of blood, the breaking out of inflammatory boils in parts, or over the whole, of the body, and the appearance of these dark blotches upon the skin which suggested its most startling name. Some of its victims died almost on the first attack, some in twelve hours, some in two days, almost all within the first three. Before it medical skill was powerless; few recovered, until, as the plague drew towards its close men bethought them of opening the hard, dry boils - a treatment that relieved the system of the venom and saved many lives. Contagion bore it everywhere; the clothes, the breath, everything the patient touched, the very air that surrounded him, were poisoned with it; even a glance of his eye, men fancied, might strike down the onlooker. Its career in England on this visitation lasted for about a year; but its destructive energy would seem to have been at its height between May, 1349, and the following Michaelmas, the snmmer heats doubtless stimulating its fury. The havoc it made in the population far exceeded that made by any similar scourge recorded in history; the exaggerations of a contemporary annalist, gross as they are, help us to realise its extent. "Towns, once close packed with men, were stripped of their inhabitants; and to so pernicious a power did. ; plague rise that the living were scarce able to bury the dead. In certain religious houses, out of twenty inmates there hardly survived two. By several it was reckoned that barely a tenth part of the population had been left It is stated that it slew 100,000 human beings in London-50,000 of whom were buried in a plot of ground which Sir Walter Manny had bought for the purpose, a space now covered by Smithfield—nearly 60,000 in Norwich, and proportionate numbers in Bristol and other leading cities. These

scrupulously careful living writer has found evidence which satisfies him that at least half the population died by this outbreak, whilst another, of equal industry, admits that the full sum of the vietims cannot have been less than a third. And the leaning of historians is generally towards the higher reckoning, by which the actual carnage would amount, at highest, to 2,500,000, at lowest, to 1,500,000, for the estimates of the population at the time range from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. For obvious reasons, the mortality was greatest among the elergy and the humbler classes; yet the contagion reached even the highest. A newly-elected Primate, Bradwardine, and Edward III's. daughter. Joan, caught it and perished. For a time its progress seemed arrested by the Scottish border, and "the foul death of the English" is said to have been a favourite oath with the Scets, who felt a malicious pleasure in their enemies' misfortunes; but the scoffers soon involved themselves in the same disasters by making a foolish raid into England, and the work of death went forward in Scotland also. The disease passed over to Ireland, where, if report can be trusted, it discriminated between the intruding English and the natives; the former were taken and the latter left. immediate effects on society were of the kind usual in such frightful calamities. Humanity showed itself at its worst and its best : there was much reckless profligacy and revolting selfishness, but not a few examples of self-The terror-stricken sacrificing devotion. rushed to religion for comfort and help; many gave up lands and goods, and sought a haven in monasteries; an earlier and fierce fanaticism—that of the Flagellants—was reorganised, and fascinated or horrified men by its ghastly ritual. I ho permanent impression that the Black Death made on the human memory is shown in several ways—in this conspicuously, that it was set up as a fixed mark to reckon time from; it was long a practice to date charters and legal instruments from it. Far more important were its economic and remoter historical eonsequences. The great social movement of the fourteenth century gained by it an impetus, if not an originating force, and found in it the most favourable conditions of success; it led, by regular stages, to the rising of the commons under Wat Tyler; and the whole system of farming was revolutionised by it. It has even been surmised that England owes to it the picturesque hedge-rows that divide her fields. It is certain that the wages of labour at once more than doubled through the scarcity of labourers; that proclamations were issued and statutes were passed fixing the price of labour at its former rate, and imposing penalties on all who demanded or gave more; that, these proving ineffective, others, and again others, were passed with the tume aim and a like result: that ill feeling arose between those who lived by and those who lived on manual labour, which at last drove the working classes into rebellion. And the difficulty of getting their lands tilled by the old method of villein services and hired labour forced the lords and religious houses to break up their estates, hitherto managed for them by bailiffs, into farms, which they let on leases to the actual tillers of the soil. But this was the issue of a long and compliented process, the dotails of which are too abundant to be given here. The visitations of 1361-2 and 1369 were also formidable in the extent of their ravages, yet mild as compared with their terrible predecessor. Thoy may be regarded as stages in the gradual settling down of the "great mortality" into the endemic state that it remained in for Black Hole of Calcutta, The (June 20, 1756). Suraj-ud-Dowlah, the Nawab of Bengal, a young man, cruel, effeminate, and debauched, who succeeded Aliverdi Khan early in 1756, was greatly enraged with the English at Calcutta for concealing a fugitive from him. He marched down on Calcutta on June 18 on the pretence that the English had erected some new fortifications without consulting him. The town was ill-prepared to resist an ass...lt, and was moreover weakened by the disgraceful desertion of Mr. Drake, the governor, with the railitary commandant, who slipped off unperceived, and rowed down to the ships. Mr. Holwell was thereupon placed in command by common consent, and the fort was gallantly held for forty-eight hours, when it became necessary to surrender. The Nawab gave Mr. Holwell every assurance of protection, and retired about dusk to his encampment. In spite of this tho prisoners, 146 in number, were thrust into a narrow chamber, some twenty feet square, which had been used as the prison of the garrison, and, however suited for the confinement of a few turbulent soldiers, meant simply death to the crowd thrust into it at the sword's point in one of the hottest nights of the most sultry season of the year.

The agonies endured during this terrible night were horrible beyond expression. The night was intensely hot, and as the torments of thirst and suffocation came upon them, the prisoners struggled with one another for a mouthful of fresh air at the windows. They insulted the guards to induce them to fire on them. The majority died in raving madness; and the few who survived owed their lives to the freer ventilation obtained by standing on the bodies of their dead or dying companions. Twenty-three glastly survivors alone were dragged out the next morning. Mr. Holwell was so broken that he had to be carried before the Nawab, who manifested no compunction at the results of his infamous cruelty.

Black Mail was the compulsory payment ex eted by the border chieftains from the dwealers in the more civilised districts on the English side in return for the protection of their cattle and goods. The levy of black mail was made a felony by 43 Eliz, c. 13 (1601). The name was also given to the payment made to the chiefs of some of the Highland clans by those who lived in their neighbourhood in return for the immunity of their cattle from capture. It did not entirely cease till 1745.

Black Mountain War, The (1868). The Hussunzye tribe of Afghans, inhabiting the Agror Valley in the Black Mountain range, broke out into hostilities and attacked a police station. As they showed no disposition to submit, General Wyldo was sent against them, Sept. 26th, and after various operations, which lasted till the 7th of Nov., reduced the insurgents, who submitted, and the force was withdrawn on the 18th. Black Sea Conference, THE. In 1871, in consequence of a declaration by Russia that she would no longer be bound by the Treaty of Paris of 1856 with regard to the navigation of the Black Sea, a Conference of the Powers was invited to meet at London to settle the questions. In assuming a right to abolish her own treaty engagements, there can be no doubt that Russia counted upon some general understanding she had arrived at with Prussia, to the effect that the latter power would assist her in effecting her wishes. Some delay arose in the assembling of the Conference owing to the anomalous position of France, but on Dec. 18th, Lord Granville received a formal intimation that a French plenipotentiary would present himself at the Conference. The emergency at Paris, how-ever, prevented this, and the representatives ble of the other powers proceeded to deliberate without France; but the Duke de Broglie, the French plenipotentiary, eventually appeared on March 13th. As the result of the Conference the Treaty of London was concluded. Its provisions were that articles XI., XIII., and XIV. of the Treaty of Paris, 1856, are abrogated; that the principl of closing the Dardanelles and Bosphorus is maintained with power to the Sultan to open the said straits to the fleets of friendly and allied powers, in the event that the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris should require it; that the commission for managing the navigation of the Danube should be continued in its present ferm for a further period of twelve years. The result of this treaty was to open the Black Sea to Russian ships of war, and to allow the Sultan to open the Dardanelles to foreign ships of war if the defence of his throne required it.

Black Watch, The, was the name originally given to the semi-independent bodies of llighlanders who were entrusted by the English government with the duty of keeping order in the Highlands. They were embedied as a regiment of the regular army (the 43rd, afterwards the 42nd) in 1740. Three years afterwards they were removed to London. In May, 1743, the greater part of the regiment mutined, and set out northwards. They were pursued, surrounded, and compelled to surrender. Three ringleaders were put to death, and the remainder of the regiment sent to the West Indies and to Flanders. As a regiment of the regular army the Black Watch has sinee borne a distinguished part in nearly all the wars in which England has been engaged.

Blackheath, THE BATTLE OF (June 22 1497), was fought between the troops of Henry VII, and the Cornish robels. The rebels had taken up a strong position on a hill at Blackheath, within sight of London. The king had recalled the troops destined for service against Scotland, and had collected tegether at London a large army composed of all the fighting men in the neighbou .ng counties. He stationed one portion of his army (under his personal command) in St. George's Fields. A second detachment, under the command of the Earls of Oxford and Suffolk. was ordered to make a circuitous march round the hill occupied by the rebels, and take up as strong a position as possible in their rear. The remainder of his forces, under Lord Danbeny, he sent forward to attack the rebels in frent. The Cornishmen fought bravely; but ill-armed, ill-led, without horse or artillery, they were unable to offer any long resistance to the disciplined, wellequipped troops who attacked them in front and rear simultaneously. Two thousand of their number were slain, and the remainder surrendered. Among the large number of prisoners were the rebel leaders Lord Audley, Michael Joseph, and Thomas Flammock, who were put to death.

Blacklow Hill, an eminence between Warwick and Coventry, was the scene of the execution of Piers Gavesten by the revolted barons under the Earls of Lancaster and Warwick in 1312.

Blackstone, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1723, d. 1780), was the posthumous son of a Cheapside silk-mercer, and was educated at the Charterhouse and Pembroke College, Oxford. He obtained a fellewship at All Seuls, and was called to the bar by the Middle Temple in 1746. His practice was never large, and after a few years he devoted his attention mainly to collegiato matters. As bursar of All Souls he shewed administrative skill and zeal for reform; and the building of the Codrington L'brary was mainly due to his exertions. In 1757 he was elected to a fellowship at Queen's College, where his architectural activities again displayed themselves. A year later he was elected to the newly founded Vincrian Professorship of Law, and delivered from that chair the lecture, which were subsequently (1765) embodied in the "Commen-taries." The fame of his lectures caused him to return to a more active professional life. In 1761 he was appointed Principal of New Inn Hall, a post which he held for five years in the vain hope of establishing at Oxford a college for legal education. He also during this period sat in Parliament for Henden and Westbury. From 1770 until his death he was one of the Judges of the Common Pleas. As a writer upon law his faults are mainly those of his age—an unscientific arrangement and a loose terminology. Bentham has exposed these faults with great vehemence, but at the same time does full justice to Blackstone's merits as an expounder. "He it is," he says, "who, firs' of all institutional writers, has taught jurisprudence to speak the language of the scholar and the gentleman." This sentence accurately represents Blackstone's claim to be remembered, and will explain why laymen regard his werk with reverence and lawyers with indifference.

Besides the Commentaries on the Laws of England, of which numerous editions have appeared, Blackstone wrote several tracts on questions of constitutional law, that on the Middlesex Election, and on the Extent of the Powers of Parliement, being the two best known. The Commentaries have been rearranged with doubtful advantage by R. M. Kerr and Mr. Serjeant Stephen. A Life by J. C. Clitherow is prefaced to Blackstone's Reports (folio, 1781). A biography and list of works published, and in manuscript, by a "Gentleman of Livcoln's Inn" (Dr. Douglass), appeared in 1782. Blackwater, THE BATTLE OF (1598), was fought near the fort of that name in Tyrone. Hugh O'Neil, called the "arch rebel," here defeated the English Marshal, Sir Henry Bagnall, who had marched to the relief of the fort. O'Neil killed the English leader with his own hands. One thousand five hundred of the English foll, and all their stores and ammunition were captured by the Irish, as well as the fort itself. The forces engaged on each side amounted to something like 5,000 men. This victory led at the time to an almost general revolt of the natives.

Bladensberg, The Battle of (Aug. 24, 1814), fought during the American War, took its name from a small viliage on the left bank of the eastern branch of the Potomae. This position commanded the only bridge over the river; and here the American general, Winder, prepared to oppose the advance of the British, under General Ross, upon Washington. To effect their object it was necessary for the British to carry the bridge and the commanding position of the Americans. Ross accordingly formed his forces into two columns, one under Thornton, the other commanded by Brooke. The attack was entrusted to the former; and so ree an onslaught did his column make upon the defenders of the bridgo that it was carried immediately, together with a fortified house at the farther end. On the other side of the river, Thornton's column was joined by Brooke's men, and a general uttack was made upon the American position. One impetuous charge carried it, and the whole American army broke in confusion, and, flying through Washington, never stopped till they had taken up a position on the heights of Georgetown. After a short rest, the British advanced, and on the same evening entered Washington without encountering any further opposition.

Blake, ROBERT (b. 1599, d. 1657), was born at Bridgewater and educated at Oxford. He sat in the Long Parliament as member for Bridgewater. At the outbreak of the Civil War he raised a regiment, took part in the defence of Bristol, and successfully held Taunton against the Royalists. In 1649 Colonel Blake was appointed one of the commanders of the navy, and shortly afterwards Warden of the Cinque Ports. He was eminently successful as a naval commander. He drove Prince Rupert from the British seas to take refuge in the Tagus, and, in January, 1651, destroyed almost the entire Royalist fleet in Malaga Harbour. Later in the year he recovered the Channel Island fortresses from the Royalists, and was made a member of the Ceuncil of State. In May, 1652, he fought a sharp but indecisive action with the Dutch in the Straits of Dover; and on September 18 defeated them in the Downs. In November he fought a terrible engagement against the Dutch under Van Tromp, whose forces were greatly superior. The English were defeated and compelled to take refuge in the Thames. Blako was present in the bloody and obstinate engagements in February and June, 1653, but, owing to illhealth, took no part in the great English victory of July 29, in which Van Tromp was killed. When war broke out between England and Spain in 1656, Blake was appointed to command the English fleet in the Me'iterranean. In April he performed the daring feat of sailing into the harbour of Teneriffe in spite of the fire from the forts, and captured a large fleet of galleons which lay at anchor there. He died the year following, just as he was entering Plymouth Sound. Ho was buried in Westminster Abbey, but after the Restoratic his remains were disin-· Tyburn. Blanche of Lancaster. [Lancaster. TER.]

Blanche of Navarre, wife of Edward Crouchback (second son of Henry III.), and mother of Thomas of Lancaster (executed after the battle of Boroughbridge, 1320), was the daughter of Robert of Artois, brother of St. Louis, and the widow of Henry, King of Navarre.

Bland, John (d. 1555), the rector of Adisham in Kent, was one of the martyrs of the Protestant persecution of Mary's reign. Being convicted of heresy by a commission composed of Thornton, Bishop of Dover. Collins, the deputy of Cardinal Pole, and Nicholas Harpefeld, the archdeacon, he was burnt at Canterbury.

Bland's Case (1586). John Bland, a currier of London, was brought to the bar of the House of Commons for using slanderous language, saying that the curriers could get no justice in the House, and that the shoemakers were unjustly favoured. On account of his poverty he was dismissed upon making his submission on his knees, and paying twenty shillings to the sergeant. This is an important precedent for the power of the House of Commons to punish even non-members for offences against its privileges.

Blasphemy. Before the Reformation, offences against religion, of which blasphemy was one, were almost exclusively dealt with in the ecclesiastical courts, and several statutes, passed in the fifteenth century, gave the bishops power to deal with the offence. These powers were not finally dropped till the temporary suppression of the ecclesiastical courts in 1940, and their revival after the Restoration without the ex-officio oath. In 1677 the common law writ, de hæretico comburendo, was abolished by Parliament; but the judges henceforward treated blasphemy as an offence at common law. It has been held to consist of denial of the being and providence of God, or uttering contumelious reproaches against Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or denying the truth of Christianity. According to the eelebrated judgment of Lord Hales in the case of Rex v. Taylor, "Christianity being parcel of the law of England, to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law:" but in a later case (1883) it has been held that a person may attack the fundamentals of religion without being guilty of a blasphemous libel "if the decencies of controversy are observed." Blenheim, The Battle of (Aug. 13, 1704), was fought during the third campaign in the War of the Spanish Succession. Louis XIV. had determined to menace Vienns, hoping to strike at the heart of the Austrian power, and at the same time to make full use of the assistance of his Bavarian ally. Marlborough, however, perceived his object and effected a junction with Prince Eugene, who commanded the Imperial forces in Würtemberg. They were hampered by their colleague, Prince Louis of Baden, a general of the old formal school. The Schellenberg, a hill above Donauwörth, was stormed, and the Bavarians driven from it. Next day Marshal Tallard effected a junction with the armies of Marshal Marsin and the Elector of Bavaria. Marlborough and Eugene got rid of Louis of Baden by persuading him to attack the fortress of Ingolstadt, and prepared for a decisive battle near Blindtheim or Blenheim. This village was situated on the northern bank of the Danube, near the place where it is joined by a little brook, the Nebel. About two miles away, and nearly parallel to the river, is a range of low wooded hills. The small stream of the Nebel runs from these hills. Tho Nebel divided the two armies. Marlborough commanded the left of the allied forces, Eugene the right. Tallard was opposed to Marlborough, the Elector of Bayaria and Marsin to Eugene. Tallard committed the great error of throwing all his best troops into Blenheim, thereby weakening the centre. The attack of Lord Cutts on the village was repulsed. Marlborough, seeing the weakness of the French centre, threw his cavalry across the Nebel, and after a terrific struggle cut the French line in two. Meanwhile, on the right, Eugene only saved the battle by tho steadiness of his Prussian infantry. had been greatly hampered by the difficulties of the ground. Marlborough's cavalry charge on the French centre had won the day. The French cavalry fled; Tallard was taken prisoner. The French troops in Blenheim were surrounded, and surrender 'after a gallant resistance; but the force opposed to Eugene retreated in good order. The allies are computed to have lost 11,000 men out of an army of 52,000, the French altogether 40,000 out of 60,000, including 14,000 prisoners. The broken army of the enemy retreated with extreme rapidity, and withdrew beyond the Rhine.

Bligh, Captain William, well known in connection with the mutiny on the Bounty, in April, 1789, which was caused by his tyrannical conduct, was in 1806 appointed Governor of New South Wales, but his appointment was so unpopular, and his conduct so harsh and despotic, that in January, 1808, he was deposed by the colonists, and the other civil and military officers of the colony, and sent back to England. Blockade. [Neutrality; Armed Neutrality; Paris, Declaration of.]

Blockade, The American. It is a principle of international law that a State cannot blockade its own ports When, therefore, the American Civil War broke out in 1861, President Lincoln had to choose between the blockade or the declaration that the Confederate ships were pirates. The American government chose the former, and on the 19th of April declared the ports of the revolted provinces to be blockaded. This practically recognised the existence of war with the Confederates, and the English government were therefore justified in recognising the Southern States as belligerents, which was done May 14, 1861. The Federal government protested that the recognition by England was an unfriendly act, but subsequent writers on international law, both American and English, are agreed that England was acting strictly according to the recognised principles of the law of nations

Block, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln (d. 1123), though born of obscure parentage, was Chancellor in 1090, which office he held till his appointment to the see of Lincoln in 1093. He became one of Henry L's chief ministers, and is the first man to whom is given the title of Justiciar, indicating a definite office. He held this office from 1100 to 1107, when he probably fell out of favour with the king, and retired into private life. Henry of Huntingdon, who was brought up by the bishop, gives an interesting picture of his household, and says that Bloct "excelled all other men in grace of person, in serenity of temper, and in courtesy of speech."

Blois, Peter of (d. 1200), was descended from a noble family of Brittany, and studied at Paris and Bologna. Subsequently he opened a school at Paris, and was invited to England by Henry II. He became Chancellor of Canterbury Cathedral, and afterwards Archdeacon of Bath, but was deprived of it for his attachment to William Longchamp. Afterwards, however, he was made Archdeacon of London and prebendary of St. Paul's. He was the author of numerous letters, more than 200 of which are extant. Many of them are very valuable for their notices of the politics and manners of the writer's age. The Continuation of Ingulf's History of Crowland from 1089 to 1117 professes to have been written by Peter of Blois; but it is probable that it was composed at a later date.

Hardy, Descriptive Catalogue, ii. 128. Peter of Blois' Epistles were printed by Dr. Giles in the Patres Ecclesie Asglicane, Oxford, 1847; and they will be found in Migne, Patrologia, vol. 207.

Blondel, or Blondian, DE NESLE, was a celebrated French troubadour who became attached to the court of Richard I. He is said to have discovered the place of the king's imprisonment in Germany by singing the king's own favourite lays before each keep and fortress till the unfinished song was at length taken up and answered from the windows of the castle of Loewenstein, where Richard was imprisoned. The story, however, does not appear to be older than the fifteenth century.

Blondel, ROBERT (b. 1390? d. 1460?), was a member of the court of Charles VII. of France, and was chaplain to Queen Mary of Anjou. He wrote several works designed to excite his countrymen to shake off the English yoke, and was the author of a work called De Reductions Normanniae, which is a highly valuable contemporary narrative of the expulsion of the English fr m Northorn France.

Blondel's De Red. Norman, is printed in Mr. Stevenson's Expulsion of the English from Normandy (Rolls Series), 1863.

Blood, Colonel Thomas (d. 1681), was an Irish soldier of fortune remarkable for his reckless audacity. In 1663 he joined a conspiracy to seize Dublin Castle, but the plot being discovered, he fled. In 1670 he seized the Duke of Ormond in the streets of London with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn, but the duke fortunately escaped. In the next year Blood distinguished himself by attempting to carry off the Regalia from the Tower, and very nearly succeeded in his object. Charles II., however, pardoned him, and gave him an estate worth £500 a year.

Blore Heath, THE BATTLE OF (1459), WAS fought, during the Wars of the Roses, between the Laneastrians, under Lord Audley, and the Yorkists, who were commanded by the Earl of Salisbury. The latter was marching southwards with ...e intention of effecting a junction with the Duke of York, and Lord Audley was despatched to intercept him. They met on Bloro Heath, about two miles and a half from Market Drayton, in Stafford-The Yorkists, though inferior in shire. numbers, were completely victorious. Lord Audley, and many other leading men on the same side, were killed, and a large number of prisoners were taken. Salisbury's further march was uninterrupted, and he effected a junction with the Duke of York at Ludlow.

Boadices, Buddig, or Boudices (the ordinary form of the name has been stigmatised as "the gibberish of editors") (d. 62), was the widow of Prasutagus, chief of the Iceni, and was the leader of the great revolt against the Romans in the time of Suctonius Paulinus. The tyranny and oppression of the conquerors had been brought to a climax by the atrocious treatment to which Boadicea and her daughters were subjected, and the revolt sho headed was a national one, and included most of the peoples of Central and Eastern Britain. Her success at first was very great. The Romans were slaughtered in great numbers, and many of their important towns taken, including the colonies of Camelodunum, Londinium, and Verulamium. But the return of Suctonius and his veterans turned the tide, and the British were signally defeated in a great battle outside London. According to Tacitus, Boadices committed suicide, but Dio Cassius asserts that she died a natural death. Her revolt taught the igned

Bocher, Joan (Joan of Kent), was an Anabaptist who was condemned by the commissioners appointed to Inquire into heresy in 1349. Their report being that she held heretical and erroneous opinions on the nature of the incarnation, sho was burnt to death May 2nd, 1550. "She died," says Mr. Froude (Hist. of Eng., v. 201), "being one of the very few victims of the ancient hatred of heresy with which the Reformed Church of England has to charge itself."

Bocland, in Auglo-Saxon legal phraseology, was that land which was held by book or charter. Originally, it was distinguished both from the "Folcland," or public domain, and from the "ethel," or estate, which was held by an individual by prescriptive right. But in later times the characteristics of ethel land were lost, and bocland was equivalent to "alod," or land which was held in full owne whip by an individual, whether It had been inherited as part of an original allotment, or whether it had been separated from the public land and allotted to an Individual by the king and the Witan, by charter or legal process. Bocland might be alienated inter vives, or devised by will, and it might be entailed or otherwise limited in descent. The owner was not liable to any public burdens on his land, except the trineds necessites. [LAND, TENURE OF.]

Boece, or Boetins, Hacron (b. 1465? d. 1536), Scottish historian, was born at Dunche, studied at Aberdeen and Paris, and became first Principal of the King's College at Aberdeen. Ho was the author of a History of Scotland, first published in Latin in 1526, and translated into English by Bellenden ten y. ars later. It is composed with a good deal of literary skill, but is altogether valueless as an authority, the narrative being full of legends and romantio tales of all kinds. Boece's History was very popular, and through it, as Mr. Burton says, "the wondrous tale of the annals of Scotland got a hold on the European mind."

A metrical version of the Buik of the Chrenic es of Scotland of Hector Boyis was executed by William Steward at the command of Margare;, wife of James IV. It has been edited by Mr. W. B. Turnbull in the Rolls Series (1888).

Boer War, THE. The events which led to the outbreak of this conflict are narrated under Thanswaal Colony. The first shot was fired on Oct. 12, 1899, when the Boers attacked an armoured train. The Boer plan of campaign was to attack the principal British towns adjoining Boer territory, and to invade Natal, with the object of capturing Pletermaritaburg and Durbau. Mafeking water layested by Cronje, Kimberley by Wessels, and Joubert led the Natal Invasion. On Oct. 20 the invaders were checked by a British force at Talana Hill, but General Penn Symons was killed, and It was judged expedient to gult Dundee and withdraw to Ladysmith. On the 21st the British under General French attacked the Boers at Elandslangte. After some severe fighting the enemy's contingent was completely broken up; all the equipment of the force and about three hundred prisoners were captured. On Oct. 24 Sir George White engaged the Boers, and withdrew after four hours' fighting. having received a message which assured him that the Dundee column was too near to Ladysmith to be cut off. The Durdee force reached Ladysmith in a state of much exhaustion. The unsuccessful action of Lombard's Kop and the disaster to the Gloucesters at Nicholson's Nek led to the investment of Ladysmith on the 29th. Happily a Naval Brigade, whose guns were the saving of the place, reached Ladysmith in time, and G neral French, whose services were to be so valuable elsewhere, escaped in the last train which got away from the threatened town. On the following day General Buller, the Commander-in-Chief, reached Cape Town. The "Entanglement of Ladysmith" necessitated a revision of plans. The projected invasion of the Orange Free State was deferred. General Buller's Army Corps was split up, a part went to Natal under General Clery, a part to Queenstown in Cape Colony under General Gatacre, in view of an expected invasion, and another part under Lord Methuen was despatched to the relief of Kimberley. General Buller landed in Natal on Nov. 25.

The severe nature of our task was shown by the opposition which confronted Lord Methuen's advance. During the last week of November he fought three engagements—at Belmont, at Enslin, and at Modder River—the latter an engagement in which the policy of the frontal attack, long ere this declared by experts to be wasteful, began to appear, murderous and dangerous. Though in each of these engagements the British forces were successful, each was purchased by considerable losses. After Modder River, where he himself was slightly wounded, he found it necessary to pause and recruit his forces. Meanwhile Bniler was preparing for a general advance in Natal, and a Nov. 30 the Government accepted the assistance offered by the Colonies. The second week in December was one of the blackest in the history of the British Empire. After a terrible night's march, in which the guide missed his way, General Gatacre, on the morning of Dec. 10, was defeated at Stormberg, losing 719 men killed and wounded; on the 11th Lord Methuen was defeated at Magersfontein, where the Highland Brigade was cut up and General Wauchope killed, with a loss of 950 killed and wounded, and on the 16th, to crown all, General Buller was repulsed at the Tugela River with a loss of 1,100 me; killed and wounded and ten guns. The immediate results were the appointment of Lord Roberts as Commander in Chief, with Lord Kitchener as Chief of the Staff; the creation of the Imperial Yeomany; and the enrolment of volunteers for the front. Matters were temporarily at a deadlock, except that General French was holding his own at Colesberg against Generals De Wet and

De la Rev. That was the only bright feature at the beginning of 1900. On Jan. 6 the Boers tried to storm Ladysmith, but the attempt was gallantly repulsed by the garrison (with 500 casualties) at Cassar's Camp and Wagon Hill. General Buller crossed the Tugela, hut met with a disastrous reverse at Spion Kop /Jan. 24), and was forced to retreat. On Feb. 5 he again attempted an advatce, but was checked at Vaalkrants, and again retired. Lord Roberts, who had reached Cape Town on Jan. 10, was now In a position to take the field. He determined to relieve the pressure on the belenguered towns by an advance through the Free State. On Feh. 9 he was at Modder River. On Feb. 16 General French and the cavalry relieved Kimberley, after it had withstood a siege lasting one hundred and twenty-three days, during the greater part of which the garrison had endured the horrors of semi-starvation and, for the latter part of it, the added terrors of bombardment. The besieging forces retreated, Cronje at their head. General French purshed them, by Lord Kitchener's direction, got ahead of them, and on Feh. 17 seized the hills above Paardeberg. Next day the infantry came up and attacked Crouje's position. Our casualties were 1,000. It was work for guns rather than for infantry. The position was bombarded, and on Feb. 27, the anniversary of Majuba Hill, Cronje surrendered with 4,000 men. This event changed the character of the Boer War, which from this time partons more of the nature of guerilla warfare. Pressure around Ladysmith had heen somewhat relaxed; General Buller fought his way through at Pieter's Hill, and Lord Dundonald and the cavalry rode into the town on Feh. 28. For four months Ladysmith had heen isolated, and its inhabitants had suffered the pangs of hunger, the inroads of fell disease, and the stress of hattle The garrison and inhabitants were in a state of great exhaustion. Dysentery and enterio fever in the town had proved themselves more formidable foes than the army of the Boers. About forty per cent. of the European population had invalided, and over five thousand of the military had been in the same predicament. The casualty list—killed, wounded, and missing—of the army of relief totalled up to five thousand. With the relief of Ladymith the Boers vacated Natal.

Half-hearted attempts were made at Poplar Grove and Driefontein to check the advance of Lord Roberts, who occupied Bloemfontein on March 13. Here there was an enforced halt of over six weeks, and a serious outhreak of enterio fever occurred. On March 28 General Joubert died, whom Sir George White, who had felt the prowess of the Boer general, described as "a soldier, and a gentleman, a brave and honourable opponent. On March 31 De Wet ambnshed Broadwood's hrigade at Sanna's Post, and four days later a detachment of Irish Rifles at Reddershurg. At last, on May 1, the army resumed its march. On May 17 a flying column under General Mahon relieved Mafeking. On May 24 a proclamation declared the annexation of the Orange Free State. Lord Roberts occupied Johanneshurg without resistance, and President Kruger left Pretoria on May 30 for Waterval Boven. Our troops entered Pretoria on June 5, hardly any opposition being offered, and 3,000 British prisoners were released. Three days later the Boer forces were located and defeated at Diamond Hill, twenty miles east of Pretoria. Prinsloo and 3,000 Free State Boers surrendered to General Hunter on July 29. Lord Roberts planned a descent npon Koomatl Poort, in conjunction with the troops under General Buller, which had come up from Natal. The two generals dispersed the Boer forces at Dalmanutha and Bergendal, and at Nooitgedacht, on Aug 30, the remainder of the British prisoners were released. President Kruger fled to Lorenzo Marques, whence he sailed to Europe on board a Dutch man-ofwar, and Koomati Poort was occupied on Sept. 25. The annexation of the Transvaal had already been proclaimed (Sept. 1), and Lord Roberts left for England.

It seemed as if the war was over. It was not over, hut it was entering on a new phase. For eighteen months a vigorous guerilla warfare was practised not only hy the hurghers hut also hy the disaffected Dntch of Cape Colony. Reinforcements of 30,000 men were sent out. It was necessary to cut short the food supplies of the guerillas if the war was ever to end. Large tracts of country were devastated, and the Boer women and children gathered into concentration camps. The Boers, however, being in this manner re'ieved of the care of their families, carried on hostlities with sil the more energy. In February De Wet Invaded Cape Colony, withdrew from the Colony eighteen days, with the loss of his guns, munitions, and haif his men. Negotiations for peace ensued, but broke down chiefly on the question of the treatment of the Cape Lord Kitchener adopted a new rebels. policy-that of block-houses and mobile columns. Wherever there was a line of block-houses, and there were many, com-munication with a base was assured. Up to the close of 1901 there was a great deal of desultory fighting, in which on the whole the British had the advantage, though Christmas Eve was saddened by the disaster to a yeomanry camp at Tweefontein, which the Borrs captured by a night attack.

A system of "drives" by mounted troops was now organised. On one "drive" aione 600 prisoners were taken. The losses, however, were by no means all on one side. 28th Mounted Infantry were overwhelmed at Klip Drift, and in March De La Rey captured l'aris's column, when Lord Methuen, severely wounded, was among the prisoners. But in ap te of these successes the Boers were coming to the ond of their resources. At a mass in eting of representative burghers at Vereeniging, a majority decided on surrender; and after some discussion peace was signed at Pretoria on May 31, 1902, and proclaimed the day following. Among the conditions of peace the following were the most important. All burghers to have complete immunity on laying down their arms and taking the oath of allegiance to King Edward; the Datch language to be taught in schools at the request of parents, and to be allowed in Law Courts; the Boors to be permitted to own sporting rifes; martial law to be replaced as soon as possible by civil administration, representative government to follow in due course; the question of native franchise not to be considered until such government be granted; £3,000,000 to be given to the farmers as compensation for damage done to their inrms; and a Commission to be formed to repatriate burghers. Subsequently in the Imperial Parliament the sum of £8,000,000 was voted, to be apportioned as follows:-£3,000,000 for grants to burghers to aid them in resuming their normal employments; £2,000,000 for grants in respect of losses incurred through the operations of war; £3,000,000 for supplementary loans, to be repaid after a term of years at 3 per cent. interest. The first and second amounts were to be charged on Imperial funds; for the third the Colonial Governments, now established, were to be the creditors. On the British side 5,774 officers and men were killed in action, and 22,829 wounded; of the Boers about 4,000 were killed, while the number of their wounded is uncertain. There were 40,000 Boer prisoners at the end of the war.

Bohemia, RELATIONS WITH, Dealings. between England and Bohemia begin with the grant of the Emperor Henry VII, to his son John, which established a German line of kings in liohemia, and involved it in Western politics. John constantly resided in France, and, as the opponent of Louis of Bavaria and the friend of Philip of Vaiois, was ied by his restless chivalry to take part in the war against England, which ended by his death at Crecy (1346). His son, Charles IV., was of a more practical temperar t; and the same Diet at Metz which accepted the Golden Bull witnessed his attempted mediation between France and England. In time more intimate relations grew up on the narriage of Anne of Bohemia, his daughter, with Richard II. Under Wenzel, her brother, still more than under Churles, the Luxemburg house had become national Kings of Bohemia at the expense of the Imperial dignity, which degenerated into a mere title. Hence close dealings between Bohemia and England; and as Catholicism and the Papacy were associated with the hated German influence, the Bohemian national party greedily listened to the doctrines of Wiclif, which all the Bohemians at Richard's court had ample opportunities of learning. What in ample opportunities of learning. What in England was mere abstract dialectic, and at best the expression of inarticulate, discontent, was turned by Bohemian patriotism into the watchwords of a national party of religious l'uritanism. Prague became a more popular Oxford. Jerome of Prague actually brought Wielif's teaching from the Thames to the Moldau. The direction taken by Huss was entirely the result of English infine ce. In one library the are still five tr cs of Wiclif copied out in his own ha copious notes. Henry V. had already COLLIE intimately allied to Sigismand, by their common efforts to restore the unity of Christendom. A fresh link of orthodex antagonism to heres; united the sover the if it separated the people. The Count of Constance marks the confidence of their closest approxima-tion. With the suppression of the national movement, Bohemia sinks into insignificance or dependence. Ferdinand I. unites Its crown with the Austrian honse. Only on the last attempt at the assertion of Bohemian nationality, which in 1618 led to the endeavour to set aside Ferdinand of Styria for Frederick of the Palatinate, the son-in-law of James I., were direct relations between the two States renewed. But though the cause of the Protestant Pfalzgraf, was exceedingly popular in England, James refused to support him until it was too late. The battle on the Weissberg (1620) destroyed at once the fortunes of Frederick and Elizabeth, and the nationality and independence of the Czech kingdom.

Palacky, Geschichte von Böhmen, is perhaps the best general authority on Bohemian history, Creighton's History of the Papacy (Bk. II., ch. iii. and iv.) brings out very clearly the connection between Huss and Wichif. Cf. Bohun, THE FAMILY OF, was founded by a certain Humphrey de Bohun, said to have been a kinsman of William I. In 1199 Henry de Bohun was created Earl of Hereford by John (apparently inheriting the office of Constable from his father Humphrey, whose mother was the daughter of Miles, Earl of Hereford and Lord High Constable). He married the daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex, and upon the death of his brother-in-law, the last Earl of Essex of the house of Mandeville, succeeded to his estates. His son Humphrey, second Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Essex about 1236. William de Bohun—who fought at Creey—fourth son of the four h Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Northampton 1337. His son succeeded to the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton, and died 1372, leaving two daughtors, Eleanor—who married Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of (floucester-and Mary-who married Henry of Bolingbroke (afterwards Henry IV.), who thus gained the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton.

Bois-le-Duc, The Battle of (Nov. 12, 1794), was fought during the campaign of the allies with the English contingent under the Duke of York, in Flanders. For some time past great preparations had been pushed forward by Moreau in obedience to the instructions of the Committee of Public Safety at Paris, who were resolved on subjugating Holland while the severity of the winter had neutralised i' defensive advantages of the country. To carry out this project, the first step was to cross the Meuse, and, with this object in view, boats for a bridge had been collected at Fort Crèvecceur on that river. When all preparations had been completed, the passage was attempted at day-break on the 12th. But the firm resistance of the allies, under the Duke of York, prevented all the attempts of the French, though Moreau omitted no pains or skill; and at length, seeing that it was impossible to earry the passage, that able engineer desisted from the attempt, and placed his troops in winter quarters between the Meuse and the Rhine.

Boleyn, Anne. [Anne Boleyn.]

Boleyn, Mary. An elder sister of Anne Boleyn, second queen of Henry VIII., and at one time herself: object of the king's passionate admiration. This, however, was one of Henry's earlier attachments, and took place at a period when his affection for Catherine of Arragon was still sufficiently strong to prevont his seriously entertaining any idea of a second marriage by means of a divorce. Mary Boleyn married, in July, 1521, Sir William Pavey, a descendant of the Beaufort family, and, disappearing for awhilo from the vicinity of the court, was spared any renewal of the fickle king's dangerous attentions.

Poleyn, Sir Thomas. [Wiltshire, Earl of.]

Bolingbroke, HENRY. [HENRY IV.]

Boling broke, HENRY St. JOHN, VISCOUNT (b. 1678, d. 1751), the son of Sir Henry St. John, was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In the year 1700 he married, and in the following year entered Parliament for Wootton Bassett, and attached himself to Harley and the Torics. When Harley was appointed Secretary of State in 1706. St. John was made Secretary for War. He retired with Harley in 1708, and returned, when the Tories came in again after the Sacheverell episode, in 1710, as one of the Secretaries of State. The position of that party was a doubtful and dangerous one. Peace was loudly called for by a section of the people, and was in itself a desirable enough object. But there is little to be urged in excuse of the steps by which it was brought about. Under St. John's conduct, England deserted her allies, and, in violation of all her agreements, proceeded to enter into private negotiations with France. [UTRECHT. TREATY OF.] At home the Tory leaders were engaged in a course of intrigues, with the object of counteracting the predominance the Whigs were sure to gain under the house of Hanover. The army and the civil service were being gradually filled with men who were really Jacobites, and the design seems to have been entertained of changing the succession. The struggle for power between Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and Bolingbroke (called to the Upper House as Viscount Bolingbroke in 1712) interfered with this project, and very greatly weakened the party. Through the influence of Lady Masham with the queen, Oxford was dismissed in July 2, 1714. But Bolingbroke's tenure of undivided power was very short. On the 30th of July the queen was seized with the attack of apoplexy which was to prove fatal to her. At the council which was summoned on the emergency, the Whig Dukes Argyle, Somerset, and Shrewsbury succeeded in carrying the resolution by which the last-named became Lord Treasurer. On the death of the queen (Aug. 1) Bolingbroke deliberated, and was lost. The Whig dukes seized the reins of government, proclaimed the Elector king, and sent special messengers summoning him to England. The new Parliament was violently Whig. Bolingbroke, knowing tly that he would be impeached, fled to France (March 25, 1715). On the 10th of June ho was impeached, and on the 16th of September his name was struck off the list of peers and sentence of banishment was passed upon him. He now ontered the service of the Pretender, and was nominated by that prince his Secretary of State; but in 1716 ho was dismissed from the prince's employment, and a breach took place between him and the extreme Jacobites. For some years he remained in France, devoting himself chiefly to study and to the society of the Marquise de Villette, a niece of Madamo do Maintenon, whom he ultimately married. In 1723 he was permitted to roturn to England, and an Act of Parliament was passed allowing him to enjoy his property; but he was still excluded from the House of Lords. lle joined the opposition against Walpolo, and for many years carried on relentless hostilities with that minister by means of intrigue and political journalism. He contributed largely to the Craftsman, a periodical which had a large circulation, and a re-putation very damaging to Walpole'a cause. In 1735, however, he found it prudent once moro to withdraw to France, where he remained till 1742. On the fall of Walpole, he found that his allies in opposition wero not disposed to admit him to any share of power. He withdrew altogether from politics, and spent the remaining nine years of his life in philosophical retirement at Battersea. Bolingbroke's writings produced more effect on the thought of the eighteenth century than their intrinsic merits seem to warrant. His political and historical works, of which the chief are Letters on the Study of History, Remarks on the History of England, A Dissertation upon Parties, The Idea of a Patriot King, and A Letter to Sir William Windham, are evidently composed in great part to justify his own action in public life; but they contain a good deal of suggestive disquisition, and some fine passages of declamatory eloquence.

Bolingbroke's Works were published by Mallet in 1754 in 5 vols. His Correspondence appeared in 1798, edited by Gilbert Parke. See also the easay on Bolingbroke in Edmusat, L'Angleterre au Diz-hutième Siècle; G. W. Bolingbroke, Rooen (d. 1441), a chaplain of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, was executed for having conspired with Eleanor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester, to destroy King Henry VI. by magical incantations.

Bolton Castle, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was the scene of Mary Stuart's imprisonment, 1568. The intrigues of the Queen of Scots caused her to be removed in the following year to the "straiter

Bombay. A presidency and governorship of British India. The town and island of Bombay were ceded to England in 1661, as part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles II. A few cars afterwards it was handed over to the East India Company in return for a nominal annual payment. In 1687 Bombay was constituted a separate presidency; but in 1753 it was under the authority of the Calcutta government. The dominions of the presidency were very limited in extent until the wars with the Mahrattas, comprehending only the town and island of Bombay, with Salsette and Bassein; but by the end of the administration of the Marquis of Hastings it included Surat, Broach, Ahmednuggur, Belgaum, Sholapoor, and the whole dominions which had belonged to the Poonah state, with the exception of Sattara, which was annexed in 1848. In 1843, on the conquest of Scinde, that province was also placed under the Governor of Bombay.

Boniface of Savoy (d. 1270), Archbishop of Canterbury (1245—1270), was the son of Thomas, Count of Savoy, and consequently unclo to Eleanor of Provence, wife of Henry III. To this connection he owed his appointment to the archbishopric. He was one of the most unclerical and most unpopular of our archbishops; his sympathics were with the foreigners at Henry III.'s court, and his tastes were military. At times when his interests seemed to be opposed by the Poitevins he sided with the Barons, but his policy was a purely selfish one, and seen through by all parties. During the Barons' War he was absent from England, but returned after the battle of Evesham, and is said to have accompanied Prince Edward on his Crusade.

Boniface, Saint (b. 680, d. 755), born at Crediton, was a monk of the Excter monastery. His original name was Winfrith. In 715 he set out for Rome, and received a commission to preach to the heathen nations of Germany. His earnest missionary labours met with the greatest success in Friesland, Thuringia, and Franconia, and immense numbers were converted. He laboured in Central Germany for more than thirty years, and established the bishoprics of Salzburg, Passau, Freisingen, Ratisbon, Wurzburg, and Erfurt, and a very large number of monasteries. His influence in civilising and evangelising the wilder parts of Germany was very great. Besides his labours as a missionary, and organiser of the newly converted districts, Boniface was equally great as the restorer of the older Churches on the Rhine and Danube. He became Archbishop of Mainz, and his efforts made that see the Canterbury of Germany. He was assisted by numerous missionaries, whom he sent for from Britain, and was high in favour with the Carolingian princes. Pepin was erowned king by Boniface at Soissons. In 755 he made his last missionary journey into Friesland; but near Dokkeim he was attacked and slain by a band of the Pagans. His remains were buried in one of the most famous of his abbeys—that of Fulda.

The Works of St. Boniface were published by Dr. Giles (London, 1842). See also Vita S. Bonifacii in Mabillon, vol. iv.; Seiter, Bonifacius, 1845; Neander, Church History.

Bonlagh Common, in County Tipperary, was the place where, on July 29, 1848, Smith O'Brien appeared before the house of a widow named Cormae, which had been taken possession of by fifty constabulary, and took up a position in front of it with his followers. The constables fired, and, another party coming up at the same moment, under the command of Mr. Cox and of Mr. French, a magistrate, the rebels fled, leaving eighteen dead and many wounded behind them; none of the constabulary were wounded. This action, such as it was, put an end to the Irish "insurrection" of 1848.

Bonner, EDMUND (b. 1496, d. 1569), successively Bishop of Hereford and of London. said to have been the natural son of a priest named Savage, studied at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and became one of Wolsey's ehaplains. He subsequently attached himself to Cromwell, and in 1533 was sent on a mission to the Pope about the Divorce question. According to Burnet, his de-meanour greatly enraged Clement, "who talked of throwing him into a eauldron of melted lead, or of burning him alive." In 1538 he was made Bishop of Hereford, and in 1539 translated to London. During Henry VIII.'s reign Bonner was a leading member of the Anglican Conservative party led by Gardiner and Norfolk, but on the accession of Edward VI. he declined to follow the advanced Reformers, and protested against Cranmer's homilies and injunctions. For this Bonner was committed to the Fleet, but soon released; but in 1549 he was tried by a special commission, deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned in the Marshalsea. He was restored by Queen Mary, and was one of the most active agents in carrying out her reactionary policy. He restored the Mass in St. Paul's even before the publication of the royal ordinance which commanded it, accepted the restoration of the papal authority, despite his former policy, and his diocese was distinguished by the number of persons burnt in it, and the vindictive energy with which the bishop pushed on the work of persecution. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth, when ho appeared before the queen to tender his allegiance, she shrank from him with undisguised aversion. In May, 1559, refusing to take the oath of supremay, he was deprived and indicted for pramunire. Ho was committed to the Marshalsea, where he passed the rest of his life.

Booth, LAWRENCE (d. 1480), ARCHBISHOP OF YORK (1476—1480), after holding several minor preferments, was in 1457 appointed Bishop of Durham. He sided with the Lancastrians, and his temporalities were seized by Edward IV., but he subsequently reconciled himself with the king, and in 1473 was made Lord Chancellor, and held the Great Seal for eighteen months. He was appointed to the archbishoprie of York in 1476.

Borders, The. The English invasion established in the north-east of Britain the kingdom of Northumberland, which extended from the Humber to the Forth. West of this the Celtic kingdom of Strathclyde extended from the Dee to the Clyde. were the Celtic kingdoms of the Piets and Scots. In 827 Northumberland submitted to the supremacy of Egbert, King of Wessex, and after the repulse of the Danes that supremacy was still further extended. In 924 the princes of Northumberland, Strathelyde, and Scotland submitted to Edward the Elder. In 945 the kingdom of Strathelyde was conquered, but Galloway and Cumberland were granted to the Scottish king. Similarly, Lothian was granted to the Scottish king, either by Edgar or Canute. In 1092 William II. took Cumberland, and from that time the boundaries between England and Scotland were the Solway, the Cheviot Hills, and the River Tweed. At the time of the Norman Conquest, Seotland became the refuge of many of the English, and Lothian remained the most purely English part of the two kingdoms. William I., finding it difficult to keep his hold on the northern part of England, resorted in 1060 to the savage measure of ravaging Northumberland. The northern counties were laid waste, and the subsequent inroads of the Scottish king completed the work of devastation. The northern counties are omitted in the Domeslay Survey, probably because they were not considered worth the trouble of examining. The disputes between England and Scotland exposed the Borders to perpetual ravages. But attempts were made to introduce order, and the thirteenth contury saw Cumberland and Northumberland tolerably prosperous in agricultural pursuits. It is probablo that the necessities of constant defence enabled the men of the Borders to retain many of the old English customs more definitely than was the case elsewhere. The township organisation was not superseded by the manor, and traces of its existence till recent times are frequent. In 1249 an attempt was made to promote peace on the Borders by the issue of Border laws, which were determined by an inquest of twelvo English and twelve Scottish knights. They related to the trial of malefactors who fled across the Borders, and the redress of grievances amongst the Borderers themselves. They recognised courts to be held on the marches, at which English and Scots were to meet and try their respective criminals. l'eace and prosperity were, however, destroyed by the Scottish wars of Edward I. From that time Eugland and Scotland stood in nvowed hostility, and a perpetual warfare was waged on the Borders of the two king-doms. The land was divided into three marches, the Eastern, the Western, and the Middle, and over each was set a Warden to provide for its defence. The chief military road was along the east coast, from Newcastle through Berwick or Coldstream, and along this the chief battles between English and Scots were fought. But the passes by the valley which rnns from the Cheviots were mostly used for the incessant plundering raids that marked Border life. Along the valleys of the Jed, the Teviot, the Coquet, the Tyne, and the Rede freebooters from both countries were perpetually ravaging. The state of life along the Borders is sufficiently seen in the aspect of the country. It is rich in ruined castles, vast fortified piles in strong positions, dating in their main parts from the fourteenth century. Besides these are ruins of monastic buildings (those along the Tweed being especially famous) which were the sole abodes of peace, yet even they bear traces of careful fortification, and wore generally under the shelter of a neighbouring castle. The only other buildings of any antiquity are low square towers, called peil towers, which sufficed as shelter against a sudden raid of robbers. They probably stood in an enclosure, which contained the eattle hastily driven away. Some of the older churches have towers of the same kind, which were used for defence. The dwellings of the people were mere hovels, and their possessions were nothing but arms and cattle. Of Border frays, the buttle of Otterburn (1388) is the most famous, and has passed into legend under the name of "Chevy Chase." The great families on the Borders grew to be important men. The Percies, Greys, Dacres, and Umphravilles are famous in English history; and the Douglases, Hepburns, Lindsays, and Durbans are no less famous in the history of Scotland. Moreover, families of freebooters formed thomselves into powerful clans, and waged hereditary feuds amongst themselves—the Armstrongs, Elliots, Charltons, and the like. After the battle of Flodden Field (1513) Scotland was greatly weakened, and Henry VIII. made use of the robber warfare along the Borders as a means of still further reducing the Scot-tish power. The records of plunder and bloodshed which have been preserved show almost incredible barbarity. The result of this long-continued warfare was an entire lawlessness among the Borderers: they regarded plunder as their trade, and bloodshed as an episode in their life. When peace was made between England and Scotland in 1549. it became an object of importance for both countries to bring their borders into order. Regulations were made for that purpose; but they could not be enforced. A watch was set along the English borders; each hamlet sent its men to keep guard by night, and the news of a Scottish inroad was flashed by beacon light from place to place. The Wardens' Courts were regularly held, and the balance of bloodshed and rapine was adjusted between the two countries. But how difficult it was to keep the peace was shown in 1575, when, at a Wardens' Court held at Redeguise, some disagreement led to an appeal to arms, and the English Warden was carried away prisoner. This occurrence carried away prisoner. This occurrence threatened to lead to a breach between the two countries, and gave rise to long negotiations. The carefulness of Elizabeth's government is nowhere seen more clearly than in the steady attempt to introduce order into the English Border. The union of the erowns of England and Scotland in the person of James I. increased the general desire to pacify the Border. There was no longer war between England and Scotland; but theft and murder had become hereditary. The dwellers of one valley were the immemorial foes of those in another. It was necessary to root out bloodfeuds and robbery by strict justice, and Lord William Howard, known as "Belted Will," did much to make the law respected. The rudiments of civilisation had to be introduced, and the bad habits of the past were slow in dying away. Redesdale, Tynedale, Liddesdale, and Teviotdale were wild and lawless places, and retained traces of their old characteristics up to the beginning of the nineteenth century. Now there are no more orderly people than those of the Borders, and nowhere is agricultural enterprise and prosperity more marked.

Borh. [FRANKPLEDGE.]

Born, BENTRAND DE (d. 1200), one of the most famous troubadours, played an important part in the quarrels between Henry II. and his sons. He took up the cause of Eleanor of Guienne, and subsequently joined the Poitevin rebellion against Richard, inciting by his verses the young Prince Henry against his father. Taken prisoner at Limoges, he was set at liberty by Henry II., and eventually ended his days in the monastery of Citeaux.

Boroughbridge, The Battle of (1322), during the barons' revolt in Edward II.'s reign, was fought between the royalists under the command of the king and Sir Andrew Harclay, and the baronial forces headed by the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford. The barons were totally routed, the Earl of Hereford slain, and the Earl of Lancaster taken prisoner and subsequently executed at Pontefract

Borough-English was the name given in England to a not unusual eustom in certain manors "that lands shall descend to the youngest son, or, in default of issue, to the younger brother of the owner." Certain analogous extensions of the eustom which, for example, gives rights of succession to the youngest daughter or sister, though not strictly included in the recognised custom of borough-English, may be roughly grouped with it under such a term as "ultimogeniture" (suggested by the Real Property Cor. missioners), "junior-right," or "juniority" (Elton). The foreign "Droit de Maineté," "Juveignerie," and "Jüngsten Recht," are closely analogous to borough-English. cerning its origin we can only guess. The theory of the old lawyers that the youngest was naturally the weakest and wanted most attention, is obviously inadequate to explain it. Neither does Sir Henry Maine's view-that it sprang from the "patria potestas," and the youngest son inherited because the least likely to have forfeited his rights by emancipation-wholly cover the ground. Mr. Elton, while admitting that the problem is difficult, perhaps in-soluble, suggests the theory that the custom is a survival of very early times, perhaps pre-Aryan, certainly before Celt, Teuton, and Slav had branched off from their common parent stock. Just as primogeniture sprang from the Aryan domestic worship which it was the special function of the eldest to conduct, so "ultimogeniture" may be a survival of ancestor-worship in a race that saw no pro-eminence in the eldest. The widespread nature of the eustor-and some more direct evidence-supports this view. We read of it in England so far back as Glanvil's time. and by its modern name in the Year-book of the First of Edward I. It occurs especially in the south-east of England, Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, and the environs of London, and less so in the eastern counties. It is also very common in Somerset, but rare in the Midlands, and unknown north of the Humber. A very early form of the eustom appears in the Welsh laws of the tenth century, and also in Brittany and other Celtic districts. It was also very common in North France, Friesland, Westphalia, and, recently, in South Russia.

Boscawen, Edward (b. 1711, d. 1761), first distinguished himself at the attack on Porto Bello in 1740. He was appointed commander-in-chief of an expedition to the East Indies (1747). In 1755 Boscawen received the thanks of Parliament for the capture of two French ships, and became vice-admiral, and in the following year admiral. In that year he commanded the expedition to Cape Breton Island, and took the town of Louisburg. In the following year he defeated the French fleet in Lagos Bay, and received the thanks of Parliament. In 1760 he was sworn of tho Privy Council. Boscawen's career was brief, but he was not tho least remarkable of the naval heroes who won such triumphs on the sea during the closing period of Georgo 11.'s reign. His personal courage was brilliantly displayed in every engagement.

Boscobel, in Shropshire, the house of Mr. John Giffard, was the hiding-place of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester in 1651. The fugitive king was committed by Lord Derby to the charge of some woodcutters named Penderell. Here he remained in concealment for some days, and at one time it was even thought necessary that he should pass some time in an oak-tree in the Boscobel woods, so hot had the pursuit become. The king eventually effected his escape. From his hiding in the oak, the fashion of wearing oak-leaves on the day of the Restoration (May 29) originated.

Boston, in Lincolnshire, is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been founded by St. Botolph. It rose to great importance in the twelfth century, and was one of the chief ports in the kingdom. Edward III. made it one of the wool staples, and its prosperity continued till the early part of the sixteenth century, from which time it gradually declined.

Boston, in Massachusetts, was settled in 1630 by John Winthrop, most of the earliest colonists coming from Lincolnshire. During the Great Rebellion the settlers sided with the Parliament, and even received two of the regicides with rejoicing in 1660. The town was on bad terms with the royal government all through the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in 1689 a rebellion broke ont. and the governor, Sir Edmund Andros, was compelled to quit the country. The Boston people warmly supported the revolution of 1688. The town increased greatly in wealth and consequence, and was noted for the stern Puritanism of its inhabitants, and their sturdy spirit of independence. Boston took the lead in resisting the attempt of the English government to apply its revenue system to the On March 5th, 1770, the riot Colonies. known as "the Boston Massacre" took place, and in Dec., 1773, the attack on the tea ships was made in Boston harbour. For a time tho trade of the town was nearly ruined by the Boston Port Bill (q.v.), and a large number of English troops were sent to garrison the port. The town was surrounded (1775) by an American force, between whem and the British the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, June 17. British abandoned the place in March, 1776. After the war Boston became one of the chief cities in the United States, and the centre of art, literature, and education. During the quarter of a century preceding 1860, Boston was the head-quarters of the movement for the abolition of negro slavery.

Boston Port Bill, THE (1774), is important as being one of the immediate causes of the outbreak of the American War of Independence. In the year 1773, in order to find a market for the accumulated stores of the East India Company, Lord North withdrew the whole of the duty payable in England on any teas exported to America by the Company. The teas, however, were still subject to a colonial tax of threepence on the pound. On Dec. 16, 1773, the people of Boston, excited by the speeches of Samuel Adams and others, proceeded to the wharf where three tea ships lay, and threw their cargoes, valued at £18,000, into the water. Popular indignation was aroused throughout England by this act, and it was resolved to make an example of the little port. On March 14, 1774, Lord North brought in the Boston Port Bill. The preamble set forth that in the present condition of Boston, the commerce of his Majesty's subjects could not be safely carried on, nor the customs be duly collected there; and it was therefore proposed that from and after the 1st of June it should not be lawful for any person to lade or unlade, to ship or unship, any goods within the harbour. The king in Council was to have the power, when peace and order should be established at Boston, and full compensation paid for the teas destroyed, to restore the town to its former position. Some opposition was offered to the measure by Dowdeswell, Burko, and Charles Fox, but on the whole it was approved both by Parliament and the country. The Bill, accompanied as it was by the Massachusetts Government Bill, was received with great indignation in America.

The 1st of June—the day appointed for the Boston Port Bill to come into force—was set apart as a solemn fast. On the meeting of the Massachusetts Assembly, General Gago found the spirit of resistance so unanimous among the delegates that he felt compelled to dissolve it immediately.

Bosworth Field, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 21, 1485), was fought between Richard III. and Henry, Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. On August 1, Henry landed at Milford Haven and passed on without opposition to Shrewsbury, being joined by a largo number of Welshmen. Ho then marched on to Tamworth, where he arrived at the 18th. On the 20th he was at Atherstone, where he was met by Lord Stanley and by Sir William Stanley, who both promised to desert Richard during the battle. Meanwhile Richard, having mustered his forces at Nottingham, marched to Leicester and encamped at Bosworth on the 21st. On the next morning the two armies met between Bosworth and Atherstone at a place known as White-moors, near the village of Sutton Cheneys. The battle was mainly a hand-to-hand encounter, the Stanleys for some time keeping aloof from the fight ill, at a critical moment, they joined Richmond. Richard, preciving that he was betrayed, and crying out, "Treason, treason!" endeavoured only to sell his life as dearly as possible, and refused to leave the field till, overpowered by numbers, he fell dead in the midst of his enemies. crown was picked up on the field of battle and placed by Sir William Stanley on the head of Richmond, who was at once saluted king by the whole army. Among those that erished on Richard's side were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Ferrers, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury, while the only person of note in Henry's army who was slain was his standard bearer, Sir William Brandon, who is said to have been killed by Richard himself.

B6t was a word which signified amends, reparation, either in the simple sense, as burk bit—i.e., repair of fortresses—or more often in the sense of money compensation for wrongdoing. In the earlier laws of the various Teutonic tribes, most offences are regarded as involving a breach of the general peace, and as putting the offender in outlawry and at feud with the community, till at any rate he has come to terms with the injured party; some less grave offences regarded as merely wrongs to the individual have a fixed composition attached to them; while in some cases 's seen the idea of crime as demanding punish nent. It is indisputable that these, conceptions belong to very different stages of thought, and respectively succeed each other. Any offence, it is clear, originally put the offender at feud with all, and exposed him to his victim's vengeance. The right of vengeance then became limited by the growth of fixed compositions. And lastly, in the most developed codes, the idea of punishment has intruded upon the region of composition payments. In the code of Alfred, a discrimination is made, and in ordinary cases homicides paid for according to the wergild of the slain, while in ex-traordinary cases, such as wilful murder of a lord, the crime is to be punished by death. The bot, then, or money payment, represents the view of a misdeed which regards it as so much damage to the individual, reparable by payment at a fixed tariff. For less grave offences the amends must, by Anglo-Saxon law, be accepted. In graver offences only, if the amends be not paid or be unsatisfactory to the party injured, does he re-enter on his right of feud, under certain legal limitations. These two are the "bot-worthy" class of offences. And even in the "bot-less" offences, the king can at pleasure accept an amends in money for them; for instance, the perjurer is to have his hand cut off, but the king can allow him to redeem it at half his wergild. In case of treason against a lord, Alfred says "the king and his witan dare not grant mercy." 'The relation of the "bot" to the "wite" is very irregular, and indeed inexplicable. The amount of the bot itself is equally perplexing; 6s. is the amends for knocking out a front tooth, only 3s. for breaking a rib; 6s. for breaking the arm, but 11s. for destroying the little finger, and 20s. for cutting off the beard. On the whole it appears that the payment was on an estimate of the part affected, and its value or appearance, the degree of the a". nt, and the social position of the injured party, or even that of the offender. The chief peculiarities of this Anglo-Saxon system compared with that of other Teutonic tribes are-(i.) the strict maintenance of rights of private property by severe treatment of theft and stringent enactments to secure bail; (ii.) the grest attention paid to the privileges of the Church and the enforcement of its precepts; (iii.) the rapid growth of the kingly power and its recognition as the source of justice. There are many minute variations be-tween West-Saxon and Anglian law as to the ratios of the payments of bot.

Bothwell, Francis Stewart, 2nd Earl or, the son of John Stewart, Prior of Coldingham (an illegitimate son of James V.), and Lady Jane Hepburn, sister of the first Earl of Bothwell, was a favourite of James VI., by whom he was created Earl of Bothwell, 1587. His life was a series of rebellions against the king, whom he attempted to seize at Holyrood, 1592—an attempt which was frustrated by the citizens of Edinburgh. The same year he made another unsuccessful attack on the king at Falkland; and in 1593 suddenly appeared at Holyrood, at the head of an armed band, to ask pardon, as he said, for his treason. In 1594 he again attacked Edinburgh, being only beaten off by the citizens; but from this time his power was broken, and he was forced to quit the country.

Bothwell, James Hepburn, 4th Earl of (b. 1536, d. 1578), was Lord Warden of the Scotch Marches, as well as Lord High Admiral of Scotland, in which capacities he is said to have acted more as a marauder and a pirate than as an officer of state. In 1558 he was one of the Lords of the Articles; and in the following year distinguished himself as a partisan of the queen regent, and an opponent of Arran and the reforming lords. He was one of the nobles sent to Mary in France after the death of her husband; and in 1561 was made a member of the Privy Council. He was, however, in constant difficulties, owing to his turbulence and violence. In 1562 he was impeached for having plotted to carry off the queen, and outlawed; but in a few months he returned, and married Lady Jane Gordon, a sister of Lord Huntley, and about the same time began to find favour in the eyes of Queen Mary. From this time his life becomes closely associated with that of the queen. After Rizzio's murder, Mary fled to Dunbar Castle, of which Bothwell had the custody; and subsequently he returned with her to Edinburgh. In October, 1566, he received a visit from her when lying wounded in his castle of Hermitage; and after he had compassed the murder of Darnley, 1567, he was in constant attendance on Mary at Seton. An attempt on the part of Lennox to bring the murderer of his son to justice ended in Bothwell's acquittal, owing to the non-appearance of the accuser, and brought him fresh proofs of the queen's regard in the shape of large grants of land. In 1567 he carried off Mary as she was going from Stirling to Edinburgh, probably with her own connivance, and, having obtained a divorce from his wife, married the queen, May 15, 1567. Shortly afterwards a combination of the leading barons of Scotland forced Bothwell, who previous to his marriage had been made Duke of Orkney and Shetland, to fly to Borthwick Castle, and thence to Dunbar. On the queen's surrender to Kirkcaldy, after the conference at Carberry Hill, Bothwell had to escape as best he could to the Orkneys. Pursued thither, and driven to sea, he was arrested by a Danish war-ship off the coast of Norway, on suspicion of piracy, and conveyed to Denmark. There he was imprisoned by Christian IX., first at Malmoë (1567—1573), then at Dragsholm (1573—1578); but the king refused the demands of the Scottish government for his extradition or execution. The so-called "Testament" he is said to have drawn up during this period, is probably a forgery. Bothwell was, as Randolph said of him, "despiteful out of measure, false and untrue as a devil;" and it is not the least extraordinary feature in Mary's career that she should have eonceived any affection for this brutal, ferocious, and unscrupulous border chief.

Bothwell Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (June 22, 1679), was fought between the Royalist troops, commanded by the Duke of Monmouth, and the forces of the revolted Conveniclers, or Covenanters. The insurgents occupied a strong position, with the Clyde between them and the enemy; but, as they attempted to defend instead of destroying a bridge, Monmouth cleared the passage of the river by his artillery. The insurgents were forced to retire to a hill near by, known as Hamilton Heath, where they were attacked by the Royal troops and completely routed, Bethwell Bridge is in Lanarkshire, near Hamilton.

Bottle Plot, THE (1823). This name was given by Canning to a riot in a Dublin theatre, got up by the Orangemen, when a rattle and a bottle were thrown into the box of Lord Wellesley, the then Lord-Lieutenant, who was supposed to favour the Catholics. The grand jury threw out the bill for conspiracy with intent to murder which was brought in against those arrested.

Eculogne. I. Its capture by the English, the one important result of the combination of Henry VIII. and Charles V. for the subjugation of France in 1544, took place September 14, 1544, after a pro-tracted siege of nearly two months. According to the original plan of the campaign, Charles was to strike across France by Champagne, Henry by Picardy, and neither was to stop till he reached Paris, where, in their united might, they were to dispose of the French monarchy. The first thing, however, that Henry did was to sit down with the bulk of his army before Boulogne; and when Charles reproached him for not adhering to the method of invasion determined upon between them, Henry retaliated by accusing Charles of a similar breach of their contract. The siege of Boulogne is principally memorable for the length of the resistance made by the garrison under the disadvantageous circumstances of weak fortifications, and besiegers strong in numbers and offensive engines. After the capitulation they were allowed to march out with their arms and property; whereupon, according to Hall's Chronicle, "the king's highness, having the sword borne naked before him by the Lord Marquis Dorset, like a noble and valiant conqueror, rode into the town, and all the trumpeters, standing on the walls of the town. sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the king's true subjects." The town was restored to the French on the conclusion of peace (1550). II. Boulogne was also the chief station of the force collected by Napoleon for the invasion of England in 1803. The Catamaran expedition (Oct. 1804) was an unsuccessful English attempt to burn his flotilla there by sending in fireships.

Boulter, Huoh (b. 1672, d. 1742), Archbishop of Armagh, studied at Merchant Taylors' School, and was elected a demy of Magdalen at the same time as Addison. He was subsequently chaplain to Sir Charles Hedges, and rector of St. Olave's, Southwark. In 1719 he was consecrated Bishop of Bristol. and in 1724 elevated to the archbishopric of Armagh and the Irish primacy. He took an active share in the political affairs of Ireland, was strongly opposed to Swift on the policy of diminishing the gold in, though he concurred with him on the question of Wood's atent, and was one of the chief promoters of the system of Protestant Charter Schools. He founded many charities in Armagh, Drogheda, and elsewhere, and was no less than thirteen times appointed one of the Lords Justices of Ireland.

Bourchier, Family of. The founder of this family was Sir John de Bourchier. Justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Edward II. His son Robert became Lord Chancellor in 1340 (the first layman who held the office), was summoned to Parliament as a baron in 1342, and died 1349. The barony devolved on Henry Bourchier, Count of Eu, grandson of his younger son. He was created Earl of Essex 1461, and was succeeded by his grandson Henry, upon whose death the peerage became extinct.

Bourchier, Thomas (d. 1486), Archbishop of Canterbury (1454—1486), was the son of William Bourchier, Count of Eu, by Anne, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester. After holding minor preferments, he was elected Lashop of Worcester in 1435, and was translated to Ely in 1443. On the death of Archbishop Kempe, the Council, at the request of the Commons prayed that the Pope would confer the primacy on Bourchier. Accordingly, he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury in 1454. In 1405 he was made Chancellor, and held the Great Seal for eighteen months, both Yorkists and Lancastrians being anxious to conciliate a member of so powerful a family. Bourchier was at first inclined to act as a mediator between the contending factions, but subsequently became a distinct partisan of the Duke of York. He welcomed the return of the Yorkist leaders in 1460, and crowned Edward IV. in the next year. In 1464 he was made a cardinal. He crowned Richard III., and two years after performed the samo office for Henry VII. He was a putron of learning, and instrumental in introducing printing into England, and left a reputation for personal generosity and kindness.

Bouvines, The Battle of (July, 1214) was fought at a small town between Lille and Tournay, between Philip Augustus of France and the forces of the Emperor Otto IV., with the Flemings and some English auxiliaries, under William, Earl of Salisbury. John had joined the alliance for the purpose of gaining the assistance of the Germans and Flanders in the war he was carrying on with Philip for the recovery of his Fronch territorios. The battle (in which the forces engaged on both sides would appear to have been very large) terminated in a signal victory for the French. The defeat consummated the separation of Normandy from England, and by dopriving John of further hopes of being able to rely on his Continontal dominions, as well as by the loss of prestige it occasioned him, had some effect in compelling him to submit to the demands of the barons. The battle is memorable as being one of the few occasions in which men of English, High-German, and Low-German race have fought side by side against the French and have been completely defeated.

Roger of Wendover, iii. 287 (Eng. Hist. Soc.). See Freem in, Norm. Conq., v. 706, who speaks of it as "that day of darkness and gloom when three branches of the Teutonic race, the German, the Fleming, and the Englishman, sank before the arms of men of the hostile blood and speech." In Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vi. 424, a somewhat different view is taken.

Bowes, Sir Robert, was a distinguished soldier, diplematist, and lawyer in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary. In the great Northern rebellion of 1536, he was mong the prisoners captured at the surrender of Hull to the rebel forces. In 1542, whilst in command of a body of 3,000 cavalry, he was defeated and taken prisoner at Halydonrigg by a Scottish force under the Earl of Huntley; and on the termination of hostilities between the two countries, became Warden of the East and Middle Marches.

During the exercise of this office he compiled his Informations on the state of the Marches. and their laws and customs—a work full of curious and interesting details. In June, 1552, he was made Master of the Rolls, a position which just then was environed with dangers. As Master of the Rolls, Sir Robert Bowes was one of the witnesses to the will of King Edward VI., which fixed the succession to the crown on Lady Jane Grey. He retired from his office two months after Mary's accession to the throne, and during the remainder of his life he occupied himself with his old duties on the Scottish border. The precise year of his death is uncertain.

Boycotting was the name applied to the system of social and commercial ostracism which was extensively resorted to in Ireland during the land agitation of 1880 and 1881. Landlords who were disliked by their tenants, tenants who had paid rents to unpopular landlords, and other persons who incurred the hostility of the local branches of the Land League were rigidly isolated. No one could be got to work for them, or even to supply them with the necessaries of life. The name was derived from Captain Boycott, of Lough Mask House, a Mayo landlord and agent, one of the first against whom the process was put in force. Capt. Boycott was "relieved" by a number of Orangemen, escorted by a large military and police force, Nov. 11, 1880.

Boyle, Charles, 1st Load (b. 1676. d. 1731), second son of Roger, Earl of Orrery, while an undergraduate at Oxford, took part in the controversy with Bentley on the letters of Phalaris. In 1700 he entered Parliament as member for Huntingdon, and in 1703 succeeded to the Irish peerage of Orrery. In 1709 he fought at Malplaquet, and in 1713 was Envoy Extraordinary to the States of Brabant and Flanders, and on his return received an Eaglish peerage. He was a favourite of George I., but in 1722 was committed to the Tower on a charge of being concerned in Layer's Plot, of which, however, he was acquitted. His later years were devoted to philosophical studies.

Boyne, The Battle of the (July 1, 1690), was fought between the troops of William III. and the Irish under James II. James, marching from Dublin, had taken up a position behind the river Byne, and there waited for the invading army. His position was strong, and Schomberg endeavoured to dissuade William from the attack. Early in the morning, however, the English right, under young Schomberg, was sent to eross the river by the bridge of Slane, some miles higher up, and thus turn the Irish right. The bridge was captured. Four miles to the south of the Boyne the road to Dublin runs through the passage of Duleek. If Schomberg secured this pass the Irish retreat would be cut off. of the French allies, marched to oppose him. Thus the Irish alone were left to withstand William. At the head of his left wing, consisting entirely of cavalry, he forced the passage of the river not far above Drogheda. The centre of his army was commanded by the elder Schomberg. The Irish infantry fled without a blow; the cavalry under Richard Hamilton fought bravely on. The gallant Schomberg fell while rallying his troops. But at this moment William came up with his left wing, and the battle was won. lrish cavalry retreated slowly, fighting to the last; their leader, Hamilton, was taken prisoner. James thed early in the day towards Dublin. The fugitives poured through the passage of Duleek, where the French had steadily resisted Meinhart Schomberg's attack. Considering the : sat importance of the victory, the loss was slight. About 500 English had fallen, and 1,500 Irish.

A striking and detailed account of the battle

Boy-Patriots was a name given by their enemies to a body of young and rising men who opposed Sir Robert Walpole's administration, but who coalesced neither with the Tories nor with the malcontent Whigs. The chief members of this party were Lyttelton, George Grenville, Lord Cobham, and, above all, William Pitt.

Bracton, Henry (d. 1268), the writer of a valuable commentary on the laws of England, was educated at Oxford, and devoted himself to the study of law. In 1245 he was appointed one of the judges errant, and later on was one of the king's clerks or secretaries. He is supposed to have become an occlosiastic towards the close of his life, and to have been Archdeacon of Barnstaple. His work, entitled De Legibus et Consuctudinibus Anglise, is our great authority for mediaval English law. An excellent edition is published in the Rolls Series (1878, &c.), with a Translation, Notes, References to Glanville, &c., and Introductions by Sir Travers Twist. The editor suggests that "the immediate object which Bracton had in view in composing his work, was te draw up a manual of the common law of England for the use and instruction of the Justiciaries of the Eyre." The work is very largely influenced by Roman legal ideas.

Braddock Down, situated between Liskeard and Bodmin, in Cornwall, was the scene of a battle during the Civil War. Here, on Jan. 19, 1643, the Royalist officers, Sir Raiph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville, coming from Bodmin, encountered and defeated the commander of the garrison of Plymouth, Ruthven, who, without waiting for the support of his superior officer, the Earl of Stamford, had crossed the Tamar and occupied Liskeard. The result of the battle was that the Cornishmen resumed the offensive, drove back Stamford and his forces, and carried by assault Saltash and Okehampton.

There is a full account of the battle in a letter of Sir Bevil Grenville, printed in Forster's Life of Pym. See also Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, vi. 248.

Braddock, GENERAL. [DUQUESNE, FORT.]

Bradshaw, John (b. 1602, d. 1659), was a barrister, but was very little known, either as a lawyer or a politician, when, in 1648, he was made President of the High Court of Justice, instituted to try Charles I. The reason fer his appointment seems to have been the refusal of all the leading lawyers to serve on the trial, and the necessity of having some one possessed of legal knowledge as the president. For his services he was given the house of the Dean of Westminster, the sum of £5,000, and large grants of land, and made Chanceller of the Duchy of Lancaster. He subsequently presided at the trials of the Duke of Hamilton and other Royalists, and was President of the Councils of State from 1649 to 1651. He was a member of the Parliament of 1654, and was probably one of those excluded for refusing to sign the engagement recognising Cronwell's authority. In 1659 he was made one of the Council of State, and shortly afterwards a commissioner ot the Great Seal; but he died before the end of the year. He was one of those who were siyled "stiff Republicans," or "Commonwealth's men," and was sincerely opposed to the government of one person, whether king or protector; but he does not appear to have been a man of any marked ability. After the Restoration his body was disinterred and hung in chains at Tyburn.

Bradwardine, Thomas (b. circa 1290, d. 1349), a native of Chichester, educated at Merton College, Oxford, was one of the most celebrated of the scholastie philosophers, and was known by the title of Doctor Profundus. He became Chancellor of the university, Professor of Divinity, and subsequently chaplain to Edward III. In 1349 he was appointed to the archbishopric of Canterbury, but within a few weeks of his consecration he was carried off by the Black Death.

Bradwardine's great work, De Causa Dei, was printed in 1618 (Lond., folio). His other works were chiefly mathematical.

Braemar Gathering, The (Aug. 26, 1715), was the name given to the great assembly of disaffected nobles and Highland chiefs which met ostensibly for the purpose of a hunting in the Earl of Maw's forest of Braemar, but in reality to organise measures for raising the standard of insurrection in favour of the Pretender, which was done soon afterwards (Sept. 6). Among those at the Bruemar gathering were the Earl of Mar, the Marquis of Tullibardine, Lords Southesk, Errol, Kilsyth, Kenmure, Strathallan, Seaforth, and Glengary.

Braintree Case, THE. In 1837 the majority of the vestry of Braintree postponed n Church rate for twelve months; the churchwardens, however, proceeded to lovy it on their own authority. A prohibition of the Court of Queen's Bench restrained them. It was suggested, however, that the churchwardens and the minority of the vestry might legally levy a rate, as it might be argued that the votes of the majority who refused to perform their duty were not valid. The church-wardens and the minority of the vestry voted a rate accordingly (July, 1841). On the matter being once inore brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, that tribunal now declared the rate valid. The decision was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but upset on appeal hy the House of Lords, which pronounced the rate invalid, and altogether denied the right of the minority of the parishioners to levy it. It was such cases as this that led to the Act 31 & 32 Vict., cap. 109, which abolished compulsory Church rates, because "the levying thereof has given rise to litigation and ill-feeling.'

Bramham Moor, The Battle of (1408), was fought between the Earl of Northumberland, and the other nobles who had revolted against Henry IV., and the royal troops, under Sir Thomas Rokoby. The latter were completely victorious, Northumberland being killed on the field, and his chief associate, Lord Bardolf, mortally wounded. Brumham Moor is in Yorkshire, between Leeds and Tadcaster.

Brandywine, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. t1, 1777), in the American War of Independence, was fought on the shores of Brandywine Creek, about fifty miles from Philadelphia, and ended in the defeat of the Americans, under "ashington. General Howe had landed 18,000 men near the Brandywine. Washington had only 8,000 troops fit for action. For some days he baffled General Howe's attempts to drive him back. At length the two armies encountered one another. While Howe and Cornwallis made a flank movement with the greater part of their forces, Washington resolved on a bold attack on the British in his front. To render such an attack successful, the co-operation of Sullivan was nee ssary. But that general, using his own discretion instead of obeying orders, laid himself open to an attack while his troops were in confusion. The rout of Sullivan's troops threw the rest of the American army into confusion, and soon they were everywhere in retreat. The American loss was set down by Howe at 300 killed, 600 wounded, and 400 prisoners, as against 90 killed and 500 wounded and missing on the English side. Washington made good his retreat; but he had to abandon the idea of saving Philadeiphia when he found that Cornwallis had forced his way between his camp and that town.

Brantingham Roll is the name given to the Issue Roll of the Exchequer for the forty-fourth year of Edward III., when Thomas of Brantingham, Bishop of Exeter, was Treasurer, containing an account of the various payments made during the year. It was discovered in the office of Pells, and published in 1835, with a general introduction on the character of the Exchequer Records by Mr. Frederick Devon.

Braose, William DE (d. circa 1212), was one of the most powerful barons in England, and received from Henry II., in 1177, the grant of the whole kingdom of Limerick. He was one of the itinerant justices in Richard I.'s reign, but fell out of favour with John, who in 1210 stripped him of all his possessions, and, it is said, starved his wife and son to death in Windsor Castle. De Braose himself escaped to France, where he died shortly afterwards. His youngest son Reginald received back a great part of his father's possessions, but, dying without heirs in 1229, the family became extinct.

Foes, Judges of Eng.

.Bray, Sir Reginald (d. 1503), was one of Henry VII.'s most trusted counsellors. Together with the Lord Treasurer he was the big's messenger in 148% to the city of London to ask the citizens for a loan of 6,000 marks, obtaining, after much negotiation, the considerably smaller sum of £2,000. He was the object of special hatred to the Cornish robels of 1497 as being the instrument of Henry's extertion.

Bread Riots (1816). The cessation of the great war, which caused many farms to be thrown out of cultivation, and the failure of the harvest, occasioned severe distress and riots in all parts of England, especially in the eastern counties. Declaring that the farmers had conspired to raise the price of bread, the mob set farm buildings on fire, demanded that wheat should be sold cheap, and in several places broke into the bakers' shops. The riots were suppressed by military force, and the rioters tried by a special commission. There were also occasional riots caused by famine during the Chartist movement. The most dangerous were these of 1842, in Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Breauté, Falkes DE, was a Norman of mean birth, who had served King John with unscrupulous fidelity as a mercenary captain, and was in 1208 rewarded by him with the sheriffdoms of Glamorgan and Oxfordshire, the castles of Chilham, Northampton, Cambridge, Oxford, and Bedford, and the hand of Margaret Redvers, widow of Baldwin, on of the Earl of Devon. On John's death, it was judged advisable to conciliate this soldier, who hat taken Bedford Castle, burnt the suburbs of London, and terrorised over John's enemies in the neighbouring counties. In return for his to the royal cause against Louis and the rebel barens, he obtained the sheriffdoms of Rutland, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Bucking-ham, Bedford, Oxford, Northampton, for seven years. But from 1220 onwards the vigorous werk of Hubert de Burgh was putting an end to the state of things in which such a man could move freely. Convicted at the Dunstable Assizes in 1224 of thirty-five acts of violence, he audaciously captured one of the justices, and imprisoned him in Bedford Castle, under the care of his brother, William de Breauté, who refused to surrender it, saying "he was no liegeman of the King of England." The siege took two months, "with great slaughter of the king's nobles; and it required an elaborate siege-train. The castle was taken and the garrison at once hanged. Falkes, now under excom-munication, had fled to North Wales, the prince of which district married his daughter Eva; but he soon returned and submitted himself to the king's mercy. The judgment of the barons was thut he should surrender all his goods and abjure the realm. His wife, too, obtained a divorce on the ground of constraint; and on his first setting foot in Normandy, only his crusading vow protected him from being hanged by the French king. He prevailed with Honorius III. to send a strong letter of intercession to the king. While on his way back to England, however, he died in Normandy. Falkes de Breauté was a typical example of the unscrupulous fereign adventurers whom the early Angevin kings introduced into England as able tools of royal misgovernment.

Breda, THE DECLARATION OF (April 14, 1660), was the manifesto sent by Charles II. to both houses of the Convention Parliament. By this the king granted a free and general pardon to all "who within forty days after the publishing hereof shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall by any public act declare their doing so," except such as Parliament should except. It also granted amnesty for all political offences committed during the Civil War, and the subsequent interregnum; promised that the king would rely on the advice and assistance of a free parliament; and declared a liberty to tender consciences, so "that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matter of religion." The king also undertook that no inquiry should be made into the titles of lands acquired under the Commonwealth, and that the arrears of Monk's officers and seldiors should be paid.

Breda, THE TREATY OF (July 31, 1667). was concluded between England on the one side, and France, Holland, and Denmark on the other. It was entered into after a naval war between England and Holland, in which the victories had been pretty evenly distributed. Franco had joined the Dutch, fearing that England would make herself supreme on the sens, but sho had not taken much share in the war, her policy being to use the two great naval powers as checks one upon the other. The following were the terms of the Treaty of Breda:-1. The Islands of St. Christopher, Antigua, and Montserrat were restored to England, and the province of Acadia (Nova Scotia) to France. 2. England and Holland made peace on the principle of 1.ti possidetis; thus England retained New York and New Jersey, and Holland retained Surinam. 3. The Navigation Act was modified in favour of the Dutch. 4. Friendly relations were restored between England and Denmark.

Brehon, or, more correctly, Buzznow, in Erse signifies a judge. From the earliest days of Irish history of which we have any trace, this class seems to have been a distinctly recognised one, and previous to the conversion of the Irish to Christianity we have proof that the office had become hereditary. In fact, there seems strong reason for connecting the Brehens with the ancient Celtic priesthood in Ireland. whether or no we choose to give to that priest-hood the name of Druid. [DRUIDS.] Some of the chief Brehons, whose names have been handed down to us, especially a very cele-brated one. Dubhthach mac na Lugair, chief author of the Senchus Mor, is by later writers often called a Druid. Cæsar tells us that the Druids had acquired the office of judges in both civil and criminal cases, and that they were likewise bards who preserved the historical traditions of the people. The Brehons as they are known to history-that is to say, the Brehons of Christian time—seem to have united these two offices. "The Brehons and feast poets of the men of Erin," says an opening paragraph of the Senchus Mor. . We can easily understand that when a change of religion came, and the priestly functions assed to the men ordained by Patrick and his successors, the more secular offices would be retained by the Brehons. preaching of St. Patrick began about the year 432, and was crowned with a rapid success. One of the most important among his early conversions was that of the Brehon Dubhthach nbove spoken of. We may suppose there were some mutual concessions between the two. Dubhthach, who was probably a Druid, renounced his magical and idolatrous practices, and Patrick in his turn "blessed his mouth" (as we are expressly toid in the Scuchus Mor) when he uttered secular ineignments. It was probably with St. Patrick that the idea arose of writing down the Brehon laws, or, as we should say, of codifying them. We must remember that at this time Theodosins had just codified the Roman law, a precedent which would be present in the mind of St. Patrick. In fact, from this time forward we nearly always find that the conversion of any barbarons people to Christianity is immediately followed by some sort of codifying of their ancient traditional law. The first Saxon code is that of Ethelbert, King of Kent, which was undertaken by St. Augustine. Whatever of the traditional law is not inconsistent with the Christian doctrine or the crown law, is in all cases retained, but what is opposed to these is expunged. Thus, in the introduction to the first great code of Brehon laws, the Seachus Mor (A.D. 438-441), we find a distinction made between the "law of naturo" and the "law of (fod." The latter refers to the laws which came with the revealed religion; the former term bears reference to the words of St. Paul where he speaks of the Genti's "doing by nature the works of the law," and therefore means all in the ancient code which was not inconsistent with the revealed commandments. The Senchus Mor is said to have ithers, or eo-operators, in its conhad vho are spoken of as "the nine the Senehus Mor." Three were pillars , Laeghaire, Over-King of Ireland; kings, v Core, King of Cashel; and Dairi, King of Ulster. Three were bishops or saints, namely, Patrick, Benen (Benigaus), and Cairnech: these we may suppose locked after the Christian portion of the code. Finally, we have three Brehons, who were, of course, the chief authors of the law, viz., Dubhthach before mentioned, assisted by Rossa and Ferghus. These last two are sometimes spoken of simply as "bards;" but as we have before said, it is not probable that there was any distinct line of demarcation between the Brehon and the bard.

Brember, Sir Nicolas (d. 1388), was Lord Mayor of London in 1377, and again from 1383 to 1385. He was the head of the royalist party in the city, and in 1387 was one of those who were appealed of treason by the Lords Appellant. In 1388 he was impeached by l'arliament, sentenced to be beheaded, and shortly afterwards executed. [APPELLANT, LORDS.]

Brenneville, The Battle of (Aug. 20, 1119), was a cavairy skirmish fought during the campaign in Normandy between Louis II. of France and Henry I., and arose out of the support given by the former to Wiiliam Clito. The French were united, and shortly afterwards Louis made peace and abandoned William. There were only about 900 men engaged in this combat, and not more than three were killed. Both kings were present on the field.

Brentford, Patrick Ruthven, Earl or (d. 1857), after having served in many foreign armies, joined the Royalist troops, and was at once made n field-marshal by Charles I. He had an important command at the battle of Edgehill, and on the death of the Earl of Lindesay was made Commander-in-chief of the Forces. He was created Earl of Forth, and subsequently Earl of Brentford, by the king, who had a high opinion of his military ability. He was severely wounded in the second battle of Newbury, and obliged to resign his command, being succeeded by Prince Rupert. Clarendon remarks that, "both by reason of his age and his extreme deafness he was not a man of counsel or words; hardly conceived what was proposed, and as confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion."

Clarendop, Hist, of the Rebellion, vitl, 29, &c.

Brentford, The Battle of (Nov. 12, 1642), was fought between the Royalists under Prince Ruport and the Parliamentarians under Denzil Holles. After the battle of Edgchill Charles marched towards London, touching Reading and other places on the way. At Brentford Rupert encountered three regiments which were stationed there, and after a sharp skirmish forced the barricades they had erected, and occupied the town of Brentford, taking fifteen hundred prisoners and eleven cannons. The Parliamentary army being subsequently reinforced, the king was obliged to fall back from Brentford, and retired into winter quarters at Oxford.

Brest, The Expedition against (1694), was a disastrous failure. The English government had attempted to keep the destination of the expedition secret, but it had become well known to the French government. Information had been treacherously conveyed to them by various persons in England, among others by Marlborough, who wrote a letter to James II. on the subject. Thus forewarned, the French government sent Vauban to put the defences in order. On the 6th of June the fleet, under Berkeley, with Talmash in command of the land forces. s lm. was off Cape Finisterre. It was proposed to iand in Camaret Bay. The Marquis of e bented. Caermarthen, the videst son of the Duke of i.eeds, entered the basin to reconnoitre, and reported the defences formidable. But g. 20. ilerkeley and Tulmash thought that he overuring in II. rated the danger. Next day Caermarthen, of the with eight ships, was followed by Talmash with a hundred boats tuli of soldiers. A Clito. wards murderous fire from the batteries swept away iliam. the men. Tulmasi, however, imagining ed in that he was contronted by peasants, refused to retire, and fell mortally wounded as he were attempted to land. Bretigny, THE TREATY OF (May 8, 1360). was concluded between England and France after the continued successes of Edward III., while the French king, John, who had been taken prisoner at Poltiers, remained in captivity in England. The protracted negotiations were brought to a close by a dreadful storm, recorded in history, which was interpreted to be a manifestation of Divine wrath at the continuance of hostilities. The English renounced their pretensions to the crown of France, as well as to Normandy, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou. France consented to cede Gascony, Guienne, Poitou, and their dependencies and outlying districts; and ln northern France, Calais, Guisnes, and the county of Ponthieu. King John was to pay a ransom of 3,000,000 gold erowns. The question of Brittany was left open. The French were to break off their alliance with the Scots, and to abstain from assisting them against the English, and the English were to give no further aid to the Flemings. By a separate treaty, the Kings of France and Navarre were to be reconciled.

Bretwalda. A title of supremacy among the early Anglo-Saxon kings. Bede (Hist. Eccles., ii. 5) gives a list of seven kings who heal ruled over the English south of the Humber. The first four—Ella of Sussex, Ceawlin of Wessex, Redwald of East Anglia, and Ethelbert of Kent—could have had no power over the Northnmbrians, even if they all really possessed the influence Bede assigns to them. But the last three—Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy—were Northumbrian kings, and therefore their "imperium" or "ducatus," according to Bede, must have extended over all South Britain. Oswald is, in fact, called by Adamnan (Vit. S. Columba), Totius Bitannise Imperator ordinatus Deo," and history proves the reality of their power. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (s. a. 827), when enlarging on the exploits of Egbert, quotes Bede's list, and adds to them Egbert, saying, "And he was the eighth king that was Bretwalda." West-Saxon prejudice probably caused the chronicler to pass over the great Mercians of the eighth century, of whom Ethelbald claimed to be "King of the South English," and Offa" Rex Anglorum" (Cod. Dip., 1, 96, 162, &c.), while Charles the Great called the latter the "greatest of the kings of the West." Besides this passage, the remarkable word Bretwalda occurs elsewhere only in a bilingual charter of Athelstan in 934 (Cod. Dip., v. 218), which describes him as "King of the Anglo-Saxons and Brytaenwalda of all the island"-in Latin, "Anglo-Sax num nee nen totius Britannia Rex." In seeking the meaning of this rare title we must first distinguish between the name Bretwalda and the fact of overlordship. Every one admits the successive hegemony of Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex over English and British alike. But the nature of this supremacy, and the relation of the Bretwaldadom to it, have been much debated. Rapin started a theory of an elective sovereignty, which Turner and Lingard at least tacitly accept, and which Palgrave worked out to new consequences in his English Commonwealth. l'algrave connects the title with the imperial position of the kings, as inheritors of the remains of Roman Imperialism that still survived the withdrawal of the legions. The Bretwalda was the successor of Carausius, the predecessor of Edgar. He illustrates the continuity of R man and British influence after the English Concrest, and the all-pervading fascination of home. "Heptarchic" England was a federal monarchy under an elective Bretwalda, the "wielder of Britain." Out of this office grew the later English kingship. Athelstan, the last Bret-walda, the first "King of the English," marks the contact of the two titles. Against this brilliant but unsupported theory Kemble Saxons in England) does his best to minimise h fact and title. The word is not "ruler Britain," but "wide ruler" (from bryten, Britain," but "wide ruler" (from bryten, road: cf. brytencyning). The idea of election among the "kites and erows," of continuity between rival races, of a meeting of Welsh princes to transfer to Ella the "Empire of Britain," is quite untenable. How could the feeble princes of the south-east make their influence felt up to the Humber? Hallam (Middle A es, ii. 352-9, and Archeologia, vol. xxxii.) inclines, though with more moderation, to a similar view. Mr. Freeman (Norm. Conq., vol. i., note B) leans to "an intermediato position between Kemble and Palgrave." He accepts the title as significant of a substantial hegemony, but rejects Palgrave's doctrino of Roman influenco and continuity. The Bretwaldadom is of "purely English growth." Dr. Stubbs (Const. Hist., i. 162) seems to agree with Mr. Freeman in a view that certainly best uccounts for the facts. If we could get rid of Ella and the earlier Bretwaldas, there would be some reason for connecting the triumph of the Northumbrians over Cadwallon, and the final catastrophe of the Britons, with Edwin's assumption of imperial style and emblems. (See Rhys' Celtic Britain, p. 134, for an ingenious recent development of Paigrave's theory.) But there is no evidence for a consistent theory, and there is always the danger of making too much of a name that occurs only twice in the authorities.

Besides the authorities referred to in the text, see Freeman, Norman Conquest, i. 542, note B, where there is an exhaustive statement of all that can be said on both sides of the question, and a complete list of the various imperial titles assumed by early Euglish kings.

Brian Boru (or Boroimhe) is said to have been the son of Kennedy, King of Munster. His first warlike exploits were performed under the banner of his brother, the King of After his brother's assassination. he became King of Munster, and as such compelled the Danes of Dublin to pay tribute. He was engaged in a long and finally successful war against Malachy, the King of Tara, and his nominal overlord. In the end he was acknowledged as lord even by the O'Neils, and Malachy, their chief, followed in his train as an under-king. The whole island had now submitted to him, but the Danes made an effort to re-establish their supremacy. Leinster joined the Ostmen, but they were overthrown by Brian in twenty-five buttles and finally at' Clontarf (1014). Brian, who is said to have been eighty-three years of age, did not command in person, but remained in his tent, where, after the victory had been won, he was killed. Tradition makes Armagh his b rial-place. Brian Boru must be regarded us the popular hero of early Irish history, and the stories told about his reign led to its being regarded as a sort of golden age. The O'Briens and many other distinguished Irish families elaim him as their aneestor.

Bribery. (1) Indirect Bribery, by the bestowal of titles and offices and the like, has ut some periods of our history been frequently employed by the crown and by its ministers. The practice became very common under the later Stuarts, and under William III. the ubuse had become so great that by the Act of Settlement, 1701, it was enacted that no person holding un office under, or receiving a pension from, the crown, should be eligible for election as a member of Parliament. This Act was speedily repealed in favour of one which rendered the holders of any new office created after Oct. the 25th, 1705, incapable of sitting in the House, as well as persons who were in receipt of a pension from the crown during pleasure, and which further obliged members to vacate their seats on accepting any of the existing offices, though they might be immediately re-elected. In 1742 another Act was passed against placemen; and in 1782 government contractors were prohibited from sitting in the House. After the beginning of Mr. Pitt's administration, the practice of bestowing places as a bribe to members gradually became much less common, and almost ceased after the Reform Bill; though a certain amount of this indirect form of bribery is perhaps a necessary accompaniment of our parliamentary system, which places offices at the disposal of the leaders of the successful party. [Pensions.]
(2) Direct Bribery by sams of money may be divided into three classes :-(i.) Bribery of Members of Parliam at by the Crown or its Ministers was largely employed during the age of Charles II., when the king himself took the money of France, and partly employed it in bribing members. Instances had, however, occurred under James I., and we are told that Richard II. occasionally used "gifts" to seeure the passing of unpc rular measures through the House of Commons. William III. found it necessary to have recourse to the same means of propitiating obstinate members; and under George II. (especially during the administration of Sir Robert Walpole) bribery was "reduced to an organised system." Under George III., Lord Bute frequently bribed those whose votes he wished to secure. In regard to the peace of 1762, Horace Walpole says: "A shop was publicly opened at the Pay Office, whither the members flocked, and received the wages of their venality in bank-bills, even to so low a sum as £200 for their votes on the treaty. £25,000, as Martin, Secretary to the Treasury, afterwards owned, were issued in one morning, and in a single fortnight a vast majority was purchased to approve the peace." In 1763 Lord Saye and Selc returned Mr. Grenville u bribe of £300, saying that "a free horse wanted no spur." The practice continued under Lord North, but gradually died out under the powerful and popular administration of Mr. Pitt. The union with England in 1800 was, however, passed through the Irish l'arliament by the systematic bribery of the Opposition members, carried out on an enormous scale.

(ii.) Bribery of Judges and Ministers was, even in early times, of very frequent occurrence; and it was no uncommon thing to find one or more of the judges corrupt. In 1401 a statute was passed, to the effect that all judges, officers, and ministers of the king convicted of bribery shall forfeit treble the bribe, be punished at the king's will, and be discharged from the king's service, whilst the person who offered the bribe was held guilty of u misdemeanour. Under the Tudors and Stuarts judicial bribery was common, the best-known instance being that of Lord Chancellor Bacon, who, in 1621, was found guilty on his own confession of having received extensive bribes, and was heavily fined, sent to the Tower, and degraded. There are, however, many other instances of judges being removed for corruption. Judicial and ministerial bribery has, however, been practically unknown since the Revolution of 1688. (iii.) Bribery connected with Elections. The first instance of a penalty inflicted for bribery in elections was in 1571, when a fine was imposed on the borough of Westbury for reeciving a bribe of four pounds for the election of Thomas Long as their member, "being a very simple man, and of small capacity to servo in that place," though Long himself was not expelled from the House. Under the Stuarts the practice of purchasing votes continued, and had become quite common by the reign of Charles II. In 1696 an attempt was made to pass a statute, which subsequently became law in the reign of Anne, to impose a property qualification of £6(0 a year from land on county members, and £300 a year on borough members, in order to check the system by which men who had made money in trade or otherwise, used to buy seats in places with which they had absolutely no connection. Ten years before this, however, the first Bribery Act had been passed, though bribery had even then been recognised as an offence by the common law, and had been condemned by resolutions of the House of Commons. The increase of corruption under George II. led to an Act in 1729 inflieting severe penalties on persons receiving bribes; but it seems to have had little effect, and in 1762 another Act was passed inflicting pecuniary penalties for bribery. There were two methods by which candidates might purchase a seat: they could either buy the borough outright from the corporation or proprietor, or, if the electors happened to be independent, they could buy individual votes. Examples of the first method are by no means nneommon. In 1767 the mayor and corporation of Oxford offered to return their sitting members, Sir Thomas Stapylton and Mr. Lee, at the next election for £567. The offer was refused, and some of the aldermen were sent to Newgate, but subsequently discharged, after having been reprimanded on their knees by the Speaker. The borough of Ludgershall was sold for £9,000; and, says Sir Erskine May, "it was notorious at the time that agents, or 'borough-brokers,' were commissioned by some of the smaller boroughs to offer them to the highest bidder." Bribery of individual electors also prevailed to a large extent, prices generally ranging from twenty guineas to one guinea a vote; though it is said that the electors of Grampound on one occasion received £300 a-piece. In 1768, 1782, and 1786 attempts were ineffectually made to secure the acceptance of bills to restrain corruption; and it was not until 1809 that a Bill was brought in by Mr. Curwen to prevent the obtaining of seats by bribery, and actually passed. Treavy penalties were imposed by it on corrupt agreements for the return of members; and in the ease of persons returned by bribery or corruption, it enjoined the forfeiture of their seats, but does not seem to have been very effectual. The Reform Act of 1832 made no distinct provision for the restraint of bribery, which continued to be practised more or less openly, in many cases leading to the disfranchisement of boroughs. In 1841 a new Bribery Act was passed extending the powers of election committees. In 1852 an Act provided for the appointment of royal commissioners to inquire into cases of corruption; and two years later the offer or acceptance of a bribe was rendered a misdemeanour, which might be punished by fine, imprisonment, and forfeiture of franchise; by this Act also the accounts of election expenses were to be published. In 1858 another Act permitted the conveyance of voters to the poll, though no money was to be given to the voters themselves for the purpose. In 1883 an Act, called the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, was passed to prevent bribery, and limit the expenses of elections. Stringent penaltics against corruption are enacted in it. A candidato found guilty of bribery is incapacitated for sitting in the House of Commons, or voting at an election for seven years. Persons convicted of bribery, or "undue influence." are liable to imprisonment for a year, and a fine of £200. The use of hired vehicles for conveying voters to the poll is illegal. Since 1868, when the House of Commons resigned its privilege of exclusive jurisdiction in cases of controverted elections, the mode of questioning the validity of an election is to present a petition against it. This petition is tried before one of the judges of the superior courts of common law. The judge certifies the result of the trial to the Speaker, and at the same timo reports any violations of the law relating to corrupt practices which have been proved before him. The House thereupon takes the requisite action on his certificate and report. [Elec-

Bridgeman, Sin Orlando (b. 1609, d. 1674), was the son of a Bishop of Chester. and was returned as member for Wigan to the Long Parliament in 1650. He took part with the king, and in 1644 was one of the members of the Oxford Parliamer. In 1645 be was one of the king's commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge. During the Commonwealth he lived in retirement, and devoted himself to conveyancing. Bridgeman and Sir Geoffrey Palmer are credited with the invention of an important legal expedient during this period. "This was the notable contrivance of 'trustees to preserve contingent remainders,' of which it is enough to say that it protected the interests of tenants in tail against the risk of being defeated by the wrongful act of preceding life tenunts. From this epoch must be dated the modern type of settlement." On the Restoration ho was appointed Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and very shortly afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He presided at the trial of the regicides. In 1667 he was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and held it till 1672. His eldest son, Sir Henry, was created Lord Bradford.

Bridge of Dee, The Affals of (1639), is the name given to the forcing of the bridge over the Dee by Montrose and the Covenanters. The bridge was gained by its defenders being drawn off by a stratagem, and access was thus obtained to the city of Aberdeen. In Sept., 1644, Montrose, this time on the Royalist side, again fought a successful engagement at the bridge of Dee.

Bridgewater. An ancient town in So. ..ersetshire on the River Parret, and said to derive its name (Burgh-Walter) from a Walter of Douay, to whom the manor was granted at the Conquest. A fine eastle was built here in Henry II.'s reign hy William de Briwere. The town was taken by the Royalists in 1643, but in July, 1645, it was captured by Fairfax. By this capture the Parliamentarians secured a line of forts extending from sea to sea which blocked up and practically isolated Devonshire and Cornwall. Bridgewater was one of the places that declared for Monmouth, and it was within a few miles of this town that he met with his overthrow at Sedgemoor. The borough of Bridgewater was disfranchised in 1870.

Bridlington, John of (d. 1379), a regular canon living in the diocese of York, was the author of a curious poetical retrospect of the reign of Edward III., "compiled," says Mr. Wright, "in a form which is by no means unknown in modern literature—namoly, that of a supposed old text, and of a recent commentary." It has been printed in vol. i. of Mr. Wright's Political Poems and Songs (Rolls Series, 1859).

Bridport, ALEXANDER HOOD, 1st Viscount (b. 1727, d. 1814), entered the navy, became a lieutenant in 1746, and post-captair. in 1756. In 1758 he served under Admiral Saunders in the Mediterranean, and under Sir Edward Hawke in the Channel. In 1766 ho was appointed Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. In 1778, he took an active sharo in the engagement off Ushant. In Scht., 1780, he was appointed Rear-Admiral of the White, and in 1782 commanded tho centre squadron of the fleet sent out under Lord Howe to relieve Gibraltar. On Feb. 1, 1793, he became Vice-Admiral of the Red; and on the very next day France declared war. On the 1st of June, 1794, the division of the Channel fleet commanded by Lord Howe attacked and utterly defeated the French fleet off the Hyères Islands. In this action Hood played a conspicuous part, and in the following August he was created Baron Bridport, in the Irish Peerage. In the following June, having succeeded Lord Howe in the command of the Channel fleet, he sailed with fourteen ships from Spithead to cruise off the French coast, and chased a French fleet into Port L'Orient. During his tenure of com-mand in the Channel occurred the mutiny of the fleet, which cannot, however, be in any way attributed to his conduct. the contrary, tho men disavowed all intention of giving personal offence to the admiral, and called him their father and friend. At length, through the combined efforts of Lord Bridport and Lord Howe, and the tact and prudence displayed by both, the men were brought back to their allegiance, and again sailed, in 1799, ur der Lord Bridport in pursuit of the I reach fleet, which this time eluded them and escaped to the Mediterranean. On resigning his command ho became general of marines, and in 1801 was raised to the rank of viscount. He lived on for thirteen years, chiefly in retirement.

Briefs, Church, were letters addressed by the sovereign to the archbishops, bishops, and clergy, empowering them to raise voluntary contributions for building churches, and for charitable purposes generally. They do not appear to have been issued before the Reformation, and may possibly be derived from the briefs given by the papal court to mendicant friars, empowering them to collect contributions. The granting of briefs appears to have led to great abuses. It was regulated by Anne, cap. 14, and practically abolished by 9 Geo. IV., cap. 42, though briefs have been issued for special purposes since the date of the latter statute.

Brigantes, Tue, were a powerful tribe, or confederacy of tribes, of ancient Britain. They occupied the whole of the northern and north-western part of Southern Britain, as far as the Firth of Forth and Clyde, and appear to have been driven northward from their original seuthern possessions by later celonists. According to the view of some authorities, they were descendants of the carlier [non-Celtic] inhabitants of the island. They were, at any rate, among the rudest and fiercest of the Britis' tribes. Cartismandua. the queen of onc of the Brigantian tribes. was an ally of the Romans, and delivered Caractacus to them when he sought refuge in her kingdom. But the nation was weakened by a civil war, which broke out between Cartismandua and her husband, Venusius; and after being def- ed by Cerealis in 69, was subdued, after some difficult campaigns, by Agricola. There was a tribe of Brigantes (possibly a colony from Britain) which occupied the present countrof Wexford, in Ire-

Brigham, THE CONFERENCE OF (July, 1290), was a meeting held by the Scotch estates, near Berwick, to decide about the marriage of the Maid of Norway and Prince Edward of England. A treaty was made, and accepted by Edward, providing that the rights and liberties of Scotland should continue unvioated; that the kingdom of Scotland should remain separate from England, divided by its proper boundaries; and that no parliament was to be held beyond the frontiers of Scotland to discuss matters respecting that kingdom, and other points favourable to Scotland. On Baliol obtaining the crown of Scotland from Edward, the English king required as a condition of its bestowal the renunciation of the Treaty of Brigham.

Bright, John (b. 1811, d. 1889), son of Jacob Bright, of Greenbank, Rochdale, took an active part in the Reform agitation of 1831—2, and became, in 1839, one of the earliest members of the Anti-Corn Law League. In April. 1843, he unsuccessfully contested the city of Durham, for which, however, he was returned in July following; and he continued to sit for Durham till 1847, when he was returned for Manchester. He made his maiden speech in Parliament on Mr. Ewart's motion for extending the principles of Free Trade, Aug. 7, 1843. During the interval between his election for Manchester and the accession of the first Derby ministry to power, Mr. Bright's activity in l'arliament and on the platform was varied and continuous. In the House of Commons he proposed to apply the remedy of Free Trade in land to the state of things which produced the Irish famine. He appealed unsuccessfully for the despatch of a royal commission to investigate the state of India; and in 1849 he was appointed one of the members of the celebrated select committee of the House of Commons on official salaries. In the Legislature and in the provinces, especially at Manchester, he co-operated carnestly with Mr. Cobden in his attempts to obtain financial reform, with a view to the reduction of the naval and military establishments. He also denounced the Russian War with great energy, and at the general election that ensued, he was rejected by Manchester, but in a was rejected by Manchester, but in a few months was invited to fill a vacancy at Birmingham. In 1868 he accepted office under Mr. Gladstone, as President of the Board of Trade, but was compelled by ill-health to retire from office in Dec., 1870. On his recovery, he became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which office he continued to hold till the downfall of the Liberal Government in 1874. On the return of the Liberals to power, under Mr. Gladstone, in 1880, Mr. Bright became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He resigned on July 17, 1882, owing to a difference with his colleagues as to their Egyptian policy. In 1886 he opposed the Home Rule Bill.

Brihtwald (b. circa 650, d. 731), Archbishop of Canterbury (692—731), belonged to the royal house of Mercia. During his archbishopric, the much-vexed question of the celebration of Easter was settled by almost all the British bishops adopting the Roman practice. This period also saw the beginning of missionary enterprise abroad, and the English engaged in preaching the Gospel to their heathen kinsmen in Germany.

Brihuega, The Battle of (1710), was a great defeat sustained by the English arms during the War of the Succession in Spain. General Stanhope, with Staremberg, his Austrian colleague, had occupied Madrid, but it was found impossible to hold the city. They therefore retreated into Catalonia, marching in two parallel armies. The French commander, the Duke of Vendôme, pursued with remarkable rapidity. Stanhope was surprised and surrounded at Brihuega. Tho walls of the town were battered with cannon. and a mine sprung under one of the gates. The English kept up a deadly fire until their powder was consumed, and then fought on with the beyonet against terrible odds. At length the British general saw that further resistance could produce only a useless slaughter of his troops. He coucluded a capitulation by which the remnant of his army, 500 in number, surrendered themselves as prisoners of war. Scarcely was it signed when Staremberg appeared. His slowness had ruined his cause; but the battle that ensued, called that of Villa Viciosa, was admirably contested, when night put an end to it. Staremberg remained master of the field, but all the fruits of the battle remained with Vendôme. The Austrian general spiked his cannon, and, with a sorry remnant of his army, consisting of 7,000, took refuge in Barcelena.

Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, was founded as a penal settlement in 1825, and named after Sir Thomas Brisbane, Governor of New South Wales, 1822--26. It formed part of New South Wales till 1859. The penal establishment was abolished in 1842.

Bristol has from an early period ranked as one of the most important of English towns. Until the rise of Liverpool and the manufacturing towns of the North, it was the second city in the kingdom. The castle was granted by the Conqueror to Robert Fitzhamon, from whom it passed by marriage to Robert of Gloueester, natural son of Henry I. Robert of Normandy was for a time imprisoned here. In Bristol Castle Stephen was imprisoned by the partisans of Matilda in 1141, and sixty years later the ill-fated Eleanor of Brittany was incarcerated at Bristol by 1 uncle John, who was afraid that her claims to the throne might be put forward by his opponents. In 1399 Henry of Lancaster took the town, and put to death many of the adherents of Richard II. Sebastian Cabot was born at Bristol, and sailed from that port on his famous voyage, and in 1609 a colony of settlers from Bristol were the first to establish themselves in Newfoundland. Bristol was made the seat of one of Henry VIII.'s new bishoprics. The town played a very prominent part in the civil war of the seventeenth century. At the beginning of the Great Rebellion Bristol declared for the Parliament, and received a garrison under the command of Nathaniel Fiennes. In July, 1643, the Royalist successes in the west made the possession of Bristol still more important, as commanding the valley of the Severn, and Prince Rupert was sent to besiege it. After a very brief attack, Fiennes determined to capitulate, and Rupert offered such good terms that a large number of the Parliamentary troops took service in his army. Bristol remained in the possession of the Royalists till September, 1645, when Rupert, who was in command of the town, surrendered it in almost as unaccountable a manner as Fiennos had dono two years before. In 1656 Bristol Castlo was destroyed by the government. In 1685 it was the one town in Somerset that refused to receive Monmouth. In 1715 serious riots broke out here on the occasion of the accession of George I. Violent riots also occurred in 1793 in opposition to an unpopular bridge-toll, and many persons lost their lives before they were suppressed; and great rioting took place in 1831 [BRISTOL RIOTS] in connection with the Reform Bill. The church of St. Mary Redcliffe, one of the finest in England, was in great part built by William Cannynge, a wealthy merchant of Bristol, in the later part of the fourteenth century.

Bristol, JCHN DIGHY, 18T EARL OF (b. 1580, d. 1654). He was born at Coleshill, in Warwickshire, was the youngest son of Sir George Digby, knight, and of Abigail, daughter of Sir A. Hevengham of Norfolk. In March, 1606, he was knighted by James I. In 1611, and again in 1614, he went as ambassador to Spain. In 1616 James conferred on him the manor of Sherborne, in Dorset. In 1617 Digby went for the third time to Madrid with the special mission of reviving negotiations, commenced during his former embassies, for a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta Maria. On his return in 1618 he was made a peer with the title of Baron Digby of Sherborne. In 1621 Digby went first to Brussels and afterwards to Vienna, in order to prevail on the Emperor Ferdinand to restore the Palatinate to James's son-in-law, Frederic. Digby strove to negotiate peace or. the basis that the Emperor should restore the Palatinate, and that Frederic in return should renounce the title of King of Bohemia and abandon the right of private war within the Empire. But his efforts were unavailing. If Digby's policy was to succeed, it was necessary that James should be ablo, in case of need, to draw the sword. James, by his angry dissolution of Parliament in 1621, shattered the policy of his ambassador. In 1622 Digby again went to Spain in order to conclude the marriage treaty and obtain the restoration of the Palatinate through the influence of Philip IV. He thought that, in return for some modification in the treatment of English Catholics, Spain would support a compromise in Germany. But in this he was mistaken, since the Spaniards were aiming at no less than the conversion of the English nation to the Catholie faith. In 1622 he was created Earl of Bristol. and Buckingham to Spain in 1623 resulted in the breaking off of the negotiation and the recall of Bristol. On his return Bristol was ordered to remain in confinement at his own house, because he refused to admit that he had been at fault and to make apologies to Buckingham. In 1626 he appealed to the House of Lords and brought accusations against the Duke of Buckingham. Charles, to defend his favourite, retaliated by accusing Bristol of high treason. In 1628 Bristol opposed the king's first answer to the Peti-tion of Right. When Strafford was impeached, Bristol sought to save his life while incapacitating him from holding office. On t'e breaking out of the civil war, he took the king's side. At its close he went to Paris, where he died Jan. 16, 1653.

A few of Bristol's Despatches are printed in the Appendix to the Clarendon State Papers, vol. i. For his defence of his conduct in Spain, see the Camden Miscellany, vol. vi.; for his own impeachment, and the charges that he made against Buckingham, Parliamentary History, vol. vii.; for a general account of his political career, B. Bristol, George Digby, 2nd Earl of (b. 1612, d. 1677), was the eldest son of the preceding. He was educated at Oxford, and sat for Dorsetshire both in the Short and the Long Parliaments. He at first joined the Opposition, and was one of the managers of Strafford's impeachment, but soon went over to the king, and voted against the Bill of Attainder which the Parliamentary leaders had brought in against Strafford. He received a writ of summons to the House of Lords as Baron Digby, and became one of the king's confidential advisers. He was one of the chief promoters of the scheme for the arrest of the Five Members, after the failure of which he was impeached by the Commons and fied to Holland. On his return he was captured and imprisoned at Hull, under the care of Sir John Hotham, who connived at his escape. He joined the king, and took part in most of the important battles of the Civil War, till, quarrelling with Prince Rupert, he threw up his command. At the conclusion of the war he fled to France, where he distinguished himself in the war of the Fronde; but, having formed a foolish idea of supplanting Mazarin and becoming Prime Minister of France, he was obliged to escape to the Netherlands. On the Restoration he returned to England, but his flighty and untrustworthy character prevented his being appointed to any office. In 1663 he brought a charge of high treason against Clarendon, which was, however, rejected by the House of Lords, and after that he took no part in public affairs. He was a man of undoubted ability, and one of the foremost orators of his time, but u stable and headstrong to the last degree.

Clarer Hist 'the Rebellion, and Life;

Existel, Frederick Augustus Hervey, Earl of (d. 1803), and Bishop of Derry, was an occentric nobleman who affected to adopt the character of a prelate of the Middle Ages. He raised three regiments of Volunteers, which were commanded by his nephew. At the second Dungannon Convention he was one of the leaders. In 1784 he entered Dublin in almost royal state, and expected to be chosen president of the Convention there, but he had identified himself too much with the more extreme party, and was disappointed. When the Convention dispersed, he went to Ulster and made inflammatory speeches, so that at one time his arrest was contemplated. The earl was in favour of Catholic Emancipation, Reform, and separation from England.

Bristol Riots (Oct. 29, 1831) were a series of outbreaks produced by the popular indignation which resulted from the rejection of the Reform Bill by the House of Lords. On the occasion of the public entry into Bristol of the recorder, Sir Charles Wetherell, a bitter opponent of the Bill, a mob which seems never to have greatly exceeded a few hundred persons, took possession of the principal streets, broke into the town-hall, and set fire to several houses. For two days, the weakness of the magistrates allowed the disorders to continue unchecked; at length they instructed the military to re-establish order, which was done without much difficulty, though with some loss of life. The blame for the long continuance of the riots was laid on Colonel Brereton, the commander of the military, who might have used the discretion with which the magistrates had armed him probably in order to avoid the responsibility themselves) to suppress the disturbances at an earlier period. He was tried by courtmartial, and, unable to face the consequences, committed suicide. Four of the ringleaders were hanged, and the town was compelled to pay £68,000 damages.

Britain. [BRITANNIA; ROMANS IN BRITAIN; BRITAIN]

Britain, Count of (Comes Britanniæ), was a Roman officer who in Constantine's scheme of governing the Empire, was the supreme general of the military forces in Britain. His jurisdiction was, however, subject to that of the Masters of the Cavalry and Infantry in the West. His power was not localised within Britain, but under him were the Dux Britanniarum, who seems to have commanded the forces massed along the northern wall, and the Comes Litoris Saxonici, who was in command of the coast-line between the Wash and Wight, which was most exposed to piratical Saxon assaults. The "Gwledig" is thought by some to have inherited the power of the Dux Britanniarum.

Britannia, THE ROMAN DIVISIONS OF. Originally only one Province of Britain was constituted, but it is possible that Severus divided it into Upper and Lower Britain; though whether this statement rests on a misconception of Dio Cassius, a merely popular use of the words, or a regular legal subdivision of the province, it is hard to determine. In Dioeletian and Constantine's reorganisation of the Empire, the "diocese" of Britain was divided into four "provinces," Γ tannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cœsariensis, and Maxima Cæsariensis. To these Valentia was added in 369. It consisted of the district between the two walls of Hadrian and Antoninus. The situation of the rest is absolutely unknown, for it is now acknowledged that the chronicle of "Richard of Cirencester," from which the ordinary identification comes, is an eighteenth-century

Hubner, Preface to vol. vii. of Corpus Inscrip. Lat., gives a well-digested summary of all that is known on this subject. Cf. Rhys. Celtic Britain, and Elton, Origins of Eng. History.

Britanny, RELATIONS WITH. There is no sufficient evidence to warrant the belief that Britanny received its present population from Britons who fled from the Saxon invaders. Individual cases of emigration, settlements from the days of the soldiers of Maximus downwards, there may well have been. Intimate relations certainly existed between Welshmen and Britons in the earliest times. Similarity of language; place-names, institutions, and traditions point to the racial unity of Gaul and Briton. In their western sea-girt highlands, each alike struggled against the ever-flowing tide of Roman and Teutonic influences, yet preserved unimpaired their tongue and nationality. But the colonisation theory is rather a popular attempt to explain these phenomena than a proved fact. If the Britons did conquer Armorica, whom did they expel, and how did fugitives, disorganised by defeat, manage to win so large and fair a territory? The popular legends, moreover, speak as much of migrations from Armorica to Britain (e.g., the legend of St. Padarn in Rees' Welsh Saints) as from Britain to Armorica. With the establishment of the English monarchy over Britain, the early relations of Wales and Britanny became fewer. But even in England Alfred sends gifts to Breton Abbeys, and Athelstan gives a shelter to Alan when the Breton revolt against William Longsword of Normandy had been put down. The superiority which Rolf had previously established over Britanny thus continues, and accounts for the number of Bretons in the Conqueror's army, and their large grants of land in the west of England. Alan of Britanny received that Honour of Richmond which so long remained a link between England and Britanny. It was from Britanny that Walter Map brought the old Welsh Book of Legends of Arthur that is professedly the basis of Geoffry of Mon-mouth's history, and Rhys Ap Tewdwr's return from his exile in Armorica marks a new era in Welsh literature. Like the Welsh, the Bretons were constantly harassed by war and faction; and, in 1148, when the Connt of Porhoet defeated Hoel VI., the defeated party invoked the aid of Henry of Anjou as Rolf's successor. Henry granted the duehy to his brother Geoffry, whose death was succeeded by the triumph of the native prince, Conon IV. But Henry, since 1154 King of England, compels Conon to abdicate and marry his daughter Constance to his son Geoffry. Thus Henry 11. practically adds Britanny to the Angevin Dominions. Geoffry died in 1186, and the rivalry of John and Philip Augustus for his territory ultimately led to his son Arthur's murder, the French triumph, and a new line of Breton princes sprung from Geoffry's daughter. In 1342 Edward III. found another opportunity of intervention in favour of John of Montfort, the native claimant, against Charles of Blois, the friend of Philip VI. For many years the Breton succession war was an episode in the great hundred years' struggle of France and England. Left unsettled at the Treaty of Bretigny, the question was at last decided, at the battle of Auray, in favour of the house of Montfort. In the early stages of England's second struggle for France, Britanny, though less energetically than Burgundy, sided with the English. But Arthur of Richmond, brother of the duke, and inheritor of the old Honour of A. broke with the English, and became the 14 " supporter of Charles VII. In 1488 theth of Francis II. produced a European contest for the hand of his daughter Anne which, despite the exertions of Henry VII., resulted in her marriage with Charles VIII., and the ultimate annexation of Britanny to France. Thus the old ally of Eng and became a pro-nus the old any of Eng. and became a province of her hereditary er.ny.

Bede, Nennius, the Anglo-Saxon Chron. and the Brut y Tywysogien, contain the earliest references to the colonisation. Cf., Elton, Origine of Eng. Hist., p. 955, note, which refers to the Histories of Britanny, by Halleguen and De Courson. Freeman's Norman Conguest (vol. i. 199, 206; vol. iii. 313; vol. iv. 172, 296) gives an account of later dealings. For Henry II. a relations, see Lyttelton, History of Henry II.

British Legion, THE. On the outbreak of the war between Imbella of Spain and Don Carlos, in 1835, an Order in Council was issued authorising "any person to engage during the next two years in the military and naval service of her Majesty Isabella II." De Lacy Evans, a colonel in the British army, was selected for the command. Recruits to the number of 10,000 were enlisted, and despatched to the Peninsula. In 1837 Evans returned to England; and in 1838 the Ministry withdrew the Order in Council, and the corps was dissolved.

Britons. The general name given by the

Briton, THE NORTH. [WILKES.]

Romans to the inhabitants of South Britain. Its etymology has generally been traced to the Welsh brith (spotted or tattooed), but it is more probably kindred with brethyn, the Welsh for cloth. Thus, the Britons were the clothed people, as opposed to the pre-Celtie occupants, who probably wore but little clothing. The classical form: "Britanni" passed away with the Romans, and was superseded by the more correct form, "Brittones." Modern inquirers have sought a remedy for the vague use of the word Briton by limiting it (in its Welsh form, Brython) to that branch of the Celtie stock otherwise called the Cymric; and it has been pointed ont that large Gaelic survivals prevented South Britain from being exclusively the property of either group of tribes. [Celts.] But as these vestiges of the Gael had almost passed away before regular history begins, we cannot do much harm in treating of the Britons in the more general sense of the ancient writers. But, politically and socially, we have not anfficient information to draw a clear line between Brython and Goidel (Gael); especially if, with Mr. Elton, we reject the accounts in Bede and his school. "p" instead of the older "qu" or "qv." The tribes of the south were, from their neighbourhood or their affinity to the Gauls, the most advanced in culture, and the Cantii were, according to Casar, the most civilised nation. Besides these, the chief tribes of the Britons were the Belge, Atrebatil, the Regni, the Durotriges, and the Dumnonii (Goidelic) of the South; the Dobum, Catavellauni, Coritavi, and Cornarii of Middle England; the Iceni, Commagni, and Trinohantes of the Eastern Counties; the Silures Demotes and Ordovices of South-Eastern, South-. Western, and Northern Wales; the Brigantes, and some less important tribes—such as the Parisi, Segantii, Otadini, Selgove, and Damnonii-of the district between the Humber and the Northern Wall. Beyond this latter the Britons, in any precise sense, hardly extended.

Elton, Origins of English History (especially chap. ix.), with Rhys's late. Celtic Britain; Skene, Celtic Scotland, gives a rather different view; Camden, Britannia, has the fullest local and archeological details.

For the ethnology and general characteristics of the Britons, see Crits. The chief tribes are mentioned under their various names. For the political history of Britain, see ROMARS IN BRITAIN.

[T. F. T.]

Britton is the title of an early summary or abstract ("Summa de legibus Anglia qua vocatur Bretone") of English law purporting to have been written by command of Edward I. Nothing is known with certainty as to the authorship of the work. The theory that it was the work of John le Breton, Bishop of Hereford, is untenable, because there are allusions in the work to events which occurred after the death of that prelate in 1275. Selden and others have thought that the book was written by Henry de Bracton, and is an abridgment of his great work. [Bracton.] Britton is a very useful guido to the English legal system of the thirteenth century. It has been printed, in 1640, by Edward Wingate, and by Mr. F. M. Nichols, with an English translation, Oxford, 1865.

Broad Bottom Administration.
THE (1744—1754), was a cant name given to the ministry formed by the Pelhams, after they had contrived to rid themselves of Carteret by threatening to resign, because its supposed policy was to admit to office the heads of Opposition, both Whig and Tory, except Carteret and Bath. Chesterfield and Pitt were persuaded to relinquish their opposition (the former becoming Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), the Privy Seal was given to the Tory Lord Gower, and Sir John Hinde Cotton, an undoubted Jacobite, was given a place about the court; while other posts were given to the Dukes of Devonshire and Bedford, Lords Cobham and Hobart, and Bubb Dodington-In 1746 the Pelhams, finding themselves in danger of being once more supplanted by Granville (Carteret), demanded the admission of Pitt to office, and on the king's refusal resigned; but on Granville's failure to form a ministry they returned to office. .

Bromley. SIR THOMAS (b. 1530, d. 1587), was in 1566 made Recorder of London, and in 1570 Solicitor-General, in which capacity he took a leading part in the trial of the Duke of Norfolk, 1572; he was subsequently employed in the attempt to extort concessions from the Queen of Scots; and, on the death of Sir Nicholas Bacon, was made Lord Chan-cellor, 1579. In 1586 he took an active part in the prosecution of the conspirators in Babington's plot and was President of the Commission for the trial of Mary Stuart, whilst he shared with Burleigh and Davison the responsibility of despatching the warrant. He died shortly afterwards, having never got over the s.nxiety of the presidency.

Erompton, John, Abbot of Jervaulx, compiled a chronicle about the middle of the fiftconth century, consisting of selections carefully made from older chroniclers. This work, which embraces the period from 597 to 1199, possesses little authority, but curiously enough is constantly quoted by historians. It was printed by Twysden in his Scriptores Decem, 1652.

Brooke, SIR JAMES (b. 1803, d. 1868), after serving with credit in the Bengal army, visited Borneo in his yacht in 1838, and assisted the Sultan against the revolted Dyak tribe. In return he received a grant of tho district of Sarawak from the Sultan of Bornoo with the title of Rajah. He did much to ameliorate the condition of the natives, to dovelop the resources of the island, and to snppress piracy, and earned on sevoral occasions the thanks of the British government, to whom homore than once offered to surrender Sarawak. The island of Labuan having been acquired by the British, Brooke was appointed its governor, 1847; but in 1851 serious charges of cruelty towards the Dyaks were brought against him by Joseph Hume. A Royal Commission investigated the matter, but came to no definite conclusion. Sir James Brooko was, however, deprived of the governorship of Labuan. His later years were spent in England; but he frequently visited Sarawak.

Brougham and Vaux, Henry, Lord (b. 1778, d. 1868), the eldest son of Henry Brougham, of Brougham Hall, Westmore-land, educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1800. When the Edinburgh Review was established in 1802, Mr. Brougham became one of its most active contributors, and exhibited an extraordinary variety and extent of knowledge. In 1207 he resolved to qualify himself for the English bar, and in 1808 he began to practise in the Court of King's Bench, and on the In 1809 he was returned northern circuit. to Parliament for the borough of Camelford. His powers of debate were soon recognised, and he became the rival of Georgo Canning, and his most formidable opponent. In the clection of 1811, Mr. Brongham was beaten at Liverpool by Mr. Canning, and was excluded from Parliament till 1816, when he was returned for Winchelsea. In 1820 he undertook, with Denman, the defence of Queen Carolino. During the whole of the trial his popularity was as unbounded as the queen's. On Feb. 11, 1822, he moved a resolution in the House of Commons for the ecasideration of the public burdens, particularly those pressing on the agricultural intcrest. This motion was, however, negatived. In the same year he moved a resolution condemnatory of the unconstitutional influence of the crown in the government, which was also lost. In 1823 he delivered a powerful speech exposing the designs of the Holy Ailiance. On April 17th of the same year, he exchanged abuse of such an insulting nature with Canning, that the Speaker was compelled to order both into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and they only escaped this by retractations. In the same year he was engaged with Mr. Birkbeck in founding the first Mechanics' Institute. In 1825 he took a large share in the foundation of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and also of the London University. In 1828 he delivered his famous six honrs' speech on Law Reform. In 1830 he came prominently forward as the champion of r rliamentary Reform, and the House of Commons had no sooner met than he announced his intention to bring in a Bill embracing a comprehensive measure of reform. A ministerial crisis, however, supervened. The Duke of Wellington, having been defeated on a government measure, resigned; and the formation of a new government under Earl Grey, including Brougham, who with some difficulty was induced to accept the Chancellorship, placed in the hands of the ministry the great question of Parliamentary Reform. But though no longer a representa-tive of the people, and personally relieved from the charge of the Reform Bill, his best powers were called forth in support of it; and his speech on the 7th Oct., 1831, when the Bill was read a second time in the House of Lords, was a display of eloquence of the highestorder. As Lord Chancellor, Brougham's success was not very great. He was unacquainted with the details of English equity, jurisprudence, and with the practice of his court, and his manners gave great offence to the distinguished advocates who practised before him. His extraordinary energy, however, atoned for many defects, and he had the distinction of getting through the arrears ctise in his court with unexampled repidity. In 1834 Brougham resigned with the Whig government. In 1835 they returned to power under Lord Melbourne, but Lord Brougham, who had never acted cordially with the leaders of his party, did not return with them, and Cottenham, greatly to Brougham's anger and chagrin, was made Lord Chancollor. Released from party ties he now acted independently, and even showed a disposition to court the Tories, and especially the Duke of Wellington. But for the remainder of his long life the part he played in politics was unimportant, though his restless vanity still kept him before the public eye. As a law reformer, and a member of the Privy Council, he continued to do useful work; and many of his judgments in House of Lords appeals are of great importance. Lord Brougham's powers of mind, his remarkable activity, his ardent love of liberty and justice, his versatility and his cloquence, made him one of the most conspicuous figures in English politics for many years; and had these great qualities not been neutralised by defects almost as striking—an unbounded recklessness, an extraordinary want of self-control, and an eccentricity which sometimes bordered on insanity—he could hardly have failed to rank among the most Illustrious of English statesmen.

Lord Brougham's Autobiography, which was written during the closing years of his life when his memory was falling, is often untrustworthy. The same must be said of Lord Campbell' 'to of Brougham, the work of a not too go rival. Lord Brougham wrote largely 't variety of topics, but his writings to the History of England under the History of England under the R. of Lancaster, and Sketches of the Statesmen of the Time of George III. His Speeches were collected in four volumes, 1838. [S. J. L.]

Broughton, JOHN CAM HOBHOUSE, LORD (b. 1786, d. 1869), the eidest son of Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, was educated at Westminster School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was the intimate friend of Lord Byron, accompanied him on his travels in 1809, and was with him during his first visit to Turkey and Greece. He adopted advanced Liberal views in politics, and was a zealous advocate of Parliamentary Reform. In 1816 he wrote a work called Letters written by an English Gentleman resident at Paris, which gave great offence to the English government. In December, 1819, in consequence of one of these letters, which contained some severe remarks on certain members of the House of Commons, and which was therefore declared a breach of privilege by that assembly, he was arrested and imprisoned in Newgate, but was liberated a few weeks after, when Parliament was dissolved by the death of George IV., in 1820. The same year he was elected with Sir F. Burdett member for Westminster. In 1832 he joined Earl Grey's government as Secretary for War. In 1833 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland; and in 1934 Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests. He was President of the Board of Control from 1835 to 1841; and again from 1846 to 1852. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1831; and was raised to the peerage as Baron Broughton in 1851.

Brownists, THE, were a religious sect founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Robert Brewn, a clergyman of the Church of England, who began to preach his doc-trines about 1580. They were ultra-Puritans, regarded the Church of England as impure, and, assuming the character of Separatists, refused to held any communication with her. They were strong op-posers of episcopacy, and, in consequence, suffered much persecution at the hands of the bishops. In 1593 a statute was passed enacting the penalty of imprisonment against any person above the age of sixteen who should forbear, for the space of a month, to repair to some church until he should make such open submission and declaration of conformity as the Act appointed. In consequence of the rigorous enforcement of this Act, a large proportion of the Brownists sought an asylum in Holland, whence subsequently, in 1670, many of them sailed from Amsterdam to found a new home in America. The members of the sect who remained in England endured considerable persecution, until the principle of Toleration was recognised. During the Civil Wars of Charles I.'s reign they became merged in the sect of the Independents. The Brownists objected alike to Episcopacy and to the Presbyterian form of Church government, and favoured a purely congregational system, without convocation or synod, and without any separate order of priests. Bruce, The Family of (or de Baus), was of Norman descent. The founder of the English branch came over with William the Conqueror and obtained largo grants of land in Northumberland, where the family quickly assumed a powerful baronial position, being frequently involved in border warfare with the Scotch. David I. of Scotland made over to the house of Bruce the lands of Annandale about 1130, and thus it obtained its recognition as a power in the south of Scotland. Isabella, second daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, he brother of Malcolm IV., married Robert de Brus, Lord of Annandale, and their son became a competitor for the crown of Scotland, 1291. Their grandson was the great Robert Bruce, King of Scotland 1306-1329.

Bruce, Edward (d. 1318), was the brother of Robert Bruce. He commanded the reserve at Bannockburn, and dispersed the English archers. His restless spirit gave much trouble to his brother, who gladly let him go to Ireland, to assist the native rebels against England, On May 25th, 1315, he landed from a fleet of 300 sail at Lorne, on the coast of Antrim. With some 600 men he took Dundalk. and was joined by a large native force. The O'Neil resigning his claims, he was crewned king. At the River Boyne he defeated the O'Connors and the Red Earl of Ulster, and proceeded to besiege Carrickfergus. In Meath the Lord Justico Mortimer succumbed to him, and the flight of another English force before him led to a rising in Munster and Leinster. In 1316, however, want of provisions compelled the Scots to retire into Ulster and leave the Wicklow septs to their fato. The De Burghs and Geraldines also agreed to a truce in face of a common foe. But Robert's arrival counteracted all this, and was at once followed by the capture of Carrickfergus, though the English victory at Athenry restored the balance somewhat. The Bruces, however, followed by 20,000 men, now marched straight on Dublin, and the De Lacys openly joined them. Dublin was not taken, but the country was wasted as far as Limerick; and so completely was this done that the Scots themselves suffered severely, on their retreat, from want, and it was only the supineness of the English which enabled them to regain their old position. In 1317, Robert Bruce's good sense induced him to give up the contest and leave Ireland: all his forces, however, remained with his brether. The Anglo-Irish, still fighting among themselves, were unable to gain any idvantage. In 1318, however, Edward Bruce and the De Lacys, joining their forces, marched to Dundalk, but were met near that place, on Oct. 5tn, by the now united English, were routed, and Bruce himself killed. His body was quartered, and the head sent to Edward II.

Bruce, Robert, King of Scotland (b. 1274, s. 1306, d. 1329), was the grandson of Robert de Bruce, the rival of John Baliel. In 1297 he fenght for Edward I. against Wallace, then joined the Scottish army, and, in the same year, returned to his allegiance to the English king until 1298, when he again joined the national party in Scotland, and was chosen one of the guardians of that kingdem. In 1304 he entered into an alliance of mutual support with Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrews, and about the same time became reconciled to Edward, at whose court he resided until web., 1306, when-hearing that the king, oring to some information that he had obtained from Comyn, intended to put him to death-he fled to Scotland. Having stabled Comyn at Dumfries in a quarrel, he determined to assert his right to reign over Scotland as the representative of David of Huntingdon. He was accordingly growned at Scone (March 27th, 1306) by the Countess of Buchan, of the house of Macduff.

Edward I. at once procured from the Pope the excommunication of Bruce, and was on his way to revenge the death of Comyn when he died at Burgh-on-the-Sands, when he died at Burgh-on-the-Sanus, in 1307. Before this, however, Bruce had been twice defeated (at Methven and Dulay), though he had somewhat retrieved his fortunes at Loudonn Hill. It is to this period of his life that the marvellous stories told by the chroniclers about him mainly refer. There is no doubt that Bruce had to conceal himself in the fastnesses of the mountains and to the fastnesses of the mountains, and to support himself as best he could. In 1308 he routed his old enemy, the Earl of Buchan, at Inverury, harried Lorne, and received additional support by a declaration of allegiance on the part of the clergy. A feeble incursion into Scotland, undertaken by Edward II., 1310, was revenged by Bruce in the two fellowing years, when he invaded England and laid Durham waste. In 1313 Bruce ravaged Comberland, and laid violent siege to the castle of Stirling, the attempted relief of which by the English led to the Scotch victory of Bannockburn in 1314, a battle in which Bruce displayed as much generalship and valour as he after-wards did moderation in the use he made of his victory. His attempts to bring about peace were, however, unsuccessful. In 1316, when he left Scotland for a time to aid his brother Edward in Ireland, his absence was made the occasion of many unsuccessful inroads by the English. An attempt at mediation on the part of the Pope (John XXII.) having failed, Bruce, in 1318, took Berwick, and harried Northumberland and Yorkshire. The next year Edward II. tried unsuccessfully to recover Berwick, only drawing dewn on his kingdom retaliatory raids on the part of Bruce, who, in 1322, entered into negotiations with the rebel Earl of Carlisle. At length, on March 30th, 1323, a truce was concluded at Thorpe, in Yorkshire, for thirteen years, and was ratified by Robert Bruce at Berwick. The peace was, however, soon broken, and in 1326 Bruce again ravaged the north of England, evading the English army, which he reduced to great straits by destroying all their previsions. In 1328, another treaty very favourable to Scotland was made at Northampton, by which Robert's con David married Joanna, daughter of Edward II. "The good King Robert" died at Cardross, June 7, 1324, and by his patrictism, wisdom, and courage left behind him the character of a good man. He married, first, Isabella, daughter of the Earl of Mar, and, secondly, Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter of the Earl of Ulster.

Bruce, ROBERT DE (d. 1298), and Lord of Annandale, was of Norman origin, and the son of Robert de Bruce and Isabella, daughter of David of Huntingdon. He was one of the Scotch Commissioners who went to Salisbury to confer about the marriage of Prince Edward and the Maid of Norway (1286). On the dispute for the succession to the Scotch crown, after the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), Bruce put in a claim as the descendant, in the nearest degree, of David of Huntingdon. He also declared that in 1240 Alexander II. had, in an Assembly of the Estates, recognised him as his heir in tho event of his dying childless (since that time, however, other male descendants had been born). The only competitor whom Bruce had need to fear was John Baliol, in whose favour Edward finilly decided (Nov., 1292). On the resignation of Baliol in 1295, Bruce tried ineffectually to persuade Edward to bestow the kingdom on him. He died shortly afterwards.

Brade, Son of Marlin, was a powerful Pictish monarch (5.556, d.553) who had his capital at Inverness. In 560 he defeated the Scots of Dalriada, slaying their king, Gabran, and driving them back to Kintyre. This defeat was important, as it led to the missio of St. Columba, by whom Brudo was baptise in 563. [Picts.]

Brunanburh, The Battle of (937), was fought by Athelstan against the combined forces of Anlaf the Dane, who came over firm Ireland, Constantine of Scotland, and Owen of Cumberland. This powerful combination was thoroughly ronted by Athelstan, and in commemoration of the great Saxon victory over this great Danish and Celtio league a noble war-song was composed, which is preserved in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. The site of the battle is very doubtful; it has been placed in the Lothians, in Northumberland, in Yorkshire, and it has been identified, with some plausibility, with Brumby, in Lincolnshire.

Ang. Sas. Chron., i. 290 (Rolls ed.); Freeman, Norman Conq., i. 61. For a spirited translation of the "Song of the Fight at Brunanburh," see Mr. Freeman's Old-English History, p. 155.

Brutus (or Brutz) was the name assigned to the fabulous hero who was supposed to have given his name to the island of Britain. According to the account given by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and universally believed in the Middle Ages, Brutus was the great-grandson of Æneas. Having been banished from Italy, he letired to Greece, where he became the champion of the oppressed Trojans. After many difficulties, he succeeded in reaching Albion, which at that time was inhabited by giants. Having destroyed these monsters, the Trojans occupied the country, which, in honour of their leader, they called Britain. Brutus died in the twenty-fourth year after his arrival in the island.

Brut y Tywysogion, or THE CHRO-NICLE OF THE PRINCES OF WALES, is the name of a most important Welsh chronicle which extends from the abdication of Cadwal at Rome in the year 681 to the conquest of Wales in 1282. It is printed with an English translation in the Rolls Series (1860).

Buccaneers (the name is derived from a word used by the Caribbean Indians denoting dried or cured meat) were associations of piratical adventurers which flourished in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The buccaneers were chiefly English and French, and owed their origin to the attempts made by other European nations, in the early part of the sixteenth century, to acquire a share in the rich American trade which the Spaniards at-tempted to engross. The buccaneers, though in later times they carried on general piracy, directed their chief efforts against the Spaniards, whom they regarded as their natural enemies. In 1625 they took St. Christopher, and in 1630 Tortuga, which they made their head-quarters. In 1670, under Henry Morgan, they captured Panama with immense booty; and in 1683 and 1684 made the expeditions to the South Seas which are described in Dampier's farnous Voyages. In 1670 a treaty, called "The Treaty of America," was concluded between England and ain for the suppression of the buccaneer associations, but it was quite ineffectual. The wars between England and France, by making the English and French buccaneers enemies, did much to weaken them, and after the Treaty of Ryswick they gradually disap-peared. The most noted buccaneer chiefs were Lewis Scot, François Lolanois, Mansvelt, and especially Henry Morgan, who was knighted by Charles II., and made deputygovernor of Jamaica.

Buch, JEAN DE GRAILLY, CAPTAL DE (d. 1377), was one of the most famous of the English commanders in the French wars of Edward III.'s reign. He was a native of Aquitaine, and attached himself to the Black Prince, with whom he fought at Poitiers and Navarrete. In 1372 he was taken prisoner by the French, and died in captivity five years later.

Buchan, John Comyn, Earl of, was a staunch adherent of Edward I. He was defeated by Bruce at Inverury, and had his territory harried by the victorious troops. His wife, Isabella Macduff, sister of the Earl of Fife, was a supporter of Pobert Bruce, and crowned that king at Scone, March 27, 1306. For this, she was imprisoned by Edward I in a cage at Berwick, as a warning to those who dared to support Bruce.

Buchan, John Stewart, Earl of (d. 24), the second son of Robert, Duke of Al-1424), the accord son of Robert, Duke of Albany, led a Scotch army of about 6,000 men to France, to aid Charles V. against the English. After winning the battle of Beaugé, he was created Constable of France and Count of Aubigny, and was slain at Verneuil, 1424.

Buchanan, GRORGE (b. 1506, d. 1582), studied at Paris and at St. Andrey s, and became tutor to the Earl of Cassilis in 1532, and subsequently to a son of James V. He hitterly assuited the friars in his Franciscanus, which subjected him to much persecution from Cardinel Beaton. He found it unsufe to reside in Scotland, and retired to Bordeaux. In 1544 he went to Paris and taught at the College of Bourbon. Three years later he went to Coimbra in Portugal. Here he was seized as a heretic, and imprisoned in a monastery, where he began his version of the Psalms. On his release he remained for some years in France, and in 1560 came to Scotland as Latin tutor to Queen Mary. He received a pension from the queen, and in 1567 was made Moderator of the General Assembly. Ho accompanied the Regent Murray to England, and took a considerable share in political affairs, being among the most violent opponents of the Queen of Scots. He was present at the Commission of Inquiry at York in 1568 as the representative of the Scottish lords, and has been charged with he forgery of the "Casket Letters" (q.v.). In 1571 he printed his tract De Maria Scotorum Regina, a very bitter attack on Mary. Meanwhile, in 1570 he had become tutor to the young prince James, and soon afterwards was made Director of the Chancery and Lord Privy Seal, and sat in Parliament for some years. He was a voluminous writer of Latin verse, and is among tho first, if not the very first, of non-classical poets. He was the author of two important prose works. The famous treatise, De Jure Regni apud Scotos, published in 1579, is a political dialogue on the source and origin of kingly power. It is filled with the principles of liberal and constitutional monarchy, and its author has been not inaptly styled "the first Whig." The Rerum Scoticarum History, 1 uhlished in 1582, is an authoritative record of Scotch affairs in the sixteenth century.

Buckingham was an ancient borough at the time of the Domesday Snrvey. It had been fortified by Edward the Elder in the early part of the tenth century, and captured by the Danes in 1016. It was a place of considerable trade in the Middle Ages, and Edward III. fixed one of the wool staples there. It received a charter from Mary in 1554, which was surrendered and restored in 1684. The borough formerly returned two members to Parliament; but it was deprived of one of its representatives in 1868.

His great-grandson, third duke, was beheaded, 1521, and his honours forfeited. (iv.) His son was created duke in 1822.

L'uckingham, Henry Stafforn, Duke or (d. 1483), was the eldest son of Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, by Margaret Beaufort, daughter and heiress of Edmund, Duke of Somerset. He was doubly connected with the royal family, and his marriage with Catherine Woodvillo, daughter of Earl Rivers, made him hrother-in-law to Edward IV. He was one of Richard III.'s great supporters, and was the chiof agent in obtaining the crown for him. But before Richard had been on the throno many months Buckingham became alienated from him, the chief reason being apparently Richard's refusal to give him any portion of the inheritance of the Bohuns, to which Buckingham had a claim. Influenced hy Morton, Bishop of Ely, ho entered into a project for calling over Henry. Earl of Richmond. This scheme was supported by the Woodville party, and Buckingham arranged that he should head a rising in the vest of England, while Richmond was to land in the south. But the insurrection ended in failure. Buckingham had raised a mall force in Wales, but all the hridges over tne Severn were broken down, while unusually heavy rains had so swelled the rivers as to make them impassable. Being unable to get provisions, most of his men deserted, and Buckingham himself took refuge in Shropshire, hut was betrayed hy one of his retainers, taken to Salisbury, and executed there.

for high treason, the chief evidence for the charge being that he had unguardedly let fall some expressions to the effect that he would be entitled to succeed to the throne should the king chance to die without issue. No doubt his connection with the royal line was his real offence in the eyes of tho king. The office of Constable, which the Duke of Buckingham inherited from the Bohuns, Ear' of Hereford, was forfeited by his presumed offence, and was never afterwards revive in England.

Bucking ham, George Villiers, Tair of, born Aug. 20, 1592, was a younger son of Sir George Villiers of Brooksley. In 1614 he was first brought before the notice of James I., and, being an active, handsome, and intelligent youth, his companionship served to amuse the leisure hours of tho king. In 1615, after the fall of the former favourite, Carr, Earl of Somerset, Villiers was left without a rival in the king's favour. In 1616, he was created Viscount Villiers: in 1617 he became Earl; in 1618, Marquis cf Buckingham. By the royal bounty he was made one of the richest noblemen in England, and all the patronage of the court was placed in his hands. Few men could endure such rapid and unmerited advancement without detriment to their character. Buckingham was a vain and arrogant man, not ready to take advice, and not content that any should hold office who did not owe heir promotion to his good-will. Charges of malversation were brought against various officials, and several noblemen of high birth deprived of their offices. But although some reforms were effected in the public service, and although Buckingham was not personally avaricious, the atmosphere of the court remained venal. Those who sought promotion, if they had not directly to purchase office, wero expected to requite the service in one form or another, to win the favour of Buckingham's dependants, or possibly marry one of his needy relations. Over the direction of James's foreign policy Buckingham, during the first part of his career, exercised no appreciable influence. In 1619 the Protestants of Bohemia had risen in rebellion against their king, the Emperor Ferdinand, and had bestowed the crown on James's Protestant son-in-law, the Elector Palatine. The Palatinate had been in consequence invaded by a Spanish army. James hoped to get it restored to the Elector by negotiating a treaty of marriage between Prince Charles and the Spanish Infanta. Buckingham, as personal motives prompted him, joined those who approved of a Spanish alliance or those who desired to render assistance to the Protestant party in Germany. In 1620 he had married a Catholic, Lady Catherine Manners, and in 1622 his attitude became more decided. He entered into a close friendship with the Spanish ambassador, Gondomar, and the following year prevailed on James to let him and the prince go to Spain, under the belief that once there they could readily prevail on Philip IV. to restore his lands to the Elector. Arrived at Madrid Buckingham soon discovered his delusion. The Spaniards wanted toleration for the Anglish Catholics, but refused in return to bind themsel es in any way about the Pala-tinate. During his absence James conferred on Bucking ham the title of duke. Tho new cuke and harles both returned homo, irato with the Spaniards and eager to declare war. A Parliament was summoned and its support asked (1624). For a time the duke was immensely popular, but his popularity was short-lived. He had many schemes in his head for the recovery of the Palatinate, but he had not the qualities of a statesman, and did not understand the first conditions of success. A treaty was agreed on for the marriage of Charles with Henrietta Maria, the sister of Louis XIII., in which concessions were made in favour of the English Catholics, although a distinct promise had been given to the Parliament that nothing of the sort should be done. James and Buckingham expected that in return Louis would aid them to recover the Palatinate, but they were soon undeceived. Dire misery and misfortune bofell an isolated body of 12,000 men sent to pass through Holland and fight their way into the heart of Germany. In March, 1625, James died, and Charles, who was deeply attached to the duke, came to the throne. A Parliament was summoned from which Charles parted in displeasuro because it expressed distrust of the duke's capacity. A fleet despatched to Cadiz to seize Spanish treasureships returned without effecting its object. Want of money led to the summoning of a second Parliament, which impeached the duke and was angrily dissolved by the king (1626). Buckingham, always buoyant and sanguine, believed that if he could achieve success he should recover popularity. Anger against the French king led to a declaration of war with France, and Buckingham sailed in command of a fleet to succour the Protestant town of La Rochelle, which had rebelled against Louis (1627). He effected a landing on the Isle of Rhé, but was subsequently driven off by the French with heavy loss. The king summoned a third Parliament, which passed the Petition of Right and afterwards drew up a Remonstrance asking that Buckingham should be removed from office 1628). In consequence, the Parliament was dissolved, and popular feeling became more excited than ever against the duke. He was at Portsmouth, preparing a second expedition for the relief of Rochelle, when as he left the room where he had breakfasted he was stabbed to the heart by a discontented officer. John Felton, who had served under him, and who thought with one blow to avenge his private wrongs and rid his country of a public enemy (Aug. 22, 1628).

The fullest account of Buckingham is to be found in John Forster's Life of Eliot, and S. R. Gardiner, Hist. of England, 1803 --1842.

Buckingham, George Villiers, 2nd Duke of (b. 1628, d. 1687), was the son of the first duke. He served in the Royalist army, and was present at the battle of Woreester, after which he retired to the Continent. He returned to England in 1657, and married the daughter of Lord Fairfax, through whose influence he was able to recover a portion of his large estates. At the Restoration he was made Master of the Horse and a Privy Councillor. In 1666 he took part with the Opposition in Parliament, and on a charge of having endeavoured to excite a mutiny in the fleet he was committed to the Tower, but in less than a year he was pardoned. On the formation of the Cabal ministry in 1668, he hecame one of its chief members, and when it fell in 1673 he, like Shaftesbury, joined the Opposition. But his health was so bad that he took little further part in public affairs, and spent the rest of his life at his seat in Yorkshire. In his private character he ranks as the most profligate member of the most profligate court England has ever seen. He was strongly suspected of having hired Colonel Blood to assassinate the Duke of Ormond, while his seduction of the Countess of Shrewsbury and the death of the earl in a duel with Buckingham created a fearful sensation even in those days. He is thus described by Dryden, under the name of Zimri, in some famous lines of " Absalom and Achitophel "-

"A man so varions that he seemed to be, Not one, but all mankind's epitome; Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong, Was everything by starts, and nothing long... Railing and praising were his usual themes; And both, to show his judgment, in extremes... He laughed himself from court; then songht relief, By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief."

"Buckingham," says Ranke, "is a forecast of the Regent [Orlcans] and Dubois. In natures of this kind everything works together, amusement and labour, distraction and exertion, good and bad; the most refined culture can go with intolerable insolence; for such men have every kind of ambition, they must be first in everything and remain first. Social considerations and sympathies caused by hatred of predecessors determine their political action or inaction." Macaulay describes him as "a sated man of pleasure, who turned to ambition as to a pastime."

Carte, Life of Ormonde; Burnet, Hist. of His Oven Time; Ranke, Hist. of Eng.; Macaulay, Hist. of Eng. Buckingham's miscellaneous Works were printed in one vol., 8vo, 1704.

Buckinghamshire, John Sheffirld, Duke of (b. 1648, d. 1721), was the son of Edmund, Lord Mulgrave. On his father's death (1658), he became Earl of Mulgrave. In 1666 he served against the Dutch and returned home to take command of a troop of horse. Again, in 1672, he was appointed captain of a ship of eighty-four guns, and as soon as he came back from sea was made colonel of a regiment of foot. Subsequently he passed over to France to learn the art of war under Turenne. On his return Mulgrave engaged in a professional quarrel with the Duke of Monmouth, and bitterly offended the royal family by entertaining hopes of the hand of Princess, afterwards Queen, Anne. In 1680 he was sent to destroy Moorish pirates who were attacking Tangiers. On the accession of James 11. he was created Privy Councillor and Lord Chamberlain. After the Revolution Mulgrave readily took the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. William created him Marquis of Normanby, and named him a Cabinet Councillor. In 1703 he was created Duke of Normanby, and soon afterwards Duko of Buckinghamshire, and in this year built Buckingham House. Ho was compelled to resign office for cahalling with Nottingham and Rochoster against Godolphin and Marlborough. Forthwith he became a violent member of the Opposition, and was struck off the list of the Privy Council (1707). In 1710, however, when the Tories were restored to power, he was made Steward of the Household, and on the death of Rochester, Lord President. He entered eagerly into the plots for the restoration of the Stuarts, and is said by Swift to have been the only man he knew who was sincere in his intentions. The death of Anne destroyed his hopes. The remainder of his life was spent in political disgrace. Buckingham wrote some poems, the best known of which are the Essay on Satire and the Essay on Poetry.

The armament arrived off Buenes Ayres on the 24th June. No time was wasted, and on the 28th the land forces surprised and captured Buen.s Ayres, while a feint was made by the fleet against Monte Video. But the inhabitants secretly organised an insurrection which broke out on August 4th, and was assisted from without by the militia of the surrounding districts. The British garrison, after a stout resistance, was overpowered; and the survivors were made prisoners of war, though Sir Home Popham escaped with the squadron, and anchored for a while at the mouth of the river. was despatched, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, who, on the 2nd February, 1807, assaulted Monte Video, and carried it by storm after a most stubborn conflict, in which the British loss was 600. In June, Auchmuty was joined by General Craufurd with reinforcements, which brought up the total of the British forces to 9,000 men; and General Whitelocke was sent out to take command of the whole force. On the 5th July, an atta was made, without due preparation or design, on Buenos Ayres. The town had no regular fortifications, and the inhabitants trusted solely to their advantageous position on the roofs and towers. From these points of vantage the attacking troops were met by a destructive fire. On the right, Auchmuty seized the Plaza de Toros, with its large stores of all sorts; but this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the defeat of the English at all other quarters. Next morning the Spanish general offered to restore all British prisoners on condition of the evacuation of "onte Video, and all the rest of the region of the La Plata; and White-locke agreed. On returning to England he was tried by Court Martial, and dismissed the service.

Bulls, PAPAL, are the letters issued by the Popes in their official capacity, addressed to individuals or communities, usually on matters of doctrine. Papal letters may be either BRIEFS or BULLS. The latter are considered the more anthoritative and important. They are invariably written in Latin on thick archment, in angular archaic characters, and sealed with the bulla or globular seal of lead attached to the document by threads of silk or hemp. The brief is written in cursive characters, on paper or thin parchment, and sealed in wax with the seal of the Fisherman (sub annulo Piscatoris). It generally refers to matters of discipline. By an ordinance of the Conqueror, ecclesiastics in England were forbidden to receive letters from the Pope, unless they had previously obtained the royal permission. Royal letters, forbidding the introduction of papal bulls without licence, were issued by Edward 11. in 1307, and by Edward III. in 1327 and 1376. To procure or publish them was declared high treason by 13 Eliz., cap. 2. [For the various balls of importance, see under their titles, e.g., CLERICIS LAICOS; and for the whole subject see PAPACY.]

Bulwer, SIR HENRY. [DALLING, LORD.]

Bundelkhund. The name of the district between Oude, Malwa, Berar, and Bengal. It was conquered by Rajput tribes in the fourteenth century, and, though exposed to frequent attacks from the Mohammedans, it always managed to resist them successfully. In the middle of the eighteenth century, however, large portions passed into the possession of the Peishwa, and towards the end of the century tho whole province was in Mahratta hands. The Treaty of Bassein ceded a portion of the territory to England, and soon afterwards the Rajah Bahadur was induced to part with his large territories in Bnndelkhund, receiving compensation elsewhere. On the extinction of the Peishwa's independence in 1818, all his sovereign rights in Bundelkhund were finally ceded to the British.

Bunker Hill, THE BATTLE OF (June 17, 1775), is noticeable as the first important battle of the War of American Independence. Boston is separated by a narrow channel or arm of the sea from the suburb of Charlestown. On June 12th General Gage had declared martial law, and was in possession of Charlestown and Boston. To secure his position in the former, it was necessary for him to occupy two hills which commanded it—Breed Hill and Bunker Hill. The latter was farther from Charlestown, but was the higher of the two, and dominated Breed Hill and Charlestown. On the night of the 16th a body of American militia were sent to seize it. When on t'next morning they were descried on the top of Breed Hill, which they had occupied by mistake, Gage determined to attack them. Three thousand regulars, under Howe and Pigot, assaulted the position in front, unsupported by any movement from the rear. Twice they were driven back, but in the third attempt they were joined by Clinton, and succeeded in dislodging the defenders, who, however, made good their retreat to Prospect Hill, where they encamped. The loss of the assailants in so fierce an assault was 226 killed and 828 wounded and missing. the course of the assault, Charleston had been set on fire by the British 200ps under Howe, and the exasperation caused by this act far more than counterbalanced any gain resulting to them from the battle, especially as they remained idly watching Washington, who was in the greatest difficulties, and quite unable to offer any serious resistance to vigorous measures.

Burdett, Sir Francis (b. 1770, d. 1844), the son of Sir Robert Burdett, entered Parliament in 1796 as member for Boroughbridge In 1797 he brought forward a motion for Parliamentary Reform, and in the following year vigorously protested against the attempts of the government to gag the press. Two years later he devoted all his energies to prevent the suspension of the Habeas Corpus

Act, and to secure better provision being made for political prisoners. In 1802 he was elected for Middlesex, and was re-elected at the poll on the former election the head d void. At the election of 1806 being dehe issued a celebrated address to the Middlesex electors, and on being re-elected gave a warm support to the administration of Fox and Lord Grenville. On the resignation of that government he stood for Westminster, and was easily elected. In 1810 he was convicted by the House of Commons of having committed a breach of privilege in a certain letter addressed to his constituents. Burdett refused to surrender to the Speaker's warrant, and the people 'efended his house. The result was a sei s of riots, in which the people were fired upon, and some of them killed. Burdett proceeded to bring actions against the Speaker, and nearly every one who had had a hand in his commitment to the Tower, but was unsuccessful. His imprisonment terminated with the prorogation of Parliament, and he resumed his place at the beginning of the session of 1811, when he chiefly occupied himself in opposing the Regency Bill. In 1819, after in vain attempting to induce the House to consider the eonduct of the Manchester magistrates at Peterloo, he vented his feelings in a letter to his constituents, for which he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with a fine of £2,000. In 1922 he supported Lord John Russell's proposed Reform Bill, and continued one of its warmest advocates till it was earried. After this Sir Francis gradually fell away from the Liberals. He denounced the alliance, which took place shortly afterwards, between the ministry and O'Connell, retired from Brookes's Club, and openly joined the Tories. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for North Wilts. Till his death in 1844 he continued to represent that constituency.

Burford, THE BATTLE OF (752), between the West Saxons, under Cuthred, and the Mercians, under Ethelbald, resulted in the victory of the former and the maintenance of the independence of Wessex.

Burgess, A, is, properly speaking, the inhabitant of a borough or town exercising a trade there, and enjoying the rights of freedom or citizenship. In the early days of the boroughs, the burgesses were "the owners of land; the owners of houses, shops, or gardens; the burgage tenants, from whose burgages the firma burgi, or rent, was originally due. In a trading town they would be the members of the gild, and in the judicial work of the town they were the class who furnished the judices and curatores.

They were also the electors of the municipal magistrates in cases where the corporations had not become close, and were in most eases the holders of the parliamentary franchise. The privileges of the burgesses were in former times very considerablee.g., participation in the income of the corporation, exclusive right of trading within the borough, and the like. These privileges have, however, been swept away by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, and the burgesses are now simply the constituency which elects the borough council. The term burgess, too, is often applied to the representatives of a borough in Parliament. By a law of Edward II., the burgesses returned for any town were entitled to two shillings a day for expenses, and the practice of paying members of Parliament was occasionally resorted to up to the reign of Charles II. By an Act of Henry V. it was decreed that a burgess of Parliament must be resident in the borough which returned him; but this, however, was not enforced for long. [Towns; Elections.]

Burgh, Hubert DE (d. 1243), first appears in history as one of Richard I.'s ministers. In 1199 John mado him his Chamberlain. On the capture of Prince Arthur, in 1202, he was entrusted with the charge of the imprisoned prince at Rouen, and continued a faithful and active servant of John during the remainder of that king's reign. In 1215 he was appointed Justiciar, and in the next year bravely defended Dover Castle against the French, who were compelled to raise the siege, and shortly afterwards defeated by De Burgh in a naval engagement in the Channel. On the death of William Marshall he became Regent of the kingdom, the custody of the king's person being entrusted to Peter des Roches. Between these two there was constant rivalry, De Burgh representing the English, Des Roches the foreign interest. In 1224 the reckless turbulence of Falkes de Breauté gave De Burgh an opportunity of getting rid of the foreigners. De Breauté was banished, and, on the king attaining his majority in 1227, De Burgh attained supreme power by the exile of his great rival, Des Roches. In this year also he was raised to the earldom of Kent; and, in 1228, he was appointed Justiciar for life. From this date till 1232 England was entirely in his hands, and was, on the whole, well governed. In 1232 the intrigues of Des Roches, who had been permitted to return, and the king's weariness of restraint, occasioned his fall. He was accused of connivance with Twenge in his attacks on the Italian clergy, and the emptiness of the treasury was attributed to the mismanagepal ment of the minister. He was driven from office, and for the next two years suffered the cruellest persecution at the hands of the monarch for whom he had done so much. The disgrace of Des Roches in 1234 restored him to favour, but he did not resume his office, and the remainder of his life was spent in retirement, broken only by occasional appearances in the political arena, as in 1238, when he supported the king against the powerful baronial confederacy headed by Richard of Cornwall. Hubert's policy was a thoroughly national one. He resisted the encroachments of the Pope and the rapacity of the foreigners, as well as the arbitrariness of the king and the turbulence of the barons. His aim was, however, limited to a restoration of the administrative system and policy of Henry II. It is said that an Essex blacksmith, when ordered to put chains ou Hubert, replied, "Do what you will with me: rather would I die than put fetters on him. Is not he that faithful and magnanime as Hubert, who hath so often snatched England from the ravages of foreigners and restored England to England?"

Burgh, WALTER HUSSEY (b. 1742, d. 1783), was a celebrated Irish barrister and politician. He made a most successful practice at the bar, and was appointed Prime Sergeant iu 1779. As a member of the Irish Parliament he belonged to the national party of Flood and Grattan, he approved of the Volunteers, and for a brilliant speech on a free trade motion of Grattan's, in which he described the condition of Ireland as one of "smothered war," he thought it necessary to resign office. Towards the end of his life he cooled towards the Volunteer movement, fearing that it would embroil England and Ireland, but supported the cause of Irish independence at the risk of all chances of preferment. Just before his death he was appointed Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Hussey Burgh is described as the best every-day speaker of the Irish Parliament, though his manner was that of a lawyer. He was a vain and ostentatious man, and died heavily in debt, but his liabilities were paid by a Parliamentary grant proposed by Grattan on account of his integrity and patriotism.

Burghhead, THE BATTLE OF (1040), was fought between Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, and King Duncan, who was attempting to seize the territories of the Earls of Orkney on the mainland. It resulted in a victory for Thorfinn.

Burghersh, Henry DE (b. circa 1290, d. 1340), was a nephew of Lord Badlesmere, through whose influence he was made Bishop of Lincoln in 1320. He was suspected of complicity with his uncle in 1322, and was deprived of his bishopric, though he seems to have been restored before the end of the reign. He sided with the queen and Mortimer agains' Edward II., and for his support he was made Treasurer, and, in 1328, Chancellor, which office he held till the fall of Mortimer. He was frequently employed by Edward III., and died at Ghent, whither he had gone ou diplomatic business.

Burgoyne, John, Lieut.-Gen. (b. 1722, d. 1792), a natural son of Lord Bingley, in 1762 acted as brigadier-general under Lord Tyrawley in Portugal, where he greatly distinguished himself by a most daring and successful raid upon a strong body of troops who were guarding the magazines at Valentia. In 1775 he was appointed to a command in America. The next year he was summoned home to advise the king on colonial questions, but returned to his command in 1777, when he at once issued an invitation to the natives to join the English flag. He then organised an expedition in order to join Clinton, who was advancing from the south. Before they could meet, however, Burgoyne had encountered such difficulties that he was compelled to surrender on the 17th Oct. at Saratoga. He was allowed to come home on parole, and no sooner had he arrived than the pposition made overtures to him to lay the blame of the disaster on the government. He thus became odious to the ministry, whom he charged with mismanagement in not supplying him with proper resources; and the king meanwhile refused to see him, or to allow him a court-martial, which he demanded. This the ministry also strenuously opposed, knowing that the corruption of the War Department would come out if any inquiry were held. In 1779 Burgoyne refused to go back to America, on the ground that his honour did not compel him to do so; and the ministry seized the opportunity to dismiss him from the army. On the Rockingham ministry coming in in 1782, he was reinstated, and appointed Commander-in-chief in Ireland. Burgoyne's previous services lead us to infer that the disaster of Saratoga was not entirely due to himself; and this idea is confirmed by the steady refusal of the government to allow any inquiry. In the absence of that inquiry, it is difficult to form a just estimate of Burgoyne's merits.

Burgoyne, Sir John (b. 1782, d. 1871), the son of General Burgoyne, was educated at Eton and Woolwich, and, in 1793, received a commission in the Royal Engineers. In 1800 he sailed for the Mediterranean with Sir Ralph Abercromby, and saw active service throughout the French wars in Sicily, Egypt, Sweden, Portugal, and Spain. He was with Sir John Moore at the retreat to Corunna: and in most of the great battles and sieges of the Peninsular War, he was first or second in command of the Engineers. In 1812 he was sent to New Orleans as commanding Engineer under Sir Edward Pakenham, and, in consequence, was not present at Waterloo, though he returned in time to form one of the army of occupation at Paris in the middle of July, 1815. During the long peace he held some When the important civil appointments. Russian War was on the verge of breaking out he was sent to Constantinople to report on the measures necessary for the defence of the Ottoman Empire, and, on his return, was appointed Lieut.-General on the staff of the army of the East. It was Sir John Burgoyne who was most strenuous in dis-suading Lord Raglan from attacking Sebastopol on the north, and supported with equal warmth the flank march and attack on the south side. From the first he pointed out the Malakoff as the key of the entire position; and conducted the siege operations before Sebastopol up to the middle or end of March, 1855, when he was recalled to England, leaving Sir Harry Jones to complete the work. Soon after he was created a baronet, and subsequently received a field-marshal's báton, and the appointment of Constable of the Tower.

Burgundy, RELATIONS WITH. Of the ten Burgundies that history knows, England had important dealings only with the French fief, the duchy of Burgundy, under its last line of Valois dukes. The imperial free county of Burgundy (Franche Comté) also be-longed to them. They began with Philip the Bold (le Hardi), whose valour at Poitiers was rewarded by his father John with the grant of the vacant duchy on his taking the hand of its heiress (1363). The acquisition of Flanders, so closely bound to England by economical and political ties, hostility to Louis of Orleans, whose championship of Richard II. and absolutism involved his hostility to the Lancastrian monarchs, first brought the house into intimate relations with England. The Burgundians and Armagnacs fought for supremacy under the mad Charles VI., and their feuds gave ample opportunity to English intervention. Both united to withstand Henry V., and met a common defeat at Agincourt (1415). But the murder of Join the Fearless (1407-1419) on the bridge of Montereau, at the instance of the Dauphin and the Armagnacs, led to Burgundy throwing its whole weight on the English side. Paris, the centre of Burgundian influence, welcomed the entry of Henry V. and the new duke, Philip the Good (1419—1467). Up to 1435, this close alliance enabled the English to retain their hold of North France. But the nationalist revival stirred even Philip, the death of the Duke of Bedford broke his close family tie to the English ho, and the mad attempt of Humphrey of 6. ... cester on Holland and Hainault completed the alienation which led to the Peace of Arras (1435) between Burgundy and France, and even an attack on Calais from our old ally. In the Wars of the Roses, Philip and his son Charles generally sympathised with the Lancastrians. Charles the Bold (1467-1477) regarded his descent from John of Gaunt through his Spanish mother as making him a member of the Lancastrian house; and he showed the greatest sympathy with the exiles whom Edward IV.'s accession had driven to the Netherlands. But he could not afford to quarrel with Edward, and as Louis XI. definitely supported Warwick, and reconciled him with Margaret of Anjou, Charles very unwillingly joined the Yorkist cause, and married Edward's sister Margaret. When in 1469 Edward was driven from England by Margaret and Warwick, he found refuge in the Netherlands, but a personal interview only produced personal hostility between him and Charles. Despite Charles's inadequate support, Edward won back his crown; and fear of France caused the renewal of the political alliance. In 1474 a common expedition against France was determined upon, but Charles lingered at Neuss, and came at last without an army; so Edward, in the Treaty of Pecquigny (1475), abandoned Burgundy for France. The marriage of Mary, Charles's daughter, with Maximilian I., brought Flanders and England into new relations that passed on to the Anstro-Spanish Allianco. But the conquest of Burgundy by Louis on Charles's death (1477) pnt an end to the independent existence of the House of Burgundy.

Burke, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in Ireland by William Fitzaldelm de Burgh, a descendant of Robert Mortain, and first cousin of the great Justiciar, Hnbert de Burgh. He was the seneschal of Henry I., and was made Viceroy of Ireland in 1176. In 1225 Henry III. bestowed the province of Connanght on Richard de Burgh, son of Fitzaldelm, who, after a violent struggle with the O'Connors, succeeded in establishing himself there. His son Walter became Earl of Ulster in right of his wife Maude, daughter of Hugh de Lacy, and at this point the De Bnighs split up into two families—those of Ulster and Connaught. Of the Ulster line, Richard de Burgh, known as the Red Earl, taking ad-vantage of the weakness of the Fitzgeralds, raised the De Burghs to the position of the most powerful family in Ireland. The Ulster earldom expired with his grandson William, murdered in 1333 by the English of Ulster. His daughter Elizabeth afterwards married Lionel, Duke of Clarence, son of Edward III., whereby the earldom of Ulster became 35) eventually attached to the royal family in the person of Edward IV. The De Burghs of Connaught, scorning to hold their lands of a woman, and fearing that their possessions might pass by marriage into other hands, declared themselves independent of English law, and renounced English They assumed the name of Bnrke, and divided Connaught between them, Sir ancestor of the Clanricardes, taking Galway with the title of MacWilliam Oughter (the Upper), and Sir Edmund, ancestor of the Mayos, taking Mayo with the title of MacWilliam Eighter (the Lower). The first Earl of Clanricarde, created in 1543, was William, or Uliek, "of the heads," socalled from his victories over the Geraldines. In 1576 the Burkes, fearing that Connaught was to be colonised as Ulster had been, broke out into open rebellion. Thereupon their territories were utterly laid waste, and the race was nearly extinguished. In 1635, Wentworth's commission of inquiry into defective titles declared the lands of the Burkes to have lapsed to the erown. Uliek, however, the fifth earl, and second Earl of St. Albans, was created Marquis of Clanricarde for his services in subduing the rebellion of 1641, and he is the direct ancestor of the present marquis.

Burke, EDMUND (b. 1729, d. 1797), born in Dublin, was educated at Trinity College, and came to London to study at the Middle Temple in 1750. The study of law was not eongenial to him; and he soon deserted it for literature. His first attempts in this field were made in 1756, and consisted of A Vindication of Natural Society, which was intended as a satire on Bolingbroke's theory of the origin of society, and A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas on the Sublime and Beautiful, which was warmly praised by such judges as Lessing and Kant. In 1759 the first volume of the Annual Register was published, and contained a survey by Burke of the chief events of the year. In 1761 he accompanied "Single-speech" Hamilton, who was private secretary to Lord Halifax, to Ireland. The connection lasted four years, at the end of which time Burke threw up a pension which Hamilton had procured for him, and returned to England. In the same year Rockingham came into office and appointed Burke his secretary. In Dec., 1765, through the influence of Lord Verney, Barke was returned to Parliament for Wendover, and lost no time in making himself known to the House by a speech on the American colonies, which won for him a compliment from Pitt. In 1769 he wrote his remarkable pumphlet, Observations on the Present State of the Nation. Burke was always on the side of constitutional order and liberty on such questions as the right of a constituency to choose its own representative, the freedom of the press, the legality of general warrants issned by Parliament, and the relations of a colony to the mother country. In 1770 he published Thoughts on the Present Discontents, which, though unsuccessful as a pamphlet, placed its anthor in the front rank of political philosophers. In 1772 he was offered the direction of a commission, which was to examine the details of every department in India; but loyalty to his party made him decline the offer. In April, 1774, he made one of the most celebrated of all his great speeches—that on American taxation. November, 1774, he was invited to stand for Bristol, and represented that city for six years. In March, 1775, he moved his resolutions in favour of conciliation with America; he urged the government to recognise the old constitutional maxim that taxation without representation is illegal, to return to the old custom of accepting what grants the general assemblies of the colonies should freely contribate, and above all things not to enter upon Two years later Burke addressed a letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, in which, in the elearest and most independent way, ho explained to his constituents the principles which had guided him in his policy towards the colonies. In Feb., 1780, he brought in his resolutions for the amendment of the administration. His first project was directed against the corruption of Parliament and the sources of that corruption, and was contained in a plan for the better security of the independence of Parliament, and the economical reformation of the civil and other establishments. In the same year Burke retired from the representation of Bristol, finding that his independence was distasteful to the electors. Lord Rockingham's infinence, however, obtained for him the seat of Malton in Yorkshire; and on that nobleman succeeding Lord North in 1782, he accepted the Paymastership of the Forces. On the death of Lord Rocking-ham in July, his ministry became divided against itself; Lord Shelburne succeeded to the Premiership; and Bnrke, Fox, and Sheridan resigned. The combination against him proved too strong for Shelburne, and in April, 1783, he made way for a coalition ministry nnder the reminal lead of the Duke of Portland. Burke returned to the Pay Office, and immediately committed a grave indiscretion in restoring two clerks who had been sus-pended for malversation. The most important act of this administration was the introduction of Fox's India Bill, which seems to have been devised and drawn by Burke. Burke and Fox advocated the measure with all their energy and power; but the king saw his opportunity of getting rid of ministry which he disliked, and successfully used his influence to have the Bill thrown out by the Peers. This success he followed up by dismissing the ministry and sending for Pitt, who, in Jan., 1784, became Prime Minister. The India Bill, which Pitt introduced, was a compromise, of much narrower scope than Fox's Bill, and seems to have escaped any violent attack from Burke. He, however, vigorously attacked Pitt's Irish policy, as well as the commercial treaty with France. A more glorious field for the exercise of his powers was now opened for Burke in the prosecution of Warren Hastings. In April, 1786, Burke, in answer to a challenge from Hastings's friends, laid before Parliament his charges. The first eharge was thrown out; the second and third wero supported by Pitt and carried by so large a majority that in May, 1787, Burko brought forward a resolution to impeach Hastings. The management of the prosecution was entrusted by the Commons to Burke, Fox, Sheridan, Windham, and Grey. Tho trial began in Feb., 1788, and was opened by Burko in a speech peculiarly impassioned and persuasive Seven years went by before the Lerds brought in their vordict of acquittal. In the same year which saw the impeachment of Warren Hastings, politics were thrown into confusion by the illness of the king. Pitt's Regency Bill was vehemently attacked by the Opposition, and by no member of it more bitterly than by Burke. The king's unexpected recovery, however, rendered all the preparations of the Opposition unnecessary, and gave Pitt a further lease of office. In the following year the outbreak of the French Revolution was the beginning of the last act in Burke's career. For the remainder of his life his thoughts continued to be centred on France. His passionate love of order and reverence for the past prevented him from ever sharing in the generous enthusiasm which the earlier offorts of the French people awakened in Fox, Wordsworth, and Coloridge. He distrusted the Parisians, and foresaw too surely that the popular outbreak would end in something very different from liberty. It was not, however, till Feh., 1790, that Burke, in the House of Commons, openly avowed his horror of the principles that were being His avowal was worked out in Paris. couched in such terms that it occasioned a breach of his long-standing friendship with Fox. In the next month the breach had so far widened that Burke deserted Fox on a motion for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts which ho himself had suggested. At length, in November, appeared the Reflections on the French Revolution. Its success was wonderful, and it did much to alienate the majority of Englishmen from all sympathy with the Revolution. In the course of the next year Burke finally renounced his connection with Fox. In August he published his Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs. He continued in Parliament to storm against the murderous atheists in France, and their advocates on this side of the Channel. In 1794 he lost his hrother and his only son, and he never recovered from the hlow. In the same year he retired from Parliament, hut he still watched France with the same unmitigated apprehension. He found time, nevertheless, to give to the world his sound views on the corn trade in his Thoughts and Details on Scarcity. In 1796 he wrote his Letter to a Noble Lord-u scathing answer to some objections raised by the Duke of Bedford to the pension which Pitt had generously bestowed. In the same year appeared the nest two Letters on a Regicide Peace, hrilliant specimens of Burko's most gorgeous rhetoric, in which he protested against any peace with the national government of France. His work, however, was ended, and he died at Beaconsfield on the 9th of July, 1797. It is impossible within our limits to give any adequate estimate of Burko's character and genius. We may per-haps be permitted to quote the words of a competent critic (Mr. John Morley): "There have been more important statesmen, for he was never tried by a position of supreme responsibility. There have been many more effective orators, for lack of imaginative suppleness prevented him from penetrating to the inner mind of his hearers. ... There have been many subtler, more original, and more systematic thinkers about the conditions of the social union. But no one that ever lived used the general ideas of the thinker more successfully to judge the particular problems of the statesman. No one has ever come so closo to the details of practical politics, and at the same time re-membered that these can only be understood and only dealt with by the aid of the broad conceptions of political philosophy.'

duties of Secretary of State. Though no favourer of Northumberland's scheme for altering the succession, he was at length induced to sign "the device" as a witness; and at this most critical period of his career managed to avoid the displeasure of Mary; he conformed to the Catholic religion, and became very friendly with Pole. Before Mary's death, Cecil entered into correspondence with the Princess Elizabeth, on whose accession he found himself at once in high favour at court; he was immediately appointed Secretary of State, and for forty years enjoyed the entire confidence of the queen, to whom he was "the oracle she consulted on every emergency, and whose answers she generally obeyed." During almost the whole of Elizabeth's reign, Sir William Cecil may be said to have practically directed the affairs of the nation; though on one or two occasions, disgusted at the treatment he received from his bitter enemies, the courtiers, chief of whom was Leicester, he was on the point of retiring altogether from public life. In 1560 he went to Scotland, as Commissioner, to end the war, and on his return counteracted the progress which the Spanish ambassador, De Quadra, had made in his absence, by strongly advocating an alliance with the Huguenot leaders. In spite of his anti-Spanish policy, Cecil was no favourite with the people; and the court party, headed by Leicester, whose marriage with the queen he strenuously opposed, strove hard to work his ruin. The perfection to which he brought his system of espionage, by which every plot against the queen was known to her ministers almost as soon as it was hatched, undoubtedly, on more than one occasion, saved Elizabeth from assassination and the country from an internal war, though it provoked against Cecil the wrath of men like Arundel and Norfolk, whose aims he thwarted. His great scheme was the formation of a Protestant confederacy, to consist of England, Sweden, Denmark, the German princes, the Scotch Protestants, and the Calvinists in France and Flanders, against the Catholic powers; his great stumbling-block was the Queen of Scots, whose execution he did not cease to advise as absolutely necessary for the safety of the queen and of the realm. More than once was the assassin's dagger directed against Cecil himself, and in 1572 the plot of Berney and Mather might have been successful but for the minister's spies. The great blot on his character and on his administration is the persecution of the Catholics for practising the rites and ceremonies of their religion, to which Cecil, and even Elizabeth herself, had not scrupled to conform in the time of their need. To his economical spirit, too, may be ascribed that unprepared state of the arsenals and the navy which so materially increased the danger to be apprehended from the Armada. The bitant of Could who is 1571 had mada. The history of Cecil, who in 1571 had been created Lord Burleigh, from the accession of Elizabeth to his death, August 4, 1598, is the history of England, so closely is his name identified with the whole current of the foreign and domestic policy of the reign. He can hardly, perhaps, claim to be called a great man; but he was an adroit, skilful, and sensible statesman, of tried judgment, untiring perseverance and application, and boundless industry in mastering details.

[F. S. P.] Burmese Wars. (1) FIRST BURMESE WAR (1824—1826). At the time Clive laid the foundation of the English Empire in India, Alonipra had established a great dominion on the other side of the Ganges. He united under his sway the kingdoms of Siam, Pegu, Ava, and Aracan. Both nations extended their dominions until they became conterminous; and the Burmese became so confident in their own success that they demanded of Lord Hastings that he should surrender Chittagong, Dacca, and some other places, which they claimed as original dependencies of Aracan. His refusal, and the encroachments of the Burmese in scizing Cachar, a district of Bengal, and a little island on the coast of Chittagong, produced war. In March, 1824, the English attacked and occupied Rangoon at the mouth of the Irawaddi. From then to December the Burmese again and again assaulted Rangoon, which had become the stronghold of the English. Stockade fighting continued till March, and then Sir Archibald Campbell found it possible to advance up the Irawaddi to Prome, and found it deserted. The English remained there during the rainy season. In November hestilities were renewed, and the English gradually forced their way up to within fortyfive miles of Ava, the capital. There at length, in February, 1826, the Treaty of Yandaboo was concluded, by which the Burmese ceded Assam, Aracan, and the coast south of Martelban, and gave up their claims to the lower provinces.

(2) SECOND BURMESE WAR (1852). After the Peace of Yandaboo, however, and especially after a change of dynasty, which occurred in 1837, the English continued to be treated with great insolence, and even out-rage, by the court of Burmah. The successive residents were insulted, and the traders were subject to perpetual extortion. In 1851 Commodore Lambert, in the Fox, appeared, and to him the English residents in Rangoon complained. Communications were opened with the court of Ava, but without success, and thereupon Commodore Lambert proceeded to blockade the port of Rangoon. The matter was referred to the government, and, after three applications had been made in vain for redress, Lord Dalhousle (12th February, 1852) determined on war. Two expeditions were sent from Bengal and Madras, and the Bengal column landed in the Rangoon River on the 2nd April. After some stockade fighting the town of Martaban was captured, and on the 11th April the siege of Rangoon commenced. On the 14th the place was carried by storm. On the 17th May, Bassein was captured. In September the army moved on Prome, which was captured 9th October. On the 20th December a proclamation was issued, with the consent of the Directors, annexing l'egu. A treaty of peace was drafted, but the commissioners could not come to terms, The war therefore ended without any treaty being concluded. In 1867 a treaty was con-cluded by which British vessels were al-lowed to navigate Burmese waters. In the autumn of 1885 the oppressive conduct of King Theebaw towards British merchants and traders led to a war. A force of nearly 15,000 men under General Prendergast was sent up the Irrawaddy, and entered Mandalay on November 28. Theebaw was deposed, and on Jan. 1, 1886, the whole of Tpper Burmah was annexed to the British Empire. The dacoit bands were gradually exterminated, and the country has since been steadily quieting down. In the ummer of 1886 a convention was signed whina, by which the transfer of the coup o Great Britain was recognised.

Burned Candlemas was a name bestowed by the Scots on the spring of 1.75-6, at which time Edward III, completely a aged East Lothian.

Burnell, Robert (d. 1292), was one of Edward L's great ministers. In 1265 he was Secretary to Prince Edward, and soon after the accession of that king was raised to the Chancellorship. He was a great lawyer, and assisted the king in his legal and constitutional reforms. From 1274 to his death he was practically Prime Minister, and it was at his manor-house at Acton Burnell, in Shropshire, that the important statute De Mercatoribus was passed. He was an ecclesiastic, and in 1275 was made Bishop of Bath and Wells. "As a statesman and a legislator," says Lord Campbell, "he is worthy of the highest commendation."

Burnes, Sie Alexander (b. 1803, d. 1841), when a young officer in the Bombay army, was selected by Sir John Malcolm, in 1830, to take charge of a mission to Runjeet Singh, which was to proceed up the Indus, and at the same time make an attempt to establish friendly relations with the chiefs on its banks.

He was badly received in Scinde, and It was only the energetic remonstrances of Colonel Pottinger, Resident at Cutch, which procured hlm means of transporting his convoy up the Indus. He was well received by Runjeet, and proceeded to Simla and submitted a report. He was directed to return to Bombay, through Afghanistan, Balkh, and Bokhara, and to explore and report. In 1837 Capt. Burnes made his appearance at Cabul, where he unsuccessfully attempted to conclude an alliance with Dost Mohammed. In 1839 he accompanied the Afghan Expedition, and was entrusted with the important task of concluding an alliance with Mehrab Khan, ruler of Beloochistan, which he accomplished. In 1840 he was created a baronet. and was left in Cabul to succeed Sir W. Macnaghten as envoy. In 1841 he was murdered in the Cabul massacre. [Afohan Wars,]

Burnet, Gilbert (b. 1643, d. 1715), Bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh. He studied at Aberdeen, and visited England, France, and Holland. In 1665 he was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun by the father of the celebrated Fletcher of Saltoun, who himself became Burnet's pupil. In 1668 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Glasgow, and became known to the Duke of Hamilton, a relation of whom he married. He incurred the resentment of Lauderdale, by whom he was accused of instigating the opposition to the government, and thought it advisable to leave Scotland and to settle in London. In 1675 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel. He became very popular as a preacher, and was well known at court. During the Popish Plot he made great efforts to save the victims of that delusion. In 1681 he published the first volume of his History of the Reformation, and received the thanks of the zealously Protestant Commons for it. In 1683 he accompanied Russell to the scaffold, and was examined by the Commons on tho charge of having written his dying speech. On the accession of James, he withdrew to the Continent, and after travelling for a year arrived at the Hague, where he soon gained the confidence of William of Orange, and succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the prince and his wife. He wrote numerous tracts directed against James, whose bitter enmity he excited. He accompanied William to England as his chaplain, and after the Revolution, was rewarded with the bishopric of Salisbury. He was a zealous advocate of the claims of Mary to a share of the throne. In religious politics he took the unpopular latitudinarian side. While most vigorously opposed to granting any rights to Catholics, he was in favour of toleration for Dissenters. Accordingly, he attempted, with his friend Tillotson, to draw up a scheme nel of reconciliation with the Presbyterians, and he supported Nottingham's Comprehension In politics he was a thoroughgoing Whig. He proposed to insert the name of the Princess Sophia as secured in the Bill of Rights, but the clause was rejected by the Commons. He was therefore regarded by the adherents of the house of Prunswick as the chief supporter of their cause. He also claims to have inserted in the Bill of Rights the clause which forhids the sovereign to marry a l'apist. In 1693 it was resolved by the Commons that a pastoral letter of his, in which he had spoken of England as being conquered by William, should be hurnt by the hangman. On the death of Mary he wrote a warm eulogy on her character. In 1698 he was appointed tutor to the young Duke of Gloucester, the heir to the throne, whose education he carefully superintended. In 1701 his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles was censured in Convocation; and the same year an ineffectual attempt was made in the House of Commons to get him removed from his post about the young prince. He violently attacked the Occasional Conformity Bill in 1704. Ho was a staunch supporter of the Union with Scotland, and was chairman of the Committee for considering the Articles in tho Lords. His care for the welfare of the Church was shown by his scheme for the augmenta-tion of small livings, which ultimately ripened into Queen Anne's Bounty. In the Sacheverell episode he enunciated the doctrines of the Whigs in a speech against passive obedience. He upbraided Queen Anne with her supposed design of settling the crown on the Pretender, and towards the close of his life vehemently opposed the Tory Peace of Techt.

The History of the Reformation of the Church of England is a valuable piece of historical composition, despite its character of partizanship. Burnet's other important work is the History of His Own Time (1860—1713), published restnumously by his son in 1724—34. From .car of giving offence the editor had suppressed many passages in the original mannscript; but the suppressed passages are restored in the edition public's by Routh in 1823. The History is the work of a violent Whig, distorted and discoloured by the anthor's prejudices and partialities; and it is written with singular want of discretion and self-command. Still it is highly valuable as a copious contemporary record of events as they appeared to one who had borne a prominent share in them. Burnet also wrote numerous polemical pamphlets, and several other historical and literary works, including The Life and Deeth of John, Earl of Rockster, 1690; The Life of Sir Matthew Hale, 1682; Memoire of the Dukes of Hamilton, 1677; and a translation of More's Utopic, 1685.

Burrard, Sin Hanny (b. 1755, d. 1813), entered the army early in life, and first saw active service in the American War, being present at Camden, and under Lord Rawdon in South Carolina in 1781. In 1798 he distinguished himself in the unfortunato expedition to Ostend. At Alkmaar he was posted on tho left in command of the hrigade of Guards, and rendered good service in supporting Abercromhy's attack. In 1807, he went as second in command of the expedition to Copenhagen; and on his return he was made a baronet. In the following year he was sent out with reinforcements to Portugal. He arrived just in time to find that Wellesley had defeated Junot at Vimicro and was arranging every-thing for a hot pursuit. Burrard at onco forbade any further advance, and recalled the troops to their positions. The results of this prohibition were disastrous, since they prevented Wellesley from totally destroying Junot's army, and rendered the Convention of Cintra necessary. A court of inquiry was held, in which Sir Harry was exonerated from all blame; hut popular indignation prevented him from ever being employed again. Napier, a not tor gentle critic, says that "it is absurd to blame Sir H. Burrard for not adopting one of those prompt and daring conceptions that distinguish great generals only." Wellesley himself acknowledged that Sir Harry Burrard had acted on fair military grounds.

Burrowes, Peter (b. 1753, d. 1841), was an Irish politician. He began life as tutor to one of the Beresfords, and was offered a seat in the Irish Parliament, but declined to become a more placeman and to vote against his convictions. He preferred to go to the bar, and soon became famous. In 1783 he was a delegate to the great Volunteer Convention. He entered the Irish Parliament shortly before the Union, and was one of the many barristers who declined to be bought over hy Lord Castlereagh, his friend Charles Bushe, afterwards Solicitor-General, being When Lord Cornwallis was sent to another. Ireland as Lord-Lieutenant, Burrowcs proposed to his friends that an appeal should be made to the Yeomanry to defeat the Union, but he was discuaded from the step, much to his subsequent regret. His speeches were among the best that were made on the anti-Union side. In 1811 he appeared as counsel for the arrested delegates of the Catholic Convention, and won his case. He was a particularly earnest man, and thoroughly incorruptible.

Burton, Henny (b. 1578, d. 1648), was Clerk of the Closet to Prince Charles, but after Charles's accession to the throne he was removed, and for accusing Laud of Popery was forbidden the court. In 1637 he was accused before the Star Chamber of writing schismatical and libellous books against the hierarchy of the Church, and to the scandal of the government. For this he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, lose his ears, be fined £5,000, and imprisoned for life. The first part of the sentence was carried out, and he remained in prison till 1640, when he was released by the Long Parliament, the proceedings against him annualled, and £5,000 compensation given him.

Burton, John Hill. (b. 1809, d. 1881), born nt Aberdeen, studied at Marischai College, and became an advocate at the Scotch bar, 1831, but devoted himself chiefly to literature. He became Secretary to the Prison Board of Scotland in 1854, Historiographer Royal in 1867, and a Commissioner of Prisons in 1877. He wrote Lives of Simon Lord Lorat and Duncan Forbes of Chiloden, 1847; Narratives from Criminal Trials in Scotland, 1852; soveral works on legal and general subjects; A History of Scotland to 1688, 1867; A History of Scotland from the Revolution to 1745, 1853; and A History of the Reign of Queen Anne, 1880. Mr. Burton's History of Scotland (issued in 8 vols., 1873) is a very able, careful, and accurate work, and is one of the best general Scottish histories which have appeared in recent times.

A memoir of Mr. Burton is prefixed to his work, The Bookhunter (new ed., 1882).

Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk, was probably a Roman settlement of some importance. Previous to the ninth century it was known as Beodric's-worthe. It derived its modern name from St. Edmund, King of the East Angles, who was taken prisoner hore by the Danes in 870, bound to a tree, and shot to death with arrows. In his honour an abbey was founded here which became famous in monastic history, and is now a ruin of great interest. It was one of the most colebrated Benedictine foundations in England, and at the Dissolution was found possessed of enormous wealth. In 1.11 a great meeting of the barons took place at Bury, when they swore solemnly to compel King John to grant a charter. It was one of the centres of the Peasants' revolt of 1381. Frequent Parliaments were held here, the most famous in 1446, at which Duke Humphrey of Gloucester was arrested.

Busaco, The Battle or (Sept. 27, 1810), secured Wellington's retrent to the lines which he had prepared on Torres Vedras, He had taken up a strong position on the Buaaco range of hills, with a very steep front. On the 29th, in the early dawn, Massens ordered the English position to be assaulted in the centre, where the ascent was easiest. Picton was in command; and here the French assault was so rapid and determined that after driving back the skirmishers they gained the crest of the hili, and threw the third division into confusion. At that moment General Leith. who was on Picton's right, seeing the danger, moved up a brigade to his assistance: and the French were driven over the hillside. Meantime Nev, on the French right, had led his men over more difficult ground, but with equal gailantry attacked Craufurd, who communded on the extreme left of the allied line. When the French were on the point of carrying the position, Craufurd launched against them a reserve of 1,800 men, whose onslaught it was impossible to withstand, and the second assault of the French failed. It was clearly impossible to take this strong post by assault; and Massena, in the evening, hastily began to execute a flanking march round the hills on the left of the allied forces. Wellington perceived the movement only just in time, and ordered a retreat to meet it. The allied troops were in great danger on several occasions; hut the disorder and confusion of the French army rendered its movements slow, and saved the allies from defeat. As it was, they were worsted in several skir...ishes with French scouting parties, and the negligenco of Craufurd at the last moment imperilled the safety of the allied army; but at length Wellington had the satisfaction of having all his forces ensconced behind the lines of Torres Vedras. Bussy-Castelnaw, Charles Joseph, Marquis of (b. 1718, d. 1785), a distinguished French officer, was Dupleix's able licutenart and was mainly instrumental in maintaining French influence in the Deccan and Carnatic, In 1748 (Oct. 17) he caused the English to raise the slege of Pondicherry. On the arrival of Lally in India, Bussy found himself subordinate to that officer, who rendered his plans ineffectual. Bussy was taken prisoner at Wandewash and conveyed to England, but at the trial of Lally he was released on parole and allowed to return to France to clear himself. He wrote a Mémoire contre M. de Lally, Paris, 1766.

life he became by accident acquainted with Frederic, Prince of Wales, and soon acquired great influence over him, though it is difficult to see what were the charms which endeared him to the prince, since he is described as "cold and unconciliating in his manners, proud and sensitive in his nature, solemn and sententious in his discourse." During the later years of George II. he had remained attached to the court of the widowed Princess of Wales; and scandal attributed to their relations a character which there is no real ovidence to show that they possessed. But no sooner was George III. seated on the throne than Bute took advantage of his ascendency over the young king to come to the front in politics. the dissolution of Parliament early in 1761, he became one of the Secretaries of State as tho colleague of l'itt, to whom he was warmly opposed on the question of the Continental war. Pitt resigned in October, leaving Bute supreme. The discovery of the Family Compact between France and Spain, which Pitt had suspected, led to a necessary rupture with Spain; but Bute was none the less resolved to come to terms with France and to heart Germany, and to reverse the policy of his predecessors. On Nov. 3, 1762, the preliminaries were signed at Fontainobleau, and peace was definitely concluded in the following February. But the ministry was unpopular; and this unpopularity gradually developed into a fierce hatred, which amused itself in burning the Primo Minister in effigy in almost every public place. This extreme feeling can scarcely be said to have been justified by Bute's public measures; and two, at any rate, of his chief sins in the popular view are well set forth by a contem-porary writer, who says that he was utterly "unfit to be Prime Minister of England, because he was (1) a Scotchman, (2) the king's friend, (3) an honest man." In April, 1763, he had to yield to the storm of indignation which he had aroused; and he never afterwards filled any prominent office in the State. But he retained his influence over the king, and was all-powerful in the Closet, until George Grenville, after the failure of Bute's attempted intrigues with Pitt, insisted on his complete dismissal from the court as a condition of his own return to power. From this time forward, ther is little evidence that Bute had any hand u. he politics of the day, though his withdra wal could not remove the suspicion of his secret influence at the back of the throne. During the last twenty-five years of his life he lived in almost complete retirement at Christchurch, in Hampshire, in the midst of his family.

Butler, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in cland by Theobald (fualtier or Walter (a Ireland by brother of Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England), who received grants of land in Leinster from Henry II., together with the hereditary office of Pincerna, or Butier, to the Kings of England. The Butler family did not play a very prominent part in Irish history until the beginning of the fourteenth century, when Edmond le Boteler was created Earl of Carrick for his exertions against Edward Bruco and the Scots. From him sprang two lines, those of the Earls of Ormonde and the Earls of Carrick. 'The earldom of Ormonde was created in 1328, and James, the second earl, who married Eleanor, daughter of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Essex and first cousin of Edward II., raised the family to a position of equality with the Burkes and the Fitzgerakis. The Butlers were powerful chiefly in the Pale, and though they adopted some Irish customs, yet, on the whole, they were faithful to their English origin. They almost alone, in epposition to the Fitzgeralds, supported the house of Lancaster and the English connection. Kilkenny and part of ! erry formed their Palatinate, and they s. in power to the Fitzgeralds. The title . . . , was created in 1527, when Pierce Butler consented to resign the title of Ormonde to Thomas Boleyn, Viscount Rochfort, but the latter honour was restored to him after the execution of Rochfort. The Butlers joined the Desmonds in the Munster insurrection of 1569. They played an important part in English history during the seventeenth century; they were now Pro-testants, and, though Irish in sympathy, thoroughly Royalist in their views, and anxious to keep up the English connection. James, Duke of Ormonde, who was created marquis in 1642 and duke in 1661, commanded the Royalist troops for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, and after the Restoration was governor of the country. His son Ossory died in the service of William of Orange. James, the second duke, was one of the staunchest supporters of the old Pretender; in consequence of his intrigues during the last years of the reign of Queen Anne, his honours were extinguished and his immense estates forfeited (1716). His brother and heir, Charles, was created Baron Butler of Weston, Hunts.

Butler, Samuel (b. 1612, d. 1680), is the author of one of the greatest political satires in the English language. The early years of his life are obscure, but he is said to have been at one time employed by Selden as an amannensis, and to have been recommended by him to the Countess of Kent. He subsequently entered the service of Sir Samuel Luke, a rigid Presbyterian, where he had the opportunity of observing the various traits of bigotry and absurdity which he subsequently wove into Hudibras. This work was published in three parts; the first in 1663, the second in 1664, and the third in 1678. The work is a satire on the Independents and Presbyterians, and is of considerable historical interest as giving a striking picture of many of their peculiarities. Its abounding wit, and the extraordinary copiousness and variety of diction displayed in the dialogues, as well as the genuine humour of some of the comic aituations, have made it one of the most popular of political satires. Butler was the author of a satire on the Royal Society, The Elephant in the Moon; a collection of Characters, and some other works. He seems to have gained little or no solid reward from the court, and is said to have died in the extremest poverty in London. In 1721 a cenotaph was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey which pro-voked from Samuel Wesley a well-known epigram.

An edition of Hudibras with copious and useful explanations of allusions, &c., is that of Grey, Lond., 1744.

Butt, Isaac (b. 1813, d. 1879), the son of an Irish Protestant clergyman, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1835, was made Professor of Political Economy the following year. In 1838 he was called to the Irish bar and began to take an active part in politics on the Conservative side. He was a strenuous opponent of O'Connell. In 1844 he was made a Queen's Counsel, and in 1848 defended Smith O'Brien. From 1852 to 1865 he sat in Parliament as member for Youghal, but did not distinguish himself. In 1871 he was elected as Home Rule member for Limerick, and assumed the leadership of the new party, and in 1872 founded the Home Rule League. But he was opposed by the more extreme and violent section of his party, and by the end of his life he had little authority left in the Home Rule ranks.

Buxar, The Battle of (Oct. 23, 1764) was fought between the English, commanded by Major Munro, and the army of the Vizier of Oude. The latter was completely routed, and obliged to abandon his camp, with all its stores and 130 pieces of cannon. This victory was scarcely less important than that of Plassey. It demolished the power of the Vizier Sujah-Dowlah, the only chief of importance in the north, and made the English masters of the valley of the Ganges.

Buxton, Sir Thomas Fowell (b. 1786, d. 1845), a member of the brewing firm of Truman, Hanbury, and Co., in 1816 established a well-organised system of relief for the pcor in Spitalfields, and soon after examined the state of the prisons, in which he was aided by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Fry. He wrote a pamphlet exposing the horrors of the prison system, which excited great attention. He now stood for Weymouth, and was triumphantly returned. He continued to represent this borough till 1837, when he was defeated by Mr. Villiers. In Parliament he proved himself an important ally of Mackintosh on the question of the Amelioration of the Criminal Code. In 1823 he brought forward a resolution "that slavery, being repugnant to the Christian Religion and the British Constitution, ought to be abolished at the earliest period compatible with the safety of all concerned." It was not, however, till 1831 that the principle of eman-cipation was conceded, chiefly owing to Mr. Buxton's efforts, and in 1833 government introduced a measure of emancipation. Mr. Buxton did not, however, relax his efforts, but laboured to effect the abolition of the system of apprenticeship which was still sanctioned by the law. In 1837, on his defeat at Weymouth, he quitted Parliamentary life; and in 1839 he published The Slave Trade and its Remedy, in which he proposed the colonisation of Africa. An expedition with this object was sent to the Niger, but it proved a complete failure. In 1840 Mr. Buxton was created a baronet.

Bye Plot, The (1603), was set on foot by a Roman Catholic priest named Watson, and was joined by ardent Catholics like Sir Griffin Markham and Anthony Copley, as well as by Puritans like Lord Grey of Wilton and George Brooke, who were discontented with the policy of James I. Their plan seems to have been to secure the person of the king, compel him to dismiss his ministers, and to grant toleration to Catholics and Puritans. Many were inveigled into joining on the presence that the meeting was merely for the presentation of a petition in favour of general toleration. The scheme was badly arranged, no definite plan had been agreed upon, and it proved a complete failure. It is certain that the Bye Plot had no connection with the Main or Raleigh's Plot, with which, however, Cecil and the other ministers managed to mix it up in popular belief. Watson was executed, Markham reprieved on the scaffold, Grey imprisoned in the Tower, and Copley banished. S. R. Gardiner, Hist, of Mag., vol. i.

Byng, Sin George. [Tornington, Viscount.]

Byng, John, Admiral (b. 1704, d. 1757), was the fourth son of Lord Torrington, and served at see under his father. In 1756 he was sent out with a fleet of ten ships of war, poorly manned and in bad condition, with orders to relieve Minorca in case of attack. Only three days afterwards the French fleet attacked the castle of St. Philip in that island. Byng arrived off St. Philip on May 19th, and tried in vain to communicate with Byng was brought home under arrest, and tried by court-martial. His judges acquitted him of treachery and cowardice, but it was decided that he had not done his utmost to relieve St. Philip, or to defeat the French fleet. Ho was recommended to mercy. Pitt in vain tried to induce the king to pardon him. Byng was shot at his own request on the quarter-deck of his ship in Portsmouth Harbour; he met his fate with great courage. Voltaire, who had tried to help him by sending him a laudatory letter of the Duke of Richelieu, says that he was slain " pour encourager les antres." It is probably true that Byng had not done as much as he might have done for the relief of Minorca. But there can be no question as to the harshness and injustice of applying the severe penalties prescribed by the twelfth article of the naval code in the case of an officer who was rightly acquitted of treachery and cowardice. Though Byng was perfectly honest and anfficiently brave, it may, however, be conceded that he was wanting in capacity. "He trembled not at danger, but, like many other weak men in high places, he did tremble at responsibility." [Minorca.]

Byron, John, Lord (d. 1652), was the dest son of Sir John Byron. He was eldest son of Sir John Byron. one of Charles I.'s personal attendants, and was by him made Lientenant of the Tower in 1641. As he was strongly attached to the royal cause, the Parliament was anxious to get rid of him, and, in 1642, the king consented to appoint Sir John Conyers in his place. On the outbreak of the war, Byron raised a troop for the king, and at the battle of Edgehill was in command of the reserve. He showed great bravery at Roundaway Down and Newbury, and, in 1643, was created a peer, and shortly afterwards Governor of Chester, where he sustained a long siege, capitulating only when all the provisions were exhausted. He was subsequently appointed Governor to the Duke of York. He took part in the second Civil War, and on the failure of the Royalists returned to his charge of the Duke of York, and died at Paris.

Cabel, THE (1667 — 1673), was the name given to the ministry formed in the reign of Charles II., after the fall of Clarendon.

'The word "Cabal" had been used previously to denote a secret Committee or Cabinet, miswers to the "Junto" of a somewhat later date. [CAHINET.] It happened, however, rather curiously that the initials of the statesmen who formed this administration spelt the word "Cabal." These ministers were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley-Cooper (Lord Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale. "They agreed," says Ranke, "in wishing to strengthen the royal prerogative by moderating the uniformity laws with the help of France, and during the excitement caused by a foreign war; bnt, otherwise, they were attached to widely different principles. Landerdale was a Presbyterian; Ashley-Cooper, a philosopher; Buckingham, if he held any opinion at all, an independent; Arlington, a moderate Catholic; Clifford, a zealous one." At first, in foreign policy, a new departure was taken by the formation of the Triple Allianco (q.v.), which compelled Louis to desist from his schemes of aggression in the Spanish Netherlands. But this line of policy was not long pursued. War with the Dutch and alliance with France followed, with the infamous Treaty of Dover (1672). Money was obtained by seizing that which had been deposited for security in the Exchequer, while Parliament, which might have proved obstructive, was prorogued. Declaration of Indulgence, granting liberty of worship to all sects, was issued. But the war ended in failnre, and the Declaration was received with great suspicien even by the Dissenters. The Treasury was empty, and in 1673 Parliament had to be summoned to grant supplies. Charles was compelled to withdraw the Declaration, and to assent to the Test Act, which, by excluding all Catholics from office, obliged Clifford and Arlington to resign, and put an end to the Cabal Ministry.

Cabinet, THE, although familiar by name to every one as the most powerful body in the Executive Government of the State, is, properly speaking, unknown to the Constitution. Theoretically, the Cabinet is only an irregular Committee of the Privy Council. By the theory of the Constitution, the Privy Council is the proper body to advise the sovereign; yet the members of the Privy Council do not at end unless they are specially summoned, and they have only formal business to transact. The Cabinet Council took its rise under the Tudors, but as then only a small irregular body, consisting of the members of the Privy Council, whom the sovereign chose from time to time to consult. After the Restoration, when the distinction between the ordinary Council and the Privy Council had ceased to exist, and when all members of the Council were sworn came unwieldy from its numbers. Charles II. complained that the great number of the Council made it unfit for the secrecy and despatch which are necessary in great affairs. He formed a select Committee of the Council, called the Cabal or Cabinet, which deliberated on all matters of business before they were submitted to the larger Council. This method of government was very unpopular—partly from the character of the ministers who composed the Cabinet, and partly from the imperfect understanding of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. In 1679 an attempt was made by Sir William Temple to restore the Privy Council to its former position. Its numbers were to be reduced from fifty to thirty, of whom fifteen were to be the chief officers of State, and the rest made up of ten Lords and five Commoners. The joint income of the Council was not to be less than £300,000, which was thought to be nearly equal to the estimated income of the House of Commons. Charles promised that he would be governed by the advice of this Council, but he continued to consult his Cabinet as before. The Cabinet assumed more definite duties under William III., Lo also introduced his principal ministers into Parliament. At the same time, the king chose his Cabinet from the two great parties, until, in 1693, he formed a Ministry exclusively of Whigs, called the "Junto." The accession of George I. made a great difference in the position of the Cabinet, because the king, not understanding English, ceased to attend its meetings. Both he and his successor, George II., cared more for the affairs of Hanover than for those of England. Under their reigns, the fabric of constitutional government was consolidated, although the Torico, in consequence of the remains of Jacobite sympathies among them, were excluded from power. George III., on his accession, determined to free himself from the domination of the Revolution Whigs. He did not, however, give up Cabinet government, although he was accused of consulting "an interior Cabinet" other than his responsible advisers. It was not till the accession of Pitt to office, in 1783, that the Prime Minister assumed the authority with which we are familiar. As Mr. Traill says (Central Government, p. 20), there are three ways in which Cabinet government has been matured and strengthened during the last hundred years, viz.: 1. Political Unanimity—the principle that a Cahinet should be formed on some definite basis of political opinion, or, in the case of a coalition, of agreement on certain specified points. 2. Unity of Responsibility—that is, that the members of a Cabinet should stand or fall together; the first instance of this dates from 1782. 3. Concert in Actionthat the Cabinet should not consist of a number of units, each governing his own department independently of the rest, hut of a body of men acting in concert for the common welfare. In theory, the choice of the Cahinet belongs to the crown, hut in practice it is in the hands of the Prime Minister, and even he has no absolute choice in the matter. As Mr. Bagehot says (English Constitution, p. 14), "Between the compulsory list, which he must take, and the impossible list that he cannot take, a Prime Minister's independent choice in the formation of a Cahinet is not very large: it extends rather to the division of the Cabinet offices than to the choice of Cahinet Ministers. Parliament and the nation have pretty well settled who shall have the first places." The numbers of the Cabinet generally vary from twelve to fifteen. The following Ministers have usually been members of it:—The First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the Home, the Foreign, and the Colonial Secretaries, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretaries for India and for War, the President of the Board of Trade, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Postmaster-Duchy of Lancaster. General, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, tho President of the Local Government Board, are sometimes members, and sometimes not. The meetings of the Cahinet are secret, no minutes of proceedings are taken, and what passes may not be divulged.

Cabot, John (d. 1499), was a naturalised Venetian, probably of Genoese birth, who settled at Bristol in the reign of Henry VI. In 1497, having obtained a patent from the king for the discovery of unknown lands, he set sail from Bristol, with his son, in order to discover the North-West Passage to India. In the course of the voyage, they discovered Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Florida. John Cabot thus deserves the honour of discovering the mainland of America, which he reached June 24th, 1497, a year before Columbus.

Cabot, SEBASTIAN (b. 1474, d. circa 1557), was the son of John Cabot. In 1497 he accompanied his father on his great voyage, in the course of which the adventurers visited Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Lahrador, and Florida, In 1512 Ferdinand the Catholic induced Cabot to enter the service of Spain; but on the death of the king, in 1516, he returned to England, and in the following year made another attempt to discover the North-West Passage, visiting Hndson's Bay. In 1525 he sailed on a voyage in the interests of Spain, and discovered St. Salvador and the River Plate, returning to Europe in 1531. In 1548 he again settled in England, and received a pension from Edward VI., with the title of "Grand Pilot of England." In 1553 he did good service to English commerce by being instrumental in establishing the trade with Cade's Rebellion is the name generally given to the rising in south-eastern England in the summer of 1450. Parliament was sitting at Leicester vainly striving to frame measures to check the enormous evils, financial and political, from which the country was suffering, when, early in Jnne, news came that the commons of Kent had risen in arms under a captain who called himself Mortimer, and whom Thomas Gascoigne, an Oxford theologian of the day, represents as "a descendant of Roger Mortimer, the bastard," whoever he might be. But the captain proved to be one Jack Cade, described by later writers as an Irishman who had killed a woman of Sussex, fied to France, fought there against the English, come back to England, and wedded the danghter of a squire. He undoubtedly gave proofs of military capa-city; and we are told that the Primate, in a conference with min, coming," if "sober in talk and wise in reasoning," if At any rate, the rising he led was no wanton one. Misrule at home and failure abroad had brought on men in power a hatred and contempt almost universal. The amiable king was as clay in the hands of his headstrong queen and the friends of the late unpopular Duke of Suffolk. The royal income had dwindled by improvident grants; the Exchequer was well-nigh bankrupt; grievous taxes oppressed the commons, whilst their favourite, the Duke of York, was excluded from the government. The lawless murder of the Duke of Suffolk at Dover, on May 2nd, had been followed by a report that the king's vengeance would fall on the county of Kent. The men of Kent thereupon resolved on an immediate appeal to arms; and in combination with the men of Surrey and Sussex, and headed by Cade, who called himself "Captain of Kent," assembled, on June 1st, in considerable force, on Blackheath. This was no tumultuous gathering of a mere clownish mob, but an organised enterprise, deliberately carried ont by means of the regular local machinery; and men of good birth are known to have taken part in it. In their formal complaint we learn the provocation and aims of the rebellion. Prominent among the first were the heavy taxation, tho abuse of purveyance, the appointment of upstarts to high office, the treasonable loss of France, undue interference of great men at elections, and exactions under colour of law; among the second it was urged that the alienated crown lands should be resumed, the friends of Suffolk discarded, and the king's confidence given to York - in fact, redress of grievances and change of counsellors. The king at once mustered an army, and marched to London: and thence, after delay, moved on Blackheath. Cade fell back before his advance; and Henry, thinking the brunt of the danger over, sent only a small force, under Sir Humphrey and William Stafford, in pursuit of him. Cade faced round at Se enoaks, and there, on June 18th, a fight ensued, in which the king's force was routed, and both the Staffords killed. Cade returned to London, and occupied Southwark. The Londoners resolved, by a vote of the Common Council, to open their gates to the rebels; and on July 2nd, Cade led them across the bridge and took formal possession c' the city by striking London Stone with his sword. For a time he preserved the show, and something of the reality, of discipline, making his men respect the persons and properties of the citizens, and returning with them every night to Sonthwark. But he took Lord Say and Sele, the Treasner, who was in special ill-odour with the country, out of the Tower, and had him arraigned before the Lord Mayor, but afterwards cansed him to be carried off and beheaded in Cheap. Crowmer, Say's son-in-law and Sheriff of Kent, and another were also murdered. Then discipline gave way; robberies became frequent, Cade himself plundering friend and enemy alike. This conduct enraged the Londoners; they turned upon Cade: and under the command of Matthew Gough, a soldier of renown in the French wars, sought, on July 5th, to hold the bridge against the rebels. Cade promptly made a furious onslaught upon them; drove them with heavy loss to the drawbridge at the centre, which he set on fire; and killed their leader. The contest lasted through the night; but the Kentish men fell back the next morning. The Chancellor (Archbishop Kemp) seized this moment of discouragement to tempt the insurgents with offers of pardon. These were produced by Bishop Waynflete at a conference with Cade, and were gladly accepted. Soon almost every man of the rebels was making for his home. But their captain, distrusting his pardon, or yielding to his instincts, flung open the gaols, and turned the released prisoners into a new force. With this he went to Rochester, whither his hooty had been sent by water. A price was now set on his head; and his men quarrelled with him over the plunder. He left them and fied into Sussex. He was heading towards Lewes, when he was caught at Heathfield in a garden, by Iden, the new Sheriff of Kent, and struggling against capture, was cut down and wounded to the death. He died before his captors could get him to Cadis, Expeditions Adainst. The first (1596) was undertaken to create a diversion in favour of Henry IV. of France, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Melun. In June, 1596, a combined fleet of English and Dutch under Lord Howard of Effingham and the Earl of Essex, entered Cadiz harbour, where Sir Francis Drake had burnt the shipping nino years before, and completely defeated the Spanish vessels assembled there for the defence of the city. Essex, with 3,000 men, landed at Puntal, and captured the town, extorting a ransom of 120,000 crowns from the citizens. The expedition returned ten weeks after it had left Plymouth, having done much to lower the prestige of Spain, and to assert the naval superiority of the English. The second (1625) resulted from the rupture of the negotiations for the Spanish marriage, and the restoration of the Palatinate by Spanish aid, and the consequent expedition planned by the Duke of Buckingham to seize a Spanish port and intercept the treasure fleet. An open breach took place in September, 1625, when Charles concluded an alliance with Holland (Sept. 8th), and a joint expedition was agreed Sir Edward Cecil (Lord Wimbledon) was entrusted with the chief command, with Lord Denbigh as rear-admiral and the Earl of Essex as vice-admiral. The combined fleet arrived in Cadiz Bay on Oct. 22nd; but instead of at once attacking the ships in the harbour and assaulting the city, the next day was spent in capturing the fort of Puntal, which guarded the entrance of the harbour. The delay gave the Spaniards time to garrison the before defenceless city, and made a surprise impossible. On the 24th Wimbledon landed his troops, and marched northwards to meet a Spanish force of whose approach he had heard; but the Spaniards retreated, and, after a useless and disorderly march, he returned next morning to his fleet. The fleet, which was to have destroyed the Spanish vessels at the head of the harbour, found them posted in an inaccessible ereek, and accomplished nothing. Cadiz was now too strong to attack; so on Oct. 27th the soldiers were re-embarked, the fort of Puntal was abandoned, and the Seet 1 to sea to intercept the treasure ships. This portion of the enterprise also failed; the ships were unseaworthy, and disease raged among the crews; and in December the fleet returned to England. The third (1702) occurred during the War of the Spanish Succession, and the idea appears to have been suggested by the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who was convinced that the Spaniards were to a man in favour of the Archduke Charles, and that Cadiz would form a good basis of operations. Accordingly a joint expedition of English and Dutch was fitted out and placed under the command of the Duke of Ormonde; Sir George Rooke, who disapproved of the whole plan, being in command of the fleet of thirty ships of the line. The land forces amounted to 14,000 men. It was first designed to attack Gibraltar, but this idea was given up. For a fortnight the fleet was delayed by storms. Cadiz was strongly fortified and was defended by the veteran general Villadrias. Ormonde first attempted to gain over the governor Brancaceio, and then the inhabitants, but without success. As the town itself was supposed, though utterly without reason, to be impregnable, Villadrias having only 200 men, the allies occupied the port of Santa Maria, which they ruthlessly pillaged, the officers being as unprincipled as the men (July 18th). An attempt to take Fort Matagorda proved an utter failure; dysentery, too, broke out among the troops. Accordingly, on the 30th of September, Ormonde, sorely against his will, was constrained to re-embark his troops, and they set off homeward "with a great deal of pluader and infamy." On their way home, however, the expedition partly retrieved its character by the destruction of the Spanish galleons in Vigo Bay.

Cadogan, WILLIAM 1ST EARL OF (d. 1726), was one of the officers whom Marlborough most trusted. He was made colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Horse in 1703, and general in the following year for his gallant attack on the Schellenberg. In 1705 he was elected member for Woodsteck. He fonght at Ramillies, and towards the end of 1706, he was taken prisoner, but soon exchanged. In 1708 he was appointed ambaseador to the States General. Cadogan led the van at Oudenarde, having been sent on to construct pontoons across the Scheldt, by which the army effected the passage. He also supported General Webb, in his gallant fight with the enemy at Wynendale. At the end of the year he was made He was again aplieutenant - general. pointed envoy to the States General, but was recalled by the Tory ministry. In Marlborough's last campaign he surprised Bouchain and Cambrai, and broke the barrier which Villars had termed his "non plus ultra." On the disgrace of Marlborough he resigned his appointments. Cadogan was sent to Scotland after the dilatoriness of Argyle had been proved, and soon brought the campaign to a conclusion. He was raised to the Peerage in 1716. He signed the defensive alliance between England, France, and Holland, and subsequently carried out the execution of the Barrier Treaty, and signed the Quadruple Alliance. His influence in Holland was partly owing to his friendship with Mariborough, and partly because he had married a Dutch lady of good family. On the death of the Duke of Mariborough, he was appointed Commander-in-chief and Master-General of the Ordnance. Later on he supported Carteret in his quarrel with Marlborough's Despatches; Coxe, Marlborough; Wyon, Reign of Queen Anne.

Cadsand, THE BATTLE OF (1337), the first fight of the Hundred Years' War against France, was brought about by the attack of the Count of Flanders on the party of Van Artevelde, who sought aid from England. Sir Walter Manny was sent with a small force, and having effected a landing at Cad-sand, an island at the mouth of the Scheldt, inflicted a serious defeat on the troops of the Caen, The Theaty of (1091), was made between William Rufus and Robert of Normandy, under the mediation probably of the King of France. Robert renounced his claim to England, and was allowed to retain his capital and the greater part of his duchy; but he recognised the commendations which many of the Norman nobles had made to William Rufus, who thus became a Continental neighbour to his brother, "hemming in what was left of Normandy on every side (Freeman). Cherbourg, Fécamp, and St. Michael's Mount were among the places surrendered by Robert. The treaty provided that if either Robert or Wi. am should die without an heir the survivor should succeed to his dominions.

Freeman, William Rufue, ii., in the Appendix the different versions of the treaty are given.

Caerlaverock Castle, on the Nith, in Dumfrieschire, was held for some days in the year 1300 by sixty men against an overpowering force commanded by Edward I. It was the place where James V. of Scotland died, December 14th, 1542. In 1645, Hertford persuaded Lord Maxwell, its owner, to surrender the castle to the English, by whom, however, it was not held for long. The castle was destroyed by Cromwell.

The siege of Caerlaverock by Edward I. forms the subject of a curious French poem giving a catalogue of the various barons and knights present, with a description of their arms, persons, and characters. It was printed by Grove, in 1998, and Sir H. Nicolas in 1828, An elaborate edition has been issued by Mr. Thos, Wright, Lond, 1866, 4th ed.

Cagliari Affair, Tur. In June, 1357, some of the passengers on a trading steamer, the Capitari, seized the ship and attacked the island of Perga. The ship, after being abandoned by its captors, was taken at sea by a Neapolitan war-vessel, and two English engineers aboard were imprisoned till Mar., 1858, until one became mad, and the other seriously ill. The affair formed the subject of much discussion in Parliament, representations from the English government to that of Naples ending in the payment of £3,000 compensation by the latter in June, 1858.

Cairns, Hugh McCalmont, 1st Earl (b. 1819, d. 1885), second son of William Cairns, of Co. Down, Ireland, was called to the bar in 1844, and entered Parliament as member for Belfast in 1852. In 1858 he was appointed Solicitor-General by Lord Derby. On the Solicitor-General by Lord Derby. return of Lord Derby to power in 1866, he was made Attorney-General, and subsequently a Lord Justice of Appeal. In 1867 he was elevated to the peerage. He became Lord Chancellor in 1868, and held that office till the derivative of the lord of the the downfall of Mr. Disraeli's ministry. In Mr. Disraeli's second administration he again held the Chancellorship.

Caithness is mentioned in the Pictish Chronicle as the territory of Cait, one of tho sons of Cinge. The district seems to have embraced the whole of the northern part of the island from sea to sea. It passed under the rule of the Norwegian Earls of Orkney in the ninth century, though the Kings of Scot-land claimed the territory as part of their kingdom. William the Lion, about 1196, deprived Earl Harold of that part of the district of Caithness which comprises Sutherland, and bestowed it on the Morays. The Norvegian Earls of Caithness held of the Scotch king, and not of the King of Norway, as did the Earls of Orkney. The old line of earls came to an end, in 1231, with the death of Earl John, and for the next century the carldom was held by the family of Angus, after which it passed to the St. Clairs, or Sinclairs. The bishopric of Caithness was founded by David I., with the cathedral at Dornoch.

Skene, Celtic Scotland, iii., Appendix.

Caithness, John, Earl of (d. 1231), son of Harold, was supposed to have connived at the murder of Bishop Adam. He was in consequence deprived of half his earldom by Alexander II., from whom, however, he bought it back a year later. The earl The earl was burnt to death in his own castle, 1231.

Calais first passed into the possession of the English in the reign of Edward III. It was invested by the English in August, 1346, and after the battle of Crecy Edward III. appeared in person before the walls with the army that had won the victory. The town endured a siege for nearly a year with heroic bravery, and finally surrendered, Aug. 4, 1847. According to Jean Le Bel, six of the chief citizens offered their lives to the king in ransom for their fellow-townsmen, but were spared by the intervention of Queen Philippa. The town was unsuccessfully besieged by the Duke of Burgundy in 1436, and remained in English hands as the sole vestige of the English conquests in France at the close of Henry VI.'s reign. In 1455, Warwick was mado Captain of Calais, but, in 1470, he and Clarence were refused entrance to the city. In July, 1475, Edward IV. landed at Calais to begin his projected campaign in France. In January, 1558, the town was invested and easily captured by the Duke of Guise, owing to the apathy of the English government, which had left the town without men or supplies to withstand a siege. By the peace of Cateau Cambresis the French bound themselves to restore Calais to the English at the end of eight years, on pain of ferfeiting a large sum of money; hut the eugagement was never carried out. It was while lying off Calais on Aug. 7, 1588, that the great Spanish fleet [ARMADA] was dispersed by the fireships of the English. In 1596 Calais was taken from the French by Philip of Spain, a circumstance which so alarmed England as to occasion the expedition to Cadiz under Lord Howard of Effingham. Calais was restored to France in 1598, and has since remained in the hands of the French.

Calathros. A district in the ancient kingdom of Dalriada, lying between the Roman wall and the River Avon, now called Callander. The Battle of Calathros (634) resulted in the defeat of King Donald Brec, who was attempting to wrest the district from the English.

Calcutta first became an English trading station in 1686, when the small factory established at Hooghley was removed to this place. In 1696 Fort William was built, and became the head-quarters of the Bengal servants of the East India Company. In 1707 it was constituted a Presidency, and its trade soon became considerable. In 1710 the population was computed at nearly 12,000. The city was strongly fortified, and in 1742 the trench called the "Mahratta ditch" was dug round it to protect it from the predatory Mahratta horsemen. In 1756 the town was captured and sacked by Surajah Dowlah, and the tragedy of the "Black Hole" enacted [Black HOLE OF CALCUTTA]. In Jan, 1757, the town was reconquered by Clive, and rebuilt. In 1773 it became the capital of British India as well as of Bengal, hy an Act of Parliament which gave the Fort William government superiority over those of the other Presidencies. The Governor of Bengal was henceforth called the Governor-General, and in 1834 his title was changed to that of Governor-General of India. Many magnificent buildings were erected in the European quarter, including the splendid Government House built by Lord

Wellcaley in 1804. In 1854 the supreme government was separated from the local Bengal government by the greation of a Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, who also has his seat at Calcutta. The population of the city, with suburbs, in 1901 ws 1,423,527

Caledonia. The name given generally by the Romans to that part of Britain lying north of the Firths of Forth and Clyde, and first laid open by the conquests and explora-tions of Agricola. The name first occurs in Lucan, vi. 67, and Valerius Flaccus, Argonaut., i. 7. Tacitus says that the red hair and large limbs of the Caledonians point to a German origin. The Caledonians, according to Ptolemy, extended from the Sinus Lemannonius (probably Loch Long) to the Varar Aestuarium (Beauly Firth). They occupied the tract of wild country called Caledonia Silva, or Forest of Celyddon, and were the most powerful of all the tribes north of the Brigantes. At a later period the name came to include apparently all the barbarian and partially unsubdued natives of the northern mountainous district. In 201 the Caledonians joined the revolt of the Meatse. Severus conducted a campaign against them in 208; but they again revolted a year or two afterwards. In the fourth century, and subsequently, the name is used as equivalent to the whole of Northern Britain-modern Scotland, as distinguished from England and Ireland.

Calendar, THE REFORMATION OF THE (1751), was in great part due to the efforts of Lord Chesterfield. The "Old Style," which was now eleven days in error, had long since been abandoned by most civilised nations. England, however, with Russia and Sweden, still clung to the antiquated system. "It vas not," wrote Chesterfield, "very honourable for England to remain in a gross and avowed error, especially in such company."
Accordingly, having paved the way to his measure hy some letters to the World, Chesterfield drew up the scheme in concert with Lord Macclesfield and Bradley the astronomer. The Bill successfully passed both Houses of Parliament. It ordained that the year 1752 should begin on the 1st of January instead of the 1st of March, and that the 3rd of the month of September should be called the 14th, so as to lose the eleven days. Further, such changes should be introduced as would make the solar year and the lunar year coincide. In the matter of payments, it was enacted that these should not be altered, and that the 5th of April, the 5th of July, the 10th of October, and the 5th of January should still continue to be the days on which the dividends of the public funds became due. This change met with a good deal of ignorant opposition. The common Opposition election cry was, "Give us back our eleven days."

Cambridge was the site of a Roman station, named Camboritum. After the English conquest the name of the town was changed to Grantchester, the modern name being derived from the great stone bridge across the Cam. In 1267 it was fortified by Henry III., and afterwards taken by the barons. In 1381 it was attacked by the insurgents, and many of the colleges were pillaged and their charters burned. During the Great Rebellion it was occupied by the Parliamentarians. The town returned two members from Edward I.'s time till the last Redistribution Act reduced the number to one.

Cambridge, RICHARD PLANTAGENET, EARL of (d. 1415), was the second son of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York. He was created Earl of Cambridge by Henry V., but in 1415 was concerned in the conspiracy with Lord Scrope of Masham and others, to dethrone Henry and place the Earl of March on the throne. On the discovery of the plot Cambridge was beheaded. He married, first, Anne Mortimer, sister of the Earl of March, through whom the claims of the house of Mortimer were transferred to the family of York; and, secondly, Maud, daughter of Thomas, Lord Clifford.

Cambridge, George Frederick William Charles, Duke of (b. 1819, d. 1904), son of Adolphus Frederick, seventh son of George III., was born at Hanover. He became a colonel in the British army, 1837; a major-general in 1845; and a lieutenant-general in 1854. He was present at the battles of the Alma and Inkermann, as commander of the two brigades of Guards and Highlanders: In 1856 he was appointed Commander-in-chief, a position he filled down to 1895, and in 1862 he was advanced to the rank of field-marshal.

Cambuskenneth, THE BATTLE OF.

Camden, The Battle of (August 16, 1780), fought during the American War of Independence, arose out of an attempt made by the Americans to save the Carolina provinces from falling into British hands. In the early part of the summer, Washington despatched De Kalb with 3,000 men to join Gates in the South; and Virginia sent out a large body of Militia. The centre of the British force, which was widely extended over South Carolina, lay at Camden, but Cornwallis, on hearing of Gates's advance, concentrated a large body on that place. A skirmish at daybreak of August 16 between the vanguards of the two armies soon developed into a general battle. The British were outnumbered, but a great part of the American force was raw and undisciplined, the steady attack of the regulars was irresistible, and the flight soon became a hopeless rout. The American losses were very heavy both in men and stores. Among the former was De Kalb himself. The victory was the most decisive advantage gained by the British during the war. It placed South Carolina and Georgia almost entirely in the power of the British. [CORNWALLIS.]

Camden, Charles Pratt, 1st Earl. (b. 1713, d. 1793), was the son of Chief Justice Sir John Pratt. He was educated at Eton, and called to the bar in 1738. In February, 1752, he defended a printer who was prosecuted for an alleged libel. His practice and his reputation continued steadily to increase, until when Pitt came into office in 1757 he was appointed Attorney-General. When Pitt resigned in October, 1761, Pratt continued in office as Attorney-General, and in the following January became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. While he held this position, he continued to maintain constitutional principles against tyrannical attempts to oppress the subject, and decided in numerous cases against the legality of general warrants. To him Wilkes applied, and the Chief Justice ordered his release on the ground of his privilege as a member of Parliament. On the formation of the Rock Parliament. On the formation of the Rockrariament. On the formation of the rectaining and cabinet, in 1765, he was raised to the peerage as Baron Camden. In February, 1766, he made a great speech in favour of the repeal of the Stamp Act, and against the Declaratory Act. In the following July Camden was raised to the woolsack. Lord Camden's opinion on the right of Parliament to expel Wilkes seems to have been at variance with the action taken by the cabinet, though in his perplexity as to the right course to take he continued to belong to the government; but in January, 1770, he openly declared his differences with his colleagues on that subject of the Wilkes question, and resigned the Great Seal. In 1772 he warmly opposed the Royal Marriage Act. In January, 1782, he supported Lord Shelburne's amendment to the address on the King's Speech. On the formation of the second Rockingham cabinet in March, 1782, Lord Camden preferred the office of President of the Council to the Great Seal. In 1783 he resigned, and offered a vigorous opposition to the "Coalition" Ministry. Soon after Pitt became Prime Minister, Camden was again made President of the Council. In May, 1786, he received an earldom. He conducted, in the House of Lords, the measures adopted by the government in relation to the Regency Bill. The last occasion on which he addressed the House of Lords was the debate on Fox's Libel Bill. On the eve of fourscore years, he made his final and successful effort to put on the statute-book those principles as to the rights of juries.

which he had so consistently maintained throughout his life.

Camden, John Jeppress Pratt, 1st Marquis (b. 1759, d. 1840), son of the preceding, entered Parliament in 1780 as member for Bath. In 1795 ho succeeded Lord Fitzwilliam as Viceroy of Ireland. On his entry into Dublin in March, 1796, there was a serious riot, which could only be quelled by bloodshed. In 1797 he was bitterly deby bloodshed. In 1797 he was bitterly de-nounced by Grattan, on account of the severities he had found it necessary to authorise in Ulster: but the Parliament, now thoroughly alarmed by the progress of disaffection, was on his side. The English government was more uncertain how to act, but ultimately supported Lord Camden, and took his side in the disputo in which he was involved with General Abercromby. He was, after the beginning of 1797, in full possession of all the rebel plans, but was unable to act on his information during the Rebellion of 1798. 'He was consequently urging the gravity of the situation on the English cabinet, but it was only after Father Murphy's successes that the Guards and other English troops were sent out to support him. The Whigs in England, meanwhile, continued to attack him as a tyrant of the worst kind, Sheridan moving for his recall in the Commons, and the Dukes of Leinster and Norfolk in the Lords. Both motions were defeated, but popular clamour was so great that, in June, 1798, he was recalled. In 1804 he was in the cabinet, and in 1812 was made a marquis. For nearly sixty years he held the lucrative post of Teller of the Exchequer; but during more than half that period he patriotically declined to draw tho enormous emoluments of the office.

Camden, WILLIAM (b. 1551, d. 1623), one of the most celebrated of English antiquaries, was born in London and educated at St. Paul's School and at Oxford. In 1575-6 he became a masterat Westminster School; in 1589 received a prebend at Salisbury_Cathedral; in 1593 he becsme Head Master of Westminster, and in 1597 Clarencieux King-atarms. In 1607 he was commissioned by James I. to translate into Latin the account of the trial of the Gunpowder Plot conspirators. In 1622 he founded his Professorship of History at Oxford, and died at Chiselhurst the next year. Camden's most eelebrated work is the Britannia sive Florentissimorum Regnorum Anglia, Scotia, Hibernia, et Inn-tarum Adjacentium, ex Intima Antiquitate Chorographica Descriptio, which first appeared in 1586, and had gone through a ninth edition in 1594. A new and enlarged edition was published in 1607. It is an interesting work, and the care and learning shown in its compilation still make it of great value to scholars. Though many of Camden's antiquarian theories have been dispelled by later research, his work is important as a great storehouse of facts. He also wrote an English antiquarian work of less elaborate character, called Remaines Concerning Britain, 1605, which has been frequently reprinted. In 1615 he published the first part of his Annales Rerum Anglicarum Regnante Eiszabetha, the second part of which did not appear till after the author's death. It is not a work of special value.

The Britannia was translated into English by P. Holland 1610; and by Bisbop Gibson in 1694, which translation was reprinted in 1722 and enlarged in 1732 and 1772. An enlarged translation was published by Gough in 3 vols., 1789. An edition of Camden's Works in 6 vols. was published in 1870.

Camden Society, The, was founded in 1838 for the purpose of printing ancient chronicles, documents, and memorials relating to English history and antiquities. It has published some 150 volumes, many of which are of the greatest importance, and are, indeed, indispensable to the historical student. The Camden Society's works bear especially upon the history of England under the Tudors and Stuarts. [Authorities.]

Cameron of Lochiel, "a gracious master, a trusty ally, a terrible enemy," was one of the staunchest adherents of James II. in the campaign of 1689. He was in command of the Camerons at Killiecrankie (q.v.), but after the death of Claverhouse he refused to serve under his successor, Cannon, the Irish commander, and retired to Lochaber. In 1692 he took the eaths to William III. with the other Highland chiefs.

Cameron, Richard (d. July 20, 1680), the founder of the Cameronians, was born at Falkland, in Fife, and was the son of a village tradesman. He entered the ministry and distinguished himself by his violent opposition to the restoration of episcopacy. He proceeded to still further lengths by the Sanquhar Declaration, by which he and his followers practically declared themselves rebels, and announced their intention of offering armed resistance to the government. In 1677, Cameron was compelled to fice to Holland; but in the spring of 1680 he returned, and was killed in the skirmish of Aird's Moss.

Cameronians, The, took their name from Richard Cameron, the author of the Sanquhar Declaration. They were sometimes called "Covenanters," from their rigid adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant, and afterwards "McMillahitos" (from their first minister after the Revolution) and "Mountain Men". Their creed considered as enemies to rightcourses.

Romanists, Episcopalians, and more especially those moderate Presbyterians who had accepted the indulgence of Charles II. Besides holding the binding obligation of the Covenant on the three kingdoms, they maintained the Westminster Confession, and the Scriptnres as the absolute rule of faith and conduct. The sect was not extinguished by the defeat of Aird's Moss, and the death of their leader. They issued a defiance to the royal authority, Oct. 28, 1684, and in return were proscribed and hunted by the royal troops. The Cameronians were most numerous in the wilder parts of south-western Scotland, where, on the accession of William III., their warlike temperament was utilised by the formation of the Cameronian Regiment. The Revolution secured for Scotland a Presbyterian church government; but many of the extreme Cameronians refused to swear allegiance to William III., or to attend the established places of worship. These Covenanting nonjururs became the "Reformed Presbyterians," or the "Old Presbyterian Dissenters," and formed a Presbytery and subsequently a synod in 1743. They founded numerous churches in England, Ireland, and America.

Campbell, The Family or, is, according to tradition, descended in the female line from the ancient kings or chiefs of Argyle, and from one of these, a certain Dlarmid, the clan is supposed to derive its name of Scol Diarmid, by which it was known in Erse and Gaelic. In the reign of Malcolm Canmore the name was changed to Campbell by the marriage of the heiress of the house with a person of that name. A Sir Colin Campbell, Lord of Lochow, was among the Scottish knights and barons summoned to the Council of Berwick in 1291. His son, Sir Neil Campbell, was a strong supporter of Robert Brnce, whose sister he married. His son, Sir Colin, received large grants of land in Argyleshire from King Robert and his successor. His grandson, Duncan, was made Chancellor of Scotland by James I., and raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell. The grandsonof this peer, Colin, was made Earl of Argyle in 1457. Archibald, the eighth earl, was created Marquis of Argyle in 1641; but was executed, and his honours for-feited in 1661. The earldom was restored to his son, Archibald, the ninth earl, in 1663, who was beheaded in 1685. His con, Archibald, was restored under William III., and created Duke of Argyle in 1701. [ARGYLE, PERRAGE OF.

d. 1861), descended from a junior branch of the ducal house of Argyle, was the son of Dr. George Campbell, minister of Oupar. He was educated at the Grammar School at Cupar, and at the University of St. Andrews, and was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn in 1896. In 1827 he obtained a silk gown, and in 1830-31 he represented Stafford in the House of Commons. In 1832 he was made Solicitor-General, and in February, 1834, was appointed Attorney-General. During his period of office he inaugurated several important law reforms, among which were the Act called Lord Campbell's Act for the amendment of the law of libel as it affects newspapers [Libel, Law or], and an Act limiting the power of arrest in cases of disputed debt. In June, 1841, he was raised to the peerage and received the Irish Chancellorship, which post be held for only sixteen days. In 1846 Lord Campbell joined the Whig cabinet as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he became Lord Chief Justice, and held that office till he was appointed Lord Chancellor of Great Britain by Lord Palmerston in 1859 Lord Campbell published, in 1849, The Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal of England, in seven volumes. He also wrote Lives of the Chief Justices. On the morning of Sunday, June 24th, 1861, he was found dead in his chair.

Campbell, John, LL.D. (b. 1708, d. 1775), was the writer of many nseful historical works which had a considerable reputation in the 18th century. He was largely concerned in the Ancient Universal History, and was editor of the Medern Universal History. He also wrote A Political Survey of Great Britain, 1772, and Lives of the Admirals, the latter of which is a careful and interesting work.

Campbell, SIR COLIN. [CLYDE, LORD.]

Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Herry, G.O.B. (b. 1836, d. 1908), educated at Glasgow University and at Trinity College, Cambridge, entered the House of Commons in 1868, and was Financial Secretary of the War Office 1871-74 and 1880-82. In 1882 he was appointed Secretary to the Admiralty; in 1884 Chief Secretary for Ireland; and in 1886, and again in 1892, War Secretary. In 1898 he led the Liberal Opposition in succession to Sir William Harcourt, and in 1905, on the resignation of Mr. Bulfour, became Prime Minister. At the general election in 1906 the Liberals obtained a striking victory, and Sir Henry was Premier until he resigned a short time previous to his death.

Camperdown, The Battle of (Oct. 11, 1797), was fought between the English and the Dutch. In the autumn of 1797 a great Dutch fleet was prepared to co-operate with the French in the invasion of Ireland, Oct. 9. The Dutch, under De Winter, weighed from the Texel: Admirat Duncan, who had been lying in Yarmouth Roads, crossel the German Ocean, and came in sight of the Dutch on the morning of Oct. 11th, nine miles from the coast, near Camperdown. At half-past eleven Duncan made the signal for the fleet to engage, and at twelve o'clock determined to pass through the enemy's line in two divisions and engage to leeward. But the weather was so hazy that the signal was not seen by many of the ships, which accordingly engaged in close action as each captain saw an opportunity. The two flag-ships passed through the line, followed by a few leading ships, while the others, for the most part, engaged the enemy to windward. The action was fought with the desperate stubbornness which had always been so marked a characteristic of the two nations. Do Winter in the Vrigheid assailed by the English admiral's ship and two others, after a desperate contest, surrendered, when he was totally dismasted, and had scarcely enough men left to fight his guns. One after another the Dutch ships followed his example, and it only remained for the British to secure the prizes before night set in. Eight of the Dutch ships, with over 6,000 prisoners, were taken. The English lost 1,040 and the Dutch 1,160 killed and wounded. In the action the English had 16 line-of-battle ships carrying 8,221 men, and the Dutch 16 line-of-battle ships carrying 7,157. The Dutch prizes were so shattered as to be quite useloss.

Campian, EDMUND (b. 1540, d. 1581), was born in London and educated at Oxford, where he became a Fellow of St. John's College; but having openly embraced the Catholic faith, to which he had long secretly inclined, suffered a short imprisonment. On his release he went to Cardinal Allen's college at Douay, where he became noted for his learning and virtues. His affability and high moral character made him an invaluable assistant to the Jesuits, and in June, 1581, he undertook a "missionary journey" to England, in company with Robert Parsons. Their zeal was such as to cause the Parliament of 1581 to pass the harsh statute against any one harbouring a Jesuit, and active measures were taken for the apprehension of the two missionaries. In July, 1581, Campian was taken at Lyferd, in Berkshire, and sent to the Tower, where he was tortured, in order to extort from him the names of Catholics who had given him shelter. He was then indicted for compassing and imagining the queen's death, and, after what appears to have been a very unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, Dec., 1581.

Camulodunum, a town of Celtic and Roman Britain, is now generally allowed to be identical with the modern Colchester. It became the capital of the Trinobantes under Cunobelin, or Cymbeline (q.v.). In 44 it was taken by Aulus Plautius, and in 60 was made a Roman volony. Two years later Boadicea and the Iceni captured and burnt the city and defeated Petilius Cerealis, but shortly afterwards, in the neighbourhood of Camulodunum, Snetonius Paulinus retrieved by a complete victory the honour of Rome.

Canada. Cape Breten Island and Nova Scotia, now part of the Dominion, were discovered by John Cabot in 1497, and claimed for England, but not formally occupied. In 1525 an expedition, sent out by Francis I., under the leadership of Giovanni Verrazano, a Florentine, took possession of the country, which had previously been claimed for England by Cabot, giving it the name of "La Nouvelle France." In 1541 another French expedition, under M. de Roberval, gave Canada its present name, mistaking the Indian word "kanata" (huts) for the native name of the country. In spite of various attempts on the part of England to establish her claim on Canada, the country remained in the hands of the French until 1763, when it was ceded to Great Britain by the terms of the Treaty of Paris. The Quebec Bill, passed in 1774, established the government of Canada, with a careful regard to the rights and feelings of the French inhabitants, and was tho means of securing the allegiance of the great mass of French Canadians, by whose aid the American invasion of Canada, in 1776, was easily repulsed. In 1790 the province of Canada was divided, at the suggestion of Pitt, into Upper (or Western) and Lower (or Eastern) Canada, mainly for purposes of representation, whilst the division also served to mark out the locality where the English and French elements respectively preponderated. Each province had a Governor and an Executive Council, a Legislative Council appointed by the crown, and a Representative Assembly appointed by the people. For some years after the establishment of the Houses of Assembly, there were frequent disputes between them and the Legislative Council, giving rise to such discontent that, in 1812, the Americans projected an invasion of Canada, under the impression that they would be joined by a large majority of the inhabitants. The Canadians, however, stood firmly by the British during the American War of 1812—15, and the attacks on East and West Canada were repulsed. On the conclusion of peace in March, 1815, the disputes again broke out, varying in degree according as the policy of the governors was conciliatory or the reverse. The grievances of the French or national party seem to have had real existence. The discontent among the French Canadians continued to increase. The refusal of the government to make any concessions at length brought matters to a crisis, and in 1837 a rebellion broke out in Lower Canada. This insurrection, though crushed almost at its first outbreak, laid still the effect of opening the eyes of the Home Government to the danger of neglecting any lenger the demands for reform which were being urged upon them by the French Canadians, and accordingly, in 1838, Lord Durham was sent out to Canada to report on the best method of adjusting the future government of the province. The result was the union of the two Canadas in 1840, from which time discontent and insurrection have been at an end. The changes introduced by the union were considerable. A single government was instituted, with a single parliament, consisting of a Legislative Council of twenty or more life members, and a Lower House of eighty-four deputies, appointed by popular election every four years. The reforms of 1840 were consolidated by Lord Elgin (1847), to whose practical and far-sighted administration of his office of Governor-General much of the prosperity of Canada is due. In 1856 the Upper House was made elective. In 1867 Canada and the other provinces of British North America we's united, under the title of the Dominion whole of British North America, with the exception of Newfoundland, includes the various provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and the North-Victories. The government of the Dorm, fon is exercised by a Governor-General, who is advised by a Privy Council; whilst there are two Legislative Chambers called the Senate and the House of Commons, the members of which meet at Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion and the seat of the Executive Government. The various provinces are administered by Lieutenant-Governors appointed by the Governor-General, and have separate chambers of legislature. The Province of Canada proper in the Dominion of Canada consists of the two districts of Ontario and Quebec, each having a provincial government, vested, in the case of Ontario, in a Lieutenaut-Governor and a Legislative Assembly of one hundred and six members elected for four years; in the case of Quebec, in a Lieutenantjovernor, a Legislative Assembly of seventyour members, and Executive and Legislative Councils appointed by the Governor. Since the constitution of the Dominion, the connection with England has become very slight.

A Supreme Court of Appeal for the Dominion was established in 1875, but in virtue of the Royal Prerogative the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council can consent to hear appeals from its decisions. A direct appeal to that Committee may also be made from the inferior Dominion and the Provincial Courts under certain conditions. The legal system in the older provinces is somewhat complicated, a din Quebec the old laws and customs of French Canada, founded on the jurisprudence of the Parliament of Paris, the edicts of the French kings, and the Civil Law, are still recognised by the courts for certain purposes. The area of the Dominion of Canada is about 3,700,000 square miles, and its population, which is increasing fast, is about 5,000,000, of whom over a million are of French descent.

Canning, George (b. 1770, d. 1827), was born in London, the son of a poor barrister. His mother, left in needly circumstances, went upon the stage, and afterwards married an actor. George was sent by his uncle, Stratford Canning, a London merchant, the father of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to Eton, where he had a brilliant career. Whilst at school he founded and contributed largely to a school magazine called The Microcosm. In 1787 he went to Oxford, where he attracted the attention of Pitt, and formed a close friendship with Mr. Jenkinson, afterwards Earl of Liverpool, which was of great service to him in later life. He was at thia time a Whig, devoted to Fox and Sheridan, and inclined to look favourably on the French Revolution. On leaving Oxford, he at first went to the bar, but in 1793 was induced to enter Parliament as taomier for Newport (Isle of Wight), and as a follower of Mr. Pitt. He spoke frequently during his first years in the House of Commons, and always as a supporter of the ministry. In 1796 he became member for Wendover and Underecretary for Foreign Affairs. In the autumn of 1797 he published, in conjunction with John Hookham Frere, Jenkinson, George Ellis, and Gifford, a satirical paper called The Anti-Jacobin. Some of Canning's contributions have taken a permanent place in lite. equal political rights to the Roman Catholics. When this measure failed, owing to the persistent opposition of the king, Canning left the government with his chief. Pitt was succeeded by Addington, who was assailed by Canning with untiring ridicule. "Pitt is to Addington," he said, "as London to Paddington." In 1799 he married the daughter of General John Scott, who brought him a large fortune. In 1804 he returned to office, with Pitt, as Treasurer of the Navy. On the death of Pitt in 1806, Fox came into office, and Canning had to retire. In March, 1807, he took office, under the Duke of Portland, as Minister for Foreign Affairs. In this capacity he executed the bold stroke of securing the Danish fleet lest it should fall into the hands of Napoleon (Sept., 1807). He also organised the assistance given by England to Spain against Napoleon, which eventually tended more than anything else to effect the emperor's downfali. He could not agree with Lord Castlewigh, the Secretary at War, and after the fadure of the disastrous Walcheren expedition, for which Castlereagh had been largely response sible, resigned his office. Castlereagh became aware that Canning had intrigued against him with the Duke of Portland, and challenged him to a duel. 'They met at Putney, and Canning was wounded in the shoulder. Canning's resignation of office was an event which long retarded his advancement. He remained a strong advocate of the Emancipation of the Catholics. After the murder of Perceval in May, 1812, Canning and Wellesley received the king's commands to form a ministry, but they were unable to come to terms with Grey and Grenville. Lord Liverpool became Prime Minister instead. Lord Liverpool offered him the post of Foreign Secretary, which Canning refused. In 1814 he went as ambassador to Portugal. Two years later his impatience of being out of office led him to accept the post of President of the Board of Control in Lord Castlereagh's cabinet. In this ministry he was forced to sanction measures of repression of which he could not approve. He agreed with his colleagues in their dislike of Parliamentary reform, but differed from them both with regard to the Emancipation of the Catholies and the harsh measures adopted towards the Princess of Wales. During the trial which followed at the accession of George Ill., Canning travelled abroad and refused the Home Office offered him by Liverpool. In November, 1820, he came to London, resigned office, and then returned to France. In 1822 the directors of the East India Company appointed him to succeed Lord Hastings as thovernor-General. He made all preparations for departure, and went down to Liverpool to take leave of his friends, when Lord Castlereagh (the Marquis of Londonderry, and Secretary for Foreign Affairs) suddenly committed suicide. Canning gave up the brilliant prospect of the Viceroyalty, and succeeded Londonderry. He now showed his resemblance to those English statesmen, who, like Chatham and Palmerston, have been able to sympathise with the aspirations of foreign Liberals. He supported constitutional prisciples against the reactionary efforts of Matternich He protested against the Congress of Venice, and against the intervention . France in the affairs of Spain. He opposed the policy of the Holy Alliance. He was the first to recognise the independence of the Spanish colonies in America as he said he "called a new world into existence to redress the balance of the old." He protected constitutional government in l'er tugal, and effected the severance of Portugal and Brazil. He still longed anxiously for the Emancipation of the Catholics, but this was temporarily hindered by the agitation of O'Connell, and a s not effected till two years after Canning's ath. He supported Huskisson in preparation the way for free trade, and laboured to effect the abolition of the slave trade. On the death of Lord Liverpool in Feb., 1827, Canning became Prime Minister. His last act was to a cure the liberation of Greece by the Treaty of London, July, 1827. He died on the following August 8th. Ilis death was felt as a shock to the whole of the civilised world, for he was the most prominent opponent of the system of reaction which was endeavor ing to stamp out sapir tions for liberty wherever they wer found.

George Canning, 3 vols., 1831, and George Canning and His Times, 1839. A further collection of Canning's Letters and Papers has been edited by Mr. P. Stapleton (1887). There is a brilliant sketch of his career in Lord Dalling's Historical Characters; and a brief Messour by Mr. F. Hill in the English Worthies agrees.

The activity of commercial nte prise which followed the re-establishment of peace led to a rush of private business in the House of Commons, and Mr. Manners Sntton showed great skill in dealing with it. When Farl Grey resigned in 1832, Manners Sutton assisted the Duke of Wellington to form his temporary ministry; this was apparently to oblige the king, who rewarded him with the order of the Bath. In 1834, when Lor Mellourne was suddenly dismissed from office, a rumour was started that Manners. utton was to be the Tory premier; and in consequence of this and of his active negotiations in forming the Peel ministry, the Whigs threw him out, and elected Mr. Abercromby Speaker in his place. In 1835 he was called to the Upper House.

Cantii, THE, were a British tribe, occupying a portion of the present county of Kent (which derives its name from them) and a part of Surrey. They were divided into four kingdoms, and were the most important of the peoples of botth-eastern England. From their proximate to Gaul, they seem likewise to have been the most civilised of all the nativo tribes at the time of Cesar's invasion.

In 1236 he became Bishop of Worcester, when he boldly resisted the exactions of the Pope. Cantilupe, Sr. Thomas de (d. 1282), the nephew of Walter de Cantilupe, was a man greatly respected for his picty and learning. In 1265 he was appointed Chancelior by Simon de Montfort, but relinquished the office in the same year, after the battle of Evesham. He is remarkable as being the last Englishman who was canonised.

Canton was first visited by the English about 1634. From 1689 to 1834 the East India Company had a monopoly of the trade with that port. In 1841, during the first China War, Canton surrendered to Sir Hugh Gough, and the following year foreigners were granted permission to settle in the town. In 1856, after the affair of the lorcha Arrow, war was declared between England and China, and Cauton was bombarded by the English. The bombardment led to an exciting debate in the House of Commons (beginning Feb. 26, 1857), in which men of all parties strongly condemned the action of Lord Palmerston's government, and a motion, proposed by Mr. Cobden and seconded by Mr. Milner Gibson, was carried against the ministry by a majority of 16. Canton was occupied by the English and French in Dec., 1857, and held, under English and French Commissioners, till October, 1861.

Can'te (called Cnut in the English of his own day-a word that Pope Paschal II. could not pronounce, and therefore Latinised into Canútus), King (b. circa 995, s. 1017, d. 1035), was the younger son of Swegen, or Sweyn, King of Denmark, and the first foreign conqueror of all England. connection with England began in 1013, when, being still a lad in years, he accompanied his father on the great expedition that forced the English to take Sweyn as their king and drove Ethelred into exile. Young as he was, his father entrusted him with the command of the fleet and the care of the hostages when starting on his southward march from Gainsborough, But a few months later (Candlemas, 1014) Sweyn ended his days: and the Danish fleet, with one voice, chose Canute as his successor. By his father's death he became, for a time, a landless viking, a splendid adventurer; for tho English at once restored their native king to the throne, and the Danish crown fell to Swoyn's elder con Harold. Caught unprepared by a sudden march of Ethelred, ho sailed away from Linuscoy, cut off the hands, ears, and noses of the hostages, put the wretches ashore at Sandwich, and went off to Denmark. Next year (1015) he was back again at Sandwich with a powerful fleet and Coasting round to Poole Bay, he army landed his men, and in a few months was master of Wessex. The first days of 1016 saw him in Mercia also; his burnings and ravagings soon compelled submission; at Easter he was getting ready to lay siege to London, the only part of England that still deticd his power. But at this moment the death of Ethelred, and the accession of his vigorous son Edmund to the command of the national cause, gave a new turn to the conflict. Inside London, Edmund was chosen king; outside, Canute; and a fierco and chequered struggle between the rivals began. Edmund rallied the men of Wessex to his standard; there were two Danish sieges of Loudon, both unsuccessful; five minor battles, four of which are given as English victories, one as doubtful; and one last great battle, that of Assandun, in Essex (Ashington or Ashdon). This was a terrible, seemingly a crushing, But while this ovorthrow of Edmund, triumph assured Canute a kingdom in England, it failed to tear Wessex from the indomitable Edmund. At Olney, in the Severn, the rivals camo together, and agreed on a division of the land between them which made the Thames the common boundary of their dominions. This compact had, however, but a brief trial. On St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) Edmund died; and in 1017 Canute was accepted as king of the whole kingdom (1017 -1035). His reign was comparatively uneventful. Ho begun it hy dividing the realm into four earldoms, giving two of them to Danes, a third to Edric, the treacherous Englishman, and keeping Wessex under his own immediate rule. He put away his Danish wife and married Emma, King Ethelred's widow, a lady nearly double his age. He slew the one son of Ethelred who was within his reach, Edwy, and sent the two little sons of his dead antagonist to Norway, to be made away with there. He had three other Englishmen of high rank put to death, and soon took the same course with the traitor Edric. Next year (1018) he wrung from the country a payment of £83,000 to satisfy his fleet, the bulk of which thereupon carried his army back to Denmark. Having thus established his throne, he entered upon the line of conduct that has gained him the good word of modern historians, purposing henceforward to rule England for the English and by the English. One by one the leading men of Danish birth were removed from England or slain, and their places given to Englishmen. Thus the famous Godwin and renowned Leofric came to hold posts of the highest trust; indeed, little, Cannte handed over to the after a former his own special care, the earldom of Wessex. He confirmed the laws of King Edgar, who had made no distinction between the Danish and purely English parts of his kingdom, treating all his subjects as members of the same body politic. He sought to gain the favour of the people by religious foundations, by gifts to monasteries and churches, by doing reverence to the saints and holy places they revered, by preferring the church-men they honoured, and by many other gracious and politic acts. Though other countries demanded his care, he bestowed the largest share of his time and attention on England, making her interests his peculiar concern. We are told that he even placed English bishops in Danish sees, and brought English workmen to instruct his Danish subjects in their handicrafts. And in England itself he seems to have favoured Wessex most. Nor is this strange. It is true that he was supreme lord of many lands; Harold's death in 1018 gave him Denmark; Norway he conquered in 1028; in 1031 he invaded Scotland, and made King Maleolm admit his superiority; Sweden is also re koned among his vassal kingdoms. But no one of these could in real worth compare with England; and of England, Wessex was the fairest portion. In 1027 he made a journey to Rome, and wrote from thence a letter to his English people, full of penitence for the past, good promises for the future, and lofty moral sentiment. He was in high esteem among foreign princes; his sister Edith married Robert, the Norman duke; his daughter Gunhild, King Henry III. of Germany. He died at Shafte: Lury in November, 1035, perhaps still under forty years of age. Canute has been greatly praised by some modern historians. Dr. Stubbs reckons him among the "conscious creators of English greatness." Mr. Freeman's judgment of his policy and character is exceedingly favourable. Clearly his rule brought many blessings to England; under it she enjoyed long unbroken peace, a firm, yet humane, administration of the laws, and a comparative freedom from vexations imposts and oppressiens. In his later years he issued a body of laws which testify to his preservation, in full integrity, of the national constitution, to his regard for religion, to his strict impartiality, and respect for the people's rights. The quiet that settled down on the land may, perhaps, be explained in part by his institution of the Hisearls, a permanent force of fighting-men, 3,000 or 6,000 in number, owing obedience to a military code—the earliest approach to a standing army in England. Not without reason did the common folk cherish his memory, if only by repeating simple tales of his sayings and doings.

Cape Breton, which lies to the cast of Nova Scotia, and is now incorporated with it, was first discovered by Cabot in 1497, but remained practically uninhabited until 1714, when it was occupied by the French for fishing purposes; a few years later the town of Louisbourg was built, and the French established a regular settlement on the island, which formed a convenient basis for hostilities against Nova Scotia. In 1744, an attack was made upon Port Royal, the capital of Nova Scotia, by Do Quesnay, the Governor of Cape Breton; the English, in retaliation, attacked and took Louisbourg, and held Cape Breton until the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1758 Louisbourg was again taken by the English under the command of Admiral Boscawen and General Volfe, and all its fortifications destroyed. A few years afterwards, Cape Breton was created a separate colony, and Sydney, its present capital, was founded in 1820. However, it was incorporated with Nova Scotia, and has ever since that time remained a county.

Capgrave, John (b. 1393, d. 1464), was Prior of Lynnin Norfolk, and provincial of the order of Augustinian Friars in England. He wrote a Chronicle of England extending from the creation to the year 1417, and a work entitled The Book of the Illustrious Henries, which contains the lives of great men who have borne the name of Henry. Capgrave is one of our few contemporary authorities for the early part of the lifteenth century and reign of Henry VI., and his works are of some value. His Chronicle and Book of the Illustrious Henries have been edited, in the Rolls Series, by Mr. F. C. Hingeston.

Caradoc (Caractacus) (d. circa 54). A British chief, said to have been son of Cunobelin or Cymbeline. At the head of the Silurians of the West, Caradoc carried on a struggle of nine years against the Romans under Vespasian and Plautius. After sustaining frequent defeats, he was at length driven out of his own district and compelled to take refuge with the Brigantes, whose queen, (artismandua (q.v.), delivered him up to Ostorius Scapula (A.D. 51). He was carried in chains to Rome, where his dignity and noble bearing are said to have induced the Emperor Claudius to order his release. His subsequent history is unknown.

Carausius (d. 293) was a native of Batavia, and the first "Comes Littoris Saxonici." In this office he managed to accumulate great wealth, and, in 286, with the aid of some Frankis, warriors, seized the great naval station of Gesoriacum, and proclaimed himself one of the Emperors of Rome. His talents enabled him to keep this position and maintain his power in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his own officer, Allectus.

Carberry Hill (near Musselburgh) is the place where the forces of Bothwell and Queen Mary met those of the Confederate Lords, June 14, 1567. There was no actual collision, but Bothwell, seeing that his chances of victory were almost hopeless, made his escape, while Mary surrendered herself to Kirkcaldy of Grange.

Car

Cardwell, EDWARD, VISCOUNT (b. 1813, d. 1886), was educated at Winchester, and Balliol College, Oxferd, where he was elected fellow. He entered Parliament in 1842 as member for Clitheroe. He supported Sir R. Peel in the financial changes of 1845-46. He was Secretary to the Treasury from 1845-46, and President of the Board of Trade in Lord Aberdeen's administration. In 1859 he accepted the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland under Lord Palmerston, and was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from 1861 to 1864, when he became Secretary of State for the Colonies. In Dec., 1868, he became Secretary for War under Mr. Gladstone. In this capacity his name is associated with a very important reform of the British army. The increased demands of India, the striking success of the Prussian army reserve system in the war with Austria (1866) and the Franco-German War of 1870, combined to suggest the need of an increased army reserve. Mr. Cardwell provided this by shortening the term of service to twelve years—six "with the colours," six in the reserve; and "linked" the existing battalions in pairs, assigning to each pair, as a recruiting-ground, some county or district with which they had usually a traditional connection. A "military centre," or depôt, was formed for each such district, and the Militia and Volunteers also associated with it. It was during his tenure of office (in 1871) that the purchase of commissions, after the House of Lords had refused to abolish it, was done away with by royal warrant. He completed the competitive system in the army. His reforms, which destroyed the historical associations of the old (numbered) regiments, were violently opposed, but have since been fully justified. In 1374 he resigned with his colleagues, and was made a peer.

Carew, SIR GEORGE (d. 1613 f), secretary to Sir Christopher Hatton, was sent by Elizabeth as her ambassador to Poland, 1597, and by James I. to France, 1605—9. His Relation of the State of France was printed by Dr. Bird in 1749.

Carew, Sir Peter (d. 1575), of Mohun Ottory, in Devonshire, spent his boyhood at the court of France, and on his return to England entered the service of Henry VIII. On the outbreak of the Western rebellion, iu 1549, Sir Peter and his brother were sent down to Devonshire with orders to crush the insurgents; they were, however, unable to make head against them until the arrival of reinforcements under Lord Russell and Lord Grey; in fact, the violence of the Carew party was said by Somerset to have widely extended the rebellion. After the defeat of the insurgents, Carew espoused the cause of Mary, whom he proclaimed in Devonshire, 1553. Very soon afterwards, however, he joined tho anti-Spanish party, and was entrusted with the task of raising Devonshire, while Sir Thomas Wyatt was to raise Kent. His action, however, in the rebellion of 1549 had made him so unpopular with the country people that he was unable to do anything effectual against the government, and was compelled to seek an asylum in France for the remainder of Mary's reign. In 1560, Carew was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the Treaty of Leith (q.v.), and in the same year was entrusted with a mission to reorganise the army in Scotland. A few years later bir Peter became one of the colonists of Munster, where many cruelties are attributed to him. He joined the expedition of Essex in 1675, but died the same year.

Carew's Life, by John Vowel, was edited by Mr. Maclean, Lond., 1857.

Cargill, Donald, one of the most extreme of the Covenanting clergy, was a chief promoter of the Sanquhar Declaration, 1680. For having excommunicated Charles II. and the Duke of York, he was, on his capture at Glasgow, taken to Edinburgh and executed, July 26, 1681. [Cameronians.]

Carleton, SIR DUDLEY. [DORCHESTER, LORD.]

Carleton, Guy. [Dorchester, Lord.]

Carleton, HENRY BOYLE, 1st BARON (d. 1725), was a leading Whig politician. In 1701 he was created Lord Chancellor and Under Treasurer of the Exchequer. He was one of those who opposed the "tacking" of the Occasional Conformity Bill. He was employed by Godolphin to request Addison to write a poem on the battle of Blenheim; the result of his negotiations being The Campaign. In 1707 he was made Secretary of State. He was one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial, and in consequence of that ill-advised step was compelled to resign his office. On the accession of George I., Boyle was raised to the peerage, and created Lord President of the Council, an office he held until his death. "He was," says Budgell, "endowed with great prudence and winning address; his long experience in public affairs gave him a thorough knowledge of business.'

Budgell's Lives of the Boyles.

Carlisle was probably a Roman station, and has been identified with Luguvalium in the Itinerary of Antoninus, from which, indeed, the name has been derived—Caer-Luel. The town was sacked by the Danes in 875, and rebuilt with a strong castle by William Rufus. It was held by the Scots during their tenure of Cumberland, and the beginning of the great church of St. Mary's is attributed to David I., King of Scotland. Subsequently it was frequently besieged in the course of the border wars, one of the most celehrated sieges being the unsuccessful one by William the Lion (1173). The place surrendered to Charles Edward in 1745, and the mayor and corporation proclaimed him king. The cathedral, begun in the reign of William Rufus, was partly destroyed by Cromwell in 1648.

Carliele, George William, 7th Earl of (b. 1802, d. 1864), was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1826 he accompanied his uncle, the Duke of Devonshire, on his visit to Russia at the coronation of the Emperor Nicholas. He was afterwards returned to the House of Commons for the family seat of Morpeth, and one of his earliest speeches was in defence of the character of the Russian emperor. During the agitation of the Reform Bill he enlisted on the side of Earl Grey, and on the dissolution of l'arliament which followed the success of General Gascoyne's motion, he was returned for Yorkshire, which seat he held till the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832. He was Chief Secretary for Ireland from 1835 to 1841, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from 1849 to 1851. In 1855 he became Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and began a career of popularity almost without parallel among Irish viceroys. A change in the government removed him for a short time; but he returned again in 1859, and held this office till the summer of 1864, when illness compelled him to lay it down.

Carlisle, Lucy, Countess of (b. 1599, d. 1660), was the daughter of Henry Perry, ninth Earl of Northumberland. In 1617 sne was married to the Earl of Carlisle, who died in 1636. She was a favourite attendant of Queen Henrietta Maria, and is supposed to have been Strafford's mistress. After his death she became the confidente, and it was said the mistress, of Pym, to whom she betrayed all the secrets of the court, and it was by her that he was made acquainted with the king's desire to arrest the Five Members in Januar 1642. In 1648 she seems to have assisted the Royalists with money towards raising a fleet to attack England, and on the Restoration she was received at court, and employed herself in intriguing for the return of Queen Henrietta to England, which was opposed by Clarendon 37 thers. Very soon after the queen's return alied suddenly.

Carlisle, The Second of (1307), passed by Edward I. in Parlian ont, after he had previously obtained the consent of the barons to it in 1305, was intended to prevent the drain of English gold to Rome hy clerical exactions. It forbade the payment of tallages on monastic property, and render a lillegal other imposts by which money was to be sent out of the country. Though never acted upon, this statute is most important as the precedent on which the Acts of Provisors and Premunire and the whole series of anti-papal assertions of English independence were based.

Carlow, the seat of one of the great castles founded by the Norman conquerors of Ireland, was often taken and retaken in the rebellion of 1641. In July, 1650, it was occupied by the Royalists, and after a short siege taken by the Parliamentarians, under Sir Hardress Waller. On May 25, 1798, a akirmish took place between the royal trocard and the rebels, of whom 400 were killed.

Carnaryon, Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, 4th Earl of (b. 1831, d. 1890), was Colonisl Under Secretary of State in Lord Derhy's second administration, 1858—9, and Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Derby's third administration, 1866. Ho resigned on account of a difference of opinion respecting Parliamentary Reform, in 1867. In Mr. Disraeli's cabinet in 1874 he was again Colonial Secretary. In 1878 he resigned upon the Eastern question. In 1885 he became Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Lord Salisbury's first administration, resigning in January, 1886. Here his policy was conciliatory, and he even secretly approached Parnell on the subject of Home Rule. But in this, as he subsequently made clear, he did not profess to speak for his colleagues.

Carnatic was the name formerly given to the district in south-eastern India extending along the coast from the Guntoor Circar to Cape Comorin. In the middle of the eighteenth century the country was governed by the Nabob of the Carnatic at Arcot. It was cut up, however, in the south by the Mahratta kingdom of Tanjore, the British and French settlements, and the almost independent districts of the Polygars of Madura, Tinnevelly, &c. It was feudally subject to the Viceroy, or Nizam, of the Deccan. 1743 Anwur-ud-Deen was appointed Nabob by the Nizam-ul-Mulk. On his death the succession was disputed between Chunda Sahib, who was assisted by the French, and Mohammed Ali, who was supported by the English. The latter succeeded in establishing their nominee as Nabob over the greater part of the Carnatic; but both he and his son, Omdut-ul-Omrah, who succeeded in 1795, The failed to regain their independence. discovery of their correspondence with Tippoo Sahib (q.v.) determined Lord Wel-lesley on annexing the country. On the death of Omdut-ul-Omrah, therefore, an arrangement was made (1801) with Azimul-Omrah, his nephew, to the effect that the entire civil and military government of the state should be resigned to the Company, and Carne, Sie Edward (d. 1561), was a graduate of Oxford, where he became Doctor of Civil Law in 1524. He was frequently employed as envoy to various foreign princes by Henry VIII. In 1530 he was sent by the king to Reme to argue against the citation of Henry to appear at the Papal Court. He frequently represented the English sovereign at Rome under Mary, and in the earlier years of Elizabeth's reign; but was finally detained by Paul IV. at Rome, and compelled to become governor of the English Hospital there. This was declared to be a gross violation of the privilege of an ambasador; but it is probable that Sir Edward, who disliked the religious changes of Elizabeth, was a willing captive.

Caroline, Queen (b. 1683, d. 1737), wife of King George II., was the daughter of John Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg Anspach. In the year 1705 she married Prince George of Hanover, over whom, in spite of his immerality, she maintained the greatest influen during his life. During the quarrels of her husband and his father, she retained her influence over the first without forfeiting the esteem of the second. In 1727 she was crowned with her husband. When Walpole was displaced from power, at the commencement of the reign, she espoused his cause, being persuaded of his financial abilities, and attracted by the jointure of £100,000 a year he secured in her favour. She therefore persuaded the king that Compton was unfitted for the post of minister. During her life she continued the firm friend of Walpole, and upheld his policy of peace at home and abroad. She was deeply mortified when he was obliged to relinquish his Excise scheme. In 1737 she reprieved Porteous, who was cendemned for firing on the crowd at Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the quarrel between Frederick, Prince of Wales, and her husband, she violently espoused the cause of the latter. In consequence, sho and her son were on extremely bad terms, and the queen often expressed a wish for the prince's death. Her influence over the king continued unimpaired till the end of her life, and on her death-bed the monarch gave a rather curious testimony of it. The dying queen besought her husband to marry again. "Non," answered the sobbing prince, "j'aurai des maîtresses." "Oh, mon Dicu!" was the reply; "cela n'empêche pas." Caroline was a woman of considerable intellectual ability. She knew something of philosophy and theology, and affected the character of patroness of literature and poetry. She took creditable pains to get the higher posts in the Church filled by men of learning and character. She was a valuable ally of Walpole, and materially assisted him in carrying cut his policy.

The best account of the queen is gained from Hervey's Memoirs. See also Horace Walpole, Memoirs, and Stanhope, Hist. of Eng.

Caroline of Brunswick, Queen, wife of George IV. (b. 1768, d. 1821), was the daughter of Duke Charles William Frederick of Brunswick, who died after the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, 1806, and sister of Duke William Frederick, who was killed at the battle of Ligny, 1815. Her mother, Augusta, was daughter of Prince Frederick of Wales, and sister of George III. At the age of twenty-seven the princess was married to George, Prince of Wales, afterwards Regent and king. A more unfortunate choice could net have been madc. The prince was already married to Mrs. FitzHerbert, and although that marriage was considered void under the Royal Marriage Act, he was averse to contracting any other similar tic. The princess had been badly brought up, was clever, but uneducated and undisciplined, im-pulsive and indiscreet, with a good heart, but devoid of regulating judgment. The marriage took place on April 8, 1795. A daughter, afterwards Princess Charlotte of Wales, was born on January 7, 1796. Even before this the prince had treated his wife so badly as to call forth a remonstrance from his father. He now wrote, on April 30, 1796, to say that they were to live apart. This repudiation of his wife without any reason except personal dislike, within a year of their marriage, is sufficient to account for, and almost to excuse, any conduct of which she might afterwards have been guilty. Matters remained thus for the next ten years. The princess lived quietly at Blackheath. In the year 1806 rumours were set afloat that the conduct of the princess had been improper. She always had a fancy for children, and before her death had adopted half-a-dozen. At this time she had adopted a child named William Austin, and scandal said she was his mother. A delicate investigation was ordered, evidence was laboriously collected, and a report laid before the king. The report acquitted the princess of improper conduct, but seemed to fix upon her the charge of indiscretion. Assisted by Perceval and others, she vigorously defended herself, and was entirely acquitted by a Minute of Council in 1807. Princess Charlotte of Wales was heir to the crown. As a child she had been allowed to see her mother regularly, but as she was growing up the permission began to be refused. Canning and Brougham arrayed themselves on the side of Caroline. She had the whole force of popular opinion with her, for the prince was very much disliked, and the wrongs of the princess were calculated to naina teuch the heart of the multitude. The queen took a strong dislike to her, and about 1813 she was forbidden to attend the royal drawing-room. In June, 1814, she went abroad, with an allowance of £35,000 a year. She went first to Brunswick, and then to Switzerland and Italy. Her conduct was very eccentric, and her suite gradually left her, upon which she fell into the hands of an Italian family named Bergami. She went to Jerusalem, and then returned to Italy, living at the Villa d'Este, on the Lake of Como. On January 29, 1820, George IV. succeeded to the throne, and his wife assumed the title of queen. Before this a commission had been sent out to Milan to collect evidence of the queen's conduct during her sojourn at the Villa d'Este. The king ordered her name to be omitted from the Liturgy, and forbade royal honours to be paid her at foreign courts. The queen, finding herself thus treated at Rome. determined to come to England. Immediately after her arrival steps for bringing her to trial were taken. On November 6 a Bill of Pains and Penalties, the proceedings in connection with which are popularly known as the Queen's "trial," was passed in the House of Lords by a majority of twenty-six, but on the third reading the majority was only nine, and it was with-drawn. This result was received with general delight throughout the country. On November 29 the queen went in procession to St. Faul's, to return thanks for her deliverance from a great peril and affliction. In the next session of Parliament she accepted a pension of £50,000 a year from the government, and from that time her popularity gradually declined. In 1821 George IV. determined to be crowned with great pomp in Westminster Hall. The queen claimed, according to ancient precedent, to share the ceremony with him. At an early hour on the morning of the coronation the queen set out with a coach and six. She had no ticket of admittance, and was repulsed by the officials. As she retreated the jeers of the crowd followed her. This was on July 19, and she died on August 7. However much she may have been deficient in moral dignity, we may feel convinced that there was no foundation for the grave charges brought against her character; and for the lighter indiscretions of her life her education and the treatment of her husband are quite sufficient both to account and to atone.

Carstares, William (b. 1649, d. 1715), was educated at Utrecht, where he became acquainted with William III. He was accused of being implicated in the Rye House Plot, and was tortured at Edinburgh. After the Revolution, he acquired great influence with William, to whom he acted as a sort of unofficial secretary for Scotch affairs. The king appointed Carstares his chaplain in Scotland. In 1704 he became Principal of Edinburgh University, and was one of the active supporters of the Union. "Sprung of that respectable middle class," says Mr. Burton, "to whom it has been in a manner the peculiar pride of the Scots priesthood to belong, he rose to hold in his hands the destinies of the proudest heads of the proud feudal houses of Scotland." Carstares was a man of undoubted ability, and is honourably distinguished among the public men of his age by his firmness and honesty. A volume of his State Papers and Letters was published in 1774, and is of considerable value as illustrating Scottish affairs during Se Revolution.

Carte, Thomas (b. 1686, d. 1754), born at Clifton, studied at Oxford, and entered the Church. He was a strong partisan of the Stuarts. He declined to take the oath to George I., and abandoned the priesthood: and, being suspected of complicity in the Jacobite plots of 1715 and 1722, he was obliged to flee to France, where he resided for twelve years. He was the author of a Life of James, Duke of Ormonde, 3 vols. folio; and a History of England to the year 1654. Both are valuable works, showing much learning and industry on the part of the author, though his strong Stuart partisanship is very marked, especially in the life of Ormonde.

Carthusians, The, one of the regular monastic orders, was an offshoot of the Benedictines, instituted at Chartreuse near Grenoble, by Bruno of Cologne, in 1080. The rule resembled that of the Benedictines, but was much more rigorous and austere. The Carthusians came into England about 1180; but they failed to make much way in the country. There were only nine monasteries of the order in England: the Charterhouse (the name, of course, is a corruption for Chartreuse) in London, and those at Witham, Henton, Beauval, St. Anne's Coventry, Kingston-on-Hull, Mountgrace, Eppworth, and Shene. There were no Carthusian nunneries in England.

Cartismandua wss the Queen of the Brigantes, from whom Caractacus, after his defeat by the Romans (A.D. 51), sought shelter and assistance, and by whom he was treacherously betrayed to his enemies. [Carapoc.] According to Tacitus, Cartismandus quitted her husband, Venusius, and married his armourbearer, Vellocatus. Venusius drove her from her territories, and forced her to seek an saylum

Cartwright, Thomas (b. 1535, d. 1603), the leader of the Church of England party in Elizabeth's reign which advocated the ubolition of episcopacy, was educated at Cambridge, whence he was compelled to withdraw during the Marian persecution. On the accession of tion of episcopacy, was educated at Cambridge, whence he was compelled to withdraw during the Marian persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned, and acquired great reputation as a preacher, becoming so active a supporter of a Presbyterian polity and so determined an opponent of episcopacy that he was prohibited from occupying the pulpit, and expelled from the university. In 1572 he published his Admonition to Parliament (q.v.), and was drawn into a long controversy with Archbishop Whitgift. In 1584 he was imprisoned by order of Bishop Aylmer, but released by the queen. In 1590, after the death of his patron, Leicester, Cartwright was examined by the Court of Star Chamber, and sent to the Fleet Prison, "for setting up a new discipline and a new form of worship," remaining in confinement for nearly two years.

Carucage was a tax on every carucate or hundred acres of land, and was first imposed over the whole country by Richard I. in 1198, when the tax was five shillings. John, in the first year of his reign, fixed it at three shillings. A carucate was originally as much land as could be ploughed by one team in a season, but it afterwards became fixed at one hundred acres.

Cashel, The Synod of (1172), was a great assembly of the Irish Church, attended by all the archbishops and bishops. The ecclesiastical disorders, which had formed one at least of the canses which led to the Bull of Popo Adrian, and the invasion of Ireland by Henry II., were condemned. Thus the marriage of the clergy was forbidden, the tithe introduced, the appropriation of benefices by laymen, and levying of cashery on the clergy abolished. In other ways, too, the Roman discipline and the authority of the Pope were recognised.

Casket Letters are a celebrated collection of documents, supposed to be the correspondence between Bothwell and Mary Stuart. Bothwell left in Edinburgh Castle a casket containing some papers, for which he sent after his flight from Carberry Hill. His messenger was intercepted whilst returning, and the casket and its contents fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton. On a letter from the queen to Bothwell contained in it, the charge that she was an accomplice in Darnley's murder was founded. The letters were laid before the Scotch Council of Government, and the Scotch Parliament adjudged the charge proved (Dec. 1567). They were again produced before the English Commissioners at Westminster, compared with other writings of the queen's, with which they corresponded (Dec., 1568). The letters descended from one Scottish regent to another, and finally passed into the hands of the Earl of Gowrie. After his execution (1584) they disappeared. They had, however, translated into different languages and published. Mary continually asserted them to be forgeries, and demanded first to see the originals, then to be provided with copies. Neither of these requests was granted. An argument in favour of the theory that the letters were forgeries is furnished by the fact that the two most criminatory letters wore evidently originally written in Scotch, and the copies published were a translation of this Scotch original into French. But Mary, nntil after her flight into England, always used the French language in her letters. Therefore the conclusion is that she could not have written these letters. But the question of the genuineness of non-existent documents is naturally difficult to solve. Amongst English historians, Froude, Burton, and Laing believo the letters genuine; Caird and Hosack take the opposite view. Of foreign writers on the subject, Ranke, Pauli, Mignet, and Gaedeko accept the letters, whilst ern, Philippson, Gauthier, and Chantelauze, _eny their authen-

Cassivellaunus (Caswallon), at the time of Cæsar's second invasion of Britain (B.C. 54), was chief of the Cassi, and had shortly before usurped the sovereignty of the Trinobantes and murdered the lawful king. The Roman invasion drove the tribes of the southeast of Britain to form a league, at the head of which Cassivellaunus was placed. For a short time he succeeded in repelling the Romans, but his stronghold being captured, and the other tribes having deserted him, he submitted to Cæsar, gavo up the country of the Trinobantes to Mandubratius, son of the late king, and contented himself with keeping his own domains. After the departure of Cæsar we hear nothing more of Cæsaivellaunus.

Castillon, The Battle of (1453), was the last engagement in the Hundred Years' War between England and France. In 1452 the Gascons rose against the French, and besought aid from England. Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent out, and was at first very successful. In June, 1453, hearing that the French were besieging Castillou, a fortress on the Dordogne, he marched with a small force to relieve it, but the French were stronger than he imagined, and he was defeated and slain. With his death all the hopes of the English were at an end.

Castlebar Races (1798). The name given to the engagement fought near Castlebar on August 26, 1798, during the French raid on Ireland. Generals Lake and Hutchinsou, with 2,000 Irish militia, a large body of yeomanry, and Lord Roden's fencibles, advanced against General Humbert, who had landed at Killala on the 17th of the month. Humbert had with him 800 French troops, and about 1,000 of the Irish rebels. The militia, however, would not stand their ground, and at once ran; and the yeomanry following, Lake's guns were taken, 'nd Roden's horse were unable to save the day. Of Lake's men fifty-three were killed and thirty-four wounded; the French loss was heavier, but they took fourteen guns and 200 prisoners, and the town of Castlebar fell into the hands of the insurgents, with whom it remained for about a fortnight, till the surrender of Humbert at Ballinamuck, on September 8th.

Castlereagh, VISCOUNT. [LONDON-DERRY.]

Castles, of which there are remains of nearly 500 in England alone, belong chiefly to the period between the Norman Conquest and the middle of the fourteenth century. It is true that strong places were fortified by Alfred and his successors; but these would rarely be more than a mound and a ditch, with wooden tower and palisade; and Domesday, which mentious forty-nine castles, gives only one stone castle, viz., Arundel, as existing under the Confessor. They were a Norman product, even when as at Hereford and Warwick, strong earthworks in place of masonry show that the Norman builder used an existing English fortress. They are identical in type with the great castles of Normandy, and keep pace with them in development. Thus the essential point of the Norman castle is the massive rectangular keep, with walls as much as 20 feet thick, and, as at Rochester, over 100 feet high, with its stairs, chapel, chambers, kitchen, well—making it complete in itself as a last resort. The base court in the castles built immediately after the Norman Conquest (e.g., Oxford, London, Newcastle) was for some years left to the protection of a stockade. When this was replaced by circuit walls, with strong gatehouse, we have complete the Norman system of fortification by solid works of great passive strength. The "Edwardian" castle (e.g., Carnarvon) exhibits a system, which completely superseded this, of concentric works, with skilful arrangement of parts, so as to include a far larger area. Such a castle as Bamborough could accommodate a large garrison with stores, horses, and cattle, and could be stormed only in detail. The duke in Normandy had exercised the right of holding a garrison in the castles of his barons, and the Norman kings of England ealously maintained the requirement of a royal licence for their erection. Of the forty-nine in Domesday, thirty were built by the Conqueror himself. In the anarchy of Stephen's days, 375 were built, or, according to Ralph de Diceto, 1,115. Henry II., on his accession, had to besiege and recover for the crown the "adulterine" castles; and after the revolt of 1173 it became a definite policy of the crown to keep down their numbers, and have a voice in the appointment of castellans. One of the first steps of the barons of 1258 was to sub-stitute nineteen of themselves for the alien favourites as guardians of the royal castles, and the last stand of the defeated party was made in De Montfort's castle of Kenilworth from Oct., 1265, to Dec., 1266. After this tho castles ceased to be a menace to royal power. The Edwardian castles were chiefly national defences on the coast or the Welsh and Scotch Marches. The number of licences to "crenel-late and tenellate" rises to its height in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III.; tho Commons in 1371 even petition that leave to do this may be given freely for all men's houses and for the walls of boroughs. But these were castellated mansions rather than true castles. In them the keep sinks to a guardhouse, the walls are less solid, the windows are adapted to convenience rather than defence. However, under the Stuarts such fortified mansions proved capable of tanding a siege. But the last castles are not later than Tudor times, and even the "Peel" towers, for defence against the Scots, fell into ruin after the union of the kingdoms. The castles had been a heavy cost and trouble to the crown. Bridgmorth alone had cost in repairs £213 during Henry II.'s reign; the Constable of Bridgnorth besides was paid 40 marks salary; and the jurors of 1258 declared it required £20 a year to keep it up in time of peace. The tenure of castle guard, at the rate of forty days' service for a knight's fee, commuted often for a mark on the fee, was a burden vexatious both to nobles and entry. Some castles, like Lancaster and Richmond, were associated with a quasi-royal jurisdiction over the district. In others the lords would be only too ready to arrogate such rights. Many, no doubt, like Bridgnorth, served as centres of tyranny, even when in royal hands. And this tendency probably accounts for the frequent changes made by the crown in the persons chosen as royal constables, and for the fact that Edward I. finds it necessary, even after Henry II.'s determined assertion of royal rights, to make the Que Warranto inquiry into the jurisdictions claimed by each of his barons.

Stephen's reign :- "They filled the land full of castles, and when they were finished, filled them with devils and ovil men; . . . then they tortured men and women for their gold and silver; . . . then plundered they and burned all the towns; . . . they spared neither church nor churchyard; . . . they robbed the menks and the clergy; . . the earth bare no corn; the land was all ruiued by such deeds; and it was said openly that Christ slept and His saints."
The castles of England, on many sides illustrate the national history. Berkeley has its story of royal tragedy, Kenilworth of constitutional struggle, Carlisle of border romance. The names of Montgomery and Balliol and Granville recall the baronial families who brought into England the titles of their Norman castles. And the immense households which the later spirit of chivalry gathered tegether into Alnwick, or Lancaster, or Warwick made the castle of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries a local centre of vast social influence, even when the days of its Cateau Cambresis, The Treaty of (April 2, 1559), was concluded between France, Spain, and England after the accession of Elizabeth. The chief difficulty in bringing about the peace had been the question of Calais, which the French were determined to keep. Finally it was arranged that the French should keep the town for eight years, and then restore it. The French gave up their claims on Milan and Naples; they also agreed to evacuate and raze the fortresses they had built on the Scottish border, and to give substantial bonds for the restitution of Calais. The Dauphin and Dauphiness were to cenfirm the treaty, and to agree to recognise Elizabeth's right to the English crown.

The treaty is given in Rymer, Fodera, zv. 505.

Catesby, William (d. 1485), one of Richard III.'s ministers, was Speaker of the House of Commons in 1484, and seems to have owed his rise to Lord Hastings, of whem he was at first a close follower, though he afterwards deserted his cause when Hastings fell under the displeasure of

Richard. He was taken at the battle of Bosworth and put to death by the orders of Ilenry VII. The three principal advisers of Richard III.—Catesby, Sir Richard Ratcliff, and Lord Lovel, are held up to opprobrium with him in the well-known contemporary rhyme:—

"The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel the Dog, Rule all England under the Hog."

Cathedral is properly the chief church of the diocese, in which the bishop's seat was established. The ecclesiastical organisation en the Continent generally followed the lines of the political organisation of the Roman Empire. The province usually became the diocese, and the church of the provincial capital became the seat of the bishop. In England, became the seat of the state of the however, Christianity was largely brought by missionaries, who lived together under monastic rules. Hence, among others, many of the English eathedrals—e.g., Worcester—were the control of the con eriginally monastery churches, over which a bishop was set. In other cases the bishop was set over a district, and chose his own cathedral church. Hence the bishops' seats were frequently changed, till after the Norman Conquest they were ordered to be fixed in cities and walled towns. Thus, among others, the older cathedrals of Sherborne, Selsey, and Dorchester gave place to those of Salisbury, Chichester, and Lincoln. [BISHOPRIC.] English eathedrals were of two classes, according to their origin. The clergy attached to them were in some cases monks, in others secular canons. In the first case the bishop reckoned as abbot of the monastery, in the second case he was the head of his chapter. In both cases, however, the secular and official duties of the bishop tended to sever him from his cathedral, and the chapter took possession of it. The dean became more powerful than the absent bishop, who was gradually driven from his own church, and retained little save a visitatorial power over his chapter. The annals of most mediaval episcopates are full of the quarrels between the bishop and the monks or chapter, leading to constant appeals to Rome and a diminution of the episcopal authority. In the reign of Henry VIII., after the suppression of the monasteries, the monastic cathedrals were re-modelled. These "cathedrals of the new foundation" are Canterbury, Carlisle, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Winchester, and Worcester. The bishopries founded by Henry VIII.—Bristol. Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, Peterborough, and Westminster-were provided with cathedrais after the same model. Westminster, though it lost its bishop, has retained its dean and its position as a cathedral church. In recent times new bishoprics have been founded, and the bishop's seat established in old collegiate and parish churches, which have been turned into cathedrals at Manchester, Ripon, Liverpool, St. Albans, Newcastle, Southwell, Southwark, and Birmingham. Catherine of Aragon, Queen, first wife of Henry VIII. (b. 1485, d. 1536), was the youngest of the four daughters of Ferdinand, King of Aragon, and Isabella, Queen of Castile. The foreign policy of Henry VII. was based on a renewal and development of the traditional medieval alliance between England and the Spanish kingdoms. Hence, as early as 1492 a treaty was made between the two monarchs to cement their friendship by intermarriage. In 1498, Arthur, the eldest intermarriage. In 1498, Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII., was contracted to Catherine by proxy, and in 1501, when Arthur was fifteen years old, Catherine was sent to England. The marriage was then celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral; but four months afterwards Arthur died. It was agreed that Catherine should be married to Henry, Arthur's younger brother. A papal dispensation was obtained to legalise such a marriage, and a contract of marriage was made. When Henry VIII. asconded the throne, in 1509, his first act was to marry Catherine. He was then eighteen years old, and she was twonty-four. Catherine was not handsome, but she was lively, of an amiable disposition, well-informed, and de-voted to her husband. Her married life was at first huppy. But of her three sons and two daughters, all died in infancy except Mary. Sho coused to bear children, and showed the effects of advancing years much more than did Henry VIII. She had lost Henry's affections, but still retained his esteem, when Anne Boleyn appeared upon attachment to Anne scruples about the validity of his marriage with Catherine arose in his mind. In 1527 these scruples went so far that he consulted with Cardinal Wolsey how to obtain a divorce. Throughout the complicated negotiations for that purpose Catherine, alone and friendless as she was, preserved a firm and dignified attitude. She was submissive to Henry's will on all small points, but refused to make any admissions which might facilitate a divorce. She stood upon the justice of her cause, and, though Wolsey and the papal nuncio, Campeggio, plied her in every way, she remained firm. On June 1, 1529, she and the king appeared before the legate at Windsor. Catherino refused to admit the jurisdiction of the court, saying she had appealed to Rome. The Pope, Clement VII., being in the power of the Emperor Charles V., who was Catherine's nephew, was driven to receive the appeal and advoke the case to Rome. Wolsey had failed, and his disgrace followed. Still Henry patiently pursued his object of obtaining a divorce from Rome; as this became more improbable, he attempted to intimidate the Pope. In 1531 Catherine was ordered to leave Windsor; sho retired to Ampthill, and was no longer treated as queen. She still remained firm in her position that she was the king's wife by lawful marriage, and would so abide till the court of Rome shall have made thereof an ond." But Henry VIII. made an end his own way. On March 30, 1533, Cranmer was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He cited Catherine to appear before him at Dunstable. Catherino paid no heed to his citation, and was pronounced contumacious. On May 23 Craumer gave his decision that the marriage was null and void from the beginning, as contracted in defiance of the Divine prohibition. From this time Catherine was styled in England the Dowager Princess of Wales. At Easter, 1534, Pope Clement VII. pronounced Henry's marriage with Catherino to be lawful, and ordered the king to take back his legitimate wife. Henry VIII. replied by an Act of l'arliament de-claring the marriage unlawful, and making it treason to question the lawfulness of his marriage with Anne Boleyn. Catherine lived in retirement in one of the royal manors. Henry VIII. did not cease to endeavour to procure from her submission to his will, but she constantly asserted the lawfulness of her marriage. She died at Kimbolton in January, 1536, and on hor deathbed wrote Henry a letter assuring him of her forgiveness, and commending to his care their daughter Mary. By Henry's orders she was buried with becoming pomp in the abbey church of Peterborough, which was soon after erected into a cathedral.

Catherine of Bragansa, Queen, wife of Charles II. (b. 1638, d. 1705), was the daughter of John, King of Portugal. She was married to Charles II. in 1662. Her married life seems not to have been happy, owing to her husband's infidelities and the harshness and neglect with which he treated her. She mixed very little in politics, and, though a sineere Roman Catholic, never made any real attempts to get Romanism re-established in England. Notwithstanding this, she was accused by Titus Oates of plotting against the king's life, but the informer's equivocations were detected by Charles, and the charge was dropped. After her husband's death she lived quietly in England till 1692, when she returned to her native country, where she spent the rest of her life.

Catherine of France, Quzen, wife of Henry V. (b. 1401, d. 1438), was the daughter of Charles VI. In 1420 she was married to Henry V., in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Troves. By him she had only one son, Henry VI. In 1423 she took for her second husband Owen Tudor. a Welsh gentleman attached to the court, "the smallness of whose estate was recompanced by the delicacy of his person, being every way a very compleat gentleman." By him sho had three sons, the eldest of whom, Edmund Tudor, was the father of Henry VII. [TCDORS.]

Catherine Howard, Queen, fifth wife of Henry VIII. (b. ?1522, d. 1542), was the daughter of Lord Edmund Howard, the son of the Duke of Norfolk. Educated under the care of the Dowager Duchess of Norfolk, sho early developed a taste for levity and frivolity. Henry VIII. was captivated by her beauty and vivacity, and married her, July 28, 1540. But the levity which had marked her before her marriage continued afterwards, and there can be little doubt that she was guilty of improper conduct with at least one of her former lovers, Derham. In Nov., 1541, she was charged with adultery, and sent to the Tower. On Dec. 10 two of her paramours, Derham and Culpepper, were beheaded. In 1542 a Bill of Attainder against her was passed; and on Feb. 12 following she was executed. Immediately afterwards a bill was passed making it high treason for any woman whom the king married or sought in marriage to conceal any questionable circumstances in her past life.

Strickland, Queens of England.

Catherine Parr, Queen, sixth wife of Henry VIII. (b. 1512, d. 1548), daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, was connected by birth with the Nevilles and other great families. She was carefully educated, and married, at an unusually early age, to Edward, Lord Borough, who left her a widow, and in her sixteenth year she was married, for the second time, to John Neville, Lord Latimer, with whom she lived happily for several years. During this period she became greatly attached to the doctrines of the Reformers. Lord Latimer died in 1542, and Catherine was besieged by many suitors. She was beautiful, and famed for her accomplishments, and her husband's death had left her in possession of one of the finest properties in the kingdom. The most favoured of her suitors was Sir Thomas Seymour, who, however, prudently withdrew his pretensions when the king cast his eyes upon the lady. In July, 1543, she was married to Henry, and this, unlike the king's previous matrimonial alliances, oxcited no dissatisfaction among any class of his subjects. In the very difficult position of queen she acted with great prudence. ministered to the growing bodily infirmities of the king, and endeared herself to his children. But there is no doubt that she was a sincere and, as far as prudence allowed her, an active supporter of the Reformers. In spite of her great caution, Henry conceived a mistrust of her theological learning, and was prevailed upon by Bishop Gardiner to sign articles of Impeachment against her, and to order her arrest; but Catherine's skilful management succeeded in averting the danger. It is probable, however, that Henry was meditating a fresh charge of treason against her when he was overtaken by death. Almost immediately after this event Cathorine married her former suitor, Sir Thomas Seymour of Sudeley, the Lord High Admiral. Her husband, however, neglected her, and had obviously fixed his affections on the Princess Elizabeth. The union was unhappy, and in August, 1548, she died in childbirth. From some words spoken by Catherino during her last illness, it has been supposed that Seymour poisoned her; but there is no evidence to confirm the suspicion. Catherino was the author of a volume of Prayers and Meditations, and a tract called, The Lamentations of a Sinner, which is written with a good deal of vigour, and in parts with some genuine eloquence.

Catholic Association, THE, was founded by Daniel O'Connell in 1823. It embraced all classes, and was really representative in character, though not nominally so. It received petitions, appointed com-mittees, ordered a consus of the Catholic popu-lation, and collected the Catholic Rent. This was a subscription raised all over Ireland by means of officers called Wardens, appointed by the Association. O'Connel! managed all the money that came in, without accounting for it to any one. In 1825 Parliament attempted to put down the Association by means of the Convention Bill, but the Association dissolved itself before the Bill came into force. This, however, was merely in appearance; as a matter of fact, it continued to exist, and the Catholic Rent was still raised. In 1829, after the victory won at the Clare election, the Convention Bill having expired, the old Association was renewed, and it declared that none but Catholics should in future be elected for Irish constituencies. The members also began to assemble at monster meetings, to which they marched in military array; but a proclamation against these meetings was obeyed by the Association. When the Emancipation Act was passed it was accompanied by a measure for suppressing the Association. Bnt, its object being fulfilled, the Association was dissolved before the Bill became law. Sheil and Wyre were the leaders, next to the "Liberator" himself.

Catholic Committee, The, was an association of some of the leading Catholics in Ireland, which was established in the reign of William III., and was intended to watch over Catholic interests. The Committee became extremely active during the agitation of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. In 1791 there was a split in the Committee, the bishops and the noblemen, like Lord

Fingal and Lord Kenmare, separating from the more violent party; the latter pressed for instant emancipation, while the former were willing to wait. The violent party determined on a convention, and on an alliance with the United Irishmen, under Byrne and Keogh. The consequence was the Back Lane l'arliament (q.v.). Meanwhile, however, the Committee itself, after a hot debate, accepted the Relief Bill of 1793, and the lack Lane Parliament dissolved. But from this time the moderate party lost influence, and in 1798 the Committee dissolved itself. In 1809 and 1871 it was reconstituted, and reassembled for a short period. [Catholic Emancipation.]

Catholic Emancipation. In the reign of William III. various statutes had been passed against the Roman Catholics which forbade them to hold property in land, and subjected their spiritual instructors to the penalties of felony. These acts had ceased to be applied, but they were a blot upon the statute book, and served as a temptation to informers. In 1778 an Act, brought in by Sir G. Savile, repealed these penalties with general approval. These Acts did not apply to Scotland, but it was contemplated to repeal similar enactments which still disgraced the Scotch statute book. This stirred up fanaticism in Edinburgh and Glasgow in 1779; riots took place in the Scotch capital, and the houses of Roman Catholica were attacked. A Protestant Association was established in Scotland, and Lord George Gordon, who was more than half a madman, was chosen as its president. The association spread to England, and a branch was established in London, and in consequence the disturbances known as the Gordon Riots (q.v.) broke out. In 1791 Mr. Mitford brought in a Bill for the relief of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters "-that is, Roman Catholics who protested against the Pope's temporal authority, and his right to excommunicate kings and absolve subjects from their allegiance, and the right of not keeping faith with heretics. Mr. Fox opposed the measure on the ground that relief should be given to all Roman Cutholics. Mr. Pitt expressed similar senti-ments. The Bill was altered during its progress, and at last it passed in a form which allowed Roman Catholics who took an oath of allegiance to secure to themselves freedom of education, of holding property, and of practising the profession of the law. It also allowed Catholio peers to approach the king. Roman Catholics were still worse off in Ireland. Their public worship was proscribed; they were excluded from all offices in the learned professions; they were deprived of the guardianship of their children, if they had landed estates they were forbidden to intermarry with Protestants. In 1792 some of the worst of these disabilities were removed by the Irish Parliament, and in 1793 this relief was further extended. The restraints on worship and education, even the disposition of property, were removed; they were admitted to vote at elections on taking the outh of allegiance and abjuration: they could hold some of the higher civil and military offices, and could enjoy the honours and endowments of the University of Dublin. In the same year a similar Bill was passed for the relief of Scotch Roman Catholics. In 1799, when the Union with Ireland was in contemplation, Pitt intended to admit Irish Roman Cutholics to the l'arliament of the United Kingdom, But George III. was strongly opposed to this step, and would not allow his minister to give any direct pledge. When Pitt attempted, after the Union, to carry out his tempered scheme of relief, the king refused his consent, and l'itt resigned office. After this the question slept, but in 1803 the Catholics obtained a further slight measure of relief on condition of subscribing the oath of 1791. In May, 1805, Lord Grenville moved for a committee of the whole Honse to consider a petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireland; but his motion was negatived by a majority of 129. A similar motion was made by Fox in the House of Commons, but it was lost by a majority of 112. In 1807 an attempt was made by the ministry to admit Roman Catholics in Ireland to the higher staff appointments of the army. This attempt they were obliged by the king to abandon, and as his Majesty went on to require from them a written declaration that they would propose to him no further concession to the Catholics, they were obliged to resign. Their successors, under the Duke of Portland and Mr. Perceval, were opposed to the Roman Catholic claims; still numerous petitions were presented by Irish Roman Catholice, and similar petitions were presented in 1810 in favour of English Roman Catholics. Many Protestants began to petition for tho relief of their Catholic brethren, and the feeling in the universities became less strongly opposed to change. After the murder of Mr. Perceval the Marquis Wellesley was charged with the formation of a ministry, and made the settlement of the Catholic claims the basis of his programme. He did not, however, succeed. In the same year Mr. Canning carried a motion for the consideration of the laws affecting Catholies by a majority of 129. In the Lords a similar motion was lost by a single vote. A Catholic Association (q.v.) had been formed in Ireland in 1823. During Mr. Canning's tenure of office it had been dissolved, in the hope that he would be sure to carry out his well-known views. After his death, in 1827, it was reconstructed. In 1828 it secured the return of Daniel O'Connell for the county of Clare. Mr. Peel and the Duke of Wellington were convinced that the time for settling the question of the Catholic claims had now arrived. Besides other difficulties, they had to face the strong opposition of the king, George IV., who now expressed as much objection to the measure as his father had done. At last the king was persuaded to allow the ministry to draw up three measures, one to suppress the Catholic Association, one a Relief Itill, and the third to revise the After some delay franchise in Ireland. caused by the king, Peel introduced the measure of Catholic Relief. It admitted Roman Catholics, on taking a now oath instead of the oath of supremucy, to both Houses of l'arliament; to all corporato offices; to all judicial offices, except in the ecclesiastical courts; to all civil and political offices, except those of Regent, Lord Chancellor in England and Ireland, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Roman Catholics were still restrained in tho exercise of Church patronage. The motion to go into Committee was agreed to by a majority of 188. The Duke of Wellington said, on the second reading of the Bill, in the House of Lords: "I, my Lords, am one of those who have probably passed a longer period of my l'fo engaged in war than most men, and principally, I may say, in civil war, and I must say this, that if I could avoid, by any sacrifice whatever, even one month of civil war in the country to which I am attuched, I would sacrifice my life in order to do it." The Bill was opposed in the Lords hy the Archbishop of Canterbury and several others of the episcopal bench, but it was carried on April 10, 1829, by 213 to 109. The king gave his consent with great rejuc-tance. Sir Robert Peel writes in his memoria a solemn declaration that he acted throughout in this measure from a deep conviction that they were not only conducivo to the general welfare, but that they had become imperatively necessary to avert an imminent and increasing danger from the interests of the Church, and of the institutions connected with the Church.

Cato Street Conspiracy (1820) was the name given to a wild plot formed by a number of desperate men, having for its chief object the murder of Lord Castlereagh and the rest of the ministers. The originators were a man named Arthur Thistlewood, who had once been a subaltern officer, Ings, a butcher, Tidd and Brunt, shoemakers, and Davidson, a man of colour; and they had arranged to murder the ministers at a dinner at Lord Harrowby's on the night of the 23rd February, to set fire to London in several places. seize the Bank and Mansion House, and proclaim a provisional government. The plot, however, had been betrayed to the police by one of the conspirators, named Edwards, some weeks before. The conspirators were attacked by the police as they were arming themselves in a stable in Cato Street, near the Edgware Road. A scuffle ensued, in which one policeman was stabled and several of the criminals escaped. Thistlewood was among these, but he was captured next morning. He and four others were executed, and five more were trunsported for life. A good deal of discussion took place in the House of Commons on the employment of the informer Edwards by the authorities.

Cavaliers. In December, 1641, frequent tumults took place round the Houses of Parliament, in the course of which more than one collision occurred between the mob and the others and courtiers who mado Whitehall their head-quarters. The two parties ussailed each other with nicknames, and the epithet, "Cavalier," was applied by the people to the Royalists. The original meaning of the term, which was to become tho designation of a great political party, is diffi-cult to discover. Professor Gardiner says that it "carried with it a flavour of opprobrium as implying a certain looseness and idleness of military life." Mr. Forster thinks that it was used as a term of reproach on this occasion "to connect its French origin with the un-English character of the defenders of the queen and her French papist adherents, to whom it was chicfly applied." According to the statement of William Lilly, an oye-witness of hese riots, it referred at first rather to the personal appearunc of the Royalists than to anything foreign or sinister in their characters. "The courtiers having long hair and locks, and always wearing swords, at last were called by these men 'Cavaliers;' and so all that took part or appeared for his Majesty were termed Cavaliers, few of the vulgar knowing the sense of the word 'Cavalier.'" It thus exactly corresponded to the term Roundhead [ROUNDHEAD]. earliest uses of the word in the Journal of Sir S. D'Ewes are found under the dates of Jan. 10, and March 4, 1641. The king complained of its use, accusing his opponents of attempting "to render all persons of honour, courage, and reputation odious to the common people under the style of Cavaliers, insomuch as the highways and villages have not been safe for gentlemen to pass through without violence or affront." The name at first used as a reproach came to be adopted by the Royalists themselves as a title of honour. "A complete Cavalier," wrote Dr. Symons, in a sermon preached before the royal army, " is a child of honour. He is the only reserve of English gentility and ancient valour, and hath chosen rather to bury himself in the tomb of honour than to see the nobility of his nation vassalaged, the dignity of his country captivated or obscured by any base domestic enemy, or ed, in everal wood next cuted, e. Kaye, Sepoy War. Caxton, WILLIAM (b. ? 1422, d. 1491), the rst English printer, was born near Hadlow. Kent, and apprenticed to a rich London mercer in 1438. He left England in 1441 to transact business in connection with his trade in the Low Countries, and thally took up his residence at Bruges, where he remained for thirty-tive years. He joined there the gild of Merchant Adventurers, who had a depôt in the city. In 1463 Caxton was promoted to the office of governor of the gild. Soon afterwards he, together with another English envoy, was entrusted by Edward IV. with the task of renewing an expiring commercial trenty between England and Burgundy. In 1470, Caxton used his influence at Bruges in behalf of Edward IV., who was taking refuge there from the Laucastrians, and in the next , ear the Duchess of Burgundy offered him a post at her court. By the duchess's command he completed, in 1471, a translation into English of a popular French collection of remances concerning the Trojan War. He became acquainted with Colard Manson, who had some knowledge of the new art of printing which Gutenberg had perfected some sixteen years before. Together they printed Caxton's translation-The Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye-and 1474 has been the year assigned as the date of the production of this, the first English-printed book. The experiment roved eminently successful to another of Caxton's translations-The Game and Playe of the Chess-issued from the same press in 1475. In 1476 Caxton arrived in England with new type, and set up a press near the western entrance to Westminster Abbey. During the following fifteen years, he printed many works—charaltie romances, religious works. and transation. His patrons included Edward IV., 12 mard III., and Henry VII., and the chief no 'me" and many merchants of the day. Ca or Churchyara, c. '. . Westminster Abbey.

Ceadwalla, King of Wessex (685-688), was descended from Cerdic through Ceawlin. His name is generally considered to be-speak a British origin, the same as the Welsh Cadwallon, when in support of his view it may be merelimed that his brother was called Mul, i.e., mule," a mar of mixed descent. On being traished from "essex, he retired to Sussex, which kingdom he ubdued. He was, however, subsequently expelled, returned to Wessex, and, on the death or abdication of Centwine, became king. then conquered Sussex and the Isle of Wight, and twice ravaged Kent. In 688 he abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he was baptised by the Pope, and received the name of Peter. He died on Easter Day, 689.

Ceawlin, King of Wessex, succeeded to the thrane in the latter half of the sixth century on the death of his father Cymrie. Under his leadership the West Saxons enlarged their boundaries and the Britons were driven back. In 568 he defeated Ethelbert of Kent at Wimbledon, and three years later gained a great victory over the Britons at Bedford, which brought the important towns of Aylesbury, Bensington, and Eynsham under his dominion. In 577 he won a victory at Deorham (q.v.), in which three British kings fell, and as a result of this success ho obtained possession of the three cities of Bath, Gloucester, and Circneester. In 684, again attempting to extend his conquests to the upper Severn valley, he fought a doubtful battle at Faddiley in Cheshire, acfeated the Britons at Frithem in Shropshire, but after this is said to have made an alliance with them against Ethelbert, by whem he was defeated at Wodnesbeerh (? Wanborough, about three miles from Swindon) and driven out of his kingdom (? 590). Two years after this he died. Ceawlin is reckoned as the second Bretwalda in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; and William of Malmesbury says of him that "he was the astonishment of the English, the detestation of the Britons, and eventually the destruction of both."

Celts in the British Isles. Celts form one among that large group of peoples which is commonly called the Aryan group, and which includes nearly all the present inhabitants of Europe with several considerable peoples of the East. The name Celt was that by which the people were first known to the Greeks, whereas the Romans always knew them under the name of Galli, or Gauls; both these words probably mean the same thing, namely the warriors, or according to Professor Rhys, the kilt-wearing, or clothed people. Another name by which the Celts of South Britain were known is Cymry, which is still the name by which the Welsh designate themselves, and which possibly reappears in the Cimbri spoken of by the Roman historians. There can be no doubt that the Celts at one time formed the most powerful confederary of nations in Enrope. Gradually the Celtic peoples were driven back from their more easterly possessions by the Romans and the kindred races in the south, and in the north by the Tentonic peoples; so that at the time when the light of history first shines on them with any clearness we find them in possession only of the three most western lands of Europe-namely, the Iberian Peninsula, Ganl, and the British Isles.

It must not be supposed that the inhabitants of these lands, though they consisted fundamentally of the same race, formed in any sense a single nationality, or spoke an identical language. In the British Islands some dialects of Celtic are still spoken and others are but recently extinct. These we can classify. They are the Welsh, or Cymric (Kymraeg), the Cornish, the Manx (dialect spoken in the Isle of Man), the Irish (Erse or Gaidhelic), and the Highland Scottish, or Scottish Gaelic. To these we must add the only other living Celtic tongue, the Breton of Britanny, otherwise ealled Armorie. These six dialects divide thomselves into two elasses, the Gaidhelie (Goidelie) and the British or Cymric. The first included Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic; the serend romprises the Welsh, Cornish, and Armoric. It is quite possible that this division was in force as long ago as the date of the first Roman invasion, so that the inhabitants of the British Islands then consisted of two great nationalities, the Britons in the lower part of Britain, and the Gaels in the Highlands of Scotland and in Ireland. There can be little doubt that of the two the nationality of the Britons was most nearly allied to that of the Gauls.

Many of our geographical names servo to remind us of these two main divisions of the Celtic rere. The word Gaidhel (which is, of course, etymologically allied to Gaul) is preserved in the words Gael and Gaelie, now used only for the Scottish Gaels, though in the native Irish the same word (Gaedhil) is applied to that nationality and language; it is preserved again in Galway in Ireland, and in Galleway iu Scotland, and in many lesser local names. The word Cymry, which is still the name by which the Welsh call themselves, has been for us Latinised into Cambria, and remains again in Cumberland (Cumbria) which once included a much larger area than it now includes. Britain, Briton, are names which have been bestowed from withoutnamely, by the Greeks and Romans - while Wales, Cornwall, have likewise been bestowed from without by the Teutonic invaders of Britain. All the Celtie nationalities were, as we know, an immigrant people into Europe, and it is not to be supposed that when they made their way into these islands they found them empty of inhabitants, or that no traces of these earlier races continued to exist after the Celts had been long settled there. Some among the tribes which Casar counted among the Celtie inhabitants of Britain may have belonged to this earlier stock, in particular the Silures, who inhabited the south of Wales and Monmouthshire, near Caerleon (Isea Silurum), and a part at least of the tribes of Devonshire and Cornwall have been designated as representing these more primitive inhabitants of the British Isles, who were. it is generally believed, allied to the original inhabitants of Spain, the Iberians, and to the Basques, their modern representatives. would seem that the Gaelic branch preceded ke an slands These Welsh, , the Man), Highthese Celtic erwise themoidelic) rst ine; the h, and s dividate of nhahisted of in the in the the Cymric in the course of invasion, and that the latter as they advanced drove the Gaels towards the north and west. At the time of Casar's invasion the Cymric Celts may be said to have composed the body of the population south of the Firths of Forth and of Clyde; and as the names Britannia, Briton, were by the Romans bestowed only on the country and the people in the southern part of the island, the word Briton may be used synonymously with Cymric-Celt. In fact, the Cymric people came in after-times to designate themselves as Brythons. When first known to the Romans, therefore, the Britons are to be looked upon as one nation, with a certain admixture of more primitive elements, and with the addition of eno intrusive nationality, the Belgae (q.v.), who had made a settlement in the south of the island. The Belgie were likewise Celtic by but were not closely allied to the nativo inhabitants of Britain. These Belgae seem to have been more civilised than the rest of the inhabitance, and to have offered the most formidable resistance to the Roman arms. The exact districts over which they extended cannot be ascertained. The centre of their possessions probably lay somewhere near the borders of Sussex and Hampshire. With the exception then of some primitivo triber and the intrusivo Belgae, the Britons from the Channel to the Firths of Forth and Clyde were, at the time of Casar's invasion, essentially one people belonging to the Cymric branch of the Celtic family [Britons]. North of the firths tho land was inhabited by a people who were to the classic writers first known as Caledonians, but afterwards by the Romans known as Picts. This name, it is well known, means simply the painted or stained (Picti), and was bestowed upon all these who had not adopted the Roman civilisation, but adhered to their national system of staining themselves with woad. Concerning the nationality of the Piets there is considerable dispute. Tacitus says that they were of German origin. This assertion was fermerly very generally accepted, and still is by some scholars. It is more probable that they were of a Celtic stock. Mr. Skene, who has undertaken an exhaustive examination of the question, arrives at the conclusion that they belonged, not to the Cymric but to the Gaelic branch of the Celtie family [Picts]. In Ireland again the inhabitants were probably to be divided into several nationalities. There was, in the first place, undoubtedly a substratum of the same primitive stock of which we have noticed traces in England. Irish tradition tells us of feur nationalities who, at different times, hold rule in the island, namely, the Nemidians, the Firbolgs, the Tuatha da Danann, and the Milesians, or boots. Should we set aside what seems purely mythical in the tradition, and with that the Nemidians, of whom nothing can be made, it is not unlikely that the three names which remain do really represent three peoples, out of which the Irish nation is composed. The Firbolgs, who are described as a dark and slavish race, very likely represent the oldest inhabitants of Iberian stock, while the Tuatha da Danann and the Milesians were two different branches of the Gælic race, having somewhat different appearances and national characteristics. The Milesians, who eventually obtained the supremacy, seem to be identical with the Scots, who gave its name first to Ireland, and later on to Scotland

[Scors].

Such is the general ethnology of the Celtic people of Great Britain and Ireland. What wo know of their social life and religion at, the time of the Roman conquest is gained almost solely from the testimony of Roman historians, and therefore applies chiefly to the inhabitants of South Britain, who were the only people to come in contact with the invader. We have some other sources of information in the Welsh and Irish traditions, and in all that is most ancient of what has been preserved of their ancient laws, especially of the Brehon Laws of the Irish [Brenon]. This last source of information shows as that the Celts, where untouched by Roman civilisation, adhered to a form of social organisation which was, at one time, pretty general among the Aryan peoples. The distinctive features in their state of society were that each tribe, or, more strictly speaking, each village, constituted a state in itself, a political unit whose tie of union with any other village was only of a very loose character. At the same time, the tie which united together the inhabitants of any single village was remarkably close, most of the land, for example, being held, not individually, but in common, by the whole body. This form of society is commonly distinguished by students as the Village Community (see Sir H. S. Maine, Village Communities of the East and West). The religion of the inhabitants of Britain must have been the same as that of the Gauls, if, as Casar tells us, the special home or college of the (laulish priests, the Druids, was in this island [DRUIDS]. Of this ereed we do not know much. There are, however, good reasons for believing that it very closely resembled the religion of the Teutonie neighbours of the Celts, of which some traces have con J down to us. As with the German races, and as with the Romans thomselves, the highest divinity was probably a god of the sky and of the thunder. Beside him stood a sun-god whom the Gauls, when they became Latinised, identified completely with Apollo, and who perhaps corresponded to the Freyr or Frô of the Toutonic peoples. His original Gaulish name may have been Granus. To form with these a trilogy we have a god of war, probably similar to the Teutonio Zie or Tiw, and called by the Roman writers

Mars. The chief goddess of the Gauls is called by Cæsar Minerva, but we have proof that they worshipped a mother goddess who, like the Roman Lucina, presided over births, and whose image, holding on her lap a child, is frequently dug up in France, and always taken by the peasantry for an image of the Virgin and Child. To this puntheon of nature-gods was joined a lower form of natureworship, especially an adoration of trees and streams. As to the Tentons, the oak was to the Gauls an especially sacred tree. Tho Celtic worship of streams was more peculiar, and the traces of it still survive in the special reverence paid to wells in Britanny, in the more Celtic parts of Great Britain, and in Ireland.

Census, The, a numbering of the population of Great Britain and Ireland, was appointed to be taken every tenth year by Act 41, George 111., c. 15 (Dec., 1800). The first census was accordingly taken in 1801. At each recurrence of the census it has been rendered more complete, and at the present time elicits a vast amount of valuable and accurate information. It is taken simultaneously throughout the kingdom by special officers. The official figures since 1801 are as fellows:—

1811	i	Ċ		18,509,116	1871			31,857,338
1821	Ċ	Ċ		21,272,187				35,246,633
1831		i		24,392,485				37,880,764
1841				27,239,404	1901			41,609,320
1851				27,958,143

The first Imperial Census of Great Britain and Irelaud, the colonies and dependencies, was taken in 1871, when the population was 234,762,593. In 1881 it was 315,885,000; in 1901 it was 400,543,713. In 1908 the estimated population was 410,000,000.

Central India. The official name for the group of feudatory native states in the centre of India, comprising the dominions of Holkar and Scindiah, and the states of Bhopal and Dhar. [Holkar, &c.]

Central Provinces, The, a chief commissionership of British India, formed out of the Nagpore province and Nerbudda territories, in 1861, lies to the south of Rewah and Bundelcund. It is divided into nineteen districts and four divisions, and has an area of 84,000 square miles, and a population of about 8,200,000 (in 1872), of whom nearly six millions are Hindoos. [NAGPORE.]

Cenwealh, King of the West Saxons (643—672), was the son and successor of Cynegils. He tried to effect in Wessex a relapse into Paganism, but his expulsion by Penda, whose sister he had repudiated, led to his seeking refuge in East Anglia, where he was converted to Christianity. After having recovered his kingdom, he defeated Wulfhe, the son of Penda, at Ashdown, and took him prisoner (661). He also wen two great victories over the Britons at Bradford and Pen, and extended his dominions on every side.

Cenwulf, King of the Mercians (796—819), was descended from Cenwealh, the brother of Penda. His reign was a very prosperous one, and he retained for Mercia that supremacy which had been won by Offa. He completed the eonquest of Kent, which he granted out to his brother Cuthred; while to conciliate the Church, he suppressed the archbishopric of Lichfield, which Offa had founded. He was victorious over the Welsh, and his army is said to have penetrated as far as Snowdon.

Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury (833 - 870), made his episcopate important in many ways. In 838 he assisted at the Council of Kingston, when a treaty of peace and alliance was agreed upon between the Kentish clergy and the two kings, Egbert and his son Ethelwulf. This treaty laid the foundation of those amicable relations which we find existing ever after between the descendants of Cerdic and the successors of Augustine. Twice during Ceolnoth's life, Canterbury was sacked by the Danes, but the church and the monastery of St. Augustine were spared, probably by the payment of a heavy ransom on the part of the archbishop, who also contributed towards raising a fleet against the Danes.

William of Malmesbury; Hook, Archbishops.

Coolwulf, King of the Northumbrians (d. 764), succeeded his brother Cenred. In 713 he was seized by his enemies, and confined in a cloister, but was afterwards released by his friends and reseated on the throne. He was a patron of learning, and to him Bede dedicated his Ecclesiastical History. After reigning eight years he abdicated, and spent the remaining years of his life as a monk at Lindisfarne.

the following senses: - (1) man-vir, maritus; (2) peasant, rusticus; (3) the ordinary nonnoble freeman. In this, its ordinary constitutional sense, we find (a) coorl opposed to eorl, as simple to gentlo; (b) the ceorlise man opposed to gesitheundmen and thegen, and in Northumbrian ecclesiastical law to landagend cyninges-thegen; (c) ceorl used as equivalent to twyhyndeman in the West-Saxon and Mercian laws, and in opposition to the sixhyndeman and twelfhyndeman. Originally, the simple freeman was the corner-stone of the old German state. Even the good blood of the earl only brought with it social estimation and easy access to political power, rather than a different position in the eye of the law. But in historical times the ceorl had fallen from his old status. He stood midway between the "ingenuus" of Tacitus and the mediæval villein. With the development of the constitution he gradually sinks towards the latter condition. Legally the coorl still was a full citizen; but if he possessed no land, his position in a territorial constitution be-The establishcame extremely precarious. ment of private property in land had deprived him of his old right of sharing in the common land of the state. Though still a member of the local courts and of the host, though still fully "law-worthy," and though his wergild was still paid to the kindred, the landless coorl was compilled, by a law of Athelstan, to choose a lord to answer for his good be-haviour. The right of selecting his own master alone distinguished him from the predial serf. In a later stage, even the small land-owning coorl was practically obliged to commend himself for safety's sake to some great proprietor; and the "liber homo qui ire potest cum terra quo voluerit" of Domesday represents this large class of voluntary dependents. Many grades of ceorls thus apring up according to their relations to their "hlaford." But while the loss prosperous ceorls thus lost their freedom, the disappearance of the blood nobility of the corl helped the more thriving of their class to attain that higher status which no longer depended on birth alone. The ceorl with five hides of land (600 acres), with house and church, a special relation to the crown, and a special jurisdiotion over his property, became "of thegn right worthy." Yet, on the whole, the growth of thegahood depressed the "ecorlisc man." Its first principle was dependence; and, as in the Continent, the old freedom withered away before feudalism. The very name ceorl is not found in Domesday, and its equivalents, bordarius, cotarius, cotsetvs, socmannus, villanus, indicate that the process which degraded him to the "anfree villein" had almost become complete. The lawyers of the twelfth century completed the process. The bad meaning attached to the word "churi" is an indication of the disrepute into which this once homograble title had fallen.

Cerdic, King of the West Saxons (d. 534?), is said to have been nit th in descent from Woden, and, in company with his son Cymric, to have come to Britain in 495, "at the place which is called Cerdices-ora" (prohably in Hampshire). His early wars were not attended with great success; but in 508, having made an alliance with Aese and Aelle (Ella), he totally defeated the Britons. In 514, reinforcements having arrived, he continued his conquests, and in 519 " Cerdic and Cymrie obtained the kingdom of the West Saxons." In 530 they conquered the Isle of Wight, and made a terrible slaughter of the Britons at Whitgaresburh (probably Carisbrooke). Four years later Cerdie died. From Cerdie all our kings, with the exception of Canute, Hardicanute, the two Harolds, and William the Conqueror, are descended.

Cerones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe occupying the west coast of Inverness and part of Argyle.

Cessation, THE, was the name given, during the Ulster Rebellion of 1641, and the following years, to a truce for one year, agreed on Sept. 15th, 1643, between the Marquis of Ormonde and the confederato Irish at Drogheda. The English Parliament impeached Ormondo on account of it, and the Scots refused to recognise it. The native Irish party, headed by the Legate, were also opposed to it; it had a very bad effect on the Royalists in England; and, after all, tho king's object of getting help from Ireland in troops and money was only very partially gained.

Ceylon, an island in the Indian Ocean, lying sonth-east of India, and separated from it by the Gulf of Manaar, has been known since very early times. It was visited by the Macedonians, and was much frequented by merchants in the sixth century. It was first merchants in the sixth contury. visited by the Portuguero in 1505, and a few years later a fort was built by them at Colombo. In 1656 the Portuguese were expelled from the island by the Dutch, who were in their turn driven out by the British in 1795, Ceylon, or at least as much of it as had belonged to the Dutch, being annexed to the Presidency of Midras; but, in 1801, it was made a separate colony. In 1803, on the refusal of the King of Kandy to accept the British terms, Kandy was attacked by a large force, under General Macdowal; but the expedition ended most disastrously in a massiere of the British troops. In 1815 Kandy was occupied by the British, and the king deposed; a few years later the natives rebelled, and tried ineffectually to drive the English out f the interior of the country.

In 1831 a commission was sent out from England to inquire into the condition of the island, with the result that a charter providing for the administration of justice by supreme district and circuit courts was issued; trial by jury was adopted; every situation was thrown open to the competition of the Singhalese; and three natives of Ceylon were appointed members of tho legislative council, en a footing of perfect equality with the other unofficial European members. Notwithstanding the attempts at reform, insurrections took place in 1835 and 1848, both of which were organised by the Buddhist priests, who dreaded tho diminution of their influence under British rule; but the rebellions were crushed before they had spread to any very alarming extent. The government of Ceylon was vested in a governor, assisted by an executive couneil of five mombers, viz., the Colonial Secretary, the Commander-in-chief, the Attorney-General, the Treasurer, and the Auditor-General. There is also a legislative council of seventeen, including the members of tho executive council, feur other official and eight non-official members nominated by the governor. This form of government has existed since 1833. The Roman-Dutch law, as it prevailed in the colony in 1795, is that which is still suffered to apply, except where it has been modified by direct local enactments, which have introduced trial by jury, the English rules of evidence in criminal cases, and the English mercantile law in some important matters.

Chalgrove Field, The Battle of June 18, 1643), was fought between the Royalist eavalry, under Princo Rupert, who had pushed forward from Oxford on a raid, and a body of Parliamentary troops, under Hampden. The encounter, which was more of the nature of a skirmish than a battle, is memorable as the one in which John Hampden received his death-wound. Chalgrove is a small village about twenty-two miles east of Oxford, between the Thanes and the Chiltern Hills.

Chaloner, Sir Thomas (b. 1521, d. 1565), a statesman, a soldier, and a man of letters, whilst quite a boy entered the service of the Emperor Charles V., whom he accompanied on the expadition to Algiers, 1541, barely escaping with his life. Soon afterwards he returned to England, and was present at the battle of Pinkio Cleugh, 1547, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was Clerk of the Council to Henry VIII., and a faithful servant to Edward VI., though his religion deburred him from the favour of Mary. Under Elizabeth he acquired considerable renown as an able diplomatist, and was sent as ambussador to Germany and Spain, renaining at Madrid for two or three years before his death. Sir Thomas was the author of a treatise, De Republica Anglorum Instauranda (Lond., 1579), and some other tracts.

Chalons, The Battle of (1274), began with a tournament, to which Edward I. was invited by the Count of Chalons-sur-Marne. Foul play endangered the king's life, and resulted in a fight between the English and French, in which a considerable number of the latter were slain.

Chalus-Chatrol, a castle in Poitou, belonging to the Viscount of Limoges, was besieged by Richard I. in 1199. It was before the walls of this fortress that the king received his death-wound. [RICHARD I.]

Chamberlain, THE LORD GREAT, is one of the great officers of state, the sixth in order of precedence. This office early became one of comparatively small importance, and has for many centuries been a purely titular dignity. It was granted to the De Veres, Earls of Oxford, by Henry I. in 1101, and was for many centuries hereditary in that family. On the death of John de Vere, sixteenth Earl of Oxford, his daughter Mary married Lord Willoughby de Eresby; and in 1625 the House of Lords declared that the office passed to this nobleman. On the death of the last malo descendant of this peer, it was decided, after much litigation, in July, 1779, that the honour passed to his female descendants, the Lady Willoughby de Eresby and the Lady Charlotte Bertie.

Chamberlain, THE LORD, OF THE HOUSEHOLD, or King's Chamberlain, is still an officer of some importance. Notices of him are found early in the thirteenth century. In 1341 he was ordered to take an oath to maintain the laws and tho Great Charter, and in 1 Richard H. it was enacted that he should be chosen in Parliament. He derived considerable political importance from the fact that it was his duty to endorse petitions handed to the king; and frequent complaints in Parliament show that this prerogative was generally exercised, and occasionally abused. In 1406 it was declared in Parliament that the King's Chamberlain should always be a member of the Council. Under the later Plantagenets and Tudors the Lord Chamberlain became the chief functionary of the royal household; and his duties are still not altogether nominal. By 31 Henry VIII. he takes precedence after the Lord Steward. By modern usage, he is always a peer of high rank, and he goes out with the ministry. He has also a peculiar authority over dramatic entertainments, which arises from the fact that the players attached to the Royal Household were under his jurisdiction. But the Lord Chamberlain's function as Licenser of all plays dates only from 10 George II., cap. 28, 1736, when Walpole brought in an Act of Parliament requiring that all dramas and plays should receive the licence of the Lord Chamberlain before being acted, power being given to this officer to prohibit any piece offending against morality, decency, or public order.

Chamberlain, THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH (b 1836), after an active municipal career in Birmingham, became M.P. for it in 1876. In the second Gladstone administration he was President of the Board of Trade and in the In the third he was President of the Local Government Board, but resigned (March, 1886) on the Home Rule question. In 1887 he went to Canada as British Commissioner in the Fisheries dispute. In 1895 he became Colonial Secretary in Lord Salisbury's Cabinet. In 1903 he resigned his position in the Cabinet, in order to advecate a new fiscal policy untrammelled. He suffered in 1906 a severe illness, which necessitated his withdrawal from public life.

Chamberlain, The Right Hon. J. Austen, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1863, and was educated at Rugby and Cambridge. In 1892 he was elected as a Liberal Unionist for East Worcestershire. He was Civil Lord of the Admiralty, 1895–1900; Financial Secretary to the Treasury, 1900-2; Postmaster General and member of the Cabinet, 1902-3; and Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1903-6.

Champion of England, The, is an officer whose business it is to appear at the coronation of a sovereign, and challenge all comers to deny the new ruler's title. The office is popularly supposed to have been instituted by William the Conqueror. It goes with the manor of Scrivelsby.

Chancellor, RICHARD (d. 1554), was the founder of the English-Russian Company. Whilst on a voyage of discovery, to find the north-west passage to China, under the direction of Cabot, in 1553, he doubled the North Cape (a feat never before accomplished by the English), and reached Archangel. Thence he journeyed to Moscow, and established the first trading relations between England and Russia. On his return to England he established a company to trade with Muscovy, which was incorporated by Queen Mary.

Chancellor. [CHANCERY.]

Chancery. The Court of Chancery and its equitable jurisdiction have occupied in England a unique position, and exercised a paramount influence on the development of the English legal system, especially on the laws relating to land. But the Chancery and the office of Chancellor existed for more than three centuries before it became a court of jurisdiction at all. The office was at first purely ministerial. The cancellarius of Rome, the officer who sat behind the screen (cancelli) was merely a secretary; and the Chancellor of the Norman kings, under whom this official first comes into notice, was simply the chief of the reyal clerks who superintended them in drawing up writs, and kept the seal. As a clerk ho was an ecclesiastic; and as an ecclesiastic nearest to the royal person, he was the king's chaplain, and "keeper of the king's conscience." Becket, when Chancellor, is described as secundus a rege; he had fifty clerks under him; he held pleas with the constable and judges of the curis regis. This came to him only by way of delegation from the Council, when to the king in Council, as the feuntain of justice, there came appeals from the lower reyal courts, and petitions in cases where these courts would not or could not do justice. By the ordinance, 22 Edward III., all petitions that were "of grace" were to be referred to the Chancellor. Henceforth petitions are addressed to the Chancellor directly. Of these early petitions most seek redress under circumstances where ordinary justice neight miscarry; as against a partial sheriff, an encroaching lord, or the keepers of a gaol So far the Chancellor was exercising only the natural authority of a king's representative; since these were eases of trespass (viet armis), in which cases the curia regis always interfored; and till modern times a bill in Chancery preserved the formal statement of a conspiracy to commit a trespass, as the ground on which the court was asked to interfere. The theory of trespass was soon enlarged, and the desire to avoid the procedures by compurgation or by ordeal of battle would cause many petitions for a hearing in the Chancery. The court was charged, too, with the preservation of royal rights, and the decision of technical points touching writs, patents, and grants issued by its clerks. Under Richard II. it was to supervise the justices of the peace; under Henry VI. to try Admiralty cases, and so on. But all this would not have created in the Chancery its distinctive jurisdiction, nor have thrown it into rivalry and oven hostility with the common law courts. Many great lawyers have treated this as a necessity inherent in the nature of law, and one paralleled in the actual system of Roman law. But the anomaly peculiar to England is that the equity, which is more or loss truly said to soften and correct while it follows the law, is administered by a separate tribunal; so that the law itself has been thrown into an attitude of jealousy towards the equity which was to supplement and expand it, and "a man might lose his suit on one side of Westminster Hall and win it on the other." This anomaly may be historically traced to the common lawyors' own resistance to progress. They took up too early the view that their system was complete; for every wrong there existed a remedy, and the remedy must be by a form of writ. Cases, therefore, that could not be brought under the existing forms of writ, would fail to obtain a hearing in the courts. The statute 13 Edward I., cap. 24, therefore ordered that the Chancery should draw up new forms of writ "for like cases falling under like law and requiring like remedy." But the judges were now disinclined to allow their system to expand. In their jealousy of the Chancery elerks, they construed the statute as narrowly as possible, were loth to allow that any new case was a "like case," and declined to admit new forms of defence at all. It followed that new greunds of action and defence were left to the Chancery Court, which, in the next century, began rapidly to extend its action. The earliest recorded equity suit before the Chanceller is a married woman's petition on an ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement, in the reign of Edward III.

The hostility shown by the Commons in Parliament to this jurisdiction was due to the vagueness in the summons of the subporns "to answer on certain matters," to the searching mode of inquiry pursued, perhaps also to the generous hearing ostentatiously offered to the poor. But their hostility embodied also the jealousy against investigation into land titles, and inter-ference with the sacred franc-tenements, and the jealousy of a jurisdiction so closely connected, by its principles and its administrators, with the Church. It is to be neticed that except from 1371 to 1386, all the Chancellors down to Sir Thomas More were ecclesiastics. The device itself of "a use," or grant, of lands to A to hold to the use of others, had originated with the Church, which bad then protected the use by spiritual sanction. On the other hand, this and other medes of acquiring rights in land for the Church had been ehecked by successive Mortmain Acts: those of Henry III., Edward I., 15 Richard II. The similar attempts made by the Commons to check growing Chancery jurisdiction failed; the rst recorded enforcement of a use by the Chancellor is in Henry V.'s reign; in that of Henry VI. uses were firmly established; till by the Wars of the Roses most of the land of England was held subject to uses. By this condition of things the legal was divorced from the actual ownership of land; the feoffee to uses merely served as a screen to cestui qui use; this latter, being "he that had the use," enjoyed the profits unburdened with the liabilities. The machinery of a use made it easy to evade in every direction the rigour of the feudal land-law; so that land could thus be conveyed by mere word of mouth, could be conveyed freely or devised by will, or charged in any way for the benefit of others; the Chancellor recognised and enforced all such dispositions. So far, it was a boon to society that the land system should thus have escaped from the feudal trammels; but it had now become an intolorable evil that the ownership of land should be just what the feudal law had guarded against, viz., secret, uncertain, and easy of transfer. Attempts had been made to remedy this; a statute of Henry VII., following a similar Act of 50 Edward IV., had set a precedent for regarding the beneficiary as the real owner in the case of debts secured on the land. So, 1 Richard III., cap. 1, allowed the beneficiary's conveyance to be valid without assent of the feoffees, and by 4 Henry VII., cap. 15, the lord could claim wardship over the heir to lands held through a use. But the final blow at the system of uses was dealt by Henry VIII. In 1534 he carried the Act which made uses forfeitable for treason, and two years later, introduced the great Statute of Uses, 27 Henry VIII., cap. 10, to put an end to the system once for all. But the narrow conservatism of the common lawyers, disguising itself as philosophical strictness of interpretation, was able to defeat the great legislative design. In the end the whole effect of the statute has been said to consist " in adding four words to every conveyance." For, following servilely the wording of the statute, the judges managed to oxelude from its scope uses where the use was founded on a leasehold interest, where the use implied some active duties, or where a further use was raised upon the first use. It was held also not to apply to copyhold lands at all, nor where a use was held by a corporate body. Here, then, were a number of cases of obligation unrecognised by the common law, and left to be enferced by the Chancery courts, which had thus by Coke's time recovered under the name of "trusts" all that bold over transactions in land which the statute was to have transferred to the law courts. In the reign of Elizabeth the first collection of Chancery precedents was made and published, and by the time of the Stuarts the jurisdiction of the court was well settled to give relief in tho same main subjects as it does now, viz.: trust, fraud, accident, extremity. Its chief developments since that time have been in the direction of "implied trusts," and especially in the protection of mortgagors' "equity of redemption," the settled property of married women, and the estates of minors. The doctrine of "specific performance" has been its own creation. The court's main instrument besides imprisonment has been the adjudication of costs, and its strongest arm the injunction. The benefits conferred on English society by the Court of Chancery have been immense. Much of its semi-criminal jurisdietion has been renounced since the seventeenth century; but the year-books and petitions enable us to judge of the value of a strong court armed with the directest authority of the crown, and deciding on enlightened principles with thus nels: evil just inst, sfer. is; a nilar dent real the 1 tho vithlaim ough m of 34 he table uced cap. r all. imon hical efeat l the id to conding clude nded plied e waa also nor юdу. liga-, and urts. ınder ranshave reign cery d by n of n tho rust, elopirecn the empmen, ne of own ment dicae inglish been sdicenth

a prompt and elastic procedure in the ages whose supreme and chronic grievance was lack of governance. It must be admitted that this equity was not always ideal justice; the very completeness of the inquiries necessitated the long delays of a Chancery suit, just as the very elasticity of the procedure introduced a certain confusion and prolixity into the pleadings. Too much was left to the Masters in Chancery and done in "secret chamber-work:" and above all, misled by the half truth that equity follows the law, there were hardships against which the Chanceliors had not, in the face of the judges, the courage to grant relief. But there were others which they holdly followed up, as in resisting, on grounds of "public policy," the creation of perpetuities, or in acting on the maxims, "Ho that seeks equity must do equity:" "Equity looks to the intent rather than the form;" "Equity considers as done that which ought to be done." But the greatest triumph has been the influence exerted by equity on the common law, which adopted the rules of equity as to the construction of deeds, tho admissibility of "set-off," the power to change the venue and grant a now trial, the repudiation of penalties in a contract. So, too, the right to make a will of land, denied at law, was granted by Chancery, and had to be adopted by statute (32 Henry VIII.). Finally, the Married Women's Property Act of 1883 is a practical monument of the victory of the Chancery and Roman law view as to the status of a married woman over the barbarous code in which her personalty was merged in that of her husband. The lay Chancellors who succeeded Sir Thomas More down to Lord Nottingham, i.e., from 1532 to 1673, contrasted unfavourably with the clerical founders of the great edifice. The Reformation interrupted the traditions of the office, and broke up the study of civil law; in the want of precedents the Chancellors relied too much on intuition and common sense (as Lord Shaftesbury, in a more settled time, 1672, essayed to do, to his own discom-This explains Selden's famous refiture). proach, half-jesting, no doubt, "Equity is a roguish thing "Tis all one as if we should make the standard for the measure of a foot the Chancellor's foot. One Chancellor has a long foot; another, a short foot; a third, an indifferent foot." The Tudor Chancellors certainly seem to have deferred to the personal leanings of the sovereign. But no such reproach could be made of this or the last century, when equity became as much "a laboured connected system, governed by established rules, and bound down by precedents, as the common law" (Lord Eldon). Still the abuses of the court were numerous, and some of them had reached a monstrous pitch. Venality was the old canker of the court, and the memory of Bacon's offence was revived by similar charges against Lord Clarendon, by the impeachment of Lord Somers (1700) for corruption, by the flagitious sale of Church patronage by Sir N. Wright, till the accumuated popular indignation burst upon Lord Macclesfield, who was dismissed and heavily fined in 1725 for misuse of the "suitors fund" and open sale of offices. But even had every official had clean hands, the abuses of delay and prolixity would have remained an intolerable burden. The Restoration gave these abuses a fresh lease of life; the use of English was not enacted till 1730, nor registries till Anne's reign, and then only for Yorkshire and Middlesex. Meantime, the abolition of the ancient Courts of Wards and of Requests, increased the business, which accumulated with the wonderful growth of wealth and population in George III.'s reign, and with the proverbial dilatoriness of Lord Eldon, who held the seal almost continuously from 1801 to 1827. Even the new office of Vice-Chancellor of England, established in 1813, failed to relieve the congestion of causes, because an appeal lay against him to the Chancellor. A successful commission was at last appointed in 1825, whose labours were not wholly thwarted either by the apathy of Eldon or the presence of a number of Chancery lawyers; for the energy of Brougham, Campbell, and Westbury in time carried out these reforms, and that which was a necessary preliminary to them, the simplification and amendment of the law of real property. Queen Victoria's reign and preceding ones did more for these objects than all the previous centuries put together; additional Vice-Chancellors and clerks have been appointed, a court of appeal established, the common law side of the court and its bankruptcy business transferred elsewhere, the suitors fund re-arranged, and the procedure gradually simplified, while the court has been empowered (1858) to impose damages, try matters of fact by a jury, and take a judge as assessor without application to a common law court. When, about the same period (1854), common law courts were given the powers of an equity court as to examination of parties, discovery of docu-ments, injunctions, &c., it became clear that the two ancient rivals were approximating to each other, and would soon be prepared to be reconciled or even amalgamated. The bill (1860) for this purpose was cut down by the influence of the Chancery lords; but in 1873 the Judicature Act was passed, which followed the advice of Lorde Brougham, Westbury, and St. Leonards, and harmonised, without attempting completely to fuse, the two systems.

In IRELAND, there was a Lord Chancellopresiding over a separate court of equity, the growth of which has followed very closely the development of the English equity system. The earliest Chancellor was Stephen Ridel, appointed in 1189. In Scotland, the functions of the Chancellor's Court in the thirteenth century were probably not very different from those of the same office in England. But as the Civil Law formed the basis of the Scottish legal system, the Chancellor became the chief administrator of law, not of an equitable system. In 1553, when the Court of Session was established, he became the chief judge of this court. In Scotland till the Reformation he was generally a churchman; and afterwards became a mere officer of state. On the union with England his separate functions were merged in those of the English Lord Chancellar.

Chandos, Sir John (d. 1369), was one of the most famous of the English generals during the French wars of Edward III,'s reign. In 1362 he was appointed Constable of Guienne, and in 1364 was sent over to Brittany to assist De Montfort, where he took Du Gueselin prisoner. In 1369 he was made Seneschal of Poitou, and in the same year fell in a skirmish.

Chandos of Sudeley (Six John Brydoes), Lord, accompanied Henry VIII. to France, 1513, when quite a boy. He greatly distinguished himself at the Battle of the Spurs (q.v.), and in 1549 successfully dended Boulogne, of which he was deputy governor, against the French. He subsequently became Lieutenant of the Tower, and had the custody of Lady Jano Grey and the Princess Elizabeth. He was a bigoted Papist, and assisted Mary in her persecution of the Reformers.

Channel Islands, The, comprise the Bailiwicks of Jersey and Guernsey, the latter of which includes Sark, Herm, and Alderney, together with some small outlying islets. They are interesting as being the last portion of the dukedom of Normandy remaining to England, which has possessed them ever since the Norman Conquest. In 550 they were granted by Childebern to a Syxon bishop, who soon afterwards converted most of the inhabitants to Christianity.

The Channel Islands came into the possession of the Dukes of Normandy in the tenth century by the grant of Charles IV., and remained attached to the English erown when Philip If, conquered the rest of Normandy from King John. After the loss of Normandy by John, the Channel Islands were attacked by the French in the reign of Edward 1., and again in that of Edward Ill., when Dn Guesclin, the Constable of France, almost succeeded in reducing them. In the reign of Henry IV., thoy did fall into the hands of the French for a short time, but were retaken shortly afterwards by Sir Henry Harleston. Under Edward VI., Sark was also lest for a time Towards the close of the sixteenth century, the Channel Islands were governed by Sir Walter Ralcigh. During the Parliamentary wars, Jersey esponsed warmly the side of the king, for which the government was put in commission by Cromwell. In 1779 the French made an ineffectual attempt to lund, and in December, 1780, sent another oxpedition, under the Baron do Rullecourt, who succeeded in taking St. Helier in Jersey, although he was subsequently defeated and slain by the British troops. At the Reformation the islands adopted a Protestantism of the Genevan type, but were eventually reconciled to Anglicanism by Bishop Andrewes, and are part of the diocese of Winchester. Though under governors appointed by the crown, they have constitutions of their own. Jersey and Guernsey (with its dependencies) have each a lieutenantgovernor and also a bailiff, who presides over the States of Deliberation, and is nominated by the crown. The States of Deliberation of Jersey and Guernsey respectively are composed of certain officials—the rectors of parishes, the judges of the courts, and elected representatives. In Guernsey the election is very indirect; in Jersey the representation is more of a popular character. The courts of justice are presided over by the bailtiff, and by elective judges. This constitution has existed with but little alteration since the time of John. Guernsey is divided into ten parishes, and Jersey into twelve, some of which are included in municipal corporations. The efficial language of the courts (whose procedure is based on the Norman) and of the legislature is still French. 'The King's writ runs in the Channel Islands.

Chapter, The, is the body of clergy attached to the cathedral. Originally, this body was the assembly of the priests of the diocese round their bishop. It was the bishop's general council, and contained within it the bishop's officials for the administration of the diocese, and the clergy who had the care of the services of the cathedral itself-

The chapter in the bishop's council soon fell into disuse, and the name was applied almost entirely to the clergy of the cathedral church itself, who soon gained a position almost independent of their bishop. Chapters in England were of two kinds-monastie and secular [Cathedral]. The monastic chapters were like monasteries, over which the bishop ranked as abbot, though the resident prior was the real head. These monks were in England Benedictines, except in the case of Carlisle, whore they were Augustinians. In the secular chapters, the dean rises into prominence in the eleventh century. work of his diocese, the necessity of constant journeys, and the increase of secular business undertaken by the bishop left the cathedrals without a head, and the chapters everywhere began to manage their business without their bishop. The theory that the chapter elected the bishops gave them at times a position of some importance, both towards the king and the Pope. Chapters frequently appealed to Rome against their bishops, and often were successful in obtaining privileges from the Pope. The separation of the chapter from the bishop became more and more definite, till the bishop was left with no powers save those of visitor over his chapter. The chief officers of the secular chapter were: the dean, who was head of the bosly; the pracentor, who superintended the services; the chanceller, who was head of the educational and literary works of the chapter; and the treasurer, who had the care of all the treasures of the Church. Besides those there were the archdeacons, who were the sole survivors of the diocesan organisation of the chapter. its other members were canons, as bound by the rule, or prebendaries, if they held an endowment besides their share of the corporate fund. This last body was generally non-resident, and their duties were performed by vicana, who are now called ricars-choral or minor canons. Under Henry VIII. the monasteries attached to the eathedrals were suppressed, and their chapters were refounded as secular chapters under a dean. After the same model the cathedrals of the new Lishoprics founded by Henry VIII. were arranged. Hence came the two classes-Cathedrals of the Old Foundation and Cathedrals of the New Foundation. [CATHEDRAL.] An Act of 1838 reformed cathedral chapters by diminishing the number of canons, reducing their incomes, and bringing all chapters to greater uniformity. Chapters at present generally consist of a dean and four camous, though some of the richer cathedrals have six canons.

Charlemont, JAMES CAULPIELD, 1 ST EARL or (b. 1728, d. 1799), was elected by the Irish Volunteers "General of the Patriot Army," in July, 1780. Soon after, he reviewed them is the north. In 1781 he opposed Catholic Emancipation, and was one of the leaders in the first and second conventions at Dunganuou, and president of the Dublin convention. He went over to England with the Regency Bill, and signed the "Round Robin" of 1789. He was also the founder of the Northern Whig Club. On his estates the rebellion of 1798 assumed. a peculiarly dangerous form. Mr. Froude speaks of him as "the most enthusiastic and the most feeble of revolutionary heroes."

Charles I., Kino (b. Nov. 19, 1600, s March 25, 1625, d. Jan. 31, 1649), second son of James 1. and of Anne, daughter of Frederick 11., King of Denmark, was born at Dunfermline. He was a handsome and athletic youth, with reserved and diffident manners. James'sbrilliant favourite, Buckingham, gained complete ascendency over him, and in 1623 the two young men went to Madrid, with the object of bringing back with them, us Charles's bride, the Infants. Buckingham, who had expected that he would readily prevail on the Spaniards to effect the restoration of the Palatinate, soon discovered his mistake; but the prince, unwilling to return home foiled in his object, refused to leave the eountry, making promises that it was impossible for him to perform, and allowing tho Spaniards to suppose that he would become a Catholic. At last, finding that if he married the Infanta he would not be allowed to take her to England until his promises were performed, he returned, along with Buckingham, to England. In opposition to promises made to Parliament, Charles gained the hand of Henrietta Maria, sister of Louis X111. of France, by consenting that the laws against English Catholics should not be enforced. Shortly before the marriage was eonsummated James died, and Charles ascended the throne. Thus, he began his reign under ill auspices. He had made to Parliament and to the King of France promises incompatible with one another, and he was under the guidance of a man whose temerity and self-confidence were about to involve his country in a series of military disasters. Charles dissolved his two first Parliaments because they refused to support the policy of the duke. To war with Spain was added war with France. Money was raised by means of a forced loan, and persons refusing to lend were imprisoned. In 1628 a third Parliament met. Charles Cerdie nother at the made concessions to public opinion by passing the Petition of Right (q.v.). Soon after the prorogation of Parliament, Buckingham was murdered by Felton; and the king for the future himself directed the policy of his government. Though Buckingham was removed, there was small hope of good understanding between Charles and the nation. Charles had no desire to make alterations in government. He, indeed, prided himself, when involved in any dispute with a subject, on having the law on his side; but he was content to rest his case on legal subterfuges, or to obtain his end by the appointment of subservient judges. Moreover, while he claimed the right to nominate ministers at will, and to pursue whatever policy seemed good to himself, he failed to perceive that the authority of his predecessors had remained unquestioned only when they had ruled in accordance with national desires and aspirations. Charles had no sympathy for the holders of Calvin's creed, who formed the majority of thoughtful and earnest men at that time. Within the Church had grown up a small party, the socalled Arminians, holding doctrines akin to those of the Church of Rome. Each party desired to suppress the other, and Charles, who favoured the Arminians, was incapable of holding the balance evenly between the twe. Parliament met again in 1629, only to be angrily dissolved, because the Commons refused to give the king a grant of tonnage and poundago until he should consent to pursue the Church policy approved by them.

For eleven years Charles ruled without Parliaments. His government became intensely unpopular. Peace was made with both France and Spain; but it was difficult to provide for the ordinary expenses out of the fixed revenue, and hence old rights of the crown were once more enforced, and money raised by means which brought little into the exchequer, while they irritated large numbers of persons. The system culminated in the imposition of ship-money, when Charles, being desirous of having a fleet in the Channel, imposed what was really a heavy tax on the country. North of the Humber, the Court of the North, under the presidency of Lord Wentworth, in the south, the Court of Star Chamber, punished by fines and imprisenment persons who refused to submit to demands of which the legality was questionable. At the same time, under the direction of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, an ecclesiastical policy was pursued which ran directly contrary to the current of popular teeling, and rendered both the bishops and the Court of High Commission objects of general odium. The attempt to impose a Church service, similar to the English, in Presbyterian Scotland, led to the rising in arms of the Scots. Charles summoned Wentworth, now created Earl of Strafford, to his side from Ireland, and called a Parliament, which he dissolved in three weeks, because it refused to support him in carrying on war against the Scots. The advance of a Scottish army into the kingdom compelled him in the autumn of this year (1641) to summon another—the celebrated Long Parliament.

Charles was for the time unable to resist the demands of the popular representatives. He gave his consent to whatever bills were offered to him, and passed a bill of attainder against his faithful servant Strafford, to whom he had promised that not a hair of his head should be injured. [Strafford; Lond Parliament.] In 1641 ho went to Scotland, with the object of forming a royalist party there, and on his return to London went in person to the House of Commons, to arrest five members, whom he accused of high treason (Jan. 3, 1642). [Five Men-ners.] The attempt having failed, he left London, to prepare for war; and on Aug. 22 the royal standard was unfurled at Nottingham. A considerable army soon gathered round him. Men who thought that the concessions already made were sufficient to prevent abuse of the royal authority, as well as all lovers of the existing form of Church service, took his side. At Edgehill, his cavalry, composed of country gentlemen, readily proved its superiority to the Parliamentarian horse. But want of subordination prevented his officers acting in union, and deprived him of victory. Charles could not maintain discipline himself, nor did he depute authority to those who possessed the art. High commands were given to the wrong men, and officers were allowed to act independently of one another. Hence, the royal strategy broke down, while the gallantry of individuals was spent in vain against the disciplined troops that Cromwell brought into the field. The passing of the Self-Denying Ordinaneo (q.v.) placed all the forces of the Parliament under the control of the Independents. Led by Fairfax and Cromwell, the remodelled army destroyed at Naseby (June 14, 1645) the last army which Charles was able to bring into the field. The king now authorised Glamorgan to conclude a secret treaty with the Irish Catholics, promising to allow them the free exercise of their religion if they would place 20,000 men at his service (Aug. 12). În April, 1646, to avoid being made a prisoner by the Parliament's officers, Charles took refuge with the Scotch army near Newark. The Scots, however, were not ready to take the part of the king while he refused to allow the establishment of a Presbyterian Church in England: and on the withdrawal of their army into Scotland in January, 1647, they surrendered him into the power of the English Parliament.

The Parliament demanded of Charles that he should abandon his right to appoint either ministers of state or officers of the militia, and that he should consent to the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in England. On the other hand, the Independents were willing that Episcopacy should be maintained, if toleration were granted to Dissenters. Charles expected to be able to play one party off against the other, and by such means to recover the whole of his former prorogatives. During the war, he had negotiated at once with Presbyterians, Independents, and Irish Catholies; and, in spite of the distrust that his conduct excited, he still pursued the same course. From Hampton Court, where he was under the charge of the army, he fled to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under the protection of Colonel Hammond, the governor of Carisbrooke Castle. Here he concluded a secret treaty with the Scots, promising to establish the Presbyterian Church in England for three years if they would send an army into England to restore him to his throne. The Civil War again revived; zeolots rose in arms, while the Scots, led by the Duke of Hamilton, crossed the border. 'airfax suppressed the Royalists, while Cromwell crushed the invaders at Warrington, in Lancashiro (Aug. 19, 1648). The army returned to London, demanding that Charles should pay with his life for the blood that he had caused to be shed. The Commons, foreibly purged of the more moderate Presbyterians, voted that it was treason for the King of England to levy war against tho Parliament and the kingdom, and passed an ordinance for instituting a High Court of Justice, compesed of men of their own party. As the Ilouse of Lords refused to take part in the proceedings, they further resolved that whatever is enacted by the Commons has the force of law without the consent of the king or the House of Peers. The trial was held publicly in Westminster Hall. One hundred and thirty-fivo judges had been named on the ordinance; but only about eighty, amongst whom were Cromwell and Ireton, attended the sittings of the court. Bradshaw, Cromwell's consin, presided. Charles was accused of having endeavoured to overturn the liberties of the people, and of being a tyrant, traitor, and murderer. He refused persistently to answer to the charge, on the ground that the court had no lawful authority derived from the people of England by which to try him. Sentenco of death was pronounced against him; and on Jan. 30, 1649, he was executed on a scaffold mised in front of the Banqueting House at Whitehall, in presence of a vast erowd, which, had the decision rested with it, would eagerly have delivered him from death. Internal affairs during the reign of Charles I, are best studied in the Ustendars of State Pa, ers (Domestic Series). The Hardwicke Papers contain materials relating to the French and Spanish matches, the expedition to the Isle of Rhé, and the Scotch troubles of 1637—41.

The Memorials and Letters published by Sir Daulel Dalrymple; The Court and Times of Charles I., by Thomas Birch; Halliwell's Letters of the Kings of England; The Letters of the Kings of England; The Letters of Charles I. to Henrietta Maria, edited for the Cumden Society by John Bruce; The Aeres of the Fire Members, by John Forster—are works which throw light on the character of the king and the motives of his actions. A Royalist account of the years 1644 and 1645, and of the negotiations carried on in the Isle of Wight in 1648, is to be found in Sir Edward Walker's Historical Discourses; and of the king's personal history during the last two years of his life, in Sir Thomas Herbert's Memoirs. For modern accounts see Rauke, Histof Eng.; and esp. S. R. Gardiner, Hist. of Eng. 1603—1642, 10 vols., 1283—84.

[B. M. G.]

Charles II., Kino (b. May 29, 1630, s. May 8, 1660, d. Feb. 6, 1685), was the eldest son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. In his ninth year he was created Prince of Wales, and when the Civil War broke out he accompanied his father at tho battle of Edgehill. In 1644 he was tho nominal head of the royal forces in the west of England; but on the decline of the royal cause he was obliged to retire to Scilly, to Jersey, and eventually to France. When matters appeared to be drawing to extremity with the king, several of the ships of the Parliament went over to the prince, who made some attempts to blockade the Thames, and even landed near Deal, but was soon obliged to withdraw to Holland, whence, in the hope of saving his father's life, ho despatched to the intending regicides a paper signed and sealed, but otherwise blank, for them to insert their own conditions. On the death of his father in January, 1649, Charles assumed the title of king, and in February he was proclaimed King of Scotland at Edinburgh. In 1650 he came over to Scotland, and, having taken the Covenant, was crowned at Seone on January 1, 1651. Charles exhibited courage and conduct in opposing Cremwell's troops before Edinburgh, but his cause was hopeless from the first, owing to the discord among his supporters. He suddenly determined to leave Scotland and march into England, and succeeded in getting as far as Worcester, where (September 3, 1651) ho received so severe a defeat that his cause seemed utterly ruined. Charles escaped from the battle, and after an adventurous flight of forty-four days, through the western counties and along the south coast-during the early part of which he owed his safety entirely to the fidelity of a labouring family-he succeeded in finding a ship near Brighton, which landed him safely in France. For the next nine yours he led a wandering life in France. Germany, and the Low Countries, sometimes relieved and sometimes repulsed, according as the various sovereigns or their ministers threw off or yielded to their dread of Cromwell. He was accompanied by a few faithful adherents; but his little court was also beset by intriguing turbulent men and spies, who betrayed his counsels and caused the numerous attempted risings of his friends both in England and Scotland. At length, on the death of Cromwell, it became obvious to most persons in England that the only hope of establishing a settled form of government and of saving the country from a military despotism, lay in restoring the menarchy; and, chiefly through the instrumentality of General Monk, Charles was invited to return to England. He at once complied, and entered London in triumph on May 29, 1660, having previously signed the Declaration of Breda (q.v.). During the first years of his reign, when the king was largely under the guidance of Clarendon, matters went smoothly. The Parliament was ardently Royalist, and supported the English Church by passing stringent luws against Catholics and Dissenters; but the failure of the Dutch War in 1665, the maladministration of the government, and the misappropriation of the public money, led to the downfall of Clarendon (1667). In 1668 (January) Sir William Temple concluded the Triple Allianco be-tween England, France, and Sweden. But the "Cabal" ministry speedily came into office, and reversed this policy for one of alliance with the French king and hostility to Holland. Finally, the infamous Treaty of Dover was signed (1670); Charles became a pensionary of Louis, and war was de-elared against Helland. The attempt of the king to get toleration for the Catholics by issuing a Declaration of Indulgence eaused the passing of the Test Act (1673) by Purliament, and the consequent fall of the Cabal administration. With this began the great struggle between the king and the opposition, headed by Shaftesbury, during which Charles showed the greatest prudence. He yielded to the storm caused by the pretended Popish Plot (q.v.), but steadily refused to alter the succession by excluding his brother James. The violence and cruckty of the Whig leaders, together with the discovery of the Rye House Plot (q.v.), turned the tide in the king's favour. He gained a complete victory over his opponents, and was able fer the last three years of his life to reign without Parliament and free from all opposition. In 1662 Charles marrie Catherine of Braganza, daughter of John of Portugal, but had ne children by her. His private life was characterised by great profligacy, and he had a large number of mistresses, and no less than twelve illegitimate children, among whem were James, Duke of Monmouth; Henry Fitzroy (son of the Duchess of Cleveland), ancestor of the Dukes of Grafton; Charles Beauelere (son of Nell Gwynn), ancestor of the Dukes of St. Albans; and Charles Lennox (son of the Duchess of Portsmouth), aneestor of the Dukes of Richmond. Charles, in spite of his licentiousness and his extremo selfishness, was possessed of much talent. The natural champion of the principle of hereditary right at a time when hereditary right was exposed to attack, Charles's position was one of considerable difficulty. He played his part dexterously, and with considerable ability, and it cannot be denied that he showed much capacity for governing.

Clarendon, Life, and Burnet, Hist. of His Own Time, both of which must be read with cantion; Barillou's Letters, and Temple's Works (and especially the Memoir from the Peace), contain much information on the diplomatic history. See also Carte, Life of Ormonde, and Macpherson, Stewart Papens; Baxter, Life and Times; Reresby, Memoirs; Pepys, Diary; Evelyn, Diary; Shaftesbury, Letters and Speeches (ed. W. D. Christie); D'Avaux, Negociations en Hollande; Masson, Life of Milton. There is a brilliant sketch of the reign in Macaulay's History. The best general modern account is in Ranke's Hist of Eng.

Charles, Edward. [Pretender, The Young.]

Charlotte Augusta, Princess (b. Jan. 7, 1796, d. Nov. 6, 1817), was the daughter of George IV. and Caroline of Brunswick. Owing to the disunion of her parents, her earlier years were passed in retirement, away from the court, under the care of the Dowager Duchess of Leeds, Lady Clifford, and the Bishop of Exeter. She early gave proofs of a noble character and intellectual qualities above the average. She was destined by her father to marry William, Prince of Orange; but her own affections had been fixed on Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who became, in 1830, King of the Belgians. Yielding to her father's desire, the princess agreed to marry the Prince of Orange, and the betrothal was . rranged between them, when the princess broke off the match, partly in anger at her father's conduct to her mother, partly because of her repugnance to the prince. In 1815 she was married to Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, and in the following year (Nov.) died in giving birth to a son, who did not survive her. Her death caused great grief throughout the entire nation

Charmouth is a village on the Dersetshire coast, about two miles from Lyme Regis. In 836 Egbert was defeated here by the Danes, and in 840 his son Ethelwulf met with a like disaster at the same place.

Charnock, Robert (d. 1696), a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, became a Roman Catholic, and supported James in his illegal ejection of the Protestant Fellows of his eollege by means of the Court of High Commission. After the Revolution, he became one of the most active of the Jacobite conspirators, and was among the chief organisers of the Assassination Plot (1696). He was arrested, and his trial began on March 11. The new Act ir regulating procedure in cases of high treason was not to come into force until the 25th. It allowed the prisoner to examine his witnesses on oath, compel their attendance at court, and have the service of counsel. The prisoners, Charnock, King, and Keyes, claimed, not without reason, to have their trial postponed till that date. Their request was, however, refused, and they were all condemned. Charnock left behind him a paper in which ho justified the plot, on the ground that William was a usurper, and by an appeal to the laws of human society. [Assassination Plot.]

Charter, THE GREAT, &c. [MAGNA CARTA, &c.]

Charter Schools (IRELAND). In 1730, an association, with the primote, Archbishop Boulter, and the Lord Chancettor, at its head, was formed to provide Protestant education gratis for the Catholic poor. Before that time, in spite of a statute of Henry VIII., Protestants had to rely on private enterpriso entirely as far as education was concerned. In 1733 a charter was granted to the association, but only on condition that the endowment was not to exceed £2,000 a year. On Oct. 24, 1733, the corporation began its work; day-schools and boarding-schools were established. They were really industrial schools. After five years' schooling, children were bound out as apprentices at the expense of the society (girls got a small portion on marrying), and the whole cost of education for one child came, in the day-schools, to only £9 per annum. The boarding-schools increased from four to fifty, and George II. granted £1,000 from his privy purse in their support. The day-schools soon came to an end, but the boarding-schools were supported by parliamentary grants after 1745, when a special tax was devoted to this object. Altogether, by 1767, £112,000 had been devoted to the Charter schools. In 1750, parents were forbidden to take back their children, when once they had entered, and thus to prevent their becoming Pretestants. Soon afterwards the society was allowed to take up all children between five and twelve found loitering about, and put them into their schools. However, by 1757, whether it was on account of the determination of the Catholics not to be entired into ehanging their children's religion, or for other reasons, it became chart that the Charter schools were a failure. . Howard, in 1758, investigated this school system, and brought to light great abuses; a parliamentary committee appointed in consequence found children who had been at school for twelve years unable to spell. Still, for twenty-five years after the Union they continued to exist, and vast sums were spent on the education of some 2,000 c1 ildren. Mr. Froude calls the Charter schools "the best-conceived cducational institutions which existed in the world," while Mr. Leeky says of them that they "excited in Ireland an intensity of bitterness hardly equalled by any portion of the penal code." Of one thing there can be no doubt: they completely failed in their object—the conversion of the Irish peasautry to Protestantism.

Stevens, The Charter Schools; Froude, English in Ireland; Lecky, Hist, of Eng. in the Eighteenth Century, vol. ii.

Chartists (1838-48) was the namo given to the members of a party in England who supported certain reforms which were generally known as the "People's Charter." The Charter consisted of six points, viz.: (1) man-hood suffrage; (2) equal electoral districts; (3) vote by ballot; (4) annual Parliaments; (5) abolition of property qualification for numbers; (6) payment of members. These points seem first to have been urged together at a meeting held at Birmingham on August 6, 1838, where the chief speakers were Attwood, Scholefield, and Feargus O'Connor. A similar meeting was held in London in the following September. During the following year the cause was advocated by tumultuous meetings and processions, which had to be put down by tho law, and a petition, the size of a coach-wheel, said to be signed by a million and a quarter petitioners, was rolled into the House of Com-Riots took place at Birmingham, Newcastle, and Newport. Feargus O'Connor was arrested. On May 2, 1842, another monster petition, purporting to contain more than three million signatures, was brought to the House of Commons. Mr. T. Duncombe proposed that the petitioners should be heard at the bar by counsel, while Macaulay, Peel, and Roebuck spoke on the other side. After this the agitation slumbered till 1848, when a huge meeting was held on Kennington Common ou April 10. The intention was to car y to the House of Commons a mouster petition with five million signatures. There was great fear lest London should be the scene of a rising, and the Duke of Wellington took measures for protecting the Bank, Custern House, Exchange, Post Office, and other public buildings. A quarter of a million inhabitants of London were enrolled as special constables. The duke disposed his troops with masterly skill, so as to keep them out of sight. The meeting proved a failure, owing to dissensions between the leaders of the Chartists, and no disturbance took place. Similar precautions were again taken in June, but the threatened demonstration ended in smoke. On August 16 an arrest of armed Chartists was made at tho "Orange Tree" public-house, in Orango Street, London, and some more in Green Street. It was understood that there was a plot to attack the different clubs about midnight, and also the principal buildings in tho metropolis. The chief ringleaders were tried and punished. This latter outbreak of Chartism was connected with the revolutionary disturbances which took place throughout Europe in 1849. After this, Chartism expired, and agitation took a different form. It is strange that reforms so unequal in importance, and some of them so little calculated to effect the end aimed at by their promoters, should have been the cated with such an amount of passion.

Annual Register; S. Walpole, Hist, of Eng.; McCarthy, Hist. of Our Own Times.

Chartley Manor, in Staffordshire, was at one time the place of Mary Queen of Scots' imprisonment. In 1585—86 she was at her own request removed here from the care of Sir Amyas Paulet at Tutbury. Chartley was well known to Walsingham's spy Gifford, and this afforded the latter exceptional facilities for copying the treasonable correspondence of the captive queen.

Chatham was a village of small importance till the establishment of a dockyard and naval arsenal in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when preparations were being made to resist the Spanish Armada. The dockyards were improved under Charles I. and the Commonwealth, and the fortifications strengthened after the attack of the Dutch in 1667. These were enlarged and strengthened between 1757 and 1808, and during the nineteenth century Chatham was rendered one of the most important dockyards and strongest naval fortresses in the world.

Chatham, William Pitt, 1st Earl of (b. Nov. 15, 1708, d. May 11, 1778), was the grandson of a former governor of Madras, who had returned to England to buy estates and rotten boroughs, one of which, Old Sarum, he represented in Parliament. His son Robert succeeded him, and sat in turn for the two boroughs of Old Sarum and Okehampton. Of Robert Pitt's two sons, William was the younger. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Oxford, but he left Oxford, without taking a degree, to travel on the Continent on account of the gout, to which he was throughout his life a victim. He came back from his tour to fit . his father dead and himself but slenderly provided for. As a profession he chose the army, and obtained a cornetcy in the Blues; but his family interest in 1735 procured for him the seat of Old Sarum. In April, 1736, the Prince of Weles married Augusta, Princess of Saxe Gotha; and it was on the address which was presented to the king on this occasion that Pitt took the opportunity of delivering his first speech, which made a deep impression on the House. This impression was soon justified, as he became so troublesomo to the government, that Sir Robert Walpole dismissed him from the army. The Prince of Wales, however, recompensed him by making him his Groom of the Bedchamber, from which position he could in security declaim against the peace policy of the ministry. In 1742 Walpole resigned; and it was for some time doubtful who would succeed him. Pitt seems to have made overtures to Walpole, which the retiring minister rejected. In the new government that was formed under Carteret, Pitt was entirely left out. He vented his disappointment in the fiercest invectives against Walpolo, and in advocating the most violent measures for his prosecution. All his violence failed to injure Sir Robert, now the Earl of Orford, who retired into private life, and left Pitt free to transfer his attacks to Carteret, who now held the reins. The chief object of his indignation was the prevailing method of subsidising with English money petty German States, for the benefit of the family estates of the House of Brunswick. The old Duchess of Marlborough died in October, 1744, and left Pitt a legacy of £10,000 "in consideration of the noble defence he had made for the laws of England, and to prevent the rain of his country." But Pitt's ambition d'd not lie in the direction of money; and on the elevation of Curteret to the House of Lords he saw a chance of advancement. To take advantage, however, of the chance, it was necessary for him to conciliate the king; and he accordingly resigned his office in the household of the Prince of Wales, and by the exertions of the Pelhams, against the king's wishes, he was appointed early in 1746 to the post of Paymaster of the Forces. The government continued in security until the death of Henry Pelham, in 1754, threw it into con-fusion. It devolved on the Duke of Newcastle to form a ministry. His great difficulty was as to the leadership of the House of Commons; and the rival claims of Pitt and Fox to that office were settled by a compromise in the person of Sir Thomas Robinson, an inoffensive mediocrity. Pitt was appointed secretary of state, and Fox retired to the lucrative Pay Office; but before a year was over they had combined to render their leader so ridiculous that Newcastle was compelled to make a change. Pitt was intractable on the subject of subsidies; and the duke turned to Fox, who became secretary of state, with the entire lead of the House of Commons and the management of the funds for corruption. On the resignation of Newcastle, in November, 1756, the Duke of Devenshire succeeded him as first lord of the Treasury, with Pitt as first secretary of state and virtual prime minister. The ministry was odious to the king, who said that he was not a king while he was "in the hands of these scoundrels;" and in April. 1757, Pitt and Lord Temple were dismissed from their offices. But the contumely which Pitt had experienced from the court only served to raise him in the estimation of the country at large. The freedom of the City was granted to him; all the great towns of England followed the example set by the Corporation of London; and "for some weeks," says Walpole, "it rained gold boxes." During his short term of office Pitt found time and courage to pass several important measures, including his bold schome of pacifying the discontented Highlanders by embodying them in the regular army. Newcastle having failed to form a ministry, an agreement was at longth arrived at between the duke and Pitt, through the mediation of Lord Chesterfield. The king, however, refused to receive Pitt as a minister, and persuaded Lord Waldegrave to accept with great reluctance the premiership. But without Pitt it was impossible for any min' try to work; and Lord Waldegrave's broke up almost before it was formed. The king was obliged to yield to necessity. Newcastle took the Treasury; Pitt became secretary of state, with the load of the Lower House; and Fox was silenced by the gains of the Pay Office. Pitt had told the Duko of Devoushire that he was sure he could save the country, and that no one else could. And he lost no time in setting about the task. His early plans, however, were not attended with seess. An expedition against Rochefort failed through the bad management of the land forces. In Germany, Cumberland was compelled to sign the humiliating Convention of Kloster-Seven. In India, the conspicuous success of Clive in some measure compensated for these misfortunes. The war was vigorously carried on threughout 1758 in every part of the globe where Freuchmen could be found; still the year was marked by no great victories on either side. But in 1759 Pitt's energy, and his tact in choosing men, were everywhere rewarded by the extraordinary successes by laad and sea which marked that year of victory. These victories gave Pitt a position of extraordinary influence. He was known as the "great continuoner;" and the Houses of Parliament no less than the people at large were hushed into awe and reverence by the success of his measures. But the death of George II, on October 25, 1760, changed the face of affairs; and it was clear that the new king's partiality for Lord Bute would be more powerful than the nation's leve of Pitt. In March, 1761, Parliament was dissolved; and with it the ministry began to break up. Bute was made secretary of state in the place of Lord Holderness. But Pitt was determined, if possible, to save the country from a degrading peace; and he held on until finding his brother-in-law, Lord Temple, alone supported him in the council in his desire for war with France and Spain, he resigned on October 5, 1761. He had seorned all premotion and all gains for himself, but accepted a peerage for his wife, who was created Baroness Chatham. In Nov., 1762, peace was made with France; and Bute could no longer stand before the open opposition of Pitt and the fury of the nation, and in April, 1763, he resigned. A new ministry was formed out of the followers of the Duke of Bedford and those of Grenville, whose tenure of office was signalised by the persecution of Wilkes, and the still more fatal attempt to tax the American colonies. Pitt meanwhile opposed all his elequence to the doctrine of the legality of general warrants, and pointed out the mischief of Grenvillo's scheme for colonial taxation. His health became very bad, and he retired into the country and took no part in the debates on the Regency Bill. This bill, however, was the ruin of the Bedford ministry; and the king resolved to 'rid of Grenville's bullytures were twico made Duke of Cumberland; ing arrogance. to Pitt throu hut they faile .o retired to his estate in Somersetshir .s if bent on finally withdrawing from public life; and the Rockingham ministry was formed. In January, 1766, Pitt came up to London, and by his able assistance enabled the ministry to carry the repeal of the Stamp Act. The government was, however, too weak to stand; and in July Pitt at length consented to bre Temple, and to form a ministry wit But he was suffering both mentally and physically: he could not stand the s rain of the House of Commons; he accepted the Privy Seal, and was created Earl of Chalham. It was felt throughout the country tha he had been gained over to the court; and the popularity, which had been so lavish'y bestowed on him as the "great commoner," failed to follow him to the Upper House. His policy was as energetic and comprehensive as ever; but his mind was unhinged, and at last gave way so far as to incapacitate him for all public business. He was taken to Hayes, and remained there in gloomy seclusion for two years. In October, 1768, he resigned the Privy Seal, and the ministry came to an end. Soon after his resignation, Chatham's mental malady passed away before an attack of the gout sharper than usual. In July, 1769, he once more appeared at court, after a reconciliation had been effected with the Grenvilles, and in the following January he again took his place among the Lords. He had lost none of his old power, and his first speech, inveighing against the policy pursued by the government towards America and in relation to the Middlesex election, was the signal for the resignation of Lord Camden and the Marquis of Granby. The Duke of Grafton himself, wearied by the continual onslaughts made upon him, and finding it impossible any longer to prop up his falling ministry, sent in his resignation on January 22. Lord North proceeded to form a ministry after the king's own heart, which would be content to carry out the king's wishes. Wilkes and America continued to be the chief topics; North in both points adhered to the policy of his predecessors, and Chatham continued to wago war against it. He warmly advocated the repeal of the Test Acts, for which a bill was introduced. During the greater part of 1773 he employed himself in the study of India, and became strongly convinced of the "necessity of a reformation of Indian iniquities." But as the clouds every month thickened in America, they dispelled all other thoughts, and caused mm more and more to dread the application of coercion to the colonists. The Boston Port Bill heightened his alarm; and in May 1774, he appeared in Parliament "to stand for England and America." In Jan., 1775, he moved an address to the king, praying him to adopt a conciliatory policy towards America by removing the forces from Boston, and he followed up this motion by presenting to Parliament a plan for the prevention of civil war. The object of his conduct was, as he himself briefly expressed it, "to secure to the colonies property and liberty, and to ensure to the mother country a duo acknowledgment on the part of the colonics of their subordination to the supreme legislativo authority and superintending power of the Parliament of Great Britain." As long as there was any hope of the attainment of these two ends, Chatham was as warm an advocate as anyone for granting liberty to the colonies; but when the news of the capitulation of Burgoyne came in Dec., 1777, followed almost immediately by the announcement of the alliance of America and France, it became clear that the Americans would be content with nothing hort of entire independence; and Chatham was as firm in his opposition to this concession "... he had been zealous in favour of vand justice. At this point granting Chatlu . Lr from his long agreeam's party, and carried ment with Shelbu... ia: speech in Parliament; he made . and the effort was too much for him. He was carried to Hayes, and there died on May 11th. A monument was raised to him in Westminster Aboey at the expense of tho nation. Lord Chatham was essentially a war minister. It has been said of him that whenover a cannon in Europe was fired he required to know the reason. The epitaph on his monument in Westminster Abbey says, truly enough, that during his administration Great Britain was exalted "to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former Chatsworth, in North Derbyshiro, tho property of the Cavendish family, was in 1570, 1578, and 1581 the prison of Mary Queen of Scots. It was subsequently garrisoned by the Roundheads in 1643, and by the Cavaliers two years later.

Cheke, Sir John (b. 1514, d. 1557), is well known as the tutor of King Edward VI., whose education he undertook in conjunction with Sir Anthony Cook. In reward for his services he was made Provost of King's College, Cambridge, and a Privy Councillor. On the accession of Mary, Cheko was imprisoned for the sympathy which he had shown for the cause of Lady J. ac Grey, from whom he had accepted the office of Secretary of State. On his release he went abroad and settled at Strasburg, but, having gone to visit Sir John Mason at Brussels, was captured on the way, and sent to England, where he was confined in the Tower. Cheke, who was a zealous Protestant, and "one of the most godly men of those days," was kept in confinement until hard usago wrung from him a renunciation of his real convictions. He was then released, but is said to have died of shame at his recantation. He was a voluminous and able writer, and did much for the literature of England. Besides being the tutor of King lward VI., ho was the tutor of William C. II, Lord Bur-He was one of th earliest and greatest of English Greek scholars of the Renaissance; and in particular set himself to reform the corrupt pronunciation of his time. His fame was still living at Cambridge in Milton's days, and the poet refers to him in Sonnet XI. :-

"Thy Age, like ours, O soul of Sir John Cheke, Hated not learning worse than toad or asp, When thou taught at Cambridge and King Edward Greek."

Chester was probably a Roman military station, as its Celtic name, "Caerleon Vawr, would seem to attest. It is called Deva in the Roman geographical writings, and would seem, at any rate, to have been a tradingplace of importance. In 894 it was captured by the Danes, who were, however, forced to surrender it to the English. It was a place of considerable importance as being the frontier town of the Welsh Marches. The Conqueror established an earldom of Chester, and Hugh Lupus, his nephew, became its palatine. He built the castle and founded the abbey of St. Werburgh. In 1237 the earldom was seized by Henry III., and has since been a In 1300, Edward, Prince of royal appanage. In 1300, Edward, Prince of Wales, received the homage of the Welsh princes at Chester; and here for a time Henry IV. held Richard II. captive. The city suffered severely in the plagues of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and especially in 1602-5. In 1642 Charles I. arrived in Chester. The citizens were warmly Royslist. From July, 1643, until 1646, the city was continuously besieged or blockaded by the Parliamentarian forces, and at last honomably surrendered in February of the latter year. Great riots occurred on the occasion of the visit of the Duke of Monmouth in the year 1683. Chester was created a bishopric by Henry VIII. in 1541, and its fine abbey church of St. Werburgh became the cathedral.

Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stannorg. 4TH EARL OF (b. 1694, d. 1773), was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. On the accession of George I., he was made Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the Prince of Wales. He sat as member for St. Germans in 1715. The division between the Prince of Wales and the court soon drove him into opposition in spite of the entreaties of his relative, Goneral Stanhope, and he joined the discontented Whigs. [Walrolz.] llo had great expectations from Georgo II. on his accession; but had the misfortune to offend Queen Caroline. The death of his father in the previous year removed him to the Upper House. In 1728 ho was sent as ambussador to the Hague, and on his return was made High Stoward of the Household, but was dismissed in 1733 by Walpolo for his opposition to tho Excise schemo. Forthwith he becamo a prominent member of the Opposition, and in 1737 mado a magnificent speech against the Playhouse Bill. In 1741 ho went abroad; and at Avignon met Ormonde, with whom it is said he attempted to concert measures for a Jacobite combination against Walpole. He was excluded from office under Pelham's administration; and continued in opposition, directing his attacks especially against the employment of Hanoverian troops, and the foreign policy of Carteret. At length, in 1744, the king's repugnance was so far overcome that he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. His administration of this office deserves the highest praise, and his firm government checked any tendency there might be to imitate the example of the Scotch revolters in 1745. In 1745 he was again sent to Holland, where his negotiations induced the Dutch to send troops to the campaign which terminated in the buttle of Fontency. In 1746 he became Secretary of State. He aimed at governing the king through the latter's mistress, Lady Yarmouth, but finding he could make no progress in bringing about a peace, he resigned in 1748. He still continued to speak, and in 1751 proposed and carried out the reformation of the calendar. In 1752 he lost his hearing. In 1757 he was asked to negotiato between Pitt and Newcastle during the intrigues which led to the formation of that great ministry known by their names. In 1768 his natural son, Philip, the object of the greatest care and affection on his part, and to whom he had addressed his fumous Letters to his Son on which his literary fame largely rests, died, and from that time Chesterfield's life was desolate and cheerless. "Chesterfiold was," says his biographer, Dr. Maty, "a nobleman unequalled in his time for variety of talents, brilliancy of wit, and elegance of conversation." Lord Stanhope, referring to his political career, says that "diplomacy was especially swited to his tastes and talents. At home, his career, though never inspired by a high and pervading patriotism, deserves the praise of humane, liberal and far-sighted policy. His defects were a want of generosity, dissimulation earried beyond justifiable bounds and a looseness of religious principle."

Maty's Life, prefixed to Chesterfield's Works, 2 vols., 1777.

Cheyne, Sir Thomas, Treasurer of the Household to Henry VIII., was appointed one of the Council of Executors by the king's will, 1547. Having served in the Scottish expedition of 1547, he was made Warden of the Cinque l'orts, and in 1549 he was sent on behalf of the Council to the Emperor Charles V. In 1553 he is found in strong opposition to Northumberland's scheme of altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey, and in Wyatt's Rebellion (q.v.), 1554, he did good "crvice for the queen in Kent."

Chichele, HENRY (b. circa 1362, d. 1443), is said to have owed his education to William of Wykoham, and certainly was a student on Wykeham's foundations at Winchester and Oxford. Ho was frequently employed on diplomatic business by Henry IV., and in 1408 was made Bishop of St. Davids. In 1409 he was one of the English delegates to the Council of Pisa, and in 1414 was raised to the see of Canterbnry. He accompanied Henry V. on his second and third expeditions to France, and crowned Queen Catherine. Chichele has been greatly blamed for inciting Henry V. to go to war against France, and it was generally believed that the French war was encouraged by the clergy, to divert popular attention from the wealth, luxury, and corruption of the Church. But this view rests on no historical basis, though it is not improbable that Chichele and the other bishops did lend their sanction to the king's ambition. Chichele is also accused of being a persecutor, but it would seem that his aversion to the Lollards was political rather than religious; for that seet was regarded as hestile to the dynasty, and a fee to all social order as well as to the Church. During Henry VI.'s reign, Chiehelo seems to have confined himself almost entirely to his clerical duties. In 1437 he founded All Souls College at Oxford, and in 1443, attended by four of his suffragares, visited Oxford, where he was received with great honour, and opened the college and consecrated the chapel. In the same year he wrote to the l'ope, saying that his age and infirmities rendered him unable to discharge the duties of his office, and praying that he might be allowed to resign his archbishopric. Before his intended resignation could be accomplished he was removed by death. Chichele boldly resisted the pretensions of the Pope, who was desirous of getting the Statute of Præmunire repealed, and when the papal party retaliated by accusing him of avarice, the barons, the bishops, and the University of Oxford came forward to bear testimony to the marits of the archbishop.

Chichester, ARTHUR. LORD (b. 1563, d. 1625), was Lord-Deputy of Ireland from 1604 to 1614, when he became Lord High Treasurer. It was under his government that the Plantation of Ulster was carried out. One result of the colonisation of Ulster was the possibility to summon an Irish perliament in which the representatives of the native Irish should be in a permanent minority. This should be in a permanent minority. parliament met in 1613, for the first time in twenty-seven years, and at once broke into open discord. The subjects in dispute were referred to the King, and in February, 1614, Chichester was commanded to return to England to give an account of the state of the country. On his return to Ireland in the same year instructions were given him to recur to the policy of driving the Irish by persecution into the Protestant church. Chichester, however, obtained their practical modification, and some approach was made to an understanding between the Irish Roman Catholics and the Government. In August, 1614, the King ordered the dissolution of the Parliament, and three months later Chichester was recalled. Though no reason was publicly given for his recal!, there are grounds for believing that the real motive lay in his opposition to any new attempt to persecute the Roman Catholics. He was, however, on his return treated with every show of honour, and was made Lord Treasurer of Ireland, a post more dignified than influential. The lands of Sir Cahir O'Doherty of Innisowsn were granted to Chichester, and formed the bulk of the large estates left by him to the present representatives of the family, the Marquises of Donegal.

Chichester, a cathedral town, is built on the site of a Roman settlement, and is generally identified with Regnum mentioned in the Itinerary of Antoninus. It appears to have been a place of some trade. The town was destroyed by Ella, and restored by his son, Cisea, from whom it received its modern name. The see was originally at Selsey, and was removed to Chichester in 1083. The cathedral was built upon the site of a monastery of St. Peter. Begun in 1091, it suffered more than once from fire, and its different parts show many periods-Norman,

Early English, Decorated, and Perpendicular. The building suffered much at the hands of the Parliamentary troops which were quartered in it. The city was incorporated in 1213. The town was Royalist in the Civil War, but in December, 1642, was surrendered to the Parliamentarians after un sight days' siege. It was recaptured by the Royalists in the following December, but had again to surrender to Waller a month later after a siege of seventeen days. Among the prisoners of war was the famous Chillingworth, who died here, and lies burisd in the cathedral.

Childers, Hunn Cullino Earnley (b. 1827, d. 1896), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and went to Australia in 1850, and was inspector of schools in Melbourne in 1851. Later he was made secretary to the education department and emigration agent at the port of Melbourne, and in 1852 hecame auditor-general and a member of the Legislative Council. The following year he was collector of customs and a member of the Executive Council. He was the first Vice-Chancellor of Melbourne University. 1857 he returned to England as agent-general for Victoria. He was elected member of Parliament for Pontefract in 1860, and was on the royal commission on penal servitude ln 1863. In 1865 he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and appointed First Lord of the Admiralty and Privy Councillor in 1868. He resigned office in 1871. In 1872 he became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and Secretary of State for War in 1880, and produced a successful scheme of army reform in the following year. He was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1882, and in the following year formulated a great scheme for reducing the national debt (q.v.). In 1886 he became Home Secretary, and supported Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill. The state of his health precluded him from becoming a candidate at the General Election of 1892.

Chillian walls, The Battle or (Jan. 13, 1849), was fought during the second Sikh War. After an interchange of shots from the Sikh and English pickets, Lord Gough gave the word to attack the position of Shere Sing at three in the afternoon, General Campbell [CLYDE] moved forward his division in two brigades. His own victoriously advanced to the front, seized and spiked the guns; but the second was torn to pieces by a fire of grape and musketry, and the attack would have failed had not General Campbell advanced rapidly to the rescue, and captured the guns which were pouring in this deadly fire. Sir Walter Gilbert's two divisions were successful on the right, but not without serious loss. The cavalry brigade under Brigadier Pope got entangled in trees and brushwood, and owing to some mistaks, retreated, but the left brigade, under Sir Joseph Thackweil, behaved with great galiantry. The result was that when darkness put an end to the struggle Lord though found himself master of unknown ground in the dark, and unvertain as to the whereabouts of the enemy, after a victory which was the nearest possible approach to a defeat. He was compelled, therefore, to withdraw to Chillianwaila. [Sikh Wars.]

Chillingworth, William (b. 1602, d. 1644), was educated at Oxford, and obtained a followship at Triaity College. By the efforts of a Jesuit, John Fisher, as was converted to the Roman Catholic communion. Chillingworth's conspicuous abilities made him an important convert, and the Josuita determined to find him employment. In 1630 he went to the college of Douny, where he was urged to write an account of the motives which led him to make his religious change. He undertook the task, but felt it his duty to weigh afresh the arguments in favour of the Protestant religion, and Laud, then Bishop of London, began a series of letters to Chillingworth, for whom he had acted us godfather. The result was that in 1631 Chillingworth left Douay and returned to Oxford, where he pursued his theological inquiries with an impartial mind. In 1634 he again declared himself to be a Protestant, and wrote a statement of the reasons which induced him to adopt the Roman Catholic falth, together with a refutation of them. He became, in 1638, Chancellor of Salisbury and Prebendary of Brixworth. In the Civil War he accompanied the King's forces, though his heart sank within him to see "publicans and sinners on the one side, against Scribes and l'harisees on the other." He took an active part in the operations at the siege of Gloucester, and was taken prisoner at the capture of Arundel Castle. Being very ill, he was allowed to remove to the palace of Chichester, where he died. He was the author of a famous tract, called, The Religion of Protestants: a Sufe Way to Salvation, first published in 1638, and very frequently reprinted.

Chiltern Hundreds, THE, as the hundreds of Bodenham, Desborough and Stoke, in Buckinghamshire, are called, have attached to them a Stewardship, the helder of which office was charged with the duty of keeping down the robbers who infested the woods of the Chiltern Hills. At the present time the office is used for an interesting purpose. As a member of the House of Commons cannot by parliamentary law resign his seat unless he becomes disqualified either by the acceptance of a place of honour and profit under the crown, or by some other cause, a member wishing to retire applies for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds which is held to be such and necessarily entails the vacation of the seat. The stewardship is usually granted as a matter of course, though it has been refused in a case of bribery. As soon as it is obtained it is again resigned, and is thus generally vacant when required by a member of Parliament. This method of evading the restriction as to the resignation of a member of Parliament appears to have come into practice in the reign of George II., about 1750. The gift ites with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the event of two applications being made for the post at the same time, the stewardship of the manors of East Ilundred, Hempholme and Northstead, is bestowed on one of the applicants.

China, RELATIONS WITH, cannot be said to have existed much earlier than the beginulng of the seventeenth century, though there was, no doubt, imilrect intercourse at a much earlier date between English merchants and "Cathay." For instance, the Florentine house of Bardl, which had extensive mouetary dealings with Edward III., had also a coasiderable brule with China. The first attempts of the East India Company to establish a commercial station at Canton, in 1637, were unsuccessful, as were others made in 1668, but in 1670 a trade was opened with Formosa, and a treaty conclude l. Ten years later a factory was established at Canton. After the accession of the Manchoo or Tartar dynasty, however (1679), a hostile policy, caused, perhaps, by the misconduct of the Portugueso, was adopted towards foreign traders. Trade, which had spread to several ports, was confined to Canton, and was there conducted with difficulty, owing to the dishonesty of the Hong merchants and the extertions of the mandarins. This unsatisfactory state of affairs, varied by quarrels between the East India Company, the French, and Portuguese, continued down to 1792, when Lord Macartney was sent as the first English ambassador to the court of Pekin with presents to the emperor, to place the relations between the two countries on a secure and proper footing. But though the ambassador and members of his suite were courteously treated, he was thable to effect the removal of the restrictions on trade, and Lord Amherst, who was despatched thither in 1816, was dismissed for refusing to perform the "kowtow," or prostration, before the emperor, and thereby acknowledge his own sovereign to be but a vassal of the Chinese empire.

In 1834, when the monopoly of the East India Company expired, it was determined to send out a trade commissioner to the port of Canton. Lord Napier was the first, but he soon gave way beneath the anxieties of his position. Soon afterwards the Chinese authorities began to protest against the introduction of opium by English traders, an import forbidden by law. The irritation grew, until, in 1839, the Chinese authorities insisted on the confiscation of a large quantity of the drug, which they burnt. This proceeding Captain Elliott, the Commissioner of Trade, seems to have considered as a celelaration of war. With the arrival of the fleet from India in the following year, the First Chinese War (April, 1839—March, 1841) began. The island of Chusan was promptly taken, and the capital threatened. The Chinese thereupon sued for peace, but negotiations were broken off, and Hong Kong and Amoy feil, and Nanking was menaced. Thereupon hostilities were again suspended, and in 1842 Sir Henry Pottinger concluded a treaty hy which the Chinese agreed to throw open five additional ports to European trade and pay an indemnity of some four and a half millions sterling, togeth: with a million and a quarter as compensation for the destroyed opium, which sum the English merchants declared to be below their loss.

The relations between England and China continued to be fairly pacific until 1855, when the seizure of the lorcha (or curter), Arrow, by the Chinese authorities, on the charge of piracy, was the cause of the Second Chinese War (Oct., 1855-May, 1858). The vessel was undoubtedly of a suspicious character, but she had obtained a British registration, and in consequence Sir John Bowring demanded the surrender of the captured men. which was done, but all apology was refused by Yeh, the governor of Cauton. Thereupon the town was bomharded and taken by the English, the Taku forts fell in 1858, and the English commissioner, Lord Eigin, concluded a treaty at Tientsin by which transit-dues were considerably reduced, and an indemnity of four millions agreed upon. In 1859, however, the English Minister. Sir F. Bruce, was fired upon from the Taku forts while sailing up the river to carry out the ratification of the treaty at Peking, Lord Elgin was promptly sent out, together with a force under Sir Hope Grant, who was assisted by the French. The Taku forts fell, and the emperor, in order to save Peking, agreed to the ratification of the Treaty of Tientsin, with many important additional stipulations, the most important of which were that the sovereigns of Great Britain and China might, if they saw fit, appoint ambassadors, ministers, or other diplomatic agents to their respective courts, and that the British representative should not be required to perform any ceremony derogatory to him as representing the sovereign of an independent nation of an equality with China. Shortly afterwards Major Charles Gordon entered the Chinese service, and aided the government in crushing the Tai-ping rehels.

Once more (1876) the relations with England became strained, partly owing to the murder of Mr. Margary on the Chinese frontier, and partly to the refusal of the government to publish the treaties by which the British were empowered to establish a trade route from China to Burmah. At one time war seemed imminent, but was averted by the firmness and tact of Sir Thomas Wade who, in the following year, by the Chefin Convention, established the rights of foreigners to travel and protection.

The chief events which have of inte years brought Great Britain into contact with China are the Chino-Japanese War and the Boxer rising of 1900. At the conclusion of the Chino-Japanese War (1895) the Treaty of Shimonoseki opened four more ports, viz., Chung-King, Hung-Chow, Soc low, and Sha-Taze. Great Britain insisted that no part of the Yangtase Basin should be ailenated, but that that region must be considered as a British "sphere of influence"; and oc-cupied Wei-Hal-Wei on an extensible lease. Generally speaking, Great Britain insisted on the policy of the "Open Door," that is, that no European country should seek to restrict the trade of any other European country with China. In April, 1900, the Boxer outhreak was signalised by riots at Pekin, and the murder of missionaries and native Christians. In June the Foreign ambassadors were besieged in the legations. The besieged garrison cons ted of less than 500 officers and men, and anxiety for its safety was intensified by the fact that there were many women and ohiidren to be protected. An international force under Admirai Seymour set out to relieve the legations, but was driven back. The troops, however, occapied Tientsin in July. For eight weeks the legations held out against a series of vioient attacks. In these attacks Chinese Imperial troops took part, though the Govern-ment nominally doprecated the Boxer outment nominally doprecated lieved by an hreak. It was some montile before the Powers could agree on the demands to be made in satisfaction of ir. .. wies, and to ensure future se un'y, but these var eventually formulated on e. 19. They included the destruct..... of the laku forts, the reform of the Tsung-Li-Yamen, and the punishment of individual offenders. A peace protocol embodying these terms was signed on Jan. 14, 1901. The total indemnity was fixed at £65,000,000, to be paid within thirty-nine years; Princes Tuan and Lan were to be banished; and six high officials were to be executed. Japanese executed two who were in their hands, and the Chinese reported four as having been put to death in the interior. The Tsung-Li-Yamên was abolished, and replaced by another board known as the Wai-Wu-Pu. Foreign troops evacuted Peking on Sept. 17, but the legations were allowed increased guards.

In 1992 the British Government announced a change of policy as regards Wei-Hai-Wei. The place is not to be the seat of a large garrison, but to be used as a sanatorium and for small arm naval practice. The Chinese regiment, which had been enrolled, was then reduced from 1,000 men to 400, and in 1907 was disbanded. On Jan. 7, 1902, the Court returned to Peking, and the Dowager Empress lavished attentions upon the ladies of the legations, and shed teurs over the unhappy events of 1900. The formation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance on Jan. 30 was a proof of the importance which the two countries allied attach to the preservation of the integrity of the Chinese can describe the Chinese and of Korea, and to the maintenance of each rights for foreigners.

maintenance of equal rights for foreigners.

A fresh commercial Treaty was made between Great Britain and China at tho close of 1902. China undertook to open four new Treaty ports, viz., Chang-Sha, Ngan-Kin, Wan-Hsien, and Wai-Chan; to accept improved minit, regulations; and to adopt amended rules for the navigation of inland waters and for the protection of British trade marks in China. Also likin (a tax on inland trade levied while merchandise was in transit from one district to another, which raised nearly £2,000,000 annually for the Chinese Government, after probably twice that sum had been subtracted by local authorities for cost of collection) was abolished in return for a sur-tax on imports slightly over 4 per cent. ad valorem. Likin was a vexatious impost, which led to peculation as well as to annoying delays in the conveyance of merchandise from one place to another. With this Treaty signed, and with Tientsin restored to the Chinese, the relations between Great Britain and China may be said to have been placed upon a footing favourable to peace and amity. In 1908 Great Britain obtained for defensive purposes a ninety-nine years' lease of territory on the mainland, opposite the island of Hong Kong. In the same year the Wai-Wu-Pu and the British Minister arrived at an agreement whereby there should be an annual decrease in the importation of opium, which after ten years is to be imported into China no longer; that China should levy more duties on foreign imported opium; that no poppy juice should be imported into China from Hong Kong, nor any sent from China to Hong Kong; that no opium pipes should be sold in foreign settlements, and no opium dens be permitted to be established. All the Powers have given their assent to the prohibition of the importation of morphia except for medicinal purposes.

Chitral Expedition, 1895. The small principality of Chitral, in the Hindu Kush Mountains, was placed under the suzerainty of Kashmir, and therefore indirectly of Britain, in 1878, by its then ruler, the Mehtar Amanul-Mulk. On his death in 1892 a contest arose between his two sons—Amir-ul-Mulk and Nizam-ul-Mulk-and his brother, Shere Eventually Nizam-ul-Mulk expelled Shere Afzul and put the Amir-ul-Mulk to death, but was himself murdered (Jan. 1, 1895) at the instigntion of another brother, Afzul-ul-Mulk, who then endeavoured to obtain recognition from the British Government. Dr. (afterwards Sir George) Robertson, H.M.'s political agent at Gilgit, came in to deal with the matter; but on the approach of Umra Khan, chief of Jandol, and of Shere Afzul-with whom Afzul-ul-Mulk was secretly negotiating-had to retire (Feb. 10) into Chitral Fort with his escort, comprising several British officers and about 500 Indian troops, mostly Sikhs and Dogras. From March 3 till April 23 they were besieged in the fort, a place most unsuited for defence, and exposed to most vigorous and vuried attacks by a greatly superior force, against which they made a gallant resistance. Mean-while the Indian Government had despatched a force of 14,000 men under Sir R. Low from Nowshera, and also a body of native troops under Colonel Kelly from the neighbourhood of Gilgit, where they had been road-making. These latter, after great difficulties, reached Chitral on April 23, and the siege was raised on their approach. General Low, after severe fighting with the Swatis at the Malakand Pass, sent on a flying column, which arrived at Chitral on May 10. The Indian Government, on March 22, had proclaimed to the people of Swat and Bajaur that they meant to send a force through, but not to occupy the territory permanently or interfere with the tribesmen. They made a military road through the territory, and it was oventually decided (August, 1895) to retain Chitral, as advised by the Indian Government and high authorities in India, partly on the ground that it commands certain passes from Badakshan, and so might be of strategio value in case of a Russian invasion of India. By the agreement negotiated by Sir Mortimer Durand with the Amir of Afghanistan in 1893, Chitral, with Bajaur, Swat, and the neighbouring states of Indus-Kohistan, were assigned to the British sphere of influence, the Amir securing Asmar and Kafiristan, the latter of which he subdued in 1895-96.

Chivalry. This word, which variously meant "horsemanship," "knighthood," "a fully-armed array of horsemen or knights," "the knightly ideal of conduct," and other things akin to these, in its widest application embraced the whole brotherhood of trained, approved, and dedicated men of the sword, who had undertaken with elaborate and solemn ceremony to do their fighting in a peculiar spirit, on principles and with aims of a special character, as well as the whole body of laws and usages, that these select warriors were bound to observe. Defined by a friendly historian, it was "a fraternal association, or rather an onthusiastic compact between men of feeling and courage, of delicacy and devotion," who had chosen the profession of arms and fitted themselves for it by a long and severe apprenticeship. It was an institution in which each faithful member was animated by a sentiment of conscious dignity, and regulated his life in conformity with a code of military cthics that raised a naturally demoralising occupation into a chastening discipline and ennobling pursuit. It owed to feudalism the conditions which enabled it to play its part; but it was no essential feature or direct offspring of feudalism; it was rather a corrective of the ferocity and injustice that make the chief reproach of feudal institutions.

The times of its beginning and ending, and its origin, are still controverted points among historians. But we cannot be far astray in limiting its flourishing period as an efficient and earnest motive and rule of action to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, though its spirit and forms can be traced much earlier, and, in show at least, are perceptible much later. Mr. Freeman sees the dawn of English chivalry in William Rufus's making a certain line of conduct "a point of honour;" and the French wars of Edward III. display tho glitter and affectations, the serious mockeries, that outlived the decay of real chivalry. As to its origin, some find it in the Crusades, some in the necessity of confronting the evils that harassed France in the cleventh century by "a consecration of the arms of the strong;" and some in the slow rise to ascendency of certain ideas and customs one or two as old as the days of the Germania -amid the anarchy that followed the death of Charlemagne. This last seems the safest conclusion: the ceremonial with which a young German warrior assumed arms; the duty of serving on horseback laid on certain landholders in later times; and the personal attachment to a superior obligatory on an aspirant to a military career, needed but the glow of religious feeling and the sense of individual honour as the master-motive of action, to complete the chivalrous character. For the grand creation and central figure of chivalry was the knight; and it is the union in him of religious fervour and sense of duty, with a recognition of honourable obligation, devotion to all women and constancy to one, and a horror of doing anything unworthy of a true knight, that is the very essence of the chivalric idea. Yet very essence of the chivalric idea. chivalry owed to the Crusades its summons into energetic life; in Milman's words, "all the noble sentiments which, blended together, are chivalry—the high sense of honour, the disdain of danger, the love of adventure, compassion for the weak or the oppressed, generosity, self-sacrifice, self-devotion for others—found in the Crusades their animating principle, perpetual occasion for their amplest exorcise, their perfection and consummation." The unit of chivalry was the knight, or chevalier, and care was therefore taken to make and keep knighthood select. In most places, though not in all, gentle birth was a necessary qualification; from his seventh to his fourteenth year the aspirant must serve in some noble or knightly household as page or varlet; he had then to choose, from among the well-born ladies of the society he lived in, some one as a special object of loyal devotion, and was allowed to receive at the altar from the hands of the priest the consecrated sword that proved him an esquire. His manifold duties as an esquire had as their general drift to make him perfect in the virtues and accomplishments of a knightly character. Having "borne him well" in his long and trying neviciate, he was "ordained" a knight with a most impressive ritual. After being bathed, and clothed in symbolic garments, he fasted for twenty-four hours, watched the arms he was to wear for a whole night in a church, cenfessed, communicated, had the sword that hung from his neek blessed by the pricst, was armed by ladies or knights, and frem enc of the latter received the accolade. His most imperativo obligations, taken on oath, were: to serve God and his princo; to uphold the weak; to be true to his word; to despise gain; to love honour; to persist to the end in any adventure he undertook; to reverence purity in women; to be faithful, courteous, and humble; and to protect maidens from danger and insult.

Chivalry had its absurd side: in its namo men now and then played very fantastic tricks. Single combats, tournaments, jousts, the splendid frivolities dear to an age of empty show, were its outcome. But its nobler gifts to mankind far outweigh these; from it sprang the Knights Hospitaller and the Teutonic Order, which, along with not a little that is questionable certainly bere excollent fruit. Abeve all, it set a curb on the passions of men, and thus softened the horrors of war; held up before them an elevating ideal; made active the virtues of loyalty, conresy, respect for women, valour, justice, and veracity. Its chief bequest to mankind was the "chastity of honour which felt a stain like a wound," which still lives. It is significant, too, that the clearest English eye of the fourteenth century saw in the knight "who lovede chivalrio"

"Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie."

Chivalry, THE COURT OF, was hold before the Constable and the Marshal of England for the trial of military offences, and for the decision of questions relating to coat armour, personal honour, and the like. By 13 Rich. II., cap. 2, it is doclared that this court has cognizance over all matters of this kind, except such as may be determined by the common law. The court has long ceased to be held; the last instance of its sitting being in 1737.

Chunda Sahib (d. 1752) married the daughter of Dost Ali, deputy of the Carnatie, and became chief minister. He was made use of by Dupleix as a pretender to the throne of Arcot against the English candidate, Mahomed Ali. In allianco with Mozuffer Jung, the French candidate to the throne of Hyderabad on the death of the Nizam-ool-Moolk (1748), he overran the Carnatic, and obtained investiture from Dupleix and Mozuffer Jung. Clive's defence of Arcot and the death of Mozuffer broke the confederacy; and Chunda Sahib surrendered to Monackjee, the Tanjorine general, who was in alliance with Manomed Ali and the English. The general took a solemn oath to convey him to a French settlement, but immediately afterwards caused him to be assassinated, at the instigation of Mahomed Ali.

Church of England. Christianity came to Britain in the wako of the Roman occupation, and the British Church was so far organised that it sent three bishops to the Council of Arles in 314. [CHURCH, THE CELTIC.] The English invaders were heathens, and British Christianity was swept westward before them. The conversion of the English was effected by missionaries from Rome in the south, and missionaries from Iona in the north. As the ritual of these two sets of missionaries differed in some points, different usages were found to be productive of confusion, till at the Synod of Whitby (664) the Northumbrian kingdom adopted the Roman use; and from that timo England obtained ecclesiastical unity as a daughter of the Church of Rome. The work of ecclesiastical organisation was begun by Archbishop Theodore in 668, and the example of unity given hy the Church was one of the chief influences to produce unity in the State. Church and State worked harmoniously together, and there were no questions to bring them into collision. The bishop sat by the side of the caldorman in the shire court, and eeclesiastical causes were decided in the same way as others. period of the Norman Conquest coincided with that of the ecclesiastical reforms wrought by Hildebrand on the Continent; and the influence of his ideas is apparent in the ecclesiastical policy of William I. Ecclesiastical courts were established for eeclesiastical causes, which were to be tried hy canonical, not by customary, law. This change was considered necessary for the sake of a uniform system of law, to introduce more regular discipline into the Church; but it brought with it a vexatious extension of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and led to the recognition of the right of appeal to the papal court, which ultimately proved minous to the authority and independence of bishops. But while making this change, William I. was careful to protect himself from papal interference hy laying down three rules:— (1) That the Pope of Rome should not be recognised as apostolie, except at the king's command, and that letters for the Pope be first shown to the king. (2) That the resolutions of ecclesiastical synods should have no legal force till sanctioned by the king. (3) That no baron or royal servant be excommunicated, except by the king's consent. These regulations of William I. show a feeling of distrust about the relations between Church and State which was speedily realised. Under Henry I., Archbishop Anselm raised the question of the lawfulness of lay investiture to a spiritual office. The tenure of clerical lands was, hy the growth of the royal power, assimilated to that of lay. The nomination of bishops, and their investiture with the emblems of their spiritual dignity, had passed into the hands of the erown. Hildebrand strove to eheek the growing secularisation of the Church; but the State answered, with some show of reason, that it could not allow of the existence of powerful land-holders who did not recognise the king as their lord. In England a compromise was at length made between Henry I. and the Pope. The king agreed that chapters should elect their bishops, but the election was to be made in the King's Court; he gave up the investiture with ring and crosier, but the bishops were to do homage for their temporalities. The crown retained the real appointment of bishops, and the rights of suzerainty over them, but ahandoned its eneroachments upon their spiritual dignity. Anselm showed that the Church was the only power which could withstand the tyranny of the crown. In like manner, Becket resisted Henry II.; and Bishop Hugh, of Lincoln, offered a constitutional resistance to the demands for money made in the name of Richard I. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Church fought the battle of the people, while it defended its own rights against the threatening power of the king.

But though the Church succeeded in a measure in holding its own against the king, it was less successful against the Pope. The Pope, as judge in all disputed eases, gained considerable power over episcopal elections, where disputes were frequent. In 1204 Pope Innocent III. rejected the contending candidates for the see of Canterbury, proposed Stephen Langton, and confirmed his informal election without the king's consent. Gradually, the king and the Pope eame to a sort of truct understanding that they would share between them the appointment to bishoprics, and the result was that the powers of the chapters became more and more shadowy, till they practically died away. Papal provisions and reservations over-rode the rights of patrons, and though the Statute of Provisors (1350, 1364, 1390) was onacted and reenacted to check this abuse, the Pope and the king found their interests to coincido in keeping a tolerably close partnership in the disposition of patronage. Yet the Statute of Præmunire (16 Rich. II., c. 5, 1393), which forbado the prosecution of suits in foreign courts, gave the king a powerful weapon against the Pope, and was resented as an infringement of the papal supremacy. Papal taxation weighed heavily on the clergy, and the attempt made by Pope Boniface VIII. to exempt them from national taxation was powerless before the resolute character of

Edward I. [PAPACY.] In the fourteenth century, the results of the organisation of the Constitution by Edward I., and the steady growth of royal and papal interference with the appointment and powers of the bishops, gradually diminished the political influence of the Church, and its spiritual activity declined. The teaching of Wiclif marked dissatisfaction against the Papacy, social discontent, and, in a minor degree, desiro for doctrinal change. The social side of the Lollard movement w s tho most largely developed, and it was this especially that led to legislation against heresy. In 1401 was passed the statute De Hærctico Comburendo (2 Hon. IV., e. 15, 1401). The Church lost its hold upon the people, and became more and more dependent on the Pope and the king. There was an acknowledgment of abuses on all sides, but there was no power to work a reformation. The machinery of the Church had been ruined by papal interference. Reform was possible only at Rome; but the Popes showed no inclination to undertake it. The clergy gradually put themselves more and more under the royal protection as against the Pope, till Henry VIII., freed from any power of the baronage, and willing to serve the interests of the commons, found the Church reduced to obsequious dependence on the crown. Henry VIII. quarrelled with the Papacy about one of the few points in which the papal interference with legislation was possible without the king's consent. At length he put forth the fulness of the royal power. By suppressing the monasteries, he deprived the Church of a third of its He severed the union between the English and the Roman Churches, and compelled the reluctant elergy to recognise the king as supreme head of the Church in England. Ho practically deprived the Church of legislative power by requiring the royal licenco for all decrees of Convocation. Henry VIII. broke with the Papacy because the Papacy was an obstacle in the way of his personal gratification; but ho aimed at a reformation of ecclesiastical practice and a re-adjustment of the ecclesiastical system to the needs of England as it was, Still, the breach with Rome would have been impossible to Henry VIII. if there had not been a serious breach in the European obedienco to the Papacy. New theological opinions were rapidly spreading in Germany, and had already attracted the attention of scholars in England; and Henry VIII.'s wish to confine his changes to mere points of ecclesiastical organisation was impossible. Yet, so long as ho lived he held the balance. between the old and tho now learning, and ehecked the progress of doctrinal change. Under Edward VI. the reforming party came into power, and Archbishop Cranmer moved forward towards the German Protestants. The steps in his advance may be traced in the history of the fermularies of the English Church. [ARTICLES.] But the reforming party was a minority of the nation, and its rapid changes shocked the popular mind; it owed its political support to the selfish greed of a body of courtiers, who were willing to use the Reformation as a means of enriching themselves. Hence, the reaction under Mary was greeted with delight; but it was too complete to be permanent. The Catholicism of Mary was anti-national, and the successive failures of Protestants and Catholics under Edward VI. and Mary prepared the way for the religious settlement of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth reverted to the policy of her father, and strove to effect a compromise between the now hostile parties of the Catholics and Protestants. The Catholies held to the old formularies; the more advanced Protestants, who had been in exilo during Mary's reign, had adopted the logical system of theology laid down by Calvin, and demanded that nothing should be adopted but what could be proved by Scripture to be true. Elizabeth favoured the opinion of the moderate Reformers, who held that nothing should be discarded but what could be shown from Scripture to be false. The Prayer Book of Edward VI. was revised, and two statutes were passed in 1559 which established the logal relations between Church and State. The Act of Supremacy required all beneficed ecclesiastics, and all laymen holding office, to take the oath of supremacy, and renounce all foreign jurisdiction. The Act of Uniformity prohibited the use by any minister of any liturgy save that contained in the Prayer Book, and imposed a fine on all who absented themselves from Church. The Liturgy and the Articles, under the direction of Archbishop retain much of Parker, were devised so as the old uses, while purging them of much that might offend the Calvinistic party. The ideal of Elizabeth was comprehension uniformly enferced. It was impossible that such a scheme should be entirely successful; yet it so far succeeded that the national feeling of England gathered round the Church, which embraced the large majority of the people. But a considerable Catholic party stood aloof; and the excommunication of Elizabeth by the Pope in 1570, the secret visits of Jesuit missionaries, and the plots in favour of Mary Queen of Scots, occasioned a rigorous persecution of the Catholies. Similarly, the Calvinistic party, or Puritans, disliked many practices of the prescribed ritual as superstitious, and disregarded them. In 1565, Archbishop Parker issued a book of regulations, known as the "Advertisements" (q.v.), which afterwards received the royal sanction. He attempted to enforce regularity in the conduet of services, and thereby only drove the Calvinists into more pronounced opposition. It is true that their spirit was narrow, and their opinions tended towards the establishment of the tyranny of an ecclesiastical democracy. Yet the persecution of Archbishop Whitgift was injudicious and ineffective. The High Commission Court, to which was entrusted the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the crown, grew to be a means of royal tyranny

One result of the legislation of Elizabeth was that the Church became definitely subordinate to the State; jurisdiction and legislation for the Church could only be exercised with the consent of the crown, and the rites and discipline of the Church could not be altered without the consent of Parliament. The appointment of bishops w. exercised by the crown, and Elizabeth demanded that they should be crown officials, for the purpose of enforcing the ecclesiastical uniformity which she required. They became, and have to some extent still continued to be, disciplinary officers executing the law, rather than Futhers in God to their clergy. The Elizabethan bishops were not men of lofty or commanding eharacter, and were indecorously dietated to by Elizabeth and her Council. On the death of Elizabeth there were loud demands for coneessions. But James I. lectured the Puritan ministers in the Hampton Court Conference (1604), and agreed to a few insignificant alterations in the Prayer Book which reconciled no one. Archbishop Bancroft continued the persecution of the Puritans, and deprived many Puritan clergy of their benefices. The Puritan party became more and more identified with the party of constitutional opposition to the crown; and in the Church itself a party began to arise which insisted on the necessity of Episcopacy as a divine institution, and, by excluding Presbyterians from the Catholic Church, seemed to draw nearer to the Church of Rome. This party advocated the divine right of kings, and preached the doctrine of passive obedience. Under Arch-bishop laud it attained to great influence, and aided Charles I. in his arbitrary and unconstitutional conduct. The result was that Puritanism in England combined with

Presbyterianism in England, Charles I. lost his throne and his life, and the Church of England was abolished. But rigid Presbyterianism would have laid a heavier voke on England than the rigid Anglicanism of Laud. Cronwell gathered round him the sects, especially the Independents, and saved England from Presbyterianism by advocating the liberty of each congregation. But the Puritan supremacy was intolerable to England, and the restoration of Charles II. brought back the Church of England, endeared to the people as a bulwark against Puritanism. There was some show of desire to meet the scruples of the Puritans, and a Conference was held in the Savoy Palace, 1661. But Dr. Sancroft, who presided, was of an unyielding temper, and the demands of the Puritums were unreasonable. Both parties separated in anger. A few changes were made in the Prayer Book—but they increased rather than diminished the objections the Puritans had to it. Then, in 1662, was passed an Act of Uniformity, which required all beneficed clergy not only to use the Prayer Book, and that only, but also to deelare "unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in it." About two thousand of the clergy were ejected from their benefices for refusing to make this declaration. Charles II. was willing to grant indulgences to the Puritans, that he might also grant them to the Catholics. Parliament and the bishops regarded the maintenance of the Established Church as the only means of saving England from the dangers of complications in foreign politics which might come through Catholicism and the dangers of the tyranny of an organised minority in domestic affairs. The royal indulgence was opposed, and Acts against Nonconformity rapidly succeeded one another; the Corporation Act, the Conventicle Act, the Five Mile Act, the Test Act, and the Act for disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament, were all passed between 1661

In 1664 an important change was made in the relations between Church and State, Hitherto the clergy had taxed themselves in Convocation, but it was found that they consequently were taxed more heavily than the laity. In 1664 it was quietly agreed that the clergy shoold be taxed in the same manner as the laity—by Parliament. Though Convocation had lost its power of making canons without the king's consent, it still could petition for redress of grievances before granting supplies. Now that it ceased to grant supplies, its proceedings became merely formal, and after giving occasion to a theological controversy in 1717, it was not again summoned for business till 1861, when it was revived. persecution of the Cathelies in consequence of the false evidence of a pretended Popish plot. Notwithstanding a vigorous attempt to oxclude James 11. from the throne, on the ground that he was a Catholic, the general Jesire of England for a settled government led men to accept him us king. But James If. strove to impose by his prerogative a toleration which would enable him to put Catholics in all the important offices of state. He ordered a general declaration of liberty of conscience suspending all penal laws about religion, to be read in all the churches. Seven bishops, headed by Archbishop Sancroft, petitioned the king to recall this step. They were committed to the Tower, and were brought to trial for uttering a libel against the king, and their acquittal was a sign of the public opinion against James, which led to the Revolution. The accession of William III. and Mary was largely due to the fact that the Dissenters preferred to wait for toleration from the Church rather than to accept it unconstitutionally from the king. In 1689 a Toleration Act was passed, which granted some relief to the Dissenters, but none to the Catholics. Moreover, the Revolution overturned the doctrine of the divine right of kings, which had been a tenet of Anglicanism; and Archbishop Sancroft, with three hundred others, resigned their offices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William. The sect of the Non-jurors soon died away, and Anglicanism was strong enough to resist the changes which William III., in the interests of comprehension, wished to introduce into its system. Anne showed herself favourable to the Church, and in 1704 formed the fund which is known as Queen Anne's Bounty, by giving up for the augmentation of small benefices certain ecclesiastical dues which the English crown had inherited as the heir of the papal claims. The old High Church doctrine of passive obedience was revived in a modified form, and the impeachment of an obscure divine, Dr. Sacheverell, for a sermon embodying this view, was one of the causer of the fall of the Whig ministry. The toleration given to Dissenters under William III. was diminished by the Act of 1711 against occasional conformity, and the Schism Act of 1714, which required all teachers to have a licence from a bishop. But these were the last Acts which savoured of exclusiveness. With the accession of George II. a more tolerant spirit prevailed. A yearly Act of Indemnity began to be passed in 1727 for Dissenters who held office contrary to prohibitive Acts. From this time forward there was a gradual progress in practical tolerance, and in the last thirty years of the century efforts were made. with some success, to repeal the disabling Acts. The Corporation and Test Acts were not, however, repealed till 1828, and in 1829 the Catholic Relief Bill becamo law.

Meanwhile, religious lethargy had invaded the Church and Nonconformists alike. This was broken by the effects of the Wesleys and Whitfield, and their movement to Christianise the masses met wit's great success. It was looked upon by the Church with coldness that deepened into dislike, and Wesley's followers formed themselves into a sect known by the name of Mcthouists. This movement largely swelled the ranks of Nonconformity, but also awakened the zeal of the Church. Still, at the beginning of the unneteenth century, the Church was violently assailed by Nonconfo mists; ecclesiastical abuses were romorselessly exposed, and claims resting solely on the fact that they were "by law established" were seen by their champions to be untenable. The wave of Liberalism that carried the Reform Bill was seen to be dangerously threatening the Church itself. In the earlier portion of the nineteenth century the most acti - party in the Church were the revived Puritans, under Simeon and Melvill. A movement which had its seat at Oxford, and was begun by Newman, Keble, Pusey, and Hurrell Froude, revived the old High Church party. In a flow of tracts and pamphlets the leaders of this movement laboured to restore the dogmatic basis of the Church. Their propositions awakened coasiderable alarm, which increased wh n some of the leading minds, notably Newman and Ward joined the Church of Rome. Theological activity again awakened, and questions as to the limits of comprehension allowed by the fermularies of the Church of England to its clergy were raised with much frequency. When these questions had slightly subsided, another of equal importance emerged—the question of the limits allowed to the clergy in criticising the Scriptures, and of individual opinion as to their interpretation. The result of this revival of theological interests was to bring forward many points for settlement. In early times appeals in ases of dispute were decided by the Pope; after the Reformation they were decided by the king in council, and a Court of Delegates was appointed when occasion required. In 1832 this Court of Delegates was abolished, and ecclesiastical appeals were transferred to the appellate jurisdiction of the king in council. In the first heat of party feeling, the composition of this court was not much regarded; but more recently this question has become one of the ehief difficulties in the relations between Church and State. Another consequence of theological differences was to show that the Church was powerless to influence the election of bishops by the crown. In 1847 objections were made on theological grounds to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford; but it was found that there was no legal means of having these objections brought to trial. In 1861 the meetings of Convocation were revived, and though the constitution of that body is not entirely representative of the clergy, it gives expression to many of their grievances. By its agency a revision of the translation of the Biblo was undertaken. In 1886 a representativo House of Laymen for the province of Canterbury-a body from the purview of which matters of doctrine are excluded-held its first sitting. The Church became in the ninetcenth century more vigorous and more highly organised, and recognised within its body considerable variations of theological opinion. On the other hand, Nonconformists were freed from all disabilities and from all legal obligations towards the Church. An Act passed in 1868 abolished compulsory Church rates for the maintenanco of parish churches, and the Burials Act of 1880 permitted Nonconformists to bury their dead in the parish churchyards with their own rites and ceremonies. In Ireland, the Established Church had never commended itself to the people, who remained Catholics, and in 1869 it was discstablished and partially disendowed.

The relations between Church and State are closer in England than in any other country. The Church, after the Reformation, drew up its owr services and formularies, and is recognised by the State on that basis. It caunot alter its services without the permission of the State, and the interpretation of its formularies is in the jurisdiction of the State, while the appointment of its bishops is likewise in the hands of the State.

Church, THE EARLY CELTIC. Two sharplycontrasted periods are to be distinguished in the early Church history of Celtic Britain. So long as the Romans ruled in South Britain, the Christianity which gradually permeated from Gaul in.o the island was weak, mainly confined to the Roman settlements, and affected very little the native population. The efforts made by Ninian, Palladius, and Patrick at the conversion of the Ceits outside the province had very little result; but a very remarkable ecclesiastical revolution seems to have closely followed the withdrawal of the Roman legions. A wave of religious enthusiasm, excited perhaps by reaction from the Saxon conquerors, ran through the whole Celtic portion of the island. The first impulse came, as before, from Gaul. Gallie churchmen, like Germanus of Auxerre, re-kindled the dying embers of Christianity in Britain, and led the orthodox alike against Pelagian heretic and Saxon or Pictish heathen. Monasticism, brought by St. Athanasius from the East, found in St.

Martin of Tours its greatest Western exponent. From St. Martin's great Abbey of Marmoutier the monsstic current flowed through Britanny into Wales and Cornwall, and thenco into Ireland, where it developed itself to its extreme limits, and to Scotland, to which the monastie movement first gave Christianity. But the Saxon Conquest cut off all communication between the Celts of Western Britain and the Continent. Separated from civilisation by a wedge of heathenism, the Celtic Church gradually acquired a character of its own that marks it off sharply from the Churches of the Continent. When, in the seventh century, the conversion of the English again renewed intercourse between the Celtic Christians and the Western world, the differences between the Celtic Churches and the Catholic Christians had become so great that intercommunion was regarded as impossible, and a struggle for mastery between the two Churches set in that terminated only with the defeat of the Celts. It was not that the Celtic Christians were in any formal sense heretics. The only points that could be alleged against them were their habit of celebrating Easter according to an erroneous cycle, which the better-instructed Romish Church had abandoned, their peculiar form of tonsure, a few unimportant liturgical differences, and, with a willingness to respect the Roman Church as the caput ecclesiarum, a steadfast refusal to yield it that canonical obedienco which the Popes had now begun to elaim. But though the formal differences of the Celtic and Catholic Churches were thus few-though not on that account the less hotly contested-the difference of organisation, system, and spirit between the two Churches was of the last importance. The child of the monastic revival, Celtic Christianity had become through and through monastic. Monasticism had in many places absorbed diocesan episcopacy. Great monasteries had grown up everywhere, which faithfully reproduced the tribal characteristics of the Celtic State, whose abbots, themselves often of royal houses, excreised a jurisdiction that left nothing to the bishops save the mere maintenance of the apostolical succession. In the great abbeys of Ireland, and still more at Iona—the great foundation of Columba (q.v.), which was the source of the Christianity of Scotland and the seat of a jurisdiction practically episcopal over its dependent Churches—the swarms of bishops were, despite their higher rank in the Church orders, subject to the jurisdiction of the abbot, who was generally a mere presbyter. As centres of education, of Church worship, of spiritual life, of an extreme asceticism, and of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the monasteries enjoyed a far-reaching influence. Their intimate relation to the tribe enabled them to permeate the whole life of the nation with a real, if irregular, spiritual enthusiasm. The sixth and seventh centuries were the great period of the Welsh and Irish saints, of the earliest exy of Welsh literature, of successful resistance to the English, to whose conquests a limit was at last set. Heathenism was driven out of Celtic Britain. When Augustine and Pauliwed wall. oped and, nus failed, Aidan from Iona succeeded. At THE O least half of the conversion of England is duo to the Columban monks. On the Continent cut s of Celtic missionaries carried their own usages ated and planted their own monasteries. But the monastic Church of Celtic Britain, though fertile in saints and missionaries, had a fatal weakness in its want of definite organisation. Even in Wales, where the functions of abbot and bishop were generally conjoined-the founders of the great Welsh monasteries were also founders of the Welsh sees (St. David, for example)-the work of discipline and supervision which belonged to the bishop could be very imperfectly performed by a recluse who chose the remetest solitudes Efficient in exciting religious for his abode. emotion, the Celtie Church failed in its more regular and routine duties. The monks were better missionaries than parish priests. A society that aimed at abjuring the world could not thoroughly make its influence felt in the world. Shut up in an extreme corner of the universe, rigidly opposed to all external influences, its doom was sealed when the triumph of Wilfred at Whitby and the alliance of Oswy of Northumbria and Theodore of Canterbury expelled the Celtic customs from Britain. Henceforth confined to the north and west of the island, the monastio Church lost, with its capacity for expansion, its powers of vitality. It was affected by twe opposite influences from without and from within. The triumph of the Roman party in England gave the secular clergy a position side by side with the Celtic regulars. The ascetic impulse which had established the monasteries continued so far that monasticism itself was no sufficient expression of the severe spirit of renunciation that sat. in the life of the solitary anchorite the highest expression of spiritual emotion. Even the tribal connection which in the first flow of the movement had done so much service to the monas-terics ultimately proved a snare. The secular aspect of the tribe began to assert itself, and an abbey whose head was an hereditary official soon became a monastery simply in name. As the abbey had carlier absorbed the tribe, so the tribe now absorbed the abbey

Thus assailed from within and without, the monastic Church could offer no efficient opposition to the strong reaction in favour of tommunion with Western Christendom, even at the expense of a loss of the national usager. In 634 the Southern Irish, in 692 the Northern Irish, accepted the Roman Easter. On the death of Adamnan (704), an effort to introduce the Roman customs into Iona itself led to a schism in that monastery. In 717 the Columban monks were expelled from the kingdom of the Picts. In the middle of the oighth century the Welsh gave up the Celtio Easter. Formul schism was thus ended, but it was centuries before the monastic peculiarities of the Celtie Churches entirely disappeared. The Danish invasions, the English overlordships, both had their effect, yet it was not until the days of Matilda, wife of Malcolm Canmore, that complete diocesan episcopacy and the rule of St. Benedict were imposed on the Scots, and the Culdees (q.v.) reduced to the position of canons regular. In the seme way the Norman kings reorganised the Church of Ireland on a territorial, instead of a tribal, basis. Wales, where the Celtic Church had never developed so far, where diocesan episcopacy always continued in a way, gradually became subject to Canterbury, as well as to the English kings. The Norman Conquest imposed on the Welsh Church a foreign hierarchy, that completed the process of union. Centuries earlier the Scottish monks on the Continent had been compelled to accept the Rule of St. Benedict.

The true history of the old Celtic Church has been obcurred by a cloud of fable and legend which has seen in it a Protestant witness against the errors of Rome, and a Presbyterian polity worthy of Calvin, which has regarded its characteristics as survivals of the mystic rites of Druidism, and which has found the explanation of its Easter observance in the Quartodeciman practice of the Churches

Asia.

The chief materials for the history of the Celtic Church are in Haddan and Stubbe's Councils and in Adamnan's Life of Columba. Dr. Reeve's introduction and notes to Adamnan, and Mr. Skene's Celtio Scotland, voi. ii.. may be mentioned as leading modern authorities for Ireland and Scotland. In the Lives of the Cambro-British Scinits, amidst much that is wild legend, something authentic may be gleaned. Re... Walsh Saints is an ingenious attempt at reconstruction one aspect of early Welsh Church history. Pryce's Ancient British Church is a usoful compendium of that portion of the subject. The essays on the Churchs of the British Confession and The Scots on the Continent, in A. W. Haddan's Remains, are a masterly summary of the whole question. Montalembert's Monks of the West gives an eloquent, if often misleading, picture of the monastic aspect of the Church.

assembled in a vestry meeting. Church rates are of very ancient erigin; and as early as 970, Archbishop Elfric ordained that Tithes (q.v.) should be divided into three parts, one of which was to be set aside for the repairing of the church. This Church rato, at first voluntary, became gradually obligatory, and though up to 1817 the only method of enforcing payment was through the action of the ecclesiastical courts, it was in that year enacted that the payment might be enforced by the county justices. The objection of the Dissenters to pay these rates led to much litigation on the subject. Frequent bills were brought in for their abolition, and in 1858 a bill of Sir John Trelawney actually passed the House of Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. The opposition of the Dissenters at the vestry meetings was frequently se strong as te prevent the levying of any rate at all, and "in 1859," says Sir T. Erskine May, "Church rates had been refused in no less than 1,525 parishes or districts." [BRAINTREE CASE.] The question was settled in 1868 by the substitution of compulsory Church rates for voluntary payments. But Church rates levied Churchill, Arabella (b. 1648, d. 1730), was the daughter of Sir Winston Churchill, and sister of the Duke of Marlborough. She became the mistress of the Duke of York (afterwards James II.) and by him the mother of James Fitz-James, Duke of Berwick, and three ether children.

Churchill, Admiral George (b. 1654, d. 1710), was a younger brether of the Duke of Marlborough. In 1693, when in command of a brigade, he took his nephew, the Duke of Berwick, prisoner at the battle of Landen. On the accession of Queen Anne he was placed on the Admiralty Pard. He had complete ascendency over the head of the Admiralty, Prince George of Denmark, the husband of the queen, and thwarted the ceunsels of Admiral Rooke. In 1707 he was vehemently attacked by the Whigs for his mismanagement. On the death of Prince George he was dismissed from office (1709). "His mental constitution," says Mr. Wyon, "was the opposite of that of his illustrious relative. He was a Tory of the extreme school—virulent, domineering and foelish."

Churchill, The Right Hon. Lord Randolph (b. Feb. 13, 1849, d. Jan. 24, 1895), second son of the sixth Duke of Marlborough, entered Parliament in 1874 as member for Woodstock. After the Conservative defeat of 1880 he began, as leader of the Fourth Party, to distinguish himself in debate, acquiring fame also as an effective platform orator. In Lord Salisbury's first Ministry (1885) he was Secretary for India;

In the second (July, 1886) he became Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House of Commens. On the 23rd of December, in the same year, he resigned, never to take office again.

Churchill, THE RIGHT Hen. WINSTQY L. S. (b. 1874), eldest son of Lord Randolph Churchill (q.v.). He served in the Spanish Warwith Caba and the Malakand Field Force, and went as a wer correspondent to Sout. Africa during the Boer War (1899–1902). He was elected to Parliament as a Conservative in 1900, but dissociated himself from Mr. Chamberlain's Fiscal Policy and joined the Liberals. He became Under Secretary for the Colonies in 1906, and was appointed President of the Board of Trade in 1908.

Cinque Ports, THE, are a group of seven towns, situated in Sussex and Ken: which still possess, in some dogroe, their old and peculiar jurisdiction. The original members of the group were Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dever, and Sandwieh, to which the "ancient tewns" of Winchelsea and Rye were afterwards added. They still retain the privilege of holding two courts, viz., the Court of Brotherhood and the Court of Guestling; but these exercise now only " very small part of their former functions The Cinque Perts ewe their existence as corporate body to the fact that in our early history there was ne standing navy. Hen whenever invasion was threatened er ec templated, it was necessary to rely mainly a the services of the seaboard tewns. It was the Cinque Perts that centributed largely te the defeat of Eustace the Monk in 1217, and feur years later we find the same body summened befere Hubert de Burgh for pirac; against the men of Calais. In 1242 Kem issued orders to the officers of this cerporatien to prey upon French merchants and travellers—an erder whose terms they enlarged upon, to the hurt of their felleveeuntrymen. By this time, then, we may consider the Cinque Ports to be a recognise institution, with its own efficers and warde i. and in this capacity its members espoused the to send "barens" te the Parliament of 126. Local historians have claimed for these baron a position higher than that of the borons members, or even the knights of the shire. It is not, hewever, till the reign of Edward I. that we have absolute proof that the Cinque Ports possessed a charter. But, en the other hand, the terms of Edward's charter speak definitely of certain rights possessed by this body in the time of Henry 11., and more vaguely of others dating back through almost every previous reign to that of the Confessor. And we may consider Edward I.'s charter, though somewhat enlarged hy later sovereigns, as a fair summary of the privileges of the Cinque Ports. By the terms of this charter the Cinque Ports were to have criminal and civil jurisdiction within their limits; exomption from all taxes, aids, and tollages; the right of assembling in their own parliament at Shepway, near Hythe; for the purpose of me .ing by-laws; and several other privileges, including the right of regulating the Yarmouth fishery and fair. In return fer these concessions, they were to furnish the king at call with fifty-seven ships for fifteon days each year, and there is at least one instance where they had to victual the ships supplied hy another tewn (London). The efficer in command of the ships furnished by the Cinque Ports was called the Warden; and under Edward I. the Warden of the Cinque Ports acted as admiral of the fleet from Dover to Cornwall.

The Cinque Ports centinued to be the main strength of our navy till the time of Henry VII. In the reign of this king we find signs that they had already fallen, or were falling, under the ordinary taxation of the kingdom, though they are still allowed to deduct £500 from their own share of any tenth or fifteenth levied on the counties of Sussex and Kent—a privilege which Elizabeth confirmed as a reward for their services against the Armada. The Charters of the Cinque Ports were surrendered to the crown in 1685, and most of their peculiar privileges and phligations were abolished by the Reform .41832), and Municipal Corporations Act

Cintra, The Convention of (Aug. 30, 1808), was an agreement made at the beginning of the Peninsular War between the French and English after the battle of Vimiere. The conditions would have been much more favourable to the British had not the timid caution of Sir Harry Burrard and Sir Hew Dalrymple prevented Sir Arthur Wellesley from fellowing up the advantage gained in the battle. An advance was cautiously begun towards Lisbon; and almost immediately an envoy was sent by Junot to treat. Terms were drawn up, subject to the approval of the English admiral, and this he would not give. Negotiations were accordingly begun aftesh, while the English advanced still nearer to

Finally, the Convention of Cintra was signed at Lisbon, the terms being that the French troops should evacuate Portugal, and should be transported to France in English ships. After some trouble it was also decided that the Russian fleet in the Pert of Tagus should eass into the hands of the English. Much indignation was felt in England on the news of the convention, although four months previously it would have been hailed with delight. Burrard, Dalrymple, and Wellesley were erdered home to take their trial, and Sir Jehn Moore was appointed to the command in the Peninsula.

"Circumspecte Agatis" was the title of a writ or statute issued by Edward I. in 1285, defining the duties of the ecclesiastical courts, and fixing the boundaries between the temporal and spiritual jurisdictions, thus putting a stop to the gradual encroachment of the ecclesiastical courts in matters of which the cognisance belonged to the crewn. By this statute hreaches of morality, such as adultery and false swearing, are assigned to the Courts Christian, together with questions of tithes, mertuaries, or battery of a clerk.

Cironcester is situated en the site of an important Roman military station, named Cerinium. It was captured by the Danes in 873. An abbey of some importance was founded by Henry I., and a fine church built in the fifteenth century. During the Civil War the town was held by the Parliamentarians, and captured by Prince Rupert in 1642, and surrendered again te the Roundheads, in 1643.

Cissa (d. 520?) was the son of Ella (q.v.), whom he is said to have succeeded in 517. His name is traced in Chichester (Cissaceaster) and possibly in Cissbury Camp.

Cistercians, The, were a religious order, an off-shoot of Benedictines, founded in 1098 at Citeaux. The order owed much to its second abot, Stephen Harding, an Englishman, who enjoined especially the strictest adherence to the austere Benedictine rule, from which the Benedictines themselves had long departed. It was Stephen Harding also who, at the chapter of the order in 1119, established the system of gevernment which allewed a large amount of independence to each abbey, under the supervision of the general chapter of the order. The order became very popular all over Western Europe, and in ne country mere than in England. They first settled at Waverley, in Surrey, in 1129, and from thouses were very numerous, especially in Yerkshire. [Monasticism.]

ed ti nen l 126 baro. Ciudad Rodrigo, The Shees or, during the Peninsular War, January, 1812, was the opening operation of Wollington's campaign of 1812. The fall of the works was hastened, in spite of many natural and artificial obstacles, on account of the approach of Marmont with a relieving force. On the 13th the Santa Cruz convent was taken; a well-organised sally, however, delayed the bombardment; but on the evening of the 14th it was begun, and in the confusion that arose, the 40th Regiment seized the convent in the suburbs to the east of the town. The bombardment was kept up almost continuously, till on the 18th the great breach became a wide gap. On the 19th, soon after seven o'clock, the assault was begun: the faunse-braye was cleared by the stormers; but the French, driven back, held their ground behind the retrenchment, and wrought great havoe among the British. Meanwhile, the attack at the smaller breach had been made with reckless impetousity, which carried the fansse-braye; and sweeping onward, led by Major Napier, the light division dashed into the narrow opening, and at the point of the bayonet broke down all resistance, until they had gained a foothold in the town. Then part of the light division, driving all before them, fell upon the flank of the defenders at the great breach, and by their overthrow made a way for the entrance of the storming party; while the rest of the light troops cleared the streets and houses in the town. The town very soon became the scene of the wildest excesses and frenzied disorder. The loss of the allies was 90 officers and 1,200 soldiers.

Civil List, THE, is a sum of money granted annually by Parliament for t1 support of the royal household, and tho personal expenses and bounty of the sovereign. It originated in the reign of William and Mary, and at first comprised the payment of civil offices, and pensions, Its amount was fixed at £700,000 (£400,000 being derived from the hereditury revenues f the crown and £300,000 from the Excise duties). This continued to be the nominal sum-although frequent debts were incurred -until the reign of George II., when it was increased to £800,000, being further raised in 1777 to £900,000; this sum, however, proved quite inadequate for the necessary expenditure, and debts on the Civil List had continually to be paid throughout the whole of the reign of George III.: and it was found advisable to remove from the list many charges, such as salaries of state officers and the like. On the accession of William IV. these extraneous charges were further reduced, and the Civil List fixed at £510,000, a sum which included a pension-list of £75,000. The Civil List paid to Queen Victoria by 1 Vict., c. 2, amounted to £385,000. The Civil List paid to the King by 1 Edward VII., c. 4, amounts to £470,000; total, with annulties and pensions for members of the Royal Family, £543,000.

Civil Wars. [BARONS' WAR; ROSES, WARS OF; REBELLION, GREAT.]

Claim of Right, The, passed by the Scottish Estates in April, 1689, declared that James VII. had forfeited the crown for various offences committed against the constitution of the kingdom and the privileges of the subjects, and that no Papist could ever in the future rule over Scotland; it further declared the necessity of frequent Parliaments, and the burdensome nature of prelacy. It was, in fact, a statement of the terms on which the Scottish crown was offered to William of Orange. [Convention of Estates.]

Claimants of the Scottish Crown in 1291. On the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), the last of the descendants of Alexander III., a number of competitors for the Scottish crown appeared. Chief amongst them were John Baliol, Robert Bruce, and John de Hastings, the descendants of three sisters, daughters of David, Earl of Huntingdon. Baliol claimed as the grandson of the cident sister, Bruce as the son of the second, and Hastings, as the son of the youngest daughter, claimed one-third of the kingdom, contending that it was divisible like other inheritances. This disputed succession Edward I. determined to settle, and accordingly summoned a conference of Scottish and English nobles to meet at Norham, May, 1291. It was there determined to accept Edward's appointment as lord paramount, and to uppoint commissioners to decide upon tho morits of the claimants. Forty were named hy Baliol, forty by Bruce, and twenty-four by the English king. In June, 1292, these commissioners, after much deliberation, reported in favour of Baliol, saying that "By the laws and usages of both kingdoms, in every heritable succession the more remote in one degree lineally descended from the eldest sister, was preferable to the nearer in degree issuing from the second sieter." Edward accordingly declared John Baliol

Besides these three chief, there were ten minor, competitors: Nicholas de Soulis, the grandson of Marjory, natural daughter of Alexander II., whom he declared to have been legitimatised; Florence, Earl of Holland, great grandson of Adu, daughter of Prince Henry, and sister of William the Lion; Robert de Pinkenv, great grandson of Marjory, daughter of Prince Henry; William de Ros; Patrick, Earl of March, and William de Ros and Roger de Mandeville, the descendants of illegitimate daughters of William

None of these claims were of any validity, and they were not pushed to an open trial.

Graims, The Court or, was established in 1662, in accordant with the first Act of Settlement to examine the case of all dispossessed Irish proprietors. It decided very soon such large grants were made to the Duke of York and others, that It became impossible to provide for any other claimants. Thus, after it had heard about 600 claims its labours came to an end, and the second Act of Settlement, 1665, became necessary.

Clanricarde, ULICK BURKA, OF DE BURGH, 18T MARQUIS OF (b. 1604, d. 1657), was so created in 1645. Though a Roman Catholic, he continued faithful to the king all through the Rebellion of 1641 (q.v.). His sympathies were largely with the insurgents, but he refused the supreme comma. I they offered him. At court, in 1647, he was able to combine his loyalty with his attachment to the ancient faith, and began to take a prominent part in affairs. When, in 1649, Ormonde left the country, he made Clauricarde Lord Depusy, who in 1650 induced the Irish to reject the terms offered them by Parliament. He continued to hold out for some timo longer, but was finally compelled to surrender to Coote on the usual terms of personal freedom, and the restoration of part of his estates. Ho was succeeded by his cousin as Earl of Clanricarde, the marquisate dying with him as he had no issue. At the Restoration all his estates were at once restored to his heirs. His Memoirs Concerning the Affairs of Ireland from 1640 to 1653 were published in 1722.

Clare, John, Earl of. [FITZGIRBON.]

Clare Election (July, 1828) was the famous contest in which Daniel O'Connell was, after five days' polling, returned against Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, a supporter of Catholic Emancipation, but a Protestant, who was seeking re-election on becoming President of the Board of Trade. O'Connell was the first Catholic returned to Parliament since 1690. He owed his election to the "forties;" the £50 freeholders and the gentry without distinction of political opinion voting to a man for his opponent. When he was elected he refused to take the oaths; but after the Catholic Emancipation Bill he was re-elected without opposition, and took his seat April, 1829.

Clarence, GLORGE, DUKE OF (b. 1449, d. 1478), was the third son of Richard, Duko of York, and brother to King Edward IV. After the battle of Wakefield and the death of his father, he was taken to Flanders for security, but returned to England in 1461, on the accession of Edward IV. He was made Lieutenant of Ireland for seven years in 1462. Being greatly vexed at the king's marriage, he intrigued with the Earl of Warwick against him, and, in 1469, married Warwick's eldest daughter, Isabel, contrary to Edward's wishes, at Calais, whither he had retired with Warwick. In 1470 Edward fell a prisoner into their hands, and for a time Clarenco and Warwick had everything their own way. But the escape of the king and the defeat of the Lincolnshire insurgents, whose avowed intention it was to place Clarence on the throne, changed the aspect of affairs, and Clarence and Warwick had once more to flee to Calais. Thence they invaded England towards the end of the year, landed in Devenshire, and soon found themselves at the head of a large army. Edward was again obliged to flee from the kingdom. Warwick with Clarence entered London, and re-crowned Henry VI. But Clarence was playing a double game. When Edward IV. landed at Ravenspur and marched southwards, Clarence was in correspondence with him, and when Edward advanced towards London, Clarence marched out and prined hlm, and fought against his old confederate at Barnet. But Clarenco soon quarrelled again with his brother. He claimed the inheritance of Warwick as the husband of Isabel, and was unwilling to divide the carl's possessions with Richard of York, who married the second daughter, Anne. the death of Isabel, Clarence was anxious to marry Mary of Burgundy, but the mar-riage was prevented by Edward IV. A violent quarrel ensued. A gentleman of Clarence's household was condemned for using necromancy against the king. Clarence interfered with the execution of the sentence, and was impeached by the king in person before the House of Lords. Ho was con-demned to death in 1478, and was made away with secretly in the Tower. According to a well-known story, which is not supported by authentic evidence, he was drowned in a butt of malmaey wine.

Clarence, Thomas, Duke of (b. 1389, d. 1421), was the second son of Henry IV. In 1401 he was made Lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1412 created Duke of Clarence. He played an important part in the French wars of Henry V.'s reign, and in 1421 he was defeated and slain at Beaugé by a combined force of French and Scots. He married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, and widow of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, but left no issue.

Clarendon, THE CONSTITUTIONS OF (1164), received their name from the royal huntinglodge of (.. crendon, near Salisbury, where they were enacted. They were the outcome of the determination of Henry II. to settle the relation between Church and State in matters of jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical courts which had been separated from the national courts by William the Conqueror had gradually extended their jurisdiction, and their pretensions had been favoured by the anarchy of Stephen's reign. Now, however, that justice was once more fairly administered in the civil courts, it became un absolute necessity to assert the supremacy of the State over clergy and laity alike, the more so since the ecclesiastical courts had shown themselves anable to perform the work they had undertaken. Many other work they had undertaken. points connected with the relations between Church and State had to be settled, such as questions of advowson and excommunication. of election to bishopries, and of ecclesiastical appeals, and on all these points the Constitutions are very firm in insisting on the rights of the crown. "They are," says Bishop Stubbs, "no mere engine of tyranny or secular spite against a churchman: they are really a part of a great scheme of administrative reform, by which the debateable ground between the spiritual and temporal powers can be brought within the reach of common justice, and the lawlessness arising from professional jealousies abolished." The Constitutions were drawn up by a committee of bishops and barons, the Justiciar, Richard de Lucy, having the chief hand in them. Thei purport is as follows :-

1. Any controversy concerni - advowson or presentation to livings to be ried in the King's court.

Churches in the royal demeste not to wen away in perpetuity without the clerks accused of any civil offence to be brought before the king's court, and there to chain their benefit of clergy.

4. No archbishop, bishop, &c., to leave the realm without the king's consent.

5. Excommunicated persons not to give excessive bail.

.6. Laymen not to be accused, save by certain legid accusers and witnesses, in presence of the bishop. If those who are arraigned are such that no one is willing or dazes to accuse them, the sheriff shall, on demand of the bishop, cause twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood to swear before the bishop that they will declare the truth in that matter according to their conscience.

7. No tenant-in-chief to be excommunicated or to have his lands put under interdict without the king's leave.

8. Appeals shall be from the archdeacon's court to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop, and no further (that is, to Rome) without the king's leave.

 If a dispute arise between a cleric and a layman, whether a fief is held by ecclesiastical or lay tenure, it shall be settled by the declaration of twelve lawful men, in the presence of the king's pastlee.

10. A man refusing to appear before an ecclesiastical court shall not be excommunicated till un officer of the king has inquired into the matter.

11. Archbishops, bishops, &c., shall hold their possessions of the king as baronies, and answer for the same to the king's justices, and do suit and service and observe all the king's customs, except in cases of life and limb.

12. When an archbishopric, bishopric, &c., in the royal demesne shall be vacant, it shall remain in the king's hand, and he shall receive from it all the revenues and proces.

13. If any of the barons refuse justice to an ecclesiastic, the king shall give him justice.

14. The chattels of those who are in forfeiture to the king shall not be detained in a church or churchyard.

15. All pleas concerning debts are to be tried in the king's court.

16. The sons of villeins are not to be ordained without the consent of their lords.

It is important to notice that the mention of a jury in clause 6, and of the principle of recognition by twelvo lawful men in clause 9, are the earliest instances of such mention in anything like statute laws, though, no doubt, the practice of such recognitions prevailed long before this date. [Becket.]

Clarendon, EDWARD HYDE, 18T EARL OF (b. Feb. 18, 1609, d. Dec. 9, 1674), ron of llenry Hyde of Dinton, Wilts., entered Magdalen Hall, 1622, the Middle Temple, 1625. When the Short Parliament was summoned, Hyde, who had obtained considerable reputation as a lawyer, was elected member for Wootton Bassett. In the Long Parliament he represented Saltash, and took a prominent part in the attack on the maladministration of the last twelve years. Legal abuses, such as the extraordinary courts, the ship-money judgment, the misconduct of the judges, and other causes which had brought into contempt "that great and admirable mystery the law, met with his chief attention. He shared in the earlier portion of the proceedings against Strafford, and his name is not among the list of those who voted against his attainder. But the question of Church government led to his separation from the popular party, and brought him into connection with the king. In the autur n of 1641 he became, though without any official position, the confidential adviser of Charles, and the real leader of his party in the Commons. He thoroughly disapproved of the king's attempt to seize the Five Members, but nevertheless continued in his service, drew up in secret the royal replies to the manifestoes of the l'arijament, and finally joined the king at York. His great work was the formation of the party of Constitutiona' Royalists, whose leader and spokesman be was, and he now succeeded in persuading the king to abstain from unconstitutional a tion, and take his stand on his legal rights. Tan he gave the king a policy, and gathered round him a party. In the spring of 1643 he was knighted, made a Privy-Councilior, and appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was by his counsel that the king summoned the Parliament which met that autumn at Oxford. In all .legotiations he was the king's chief agent and adviser, and the l'ariiament recognised his importance by excepting him from pardon. When, in 1645, the Prince of Wales was sent into the West of England, Hyde accompanied him as one of his council, and also accompanied him in his flight from the advance of Fairfax, first to the Scilly Isies, then to Jersey (April, 1646). In September, 1648, the outbreak of the second Civil War, and the rumour of an expedition to England cailed him to Holland to join Prince Charles, but in the spring of the next year he was sent as ambassador to Madrid, and remained in Spain till 1651. At the end of 1652 he rejoined the young king, and from that time till the Restoration acted as his chief minister, being promoted in 1658 to the dignity of Lord Chancellor. Juring these years he managed the king's finances, conducted his negotiations with foreign courts, and carried on a constant correspondence with the disaffected in England, which survives in the collection entitled the Currendon State Papers. At the Restora-tion he drew up the Declaration of Breda, and it was by his suggestion that the king, instead of attempting to arrange the terms on which he should be restored, referred them unreservedly to the future judgment of Parliament. The king's return placed him at the head of the administration; he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and created Earl of Clarendon (April, 1661). His daughter's (Anne Hyde) mar-riage with the Duke of York, which first seemed to endanger, in the end con his power. Ir his domestic policy led to maintain the balance of the Const. against both king and Parliament. opposed the attempt to convert the king's Declaration of Indulgence into law (1663). It was afterwards charged against him that, when he might have secured for the king a revenue which would have made the king independent of Parliament, he preferred not to do so. "He had no mind," says Burnet, "to put the king out of the necessity of having recourse to his l'arliament." On the other hand, when the Cavalier majority of the House of Commons wished to repeal the Act of Indemnity (1662), he set his influence against it, and kept the king to his promises. "He often said it was the making those promises had brought the king home, and the keeping them must keep him at home." When Parliament introduced the principle of appropriation of supplies (1665), and the system of auditing expenditures (1666), it was against his advice that the king yielded to them. In ecclosiastical matters he aimed at restoring the state of things which had existed before 1640. The Declaration of Ilreda had held out to the Nonconformiats promises of comprehension and indulgence which were not observed. Clarendon, after some hesitating attempts at a compromise in favour of the Presbyterians, urged the re-establishment of the old ecciesiastical system in ail its rigidity, and supported the enactment of the Corporation Act (1661), the Act of Uniformity (1662), the Conventicle Act, and the Five Mile Act (1665). Abroad, the alliance with France, which began under Cromwell's rule, was continued under Clarendon. He favoured the Portuguese match (1662) and negotiated the sale of Dunkirk (1662). He opposed the war with Holland (1665), but continued in office, and was made responsible by public opinion for its mismanagement. He had already been unsuccessfully impeached by the Eari of Bristol (1663). In August, 1667, he was dismissed from the Chancellorship, and two months later the House of Commons decided on his impeachment. The charges brought against him were corruption, the intention of introducing arbitrary government, and treachery in the late war. In obedience to the king's command, Clarendon fled to France. l'arliament summoned him to return and stand his trial. and as he did not do so, centenced him to exile for life. He therefore remained in France until his death, which pok place on December 9th, 1674. As a st...osman Clarendon was honest, and constant to his principles. His attachment to the Church never failed, and his influence with both his masters was always used to prevent changes in its government or discipline. "He did really believe the Church of England the most exactly formed and framed for the encouragement and advancement of learning and piety, and for the preservation of peace, of any church in the world." For the Constitution he had "a most zealous esteem and reverence; and believed it to be so equally poised that if the least branch of the prerogative was torn off or parted with, the subject suffered by it and that his right was impaired; and he was as much troubled when the crown exceeded its just limits, and thought the prerogative hurt by it." During his first exile he wrote the first seven books of the History of the Rebellion and portions of the three subsequent books (1646—1648). His object was to explain to posterity the success of the Rebellion, and "to vindicate the memory of those few who out of duty and conscience had opposed and resisted that torrent," i.e., to justify the tonstitutional Royalists. The rest of the History of the Rebellion was written during the second oxile. Clarendon at first (1668-70) set to work on an Autobiography in which he recounted his life down to the Restoration, and related over again much that he had written in the History. He then changed his mind, and decided to unite the two works, incorporating portions of the Life in the earlier work, and also using it to form the latter books of the History. Thus the History fthe Rebellion consists of two parts, written at two periods; the first composed with the intention of writing a history, the second with the intention of writing a biography. Of these parts the first is the most valuable and the most accurate. The Continuation of the Life is an apology for Clarendon's administration, written in 1672 for the information of his children. The History of the Rebellion in Ireland was written to vindicate Lord Ormonde.

In the first edition of the History of the Re-bellion, edited by Sprat, Bishop of Worcester, some small alterations were made in the text; these were in part restored in the edition of 1826, and the original text was exactly printed in 1849.

Clarendon, HENRY HYDE, 2ND EARL or (b. 1638, d. 1700), was the son of Charles II.'s great minister. In 1685 he was appointed Lord Privy Seal. At the end of the year he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Ho found himself completely eelipsed in that country by the influence of Tyrconnel and (as he was a sincere Protestant) his alarm was great when several Roman Catholics were sworn of the Privy Council. He, nevertheless, submitted to Tyrconnel's dictation, and when James threatened to dismiss him for his reluctant compliance in the reform of the army and administration, he wrote humble letters of apology. Ho was, however, dismissed in 1687, shortly after his brother, Rochester. He was invited to the consultation in act of the Seven Bishops. When the Declaration of the Prince of Grange was rublished, he told the king that he had had no part in summoning him to England. He was much grieved at hearing that his son, Lord Cornbury, had described James, but at length joined the Prince of Orange at Salisbury. Finding that he was coldly received by William, ho soon resumed his Tory principles, and endeavoured to persuado the Princess Anne to insist on her rights to the throne. He took part in the Jacobite plots of 1690. Before setting out for Ireland William sent warning to him through his brother, Roehester. Ho was subsequently arrested by order of the Privy Council. He again engaged in Jacobite plots, and letters from him to James were seized among Preston's papers. confined in the Tower for six months, but afterwards suffered to go free. On the death of Queen Mary he lost his influence with the Princess Anne. The remainder of his life was spent in obscurity.

Clarendon, Sin Roger (d. 1402), was a natural son of the Black Prince. He was a personal attendant of Richard II.; and in 1402, on a rumour that Richard was still alive, attempted to raise a rebellion, but was seized and executed.

Clarendon Code, THE, is the name given to the four Acts passed during Lord Clarendon's administration, directed against Nonconformists-viz., the Act of Uniformity, the Corporation Act, the Conventiele Act, and the Five-Mile Act.

Clarkson, THOMAS (b. 1760, d. 1846), was born at Wisbeach, and educated at St. Paul's School, and St. John's College, Carabridge. In 1785 ho carried off the Latin Essay, the subject being, "Is it lawful to make men slaves against their will?" He was so thoroughly convinced by what he read on the subject of the horrors of the slave traffic, that he resolved to dovoto all his energies towards its abolition. Clarkson began with indefatigable zeal to prosecute inquiries at every port. The result of his rescarches he embodied in a pamphlet, entitled, A Summary View of the Slave Trade. Most of the leading men among the Whigs encouraged the movement, and Pitt, in 1788, supported a bill for mitigating the horrors of the Middle Passage. Clarkson's next publication was an Essay on the Impolicy of the Slave Trade. When the French Revolution broke out, he went over to Paris to try to induer the National Assembly to set an example to the world by introducing real equality for both white and black men. So unceasingly did he labour that in 1794 his health completely broke down, and ho had to cease from all active work. Ho occupied his enforced leisure in writing a History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade, which appeared in 1808, the year after the Act for its abolition had passed through Parliament. In 1823 ho was appointed one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Slavery Society, which had just been formed. To Clarkson's exertions is the abolition of the slave trade in large measure due, since it was his researches which enabled Wilberforce to bring such convincing proofs of its horrors before Parliament.

Classes, THE ACT OF (1649), passed by the Scotch Estates, disqualified four "classes" of men from sitting in Parliament or holding office for various periods. The classes consisted of the enemies of the Covenaut, Malignants, those who had entered into the "Engagement" with Charles I., and persons of immoral life.

Claverhouse. [GRAHAM, JOHN.]

Cleanse the Causeway (1520) was the name given to a street fight in Edinburgh, between the partisans of the Douglas family and the followers of the crown and the Hamiltons. The Douglases overpowered their antagonists, and drove them from the streets; hence the name of the combat, in which the Earl of Angus, the head of the Douglases, slew Sir Patrick Hamilton, brother of the Earl of Arran.

Cleargrits, The, was the name given to the advanced liberal party in Canada, about 1850, who opposed the prependerant influence of the French Canadians and demanded representation by population. They were at different times joined for a short period by discontented members both of the conservative and liberal parties.

Clergy is the general name given to the body of men set upart in England for the performance of public worship. Christianity in England was at first monastie, and churches were chiefly served by monks. [Church, The Celtic.] The clergy were maintained by the offerings of the people or by the lords. The ecclesiastical organisation of Archbishop Theodore began from the top and was diocesan; but it spread downwards, and parishes were formed on the basis of townships. The Levitical ordinance of giving a tithe to God was first recommended, and in 787 was enacted by ecclesinstical councils which had the authority of witchagemots. At first this tithe went to the bishop, who distributed it into four parts: one for himself, one for the fabric of tho church, one for the poor, and one for the ineumbent. It was, however, frequently given by the lords of lands to monasteries, and so the system of appropriation began. The appropriators were bishops, monasteries, or spiritual corporations who received the tithe, and paid only a portion which they deemed sufficient to the vicar or curate who discharged the spiritual duties of the parish. Where the parson received the endowments of his office he was styled rector. This system of appropriation led to the growth and wealth of monastic orders, and to an inadequate provision for the parochial elergy. Its prevalence in England rendered easy the transferrence to Henry VIII. of ecclesiastical revenues which were held by appropriators in this anomalous

In early times the clergy were the civilisers and educators of England. Their system, their councils, and their learning made them powerful in influencing the growth of the organisation of the state. After the Norman Conquest their status became more definite, as everything else became more definite likewise. The growth of the canon law into a regular system, and the establishment of ecclesiastical courts gradually led to elerical exemptions from ordinary jurisdiction, which produced disorders. Henry II. strove to remedy this by the Constitutions of Clarendon; but criminous clerks were still handed over to ecclesiastical tribunals if they claimed Benefit of Clergy (q.v.), a privilege which was not entirely abolished till 1830.

The tenure of Church property was regulated by the concordat between Henry I. and Anselm, which established the obligation of homage on all temporalities. This led to the taxation of Church lands on the same footing as lands held by other barons. The taxation of the spiritual revenue of the clergy was attempted by John, but was withstood. The claim of the Pope to tax the clergy for a crusade gradually helped the king to break down clerical immunities on this head. The crown demanded grants from the spirituality, who considered these demands in Convocation. In this way the clerical assembly took part in secular business, and the clergy became more definitely organised into an estate of the realm. They were recognised as such by Edward I. in his Parliament of 1295, to which he summoned the proctors of chapters and of the parochial elergy. But the clergy preferred to tax themselves in Convocation, and therefore did not form a clerical estate. Probably they considered that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual. [Convocation.]

The clergy in the Middle Ages were a wealthy body. Their share of indirect taxation was nearly a third of the whole amount. Their landed estates were spread over England, and their revenues from tithes and offerings were still greater. The monastic orders especially were good farmers, and did much to bring the soil of England under cultivation. The clergy were mild landlords, and stimulated the national industry. The numbers of the clergy were very large, and they were taken from every class of society. Even villeins sought ordination as a means of obtaining freedom. But the wealth of the Church was unequally divided. Pluralities were common, and many of the higher clergy were devoted to the business of the State. L'arishes were not well served, in spite of the number of clergy. Very many of them were chaplains, or were endowed by private persons to say masses for their dead. Abuses grew up in proportion as the mechanism of the English Church was broken down by Papal interference, and appeals to Romo rendered futile the authority of the bishops. Till the beginning of the thirteenth century the clerical order was amongst the most resolute supporters of natural liberties against the crown. The growth of clerical corruption gave weight to the attacks of the Lollards upon the clergy, and the elergy finding themselves

They were divided amongst themselves. The regular clergy opposed the seculars, the monks disliked the friars, Dominicans were set against Franciscans. In current politics the clergy were as much divided as the nation. They represented the cducation of the country, and their influence was spread into every class. Their mand influence was not so good. The excessive number of clergy, their wealth and idleness, rendered them on the whole frivolous. The obligation of celibacy was frequently evaded by concubinage, for which in some cases licences

After the Reformation the wealth of the Church and the number of the clergy were greatly diminished. The connection with the Papacy ceased, and the clergy became closely united with the crown. Ecclesiastical courts were not, however, abolished; and under Elizabeth a new court, the Court of High Commission, was created for the purpose of exercising the powers of the royal supremacy. Elizabeth used the bishops as State officials for the purpose of reducing to uniformity the body of the clergy. The clergy were allowed to marry, but were ill-provided for, and no longer had an intellectual superiority over the laity. In the struggle against Popery on one side and Puritanism on the other, the clergy became more and more firm adherents of the royal prerogative. The State, in its desire for internal unity, recognised no other religious system save that of the Church of England, and rejused to extend its limits. At the same time the Court of High Commission was used to sanction oppressive proceedings on the part of the crown. The Great Rebellion destroyed monarchy and Church alike, and at the Restoration t'a clergy returned as staunch Torics. Even he avowed intention of James II. to re-establish Romanism did not, in the eyes of some of the clergy, justify the Revo-lution. Nearly four hundred followed Archbishop Sancroft in resigning their benefices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William III.

The clergy of the seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth century as a body were poor, and very many of the incumbents laboured with their own hands. Ecclesiastical incomes were still very unequally divided, and there was a great difference between the wealthy and learned clergy and the ordinary incumbents, who were on the same level as their people. The first attempt to raise the position of the poorer clergy was made by Queen Anne, who resigned the claims of the crown on annates and first-fruits, dues levied by the Pope on benefices which had passed into the hands of the crown. Out of these dues was formed a fund, known as "Queen Anne's Bounty," for the augmentation of small livings. From this time the average position of the clergy has slowly increased. In 1836 a body called Ecclesiastical Commissioners was established for the improved management and distribution of the revenues of the Church. Tho number of clergy attached to cathedrals was reduced, and the surplus revenues are applied to the increase of small benefices. In the same year the Tithes Commutation Act converted tithes into a rent-charge upon the land; and so ended the numerous disputes between the clergy and their parishioners which the system of tithes encouraged.

From the reign of Anne the clergy ceased to have any direct political importance. In 7.7 the sittings of Convocation were practically suspended. Since Anne's reign no bishop has held any office of State. During the eighteenth century the clergy were not zealous in the discharge of their duties, till a new stimulus was given to religious zeal by the Wesleyan movement. The clergy were content to rest on their position as officers of a Church "by law established," and there were many scandals in reference to simoniacal appointments. The Tractarian movement of 1833 did much to deliver the Church from Erastianism, and to develop the zeal of the clergy. In 1838 the Pluralities Act did away with many of the abuses caused by the non-residence of wealthy clergymen at the benefices whose revenues they received.

Politically the clergy have been gradually deprived of exclusive privileges, and the State has removed all the disabilities which it had formerly placed on those who were not members of the Established Church. The clergy are now subject to the same jurisdiction as laymen in all civil matters. As regards their orthodoxy, their morals, and the conduct of their ministrations, they are subject to the jurisdiction of their bishops and to the law of the Church. The procedure of the Bishops' Court is regulated by the Church Discipline Act, 1840. Appeals from this court were formerly made to a Court of Delegates appointed by the king; but in 1832 this was transferred to the king in

Council. [CHURCH.]

Admission into the clerical body is given by episcopal or lination. Candidates must have reached the age of twenty-three, must prove them selves ft in character, education, and orthodoxy, and must show that they have a definite sphere within which they can exercise their clerical functions. By canon law, ordination conferred an indelible character on the recipient, and a clergyman could not relinquish the priesthood. The Clerical Disabilities Act (1870) provides that a clergyman may execute a deed of relinquishment, which is to be recorded by his bishop in the diocesan registry. After this registration, the priest or deacon is incapable of officiating as such, and loses all his rights as a clergyman.

To enable the clergy to discharge their duties more efficiently, the State exempts them from certain civil responsibilities. They cannot be compelled to serve on a jury or to hold any temporal office. Ecclesiastical revenues cannot be seized in payment of debts, but are subject to sequestration, i.e., the churchwardens pay the sum due out of the profits of the benefice, after making provision for the performance of the services of the Church. On the other hand, the clergy labour under certain disabilities owing to their spiritual avocations. They are prohibited from trading, and may not sue for debts due from commercial transactions. In 1800 they were declared incapable of being elected members of the House of Commons.

"Clericis Laicos" are the opening words of the famous Bull issued by Pope Boniface VIII., forbidding the king to take, or the clergy to pay, taxes on their ecclesiastical revenues. The result of this was that, in .297, Archbishop Winchelsey refused to agree to a money grant, whereupon Edward I. outlawed the clergy, and confiscated the estates of the see of Canterbury. Upon this, many of the clergy gave in; but the archbishop still held out, till eventually a compromise was made, whereby Winchelsey promised that if the king would confirm the charters, he would do his best to obtain money from the clergy, the Pope having delared that his prohibition did not affect voluntary grants for purposes of national defence. Cleveland, BARBARA VILLIERS, DUCHESS or (b. 1640, d. 1709), was the daughter of Lord Grandison, and wife of Roger Palmer. About 1659 she became one of Charles II.'s mistresses. In 1662 her husband was made Earl of Castlemaine, and it is as Lady Castlemaine that his wife is generally known. Her beauty and strong will gave her immense influence at court, while in the number of her intrigues she almost eclipsed the king. In 1670 she was created Duchess of Cloveland, and shortly afterwards left England for France, where she spent the rest of her life. In 1705 she married Robert (Beau) Fielding: but the marriage was subsequently annulled, on the ground of the husband's having committed bigamy. Of her sons by Charles II., the eldest became Duke of Cleveland, the second Duke of Grafton, and the youngest Duke of Northumberland.

Clifford, JOHN, LORD (d. 1461), was the son of Thomas, Lord Clifford, who fell in the Hist.—11* first battle of St. Albans. He was a strong Lancastrian, and took part in the battle of Wakefield, after which, in revenge for his father's death, he killed in cold blood the young Earl of Rutland, son of the Duke of York. In 1461 he was defeated and slain at Ferrybridge.

Clifford, Thomas, Lorn (b. 1630, d. 1673), descended from an old Catholic family, highly distinguished himself by his bravery in the Dutch War of 1665, and in 1666 was made a Privy Councillor. He joined the Cabal ministry in 1667, and took a prominent part in the Treaty of Dover, and in advocating the war with Holland. In 1672 he was made Lord High Treasurer and a baron. In 1673 the passing of the Test Act compelled him, as a Catholic, to resign his office, and shortly afterwards he died. Clifford was one of the most zealous Catholics at court, and a strong advocate of tolerance of all religious opinions. [Cabal.]

Clinton, Edward, Lord (b. 1512, d. 1585), an able commander and astute diplomatist, was, in 1550, appointed Lord High Admiral of England, having in the previous year held the post of Governor of Boulogne. On the accession of Elizabeth, he was confirmed in his office of Lord High Admiral, though he had just before shown some want of energy whilst commanding the fleet in the expedition against Brest, 1558. He subsequently became a trusted adviser of Elizabeth, and in 1569 oid much to suppress the rising in the North. In 1572 he was created Earl of Lincoln, and in the same year sent to Paris to ratify the treaty with France. His policy was strongly anti-Spanish

Clinton, George (b. 1739, d. 1812), Vice-President of the United States, entered Congress May 15, 1775, and voted for independence. In 1776 he was a deputy to the New York Provincial Congress. He was appointed brigadier-general, and defended Forts Montgomery and Clinton against Sir H. Clinton, Oct., 1777. He was chosen Governor of New York in 1777 and 1795, and Vice-President of the Union 1804—12.

Clinton, Sir Hanry (b. 1738, d. 1795), a grandson of the sixth Earl of Lincoln. On the prospect of a rupture with the American colonies, he was sent out with Howe and Burgoyno in command of reinforcements. He distinguished himself at Bunker Hill, and was soon afterwards despatched to Charleston. He was appointed commandant of Long Island. He did not however, hold it long, as he was compelled to capitulate to Gates. In January, 1778, he was appointed commander-in-chief in America, and was fairly successful in this position. In 1780 he made an expedition to South Carolina and captured Charleston, and at one time had almost won back the Carolinas and Georgia. This campaign was stained by his tampering with General Arnold to induce him to deliver up West Point—a transaction which cost Major Andre's life—he failed also to succour Cornwallis. Circumstances which would have tried a much greater general than he, were opposed to him, and he was superseded. On his return to England a pamphlet war of mutual recrininations ensued hetween the two generals. He was afterwards Governor of Limerick, and in 1793 was transferred to Gibraltar, in command of which post he died in December, 1795.

Clinton, SIR HENHY, G.C.B. (d. 1829), entering the army in 1787, first saw active service, as aido-de-camp to the Duke of York, in the campaigns of 1793-4 in the Netherlands. On his return to England in 1795, he was appointed lieut.-colonel of the 66th, and proceeded to the West Indies to join his regiment. There he served under Sir Ralph Abercromby, and was present at most of the expeditions against the different islands. On his return from the West Indies. he served under Lord Cornwallis in Ireland, as his aide-de-camp, and was present at the surrender of the French invading force at Ballinamuck. In April, 1799, he was attached to Lord William Bentinck on a mission to the Austro-Russian army in Northern Italy, and was present at the battles of Trehia and Novi, and the siege of Alessandria. Being afterwards appointed to join Suwarof, he was with him throughout the enterprising campaign in Switzerland. On his return to England he was appointed adjutant-general in India, where he served under Lake at the battle of Lasswaree, and where he remained until the spring of 1805. In 1806 he commanded the Guards in Sicily, and held Syracuse from December, 1806, to the following November. He was then appoir d to the command of a brigade in Sir Je., a Moore's expedition to Sweden, and on his return became adjutant-general to the army in Portugal, in which capacity he was present at the battle of Vimiero. Almost immediately afterwards, he accompanied Sir John Moore through the Spanish campaign and the retreat to Corunna. His next employment was in Ireland, where he remained two years, until he found a more congenial sphere in the command of a division under Wellington. He rendered conspicuous service at Salamanca, was left in command on the Douro when Wellington advanced to Madrid, and was present at the siege of Burgos. For his services he received the thanks of Parliament, and obtained promotion, but continued to serve in Spain, and was present at nearly all the battles and sieges in the north of Spain and the south of France. His last public services were rendered to the country at Waterloo, where he commanded a division of infantry. During the peace that followed, he had no opportunity of displaying his great tactical abilities.

Clive, ROBERT, LORD (b. 1725, d. 1774), was the son of an obscure country gentleman of good lineage, but small fortune. He had been sent to Iudia in the capacity of a writer in 1744, and was present at the surrender of Madras to Labourdonnais in 1746. The counting-house was little adapted to his genius, and he soon exchanged the pen for the sword. Having obtained an ensign's commission, he distinguished himself in the operation before Devicotta, where he attracted the admiration of Major Lawrence (1749). He was also present at the disastrous siego of Pondicherry, under Admiral Boscawen. By this time, the success of the confederation which Dupleix had aroused against the English had rendered the French masters of all South India. Clive successfully persuaded Mr. Saunders, Governor of Madras, to allow him to undertake the celebrated expedition to Arcot, which, by dividing the forces of the enemy, saved the English garrison cooped up in Trichinopoly. Clive's defence of Arcot laid the foundation of the British Empiro in India. After fifty days, the troops of Chunda Sahib raised the siege. A series of successes, culminating at Trichinopoly, led to the surrender of the French general D'Anteuil to Chunda Sahih, and this in its turn brought about the recall and disgrace of Dupleix. After the eapture of Coulong and Chingleput-two strong places in the Carnatie-Clive returned to England, in 1752, with his health greatly impaired. He was received with great distinction by the Company and hy the ministers, and on his return to India was appointed Governor of Fort St. David. In 1756 Clive was entrusted with the task of revenging the tragedy of the Black Hole of Calcutta (q.v.) on Surajah Dowlah. With Admiral Watson in command of the fleet, he soon recovered Calcutta, and forced the nabob to treat for peace. But no sooner had Clive been called away than Surajah Dowlah began to intrigue with the French. It was evident that the English power was in serious danger unless a prompt blow were struck; and Clive, after entering into negotiations with tho nabob's discontented subjects, utterly defeated the native army at Plassey (1757). Meer Jaffier was appointed to the government of Bengal; but his fellow-traitor, Omichund, whose services had been secured by a forged promise of £300,000, received nothing. From the new nabob Clive obtained for the Company a concession of the land 600 vards around the Mahratta Ditch. and the zemindary rights of the country lying to the south of Calcutta. The victory of Plassey was followed by the assessination of Surajah Dowlah; the reconstitution of the government of Calcutta, with Clivo at its head; the rout of the invading army of Ali (lehur, the heir of the Mogul Empire (1759); and the return of Clive to England, in 1760. On his return, he was received with great distinction by all ranks, and honoured with an Irish peerage. In 1765 he returned once more to India, as Governor of Bengal, pledged to reform the luxury and corruption of the civil servants of the Company—who had made large fortunes by the cruellest extortion—and to settle the disturbed affairs of Bengal. He put an end to these practices by enforcing the laws prohibiting the acceptance of presents from the natives; while, at the same time, he raised the pay of the civil service by appropriating to this purpose the proceeds of the salt monopoly. The Nabob of Moorshedabad [Meer Cossim] was pensioned off, the dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa was obtained for the Company by imperial firman, and a mutiny in the army was successfully quelled. In 1767 Clive finally returned to England, with his health shattered by severe attacks of disease, when his enemies in the India House tried to impeach him for corrupt practices; but the House of Commons passed a resolutien that "Robert Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country. Broken, however, by the pressure of bodily and mental suffering, he put an end to his existence in November, 1774. [INDIA, EAST INDIA COMPANY.]

Clontarf, The Battle of, was fought on Friday, April 23, 1014. Brian Boru (q.v.) and his son, at the head of the Irish of Munster, Connaught, Meath, and Ulster, were opposed to the Ostmen (q.v.) of Ireland, reinforced by their countrymen from the Baltic and the Orkneys, and supported by the Leinster Irish. The result was a victory for Brian; but both ho and his son fell in the fight. The Danes are said to have lost 6,000 men, and they never became formidable to the native Irish after this defeat.

Clontarf, MEETINO AT. A monster meeting in support of the Repeal of the Union was to be held on this historical spot on Oct. 8, 1843. The government issued a proclamation for its prevention, and military procautions were taken. O'Connell (q.v.) and the priests exerted themselves to keep the people from assembling, and succeeded, in spite of the short notice given. But it thus became evident that O'Connell would not hight, and thus the Repeal movement collapsed.

Close Rolls, Tue, are certain Records of the crown containing letters, mandates, &c., of a private rature. They begin in 1204, and tre no. ite variety of subjects. They are of very great importance in the thirt—1th, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as containing materials for local and family histories, and also as shedding light on many obscure parts of our national annals. The Close Rolls of John and the first cloven years of Henry 11I. have been printed by the Record Commission under the editorship of Sir T. Hardy.

Closter-Seven, The Convention of (1757), was one of the incidents of the Seven Years' War. In July, the English commender, the Duke of Cumberland, was de-feated at Hastenbeck by the French. Hameln, Gottingen, Hanover, Bremen, and Verben were occupied by the French. Cumberland retired under Stade, but his communications with the Elbe were soon cut off. He therefore accepted the mediation of the King of Denmark, and on Sept. 8 signed a conviction with the Duke of Richelieu. The terms were, that the assailing troops, such as those of Hesse and Brunswick, should be sent home, and that the Hanoverians under Cumberland should pass the Elbe, and be dispersed into different quarters of cantonments, leaving only a garrison at Stade. The convention was very violently denounced in Prussia, and in England it was generally looked upon as extremely disgraceful. But perhaps Cumberland took the wisest course under the circumstanecs. The French were in vastly superior force, and his own army was ill-disciplined and not to be depended on in any way. The convention was not rigidly kept on either side, and was subsequently, at the suggestion of Pitt, repudiated by the English, and the Hanoverian army equipped afresh.

Clovesho was the place where synods were held in Anglo-Saxon times. There have been numerous conjectures as to its situation, but it may perhaps be identified with Cliffe-at-Hoo, in Kent, though it is also said to be a place nearer London.

Club, The, was a name given to the Parliamentary majority of the Scotch Parliament, 1689, who used to meet in a tavern in Edinburgh to concert their measures against the government. The Club, which was composed of various elements, including Tories, discontented Whigs, and men of other political creeds, soon attained considerable power, and proved an immense hindranee to the government. In 1690 its chief members, Annandale, Ross, and Montgomery, began to intrigue with the Jacobites, the result being the revelation of the Montgomery plot.

Clyde, Colin Campbell, Lord (b. 1792, d. 1863), entered the army at an early age, and first saw service in the Peninsular War. Ho received his lieutenant-coloneley in 1832, and in the Chinese War in 1842 went out in command of his regiment, the 98th. In the Sikh War of 1848-9 ho obtained considerable distinction, was wounded at Chillianwallah, and largely contributed to the victory of Goojerat. In the Crimean War he was in command of the Highland Brigaue, and greatly distinguished himself at the Alma, after which battle he received the personal thanks of Lord Raglan. On the morning of the battle of Balaclava, the Highland Brigaue, under Campbell, was entrusted with the defence of the British landing-place, and the repulse of a squadron of Russian cavalry was one of the results of the day's fighting. In July, 1857, Sir Coliu Campbell was ordered to India to assume eommand against the mutincers. Leaving England at twenty-four hours' notice, he arrived at Calcutta on Aug. 13, and hastily collecting what troops he could, he marched on Lucknow, the relief of which city was effected with consummate skill and generalship. One after another the rebel strongholds were reduced, and Sir Colin's talents as a commander-in-chief were hardly more conspicuous than his tact and temper in the difficult position in which ho was placed. On the complete suppression of the Mutiny by this able general and his brilliant lioutenants. Campbell was raised to the pecrage, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, with a pension of £2,000 a year. He was ereated a field-marshal shortly before his death.

Cobbett, William (b. 1762, d. 1835), the son of a Surrey farmer, was born at Farnham. After spending some years as a solicitor's clerk and a private in the army, he went to America in 1792, and opened a bookseller's shop in Philadephia. Here he issued a series of pamphlets under the title of "Peter Porcupine." In 1801 he returned to England and set up a morning paper, in which he warmly supported Mr. Pitt. This failed, and he after-wards started the Weekly Register. At first he was patronised by the ministry, but in 1805 he became un eager Radical, and a formidable opponent to the ministry. In 1810 ho was prosecuted for some remarks on a military floggiug, and imprisoned for two years, but still continued to write. It was at this time that he issued Twopenny Trash, a series of papers wherewith he harassed the administration. In 1817 he again settled in America; but returned in 1819 and took an active part in the trial of Queen Caroline. He also unsuccessfully contested Coventry and Westminster. Renewing his attention to agriculture, he took a farm, and attempted to introduce Indian corn as a staple article of English produce, but the project proved a failure. In 1831 he was prosecuted for publishing a libel with intent to rouse discontent in the minds of the labourers. In defending himself he made a defiant speech, declaring that "the Tories had ruled the country with rods, but the Whigs scourged it with scorpions." The jury disagreed and he scorpions." The jury disagreed and ho was discharged. In 1832 he was returned to the Reformed l'arliament for Oldham. The exertion of speaking on the Marquis of Chandos's motion on agricultural distress on May 25, 1835, and remaining late to vote were too much for him. He went down to his farm early noxt morning, and died three weeks afterwards. He was a most prolific and popular writer, and the vigour of his style and his extraordinary mastery of the resources of the language have been deservedly praised. Among his works are the Parliamentary History to 1803, in 12 vols., a well-known and useful compilation; tho Political Register; Cottage Economy; and a translation of Marten's Law of Nations.

There is a good sketch of Cobbett in Lord Dalling, Historical Characters.

Cobden, RICHARD (b. 1804, d. 1865), Was born at Midhurst, in Sussex, and became early in life a traveller for a cotton firm, settling in Lancashire. In 1830 ho started a business in partnership with some of his relatives. He was highly successful in his new sphere of work, and travelled abroad in Greece, Turkey, and the United States, in the interest of the house to which he belonged (1834—35). On his return from the latter country he addressed several letters on coonomical and political subjects to the Manchester Times, strongly advocating the theories of his later years, peace, retrenchment, non-interference, and free trade. Meanwhile the Anti-Corn-Law League had been established at Manchester (1838), and when Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright joined its ranks, they roused its energies to the full. At the election of 1841, when Lord Melbourne made his appeal to the country in favour of a fixed duty on corn, Mr. Cobden was elected member for Stockport. He now had every opportunity of advocating his views; and at last Sir Robert Peel declared himself in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws (1845) and 1 pealed them the following year. Sir Robert I'eel on this occasion paid a just tribute to Mr den's efforts. While absent on the Caricalt, Mr. Cobden was returned for the Wess Riding of Yorkshire (1847). He had before this refused to join Lord Russell's ministry, but offered a strong opposition to the Derby government of 1852, and the Coalition cabinet of Lord Aberdeen. He condemned the war with Ruse's entirely; and in this 1 .tter, though ho succeeded in causing a disc ation of Parliament by carrying a vote condemning the proceedings of Sir John Bowring in China, his course was so distasteful to his constituents that he did not offer himself again for the West Riding, and remained out of Parliament till 1859, when he was elected, in his absence, for Rochdale. In 1860 he negotiated the commercial treaty with the French; but always steadily refused Cobham, ELEANOR, was first the mistress and then the wife of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to whom she was married in 1426. She was the daughter of Reginald, Lord Cobham. In 1441 she was arraigned on a charge of treason and witcheraft, and it appeared that two of her accomplices had by her orders constructed a waxen image of King Honry VI., which they gradually melted before a fire, it being expected that the king's life would waste away as the image was acted upon by the heat. In the event of Henry's death, the Duke of Gloucester, as the nearest heir of the house of Lancaster, would have succeeded to the throne. For these crimes Eleanor Cobham was compelled to de public penance in the streets of London, and was imprisoned for life.

Cobham, WILLIAM BROOKE, LORD (d. 1598), was Warden of the Cinque Ports when Bailly's treasonable letters were captured in 1571; by his connivance, Loslie, Bishop of Ross, was enabled to change the packet before it was laid before the Council. In 1578 he was sent on a mission to the Low Countries, in conjunction with Sir Francis Walsingham, and again in 1588 with Lord Derby, Sir James Croft, and Sir Amyas Paulet, as his companions. He was subsequently created Lord Chamberlain.

Cobham, LORD. [OLDCASTLE.]

Cochrane, ROBERT, a stonemason, was the favourite and principal adviser of James III. of Scotland, whom ho is said to have instigated to murder his brother, the Earl of Mar. On Mar's death, Cochrane obtained a grant of his estates, a circumstance which roused the Scotch nobles to fury. No audience could be obtained with the king except through his favourite. He was hanged, together with some other favourites of the king, at the bridge of Lauder, by Archibald "Bell-the-Cat," in 1482.

Cochrane, THOMAS. [DUNDONALD.]

Codrington, Christopher (b. 1668, d. 1710), was born in Barbadoes, and having served with distinction in Europe, being present at the siege of Namur, was rewarded with the post of Governor of the Leeward Islands. In 1703 he planned and carried out the attack on the French at Guadaloupe.

Codrington, Admiral Sir Edward (b. 1770, d. 1851), entered the navy in 1733, and was present at the battles off the De Croix and Trafalgar; he accompanied the expedition to Walcheren; and was employed off the coast of Spain co-operating with the Catalonian patriots during the Peninsular War. During the war with the United States which followed, he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1815 he was nominated a K.C.B., was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, 1821, and was appointed commanderin-chief of the Medi erranean squadron, 1826. It was in this capacity that he took the leading part in the battle of Navarine, Oct. 20, 1827. In reward for this, Codrington was advanced to the dignity of the Grand Cross of the Bath; while from the Emporor of Russia he received the Grand Cross of St. George; and from the King of France the Grand Cross of St. Louis. But at home opinions were divided as to the necessity of what the Duke of Wellington called "an untoward event," and Sir Edward was thought to have been unduly influenced by his Philhellenic ideas; he was recalled in April, 1828. He obtained the rank of full admiral, and was appointed in 1839 commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. In 1832 he had been elected for Devonport in the Liberal interest, and was re-elected in 1835 and 1837; but resigned his seat npon taking the command at Portsmouth.

Coggeshall, RALPH OF, wrote a chronicle extending from 1066 to 1224. The earlier part is a compilation from various sources, but from 1187 this chronicle is important and valuable. Beyond the fact that Ralph was Abbot of Coggeshall from 1207 to 1210, and resigned in the latter year on account of ill-health, nothing is known of him.

Ralph of Coggeshall's Chronicle is published in the Rolls Series.

Coinage. The Britons first learnt tho art of coining from the Gauls about a hundred years before the invasion of Julius Cæsar. The Gaulish native coinage at this era consisted chiefly of rude imitations of the gold staters of Philip II. of Macedon, which almost from the time that they were struck, or say from about B.C. 300, began to have a currency in that country. These copies passed over into Britain, and were again in their turn copied still more rudely by the The coins of Philip which thus Britons. afforded a prototype to both the Gaulish and British coins, represented upon one side tho laureate head of Apollo (or possibly Ares or Heracles), and on the reverse a two-horse chariot or biga. The British imitations of these pieces are so rude that at first sight no resemblance between the original and tho copy can be detected. The barbarous copy can be detected. artists, unable to copy the head, have represented it by only a few lines and dots, and have at last confined their attempts at copying to the hair and the laurel wreath. On the reverse, the chariot and charioteer have almost, or totally disappeared, and the horse is barely recognisable. At first the British currency was entirely of gold, but a short time before the Roman invasion, silver, copper, and tin coins were also issued. These began by being imitations of the gold coinage, but afterwards copied the silver and other metal coins of Gaul. The British coins were at first entirely without legend; but about the time of the Roman invasion names began to appear upon them. Some of these names are otherwise known to history, as is, for example, Cunobelinos, the Cymbeline of Shakespeare. Although Casar's invasion did not immediately affect the political condition of the country, a tendency to imitate the Roman civilisation (which was beginning to take a firm hold in Gaul) set in in Britain, and of this there is abundant evidence on the coins. The Macedonian type gradually disappears, and we have designs copied frem the contemporary Roman coinage.

After the subjugation of South Britain by the Romans, the regular imperial series was substituted for the native currency, the British towns of mintage being Londinium and Camulodunum (Colchester). The last Roman coins struck in Britain were probably some which bear the name of Magnus Maximus the usurper, and which were apparently issued in A.D. 383.

From this time forward a considerable interval occurs. Deubtless, Roman coins were still current in Britain, though as time went on they must have diminished in numbers. Then came the rise of the Saxon The first coins issued by the Saxons seem to have been some small silver pieces usually called sceattas, weighing twenty grains, and bearing generally no name, whose precise date, on this account, it would be very hard to determine. Those of the sccattas which are prebably the latest are some which have Runic letters, and which can be dated in the middle of the seventh century. While we are speaking of these coins it is the proper place to notice a series of copper pieces, very like the sceattas in size and shape, which were confined altogether to the kingdoin of Northumbria, and which belong to a rather later period than the sceattas, namely, to the eighth and part of the ninth centuries. They are called stycas.

We then come to the coin which long remained almost the sole money of the English, with the insignificant exception of a few gold coins, which were struck from time to time. This was the penny. It was copied from the silver denarius, which in the course of the eighth century, and under the Carlovingian dynasty had come to supplant the gold currency of the Merovingian time. The penny, like the Carlovingian denarius, was a thin and flat silver coin, weighing some twenty to twenty-four grains; the full weight being twenty-four, whence the twenty-four grains which make up our pennyweight. The usual type of the penny showed on one side a rude head or bust, intended conventionally to represent that of the king, whose name was written round the head, while on the reverse, the piece showed some device, most frequently a form of cross: around this device was written the name of the moneyer, i.e., the fabricator of the coin, and of the town in which the piece was made. The pennies begin with Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 755—794), and they continue (with trifling exceptions) the sole English coins until the reign of Edward I. (1272).

The student must be placed upon his guard against confounding the actual denominations of coins with the denominations of money of account. In early times calculations were constantly made in money of account which was unrepresented by any coincd pieces. This was a reminiscence of the days when money was computed altogether by weight. In fact, it may be said that the name of almost every coin which has ever existed has denominated a weight before it denominated a coined piece (e.g., the Greek stater, the Jewish shekel, &c.). The Saxon money of account was of two kinds. One was derived from their weight system, which was a combination of the Roman and a non-Roman Tcutonic system, and whose chief denominations were the pound and the mark. The second money of account was simply taken from the Roman (or Byzantine) gold coin, the solidus, which in English was called the shilling. We frequently read of sums computed in pounds, marks, and shillings. Occasionally a solidus in gold was actually struck. The value of these moneys of account relative to the current coin has remained unaltered. The pound contained twenty shillings, or 240 pence; tho mark two-thirds of the pound, or 160 pence. The mark eventually fell out of use, leaving the three forms of money by which we still compute—the pound (liber), the shilling (solidus), and the penny (denarius). From these Latin names come our symbols, £, s., d.

The Norman Conquest produced at first no material alteration in the English corage. The penny continued to be the sole currency down to the reign of Edward I. The pennies of the first two Williams were as varied in their types as those of any previous monarch: but after these reigns the types dimmished rapidly in number, and from the time of Edward I. downwards, through many subsequent reigns, this coin was made upon one uniform pattern, which showed on the obverse a full face crowned, and on the reverse a long cross; the whole displaying a distinctly architectural design. The groat (first coined in the reign of Edward I.) was in type almost identical with the penny. The next important change was made by Edward III., who intro-duced a gold currency into England. For a long period in the Middle Ages—that is to say, from the beginning of the ninth century to the middle of the thirteenth-the gold coins in use in Westorn Europe had been supplied by the Emperors of Byzantium, whence these pieces acquired the name of bezants. Florence and Venice, in the course of the thirteenth century, instituted a gold currency of their own, and this example was speedily followed by other countries of Europe. Henry III. had made the experiment of a gold coinage by striking gold pennies worth thirty times as much as the silver coins; but this was only un experiment. Edward III. introduced a regular gold currency, first of forins (named ufter the gold coin of Florence), and after-wards of nobles, so called on account of the fineness of their metal. In value they were equal to eighty pence—i.e., to half a mark. The noble represented on one side the king in a ship (an allusion to the victory of Sluys), and on the other a highly ornamental cross. Half and quarter nobles were issued at the same time. The type was slightly altered by Edward IV., who replaced the reverse cross by a sun, and on the side of the ship placed a rose, from whence his pieces got the name of rose nobles. They were also called ryals (royals). Silver having declined in value in comparison to gold, the rose nobles were now worth ten shillings, and to represent the older value of half a mark a new piece was struck, having on one side the figure of St. Michael trampling upon Satan, and on the other a ship bearing a cross. This coin was called the angel noble, or, more shortly, the 1; its half was the angelet.

irther changes of importance are to be in the reign of Henry VII. In the currency, the pound sovereign was added to the pieces already in circulation. This coin, which was larger than any previously struck and current for twenty shillings, represented upon the obverse the king en-throned, and on the other side the royal arms over a rose. Shillings were now first struck, and the type of the groat was changed from a front to a side face. Henry VIII. struct some double-sovereigns, as well as half-sovereigns, and crowns, or quarter-sovereigns, in gold, and he issued a new type of noble (not continued in subsequent reigns) called the george noble. It nearly resembled the angel, but displayed St. George in place of St. Michael on the obverse. This king is unfavourably distinguished as the first who persistently debased the coinage of this country. The debasement continued during the two following reigns; but in the reign of Elizabeth the coinage was restored to its former purity. Edward VI. first struck the crown and the half-crown in silver, as well as the sixpence. In the reign of Mary we have sovereigns, rose nobles, angels, half-angels, half-crowns, shillings, groats, pence, and the divisions of the penny; but in the reign of Elizabeth we find the highest complement in the number of its denominations which the English coinage ever attained. It now consisted of no less than twenty distinct kinds of coin, viz., in gold, of the sovereign, half-, quarter-, and half-quarter-sovereign, rose noble or ryal, angel (now equal to a half-sovereign), angelot and quarter-angel, crown and half-erown; in silver, of the crown, halfcrown, shilling, sixpence, groat, half-groat, three-penny, and three-halfpenny pieces, the penny, tho three farthings, tho halfpenny, and farthing. Queen Elizabeth also struck coins for the use of the East India Company, which may be reckoned the begin-ning of the English colonial coinage. In the reign of James I. there was no substantial alteration, though some of the above denominations were changed, and some abandoned. The sovereign was now generally known as the broad, and this name was continued through the reign of Charles I. and through the Commonwealth. Charles I. struck some pieces of the value of three pounds, and subsequently, during the scarcity of gold which he experienced during the Civil War, he molted plate and coincd it into silver pieces of the values.of twenty and of ten shillings.

From the accession of James I. until the reign of Charles II., considerable fluctuations took place in the value of gold, and thorefore in the value of the chief gold coin. At one time the broad was worth as much as thirty shillings. In the reign of Charles II. it became fixed to the somewhat arbitrary value of twenty-one shillings, and as the gold from which the money of this reign was made came chiefly from the Guinea coast, the highest gold coins of this period acquired the name of guinea-pounds, or of guineas. Hence-forth, until nearly the ond of the reign of George III., the guinea entirely replaced the sovereign, and the gold currency, from the reign of Charles II. to George III., uniformly consisted of pieces of five, two, one, and half guineas. In 1817 George III. reintroduced the sovereign, and the guinea was abandoned. Copper coins were first made in 1672, and replaced by bronze in 1861. £5 and £2 pieces, in gold, and a silver four shalling piece were added in 1887, when new designs were placed on all the coins in honour of the queen's jubilee.

The coinage of Scotland began at a much later date than did that of England. With the exception of a few rude pennies, we have no Scotland money until the reign of David I., about the year 1124. The first coinage of Scotland followed as closely as possible the types of the English money, consisting, like the English coinage, at first exclusively of pennies, and about the end of the thirteenth century (David II.) of the penny and the great. The noble was likewise introduced by David II., but not continued in subsequent reigns. But after her long struggle for independence had come to an end, Scotland began to issue a series of new denominations, which we will briefly mention in the order in which they were introduced. Robert II. coined gold pieces called from their types, St. Andrew and Lion (having the shield of Scotland upon one side), and equal respectively to a half and a quarter of the noble. These two names and types were afterwards united for one piece. James I. struck a coin called demy, and equal in value to half an English noble. In the reign of James III, were issued the first coins in base silver, or billon, and of a very low value, which went by the names of placks and half-placks. The Scottish coinage was now completely separated from the English, though some of the nominal values were still retained. The actual values of the Scottish currency deteriorated so rapidly that when, in the reign of James VI. (I.), the eoinages of the two countries had to be brought into agreement, the Scottish shilling was found to be worth only onotwelfth of the English shilling. Therefore, when we read of a certain number of shillings Scots, we may pretty generally reduce that to the same number of pence in English reckoning. In the reign of James III, we notice the introduction of two new gold coins, the rider, which shows the king on horseback, and the unicorn, on which that animal is holding a shield. Divisions of these pieces and of the St. Andrew were struck. Two other gold coins, not differing much from these in value, but different in type, belong to the reign of James V.-viz., the eeu, or crown, giving (as the name implies) the shield of Scotland on the obverse, and the bounct piece, where the king's bust is represented in a square cap. The same prince coined a billon piece, known as the bauchee, a corruption from bas pièce in Scottish French. In the reign of Mary we have a number of new coins, which by their names show an approach to the contemporary English coinage -viz., the twenty shilling piece, the ryal in gold, the testoon, equal in value to an English sixpence, and a billon piece called hardhead. A separate Scottish coinage was continued in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., but the coins were more and more assimilated to the English type.

The Irish coinage calls for little remark.

The Irish coinage calls for little remark. The Danish kings of Ireland in the tenth and eleventh century struck pennies, some of which bear the names of known kings. The first coins struck after the Anglo-Norman Conquest were issued by John while still a prince, and governor of Ireland. Henceforward the Irish coinage follows that of England, with these ferences—that it contains no gold coinage, nor the higher denominations of silver, and is generally of a more alloyed metal. The harp for Ireland and the three crowns are the most distinctive types. The principal Anglo-Irish mint places were Dublin and Waterford. Edward IV. struck a considerable Irish currency, and at various mints, Dublin, Cork, Drogheda, Limerick, Trim, Waterford, and Wexford. During the period that James II. remained in Ireland, after his flight from Lendon, he Issued a coinage of brenze, generally called gun-money, which assumed the denomination of coins of corresponding size and type in silver. On the accession of William and Mary this coinage fell to its metal value, that is to say, a nominal value of £22,500 was bought back for £640.

E22,000 was bought back for Luzu.

C. F. K.] Coke, Sir EDWARD (b. 1552, d. 1634), Chief Justice of England, was born at Mileham, in Norfolk. After leaving Cambridge, he became a member of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar early in 1578, when his extraordinary ability speedily became manifest. Appointed Recorder of Norwich, 1586, he fulfilled the duties of his office with such acuteness that, ln 1592, he was made Recorder of London, and in the same year Solicitor-General. As Speaker of the House of Commons, in 1593, he distinguished himself by the flowery nature of his addresses to Elizabeth, and a few months later became Attorney-General, in which capacity he conducted the prosecution, for the crown, of the Earls of Southampton and Essex (1601). In 1603, Coke, who had received the honour of knighthood from James I., was the crown prosecutor at the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh, on which occasion he displayed unfeeling harshness and arrogance. Three years later Sir Edward Coke was engaged to prosecute the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, and displayed great ability in his management of the case. Shortly afterwards he became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and, in 1613, was transferred to the King's Bench and made a Privy Councillor. His enemies were, however, many and powerful; Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, Buckingham, and Sir Francis Bacon were his implacable foes, and in 1616 Coke refused to assist the court by giving judgment for the king in the case of Commendams, and thus gave them an opportunity to procure his downfall. The Chief Justice was removed from his office on the charge that in his reports of decided cases he had introduced several things in derogation of the royal prerogative. The enmity of Bacon continued, but Cokc, by the alliance of his daughter with a brother of Buckingham, regained some small share of the royal favour, and was subsequently one of the managers of Bacon's impeachment. In 1621 he entered Parliament, where he speedily drew upon himself the hostility of the court by his opposition to monopolies, and by his determined assertion of the power of Parliament At the end of the year he was imprisoned in the Tower, hut was released after a few months, and continued to take an active part in Parliamentary affairs, whilst, in 1628, he originated and carried the Petition of Right (q.v.). Sir Edward Coke's reputation as a lawyer and as a judge was unequalled in his age. As the author of the celebrated Reports, 1600—1615, and the Commentary upon Littleton, 1628, he is still a writer of the greatest importance to those who would know anything of the history of English law and practice.

[F. S. P.]

Coke, Roger, was the author of a work called Detection of the State of England during the Four Last Reigns, Lond., 1697, which is of some historical value.

Coke, William, in 1552, was made a judge of the Common Pleas. He is said to have been one of the witnesses to the will of Edward VI., altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Groy; but there is some doubt as to whether he actually signed the document. He died 1553.

Colchester, generally identified with the Roman Camulodunum, was one of the most important Roman stations in England. mense quantities of Roman relics have oeen found here. It was an important centre under the kings of the West Saxon line, and was strongly fortified by Edward the Elder. appears in Domesday as a place of considerable importance. In 1218 it was taken by Louis of France. The town enjoyed considerable trade all through the Middle Ages. During the Great Rebellion it was eaptured by the Royalists under Lord Goring in 1648. Fairfax besieged it for eleven weeks, and finally took it. The abbey was a Benedictine foundation, instituted in the reign of Henry I., and suppressed in 1539. The town returned two members to Parliament from 23rd Edward I. to 1885, when the number was reduced to one. It received a charter from Richard I. in 1089.

Colchester, Charles Arrot, Lord (b. 1757, d. 1829), was educated at Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford, and attained much practice at the bar. He entered Parliament in 1795, and strongly supported the Seditious Meetings Bill. In 1801 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1802 he became Speaker of the House of Commons, in which capacity he gave a easting vote against Lord Melville in 1805. He strongly opposed the Catholic Relief Bill, effected several important improvements in the me of managing business in the House, resigned his seat in 1817, and was raised to the Peerage.

Colet, John (b. 1466, d. 1519), Dean of St. Paul's, was the son of Sir Henry Colet, and was educated at Magdalen College. Oxford. About 1493 he went to the Contlnent, and studied Greek in Italy and Paris, making the acquaintance of Erasmus and other Returning in 1497, he lectured at Oxford on Divinity and Greek. In 1505 he was made Prebendary and Dean of St. Paul's. Between 1508 and 1512 he founded and ondowed St. Paul's School. Colet was one of the most effective of the teachers of the "New Learning" in England in the early part of the sixteenth century, and one of the most earnest of the knot of churchmen who aimed at the reformation and purification of the Church of England without actually separating from Rome.

P. Seebohm, The Oxford Reformers.

Coleman, Edward (d. 1678), was secretary to the Duchess of York. He was a Roman Catholic, a convert from Protestantism, and a busy intriguer, who corresponded secretly with the French court. He was one of the first accused by Fitus Outes of complicity in the Popish Plot. His papers were seized, and he was arrested. In his possession were found letters addressed to Père La Chaise, Louis XIV.'s confessor, in which he asked for money to be employed in giving "the greatest blow to the Protestant religion it has received since its birth," togethe with other expressions of a similar character. These were considered to be conclusive proofs of his guilt. On his trial Oates and Bedloe bore witness a inst him, and he was executed.

Colepepper, John, Lord (d. 1660), after having spent many years abroad in foreign service, returned to England, and was elected to the Long Parliament, where he distinguished himself by his vigorous opposition to monopolies. In 1642 the king made him Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he acquired great influence in the royal councils. On the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the king, was made Master of the Rolls in 1643, and a peer in 1644. He accompanied Prince Charles to Holland, where he remained till the Restoration, when he was reinstated ar Master of the Rolls, but died very soon afterwards.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion.

College, Stephen (d. 1681), known as "the Protestant joiner," was a citizen of London, celebrated in Charles II.'s reign for his intemperate zeal against the Roman Catholics. In 1681 he was sent to Oxford by Shaftesbury to watch the proceedings of the court party during the session of Parliament. While at college there, he distinguished himself by inventing a "Protestant flail" for beating out the brains of Papists, and by writing coarse rhymes against the king. He was indicted in London on a charge of high treason, but the bill was thrown out by the grand jury. Subsequently he was tried in Oxford, found guilty of a conspiracy to seize the king, on the evidence of Dugdalo and other lufermers, and executed,

Collier, Jenemy (b. 1650, d. 1726), was rector of Ampton, in Suffolk, and in 1685 was appointed lecturer at Gray's Inn. He was a zealous partisan of the Stuarts, and was committed to Newgate for writing against William III.; he was, however, released without trial. But having granted absolution to the prisoners executed for the Assassination Plot (q.v.), he was obliged to leave the country. Returning to London, he wrote several works. In 1698 he produced his Short View of the Immorality and Profesences of the English Stage, in which he attucked Dryden and other drame-tists of the day. The book was widely read, and had considerable effect in bringing about the gradual refermation of the stage. Collier also produced, among other works, an Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, which involved him in a controversy with Burnet.

Collingwood, Curnsear, Lond (b. 1759. d. 1810), was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and was very carly sent to sea. In 1774 ho served under Admiral Graves in America, and led a party of seamen at Bunker Hill. In 1776 he proceeded to the West Indies, where his promotion was rapid, as he stepped into each place vacated by Nelson, and in 1780 he accompanied Nelson in the expedition against San Juan, where his strong constitution stood him in good stend among the pestilential marshes. During the three next years he did good service in the capture of French merchantmen, and on peace being concluded in 1783, rejoined Nelson in the West Indies. In 1786 he returned to England, but did not long remain idle; and on the 1st of June, 1793, he greatly distinguished himself, though his services were passed over by Lord Howe. In command of the Excellent, he was present at the battle of St. Vincent, and took more than his share of the hard fighting. After this he was employed in blockading tho enemy's ports, but managed to obtain a short holiday in 1798. The next year he was nude a rear-ndairal, and was appointed to serve in the Channel fleet under Lord Bridport, by whom he was shortly afterwards despatched with reinforcements to Lord Keith in the Mediterranean. lu May, 1802 he obtained a year's quiet enjoyment with his family, and was then sent off to join Admiral Cornwallis off Brest. In 1804 he was engaged in the blockade of Cadiz, until the union of the French and Spanish fleets compelled him to retire. But he soon resumed his position, and only left it to join Nelson's fleet in its pursuit of Villeneuve. In command of the Royal Sovereign he was second in command to Nelson at Trafalgar, and, leading one division of the fleet, was the first to engage the enemy. On Nelson's death the command devolved on Collingwood, who has now been acquitted of any blamo for not having saved more of the enemy's ships after the battle. He was at once raised to the peerage with a life pension of £2,000 per annum. He continued actively employed in annoying the French coast, and guarding the relations of England with the countries bordering on the Mediterraneau. So unremitting were his exertions, that they produced a disease which finally, on March 10, 1810, killed him almost at his post, and before he could reach England. He was of all the able captains of his day second only to Nelson, nor was he less beloved by his men for his gentle consideration and his daring courage.

[W. R. S.]

Colonies, Tue, may be said to date from the time of the enterprising navigators of Queen Elizabeth's reign-such as Gilbert and Raleigh (q.v.), by whom the infant colony of Virginia was first planted, in 1587—but it was not until the persecutions of Junes 1. and Charles I. drove many Puritans to seek an asylum in New England that colonisation became at all general amongst Englishmen. Henceforward tho celonies on the Atlantic seaboard of North America increased rapidly, absorbing the settlements of other nations, such as the Dutch on the Hudson, the Swedes on the Delawaro, and, finally, the French on the Mississippi. [Colonies, The American.] When these colonies secoded from England in 1783, a new area for colonisation in teniperate climates had already been opened up by the discovery of Australia. [AUSTRALIA.] The town of Sydney was founded in 1727, and the progress of the various settlements of tho Australasian group has been continuous since that time. Another group of colonies are those which have been acquired by conquest from other powers, chiefly France, Spain, and Holland. Of these the most important is Canada (q.v.), conquered in the Seven Years' War (1757-63), and the islands of the West Indies, many of which were acquired in the same war, and the Cape of Good Hope, taken in the war of the French Revolution (1793-1815). The term Colony is used somewhat loosely to include the various dependencies (whether true colonial settle-ments or not) administered by the department of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. They may be classed roughly as :-

(1) Agricultural colonies, where cultivation of the soil and sheep-farming is the chief source of wealth — such as the Australian colonies and those of British North America.

(2) Plantation colonies, "where the main object of those who go to them is to plant and rear certain vegetable productions which abound in hot climates only, and which are of great value in European markets"—such as Ceylon, the West Indian colonies, and Mauritius.

(3) Trading colonies—such as Singapore.
(4) Naval or military stations, such as Malta or Gibraltar, which are considered colonies.

The class of penal colonies which existed at an early period no longer remains.

Colonies may be subjected to a further division, according to the means by which they were acquired:—

(i) Colonies obtained by conquest or cession, legislation for which is absolutely vested in the crown, until a representative assembly has once been granted, in which case the crown cannot legislate further, though the colony is still subject to the Imperial Parliament. The law in conquered or ceded colonies remains as it was, unless altered by the sovereign in council.

(2) Settled colonies, acquired by occupation when uninhabited. Although such colonies become the property of the crown, the crown has no power of legislation by virtue of its prerogative, but can only act by orders in council. It must be remembered that a ceded colony is not bound by Acts of Parliament pussed before its cession; nor is the colony bound by Acts made after its acquisition, unless the Act is intended to embrace all British colonies, or the colony is specially named.

British colonies are officially divided into

(1) Crown colonies are ceded or conquered colonies, where the crown has the entire control of legislation and of the officials.

(2) Colonies with representative institutions, but without responsible government, where the crown retains only a veto on legislation.

(3) Colonies having both representative institutions and responsible government. Such institutions and government were introduced first inte Canada in the year 1847, owing to Lord Durham's roport. "In colonies with responsible government, the control of all public departments is practically placed in the hands of persons commanding the confidence of the legislature; and the ministers are responsible to the legislature, as in England. The Home Government has in such cases no control whatever over any official except the governor, though the crown retains a veto on legislation. By the adoption of the principle of re-sponsible government," says Sir T. Erskine May, "a colonial constitution has become the very image and reflection of Parliamentary government in England. The governor like the sovereign, whom he represents--holds himself aloof from and superior to parties, and governs through constitutional advisers who have acquired an ascendency in the legislature." The English constitution. in fact, is generally the type of the colonial governments, which have a governor acting as viceroy of the crown, an Upper Chamber either appointed by the governor or elected by a limited suffrage, and a Lower Chamber, corresponding to the House of Commons, and like it retaining the exclusive privilege of originating money bills. The transactions of such colonies with the Home Government are chiefly confined to foreign and commercial affairs. The former are managed by the Colonial Office; while for the latter purpose the various colonies have commissioners in London called Grown Agents or Agents-tieneral. The colonies administer justice by their own courts of law, but an appeal lies from all colonial supreme courts, except those of Canada, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Colonies, THE APRICAN. [SOUTH APRICA.]

Colonies, THE AMERICAN, were for the mest part founded in the seventeenth century. The North American continent was first discovered in 1497 by John Cabot, to whom a patent was granted by King Henry VII.; but the first attempts at colonisation were made by the Spaniards in 1521 and onwards, on the coast of Florida, whither the French followed them in 1562. French also soon after 1535 began to make settlements in the North, over Canada, Cape Breton, and Nova Scotia, then called Acadia. Nova Scotia was selzed by England in the War of the Spanish Succession (1701—1713), and Canada in the Seven Years' War (1757— 1763). [Canada.] The first abortive attempt at English colonisation was made in 1578 by Fi bisher; then followed two by Sir Humphrey Gilbert (1579 and 1583), and two by Sir Walter Raleigh, the first of which, in what is now North Carolina, was for a little while successful. At length, in 1607, the London Company despatched an expedition which effected the first permanent English settlement in North America on the James River in Virginia.

The thirteen colonies which afterwards formed the United States are usually divided into three groups—those of Virginia, New York, and New England.

(1) The Virginia group. Virginia, a name given by Raleigh to one of his unsuccessful attempts at colonization in honour of Queen Elizabeth, at first had a very struggling existence. It was kept alive chiefly by the exertions of a hardy adventurer, John Smith,* who explored the country, and made friends with the Indian chief Powhatan, the themo, with his daughter Pocahontas, of some romantic stories. Freshimmigrants soon began to strengthen the colony; it grew rich by the sale of tobacco, and in 1619, the Virginian House of Burgesses assembled for the first time. The next tew years witnessed some dangerous struggles with the Indians, in which the colony suffered greatly until the submission of the savages in 1646, which was confirmed by a great treaty at Albany in 1684. 1624 James I. dissolved the London Company, and Virginia became a crown colony; but soon afterwards the valuable monopoly of the import of tobacco to England was secured to Virginia and the Somers Islands by proclamation. Its position under the Commonwealth was one of practical independence. Fortune changed, however, with the Restoration, when Charles II. restricted the commerce of the colony by Navigation Acts, while the Assembly, which was extremely Royalist, persecuted Nonconformists and limited the suffrage. Finally the whole of Virginia was handed over for thirty-one years to Lord Colepepper and Lord Arlington. From these causes sprang a rebellion, known from its leader as "Bacon's Rebellion," in 1675, which was crushed two years later by Sir George Berkeley. Lord Colepepper was made governor for life, and the position of the colouists during the remainder of the Stuart period was disastrous. After the Revolution, however, Virginia recovered her prosperity, and the separate history of the colony consists chiefly in a series of disputes between the governors and the assemblies. Maryland, named after Queen Henrietta Maria. was originally part of Virginia, but was made into a separate colony by charter in 1632, when it became the property of a Catholie, Lord Baltimore, under a most liberal constitution, equality being conceded to all Christian creeds. Its condition was one of great prosperity until Clayborne, a man of republican sympathies, opposed the authority of Lord Baltimore, and threw the colony into confusion, which lasted for ten years until 1660. Under William and Mary, the colony passed into the hands of the crown, and Roman Catholicism became illegal: but in 1716 it was restored to the descendants of its founder, now become Protestants. The Carolinas were so called in the first instance by the French settlers in honour of Charlos IX. of France, and North Carolina was the scene of most of Raleigh's attempts a' colonisation, being then part of Virginia. The name was given to them afresh by Charles II., in whose reign it was granted by charter to proprietaries, and a constitution known as the "Grand Model," prepared for it by Loeke and Shaftesbury. It was, however, found unworkable; the colonists took matters into their own hands, divided themselves into two governments, began to impert negro slaves, and to treat the Indian tribes with great brutality. Finally, in 1729 the proprietors sold their rights to the crown. Georgia, originally part of Carolina, was founded by Colonel Oglethorpe, with some government assistance, as a refuge for insolvent debtors and persecuted Dissenters whom he rescued f om English prisons. Its religious ideas were strongly influenced by the advent of some Moravian settlers, and by the visits of the two Wesleys and Whitfield. In 1739 Oglethorpe invaded the Spanish colony of Florida without success, and the counter attack also failed. Slavery was introduced into the colony about 1750, and two yours later it was annexed to the crown.

(2) The New York group. Of these New York and New Jersey have a common history. They were in the first instance Dutch colonics. Delaware Bay was discovered by Henry Hudson in 1609, and a settlement made at Albany in 1615. Soon New Amsterdam, at first a trading station, became a permanent town, and the island of Manhattan was bought from the Indians. After a struggle for existence with the English colonies, with the Indians, who nearly destroyed them, and with the Swedes, whoso settlement, "New Sweden," was annexed in 1655, the state and city of New Amsterdam became very prosperous. In 1664, however, the country was granted by Charles II. to James, Duko of York; it surrendered to Sir Robert Holmes without a struggle; New Amsterdam becamo New York, and the district between the Hudson and Delaware New Jersey. For a few years the Dutch recovered it again, but it was finally eeded to England in 1674. James II. united New York and New England under the governorship of Sir E. Andrews, but at the Rovolution he was driven out, and the connection dissolved. The rights of the proprietors in New Jersey were bought by the Quakers in 1682, but surrendered to the erown in 1702. Pennsylvania, a district originally occupied by the settlement of New Sweden, was also purchased from Charles II. by William Penn in 1682, when its capital, Philadelphia, waa founded, and a treaty concluded with the Indian tribes. Soon afterwards a boundary dispute arose with Maryland, which terminated in the cession, in 1701, to Penn of the tract on the south of the Delaware, which was known as the Delaware Territory, and which was attached to Pennsylvania, though with a separate legislature, till 1776, when Delaware declared itself an independent State. After the English Revolution Penn's proprietary rights were confiscated.

(3) The New England group. This was so named by John Smith, who made one of the two early and unsuccessful attempts to found a settlement there. In 1620, however, somo Puritan Nonconformists, known as the "Pilgrim Fathers," sailed from England in the Mayflower, and, landing in Plymouth Bay, effected a permanent occupation. Their relations with the Indians were on the whole friendly, and fresh settlements were made, viz., New Hampshirs (1622), Massachusetts in 1628, Rhode Island by Roger Williams (1631), and Connecticut colonised from Massachusetts from 1633 and onwards. This last settlement involved the New Englanders in two Indian wars, which resulted in the defeat of the Pequod and Narragansett tribes. The northern colonies were subjected by Charles I. to severe restrictions, but in 1643 formed thereof. into a federation knewn as Th 1. wite th Colonies of New England, which proved the germ of the present Unite States. Massachusetts soon proved itself we most powerful of the four colonics, and a. 1676 crushed the Indians in a great was collect, after the chief of the Wampanoags, "King Philip's War." New England was severely oppressed after the Restoration by Andros aud other governors: Massachusetts forfeited her charter in 1684, but with the Revolution better times came. In 1690 the Massachusetts government instigated a war for the conquest of Canada, which lasted with a long interval after the Peace of Utrecht (q.v.) down to the close of "King George's War," i.e., the War of the Austrian Succession. Such was the origin of the thirteen American colonies, of which it may be said that the southern, where slave-labour was universal with the exception of Georgia, were in the main aristocratie, and the northern sectarian and domocratie. Their constitutions varied considerably, but as a rule they consisted of a house of assembly elected by the burgesses, or freemen, reinforced frequently by nominees of the proprietaries, a council nominated, as a rule, by the governor, but in Massachusetts by the freemen, and a governor appointed in crown colonies by the king and proprietors, in the others by the council.

Before the commencement of the Seven Years' War in Europe, a border warfare known as the "French and Indian War" broke out in America, during which occurred the occupation of the Ohio valley by the French, who built there Fort Duquesne, and the defeat of General Braddock and Georgo Washington when they advanced against it, 1755. War was net formally declared until 1756, when the newly-built Fort William Henry was taken by the enemy. Towards the end of the war, however, fortune changed, and the great success of Wolfe in Canada was anticipated by the capture of Fort Duquesne (subsequently re-named Pittsburg) in 1758 by General Forbes supported by Washington. After the Peace of Paris (1763), the Virginians defeated the Ottawas and their allies in the last great war waged by the colonists against the Indians.

It is impossible here to do more than just hint at the events which from that date tended to embitter the relations between the colonies and England. There were, in the first place, the Navigation Laws (1657—1600), by which the colonies were prohibited from procuring a large number of articles except from England and, after the Treaty of Utrecht, from Spain, and laid duties on the export of articles from colony to colony. These laws were largely ovaded by smuggling, and in consequence Grenville in 1764 enforced them with great severity, and by a Revenue Act laid heavy duties on various imports, including wines. The Stamp Act (1765) followed, which imposed duties ranging from 1d. to $10 cf. printed publications, but it was receive with such outery and riots all over America, that it had to be repealed in the following year, while a Declaratory Act at to same time insisted on the dependence of the colonies on the king and Parliament of Great Britain. This conciliatory policy did not continue long. In the same year the New York Assembly was suspended for refusing to supply stores to the royal troops in obedience to the Quartering Act, and Charles Townshend's fatal Revenue Act, imposing import duties on paper, glass, tea, and other articles followed in the next year. War was from that moment inevitable; the Massachusetts Assembly was dissolved in 1768 for refusing to rescind a letter of protest, and there was a collision between the citizens of Boston and the British troops, known as the Boston Massacre," in 1770. Lord North's Tea Act (1770), which removed the restrictions except that on tea, postponed the war for awhile, but the rejection of Dunning's petition for the removal of Hutchinson from the governorship of Massachusetts by the English government was followed, in consequence of the burning of the tea ships iu Boston harbour, by the Boston Port Act, the spark which set the incendiary forces of a century ablazo. Colonies, The Australian. [Australia.]

Columba, St. (b. 521, d. 597), was a native of Gartan, in Donegal; he was tho son of Feidlhim and Ethne, both of Irish blood royal. Educated for the Church, he founded, in 545, the monastery of Derry, and subsequently established many churches in Ireland. The victory of the heathen king, Brude MacMaclen, over the Scots of Dulriada, in 560, led, three years later, to the mission of Columba, undertaken for the purpose of converting the Picts: though another account ascribes the departure of Columba from Ireland to his action in bringing about a battle tetween two Irish tribes. Columba landed in fona 563, recoiving the grant of the island from Conal, King of Dalriada, or, as some think, from Brude, the Pictish monarch; here ho founded his church, which became for 150 years the national Church of Scotland. Columban church, always intimately connected with the Church of Ireland, was in semo points of doctrino and ceremonial opposed to that of Rome, to which it owed neallegiance. [Church, THE CELTIC.] After two years spent in the establishment of his menastery, Columba, in 565, went on a mission of conversion to the court of Brude, King of the Piets, at Inverness; having won over the menarch to the new faith, he proceeded to establish monasteries throughout the Pietish territory. In 575 he caused Aidan, King of Dalriada, to assert his position as a king, independent of the Irish Dalriads; the remaining years of his life were chiefly spent in founding churches amongst the southern Picts. Shortly before his death, which took place in June, 597, he rovisited Ireland. The clouds of tradition and romance in which the facts of his life are enshrouded render it somewhat difficult to estimate his true character: he is called by his biographer Adamuan a man of contrasts, "at once tender and irritable, rude and ceurteous, grateful and revengeful." The verdict of Mr. Skene may be queted:-" He was evidently a man of great force of character and determined zeal in effecting his purpose, but he could not have been the object of such tender levo and implicit devetion from all whe came under the sphere of his influence if the softer and mere amiable features pictured in the earlier descriptions of him had not pre-dominated." In later years, part of his relies were removed to Kells, in Meath, and part by Kenneth MacAlpino to Dunkeld.

Columbia, Burrisu, was formerly part of the Hudson's Bay Territories. It rose into importance owing to the discovery of gold there (1858—1861) and the consequent influx of settlers. It was created a crown colony in 1858. In 1866 Vancouver's Island and Queen Chariotte's Islands were incorporated with it, and in 1871 the whole district was formed into a province of Canada (q.v.). The government, which, like those of the other provinces of the Dominion, is subject to the central authority at Ottawa, consists of a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly of thirty-eight members.

Combermere, Starleton Cotton, 1st Viscount (b. 1773, d. 1865), took part in the last Mysore War. He served with distinction through the Peninsular War, was commander of all the allied cavalry after 1810, and decided the fortune of the day at Salamanca by a grand cavalry charge. In 1814 he was for his services ereated Baren Combermere. In 1817 he was made Governor of Jamaica. In 1825 he was appointed commander-in-clief in India, and accomplished the reduction of Bhurtpore at the close of the Burmese War. He was created Viscount Combernere of Bhurtpore, Feb., 1827.

Commendams. On the vacancy of a benefice, it was sometimes customary to assign it to the care of a bishop, to be held in commendam until a proper person could be found on w. om to bestow it. This system was employed for the purpose of evading the law against pluralities, and was frequently abused. In 1616 occurred the famous Case of Commendams, when an action was brought against Neile, Bishop of Lichfield, for helding a living, in commendam, to which it was alleged he had been illegally presented by the king, whose general prerogative of granting a commendam was disputed. The ease is famous for the subserviency of the judges, who, having made some slight effort to resent the king's attempt to obtain a verdict favourable to himself, subsequently sued for pardon on their knees. Sir Edward Coke's epposition to James's unconstitutional act entailed his dismissal shortly afterwards.

Commendation. [Feudalism.]

Commerce. The history of English commerce is naturally divided into two parts—the progress of navigation and the routes taken by traders. But for the sake of convenience and brevity they nust be taken together in the present article.

The chief objects of medic val maritime enterprise were tho fisheries and the trade with the East. The former were principally in the hands of the Dutch and English; the latter, as far as Europe was concerned, in those of the Venetians, Geneese, and Florentines. Fish was a far more important article of diet in the Middle Ages than it is now. It was prescribed during certain times of the year or week by religion, and it supplemented as well as varied the coarse salted food of our ancestors in winter. The principal ports engaged in this trade were Yarmouth and the neighbouring towns fer herrings, and Scarborough for cod. There were also extensive salmen fisheries in the Thames, the Tweed, and the Severn, barrelled salmon being an important, though comparatively expensive, article of diet. In the early part of the fifteenth century, i.e., before 1436, Bristol mariners, by the use of the mariner's compass, reached Iceland by the Irish Channel and Atlantic, and successfully competed with their Scarborough rivals. Bristol gained considerable epulenco by this trade, and during this century became the second city of the kingdom fer opulence and numbers. The magnificent church of St. Mary Redcliffe was the gift of a rich Bristol merchant in this contury.

The trade of England during this period was very considerable, and was doubtlessly much assisted by our possessions in France. The English claimed, by virtue of the situation of the port of Calais, to have the control of tho narrow seas, and, as long as they held Normandy and Guienne, wit the suzerainty over Britanny, could regulate traffic along the coast from Flanders to Bayonne. Hence the efforts which the Lancastrian kings made for the maintenance of Henry V.'s conquests had a commercial as well as a military purpose. The Emperor Sigismund told Henry V. that Dover and Calais were the key. If the Channel, and should be kept as the special strength of England. The trade with the Baltic and the coasts of Scandinavia and Denmark was in the hands of the Hanse towns, which were closely connected with London, where a powerful corporation called the Alderman and Merchants of the Steel-yard, had important privileges from the thirteenth century till towards the close of the sixteenth. When the English occupation of Normandy was gone, English commerce was seriously affected by the numerous corsairs which hid in the Breton ports, and, after the loss of Guienne, this part of France was similarly affected by the decline of trade with England, and vainly strove, by the revolt of 1453, to renew its old relations with the English crown and people. The commercial relations between England and Portugal were intimate. But after the war with France was practically over, and Louis XI. left no means untried to conciliate Edward IV., the coasting trade of England became again extensive and profitable, for we learn from a remarkable treatise of the time that the English mercantile marine had nearly all the carrying trade of the coar, while that of France was unimportant. The writer, a Frenchman, therefore recommends a stringent navigation law.

In the fourteenth century the produce of the East was conveyed to Europe by three routes at least: two by land, a third mainly by sea. The two land routes started from Bagdad, one passing through Mesopotamia to Antioch, the other through the high-lands of Armenia to Trebizond. The third was to Aden, np the Red Sea, then by a short land journey to the Nile, and down the Nile to Cairo and Alexandria. This road ultimately superseded the others. Central Asia, owing to the gradual advance of the Turks, and finally the conquest of Constantinople and the fall of the Greek empire, became impassable for commerce, and the only road which remained open was through Egypt, where heavy tolls were exacted, though not so as to entirely spoil the trade. The goods brought from the East, chiefly spices, which were eagerly purchased by all who could afford them, were carried through Italy, across the Alps, and down the waterways of the Rhine, the Upper Danube, and their affluents, enriching the towns of Lower Germany and Flanders. It is possible that some Eastern produce still found its way into Europe by the Caspian, Astrachan, and Russia, and that the early opulence of Novgorod was due to this commerce.

Meanwhile, the avenues of trado with the East were being closed up, and the Western nations began to be alarmed at the risk of being excluded from the use of products which had become necessaries to many. Maritime enterpriso had been stimulated by the example of the Portuguese and their successful explorations of the African coast. Simultaneously, Vasco da Gama, under the patronage of the King of Portugal, and Columbus, under that of Ferdinand and Isabella, strove to find a waterway to the East, and so escape from the flow of barbarism which had nearly destroyed commerce. At the close of the fifteenth century, Vasco da Gama achieved the Cape passage; Columbus, the discovery of the New World. The Pope granted to Portugal and Spain, in an age when no one disputed his authority in the matter, the dominion over their discoveries, and exclusive privileges of trading thither. The result in the New World was the Spanish conquest and the establishment of Spanish monopoly. In the East, factories were established, especially on the western side of Hindostan, which, after the union of the crowns of Spain and Portugal, became also part of the vast Spanish empire. These discoveries were made only just in time. In les han twenty years after the voyages of Columbus and Da Gama, Selim I. conquered Egypt, annihilated what little trade was left by this route, and ruined the prosperity of the Italian and free German cities.

The sea route was for a long time costly and unprofitable. It was protected by a monopoly—due to the papal grants. It was in the hands of a small power, which, after a brief period of extraordinary activity, showed signs of early decay. From these discoveries the English were excluded, owing, amongst other causes, to the timid avarice of Henry VII., to the respect still entertained for the Pope's authority, and when that was discarded, to the fear or the Spanish power. Hence, in the middle of the sixteenth century an attempt was made to develop trade in another quarter. In the year 1553 Sir Hugh Willoughby attempted a North-East passage, with three ships. Two were driven into a desert harbour of Lapland, and the commanders and crews frozen to death. third reaching Archangel, its commander had an interview with Ivan the Terrible, and obtained for his employers the charter of the Russian Company. The first map of Russia was published in 1560 by an agent of this company; but for a long time the operations of the company were trivial. Similar attempts were made to open up a trade with the Levant and Morocco. These were distinct advances, though as yet without decisive results. In the reign of Henry VIII.

—as we learn from one of his statutes, regulating the price of freights, and directing what should be the goods transported to would be supposed to would be supposed to would be supposed to which at the stime the English ship-master ventured. It is plain that England had fallen far behind other nations in the extent and activity of ber inercantile marine.

The resuscitation of English enterprise was due to Frobisher, Davis, and Drake, especially to the last. In 1579 Elizabeth entered into an alliauce offensive and defensive with Holland. and thus informally declared war against Spain. Two years before this, Drake had set out en his famous voyage. His distinct purpose as the plunder of Spanish commerce, and he probably started with the queen's concurrence, certainly with her connivance. In those days it was very difficult to prevent private warfare, especially when the object of such warfare was opulent, and possessed of lucrative privileges, held under what had now become a discredited authority, and was wholly unable to defend those privileges by a blockade or a police of the seas. The practical exclusion of all ships but these of one nation from both ancient and new markets explains, though it may not justify, the buceaneering exploits of Drake and his followers. It was the only way intelligible to the wild spirit of the time of breaking in upou a monopoly, when England declared war against Spain and Spain had added the possessions of Portugal to her own. commerce and factories of the East becamo lawful prize to the English and the Dutch. The latter were early successful, and establisbed an Indian empire in the Archipelago. But the English built up their commerce with the East very slowly; and after many reverses, Elizabeth granted charters, towards the conclusion of ber reign, to the Levant and East India Companies, and made considerable sacrifices of revenuo in order to foster their early efforts.

When the rupture with Spain was imminent, England began to plant colonies in North America, Raleigh being the pioneer of those settlements. But they were practically private adventures. The settlers found neither fertile localities abounding in mineral wealth nor opulent kingdoms, the plunder of which would enrich monarchs as well as soldiers of fortune, such as were Mexico and Peru. Tho settlers in the English plantations had to contest their occupation with vigorous. poor, and resolute savages, who had probably dispossessed and annihilated a wealthier and more eivilised race. The later settlers of New England planted themselves on sterile land, and in a climate of extremes. The struggle for existence, as wo know, was severe, and a long time elapsed before these settlers could acquire a few comforts. They became, indeed, the nucleus of a vast empire, the opalence and resources of which already are beyond parallel, and will be beyond rivalry at no remote date. But for a long time they were weak and profitless to England.

After many disappointments, the East India Company began to prosper. During the reign of Charles II. its profits from trade were very large, and the fortunes of many a noble and wealthy family were founded on East India stock and the sales of its imports. Like every similar institution, in the extraordinary period of stock-exchange and stockjobbing activity, which became a frenzy from the Rovolution to the collapse of the South Sea Scheme, the East India Company had its rivals for privilege and monopoly. The Parliament had taken from the crown the right of giving patents for exclusivo trade, and had assumed the power itself. crown was not unwilling to transfer the odium of such grants from itself to the Parliament, especially as the companies were perfectly willing to assist the financial embarrassments of the government by loans on favourable terms, or even by the bandsel of large sums down in return for concessions. Nor is there any doubt that much of the corruption of Parliament was duo to votes bought by those who were eager to obtain the lucrative monopoly of a Parliamentary title. The habit of gambling in companies' shares was greatly furthered by the almost unlicensed practice of offering letteries on every conceivable subject.

The theory of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was that the development of commerce was of supreme importance to tho community, and that commerco was best secured by monopoly. But monopoly in tho existing condition of commercial Europe was to be secured only by war-an improvement, indeed, on the old system of buccaneering, but for a long time accompanied by it. James was too timid to make war on any pretext. Charles could not rely on his subjects, even if he had possessed the means whereby to carry on a warlike policy. But Cromwell consulted the impulses of his age and race when he declared war against Spain. He demanded trade with the Spanish colonies, and religious freedom for English settlers in such colonies. His demands were refused, and he seized Jamaica (intending to seize Cuba), in the Antilles, and Dunkirk, on the Flemish coast. He intended to control tho narrow seas, and to found an empire in the West. He defeated the Dutch, humbled them and broke their prestige, and designed to ruin their trade by his Navigation Act. And had Cromwell lived to the natural span of human life, instead of dying in bis fitty-ninth year, he could assuredly have founded an English empire in the Gulf states, and have expelled the Spaniards, nearly two centuries before Canning's famous boast was uttered, that he had called the New World into being in order to redress the balance of the Old.

The commerce of England grew rapidly during the first half of the eighteenth century. Wild speculation was checked by the losses of the South Sea scheme, capital was accumulated, agriculture prospered, and the pacific policy of Walpole and Fleury aided progress. The Seven Years' War, avowedly carried on by England in order to secure commerce by conquest, had, and continues to have, lasting effects on mankind. It gave India and North America to the English race and to English civilisation. But it also brought with it the refutation of the old commercial doctrine that war makes trade and conquest secures trade. England sought to impose part of the charges of the war on the American colonies, and the War of Independence followed. The East India Company found that they could not live and pay dividends on trade, though they clung to their menopoly, and therefore they began to pay dividends out of the tribute of conquered races.

It was supposed that after the loss of the American colonies English commerce had sustained a fatal blow. The leading Americans of the Revolution thought so. The great majority of public men in England held the same opinion. But in a short time it was found that the United States were better customers than the Plantations were. fact is, commerce, unless it be violently prevented from seeking its own career, has no preference beyond what is suggested by Besides, the cheapness and convenience. latter part of the eighteenth century was an age of practical invention. Watt made the steam-engine a power. The invention of Arkwright increased the handiness of man ten or twentyfold. There is a story that this man offered, if his patents were continued to him, to defray a moiety of the extraordinary charges of government in England. The story is perhaps an exaggeration, but it has a basis of truth. It implies that the consuming power of mankind was enormonaly increased by invention, and that this consumption was supplied by the machinery of trade and commerce; for it is manifest that Arkwright looked for his customers beyond the wants of his own countrymen. But even more important than invention was the great boon of commercial freedom granted in 1846. The advocates of Free Trade may regret that their views are not accepted by all civilised nations. But they know that the members of every community wish to sell, and that, though the laws may limit their choice in buying, they must buy in order to sell. The effects of the commercial freedom which we have adopted are that we always buy in the cheapest market, not only by choice, but perforce, as those who restrain themselves have to give more and take less, and that the mercantilc marine of this country is of unexampled magnitude.

Commissaries, The Court or, for Scttland, was an ecclesiastical court created in 1563, "to fill up the gap caused in the administration of civil justice" by the abolition of the Consistorial Court. It dealt with divorce cases, sentences of excommunication, and other ceclesiastical matters.

Commissions are instruments issuing from the crown, and delegating authority to particular persons to perform certain acts. Thus, in military matters a commission is, properly speaking, the document issued to every military officer, authorising him to perform duties on behalf of the state. Commissions of array were royal warrants authorising barons and others to raise men for the purpose of exercising and training [MILITARY SYSTEM.] Among them in war. the permanent bodies of commissioners, who perform regularly duties delegated by the crown, are the Commissieners in Lunacy, who are required to supervise the care of lunatics, and the Justices on the Commission of the Peace. [JUSTICES.] Royal Commissions are frequently issued to small bodies of persons-members of either House of Parliament, and others empowering them to inquire into the operation of laws, into alleged grievances, or social, economic, or educational matters; generally with a view to future legislation. They are empowered to collect evidence, and to examine witnesses, though not on oath; and their proceedings are recorded and usually published in the form of a report.

Commissioners, ROYAL, are appointed by the crown, en the address of the Houses of Parliament, to the effect that the judge who has tried any election petition has reported the prevalence of corrupt practices. They inquire into the matter; and on their report the action of Parliament in the way of disfranchisement or prosecution is based. Such Commissions were established in 1853.

Committee. [PARLIAMENT.]

Common Lands are unenclosed and uncultivated spaces, not held in individual ownership, where the neighbouring landowners and tenants enjoy certain rights of pasturage, of turbary, or cutting turf for fuel, and sometimes of estovers, or the liberty of taking wood for the furniture or use of a house. These rights are, in all probability, of very ancient origin, and are probably a survival of the old Germanio system of common pasturage on the folkland, or public land. As, however, from the time of Alfred the folkland became, for the most part, royal demesne, and large estates were formed, the idea of individual ownership tended to supplant that of common ownership. change was completed by the foudal lawyers, who held commons to be the wastes of maners, and minutely defined the rights of common pasturage. It was either appendant, as belonging to the occupiers of arable land, or appurtenant-i.e., founded on a special grant-or because of vicinage, or in gross. The common lands being regarded as the property of the lerd of the manor, he elaimed the right of enclosure. This was resisted by the free-hold tenants, and the Statute of Merton (1235) allowed the owner to enclose or approve against common of pasture, but only provided that he could show that there was left common sufficient for such as were entitled thereto. When the customary right of copyholders became recognised-i.c., about the time of Henry IV .- they also claimed rights of pasturage, and resisted enclosures. The inhabitants of villages, however, had not this privilege, and as late as 1603 the claim of the people of Stixwold, in Lincolnshire, to exercise rights of pasturage in the waste of the manor was overthrown by the courts of law. Under the Tudors the practice of en-closures, together with the still more oppressive plan of converting arable land into pasture-land, became a crying evil. Bacon commented upon it in the History of Henry VII.; it was one of the causes of the formidable insurrection in the eastern counties in 1549; and Bishop Latimer, in his famous Sermon of the Plough, preached before the court of Edward VI., denounced the nobles as "cn-closers, graziers, and rent-raisers." One or two attempts were made to check these practices. Henry VIII. ordered the houses which had been pulled down to be rebuilt, and limited the number of sheep on each farm to 2,000; and the Protector Somerset appointed a Royal Commission "for the redress of enclosure." Such efforts, however, were of no avail, and complaints were frequent throughout the reigns of Elizabeth and of the Stuarts.

Gradually the Statute of Merton ca ac to be regarded as obsolete, and it was thought necessary to obtain the sanction of Parliament for enclosure. The first Local Enclosure Act was passed under Anne, and since then the permission of the legislature has generally been regarded as a necessary preliminary to enclosure. Between 1700 and 1845 some 4.000 of these Acts were passed, and 7,175,000 acres of land enclosed, whereby the class of small yeomen became almost expand. The legislation on the subject, which was consolidated in 1801, provided that the consent of three-fourths of the freehors and copyholders of the manor was necessary, that the common should be divided among them in proportion to their holdings, the lord being awarded one-sixteenth. He had also the power of vetoing enclosures. The General Enclosure Act of 1845 established a new principle, that of local inquiry through Enclosure Commissioners, so that the poor could make known their grievances; it also set apart certain portions of land for recreation and garden allotments. Passed, however, before the nation had adopted Free Trade, it tended to promote rather than check enclosure; the land set apart for recreation was miserably inadequate, and the great commons and forests were threatened everywhere. Accordingly a Society for the Protection of Rural Commons was formed by the late Mr. Fawcett, and one for the Preservation of Commons near London by Mr. Shaw Lefevre (afterwards Lord The exertions of the former were successful in preventing the Parliamentary sanction of enclosures between 1869 and 1876, and the necessity of such a step was proved by the fact that the area of common land in England and Wales was not, as was imagined, 8,000,000 acres, but only 2,632,000. The question of urban commons was not decided until after a violent struggle in the law courts, owing to the fact that while the right of a village to its green was recognised by law, that of a town to its common was not. The crucial case was that of Epping Forest, over which the crown has several important forestal rights, which had, until about 1840, prevented enclosure. When the neighbouring landlords began to appropriate the land, an old man named Willingale resisted them on behalf of the villagers of Loughton, and his cause, taken np by the Corporation of London, re-ulted, in 1874, in a complete overthrow of the landlord's pretensions. Soon afterwards a Royal Commission deeided that the enclosures were illegal, and that the forest should be restored to its original condition. In 1878, therefore, an Act was passed, directing that Epping Forest should be preserved for ever, open and unenclosed, for the benefit of the people of London. The Corporation of London were made its conservators-and subsequently of all common lands within twenty-five miles of London. Finally, the Commons Act of 1876 substituted regulation and improvement in place of the enclosure of common lands, and laid down the principle that no enclosure should be sanctioned by the commissioners without distinct evidence that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants In Ireland and Scotland the question of common lands is not so important, owing to the fact that the comparative barrenness of the soil offers less temptation to en-The first Whiteboy rising in closures. Ireland, however, in 1692, was in great part due to this cause.

Common Law may be defined as that part of the law of the land which, before the Judicature Act of 1873, was administered by those courts which were called courts of commen law, in distinction to the courts of It was founded on the old popular law of the nation, and has grown by the process of legislation and by the assimilation in whele or in part of other systems; just in the same way as the judicial system of the royal courts introduced after the Conquest, became part of our common law. It consists of written laws or statutes, and of unwritten laws, or customs; though the term common law was generally used in a more restricted sense to describe the system of customary law grounded on the recorded decisions of successive judges, as opposed to the "written" or statute law. Such decisions of judges which are preserved in year-books, reports and digests of cases, as well as certain famous law books such as tho Institutes of Sir E. Coke, are of high authority in our courts. The application and interpretation of the statute law is entrusted to the judges. By the way in which they carry out this work the law is modified. They are, however, not free to interpret statutes as they choose, but must observe certain rules in their dealings with them; as, for instance, that all Acts of Parliament, except in cases where the effects would be manifestly absurd or unjust, and so contrary to the clear intention of Parliament, are to be interpreted according to the plain meaning of the words. For judges are not set to speculate on, but to carry out, the intentions of l'arliament. In order to ascertain the meaning of a statute, the preamble, though not in itself law, may be consulted as an authority. As regards the administration of statutes, it is to be observed that no statute is of retrospective force unless the same is expressly declared; that repealed statutes are not to be taken into account except as having had force before their repeal; that general terms used after particular cases apply only to cases which are strictly ejusdem generis; and that all penal statutes and such statutes as relate to taxation are to be construed strictly. The statute law begins with 9 Hen. III., the Great Charter. Customary law has the same force as statute lawas to the assent of the people. For lex non scripta "consists of those rules and maxims concerning persons and property which havo obtained by the tacit consent and usage of the inhabitants of the country." Customs are either general or particular. General customs bind all men equally who are under the same conditions, though they may not have been the subjects of enactment. For a general usage, if ascertained and established, becomes part of the common law and is recognised by the courts. Particular customs are exceptional in their application. For a custom to be good it must have arisen before legal memory, which has been fixed at the first year of Richard I. This doctrine has, however, been regulated by statute (2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 71, 1 and 2). A custom must, moreover, be continuous as regards right: it must be peaceably enjoyed; net unreasonable; it must be certain, or at least such as can be ascertained; and it must be consistent or compulsory in its application. A particular custom which is contrary to general rights must be construed strictly. The customary law is declared by the judges, and their decisions collectively exhibit the common law both as regards the application of statutes and the declaration of customs.

Common Order, The Book or, was the service book of the Scottish Reformers, and was compiled, 1567, by Knox from a manual issued by Calvin. It long continued to be used by the Presbyterians, both in Scotland and England.

Commons, The House of, is the Lower Chamber or representative branch of the English Parliament, appointed by popular election. The peculiar feature in the constitutional position of the Commons, when they secured their place as one of the estates of Parliament, is that they had little more than a formal share in legislation; in control of the administration, only the power of petition; and no share at all in the function of justice; while almost from the first they take the chief part in the grants of taxation. This theoretic position is traceable even at the present time, when the Commons alone settle taxation, whereas their share of legislative and administrative power won by the conversion of the petition into a "bill," is only concurrent with that of the Heuse of Lords, and the Lords retain exclusively the powers of justice. These peculiarities are due to the historical conditions of the development of the House of Commons. Another peculiarity, which only these historical conditions an explain, is the meaning which came to be attached to the word "Commons," including freeholders and burgesses at once, and which thus differentiated essentially the English Parliamentary system, both in its construction and in the course it has run, from the representative systems of other countries. Lastly, the history of the third estate brings out the original character of the members of the House of Commons as being mere delegates, and the gradual re-placement of this by the higher character of senators, so that each member is not the deputy of a locality but a representative of the whole.

munanté) is found in the thirteenth century often in the simple sense of the whole body of the nation. But under the influence of the French use of the word for an organised body such as the town corporations, it comes to be also used for smaller organised representative bodies, such as the county courts or the corporate body controlling the boroughs, or again, the body of tenants-in-chief. The barons at Oxford in 1258 speak of the twelve appointed per le commun, i.e., by tho baronial tenants-in-chief, to consult pour le commun de la terre, i.e., for the whole nation. Indeed the whole constitutional struggle between classes in this century may be put in the formula of a struggle as to the practical interpretation of the word communitas. And for some time it seemed that the English Constitution would be cast in a mould like the French, constituted of clergy, chief tenants, be. ughs: or at least that it would resemble that of Aragon (clergy, magnates, knights, towns); for each of these bodies had in England at one time an identity of its own. What, then, defeated this tendency? What common ground brought the burgesses and freeholders' class together in England alone of all countries? The answer is, the shire-moot, or county court. Here the two classes had been long used to meet and work together under royal orders, the communitas scira had contained not only freeholders from hundred and township, but also the representative burgesses from each borough, entrusting the duties laid on the shire to three or four of the more discreet knights; and after the dangerous precedent had been set aside of Simon de Montfort's dealing with the boroughs apart from their shires, from 1283 the writ for knights and burgesses aliko was executed in the shire-moot. The shire had brought over the knights from the baronial body to the freeholders, and had now associated the knights with the burgesses. The only thing which threatened to keep them still separated in Parliament was the system of taxation, and when the old feudal taxation by aids, scutages, and carucages [AID] had yielded to the national taxetion by subsidies and customs, it became natural for the knights and burgesses, as the representative and taxing body, to part off from the barons, and to sit together in one House of Commons, i.e., about the beginning of Edward III.'s reign.

The English Parliament, then, in the four-teenth century, consisted of two "estates," the clergy and the lords, and a third body, which had more the character of a representation of localities. It had seemed not impossible under Edward I. that two other estates right be added—the lawyers and the merchants. The former would have been fatal to the Commons' acquisition of administrative supervision; the latter, fatal to their monopoly of taxation, and so to their one weapon against the crown. However, not only was this not realised, but the actually existing estate of clergy entered on the suicidal policy of escaping their position between "the hammer and the anvil"-Pope and king-by taking up a position of jealous constitutional isolation, and persisted in dropping out of the Parliamentary system. The Commons were left alone, the solo body representative of the nation, and the sole body too which could be fairly deemeds ole to impose a national tax. For while the making of laws and the administering of supremo justice had been the business of the king and his great council, it had been always necessary to obtain the active concurrence of the shire-moot to raise a tax. Thus the terms in which the representatives are called to Edward I.'s Parliaments are mercly "to hear;" under Edward II., "to hear and consent to," as against the Lords "to treat of" the matters. But the separation of the Houses increased the powers of the representative House, as did also the appeals to them made by the contending parties of the court and the opposition baronage in 1322, 1327, 1386, 1387, 1399. Also through the reign of Edward III. the Commons felt, as their song said, that they were the "shippe's mast, That with their chattel and their good Maintained the war from first to last." And moreover, the knights of the shire were now taking up that attitude of bold, yet wary and unaleeping opposition which justifies Hallam in saying that they "bore the brunt of the battle for constitutional liberty." Thus it was almost wholly their energy which, in the battle over taxation, secured to Parliament in 1340 the sole right to direct taxation, and in 1362 to the increase of the customs; while, under Richard II., the indirect control by appropriation and audit, and the rule settled in 1401, that grants be made tho last day of the session, permanently secured the principle that redress precedes supply, as the downfall of Richard II. decided against the claim of the crown to an ordaining power tantamount to the law-making power of Parliament. "The year 1341 distinctly marks the acquisition by the third estate of its full share of Parliamentary power, the Commons asserting, and the Lords allowing them, an equal share in the common demand of right and control" (Stubbs).

In legislation it had already in 1327 become the rule to say "at the petition of the Commons," instead of "by their assent." And this was made reality—the real initiative was given to .nem—when in 1439 the petition was transformed into a "bill, containing in itself the form of an act," a usage which became regular under the Tudors. To the control of administration the Commons had made their first step by their great petition against grievances in 1309, and this attitude they maintained by indefatigable petitioning through the century, e.g., in 1376 especially; while their being called on to ratify the depositions of Edward II. and Richard II. strengthened their claim immensely, as did the period of regency after Edward III., and above all the fact that, up to 1437, the Lancastrian dynasty's Parliamentary title obliged the kings to subject their Council to instructions from Parliament, and to constitute it of such members as would be agreeable to the Commons. Even Edward IV. evaded rather than defied their interference. The Tudors had the confidence of their subjects, but they packed the House with creatures of the court, and introduced more than eighty new boroughs; yet, in the last resort, even the Tudors knew how to yield when the temper of the House had been dangereusly stirred by unxiety as to the succession, by an ecclesiastical measure for which they were not prepared, or by some great defect in the ordinary administration, such as the abuse of menopolies in Elizabeth's reign. In the seventcenth century a common spirit animated the whole House. It was far better attended, the grant of freedom of speech became more of a reality than the warning with which it was conjoined against abuse of the grant. The old weapon of impeachment, which had preved so formidable to unpopular reval ministers in 1377, and in 1386, and in 1449, had lain unused since then, but was breught forth once more against Mompesson and Bacon in 1621, and against the Earl of Middlesex in 1624, and, as used against Strafford in 1640, gave the deathblow to ministerial reliance on crown support. No part of the Commons' work is now more theroughly carried out than this supervision of all public departments by the machinery of metions for a resolution, motions before supply, and questions to ministers. Similarly the House, by its representative character and its hold of the purse, has long had practically the final voice in deliberation on such matters as foreign policy, and the determina-tion of war and peace. In the fourteenth century the Commons had mostly avoided direct interference in such questions, but the failure of the French wars had reused them to more straightforward interposition, and this jealousy was afterwards revived by distrust of the action of the court. In taxation the fourteenth century had seen the sole right to impose taxes won for Parliament by the Commons, the fifteenth sees the Commons secure the fruits of this victory solely for themselves, for in 1407 it was allowed that a tax could originate only with the Commons; the Lords and the clergy in Convocation having nothing to do but practically to follow with corresponding grants. This claim they did not relax under the Tudors, though it was evaded by benevolences, and it was this which brought them first into collision with the Stuart theory of prerogative, which took nowhere a more offensive form than in the ship-money and customs duties by which it aimed at superseding the representa-tive control of taxation. The Petition of Right (1628) and the Bill of Rights (1689) embodied this as a cardinal principle of the constitution, and it was completed by the doctrine first heard in 1671 and 1680, and finally vindicated in 1861 by their resolute action in rejecting the Lords' amendments to the Bill for Repealing the Paper Duties, that no amendment can be made in a money bill of the Commens, nor can the Lords even in-directly impose any charge. And this the language of the Acts of Parliament and of the King's Speech formally recognises. . It is this principlo as much as the necessity to renew the Mutiny Act, that gives the Commons control over the numbers of the standing army. But with all their sole contrel, and the annual Appropriation Act, and Budget, and elaborate machinery for audit and for criticism of each item, it may be doubted whether the grewth of public expenditure is not beyond the power of the House, as at present constituted, to restrain. The Grand Committees established in the year 1882 may lead to some more feasible means towards this end.

In the course of their long advance to supreme power in the state, the Commons have sometimes made errors; thus they were defeated in their attempts to tax the clergy (1449) and to claim a share of the Lords' judicial powers (1400, and Floyd's Case, 1621), and they have abandoned the practice of forcing bills through the Lords by tacking there to a money bill; but most of all have they misjudged their dignity in the interpretation they have sometimes given to Privilege of the House. As to the elections in the shires, Acts had been passed in 1406 and 1430 to check the interference respectively of the sheriff and of others than freeholders; but the cognisance of disputed elections lay with king and Council until the Commons took notice of such cases in 1553 and 1586, and in 1604 entered on an indecisive conflict with the Chancery, since which date, however, or indisputably since the Aylesbury Case (q.v.) in 1704, the House has been judge of its own elections, a function it deputed to a committee from 1790, and from 1868 more honourably delegated to the judges, with marked results on tho purification of the public tone in relation to bribery, as can be seen in the stringent clauses of the Bill of 1883. [BRIBERY.] As to privi-lege of members of the House of Commons from arrest, the first important case to be noticed is that when the Speaker, Thorpe, was imprisoned on an action of trespass brought by the Duke of York in 1453. But Henry VIII., in Ferrers' Case (1543) supported their claim, and James I. had to allow it in his first Parliament (Shirley's Case), and it has been allewed consistently ever since, with the exception that it has ceased to be extended to members' servants. The House has always exercised jurisdiction over its own members by committal or expulsion, though the former expires at a prorogation, and is so far inferior to the internal jurisdiction of the Lords. The important privilege of freedom of speech was not acquired till the Lancastrian reigns, and was little respected by the Tudor kings, but under the Stuarts the release of Sir John Eliot and others (1629), and the failure of the attempt upon the Five Members (1642), led to the recognition of the principle by the King's Bench and its final enunciation in the Bill of Rights (1689). It still was found necessary, after the undignified dispute with Stockdale (1837-40), to pass an Act protecting printers of Parliamentary papers from liability to actions for libel. On the other hand, in appealing to privilege to prevent the publication of debates, the Commons had put Wilkes into the position of a representative of a just and irresistible popular demand (1771) and they have more prudently given up this pretension, as well as the inconvenient custom of excluding "strangers" at a single memher's request.

The constitution and structure of the House of Commons has also a history of its own. In 1295, 37 counties and 116 boroughs were represented; the Tudor period saw the addition of two English counties with two members, and 12 Welsh counties the one member each, and more than 80 bos. It was not until Charles H.'s reignt the Palatinate of Durham first sent members to the House of Commons. The number of boroughs increased up to 1832, and in the interval 45 members had been added for Scotland, 100 for Ireland, and five for the Universities. After many proposals for reform, the Reform Bills of 1832 a : 1868 transferred members from many bor as to the counties, and increased the representation of Scotland and Ireland. Further alterations were made in 1885; and now the total is 670. [Reform.] In 1430 the franchise was declared to belong only to 40s, freeholders; in 1707 a property qualification for members was required; but the former was enlarged by the Bill of 1832, the latter abolished in 1858. [Election.] The original theory of the representative system under which a member was a delegate from a particular place had always tended to be tacitly dropped in favour of the wider senatorial theory that each member represents the whole Commons; and occasional endeavours in the fifteenth century to require from candidates residence as a qualification were fortunately never acted on. A greater necessity was to strengthen the independence of the House and make its representative character a reality by excluding lawyers (1372, 1404), maintainers (1350, &c.), and shcriffs(1372 and afterwards); but the "undertakers" of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and the placemen of the eighteenth century, were not satisfactorily excluded till the rule established in 1707 disqualifying pension holders, and even obliging members appointed to office to seek re-election.

But the essential defect in the Commons as a representative House up to 1832 lay elsewhere. The representative system which when first constituted in the thirteenth eentury was an honest reflex of the social state, failed to expand to meet the expansion of society; the villeins who were unfit for representation in 1295 had acquired practical independence before 1381; the boroughs which were worthy of representation at 1295 fell into decay as the centre of gravity of the population shifted from the south of England to the north. Thus the Commons of the sixteenth century had ceased to be a just reprosentation of centemporary wealth and intelligence; yet retorm was delayed till it was almost enforced by revolution, a pregmunt lesson which statesmanship will do well to learn of history. [A. L. S.] Commonwealth, THE, a term formerly employed to signify the general weal, and the nation with its inhabitants, was specially adopted to designate the government which intervoned between the death of Charles I. in Jan., 1649, and the establishment of Cromwell's Protectorate in Dec., 1653. After the forcible ejection of certain of its members by Colonel Pride, Dec. 6, 1648, the House of Commons consisted of eighty members. On Fcb. 6, 1649, seven days after the execution of Charles, this mutilated House resolved that the House of Peers ought to be abolished, and on the next day adopted a similar resolution with regard to the office of a king. resolutions were afterwards enlodged in Acts of Parliament, and a further Act passed enacting that the people of England and of all the dominions thereto belonging should be governed as a Commonwealth and free State (May 19, 1649); the executive was vested in a Council of State of forty-one members, re-clected by the Parliament yearly. With the exception of three or four members, this Council always consisted of members of Parliament. The average attendance of the House was about fifty, and as the most active members of the Council were also the most active members of Parliament, it was the Council which was mainly responsible for the policy of the government. There was no individual responsibility; all work being dono by committees formed of members of the Council, and of the Parliament, and of both bodies tenance on the army. Yet amongst the mass of officers and soldiers no desire was felt for the continued existence of the present Parliament. Before the execution of Charles a project drawn up by Ireton had been presented to Parliament, demanding its speedy dissolution, and proposing the election of triennial Parliaments, a reform of the elec toral system, and a redistribution of seats. The Parliament was, however, unwilling to decree its own dissolution, and the dangers with which the new government was surrounded justified its refusal to take the question into consideration. It had to face the hostility of the Presbyterian section of the l'uritan party, as well as of old Royalists and Irish Catholics. Both in Ireland and Scotland the Prince of Wales was proclaimed king of the three countries. Prince Rupert ruled the Channel at the head of some revolted ships. Foreign princes refused to recognise the Republic. Dangerous mutinies broke out amongst the Fifth-Monarchists and Levellers in the army. These, however, were quickly suppressed, by the energy and decision of Cromwell and Fairfax in dealing with the mutineers. An Act was passed to restrain the press (Sept. 20, 1649). An engagement to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, as established without king or House of Lords, was required as a necessary pre-liminary to holding any office in Church or State (Oct. 12), and by a subsequent Act was rendered universal (Jan. 2, 1650). In Ireland Cromwell in nine months brought the greater part of the country again into subjection to England. The following year his great victories gained over the Scots at Dunbar (Sept. 3, 1650) and Worcester (Sept. 3, 1651) destroyed for the time all hope of a Presbyterian or Royalist reaction, and reduced Scotland to the condition of a subject province. A bill was introduced into Parliament for anion of the two countries. An Act assed for the settlement of Ircland, the union of the two countries. which excepted from pardon all persons who had taken part in the massacre of 1643, and confiscated a large amount of land belonging to Irish Cutholics (Aug. 12, 1652). A further bill was brought in for the planting of Protestant families on the land thus confis-

In March, 1649, the Council of State appointed Milton its secretary for foreign tengues. After the victory of Worcester, foreign princes, who before refused to recognise the Republic, sought its friendship. During the two years in which Cromwell was reducing Ireland and Scotland, the Republicans in London had raised a formidable navy—Prince Rupert, driven by Admiral Blake from the mouth of the Tagus when he sought refuge, saw his fleet dispersed and destroyed on the Mediterranean (1649). Commercial jealousy led to the passing of the Navigation Act (Oct. 9, 1651), Intended to transfer the carrying trade of the Dutch to Englishmen, and in the ensuing summer to the opening of hostilities with the United Provinces. In an engagement off Dover the English under Blake were worsted by the Dutch under Van Tromp. In Feb., 1653, the hostile fleets again engaged off Portland Isle, when the Dutch were defeated and driven for refuge into the Texel.

After the restoration of internal peace the question of the dissolution of the Parliament again rose into prominence. Various Acts had been passed by which the House sought to express its regard for religion and morality, but the chief reform demanded remained unexecuted, ner did it seem probable that the government, as at present constituted, would ever have the energy requisite for the attainment of practical results in the directions required. The reform of the law, a definite settlement with regard to the Church and the appointment of ministers, the termination of the system of sequestering the estates of former delinquents, and of governing by means of committees, appeared no nearer attainment than at the time of the institution of the Republic. The impracticability of compromise between the so-called Republicans, Vane, Ludlow, and others, who sought to maintain the existing form of government, and those who were indifferent to the form the government should assume, so long as the predominance of the Puritan party was assured, led to the sudden and forcible ejection of the members from their seats by Cromwell (April 19, 1653

From this time, Cromwell was practically at the head of the government, which was for the time carried on by a council of thirteen, including himself and eight other officers. In July, in answer to his summons, there met an assembly of 139 persons, known as the Little Parliament, or as Barebones' Parliament, from the name of one of its members, a leather-soller-Barbon, a London Baptist. It was representative of the reforming party, and was divided nearly equally between a more radical but small majority, and a large, less radical, minority. It passed Acts for the relief of debtors, for the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, and the institution of civil marriages. It also brought in bills affecting the Poor Laws and the administration of justice. It voted the abolition of the Court of Chancory. It further voted that the choice of ministers should be vested in their parishioners, and rejected by a majority of two the report of a committee in favour of the continuance of tithes. These votes on the Church question represented the triumphs of those who desired to effect the severance of Church and State. The minority, opposed to a voluntary system, took opportunity in the name of the Parliament of resigning their authority to Cromwell. The officers of the army determined to restore the executive into the hands of a single person, and, on Dec. 16, Cromwell was installed head of the government with the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Compounders, THE, were a section of the Jacobite party who wished for a restoration of the Stuarts, "but for a restoration accompanied by a general amnesty, and by guarantees for the security of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the realm." They obtained their name about 1692. The Compounders formed the main strength of the Jacobite party in England; but the more violent party or Non-Compounders were allpowerful at St. Germains. Their leader at St. Germains was the Earl of Middleton, who resigned in 1693. They were much offended by James's Declaration in 1692, and shortly atterwards recommended that James should resign in favour of his son, on his refusal to accept these conditions, part of which was the observance of the Test Onth. The remainder of their history is merged in that of the party. [JACORITES,]

Comprehension Bill, THE (1689), was a scheme for the relief of Protestant Dissenters proposed by the Earl of Nettingham. A measure of similar tendoncy had been advoented on the o casion of the enactment of tho Test Act, but had been allowed to drop. Another proposal of similar tendency, a bill to relieve Protestant Dissenters from the penalties of the 35th of Elizabeth, suffered a similar fate in 1680. Nottingham's Bill provided that all ministers of the Established Church, and members of both Universities, should be freed from the necessity of subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles, on signing a declaration that they app d, and would support, "the doctrine, woi , and government of the Church of England;" scrupled ceremonies, such as tho wearing of a surplice, the sign of the cross in baptism, the admission of godfathers and godmothers to christening, and the reception of the Eucharist in a kneeling position, were left at discretion; a Presbyterian minister might acquire all the privileges of a clergyman of the Church of England on submitting to the imposition of the hands of a bishop. This bill was mutilated in th: Upper House, and a petition substituted that the king would call the houses of Convection "to be advised with in ecclesiastical matters." The Nonconformist clergy, themselves accustomed to independence, and disliking formal subscriptions of faith and compulsory uniformity, were not anxious for the passing of the measure; and so the scheme of comprehension was allowed to fall absolutely and finally to the ground.

Compton, HENRY (b. 1632, d. 1713), WHE R younger son of the Earl of Northampton. After studying at Oxford he entered the army, but soon after relinquished the military for the elerical profession. In 1669 he was made a canon of Christ Church; in 1674, Bishop of Oxford; and in 1675 was translated to He incurred the displeasure of James II. by disregarding the royal order proaibiting controversial sermons, and was suspended from his episcopal functions. He joined Danby and others ln inviting William of Orange to England, and took a leading part in the Revolution. He assisted in the coronation of William and Mary, but, being disappointed in his hopes of obtaining the archbishopric of Canterbury, from that time took little further part in public affairs.

Compurgation was a mode of defence allowed by Anglo-Saxon law. When a man was accused of any crime, he might, if he chose, purge himself by the oaths of twelve men, if he could find that number to swear to his innocence. After the Conquest, compurgation gradually fell into disuse, though it was specially retained as an alternative to ordeal of battle in certain chartered towns. The compurgators were not a jury, but a body of sworn witnesses to character. Compurgation was a custom common to all, or nearly all, the Teutonic tribes, and the number of ompurgators required in early times varied according to the heinousness of the offence, the rank of the accused and the accuser, and in some cases toached one hundred: in England it was usually twelve.

Conadh Cerr (d. 629) was the son of Eocha, who resigned the kingdom of Dalriada in his favour, 627. In this year Conadh fought at the battle of Ardcorran in Ireland ou the side of the Irish Dulriads; and two years later was defeated at another battle in Ireland, fighting against the Cruithough and his own father, who was now apparently king of the Galloway Picts.

Confirmatio Cartarus: (1297) was the name given to an important document in which Edward I., under pressure from the harons and clergy, confirmed and extended the constitutional rights established in the two preceding reigns. It was obvious that the Great Charter, in the mutilated condition in which it had been left in 1225, was not sufficient guarantee against arbitrary taxation on the part of the king. The barons accordingly drew up a series of new articles to be added to the Great Charter, and these the king was obliged to concede. The articles were seven in number:-(1) The Charters are confirmed, and are to be kept in every point without breach. (2) Any judgment given henceforth contrary to the points of the Charters aforesaid by the justices, or by any other royal ministers, to be undone, and holden for nought. (3) Copies of the Charters are to be sent to the cathedral churches of the realm, and read twice a year to the people. (4) The bishops are to ex-communicate all who break the Charters. (5) The exactions by which the people have in former times been aggrieved not to be a precedent for the future. (6) For no businow henceforth will the crown take such my eer of aids, tasks, or prizes but by the common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof, saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed. (7) Forasmuch as the commonalty of the realm have oeen sore grieved with the maltote of woods, we, at their requests, have clearly released it, and have granted for us and our heirs that we will not take such thing nor any other without their common assent and good-will, saving to us and to our heirs the custom of wools, skins, and leather granted before by the commonalty aforesaid. - The confirmation of the Charters may be held to complete the work begun at Runnymede. "It established," says Bishop Stubbs, "the principle that for all taxation, direct and indirect, the consent of the nation must be asked, and made it clear that all transgressions of that principle, whether within the letter of the law or beyond it, were evasions of the spirit of the constitution."

Stubbn, Const. Hist.; Select Charters, 487, seq.

Congé d'Elire - "leave to elect "-is a Norman-French phrase, signifying the sove. reign's permission for the denn and chapter of a vacant see to proceed to the election of a bishop. In pre-Norman times, the bishops were, as a rule, appointed by the king in the witenagemot, though there occasionally occur instances of an election more or less free-as in the case of Helmstan, Bishop of Winchester (839). After the Norman Conquest, the election became by degrees canonical, though even then the election was held in the king's chapel, and so much under his influence as to be little more than nominally free; and the dispute about investiture between Henry I. and Anselm ende sovereign we . er the temporal power, and the election wa be made by the chapters. In 1164 a clause in the Constitutions of Clarendon mentions the custom that elections to bishoprics should be "by the chief clergy of the Church, assembled in the king's chapel, with the assent of the king;" whilst, in 1214. John, by a special charter, made a grant to the chapters of free canonical election, reserving, however, to the king the right of licence and approval. This charter was confirmed by Magna Charta, and again in 1351 by Edward III.; and in spite of various attempts at interference on the part of the Pope, the crown as a rule managed to secure the appointment of its nominees. In 1534. an Act of Henry VIII. provided that with the congé d'élire the king was also to send the name of the person he wished to be elected; and that if the election is delayed beyond twenty days after the issuing of the royal licence, or if any other than the royal nomince was chosen, the dean and chapter were to incar the penalties of Præmnnire (q.v.). It was also provided that after a delay of twelve days on the part of the chapter the king might fill up the vacant see by letters patent. The method of this Act still prevails in England. In Ireland, before the Irish Church Act of 1869, the nominations were made by letters patent. [Bishop.]

Congleton, HENRY BROOKE PARNELL, LORD (b. 1776, d. 1842), was the second son of the Right Hon. Sir John Parnell, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland. His elder brother being born a cripple without the use of speech, the estates were settled upon Henry by a special Act of Parliament, 1789.

Hisr.-12

He entered Parliament in 1802 as member for Portarlington. He devoted himself, especially during his Parliamentary career, to the questions of the Corn Law Reform and Catholic Relief, and soon became prominent as a champion in the Opposition. He also published several pamphlets of some weight on these questions. He was chairman of the Finance Committee in the session of 1828. His motion, in 1830, with regard to the Civil List, on which the ministry was outvoted, produced the downfall of the Wellington administration. He afterwards sat for Queen's County for twenty-seven years, and subsequently represented Dundee, being created a peer August 11, 1841. He died by his own hand, May, 1842.

Coningsby, Thomas, Earl (d. 1729), was member for Leominster during the reign of William III. He was "a busy and unscrupulous While." He accompanied the king to Ireland in the capacity of Paymaster-General. On the departure of William to England he was created one of the Lords Justices. Together with his colleagues, he was guilty of hanging a man named (fafney, who turned informer in a murder case. He superintended and signed the Treaty of Limerick. During the next six months, by his unprincipled rapacity, and by the favour he showed to Roman Catholics, he succeeded in alienating all classes, and was recalled. In 1701 we find him voting for the Resumption Bill, although he had received considerable grants of Irish land. "He was," says Macaulay, "an unprincipled man: he was insatiable of riches; and he was in a position in which riches were easily to be obtained by an unprincipled man." After the death of Queen Anne, Coningsby was created a peer of Great Britain.

Connaught. The ancient kingdom of Connaught, originally cailed Olnegmacht, comprised, roughly speaking, the present counties of Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Rescommon, Leitrim, and Cavan, afterwards added to Ulster. According to tradition, when the Scoti established themselves in Ireland, their great chief, Tuathal (d. circa 160 A.D.), reigned over Munster, Leinster, and Olnegmacht, and in the great division of the country between his grandson Con, or Cond, "of the hundred battles," and the rival king, Mug of Munster (whence came the terms Leith-Cuinon, "Con's half," for north Ireland, and Leith-Mogha, "Mug's half," for south Ireland), the district now known as County Clare, which had originally belonged to Olnegmacht, was transferred to Munster. About this time the name of the kingdom was changed from Olnegmacht to Connaught. In the reign of King Laeghairé, Connaught was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick (about 433). In the time of the so-called Irish Pentarchy, Connaught was a fairly compact kingdom, owing allegiance to the Ard-Riagh, or chief monarch of Ireland, usually chosen from the kings of Meath. Its power was at its height in 561, when Fergus defeated the Ard-Riagh Diarmid at the battle of Sligo; but soon afterwards the kingdom split up into principalities, and continued through the Danish invasion, in which the nobles unpatriotically sided with the invader, though they afterwards changed sides and aided Brian Boru in winning the great battle of Clontarf (1014). Soon after this, the great sept of the O'Connors of Roscommon became prominent in Connaught, and began to wage civil war with the O'Neils of Ulster and the O'Briens of Munster. Turlogh O'Brien drove the reigning O'Connor from his kingdom in 1079, but Turlogh O'Connor overran the whole of Munster in 1118, and followed this up by taking Dublin. His son, Roderic O'Connor, claimed the title of Ard-Riagh of Ireland, and was crowned with great pomp in Dublin in 1166. Soon afterwards he drove Dermot Macmurrough, King of Leinster, from his kingdom, whereupon the latter sought help from Henry II. of England, and the English Invasion followed. Roderic, a man of indolent disposition, made little attempt at resistance, but did homage to Henry in 1175, when the sovereignty of Ireland was reserved to him with the exception of Dublin, Meath, Leinster, Waterford, and Dungarvan. His son, Cathal, pursued the same policy on John's visit to Ireland in 1210. Henry III., however, by a great breach of good faith, granted the country, in 1225, to Richard de Burgh, and after a terriblo struggle he succeeded in holding his own against the O'Connors, who were, as usual, split up into several factions; and the sept was almost annihilated in the reign of Edward II., when Felim O'Connor joined Edward Bruce, and was defeated by his kinsman Rory, supported by the Burghs and Berminghams at Athenry (1316). About the middle of the century the Burghs of Connaught, the younger branch, threw off their allegiance to the English crown, and Connaught was divided between their leaders, while they changed their name at the same time to that of Burke. The race rapidly degenerated; they adopted Irish manners and intermarried freely with the O'Connors, in spite of the Statute of Kilkenny (1367). The power of the latter revived, so that by the commencement of the reign of Henry VIII. they still claimed to be kings, and had extended their dominions to within twenty miles of Dublin. strength was, however, checked in the reign of Edward VI. by Sir Edward Bellingham, who built a castle at Athlone to curb Connaught. In the reign of Elizabeth the Burkes suffered a sterner punishment; they had remained quiet during the Ulster and Munster insurrections, but at last, in 1576, when the hated Sir Nicholas Malby was appointed Ard-

President of Connaught, they arose in rebel-The whole of the country was ireturn laid waste by fire and sword, and the unfortunate race nearly exterminated in that and the following years. In 1560 Connaught ceased to be a kingdom, and was divided into counties by Act of Parliament. Clare, or Thomond, originally part of Connaught, was soon afterwards added to it again, but after a little while again became part of Munster. [Burke; O'Connor.] In the reign of Charles I. an Inquiry into Titles in Connaught was made at the instance of Wentworth, afterwards Lord Strafford, when Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The idea was first mooted in 1634, but was laid aside in order to conciliate the Irish Parliament. As soon, however, as they had voted the necessary supplies, Charles broke his promise of making sixty years' possession a bar to the claims of the rown, and, in 1635, issued a commission to inquire into defective titles in Connaught, wishing to dispossess the landlords and colonise the country on the plan which James I. had pursued in Ulster. After the juries had been warned what the consequences of contumacy would be, the commission went to work, and le atsoon declared that the lands of the Burkes about Athlone—in fact, nearly three-fourths of the province—belonged to the crown. For reland ion of this the foreman of the jury, Sir Lucas Dillon, Dunwas permitted to retain some of his own same lands. In most cases the landlords had no 1210. title-deeds to show, and those who had were ach of forced to pay large fines for their confirmation. 25, to In Galway alone the jury refused to find for the king; they were fined £4,000 each and errible s own imprisoned, when the sheriff, on whom a usual, penalty of £1,000 was imposed, died. The Transplantation to Connaught was effected during the Protectorate. Cromwell detere sept dward mined, in 1653, to confine the Irish nation Rory, to the desolated province of Connaught, ghams and declared that they must transplant themof the selves thither within seven months on the ounger penalty of death. There they were to be enclosed by a cordon of soldiers, to whom a to the livided strip of land, a mile wide, running round the hanged coast and the Shannon, was assigned. The Burke. population was now reduced by war and banishdopted ment to about 850,000, and for them 800,000 ly with acres was set apart. By a summary process the estates of the Catholic gentry were confis-cated, according to their degree of complicity tute of latter of the in the Irish rebellion and their resistance to the d to be l'rotectorate, in various proportions, from one ions to to two-thirds, which were handed over to Their adventurers and Parliamentary soldiers, while they were forced to accept an equivalent e reign ngham. across the Shannon. After the appointed time b Conhad passed, an Irish gentleman was hanged for Burkes refusing to transplant, and many hundreds, had rewith their families, were sent as slaves to Iunster Barbadoes. Many others were removed bodily, hen the with what they could save of their possespointed sions, to Connaught. The utmost severity was used in the process, noble ladies, for instance, being compelled to go on foot, and all being reduced to the greatest misery. Some of the sons of the banished owners wandered about their old estates, living by outlawry and the hospitality of their fathers' tenants. A sum of £20 was laid on the heads of these "Tories," in 1657, and their extermination decreed, together with that of two other "beasts," the wolf and the priest. After the Restoration an attempt was made (1661) to soften these conditions, the result of which was that it was declared that all Catholics who were innocent of rebellion should be restored to their estates. Those, however, who had accepted lands in Connaught were forced to abide by their bargains, and of those who returned from exile but few obtained any redress.

Conservators of the Peace. These predecessors of our modern justices of the peace were persons entrusted with the duty of maintaining order and police in their counties. Dr. Stubbs traces their origin to an edict of Hubert Walter in 1195. According to this proclamation an oath against harbouring or aiding thieves and robbers was to be taken by every one above fifteen years of age. This usage dates from Anglo-Saxon times; but its execution was now assigned to special knights appointed for the purpose. In 1230 and 1252 two or three knights are appointed in each shire for the conservation of the peace, and in 1253 we find he sheriffs summoning four men, and the reeve from each township, and twelve burghers from each borough, to execute the same functions; and in the fifth year of Edward I. an care bearing the title of "Custos Pacis," or guardian of the peace, is elected in the county conrts. Conservators of the same kind were appointed to carry out the provisions of the Statute of Winchester, which deals so largely with questions of local police. Dr. Stubbs considers that these offices were originally filled by the crown, but when vacant, by election of the shire-moot. In the first year of Edward III. "good men" were appointed to guard the peace in each county, but apparently were not elected like Edward I.'s "Custodes Pacis." In the eighteenth year of Edward III. these Conservators of the Peace were commissioned to hear and determine felonies, and sixteen years later received authority to do so regularly, and they became regular officials of the crown, from whom they henceforth derive all their authority.

Consistory Courts. [Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction.]

Consols is the usual abbreviation for the government stock, properly entitled Consolidated Bank Annuities. It originated in the year 1751, when an Act was passed consolidating several separate stocks bearing interest at 3 per cent. By the National Debt (Conversion) Act, 1888, the interest was reduced to 2½ per cent., and provision was made for a further reduction to 2½ per cent., which took place in 1905. [NATIONAL DEBT.]

constable (derived from the Latin comes stabuli, count of the stable) was originally an office in the Byzantine court, the name appearing in the West about 580 a.b. In England it is used in several different senses.

(1) It appears to have been first attached after the Conquest to the keepers of the royal castles, e.g., the Constable of the Tower, of Baynard's Castle, of Chester Castle, &c., who rapidly acquired hereditary privileges, and exercised under weak kings usurped jurisdictions in common pleas, together with oppressive powers of imprisonment, which were not finally abolished until 1403.

(2) The Lord High Corstable appears about the time of Stephen as one of the domestic dignitaries of the court. The office existed indeed under the Norman kings, but was comparatively unimportant, and the first High Constable who is at all prominent in history is Miles of Hereford, one of the chief supporters of the Empress The High Constable may be con-Matilda. sidered to have succeeded to the duties of the officer who, before the Conquest, was known as the Staller: he was quartermaster-general of the court and army. From the Dialogus de Scaccario we learn that he was also, in the time of Henry 11., one of the officers of the Exchequer, where he helped the Treasurer to cheek the accounts of the king's household servants. As was the ease with the other great offices of the royal household, the Lord High Constable had, before the end of the reign of Henry II., become an hereditary dignity, and went, together with the tenure of certain manors in Gloucestershire, and the eastle of Caldecot iu Monmouthshire, into the family of Bohun, through Humphrey de Bohun, who married the daughter and heiress of Miles of Hereford, and on the extinction of that line in 1372 it was held by Thomas of Woodstock (d. 1397), who married the heiress of the seventh Earl of Hereford. With the accession of the house of Lancaster (1399), the office ceased to be hereditary. The Earl of Northumberland was made Constablo by Henry IV. in 1399, but the office was taken from him in 1403 and given to the Duke of Bedford. Subsequently the Duke of Somerset was made Constable in 1450, but there seem to have been considerable gaps between many of the appointments. The Lord High Constable, together with the Marshal, had by the time of Edward I. acquired great powers in the management of the army; ho superintended the mustering, billeting, and formation ot troops, took care that those who owed service by their tenure sent the proper amount of men, and during the campaign held court for the trial of military offences. In 1296, Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, together with Bigod the Marshal, refused to take charge of an army destined for Guienne, availing themselves of the legal quibble that they were only bound to serve the king in person, and they gained their point. From this date also tho judicial functions of the Lord High Constable became important; besides administering martial law, he was, with the Marshal, whose functions are by no means distinct, the presiding officer of the C. urt of Chivalry (q.v.), and, as such, decided questions of honour and heraldry. These powers became considerably enlarged, and tended to encroach on the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and were strictly limited in 1389. Edward IV., however, revised and increased the illegal powers for the purose of punishing the Lancastrians. Lord High Constable was empowered to take eognisance of all cases of high treason, "to hear, examine, and conclude them, even summarily and plainly, without noise or show of judgment, on simple inspection of fact." Richard III. bestowed the office on Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, partly, perhaps, with the idea of making it hereditary again, for Buckingham was a descendant of the Bohuns. The honour was conferred on his son Edward by Henry VII. Henry VIII., however, in 1514, finding that the fees of the office were exceedingly burdensome to the crown, discharged Buckingham from Since Buckingham's discharge his office. the Lord High Constable has only been appointed for special occasions, such as the king's coronation, and, in one single instance (in 1631), for trial by combat. The Duke of Wellington officiated as Lord High Constable at the last three ecronations.

(3) The Constables of the Hundred, or High Constables, were officers who, under the Angevin kings, performed in a subordinate capacity some of the duties which before the Conquest were entrusted to the head man, or reeve of the hundred. In a writ of Henry III. (1252), it is provided that "one or two chief constables should be constituted in every hundred, at whose mandate all those of his hundred sworn to arms should assemble," and by the Statute of Winchester (1285) it was ordered that in every hundred or franchise there should be chosen two or more constables to make the view of armour. They were elected by the court leet, and sworn in by the lord or his steward. In the reign of Elizabeth we find that they had the power of holding petty sessions for the hiring of servants. In 1844 it was provided that in default of appointments in the court leet, high constables might be chosen by justices at their special sessions. After the establishment and regulation of the county constabulary (between the years 1839 and 1859), high constables having become practically useless, the justices of each county were directed to consider and determine whether it was necessary to continue the effice in each hundred. [Huyppen]

the effice in each hundred. [HUNDRER.]

(4) The Petty Constable, or Constable of the Vill, may, on the analogy of the constable of the hundred, be considered as the degenerate descendant of the tithing man. He also was elected in the court leet until the reign of Charles II., when, in virtue of a statute passed in 1673, the duty of nominating and swearing-in constables was by degrees transferred to justices of the peace. In the reign of George II. it was provided (in 1751) that no constable could be sued without making the justice who signed the warrant a joint defendant. In 1842 it was declared that, with the exception of certain privileged classes, every able-bodied man between the ages of twentyfive and fifty-five who contributed to the poor rates, or held a tenement of the annual value of £4, was liable to serve as constable. The election of the constabulary of boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Act was placed in the hands of a watch committee in 1832, and the duties of special constables, who might be sworn in to keep the peace on emergencies, were regulated by legislation in 1827 and 1832.

(5) The Lord High Constable of Scotland can be traced back to the time of David I. In Scotland, the duties of the High Constable consisted in commanding the army while in the field, in the absence of the king, and, in conjunction with the Marshal, judging all transgressions committed within a certain distance of the king's palace, known as the chalmer of peace. In 1321, when Sir Gilbert Hay was made Earl of Errol, the office was made hereditary in his family. It was expressly reserved by the treaty of Union, and by Act of Parliament in 1747. It is now, however, purely honorary.

Constance, fourth daughter of William the Conqueror, married Alan, brother of the Duke of Britanny, to whom her father gave the earldom of Richmond. In 1090 she died, it is sa'd poisoned by some of her husband's vassals, who found her harsh and oppressive.

Constance of Britanny (d. 1201) was the daughter and heiress of Conan, Duke of Britanny. She was married to Geoffrey, son of Henry II., by whom she had two children, Arthur and Eleanor. After Geoffrey's death, in 1186, she obtained the guardianship of her son and the government of the duehy, but was soon afterwards compelled to marry Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who made himself so hated in Britanny that on Henry II.'s death, in 1189, he was driven out, and Constanco restored to power. In 1196 sho was seized by a body of troops under her husband, and imprisoned for eighteen months; her conduct during this period in asserting the rights of the Bretons was most adverse to the interests of her son, in addition to which, she had quarrelled with her powerful mother-in-law, Eleanor, as well as with her husband, from whom she obtained a divorce in 1198. She now married Guy, brother of the Viscount of Theuars, by whom she had three daughters. from the eldest of whom, Alix, sprang the Dukes of Britanny who played such an impor-tant part in the French wars of Edward III.'s Constance of C. ILE (d. 1392) was the cldest daughter of Pedro the Cruel, and became the second wife of John of Gaunt, who inherited, through her, claims to the crown of Castile.

Constantine (d. 820), son of Fergus, expelled Conall, King of the Picts, and obtained the Pictish throne (789), having in all probability anthority over Dalriada also. In 796 some monks from Lindisfarne visited his court, and for them he founded the church of Dunkeld. He was succeeded by his brother Angus. The reign of Constantine is chiefly memorable as marking the date of the first historical attacks of the Norsemen on the British shores. It was in 793 that they harried the holy island of Lindisfarne, and a few years later seized upon the western islands, and slaughtered the monks of Iona. By these pirates, who henceforward for several centuries continued their ravages, nearly all communications between Ireland and Scotland were in time broken off.

Constantine (d. 877), son of Kenneth, succeeded his uncle Donald as King of the Picts, 863. His reign is chiefly remarkable for a series of conflicts with the Northmen, under Olaf the White, the son of Norsten the Red. This chieftain is said to have conquered Caithness and Sunderland. When the Norwegians drove the Danes out of Ireland, the latter invaded Scotland, and defeated the Scotch king at Dollar and Inverdoret, at which last battle Constantine was killed.

Constantine (d. 952), son of Aedh, reigned over the kingdom of Alban, 900—943. He was a man of vigour and an experienced warrior. In 904 he cut to pieces in Stratherne an invading body of Danes, under Ivan. Soon afterwards he united the Pietish and Scottish Churches at an ecclesiastical council held at Scone. In 908 ho procured the election of his brother Donald to the throne of Strathclyde, and in 918 joined the Northumbrians against the Norsemen, whose advance was checked by the allied armies at the battle of Corbridge-on-Tync. Under the year 924 the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle tells us that amongst other nations the Scots chose Edward the Elder fer father and lord. But these peaceful relations cannot have lasted very long, for in 934 we find Edward's successor, Athelstan, invading Scotland, and penotrating as far as Dunotter, and ravaging the coasts of Caithness with his fleet. Constantine, in retaliation, joined with the Norsemen and the Britons of Strathclyde in an attempt to wrest Northumbria from the English king, but the united forces were defeated at Brunanburh (q.v.), 937. In 943 Constantine resigned his erown, and became abbot of the monastery of St. Andrews, where he died, 952, having, however, emerged for a short time, in 949, to do battle with King Constantius Chlorus, Emperor of Rome (292—306), ruled over the provinces of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and seems to have spent most of his time in this country. But the story of his laving married a British princess named Helena rests on no good authority. He defeated Allectus, and reunited Britain to the Empire. He died at York in the year 306.

Constitution, THE IRISH, OF 1782. In 1779 the Irish Volunteers, whom the carelessness of the government and the undefended state of Ireland had allowed to become formidable, had succeeded in frightening the government into repealing the trade restrictions. The movement was continued, and, under the direction of Grattan, aimed at legislative independence. In 1781 Lord Carlisle, the new vicerov, was instructed to resist all efforts at legislative independence, but nevertheless, notice was given of bills for the repeal of Poynings' Act (q.v.) and of the Mutiny Act. The repeal of the first, placing the Irish Parliament mass or less in the position of the English Parliament, could not be resisted, and was carried in Dec., 1781. The repeal of the Mutiny Bill, however, was not carried, though moved by Grattan. When Parliament again met, iu Feb., 1782, the Volunteers assumed a very threatening attitude, and the patriot party, backed by the resolutions of Dungannon, and aroused by ... a mention of Ireland in some unimportant Acts passed in England, proceeded, through Grattan, on Feb. 22, 1782, to move a sort of declaration of independence, but they were beaten by 137 to 68. But, though the resolutions were lost, the principle on which they were based had been admitted by every one. The Parliament was now adjourned, and when it met again, in March, the North ministry was overthrown, and the Whigs were in office. On April 17th Grattan was content to movo an amendment in the address demanding complete independence, and the House then adjourned to wait for an answer from England. On May 17th resolutions were passed in the English Parliament conceding the repeal of Poynings' Act, and of the statute 6 George I. and a bionnial Mutiny Bill. On May 27th the Irish Parliament received the news, and immediately voted £100,000 and 20,000 men for the war. Flood indeed attempted to declaim against England's concessions as insufficient, but failed, and the House resolved "that the right of legislation of the Irish Parliament in all cases, internal and external, had been already asserted by Ireland, and fully admitted by England." The constitution of 1782 was thus conceded; though hailed with enthusiasm at the time, it made corruption on a large scale necessary, and hastened on the Union as achieved in 1800.

Consuls are persons empowered to take charge of the trading and commercial interests of British subjects in foreign towns. They were introduced in the sixteenth century, but it was not till the end of the seventeenth that it became customary to appoint them regularly. Their duties are to give advice and assistance to English traders; to settle their disputes where possible; to guard the legal rights of British subjects under foreign jurisdiction; and to report on the trade of the country in which they are resident. By the Consular Marriage Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 68), consuls are empowered to celebrate marriages between British subjects resident in their district. They can take evidence on oath as to crimes committed on British ships, and are empowered to send home the offenders for trial; and they are also to exercise a general superintendence over British shipping, so as to see that the Merchant Shipping and other Acts are not violated. In some cases British consuls are also diplomatic agents or charges d'affaires, empowered to communicate with the Foreign Offices of the states in which they are stationed, and in this case they are called Consuls-General. In Turkey and the Levant the consuls-general exercise the powers conceded under the capitulations between England and the Porte, and are supreme judges of the consular courts. British consuls are allowed to trade in some towns, while at other stations this privilege is refused.

Conventicle Act, The (1664), enacted that any one over sixteen years of age present at an unlawful assembly or conventicle was to ineur fine or imprisonment. A conventicle was defined as an assembly of more than five persons, besides the members of a family, met together for holding worship not according to the Church of England. In 1670 the Act was amended, and the penaltics greatly lessened, but a severe fine was imposed on any one who lent his house for such meetings. The Conventicle Act was repealed by the Toleration Act of 1689.

Convention, THE (1688—9), is the name given to the Parliament which met after the abdication of James II. to settle the succession. It met on Jan. 22nd. It first placed the administration and the disposal of the revenue in the hands of William of Orange. The Commons declared the throne vacant, and voted that it was inconsistent with the safety of the Lingdom that it should be governed by a Popish king. The Lords, after much discussion, negatived the resolution that the throne was vacant, Dunby's party asserting that the crown had devolved on Mary. Disputes thereupon broke out between the two Houses. After a conference, the Lords yielded, and a resolution was passed that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen of England. Soon afterwards William and Mary arrived in England, and the crown was tendered to them, and accepted (Feb. 13). As soon as the new ministry was established, the question was broached whether the Convention should be turned into a Parliament. A bill declaring the Convention a Parliament passed the Lords, and after a sharp debate was accepted by the Commons. It contained a clause requiring members of both Houses to take the oaths te the new king and queen. "Such," says Hallam, "was the termination of that contest which the house of Stuart had maintained against the liberties, and of late against the religion, of England; or rather, of that far more ancient controversy between the crown and the people which had never been wholly at rest since the reign of John." Convention Bill, THE, passed by the Irish Parliament in 1793, declared the assemblage of persons calling themselves representatives of the nation, under any presence whatsoever, illegal. Fitzgibbon carried it, in spite of the violent epposition of Grattan and the Duke of Leinster.

Convention of Estates, The (1689), was the name given to the Scottish Parliament which assembled on March 14, 1689, after the Revolution. On the 4th of April the Estates passed a resolution declaring that King James VII., "being a professed Papist, did assume the regal power and acted as king without taking the oath required by law and hath by the advice of evil and wicked councillors invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power, and hath exercised the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and the violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government, whereby he hath forfaulted all right to the crown, and the throne is become vacant.' On the 11th of April the Estates adopted the Claim of Right, which declared the fundamental liberties of the kingdom of Scotland, and stated that no Papist could be King of Scotland, and that the Scottish Church was Presbyterian, and finally declaring that William and Mary were King and Queen of Scotland. Two days later (April 13) a number of resolutions, called the Articles of Grievances, were voted. These set forth a number of acts done under the authority of bad laws which the Estates desired to have repealed. The Convention exercised the executive authority in Scotland till the crown had been duly offered to and accepted by William III., when it became a Parliament.

Convention Parliament, THE (1660), is the name given to the assembly which established the Restoration of Charles II. It assembled April 26, 1660, on the dissolution of the "Rump." It immediately accepted the Declaration of Breda (q.v.), and issued an address inviting Charles to accept the crown. On the return of Charles, the discussions of the Convention turned chiefly upon the questions of the amnesty, the settlement of the claims of property which had changed hands, the settlement of the Church, and the royal revenuc. In regard to the first, the amnesty was voted for all but the judges of Charles I. In regard to the second, an Act of Indemnity and Oblivion was brought in to prevent holders of land sequestrated during the interregnum regaining possession of their property. The old feudal claims of the crown for fines upon alienation, reliefs, wardships, &c., were abolished, and the crown revenue was fixed at £1,200,000 a year, raised partly from the excise, and partly from tunnage and poundage now granted to the king for life. After much discussion, the settlement of the Church was left open when the Parliament was dissolved on December 29th, 1660.

Convocation is the name given to the general assembly of the clergy of the kingdom. The organisation of the Church gave its councils great importance in carly times, and under the Norman kings this conciliar activity was still further developed. The Church had its synods of the nation, the province, and the diocese; they were attended by prelates, chapters, archdeacons, and the parochial clergy. In general history, these synods became important as clerical taxation was introduced. As this became eustomary, diocesan representatives were sent to the provincial Convocations for the purpose of giving their assent to taxation. The first definite instance of representation in Convocation is found under Archbishop Stephen Langton, in 1225. In 1283 a rule was laid down that each bishop should summon to Convocation two proctors of the clergy of his diccese and one proctor from each cathedral or collegiate church, who were to have full power of consenting to such measures as the community of the clergy think fit. This was the constitution of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury. That of the province of York, dating from 1279, contained two proctors from each archdeaconry. Besides these elected members were bishops, abbots, priors, deans, and archdeacons, as ex-oficio members.

The jealousy between the two archbishops, and the difficulty in reconciling their claims, led, in the twelfth century, to quarrels. National Church councils became almost impossible, and ecclesiastical questions were discussed separately by the two Convocations. Such matters as concerned ordinary disciplino were decided for themselves. On other matters they presented petitions to the king, which were called gravamina.

When Edward I., in 1225, organised more completely the parliamentary representation of the several estates, he wished also to incorporate the clergy with the parliamentary system. For this purpose he summoned to Parliament, by separate writs addressed to each bishop, the proctors of the chapters and the parochial clergy, together with bishops, deans, and archdeacons personally. Thus the Convocations were summoned as spiritual councils of the archbishops, and the proctors were further summoned to Parliament by the clause of the king's writ to the bishops, known, from its first word, as the "premunientes" clause. In this way the two Convocations were to be worked into the parliamentary system, while retaining their position as spiritual councils besides.

The clergy, however, showed great reluctance to enter into this arrangement. Probably they thought that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual, and did not wish to be drawn into parliamentary disputes, in which their own privileges might suffer. The crown in vain addressed letters to the archbishops, urging them to compet the attendance of the clerical estate. After 1340 the crown acquiesced in the rule that clerical taxes should be granted in Convocation, and in the fifteenth century the attendance in Parliament of clerical proctors died away. The duty of voting taxes led to the summons of Convocation at the same time as Parliament, but this was from motives of convenience, and did not affect the independence of Convocation.

In the weakness of the clergy before the royal power, Convocation was used by Henry VIII. to bring about the social tion of the English Church from the Church of Rome. The elergy were informed that they had incurred the penalties of the Act of Præmunire by recognising Wolsey's legatine authority, which had been recognised by the king himself. Iniquitous as was this penalty, the clergy were helpless against the king, and Convocation, in 1030, assented to a large subsidy to appease the royal wrath. In the bill which granted it, the royal supremacy was admitted, with the proviso "as far as Christ's law allows." The Act of Submission, 1533, practically abolished the legislative powers of Convocation. It established that Convocation "is, always has been, and ought to be, summoned by royal writ;" there was to be thenceforth no legislation without the king's licence, and a revision of the existing canon law was committed to a mixed commission of clergy and laity.

Henceforth, during the sixteenth century, the Convocation of the province of Canterbury was recognised as expressing the opinions of the elergy, and worked with Parliament in framing the formularies and laws of the Church. The Prayer-book and the Articles received the sanction of Convocation before being submitted to Parliament. In 1604 Convocation drew up a new body of Canons, which were sanctioned by the king, but were not ratified by Parliament. These Canons remain as the basis of ecclesiastical law for the clergy, but are not legally binding on clergy or laymen except where they incorporate previous laws.

After the Restoration Convocation was summoned, in 1661, to revise the Prayer-book and re-model the Canons. In this matter it did little; but this assembly is remarkable as being the last Convocation which granted a clerical subsidy. During the Commonwealth the clergy had been taxed with the laity, and there seems to have been a general agreement that this method was more convenient. Accordingly, this clerical privilege was abolished by a private compact between Lord Chan-cellor Clarendon and Archbishop Sheldon. The important constitutional change was made without any parliamentary authority (1662). Convocation thenceforth ceased to grant taxes and to have any political importance. The clergy, being merged in the estate of the Commons, became electors for members of the Lower House.

In 1689 William III. was desirous of extending the limits of the Church and of introducing alterations which would allay the scruples of Dissenters. A commission was appointed to draw up a scneme which was to be submitted to Convocation. Convocation sat in two Houses: the bishops in the Upper House, the other officials and proctors in the Lower. The struggle of parties took place over the election of a prolocutor, or president, of the Lower House, and those opposed to any change were in a considerable majority. After this the Lower House showed such deeided difference of opinion from the Upper that nothing could be done, and Convocation was soon prorogued. It was not summoned again for ten years (1700), when the differences between the Upper and Lower House were still more openly shown. Finally, the Lower House refused to submit to the archbishop's prorogation, and adjourned by its own authority. The next Convocation, in 1702, resumed the question of the archbishop's right of prorogation, and the conflict between the two Houses continued. At length, in 1717, the writings of Hoadley, Bishop of Bangor, excited great wrath amongst the clergy, and gave rise to what is known as the "Bangorian controversy." As it was clear that the Lower House of Convocation would eensure Hoadley, who was a favourite with the government, Convocation was prorogued by royal writ, and was not again summened for business till 1852. It is true that it met formally till 1741, when the Lower House agreed to admit the president's right of prorogation, but it refused to receive a commu-nication from the Upper House. Being judged incorrigible, it was not again called together till its revival in 1852, a revival due to the increased interest in ecclesiastical affairs.

The Convocations of the two provinces now meet with the sessions of Parliament. They are summoned by a writ from the crown to the archbishops. In the Upper House of each Convocation sit the archbishop and bisheps; in the Lower House, the deans, archdeacons, with proctors elected to represent the cathedral chapters and the beneficed

Conway, Henry Seymour, Marshal (b. 1720, d. 1795), was the second son of the first Lord Conway. After serving in the army, in 1741 he was returned to Parliament for Highham Ferrers. In 1757 he was appointed second in command of the Rochefort expedition, under Sir John Mordaunt. In 1761 he commanded the British troops in Germany, in the absence of the Marquis of Granby. At the end of George II.'s reign, Conway had been appointed Groom of the Bedchamber, and he was continued in that office by the new king, until his independent conduct and his opposition to the ministry on the question of general warrants, cost him alike this post and all his military commands. On Rockingham's accession to power, Conway was appointed joint Secretary of State with the Duke of Grafton, and leader in the House of Commons; and, unfortunately for himself, was persuaded by "his evil genius," Horace Walpole, to hold his ground, until he could no longer retreat with credit in 1768. During the later years of that period, the policy of the cabinet towards the American colonies had been directly opposed to Conway's views. On the king's demand for Wilkes's exclusion from Parliament, he "confessed that he had not the courage to face the consequences of a step which would make every second Englishman a rebel at heart, and convert London into a hostile capital." He accordingly resigned the seals, but acted as an unpaid member of the cabinet until the return of Lord Chatham and the resignation of Lord Camden, when he refused any longer "to provide respectability for the whole administration." When the Marquis of Granby was dismissed from the command of the army, his place was offered to Conway, and declined. In 1772 he was appointed Governor of Jersey. Ten years later he became Commander-in-chief of all the Forces. In the same year he brought forward a motion, praying that his Majesty would terminate the war with the Colonists. This was lost by only one vote; and when he brought forward the same motion a few months later, he carried it against Lord North by a majority of nineteen. In the following year he retired into private life. Conway vas a brave soldier, and a man of unsullied integrity. Of his character as a statesman Lord Stanhope says :- " Brave though he was in the field, spirited and ready though he was in debate, he ever seemed in counsel irresoluto and wavering; so eager to please all parties that he could satisfy none, and quickly swayed to and fro by any whisperer or go-between who called himself his friend."

Cook, Captain James (b. 1728, d. 1779), the famous navigator, first gained notoriety in Canada, where he did good service at the siege of Quebec, 1759, and subsequently surveyed the coast of Newfoundland. In 1708, being sent to the Pacific for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus, he discovered New Zealand and New South Wales (April, 1770); and four years later made a second voyage of discovery, in which he again visited New Zealand. His conduct to the natives at first was such as to excite their hatred, but in his subsequent voyages he invariably followed a conciliatory policy. On Cook's third voyage, undertaken with the view of discovering a north-west passage to India, he visited the Sandwich Islands, and pushed his explorations to the western coast of America. He was murdered as he was returning from this voyage by the natives of Owhyhee, in the Sandwich Islands. Captain Cook's ability as a surveyor and explorer is the more noteworthy from the fact that he began life as a common sailor, and was entirely without education.

Coo

Cooke, Sin Anthony (b. 1504, d. 1576), a man of great learning, was selected as preceptor to Edward VI. when Prince of Wales. In 1553 ho was committed on suspicion of being concerned in the plot to put Lady Jane Grey on the throne.

Co-operation. The aim of co-operation may be said to be to enable workers to work "not in the interest of, nor in order to enrich, one individual, or a few, but in the interest of the general body of those who are con-cerned, both as workers and as consumers of the ordinary necessaries of life" (Acland and Jones). The societies that have as yet been formed with this view are of three kinds. (1) The Distributive Societies, or Retail Stores. Of these there were, in 1908, npwards of 1,400 in Great Britain, with 2,404,593 members, and £30,037,352 share capital. They sell goods for ready money only. The profits at the end of every quarter are divided amongst the members according to the amount of their purchases. (2) The Wholesale Societies-one in England (founded in 1864), and one in Scotland (founded in 1868). They supply the retail stores with goods; in 1908 their combined receipts amounted to over thirty-two millions. Their managing committees are elected by the stores. (3) Manufacturing or Productive Societies and Federal Corn Mills. The returns as to co-operative agriculture in 1908 were not very satisfactory. Co-operation does not make great headway in farming. These societics, with some exceptions, are combined in a Co-operative Union, founded in 1869. It is the object of this Union to abolish false dealing in any shape or form, and "to conciliate the conflicting interests of the capitalist, the worker, and the purchaser." The Union holds an Annual National Congress, at which matters that concern co-operation are discussed-such as the best method of voting in societies, the check system, education, store management, surplus capital, cooperative journalism, &c.

"Co-operation," it has been said, "considers profit to belong to the public, and not to any one section of it, whether they are employed in selling goods over the counter, keeping the accounts, buying the goods, or making them." The co-operative movement is thus an effort on the part of labour to emancipate itself from the bondage of capital. This effort is seen assuming organic shape in the early part of the 19th century, when several co-operative stores were started in England and Scotland. These, however, on a close inspection, can in no way be distinguished from Joint Stock Companies, for the profits were divided according to the capital invested. Of such societies there were by 1830 upwards of 200 in existence, besides co-operative mills. In 1844 the Rochdale Pioneers introduced its distinctive feature into the cooperative movement, and divided profits on the amount of purchases. The example set by this society, together with the beneficial legislation—such as the Repeal of the Corn Laws, the Public Libraries Act, and the abolition of the Newspaper Duty-ot the noxt dozen years, gave a new impetus to co-operation, and by 1862 we find 450 societies in existence, with a membership of 90,000, a capital of £450,000, annual sales, £2,350,000, and profits £166,000. Two years afterwards (1864), the Co-operative Wholesale Society had sprung into existence, and became the mainstay of the whole system. In 1869 the National Co-operative Congresses began. It was at the first of these congresses that the Co-operative Union was formed, and its aim of reconciling the interests of the capitalist, the workers, and the purchaser, "through an equitable division among them of the fund, commonly known as profit, was soon after formulated." The Supply Associations in London, such as the "Civil Service" and "Army and Navy," have attained great importance. These associations cannot be regarded as co-operative at all. Their profits, garded as co-operative at all. as in a private firm, go to capital, whereas the cosenial feature of co-operation is in diverting the profits to labour.

Coorg. A province of India on the Malabar coast, between Mysore and the sea, comprising an area of about 1,500 square miles, no portion of which is less than 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. At the close of the oighteenth century the Rajah of Coorg was practically an independent prince. He had been imprisoned by Tippoo on the annexation of his country, but had contrived to escape, and to wage a successful guerilla warfare in the hills of his own country, till he dr ve out the troops of his enemy. During this warfare many of his exploits, which are related at length by Colonel Wilks, exhibit not only great gallantry, but also good faith and chivalrous generosity to an extraordinary degree. The assistance which he rendered to Lord Cornwallis in the second Mysore War procured the recognition of the freedom of his country at the Peace of Seringapatam. He died in 1809, and was succeeded by his brother, who bequeathed the crown to his son, in 1820. This prince ruled so hadly, and with such ferocity and cruelty, while exhibiting great hostility to the English, that when, in 1832, his sister and her husband fled for their lives, and revealed his barbarities to the British Resident at Mysore, the latter, after in vain remonstrating with the Rajah, proclaimed him a public enemy. In 1834, after a gallant resistance, Coorg was subdued and annexed to the Madras presidency. Twenty years later it was discovered that Coorg was eminently suited for the cultivation of coffee, and it is now one of the most prosperous of the Indian provinces.

Coote, SIR EYRE (5. 1726, d. 1783), first saw service against the Jacobite insurgents in 1745. On the breaking out of the Seven Years' War, the hostilities were renewed in the Carnatic which had died out after the recall of Dupleix. General Count Lally was sent to India wita a powerful fleet and army. At first he was successful: captured Fort St. David, besieged Madras, and re-took Arcot in 1758. The arrival of Admiral Pocock and the English fleet prevented an assault on Madras, and the ne t year Colonel Coote took the command. He re-captured Wandewash, and compelled Lally to fight a battle in the neighbourhood of the town, in which the latter was completely routed. Coote, in 1760, gradually deprived Lally of all his conquests, and finally blockaded and captured Pondicherry, which was razed to the ground. In 1769 he was made commanderin-chief of the Company's army, and the following year returned to England. The disasters of the English in 1780, during Warren Hastings' Mahratta War, rendered it necessary to send out General (now Sir) Eyre Coote, to take the command in Bengal. The news of Hyder Ali's invasion of the Carnatic induced Hastings to send Coote to Madras. In January, 1781, he began his Madras. advance. Hyder had captured Arcot, and was besieging five other forts. Coote pushed on to Cuddalore and Porto Novo. Hyder resolved to risk an engagement, and took up a strong position, which he began to fortify. A long and arduous engagement ensued near Porto Novo (July 1, 1781), which lasted six hours, and at the end the British were completely victorious, with the loss of only 300 men, while Hyder, who had lost 10,000 men, was compelled to raise the siege of Trichinopoly. Seven weeks later Hyder was again completely routed at Pollilore, Aug. 27, 1781. Another victory on Sept. 27, allowed Coote to retire unmolested into winter quarters. In 1782 the arrival of the French fleet under Suffrein brought Hyder again into the field, and Coote in vain endeavoured to bring on a general action. The French were victorious everywhere, and Hyder ravaged the Carnatic to the very gates of Madras. In October Sir Eyre Coote's shattered constitution obliged him to return to Bengal, and surrender his command to General Stuart. In 1783, April 25, two days after his return to Madras, once more to undertake the conduct of the Mysore War, the veteran died.

Copenhagen, THE BATTLE OF (2nd April, 1801), resulted in the breaking up of the Northern coalition against England, which had been one of Napoleon's most cherished schemes. After safely passing Cronenberg Castle, Nelson persuaded Parker to commence the attack without delay. Two days were spent by Nelson in sounding the King's Channel, which lies between Copenhagen and a large shoal, and is only three-quarters of a mile broad. Along the land side of this channel the Danes had ranged nineteen ships and floating batteries. Everything being in readiness, Nelson made the signal for action early in the morning of the 2nd. The pilots entirely lost their presence of mind, and the Agamemnon, the second ship, went aground, us did the Bellona and the Russell. Nelson, in the Elephant, came next, and profiting by their example, took a new course, and so guided the rest of the fleet. The action began at ten o'clock. Riou, with the frigates, at once attacked the Crown Batteries, and maintained the unequal contest for three hours, until he was killed. The battle raged for three hours without any apparent advantage being gained, and Sir Hyde Parker made the signal for recall. Nelson, affecting not to see it, continued the action, and about two o'clock the greater part of the Danish fire ceased. It was impossible, however, to take possession of the ships that struck, because they were protected by the batteries on shore. Nelson, wishing to save further bloodshed, sent ashore a flag of truce, saying that he must be allowed to take possession of the prizes, if only for the sake of the wounded men on board of them; and during the next day, Good Friday, the work still went on. The following days were spent by Nelson in maturing the negotiations, and on the 9th he succeeded in concluding an armistice for fourteen weeks, his object being to gain time to attack the Russians. The opportune death of the Czar Paul rendered any active hostility with that country unnecessary, and the armistice resulted in a treaty between England and the Northern powers.

Copenhagen, Bombardment or (Sept. 2, 1807). The English ministry had learnt in the summer of 1807 of the existence of certain secret articles in the Treaty of Tilsit between the Czar and the Emperor Napoleon, by which the Danes and the other Baltic powers were to be induced or compelled to lend their fleet to the French for service against England. The danger appeared so imminent that the ministry determined to seize the Danish fleet, though England and Denmark were nominally at peace. Accordingly, in July, 1807, twenty-seven ships of the line, with 20,000 men on board, under the command of Lord Catheart and Admiral Gambier, sailed for the Baltic, passed the Sound, and anchored off the island of Zea-land. The English commanders demanded that the Danish fleet should be given up to them to be held as a deposit till the end of the war. This the Danes refused. On the 16th of August the British troops disembarked and invested the town, and under the command of Sir Arthur Wellesley fought a sharp engagement with the Danish militia at Kioje, whom they completely defeated. On Sept. 2nd the bombardment began, and was continued for three days, till eighteen hundred houses were destroyed, and the city was on fire in several places. On the 5th the Danes surrendered, and agreed to give up their fleet, which, accordingly, to the number of eighteen ships of the linc, besides smaller vessels, was conveyed to England. The triumph, great as it was, was received with doubtful feelings in England, as the imminence of the danger to England was hardly understood, and the affair looked like an arbitrary and dangerous violation of the rights of neutrals. After an animated debate in Parliament both Houses supported the ministers by a majority of more than two to one.

Copenhagen Fields, MEETINO IN (April 21, 1834). On the conviction of the Dorsetshire labourers for administering illegal oaths, the labour unionists summoned a meeting in Copenhagen Fields, London, on the 21st April, with the object of overawing the ministry. A plan was also formed for the violent seizure of Lord Mclbourno, the Prime Minister, and for other illegal acts. Due warning being, however, given to the government, preparations were made. Melbourne did not meet the deputation of the union; troops were held in readiness, the public offices defended with artillery, and 5,000 householders sworn in as special constables. Melbourne's under-secretary received the deputation, and informed them that it was illegal for a petition to be presented by 60,000 men. The crowd, seeing the preparations made to receive them, withdrew quietly, and no disturbance followed.

half of the twelfth century, when the degradation of the agricultural class seems to have been completed, and former distinctions were merged into a uniform condition of villenage, they who held land by villein tenure, whether they were villeins or freemen, had no means of asserting their rights to the land as against the lord. They held part of the demesnes of a manor for the lord's advantage, and at his will. They had no rights in the court of tho manor, and no remedy by assize, for these institutions were concerned solely with freeholders. In effect, however, the uncertainty of their tenure was remedied in Bracton's time by covenants with the lord, and his will was restrained by custom. Attending the court baron to make surrender, or crave admission, or pay their dues, tenants in villenage had their transactions entered in the rolls of the court, which became the cyidence of their title, and of the eustom of the manor. The court, while engaged in business of this kind, became separate from its original character, and as a new court, was called the customary court, to distinguish it from tho court baron, of which the freeholders were the suitors. A copy from the rolls of this court constituted the title of the tenant in villenage, who was hence called a copyholder. In the reign of Edward IV. the judges allowed the copyholder to maintain an action for trespass against his lord when wrongfully disturbed. From this time "copyholders stand on sure ground." This kind of tenure still exists. In it the freehold remains in the lord, and the tenant holds by copy of the court roll, at the will of the lord, according to the custom of the manor. Copyhold land must therefore always be part of a manor. It may be assumed that no land can have been brought for the first time under this tenure since 18 Edward I. Though the copyholder is independent of the will of the lord, yet the freehold being in the lord subjects the former to some disadvantages. For the lord has a right to the minerals beneath and the timber upon the soil, though he cannot, unless the custom of the manor allow, come on the land to exercise these rights without the copyholder's leave. There are species of tenure, such as customary freeholds, which resemble copyhold. All questions as to the freehold in any such tenures should be decided by ascertaining "whether the well-known rights of freeholders, such as to cut timber and dig mines, are vested in the lord or in the tenant." It is in the power of copyholders freely to alienate their lands. In the process of alienation the old character of the tenure becomes apparent, for it is effected by first of all surrendering the property to the lord, or, instead of him, to his steward, and is completed by the admission of the new tenant. An estate in copyhold may be in fee simple, tail, or for life. An estate in fee in copyhold is subject to the incidents of gra-featry, suit, escheat, in many cases to rent, and more rarely to relief. Other incidents may pertain to it, according to the custom of the manor. Copyholds could formerly be enfranchised or converted into freeholds by agreement. Now, by the Copyhold Acts (15 and 16 Viet., c. 51, s. 7, and 21 and 22 Viet., c. 94, s. 21), the tenant or the lord, by making application to the Copyhold Coniinissioners, can secure a compulsory enfranchisement of copyhold upon equitable terms. The origin of copyhold is an exceedingly obscure subject, and many conflicting theories upon it have been broached. The view here taken is that of many modern historians. Copyright Acts. The first of these was 8 Anne, c. 19, which gave an author the copyright of his works for fourteen years, with extension if the author or his representative was living for a further term of fourteen years. By the decision of the House of Lords in 1774 (in ease of Donaldson v. Beckett), this statuto was held to have done away with any common law right which the author might have in his work beyond the prescribed term of years. By the Act 54 Geo. III., c. 146, the author was granted copyright for the term of twentyoight years, and for the residue of his life should be live beyond that period. By the Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Viet., c. 45), the copyright of a book endures for the life of the author, and for seven years afterwards. If this term expires within forty-two years of the first publication, the copyright of the author or his assignees is to be extended to that term of years. Copies of all books are to be deposited in the library of the British Museum, and, if required, in the Bodleian Library, in the libraries of Cambridge University, Trinity College, Dublin, and of the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh. Dramatic. artistic, and musical copyright has been protected by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 15, 8 Geo. II., c. 13, 38 Geo. III., c. 71, and 5 and 6 Viet., Under the Musical Coperiont Act, 1906, the printing or selling of _ %-1 music is punishable.

Corbenil, William of, Archbishop of Canterbury (1123—1136), was a canon regular, and Prior of St. Osyth's, in Essex. On the death of Archbishop Ralph, a contest arose between the regulars and seculars about the appointment of his successor, which was settled by a compromise: William, who belonged, strictly speaking, to neither of these parties, being elected. The quarrel between the sees of Canterbury and York continued, and to establish his supremacy, William got himself appointed Papal legate, this being the first instance of an Archbishop of Canterbury holding this office. He was zealous in enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, and after Henry's death supported the claims of Stephen to the threne. All his contemporaries paint him in dark colours. The author of the Gesta Stephani describes him as "a man of smooth face and strictly religious manners, but much more ready to amass money than to spend it."

Cork was built in the sixth century, and was in ancient times the principality of the McCarthys. In 1172 it received a garrison from Henry II., who also, in 1185, granted a charter to the town. In 1492, the citizens were conspicuous as supporters of Perkin Warbeek (q.v.). Leter it was taken by Cromwell (1649), and Marlborough (1690). In 1810 one of the Queen's Colleges was established in the city.

Cork, RICHARD BOYLE, 1st EARL or (b. 1566, d. 1645), tho son of a Herefordshire gentleman, went to Dublin about 1588, and acquired large landed properties in Ireland. Having gained the favour of Queen Elizabeth, he was specially recommended to the notice of Sir George Carew, Lord-President of Munster, and was much employed by him. In 1612 he was made a Privy Councillor of Ireland; in 1616 raised to the pecrage as Lord Boyle; and in 1620 made Earl of Cork. In 1629 he was made one of the Lords-Justices, and two years later Lord Treasurer of Ireland, in which position he quarrelled violently with Strafford. At the beginning of the Rebellion he raised a large body of horse for the royal service.

Cornavii, or Cornum. The, were an ancient British tribe, inhabiting the modern counties of Warwiek, Worcester, Stafford, Salop, and Chester. They are reckened by Mr. Rhys to have been of the Brythonie, and not of the Goldelle, stock. [Celts.]

Cornbury, Edward, Viscount (afterwards Earl of Clarendon), was the son of Henry, Lord Clarendon, brother of the Earl of Rochester. On the landing of the Prince of Orango, he led three regiments from Salisoury over to William's side: but, finding he could not completely accomplish this act of tree-chery, stole to the prince's quarters with a few followers. His signature, together with that of several other leading men. was appended to a forged association in fa. our of James by William Young, the Jacobite informer, but nothing could be proved against him (1602). He was subsequently Governor of New York for six years, a post in which he displayed great incapacity. He is said upon one occasion to have dressed as a woman in order to represent the queen.

Cornelia, THE CAPTURE OF (Aug., 1811), was effected during the war of the French Revolution. Cornelis, in dava, was an entrenched camp between two rivers, one of which was not fordable, and the other was defended by extremely for itable redoubts and batteries. It was resolved to carry it by a coup de main and Colonel Gillespie was selected for that purpose. On Aug. 26, his column reached the redoubt at dawn, and, feeling that delay would be dangerous, he did not wait for his rear division, but attacked at once, and carried the redon't with the bayonet. Seizing the bridge he attacked and captured a second redoubt, and with his full force vigorously assaulted the nemy's reserve, which was posted with pererful artillery in front of the barriers and lesser fort. They broke and flee a lathe place fell into the hands of the Engli-i ..

Corn Laws is the name generally given to the various Acts of Parliment regulating the exportation and importation of grain, and especially wheat. They have been passed with two objects, which have prevailed to a different extent at different times: to secure a plentiful supply of cheap corn at home, and to keep up the price of corn produced in England. There have also been laws to regulate the traffic in corn by the corn dealers, and to prevent the practices called engrassing, forestalling, and regrating; and occasionally, as in the reign of Henry VI., exportation of corn has been absolutely prohibited. Importation was practically free till the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but very little corn was imported. An entirely new system was adopted on the accession of William III. In the supposed interests of agriculture and of the landowners, the exportation of corn was not only permitted, but encouraged by bounties. This legislation did not have the effect which was expected, and the price of corn continued to be very low. When, after the Peace of Paris, in 1763, the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom largely increased, and then the increase was coincident with a growth of population, the export of corn diminished, and the restrictions on imports were felt as a hardship. This led to Barke's Act of 1773, by which foreign wheat was allowed to be imported at a nominal duty of 6d, whenever the home price was at or above 48s. a quarter, and the bounty and the exportation were together to cease when the price was at or above 44s. Corp might be imported, at any price, duty free, in order to be again exported. This Act led to a large importation of corn, which did no injury to the agricultural interests, but only served to maintain the increasing manufacturing pounlation. At this time, also, large quantities of waste land were taken into cultivation, without any fall of agricultural prices. In 1791, under the pressure of the landed interest, the law of 1773 was remaied, and there was substituted for it ar, arrangement by which a limit of bass for im sortation, at 6d. a quarter, was substituted for 40%; between 54s, and 50s. there was a middle day of 2s. 6d. a quarter, and below 50s, a prohibitive duty. The bount was continued as before, and exportation was out bounty was allowed to 46s. In 1804 a new law, passed at the bidding of the farmers, imposed a prohibitory duty on all wheat imported, when the price was 63s., a middle duty of 2s. 6d, between 63s and 66s., and a sominal daty of 6d. abov 66s. In 1815 the limit of the price for importate at was fixed at 80s It was hoped at this regulartion would maintain the price of wheat about ' same standard; but still greate fluctum defollowed. The effect of this legislatic vas to raise the proc of corn very largely, and to force a will stent of land i to arable cultivation when was not suited ter it. Another Act was posed in 1822, intended to lessen the disastr is effects of the Art of 1815; but it never ame into operation. The attempt to regulate the price of corn by Act of Parliament was so disastrons that the Council was authorised to issue orders suspend the operation of the Acts, and to muit the importation of foreign corn under memmstan es of ne ssity. This fact, with others, gradually convinced agriculturists that the Corn Laws were based on a mistaken principle; and a 182 Canning carried resolutions in the House. Commons pointing to a more liberal policy. Mr. Charles Grant, In 1828, arried resolutions similar to those of Mr. Canning, a they eventually became law. The grievance of the Corn Laws was maways found to vary with the prospericy of the seasons, and the bad seasons which followed each other from 1837 to 1842 gave - to the zitation by which the Corn 1 aboli-hed altogether. The free traders attempted to get rid of this delay; but they were beaten by a large majority, and the bill passed. There was a fear lest it might be rejected in the House of Lords, but the Duke

Wellington secured its passing. In 1902, owing to a heavy deficit on account of the South African War, a Registration Duty of 3d. per cwt. on imported corn was imposed, and of 5d. on imported flour, but the duty was abolished in the allowing year.

Cornwallis, Charles, 1st Marquis (6. 1730, d. 1805), entered the army at an early age, and served under the Marquis of Granby ln 1761. He entered Parliament for Eye, and was appointed Governor of the Tower in He served in the American War of ejendence, and won much distinction at battle of Brandywine, and the siege of harleston. In 1786 he went to India as Governor-General, and Commandor-in-chief of the Bengal army. His administration lasted from 1786 to 1793, and is remarkable for the Mysore War; the arrangements with Oude, Arcot, and the Nizum: 'he negotiations with Scindiah and the M arattas; the Permanent Settlement; and series of important judicial and rever 1790 Tippoo's attack on T forms. In 1791 Lord Co termined to take the command his. marched straight to Bangalore, which he captured March 21. Tippoo had hastened back to defend his capital. The Nizam's force and the Mahrattas were wasting their time in sieges in the north. On May 13, 1791, was fought the battle of Arikera, in which Tippoo was beaten. In March, 1792, the Treaty of Seringapatam was signed, ending the dar and leaving Tippoo with reduced terrious and prestige. As an administrator, Lord Cornwallis devoted himself to the correction of abuses. He increased the salaries of the public servants in order to give them the possibility of acquiring a competence by economy, and made war on all frauds and peculation. On his return to England he was employed in 1794 as a diplomatist in Flanders, and carried on fruitless negotiations with the emperor at Brussels. In 1795 ho was appointed Master-General of the Ordnance. In 1798 he became Lord-Liou-tenant of Ireland during the violence of the Irish rebellion. In 1801 he returned to England, and was selected as the British plenipotentiary to negotiate the Peaco of Amiens. Cu July 30, 1805, he arrived in India as Governor-General, pledged to roverse the policy of Lord Wellesley. His avowed policy was to end the war; to break up the system of subsidiary alliances; and to bribe the minor princes of Hindostan to give up their alliance with us by resigning to them jaghires out of the lands south and west of Delhi. In spite of the remonstrances of Lord Lake he proceeded up the Ganges with the intention of carrying this plan out but his health tailed rapidly. He resigned the government to the senior member of the council, Sir Georgo Barlow, and died at Ghazeepore, Oct. 5, 1805.

Coromandel Coast. The popular name applied to the east coast of the Decean. It is supposed to be a corruption of Cholamandalay, in the region of the ancient Chola dynasty. The Coromandel coast extends from Cape Calimere to the mouth of the Kistnah, and is within the territory of the Madras presidency.

Coronation. This rite is of great antiquity. In England it seems to have been in general use, oven before the union of tho several kingdoms; and a coronation service of uncertain date, but as old at least as the eighth century, is still extant. The Anglo-Saxor Chronicle represents Offa's son, Egfirth, as having been "hallowed to king" in 785. In the same authority we find distinct records of the consecration of Edgar, Ethelred II., Edward the Confessor, and Harold II., to the kingly office with the same rite. And tho two essential parts of the ceremony, tho placing of the crown on the king's head, and the anointing, had then been fully established; but to neither had any exceptional sacredness been yet assigned; at most they were but symbols of the divine approval of the choice the people had made. The ritual used at Ethelred II.'s coronation has survived, and contains both these and the form of oath taken by the king. By this he promised three things-to hold God's Church and the realm in peace, to forbid rapine and injustice, and to judge justly and mercifully. Tho place varied; though generally Kingston-on-Thames, in Edgar's case it was Bath, and in Edward's Winchester. Since the coronation of Harold, however, it has been the abbey church at Westminster.

With differences of detail the ceremonial has not materially changed since the Conquest. The form of asking the clergy and people present for their voices, lasted till Henry VIII.'s time, but is now a mere presentation of the sovereign to the spectators. The chief variations have been in the oath. Till 1368

this pledged three things only—peace and reverence to God and Holy Church, justice to the people, and the removal of bad and upholding of good laws. But at Edward II.'s coronation it became more comprehensive and precise, and took the form of question and answer. Besides the three things above mentioned, the king promised to keep and defend "the laws and righteous customs which the community of the realm should have chosen." For centuries ne vital alteration was made in the body of the eath, though liberties were taken in Tador and Stuart days with its wording.

The existing form was settled at the Revolution of 1688. By it the sovereign undertakes (1) to govern "according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on," (2) to cause "justice in mercy to be executed," and (3) to maintain "the Protestant refermed religion established by law." It follows the declaration against transubstantiation deemed necessary to prove that the sovereign is not a Roman Catholic.

This ceremony has long lost its importance. Once it marked the beginning of the new reign. It afterwards came to be regarded as giving the king a sacred character, making him the Lord's anointed, against whose authority it was an impiety to raise one's hand. But it is now a mere pageant.

[J. R.] Coroner, an official first appointed by Richard I. in 1194, had originally very considerable powers. He was elected by the shire, and was to keep the pleas of the crown in the place of the sheriff. By 3 Ed. I., c. 10, the coroner is required to be of the status of a knight, and to hold inquests in cases of sudden death, and by 14 Ed. III., c. 8, ho is required to hold land in fee. By the 28 Ed. III., c. 6, his election was to be made by the freeholders assembled in the county court, in tho same manner as that of the sheriffs. The power of the coroner to hear cases of felony was abolished by Magna Charta, § 17, and the functions of holding inquests in cases of violent or sudden death expressly confirmed by the statute 4 Ed. I., c. 2, called, De Officio Coronatoris. Gradually the coroner lost all his other duties except that of taking inquisitions of death. The position and election of coroners have been regulated by several statutes in recent times. Boroughs with a population of over 10,000 have a coroner as well as counties.

Corporation Act, The (1661), was passed by the first Parliament of Charles II., with the intention of destroying the power of the Dissenters in the towns. By this statute it was enacted that all officers of corporations should take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, within twelve months of their electic to office; and on their election should take the oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and non-resistance, and abjure the Solemn League and Covenant. The Corporation Act was repealed in 1828, though long before that date it had become a dead letter.

Corporations, or bodies corporate, formed for the continual maintenance and enjoyment of certain privileges, or the holding of certain property in perpetuity, are of two kinds :- (a) Corporations sole, which consist of one person, such as the kiug or a bishop, who in the eye of the law never die; and (b) Corporations aggregate, which consist of a number of persons so bound together as to be by law considered as one individual, and which by the constant introduction of fresh members have a continuous existence. Both sole and aggregate corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay. The former division comprised such corporations as a bishop, or the chaplain of a cathedral, and the latter being again sub-divided into (a) civil corporations, such as the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham; the municipal corporations, and private corporations of the naturo of joint-stock companies; and (b) eleemosynary corporations, which are charged with the duty of administering the bounty of the founder, as in the case of the various colleges at the universities, and the hospitals.

Corrichie, The Battle of (1562), was fought near Aberdeen between the forces of Mary Queen of Scots, led by Murray, and some Highlanders, headed by the rebellious Earl of Huntly. Huntly was killed, and his son, Sir John Gordon, was captured and executed.

Corsned was a species of ordeal in which the accused had to swallow a large piece of bread or cheese. If this were performed freely and without hurt, the accused was pronounced innocent; but if it stuck in his throat, guilty. With the introduction of Christianity, the host was used for this purpose. Corunna, THE BATTLE OF (Jan. 16, 1809). between the English and French, was fought during the Peninsular War at the close of Sir John Moore's retreat from Madrid, pursued by Soult. After a march in which the severity of the elements and neglect of discipline were more disastrons to the troops than the pursuit of the French, Moore, on Jan. 11, took up a position round the town of Corunna, and, having occupied the road to Santiago de Compostella with his best troops, awaited the arrival of the English transports from Vigo. On the 14th the ships auchored in the bay, and before daybreak on the 16th the cavalry (the ground being impracticable for cavalry operations), the sick and wounded, and all but nine pieces of artillery, had been embarked. Soult had 20,000 infantry and cavalry, and a strong H167.-13 force of artillery, while Moore had only 14,500 infantry. The buttle was begun with a fierce attack by the French on the village of Elvina, which they carried, only, however, to be in turn driven out by General Baird's division. While the battle was still doubtful, Moore ordered up the reserve, under General Paget, to oppose a flank inovement directed against the English right. This was most successfully effected; and almost simultaneously the whole of the British line began to gain ground, until at nightfall they had everywhere driven the French from their positions. During the following night a retreat was effected to the shore, and the embarkation of the troops was carried out with but little loss. In the battle the English were said to have lost 800 men, including their brave general, Sir John Moore; the French, between 3,000 and 4,000.

Coshery was an ancient Irish custom, by which the chief had the right of using the houses and taking the provisions of his tenantry for himself and following at his own discretion. The Norman larons, not unnaturally, adopted so advantageous a custom. After the final confiscation of Irish land by Cromwell, the descendants of the ancient chiefs long led a precarious existence by such means, and numerous statutes failed to put a stop to it.

Cottenham, CHARLES CHRISTOPHER PEPYS, 1st EARL OF (b. 1781, d. 1851), the second son of Sir William Pepys, was called to the bar 1804. He was appointed solicitorgeneral to Queen Adelaide in 1830, and solicitor-general to the king in 1834. In 1831 he was returned to Parliament for Higham Ferrers. In 1834 he became Master of the Rolls, and in 1835 one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Whigs not being prepared with a Chancellor in whom they could confide. In 1836 he became Lord Chancellor, and continued in this office till 1841. In 1846, on the return of the Whigs to power, Lord Cottenham again became Chancellor; but his health was bad, and in 1850 he received an earldom, and the Great Seal was put in commission.

Cotter, James (b. 1690, d. 1719), the son of Sir James Cotter, a distinguished supporter of James II., was, in spite of the Irish Court of Chancery, brought up as a Catholic in England. In 1713 he headed an attack on the Protestant voters in Dublin. He was the idol of the Irish Jacobites; and his execution for rape in 1719 brought about a savage persecution of the Quakers, who had been instrumental in securing his punishment.

Cottington, FRANCIS, LORD (6. 1678, d. 1652), of a Somersetahire family, was for many years one of the English diplomatic agents at Madrid. He accompanied Prince Charles to Spain, took part in negotiating the marriage treaty, and lost the favour of his patron, Buckingham, by supporting it. In 1628 he was created a baronet and privy eouncillor. In the following year he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and sent as ambassador to Spain, and concluded a treaty which developed (Jan. 2, 1631) into an agreement for the partition of Holland. On his return he was raised to the peerage, and became, in 1635, Master of the Court of Wards. Clarendon describes him as Laud's chief opponent in the Council. To avoid impeachment by the Long Parliament for his share in the fiscal oppressions of the previous ten years, he resigned both his offices. During the Civil War he sided with the king, and, in consequence, took refuge in France. In 1652 he was appointed, together with Clarendon, ambassador to Madrid, and died, in 1653, at Valladolid. During his first stay in Spain he turned Roman Catholic, reverted to Protestantism on his return to England, and became a Catholic again in 1652. Clarendon praises his self-control and power of dissimulation. Mr. Gardiner calls him, "a man of the world without enthusiasm."

Cotton, BAUTHOLONEW DE, was a monk of Norwich, who wrote a Chroniele of England from the arrival of the Saxons to the year 1298, about which time he died. The latter portion of this history is of great value, as the writer was contemporary with the events which he records. This Chroniele, edited by Mr. Luard, has been published in the Rolls Series.

Cotton, SIR JOHN HINDE, was one of the small band of Jacobite politicians who formed part of the Opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's ministry in the reign of George II. In 1740, when the Jacobites were concecting one of their usual plots, we find him described as "doubtful of others, but answering clearly for himself;" and he arranged to remain in London as the channel of communication with James's friends. In 1742, after the fall of Walpole, his appointment to the Admiralty Board was pressed by the Duke of Argylo, but the king absolutely refused to raise him to that office. In 1744, however, in spite of the reluctance of George, ho was taken into the administration. In 1745, the French minister, Cardinal Tenein, a friend of the Stuarts, demanded that as a pledge of his sincerity he should resign office, but this he declined to do. Ho was, however, soon afterwards dismissed, and continued to lead a small body of Jacobites in the Lower House.

Cotton, Sir Robert (b. 1571, d. 1631), was a distinguished antiquary and collector of manuscripts. He assisted Cauden (q.v.) in his labours on the Britannia. On the accession of James I. he was knighted, and frequently consulted by the Privy Council on constitutional points. He was one of those who suggested to James I. the idea of creating baronets, and was himself raised to this rank in 1611. Sir kobert wrote numerous antiquarian tracts and pamphlets. But his chief title to remembrance is due to the magnificent manuscript library he collected, which passed to his heir intact, and was acquired by the nation in 1706. After being partly destroyed by fire in 1731, it was placed in the British Museum in 1757.

Cotton, Sin Willoudher, was comriander-in-chief in Jamaica during the slave rebellion of 1831—32. The insurrection was crushed owing to his promptness of action, whilst his leniency to the offendors was in marked contrast to the unwarrantable cruelty with which the negroes were usually treated. His clemency drew upon him the hatred of the planters.

Cotton Famine, THE, 1862. The outhreak of the American Civil War, which was followed by a total blockade of the Confederate coast, was productive of very disastrous results in England. The cotton supply, on the manufacture of which the greater part of the Lancashire operatives depended for a livelihood, failed, and in consequence the Lancashire mill-owners began to work short time, and finally to close the mills entirely. A certain amount of work was kept up and many large fortunes were made by running the blockade of the Confederate ports and bringing out cotton; but the general result was that two millions of people were to a great extent reduced to destitution. The Cotton District Relief Fund was started in July, 1862, and nearly two millions were subscribed within a twelvemonth. By the Relief Act passed in Aug., 1862, loans were granted to the guardians of the poor for the purpose of astituting relief works. The famine came to an end in the summer of 1865.

(1) The National Council. (") In Anglo-Saxon Times. The Witenagemot. The more primitive German tribes had no kings, and the supreme authority resided either in temporary magistrates or the national council of all freemen that met periodically to discuss all matters of great importance. When monarchy becalle universal, this council became the adviser and controller of the king. In the Campus Martius, or Madius, of the Frank monarchy, we see its continued survival until it gradually disappeared through feudal infinence. In England its history was different. In the original kingdoms of the migration, a democratic assembly of the freemen, such as still exists in the forest cantons of Switzerland (see Freeman, Eng. Const., chap. i.), certainly existed. But when the "heptarchie" states were consolidated to form larger kingdoms, no consolidation of the popular assembly followed. The "greater council" of Tacitus, the Campus Martius of the Franks, was only continued in the Shiremoot, the highest folkmoot of the English previous to the establishment of a representative House of Commons. But the idea of a national assembly lived on in the gathering of magnates, which was consolidated in proportion as the kingdom was consolidated. Similarly with Wessex, and when the West Saxon monarchs became kings of all the English, they gathered together the wise men of all the land into their Great Council or Witenagemot, For the details of the constitution, power, origin, and activity of the Witenagemot, the reader is referred to the article under that head. It is enough to observe here that it was composed of the chief ecclesiastical and temporal magnates of the kingdom, that the functions of the Witan were almost co-ordinate with those of the king, and supreme on the vacancy of the throne by death. They were the Parliament, Senate, Privy Council, Supreme Court of Justice, Civil Service, and Cabinet in one. Their powers were legislative, judicial, deliberative, taxative, and executive. Though in practice a council of officials, it remained in idea the council of the nation, virtually represented by their natural leaders. But of direct popular representation there is no trace.

(b) In Norman Times. The reat Council. The accession of William I. produced no sudden revolution in the constitution of the national council. The Great Council of the Norman reigns was in most respects a continuation of the Witenagemot. But feudal influence, the analogy of the council of Normandy, and the changed condition of the country, soon produced a gradual feudalisation of the whole institution—which, although not completed institution—which, although not completed before the reign of enry II., gradually more and more obscured the old official character of the assemblage. Yet the national idea lived on. The convocation in 1086 and 1116 of Great Councils of all the fundowners, of whomsoever they held land, is a striking ir lance of this. The gradual change of the was obscured by the fact that the new the same as believed as holders of great flefs immediately under the crown just as much as in their official capacity of magnates. But the practical change was greater than the theoretical. Nominally possessed of all the prerogatives of the Wish Men before the Conquest, their power became very formal in the presence of such monarchs as William and his sons, to whose practical despotism revolt in arms rather than opposition in council was the appropriate check. Moreover the increasing sanctity which environed the monarch deprived the national council of the last vestiges of that unique position which made the earlier Anglo-Saxon monarchs little more in theory than chairmen of a Board.

(e) In Ingevin Times. The Feudal Council of Henry II. Under Henry II. the change in the theory of the constitution of the national council became complete. Tho accepted usage of his reign was to summon the whole body of the tenants ... chief to the council. But the ordinary form of the council was, doubtless, much the same as in the carlier period. Except on special occasions none but the magnates, the bishops, earls, and royal officers, the "greater barons," were likely to attend. We learn from Magna Charta that the "greater barons" alone received special summonses addressed to them individually on each occasion that the council met. A general writ addressed to the sheriff of each county summoned the "lesser barons" to these assemblies, and their attendance was generally nominal. The Angevin council thus became a regularly organised feudal assembly. But the powers of the Great Council could not but have been unfavourably influenced by the change. In becoming feudal it ceased to be national. Even the small place left by the administrative system of Henry II. for external checks could not be satisfactorily filled up by a body out of relation with a people who rather reposed confidence in the crown, and which was representative mainly of the crushed baronial party which Henry had subdued. Still, its formal consent was invariably given to Henry's great legislative and executivo measures. We even hear of resistance to the royal will, of which in Anglo-Saxon times there is no record. But the most prejudicial influence on the immediate future of the council was the development of new and more efficient consultative bodies out of the administrative system which centred round the Curia Regis (q.v.). Thus under Henry II., the national council tended to become baronial merely, and was superseded in many of its functions by a royal council.

Yet the absence of a more adequate representation of the nation lent a good deal of national character even to this feudal council. Such an assembly gave us Magna Charta, and so well did the baronage fulfil their new part of national representation that throughout Henry III.'s reign an opposition at once popular and baronial found in it its appropriate mouthpiece. But the gradual growth of a directly ropresentative Parliament brought the old council into comparative disuse. Edward I.'s completion of the parliamentary system at once annihilated the political importance of feudalism and of the feudal Great Council. Superseded as a national assembly by Parliament, and as a consultative and execute e body by the royal council, the Great Council remained as a survival throughout the Middle Ages. Often it was hardly to be distinguished from a Parliament, as for example, the council which sanctioned so many of Edward I.'s laws. Often it was no more than an "afforced" assembly of the "Concilium ordinarium," strengthened for important business by the addition of spiritual and temporal magnates, and other "wise men," selected at discretion. Suc an assembly was not uncommon in the fourteenth and early part of the fifteenth centuries (e.g., in 1379) and Richard II.'s evil councillors were accused of inducing the king to summon councils composed of certain lords without the assent or presence of the "Lords of the Great Council." But these assemblies may largely be regarded as attempts to bridge over the distinction between the Royal Council and the Council of the nation, and give to the former body that prestige which historical continuity and full baronial support could in a large measure afford No such assembly was convoked in Tudor times, and Charles I.'s summons of a Great Council at York in 1640 was the last instance of its being called together.

(2) THE ROYAL COUNCIL. Besides the Great Council or the Common Council of the nation, there must have existed, as soon as organised government began, a smaller council of the royal ministers and confidants, by whose advice and co-operation the government was carried on. The small numbers generally attending the Witenagemot before the Conquest, and the lack of definite centralised authority, make this assembly very hard to discern in Anglo-Saxon times: but with the reigns of the sons of William I., the Curia Regis (q.v.) comes into importance; and from this general court there gradually developed by a process of differentiation not only the courts of judicature, but also the organised Royal Council of the Middle Ages. The exact relation of the Curia Regis to the national great council is not clear, but it is improbable that they were entirely separate organisations. Thus in a sense the Royal Council was a specialised form of the Great Council.

The active despotism of the Norman and Angevin kings, while reducing the national council to a form, greatly stimulated the growth of the Royal Council: for when the king had so much on his hunds he must have the help of clerks and ministers, who always tended to become his advisers. The existence of such a Royal Council is dimly foreshadowed by the act of Henry II. in 1178, when that monarch reserved the decision of knotty judicial or financial cases to a small circle of "sapientes," or councillors. But under Henry II. we have the merest reference to its action—none to its constitution or powers. The personal retinue of Richard II., the foreign councillors of John, may well have been organised in a similar body; but it is not until the minority of Henry III. that the real history of the Royal Council begins. The Regent, the legate, the great officers of state constituted that "supremum concilium," traces of whose activity are to be discerned in every department of government. In this body the hated foreign courtiers exercised their influence. Against it the Great Council of the realm fought with increasing success. Thrice oaths were imposed on this Council and baronia! nominees added to it; but it continued to maintain its existence through the crisis, and after acting as a practical Council of Regency during Edward I.'s absence in Palestinc, received from that king definition and organisation.

The special characteristic of the Royal Council was its permanence. It was always sitting, always occupied in the continuous business of the court. Its usual name was the "Concilium perpetuum," or "Concilium ordinarium," in opposition to the "Concilium commune," or "Concilium magnum" of the nation, already discussed. Besides its constant sessions for executive business, it held terminal sittings to help the king in receiving petitions and hearing suits. Its functions were so wide as to be practically incapable of definition. Nothing was too great, nothing was too small to escape its interference. It advised the king, executed his resolutions, shared in his judicial and appellate powers. The ordinary members of the Council were—the chief ministers, the judges, some of the bishops and barons, and a few other royal confidants summoned by royal writ, and bound by a solemn oath of office.

The power of the Royal Council was always growing; but it acquired a special prominence during the weak reign of Richard II.; and it is from the history of the fifteenth century that we can first get a really clear and definite idea of the functions of a body whose wholo previous history it is impossible to trace but obscurely. Under Richard II. and the Lancastrians the Royal Council, the engine and mouthpiece of the prerogative, gradually begins to subserve constitutional ends. The strong and organised parties of the time are represented upon it. Parliament asserts control over it, and the recognition by the Lancastrian monarchs of the right of Parliament to nominate its members is a remarkable anticipation of the cabinet government of modern times. In 1406 Parliament protest their great regard for the "Lords of the continuous Council," in language almost anticipating a vote of confidence in a modern ministry. In turns caressed by king and Parliament, the "Privy Council," as it now began to be called-though it is possible that the Privy Conneil was in its origin an inner and secret committee of the ordinary Council-acquired more and more gan-I the authority. Under Henry VI. it became a virtual Council of Regency, and its members practically held the royal authority in commission. This enhanced their authority, but broke their connection with Parliament. After 1437 the king resumed absolute power of nomination. Efforts to remedy this state of things led to no result: and under Edward IV. and the Tudors, it assumed the character of an "irresponsible committee of government," the agent of the prerogative, and the representative of the royal pleasure. It sent forth outshoots, such as its judicial committee, the Star Chamber; and many of the anomalous ouncils that in the sixteenth century withdrew half England from the cognisance of the common law were in close relation to it.

The temporising policy of a Hen. VIII.
and an Elizabeth, which allowed some divergence of opinion amongst its supporters, kept up at least the semblance of government by discussion. Its claborate organisation into committees under Edward VI. illustrates the width of its ramifications.

The Privy Council having attained the height of its power, it will be convenient to summarise its functions. The great variety and extent of its activity has already been noticed. Its claim in 1427 "to have the execution of all the powers of the crown during the king's minority needs only," says Dr. Stubbe, "to be slightly altered to make it applicable to their perpetual functions." The only limit to their perpetual functions. The only limit to their usurpations was the common law; and this, while but partly confining their judicial activity, left the whole field of general politics open to their aggressions. They had a very large share in all executive business. Their power of passing ordinances (q.v.) gave them a practical share in legislation; and the confidence, indifference or impotence of Parliament allowed them taxative functions of the greatest importance. They lent money to the king on their own security, or used their influence over rich lords or merchants to negotiate loans. Sometimes they got direct huthority from Parliament to levy taxes, sometimes, especially during the sixteenth century, they did so of their own authority. Wherever no positive law checked them they pushed their way. Even in judicial matters, despite the common law and the jurisdiction of the Chancery, they were still, as in 1178, the advisers of the crown on knotty points,

Rigorous under the Tudors, the powers of the Council became oppressive nnder the Stuarts; but besides the ever-increasing parliamentary check, the tendency of the Council to become unwieldy, by the inclusion of a very large number of nobles and officials, led to a habit of transacting great secrets of state in an unauthorised and informal cabal, or group of "cabin counsellors;" a system which was complained of early in the seven-teenth century, and accepted unwillingly towards its end. The Cabal of 1667, though in profession a committee of the Privy Council for foreign affairs, was practically an anticipation of the modern Cabinet. Sir William Temple's plan of reform in 1679 proved abortive, and the definite recognition of Cabinet [Carnet] government by William III., made the Privy Council again a constitutional check, that conservatives desired to maintain in power as a safeguard against the new-fangled and illegal ministerial as-sembly. The Act of Settlement of 1701 contains several clauses which tried to effect tho restoration of the Privy Council to its old constitutional position under the Plantagenets and Tudors; but they had little result. Tho Council remained as it does to this day a body of great dignity and importance, into which all statesmen of position were formally admitted, and whose members were distinguished by the appellation of Right Honourable. But the nature of its composition, and its unwieldy dimensions, preverted its being generally summoned as a whole for the transaction of general business. Councils in the presence of Royalty are still frequently held, but they consist of a very few councillors, and transact formal business. Privy Council Office exercises the functions of a department of the executive. The President and Vice-President of the Council are important ministers. Recent legislation has given special powers to these officers or the Judicial Committee of the Council. New business, such as the ever-increasing state regulation of education, is put into its hands, and the Vice-President is practically Educa-tion Minister. But as a whole and as a deliberative assembly, the Privy Council is practically obsolete.

(3) Local Councils. Besides the above, councils were appointed at various times in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to govern parts of the kingdom remote from the centre of authority, or imperfectly united to it. They were modelled generally on the Privy Council, both in constitution and functions, and often exercised a jurisdiction of certain oppressiveness and doubtful legality. Such were the Council of Wales and the Marches, established by Edward IV. in 1478, at Ludlow, to govern the southern and border districts of Wales, which until then had uncontrolled enjoyment of Palatine privileges. This court, though losing its chief reason for existence when Henry VIII incorporated Wales with England, and, limited in its jurisdiction in 1640, was not abolished until the 5th of William and Mary. Similar was the Council of the North, established at York after the revolt of 1669, famous through Strafford's tenure of the presidency, and abolished with similar councils in the first session of the Long Parliament. The Council of Calais was of older foundation, and continued until the loss off that town under Queen Mary. The Stannaries Court, which extended its special function of governing the estate of the Duchy of Cornwall, and superintending the mines there, to general business, and had become one of the most oppressive engines of prerogative, was at the same time deprived of its capacity for aggression. The Council of the Palatinates of Chester, Lancashire, &c., were mere continuations of the old feudal courts of these franchises, continued after their incorporation with the crown.

(4) COUNTY, DISTRICT, AND PARISH COUNCILS. Under the Local Government Act of 1888 most of the administrative work previously entrusted to justices of the peace in England and Wales was devolved upon elective County Councils. The magistrates, however, share with these authorities the control of the police. A supplementary Act was passed in 1894 creating Parish and District Councils.

Appointed by the "Rump," the Council of State was dissolved " Rump, by Cromwell after his coup d'état against the Parliament. A new Council of State was established in 1659, as the successor to the temporary "Committee of Safety" in the exercise of the executive power; but on tho second expulsion of the Rump by Lambert it gave way to the more famous "Committee of Safety," which acted as the mouthpiece of the army. The army scheme for the permanent government included a Council of State that never sat. Revived again when Monk restored the Rump, it naturally found no place when the Restoration brought back the old Constitution.

Councils, Ecclesiastical, are of the following kinds :-

(1) GENERAL, or ECUMENICAL COUNCILS,—
i.e., assemblies of the Catholic Church from every nation. To these, bishops from Britain were sent from the time of the Council of Arles in the fourth century to the Councils of Constance and Basel in the fifteenth. Their decrees were accepted in England as a part of the law of the Church, though in later times, as the case of the Council of Basel shows, hardly without some ratification from the royal authority. The greatest interest was at various times shown by the English Church in these councils, and their acts often profoundly affected the course of English history. But their influence is too indirect to necessitate any dotailed treatment of it in a work on English history.

(2) NATIONAL COUNCILS. Of the details of the history of the pre-English British Church we know little; but when Archbishop Theodore completed the systematic organisation of the English Church that the failure of Augustine's mission necessitated, one of his chief cares was to arrange for the assembling every August of a council of the whole Church over which he was metropolitan. The councils of Hertford and Hatfield, in which most of his reforms were arranged, were themselves precedents for the future action of the Church. These councils can only by anti-cipation be called national, for as yet the English nation was not in existence, but they exerted a most beneficial influence on the development of national unity by habituating subjects of hostile but neighbouring states to meet under the peace of the Church to discuss amicably matters of common interest. Their common place of meeting was sense border town such as Clovesho, an unknown spot near London, where Mercia, Wessex, Kent, and Essex met together at a point. They were constituted mostly of bishops, though abbots ofter nd diocesan clergy once, figure among the inbers; and, as the line between Church and State was as yet but slackly drawn, kings, ealdormen, and other temporal magnates frequently attended them. But the assertion of the independence of the archbishopric of York by Archbishop Egberht, created a jealousy between that see and Canterbury that made these national councils, which had never met with the regularity prescribed by Theodoro, very few in number. They practically ceased with the decline of all conciliar activity in the tenth century; and though revived after the Conquest, when a papal legate could summon a national council with an authority which neither archbishop could gainsay, the vindication of the archiepiscopal powers of the see of York by Thurstan revived the old jealousy that made the union of both provinces in a common assembly ridiculous or abortive. The legatine councils of Otto in 1237, and Ottobon in 1268, are the chief later exceptions to this rule.

(3) PROVINCIAL COUNCILS.—The rarity and practical cessation of national councils left room for the full development of the synods of the two provinces of Canterbury and York; even if the comparative unimportance of the northern province did not often invest the councils of the southern with a practically national character. The thirteenth century saw the completion of the systematic representation of the provincial synods, to which the name Convocation (q.v.) became gradually applied. They play an important part in both the ecclesiastical and civil history of England.

(4) Diocesan Councils, which were exhaustive assemblies of the clergy of the individual sees, were occasionally summoned, and even—

(5) Archidiaconal Councils are occasionally heard of. But these later varieties were of inferior importance, and never originated business of any weight.

Counties, The English. The word county is due to the Norman invaders' identification of the old English "shire" with their own "comitatus," the district of a count. But the shire had had a very different history from the Frankish comitatus. In the first place, the forty counties of England differ considerably in their origins. The southern counties are, no doubt, nuch the older, and are still identical with the original shires of Wessex. Wiltshire may, for instance, be imagined to have originated with some few hundred Saxon families who towards the end of the fifth century drove back the Britons from this cintury drove back the Britons from this district, attained to an independent individuality as the "folk" of the Wilszetas, and soon coalesced with neighbouring "folks" in Dorset, Hampshire, Berkshire, &c., to form the "shares" or divisions of the kingdom of the West Saxons. It is possible that these shires had often such a twofold unity, as was long traceable in the two divisions of Kent, or the two "folks" of the East Angles. At any rate, the West-Suxon shire is characterised by a primitive independence, having its own "folk-moot," its independent bing on somi moved rules the its independent king or semi-royal ruler, the caldorman and its chief town, whose name is cognate to the shire name (Wil-seetas, Wilton). This had been the history also of Sussex, Surrey, Essex, Middlesex, and even Jutish Kent, when these with others were Jutish Kent, when these, with others, were amalgamated into the kingdom of Wessex. But the Midland shires, on the contrary, are obviously artificial areas, and do not corre-pond to the original "folks" of the Mercians, South Angles, Mid-Angles, &c. They were probably marked ont when re-conquered from the Danes by Alfred and his successors in the tenth century: a town was taken as a centre, and a line, as it were, drawn round it. Such was the formation of Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, Northamptonshire. sometimes those older divisions are preserved in the bishoprics; the diocese of Worcester, for example, corresponded to the old kingdom of the Hwiccas, and was far more extensive than the modern Worcestershire; so with the ancient kingdoms of Essex, East and West Kent, and Sussex.) The shire system then, which was indigenous to Wessex, spread thence later on. Thus, again, in the north only Yorkshire and Durham appear as shires in Domesday Book: Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland were not formed into shires till the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. But the origin of one shire, Rutland, still remains "an unsolved problem in the heart of our history" (Freeman). Furthermore, not till long after the Norman Conquest was it certain that there would not be other shires formed, for the district of Richmond was often selled and the district of Richmond was often selled and the same of the shires formed.

Richmond was often called a shire were Hallamshire and Norhamsh The number of shires which sent rep tives to Parliament was during the Mi. Ages thirty-seven; for Cheshire and Durham were not incorporated till 1535 and 1673 respectively, and Monmouth added to the English shires also in 1535. The boundaries of shires—as, for example, in Essex and Norfolk—are usually the natural lines of rivers and hills; and in many cases would be explained if we could only trace the ancient forests and marshes, as on the western border of Notts; in other cases again—as in the sinuous northern boundary of Wilts, which seems to cross and recross the Thames with a sort of methodical irregularity—there must have been accidents of local formation, tribal relations, or personal circumstances, which we can hardly now hope to traco. The anomalous fragments belonging to one shire, but outlying in another, had often a great historical interest; such as the hundred of West Meon, in Sussex, but belonging to Hants, a striking survival from the settlement of Jutish Meonwaras soon absorbed by the West Saxons of Hants. These have in many cases been consolidated and rectified. When we come to compare the social characteristies of the several counties, we find that in wealth and population the southern and eastern part of England preponderated during the Anglo-Sexon times, as in political superiority. With the rice of the woollen manufacture after the thirteenth century, the balance of population spread towards the eastern counties, and along the banks of Thames and Severn. At last, the application of steam-power to manufacture opened out the coal and iron manuscrime opened out the coal and from fields of the north and west, and reversed the long predominance of the plains over the hill districts. As to the relative prevalence of feudal sentiments, it is to be noticed that the home counties after the Norman Conquest continued to be divided among smaller land-lords than the great lordships of the midlands and the north; it is therefore the barons of the north and centre who are conspicuous in the series of revolts under the Norman kings, in the struggles of Henry II.'s and Henry III.'s reigns, in Magna Charts, and in the op-position led by the house of Lancaster against the Plantagenets; and during the Wars of the Roses one striking element in the array of the trading and popular forces against the fendal, the array (that is) of Kent, London, the eastern and "home counties," against the less advanced northern and western border The same division is to be found lands. during the next century in comparing the Protestant risings (such as Wyatt's) with the reactionary Pilgrimage of Grace supported by the gentry of Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and the north. To take another instance: the Socmen, whom Domesday shows so numerous in the eastern counties, and whose presence points to the revived spirit of freedom that the Danes brought in, bequeathed their bold traditions to the revolted peasantry of 1381, and to the Puritan yeomen of the Eastern Association two centuries later. But this tenacious individuality of the shire comes out in still minuter distinctions. Kent, Cheshire, Durham, in particular, had each its own legal customs or social traditions: each, in fact, its own inner history. Charles II. in his flight was once detected by his horse's shoes having been made in feur different counties. It is only the developed means of communication of our own day, and the operation of broad economic laws, that have begun to obliterate such distinctiveness. [For authorities, see County Count.]

Counties, THE lRISH. The history of the shiring of Ireland is involved in more obscurity than the history of the shiring of England, though not for the same reason in the two cases. In England the division into counties was the result of a slow process of growth, the history of which is hidden in tho remote past. We can trace only some of its stages. But the shiring of Ireland was purely the result of the English conquest. persons who undertook it were strangers, were aliens in the country, ignorant of its language and most of its local traditions. The Irish shires are therefore distinct, formal, and legal divisions, not local and popular ones. This being the case, it might have been supposed that it would have been an easy matter to trace the stages by which these divisions came into existence. And perhaps this would not have been difficult if there had remained to us more of the State papers relating to Irish affairs. But it is well known that an immense number were destroyed during the different periods of Irish rebellion. Especially was this the case with the papers which relate to the early period of Anglo-Norman rule. There were in reality two conquests of Ireland, one in the reign of Henry U. and his immediate successors, another in that of Henry VIII. and his successors. For during a long intermediate period (almost from the death of Henry III.) the country lapsed into an independence almost as complete as if it had never known English rule. Now, though we cannot distinctly trace all the steps of the shiring of Ireland, we must unquestionably refer it to these two periods of English supremacy, and what was not done during the first we may feel sure was not accomplished in the interval between it and the second. Up to the end of the reign of Henry III. English law was administered regularly to the English subjects throughout the greater part of Ireland. Justices in eyre travelled for gaol delivery in the same way that they did in England. The eountry, therefore, must have been divided into districts, which in every way corresponded to the English shires. Of course this division of Ireland was a gradual process, beginning with the districts first conquered, and gradually extending. Nor, so far as concerns the present county divisions, does the process seem to have extended beyond Leinster and Munster. The other two previnces were treated as each one eounty. Thus very early we read of sheriffs of some of the counties of the Palo-a sheriff of Dublin, for example, is mentioned in a document of the year 1201, or not more than thirty years after the first landing of the Earl of Pembreke. This, however, does not preve the existence of the division now known as tho county of Dublin, for the city of Dublin was constituted a county before the county was formed. But it preves the existence of so much of county government in this year, as is implied by the existence of a sheriff. As a matter of fact, the "county of Dublin"— evidently here distinct from the city—is mentioned only six years after, in 1207. The county of Kildare is first mentioned in 1249; Wexford (Wesford) in 1251; Kilkenny in 1252, but more clearly in 1279; of Louth (also called Uriel), the sheriff is spoken of in 1290; but it is not distinctly called a county before the year 1301. Wicklow, though it is nowhere called a county in the early docu-ments, cannot have been behind the other places of the Pale. Meath is the only exception to the general rule of a very early shiring of the counties round Dublin. It seems only to have been settled during the thirteenth century, and it is generally referred to in the papers of that age as De Lacy's country. In 1297 we read of the lands held in Meath, "without the boundary of any county," which implies that at this date only a part of it had been shred. Three counties of Leinster, by their English names, imply a late formation—Longford, King's County, and Queen's County. The last two did, of course, receive their names in the reign of Mary and Philip, as the names of their capitals—Philipstown and Maryborough sufficiently indicate. But before this time they were known as Offaly calso called "O'Counor's country") and Leix ("O'Moore's country"), and there is no evidence that their boundaries were in any way changed with their names. Longford seems to have been a later division, as we might expect from the smallness of its size. We find incidental mention of it in a document of the year 1207; but there is no evidence to show that the county came into existence before the sixteenth century. Munster was divided into rval counties almost as early as was Leinster, for all its counties except one are distinctly mentioned as such in documents of the thirteenth century, viz., Cork first called a county in 1207, Limerick in 1245, Waterford in 1251, Tipperary in 1275, and Derry in 1281. Of Clare we do not happen to have any early record; but we need not suppose that it was much behind the others. It is the one county of Munster which has an English-derived name, as it was called after the De Clares, Earls of Gloucester, &c., who settled in the country, and was for a long time known as "De Clare's country." After the return of Ireland to practical independence, and the relapse of the Northern families to the condition of native chieftains, the country may be said to have been practically unshired over its greatest part. Gaol deliveries were restricted to the four counties constituting what was now known as the Pale, viz., Dublin, Kildare, Louth, and Meath. It seems that at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII. there were only parts of five counties which remained faithful to the English crown-Uriel (Louth), half of Dublin, half of Meath, half of Kildarc, and half of Woxford. Of course the counties which had been already constituted continued to hear their old names, but the jurisdiction which made them really shires had ceased. In the document from which these particulars have been taken, Ulster (Wolster) and Connaught are called counties. It is, however, the case that as early as 1260 we hear of the county of Down, and in 1283 of the sheriff of Antrim, and in 1290 of the sheriff of Roscommon. In 1296 Sligo is known in the State papers of Elizabeth as "O'Connor Sligo's country." This is in 1565. Five years later we find an Order in Council concerning the shiring of Ireland, but no details are given as to what new counties were constituted. The completion of the work did not take place till 1607, after the famous rebellion and flight of Tyrone and Tyronnel, which led to the Plantation of Ulster. In a State paper of this year, we find a proposal, which was shortly carried into effect, for dividing the whole of Ulster into shires. In this paper there are three old counties mentioned—Louth, Down, and Antrim-and it is proposed to create six new, viz., Armagh, Tyronc, Coleraine (Londonderry), Monaghan, Formanagh, and Donegal. The addition of London to the older name of Derry is the most evident remaining trace of the Plantation of Ulster, recalling as it does the settlement of that part by a colony from London. That settlement was begun in the year 1607. In the list of James I.'s Parliament of 1611 the names of the counties of Ireland stand almost as at present, save that Carlow is still called by its earlier name of Cathelagh, and that Cavan is absent from

Counties Palatine. [PAIATINE.]

Counties, The Scottish. The history of the erection of the counties of Scotland as they The history of now exist is involved in much obscurity. The boundaries in some cases were not definitively fixed till the beginning of the present century. It was part of the anglicising policy of the sons of Malcolm and Margaret to divido their kingdom into sheriffdoms, after the English model; therefore, in Scotland, the sheriff was not the Gerefa of the already existing shire, but an officer appointed by the crown, for whom a district had to be appropriated. The boundaries of these districts were for long vague and undetermined. They must be divided into two distinct classes—those of the Highlands and those of the Lowlands.

(1) Lowland Counties. At the time when (1) Lowland Counties. At the time when sheriffs were introduced, Scotland south of the Firths consisted of three distinct provinces—Lothian, Galloway, and Strathelyde. Lothian formed part of the English kingdom of Northumbria, and was held in fiel by the Scotlish kings. It is represented by the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, Peebles, and the Lothians—i.e., Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow. Each of these counties takes and Linlithgow. Each of these counties takes its name from the chief town within its bounds. From incidental mention in charters and other documents, we gather that each of them had a sheriff in the time of David I. or his successors, but there is no certain evidence of their first institution. The extent of these counties would seem to have been determined by existing local divisions. Thus Peebles is known as Tweeddale before its erection into a county. Ettrick Forest becomes Selkirk, and Teviotdale and Liddesdale form Roxburgh.

Strathelyde has been divided into the present counties of Ayr, Lanark, Renfrew, and Dumbarton. Ayr was formed of the districts of Kyle, Cunningham, and Carrick, which was separated from Galloway by William the Lion. The first sheriff of Ayr was appointed in 1221, but the three districts were ruled severally by baillies, who in many points acted as sheriffs. Lanark, which was made a sheriffdom in the time of David I., was divided into two parts, the over ward and the nother ward of Clydesdale; Lanark being the seat of justice of the one, and Rutherglen of the other. Renfrew was erected by Robert III. into a barony, with rights of regality, for his son James. It first appears as an independent sherifidom in 1414. Dumbarton, formerly the Lennox, or Vale of Leven, first appears as a sherifidem in the reign of William the Lion.

According to the Hiternian Gasetteer it was shired in 1910. It was again shired in the reign of James I. (Gibson, Hist, of Cort).

Galloway was divided into the sheriffdoms of Dumfries and Wigton. The sheriffdom of Dumfries nominally included the districts of Nithsdale and Annandale, and that half of Gallowny which forms the modern county of Kirkeudbright. A sheriff is mentioned in the time of William the Lion, and it is distinctly recognised as a shire at the time of the death of Alexander III. But as Annandale on the one hand, and Klrkeudbright on the other, were both stewardries, the jurisdiction of the sheriff must have been virtually limited to Nithsdale. Wigton, the remaining part of Galloway, was certainly a sheriffdom by the end of the thirteenth century, but powers of regality were joined to the earldom by David II. In every county there were regalities and baronial jurisdictions, and hereditary constables of royal fortresses, and baillies of the lands belonging to religious houses, whose powers clashed with those of the sheriff. The office almost invariably became hereditary in the family of the most powerful man of the district, and tended more to swell his consequence than to maintain law and order, till the Act of 1747 abolished hereditary jurisdictions.

(2) Highland Counties. In the Celtic kingdom north of the Firths, where the clan system prevailed, the country was divided into vaguely defined districts, whose several Mormaors or earls, while professing a nominal allegiance to the King of Scots, each claimed to represent the royal authority within his own territory. The introduction of sheriffs was therefore very gradual, and was not completed till the sixteenth century. In many cases the powers of the sheriff were conferred upon the local chief, who had thus the right of "pit and gallews," or power of life and death, within his own territory. These powers were only done away with by the abolition of hereditable jurisdictions in 1747. The boundaries of the Highland shires were not definitely fixed till the beginning of the present century. Previously, their limits were marked more by custom and tradition than by law, and Arrowsmith's map, published in 1805, is the first in which the counties are defined accurately.

Counties, The Welsh, are mainly administrative divisions of the Mercian rather than the West Saxon type. They are consequently of late origin, and in most cases receive their name from the shire town. In a country so well subdivided off by natural boundaries as Wales, their limits have, however, in certain cases, coincided so far with these, that they represent real dialectic and physical distinctions. Moreover, some counties correspond, if roughly, with ancient tribal or local divisions, and still more to the ancient ecclesiastical divisions of the land. But despite these exceptions, the Welsh shires are in the main artificial "departments" rather than natural "previnces;" they ure "shires" rather than "gauen."

"ahires" rather than "gauen."

The Welsh counties fall into three classes according to the period of their creation—viz., (1) ancient palatine counties, (2) the counties formed by Edward I., (3) the counties formed by Henry VIII., who also finally fixed the limits of the other two classes.

(1) Ancient Palatine Counties-i.e., Pombrokeshire and Glamorganshire. These represent the two greatest "Marches" which the conquering activity of the Norman barons of the twelfth century established allover Western and Southern Wales. In the west, the districts thus conquered were largely included in the indefinite limits of the English border counties, Cheshire, Shropshire, and Herefordshire, whose earls under William I. acquired regalian privileges. Up to the thirteenth century, and even the sixteenth, large districts new in "Wales" were included locally within those counties, although their inclusion was but nominal, so long as the lesser lords retained palatino powers, even after the erown had annexed the earldoms themselves. Another class of lordships marchers were never included within these counties, but although independent, were not of sufficient importance to be regarded as equivalent to counties. The lordships of Denbigh, the "honour" of Montgomery, the lordships of Brecon and Gower, were among others of this description. But Morganwg, the conquest of Fitz-Hamon, and the inheritance of Robert of Gloucester, and the great house of Clare, though never formally constituted an earldom or county palatine, was so virtually. Its lords were always earls, either of Gloucester or, as later, of Pembroke. They had fullest regalian rights and privileges, as much as the Palatine Lords of Cheshire and Durham had, and they were the greatest family of the realm. So early as 1146 we read of the "comitatus" (shire-moot) of Cardiff, and in 1148 Earl William speaks of his "vice comes" (sheriff). Pembroke was more definitely created an earldom in 1138, and became organised on the model of an English county. The boundaries of both were narrower than those of the modern shires: Gower, for example, was a separate lordship, although much of Gwent was within the lordship of Morganwg. Similarly Dewisland and Kemes were outside the Pembroke Palatinate. The modern boundaries were assigned by Henry VIII, adding to the old nuclei the adjoining marcherships.

(2) Edward I.'s Counties—viz., Anglescy, Caernarvonshire, Merionethshire, Cardiganshire, Caermarthenshire. After the conquest of Llewelyn, Edward I. divided the district which acknowledged his sway, and to which the title of the "Principality" is rightly confined, into districts called shires, but which rather bear to the regular shire the relation of a United States Territory to a State, than fully represent the self-governing district forming an integral factor of the body politio of England. lu the districts more immediately subject to Llewelyn, the shires of Anglesey, Caernarvon, and Merioneth were erected. They so far regarded old lines that they consisted of an aggregation of cantreds and commots. A sheriff in each shire, with coroners and bailiffs in each commot, were appointed. A county court was to be held once a month, and the sheriff's tourn twice a year, at which all the inhabitants were to be present. Sheriffs, &c., were aiso appointed for more setthern regions, where the power of the Welah princes at least nominally extended, one to hold his court at Cardigan and Lampeter, another at Caermarthen, though the powers of the marchers must have limited the area of their jurisdiction to narrower bounds than modern Cardiganshire and Caermarthonshire. A sixth new county was formed in Flint, which consisted of the western and more exposed portion of the Chester Palatinate, but which remained in a sort of half dependence on Cheshire. The rest of Wales remained in the hands of the

(3) Henry VIII.'s Counties-viz., Denbighshire, Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire, Breconshire, and Monmouthshire. Henry VIII.'s incorporation of Wales with England involved the division of the whole country into shireground. Hence, by the 27 Hen. VIII., tho iocal self-government, of which the shire was still the base, was introduced into the whole land. The lordships marchers lost their palatine rights, and were either (e.g., Gower, as above) incorporated into existing counties, or aggregated into new ones. Besides the new shires of Western Wales, the boundaries of Cheshire, and still more of Shropshire and Herefordshire, were readjusted; and the old Welsh counties of Edward I., and the still older palatinates, were assimilated to English shires; and the power of returning to Parliament one member for each county, and one for the amalgamated boroughs (except in mountainous Merioneth) was conferred. Moumouthshire had two members given it, and was treated as a part of England, so far as the words England and Wales had now an antagonistic meaning. Its enclosure under Charles II. in an English circuit completed its severance from Wales.

The chief Statutes creating Welsh counties are 12 Ed. I., Statutum Wellie or the Statute of Rhuddlen, and 27 Hen. VIII., c. 24, 26. Sou also 68 Hen. VIII., c. 4, and 37 Hen. VIII., c. 5, 7, 24, 28. A summary will be found in Reser's History of English Law, ii. 25—26, and iv. 195—205. For Pembroheshire and Glamorganshire the Description of Pembroheshire written in 1603 (MS. Hari., No. 6250), c. 24, fol. 240, eq., is valuable. For the Marches, see Pennant's Tour in Wales, Appendix ii. For Glamorganshire, Mr. Clark's papers on The Lend of Morean, in the Archaelogieni Journal, are useful. The Welsh county histories are not, as a rule, good Jones's Breconshire is perhaps the best.

County Court. The "county court," or "shire-moot," was for five or six centuries the most vital of our national institutions. As its being often held in the open air perhaps indicates, it was anciently a "folk-moot that is, included all landowners in the shire; and in the submission of laws to the shiremoot for formal acceptance, a piece of cere-monial which is only recently obsolete, wo may discern the aucient independence of the several "folks." While in this aspect the shire-moot has the caldorman and bishop at its head, "to declare the law, secular and spiritual," its newer aspect of dependence on a central power is embodied in the shirereeve, who convenes it, and connects it with the king. This gradually tends to supplant the caldorman and bishop in it, and after the Norman Conquest it passes wholly into his hands. Its business was to hear appeals from the hundred courts, to execute the instructions of royal writs, and to attest wills and transfers of lauds. Meantime however, a tendency to what may be called delegation, which had already affected the hundred and township courts, had now also much modified the old assembly. And thus in historic times an ordinary shire-moot is not the full folk-moot, but contains also the reeve and four "best-men" from each township, and perhaps the twelve thegas from each hundred or borough; and it appears that this quasi-representative court is called monthly, instead of twice a year, like the old folk-moot. It is possible this more frequent summoning was due to Rufus's minister, Flambard, who "drove all the moots;" and Henry I. in his charter promised to amend it. At the same time, the older and fuller form of the court was still called twice a year, chiefly for the purposes of the crown, such as taking the oath of the peace, and meeting the justices itinerant. Indeed, the shire-most after the Conquest gained in connection with the central power what it lost in independent action. Thus, its civil justice-by the vee of writs calling up cases, and by the attraction of the Common Pleas Court—was drifting up to Westminster; its criminal pleas belonged to the king, and were executed by his itinerant justices. But both for presentment of criminals and for decision of civil cases (at least, as to land) the crown always used "recognitors," that is, called in the shire to co-operate; and its co-operation was demanded in other ways, as for view of armour and election of coroners, for the negotiation, assessment, and collection of carucage, for exacting oaths of allegiance. and above all, after 1254, for the election of knights and burgesses to Parliament. this fuller shire-moot the attendance of all, from archbishops to villeins, was required. The barons in vain begged for exemption; in 1258, at Oxford, among the other grievances set forth, the barons complained that the attendance required of them was increasing; till, by the Statute of Merton, they won their point-that their attendance might be by attorney; while the Statute of Marlborough, 1267, exempted all above the degree of knights, unless specially summoned. Already individual exemptions had been so largely granted that by 1258 there was a scarcity of knights for the "inquests" of the court; and in 1293 a qualification of 40s. freehold was required for service as a juror. So that on all sides the old folk-most had been attacked, and by the thirteenth contury was attenuated to an occasional formality; but not before it had given birth to the fruitfal idea of local representation, according to which a small body of knights could act for the whole shire, and stand between the crown and the county in the business of government. Thus, in 1194 four knights act for the whole shire to elect the grand jury of each hundred; under Henry III. four knights of each shire come to Westminster to discuss the interpretation of articles in Magna Charta; and, chief of all, knights (two, three, or four in number) from time to time assess, or assess and collect, the carucages. As soon as these knights cease to be nominated by the crown or sheriff-and the precedent for their election by the whole county court is finally givon in 1254-tho stages are complete by which the shire-moots could be dispensed with, and yet transmit all their authority to a Parliament. As "Parliament is the concentration of the shire-moots," it follows that in creating a Parliament, in making the election to be by all the freeholders, not merely the chief tenants, and, above all, in closely uniting the burgesses with the knights, the shire has done its work. The rapid growth of the justices of the peace stripped it of the rest of its functions, except that of electing and instructing the representatives sent to Parliament, perhaps after discussion of the grounds of its summons as stated in the king's writ, and (till 1334) that of assessing and collecting from the tewnships the tax granted in Parliament. It was particularly during the Tudor period that this non-elective body of landowners completed the process by which they had stripped the old shire-court of its powers-judicial, police, military, and fiscal. The statutes of the early fifteenth century, which attempted to further regulate the relation between Parliament and the shires in the interests of the gentry, were aimed to check the misdoing of the sheriffs (1406), and to insure the election of knights or squires and the exclusion of maintainers; and in 1430 it was declared that the right of voting belonged only to freehelders of 40s.

and upwards. Thus it had now come about that the villeins, who had once, as the free ceorls, made up the folk-moot itself, and embodied in their decisions of "folk-right" the principle that the judges were no other than the autors; the villeins, who even in their later period of subjection to the lord had still represented their township before the royal justices, were now, at the very epoch when they had attained to a political consciousness and practical emancipation, irrevecably excluded from a share in the political life of their shire. One side of the old principle of local government-viz., cooperation with the crown by unpaid local work-remained; but the other side of itthe principle that this work is shared by all the full freemen of the shire-was long lost to view; and the quarter and petty sessions, aided by a few permanent officials, and relieved by the central power's larger assumption to itself of local duties (as in the regulation of prisons), supplanted the free-holders' county court, as this supplanted the shire-moot of representatives from the townships, and this in its turn the primitive folkmoot. The county court for general purposes now only exists for the election of coroners, and (in theory) for the proclamation of out-lawry and publication of Acts of Parliament. But the shire retains its own officers, lordlieutenant, and sheriffs, justices, coroners, and chief constable; through the justices it managed its own police, highroads, and bridges, and imposed rates until the Local Government Act of 1 '88 (51 and 52 Vict., cap. 41) established county councils. These bodies, composed of members triennially elected by the Parliamentary electors and women householders of the county, and of co-opted aldermen (q.v.), have taken over the administrative duties of the magistrates, except that the latter retain a share in the control of the police, and are a court of appeal in licensing questions. The administrative counties, however, differ slightly from the historio areas. The county courts, under paid judges, set np in 1846 for better despatch of the lesser judicial business, vary in number according to the needs of each county. Their institution has been a great success. But in size and functions they are more like hundred courts revived and centralised; and historically their name is a misnomer.

In 1381 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor, but the latter office he held only for a few months. Coutances, Walter De, was one of Henry II.'s ministers, and became successively Bishop of Lincoln and Archbishop of Rouen. He accompanied Richard I could his rusade, and in 1191 was sent to Lagland by the king, for the purpose of replacing Longchamp. The archbishop head the justiciarship from 1191 to 1194, as was active in raising the king's ransom. In 1196, however, he quarralled with Richard, and the king refusing to give way, he land Normandy under an interdict, until a compromise was effected. He supported the claims of John, and died during that king's reign.

Covenant, The. It was the old Scottish custom for those who were united in any great cause to bind themselves together by a bond to stand by one another to the death in its support. Such a bond was the Covenant which plays so large a part in the history of the Refermation in Scotland. It was originally a private bond, by which the barons who upheld the first preachers of reform bound themselves together for mutual support and the destruction of Popery in 1557. In 1581, when there was a general dread of the revival of Popery, a similar bond, entering more into detail concerning the superstitions and religious errors that were to be combated, was drawn up by the Protestant ministers. The king, James I., was the first to sign it, and his example was followed by the courtiers and then by the people. This is generally known as the First Covenant. In 1638, when

Charles I. tried to force the English liturgy on the Church of Scotland, the popular indig nation found a vent in a revival of this covenant, with a clause added to it directed against the bishops. The enthusiasm about it was universal. It was signed through the length and breadth of the land, by high and low slike, and from this time the "Covenant" became the watch-word and war-cry of the Presby-terian party. In 1643, when the English Parliament sought Scotch aid, the Scotch demanded that the mutual engagements of the two nations should be confirmed by a pact to which both nations should be sworn. Accordingly the Solemn League and Covenant yas drawn up by Henderson, amended by Vane, adopted by the Westminster Assembly (q.v.), passed by the Parliament, and ordered to be subscribed and sworn to by the nation. But the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, in 1643, though they approved the Covenant, disappointed the Scots, who hoped to see it imposed on the wholo English nation. When Charles II., on the invitation of the Estates, came to Scotland to claim the kingdom in 1650, he was compelled to sign the Covenant before he was allowed to land, and the signature was repeated at his coronation. Notwithstanding this, after the itestoration, by the king's order, the Covenant was burned by the common hangman in London, and an Act abjuring and condemning it as an unlawful oath was passed by the Privy Council of Scotland in 1662. The extreme Presbyterian party were greatly disappointed that the Act of 1690, approving the Confession, id a tenjoin the renewing of the Covenant. venant was not merely a declaration elief, but a solemn engagement binding adherents to force their belief open outlors. The name of Covenanters was Sent to en by the popular party after the friend of the Covenant in 1638, and borne by 124 roughout the Civil War. But it is more generally associated with the insurgents of the reign of Charles II. who took arms in defence of the Prerby ferian form of church government. As the Cevenant had by mat time been derequired as a seditious oath, those who perstates in maintain ig it were naturally looked upon as rebels agai. . the government. They were, however, treaced with unwarrantable severity. When, in 1662, the Act was passed for the re-establishment of episcopacy, the Presbyterian ministers who refused to acknowledge the bishops were ejected from their parishes. Round these "outed minis-ters," as they were called the Commission of the commiss as they were called, the Covenanters rallied, and gathered in crowds on the hill-sides or any lonely place, to attend their ministrations. These meetings, called "conventicles," were denounced as seditious, and to frequent them or to hold any " intercommunwith any persons who frequented them, was forbidden on pain of death. These severe measures provoked the Covenanters to take up arms in defence of their religious opinions, and led to a rebellion so widespread, that it almost amounted to a civil war. first serious action between the king's troops and the Covenanters was in the hill-country on the borders of the counties of Ayr and Lanark. Here, at Drumclog, a farm near Lou-don Hill, a party of armed Covenanters who were gathered at a conventicle were attacked by a body of dragoons under Jehn Graham, of Claverhouse, and gained a victory over their assailants (1679). After this success, the numbers of the insurgents increased so rapidly that the government be ame alarmed, and an army, 15,000 strong, was sent against them under the command of the Duke of Monmouth. He defeated them on the banks of the Clydo, at Bothwoll Bridge, where 1,200 were made prisoners, June 22, 1679. In consequence of a treasonable protest called the Sanquhar Declaration, put forth by the Covenanters, all persons who wished to free themselves of suspicion of complicity with them were required to take what was called the Abjuration Oath; and the soldiers who were sent to scour the country in search of rebels, were empowered to kill any one who refused to take the oath. The sufferings of the Covenanters were extreme. Numbers of them were put to death with great cruelty, but suffering only stre gthened their resolute spirit, and it was not until after the accession of William, when the "outed ministers" were restored to their pulpits, and adherence to the Covenant ceased to be a crime, that the Covenanters abandoned their attitude of defiance. But some oxtreme Covenanters refused to acknowledge a king whose acceptance of episcopacy in England was, they thought, treason against the divino right of presbyters. They formed the earliest dissenting Prestyterian sects in Scotland. [CAMERONIANS.]

Coventry seems to have owed its importance to the magnificent Benedictine abbey founded by Leofric and his wife, Godiva, in 1044. The town became a prosperous trading centre. According to Leland, its walls were built in the reign of Edward II. In 1451 it was created a separate county. Tho beautiful abbey church was almost destroyed by Henry VIII.; but several fine specimens of mediseval ecclesiastical architecture remain. The "Laymen's Parliament of Henry IV." met at Coventry in 1404. In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries Coventry was an important centre of the cloth and woolien trade. Its citizens were strongly Parliamentarian in the Great Rebellion; and to punish them their walls were levelled after the Rostoration. The town returned two members to Parliament from the reign of Edward I, until 1885: it now returns one, Coventry, Walter of, was a writer of whom little is known. He probably wrote between the year 1293 and the end of Edward I.'s reign, and may have been a monk, probably of some house in the diocese of York. He is the author or compiler of a Memoriale, or analysis of history extending from the arrival of Brutus to the year 1225. The earlier portions are merely transcripts from Geoffrey of Monmouth, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger of Hoveden, &c., but for the first quarter of the thirteenth century Walter is a valuable authority.

The Memorials of Walter of Coventry was first discovered by Lehnd in the aixteenth century. It has been edited, with most valuable Introductions, by Dr. Stubbs (Rolls Series, 1872).

Coventry, Thomas, 1st Lord (b. 1578, d. 1640), son of Sir T. Coventry, Judge of the Common Pleas, in 1616 was chosen Recorder of London, and in 1617 was made Solicitor-General, being advanced four years later to the Attorney-Generalship. In 1625, chiefly through Buckingham's interest, he was made Lord Keeper, and in 1628 was created Lord Coventry. Ho has been accused of advising some of Charles's most arbitrary acts, as the refusal of the summons to Lord Bristol, and the imprisonment of the Earl of Arundel; bnt Mr. Foss maintains that ho was little more than "the messenger of the king and the organ of the House." In 1635 and 1636 he enjoined the judges in their charge to the grand juries to urge the people to pay the ship-money with cheerfulness, but he took no part in the trial of Hampden for refusing to pay his share. One of his last acts was to advise the king to summon Parliament, but he died before the summoning of the Short Parliament.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion.

Coventry, Sir William (b. 1626, d. 1686), was the youngest son of Lord Keeper Coventry. In 1662 he was appointed Commissioner of the Admiralty, in 1665 was knighted and made a Privy Councillor, and 1667 a Commissioner of the Treasury. Having quarrelled with the Duke of Buckingham he challenged him to fight a duel, for which he was banished from the court, and retired into private life. "Ho was," says Burnet, "the best speaker in the House of Commons, and a man of great notions and eminent virtues." He was the author of several political tracts, the most interesting of which is The Character of a Trimmer, published in 1689.

Coventry, Sir John, was the grandson of Lord Coventry and nephew of Sir William Coventry. He was a member of Parliament in 1670, when, having somowhat freely expressed his opinion about the royal mistresses, he incurred the displeasure of the court, was set upon by a band of ruffians sent by Monmouth, half-murdered, and his nose slit with a penknife. This cutrage led to the passing of an Act against unlawful maiming and wounding, which was known as the Coventry Act (1670).

Coverdale, Mills (b. 1488 d. 1568), was one of the earliest English Reformers. 1532 he is said to have assisted Tyndale in his translation of the Bible, and three years later issued a version of his own. He was on close terms of friendship with Cromwell, and in 1535 was sent by that minister to Paris to bring out the translation of the New Testa-ment known as the Lord Cromwell's Bible. On Cromwell's fall Coverdale went to Tübingen, and travelled in Denmark and other Continental countries. On Edward VI.'s accession he was appointed chaplain to the king. In 1551 he was made Bishop of Exeter, but was removed from his see and imprisoned by order of Queen Mary. He was subsequently released, and retired to Holland and afterwards to Geneva. He returned to England after the accession of Elizabeth, and assisted at the consecration of Archbishop Parker, though he did not obtain his see again, owing to his Calvinistie views.

Two vols. of selections from Coverdale's numerous works were published by the Farker Soc., 1844—46.

Cowell, John (b. 1554, d. 1611), was a Cambridge civilian who became Master of Trinity Hall and Reader in Civil Law. 1607 he published a work called The Interpreter, which was an explanation of legal terms and theories. The book gave great offence to the common-lawyers. At the instigation probably of Coke, a great enemy of Cowell, an inquiry into the character of the book was ordered by the House of Commons in 1610, and the king was advised to suppress it, because of the unconstitutional doctrines it contained on the subject of the royal pre-rogative and the rights of the people.

Cowper, William, 1st Earl (b. 1664, d. 1723), was born at Hertford. After studying at the Temple, he was, in 1688, called to the bar, and from this time rose rapidly in his protession. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he raised a troop of horse in his support. His abilities as a Chancery barrister soon attracted Somere's notice, and in 1695 he was returned to Parliament for Hertford. In 1696 he supported the bill for the attainder of Sir John Fenwick. In 1702 William Cowper lost his seat for flertford, owing to the unpopularity caused in the borough by the trial of his brother Spencer for murder. In 1705, on the dismissal of Sir Nathan Wright, he became Lord Keeper and Commissioner of the Scotch Union. In 1707 he was raised to the Upper House, and became the first Lord Chancellor of Great Britain; but the sentence pronounced by him in this capacity on Sacheverell was influenced by party spirit, and unworthy of his reputation. In opposition to the rest of the ministry, he was in favour of making peace with France during the last years of the Succession War; and he vigorously opposed Marlborough's request to be made Captain-General for life. [MARLBOROUGH.] On the fall of the Whigs, Cowper resigned, in spite of the solicitations of Harley, who wished for a composite ministry. On the accession of George I., he received the Great Seal, and was favoured with the king's entire confidence. His sentences on the rebels of 1715 have been censured as too severe. He was one of the chief advocates of the Septennial Act (q.v.). In 1718 he resigned office, probably because George accused him of espousing the Prince of Wales's side in his quarrel with the court. He promptly became leader of the Opposition, and withstood almost alone the Peerage Bill, and the bill of pains and penalties against Atterbury. In his later years he was a cused, probably without reason, of tampering with the Jacobites.

Cox, RICHARD (b. 1500, d. 1581), Bishop of Ely, made Dean of Christ Church and of Westminster by Henry VIII., was one of the tutors of Edward VI., the others being Sir John Cheke and Sir Anthony Cooke. During the reign of Mary he was compelled with the Protestants to take refuge at Frankfort; but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, by whom he was made Bishop of Ely. It was a remonstrance from Bishop Coxe against the injustice done him by the bestowal of his land on Sir Christopher Hatton that drew forth the celebrated letter from Queen Elizabeth: "Proud prelate, you know what you were before I made you what you are. If you do not immediately comply with my request, by God I will u ifrock you. Coxe is described as "an honest but narrowspirited and peevish man."

Strype, Annals; Burnet, Hist. of the Reformation.

Coxe, William (b. 1747, d. 1828), Archdeacon, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a He entered the Church, became ineumbent of Kingston, Canon of Salisbury, and Archdeacon of Wiltshire, 1806. Coxe travelled a good deal on the Continent, and was a careful student of English and foreign history, especially that of the eighteenth Ilis numerous works, written in a rather uninteresting style, contain a good deal of information, and are of considerable value. The most important are Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, Memoirs of Marlborough, Memoirs of the Administration of Mr. Pelham, and the History of the House of Coyne and Livery was an ancient right or eustom in Ireland which enabled the lord or chief to quarter his soldiery on his tenants. The Irish name for it was

"bonaght." Its adoption by the Norman settlers was so general that even the loyal Butlers enforced it. Both branches of the house of Fitzgerald adopted it in Edward III.'s time. This custom was the subject of constant complaints by the Irish Parliament. It was forbidden by the Statute of Kilkenny, 1367, and made treason in 1409, and finally abolished in 1603. Spenser complains of its abolition as a wrong done to the Irish landlord.

Craggs, James (d. 1721), was Postmaster-General during the earlier years of George I.'s reign. He was accused with his son of frauds in connection with the South Sea Company, and while the accusation was still pending he took poison and killed himself.

Craggs, James (d. 1721), son of the preeeding, was a Whig politician. During the reign of Anne ho was employed in minor diplomatic business. He was consulted by Marlborough on the question of the luke's obtaining the appointment of Captain-General for life. In 1714, as the queen lay dying, he was asspatched to Hanover, with instructions to bid Lord Stafford to request the States General of Holland to guarantee the Protestant succession. In 1717 he becamo Secretary at War, and, on the retirement of Addison, Secretary of State (1718). He was accused of fraud in connection with the South Sea Company, but died of small-pox on the day that the report was presented to the Commons. "Whatever," says Lord Mahon, "may have been his conduct in the South Sea affairs (for his death arrested the inquiry), he undoubtedly combined great talents for business with a love of luxury and literature; and his name, were it even to drop from the page of history, would live enshrined for ever in the verse of Pope."

Craig, GENERAL SIR JAMES (b. 1748, d. Jan. 1812), after greatly distinguishing himself in the American War of Independence, especially at the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill (q.v.), was, in 1793, appointed Governor of Jersey. In 1795 ho went out to the Capo, and held the post of governor for two years, when he was sent to India, where his military experience was much needed. In 1808 Sir James Craig became Governor-in-chief of British North America, and in that capacity rendered himself extremely unpopular. His measures were arbitrary in the extreme, and it is to his treatment of the Assembly, and his refusal to grant any concessions or to consider the question of any redress of grievances, that the discontent which was so prevalent in Canada at this time was due. His unpopularity induced the Americans in 1812 to attempt an invasion of Canada, under the impression that they would be joined by a large majority of the people.

Craig, JOHN (d. 1600), was the friend and coadjutor of John Knox, on whose death he became for a time the acknowledged leader of the Kirk party, for whom he drew up the National Covenant in 1580. In 1584, however, on the Scotch Estates taking action to restrain the power of the clergy, Craig went over to the opposite side.

Craig, Thomas (t. 1538, d. 1608), a celebrated Scottish judge, and an author of no little repute, was a great favourite of James VI. He was the writer of a famous treatise on feudal law, Jus Feudale, and a tract on the succession to the throne of England.

Craigmillar Castle, three miles from Edinburgh, was the scene of the murder of the Earl of Mar, brother of James III. It was burnt by Hertford, 1544, but afterwards rebuilt for Queen Mary, who spent a good deal of time there. It was at Craigmillar that Bothwell, Murray, Morton, and Maitland of Lethington, formed their agreement to kill Darnley (1566).

Crampton Question, THE (1856). The Crimean War brought England into some difficulties with foreign powers on account of the attempt to enlist a foreign legion. Mr. Crampton, the English minister at Washington, carried out the instructions of the government in the matter so thoroughly that the United States government dismissed him from Washington, and a coolness arose between the two countries, which was with difficulty healed.

Cranbrook, GATHORNE HARDY, 1st EARL (b. 1814, d. 1906), was elected member for Leominster in 1856, and defeated Mr. Gladatone for Oxford University in 1865. He was Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs in 1858, Home Secretary in 1867, Secretary of State for War in 1874, Secretary of State for India in 1878, and in 1886 and 1886-92 Lord President of the Council.

Cranmer, Thomas (b. 1489, d. 1556), Archbishop of Canterbury, the son of a Nottinghamshire gentleman, at the age of fourteen ontered Jesus College, Cambridge, where he was, in 1510, elected to a fellowship. In 1523 he was ordained, and continued at the university, lecturing and teaching. Forced to leave the town to avoid infection in the sweating sickness of 1528, he was accidentally thrown into the company of Foxe and Gardiner, the commissioners engaged on the question of the royal diverce, and in course of conversation mentioned his own conclusion, that the marriage was not merely voidable, but void, being contrary to the law of God, and that its dissolution could therefore be pronounced by the English ecclesiastical courts without reference to Rome. The commissioners were greatly struck, and reported the matter to Henry, who lost no time in sending for Cranmer and ordering him to write a treatise in support of his thesis. Soon after we find him employed as legal adviser to two important embassies to the Pope and the Emperor respectively, which, though unsuccessful, were not fruitless. The Papal mission discovered a singular consensus among Italian jurists in Henry's favour, while in Germany Cranmer's visits to the theologians proved more favourable to his own then to his master's suit, and before his return he was secretly married to Margaret Anne, daughter of Osiander, a prominent Reformer, a marriage which, being uncanonical, though not illegal, put him entirely at the king's mercy when he became Primate. Henry's plans had mean-while been maturing; further delay would have ruined the legitimacy of Anne Boleyn's offspring, and on the death of Warham the archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to Cranmer. No sooner was the ceremony of installation over than the new archbishop wrote the king a collusive letter, demanding, in the name of the nation, that the scandal should be terminated; and, the case being fairly brought before his court, gave judgment that the marriage was void ab initio, Feb. 23, 1533. He had now performed his task, and withdrew into a literary retirement, which, broken only in 1533 and 1540 to pronounce two more iniquitous sentences of divorce, lasted till the fall of Cromwell, a minister as little inclined to endure a rival as Cranmer to become one. From that date his greater prominence is attested by two plots formed by the reactionary party for his destruction, from which he was preserved only by the unswerving confidence of the king. Yet at no time can he be called a politician: his influence was wholly personal, and con-fined to Henry, on whose death he again sank into the background. But in this retirement Cranmer was laying the foundations of the new order of things. On his elevation to the primacy he had but two points of sympathy with the continental Protestants—repudiation of the Papal supremacy and the translation of the Scriptures. But the patristic studies with which he maintained the attack on the Papacy gradually unveiled to him the features of a more apostolic and spiritual Christianity, whose truths he accepted, one by one, as conviction was forced upon his mind, till, in 1550, he published his book against Transubstantiation, whorein is maintained the Anglican doctrine of the Real, as against the Corporeal, Presence. Cranmer's reconstitution of the Church services remains his real title to greatness. His was a formative, not a creative, intellect, and, while his revision of the old Uses may be ranked for beauty and dignity with the Authorised Version of the Bible, his attempt to replace the Roman Canon Law is a monument of mistaken energy. Throughout all these reforms, his appeal is not from superstition to reason, but from the Church corrupt to the Church pure; nothing illustrates his catholic position better than hi. own words before the commission at Oxford:—"If it can be proved by any doctor above 1,000 years after Christ, that Christ's body is there in the eucharist really present, I will give all over."

During Edward's reign Cranmer was concerned in two political acts of great importance. At the coronation the archbishop, on his own responsibility, altered the position of the coronation eath, putting it after the expression of the popular assent. This innovation, by destroying the conditional character of that assent, amounted to the assertion of absolute hereditary right. The second act was the signing of Edward's illegal device for the succession, which was, however, per-formed with the greatest reluetance, and on the assurance of the judges. It sufficed to secure his condemnation for high treason on Mary's accession. The new government seems at first to have had no desire to shed blood; but Cranmer, the pilot of the Reformation, could not seize the numerous opportunities of escape which were offered; he remained, either overrating his own strength or underrating the impending danger. With his two bosom friends, Latimer and Ridley, he was taken to Oxford (Mar., 1554) to hold an academical disputation. After a parody of controversy, all three were summoned before a synod of presbyters and condemned as heretics. His friends suffered before him: the archbishop's case was delayed by the necessity of application to the Papal court, and by the desire of Cardinal Pole to ruin the cause of heresy by the recantation of the heresiarch. In the latter aim he succeeded. Cranmer was at first induced to accept the Papal supremacy, not as a doctrine, but as a fact, and his defence onco broken down, and honour lost, he was led on to sign a detailed abjuration of all his anti-Papal convictions. Fortunately for the Reformation, the queen had resolved on his destruction, and to the public eye Cranmer diad a martyr (Mar. 21, 1556). How far repentance preceded the knowledge of his fate must be left to conjecture. At the worst, he should be judged by his life, not by one failure under an overwhelming towards. one failure under an overwhelming temptation. He was a man of deep piety and honesty of purpose, and in private life his sweet temper exercised a peculiar fascination; but a certain moral weakness taints his whole career, and leaves his character one of the most difficult to estimate in history.

Crecy, THE BATTLE or (Aug. 26, 1346), was fought between the English, under King Edward III., and the French, commanded by Philip VI. The English army had landed on the coast of Normandy, near La Hogue, on July 12, and Edward had then intended to cross the Seine, march through Picardy into Artois, and there join his Flemish auxiliaries, who had already crossed the French frontier. But when he arrived at Rouen, he found the bridges over the Seine broken, and the French army on the opposite shere. Edward marched along the river almost to the suburbs of Paris, and burnt St. Germain and Neuilly, and at length (Aug. 17) by a stratagem succeeded in crossing the river near Pontoise, advanced towards the Somme, and crossed at Blanehetaque, near Abbeville. Not far from this town, at Crecy, he halted, and allowed the French to come up (Aug. 26). The army was drawn up the following morning in three divisions. The first, under the command of the Black Prince (or rather of the Earls of Warwick and Oxford), consisted of 800 men-at-arms, 1,000 Welshmen, and 2,000 archers. The second division, placed behind them, and slightly on their flank, consisted of 1,200 archers and a body of men-at-arms. The third division was held in reserve under the king, on some slightly rising ground in the rear, and consisted of 2,000 archers and 700 men-at-arms. According to Froissart, the whole army did not amount to more than 8,000 men; but this estimate is probably much too low. The French forces are computed at from 60,000 to 120,000. The French army marched from Abbeville at sunrise, and arrived at Crecy in considerable confusion. The battle was begun by the advance of a large body (stated at 15,000) of Genoese, armed with crossbows. But the Genoese fell into disorder before the shooting of the English archers. The French cavalry, under the Duke of Alençon, then fell upon the English first and second divisions. After a desperate conflict, during which the king was more than once requested to bring up the reserves, the French cavalry retired in the greatest disorder, and Philip himself fled from the field. The French fought on in a desultory manner till night, and not till the following morning was it discovered that the . French army was completely scattered and routed. Many thousands of Frenchmen were found dispersed about the field, and were slain. Their whole loss consisted of 1,200 knights and a number of inferior rank estimated at 30,000, the most distinguished being John, King of Bohemia.

The most interesting and detailed account of the battle is in Froissart, c. 126. [S. J. L.]

Creones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe, who dwelt on the west coast of Ross.

Cressingham, Huoh (d. 1297), was appointed Treasurer of Scotland by Edward I. in 1296, at the same time that the Earl of Surrey was appointed Guardian. He carried out to the best of his ability the command of the English king that Scotland was to be reduced to a state of order, and as a consequence was hated by the Scotch. He was alain at the battle of Stirling, which was lost by the English in a great measure owing to his precipitancy.

Crevant, The Battle of (July 31, 1423), was won by the English and Burgundian troops, under the Earl of Salisbury and others, against a combined force of French and Scotch, and levies from Spain and Lombardy. The English were completely victorious, and Buchan, the Constable of France, was taken prisoner. This victory, which was fought on the banks of the Yonne, near Auxerre, saved Burgundy from invasion, and greatly crippled the power of the French.

Crichton, Sir William, Chancellor of Scotland, was Governor of Edinburgh Castle at the death of James I. (1437). In his endeavours to get possession of the young king's person, he was brought into rivalry with Sir Alexander Livingston, from whem he carried off James II., only, however, to surrender him again on consideration of receiving certain lands as a reward. In conjunction with Livingston, he planned and carried out the murder of William, Earl of Douglas, and his brother. '11e was for some time at war with the Douglas family, and was besieged by them in Edinburgh Castle.

Crimean War, fought between Russia on the one hand, and England, France, Turkey, and Sardinia on the other, began in 1854, and lasted till 1856. It is called the Crimean War because the main opera-tion of it consisted in the attack made by the allied forces on the peninsula of the Crimea in the south of Russia. The dispute between Russia and Turkey had ostensibly arisen about the guardianship of the Holy Places, especially the Holy Sepulchre, in Jerusalem; but the cause of it lay much deeper. Turkey, the old enemy of Russia, had gradually retired from the countries she had originally conquered, and, as her power decayed, had become more and more unfit to rule over Christian populations. Russia, who had emancipated herself from Tartar thraldom, was deeply interested in protecting the Slavonic races still under Turkish rule, who were of the same blood and origin as herself. She also had a natural desire to extend her power to the Dardanelles, and to open a way for her commerce into the Mediterranean. The Emperor Nicholas wrote of Turkey as "a siek man dying," and his plan for dividing his possessions included the formation of the Dannbian principalities, Servia and Bulgaria, into principalities under the suzerainty of Russia, and the occupation of Egypt and Candia by England. Constantinople was to be held neither by Russia, France, England, nor Greece. Sir Stratford Canning, the English ambassador at Constantinople, an enemy of Russia. The Emporor of the French was desirous of a European war for the consolidation of his threethe consolidation of his throne. On July 2, 1853, the Russian troops crossed the river Pruth, and occupied the principalities. On November 1, war was declared, and on the 30th of the same month the Turkish fleet was destroyed in the harbour of Sinope. Lord Aberdeen, the Prime Minister, strained every nerve to preserve peace, but Lord Palmerston Foreign Secretary, declared that he would resign, unless a strong course against Russia were adopted. The country gradually "drifted into war." On Feb. 27, 1854, an ultimatum was sent by our govornment, which declared that unless the Russian troops retired behind the river Pruth before the end of April, it would be considered as a declaration of war. No reply was made, and the war took its course. Austria and Prussia contracted an offensive and defensive alliance, by which they guaranteed each other's possessions in case of attack. They also prepared their case of attack. They also prepared their forces in readiness for war. The alliance between England and France was signed on April 10. The plan of operations was very simple. As Russia could be attacked only in her oxtremities, and England could act only upon a sea base, there were not many places into which the two combatants could come into conflict. A fleet sailed into the Baltic, under Admiral Napier, with great expectations of success, which were not realised. On Sept. 14 the allied forces landed in the Crimea. They consisted of 24,000 English, 22,000 French, and 8,000 Turks. Their object was to capture Sebastopol, a powerful fortress, which the Russians had recently constructed at great expense. On Sept. 20 the Russians were defeated by the allied armies at the passage of the Alma. It might have been possible to take Sebastopol by a coup de main, but it was thought more prudent to besiege it from the south. A brilliant flank march was executed, and the harbour of Balaclava was occupied by the English as a base of operations. On October 25 was fought the battle of Balaclava, signalised by the famous charge of the six hundred light cavalry upon the Russian guns [BALACLAVA, THE BATTLE or], and the far more effective charge of the heavy cavalry, under General Scarlett. On Nov. 5 tho English troops were attacked in the early morning by large masses of Russians, and held their ground with great steadiness until the afternoon. This was the battle of Inkerman, in which we lost 2.612 killed and wounded, and the Russians, it is said, 12,000. The winter tried our troops severely. Notwithstanding the devotion of Miss Florence Nightingale in nursing the sick, the supply of hospital accommodation was insufficient, and the commissariat broke down. This caused great indigration in England, and Lord Aberdeen was succeeded as Prime Minister by Lord Palmerston. In December the allied fleet in the Baltic was broken up, and returned home; and on March 2 the Emperor of Russia died. This caused but a slight hope of peace; the fleet returned to the Haltic on April 4, and the bombardment of Sebastopol began five days later. On June 7 the French succeeded in carrying the Mamelon, one of the ebastopol forts, but an attack made by the allied forces on the Redan and the Malakhoff forts, on June 18, was unsuccessful; and on June 28 Lord Raglan, the English commander-inchief, died. On August 16 the French distinguished themselves greatly in the battle of the Tchernaya. After a month's incessant bombardment, a final attack was made on the works on Sept. 5, the result of which was that the Russians evacuated Sebastopol, and retreated to the north side of the harbour. They blew up their forts as far as they could, and left their wounded behind them. This practically put an end to the war in the Crimea. Before the end of the year negotia-tions for peace were begun by the friendly intervention of Austria. The points on which Russia found it most difficult to make concassions were the limitation of her power in the Black Sea, and the cession of a part of Bessarabia to Roumania. [The provisions on these points were cancelled respectively in 1871 and 1878. (Black Sea Confessions; Berlin Treaty.)] The Place of Paris was signed on Sunday, March 20, 1856. The English lost 194 600. soldiers during the Treaty of Paris was signed on Sunday, March 20, 1856. 24,000 soldiers during the war, the French 63,500, and the Russians, it ls said, 506,000. The war added £41,000,000 to the National Debt. [O. B.]

Criman (Chonan) (d. 1045), lay Abbot of Dunkeld, was a powerful and warlike chieftain, who married a daughter of Malcolm I., by whom he had a son, Duncan, King of Scotland 1034-1040. Criman was slain in battle (1045) whilst fighting against Macbeth.

Crofts (or Chorr), Sin James (d. 1590), was in 1553 made Deputy of Ireland, his tenuro of office being marked by the distress suffered by the country owing to the debasement of coinage. In 1554 he took arms against Queen Mary in Sir Thomas Wyatt'a rebellion, and for this was sent to the Tower. Under Elizabeth Crofts became commander on the Scottleh border, and in 1560 crossed the border with the English expedition under Lord Grey. His mismanagement at the assault on Leith in 1560 caused the repulse of the English, and in consequence Crofts was deprived of his command and sent to London.

or (b. 1841), began life as an officer in the Royal Artillery. In 1872 he accompanied Lord Northbrook to India as his private secretary. In 1876 he left India with the rank of major, being made British Commissioner of the Egyptian Public Debt Office. When the Kbedive Ismail abdicated, he was promoted to be British Controller-General. From 1880 to 1883 he was Financial Member of the Council of India. He then became British Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, and took in hand the various questions which called loudly for attention—Finance, Irrigation, the Administration of Justice, Education and other important matters. A substantial result of his reforms and economies was that Egypt was enabled (1896–1898) to achieve the reconquest of her lost possessions in the Soudan. He was raised to the peerage as Baron Cromer in 1892, was created Visconnt Cromer in 1897, and Earl Cromer in 1901. On his retirement from Egypt in 1907 he received a grant of £50,000.

Cromwell, BRIDGET (b. 1624, d. 1681), was the eldest daughter of Oliver Cromwell. Sho is described as being "a gloomy enthusiast, and so bigoted a republican that she even grudged her father the title of Protector." She married Henry Ireton (q.v.), and subsequently Charles Fleetwood (q.v.).

Cromwell, ELIZABETH (b. 1629, d. 1658), was the second and favourite danghter of the Protector. She is said, notwithstanding her parentage, to have been firmly attached to the Royal cause, and it is certain that she frequently interceded on behalf of Royalist prisoners.

Cromwell, Henry (b. 1628, d. 1674), was the youngest son of Oliver Cromwell. He outered the Parliamentary army in 1642, and to the was twenty obtained a troop in Fa...lax's life-guards. In 1649 he attained the rank of a colonel, and accempanied his father to Ireland. He was a member of the "Barebones" Parliament of 1653, and in 1655, after being sent over to Ireland to observe the cendition of affairs in that country, was shertly afterwards made Lord Deputy. His government of Ireland was exceedingly popular, and the moderation and justice of his measures pleased all except the extreme men on either side. On the triumph of the Parliamentary party over the Protector he was superseded, and retired into private life.

Cromwell, OLIVER (b. April 25, 1599, d. Sept. 3, 1658), was a native of Huntingdon, the son of Robert Cromwell and Elizabeth Steward, and connected by blood with the family of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex.

He was educated at Huntingdon School, and at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he entered as a fellow-commoner on April 23, 1616. On his father's death in the following year he returned home, married Elizabeth Bourchier (Aug., 1620), and settled down to farm his own lands. He was elected member for Huntingdon in 1628, and complained against the Bishop of Winchester for silencing controversial preaching. In the Short Parliament and the Long Parliament he represented Cambridge, and soon attained considerable influence. It has been ascertained that within the first ten months of the Long Parliament Cromwoll was specially appointed to cighteen committees, exclusive of various appointments which he shared with the knights and burgesses generally of the eastern counties. Ho moved the second reading of the Annual Parliament Bill (Dec. 30, 1640), and was one of those whe drew up the Root and Branch Bill. On religious questions ho was specially active, and he had decided to emigrate if the Grand Remonstrance had not passed. He was also one of the foremost in laying hands on the executive power, and moved (Nov. 6, 1641) to entrust the Earl of Essex with power over the trained bands till Parliament should take further order. In the summer of 1642 he commenced arming and drilling the Cambridge Trained Bands, and seized the plate of that university to prevent it from being carried to the king. He served at Edgehill at the head of the troop of horse which he had raised, and is montioned by Fiennes as doing good service. In January, 1643, he secured the town of Cambridge, and arrested the Royalist sheriff of Hertfordshire. In March ho suppressed a rising at Lowestoft; in April he raised the siege of Crowland; on May 13 defeated the Royalists of Newark at Grantham; in July ho retook Stamford, captured Burleigh House, and relieved Gainsborough. His services were recognised by his appointment as Governor of the Isle of Ely, and second in command of the army of the Eastern Association, which his activity had made it possible te form (Aug., 1643). Next menth he joined the cavalry of Sir Thomas Fairfax, in Lincolnshire, and helped to gain the victory of Winceby, where he commanded the van (Oct. In the following year he led the left wing at Marston Moor, which, after driving Prince Rupert's division from the field fell on Newcastle's foot in the centre and decided the victory. He was also present at the second battle of Newbury (Oct. 27, 1644), and a month later charged his commander, the Earl of Manchester, with slackness in making use of the advantages then gained. Lest the war should be protracted by the selfinterest or incapacity of members of Parliament, he supported the Self-denying Ordinance, and the formation of a regular army officered by professional soldiers. In spite of that law,
