his services were too valuable to be dispensed with. In Fobruary, 1645, he was sent on an expedition into the west under Waller. When he returned to resign his command he was ordered into Oxfordahire to intercept a convoy going to Oxford, which he performed at Islip (April 24th). On May 10th he was continued in his command for forty days longer, and Fairfax was authorised to appoint him to command the horse, and this appointment was confirmed and extended from time to time. At Naseby he commanded the right wing, totally routed the forces opposed to him, and, keeping his troopers well in hand, led them against the king's centre with equal success. With Fairfax he then went into the west, was present at the storming of Bristol, and at the battle of Langport. Winchester, Basing House, and other fortresses were taken by him, and he took part in the siege of Oxford. During these three years Cromwell had also become the head of a political party. From the moment he took up arms he had sought to enlist men with a religious spirit in them, thinking them the only men able to oppose gentlemen of honour and courage. What their particular form of creed was he cared little. "The state," he declared, "in choosing men to serve it, takes no notice of their opinions of their opinions." their opinions; if they be willing to serve it faithfully, that suffices." His enemies termed him "the great Independent," and saw in him the champion of the opposition to the imposi-tion of Presbyterian orthodoxy on England. This question of toleration, with two other questions then at issue between the army and the Parliament—the right of the soldiers to be fairly paid for their services, and their claim to have a voice in making a safe and proper settlement with the king—brought him into opposition with the Parliament. Matters came to a crisis when, in the spring of 1647, Parliament voted the dishandment of the army. Cromwell did his best to prevent a rupture, attempted to mediate and reconcile, and when these attempts failed and he found himself in danger of arrest, cast in his lot with Fsirfax and the army (June 3, 1647). After the exclusion of the eleven members he took an active part in the debates of the took an active part in the debates of the Commons and the negotiations with the king. There he endeavoured to fix a limit to the establishment of Presbyterianism (Oct. 13), and supported the continuance of the negotiations with the king in spito of his rejection of the nineteen preparations. rejection of the nineteen propositions. He hoped to come to an agreement with Charles hoped to come to an agreement with Charles on the basis of the new propositions, which were a compromise between the demands of the army and the Parliament. Even after the king's fight (Nov. 3) he still continued this policy, until the rejection of the four Bills (Dec. 28, 1647), and the outbreak of the second Civil War, May, 1648, taught him the impossibility of trusting Charles. Probably in March or April 1648, at a prayer meeting in March or April, 1648, at a prayer meeting of the officers at Windsor, where Cromwell was present, it was decided to call the king to account as soon as peace was restored. Then he marched against the Welsh insurgents (May), took Pembroke (July 11), hurried north to meet the Scots, and totally defeated them at Preston and Warrington (Aug. 17—19, 1648). He was still in the north, when the army again seized the king, and put an end to the Newport Treaty; nor had he any part in Pride's Purge, though he approved of both these acts. He was present every day during the king's trial, and his name stands third amongst the fifty-nine attached to the amongst the fifty-nine attached to the warrant. Naturally he was nominated one of the Council of State, but as he was appointed commander of the army destined for Ireland (March 15), he could not long take part in their sittings. He landed at Dublin August 15, 1649. The storming of Drogheda (Sept. 10) was followed by the massacre of the garrison, which Cromwell justicular factors are a right-count of Code. fled: first, as a righteous judgment of God; secondly, as tending to prevent the effusion of blood for the future. Trim, Dundalk, and other towns were at once abandoned; Arklow and Enniscorthy terrified into surrender: Wexford held out, and shared the fate of Wexford held out, and shared the rate of Drogheds; and the campaign closed with the unsuccessful siege of Waterford. In seven months Leinster had been regained. In the following spring, Kilkenny (March 28, 1650) and Clonmel (May 9) were taken. At the end of May Cromwell returned to England, to command—as Fairfax refused to do so—the command—as Fairfax refused to do so—the army ordered to invado Scotland. For about a month the forces of Cromwell and Lesley manceuvred round Edinburgh, the Scots refusing to give battle, the English declining to attack positions too strong for them. At the end of August Cromwell was forced to retreat to Dunbar, where Lesley attacked him, and was routed with the loss of 3,000 men killed, and 10,000 prisoners (Sept. 3, 1650). Edinburgh and Leith fell into Cromwell's hands; the west of Scotland followed, and before Christmas all the country south of the Forth was in his possession. From February to June, 1651, he was ill, and his army inactive. On June 25th he marched against Lesley, who was posted at Stirling, and failing to dis-lodge him, crossed into Fifeshire, subsequently capturing Perth (Aug. 2). The king's army marched straight into England, and established itself at Worcester, where Cromwell attacked and destroyed it (Sept. 3, 1652). The great influence these services gave him, Cromwell used to secure as speedily as possible the settlement the country so much needed. In less than a fortnight after his victory he raised the question of a new Parliament (Sept. 16), and succeeded in inducing the House to fix a limit for its own power. Ho became an active member of the commission for law reform, a very zealous supporter of the "Bill for General Pardon and Oblivion," and the champion of freedom of conscience in the committee for the propagation of the gospel. His great object was to use his influence and his position to secure the speedy meeting of the new reformed Parliament, which, according to the decision of the Rump, was not to meet till Nov., 1654. The impatience of the army urged him on, and a petition from the Council of Officers (Aug. 13, 1652) demanded more alacrity in the necessary reforms. The bill which was to settle the constitution of the new assembly seemed to Cromwell and the officers to be meant rathor to perpetuate and recruit tho Rump than to secure these reforms, therefore endeavoured to stop this bill by agreement, or to persuado the Parliament to delegate their powers; and when he found them still hurrying through the objectionable bill, he put an end to their sitting (April 20, 1653). The result of this action was the separation of the civil and military elements of the republican party, and the continued refusal of the fermer (with some considerable exceptions) to recognise the authority of the other as legitimate. Cromwell and the Council of Officers began by appointing a Council of Stato of thirteen persons (April 29 -July 4, 1653). Then a representative assembly of Puritin notables was summoned by the Council of Officers, to effect the necessary reforms. But its reforming zeal seemed to threaten the foundations of law and religion, so the more conservative members resigned their authority into the hands which had entrusted it to them (July 4-Dec. 12, 1653). The Council of Officers renewed their doliberations under Oliver Cromwell's presidency, and decided to make a single person head of the government. Cromweil was accordingly installed Lord Protector (Dec. 16, 1653), to govern with the aid of a permanent Council and a Parliament, to be summoned every three For nine months Protector and Council governed, raised monoy, and legislated without a Parliament. His first Parliament met on September 3rd, 1654, and immediately called in question the "Instru-ment" of government, and claimed to revise the constitution and limit the Protector's powers. In spite of the exclusion of a hundred members, it persisted in this claim, and Cromwell dissolved it (Jan. 22, 1655). Ho had to strugglo not only against discontented republicans, but against fresh out-breaks of the Royalists. He replied by a further development of military rule, and by partially abandoning his policy of toleration. England was divided (Aug., 1655) into twelve military districts, governed by major-generals, the expenses of whose administration were supplied by an income tax on Royalists, and the public services of the Church of England were suppressed (Nov., 1655). Abroad, however, the prospect was more favourable.

Cromwell had aggustised the first months of his rule by the conclusion of advantageous treaties with Holland (April 5, 1654), Sweden (April 28), Portugal (July 10), and Denmark. Spain and France contended for his alliance. His influence forced Savoy to restore the privileges of the Vaudois (Aug. 19, 1655); the conquest of Jamaica announced his rupture with Spain, and a treaty of commerce souled his friendship with France (Oct. 24, 1655). These successes, and the desire to obtain some constitutional sanction for his government, led Cromwell to call a second Parliament (Sept. 17, 1656). The preliminary exclusion of about a hundred refractory members secured a more docide assembly, in deference to whose vote Cromwell gave up his insti-tution of the major-generals. They went on to revise the constitution, to establish a new House of Lords, and to offer Cromwoll the title of king. His refusal of the title, mainly dictated by the opposition of the army, did not prevent him from accepting their constitutional amendments, and ho was again, with legally defined powers, installed as Protector (June 26, 1657). But the House of Commons, whose composition was materially altered by the admission of the excluded members and the absence of the new lords, rejected the authority of the other House, and Cromwell indignantly dissolved it (Jan. 20, 1658). This confusion at home was perhapa compensated by brighter prospects abroad. If his plan for the union of the Protestant powers failed, the alliance with France ripened into an offensive and defensive league against Spain, and the battle of Dunkirk (June 4, 1658) made his arms renowned through Europe. Cromwell's vigour was now beginning to decay, and being attacked by a fever, he died Sept. 3, 1658. Cromwell's person and character are thus described by a gentleman of his household:-"His body was well compact and strong; his stature under six foot (I believe about two inches); his head so shaped as you might see it a store-house and shop both of a vast treasury of natural parts. His temper exceeding flery, as I have known, but the flame of it kept down for the most part, or soon allayed with those moral endowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in destress, even to an offeminate measure; though God had made him a heart wherein was left little room for any fear, but what was due to himself, of which there was a large proportion, yet did he exceed in tenderness towards sufferers. A larger soul, I think, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay than his was." "He was a strong man," adds another observer; "in the derl perils of war, in the high places of the field, hope shone in him like a pillar of thre when it had gone out in all the others." Cromwell, RALPH, LORD (d. 1455), was one of the Council of Regency during Henry VI.'s minority. Ho sided with Beaufort against Gloucester; in the year 1443 he was appointed Treasurer, and held this important office for ten years, during which time he showed considerable financial ability. In 1449 an attempt was made to assassinate him, which he attributed to Suffolk. He supported the Lancastrian party, but died shortly after the first battle of St. Albans.

Cromwell, Richard (b. 1626, d. 1712), third son of the Protector, was educated at Felstend School, entered at Lincoln's Inn 1647 and married Dorothy Mayor 1649. During his father's life he lived as a private gentle-man in the country. In July, 1657, he was olected, after his father's resignation, Chan-cellor of the University of Oxford, and about the same time he was admitted into the Council of State. His father on his death-bed nominated him as his successor, and he was accepted as such in England and by the European powers. In his new position he is said to have carried himself discreetly, and better than was expected. A Parliament was assembled on Jan. 27, 1659, which recognised him as Protector, but the republican minority, headed by Vane and Haselrig, united with the officers of the army, headed by Lambert, Fleetwood, and Desborough, to force him to dissolve Parliament (April 22, 1659). His supporters urged him to meet force by force, but he replied, "I will not have a drop of blood spilt for the preservation of my greatness, which is a burden to me." He signed a formal abdication (May, 1659), in return for which the restored Rump undertook the discharge of his debts. After the Restoration he fled to the Continent, where he remained for twenty years, returning in 1680.

Cromwell, Thomas, Earl of Essex (d. 1540). The early life of Thomas Cromwell is obscure, and the various stories told concerning it are scarcely consistent. He is said to have been the son of a blacksmith at Putney. In early youth he served as a common soldier in the wars of Italy. He began a commercial career with a Venetian trader; next he was a clerk at Antwerp, and then a wool merchant at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He returned to England, and did business as a scrivener, being half lawyer, half money-lender. He lent money to the poor nobles, who at the extravagant court of Henry VIII. were often reduced to sore straits. While engaged in these pursuits he showed great aptitude for business, and became widely known. In 1624 he was employed by Carlinal Wolsey to manage the details of business connected with the suppression of the smaller monasteries and the foundation of Wolsey's Colleges at Ipswich and Oxford. In this occupation Cromwell showed himself unscrupulous, and became very unpopular. On Wolsey's fall, in 1529, he showed his extreme eleverness by using his fidelity to a fallen master as a means of promoting his own interests. He advised Wolsey to buy offthe malice of his enemies by judicious grants of pensions out of the revenues of his bishopric. In carrying out these arrangements he commended himself to many powerful friends, and prepared the way for passing over to the service of the king. Ho suggested to Henry VIII, that he should settle the divorce question by declaring himself supreme head of the Church of England, and prosecuting the matter in his own occlesiastical courts. The advice struck Henry. He made Cromwell a member of the Privy Council, and soon afterwards a Secretary of State. Cromwell devoted his energies to raising the royal power above all other authority, and establishing by its means a new order of things. His politica. text-book, according to Cardinal Pole, was Machiavelli's Princips. Ho looked to the strong hand of absolutism to work reforms. By his advice the royal supremacy was declared, appeals to Rome were forbidden, and the king's divorce was pronounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1534 the Act of Supremacy vested authority in matters ecclesiastical solely in the crown, and in the country of the next year Cromwell was appointed "Vicar-General," or the king's vicegerent in matters occlesiastical. He was already Chancellor, so that he now held in his own hands the chief authority in things secular and spiritual. Cromwell set himself to reduce the Church into obedience to the crown. He humbled the bishops by treating them as royal officials. He struck at the wealth of the Church by ordering a general visitation of the religious houses. In consequence of the report of the visitors, the lesser monasteries, to the number of 400, were suppressed, and their revenues granted to the crown. Cromwell's hand was felt everywhere. He directed the elergy what they were to preach about, and revoked the licences of those who would not obey. His spice filled the land, and words of discontent. were wrested into proofs of conspiracy, and met with condign punishment. The execution of More and Fisher taught men that they were to expect no mercy unless they obeyed. The northern rebellion was crushed, and led to the suppression of the remaining monasteries. But when Cromwell's success seemed certain, there came a reaction. The violence of the sidvanced Protestant party awakened general discontent. Henry VIII. found that in following Uromwell he had become allied with doctrines which he was not prepared to accept. The Act of Six Articles (1539) marked a Cutholic reaction, which seriously affected Cromwell's position. But it was the progress of foreign affairs which brought about his fall. The changes which had been made in England were viewed with anger by the Emperor Charles V., who was hindered from interfering in England only by his war with France. Henry VIII. trusted to his French alliance; but as France also looked suspiciously on the new English policy, Cromwell sought a new alliance with the Lutheran princes of Germany. He hoped to make a strong coalition, by which France, England, and the German Lutherans should unite to crush the power of the house of Austria. As an earnest of this policy, he laboured for the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne, daughter of the Duke of Cleves, and niece of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, who was the head of the Smalcaldic League. He carried his point, and received a new sign of the royal favour by being created Earl of Essex. But the marriage with Anne of Cleves was unsuccessful both on personal and political grounds. Henry VIII. was disappointed in his new wife, and conceived an aversion for her. The political schemes of Cromwell did not prosper. France drew nearer to the Emperor; the Lutheran princes still held by their principle of passive resistance, and showed no signs of taking active measures. Henry VIII. was willing to allow his minister full power so long as he succeeded; at the first sign of failure, at the first appearance of difficulty to himself, he remorselessly sacrificed his favourite. Cromwell had few friends, and his disgrace was a sure means of bringing back the king's popularity. On June 10, 1540, Cromwell was arrested in the Council Chamber on the charge of high treason. A bill of attainder was rapidly passed through Parliament. Cromwell was not allowed to speak in his own defence, and was executed on July 28, 1540. Cromwell lived simply, and devoted himself entirely to his political occupations. His influence over the king was supreme while he was in power, and the separation of the English Church from the Papacy was due entirely to his skilfully devised measures. He was resolute and unscrupulous, with a clearly-defined policy. But he advanced too fast, till he stood absolutely alone, and when he lost the royal favour he had nothing on which to fall back. He risked everything on the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne of Cleves. Had Anne been personally attractive to the king, Cromwell's policy might have developed results of more permanent influence.

Crowland, or CROYLAND, a town of Lincolnshire, about eight miles north-east of Peterborough, is the site of a great abbey founded in 714 by Ethelbald of Mercia. It was burnt by the Danes in 870, restored by King Ethelred II., and again burnt in 1091. In 1112 it was a second time restored on a scale of considerable splendour. [For CrowLAND CHRONICLE see INGULPHUS.]

Crown, THE. In England monarchy was one direct product of the Anglo-Saxon conquest in the fifth and sixth centuries. In their German home the Saxons were ruled by elected magistrates (ealdormen) in time of peace, and led to battle by elected generals (heretoga), whose authority expired with the war. Unlike their old tribal fornys, the expedition to Britain entailed a chronic struggle between natives and invaders, which lasted several generations; and as the duration of the heretoga's exceptional powers were defined by the duration of the war, the mere force of circumstances now rendered those powers permanent. This change, amounting to the creation of a new office, was recognised, and sanctioned by the adoption of a title already in use amongst other Teutonic tribes, the title King, or Cyn-ing (head of the kin). The new king was ealdorman and heretoga in one; he was still elected, but the danger of interregnum in the presence of an endless war leading to the practice of electing his successor in his lifetime, the influence of the victorious general was usually sufficient to secure his son's nomination. The prescription thus established gradually confined the national choice to descendants of the first king, and myth soon explained and hallowed the preference by investing them with the halo of a divine pedigree. Christianity swept away the claim to descent from Woden, but more than compensated by the introduction of Old Testament ideas and the example of the Empire. The king, who had hitherto differed from his subjects only in degree, began to assume the style and arrogate the pretensions of the Byzantine court. The oath of homage taken by his thanes was assimilated to the sacramentum (or Roman oath of military obedience, originally taken by the army alone, but extended later to the holders of civil office, and finally to all subjects), and by the time of the reign of Edmund had become the oath of allegiant e exacted from every freeman of full age. The king was now lord of the race (cynehlajord); plots against his life were punishable, like treason against any hlaford (lord), with death and ferfeiture; and finally, the Statute of Treasons, 25 Ed. III., by abolishing this penalty for petty treason, left the king on a constitutional pinnaele, no longer the first among equals.

It is from this fusion of Imperial and Teutonic ideas that the theory prevalent in most European systems of law has sprung. The lawyers distinguish carefully between two kings—the ideal and the real. The former is the state: the fountain of legislation, of justice, of honour; i.e., the despot or Imperial law. This ideal person resides from time to time in the real king, who is subject to all the imperfections of human nature, and represents the Teutonic head of the kin, limited by the caprice and free instincts of his subjects. The relation of these two persons forms the main subject of constitutional history, their identification leading to despotism, their separation to limited monarchy. In England that separation is enshrined in the famous resolution of 1642, in which the Lords and Commons declare themselves a "council . . . to provide for the necessities . . . of the kingdom, and to declare the king's pleasure in those things that are requisite thereunto, and that what they do therein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his Majesty, seduced by evil counsel, do in his own person oppose or interrupt." This victory was mainly the result of financial struggles.

THE REVENUES OF THE CROWN Were of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary : i.e., those which belonged to the crown in its own right, and those which came as a free gift from its subjects; and their history is the history of the absorption of the ordina. y by the extraordinary. The former consisted of (1) the rents of crown lands (1,422 manors at the date of the Domesday Survey, 1085); (2) purvey-ance (the right exercised on royal progresses of buying at the lowest prices, and using forced labour); (3) feudal incidents (the three regular aids, escheat, forfeiture, relief, marriage, wardship); (4) customs on imported goods (price paid by foreign merchants for the protection of the royal peace). The latter consisted of (1) aids granted by the free tenants and clergy; (2) tallage, a tax taken from towns lying in the ancient demesne (its true character is shown by the alternative namo, donum). The crusade of Richard I., the wickedness of John, and the weakness of Henry III., impaired the ordinary revenue at a time when difficulties with France were yearly augmenting the expenditure. Edward I. met the deficiency of the one by an expansion of the other. To this end he remodelled Parliament, introducing representatives of the tax-paying classes, the country gentry, and the city mer-chants; and so rapidly did the power of the new assembly grow, that in 1275 it confirmed to the king the old customs on woel and leather, known thenceforth as "magna et antiqua custuma:" a grant which at one blow transferred custems from the hereditary to the parliamentary revenue. In 1660, the abolition of feudal tenures and of purveyance narrowed the fermer dewn to the proceeds of the crown estates; and these have in their turn been resigned in consideration of a fixed pension. At first the powers of Parliament were limited to the making of the grant, tho expending of which lay wholly with the crown; but in 1378, during Richard II.'s minority, that principle of appropriation was introduced (by the provision that the tax granted for tho French war should be paid over to two parliamentary treasurers, Philpot and Walworth), which, after a temporary collapse in the period of Tudor and Yorkist despotism, revived under James I., was confirmed by the Commonwealth, adopted as a momentary expedient by the Royalist Parliament (665), and finally, by the insertion of Lord Somers's Clause (March, 1690), acquired a permanent position as an essential element of the original grant. THE CROWN WAS THE FOUNT OF LAW. "Lex fit consensu populi, constitutione regis," the maxim of the Teutonic empire was alse the theory of the English constitution, and endured in its original freshness till in Henry VI.'s reign the Commons adopted the form of bill instead of the older petition. Yet though this change practically reversed the legislative position of king and Commons, the old maxim still represents the legal theory. The crown was also the Fount of Justice. This principle is of somewhat later origin, the shire and hundred courts in their earliest form deriving authority, net from the king, but from the nation. Even so late as the reign of Henry III., the king might be sued in his own courts by a writ of the form "Præcipe Henrico Regi Angliæ;" nor was it till the present century that the abolition of private appeals in criminal cases left the erown sole prosecuter, and removed the last limitation on the royal right of pardon. The process by which the national courts became the king's courts, and the national peace the king's peace, was the work of Norman centralisation operating through the Curia Regis (q.v.). To strengthen the local courts against feudal eneroachment, Henry I. occasionally sent justices of the Curic Regis to preside in them. This practice, brought to a system by Henry II., superinduced, to the mutual satisfaction of king and people, the royal upon the national peace, till in the end the second was entirely overgrown and choked by the first. The crown was further the Fount of Honour. In the days of chivalry any knight could confer the honour of knighthood. But with the decay of feudal service the political nobility of the peerage threw the social nobility of the knights completely into the shade. The class which owed title and privilege to the special writ of the crown became far the most prominent in the state; the legal mind soon concluded that the monopoly enjoyed by the crown of conferring the highest dignity must extend à fortiori to all inferior titles of honour.

CROWN SUPREME LANDOWNER. Like justice, the land belonged originally to nation. part being divided into alodial holdings for the freemen, the rest preserved, under the name of folk-land, as a common stock for future allotments. These were effected by charters granted by the witan and king, and hence were called boc- or charter-land. The king's inducate growing with the number of his thanes, the witan came to be regarded as the witness rather than the author of the deed of grant, the folk-land changed insensibly into terra regis, and the thenes into feudal vassals. The Norman Conquest completed the process. By the simple operation of the law, which punished rebellion with forfeiture, alodial tenure had, by the time of the Conqueror's death, disappeared, and every landholder in the kingdom had become a tenant mediate or immodiate of the crown. But the growth of the constitutional system and the abolition of feudal tenures (1660) have degraded this once all-important maxim into a legal pleasantry.

Succession to the Crown. Tho king, it has been shown, was in early times elected; elected, that is to say, by the witan and accepted by the people, their choice being limited by unwritten custom to the members of a particular family. Primogeniture, the offspring of feudal tenure, did not affect the succession till the king of the people had become also the feudal lord of the soil. Yet so late as 1199, Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, could assert without contradiction, in his opening speech at the coronation of John, that the English king rules not by hereditary right, but in virtue of his election, and that the national voice which gave could also take back the crown. The old form was observed even at the coronation of Charles I. (1625), of presenting the new king to the erowd at the four corners of a raised platform, and demanding their assent to his nomination. The ground won by the solemn deposition of two kings, Edward II. and Richard II., seemed lost in the Yorkist reaction, but the accession of Henry VII. brought in a fresh parliamentary dynasty, and though the Stuarts for a time forced on the nation the absolutist maxims of the Scotch court, the triumph of the popular party was in the end complete, and the Revolution (1688) established for ever the constitutional principle that the King of England is an official and not a proprietary ruler. Crown, The Wearing of the As part of the regalia, the crown seems to have been at first nothing more than a fillet of linen or cloth, intended to represent the halo symbolical of deity. Like most of the other regal ornaments, and the general apparatus of court ceremonial, the gold crown was borrowed from the Emperors of the East, who, on the establishment of Christianity as the state religion, claimed for themselves the theocratic position of the ancient Jewish kings. The crown has been worn by the English monarchs—

(1) At their Coronation. After the administration of the coronation oath by the Archbishop of Canterbury, a special service is celebrated in Wostminster Abbey, in the course of which the Dean of Westminster solemnly anoints the new king with holy oil, the great dignitaries invest him with the regalia, the imposition of the crown, performed by the archbishop himself, constituting the essential act of investiture. At that moment "the trumpets sound, the drums beat, and the people with loud and repeated shouts cry 'God save the king!' A signal is also given from the battlements of the church, at which the twenty-one great guns in St. James's Park are fired, and also the ordnance of the Tower.'

(2) In the Norman and Angevin periods at the Courts or Parliaments held on the three great Church festivals of the year, Christmas, Easter, and Michaelmas. Edward I. first omitted the custom, "saying merrily," that "crowns do rather onerate than honour princes."

The regalia used for the coronation were, till the Reformation, kept in the custody of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, both for security and as an assertion of the national character of investiture. On the dissolution of the monasteries, they were transferred from the national to the royal keeping in the Tower. The Long Parliament destroyed them, as a protest against monarchical government. On the Restoration a new set was made, which exists at the present day.

[H. R. R.]

Crown Lands were in pre-Norman times of wide extent, all the folk-land (q.v.) gradually becoming terra regis, and the amount of this was considerably increased by the confiscations of William I. [Crown.] The re-grants, however, to the king's followers and friends soon reduced the amount of land held by the crown, and under Henry III. it was necessary to pass an Act of resumption, while in the reign of Edward II. an Act was for some time in force forbidding the alienation of crown lands. The royal demesnes were largely increased by forfeitures in the Wars of the Roses, by the acquisitiveness of Henry VII., and by the ecclesiastical confiscations of Henry VIII.; but the necessities of James I. and Charles I., and the action of the Long Parliament, disposed of all the royal estates, which were only recovered in part by the Parliamentary sales being declared void at the Restoration. The wholesale granting away of the crown lands has a distinct constitutional importance, as having compelled the king to apply to Parliament and the nation for his income, which was often granted only on condition of good government. The lavishness of William III. necessitated an Act in the reign of Anne, by which the alienation of crown lands was greatly checked; though, in 1800, this Act was declared not to apply to the private property of the sovereign, acquired by purchase or inheritance from any one not being a sovereign of England. Since George III., the sovereign on his accession has always surrendered the crown lands to be disposed of by Parliament, like the other revenues of the state, for the public service; their superintendence lies with the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.

Crusades, THE. The general history of these religious wars does not come within the scope of the present work, but a few words must be said regarding the influence of the Crusades on English history. In the first place, the fact that Robert of Normandy joined the first Crusade and, in his anxiety to ruise money for his expedition, pawned Normandy to William Rufus, perpetuated for 120 years the connection of England with that duchy. Again, the eager crusading spirit of Richard I. necessitated his raising money by every expedient. Thus charters were sold to towns many of which thereby obtained privileges which they would otherwise probably never have acquired; the feudal rights of England over Scotland were renounced, and the independenco of that kingdom recognised for the first time; offices of all kinds were bought from the king, and the buyers were anxious to recoup themselves out of the pockets of the people. But Richard I.'s Crusade did more than this; not only did the king's absence from England and the oppressive government of his minister Longchamp (q.v.) give John the opportunity of coming forward as the champion of the barons and the people, and thereby of earning for him a popularity which did much to support him when he came to the throne himself, but the heavy taxes imposed in Richard's absence, and the large sum that had to be raised to pay his ransom, combined with the harsh rule of the royal ministers, greatly alienated the people from the king; and whereas, up to this time, there had been an alliance between the king and the people against the oppression and turbulence of the feudal nobles, now parties are changed it is the king who is the oppressor of the people, while the barons come forward as their champions, and thus the way is paved for that alliance which, in the next reign, produced Magna Charta. Of later Crusades the most important in English history is the one led by Richard of Cornwall in 1240; while Edward I., by taking the Cross in 1268, relieves England of the presence of many of the leading nobles whose absence for a while was necessary if the wounds caused by the Barons' War were to be healed. But on the whole the direct influences of the Crusades were felt less in England than in most of the countries of Europe.

Culdees, THE. There has been great controversy both as to the origin and application of the name Culdee. The derivation is probably the Ce. ic Celc De, worshipper of God not Cælicola, Cælebs, or Columba, as some have tried to prove). The name does not appear until after the expulsion of the Columban monks from the Pictish kingdom by Nectan Mac Derili in 717; so the Culdees are in no way to be identified with the early Columban monks; they were anchorites rather than monks, practically independent, being under the control of their own abbots, and owning no allegiance to Rome until they were forced to conform by the action of Alexander and David. Mr. Skene says Mr. Skene says of them, "They originally sprang from that ascetic order who adopted a solitary service of God in an isolated cell as the highest form of religious life, and who were termed Deicolæ. They were finally brought under the canonical rule along with the secular clergy, retaining, however, to some extent, the nomenclature of the monastery, until at length the name of Keledens or Culdee became almost synonymous with that of 'secular canon.'" The chief Culdee monasteries in Scotland were at Lochlevon, St. Andrews, Abernethy, Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dunblane. The Culdees were known in Ireland as early as the ninth century, and continued to exist as a sect of secular priests up to the time of the Reformation. Their chief establishment was at Armagh.

Cullen, Cardinal (b. 1803, d. 1878), was Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Primate of Ireland, and Apostolic Delegate. Descended from an ancient Celtic family, he entered the priesthood and became head of the Irish College in Rome, and, for a short time, of the Propaganda. Before he became Primate he had been Archbishop of Dublin. The government owed much to him in the Fenian rising, against which he spoke with great vigour; he also did much to encourage the temperance cause.

Culloden, or Drummossie Moon, was the scene of the closing effort on the part of the Stuarts to regain the English crown. The Pretender, Charles Edward, commanded an army of Highlanders, who were utterly defeated by the royal troops under the Duke of Cumberland (q.v.). This memorable battle was fought April 16, 1746. [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD, JACOMTES.]

Culpepper, Sir Thomas (d. 1541), was a relative of Catherine Howard, and one of those executed on a confession of having committed adultery with her. Sir Thomas Culpepper, it appears, had not only carried on a criminal correspondence with the queen before her marriage, but had had the hardihood, when the court was staying at Lincoln in 1541, to get introduced, by the agency of Lady Rochford, into the queen's bed-chamber. On inquiries being made as to the queen's conduct both after as well as before her marriage, Culpepper and Lady Rochford were both executed for high treason.

Cumberland, George Clifford, 3rd EARL OF (b. 1558, d. 1605), "one of the most remarkable characters of his age," early displayed a taste for naval adventure. In 1586 he inflicted considerable damage on the Portuguese commerce, and two years later commanded a ship in the attack on the Spanish Armada off Calais. He subsequently engaged in several marauding expeditions against the Spaniards, and in 1598 took Porto Rico. The earl, besides being renowned for his dashing exploits by sea, was an accomplished courtier and a great favourito of the queen, by whom he was made a Knight of the Garter, though his character was not altogether free from stain. "Before his death," says Mr. Cunningham, "he had squandered his fortune; nor, high as he may rank as a man of talent, science, enterprise, and chivalry, is his memory as a husband free from the charge of cruelty."

Cumberland, Henry Clifford, 1st Earl of (d. 1542), was famous as the only northern noble who remained loyal to the king's cause during the formidable insurrection of 1536, known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace." His successful defence of Skipton Castle against the vigorous attack of the rebels was an important check to their otherwise triumphant progress through the districts north of the Humber, and considerably advanced him in the confidence and favour of the king. He was created Earl of Cumberland in July, 1525.

of (b. 1721, d. 1765), was the second son of George II. and Queen Caroline. He adopted a military career, and in 1743 was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1745 we find him objecting to his projected marriage with a deformed Dutch princess, and sending to the dying Lord Orford [Walfole] for advice. Orford recommended him to agree, on condition of receiving an ample establishment, which would at once cause the king to drop the project. The plan was successful. In the same year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the allies in Flanders. He fought with distingu shed gallantry at the glorious defeat of Fontenoy. He was then recalled to oppose the advance of the Young Pretender through England, and made Lichfield his head-quarters. He was out-manceuvred by the insurgents, however, and the Scotch got between him and London. On their retreat from Derby, he started in pursuit, but was defeated in a skirmish at Clifton, and allowed the Highlanders to retire unmolested. After the defeat at Falkirk, he was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, and arrived at Holyrood on Jan. 30, 1746. He utterly defeated Charles Edward at Culloden (q.v.). The defeated Highlanders were treated with great brutality, many of them being put to death in cold blood, and the country was systematically harried. By these crucitics the duke gained the title of "the Butcher." The thanks of Parliament, and a pension of £25,000 a year, were voted him. In 1747 he again commanded in Flanders, but was defeated at the battle of Laufeldt. Shortly afterwards he transmitted to the French overtures of peace. In 1757 ho was sent to command the army in Hanover. He was worsted in July at the battle of Laufeldt, and his disorganised army being surrounded by the enemy, he was compelled to sign a convention at Closter-Seven. "Hcre," said George II., when he received him, "is my son, who has ruined me and disgraced himself." The duke promptly resigned his military appointments. For the remainder of his life he lived in seclusion, his chief friend being Henry Fox. In 1765 George III., wishing to rid himself of Gren-ville and Bedford, applied to his uncle for help. The latter applied to Pitt, but found that statesman, influenced by Temple, inclined to proposals which could not be accepted. The duke, therefore, turne to Whig houses, and prevailed on them to form a ministry, with Rockingham at its head. His death at Windsor was remarkably sudden, although ne had previously suffered from a paralytic stroke, and his constitution had been utterly broken. "Of all the members of the royal family," says Mr. Lecky, "with the exception of Queen Caroline, he was the only one who possessed any remarkable ability."

Cumbria—(1) etymologically, is a more correct form of Cambria, and equivalent to Cumberland, i.e., the land of the Cymry or Welsh; (2) historically, is used first in a wider sense to denote the Brythonic district between the Clyde and the Ribble, and west of the Pernine Range and Ettrick Forest, which retained its nativo (Cymric) population after the English Conquest, and became in the sixth century a single state; secondly, in a narrower sense it is confined to the scuthernmost portion of that district, the modern Cumberland, the northern portion being called Reged and Strathelyde. But Strathelyde is also used as equivalent to Cumbria in the wider sense. The dissolution of the Roman power in Britain seems to have led to a reversion to the primitivo divisions of the Britons, but the constant pressure of the enemy forced them, no less than the English themselves, to greater union. Hence, by the sixth century, the larger Cumbris was consolidated by Rhydderch Hael (561) into a single state. It had already been, according to one theory, the main seat of the power of Arthur and the Gwledigau, had sent Cunedda to Gwynedd, and had produced the Four Bards, Taliesin, Aneurin, Merddyn, and Llywarch Hen. If the Goidel still ruled in much of North Wales, it was the largest homogeneous British state. In conjunction with the Kings of Scots and North Welsh, Rhydderch, in 573, finally defeated the heathen party at the battle of Ardgoryd (Arthuret, near Carlisle). He brought Kentigern back from St. Asaph to found the bishopric of Glasgow. Alcluyd, the modern Dumbarton (fort of the Britons) became at once the northernmost stronghold and capital of the state. Carlisle was the chief fortress of its southern portion. The Cumbrian state became so powerful that it attempted before long to attack the ngles of Northumbria; but the terrible Æthelfrith revonged himself by the conquest of Chester and the massacre of the monks of Banger Iscoed; and as the conquests of Edwin included the two Monas, they could hardly have left out "Strathclyde," as Cumbria was now often called. Whether Cadwallon, the ally of Penda, was or was not a Cumbrian cannot be decided; but his fall, in conjunction with the severance of the communication between Gwynedd and Cumbria, prevented the formation of a single great Welsh state. A long gap in Cumbrian history marks the overlordship of the Northumbrian Bretwaldas. At their fall, kings of the "Strathelyde Wealas" again appear (e.g., their deaths are mentioned in 694 and 722), but they possess mentioned in 694 and 722, but they possess only local importance; and the continuance of the Anglian influence in Galloway (q.v.) must have almost cut their state in two. In the ninth century we read of the desolation of Alcluyd by the Danes, and a later Welsh legend speaks o. a migration from the Vale of Clyde to the Vale of Clwyd. But the false etymology involved in the identification of two words sufficiently refutes this unlikely story. In the tenth century a line of Scottish princes became rulers of Cumbria, and, in 946, Edmund of Wessex conquered the whole country. He probably annexed the district south of the Derwent, and certainly bestowed all north of that stream on Malcolm, King of Scots, in return for allegiance and help against the Danes. But the connection with England did not cease, at least for the part south of the Solway, - hich William Rufu, in 1092, annexed to England. Its ruler, polfin, was an Englishman, so that, before the possible colonisation of Rufus, which revived Carlisle, almost in ruins since Danish devastations in the eighth century, the Cymric character of the district had not been entirely kept up. The county of Cumberland and bishopric of Carlisle were now founded; but the northern part still remained in the main an appanage of Scotland, and was bestowed by the Scottish kings on their sons. Yot a twolfth century charter speaks of the "Walenses" as a separate race, and it is possible that their speech lingered in remote valleys until the Reformation. The last remnant of Cumbrian independence was confined to the Pictish or Goidelic enclave of Galloway, and their amalgamation with the "Scots" into a single homogeneous nation by the common bond of anti-English feeling was the result of the injudicious legalism of Edward I.

Curfew, The, was introduced into England by William the Conqueror. By this custom a bell was rung in every town at eight o'clock in winter and atsunset in summer, when all fires and lights had to be extinguished This regulation caused a great clamour in England, although the custom was at that time almost universal throughout Europe; it was a call to prayers, an intimation that it was bed-time, and a means of guarding against fire. According to William of Malmesbury, Henry I. allowed candles to be used at court after curfew bell. The custom of ringing the curfew as an intimation of the approach of night was continued down to the seventeenth century, or even later, though the obligation to extinguish fires had, of course, been long since abandoned.

Curis Regis. The name Curis Regis was at different times applied to taree distinct bodies:—(1) The fendal assembly of the tenants-in-chief; (2) the Privy Council, organised under Henry I.; (3) the Court of King's Bench, founded in 1178. (1) In the first signification, the Curia Regis combined the characters of Saxon witan and Norman feudal court, and constituted the Great Conneil of the Realm, whose consent was required for the imposition of extraordinary taxes and the enactment of new laws, and whose advice on questions of State policy tho king was expected at least to onsult. In tho presence of this b dy was undertaken every royal measure of national importance, judicial, financial, executive, and legislative, for as yet no distinction between the different functions of government was recognised; and thrico a year, on the great Church festivals, Christmas, Eastor, and Whitsuntide, the king wore his crown in a solemn session convened at one of the provincial capitals. ?) But such a body was at once too uneldy for the prompt despatch of business, and too intermittent to preserve administrative continuity. An inner council soon appeared, the nucleus of which was provided in the royal household, and took shape under Henry I. as the Caria Regis proper. It was practically a committee of the first, entrusted with the administration generally, legislation remaining, of course, with the national council, and cor l of the great officers Jhancellor, Treasurer; of State, Justic the members of the royal household, Constable, Marshal, &c.; a number of clerks, chosen by the crown. This mixed composition was typical of the character of the body, which in different aspects might be regarded as (a) the Privy Council, (b) a Bureau of Administration, (c) a High Court of Justice, and out of which have sprung all the administrative institutions of the kingdom. In Henry I.'s eyes, finance was at once the end and the means of government. It was in his reign, therefore, that the Curis threw out the first of its many offshoots, the Court of Exchequer, organised by the Great Justiciar, Roger le Poer, Bishop of Salisbury, unless, indeed, the two bodies are parallel developments of the household, sitting in different capacitics. From this moment the Curia Regis confines itself mainly to judicial work, and its members are styled Justices. All appeals, such cases of first instance as touched either the royal interest or the rights and conduct of tenants-in-chief, came before this court, whose jurisdiction was further extended by the system of writs to cases in which the customary law of the local courts could give no sufficient remedy. [Justices.] How far the Exchequer and the ('uria Regis were co-extensive is uncertain; this at least is known: that every baron of the Exchequer sat also as a justice of the Curia Legis, and that to the intimate connection between the two we owe the system of judicial circuits. The first itinerant visitation by members of the inner council was directed solely to the assessment and collection of the royal dues; but as an important fraction of the revenue was derived from the fines inflicted in criminal cases, one duty of the Treasury officer was to entor the shire court, and hold the pleas of the crown. What was begun by the Exchequer from financial considerations, the Curia Regis continued and extended from motives of policy. It was not, however, till the reorganisation under Henry II., after the anarchy of Stephen's reign, that the system became part of the regular judicial machinery; and on the reservation to the Curia Regis of the three assizes of Novel disseism (disputed claim to land), Mort d'ancester (inheritanco), Darein presentment (advowsons), regular circuits were established. [Assize.] (3) The Curia Regis still continued to sit collectively, accompanying the king's movements from place to place. In 1178 the increasing importance of the judicial work induced Henry to establish a separato committee of five judges to hear the pleas of the crown (criminal actions), who were to be fixed to one spot. This is the origin of the Court of King's Bench, the Curia Regis in the third and most restricted sense, "the judicial committee of the conciliar committee of the full Curia Regis." To art. 17 of Magna Charta is due the separation of the third law court, that of Common Pleas (civil actions), which enacts that "The Common Pleas shall not fellow our court, but shall be held in some fixed place." But the complete separation of the three bodies by the establishment of a separate staff of justices for each was not accomplished till late in the reign of Henry III.

The Court of Equity is but another offshoot of the Curia Regis. Petitions for redress of the hardships often inflicted by the common law continued to be heard by the king, in the Privy Council. As these multicame the custom for the Chanage them before their submission to s, and roject the more extravagant. Insertictly, this preliminary sorting assumed greater prominence, till by the reign of Richard II. it superseded the final examination altogether, and the Chancellor's jurisdiction took its place among the regular law

This fecundity, however, did not alter the character, though it impaired the vitality, of the Curia Regis, which, after an intermittent activity during the Lancastrian period, was organised, on the accession of the Tudors, into the Star Chamber, a supreme court, specially directed against the lawlessness of tho great feudal houses; and to this day the Privy Council retains, though it never exercises, its ancient judicial competence. As head of the Executive, the Curia Regis is also the lineal ancestor of the present Privy Council, and its infinitely more important offspring,

Curran, John Philipor (b. 1750, d. 1817), was born of humble parents at Newhenket, county Cork, and in 1775 he was called to the Irish bar. He soon rose to eminence. In 1782 he took silk, and in the following year was returned by a friend for a close borough in Westmeath. He at once took up the popular cause in Parliament, and was soon recognised as one of the most brilliant orators in the assembly. In 1785 Fitzgibbon, the Attornoy-General, challenged him to a duel, on account of some sarcastic words which Curran had uttered about him in Parliament. The duel ended without bloodshed, but Fitzgibbon, as Lord Clare, throughout his life did his best to ruin his adversary. In Parliament Curran was, in ability at least, if not in position, the leader of the Whig party, and as such he strongly opposed the measures of Pitt's government with regard to Ireland. In 1806 Carran was appointed Master of the Rolls. In 1814 he retired on a pension. His health gratually broke down, and in his cafeebled state his mind gave way, and he put an end to his life at Chel a on the 13th Oct., 1817. "Mr. Curran's laco at the Irish bar," says his biographe "has not ever been approached since his parture. There is no man, not merely next him, hut near him."

Curson, George Nathaniel, first Baron Curson of Kedleston (b. 1859), was educated at Eton and Balliol. He was Under-Secretary for India in 1891-2, and for Foreign Affairs from 1895 to 1898. In January, 1899, he was made Viceroy and Governor-General of India, being raised to the peerage on his appointment. In 1900 he had to deal with the worst famine which India has experienced under British rule. He has caused the formation of a new province, called the North-West Frontier Province. On Jan. 1, 1903, he presided at a great Durbar at Delhi in honour of the coronation of the first British Emperor of India. His term of office was extended after the Delhi Durbar, but he resigned in 1905.

Customs first appear in England in the thirteenth century, as the duties levied on wine, wool, and general merchandise. The tax on wine, which was taken in kind, was called prisage. Wool, the chief source of English wealth, was often made the subject of violent extortion, and the exorbitant at taken on it was called the maletote. General merchandise was subject to an advalorem toll. By the Great Charter, art. 41, the king promised liberty of trade according to the ancient and lawful customs, without any maletotes. Much uncertainty prevailed as to the amount which should be levied on merchandise, until the first Parliament of Edward I.

1275, granted the king a fixed amount on weed, skins, and leather, which is called the customa magna et antiqua. This grant is the constitutional foundation of the customs. To this grant the king, in the Confirmatio Cartarum, 1297, promises to conform. He did not consider that he broke his word by making an arrangement with the foreign merchants for the payment of higher duties . both on the export of wool, &c., and on the import of wine and other merchandise. This increase was called the parra, or nora custuma. It was abolished and restored in the reign of Edward 11., and in the next reign became part of the ordinary revenue, and was recognised by statute. The popularity which attended the early part of the French war caused Parliament to grant the king extraordinary and oppressive customs on wool, which amounted to the maletote. A statuto of 1340 provided that this exaction should not be made a precedent, and that the king should take no duties without the consent of his Parliament. During the latter part of his reign he obtained increased customs by arrangement with the merchants. At last, after a considerable struggle, all such arrangements were, in 1362, declared illegal. In the first half of the fourteenth century the customs on wine and merchandise were taken at a certain rate per tun and per pound, by special agreement with merchants and towns. These customs were, in 1373, mado the subject of a grant by Parliament, and are then called tunnage and poundage. From the fourth year of Henry IV. to the ninth year of William III. the duty per pound on all export and import merchandise, except wool, &c., was 1s., and for this cause the term subsidy came to denote a general duty of 5 per cent. Henry V. first received the grant of tunnage and poundage for life, and this grant was made to all subsequent sovereigns until the reign of Charles I. In spite of the settlement of the right to levy customs, both Mary and Elizabeth acted on their own authority in the matter. Yet so trifling was the exaction in either case, that the very innovations of these queens seemed to acknowledge the strength of the claim which Parliament had so long upheld. James added fresh "impositions," as these arbitrary cus-toms were called. These impositions were resisted, but were declared legal by tho judges in Bata's Case. Their decision was followed hy the production in 1608 of a new book of rates, which added imposition to the amount of £70,000 to the lawful customs. Against this usurpation the Commons vigorously protested. When Charles came to the throne, the Commons, for the first time in two hundred years, would not g nt tunnage and poundage to the king for life. The king levied the tax without the grant, and (1628) seized the goods of the merchants who refused to pay it. In 1640, however, an Act was passed (16 Car. 1., c. 8), declaring that no such payments ought to be imposed without common consent in Parliament. At the Restoration the customs were again granted to the king for life, and a book of rates was authorised by Parliament, and signed by the Speaker. The settlement of the revenue after the Revolution closed the history of the political importance of the customs. By 9 Anne, c. 6, tunnage and poundage became part of the national income, and was made liable for the public debt; and in the reign of George 11. the last remnant of the old customs was obliterated by the purchase of the right of prisage from the Duke of Grafton, to whose family it had been granted. The system of levying customs by books of rates, which often caused confusion and loss, was abolished by 27 Geo. III., c. 13, the Customs Consolidation Act, which provided a simple and uniform scheme of taxation. Since that date several alterations have been made in the customs. Among these changes, the most remarkable are those effected by the Customs Turiff Amendment Art of 1860. This was the result of a treaty with France, and by the reduction of the duty on wine effected by Mr. Gladstono, it has made the light wines of France cheap in England. Beneficial as this Act has been, it falls short in two respects of the highest standard of policy as regards eustoms. It made the regulation of our finances the subject of a treaty with a foreign country, and it introduced un element of uncertainty into a tax, by levying the duty on wine in proportion to the alcoholit contained The whole subject of duties on merchandise is regarded in a different light now to that which ruled our policy in connection with the customs a century and a half age. Then taxes on commodities were imposed with a viow to protecting nativo industry, and to benefit particular trades. Now the principle which causes their imposition is the necessity of obtaining revenue; not as an effort to favour home produce at the expense of the foreign producer. It was also widely held that a nation acted wisely in prohibiting or checking the export of useful commodities, and for this reason in early times the export customs formed the principal, and even in later times a considerable, part of the taxes on merchandise. Sir R. Walpolo saw the fallacy of this theory, and made a step towards free trade by abolishing in one year duties en 106 exports and 38 imports. The system of drawbacks, originally looked on simply as a means of encouraging our shipping, has now been perfected by allowing the repayment of the whole import duty on the re-exportation of foreign goods. By the use of bonded warehouses, the merehant is enabled to pay the custom at the time most convenient to himself. This system was conceived by Sir R. Walpole, and carried out in 1803. The management of the customs is in the hands of a chairman and a board of commissioners (6 Geo. 1V., c. 100), who are under the control of the Commissioners of the Treasury.

Custos Lotulorum is an officer of great antiquity who serves the function of keeper of the records of the sessions of a county. Acts were passed in 37 Henry VIII. (1545) and 3 & 4 Ed. VI. (1549) considerably limiting his importance, and the office was finally regulated in 1688. He must be a justice of the peace, and of the quorum, and is now usually the lord-licutenant of a county, though the two offices are quite distinct, the one being military, the other civil.

Cutch is a native state of India which forms a peninsula to the south of Scinde. The Rao of Cutch entered into an agreement with the East India Company in 1809, and concluded treaties with Great Britain in 1816. Piracy was largely carried on by the inhabitants, and on this account, and in order to check the misgovernment of the province, the English intervened and deposed the Rao. By a treaty with Great Britain made in 1822, the country became tributary to England, and received a Resident appointed by the Bombay government.

Cuthbert, Sr. (d. 687), was in all probability a native of Northumbria, and born in the district which afterwards became the Lothians. Farly in life he became a monk and afterwards prior, at Melrose, under its first abbot, Eata, one of the disciples of Aidan, and followed him when he was transferred to Ripon. Subsequently, Eata was appointed Abbot of Lindisfurne, and Cuthbert accompanied him thither as prior, whence he retired to a hermitage on the adjacent island of Farne. At the entreaties of Egfred o. Northumbria ho quitted his retreat and allowed himself to be consecrated Bishop of Lindisfarne by Archbishop Theodore (685) Before his death, he again retired to his seclusion at Farne, where he died, March 20 687. Cuthbert's life while at Mclrose and Lindisfarne was one long missionary effort He travelled over all northern Northumbria and converted great numbers from heathen ism. His famo was very great in the north and many miracles were ascribed to his relica Throughout the Middle Ages his shrine a Durham was a great centre of pilgrimage and he continued to be the favourite sain of northern England.

Wessex to what it had been in the days of Ini. In 743, in conjunction with the Mercians, he defeated the Britons. In 752 Cuthred and his people rose against the yoke of the Mercians, and utterly defeated the Mercian king Etheibald at hurford, on the borders of Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire. In the next year he once more defeated the Britons, and died in 754 or 755, after a victorious career. [Wassex.]

Cuttack. The country on the Coromandel coast forming the northern portion of Orissa, and lying eastward of Berar. It was conquered by the Mahrattas in 1751, and taken from them by the British at the outset of the campaign of 1803.

Cutts, John, Lonn (d. 1707), served with great gallantry in the wars of the reigns of William III. and Anne. At the buttle of the Boyne he led the English regiments that had served under the States General, and was rewarded by an Irish peerage. He led the forlorn hope at the siege of Namur, and for his utter contempt of danger on that occasion obtained the honourable nickname of "the Salamander." In 1702 he led the storming party against Fort St. Michael, the stronghold of Venloo; and at the battle of Blenheim he conducted the assault on the village, but was repulsed with terrible loss. In 1705 he was made Commander-in-chief, and one of the Lord Justices of Ireland.

Cwichelm (b. 611, d. 636) was the son of Cynegils, King of the West Saxons, and for some time shared the throne of his father. Jealous of the power of Edwin of North-umbria, in 626 he sent off one of his servants with a poisoned dagger to murder that king, whose life was saved only by the devotion of his dependant, Edmer. Two years later Cwichelm and his father were worsted in a battle near Circnesster by the Mercian king Penda. In 636 Cwichelm was baptized at Dorchester (on the Thames) by Birinus, and died the same year.

Cymbeline (Cunobelin) was a British chief, whose capital was at Camulodunum (Colchester), and who, from the number of coine bearing his name, seems to have been a very powerful prince. [ColNAGE.] The wellknown Caractacus was his son.

Cynegils, King of Wessex (611-643), was the son of Ceolric, and nephew of Ceol. wulf, whom he succeeded. His son or brother, Cwickelm, seems to have been associated with him in the government. In 614 they fought against the Briton at Bampton, and routed them. They appear to have been hard pressed by the Northumbrians and Mercians, under Edwin and Penda and Mercians, under Edwin and Penua respectively. In 628 Penua attacked Cirencester, and a treaty was mede there which probably circumscribed the boundaries of Wessex on the north-west. In 635 Cynegiis was converted to Christianity by Birinus (q.v.), and was baptized at Dorchester.

Cynewulf, King of Wessex (755?-784 F), was descended from Cerdic, and became king on the deposition of Sigebert. He engaged in several hard-fought, though successful, conflicts with the Britons, but at what place and in what year we are not informed. He had a formidable rival in Offa of Mercia, and in 777 the stronghold of Bensington (near Wailingford) was captured by that king. In 784 Cyncwulf was murdered at Merton, in Surrey, by Cyneheard, the brother of the former king, Sigebert. This tragedy is very finely related in the Anglo-Saxon Chroniele, and the story is, as usual, applified by Happy of Happingdon. amplified by Henry of Huntingdon.

Cynric (d. 560?), the son of Cerdic, seems to have been recognised as King of the West Saxons, conjointly with his father, in 519. He extended his kingdom after his father's death to the west and north, defeating the Britons at Old Sarum.

sided with the royalists when he saw all was lost. His arrest was, nevertheless, ordered, but could not be carried into execution, owing to the large number of men who assembled at Naworth to protect its lord. On the first opportunity Dacres escaped into Scotland, and subsequently joined the Duke of Alva's army in the Low Countries.

Aiken, Elizabeth ; Sadler, State Papers.

Dacres, Lord of Hurstmonural x (d. 1541) (Lord Ducres of the South), was a young nebleman who, in company with several friends, had engaged in a deer-stealing expedition to the park of an unpopular neighbour. During the affray which ensued one of the foresters was killed, and the whole party were brought up for trial, and a verdict of wilful murder was returned. Despite all the efforts of Dacres's friends, Henry VIII. weuld not consent to spare the young man's life, saying he would deal out equal justice to all ranks. Lord Dacres was accordingly executed in 1541.

Degrastan, or Dawston, was the scene of the great victory won by Ethelfrith of Northumbris (603) over Aidan, King of the Scots, who was followed by a large force of Irish Piets and Britone. Ethelfrith was assisted by the Dalriads, and gained a signal victory. Dagsastan is probably Dawston in Roxburghshire.

Dalhousie, George, Oth Earl er (b. 1770, d. 1838), distinguished himself as a soldier in his earlier life. For his services in the French War, and especially at the battle of Waterloo, he was raised to a peerage in the United Kingdom. In 1816 he was appointed Geovernor of Nova Scotia, and four years later Governor-General of Canada. More of a soldier than a statesman, he failed to cenciliate the democratic party, who were clameuring for reforms. About this time a committee of the Heuse of Commons declared the grievances of the Canadians to be real, and in 1828 Lord Dalhousie was recalled.

Dalhousie, James Andrew Brown-Ramsay, 1st Marquis and 10th Earl of (b. 1812, d. 1860), was the third son of the ninth Earl of Dalhousie, and was educated at Harrow and Oxford. He entered the House of Commons young, but was soon called to the Upper House, on his father's death. Under Sir Robert Peel's ministry he was successively Vice-President and President (1844) of the Board of Trade—a post in which he did much to develop our railway system. On the fall of Sir Robert Peel's government he did not quit effice, but was soon appointed Governor-General of India (1848). It was a time of great peril for British India, where the Sikhs were threatening much trouble, and in such an emergency Dalhousie determined to be on the scene of danger.

After the victories of Goojerat and Moultan, he re-organised the government of the Punjaub, and in 1852, by the capture of Pegu, completed the frontier of British Burmah. The remainder of his term of office was occupied in consolidating the great empire under his rule. Oude and Nagpore, ln addltion to Pegu and the Punjaub, were brought directly under our government, while the Civil Service was more and more thrown open to all natural born subjects of the crown, English and Hindoo alike. Under the stralu his heaith began to fail, and in 1856 he resigned office, and soon afterwards left Calcutta for Europe. Parliament passed a vote of thanks to him for his services, and the government showed is sense of his merits by creating him a marquis.

Dalling and Bulwer, Katar Lytrow Earle Belwer, Lord (b. 1961, d. 1872), was sent as Minister to Sadrid in 1843, where he remained until, in 1848, he was ordered to leave the kingdom upon presenting to the queen - mother Lord Palmerston's recommendations to adopt a more Liberal policy. From 1849 to 1852 he was Minister at Washington (where he negotiated the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty), and from 1852 to 1855 at Flerence. From 1857 till 1865 he was ambassador at Constantinople. In 1871 he was created Baron Dalling and Bulwer.

Dalrinda—Dal-Riada, "the home of the descendants of Riada"—was (1) a district in Ireland, including the northern half of county Antrim, apparently one of the oldest settlements of the Scots among the Picts of Ulster; (2) the name given to the district of Argyleshire, settled by the immigrant Scots from Ireland. [For the history of the Kingdom of Dalriada, see article on Scots.]

Dalry, The Battle of, was an engagement fought between John of Lorn, a relation of Comyn, and Rebert Bruce. In this engagement the Scottish king distinguished himself by the skill with which he meved back his armoured knights from the swarm of half-naked Highlanders, who made the attack upon ground that was essentially unfavourable for the operations of cavalry.

Dalrymple, Sir Hew (b. 1750, d. 1830), ebtained an ensign'a commission in the 31st Regiment in 1762. After helding various ether commands, he was in 1806 appointed Governor of Gibraltar, where he remained until August, 1808, when he was placed in neommand of the British army in Portugal. taking full advantage of his victory. On Junot's proposal, terms were very soon made by Dalrymple with the 1 rench, which were embodied in the Convention of Cintra. The news of that convention was received with the loudest indignation in England, and the three commanders were recalled, and put on their trial. Sir Hew was deprived of his command; but his disgrace was of brief duration, and terminated in 1812, when he was restored to the rank of general, while two years later he was made baronet. In 1818 he was appointed Governer of Blackness Castle, which post he seems to have held up to the time of his death. [Vimeno; Cintra.]

Dalrymple, Sin James, Master of Stair (b. 1619, d. 1695), was one of the commissioners sen to London (1689) to offer the crown of Scotland to William III. He was an able and unscrupulous man, so unpopular that the Scotch Parliament endeavoured to pass a measure disqualifying him from holding office, on the ground that he had assailed the liberties of the country in the previous reigns. His name will, owing to the orders issued by hime : Secretary for Scotland, ever be execrated in history, in connection with the Massacre of Glencoe / -). After an inquiry into the matter, he severely censured by the Estates, w. begged that his Majesty would give an orders concerning him as he mi, ht deem necessary for the vindication of his government." Lord Macaulay calls him " one of the first men of his time—a jurist, a sman, a fine scholar, ar loquent orator," and considers that his treacherous cruelty to the Maedonalds arose from the fact that regarding them as he did in the light of enemies of law, of industry, and of trade, he came altogether to forget the turpitude of the means in the excellence of the end.

Dalrymple, SIR JOHN (b. 1726, d. 1810), was born in Edinburgh, educated at Cambridge, and became an advocate at the Scotch bar, and afterwards a judge of the Scotch Exchequer. He wrote, besides some legal works, Memoirs of Great Britain from the last Parliament of Charles II. to the Battle of La Hogue, 3 vols., 1771.

Palaiel, THOMAS, GENERAL (d. 1685?), distinguished himself as an officer on the royal side in the Parliamentary w. 3. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and sent as a prisoner to the Tower, from which, however, he managed to escape to Muscovy, where heserved against the Poissand Tartars. After the stestoration, he returned home (1665), and was appointed commander-in-chief of Charles IL's forces in Scotland—a post which he heid till his death, excepting for the few days when he was superseded by the Duke of Monmouth, whom Dulziel is said to have refused to serve. He defeated the Covenanters at the battle of Pentland Hills (1666), only losing five men on his side, and after this victory is said by Burnet to have "acted the Muscovite too grossly," threatening to spit and roast all the disaffected. After the battle of Bothwell Bridge (1679), General Dalziel arrived at the royal camp with his commission renewed, and reproached the Duke of Monmouth for his leniency towards the insurgents. He was remarkable for the eccentricity of his appearance, and at London, whither he always went once a year to kiss the king's hand, drew around him a rabbie of boys to store at his huge white beard, which, not having been shaved rince the death of Charles I., reached to his wasst. He died soon after the accession of James II., In the year 1685 or 1686.

D'Amory, Roorn (d. 1322), married one of the three sisters of Gilbert of Clare, Earl of Gloucester. In 1317, when war broko out between the Earls of Lancaster and Warenne, Roger joined with the Earl of Pembroke to obtain supremacy in the king's councils. In 1320 Lancaster received his help in his attack upon the Spencers; and his name is included in a list of peers who received pardon for any illegalities they might have committed in bringing the favourites to justice (1321). His quarrel with the younger Spencer was probably due to their joint claims in the Gloucester inheritance: for they had married sisters. Later in the same year, when Edward II. took arms, Roger D'Amory was one of the first to feel the effects of the king's recovered strength. His castles were attacked, and before long he fell into the hands of his enemies at Tutbury—a misfortune which he did not long survive.

Danegeld, THE, was a tax of two shillings on each hide of land, and was levied primarily as a tribute for the Dance, though it continued long after the occasion for which it was first levied had passed sway. It seems originally to have been a tax on cultivated lands, and to have been first levied in the times of Ethelred II., probably for the first time in 991. Edward the Confessor abolished it, but William the Conqueror seems to have revived it again at a threefold rate of six shillings the hide (1084). This tax was continued until the reign of Henry II. An imposition apparently almost identical in chalacter ith the Danegeld, of two shillings on the hide, ... rmed one of the earliest points of dispute between Henry II. and Bæket in 1163; and as from this vevy year the Danegeld ceased to be a distinct item in the king's revenue, it is inferred that the Dunegeld was thus abolished by the energetic opposition of the archbishop. From this time it was for some years represented in the accounts by a tax, under the name of donum, or auxilium [A10], which, according to Dr. Stubbs, was still levied on a new computation of hidaye, till under Richard I. it acquired the new name of carucage (q.v.).

Danelagh (DANELAW, or DENALAGU). The name given to that part of England where Danish blood, customs, and laws had to a greater or less extent modified, or usurped the place of, the corresponding Anglian features. Roughly speaking, we may say that the Danish influence gradually lessened as the distance from Yorkshire inereased. The extent of Daneland varied at different periods. The great stretch of eountry that was in later times included under the general name of the Danelagh seems to have been due to three, if not four, different eolonisations. First eame the settlement in Deira, which, beginning with the conquest of York in 867, was consummated when Halfden separated from the southern here in 875, and next year divided Deira among his host. The southern part of this province may be eonsidered as the very heart of the settlement, the district where the Danes were most numerous. Here the typical Danish endings thorps and caster and by occur in the greatest profusion. But the Danes do not appear to have spread into Laneashire iu any numbers, and the Norse names in Cumberland and Westmoreland are probably due to invasions of another time and family. Nor do the Danes seem to have colonised beyond the Tees. have colonised beyond the Tees. Across this boundary river, with a few exceptions, the tons and tho hams are the rule, and it is said that only four bys are to be found north of the found ports of the rule. to be found north of the last-named river. Beyond its banks are Chester-le-Street and Chesterwood; Stockton and Middleham tako the place of Doncaster, Whitby, and Barwick. But even within the more strictly Danish districts of the north, we must not suppose an extirpation of the Anglian inhabitants. These being very near by blood and language to their conquerors, the latter came in merely as new lords, and an entirely fresh state of things was not set up. So Collingham lies close by Wetherby and Alverthorpe by Wakefield, and Chester House not very far from North Allerton. The second great Danish colony was that of Lincoln, which seems to have spread down to the borders of Holland (a district distinctly non-Danish in its local nomenclature), and is marked by the same general features as the colony in Deira, only in a less degree. The heart of this settlement seems to have been in the Lindsey uplands. The partition of this part of the country took place probably in 877. The colonisation of Lindsey seems to be distinct from that which included Leicester, Nottingham, Derby, and Northampton, and which, in some parts, even extended a few miles beyond Watling Street. In later years this settlement appears in history as embracing Lincoln, and is then known as the "Five Boroughs." The fourth and last important Danish conquest was that of East Anglia and Essex. But here the eolonisation must have been very slight. The typical Danish endings are comparatively rare both in Norfolk and Suffolk, and there is only one district that is largely characterised by the by termination: that lying round the mouth of the Yare. Such were the three or four great divisions of the Danish settlements in England, and their furthest extent is marked by the Treaty of Wedmore between Alfred and Guthrum, as up the Thames to the Lee, along the Lee to its source, then to Bedford, and thence up the Ouse to Watling Street. But the whole of this territory can never have been in any strict sense Danish, and the greater part was gradually won back, and in-eorporated with the West Saxon monarchy. Under Edward the Elder, the greater part of Mercia and Essex was recovered; East Anglia submitted in 921, as did the Danish earldom of Northampton; while in 941, the Five Boroughs were finally won for the West Saxon erown. Meanwhile, the Danish kingdom of the north had been tottering, and was deprived of its independence by Edred (854).

There are, unfortunately, very few materials remaining from which to reconstruct the special features oven of those divisions of the Danelagh where the Scandinavian influence was strongest. The two great settlements of Deira and Lindsey were divided into ridings, or trithings, and these again sub-divided into wapentakes-a term which corresponds with the hundreds of the south. The court of the trithing was superior to that of the wapentake, and this arrangement has been considered to point to a systematic division of the land, nicre especially as, in Yorkshire, all three ridings converge towards the town of York. In Domesday, Leieestershire, Notting-hamshire, and Derbyshire appear as divided into vapentakes, but the trithing, as was to be expected, is not to be found in these counties. Northamptonshire and Rutland had both wapentakes and hundreds; while the East Anglian counties had neither trithing nor wapentake. East Anglia was for a time governed by its own Danish king, as was Deira in the north; but there does not appear to have been any such dignity in Lindsey or the Five Boroughs, though each of the five towns may have had its own army, with its own earl, and the occurrence of twelve lawmen in Lincoln and Stamford may perhaps point to a similar form of government in Leicester and the other two towns. The difference in law between Danish and West Saxon Britain cannot have heen very great. "The customs of compurgation, wergeld, and other pecuniary compositions for the breach of the peace, were common to both races. But, while hy Alfred's treaty with Guthrum, English and Danes were in East Anglia reckoned equally dear, in York-shire, the wergeld of the Danish hold was greater than that of the Anglian or Saxon thegn, Mr. Robertson considers that the Northern Danes "eradicated every vestige of proprietary rights in the districts actually colonised," whereas the Eastern Danes quietly settled down alongside of the earlier Anglian inhabitants; and Dr. Stubbs has noticed how fully the allodial tenure must have been reinstated in Yorkshire and East Anglia. But in any case, however trifling they may have been, certain easily recognisable distinctions did separate the laws and customs of the Danelagh from those of Mercia and Wessex. It is to this fact that Edgar alludes when he wills that "with the Danes, such laws should stand as they best may choose; " or, again, when he to their law." Canute recognises the samo distinction, which re-appears even after the Conquest, till it vanishes away during the wars of Stephen. With Henry II. the king's justice was in every land, and the historians of his reign, in using the term, show them-selves uncertain what shires belong to this

The following are the shires reckoned in the Danelagh at different periods:—Yorkshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Derhyshire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Camhridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire. [Danes.]

Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings; Stubbe, Constitutional History; Freeman, Norman Conquest; Green, The Conquest of England; Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England; Worsane, Danes in England; I. Taylor, Words and Places; Streatfelld, Lincolnehire and the Danes.

Danes (also called NORTHMEN, or WIKINOS) are generically the Scandinavian freebooters and immigrants (not only those from Denmark proper), whose incursions and settlements fill a large space in English history from the righth to the eleventh century.

Mr. Freeman has distinguished three stages of Danish invasion, in which the objects were plunder, settlement, and conquest respectively. (1) The first stage begins with the devastation of Northumbria, in 787. Every year saw fresh swarms of pirates pillaging the coasts, and sometimes penetrating far inland. Not only England, hut all Northern Europe, was exposed to these inroads, and as the triumphs of Charles the Great had made access to North Germany difficult, it was hy sea that they commonly went on their forays. Their object was mainly plunder. Settlement or conquest was impossible. Scandinavia was cut up into so many petty states, that the necessary degree of cohesion was hardly yet obtainable for combined efforts. with booty, the sea-kings returned to their native dales and fjords, to sally forth again at the approach of summer. Fierce heathens as yet, they destroyed every Christian shrine and sanctuary, spread universal misery and want, and added a new and terrible danger to the many terrors of early mediaval times.

(2) Within a century of the first inroads of the Wikings, a great revolution in Scandinavia began a new cra. Great kings arose in the north, who subjected to themselves the wide districts that became known as Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The jarls or petty kinglets who ruled each harad (district or county) of Scandinavia were crushed into deendence on a new centralising national power. Harold the Fair-haired (Harfagr) in Norway, Gorm the Old in Denmark, raised themselves hy sheer personal vigour into the position of kings of the whole land. Eric of Upsala, to a lesser extent, made every district of Sweden and Gottland acknowledge the political and religious supremacy of the protector of the great sanctuary of Upsala. It was the same process that was consolidating England into a single state, and which afterwards became the source of the national idea. But as in England and Germany, the new development proved a deadly foe to the primitive Teutonic polity, which had survived till the eighth century in Scandinavia, just as it had been described hy Tacitus in the first century in Ger-All conservative instincts revolted against the degradation of the sovereign jarl to the condition of personal subordination to the new monarch. The best and hravest of the Northmen abandoned their native land, and sought to win hy their swords a new home for their old polity. Hence the great Scandinavian migrations of the ninth century. Again the Northmen poured into England, seeking, like the English themselves three centuries earlier, a definite settlement. The second half of the ninth century is the limit of this period; at its close half Britain was Danish. The formidable alliance of Danes and West Welsh, which Egbert crushed at Hengestesdun, perhaps marks the beginning of the change. Under Ethelred I. of Wessex the crisis was reached. Between 867 and 869 Northumbria, long distracted hy anarchy, accepted as monarch the dependent of the pagan invaders. In 868 Mercia was overrun, and in 870 the martyrdom of the sainted King Edmund attested the completeness of their conquest of East Anglia. In 871 the ruling kingdom of the West Saxons was invaded. A brilliant series of hard-fought battles taught the invader that Wessex was not so easy a prey as the subject states. When Ethelred died in the middle of the contest, his brother Alfred kept up the struggle. He succeeded in clearing his own territory at the expense of the overlordship won by Egbert. But Deira, Northumbria, and East Angliu were regularly occupied and symmetrically divided among the conquerors with the same numerical precision as marks the ullotment of Iceland. A fresh invasion of Wessex in 878 reduced Alfred to the lowest pitch of degradation, but his marvellous revival led to the Treaty of Wedmore, that acknowledged the status quo, and gave the Danes all the land north-east of Watling Street (i.e., Chester to Hertford), and the Lea and Lower Thames. Within this Danelagh a new Scandinavia arese; and a new swarm of haradskonungr, like Guthorm of East Anglia, seemed to undo the work of the Pendas and Edwins. North of Deira an English line continued to reign in Bamborough. While this was going on in England, other settlements were being effected in the north and west. Fresh swarms of Wikings, who fied "from the tyranny of Harold Fuirhair," colonised the Orkneys, Shetland, Furoc, Hebrides, and the seuthern isles as far as Man, and in Sutherland and Caithness effected a settlement on the mainland. Indignant at their desertion, Harold went in person to subdue them to his sway. The boldest sought a remeter home in the hitherto desert Ieelar I, and thence in Greenland and Vinland (Massachusetts) are said to have established the first European colonies in the New World. Others went to the east coast of Ireland, where such names as Waterford and Wexford perpetuate the memory of the Wiking state. Thence they inflicted severo blows on Wales and Strathclyde. The abundance of fords, holms, and garths in the region round Milford Haven testifies that the wandering sea-king found amidst the deep inlets of south-western Dyfed the likeness of the fjords of his northern home. Fainter traces of a possible settlement in Anglesea, clearer ones of an occupation of the lands round Solway Firth, mark the ubiquity of the sea-kings' ravages. Sometimes, as in the Orkneys and Shetlands, and in the extreme north of Scotland, they drove away the old Celtie inhabitants. In others they displayed that capacity for assimilation with the subject race that always marked their descendants. Outside the bounds of Britain, similar colonising bands won Normandy from the Carolings, and effected smaller settlements on other parts of the Gaulish coast. Eactwards over the Baltic, Rurik and his Wikings founded a dynasty in Russia, whence the waranger carried the terror of the Scandinavian name to the court of the Eastern Cæsars. The Peace of Wedmore began a new period in the relation between English and Danes. For a century we hear little of fresh invasions from beyond sea, but a constant war went on between the Danes in England and the West Saxon monarchs who endeavoured to subdue them. Even the constant devastations of the "black pagans," which laid waste Carlisle, and harried with fearful effects Wales after the death of Howel Dha, were the work mostly of Danish settlers in Ircland, or of colonists among the Brythons themselves. The steps of this new strnggle are as fellows: Alfred rested centent with the acknowledgment of his overlordship and the recognition of Christianity among the Dunish settlers. Edward the Elder and his sister Æthelfiæd, the "Lady of the Mercians," went a step farther by building a strong line of fortress along the frontier of the Danelagh, which prevented further invasions of Wessex and West Saxon Mercia, and were startingpoints for the subjection of the sons of the Wikings. Athelstan exceeded this by establishing friendly relations with the princes of Scandinavia, by defeating the great confederacy of Danes and Celts at Brununburh, and by beginning the direct re-conquest of the lands ceded at Wedmore. Edred, or Dunstan his minister, completed the process by the conquest of Northumbria and the assumption of imperial titles. Edgar, called first to power by the northern and Danish half of the nation, consolidated the process by renewing the liberal, yet effectual, policy of Dunstan. Under him, the Danes became Englishmen, and the Danelagh a merely legal distinction. The re-conquest was thus completed. With Ethelred the Unready everything went wrong, and before long the dangers of the eighth and ninth century were revived by fresh plunderings of new Wiking hordes from Scandinavia. But the first stage thus renewed soon led to the second coming back, and the kings of the north were now too powerful to-brook subjects establishing new Normandies or Icelands at their expense. Hence they resolved to take part in these expeditions of plunder and settlement, and thus Mr. Freeman's third stage of political conquest, a stage never attained on the Continent, begins. The King of all Denmark now sets to work to conquer all England. After many failures, Swegen succeeded in his attempt, and handed down his power to his greater son, Canute, who reigned as legal King of England with the ascent of the English people, which, if formal at first, became ultimately as real as any such popular recognitions were, and was only withdrawn when the quarrels and misconduct of Hartha-canute and Harold led to the restoration of the West Saxon line in Edward the Confessor.

The really important Danish period of English history now ends; but Wiking forages were still not unknown, and expeditions of Danish and Norse princes still continued for nearly a century. In England, the great invasion of the heroic Harold Hardrada in 1066 might, if successful, have placed another Danish dynasty on the throne. All through the Conqueror's reign similar, if fainter, assaults were feared in the nominal interest of the English cause. The extraordinary career of Magnus of Norway among the Western Isles, ending in his war in Anglesea with the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury in 1098, was the last exploit of the Wikings that has any direct relation to English history. Brian Boroimhe's victory of Clontarf (1014) was the death-blow to the Scandinavian states in Ireland. But in Scotland, though Caithness was annexed in 1196, it was not till 1263 that the battle of Largs put an end to their capacity for aggression, and led to the annexation of the Western Islands to Scotland; but they retained their ecclesiastical dependence on Trondhjem till the fifteenth century, when also the Orkneys and their dependencies were practically handed over to James III. Apart from the general misery and want, there plunderings were too irregular to leave any deeply-seated effects behind them. A retrogression towards barbarism, the decline of learning and culture that attended the sack of the Mercian abbeys, a partial forcing on of the feudalising tendency as best adapted for defence, is all that can safely be ascribed to them. Little positively can be affirmed of the results of the Danish Conquest, either on the nation generally or on those special districts which became Danish by the Treaty of Wedmore. That they had a bracing effect upon the nation can safely be conjectured, but Mr. Robertson's argument that "a greater amount of freedom existed in the Danelagh than in Wessex and English Mercia" is based on too imperfect an induction to be safely admitted as a proved fact. Still, there can be no doubt that the advent of a new race, whose very object in emigration was to preserve their old Teutonic polity unstained by the innovations of Harfagr, did largely tend to strengthen at a time of weakness the traditional, national, and Teutonic constitution of England, and so in this respect to retard the territorialising tendency. On the other hand, however, the effect of the increased militarism which foreign invasion necessitated was directly feudal. If the Danes put off the unity of England by undoing the work of Offa, Edwin, and Egbert, they made it more certain in the end by the effacement of tribal distinctions, and by the consolidation of what remained English, which directly followed the struggle with them. But it is very improbable that the Danes introduced many definite changes in law or custom. The peculiar neages of the Danclagh may as much be Anglian a Danish. Anyhow, the fact that the Danelagh was a territory, within which all of whatever race acknowledged the "Danish custom," shows that absence of personal law is important in English history. The Danes never dispossessed the Anglian population; their institutions, so far as we know them, were fundamentally the same as the English. As soon as they became Christians they were practically Englishmen, just as the Normans became Frenchmen, only in both cases there was a superior vigour, a survival of the old Wiking days. Traces in local nomenclature; the substitution of "by" for "tun;" the "forces," "nesses," "fords," and "holms" of North England; the division into wapentakes and ridings, are clearly Danish; but such effects are purely super-ficial. The same thing took a new name: The wite, the doom, the caldorman, the frith, became the labslit, lah, jarl, and grith. But as the Northman became French in Normandy, so he became Anglian in Mercia and Goidelie in Man-which, though the very centre of Norse power, retains to this day its Celtie speech, while half the place-names of the island keep their original form. Only in the region of government where a thoroughly Norse institution was superimposed on a Celtie polity, to the extinction of the latter, is the Danish influence clearly displayed. In the Hebrides the class survived the Norse jarls, although the local names betray Norse influence. We may conjecture that the Danish settlement began the series of events that has made South Pembrokeshire an English-speaking district. In Orkney and Shetland, Caithness and Sunderland, alone did the Conquest extend so thoroughly as to supersede the old language for one which, under later influences, easily became English. Though great changes followed Canute's domination, it is very hard to say what part of them followed on the introduction of Northern customs and institutions. Even the introduction of huscarls added no new element to English develop-ment. No one now believes that Canute's "forest-law" was Danish. Canute's idea of a northern empire could more easily be got from the history of Edgar than from any precedents of anarchic Scandinavia. In fact, England bad more influence on Denmark and Norway than these latter had on her. Canute's reign is of the greatest political importance, as producing on a small scale the same tendencies that were afterwards developed to a greater extent by the Norman Conquest. But only very indirectly can Danish influence be said to be a factor in this process. The Northern antiquaries, who refer every point of similarity with their own state to Danish influence on England, ignore how much both have in common, and the assimilative capacity of a barbarous but vigorous race in contact with one of superior, though only slightly superior, civilisation.

Worsane's Dance and Normagians in England, Scotland, and Ireland is the fullest special work on this subject, but its usefulness is impaired by the readiness with which every English institution is assigned to a Scandinavian original. Stubbs's Constitutional History, i. 177, gives an exhaustive summary of the general effects of the Danish invasions. G. Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii., Nassy on the Dane Lew, and Freeman, Norman Conquest, especially for the reign of Canute. Konrad Maurer, whose Island gives the best account of the purest form of Scandinavian polity developed in isolation, has also, in his Kritische Ueberschau, treated parts of the subject with great discrimination. For the Scandinavians at home, Snorro's Hemskringla, translated by Laing, abridged in Carlyle s Early Kings of Norcay, is the great authority, and Dahlmann's Geschichte von Dannsmark a good modern account. For the islands, Munch's edition of Chronicon Regum Mannix and Ancerson's Orkey inge Saja are important. C. Stene's Celtic Scotland, especially i. 302, 325—6, 338, 396, 492.

Dangerfield, Thomas (d. 1685), the inventor of the "Meal-Tub Plot" (q.v.), was a man of profligate life, who had been more than once branded, whipped, and imprisoned for felony. His disclosures implicating the Presbyterian leaders were not believed, and his retractation and subsequent accusation of the Catholics led fortunately to no judicial murders, as in the case of his fellow-informers, Oates and Bedloe. [Popish Plot.] On the accession of James II., Dangerfield was convicted of libel in connection with the Meal-Tub Plot, and was put in the pillory and whipped. On his way back to prison, he was brutally assaulted by a Roman Catholic lawyer named Francis, and a few days afterwards died.

D'Arblay, Madame (b. 1752, d. 1840), was the marriage name of Frances Burney, the daughter of Dr. Johnson's friend, Charles Burney, and the authoress of Evelina, Cecilia, &c. Her Memoirs, which were first published in 1842, are of some value for the information they afford us concerning the court of George III.

Darcy, Thomas, Lord (d. 1537), was a faithful subject of the crown throughout the reign of Henry VII. During the Cornish outbreak of 1497, being mado ono of the royal commissioners appointed for a thorough investigation of the various circumstances of the rebellion, he showed his zeal for the king by the merciless severity of his proceedings. Later on, in the same year, Darcy accompanied the Earl of Surrey in his hasty march to the relief of Norham Castle, then closely besieged by the Scotch under James IV. and Perkin Warbeck; and it was presumably as a reward for his services on this occasion that he was appointed to the Constableship of Bamborough Castle, and in 1498 to the Captaincy of the town of Berwick and the Wardenship of the East and Middle Marches of Scotland. Darcy's suspected sympathy with the insurrection that broke out in Lincolnshire in 1536, and his unmistakable co-operation with the Yorkshire nobles in the popular rising known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace," which immediately succeeded the Lincolnshire revolt, were circumstances which at once singled him out for the vengeance of Thomas Cromwell. A very brief examination was sufficient to prove Darcy's treasonable connection with the rioters of 1537, and he was accordingly beheaded June 30, 1537. [Pilgrimage of Grace.]

Dardanelles, THE PASSAGE OF THE, WAS accomplished in 1807 by Sir John Duckworth, who thus lent considerable aid to the Russian troops invading Moldavia and Wallachia. A desultory fire was opened on the English ships from both the European and Asiatic sides of the Straits, but without much effect. An ultimatum was sent to the Turkish government, which opened negotiations so as to save time. So successful and speedy were their defences that the English admiral determined at last to retrace his steps (March 1, 1807)—a feat which he accomplished under heavy fire. Admiral Duckworth then contented himself with blockading the Straits. This expedition, though unsuccessful in its results, was well planned, and calculated, had it succeeded, to have strengthened very materially the resistance offered by Russia to Napoleon.

Darien Company, THE. After founding the Bank of England in 1694 [BANKING], Robert Paterson conceived the idea of inaugurating a company in which the Scotch should find a field for their enterprise equal to that possessed by the English in the East India Company. The Lade with Eastern and Southern Asia had long been passing round by the Cape, and was virtually in the hands of this great Company. Paterson therefore argued that by establishing a colony at Darien, the Eastern world might more directly exchange its products with the Western. In 1695 an Act was passed in the Scottish Parliament, giving to the newly-formed African Company, whose directors were equally divided between England and Scotland, special and peculiar powers to make settlements and build cities, harbours, and fortifications in Asia, Africa, or America. They were likewise anthorised to make alliances with distant powers in these three parts of the world, and to defend themselves if attacked; while to restrain private adventurers, all other Scotchmen were prohibited from trading in the districts occupied by the said company. But when the news of this concession reached England the Parliament at Westminster was loud in condemning such unwarranted privileges granted to the Northern kingdom, and William was forced to disown his Commissioner's Act, and withdraw, as King of England, the charter which as King of Scotland, he had granted his repre-sentative. The result of this outcry was that the English capital was withdrawn from the scheme, and its whole burden thrown on the Scotch, who soon subscribed a nominal sum of £400,000, of which, however, it appears that only a little more than half was actual; paid up. It was not all at once that Paterson made known the exact spot at which he would fix his great station, and even when the fleet was ready to sail, in 1698, its destination was not precisely known. A few vessels had been procured from Amsterdam and Hamburg, tho largest of which would have been one of the smallest in the English navy, and the expedition set sail under the guidance of a council of seven. The cargo laid in seems to have been just the things which would not be wanted by the inhabitants of the region to which they were being sent. Huge periwigs, heavy woollen stuffs, and hundreds of English Bibles were scarce likely to meet the wants of tho Spaniards or Indians dwellin n a tropical clime After suffering some protion for lack of pravisions, the fleet anchored off the Isthmus of Darien, and taking possession of the country, called it New Caledonia, and at once commenced to dig trenches for en new city of New Edinburgh. Negotiations were opened with the natives, and the representative plan of government which had been decided upon at home was commenced to be carried into effect. Meanwhile the site of the new settlement became known in Europe; the Spanish ambassador was loud in his complaints, and preparations were made in the Spanish ports for an expedition against the intruders. But in Scotland the frenzy increased, and in August, 1699, four more ships were despatched to the isthmus, with thirteen hundred men on board. But by the time the new expedition reached its destination the preceding one had disappeared. Unable to toil in the topical heat, and unaccustomed to tropical foods, the Scotch settlers perished by scores, till at last the survivors, disregarding Paterson's entreaties to be left with a few companions to welcome the reinforcements from home, put off for New York; and four months later the second expedition found the site of New Edinburgh a wilderness. It was in vain that they attempted to reconstruct the colony. Dissensions broke out, and mortality was high; and to crow all, a Spanish equadron anchored off their walls. With great difficulty a negotiation was opened between men of two nations who seem not to have had any acquaintar. ? 6 with each other's language, and by middle of April the Scotch party had set for home, having already, in ...ttlo more four months, lost nearly a quarter of their

A striking account is given in Macaulay, Hist, of England.

Darlington, Charlotte Sophia KilMansegge, Countess of (d. 1730), was one of the mistresses of George I. In 1721 she was created Countess of Leinster, and in the following year Countess of Darlington.
Platen (in opposition to the rival mistress, the Duchess of Kendal), supporting Carteret in his struggle for power with Townshend and

Walpole. "She was," says Lord Stanhope, "younger and more handsome than her rival; but, like her, unwieldy in person and rapacious in character. From her great size she was called 'the Elephant.'"

Darnley, HENRY STUART, LORD (b. 1545, d. 1567), was the son of the Earl of Lennox and Lady Margaret Douglas, a nicce of Henry VIII. In 1565 Mary of Scotland, his cousin, saw and at once fell in love with him. The marriagewas celebrated in the summer of the samo year, in spite of violent opposition on the part of Murray and the Protestants, who viewed the union of their queen with a Roman Catholie family with great distrust. Darnley was created Duke of Albany, and was soon afterwards, by order of his wife, illegally proclai ied King of Scots. Mary soon found her mistake in marrying a man who was at once foolish and profligate. coldness sprang up between them, and the murder of Rizzio, to which Darnley was a party, only increased it. Loathed as he was by the queen, and endangered by her reconciliation to his bitterest enemies, Darnley endeavoured to escape to France, but was not permitted to leave Scotland. After the birth of his son, afterwards James VI., whose christening he refused to attend, Darnley was seized at Glasgow with a violent illness, from which he had bare y recovered when Mary paid him a visit and urged his removal to Edinburgh. He was accordingly conveyed to a small house close to the city walls, in a district known as Kirk-of-Field. In the night (Feb. 10, 1567), the house was blown up with gunpowder, and Darnley's body was found next morning lying in the garden by that of his page; but neither eorpse bore traces of violence. Public feeling at once pointed to Bothwell as the murderer, and more than suspected Mary to have been an accompliee in the crimo. The strongest eircumstantial evidence points to the same conclusion.

Dartmowth, William Legor, 1st Eaul of (b. 1672, d. 1750), was a prominent statesman in the reign of Queen Anne. His principles were those of a strong Tory and High Churchman. He married a quighter of the Earl of Nottingham. On the accession of the queen he became a member of the Privy Council; and on the downfall of Godolphin's ministry he was made Secretary of State and Keeper of the Privy Seal of Scotland (1710). It was by making use of him that Marlborough tried to avoid dismissal from his appointments by a close union with the Tory ministry. Dartmouth was one of the persons appointed by Anne to confer with the French envoy Ménager on the preliminaries for the Treaty of Utrecht. The wholesale creation of twelve peers did not meet with his approval, but he continued in the ministry, and was created Lord Privy Scal (1714). On the accession of George he ceased to take any share in politics. "Dartmeuth," says Lord Stanhope, "who was suspected, not without reason of being inclined to a restoration of the exil family, was a good-humeured and accomplished nobleman who made ne enemies."

Stanhope, Hist. of Eng.; Coxe, Marlborough.

Dashwood, Sir Francis, created Baron le Despencer (d. 1781), the son of Sir Francis Dashwood by Lady Mary Fane, ebtained his chief claim to celebrity in early life by his reckless immerality and professeness. From such scenes as those of his "Franciscan Abbey" at Medmenham, Sir Francis was summoned to become Treasurer of the Chamber in 1761, in which office Bute found him se eonvenient a creature, that on becoming Prime Minister he appointed him Chancellor of the Exchequer. Wilkes well understood the absurdity of the appointment, when he said that "frem puzzling all his life at tavern bills he was called by Lord Bute to administer the finances of a kingdem above one hundred millions in debt." To remedy this deficit the new Chanceller proposed to levy a tax on cider, which at ence produced an entery so loud that the proposed tax had to be much reduced. Even then it was productive of much hardship, and served only to add to the unpopularity of Bute's administration. Dashwood had et any rate the good sense to perceive his ewn incompetence. "People," he said, "will point at me in the streets, and sey, 'There goes the worst Chancellor of the Exchequer that ever appeared." As a reward for his services he was created Baron le Despencer, and with his elevation to the peerage he retired from the political world.

Daubeney, Giles, Lord (d. 1508), was raised to the peerage in 1486, in recognition of his services during the period of Henry VII.'s exile. Shertly after receiving this proof of royal favour, he was made deputy governor of Calais, and while acting in that capacity he headed the expedition despatched from England with secret instructions to lend all possible assistance to the Emperor Maximilian. These orders Daubeney executed with marked success, and compelled the French to raise the siege of Dixmude. By a well-timed attack on their camp, too, he inflicted upon them severe lesses, slaying over 8,000 men, and capturing a considerable quantity of military stores. During the Cornish revolt Daubeney was a trusted leader of the king's ferces. His energetic attack on the rebels at Deptford Bridge precipitated the general engagement at Blackheath (1497), which ended so victoriously for Henry.

David I., King of Scotland (s. April 27, 1124; d. May 24, 1153), youngest son of Malcolm Canmere and Margaret, succeeded te the erown of Scetland on the death of his brother, Alexander I. Educated at the English court, owing to the marriage of his sister Matilda with Henry I., ho became thoroughly imbued with the spirit of feudalism. On his brother Edgar's death (1107) he returned to Scetland as earl of the country south of the Forth and Clyde. David had at this time married Matilda, daughter of Waltheof, and in her right held the English earldems of Northampton and Huntingden. On the death of his brother Alexander (1124), he added the territory north of the Forth and Clydo to that which he already ruled, and thus united the whele of Scotland. The result of his early education speedily became apparent in his introduction of feudal institutions and ideas hitherte unknewn in his native land. These innevations, hateful to most of the nerthern nebles, led, during David's absence in England, to a rebellion, headed by Angus, Earl of Moray, and Malcolm, natural sen of Alexander (1130). The insurgents, he wever, were soon defeated, and their leader slain. Feur years later a fresh insurrection was planned, but was defeated by Angle-Norman aid. In 1136 David entered England at the head of a large army to support his niece Matilda, Empress of Germany, against Stephen, her rival claimant for the English crown. A peace was, however, concluded which lasted until 1138, when David undertook another expedition with the same object in view. He was, however, defeated at the fameus Battle of the Standard (q.v.). Shortly afterwards, in 1139, another peace was made at Durham, through the exertions of the Papal legate. In 1141, after the capture of Stephen at Lincoln, David again joined his nicco, narrowly escaping capture at Win-chester; and in 1149 knighted Henry of Anjeu at Carlisle. He died at Carlisle in May, 1153. David I acquired a very con-Anjou at Carlisle. siderable reputation for sanctity. He was the founder of several new abbeys-notably those of Holyrood and Melrose - and was the re-organiser at least of several Scotch bishoprics.

David II., King of Scotland (s. Juno 7, 1329, d. Feb. 22, 1371), was the son of King Rebert Bruce. In accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Northampten, he was married (1328) to the Princess Joanna of England. At the time of his father's death (1329) ho was only five years of age, and the kingdom was censequently governed by regents. In 1332, en the invasion of Edward Baliol (q.v.), he fied to France, and did not return till 1341. While in France his hostility to England increased, as well as his friendship for the land that shelter i him, and he was led by these feelings to cross the border in 1346. In Edward's absence the northern barons were hurriedly called to arms, and defeated the invading army at Nevillo's Cross. David was himself taken prisoner, and was not released till 1357. This long sojourn in England seems to have begotten a love of English ways in the king's mind. An imprudent marriage soon gave disgust to his cousin, the High Steward of Scotland, and this disgust was intensified when he proposed (1563) that Prince Lionel of England should be accepted as his successor, but the Scotch Estates unanimously rejected the proposel. The remainder of his reign was occupied in disputes with his Parliament, which showed a "surly resoluteness" in checking the ubuses of the royal prerogative. He died in the year 1371.

David, Prince of Wales, was the brother of Llowelyn, by whom he had been deprived of his patrimony. In revenge for his injustice David called together sovera. Welsh chieftains-among whom Rhys ap Maredudd, the seion of the ancient princes of South Wales was the most eminent - to espouse his cause. At the same time he began to intrigue with Edward I. (1276). Next year, when Llewelyn surrendered to the English king, one of the first conditions of the peace was the reconciliation of the two brothers. But David, although Edward had married im to the daughter of the Earl of Ferrers, and granted him extensive territories in Wales and England, soon found cause of complaint against his patron. The two brothers united against the stranger. David surprised Hawarden Castle, and the marshes were laid waste. After Llewelyn's death, he was taken prisoner and tried at Shrews-bury (Sept. 30, 1283). Earls, barons, judges, knights of the shires, and twenty borough members, were all present on this solemn occasion; but the baronage alone can be considered as the peers of the culprit. He was condemned to death and executed with circumstances of special herror as a traitor and a murderer.

Davis, John (d. 1605), one of the famous explorers of Elizabeth's reign, was born near Dartmouth. He made three voyages in search of a north-west passage to the Pacific. In the first he coasted round the south of Greenland and Baffin's Land aeross the strait that now bears his name, and in the third he reached the entrance of Hudson's Strait. In 1591 he accompanied Thomas Cavendish (q.v.) to the South Sea, continuing his voyage when the rest of the expedition had returned. In later years his services were employed in journeys to the East Indies on behalf of the newly founded company; and it was on his return from one of these expeditions that he met with his fate—being killed by Japanese pirates off the coast of Malacca in 1605.

Davis, Many, or Moll, was a natural daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, and one of Charles II.'s mistresses. She had by the king one daughter, Mary Tuder, who was married to the Eurl of Derwentwater, Davison, WILLIAM (d. 1608), one of the diplomatists of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was in 1575 sent to the Low Countries to report on the state of affairs; in 1579 he revisited Holland, and four years later was again employed to counteract Scotch influence In 1586 ho became a principal Eserctary of State, and was in favour of the execution of Mary Queen of Scots; it is well known how he was made the screegoat of the other ministers for his excess of zeal in despatching the warrant for the execution (1587), after he had procured Elizabeth's signature to it. It will always remain a moot point how far the queen was really ignorant of the nature of the paper she had signed, and of its despatch, but it is probable that ano found it convenient to act as she did towards Davison in order to clear herself as far as possible of the charge of having desired Mary's death whilst Davison's repeated declarations that 'b queen herself had ordered the warrant to be sent off did not tend to pacify her resentment. The unfortunate secretary was brought to trial, Feb., 1687, heavily fined and imprisoned, and in spite of the attempts of Essex and Burleigh to procure his pardon, was never stored to favour.

Day, George, Bishop of Chichestor (b. 1501, d. 1556), was educated at Cambridge, and became Provost of King's College, 1538. Under Edward VI. he was a strenuous opponent of the religious changes, and for this offence was committed to the Fleet (1550), and soon after deprived of his bishopric, which he had held since 1543. Under Mary he was released, and appointed, with Gardiner, Bonner, and Tunstall, members of a commission to purify the episcopal bench (1553).

Deane, Henry (d. 1503), was Prior of anthony, in Monmouthshire, and entering henry VII.'s service, was employed in several public offices. When Sir Edward Poynings was appointed Lord-Deputy of Ireland, Deane was appointed Chancellor of Ireland (1495), and cid valuable service in aiding Poynings' work of re toring order and regular government in that country. At the time of his Irish Chancellorship, Deane was Bishop-elect of Bangor, and in 1501, on the death of Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was appointed to succeed him as Primate of all England. Whilst Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Deane was in some degree a patron of Wolsey, when he made his domestic chaplain. He died February 16, 1503. Hook, Lives of the Archbishops.

Deane, Richard (b. 1610, d. 1653), son of Edward Deane, of Temple Guyting, Gloucestershire, entered the Parliamentary army at the beginning of the Great Rebellion, served in the artillery under Essex, until taken prisoner in the unfortunate Cornish campaign of 1644. In the "New Model" (q.v.) he was Comptroller of the Ordnance, and in 1648 had risen to the rank of adjutant-general. He commanded the right wing of Cromwell's army at Preston, was present also at Worcester, and took part in the subjugation of the Highlands. He was deep in the confidence of Cromwell, sided with the army against the Parliament, and with the Independents against the Presbyterians, tool his seat in the court which tried the king, and helped to secure the adhesion of the fleet to the Protectorate. In 1649 he had been appointed one of the three generals at sea, in which capacity he commanded in the Dutch War, and was killed in the battle off the North Foreland, June 2, 1653. He seems to have deserved the character Essex gives of him in 1644: "an honest, judicious, and stout man."

Debt, Leoislation concerning. Among the Teutonic tribes it does not seem that a contract was concluded by any set form of words or by writing, as was the custom among the Romans : earnest money was paid, or the bargain concluded by the delivery of a strawor some similar token. But in questions of sale it was necessary to have witnesses to the transaction, and in early English law a varying number of upright men were assigned to each hundred and burh, for the purpose of testifying every such negotiation. statute of Ethelred I. runs: "Let no man either buy or exchange unless he have burh and witness;" while Edgar's law requires thirtythree witnesses for the larger burhs, but only twelve for the hundreds and smaller towns. No one in Anglo-Saxon times was allowed to take the law into his own hands and right himself before bringing his claim before the proper court, and demanding justice four times. We may suppose similar methods of procedure in matters of debt to have continued in the local courts, subject to more or less change, during the reigns of the Norman and Early Plantagenet kings; though, as Dr. Stubbs has remarked, alterations are slowest in the routine business of the petty courts. There are still extant several writs for debt issued by Henry I., several being addressed to the defendant. Two reigns later the writs for debt found in Glanvil are addressed to the shcriff, who is to refer the case, if necessary, to the king at Westminster. Debt was just commencing to be a question for the king's court. In Glanvil's time the method of deciding questions of debt was unsettled, both compurgation and the duel being allowed. Later on, compurgation won the day. With the reign of Edward I.

we find a statute upon the question, forbidding anyone to be distrained for debta not due (3 Ed. I.). By an Act passed in the 21st year of James I., a term of six years is set, within which alone the recovery of debts is legal; while another Act under the same king forbids a tradesman's books to be given in evidence for a debt unless the action be brought within a year. An Act of George II. allowed the debt of the plaintiff to be set off against the debt of the defendant. In Norman times there was considerable difficulty in making lands liable for the debts of a man after his decease; and even in the debtor's lifetime there must have been a similar difficulty, till Edward I., in the Second Statute of Westminster, empowered a creditor who had obtained a judgment in his favour to take a moict of the debtor's lands, and satisfy himself so far as he could. Imprisonment for debt was finally abolished by 32 & 33 Vict., c. 62 (1869), and punishments were provided for fraudulent debtors.

Deccan was the name originally applied to the whole peninsula of India south of the Vindhya hills. It was conquered by the Mohammedans in the fourteenth century and formed into a kingdom. Long before the advance of the English into Central India it had been broken up among a variety of princes and feudatories, and the term Deccar came to be technically confined to the dominions of the Nizam (q.v.).

Decianus, Carus, was Procurator of Britain when Boadicea rose in rebellion against the Romans, and his extortion is said to have been one of the chief causes of the revolt. At the siege of Camulodunum, the Roman colonists appealed to Catus for help, as Suetonius Paulinus, the legate, was away in Mona, and he accordingly sent 200 soldiers to their aid. After the fall of Camulodunum, Catus fied to Gaul, and was succeeded in his office by Petilius Cerealis.

Declaratory Act, The. In 1788 Mr. Pitt brought in a bill to explain the purport of the India Act of 1784. It declared that there was no step which could have been taken by the Court of Directors before the passing of that bill touching the military and political concerns of India, and the collection, management, and application of the revenues, which the Board of Control had not a right to take by the provisions of that bill: that, in fact, the whole powers of government had been transferred to the crown. Declaration, THE ROYAL (Nov. 30, 1660). When Charles II. was restored, the Irish Royalists naturally hoped for the restoration of their lands; but though, strictly speaking, their hopes were justifiable, it was practically inexpedient, if not impossible, for Charles to entirely upset existing arrange-ments. After a commission had sat, and the conflicting claims of the Irish and the Puritans had been argued before it, a document called "The Royal Declaration" was issued. This excepted from all indemnity two classes: those concerned in the Ulster Massacre, and those concerned in regicide. Protestant loyalists and certain favoured persons, like Clanricarde and Mountgarret, were to be reinstated in their possessions at once; innocent Papists were also to be restored, but the adventurers and soldiers were to be left undisturbed or compensated. Those who had accepted lands in Connaught were, however, to abido by their bargains; but those who had not done so were to have their cases considered in due time. This declaration formed the basis of the Act of Settlement and Explanation (q.v.).

De Donis Conditionalibus (1285) is the title by which the first article of the Second Statute of Westminster is generally known. This law is extremely important, as bearing on the relations between lord and vassal. Up to this time land granted to a man and his heirs became, on failure of heirs, the absolute property of the grantee, who could alienate it as he pleased. It was now enacted that land could never be alienated, but that on failure of heirs it must revert to the original grantor. Thus perpetual entail was established, and the power of the king considerably increased by great fiefs constantly falling into his hands through such failure.

Dee, The Bridge of (1639), was in 1639 held by the Cavalier party in Aberdeen against the Covenanting forces under Montrose. The Cavaliers had hurriedly run up defences of turf and stone to protect the crooked and narrow passage of the seven-arched bridge, and held out against the enemy's cannon for a whole day. Next day Montrose, by a feigned attempt to cross the river at a neighbouring ford, drew off a great part of the Cavalier forces, and with his remaining troops forced the bridge, despite the opposition of the fifty Cavaliers still left to defend it.

Deeg, The Battle of (Nov. 13, 1804), was fought between the English, commanded by General Fraser, and the army of Holkar, consisting of fourteen battalions of infantry, a large body of horse, and 160 guns. The English did net exceed 6,000, but among them were the gallant 76th Highlanders, who bore the brunt of the battle. The enemy were completely routed, and left eighty-seven pieces of cannon on the field. But the victory was purchased by the death of the general, and a loss of 643 killed and wou ded. The command devolved on Colonel Monson, who had the satisfaction of recovering fourteen of the guns he had lost in his retreat. During the engagement a destructive fire was opened on the British from the fort of Deeg, which belonged to the Rajah of Binurtpore. A battering-train was ordered up from Agra, and the fortress captured Nov. 23.

Deering, Father (d. 1534), was a monk of Henry VIII. reign, who was executed May 5, 1534, for the active part he took in the promotion of the conspiracy set on foot under the auspices of the so-called "Holy Maid of Kent."

De Pacto King, STATUTE OF (1495), was passed in the eleventh year of Henry VII., and was probably due to the insecurity which most people, in those times of constant civil war and rebellion, must have felt, no matter to what side they adhered. By this Act it is provided that all people are bound by their allegiance to serve the king for the time being, and that no person attending upon the king of the land for the time being shall be convicted of high treason, or by Act of Parliament or other process of law suffer any forfeiture or imprisonment. This statute was the subject of much discussion at the trial of the regicides at the Restoration, and after the Revolution of 1688.

Defender of the Paith (Finer Dr. A. title first conferred on Henry VIII. by Pope Leo X., in 1521. Even so early as June, 1518, when Luther's doctrines were only just beginning to make a stir in Europe, we find allusions to Henry's book of controversy against the Reformer; but it was not till more than three years later, when the king's zeal had received a fresh impulse from the publication of De Captivitate Babylonica, with its fierce attack upon the seven sacraments of the Romish Church, that the royal author put the finishing touches to his work. Clerk, the English ambassador at Rome, received instructions to present the book to the Pope, who read with avidity the opening pages, expressing his pleasure at almost every line by a ncd or word of approval. The king said the Pope had passed the clerks in their own fields. Several copies were, at Leo's request, placed in the hands of some of the principal cardinals; and a little later Leo received the ambassador in a consistory of twenty bishops, approved the book, and next day conferred on its author the title "Fidei Defensor" (Oct. 11, 1521). This title, according to Lingard, was intended as a compensation for the title "Rex Christianissimus," which Julius II. had declared to be forfeited by the King of France, and had conferred upon the King of England, but which Leo could never be brought to recognise. Henry's defence of the seven sacraments, Assertia Septem Sacrassentorum was published at Lendon in July, 1521, and rapidly passed through many editions; it was translated into German in 1523, and Into English a few years later. Luther published a flerce reply within a year, and affected to consider the work so contemptible a treatise that it must have been written by a "parcel of empty-headed sophists," who abused the king's name by prefixing it to a work "stuffed full of their own lies and virulence."

Defenders, The, were a party in Ireland that owed their erigin to a faction fight between Catholics and Protestants on July 4, 1784. The Protestants were called Peep o' Day Boys (q.v.), as they visited the dwellings of the Catholic Defenders early in the morning and took away their arms. The great faction fight of those two parties was the battle of Diamond (q.v.). In 1793 they rose in great numbers, nominally to prevent the enrolment of the militia, and, although pacified in Sept., 1795, were soon in activity again. The name disappears from history after 1798. The causes of their existence were to a large extent agrarian.

Defoe, Daniel (b. 1661, d. 1731), was the son of a London butcher, named Foe-the former himself adopted the French prefix. He was educated in the doctrines of Dissent and Whiggism. As an opponent of the designs of James II., he fought in the rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth, and was fortunate enough to escape. Shortly afterwards he published a pamphlot, warning the Dissenters ugainst the designs of the king. After the Revolution, he engaged largely in trade, and was appointed secretary to the commission for managing the duties on glass. In 1697 his Essay on Projects appeared. He also published a treatise on Occasional Conformity, and another in favour of a standing army, "with the consent of Parliament;" one against the impending French war, and one On the Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England. In 1701 his True-born Englishman appeared, a satire with the object of reproaching those who abused William as a foreigner. The same year he drew up the Legiou Memorial, an expression of public opinion in favour of William's European designs, and elicited by the treatment that the presenters of the Kentish petition received from the Commons. In 1702 he published his famous pamphlet, The Shortest Way with Dissenters, an ironical performance, written in High Church language, which deceived even the Dissenters themselves. The High Church party brought the work before the notice of the House, and it was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman. Defoe surrendered himself to justice, and was fined, put in the pillory, and imprisoned. From Newgate he issued the Review, a periodical paper, that was the predecessor of the more famous Spectutor of Steele. In 1704 ho was released by the exections of Harley, who sought to win him over to the Tory side. Money was sent him by the queen to pay his fine. In 1706 he published a satire on the High Churchmen. He was sent to Scotland to assist the Commission for the Union; and his commercial knowledge proved of uso to the English rovernment, while he at the same time aide. them with his pen. His history of the Union was published in 1709. A satirical piece, entitled A Seasonable Caution, against the Pretender, which he vindicated in the Review, caused his second imprisonment. in Newgato (1711); again Harley procured his freedom. On the accession of George, he was treated with neglect, and exposed to attacks from the Whigs on account of his friendship with Harley. He therefore published An Appeal to Honour and Justice, though it be to my Worst Enemies, as a vindication of his political career. After this he ceased to write openly on political subjects, though it is probable that he was largely engaged in surreptitions political journalism. In 1719 he produced the immortal Robinson Crusos, and subsequently a large number of other romances.

De Grey, Earl. (b. 1781, d. 1859), was the eldest son of Thoma: Robinson, second Lord Grantham. On his father's death, he entered the House of Lords as Lord Grantham, 1786, and, on the death of his maternal aunt, the Countess de Grey, succeeded to the earldom. In 1834—5 he held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty under Sir R. Peel. When Sir Robert Peel again took office, in 1841, Earl de Grey was appointed Lord-Lientenant of Ireland. He discharged the functions of his office with much credit up to June, 1844, when he retired, to the great regret of the people of Dublin.

De Herrstico Comburendo was the title ef a statute enacted in 1401 against the Lollards. It was granted by the king, with the assent of the Lords, on the petition of the elergy, a petition couched in similar terms being presented at the same time by the Commons. By this statute a heretic convicted before a spiritual court, and refusing to recant, was to be handed over to the civil power to be burned. Archbishop Arundel was the prime mover in the matter, and Henry was probably not unwilling to crush the Lollards, who were more or less closely connected with the party of Richard II.

Deira was the name given to the ancient Anglian kingdom stretching from the Tees or the Tyne to the Humber, and extending inland to the borders of the British realm of Strathclyde. Like Kent and some other districts of Britain, it seems to have retained a British ore name, both for the land and its inhabitants, long after it had been conquered by the Teutonic tribes: for the words Deira and Deiri appear to be both related to the old Welsh Deirr. In all probability, both Deira and its northern neighbour, Bernicia, were, like Mercia, originally colonised by several tribes, each under its own leader. Later wo read in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle that Ida established the kingdom of Northumbria in 547-a phrase which may fairly onough be interpreted as implying that he united into one all the petty settlements existing ln his time. Ida's kingdom, however, may very well have been only co-extensive with the later Bernieia, for we are told that in 560 Ella came to the throne, and he seems to have added the district from the Tees to the Humber to his realm. On his death (588), Ethelfrith of Bernieia drove out Ella's young son, Edwin, and usurped Deira. Edwin, meanwhile, had taken refuge with Redwald, King of the East Angles, and the two together met, and overthrew Ethelfrith in 617. Edwln now seems to have once more united Deira and Bernieia; but as if to show how very Imperfeetly even the southern part of his realm was knit together, we read of his having to subdue the small British kingdoms of Loldis (Leeds) and Elmet, both lying within the bounds of his native country, Deira. The two kingdoms were once more divided, only, however, to be permanently re-united under Oswy, the son of Ethelfrith (642-670). From this time the separate kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia may be considered as merged in that of Northumbria. But, though no longer independent kingdoms, both Deira and Bernicia reappear as separate earldoms under the great West Saxon kings, and Deira at least was regularly partitioned among the Danes in 876. Under Ethelred the two provinces appear to have been often disjoined, but were once more united by Ethelred towards the beginning of the eleventh century (1006). Canuto continued this arrangement; but there was probably a subjectearl for the Danes of Deira. Before the accession of Edward the Confessor, Siward was Earl of Deira alone till, by the murder of Eardwulf, he once more united Bernicia to its southern neighbour. On Siward's death all Northumbria was given to Tostig (1055); but on his Lanishment, in 1065, the old division appeared oneo more, when Morkere ruled in Deira, and Oswulf in Bernicia. With the Conquest we may look upon the old name of Deira as being politically extinet. Nominally, the two earldoms of the North lingered on for a few years under Morkero and Gospatric, but finally disappear in the time of the great harry-ing of 1069. This strong act of policy or cruelty may have done much to obliterate the distinction between the two provinces—whether this distinction arcse from purely political considerations, from a difference of race between the Anglian settlers of Deira and the possibly Jutish settlers of Bernieia, or was in later years mainly due to the large Infusion of Danish blood that was from 975 undoubtedly present in the more southern district. [Normathern Large La

Delaware, HENRY BOOTH, LORD (b. 1651, d. 1694), sat as member for Chester in the roign of James II. He was accused of taking part in Monmouth's rebellion, and tried in the Lord High Steward's Court. Although Jeffrey, whom Delaware had formerly called a "drunken jack-pudding," employed all his brutality against him, Delaware was acquitted. The verdict was most popular. On the arrival of the Prince of Orange in England, Delaware rose for him at the head of his tenants in Cheshire, and marched to Manchester. He was one of the messengers sent by the House of Lords to James, requesting him to retire to Ham on the Thames. He was placed on the Treasury Bench and made Chancellor of the Exchequer. He soon quarrelled with his colleagues, Mordaunt and Godolphin, and attempted to drive Halifax from office. the appointment of Caermarthen as chief minister, he retired from office, and was created Earl of Warrington (1690). Large grants of lands belonging to Jesuits made to him, and a large sum paid him expenses incurred at the time of the Re tion. Nevertheless, he complained bitterly the injustice of his treatment. He is suppose to have written a bitter pamphlet when Tory lord-lieutenants were substituted for Whigs. He protested against the rejection of the Place Bill of 1692. "He was," says Macaulay, "a zealous Whig . . . gloomy and acrimonious."

Delhi, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 11, 1803). General Lake (q.v.), with a British force 4,500 strong, discovered Bourquin, Scindiah's general, encamped in a fortified position before Deihi. The Mahruttas amounted to 19,000 men, and were drawn up with their rear resting on the Junina, and a formidable train of artillery in front. So situated, the position of the enemy appeared impregnable; and Lake ordered his cavalry, whe were advancing in front, to execute a feigned retreat. The enemy, deceived, left their position, and rushed forward veiling. The British infantry, led by the 76th Highlanders and by Lake in person, advanced steadily amid showers of grape, and after firing one round, charged with the buyenet. The shock was irresistible; the ranks of the enemy broke and fled down to the river, in which the greater number perished. The British loss was only about 400, of which one-third was from the ranks of the Highlanders.

Delhi, Sizoz or (130s). After Celonel Menson's unfortunate expedition into Helkar's territory had been forced back upon Agra, Jeswunt Rao made a sudden incursion to the very gates of Delhi (Oct. 7). This city was some ten miles in circumference, defended only by dilapidated walls and ruined ramparts, and filled with a mixed population, net yet accustomed to British rule. The garrison was so small as not to admit of reliefs, and provisions and sweetmeats were therefore served out to them on the ramparts, but the British Rosident, Colonel Ochterleny, animated by the spirit of Clive, and nobly seconded by the commandant, Celonel Brown, defended the place for nine days against 20,000 Mahrattas and 100 guns, till at length Holkar, despairing of success, drew off his

Delhi, Sizoz er (1857). On May 11, 1857, the mutineering Sepoy regiments from Meerut appeared before Delhi, and, despite the efforts of Brigadicr Graves and Lieutenant Wil-leughby, the town fell into the hands of the rebels on that day. All the Europeans who could do so iled precipitately, and the city of the Great Mogul soen became 'he eentre of the revelt. It became necessary to re-cupture so important a post, and on the 8th of June, Sir Henry Barnard, after defeating an advance division of the enemy, occupied the Ridge, a rising ground some two miles from the city. Delhi was defended by a series of bastions sixteen feet high, connected by long curtains, with here and there a martelle tower. Bastions and curtains were alike of solid masonry, twelvo feet thick, and the whele was further strengthened by a wide and deep ditch. The besieging army consisted of English troops, Siklis, Afghans, and Ghoorkas, whilst the 1 sbels were 30,000 strong, with ample previsions and ammunitien. It was not till June 23 that operations really began with a sally from the city, which was beaten back, after a day's hard fighting. During August and September the English quickened their pre-parations for the attack. Brigadier Nichol on arrived at the camp with the requisite siegetrain, and the heavy artiliery came soon after. On Sept. 8 four batteries opened fire on the city, and by the 13th a breach was made. The next morning saw the final assault. Three columns were led to the walls, while a fourth was held in reserve. For six days the fighting continued in the streets, and no quarter was extended to men with weapons in their hands. At last, on Sept. 20, the gates of the palace were forced; but llaha-dur Shah had in the meanwhile escaped to the temb of Hemayun, outside the city. Here he was car tured by Captain Hodson, and his twe sons stot as they were re-entering the city. This was the turning-point of the revolution, which could no longer threaten any considerabie danger, when its nominal head, the Great Megul king, was a prisoner in the hands of the English.

De Lolme, Jean Louis (b. 1740, d. 1806), was born at Geneva, where he studied for the bar, and practised as an advocate till ferced to leave the town, from the offence he gave to the authorities by the publication of his Examen des trois points de droit. He took refuge in England, and while resident in this country, made a eareful investigation into our government and laws, the results of which he first published in French at Amsterdam, in 1771, in his work on The Constitution of England. This was almost at once translated into English, and was for many years a standard work on the subject with which it deals. De Lolme had returned to Switzerland many years before his death, which occurred in 1806.

Delvin, Lord, was an Irish nobleman concerned in the rebellion of Tyrone and Tyrconnel (1605). He was imprisoned in Dublin, but succeeded in making his escape. Afterwards he was pardoned by James I., and created Earl of Westmeath.

Demesne Lands were the estates which belenged to the crown, and in early days were one of the main sources of the royal revenue. When these had been held ! the crown since the time of Edward the C or, they went by the name of maner demesne; and each of these man ancient of ancient demesne was reckoned as a hundred in itself, and, like the hundred, subject to the shirecourt. In the times of Stephen large grants of the reyal preperty were made for the sake of purchasing adherents to cither party; tho resumption of these grants was one of the first referms brought about by Henry II. A similar course of conduct had been pursued by William Marshall in the early days of Henry III., and again by Hubert de Burgh. In later years it became a custom for the kings te impoverish themselves by these imprudent grants, and then appeal to the Estates for support. It is to this abuse that the oftrepeated cry of reform pointed—that the king should "live of his own." In 1310 the Ordainers forhade the king to make these gifts without their consent. A similar spirit was shown by the Parliaments of 1404, 1450, and other years. In the latter half of the fifteenth century the crown had grown so poor that Fortescue, in his De Landibus Legum A. viia, auggests a general resumption of the oyal possessions, which he says at one time extended over a fifth part of the kingdom; and he suggests that for the future tho king should only grant estates for life. Several towns (e.g., Northampton) were in royal demcane, and all perhaps to be considered as so being unless they had a special lord. The king was considered to have a peculiar claim upon both manors and burghs held ir demesno—tallage; and this right Edward I. continued to exact even after the "Confirmatio Cartarum." This example was followed both by Edward II. and Edward III., though not without resistance; but from the latter reign we may regard the imposition as extinct.

Demets, The, were an ancient tribe inhabiting the south-west corner of Wales. According to Mr. Rhys, they consisted of Goidels, or the earlier Celtic immigrants, largely mixed with the remnants of the earlier pre-Celtic occupants of our island.

Denbigh, BARL FEILDING, 2ND EARL (d. 1675), son of William Feilding, and Mary, sister of the Duke of Buckingham, was ambassador in Italy from 1634 to 1638. When the Civil War began, he took the side of the Parl nent, in opposition to his father and famil; and commanded a regiment at Edgehill. In June, 1643, he was appointed com-mander-in-chief in the associated counties of Warwick, Worcester, Stafford, and Shropshire, and exercised his trust with zeal and vigour till the passing of the Self-denying Ordinance. He represented the Parliament at the Treaty of Uxbridge and in other negotiations. Though he refused to take part in the king's trial, declaring that he would "rather be torn in paces than have any share in so infamous a business," he became a member of the first two Councils of State of the Commonwealth. A zealous Presbyterian, he assisted his party in bringing about the Restoration, and exerted his influence on the side of moderation after that event.

Denman, Thomas, Lord (5.1779, d. 1854), was the son of Thomas Denman, a London physician. After completing his education at Cambridge, he was called to the bar in 1806. Distinguishing himself by the conduct of many cases, such as the defence of Lord Cochrane, he was returned to Parliament for Wareham in 1818, and later for Nottingham.

—a !own which he continued to represent till he was made Chief Justice, in 1832. But his greatest success was obtained when, in company with Lord Brougham, he was selected to defend Queen Caroline in 1820, though before this he had gained great reputation for his exertions on behalf of the Luddites (q.v.), and for the repeal of the Six Acts. In 1834 he was appointed Lord Chief Justice, an office which he discharged with a conscientious love for truth, even if, as was said, with something of the spirit of an advocate. Amongst his many titles to renown must be enumerated his passion for liberty, his exertions against the slave trade, and his ardour for the amelioration of the criminal laws.

Arnotd's Life.

Denmark, RELATIONS WITH. The consolidation of the Denish state by "Gorm the Old," in the entury, had a twofold story. Firstly, it sent effect on Erm' the for and chiefs to find new homes . , beyond the sea; secondly, it establishe at the old home of the new conquerors c. gland a state adequate to cope with the West Saxon monarchy itself. The dealings of England with the Wiking invaders are summarised in another article [DANES IN ENOLAND], but with the conquest of all England, by Swegen (Svend) and Canute (Knud), a political relation of the most intimate character between the two nations resuited, for England, in important consequences-for Denmark in little less than the introduction of civilisation from English sources. Victorious Denmark was in danger of becoming dependent on conquered England, when the death of Harthacanuto, in 1042, severed the two countries. Despite the internal confusions which resulted from the decay of the old Danish dynasty, the successors of Canute did not at once give up all hopes of re-conquering his great prize. Among their many abortive attempts may be specially mentioned those of Saint Canute (1080-1086), who, both before and after his accession to the Danish throne, strove earnestly to achieve this object. But it is in commercial rather than in political dealings that the relations between Denmark and England were now kept up. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Scandinavian states were economically bound to England by ties as close as those which kept England in dependence on the Netherlands.

The right the Hanseatic League drove the English avery: the monopoly of the Danis: crade; between the Scandinavian kingd we count to protectly from the overbearing dansa, it was to England that they turned to the William Hans, by which the England return regions the Sound dues, we allowed to have great privileges for their regions, as a lag the right of appointing consuls with jurisdiction over offenders of their own nationality. tian II. sought in England assistance against the revolted Swedes, but his close relative, Christian III., demanded all the trading rights of the English as the price of their alliance. The general friendship between Sweden and France led Denmark to an English alliance. James I. married a Danish wife, and supported Christian IV. in his attack on the Empiro in 1625. But the establishment of friendly relations between England and France may probably have led to a certain amount of hostility between England and Denmark during the seventeenth century. In 1652 Frederick III. powerfully assisted the Dutch in their struggle against the Long Parliament and Cromwell. But the changed relations of England and Holland, a new intimacy with the great Elector, on the whole a friend of England, produced another turn in Danish politics. The hostility which Charles XII. of Sweden showed to England at the end of his reign only resulted in Eng. land, Hanover, and Denmark uniting to divide a great part of the German territories of Sweden. The close connection of Denmark with Russia was, before the days of the younger Pitt, a new guarantee of English friendship, which not even the divorce of the English princess Matilda from Christian VII. and the short-lived French policy of Struensee could affect. In 1780, and again in 1801, Denmark joined the Leaguo of the Neutrals against Eugland; but in the fermer case peace was maintained, while in the latter the bombardment of Copenhagen by Parker and the death of Paul of Russia ended the dispute. In 1807 England, fearful lest Napoleon should use the Danish navy against England, sent an expedition to Copenhagen, which effected its object by seizing the Danish fleet at the expense of our friendly relations with Denmark. When peace was made in 1815, England retained of her Danish conquests Heligoland. During the nineteenth century the Schleswig-Holstein question was at the root of most of the dealings between England and Denmark. The Treaty of London, which settled the Danish succession, was largely the result of English intervention. The war against Germany in 1864 was rashly entered into by the Danes, in the belief that England would help them to retain their hold over the duchies. They were, however, disappointed, and their loss of the much-disputed territories to Prussia largely neutralised the good effect which the marriage of the daughter of their new king to the Prince of Wales had occasioned.

pany and the Rajah of Berar. Its stipulations were that Cuttack should be ecded to the English; that the lands west of the Wurdah, which had belonged to the Nizam, should be restored to him; that the English should arbitrate on his differences with the Nizam and Peishwa; and that all Europeans of any nation at war with England should be excluded from Berar.

Deorham, The Battle of (577), is the name given to the great victory by which Ceawlin of Wessex broke up the territory still held by the Welsh into two parts, by severing the Britons south of the Bristel Channel from those north of that estuary. As a consequence of this victory, Bath, Gloucester, and Cirencester fell into the hands of the West Saxons. Deorham has been identified with Dercham, a village between Bath and Chipping Sodbury.

Deposition, The Right of. It is very difficult in early English history to disentangle the true instances of a king's solemn deposition by the act of his Witan or his people from those where it may merely have been the result of a domestic intrigue or disorderly rebellion. Of the latter kind Northumbria offers the best examples, for out of fifteen kings ruling over this realm in the eighth century, only two seem to have met with a natural death while still in possession of the throne. But of these thirteen unfortunate kings, only three can be claimed as in any way exemplifying Kemblo's fifth canon, "that the Witan had the power to depose the king if his government was not conducted for the benefit of his people." If we turn to Wessex, the question becomes a little clearer. According to Henry of Huntingdon, Sigeberlit was deprived of his kingly office in 755, after the mature deliberation of the nobles and people, and with the consent of the whole nation. This reads like the formal act of a Witan, conscious of its own rights, and not fearing to assert them to the full; but it is only fair to add that one version of the "Chroniele" makes the statement in a more personal manner than that just given, and runs: "In this year Cynewulf deprived King Sigeberht of his kingdom." But another tert is even more explicit than Henry of Huntingdon in ascribing the action to the Witan. Morethan two centuries and a half later it appears that the crown of England was duly transferred by the English Witan from Ethelred to Swend. The same inherent right of a people to discard its ruler if he neglects its interests may be seen in the action of the Northumbrians when they deposed Tostig from his earldom-an instance which seems somewhat foreibly to bring out the fact that down to the very latest times some traditions, however faint, of their old independence clung to the great English kingdoms, long after they had been incorporated with the West Saxon menarchy. To sum up the foregoing remarks, it seems evident that the power of deposition was in early English times recognised as being quite within the compass of the rights of that body which undoubtedly had elected the sovereign to the throne; and it is unnecessary to call in examples of similar proceedings from the annals of kindred Teutonic races on the Continent.

races on the Continent. The same twofold power of election and deposition seems to have been recognised for many hundred years after the Conquest. That which gave had the right to take away also. But by the time of our next instance of the execution of this power, things were wearing a somewhat different aspect. The royal power had been growing for many centuries; a vague feeling of indefeasible right was abroad; the Church lawyers had done much to magnify the power and the sacredness of the kingly office. Accordingly, when Bishop Stratford brought his detailed charges against Edward II. before the Parliament of 1327, it was considered necessary to secure the king's own consent to his son's election. Again, in 1399 the same problem had to be faced; for even then partisans of Bolingbroke did not seem quite sure of the extent of the rights of Parliament. The question was debated whether Richard II. should be requested to resign or be deposed, and it was finally determined to make things perfectly legal by adopting both courses. Richard consented to perform his part of this programme, and Parliament, after hearing the long catalogue of charges brought against the king, voted that they formed a sufficient ground for his deposition. In these two last instances of deposition we seem to see signs that Parliament hesitated as to the extent of its powers, and required the king's resignation before venturing to assert its own authority. The case of Charles I. is so exceptional that it hardly comes under view of this article. But by the time of the Revolution of 1688, the doctrine of the king's divine right had been formulated in definite terms, and whether accepted or not, had a strong influence even on the minds of Whigs. Unable to muster up sufficient cor age to state boldly its right of deposition, Parliament on this occasion took refuge in the theory of abdication, and made the king's act in fleeing from the kingdom equivalent to the verbal resignation which had been extracted from the unwilling lips of Edward II. and Richard II.

To sum up, it may be said that the power of deposition was in early English times a practical, if not a theoretical, right, belonging to the Witan and the nation; but after the Conquest, men being less and less inclined to break in upon the divinity which to their eyes hedged round a king, while still exercising the old right upon consion, justified it to themselves by requiring a voluntary renunciation on the part of the king himself of the powers conferred on him at his consecration; and when this could not be obtained, allowed the fact of the king's absence to be translated into an act of abdication.

Derby. The chief town of Derbyshire was originally known by the name of Northworthig, and owes its modern name of Derby, or Deorby, to the Danes, by whom it was held from 874 to 918, when Ethelfleda, Alfred's daughter, re-captured it. Later it was restored to them as one of the five boroughs, but again united to the English crown by Edmund. Under Edward the Confessor it was a royal borough. William the Conqueror conferred it on William de Ferrers, and Henry I., who seems to have conferred on the town its first charter, granted it to the Earls of Chester. In the Civil War of the seventcenth century, though at first Royalist, it was soon taken by the Parliamentarians, and remained in their hands till the end of the war. In later history it is chiefly famous as marking the farthest point reached by the Young Pretender in 1745.

Stanley resigned office on the question of secularising the surplus of the Irish Church revenues, and with Sir James Graham, Lord Ripon, the Duke of Richmond, and some others, formed an intermediate party between the Whigs and the Tories, declining all connection with either. This unnatural state of isolation deprived the country for some time of the services of some of its ablest statesmen. The clique was derisively known as the "Derby Dilly," from its leader, Lord Stanley, the heir to the earldom of Derby. In 1841, however, this third party came to an end, most of its members joining Sir Robert Peel's government.

Derby, Earldom of. Robert de Ferrers, lord of Tutbury, was created Earl of Derby in 1138. The earldom continued in his family for eight generations, until Earl Robert (de Forrers) was deprived, in consequence of his action in the Barons' revolt, by the Dictum de Kenilworth, 1266. The earldom was revived, 1337, in favour of Henry Plantagenet, afterwards Duke of Lancaster, and fatherin-law of Jehn of Gaunt, whose son Henry, afterwards king, is styled Earl of Derby during his father's lifetime. In 1485 the title was granted to Thomas Stanley, second Lord Stanley, in whose family it still remains. The elder line came to an end with the death of James, tenth earl, 1736, when the title devolved upon Sir Edward Stanley, descendant of a brother of the second earl and the lineal ancestor of the present holder of the title.

Derby, Thomas Stanley, 1st Earl or, and 2nd Baron Stauley (d. 1504), was a nobleman who played a prominent part during the reigns of Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII. He married Warwick's sister Eleanor, and gained Edward IV.'s favour. In Edward's pretended war upon France (1475), in support of Charles the Bold, Stanley was the ready recipient of the bribes of the French king, and it was in a great measure in consequence of his counsel thus inspired that Edward IV. became a party to the Treaty of Pecquigny, Sept. 13, 1475. During the brief reign of Edward V. Lord Stanley figured as a loyal upholder of the rights of his young sovereign, and was one of the nobles arrested at the council board in Richard of Gloucester's coup d'état of the 13th June, 1483. Gloucester, however, not only forbore proceeding to extremities with him, but sought to secure his service by conferring upon him the high office of Constable of England. On the death of his first wife, Eleanor Neville, Lord Stanley married Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry Tudor, Earl of Richmond. On the landing of Henry Tudor at Milford Haven, Lord Stanley, on a plea of illness, refused to join Richard, and was only kept from following the example of his brother, Sir William Stanley, who had openly united with the invader, by the fact of his son, Lord Strange, being detained in Richard's hands as a security for his father's good faith. He still, however, kept in the neighbourhood of the invaders with a force of some 5,000 men, and it was his sudden support of Richmond in the heat of the battle that decided the day. At the coronation of his step-son, Henry VII., at which he officiated as High Constable, he was raised to the dignity of Earl of Derby; and apparently continued in friendly relations with Henry VII. to his death.

Derby, EDWARD STANLEY, 3RD EARL OF (d. 1572), on the death of Edward VI., declared in favour of Mary, and by his example aided materially in preventing any recognition of Lady Jane Grey by the country at large. He filled the office of Lord High Steward at Mary's coronation, and subsequently did all he could to prevent the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain. Under Elizabeth, Lord Derby's religion prevented him from finding any great favour at court; but in spito of strenuous efforts made by the Catholic peers to entice him into taking an active part in the Northern rebellion of 1569, he refused to implicate himself.

Derby, Ferdinando Stanley, 5th Earl of (d. 1594), was the grandson of Eleanor, Countess of Cumberland, who was herself the granddaughter of Henry VII., through his daughter Mary, the wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. The Jesuits, upon his succession to the title, urged him, through an agent named Hesketh, to assume the title of King of England; but the earl revealed the plot to the government, and was poisoned for his loyalty by the conspirators.

Derby, James Stanley, 7th Earl of (b. 1607, d. 1651), at the outbreak of the Civil War was appointed by the king Lord-Lieutenant of Cheshire and Derbyshire, as he was then generally believed to have a great influence upon the people of those two counties. He is said to have shed the first blood of the Civil War in a skirmish at Manchester, July 15, 1642. But his influence was overrated, and his ability apparently insufficient for the post he held: he was distrusted by the king, and not supported by the people. In spite of several successes, he was forced to abandon the strugglo and retire to the Isle of Man. Lathom House was heroically defended by his countess, Charlotte, till December, 1643. 1651 he joined Charles II. on his march into England, but whilst endeavouring to raise Iracashire, was surprised and defeated by Col. Robert Lilburn at Wigan. He himself escaped, and took part in the battle of Worcester, but was taken prisoner, tried by court-martial, condemned to death, and beheaded at Bolton, October 15, 1651. The countess continued to hold the Islo of Man till it was reduced by Fe: 'ax in Nov., 1651. "He was a man," says Cla endon, "of great honour and clear courage, and all his defects and misfortunes proceeded from his having lived so little time amongst his equals that he knew not how to treat his inferiors."

Derby (b. 1775, d. 1851), EDWARD SMITH STANLEY, 13TH EARL or, was first returned to Parliament in 1796 for Preston. In 1312 ho was elected for Lancashire, which he continued to represent till the changes effected by the Reform Bill. In 1832 he was called up to the House of Lords, by the title of Baron Stanley of Bickerstaffe, to strengthen the Whig ministry. In 1834, on his father's death, he succeeded to the earldom of Derby.

Derby, Edward Geoffrey Smith Stan-Ley, 14th Earl of (b. 1799, d. 1869), entered Parliament in 1820 as member for Stockbridge. He made his first speech, after three years' silent voting, in favour of a private bill for lighting Manchester with gas, and its ability was noticed by Sir James Mackintosh. In 1827 he took office under Mr. Canning as Under Secretary for the Colonies. On the death of Canning, Stanley refused to join the Goderich ministry. Ho was a strenuous advocate of Catholie Emancipation. Parliamentary Reform, reciprocity in free trade, with a moderate fixed duty on corn, and the foreign policy of Mr. Canning. Therefore, from 1828 to 1830 he remained in opposition. He then took office under Lord Grey as Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Stanley was quite as earnest as Lord John Russell himself, and much more vehement, in his advocacy of the Reform Bill. The state of Ireland was full of danger. The triumph in the matter of Catholic Emancipation, and many grievances, real or fancied, had incited the people to attempt an sgitation for repeal of the Union, and every kind of outrage was rife. It fell to Mr. Stanley's lot to introduce a Coercion Act in this emergency, and, as a consequence of this, he became very unpopular in Ireland, and was frequently embroiled with Daniel O'Connell. In May, 1833, Mr. Stanley was charged with the duty of bringing forward the measure for the emancipation of the slaves, and made a speech of remarkable eloquence. In 1834, being now by courtesy Lord Stanley, he separated himself from the Whigs on the question of the Irish Church, and with Sir James Graham, the Duke of Richmond, and some others, formed the intermediate party known as the "Derby Dilly" (q.v.). He rejected the overtures made to him by Sir R. Pcel in 1834, but accepted them in 1841, and took office as Secretary of State for the Colonies. But on the question of free trade in 1846 Stanley separated from Peel, and was formally, and by the advice of the Duke of Wellington, installed in the leadership of the Tory party, with Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Disraeli as his lieutenants.

In 1852 ho held office for ten months, but by the end of the year had to give way to the Coalition ministry of Lord Aberdeen. In 1858, being Prime Minister again, he succeeded in passing his India Bill, but was defeated on the question of Parliamentary Reform. An appeal to the country was ineffectual, and he resigned office in June, 1859. In 1866 his party succeeded in defeating Lord Russell's new Reform Bill, but only to pass next year a similar onc, which its opponents declared to be of a still more sweeping character. Early in 1868 Lord Derby surrendered the leadership of his party into the hands of Mr. Disraeli, and retired into private life on Oct ber 23, 1869. From 1852 to his death he was Chancellor of the University of Oxford. He was a man of cultured taste, and a good Greek scholar, and in 1864 published a blank verse translation of the Iliad, which attracted a considerable amount of notice at the time. Lord Derby's speeches were greatly admired for their eloquence and fire, and he is often spoken of as the "Rupert of Debate."

Derby, EDWARD HENRY, 15TH EARL OF, (b. 1826, d. 1893), son of the preceding Earl, entered Parliament in 1848 for Lyme Regis, and becamo Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his father's first ministry. In Lord Derby's second administration, in 1858—9, he was Secretary of State for India, and managed the transfer of the government from the directors of the East India Company to the crown. He was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in 1866, and succeeded to his peerage in 1869. In 1874 ho was Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mr. Disraeli's cabinct. but resigned simultaneously with the Earl of Carnarvon, the Colonial Secretary, owing to differences with his colleagues on the Eastern Question in 1878. In 1880 he abandoned the Conservatives, and in 1882 joined Mr. Gladstone's ministry as Colonial Secretary In 1886 he parted company with Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule question, and became one of the leaders of the Liberal Unionists.

Dering, SIR EDWARD (b. 1598, d. 1644), was a gentleman of Kent, created baronet in 1627, and member for the county in the Long Parliament. In the discussions on ecclesiastical questions he distinguished himself by his opposition to Laud's innovations, and was even persuaded to introduce the "Root and Branch" Bill, which he afterwards opposed. He also opposed the Grand Remonstrance, and was, in February, 1642, sent to the Tower for printing his speeches. At the beginning of the war he raised a regiment for the king, but in 1644 took the Covenant, paid a composition for his estate, and returned home to die (June 22, 1644). Sir Edward published a volume of his speeches without the leave of the House of Commons, and for this reason was expelled the House, and his book was ordered to be burnt by the hangman.

Proceedings in Kent (Camden Soc.), 1861. Derwentwater, James Ratcliffe, Earl or (d. 1716), was a grandson of Charles II. by his mistress, Moll Davis. He was a Roman Catholic, and deeply implicated in the rebellion of 1715, for which he was tried and executed in the following year, at the early age of twenty-eight.

Desborough (or DISEROW), JOHN (b. 1608, d. 1680), son of James Desborough, of Eltisley, Buoke, was bred an attorney, and married in 1636 Jane, sister of Oliver Cromwell. In 1642 he became quartermaster in the troop raised by his brother-in-law, served throughout the war, and rose to the rank of major-general. He was nominated one of the commissioners to try the king, but refused to act. During the Protectorate he was in succession Commissioner of the Navy, member of the Scotch Council, Major-General in charge of the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall, and one of the admirals of the fleet after Blake's death. He was one of Cromwell's Council of State, and appointed a member of his House of Lords, but opposed his taking the crown. After Cromwell's death, he joined the Wallingford House party, helped to overthrow Richard, and to turn out the restored Long Parliament. At the Restoration he was incapacitated from all public employment. He died at Hackney.

Noble, The House of Cromwell.

Desmond, Gerald, Earl of (d. 1583), was the head of the great house of the southern Pitzgeralds, who were all-powerful in Munster. Sir Henry Sidney had recommended that this province should be made into an English presidency and English colonists antroduced. But the queen, who had set herself against this plan, demanded that Desmond's influence should be attacked in another way. He was consequently soon arrested for treason. In 1568 he submitted to Elizabeth, and surrendered his property into her hands. But in 1574 he broke out in rebellion again, and once more in 1579. Next year ho was cooped up with the Spaniards by Lord Grey at Smerwick, but escaped the horrible fate of the garrison. At last, after wandering about for more than two years, his hiding-place was betrayed to the English, who surrounded his cabin, and murdered him in his bed (1583).

Desmond, Sir John (d. 1581), was the brother of Gerald, Earl of Desmond. In the hope of compromising his brother with the English he murdered two English officers at Tralee (1579). The wholo chas then sprang to arms. Sir John was taken prisoner at the fall of Kilmallock, in 1580, but as he spoke English fluently, he managed to escape. December next year he fell in with Sir John Zouch on the Avonmore River; that officer slew him, and sent his head to Dublin.

Desmond, Maurice Fitzgerald, Earl or, was one of the early Norman conquerors of Leeland. Having engaged to give help to Dermot, King of Leinster, he landed at Wexford in 1169. In conjunction with that monarch he conquered Dublin, where he was besieged by Roderic and an immense host of Irish in 1171. By his advice the beleaguered English sallied forth in three small troops, and utterly routed the enemy—a disaster which led to the dispersion of the other Irish armies. When, in 1171, Henry II. visited Ireland, he appointed Maurice one of the three chief governors of Dublin. He was with his colleague Do Lacy when that baron was so nearly murdered by O'Rourke's treachery.

Later, Wexford was given him as a fief, and Circulus Comprensis here he died, 1176. Giraldus Cambrensis describes him as a man of action rather than of words, valiant, and second to none in activity of enterprise.

Giraldus Cambrensis, Expugnatio Hibernia.

Despard, Enward Marcus, Colonel (b. 1751, d. 1803), was born in Ireland, and was early employed in military service in the West Indies and the Bay of Honduras, where he was made superintendent of the English colony. His conduct in this office seems to have given offence to the settlers, and he was secalled, but could never obtain an official investigation. When the French Revolution broke out, he adopted the new principles, and was, in consequence, put in prison. his release he attempted the assassination of George III.; for this offence he was tried and executed in March, 1803.

Despencer, BARONY OF. The first baron of this name is Hugh le Despencer, a Steward of Henry I. In 1264 Hugh le Despencer, Justiciar of England, was summoned to Parliament; in 1265 he was killed at the battle of Evesham [Despencer, Hugh LE, 1]. His son Hugh was created Earl of Winchester in 1322, but in 1326 was declared a traitor, and hanged. The same fato befell his son Hugh "the Younger" a month later; and the honours of both became forfeit. Hugh, however, the son of the latter, appears to have been summoned to Parliament from 1338-1349, when he died, and the title devolved upon a nephew, whose son Thomas, fifth baron by writ, procured the reversal of the Act declaring his ancestors (Edward II.'s ministers) traitors. Thomas was created Earl of Gloucester, 1397, but was degraded, 1399, and beheaded by the populace, 1400, when his honours became forfeit. His attainder was, however, reversed in 1461, and the barony of Despencer fell into abeyance among the issue of his daughter and eventual heiress, Isabel, until in 1604 it was conceded to Mary Nevillo, wife of Sir Thomas Fane, in the person of whose son it became united to the earldom of Westmoreland. In 1762, and again in 1781, it once more fell into abevance, but ultimately devolved upon Sir Thomas Stapleton, in whose family it still remains.

Despencer, Hugh LE (d. 1265), was one of the leaders of the baronial opposition to Henry III. In 1258 he was chosen as one of the commissioners on the part of the barons at the Oxford Parliament, and in 1260 was appointed Justiciar, which office he held till 1262. In the next year he was once more advanced to the justiciarship, and when the war breke out he headed the citizens of London in their attacks on the houses of the royalists. He fought bravely at Lewes, took a prominent part in the government of De Montfort, and fell with Earl Simon in the battle of Evesham. His death is celebrated in one of the political songs of the time, which Mr. Blaauw translates as follows:-

"Despencer true, the good Sir Hugh, Our justice and our friend, Borne down with wrong amidst the throng, Has met his wretched end."

Despencer, Hugh LE (d. 1326), son of the above, and known as "the Younger," married Eleanor de Clare, one of the co-heiresses of the Earl of Gloucester. He was soon involved in quarrels with the husbands of the other eo-heiresses, while the favour showr him by the king arrayed a

)-[e was banished in 1324, but recalled soon after to acquire more possessions, and almost supremapower on the defeat of the Earl of Lancaster at Boroughbridgo (1322). The success of the queen and Mortimer in 1326 obliged him to flee, but he was captured, and beheaded at Hereford by Mortimer's orders. The objects of the Despencers seem to have been primarily selfish, and they eared but little for the interests of the king. At the same time, it is evident that they wished to increase the importance of the House of Commons, and use it to counterbalance the baronage. But they entirely failed in their aims: for while they alienated the barons, they did not secure to themselves the affections of the people.

Despencer, Henry Le (d. 1406), was the grandson of Hugh le Jespencer the Younger. In 1370 he was make Bishop of Norwich, and in 1381 distinguished himself by putting down the revolt in Norfolk. In 1383 he undertook an expedition to Flanders, by which, under the guise of a crusade against the adherents of the anti-Pope element, he hoped to inflict injury on the French. Ho captured Gravelines, I pres, and other places, but was eventually obliged to retire, and on his return to England was stripped of his temporalities by the king.

De Tallagio non concedendo, STATUTE OF (1297), is the name given to the Latin form of the great statute known as the Confirmatio Cartarum, which forbade (1) any tallage or aid to be taken by the king without the consent of the hishops, earls, barons, knights, and other freemen of the realm; (2) any prize in corn, leather, or wool, &c., vithout the owner's consent; (3) the maltote (q.v.). Other clauses confirmed the charters and liberties of both clergy and laymen, pardoned the great earls and their partisans, whose firmness had secured Edward's consent to this law, and gave orders for the publication of the Charter. Dr. Stubbs considers that the original form of this statute is not the Latin, but rather the French one, which does not contain the word tallage, and is couched in more general terms. He suggests that the Latin form may be the rough draft, or informal statement, of the terms of the pacification, and may stand in the same relation to the French form, which became the permanent law of the land, as the Articles of the Barons stand in to the Great Charter of 1215. It was, however, referred to as a statute in the Petition of Right. The chief points to be noticed in comparing the Confirmatio Curtarum with the De Tallagio are that the former does not contain the word "tallage;" the latter does not reserve the rights of the king; the former renounces only "such manner of aids," &c., while the latter contains no such qualifying words.

V Dottingen, THE BATTLE OF (June 27, 1743), was fought during the War of the Austrian Succession. Lad Stair, who was the English commander, wished to drive the French from Germany, and also, if possible, to invade Alsace and Lorraine. The Duke de Noailles, the French commander, marched into Franconia against him. Stair lay idly on the Maine with 40,000 men, awaiting 12,000 subsidised Hanoverians. Nosilles scoured the country to the south of the river. Suddenly Stair marched up the river towards Franconia. Ho passed Hanau, and moved towards Aschaffenberg. About half-way between the two is the village of Dettingen. On reaching the plain of Dettingen, the English found that De Noailles had outmarched them, and thus cut them off from Aschaffenberg. Here they were joined by King George II. and the Duke of Cumberland. It was determined to secure, if possible, the retreat to Hanau. But Noailles had sent his nephew, the Duke de Grammont, across the river to occupy Dettingen. Bridges were thrown across the Maine, and Noailles' cannon played on the retreating English. It was determined to cut a way through Grammont's forces. The French commander, however, leaving a strong position behind a ravine, advanced to the attack, thinking ho was only opposed by the advanced troops of the English. Led on by King George, the English infantry broke through the enemy. Grammont retired across the Maine; but tho retreat became a rout, and 6,000 men were left on the field. George, wishing to extricate himself from his dangerous position, refrained from pursuit, and pushed on for Hanau. Stair, furious that his advice should be disregarded, sent in his resignation, which was accepted. Noailles withdrew into Alsace, whither he was followed by the king, and negotiations for peace were begun.

Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury (655-664), was a West Saxon by birth. His native name was Fritbona, which he changed for his Latin appeliation on being elected to the see of Canterbury. He is remarkable as being the first Englishman elevated to the archbishoprie. He was conciliatory towards the British Church, and Christianity was widely extended in Mercia and Northumbria during his episcopate.

Devizes. The town of Devizes appears in English history for the first time when Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, built his great castle here, during the reign of Henry I. It was sarrendered to Stephen by his son Nigel, Bishop of Ely, when that last-mentioned monarch threatened to hang Bishop Roger's son if the rebellion was persisted in. A few years later it was held by Fitz-Hubert on behalf of the Empress Maud.

Devizes, RICHARD OF, was the author of a chronicle of the reign of Richard I. from 1189—1192. This fragment is of considerable historical value, both for the incidents of the Third Crusade and for the condition of England in Richard's absence. Of the writer little is known, except that he was a member of the Priory of St. Swithin at Winchester, and that he probably died before the completion of his work.

Devon, and Devonshire, Perrage of. Tho "third penny" of the county of Devon is said to have been granted to Richard de Redvers, Baron of Okehampton, who died 1137. His descendants bore indifferently the title of Earl of Devon or of Exeter until the failure of the eldest line, on the death of Isabel de Redvers, wife of William de Fortibus, Earl of Albemarle, in 1293. The carldom was, however, successfully claimed, 1335, by a eousin of the late countess, Hugh Courtenay, fifth Baron Courtenay, and it remained in his family until the attainder of Thomas Courtenay, sixth earl, 1461. In 1469, Humphrey Stafford, Baron of Southwicke, was created Earl of Devon: but he was beheaded in the course of the same year, and the patent of his creation was annulled by a statute of 1485, when the carldon was restored to the Courtenays in the person of Edward, great nephew of the third earl. Edward's grandson, Henry Courtenay, was created Marquis of Exeter in 1525, but on his attainder, in 1539, his honours became forfeit. His son Edward was restored to both titles; his death without issue, in 1556, left the earldom of Devon without a claimant until 1830-1, when it was restored to William Courtenay, heir male of the last earl of the Courtenay family. In the interval, in 1603, another earldom of Devon had been created in favour of Charles Blount, eighth Baron Mountjoy, in whose person it became extinct, 1606. William Cavendish, Baron Cavendish of Hardwicke, was created Earl of Devonshire in 1618. grandson, William, fourth earl, atted Dake of Devonshire and Marque artington, 1694, for h rices ir carection with the Revolutio. + 1088-9.

Devon, WILLIAM COURTENA', EARL OF (d. 1511), was brother-in-law of Henry VII.'s queen, by his marriage with Edward IV.'s daughter, Catherine. When Perkin Warbeck, in the latter part of the ear 1497, followed up! slanding in Cornwall by the active siege of the city of Exeter, the Earl of Devon was foremost among the English nobles in a show of loyalty to Henry VII., and made a special effort to relieve the city before the arrival of the succours sent for that purpose by the king himself. In 1504, however, being implicated in the proceedings of the fugitive Earl of Suffolk by the ovidence of one of Henry VII.'s spies, Sir Robert Curson, Courtenay was attainted, and deprived of his estates by the Parliament of that year, under the Speakership of Dudley, and was kept a close prisoner in the Tower during the remainder of the king's life.

Devon, Edward Court 2NAY, Earl op (d. 1556), was the son of Edward Courtenay, Marquis of Exeter, who was the son of Sir William Courtenay and Cathorino, daughter of Edward IV. After the execution of his father, in 1539, for conspiring in favour of Reginald Pole, he was sent to the Tower, and confined there until his release by Mary, in 1553. Whilst still in prison he was spoken of as the probable future husband of the queen. On the announcement of Mary's determination to wed Philip of Spain, a strong purty gathered round Courtenay, and urged him to marry tho Princess Elizabeth and to declare her queen, whilst they undertook to rouse the country. and to gather together a sufficient number of men to ensure success. The chief of the conspirators were Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir James Crofts, and the Duke of Suffolk. The plot was, however, betrayed to Gardiner by Courtenay, and the rebellion was easily crushed by the courage of the queen. Courtenay, mistrusted and despised for his weakness, was sent back to the Tower, and shortly afterwards exiled. He died at Venice in 1556. Dr. Lingard says that the dissoluteness of his life was the sole cause why Mary would not consent to take him as her husband. His character is thus summed up by Mr. Froude: "He was too cowardly for a dangerous enterprise, too incapable for an intricate one, and his weak humour made men afraid to trust themselves to a person who, to save himself, might at any moment betray Devon, Charles Blount, Earl of (b. 1563, d. 1606), was the second son of Lord Mountjoy. Having won the favour of Queen Elizabeth, he became a rival of Essex, with whom he fought a duel, though afterwards the two became great friends. In 1594, Blount, who had now become Lord Mountjoy by the death of his brother, was mado Governor of Portsmouth, and three years later accompanied Essex on his unfortunate expedition to the Azores. In 1601 he was made Lord Deputy of Ireland, and successfully erushed the rebellion. He was created Earl of Devon by James I. in 1603, and died in 1606.

Devonshire, WILLIAM CAVENDISH, 4TH EARL OF, afterwards Duke of (b. 1640, d. 1707), sat as member for Derby in 1661. He was sworn of the Privy Council in 1679, but at the end of the year he petitioned for his dismissal. He was a zealous Protestant and opponent of the court party. In 1685 he was insulted in a gambling house by a brave named Colepepper. Indignant at meeting this man at court, contrary to the king's promise, he publicly insulted him, after his challenge had been declined. He was tried before the King's Bench, pleaded guilty, and was fined the enormous sum of £30,000. He was imprisoned, but hearing that he was about to appeal from the judgment of the 'ling's Bench, James allowed him to go free, on giving a bond for the amount of the fine. He eagerly joined the Revolution scheme, and was one of these whe signed the invitation to William of Orange. When William landed in England, Devonshire appeared in arms at Derby, and proceeded to Nottingham, which became the head-quarters of the Northern insurrection. A meeting of peers was held at his house to discuss the settlement of the crown. Soon after the Revolution he was made Lord High Steward, and Knight of the Garter. On the departure of William to Ireland, Devonshire was created one of the Council of Nine, and vigorously superintended the fitting-out of the fieet. In 1691 he accompanied the king to Holland. He was accused, apparently falsely, by Preston of dealings with St. Germains, but the king declined to listen to the confession of the informer. He was created Duke of Devonshireand Marquis of Hartington in 1694. On William's departure for the Netherlands, he was appointed one of the Lords Justices. We subsequently find him declaring against the bill on the Irish land-grants. He also opposed the second Partition Treaty, on which his opinion had not been asked. He was present at the death of William III. He was created Lord Steward in the reign of Quoen Anne. He accompanied her to Cambridge in 1705, and was created an LL.D. He died, professing repentance, at Devonshire House, Piccadilly. "In wealth and influence," says Piccadilly. "In wealth and influence," says Macaulay, "he was second to none of the English nobles, and the general voice designated him as the finest gentleman of his time. His magnificence, his tastes, his talents, his classical learning, his high spirit, the grace and urbanity of his manners, were admitted by his enemies. His eulogists, unhappily, could not pretend that his morals had escaped untainted from the widespread contagion of that age."

Devonshire, Spencer Compton Cavenadish, 8th Duke of. [Hartinoton.]

Devorgoil, or Devorguilla, was the daughter of Alan of Galloway and of Margaret, daughter of David of Huntingdon. In 1233 she married John de Baliol, the Lord of Harcourt and Castle Barnard, in England. Upon the death of Alan (1234), the husbands of his three danghters divided his territory amongst them. It was Devorgoil who, after she had become a widow, founded and endowed Balliol College, Oxford; and it was her son who is known in history as the King of Scotland and competitor of Robert Bruce.

D'Ewes, Sir Symonis (b. 1602, d. 1650), was educated at Cambridge. He was knighted by Charles I., and received a baronetcy in 1641. When the Civil War broke out, however, he joined the Parliamentary party. He compiled a Journal of all the Parliaments (both Lords and Commons) of Queen Elizabeth's reign—a work which was published several years after his death, in 1682, and is of the greatest importance for the domestic events of the last half of the sixteenth century. His Memoirs were published from the MSS. in 1845, by Mr. Halliwell.

Deydras, John (1324), was an impostor, who claimed to be the true son of Edward I., asserting that he had been changed in his cradle. The unropularity of Edward II. led some people to give credence to his story, but his followers were few, and he was quickly seized and executed.

Dhoondia Waugh was an Afghan chief who took service with Tippoo Sahib. On the final capture of Seringapatam, 1799, he escaped, and commenced a career of plunder on his own account, but was pursued by Colonel Wellesley, defeated, and killed September 10, 1799.

Dialogus de Scaccario is the title of work compiled in the twelfth century by Richard Fitz-Nigel, at one time Treasurer of the Exchequer, and Bishop of London from 1189-1198. This treatise is divided into two books, both of which are thrown into the form of a dialogue between a master and a scholar. The first book, in eighteen chapters, describes what the Exchequer is: the origin of its name, the duties of its various officers, with their rights and honours, the definition of the various legal terms used in the govern-ment of the country, such as hundred, murdrum, danegeld, county, &c., and the business of the Treasury. The second book, divided into twenty-eight chapters, treats of summonses, the rendering of accounts into the Exchequer, and of the sheriffs and the different branches of the king's revenue. The Dialogus de Scaccario was first printed by Madox in his History of the Exchequer, and has been again published by Dr. Stubbs in his Select Charters. The date of its composition is probably about the year 1176 or 1177. It is a work of great importance, and throws a flood of light upon the administrative system of the Angevin kings.

Diamend, The Battle of, was a great faction fight fought near a hamlet bearing this name in Armagh, on September 21, 1795, between the Peep q' Day Boys and the Defenders (q.v.). The victory remained with the former party, who slew forty-eight of their opponents. It was shortly after this fight that the first Orange Lodge was founded.

Diceto, RALPH DE (d? 1202), was a chronicler, whose writings are of considerable importance for the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. This author was for a long period Dean of St. Paul's and Archdeacon of Middlesex. The former office he appears to have held as early as 1163, while to the latter he was elected in 1181. In this last capacity he caused a survey of the estates of that church to be made, part of which is still preserved, and has been issued by the Camden Society, under the title of The Domesday of St. Paul's. Ralph seems to have been employed in many important missions by Henry II., and assisted Archbishop Buldwin at the coronation of Richard I. His two principal works are Abbreviationes Chronicorum and Imagines Historiarum. The former of these consists of a history of the world from the Creation down to 1147, and is largely composed of extracts from classical and mediaval writers. In parts it is largely based on Robert de Monte, a writer who is the primary authority for the early years (1147-1158) of Ralph's more important Imagines. But even this last work can only be described as contemporaneous, in the strict sense of the word, from the year 1173 to its conclusion, 1201, for which period it is of considerable value. Several minor historical documents are ascribed to the same hand. Ralph de Diceto's histories have been edited by Dr. Stubbs for the Rolls Series, Digby, SIR KENELM (b. 1603, d. 1665), was son of Sir Everard Digby, who was executed for his share in the Powder In 1628 he undertook a privateering to the Mediterranean, in which he o guished himself by defeating a Ven squadron at Scanderoon. In 1636 ho became a Catholic, and was employed by the queen, three years later, to obtain money from his co-religionists. During the greater part of the Civil War and the Protectorate he lived abroad, occupying himself with the study of natural philosophy. A literary contemporary compared him to Pico della Mirandola for the universality of his knowledge, and a scientific one styled him "the Pliny of his age for lying." "The truth is," says John Evelyn, "Sir Kenelm was an arrant mounte-

Digges, Sin Dudler (b. 1583, d. 1639), was a member of Parliament in James I.'s reign, and was occasionally employed by the king on public business: as, for example, on the embassy to Russia in 1618. He was one of the chief managers of Buckingham's impeachment in 1626. He was imprisoned on more than one occasion for his language against the court, and in the Parliament of 1628 he strongly advocated the Petition of Right. He subsequently made his peace with the king, and in 1630 had a reversionary grant of the Mastership of the Rolls. He held that office from 1636 to his death in 1639.

Dilke, Sir Charles (b. 1843), the son of Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. After leaving college, he made a prolonged tour through the United States and the British Colonies and India. On his return, he published a volume called Greater Britain, which attracted much attention. He was elected in 1868 Radical member for Chelsea. In 1872 he moved for an inquiry into the Civil List, a step which led him to be popularly credited with Republican views. In 1880 he took office as Foreign Under Secretary, and in 1882 became President of the Local Government Board. He retired from public life in 1886, but returned to the House of Commons in 1892. His Problems of Greater Britain appeared in 1890.

Disarming Acts (IRLAND). By the 7 Will. and Mary, 1695, all Catholics were ordered to deliver up their arms, excepting only those who were protected by the Treaty of Limerick and other Articles, and who were consequently allowed to keep a sword and pistols, also a fowling-piece. All gun-makers were to be Protestants, and to admit only Protestant apprentices. Every justice of the peace might search for arms. The Act was not very strictly carried cut. In 1730, for instance, a Catholic gentleman was convicted of carrying arms, but it was held that the Act applied only to those alive when it was passed. In 1732 Lord Gormanstown and some other gentlemen appeared at Trim Assizes with their swords; they were convicted, but after an apology, pardoned on the petition of the Grand Jury. In 1739 a new Disarming Act was passed, but little observed. In 1793 these Acts were repealed as regards Catholics, but a new Act (33 George III.) was passed forbidding any person to keep arms without a licence, and allowing a search for arms to be made.

Discipline, THE BOOK OF (1561), was the name given to a compilation adopted by the Reformers in Scotland as a basis for the re-organisation of their Church and its practice. It did not, however, receive the sanction of the Estates. In 1561 the Second Book of Discipline was issued, but likewise failed to pass the Estates.

Disinherited, The, was the name given to the remnant of the baronial party who held out after the battle of Evesham, a general sentence of forficiture having been issued against all those who had fought on the side of De Montfort. The disinherited lords occupied Kenilworth and the Isle of Ely: the former place surrendered at the end of 1266, on the terms given by the "Dictum of Kenilwerth," but those who were unwilling to accept them maintained the struggle in the Isle of Ely. The latter party was not reduced till 1267, but was even then allowed the same terms that the defenders of Kenilworth Lad obtained.

Disinherited Barons, The, were certain lords who had claims in Scotland, and on whose behalf it was provided by the Treaty of Northampton, 1328, "that they should be restored to their lands and estates, whereof the King of Scots had taken possession." The Scotch regency, on various pretexts, delayed to carry out this article, the result being that the barons resolved to support Edward Baliol and to invade Scotland. Chief amongst them were Beaument Earl of Buchan, Thomas Lord Wake, David de Strathbogie, and Henry de Ferrers. On the success of Baliol (1334), the barons began to quarrel amongst themselves over their spoils, and Baliol soon had to quit the kingdom he had partially won.

Dispensing Power, THE, was the name given to the royal prerogative, by which the sovereign was enabled to exempt individuals from the operation of the penal laws. analogous to, and frequently confused with, the Suspending Power, by which a right was claimed to abrogate one or more statutes The origin of this idea may be entirely. traced to the ancient royal prerogative of pardoning individual offenders, from which, in an age of unscientific legislation, the transition to a power of previously annulling the penalties of a statute was easy. It found countenance in the clause non-obstants, "any law to the contrary," introduced by the Popes into their Bulls in the thirteenth century. Henry III. imitated this clause in proclamations and grants, but not without protest; and in 1391 the Commons granted to Richard II. the right, with the consent of the Lords, of dispensing with the Statute of Provisors until the next Parliament, asserting, however, that this was a novelty, and should not be drawn into a precedent. The free use of the dispensing power alone made it possible to combine the retention of the Statutes of Provisors and Præmuniro with friendly relations with the Papacy. The power was frequently disputed by Parliament, and although asserted by Henry V. in 1413, with regard to a law for expelling aliens from the kingdom, a statute passed in 1444, limiting the patents of sheriffs to a year, especially forbade the king to dispense with this provision, or to remit the penalties for breaking it. Under Henry VII. the dispensing power was frequently employed (the judges even deciding that the king might grant exceptions to the statute of 1444); but in this raign an important limitation was introduced, by an agreement among lawyers, that the king could not dispense with the penalties for an offence against the common law (malum in se), but only of one created by statute (malum prohibitum). In the reign of Henry VIII., however, the dispensing power became almost unlimited; it was true that the king could not dispense with future Acts of Parliament, but he could "with things in future whereof he hath an inheritance." The ingennity of lawyers failed to decide finally the limits of this prerogative, either during the Tudors or the two first Stuarts, by whome it was frequently exercised: Lord Coke, for instance, leaving the question as he found it by deciding that "no Act of Parliament may bind the king from any prerogative which is inseparable from his person, so that he may not dispense with it by a non-obstante." After the Restoration the dispensing power was revived by Charles II. for the new purpose of admitting Catholies to office, and in virtue of it, he issued the Declaration of Indulgence. In 1673 the country party ventured to challenge the right, asserting. Indulgence. though on insufficient grounds, that it was confined to secular matters, and by threatening to withhold supplies, induced the king to cancel the Declaration. James II., however, determined to use the power on a wholesale scale for the purpose of admitting Catholics to ecclesiastical as well as secular offices, and, after dismissing refractory judges end barristers, brought the question to an issue in Sir Euward Hale's case (1686). This was a collusive action—the plaintiff, Godden, being the defendant's servant, who claimed as an informer a penalty of £500, to which his master was liable for holding the command of a regiment without taking the Sacrament. The defendant pleaded letters patent from the king, and the judges, with one exception, decided that the king might dispense with penal statutes in particular cases. This decision, by perpetuating a legal anomaly, is said by Hallam to have "sealed the condemnation of the House of Stuart." Armed with this weapon, James immediately proceeded to admit Roman Catholic lords to the Privy Council, and to authorise clergymen to hold benefices. For these and other arbitrary acts he lost the crown, and the Bill of Rights abolished both the Snspending and Dispensing power, declaring that "the pretended power of suspending laws and t'. execution of laws by regal authority with... Act of Parliament is illegal; and that the pretended power of dispensing with laws by regal authority without Act of Parliament, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal."

Dissenters. [Nonconformists.]

Dissenters' Chapels Bill (7 and 8 Vict.). In 1844 Lord Lyndhurst carried this measure, which provided that where the founder had not expressly defined the doctrines or form of worship to be observed, the usage of twenty-five years should give trustees a title to their endowment. Its occasion was an attack by some of the Nonconformists on the ten Presbyterian congregations which had diverged into Unitarianism during the eighteenth century, and which had in most instances considerable endowments.

Divine Right. In England the doctrine of divine right of sovereigns grew up during the sixteenth century, flourished during the seventeenth, and died a natural death in the eighteenth. The idea of the sacredness of hereditary right had made great progress during the fifteenth century. The false pedigree put forth by Henry of Lancaster to justify his claim to the crown, the history of the Duke of York's pretensions to the throne, the theory by which Richard III. strove to justify his usurpation, and the care with which Henry VII. guarded his hereditary title against anything which might seem to impair it, mark the advance of this view. The theory of election fell more and more into the background. At the coronation of Edward VI., the king was presented to the people as their lawful and undoubted sovereign before he took the oath to preserve the laws and liberties of the realm. Thus the very form of an election contract was destroyed. The accession of James I. was the triumph of hereditary over Parliamentary title. resolution which recognised him as king stated, "that immediately on the decease of Elizabeth, late Queen of England, the imperial crown of the realm of England did by inherent birthright, and lawful and undeubted succession, descend and come to your most excellent Majesty, as being lineally, justly, and lawfully next and sole heir of the blood roysl of this realm." Already in two of the religious confessions of Henry VIII.'s reign-the Institution of a Christian Man (1537) and the Necessary Doctrine "d Erudition (1543)—the duty of passive obedience had been established as a necessary consequence of the fifth commandment. In the Canons of 1606 the clergy went so far in enforcing this view that the king felt that the obedience they demanded for a de facto king under-mined his hereditary title. He was also obliged, at the complaint of Parliament, to condemn the theory of his absolute power put forth by Cowell, the Professor of Civil Law at Cambridge, in his Law Dictionary. Under Charles I. the House of Commens complained of the sermons of Sibthorpe and Mainwaring (1627), and in their remonstrance of May 26, 1642, asserted that the "erroneous maxim being infused into princes that their kingdoms are their own, and that they may do with them what they will, as if their kingdoms were for them and not they for their kingdoms ... was the root of all the subjects' misery." The Act by which Charles II. was made to succeed immediately on his father's death, and his reign dated accordingly, was a practical acknowledgement of the dectrine of divine right. The Church of the Restoration made the absolute duty of non-resistance part of its teaching, and it was also made part of the oath of allegiance. Both Oxford and Cambridge proclaimed this duty, and the former university burnt the works of its opponents. Closely connected with the doctrine of the divine right was the custom of touching for the "king's evil," which was, in the eyes of the people, "a visible, pulpable attestation of the indefeasible sanctity of the royal line." A Latin service for this ceremony had been drawn up under Henry VII.; under Charses I. an English one took its place, and during the reign of Anne was inserted in the Prayer Book. In a single year Charles II. touched 8,500 persons; in the course of his reign it is estimated that one hundred thousand persons received his healing touch. William III. naturally never attempted to exercise this power, but Anne revived the ceremony. It was again abande d by the Hanoverian kings, and the practice was only maintained by the exiled heirs of the Stuarts. During the same years the theory of divine right was passing away. It revived und Anne, and its efficacy was preached by Sache verell and other divines. But when George I. came to the throne, with a title based on the Act of Settlement alone, it was impossible for any party which accepted the Hanoverian succession to still maintain this doctrine. Moreover, as the Tories were in opposition, they had no motive for exalting the monarchy. The Jacobites alone continued to make this tenet part of their faith, and they became practically extinct by the accession of George III.

Dodington, George Bubb (b. 1691, d. 1762), was a politicism of some prominence in the first half of the eighteenth century. He entered Parliament in 1715 as member fer Winchelsea, and was almost at once despatched as ambassador to Spain, where he signed the Treaty of Madrid, and remained till 1717. He inherited a magnificent property, and attached himself to Walpole's party, but deserted that minister in 1741. Before this he had, in 1737, used all his influence with Frederick, Prince of Wales, to dissuade him from openly setting his ier at defiance, but was one of the leading triends and counsellors of the prince for many years. After holding several offices, he became the confidential friend of Lord Bute, in the first year of George III.'s reign, and was by that nobleman's influence created Baron Meicombe. He did not, however, long enjoy his new honours, but died the next year. He had some claims to being a patron of men of letters, and it was to him that Thomson dedicated his Summer. Among his friends were Young, Fielding, and Lyttleton. He left behind him a Diary (published in 1784), which is still one of the leading authorities for the minor history of the times in which he lived.

Dodowah, Tur Battle of (1826), took place on the Goid Coast, between a British force, under Colonel Purdon, and the Ashantees, who, after fighting with desperate bravery, were compelled to give way.

Dollar, The Battle of (875), resulted in a complete victory for the Danes, under Thorstem, over Constantine and the men of Alban. As a consequence of this defent, Constantine was compelled to eede Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, and Moray to the invaders. Dollar is on the borders of Fife and Perthshire.

Dolly's Brae, The Riot at, occurred on July 12, 1849. Fifteen hundred Orangemen marched through this defile, which is near Castlew llan, to congratulate the Earl of Roden, their provincial grand master. On their way back they were fired on by the Roman Catholics, an attack which the Protestants were not slow to return. The result of the affray was that the latter body drove back their opponents, who left four dead and forty wounded on the field. The question was taken up in Parliament, and the Earl of Roden was eventually dismissed from his lord-lieutenancy.

Domesday is the name given to the great survey of England, made by order of William the Conqueror. The name is not found before the Dialogus de Scaccario (q.v.). in which (i. 16) it is said that the English called the book of the survey "Domesdei," or "the day of judgment," because of the strictness of the examination. It has also been held to refer to the day of holding the courts at which the inquest was made. 1084 England was threatened with invasion by Canuto of Denmark. At the beginning of that year the king laid a heavy "geld," or tax, on all Engiand of six shillings on the hide. The invasion of the Northmen was not made. The threatened danger, however, and the tax which seems connected with it, probably made the Conqueror anxious to ascertain the capabilities of his kingdom, both as regards defence and taxation. At the mid-winter meeting of the Witan, after "deep speech" with the great men, the king ordered that a survey of the kingdom should be made. For the purpose of the survey the country was divided into districts, and a body of commissioners was sent to hold an inquest in each district. The names of those sent into the midland counties are preserved, and show that men of high position were employed in the work. They were bidden to inquire who held each estate in the time of King Edward, who held it at the time of the inquest, what its value was at the two dates, whether that value could be raised, and by what title it was held. In order to find out whether an estate was capable of contributing a larger sum to the royal treasury, minute inquiries were to be made as to its extent, and the men and beasts it supported. The commissioners gained their information in the way in which such matters were usually managed in England. They took the same witness of the sheriff and the French (foreign) barons, and the whole hundred, of the priest, the reeve, and six villeins of each township: that is, they learned the particulars they wished to know by answers made on oath in tho hundred court. It was not the first time that an inquest had been held to ascertain the value of the land throughout the country for the purpose of taxation; for in the time of Ethelred the country had been surveyed and divided for the assessment of the danegeld, and an inquest seems to have been held for the geld of 1084. It is evident, however, that these had not been of tho searching nature of the Domesday Survey. which was intensely disliked by Englishmen. The inquest was finished in the summer of 1086.

Questions of right, as well as the nature of the quest, led to irritation and to some bloodshed. With matters of title the commissioners did not concern themselves further than to record the conflicting claims, and in doing this they treated the people of each race alike. Cases of illegal occupation are often ranged in a class by themselves, and include possessions gained by defective or disputed titles, as well as by acts of violence. Those are the terre occupate of the western shires, and the invasiones of Essex, &c. Few indications can be found in the record of the violence of the Conquest. The rights and obligations of each landholder are settled by those of his antecessor, and the date at which these are ascertained is that of the death of King Edward. There is seldom anything to show that the new possessor did not succeed his anteressor peacefully, and, as far as possible, all reference to the reign of Harold is avoided. Nevertheless the record bears witness to a sweeping confis-cation of the lands of the wealthier and more powerful class, and in a lesser degree of the smaller owners also, to widespread devastation, and to the ruin of many boroughs. Two systems of measurement are used in Domesday: the one by the hide, the other by the carucate. The hide is used to signify an area of a certain rating value. It is an old English term, and though it implies an area, seems in Domesday at least to be of uncertain extent. The foreign carucato is the corelative of the hide, but has a more constant reference to area. It is sometimes used of land which is non-hidated, i.e., not rated for the payment of taxes. In both hide and calucate the terra ad unam carneam, or one ploughland of definite extent, is a principal factor.

The latest investigation of Angio Saxon institutions is contained in Prof. F. W. Maitland's Domesday Book and Reyond, Among the more notable conclusions are the following:—(1) Domesday being primarily a tax-book, many of its leading distinctions are fiscal rather than legal or economic. For example, the difference between the sokemen and the classes below them is that the former are personally responsible for the geld, while the latter pay it through a lord. Similarly, the term "manerium" has none of its thirteenth century meaning, but simply implies an area—be it an immense tract or only twelve acres, be its annual value £150 or 1s.—which is treated as a unit hy the tax-gatherer. (2) The line between the villani, bordarii, and cotarii was an economic one, and not a matter of status. They were not legally "ascripti globe." The distinction between the "sochemannus" and the "liber homo" cannot be ascertained. (3) The villans of Domesday were not necessarily the justiceables of their lords; still less were the sokemen. All depended on whether the lord had sac and soc (q.v.), a right which could only be claimed by royal grant. Grantees, however, could in their turn become grantors, and thus justice had already become sub-infeudated. (4) The free lordless village was as normal a feature in 1066 as the village completely subjected to seignorial control. Such free townships, however, had very little communal organisation, for they had no court and often no reeve. (5) The Anglo-Saxon Lorough is primarily a fortress, a unit in a scheme of national defence, the sphere of a special peace and of a separate court. The burgesses rarely all have the same landloid-in fact, historically they may be traced back to the complements of men sent by the neighbouring landowners to defend the post. The commercial element is not a necessary characteristic of a borough. (6) Seignorlal justice may be traced back in England to a very remote time. Even in the seventh century there were "immunists" with exalted rights within their territories; while in the tenth century a royal grant of land generally included as a matter of common form a grant of jurisdiction, extending to both the free and the unfree. (7) It is impossible to believe that the English villages as a whole have a service origin. In the west the English may, here and there, have adopted Celtic agrarian arrangements unchanged; hut elsewhere from the very first we find the typical holding a large hide of 120 acres or thereabouts, an area only suited to the freeman. The virgate of thirty acres, so often pointed to as the typical servile holding, is obviously of later origin, being only a fraction of the hide, derived by splitting it into parts.

Dominica, the largest, though not the most important, of the Leeward Islands, was discovered by Columbus, 1493, on a Sunday, whence its name. Though claimed from 1625 c wards hy England, it was colonised by the French, hut in 1754 was captured hy the British forces, and was formally coded to England by the Treaty of Paris, 1763. In 1778 it was ravaged by the French, and was taken by thom in 1781, and retained for a period of two years. In 1795 another attack was made on Dominica, and in 1805 the island was once more ravaged by a French force under La Grange. In 1813 Dominica was the scene of a Maroon war, but the insurgents were speedily crushed; and the insurrection was made a pretext for the employment of most severe measures against the slaves. Since 1871 Dominica has belonged to the federation of the Leeward Islands (q. v.), hut increased local autonomy was granted to it in 1894. The population is mainly French-speaking and Catholio.

Dominica, THE BATTLEOF (April 12, 1782) resuited in the destruction of the French naval power in the West Indies. On the 9th of April the division of Sir Samuel Hood, which, cosisting of eight ships, had got separated from the rest of the fleet under Rodney, had maintained for an hour an unequal contest with fifteen French ships, and the French admiral had thought it wise to retire when the rest of the British fleet came up. The next two days were occupied in trying to bring the French to action, and on the 12th Redney succeeded in doing so. Favoured by the wind, he took advantage of a break in the French line, and advancing in column, cut the French fleet in two. Sir Samuel Hood, who was leading the English van, at once became engaged with that of the French fleet, while Rodney was husy with the enemy's centre. The action was vigorously carried on, and the atmosphere, which was very still, soon became so enveloped in smoke that the fleets mutually ceased firing. When at length the smoke cleared away, the French were seen in full retreat. A chase was immediately begun, and five ships were taken or destroyed, including the cnormous Ville de Paris. Four more were soon afterwards captured by Hood when cruising among the islands. The English loss in the two actions of the 9th and 12th was comparatively small. Rodney and Hood were both raised to the peerage. The battle itself is famous in naval history as being the first in which the manacuvre of breaking the line was practised.

Dominicans, The, or Black Farans.
This order was founded by Dominie in the beginning of the twelfth century, and approved by Innocent III. in 1215. Thirteen brothren of this order erossed into England in 1221, and before long fixed their abode at Oxford, where they soon became prominent in the schools. Their secend English house was the Blackfriars in London, originally situated where Lincoln's Inn now stands, but removed from this place about 1279. At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries there were fifty-eight Deminican houses in England and Wales, several of them being situated in the principal towns, such as Bristol, Northampton,

Selisbury, York, and Leicester. [FRIARS.] Dominis, MARCO ANTONIO DE (6. 1566, d. 1624), was a Jesuit, who, in 1604, became Archbishop of Spalatro. He made the ac-quaintance of Bishop Bedell in Italy, and was induced by him to quit his archbishopric and come to England, where he published his work, De Republica Ecclesiastica (1617), which was aimed at some of the evils, temporal and occlesiastical, of the Papal system. De Dominis professed himself a Protestant, and was much patronised by James I. and the High Churchmen in England. He received the Mastership of the Savoy, and was made Doan of Windsor. In England he saw that his ambition was not likely to be gratified by the highest honours of the Church. He, therefore, returned to Rome (1622), where his old schoolfellow, Gregory XV., was Pope, and seems to have entertained the idea that by his efferts England might be restored to the Church of Rome. But on the death of Gregory, De Dominis was arrested by the Inquisition, and Imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, where he died.

Newland, Life of De Dominis; Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., 1608-1642.

Donald, son of Constantine and King of Alban (d. 900), was the first ruler styled by the chroniclers "King of Alban." He reigned from 889 to 900, and was occupied during the early part of his reign in repelling the attacks of Sigurd, the brother of Harald Harfagr, and the newly-appointed earl of those Norwegians whe had fied from their native ceuntry on the accession of the new king, and had already begun to colonise the Orkney Islands. The new-comers invaded Caithness and Sutherland, and the presence of the King of Alban was constantly required in those parts to keep them at bay, though their incursions could hardly affect that part of Scotland over which Donald really reigned. Later on, a fresh body of Danes from Dublin swept down upon the kingdom of Alban itself, and Denald was slain at Dunotter in contest with them.

Donald Baloch of the Isles was a relative of Alexander of the Isles, on whose captivity he raised a ferce and defeated the royal troops under the Earl of Mar at Lochaber (1431). James I. of Scotland was exceedingly angry at the ill-success of his lieutenant, and increased the taxes throughout his dominions five-fold for the purpose of finding funds for a royal progress through the Highlands. Shortly after, Donald was compelled to seek refuge in Ireland, where he was killed.

Donald Bane, King or Scotland, was brother of Malcolm Canmere, whem he succeeded in 1093. After reigning six months, he was driven out by his nephew Duncan. In 1094, however, on Duncan's death, he recovered the throne, which he shared for three years with Edmund, son of Malcolm. For some three years Donald Bane continued to rule over the Scots north of the great firths, while Edmund, as the son of the Saxon Margaret, reigned over the more Saxon population of the Lowlands. At last, in 1097, Edgar Atheling, with the assistance of an English force, after defeating and imprisoning his nephew Edmund and Donald Bane, set his other nephew Edgar on the Scotch throne. Two years later Donald Bane was taken prisoner, and after being blinded, was con-demned to perpetual imprisonment till his death. He was buried in Dunfermline

Skene, Celtic Scotland; Robertson, Early Kings of Scotland.

Donald Bane MacWilliam (d. 1187) claimed to be a descendant of Duncan, son of Malcolm Canmore. In 1181, during the absence of William the Lien at the English court, ho tried, with the aid of many of the Scottish barons, to make himself king of the country north of the Forth and Clyde, and for six years he there maintained a sort of irregular warfare, which ended in his defeat and death in the Spey Valley (July, 1187).

Donald Bree, or Domnal Breec, the son of Eocha (q.v.), was King of Dalriada (629—642). In 634 Donald was defeated by the Angles at Calathios, while attempting to wrest from their hands the district between the Aven and the Pontland Hills. In 637 he crossed over to Ireland with a large army to aid Congal Claen, King of Ulster, against the King of Ireland, but was utterly routed at the battle of Magh Rath. After another attack upon the Anglian territory, in which he was assisted by the Britons of Alclyde, he seems to have fallen out with this last race upon the death of the great Rhydderch Hael, and was slain in battle with the new King of Alclyde at Strathcarron

(642). On his death, the kingdom of Dalriada reverted to anarchy.

Dorchester, Dudley Carleton, Viseount (b. 1573, d. 1632), was ambassador to the republic of Venice from 1610 to 1615, and to the United Provinces from 1615 to During the second Parliament of Charles I. he maintained the cause of the king in the House of Commons, and attached himself to the party of Buckingham. In May, 1626, he was created Baron Carleton, and on July 25, 1628, Viscount Dorchester. On December 14 in the same year he was appointed Secretary of State, and in that eapacity advocated peaco with Franco and alliance with the German Protestants. Clarendon says that his knowledge of "foreign employment, and the condition of other princes and nations," was combined with an utter ignorance of English institutions and temper.

Dorchester. I. In Dorset, a Roman station, called Durnovaria, or Durinum, was a place of some importance under the Anglo-Saxon kings, and was made the seat of a mint by Athelstan. The remains of the ancient Roman fortifications were destroyed, and a Franciscan priory built from the materials in the reign of Edward III. The town was incorporated in the same reign, and returned two members to Parliament from tho year 1295 to 1885. II. In Oxfordshire, on the Thames, near Wallingford, the scene of the baptism of Cwichelm (q.v.), and the seat of a famous abbey and of a bishopric which was united with the see of London by Remigius in 1086.

Dorchester, Catherine Sepley, Countess of (d. 1717), was the daughter of Sir Charles Sedley (q.v.), and mistress of James II., by whom, in 1686, sho was made Countess of Dorchester. She was more celebrated for her wit and vivacity than for her beauty; and notwithstanding her ridicule of the Romish priests who thronged his court, seems to have maintained her ascendency over James. After his exile she was married to the Earl of Portmore.

Dorislaus, Isaac (d. 1649), was the son of a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church. He was appointed Judge Advocato of Essex's army on account of his great knowledge of civil law, and assisted in the preparation of the charge against Charles I. In May, 1649, he was sent as ambassador from the Commonwealth to Holland, where he was murdered at the Hague by some servants of Montrose, headed by Colonel Whitford (May 12 or 15, 1649). He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but exhumed at the Restoration.

Peacock, Army Lists of Cavaliers and Round-heads.

Dorset, Peerage of In 1397 John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, eldest son of John of Gaunt, was created Marquis of Dorset, as well as Marquis of Somerset; the title was continued in this branch of the Beaufort family till the execution and forfeiture of Henry, Duko of Somerset, 1463. In 1475, Thomas Grey, Lord Ferrers of Groby, was created Marquis of Dorset; lie grandson, Henry, third Marquis of Dorset, and Onko of Suffolk, was attainted in 1554. In 1662 Thomas Sackville, Lori Backhurst, was created Earl of Dorset, and the eventh ear, was created Duke of Dorset in 1720. In 184 Charles, the fifth duke, deed unwarried, and the dukedom became extinct.

Dorset, Thomas GREY, 1st MARQUIS OF (d. 1501), was a son of Elizabeth Woodville, the subsequent wife of Edward IV., by her first husband, Sir John Grey. Sharing in his mother's prosperity, he was created Marquis of Dorset in 1475, and cscaped the hostility displayed by Gloucester in 1483 to all the members of the queen-dowager's family by taking refuge in the Sanetuary at Westminster. Escaping thenco in safety, he joined with his uncle, Sir Richard Woodville, in an attempt to seize the Tower and raise a fleet; but failure drove him once again to concealment, until Buckingham's rebellion afforded him another opportunity of being actively hostile to Richard III. This movement likewise failing, ho forthwith fled over the sea to make one of the powerful party of malcontents supporting the Earl of Richmond in Britanny. On his return from France, where he had been left by Henry VII. as security for the French king's loan, he enjoyed the royal favour, though during the Simnel imposture ho was imprisoned in the Tower, but soon released. In the same reign ho served against the French (1491); four years later was one of the leaders when the rebels were vanquished at Blackheath, Dorset, Henry Grey, 3rd Marquis of (d. 1554), married Frances, daughter of Charles Brandon, Dnke of Suffolk, and Mary, sister of Henry VIII. By her he became the father of Lady Jane Grey. His weak and ambitious character caused him to lend a ready ear to Northumberland's proposals for obtaining an alteration of the succession in favour of his daughter. When this plot failed, Suffolk was pardoned on payment of a fine, but in the following year raised a rebellion in the midland counties, in conjunction with that of Sir Thomas Wyatt (q.v.) in Kent. His few troops were defeated near Coventry by the Earl of Huntingdon, and the duke, having taken shelter with one of his retainers named Underwood, was by him betrayed to his pursuers. He was condemned, and executed Feb. 23, 1554, a few days after his daughter, Lady Jane Grey.

Tytler, Eng. under Edward VI. and Mary.

Dorset, Thomas Sackville, 1st Earl of (b. 1536, d. 1608), was the son of Sir Richard Sackville. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, studied at the Inner Temple, and served in various diplomatic employments on the Continent. In 1567 he was created Lord Buckhurst. In 1587 he was ambassador to the United Provinces, and succeeded Burleigh as Lord Treasurer. In 1604 ho was created Earl of Dorset. Ho was the joint author with Thomas Norton of the tragedy of Gorbolue (1561), the earliest blank-verse drama ir our language.

Dorset, Charles Sackville, 6th Earl or (b. 1637, d. 1706), sat for East Grinstead as Lord Buckhurst in 1660, but declined all public employment. In 1675 he became Gentleman of the Bedchamber, and next year succeeded to his father's title. In the reign of James II. he was dismissed from the lordlieutenancy of Sussex. He entered into communication with the Princo of Orange, and on the landing of William, assisted the Princess Anne in her flight frem Westminster. became Lord Chamberlain, and employed his patronage in helping genius and misfortune. On the departure of William for Ireland, he was appointed in Mary's Council of Nine. In 1691 he accompanied William to Holland. He was declared by Preston, on the detection of his plot, to be in communication with the Jacobite court of St. Germains. The accusation was probably untrue, although Dorset was no doubt angry at William's leanings towards the Tories. Derset is better known as the patron of Prior, Dryden, Congreve, and Addison, than as a politician. Macaulay thinks that "had he been driven by necessity to exert himself, he would probably have risen to the highest posts in the State."

Dost Mahomed (d. 1863) was the brother of Futteh Khan, the vizier of Mahmood Shah in Afghanistan. In conjunction with his brothers, he succeeded to the throne of Cabul on the expulsion of Mahmood, brother of Shah Soojah. In 1834 Dost Mahomed successfully quelled the attempt of Shah Soojah to recover Afghanistan, but during this war he lost the province of Peshawur definitely to Runjeet Singh. In 1836 Dost made overtures to Lord Auekland for arbitration, and on his refusal appealed to the King of Persia. In 1837 he sent an expedition to Peshawur, and at Jumrood won a fruitless victory. In 1838 overtures for an alliance were made to Dost Mahomed, and an embassy sent to Cabul under Captain Burnes. Dost Mahomed declared his willingness to dismiss the Russian and Persian envoys, provided the English would assist him to recover Pesh wur. This the Governor-General refused, and Dost Mahomed therefore turned to Persia and Russia, and the latter power guaranteed the defence of Candahar. Thereupon the English determined to depose him, and to attain this H18T.-15 object, the Afghan expedition of 1839 was despatched. Deserted by Persia, with a British army advancing on Cabul, Dost Mahomed fied with a handful of followers to the Hindoo Koosh. After being kindly reeeived by the chief of Khooloom, he passed on to Bokhara, where he was detained by the Ameer; but on effecting his escape, he returned to Khooloom, gathered an army of Oosbegs, and crossing the Hindoo Koosh, proclaimed a religious war. He was defeated, however, September 18th, by Brigadier Dennie. After another attempt to raise the country against the English, he surrendered to Sir William Macnaughten, and was brought to Calcutta. He was released in 1842. In the second Sikh War he made common cause with the Sikhs, and captured Peshawur, from which, however, he was shortly after driven out. In 1856-7 an English army was despatched to aid him against the Shah of Persia, who had seized Herat. Before he died, he had succeeded to some extent, at least, in unitir; the Afghan power. On his death, which occurred in 1863, the country was divided between the partisans of his eldest son, and the younger one, Shere Ali, to whom Dost Mahomed had bequeathed his throne. [Afohan Wars.]

Doughty, Thomas, was Drake's second in command in the famous voyage of 1577. He was appointed captain of a Portuguese vessel captured near Santiago. Soon after quitting the Plate River, Deughty deserted with his men, but was soon overtaken, and his crew transferred to Drake's own ship, the Pelican. On the Patagonian coast the adventurers came upon a gibbet, on which, more than fifty years before, Magellan had hanged his mutineers; and this spot was now put into fresh service for the execution of Doughty. A courtmartial was extemporised; Doughty was found guilty, and beheaded, after first embracing the admiral and partaking of the holy communion. A story of tho time makes Drake to have been the executioner in person.

Douglas Castle (in Lanarkshire), during the wars of Scotland with Edward I., obtained the name of the "Perilous Castle of Douglas," from the difficulty of holding it against the Scots. It was three times re-captured from the English by Sir James Douglas, and its garrison destroyed. About the year 1451 it was demolished by James II.'s orders, while the earl was absent in Rome. It was, however, rebuilt, and was in 1639 garrisoned by the Covenanters.

Douglas, The Family of, is supposed to be of Flemish origin. The first member of the family known to history is Sir William Douglas, the friend and supporter of Wallace. The vast possessions of the Douglas family in the south of Scotland rendered them formidable antagonists to the royal power, and the fact that Archibald Douglas married a daughter of Baliol's sister, while the Stuarts were only descended from a younger daughter of David of Huntingdon, made it at one time by no means impossible that a Douglas would succeed in driving the Stuarts from the throne. Besides their estates in Scotland, the Douglases had at one time extensive lands in England, just as the Percies had similar claims in Scotland. These claims were to have been satisfied for both families according to the Treaty of Northampton; and it has been remarked that a slight difference in the distribution of the estates of either family would have "inverted their position, and made the Percies national to Scotland, the Douglases to England."

Douglas, The Peerage of, dates from Sir William Douglas, who was created Earl of Douglas in 1357. The carldom came to an end in 1455 with the attainder of James, ninth earl, after the battle of Arkenhelm and the unsuccessful Douglas rebellion. The Peerage of Angus had been conferred on George, illegitimate son of the first Earl of Douglas, in 1389. In tho Douglas rebellion the Anguses adhered to the crown, and got a large portion of their relatives' estates. In 1633 William, eleventh Earl of Angus, was created Marquis of Douglas. In 1703 Archibald, third marquis, was created Duke of Douglas. The dukedom of Douglas became extinct with him in 1761. The estates of the Douglas family were the subject of a protracted law-suit, known as the Douglas Cause, between the Duke of Hamilton and Archibald Stewart, nephew of the Duke of Douglas, who obtained the estates by a judgment of the House of Lords in 1771, and was created Baron Douglas in 1790. The peerage became extinct in 1857. The marquisate of Doughs and earldom of Angus passed to James, seventh Duke of Hamilton, on the death of Archibald, Duke of Douglas, in 1761, who was descended, by a second marriage, from William, first Marquis of Douglas (d. 1633.) [Hamilton.]

Douglas, William, 187 Earl or, was the sen of Sir Archibald Douglas. On his return from France, where he had been educated, in 1346, his first exploit was to drive the English out of Douglasdale and Teviotdale. He was the godson of Sir William Douglas, the Knight of Liddesdale (q.v.), whom he murdered in Ettrick Forest (1353) in revenge. In 1356 he was present at the battle of Poictiers; and in 1357 was created Earl of Douglas. On the death of David II. he is said to have intended to have disputed the succession of the house of Stuart, but was bought off by an alliance between his sen and Margaret, daughter of Robert II.

Douglas, James, 2nd Earl of (d. 1388), the son of William, Earl of Douglas, married

Margaret, daughter of Robert II. He sueceeded to the title in 1384. He was renowned for his bravery and skilful generalship. In 1385 he took part in a raid upon England in eonjunction with a body of French troops under John of Vienne. In 1388 he penetrated as far as the gates of York, and was earrying away Henry Percy's (Hotspur) pennon to Scotland, when he was met by the Percies at Otterburn. This battle resent in the defeat of the English, who fled from the field, leaving their leader, Hotspur, in the hands of the enemy; but it was dearly purchased by the Scots with the death of the Earl of Douglas.

Douglas, Archibald, 4th Earl of (d. 1424), was the son of Archibald, third Earl of Douglas. In 1400 his ambition procured the marriage of his sister Marjory with the Duke of Rothesay (q.v.), the heir to the Scottish erown, and he is said to have been privy to the murder of that young prince in 1402. In the September of the same year he headed an army collected for the invasion of England, but was defeated and taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon Hill. On his release, he joined Perey, in whose cause he was again defeated and taken prisoner at Shrewsbury (q.v.), 1403. In 1421 he crossed over to France to fight against the English in that country. There he was created Duke of Touraine, and falling in the battle of Verneuil, was buried. at Tours.

Douglas, William, 6th Earl of (d. 1440), and third Duke of Touraine, was the son of Archilald, fifth Earl of Douglas, who died 1439. Cr. succeeding to the earl-dom, he incurred the enmity of Sir William Crichton, who invited him to pay a visit to the young king, James II., at Edinburgh Castle, and there, after some form of trial, had him beheaded, along with his brother David (1440). The young earl was but some eighteen years old at the time of his death.

Donglas, William, 8TR Earl of (d. 1452), succeeded to the estates on the death of his father, James the Gross (1443). He was a man of turbulent spirit and vast power, possessing a large part of southern Scotland. Having been appointed Lieutenant-Governor by James JI., he rapidly concentrated his power by entering into alliances with the Earls of Crawford and Ross and other great nobles, and by setting on foot intrigues with foreign powers and with the English, whom he had defeated on the borders. In 1450 he passed in state aeross the seas to spend the Jubilee in Rome. He speedily lost the king's favour, and was deprived of his office: a judgment for which, however, he retaliated by various acts of defiance of the royal suthority. He ravaged the lands of many of the king's more immediate friends, even daring to put to death Sir John Herries, and assumed the position of an independent prince. In 1452 James II.

summoned him to an interview at Stirling, during which the king, enraged at his insolence, stabbed him in the throat, whereupon he was quickly despatched by Sir Patrick Gray. He married his cousin, Margaret Douglas, the "Fair Maid of Galloway," and so re-united the possessions of the house of Douglas.

Douglas, James, 9th Earl of (d. 1488), was the brother of William, Earl of Douglas (stabbed by James II. of Scotland), whom he succeeded as head of the family, Feb., 1452. Almost his first act was to nail a defiance of the king to the walls of the Parliament House, charging him with murder and perjury. He then declared war against James, for which act his lands were subsequently declared forfeited to the crown by an Act passed in 1454. But before long the Angus branch of his own family sided with the king, and in 1455 the Earl of Douglas was defeated at Arkenholm, two of his brothers perishing in the battle. James Douglas was compelled to seek refuge in England, where he remained until he was taken prisoner in a border foray, 1484, and was soon after confined in the monastery of Lindores, where he died in 1488, the last of his Douglas, Sir Archibald (d. 1333), was the youngest brother of the famous Lord James Douglas, and a warm adherent of David II. In 1362, having defeated Edward Baliel at Annan, he made a successful raid into Cumberland. On the capture of Sir Andrew Murray (1333), Douglas was chosen Regent of Scotland; but in the same year he was defeated and taken prisoner at Halidon Hill, and shortly afterwards died of his wounds.

Douglas, Sir Geonoe (d. 1547), was a brother of Archibald, sixth Earl of Angus. Having given offeneo to James V. of Scotland, ho was banished to England along with his brother (1528). Some years later ho took part (1532) in a raid on Scotland, to which country he did not return until the death of Jam. J., 1542, when his forfeiture was rescinded. He was one of the Assured Lords (q.v.), and was urgent in promoting the marriage of Mary with Edward, but did net do much real service to Henry VIII., except by giving good advice to his ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler. He perished at the battle of Pinkie (1547).

Douglas, James, Lord (d. 1330), called "The Good," was the son of Sir William Douglas, the friend of Wallace. Many stories, more or less incredible, are told of him, as of most of the other patriots who were fighting for Scotland at this time. He was an able and gallant partisan of Robert Bruce, his first exploit in the king's cause being the capture of the castle of Douglas from the English in 1306, and the massacre of its garrison. He was in command of one of the divisions of the Scottish army at Bannockburn in 1314, and in the same year harried Northumberland in conjunction with Edward Bruce. On the departure of Robert Bruce for Ireland, in 1316, the charge of the kingdom was committed to Douglas, who managed to defeat all attempts at invasion on the part of the English nobles. In 1319 he invaded England to create a diversion in favour of the beleaguered castle of Berwick, and wor in complete victory at Milton, in Yorkshire. In 1327, whilst on a similar expedition, he surprised the English camp by night at Stanhepe Park, in Durham, cutting, it is said, the very ropes of King Edward's tent. Later on, he was one of the Scotch commissioners at the conclusion of the Treaty of Northampton. After the death of Bruco (1329), Douglas set out on an expedition to Palestine for the purpose of conveying the king's heart to Jerusalem, but being diverted from his original enterprise, was slain in battle with the Moors in Andalusia, 1330. His body was brought back to Scotland, and buried at Douglas.

Dalrymple, Annals of Scotland; Burton, Hist.

Douglas, Sin William (d. 1353), the Knight of Liddesdale, was taken prisoner (1332) by Sir Antony de Lucy in a raid into Scotland, and by order of Edward III. was put in irens. On his release, he did good service against the English, whom he expelled from Teviotdale (1338). In 1342 he took Alexander Ramsay prisoner owing to a private feud, and starved him to death in his castle of Hermitage; but this erimo was pardoned by David II., who even made its perpetrator Governor of Roxburgh Castle. Douglas was taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, and while in captivity, entered into treasonable negotiations with Edward III. He was assassinated in 1353, whilst hunting in Ettrick Forest, by his godson, William, Lord Douglas.

Dalrymple, Annals of Scotland.

Douglas Rebellion, THE (1451). When William, the eighth Earl of Douglas, returned from Rome in 1451, he found the king's movements directed by Criehton, and unable to brook a sense of inferiority, he persuaded his own dependants and the Earls of Crawford and Ross to enter into a confederacy with him. In February, 1452, he was murdered by James's ow . hand, leaving his title and estates to his brether James, who at once took up arms to avenge his relative's Though reconciled to the king for a time, he soon grew restless, and entered into treasonable communications with the Duke of York, and even sent a letter of defiance to James, who soon drove him to the borders, where, however, the rebellious nobleman gathered a force of 40,000 men, and was forced to retreat to Fife. At Arkenholm the two armies met, but the power of Douglas was thinned by the desertion of his kinsman, the Earl of Angus, and the defection of the Hamiltons. Abandened by almost all his fellowers, the Earl James fled to Annandale, and thence to England. His estates were declared forfeited by the Scotch Parliament, and in 1484 the earl himself was taken prisoner while invading his native land, and condemned to lead a monastic life till his death (1488).

Dover, called by the Romans Dubris, was a place of considerable importance in the early history of England. It was one of the Cinque Ports, and a very usual port for embarkation to the Continent. It was here that Eustace, Count of Boulogne, committed the outrage which led to the banishment of Godwin (1051). At this time the tewn held its privileges by supplying the crown with twenty ships for fifteen days. Harold founded a castle here. After the battle of Hastings the town was burnt by William's troops, and a few years later Eustace of Boulogne attempted to seize it by force during William's absence abroad (1067). It was taken by the French in 1296; in 1520 it was the scene of Henry VIII.'s interview with Charles V., and in 1670, of the negotiations which led to the Treaty of Dover. [CINQUE PORTS.]

Dover, THE TREATY OF (1670), was concluded between Charles II. and Louis XIV., chiefly through the instrumentality of Charles's sister, the Duchess of Orleans. By this treaty: -(1) England and France were to declare war against Holland; and England was to receive the province of Zeeland in case of success.
(2) The Prince of Orange was, if possible, to receive an indemnity. (3) Charles was to assist Louis to make good his claim on the Spanish succession, and to receive as his reward Ostend, together with any conquests he might make in South America. (4) Charles was to receive a subsidy of £300,000 a year from Louis. These four clauses comprised the whole of the public treaty, which was signed by Shaftesbury and the other ministers, but there were secret clauses known only to Clifford, Arlington, and Arundel, by which Charles was to reestablish Roman Catholicism; while to enable him to crush any opposition in carrying out this scheme, Louis was to give him £200,000 a year and 6,000 French troops.

Downing, George (d. 1684?), was member for Carlisle in 1657. It was he who seems to have first suggested that the "Instrument of Government" should be abolished, and a new constitution, which aimed at reproducing the old constitution under a dynasty of Cromwells substituted for it. After the Restoration, he was English ambassador at the Hague, and in 1664 was strongly in favour of making reprisals on the Dytch account of the second of the se in 1664 was strongly in favour of making reprisuls on the Dutch, a course of conduct which was adopted, though not in the king's name. A year later he proposed in the House of Commons that the method of contracting government loans through the goldsmiths should be abolished, and that the Treasury should constitute itself a bank; and when his plan was adopted, he received a suborlinate part in that department of State. In 1672 he was again ambassader in Holland, and in 1678 had once more to defend his financial schemes in the House, but this time without effect.

Downs, The Battle of the (1666), was fought between the English fleet, commanded by the Duke of Albemarle, and the Dutch, under De Ruyter, De Witt, and Van Tromp. The battle lasted for several days, commencing on the 1st of June. On the 3rd, Albemarle retired, after setting fire to his disabled ships, and late in the evening was joined by his colleague, Princo Rupert. The battle was one of the most obstinate and bloody of all the indecisive battles fought between the Dutch and the English in the seventeenth century.

D'Oyley, Colonel, the president of the first military council in Jamaica (1656), succeeded Major Sedgewicke as governor, and by his severe measures compelled the disbended soldiers to colonise the island for England, in accordance with the wishes of Cromwell.

Drake, Sir Francis (b. 1545, d. 1596), was born at Tavistock, in Devonshire. Early inured to a sea life, he accompanied his relative, Sir Jol n Hawkins, to the Spanish main, and subsequently, in 1570, undertook a voyage on his own account to the West Indies. In 1572 he sailed with two vessels to make reprisals upon the Spaniards for the previous losses he had sustained at their hands, and made an unsuccessful attack on Nombre de Dios. On his return to England, Drake was at first employed by Elizabeth in Ireland; but in 1577 sailed, with her sanction, on another expedition. He plundered all the Spanish towns on the coasts of Chili and Peru, captured immense booty, and finally crossing the Pacific Ocean, returned to England round the Cape, thus circumnavi-gating the globe. On arriving in England, he was knighted by the queen, in recognition of his daring (1580). Five years later, Sir Francis was sent with a fleet to tho West Indies, where he captured the citics of Santiago, St. Domingo, and Carthagena. In 1587, during the preparations for the Spanish Armada, he commanded a fleet which did much damage in the port of Cadiz, where he is said to have burnt 10,000 tons of shipping, an operation which he styled "singeing the King of Spain's beard." He then captured an immense treasure-ship off the Azores, and returned home in time to take a very active part in the defeat of the Armada, as vice-admiral of the fleet. In 1595, in conjunction with Sir John Hawkins, Drake sailed on an expedition to the West Indies, but nothing effectual was done; and Sir Francis died on board his own ship off Porto Belle, Jan. 28, 1596, and was buried in mid-ocean.

Drapier's Letters (1724) is the name of a pamphlet written by Swift against tho new copper coinage which the government were attempting to introduce into Ireland, and the monopoly for coining which had been granted to a person named Wood. Thoy profess to be the production of a certain M. B., a drapier, or draper, of Dublin, and he, writing as an ignorant, unskilled shopman, gives utterance to his own appreheusions of ruin. While professing extreme loyalty to the king, the honest shopman shows, or attempts to show, that the patent was unjust, to begin with; that its terms had been infringed, and that the new coins themselves were base. In this publication Swift hit the public tasto of Ireland, and became unrivalled in popularity. So great was the impression produced by this work, that the patent had to be withdrawn from Mr. Wood, who was, however, compensated by a pension of £3,000 a year.

Drogheda is noted in history as being the place where the Papal legate Papera held a synod in 1152, on which occasion the authority of the Roman Church was greatly strengthened in Ireland. It was at this town that Poynings' Act was passed in 1494, and about the same time a mint was established there. In December, 1641, Drogheda was besieged by O'Neil with a large force of Irish, but was for three months successfully defended by Sir Henry Tichborne. On Sept. 3, 1649, Cromwell appeared before the town, which had been garrisoned by Ormonde with his best regiments, most of them English, altogether 2,500 men, commanded by Sir Arthur Aston, an officer of great reputation. On the 9th the bombardment began; a storm attempted by the Puritans on the 10th failed, and the garrison refused to surrender. On the 12th the storming of the place was again attempted, and succeeded, after a desperate struggle. The whole garrison was put to the sword, and Sir Arthur himself had his brains beaten out. Cromwell admits "that the officers were also knocked promiscuously on the head except two." Altogether, it seems that about 4,000 people perished, about half of whom must have been unarmed-so, at least, it would appear from the depositions of eye-witnesses. In 1690 Drogheda surrendered to William III., directly after the battle of the Boyne.

Droit d'Aubaine is an old rule by which the property of a deceased foreigner was claimed by the State unless the defunct man had a special exemption. This rule was not peculiar to England, but common to other countries. The derivation of the word "aubaine" has been variously explaine as from alibinatus, or advena.

Droits of Admiralty are the rights claimed by the government of England on tho property of an enemy in timo of war. It has been customary in maritime war to seize the property of an enemy if found within our ports on the outbreak of hostilities, and this is then considered as forming part of the Droits of Admiralty. Prizes captured by non-commissioned vessels are also said to bo subject to the same anditions. In the Revolutionary and Na sonie wars large sums were obtained by the enforcement of these regulations, but for the most part the money so gained was deveted to the public service. By an Act of William IV.'s reign the Droits of Admiralty for that reign were to be put to public use, and the Lord High Admiral is no longer in possession of his claim to the tenth part of property captured

Druids, THE, were the priests of the Goide ic Celts in Britain, Druidism, according to Prof. Rhys, having been adopted from the pre-Celtic population. Casar says that there were in Gaul only two classes who obtained any consideration, the common people being in a condition little above slavery. These two classes were the noble cader, Equites, as Cæsar calls them, and the riestly order, the Druids. The last presided over all the religious functions. They had the eare of public and private sacrifices, and they interpreted the religious mythology. To them the youth flocked in crowds for instruction. They were too, we find, the judges in all cases, both criminal and eivil, settling questions of disputed boundaries or affairs of inheritance, as well as those connected with infractions of the law. If any one refused to abide by their decision, they could infliet on him the penalty of excommunication or interdietien from the sacrifices, which deprived him of all his civil rites, and cut him off from all commerce with his fellow-men. At their head was one chief Druid, who succeeded by election. Generally, the elaim of one person to succeed to the vacant post was universally recognised; sometimes, however, disputed claims led to bloodshed. Once a year all the people who had any cause for hearing assembled in the most central part of Gaul the country of the Ermites (Chartres), and were judged by the Druids: much, one may fancy, as the Israelites were judged by their judges. As has been already said [Celts], Britain was considered the especial nursery of Druidism.

Cæsar tells us, as a distinction, that the Germans had no Druids. But if by this were meant that the Germans had no sacerdotal class, the statement certainly requires modification. The Germans, like most of the Aryan races after their earliest days, had a class of priosts who stood side by side with their kings or chiefs. The Celtic Druids were, we may feel sure, a sacerdotal class, of the same kind as that which was found among their kindred nationalities: that is to say, their essential function was to stand foremost in the sacrifices, and to preserve by oral tradition the mythic histories, whether of gods or heroes, which had been composed in verse, as well as to compose fresh forms when required. They were both priests and bards: gleemen, as the Saxons said, or, as the Norsemen would have said, scalds. This was their essential character. It was in degree chiefly that their functions differed from those of the priests of, say, the heathen Saxons. The Celts were undoubtedly, as Casar describes them, a very religious people, and being such, they had raised their priesthood to a position of exceptional power, and from this exceptional position arose their functions as judges. We easily gather this much from Casar's account of the Druids; for we see that the enfercement of their decrees was not secured by ordinary legal, but by distinctly religious, penalties: they forbade men the sacrifices. If the people had not been exceptionally religious, this penalty would not have carried with it such exceptional terrors.

Being raised to such a high position, it is probable that the Druids took unusual care to fence themselves round with the mystery of a priestly caste; but the theory that they had a great and secret philosophy, which by oral tradition they handed down far into the Middle Ages, is an extravagant notion which has been cherished by enthusiastic and uncritical minds. Drumelog, The Battle of, was fought on the borders of Lanarkshire and Ayrshire, June 11, 1679, between a party of the Covenanters who had been surprised at a "conventicle" and the royal troops under Claverhouse. The Covenanters, led by Balfour of B Irleigh and Hackston of Rathillet, were victorious.

Drumerub, The Battle of (965), was fought between Duff, King of Alban, and Colin, son of Indulf, a rival claimant to the throne. The latter was completely defeated.

Drummond, Sir Gordon (b. 1772, d. 1854) was one of the English generals during the American War of 1812-14. In 1814 he defeated the Americans at Fort Oswego, and soon afterwards gained a second victory over them at Lundy's Lane. In August of that year, however, he was himself defeated at Fort Erie. In 1815 he was appointed Governor-General of Canada.

Drummond, Thomas, Permanent Under-Secretary for Ireland from 1835 to his death in 1840, was born in 1797 in Edinburgh, became an officer in the Royal Engineers, and was employed in the Government survey of Ireland, and subsequently in the Boundary Commission rendered necessary by the Reform Bill of 1832. Attracted to politics, he became Permanent Under-Secretary at Dublin Castle. He was largely responsible for the organisation of the Royal Lush Constabulary (1836). His policy was to govern Ireland by the ordinary law, recognising the griovances of the people and pursuing a conciliatory policy towards the Catholics. He was bitterly attacked by the landlord party, and the aphorism "Property has its duties as well as its rights" was coined by him in a reply to a protest from the Tipperary magistrates.

Life, by Barry O'Brien.

Drummend, Sir William (d. 1828), entered Parliament in 1795 as member for St. Mawes. In 1796 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to the Court of Naples, and in 1801 he was appointed ambassador at Constantinople. Sir William was more distinguished as a scholar than as a diplomatist, and published several learned works.

Drunken Parliament, The (1661), was the name given to the ultra-Royalist Scotch Parliament elected just after the Restoration. It restored the Lords of the Articles (q.v.), and annulled all Acts of the preceding twenty-eight years.

Drury, Sir William (d. 1579), attained considerable fame in the reign of Elizabeth as an able general and administrator. In 1567 he was in command of the border forces, and in 1570, in conjunction with Lennox, took Hamilton from the Duke of Chatelherault. In 1573 he conducted the siege of Edinburgh to a successful issue, and received the thanks of the queen. Three years later Drury was made President of Munster, and inaugurated his entrance upon the office with a succession of vigorous measures. He died at Cork, 1579.

Dryden, John (b. 1631, d. 1700), was educated at Westminstor and Cambridge. At the Restoration he appears to have changed his polities; for after having, in 1659, written an elegiac poem on the death of Oliver Cromwell, we find him in 1660 ready with another in honour of the new king. From this time there hardly occurred any political event of importance that is not alluded to in his pages. The Dutch were satirised in 1662; and five years later the wonderful events of 1665—6 were celebrated in the Annus Mirabilis. In 1681 he published his greatost work, Absalom and Achitophel, a political satire, directed mainly against the intrigues of Shaftesbury and Monmouth on the question of the accession of the Duke of York. All the characters in this poem are intended to represent the chief statesmen of the day under the thin disguise of Hebrew names. Thus David is Charles II.; Absalom, his favourite son, the Duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the Earl of Shaftesbury; while the versatile Duke of Buckingham appears as Zimri. The attack on Shaftesbury was before long continued in The Medal, while by the next year, in the Religio Lairi, ho was again engaged upon one of the leading topics of the day, defending the Church of England against the attacks of the Dissenters. Under James II. Dryden turned Roman Catholic, and his pension as Laureate, an office to which he had been appointed about tho year 1668, was renewed after a temporary cessation. Shortly after this the poet's gratitude evinced itself in the publication of the Hind and the Panther (1687), another political and religious poem, in which the "milk-white hind, unspotted and unchanged," represents the Church of Rome: while the panther, "the noblest creature of the spotted kind," stands for the Church of England, and other sects are represented under the guise of various beasts. With the Revelution his various offices were taken away from him, and he henceforward confined himself to purely poctical work.

An edition of Dryden's Works, with a Life by Sir Walter Scott, was published in 1808, and has been revised and re-issued by Mr. George Saints-

Dublin has been from the very carliest times a place of great important history. Its name bespeaks a Celtic and it has been identified with the Eblana of Ptolemy. In the ninth century it fell into the hands of the Ostmen, or Danes, who, with occasional reverses, kept their footing in Ireland till the time of the English conquest. In 1171 the town was unsuccessfully besieged by Roderick, King of Connaught, with an immense host of Irish; and in the same year was the place where Henry II. received the homage of the Irish chiefs. The government of Dublin was then conferred on Hugh de Laey. In 1207 the new English colony was granted a charter, and two years later was nearly exterminated by a native rising, which has given to the day of its occurrence the title of Black Monday. Richard II. appears to have visited Dublin twice, and was being entertained there when news came of Bolingbroke's invasion. In 1591 a charter of Queen Elizabeth founded Trinity College and the University of Dublin. A new University was founded here by the Irish University Act of 1908. In 1646 Dublin was besieged by the Papists, and was next year surrendered to the Parliamentarian forces. After the Revolution of 1688, James I. held a Parliament in this eity, which, however, fell into the hands of William III. soon after the battle of the Boyne. In later times Dublin has been the head-quarters of several plots and seditious projects, such as the plot of Lord E. Fitzgerald (1798), of Emmett 1803), the Fenian Conspiracy of 1867, and the plot of the Invincibles in 1882. [IRELAND.]

Dublin, THE TREATY OF, conducted by Ormonde on behalf of Charles I. and the Irish Council of Kilkenny, became substantially. after the failure of Glamorgan's mission, the public part of Glamorgan's treaty (q.v.), and was concluded on March 28, 1646. The Papal nuncio and Owen Roe O'Neil strongly opposed it, and a synod at Waterford excommunicated all who adhered to it. It was practically set aside by the Irish advance on Dublin.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Reb.; Carte, Ormonde.

Duclair Episode. In 1870 six British vessels were seized by the Germans at Duclair in the course of their military operations, and sunk in the Seine; their crews, moreover, it was said, were treated with brutality. This excited considerable irritation in England. On explanations being demanded, Prince Bismarck showed himself ready and desirous to avoid all cause of quarrel by satisfactorily explaining away all causes of offence, and offering the fullest compensation to tho parties entitled to claim it.

Dudley, SIR EDMUND (d. 1510), was one of the unprincipled agents of Henry VII.'s rapacity, to which he contrived to lend a kind of legal support by founding it in many cases upon a revival of obsolcte statutes. In 1492 he accompanied Henry to France, and it was on his return from this expedition that he united with Empson in inaugurating that system of exaction for which he has obtained so unenviable a notoriety. In 1504 he provides an example of the completeness of Henry's power at that time by his appearance as Speaker of the House of Commons, while the king con-ferred upon him also the rank and office of a baron of the Exchequer. Dudley and his partner Empson wore naturally very unpopular; they were men, to use the words of Bacon, "whom the people esteemed as his [Henry VII.'s] horse-leeches and shearers, bold men and careless of fame, and that took toll of their master's grist." On the death of Henry VII., his successor could find no better way to ensure popularity at the opening of his reign than by the surrender to the people's fury of these agents of his father's oppression. Dudley and Empson were accordingly arrested on a charge of high treason, were at once condemned, and executed in August, 1510. So general was the disgust and indignation which Dudloy and Empson had excited, that it was thought necessary to pass a special Act of Parliament to prevent the recurrence of the illegalities of which they had been guilty.

Bacon, Henry VII.

Dudley, Lord Guilford (d. 1554), son of the Duke of Northumberland (q.v.), was married in 1553 to Ludy Jane Grey (q.v.), whose claim to the throne the duke intended to assert on the death of Edward VI. Upon the failure of his plet, he was condemned to death in company with his wife but the sentence was net carried into effect till 1554, when the insurrection of Sir Thomas Wyutt (q.v.) and the solicitations of Simon Renard, the ambussador of Charles V., induced Mary to order his instant execution. [Gney, Lady Jane; Mary.]

Froude, Hist. of Eng.; Stowe, Annals; Sir H. Nicolas, Life of Lady Jane Grey.

Dudley, Sir Andrew, brother of the Duke of Northumberland (q.v.), was sent in 1553 to the Emperor Charles V. for the purpose of mediating between the Spaniards and the French. In the same year he received instructions from his brother to bribe the King of France to send an army to England in furtherance of the scheme for placing Lady Jane Grey on the throne. For this he was put on his trial and condemned to death, but was afterwards reprieved.

Dudley, Sir Henry, a cousin of the Duke of Northumberland (q.v.), formed (in 1556) a conspiracy in favour of the Princess Elizabeth, the avowed object of the plot being to free England from the yoke of Catholicism and Spain. Elizabeth was to be married to Courtenay, Earl of Devon, who had been the cause of the previous rebellion of 1554. A plan was also laid to carry off a large amount of Spanish silver from the Treasury; but the whele plot was betrayed by one of the accomplices, named Thomas White, and most of the conspirators were arrested. Dudley himself, however, escaped abroad.

Dudley and Ward, John William Ward, 4711 Earl of (b. 1781, d. 1833), was elected member for Downton in 1802, and soon distinguished himself as a speaker in the House of Commons. In 1820 he succeeded his father in the peerage, and on the formation of Canning's ministry became head of the Foreign Office (1827), in which capacity he signed the Treaty of London, and the same year was raised to the dignity of an earl. In 1828 he left the Duke of Wellington's Cabinet with Huskisson and Palmerston, and died a few years later, in 1833. He was a man of eccentric manners, with a habit of thinking aloud It was of him that Rogers wrote his cel' ated couplet—

"They say Ward has no heart, but I deny it: He has a heart, he gets his speeches by it."

Duelling. The practice of duelling seems to have originated from the Teutonic custom of trial by battle. But it is evident that this method of deciding rights did not exist in England before the Conquest. Under William the Conqueror it was rendered compulsory only between two Normans, but was gradually extended in certain cases to both races. This law, though it had long fallen into desuctude, was not finally abrogated till 1818, after it had in the preceding year been claimed as his right by a certain Thornton, who was accused of nurder. The practice of duelling not as a solemn appeal to heaven for justice, but for the satisfaction of a personal affrent, has arisen from the legal custom, and does not seem to have occurred in England earlier than the sixteenth century, though it became very common indeed in the next one, and so continued till the last generation. It was not till about the year 1843, when Colonel Fawcett perished at the hands of his brother-in-law, that the public feeling was unmistakably expressed against the custom. After this, the army, in whose ranks the sense of henour and claim to satisfy it by shedding blood, might be supposed to be strongest, was forbidden to have recourse to this practice under heavy penalties. regulation, mainly brought about by the humanity of the Prince Consort, seems to have been of almost equal effect in every class of the community, and duelling in England has now been for many years a thing of the past.

Duff, King of Alban, was the son of Malcolm I., and succeeded Indulf, 962. In 965 he defeated Colin, son of Indulf, at Prumcrub, but was expelled by him in 967. Duff took refuge in Ferres, where he was slain at the Bridge of Kinloss, 967.

Skene, Celtic Scotland.

Duffindale, The Battle of (1549), resulted in a complete defeat of the Norfolk rebels, under Robert Ket (q.v.), at the hands of the royal troops under Warwick.

Dugdale, Sin William (b. 1605, d. 1686), one of the most famous of the English seventeenth century antiquaries, was descended from an old Lancashiro family. Marrying at the early age of seventeen, he soon settled at Blyth, in Warwickshire, where his enthu-siasm for the past was kindled by the acquaintances he made there. In 1635 he was introduced to Sir Henry Spelman, like haaself a famous antiquary, and before long commenced collecting materials for his great work, the Monasticon Anglicanum. Fearing the ruin to our national monuments that might ensue from the Civil War that was on the point of breaking out, in 1641 he mado copies of all the principal monuments in Westminster Abbey and other great English Churches and cathedrals. Next year he attended Charles I.'s summons to York, and was present at Oxford when it surrendered to the Parliament in 1646. After the Restoration he was appointed Garter king-at-arms. Besides his great work, the Monasticon Anglicanum, the recognised authority on English monastic foundations - first published in separate volumes 1655, 1661, 1673—Dugdale was the auther of the Antiquities of Warwickshire (1656), the History of St. Paul's Cathedral (1658), Origines Judiciales (1666, &c.), the Baronage of England (1675—6), and A Nhort View of the Late Troubles in England (1681), being an account of the rise and progress of the Civil War. All these works, except the last, are perfect mines of valuable information, and in many cases are the more remarkable from being, in some instances, the first serious attempts in their various lines.

Duke, the highest title in the English peerage, originated in the reign of Edward III., who in 1337 ereated his son, the Black Prince, Duke of Cornwall. The first instance of a person not a member of the royal family being ereated a duke is Robert de Vere, who in 1386 was made Duke of Ireland. The title has been very rarely given, and at present there are but twenty-two dukes of the United Kingdom, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal. The word "duke" is a herita, of the Romau Empire, under which the "duees" were military leaders: from Merevingian and Carolingian times it passed into the nomenclature of mediaval Europe, where England was one of the last countries to adopt the itle. Etymologically it is the same word as the Italian "doge."

Dumbarton, the "fortress of the Britons," is a lofty rock on the right bunk of the Lower Clyde. Originally it was called Alcluyd, and was the chief town of the Strathelyde Welsh. Its later name must have been given by the Piets. In 756 it was taken by the Piets and Northumbrians under Egbert. Granted to John Baliol by Edward I., it was in 1562 given up by Arran to Queen Mary, and held for her by Lord Fleming. It was to Dumbarton that the queen was trying to force a passage when she was defeated at Langside, 1568. In 1571 it was taken from Henry by Captain Crawford, and in 1640 it fell into the hands of the Covenanters.

Dumnonia, Damnonia, or West Wales. The British kingdom in the south-western peninsula of England. Besides the quite separate Dumnenii of the district round the Roman Wall, there was in Roman times a tribe called the Dumnonii, who occupied the whole country west of the modern Hampshire and the Bristol Avon. Some recent inquirers have regarded them as Goidelic in race, and therefore to be distinguished sharply from their British (Brythonie) neighbours. But, if so, it is difficult to see how the Brythons, driven westwards by the Saxons, were able in their defeat to conquer and assimilate these Goidels, for in later times the speech of Cornwall certainly was more kindred to the Brythonic than the Goidelic group of Celtic languages. Perhaps there remained traces of an earlier race, though the Dumnonii were roughly Brythonic. Anyhow, the sixth century saw a Coltie race still supreme in these regions, and, by its possession of the lower Severn valley, in communication with the "North Welsh" beyond the Bristol Channel. In Gildas's time, the tyrant Constantine was king of this region; but with the advance of the West Saxons westwards, the Dumnonian kingdom was forced into narrower limits. The conquests of Ceawlin in 577 (battle of Deorham) separated it from the modern Wales. The victory of Cenweulh at Pen drove the "Brytwealns" over the Parret (658), and the tales of Armorican migration attest the disorganisation of the defeated race. Centwino extended the West Saxon State as far as the Exc, and Geraint, the Dumnonian monarch was signally defeated in 710 by Inc, whose organisation of the Sherborne bishoprie, and refoundation of Glastonbury Abbey, shows the completeness of his conquests. Yet even in Egbert's time the West Welsh retained their freedom, and revenged their defeat, if not conquest, in 815, by joining the Danes against the West Saxon Bretwalda. Their defeat at Hengestesdun (835) may have led to their entire subjection. Yet it was only temporary; for Exctor continued to be jointly inhabited by English and Welsh until Athelstan oxpelled the latter; an act which led to the confinement of the Welsh to the modern Cornwall. When they were subdued directly to the West Saxons we hardly know; but no king of the West Welsh can be proved to have existed later than the Howel who did homage to Athelstan. The retention of the Celtic language, at least till the end of the seventeenth century, still marked off Cornwall from the rest of tho country. But the last trace of any separato organisation was the appointment in 1051 of Odda as Earl of the "Wealas." The modern duchy is of much later date. Even in Domes-day there are hardly any British proper names in the old Dumnonia, though to this day the great majority of the place-names among the dwellers of the moro western portion are purely Coltic.

rely Coltic.

The original authorities are a few meagre entries in the chronicles, Welsh and English, of battles. Philology and local antiquities may give something more. For a modern account see Palgrav's English. Commonwealth, I., pp. 403—411, and II., cclaiii.—cclaiv. (with an attempt to establish the succession of West Welsh kings.) For the ethnological question see Ehjer Celtic Britain; and for the ancient Dumnonii, Elton's Origins of English History, pp. 233—238. Pol-whele's History of Cornwall gives curious details of the survival of the Cornish language.

Dunbar, BLACK AGNES OF In 1339 the Earl of Salisbury laid siege to the fortress of Dunbar, which was defended in the absence of its governor, the Earl of March, by his wife Agnes, the sister of Randolph, Earl of Murray. So successful was the Countess in her resistance to the English that the English leader was obliged to withdraw his forces.

Dunbar, The Battle of (April 27, 1296), resulted in a complete victory for the English forces under Edward I, and Earl Warenne over the Scots under the Earl of Athol and Sir Patrick Graham.

Dunbar, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 3, 1650), resulted in a complete victory for the Parlinmentary army under Cromwell, Monk, and Lambert, over the Scots under David Leslie. Leslie had taken up a strong position, and fortified all the heights between Edinburgh Castle and Leith. For a whole month Leslie kept his impregnable position till it seemed that Cromwell must be starved into submission. Fearing this fate, the English general removed to Dunbar, where he could command the sea, and Leslie followed him along the slopes, settling finally upon the hill of Don, cutting off the retreat of the enemy, and looking dewn on them in the town. On the night of Sept. 2nd the Scottish army forsook its strong position and foolishly descended to the lower ground. Leslie's caution had been overcome by the rash zeal of the preachers in his camp. At daybreak Cromwell ordered his whole force to advance against the Scottish horse, which was crossing the glen of the Broxburn in advance of the main body, and before they had time to form their lines they were driven back on their ewn ranks behind, and the day was lost. It was on this occasion that Cromwell uttered his memorable quotation as the sun cleared away the mist from the hills and showed the certain rout of his enemies, " Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered." Three thousand men perished in this engagement, and nearly ten thousand were taken prisoners. From Dunbar Cromwell passed on to Edinburgh, and in a short time all Scotland was in his power.

Carlyle, Cromwell's Letters and Speches.

Dunbar Castle, in Haddingtonshire, was granted to Gespatric, Earl of March, by Malcolm Canmore. It was taken by Edward I. and Earl Warenno, April 1296, and in 1314 it gave shelter to Edward II. after his flight from Bannockburn. In 1339 it was successfully defended for nineteen weeks against the Earl of Salisbury by Black Agnes of Dunbar. It was garrisoned by French troops during Albany's regency in the timo of James V., whe greatly strengthened its fortifications after its evacuation by the foreigners. It gave shelter to Mary and Darnley after the murder of Rizzio, 1561, and again received the queen, this time in company of Bothwell, on the rising of the Cenfederate Lords, 1567. Its castle was destroyed by the regent Murray.

Duncan, Adam, 1st Viscount Camper-Down (b. 1731, d. 1804), entered the navy early in life. In 1749 he served in the Mediterranean under Keppel, and in 1755 was sent out to America in the fleet which conveyed General Braddock's troops. He was wounded in the attack on Goree, and obtained his lieutenancy soon after the battle. In 1761 he took part in the expeditions against Belleisle and Havannah and was entrusted by K bel with the difficult task of landing the coops in boats. In 1779 he was employed in the Channel till he accompanied Itoducy to the relief of Gibraltar, and in the action of Jan. 16, 1780, Duncan did as good service as any one, and was so hardly used in the battle that he had not a loat wherewith to take possession of his prizes. In 1782 he proceeded again to the relief of Gibraltar, on this occasion under Lord Howe, and in 1787 was made rear-admiral. Seven years later he received the command of a fleet stationed in the North Sea, and in this office had to watch the Dutch fleet at the Texel. Meanwhile the mutiny at the Nore broke out, and Admiral Duncan found himself left with only two ships to blockade the enemy. His tlrmness upon this occasion contributed in no small degree to the suppression of this outbreak: but at the same time he kept up the semblance of a watch upon the Dutch admiral. Later, by retiring to Yarmouth, he gave De Winter, the Dutch admiral, an opportunity of putting out to sea. The chance was immediately taken by the Dutch, while the English fleet made every effort to cut off their retreat. On Oct. 11, 1797, ho managed by skilful tactics to get between the enemy and the land. He then broke through their line, and after a stubborn contest off Camperdown gained a completo victory, capturing two frigates and eight lineof-lattle ships, including the admiral's ship. Duncan was at once rewarded by a peerage und a large pension. He remained, however, for two years more in the North Sea before coming homo to spend his last days in retirement. He died suddenly in London on Aug. 4, 1804. [CAMPERDOWN.]

Duncan I., King of Seotland (d. 1040), son of Crinan, lay abbot of Dunkold, succeeded his maternal grandfather Malcolm, in 1034. Defeated before the walls of Durham in the first year of his roign by Eardulf, Earl of Northumbria, Duncan next attempted to wrest Caithness from Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney, in order that he might bestow it upon his relative Moddan. In this attempt, however, the king was worsted in a naval engagement near the shores of the Pentland Forth, and in a battle at Burghhead, in Elgin. About this time, his general, Macbeth Mormaor, of Moray, went over to Thorfinn's side, and slew Duncan by treachery near Elgin, Aug. 14, 1040. Duncan, who is called in the Sagas Karl Hundason (hound's son), married a daughter of Siward, Earl of Northumberland. It is from the eigendary accounts preserved of the incidents of this reign and the next that Shakespeare has formed the basis of his great tragedy Macbeth.

Burton, Hist. of Sectland; Robertson, Early Kings of Scotland.

Duncan II., King of Scotland (s. 1094, d. 1094), though some obscurity surrounds his birth, was, probably, the son of Malcolm Canmore by his first wife. When quito a boy, in 1072. Duncan was sent as a hostage to the English court after the Treaty of Abernothy. There he remained till 1093, when, with Norman aid, he succeeded in driving his uncle, Donald Bane (q.v.), from the Scetch throne. Six months afterwards, however, Donald procured his murder at the hands of Malpedir MacLean, Mormaor of Mearns. The scene of this erime was Mondynes, in Kincardineshire, and a huge monolith that is still found there probably commemorates the event. secret of his fate seems to be in the fact that he was a Nerman by education and character, and had perhaps agreed to hold the kingdom as a vassal of the English sovereign. Ho does not seem to have ever been fully recognised except in Lothian and Cumbria; for the Caelic districts north of the Forth were at most only divided in his favour. He married the daughter of Torpatrie, Earl of Northumberland, by whom he is said to have had a son William.

Robertson, Early Kings of Scotland; Burton, Hist. of Scotland,

Duncombe, Charles, was originally "a goldsmith of very moderate wealth." He amassed a large fortune by banking, and purchased for £90,000 the estate of Helmsloy, in Yorkshire. He subsequently accepted the place of Cashier of the Excise, which he derived great wealth; but Montague dismissed him from the office because he thought, with good reason, that he was not a man to be trusted. In 1697 we find him defending Sunderland in Parliament. He accused Montague of peculation, but failed to make good the charge, and was in turn accused of fraud and forgery in connection with the Exchequer Bills. A bill of pains and penalties was accordingly brought in against him, after he had previously been sent to the Tower and expelled the House. The bill, providing for the confiscation of the greater part of his property and its application to the public service, passed the Commons. It was felt, however, that the measure was open to censure, and that his judges had strong motives for voting against him. Urged by these and other reasons, the Lords threw out the bill, and the prisoner was released. Ho was, however, again arrested by order of the Commons, and kept in prison for the remainder of the session.

Dundalk is noted as the scene of the great defeat suffered by John de Courcy at the hands of the Irish (1180). In 1560 the town was unsuccessfully besieged by the O'Neils; and, in 1649, Dundalk surrendered to Cromwell.

Dundalk, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 5, 1318), was fought during the invasion of northern Ireland by the Scots under Edward Brace. Edward Bruce had 3,000 men with him: among the commanders were the De Lacys. The Anglo-Irish army was led by John de Bermingham. The victory was won at the first onset of the English forces; twenty-nine bannerets, five knights, and eighty others fell on the Scottish side. Bruce himself was killed, and his head was sent to Edward as a trophy. This battle put an end to the Scottish invasion.

Dundas, HENRY, VISCOUNT MELVILLY b. 1742, d. 1811), was the son of Robert Dundas, who was for many years President of the Court of Session. Having adopted the bar as his profession, he made his way with wonderful rapidity to the top of the ladder, being Solicitor-General in 1773 and Lord-Advocate two years later. In this position he threw himself eagerly into politics, abandoning the law. Attached to a ministry which, after a long period of office, was at last falling beneath a weight of obloquy, Dundas exhibited so much spirit and ability that he was at once recognised as promising to rise to the highest power. Not the smallest source of his rising reputation was the minute knowledge he displayed with regard to Indian affairs. On the fall of North's ministry. Lord Rockingham was not slow to avail himself of Dundas's services, which were employed in the treasury of the navy, an office which he held also under Lord Shelburne. He retired, however, on the formation of the Coalition (1783), but did not have long to wait before he resumed his old post under Pitt. In June, 1788, he resigned that place to become President of the Board of Control with a seat in the Cabinet. With Pitt he resigned in 1801, and was raised to the peerage. In 1804 he again followed Pitt into office, and was appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, where he remained until 1806, when he was impeached for misappropriation of public money during his former period of contrel over the Navy Treasury. Pitt defended his faithful follower and colleague with his utmost ability, but a strong case was brought against him, and when the numbers on division were equal, the Speaker gave his easting vote against Lord Melvilie. Pitt was quito broken down by the blow, and did not live long enough to see the censure reversed by the Lords in 1807, after which the name of Lord Melville, which had been erased, was restored to the Privy Council list. He had retired, however, to Scotland, and never again took any part in public affairs; and in retirement he died in May, 1811. That Dundas had been "guilty of highly culpable laxity in transactions relating to public money," no one can doubt; but no loss had accrued to the Ntato in consequence, and it was undeniable that he had exhibited a most presseworthy energy in taking some steps to remedy the hopeless confusion and misunanagement which had for many years prevailed at the Admiralty.

Dundee, in Forfarshire, was granted by William the Liou to his brother David of Huntingdon (q.v.). It was taken from the English by Robert Brace in 1306, by Edward Brace, 1313, and pillaged by the Protector Somerset. In 1645 it fell into the lands of Montrose, and in 1651 was stormed by Monk, who put the garrison to death.

Dundee, VISCOUNT. [GRAHAM, JOHN.]

Dundonald, Thomas Barnes Cochrane, 10th Earl of (b. 1775, d. 1860), after brilliant service against the French as commander of the Speedy and of the Pallus, entered Parliament as member for Westminster, and so excited the enmity of the authorities by his attacks upon naval administration that when, in 1809, he failed in his gallant attempt to destroy the French fleet off Brest, he was put upon half-pay. In 1814 he was charged with having circulated lying news of the Fall of Napoleon in order to make money on the Stock Exchange, and though innocent, he was eashiered and imprisoned. In 1817 and subsequently he distinguished himself in the naval service of Chili, Brazil, and Greece. In 1832 he received a free pardon, and became a rear-admiral.

Dunfermline, in Fifeshire, was long a favourite residence of the Kings of Scotland, some of whom were baried in the monastery which was founded by Malcolm Canmore and burne by Edward I. in 1304.

Dangal, the son of Sealbach, obtained the throne of Julriada by his father's abdication in 723. He was soon afterwards driven out by Eochaidh, the head of the Cinel Gabran, who subsequently resisted Dungal's nttempt to regain the throne at Ross Foichen, though the old king, Sealbach, had hi "If issued from his monastery to assist his. 1, 727. On the death of Eochaidh, 735, he regained the kingdom of Dalriada, but a year afterwards was compelled by Angus MacFergus to take refuge for a time in Irelaud. In 736 Angus invaded Dalriada, imprisoning Dungal and his brother.

Dunganhill, BATTL.. of. The English army under Colonel Michael Jones here defeated the Irish on August 8, 1647. Six thousand of the latter fell, while the English loss was inconsiderable.

Dungannon Convention, The (Sept. 8, 1785), is the name given to the meeting of the representatives of 270 of the Irish Volunteer companies assembled at Dungannon ander Grattan's influence. These delegates passed several resolutions, the object of which was to secure Parliamentary reform for Ireland; if the English government objected to them the supplies were to be withheld. A convention was to have met at Dubliu had not the Duke of Rutland prevented this by his firmness.

Froude, Eng. in Ireland ; Gruttan's Life,

Dunkeld is chiefly remarkable as being the site where Constantine, King of the Piets from 789 to 820, founded a church, perluips about the year 796, to which Kenneth MacAlpin transferred the relics of Columba from Iona in 851 This last event marked the date of the final decay of the ecclesiastical rule of the Abbots of Iona, whose representatives, as heads of the Pictish Church, were henceforth to be the Abbots of Dankeld. In time Dunkeld Abbey fell into the hands of a lay abbot, while the bishopric of Fortzenn, which in earlier times had been filled by the Abbot of Dunkeld, passed on to Abernethy. One of the most famous names in early Scottish history is that of Crinan, lay Abbot of Dunkeld, whose son Dunean became King of Scotia. Duncan's grandson, David 1., either restored or established it as a bishopric about the year 1127. [See below.]

Dunkeld, The Battle of (Ang. 21, 1689), was a victory gained by the Cameronians over the Highlanders, and followed closely after Mackay's victory at St. Johnston's. The disorders in the Highland army had increased, and Lochiel had left them in disgust. Meanwhile, the Scottish Privy Council, against Mackay's wish, had sent a regiment of Cameronians to garrison Dunkeld under Cleland. Cannon, at the head of 500 men, advanced against the town. The outposts of the Cameronians were speedily driven in; but the greater part of the regiment made its stand behind a wall which surrounded a house belonging to the Marquis of Athol. After all ammunition was spent, and when both Cleland and his successor in command, Major Henderson, had been shot dead, the Cameronians succeeded in setting fire to the houses from which the Highlanders were firing on them. Soon disorder spread among the Highland host, and it returned hastily towards Blair. "The victorious Puritans threw their caps into the air and raised, with one voice, a psalm of triumph and thanksgiving. The Cameronians had good reason to e joyful and thankful, for they had finished the war."

Dunkirk. The port of Dunkirk was throughout the seventeenth century the headquarters of pirates and privateers who preyed on British commerce. Accordingly, when Cromwell allied himself with Louis XIV. against Spain (March, 1657), it was stipulated that Dunkirk and Mardyke should be besleged by a combined French and English army, and belong to England when captured. Six thousand men, first under Sir John Reynolds, afterwards under General Thomas Morgan, formed the English contingent. Mardyke was captured in September, 1657, and Dunkirk besieged in the following May. On June 4th, a Spanish army under Den John of Austria, and the Prince of Conde, in which the Dukes of York and Gloucester were serving, attempted to raise the siege, and was defeated with great loss. The town surrendered four days later, and remained in English hands till 1662, when it and its dependencies were sold to Louis XIV. for the sum of five million livres (Oct. 27, 1662). The attacks on English trade still continning, Dunkirk was unsuccessfully attacked by a combined Dutch and English fleet in 1694, and it was stipulated by the Treaty of Utrecht that the fortifications should be destroyed, and the port blocked up (1713). This stipulation was repeated by the Treaties ? Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) and Paris (1763). vevertheless, the city and port were continually restored, and in the years 1778 to 1782, the corsairs of Dunkirk captured 1,187 English vessels. In 1793 it was besieged by an English army under the Duke of York, with the intention of retaining it as a compensation for the expenses of the war, but the victory of Hoondschotten, by which the corps posted to cover his operations was forced to retreat, obliged the duke to abandon the enterprise.

Dunning, Jehn, Lord Ashburton (b. 1731, d. 1783), was called to the bar in 1756, and was six years later employed in defending the English East India Company against the complaints made by its Dutch rival. In 1763 he defended Wilkes, and in 1767 was appointed Solicitor-General, an office which ho held till 1770. It was he who, in 1780 (April 6th), brought forward the memorable niotion, "That the influence of the erown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished," a resolution which was supported by Fox, and carried by a majority of eighteen. George III. was severely wounded by this and the following votes, feeling, as he said at the time, that they were levelled at him in person. Two years later Dunning became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, under Lord Rockingham's administration, and was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Ashburton, Dunotter (Dun Nother), in Kincardineshire, a few miles south of Stonehaven, is memorable for its siege by Brude MacBile in 631. It was again besleged in 694, and in

The work of the second

900 was the seene of the murder of Domild VI, by the Danes. In 934 Athelstan advanced as far as Dunotter with his invading army. The castle of Dunotter was taken by Sir William Wullace in 1298, and by Sir Andrew Mory, 1356; in 1645 it was besieged by Montrose, and taken by Cromwell's troops, 1651. The castle belonged to the family of the Keiths, Earls Marischal.

Dunstable, The Annals or, comprise choof the most valuable of the momentic chronicles. They extend from the Incurration to the year 1297, and are particularly valuable for the reigns of John and Henry III. They are published in the Rolls Series under the editorship of Mr. Luard.

Danstable, The Town or, in Bedfordshire, is known in English history as the place where the larons met in 1244, and ordered the papul envoy to leave England; and where the commissioners for the divorce of Queen Catherine sat in 1533. Dunstable was the seat of a great abbey of monks, and was made the property of the foundation in 1131.

Dunstan, St., Archbishop of Canterbury (960-988), the son of Heorstan and Cynethryth, was born near Glastonbury. of his kinsnien were bishops, and others were attached to the court, while his brother as "reeve" looked after the secular interests of Glastonbury Abbey. Kings Athelstan and Edmund lived very often in that neighbourhood, and Dunstan began both his court life and monastic training at a very early age. He became guar-dian of the "hord" of Edmund, and wai consequently rewarded with the abbaey when still very young. Glastonbury was then only a monastery in name, served by married secular clerks, though evon in its degradation very famous, and largely frequented by Irish pllgrims as the shrine ol St. Patrick. Dunstan reformed this state of things, in the interests of education rather than as a fanatic of asceticism. Many tales are told of this early period of Dunstan's life, which are to be received only with tho utmost caution. Nearly all the details of his biography are mythical In 946 Edred succeeded Edmund. He was very siekly, of the same age as Dunstan, and the probable companion of his youth. Dunstan, who had closely attached himself to the king's mother, Eadgifu, and other great ladies, now began his political career. policy resulted in the brilliant successes of the West Saxons, under Edred, culminating in the conquest of Northumbria from the Lanes and the assumption of the title of Casar by the English king in 955. But Dunstan still continued his activity as a teacher at Glastonbury, and refused the bishopric of Crediton. The death of Edred led to a reversion of Dunstan's policy. He had "aimed at the unity of England under the West Saxon Basilous, but giving home rule to each state.' This policy was disliked by the West Saxon nobility, who regarded the vassal kingdoms as their own prey, and desired to make each state a dependency of Wessex. Their influence triumphed at the accession of Edwy, a boy of under fifteen. The ordinary details of the story of Dunstan's fall are quite incredible, but it remains a fact that the next year saw him banished. His stay at a great Benedictine abbey in Flanders first brought him in connection with the monastic revival with which his name has been so closely associated. Meanwhile the dependent states revolted from Edwy, whose ministers, besides their reactionary policy, had set themselves too much against the monks to retain their position. The Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and chose Edgar king; ho recalled Dunstan and made him Bishop, first of Worcester, and then of London as well. His retention of a chapter of secular cunons at both sees shows that he was at least not zealous for the monastie cause. On the death of Edwy, Wessex also acknowledged Edgar, and Dunstan was made Archbishop of Canterbury. and for a second time his policy triumphed. The glorious reign of Edgar the Peaceful was the result of the realisation of Dunstan's ideas. The hegemony of Wessex was established on a firm basis, without the degradation of the other states. In ecclesiastical affairs also the monastic question came to a head, but how far Dunstan was identified with this movement it is hard to say. As a Benedictine, he doubtless preferred monks to secular canons, but he was no fanatic to force them on a reluctant race. In his own see he did not expel the canons, but in Mercia, where the fervour of monasticism was perhaps needed to repair the Danish ravages, monks camo in everywhere. But Æthelwoid of Winchester, "father of monks," was the real monastic hero, although the late biographers of Dunstan connected naturally his great name with what to them was the great movement of the age. His spiriteal activity, how-ver, was rather the activity of teacher and organiser, and after all he was more of a statesman than an ecclesiastic. If the coronation of Edgar at Bath was his work, and if it was a conscious reproduction of tho ceremony which made Otto I. Emperor of Rome, his claim to statesmanship must be exceptionally high.

With Edgar's death a new period of confusion begins. After the troubled reign of Edward, the accession of Ethelred the Unready put power again into the hands of Dunstan's enemies, and ended finally his political career. We do not know who was the ruler of England during Ethelred's minority; but it does not seem to have been Dunstan. He lived on till 988, devoting his last years to the government of his dioceso and his province, and in the pursuits of literature, music, and the finer handing rits, to which he was always addicted. .. his old age, as at Glastonbury in his youth, ho reverted to the samo studies and objects. Ho was, as Bishop Stubbs says, the Gerbert, not the Hildebrand, of the tenth century. The unreal romanees of lator biographers that have obscured his life in a cloud of myth must be disregarded for earlier, if scantier, authorities, if we desire to find out what the real man was.

The materials for Dunstan's blography are collected by Dr. Stubbs, lu his Memorials of Dunstan, in the Rolls Series. The Introduction contains all that is known of the saint's career. Dr. Stubbs's collection includes a life by sa aimost contemporary Saxon mouk, which, nevertheless, has a large iegeudary element, sad later biographics by Adaibert and by Osbern, and still later by Eadmer and William of Malmesbury, to correct Osbern's mistakes. It is from these later sources that accounts like Milman's in Latin Christianity are drawn, and which consequently give entirely false impressions of the subject. Hume's fsmous account represents the reaction against the monastic idea that inspired Osbern and Eadmer. Like that in most of the ordinary histories it is historically worthless. Mr. Robertson's Essays on Dunstan's Policy, and the Coronation of Edgar, in his Historical Essays, are extremely suggestive, but their theories are not always based on definite facts. Dupleir, Joseph (d. 1750), was appointed Governor of Pondicherry for the French East India Company in 1742. Before this final promotion he had spent over twenty years in the East, where he had acquired an enermous fortune. The outbreak of the war in 1744 gave him, as he thought, an opportunity for establishing the French ascendency. Labourdonnais, the French admiral, captured the town of Mudras, and Dupleix, acting as Governor-in-chief, and intending to destroy all the English settlements, refused to ratify the treaty which provided for the restoration of the town. But this act of perfidy was rendered useless by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), which stipulated for an exchange of conquests in India. On the death of the Nizam-ul-Mulk of the Deccan, and the dispute for the succession between his son, Nazir Jung, and his grandson, Muzuffer Jung, Dupleix formed a confederacy with Chunda Sahib, the pretender to the Carnatic, and Muzuffer Jung to oust the English candidates, Nazir Jung and Mohammed Ali, and eventually, as he hoped, drive the English from India. The whole Carnatic was overrun by the French, and the English and their nabob were cooped up in Triehinopoly. Dupleix was equally successful in the Deccan. A conspiracy broke out at his instigation. Nazir Jung was murdered, and Muzuffer Jung, assuming the vacant dignity, conferred the nabobship of the Carnatic on Chunda Sahib, and the vice-royalty of all India south of the Kistna on Dupleix. Clive's daring expedition to and defence of Areot divided the forces of the allies, and the long string of successes which followed, caused the completo failure of Dupleix's plans. As his success deserted him his employers became alienated. In 1754 he was recalled, to die in misery and poverty a few years afterwards in Paris.

Duplin, The Battle of (Aug. 12, 1332) was fought in Strathearn between Edward Baliol, the leader of the discontented barons, and the army of David II., under the Earl of Mar. Baliol, though at the head of a much smaller body of men, and in a most disadvantageous position, won a complete victory, owing to the over-confidence of the royalist

Durham. This city is chiefly memorable in early English history as the site to which the bishop and clergy from Holy Island finally transferred the relics of St. Aidan to escape from the ravages of the Danes towards the end of the tenth century. The town seems to have suffered at the hands of William the Conqueror, when he laid waste the North in 1070. The same king built a eastle hero in 1072. Some twenty years later Bishop William of St. Calais commenced to build the great cathedral (1093). In later history, Durham was, for its position near the borders, a place of great military importance in the wars between England and Scotland. As the seat of the courts of the Palatine jurisdiction of its bishop, it was a place of much political importance. Its chapter was execedingly wealthy; and the plan of Oliver Cromwell, to establish a university out of the capitular revenues, was revived and earried out in 1833. [PALATINE COUNTIES.]

Durham, J.HN GEORGE LAMBTON, EARL or (b. 1792, d. 1840), descended from one of the oldest families in England, was the son of William Henry Lambton. After serving for a short time in a _ ____ent of hussars, he was returned to Parliament in 1814 for the county of Durham, and soon distinguished himself as a very advanced and energetic re-former. In 1821 he brought forward a plan of his own for Parliamentary Reform. In 1828 ho was raised to the pecrage with the title of Baron Durham. When the ministry of Lord Grey was formed in November, 1830, Lord Durham became Lord Privy Seal. During the difficulties which arose out of the Belgian question, he was sent to St. Petersburg on a special mission as successor to Lord Heytesbury. The object of his journey was to persuade the Russian cabinet to give immediate instructions to the Russian plenipotentiaries in the London Conference to co-operate, on behalf of his Imperial Majesty, cordially and effectively, on whatever measures might appear to be best calculated to effect the early execution of the treaty. Russia, however, was as yet unwilling to join the Western powers in measures of coercion towards Holland, and hence the mission was a failure. 1833 he was created Earl of Durham in reward for his services of the previous year when sent on the special mission to Russia, a court to which he was accredited ambassador in 1836. In 1838 he was sent to Canada during the time of the Canadian Rebellion. His firmness and arbitrariness, though they saved Canada, excited great opposition [Glenelo], which was increased by his lavish display, and when his Canadian policy was attacked by Lord Brougham, the ministry threw him over.

He was recalled and returned to England,

Durham, Simeon of (d. 1129), was a historian who appears to have been a monk and precentor of Durham. He was certainly living in 1104, and probably died in 1129 as for that year his great work is continued by a different hand. The chief writings attributed to him are a history of Christianity in Northumbria, and a history of the Danish and English kings from the time of Bede's death to the reign of Henry I. He appears to have preserved many facts of Anglian history which are not to be found in any of the existing versions of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and which would otherwise have entirely perished in those ages when, after the irruption of the Danes, Northumbria was little better than a waste. But it is doubtful whether all the works that pass under his name are really to be ascribed to his pen.

The works of Simeon of Durham were printed by Twysden, in his Scriptores Decem. They have also been published by the Surtees Society and in the Rolls Series.

Durotriges, The, were an ancient British tribe, occupying the present county of Dorset. Prof. Rhys considers them to have been, likethe Dumnonii of Cornwall and Devon, in the main Goidels-that is, members of the earlier Celtic invasion, and therefore more likely to be to a considerable extent infused with the blood of the pre-Celtie races-rather than Brythons.

Durward, Allan (d. 1268), was Justiciar of Scotland in the middle of the thirteenth century, and married to an illegitimate daughter of Alexander II. He served with great credit in the French wars under Henry III., who afterwards supported his cause in Scotland. The Durward family was opposed to the influence of the great Norman family of the Comyns, and succeeded in wresting the young king, Alexander III., from his subjection to their rivals. This was accomplished by the seizure of Edinburgh Castle, after which the aspect of affairs in Scotland looked so serious that Henry III. was obliged to come northwards and personally adjust the government (1255). But the party of the Comyns soon gained ground, and Allan Durward was forced to flee to England, where he seems to have been always in favour with Henry III. The Comyns, however, lost their great leader, the Earl of Menteith, upon which Allan Durward seems to have secured his old position. At the close of the thirteenth century Nicholas de Soulis, one of his descendants through his wife Maryoz, claimed the succession to the throne of Scotland, a claim which, to some extent, explains the charge brought against Allan, in his lifetime, of intriguing with the Pope for the legitimisation of his wife, so as to make her next heir to the throne.

Dynham, John, Lond (d. 1509), was a Yorkist leader who, in 1459, sallied forth from Calais, and, proceeding acress to Sandwich, captured two of the Lancastrian nobles, Lord Rivers and Lord Scales, whom he led back with him to Calais. He was also engaged in the battle of Towton, and for his services received large grants of land from Edward IV.

Eadmer (b. circa 1060, d. 1124) was a monk of Canterbury, and the confidential adviser of Anselm. He was elected Bishop of St. Andrews, but, owing to a misunderstanding, was never consecrated. He wrote several ecclesiastical biographies and theological tracts, besides a Life of St. Anselm (Vita Anselmi), and a History of His own Times (Historia Novorum), extending from 959 to 1122. Both these works rank very high as authorities for the reigns of William II. and Henry II., and the Vita Anselmi is one of the chief sources of information with regard to the archbishop. Eadmer's works were published at Paris, 1721. [ANSELM.]

Ealdfrith. [See ALDFRID.]

Ealdgyth, wife of Hareld, was the widow of Grifydd, King of North Wales, daughter of Elfgar, and sister of Edwin and Morkere. The date of her second marriage is doubtful, but its motive, viz., to secure the friendship of her powerful brothers, is sufficiently plain. [HAROLD.]

Ealdorman. [ALDERMAN.]

Eanfred, King of Bernicia (633-634), was the son of Ethelfrith. After his father's death he fled to Scotland, where he was converted to Christianity. On the death of Edwin he returned to Northumbria, and obtained his father's kingdom. But, like Osric, he relapsed into Paganism, and like him, was slain by Cadwallon.

Earl is a word which in the earliest Anglo-Saxon is a simple title of honour, denoting a man of noblo blood. It was thus used in the laws of Ethelbert (circa 600): "If any man slay a man in an eor's town, let him make compensation for twelve shillings." Its use was, however, restricted until the time of the Danish invasions; in the days of Ethelred the title began to supplant that of the official caldorman, owing prebably to its similarity in sound with the Danish jarl, with which it became confused. This change was completed by Canute, who, finding that the connection between the sovereign and the Danish jarl was closer than that of the sovereign and the English ealdorman, gave the carl a permanent status among the servitial nobility. Finally, he divided the kingdom into four great vice-regal earldoms, which continued down to the Conquest. I'nder the Norman kings the title of earl became easily amalgamated with the French title of count, both having comes as a Latin equivalent. The nature of the office became changed; it ceased to be a magistracy, and became an hereditary fief. The first carls of William I., who, even before the conspiracy of 1075, bestowed the title sparingly, were men who already held the title of count in Normandy, or were merely the successors of the English magistrates of the same name. Exceptions to this rulo were the great palatine earldoms of William, which he created probably as a part of the national system of defence. Such were the earldom of Chester on the Welsh Marches, and the bishopric of Durham between England and Scotland; the earldom of Kent, and the earldom of Shropshire. These earls were practically independent princes; land was for the most part held of them, not of the king; they held their own conncils, appointed the sheriffs, and received the profits of the courts. It should be observed that they were all created before the earls' conspiracy of 1075. The sons of the Conqueror were also cautious in creating earldoms, but Stephen and Matilda, in order to gain adherents, created many of these dignities, which were for the most part perpetuated, though they were at first titular, supported by pensions on the Exchequer, and had little or no land in the districts from which their titles were taken. The number of the earls was carefully kept down by the earlier Angevin kings. These dignities were hereditary, and were conferred by special investiture, the sword of the shire being girt on by the king, and by this ceremony the rank was conferred. As the successor of the ealdorman, or rather the ealdorman under another name, the earl also received the third penny of the county, which after the thirteenth century was changed into a creation fee of £20. His relief was higher than that of the baren. Gradually these dignities ceased to imply a territorial jurisdiction, and became merely honorary. They could be created by charter, or by letters patent, or by Act of Parliament, a custom introduced by Edward III. The title continued to be taken from a county, or county town (with the exception of the earldoms of Arundel and of March, the latter being derived from the Welsh border districts), long after all local authority had disappeared. Later it became the custom for commoners and barons created earls often to keep their own names instead of adopting local titles. An carl takes precedence next after a marquing and before a viscount or baron. [ALDERMAN; PALATINE COUNTIES.]

East Anglia. There is no account left us of the settlement of the Angles on the eastern shires of central England, nor have we even any such entry as that of the Anglo-Sazon Chronicle, which for the more northern Anglian district relates that Ida assumed the kingdom of Nerthumbria in the year 547. Nothing of the details of the conquest is known to us now, and we can only dimly infer a twofold settlement, which has perpetuated itself down to eur own days in the two counties of the Nerth Folk and the South Felk (Norfolk and Suffolk). According to Mr. Green's surmise, the conquest of Norfolk at least was the work of the Gyrwas, and may have been achieved tewards the middle of the sixth century. The first historical king of the East Angles is Redwald, the protector of Edwin (q.v.), who reigned from about 593—617. This Redwald was, according to Bede's account, the grand-son of one Uffa, from whom the East Anglian kings took their gentile name of Uffings. In his days, East Anglia was to some extent dependent on the kingdom of Kent, and Redwald seems to have become half Christian under the pressure of his overlord. But the new creed was not as yet theroughly acceptable to the mass of the people. Redwald's son and successor, Eorpwald, was slain by one of his own subjects in 627 or 628, the year of his conversion, and fer three years at least the land reverted to paganism. But at last Eorpwald's half-brother, Sigebert the Learned, who had received the new faith during his exile among the Franks, returned to rule the kingdom. Under his protection, Felix the Burgandian commenced the work of re-conversion or conversion at Dunwich. Two years later, Fursey, an Iriah monk, came over to East Anglia, and before long Sigebert himself resigned his throne, and retired into a monastery (634 Next year, however, he was dragged forth from his retreat by his people, who were now yielding before the growth of Mercia, and perished in the battle against Penda. Anna, the nephew of Redwald, succeeded, and is noted chiefly for the sanctity of his four daughters, who all eventually embraced a religious life. It was at his court that Cenwealh of Wessex took refuge, when driven out of his own country by Penda, and it was while resident in the East Anglian realm that he became a Christian. For the hospitable shelter afforded to Cenwealh, Anna incurred he resentment of Penda, who now fell on the East Anglians and utterly destroyed Anna and his host. East Anglia seems now to have been dependent on Mercia to some extent, and Penda appears to have used Anna's brother Æthelhere as a tool against Northumberland. But with the battle of the Winwaed, the sceptre of Britain passed to Oswiu of Northumbria, and deubtless the East Angles from this time, though retaining their own king, became dependent on the great kingdom of the north. But Mercia was not long in reviving, and it may well be that by the time of Oswiu's death the power of Northumbria was only nominal in East Anglia. During the reign of Wulphere (658—675), the East Angles seem to have been practically under the rule of Mercia. Tewards the beginning of the reign of Aldwulf King of the East Angles, the new diocese of Elmham was founded for the Northfolk. The seat of this see was removed to Thetford about the year 1078, and to Norwich in 1101, having towards the end of the ninth century incorporated Dunwich, the diocese of the Southfolk. [Bishophics.] From this time we may regard East Anglia as being something of an appendage of Mercia, till on the fall of that kingdom it was attached to Wessex. In accordance with this view. we find Ethelbald of Mercia leading the East Angles to fight against the West Saxens at the battle of Burford (752). On Ethelbald's death, East Anglia scens for a time to have thrown off the Mercian yoke; but before the close of his reign it must again have been subject, though of course still retaining its own kings. East Anglia and Mercia were the two kingdoms whose frontiers marked the boundaries of Offa's short-lived archbishopric of Lichfield. But by this time the days of Mercia's greatness were almost numbered, and it had already laid up a deep store of hatred in the subject kingdom of East Anglia. For in 792, Offa had caused Ethelbert, the King of the East Angles, to be put to death, and had thereupon seised his kingdom. Hence it is no wonder that when Egbert of Wessex had defeated Beornwulf of Mercia at the battle of Ellandune (823), the King of the East Angles should request the victorious West Saxon sovereign to help them to throw off the Mercian yoko, and, encouraged by his promise, defeat his tyrannical overlord and his successor in two battles. East Anglia seems to have still clung to its old kings under the West Saxon overlordship till the days of the Danish invasion, when its last native king, Edmund, was murdered by the Danes. The land was then taken possession of by the invaders, and by the Treaty of Wedmore became the seat of a Danish kingdom under Guthrum (878). [Danelaon.] Later on, notwithstanding the treaty, the Danes of East Anglia aided Hastings in his attacks upon England. Alfred's son and successor, however, succeeded in forcing the Danes of East Anglia to acknowledge him after a long struggle, which lasted nearly all his reign (921). From this time their existence as a separate kingdom ceased, but they seem still to have retained their own Witan, which in 1004 bought peace of Sweyn. When the kingdom was divided between Canute and & Edmund Ironside in 1016, East Anglia fell to Edmund's share; on Canute's death it was assigned, with the rest of the country north of the Thames, to Harold as superior lord. Under Canute, East Anglia had been one of the four great earldoms into which he divided his whole kingdom, and it continued an earldom under Edward the Confessor. Harold seems to have been appointed to this office about the year With the Conquest the separate existence of East Anglia comes to an end. [Anoles; Anolo-Saxon Kingdoms.]

East India Company, The, was incorporated by charter, in 1600, under the title of "The Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies," with a capital of £70,000. In spite of the opposition of the Portuguese and the Dutch, the company succeeded in establishing commercial relations with the Asiatics, and founded agencies or factories, of which the most important was that of Surat (1614). Nevertheless its position was for many years most precarious; its only possession was the island of Lantore, and after the Massacre of Amboyna (1623) it almost ceased to exist. Better times came with the establishment of the Hooghly factor, (1642), and the valuable acquisition of Bombay as part of the dower of Catherine of Braganza (1661), to which the presidency of Western India was transferred in 1685. Fort St. George became a presidency in 1683, and was afterwards known as that of Madras; it was separated from Bengal in 1681. Charles II. gave the company the important privilege of making peace or war on their own account. Gradually the monopoly of the East India Company became unpopular in England; rival associations were formed, of which the most important was the unchartered "New Company," which strove, though unsuccessfully, for freedom of trade. Supported by the Whig party, they made two vigorous attempts, in 1693 and in 1698, to prevent the renewal of the East India Company's charter, but the largesses of the company in secret service money prevailed in Parliament. Lord Montague, however, in the same year established a rival company in the Whig interest, known as the "General East India Company," or English Company. After being partially united in 1702, they were completely consolidated by Lord Godolphin in 1708, under the title of "The United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies." The capital consisted of £3,200,000 lent to government at 5 per cent. From this time the history of the company practically becomes the history of India (q.v.), and it will be sufficient here to indicate briefly the chief events from their non-military side. The overthrow by Clive of the great attempt of the French to found an empire in India was followed by a period of maladministration. During this period, however, was inaugurated in Bengal the important system of dual government, by which native princes surrendered their revenues to the English in return for a pension, and the maintenance by the company of an army of defence. The Bengal famine of 1770 was followed by Lord North's Regulating Act, by which, in exchange for a loan of a million which the company required, and the remission of the annual payment to govern-ment of £400,000 a year, a new council was appointed by Parliament; a supreme court, of which the judges were appointed by the crown, was established; and the Governor of Bengal was made Governor-General of India. Dundas's Bill of 1783 was followed in November by Fox's India Bill, of which the main features were the transference of the authority of the company to seven com-missioners nominated in the first instance by Parliament, and, when vacancies occurred, by the crown; while the management of the property and commerce of the company was to be entrusted to a subordinate council of directors, entirely under the superior council and nominated by the Court of Proprietors. The measure was very unpopular, and the king used his personal influence in the House of Lords to procure its rejection. Pitt's India Bill of the following year was framed upon the same lines. established as a ministerial department having under its supervision the political conduct of the company, and the appointment of the highest officers was subjected to the veto of the crown. On the other hand, the company was allowed the entire management of its business affairs and patronage.

Passing over the settlement of the landtenure of Bengal, the Mysore and Mahratta wars, and the administration of Lord Amherst, we come to the Governor-Generalship of Lord William Bentinek. The privileges of the company during this period were seriously affected, and in exchange for the renewal of its charter for twenty years, it was forced to abandon its monopoly of trade, and to give up all attempts to restrict the settlement of Europeans in India. At the same time the law was codified, and a legal member, not a servant of the company, added to the council. The anomalous position of the company was increased when, in 1863, the patronage of the civil service was taken away from it and thrown open to competi-The Indian Mutiny precipitated events; and Lord John Russell proposed that the House should proceed by way of resolutions. Upon them was based the Act for the Better Government of India (1858). It provided that the entire administration should be transferred to the crown. East Retford Question (1827). The borough of East Retford had been convicted of corruption, and the question of the manner in which its franchise should be disposed of was brought before the House of Commons. On the one hand, it was proposed that it should be given to the town of Birmingham; on the other, that it should be transferred to the hundred in which East Retford is situated. The Duke of Wellington and the majority of the cabinet supported the latter alternative; Mr. Huskisson the former, and this led to his withdrawal from the cahinet.

Ebbsfleet, in the Isle of Thanet, is identified as the Wippedesfleot, where Hengest and Horsa (q.v.) are said to have landed (in 450 f), and near which Hengest and Aesc some years later totally defeated the Britons. Ebbsfleet was also the landing place of St. Augustine in 597.

Ecclesiastical Commission Court, The, was established by James II. in 1686. It enforced the king's orders against controversial sermons, deprived the Master of Magdalen College, Cambridge, for refusing to give a degree to a Benedictine monk, and expelled the Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, for refusing to elect a royal nominee as president. James dissolved the Commission in October, 1688.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners THE. In 1835 a commission was appointed "to consider the state of the several dioceses in England and Wales with reference to the amount of their revenues, and the more equal distribution of episcopal duties; to consider also the state of cathedral and collegiate churches with a view to the suggestion of such measures as may render them more conducive to the efficiency of the Established Church; and to devise the best means of providing for the cure of souls, with special reference to the residence of the clergy on their respective benefices." This commission recommended a further distribution of episcopal duties and revenues, and the establishment of a fund to provide for worship in poor districts by the appropriation of part of the revenues of cathedral and collegiate churches, and of the surplus revenues of certain bishoprics. For this latter purpose a com-mission was created hy an Act of 1836 with all the powers of a perpetual corporation. In 1850 Queen Victoria was empowered to nominate two "Church Estates Commissioners" (one paid), and the archbishop one (paid). These were to be members of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and to form with two other members the "Church Estates Committee," which was to manage all the property of the Commission. They were empowered to secure fixed incomes to hishops, and to manage episcopal estates. They make grants to or increase the endowments of poor livings, and arrange for the creation of new parishes, etc. In 1856 they became also the Church Building Commissioners (first created in 1818).

Ecclesiastical Courts. [See below.]

Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. In England the canon law has a separate history from that which prevailed on the Continent. There the influence of the Theodosian Code secured it a uniform procedure and a ready acceptance. Here it was modified by, and in constant antagonism to, the common law. Before the Conquest, the law of the Church in England consisted of rules of penance, canons, religious laws, and the course of episcopal jurisdiction. Rules of penance, appropriating to every ain the amount of satisfaction to be paid by the sinner, are laid down in the penitentials of Archbishop Theodore, Bede, and others. These were binding only in so far as conscience enforced them. Some canons from alroad were adopted, and others were made y provincial councils. Royal laws on religions anthers-og, the laws of Alfred are not properly part of ecclesiastical law. They is it their binding force as part of the law of the land. Besides these written laws, the bishop or his archdeacon, sitting in the shire or hundred court, declared the law on ecclesiastical matters; for to the bishop pertained the duty of watching over sacred persons and things, and deciding matrimonial cases. As the caldorman pronounced the secular law in matters which were secular, so in ecclesiastical cases the bishop pronounced the law which was proper to them. The ordinance of the Conqueror, separating the spiritual and temporal courts, provided that the bishop should judge ecclesiastical causes in his own court, and according to the canons and episcopal laws, which were to take the place of the unwritten law which decided these matters. With this ordinance must be connected the appointment of men like Lanfranc, who were skilled in the law of the Continent, to the English episcopate. Dioceses now wcro broken up into different territorial archdeaconries for the purposes of jurisdiction. During the reign of Stephen, the bishops were upheld by papal interference, and the middle of the twelfth century saw a great epoch in the history of canonical jurisprudence. In 1149 Archbishop Theobald brought over Vacarius from Lombardy to teach the civil law in Oxford. Vacarius was sent out of the kingdom by Stephen, but the study which had lately been revived abroad drew many from England to pursue it on the Continent. About this time Gratian, a native of Tuscany, put forth his Decretum, which was an embodiment of canon law as it then stood. As the mode of procedure and many principles in canonical jurisprudence were supplied by the civil law, the two systems were held to be closely joined. They were looked upon with dislike by the common-lawyers and the crown. Ecclesiastical courts were continually trying to extend their jurisdiction. They harassed the people, and encroached on the province of the royal courts. Henry II. curtailed their jnrisdiction by taking away from them cases of advowson, &c., and by the Constitutions of Clarendon. [BECKET; HENRY II.] Their encroachments were checked by prohibitions issued by the royal courts. As the Decretum received new additions from successive Popes, so the English canon law was enlarged by the addition of constitutions, legatine and provincial. Legatine constitutions hegan from the legations of Otho and Otterbucie, in the reign of Henry III., which may therefore be reckened as the period at which the received text of the English canon law began to be formed. Successive archbishops, from Langton to Chichele, framed provincial constitutions.

Ecclesiastical jurisprudence was so closely connected with papal and foreign influence that it met with little favour from Englishmen in the reign of Henry III. Complaint was made by the clergy of the use of pro-hibitions. In 1236 the barons at the Council of Merton refused to admit canonical or civilian principles into the laws of England; and the king closed the law schools in London where the canon and civil laws were taught. Archbishop Peckham, a notable canonist. engaged in a vain struggle against Edward I. He drew on his cause the defeat inflicted by the writ Circumspecte agatis, founded on 13 Ed. I., which defines the province of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was limited to cases merely spiritual (e.g., heresy), to those of deadly sin (e.g., fornication), of tithes and offerings, and of assaults done on clerks and defamation where 1.0 damages were claimed. It extended to all matrimonial causes, and by customary law to those of a testamentary nature. In cases in which the condemned party neglected to give heed to the ecclesiastical censure, it was enforced by the civil power. For the bishop sent his significavit to the sheriff, who thereupon issued a writ De excommunicato capiendo, by which the offender was imprisoned until he made satisfaction. The occlesiastical authorities seem, by the Articuli Cleri drawn up in the reign of Edward II., to have been dissatisfied with this process, and received answer that the writ had never been refused. The canonists held that this writ was a right, and Archbishop Boniface in the reign of Henry III. declared that its refusal might be answered by an interdict. Chief Justice Coke, however, the violent opponent of canonical pretension, declared in the reign of James I. that it was a matter of favour. The statute, De heretico comburendo, was carried out by the ecclesiastical and civil anthorities acting together. The Statute of Provisors, 25 Ed. III., st. 4, by restraining the Pope's interference with patronage, and of Præmunirs, 16 Ric. II., o. 5, by checking appeals to Rome, lessened the power of the ecclesiastical law. In the reign of Henry V., Lyndwood, the Dean of Arches, compiled his Provinciale, which is a code of English canon law. The study of canonical and civil jurisprudence was largely pursued at Oxford and Cambridge, and a degree of Doctor of both laws was granted. A body of skilled judges and practitioners versed in the science of law existed side by side with those of the common-law courts.

Early in the reign of Henry VIII., it was evident that that monarch disliked the canonical jurisdiction. His breach with the Pope, consequent on the avocation of his divorce case, was made the occasion for his attack on the study and practice of canon law. Having caused the clergy to own him as supreme head, "so far as is allowed by the law of Christ," he procured the great petition of the Commons against the practice of the canon law in 1532. On this, by 23 Hen. VIII., c. 9, the appellate jurisdiction of the archbishop was weakened, and by 25 Hen. VIII., c. 19, the power of legislation was taken away from Convocation, and the canon law was declared to be in force, subject to a total revision by a royal commission. As this revision has never been made, the canon law up to that date, in so far as any part of it has not been abolished by national legislation, seems to rest on that statute. Such provisions only of foreign canon law, however, have force as have been received in England, nor can any law bind the laity which has not received the assent of Parliament. Henry next proceeded to destroy the study of canonical jurisprudence. He issued a mandate forbidding lectures and degrees in canon law. From that time the legal doctorate in Oxford has only been in civil law, expressed by the letters D.C.L., while Cambridge still keeps up the form of the doctorate of the two laws by the LL.D. degree. new court of appeal in ecclesiastical cases composed of divines and civilians, was formed in this reign, and called the Court of Delegates. This court was superseded in 1831, and by 3 and 4 Will. IV. (1833), c. 41, it was enacted that its jurisdiction should be transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, an arrangement which has been again altered by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. The legislation of Edward VI. was destructive of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. During his reign an abortive attempt was made by Peter Martyr, in his Reformatio Legum, to accomplish the revision promised in 1534. Elizabeth, while making as little declaration of power as possible, fully kept up the royal supremacy in action. She exercised this supremacy by the Court of High Commission, founded in virtue of 1 Eliz., c. 1. This unconstitutional court became an engine of tyranny, in which it was aided in no small degree by the ecclesiastical practice of the ex-officio oath. The court was abolished by 16 Car. I., c. 11 which sets forth that it had illegally inflicted fines and imprisonments. The ex-officio oath was abolished by 15 Car. II., c. 12. The canons of 1604, though approved by James I., were not accepted by Parliament, and are therefore only binding on the clergy. This was declared by Coke, who made on all occasions decided resistance to ecclesiastical encroachment. Unfortunately this resistance was combined with an unduo exaltation of the royal prerogative in ecclesiastical matters, and tended rather to the subservience of the clergy than to public liberty. That some resistance to clerical pretensions was needed is shown by the Articuli Cleri of Archbishop Bancroft. In these articles remonstrance was made against the issue of prohibitions by the courts of common law, and against their interpreting statutes concerning religion.

Coke declared these articles to be "monstrous." A lamentable co-operation between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions resulted in the execution by burning of two men for heresy in this reign, under the old statute De heretico comburendo. This statuto was repealed by 29 Car. II., c. 29. The gradual advance towards toleration weakened the power of the Church to punish offenders against her laws, though, until the end of the eighteenth century, fine or imprisonment and civil disabilities still sometimes followed her censures. At length the power of coercive correction was taken away by 53 Geo. III.,

The ecclesiastical courts are—(1) The Court of the Archdeacon, of which his Official is judge, and which takes cognisance of matters affecting the Church and clergy within a distinct district. (2) The Consistory Court of the bishop or archbishop, of which the Chancellor is judge, for the trial of ecclesiastical causes. The title of Chancellor ceems to cover the two offices of the Official, who is concerned for the most part in what may be considered temporal business, and of the Vicar-General, whose province is in more purely spiritual matters. (3) The Archbishop's Commissary Court, which is held for the archiepiscopal diocese. (4) The Court of Audience, in which formal business is transacted, and in which it appears, from the case of the Bishop of St. Davids, 1696, that bishops may be visited and corrected. (5) The Court of Faculties, which, by 25 Hen. VIII., c. 21, has power to grant certain dispensations which before pertained to the papal court. This court is now chiefy concerned in the grant of marriage licences. (6) The Prerogative Court lost its jurisdiction when the Court of Probate and Divorce was instituted, 20 and 21 Vict., c. 77, c. 85. (7) The Vicar-General's Court for the confirmation of bishops; and (8) The Court of Arches [for which see Auchushops]. By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, provision was made for the transfer of ecclesiastical appeals from the Judicial Committee by Order in Council. This portion of the Act, however, was repealed by 39 and 40 Vict., c. 59, which preserves the appellate jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee in these cases, and provides for the appointment of additional lords of appeal in ordinary, and for the attendance of ecclesiastical assessors. These provisions were carried out by the Rules of Nov. 28, 1876. [See Chitty's Digest, 1880.] A Royal commission to inquire into the whole subject of Ecclesiastical Courts and their jurisdiction drew up an exhaustive report in 1883.

Two Public Statutory Lectures on the History of the Canon Law in England, read in Easter Term, 1893, by W. Stubbs, D.D., &c. The writer begs to acknowledge the kindness of the Bishop of Chester in allowing free use to be made of these lectures in the above settlele. See also Gibson, Codex; Phillimore, Eccles. Law; and especially the Introduction to the Report of the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Courts, 1883, which is a most valuable digest of the whole history of the subject.

Ecclesiastical Taxation. (1) ROYAL. -Before the Conquest, the differentiation of clergy from laity had not proceeded far enough to necessitate separate ecclesiastical taxation. The clergy paid their share of the dues customary from citizens, and if they were in any way distinguished from the laity, it was on account of their participating, on the analogy of the Empire, in certain immunities which, so early as the Codes of Theodosius and Justinian, were permitted to the clergy. But the great Papal and sacerdotal movement of the eleventh century resulted in the formation of a clerical caste, whose claim for absolute immunity from State burdens was based on right divine. Yet, as citizens, the clergy still paid taxes like other men. Besides their necessary share in indirect taxation, the "temporalities of the Church," their lands, were chargeable with the ordinary feudal services. A great proportion of lands held by elergymen were held by ordinary lay tenures, with incidents precisely similar. Even the peculiar clerical tenure of frankalmoign did not exempt the tenants in free alms from heavy burdens. The spiritualities of the Church, however, its tithes and offerings, were now secure from taxation. But the growth of the royal power and royal needs made these spiritualities an ever-tempting bait. Gradually attempts were made to tax thom, with results which, though successful for the crown, led to the growth of the constitutional action of the clergy, the development of the ecclesiastical estate, and the establishment of Convocation. The steps of the process are as follows. As long as land only was taxed, the clergy naturally paid with the rest. Yet Archbishop Theobald demurred at the clergy granting Henry II. a scutage, though his objections were overruled; and Henry II. required clerks as well as laymon to give account of and pay for their knights' fees.
The Saladine tithe of 1187 began the new epoch by at once taxing the movables of the laity and the spirituals of the clergy. Its religious purpose excused an innovation, which at once became a precedent for more directly secular taxation. The ransom of Richard I. took even the chalices of the churches. John's attacks on the wool of the Cistercians led the way to his formal demand in 1207 of a grant from the beneficed elergy for the recevery of Normandy. It was refused, and a similar request from Innocent III. was forbidden by the king. But with the alliance of Pope and king, a joint pressure was put on the elergy which they could not long withstand. By the reign of Henry III. taxation of spirituals was a regular thing, and the clergy could only obtain that, like the laity, they should assemblo by their representatives, and grant the tax themselves, instead of its being arbitrarily imposed on them by the king. The establishment of Convocation (q.v.) is one result of this process. Under Edward I, the elergy became a regular estate of the realm, and their proctors in Parliament generally were compelled to make much larger grunts than the laity. At last Edward I.'s demand of half their revonues led to their taking refuge in Boniface VIII.'s bull, Clericis laicos, which forbade clerical taxation by the erown. Edward's answer was to outlaw the whole clergy, an act which soon led to a compromise. It is unnecessary to trace further the growth of clerical taxation, except to notice that the clergy objected to return representatives of their estate to Parliament, and preferred to tax themselves separately in their clerical synod to sharing in the burdens and deliberations of the nation. The importance attached to accurate assessment of spiritual incomes is seen in the minuteness of the "Valor Eccle-siasticus" of Henry VIII. This custom of separate clerical taxation continued over the Reformation, until, in 1664, when an agreement between Archbishop Sheldon and Clarendon resulted in the clergy's abandoning this right and reverting to the custom of Edward I. by being included in the money bills prepared by the House of Commons. In 13 Car. II., the clergy gave their last separate subsidy. They received in compensation the right of voting at Parliamentary elections, but it was too late for them to return, as of old, special clerical proctors to the House of Commons. [Convocation.]

(2) Papal.—Besides these special royal exactions, the clergy were also liable to heavy taxation at the hands of the Pope. This was of comparatively late origin, for Peter-pence was not an exclusively clerical tax. It reached its highest point under Henry III., when 'n ecclesiastical the Popes added temporal supremacy through John's submission, and diminished after the nationalist movement of the fourteenth century affected even the Church, but was a subject of continual complaint up to the Reformation. The crown handed over the clergy to the Papacy in return for Papal permission of royal exactions more often than it protected them against the alien oppressor. [Papacy, Relations with.]

Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, The (1851), was passed in response to a great popular outcry in England against the Pope. In 1850 much commotion was caused by a papal bull appointing a Roman Catholic archbishop and bishops with territorial titles in England. The following year Lord John Russell passed the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, declaring the Pope's bull null and void, and imposing penalties on all who carried it into effect. The excitoment, however, soon died away, and the Act was repealed in 1871.

Edbert (EADBERHT), PREN, King of Kent (794—796), seems to have been collaterally connected with the Æscings, and to have formerly been an ecclesiastic. On the death of Alric, he was elected king, but was attacked by Cenwulf of Mercia, who ravaged Kent, and obtained the excommunication of Edbert by the Pope. Cenwulf eventually took Edbert prisoner, and is said to have caused his eyes to be put out and his hands ampnitated, but subsequently liberated him.

Edbert (EADBERHT), King of Northumbria (737—758), was first cousin of Ceolwulf, whom he succeeded, and brother of Egbert, Archbishop of York. He was a successful ruler; he defeated the Mercians, and reduced the British kingdom of Strathclyde to subjection. His friendship was sought by Pepin of France, who sent him costly presents. Like his predcessor, he abdicated and retired to a monastery, where he lived for ten years.

Edburga (EADBURH) (circa 800), wife of Bertric, King of Wessex, poisoned her husband by mistake, having intended the death of his favourite, Worr. It is said that, "in detestation of the crime, the West Saxons determined that henceforth no wife of a king should occupy a royal throne by her husband's side, or bear the title of queen." She fied to the court of Charles the Great, who made her an abbess. "But she ruled over the monastery ill, and did wickedly in all things." Expelled thence, after many wanderings, she died a beggar in the city of Pavia.

William of Malmeebury; Asser.

Edgar (EADGAR), KING (b. 944, s. 959, d. 975), was the son of King Edmund, and on the death of Edred seems to have been made under-king of Mercia by his brother Edwy. But in 957 we read that the Mercians and Northnmbrians chose Edgar for their king, which, together with the fact that just at this time he recalled Dunstan from exile and made him Bishop of Worcester, looks as if he had thrown up his allegiance to his brother. However this may be, on Edwy's death Edgar was at once elected king. His reign owes a great deal of its importance and success to Dunstan, who was practically his prime minister. The reforms in the Church which belong to this reign were the joint work of the king and the archbishop. Several new sees were established, and above forty Benedictine monasteries are said to have been founded by Edgar. There are but few striking events recorded in Edgar's reign, and the absence of Danish invasions is very marked. There are the usual wars against the Welsh, but even of these we read but little in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and certainly Edgar more than any other Saxon king deserved the title "Pacificus." To protect the country, the fleet was considerably increased, and once a year it sailed round the island, often carrying the king in person. It is said that in one of these expeditions Edgar reduced the Danes in Ireland to subjection, and took Dublin. The story of Edgar's being rowed on the Dec by eight tributary kings need not be considered altogether apocryphal. The Chronicle tells us that in 973 he was met at Chester by six kings, who plighted their troth to him, while Florence of Worcester enumerates eight kings as having taken part in the ceremony—Kenneth of Scotland, Malcolm of Cumbria, Maccus of Man, Dunwallon of Strathclyde, Siferth, Iago, and Howell of Wales, and Inchill of Westmoreland. In 973, after he had been king fifteen years, Edgar was solemnly crowned at Bath. The story that this coronation was necessary on account of the penance he had to undergo for the abduction of a nun rests on no good authority, but no other solution has been attempted of this curious circumstance. In 975 Edgar died. He had been twice married: first to Ethelfieda, by whom he had Edward, who succeeded him, and secondly to Elfrida (Ælfthryth), who became the mother of Ethelred. The numerous stories of his amours, though no doubt greatly exaggerated, show his private character to be anything but exemplary; as a king, however, he was a worthy successor of Alfred. He was the first West Saxon "Emperor" who made his supremacy really felt over the Mercians and Northnmbrians. His legislation seems to show the results of an enlightened attempt to put Saxons, Angles, and Panes on a perfect equality before the law. In recording his death, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle gives an interesting fragment of a poetical estimate of the king:-

"This year died Edgar,
King of the English,
Dear Lord of West Saxous,
The Merchan's protector.
Widely was it known
Through many nations
Acroes the gannet's bath [i.e., the sea],
That Edmund's offspring
Kings remote Great!y honoured,
To the king submitted,
As to him was fitting.
Was no fleet so inscient,
No host so strong,
That in the English race
Took from him sught
The while the noble king
Reigned on his throne!

[F. S. P.]

Edgar (EADGAR), King of Scotland

(1097 — 1107), son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, obtained the crown chiefly by the aid of his uncle, Edgar Atheling (q.v.). In the following year he confirmed Magnus of Norway in the possession of the isles; the rest of his relgn was exceedingly uneventful, owing, perhaps, to his mild character, which has caused him to be likened to Edward the Confessor. In 1100 his sister Matilda married Henry I. of England. Edgar died in January, 1107, and was buried at Dunfermline; before his death he divided the kingdom between his two brothers, Alexander and David, making the latter Earl of Lothian and Cumbria.

Edgar Atheling (b. 1058, d. circa 1158), was the son of Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside. On the death of Edward the Confessor, he was the nearest heir to the throne, but his claims were disregarded, and even after Harold's cleath there were very few who seriously advocated his cause. William received him kindly, and for two years he remained at the Conquerer's court, but in 1068 his friends, fearing for his security, withdrew him and his two sisters from England, and carried them to Scotland, where King Malcolm married Margaret, one of the sisters, and supported Edgar's claims in many attacks upon England. But these were in the main unsuccessful, and Edgar at length gave up his claims to the English crown on consideration of receiving estates and a pension from William. After remaining some time in Scotland, Edgar went over to Normandy (1074), and formed a grad friendship with the Conqueror's cldest son, kobert; soon after this he made a pilgrimage to Italy and Constantinople, and on his return, supported Robert against William. The ill-success of the former obliged Edgar to flee to Scotland, where he was instrumental in effecting a peace between Malcolm and William Rufus. After the death of Malcolm (1093), Edgar took his sister's children under his protection, and eventually got leave from William to raise an army for the purpose of placing his nephew, Edgar, on the Scotch throne (1097). Having effected this, he joined the Crusaders just in time for the siege of Jerusalem. Subsequently he was taken prisoner by Henry I. while fighting for Robert of Normandy in the battle of Tenchebrai (1106), but was soon allowed to ransom himself, and retired to his estates, where he lived peacefully till he was nearly, if not quite, a hundred years of age.

Angle-Saron Chron.; Ordericus Vitalis, Hist. Eccles; Freeman, Norman Conquest.

Edgecote, The Battleof (July 26, 1469), was fought between the insurrents, led by "Robin of Redesdale," and the troops of Edward IV., under the Earl of Pembroke. The former were completely victorious. Pembroke was defeated with great slaughter, and he and his brother, Sir William Herbert, were taken prisoners, and put to death by the rebels. Edgecoto is in Northamptonshire, a few miles from Banbury.

Edgehill, THE BATTLE OF (October 23, 1642), was the first battle of the Civil War of the seventeenth century. Two months before, the king had raised his standard at Nottingham, and on September 9 the Parliamentary army, under Essex, left London. The king at first marched westwards to Shrewsbury, where his force was considerably increased, and then resolved to push rapidly on London. Essex determined to prevent this, and marched on Worcester, where the two armies remained for some time within a few leagues of one another. At length the king marched forward, and on the 23rd of October the armies met at Edgehill, near Kineton, in Warwickshire. Royalists occupied the hill while Essex drew up his troops in front of Kineton. The king's army was about 12,000 strong, while Essex's troops numbered about 10,000, and by Rupert's advice the king determined to march down the hill and attack the enemy on the plain. The battle began about two in the afternoon, and lasted till the evening. Rupert routed the Parliamentarian cavalry, but rashly pursued them more than two miles from the field, till stopped by the arrival of Hampden's regiment with the artillery. Meanwhile, the Royalist infantry had been breken, and Rupert's horse were in too great disorder to retrieve the fortunes of the day. The forces remained facing each other during the night, but on both sides large numbers deserted, and in the morning the two armies marched away—the king into Oxfordshire, Essex to Warwick. The Parliamentarian loss was heavier, but the Royalists lost many officers of rank, including the Earl of Lindsey, the Commander-in-chief. The real advantages lay with the king, who was able to capture Banbury, and march to Oxford without resistance.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion, ii. 45; Rushworth, v. 33: Whitelocke, Memo; tals.

Edinburgh (Eadwines byrig, "the castle of Edwin;" in Gaelic, Dunedin which means the same thing) was four led by Edwin of Northumbria as a frontier uenthe against the Picts, and became the chief town of Lothian, which the cession of Canute put under the Scottish kings. The introduction of English and Norman usages into the Scottish royal house made Edinburgh the chief royal residence and capital. It was given up to the English in 1174, but by the Traty of Falaise restored to the Sects in 1189. In 1296 Edward I. carried off the regalia from the castle, which was a few years afterwards re-taken by Robert Bruce. In 1322 it was besieged by Edward II., and in 1333 given up to Edward III., from whom it was taken in 1341.

In 1544 Edinburgh was burnt by Hertford, and shortly afterwards was garrisoned by the French, who were driven out by the Lords of Congregation, 1559. After the murder of Darnley, the castle was taken by the Confederate Lords, but subsequently became the head-quarters of Queen Mary's party, until Kirkealdy of Grange was compelled to surrender it, 1.73. In March, 1639, the castle fell into the hands of the Covenanters, and In 1650 was taken by Cromwell. In 1689 lt held out for some time for James II., under the Duke of Gordon. In 1708 a Jacobite plot was formed for seizing the castle, another attempt being made in 1715, and in the rebellion of 1745 it was captured by the Highlanders. In 1583 the University of Edinburgh was founded by the Town Council, partly from the proceeds of a legacy left by Robert Reid, Bishop of Orkney, and from endowments bestowed by James VI.

Daniel Wilson, Memorials of Edinburgh; James Grant, Old and New Edinburgh,

Edinburgh, The Treaty of (July 6, 1560), enacted peace between England and Scotland on condition that the French were to retire from Scotland; the fortifications of Leith and Dunbar to be razed; and a fine to be pald for the bluzoning of English arms with those of Scotland and France by Mary.

Edith (EADOYTH) (d. 1075), wife of Edward the Confessor, was the daughter of Earl Godwin, and in 1045 she married the king. Her relations towards her husband are doubtful, but she probably exerted her influence in favour of her father's policy, as on the disgrace of Godwin, in 1051, she was banished from the king's presence, and sent to a convent, but received back again on Godwin's return in the next year. She favoured her brother Tostig against Hareld, and after the Conquest, seems to have been treated with great respect by William. Sho died in 1075. She was reverenced alike by English and Normans, the latter apologising for her origin in the famous line-

"Sient spina rosam genuit Godwinus Editham." [Edward the Confessor.]

Life of Edward the Confessor (Rolls Series); Freeman, Norman Conquest.

Edith, "SWANSNECK," was the mistress of King Harold. Sho it was who is said to have identified his body after the battle of Hastings. Nothing more than this is known about her.

Edmund (CADMUND), King (b. 922, s. 940, d. 946), afterwards called Edmind the Elder by historians, was the sen of Edward the Elder, and brother of Athelstan. Before his accession he had already gained renown in the battle of Brunanburh (q.v.). His brief reign was chiefly occupied in resisting the Danes, whom he frequently defeated, and with whom he eventually divided his kingdom, as Alfred had done, Watling Street being, roughly speaking, the boundary. The most important events of his reign are the recovery of Northumbria and the Five Burghs from the Danes, and the grant of Cumberland to Malcolm, King of Scots, in 945. The next year he was lurdered at Pucklechurch by a robber named Liofa. It wife was Ethelfieda, a daughter of the caldorman Elgar, and hy her he had two sons, Edwy and Elgar (q.v.). Edmund received the title of "Magnificus," i.c., the doer of great deeds, apparently from his successes against the Danes. His sons were so young at the time of his death that they were passed over in favour of his brother Edred.

Anglo-Sazon Chron.; Lappenberg, Anglo-Sazon Kings.

Edmund (EADMUND) IRONSIDE (b. 989) s. Apr., d. Nov., 1016), was the son of Ethelred II. During his father's lifetime he had been active in opposing the Danes. In 1015 he married Aldgyth, widow of Sigeferth, and took possession of the Five Burghs, thus forming a kind of principality c his own in the heart of the Danish district. On the death of Ethelred, Edmund was chosen king by the citizens of London and those of the With who were there, while the rest of the people elected Canute. The brief reign of Edmund is taken up with struggles with his rival, in which the valour of Edmund and the bravery of his followers are in great measure neutralised by the treachery of Edric Streona and others. Immediately after his election Edmund left London, marched into Wessex, and defeated Canuto at Pen Selwood. Another buttle was fought at Sherstone, in Wiltshire, in which Edrie's treachery almost caused the defeat of the English. Edmund next relieved London, and won a victory at Brentford. A fourth battle was fought at Oxford, where the Danes were once more defeated, and "all men said that Edmund would have destroyed them utterly had not Edrie beguiled him to stop the pursuit at Aylesford." Shortly after this the Dance gained a great victory at Assington (Assandun), in Essex, in which the Chronicle tells us "all the nobility of the English race was destroyed," and which is to be attributed to the defection of Edric and his men. Canute pursued Edmund to Gloucester, and a sixth battle was about to be fought when the Witan proposed that a division of the country should be made between the two kings. For this purpose a meeting was held on Olney Island, close to Gloucester, where it was agreed that Edmund "was to be the head king, and have Wessex, Essex, and East Anglia, with the city of London; and Canute was to have Mercia and Northumbria." The story of Edmund having proposed to decide the matter by single combat with Canute rests on no good authority. Very soon after this, on November 30, 1016, Edmund died, having very probably beer, murdered by Edric. He left two yo ing sons, Edward and Edmund, who were ext'ed by Canute. His great physical strength, as we'll as his valid t spirit, gained him the aurname of "Irousade." He reigned only seven months, and during that time he had fought five great battles, in three of which he was completely victorious, and in the others only defeated by treachery.

monastery schools cas to preserve the history of the country. England is especially rich in chronicles of this period. Ethelhard, a Benedictine abbot, introduced his own translation of uclid into his schools. Disputations were heid, and prizes in poetry and grammar were established. We find dramatic entertainments given in the monastery school at Dunstable, a practice which has been continued till our own day. A later period brings us to still more ambitious efforts. William of Wykeham founded New College, at Oxford, and a great college at Winehester, intended to supply between them the whole curriculum of a liberal education. Winehester was opened in 1393. In imitation of this, P vry VI. founded King's College, at Cam'niles, and Eton Collega, near Windsor (1441). 1447 four Lone n elergymen presented a petition to Pa. ment to found schools in the different parish The only result of this was the Mercers' School, at which was educated Colet, who in 1508 founded St. Paul's School. The suppression of the monasteries at the Reformation ought to have provided funds for an efficient national education, but they were squandered by Henry VIII. Edward VI. founded (or rather refounded) a number of grammar schools, many of which have become distinguished the principal being Christ's Hospital, founded in 1552. Elizabeth to some extent continued this we k. The principal of her foundations is estminster. In her reign Judd founde anbridge School; Lawrence Sheriff, Rug John Lyons, Harrow; and in the next Thomas Sutton founded Charterhouse. rious efforts did much for the educat. a higher and middle classes, but the ed n of the lower classes was almost entirely The Society cted. for Promoting Christian Knowledge, founded in 1698, had estublished 1,600 free schools by the middle of the eighteenth century; but this number was very insufficient. Wesley's efforts for popular education were principally confined to his own communion. cursor of the Methodist movement in Wales. Griffith Jones, of Llanddowror, effected great changes by his system of "circulating schools," but his efforts were purely local. Towards the end of the eighteenth century, Robert Raikes, the editor of the Gloucester Journal, awakened public interest in this cause. Ho began to teach children in Gloucester Cathedral during the service. In 1785 was founded "The Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominions." Dissenters joined it as well as Churchman. These Sunday schools These Sunday schools gave a great impulse to the general education of the poorer classes. From these small beginnings the Sunday schools were almost universally adopted. A further advance was made by the introduction of the monitorial system by Bell and Lancaster. Bell, who re urned to England in 1797, had organised this method of mutual instruction whilst he was president of the military orphan school in Madras. Joseph Lancaster, a young Quaker, employed the annie method. He met with great success, and was favoured by the court. Under this impulse the British and Foreign School Society was established in 1805. In these schools the Bible was taught "without note or comment." In opposition to this, Dr. Bell gave his countenance to the "National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church," founded in 1811. Bell, at his death, in 1832, left £120,000 for the purpose of promoting national education. Lancaster died in poverty in America in 1838. P; the rival efforts of these two societies education was much developed, and in 1833 a proportion of about one in eleven of the whole population was attending school. Up to this time the government had taken no direct part in this movement, but the year 1832 introduced a change in this respect. In that year a committee was appointed to inquire into the matter, and in the following year £20,000 was voted for the education of the people. In order to avoid religious disputes, the sum was divided between the two great school societies, and the grant was continued in succeeding years. In 1839 the Committee of the Privy Council on Education was formed. Its action was at first exclusively on the lines of the Church of England. To meet the difficulty, the Independents founded the Congregational Board of Education, and the Baptists the Voluntary School Society. The further development of the action of government was hindered by the divergence of party views on the question. One party was in favour of an entirely voluntary system, unconnected with the State. Among the supporters of State education, some were inclined to a gratuitous system; some were for denominational, others for secular education. An important step was taken, February 25, 1856, by which an Education Department was established in two divisions : one for tho education of the people, and the other fer the development of science and art. A code of regulations was published in April, 1860, now known as the "old code." A Royal Commission, appointed in 1858, repor gave an unfavourable pictus education in England. vised code of regulationunder the influence of N appeared in a revised It reduced the subjects three R's,"-reading, writ. established six standards asserted the principle of The management of schbodies, but the inspection ; of government. The pay of the diminished The revised code was severely criticised in its details, but it laid a foundation for future action, and indirectly fami-liarised the nation with the duty of educating the people. It paved the way for the great measure of Mr. Forster, the Elementary Education Act, which became law on August 9, 1870, and authorised the formation of School Boards for the purpose of providing public elementary education under the supervision of elected representatives of the ratepayers. It was followed by the Free Education Act in 1891.

This Act gave an additional government grant of 10s. per annum for each child between five and fourteen years of age in average attendence at recognised elementary schools, and reduced fees accordingly. As the fces charged ordinarily amounted to less than 10s. per child per annum, the result was to abolish school fees in most cases, and where the abolition was not effected by the Act it was frequently carried out voluntarily by the managers. The Revised Code of 1891 made the "merit grant" dependent on the general efficiency of a school as estimated by the inspector rather than on the number of pupils who passed his examination, and so abolished the "payment by results" of Mr. Lowe's Revised Code. In 1894 Mr. Ackland issued a new Code for continuation schools, giving them considerable opening for usefulness. In 1896 an Education Bill was brought in hy the Conservative Ministry, which proposed to form an educational committee of each Connty Council, whose duty it should be to inspect all elementary schools in the county, to distribute the Government grant, and eventually to undertake the charge of secondary education. Some provisions in it were suggested by the Report of the Secondary Education Commission (see below). The Bill also gave Voluntsry Schools an annual grant of 4s. per scholar, and permitted "a reasonable number of parents" to obtain separate religious instruction in their own tenets for their children in any Board School. The Bill passed its second reading hy a majority of 160, but was withdrawn before it was far advanced in Committee. In 1897 Acts were passed granting 5s. per scholar to Voluntary Schools and some relief also to necessitous Board Schools, the first-named grant to be distributed hy associations of school managers. A Commission on Secondary Education appointed in 1894 reported in October, 1896, recommending the creation of a central supervisory authority, with subordinate local authorities in counties and boroughs, the rearrangement of educational endowments, with further aid from taxes and rates, the registration of teachers, and a system of State supervision and encouragement which might be extended to private and proprietary schools at their option. In 1599, in accordance with the recommendations of this Commission, statute was passed creating "The Board of Education for England and Wales." This Board takes the place of the Education Department and of the Science and Art Department, also of the Charity Commission and the Board of Agriculture in matters relating to Education. Its chief officials are a President and a Parliamentary Under Secretary.

There is associated with the Board a Consultative Committee, whose first task was to frame regulations for forming a Register of Teachers. It was felt that such a Register should include Teachers of all grades, and that it would conduce to the greater efficiency of the teaching profession. The Committee put forth its regulations early in 1902. Briefly, the Register has two columns, A and B. Column A is for the registration of elementary teachers. Column B is for all teachers other than elementary who have taken a University Degree, have had a year's training in pedagogy, have passed an examination in the theory of education, and have spent a year in teaching at a recognised school, other than elementary. Eighty thousand teachers enrolled themselves in Column A, and 500 in Column B. By another provision of the Act of 1899 secondary schools may, if they wish it, be examined by the Board.

The Education Act (England and Wales) introduced by Mr. Balfour in 1902 is actuated by the same motive as the Act of 1899, namely, to promote the co-ordination and efficiency of education in these countries. Its general principles as to secular education have been approved by the majority of those best qualified to form an opinion, but unhappily some of its provisions have stirred up a great amount of acctarian feeling. This Act sets up one local authority to control primary, secondary, and scientific education, invests such authority with rating powers, and throws the cost of the maintenance of all elementary schools upon the rates. In respect of secondary schools it allows the said authority to "take such steps as may seem desirable after consulting with the Board of Education to supply or aid the supply of education other than elementary."
The "local anthority" is the County Council in Counties, the Borough Council in County Boroughs and in non-County Boroughs with a population over 10,000, and the Urban District Council in Urban Districts with a population over 20,000. What were formerly known as Board Schools are now called Provided Schools, and those previously known as Voluntary Schools are now termed Non-Provided Schools. In the case of the latter the buildings have been handed over to the State, but the duty of keeping them in repair remains with the managers. In these schools religious teaching is to be under the control of the managers, of whom the majority are to be "foundation managers" appointed under the provisions of the trust deed of the school. It is over this ariangement that there has arisen so much dispute, it being contended by the objectors that rate-supported schools should in all respects be under popular control. The Act received the royal assent on Dec. 18, 1902.

In 1903 an unwillingness on the part of numerous members of the Free Churches to pay that part of the education rate allocated to the support of denominational schools led to the formation of a "Passive Resistance Committee," of which Dr. Clifford was President. In spite of the adverse opinion rresident. In spite of the adverse opinion of counsel, "Passive Resistance" became active. On Oct. 31, 1903, the Archbishop of Canterbury wrote to Dr. Horton suggesting a conference, but the reply was that the idea could only be entertained if the Church party would as a preliminary admit the principles that all schools should be under absolutely public control, and that all teachers should be appointed without reference to denomination and by the public authority. The Archbishop was unable to assent to these terms.

In 1906 a further Bill was introduced under a Liberal Government, in which it was provided that no school would be recognised as a public elementary school unless it was a school provided by the local education anthority; therefore no elementary school was to receive a peuny of public money, either from rates or taxes, unless it became a Provided School within the meaning of the Education Act. Voluntary Schools receiving rates and grants would at once become Provided Schools. No catechism or distinctive religious formularies were to be taught, but simple religious exercises and simple Biblical instruction were to be given. After considerable opposition from Churchmen the Bill was withdrawn.

Education in Ireland is by tradition said to have reached a high pitch of excelleuce in pre-Christian times. It had its military as well as its civil side. The usual custom was for the principal champions to preside over the education, chiefly athletic, of the more promising youths, and this system was perpetuated by the laws of fosterage, which continued in force as late as A.D. 1600. There were also central military schools at Tara and the capitals of the other kingdoms. are told that when the Fianna (Fenians), or national militia, was established (ci es 140 A.D.), no one was admitted to membership until he had passed a strict military examination, which included verse-making as well as feats of corporeal strength. The civil education was in the hands of the Druids and of the Fileadh, or poets, characters often united in the same person, though the former were, as a rule, stationary, while the latter, a highly privileged and protected class, wandered about the country with their pupils. Learning was held in high esteem; from 600 s.c. we have lists of great lawyers, historians, and poets who were maintained at the royal courts. Cormac, King of Erinn, who lived in the third century, endowed schools of war, history, and jurisprudouce at Tara, and we are told that the Ollambs, or doctors of poetry (or rather, culture generally), had to submit to twelve years' study of great severity. They were declared inviolate by law, and their duties consisted in teaching the people history by public recitals, and in settling questions of genealogy. With the arrival of St. Patrick, education was revolutionised by the introduction of Latin and of Christianity. A great impulse was now given to learning; ecclesiastical schools were founded, where churchman and layman alike gathered round their saintly teachers, the most famous being the School or University of Armagh, where, it is said, a third of the city was given over to foreign students, so great was its fame. Education was conducted on a well-organised system; poor students waited on the rich in return for gifts of food and clothing; and the efficiency and functions of the teachers were minutely provided for by law. During the sixth and seventh century, Ireland sent forth missionaries and scholars everywhere, and her culture was the envy of Europe. Neither internal dissensions nor Danish invasions seem to have checked the advance of knowledge; about A.D. 1000 we find poetry cultivated with great assiduity, and royal preceptors often became ministers of state: e.g., O'Carroll, under Brian Boru. A great number of schools and colleges were, however, plundered of their wealth during the anarchy which preceded the Norman invasion, and the struggles that followed that event destroyed the old teric civilisation, without, unfortunately, substituting that of England. All through the Angevin period the social condition of Ireland degenerated. The English settlers at first sent their sons to be educated in England, and after they had become, in the four-teenth century, "more Irish than the Irish themselves," did not have them educated at all. Nevertheless, two great attempts were made to establish university teaching: the first at Dublin, on the anthority of a bull from Pope Clement V. in 1311, an effort which struggled on until the reign of Edward VI., and the second at Drogheda, in 1465. Both ultimately failed from lack of funds. What other teaching existed was purely ecclesiastical, and many learned priests were brought up in the monasteries and convents which had been built by the invaders. These became rapidly corrupt, and the suppression of the religious houses of the Pale by Henry VIII. was not very detrimental to the cause of education. Then came the Reformation, bringing with it educational disabilities for the Catholics, but also in 1591 the foundation of Dublin University. A commencement was made by the establishment by charter of Trinity College, which was to be the Mater Universitatis; but though it flourished greatly, the efforts in the seventeenth century found colleges round it were only partially successful, and the University remained unin-corporated. During this period the children of the Catholic gentry were for the most part educated abroad in Catholic seminaries, or secretly at home by Jesuit priests. Education in Ireland continued to be virtually confined to Protestants until 1793, when the disabilities excluding Catholics from Dublin University were removed by law. During the 19th century many efforts were made to solve the vexed question of Irish University Education. In 1850 the Queen's University, with colleges at Belfast, Cork, and Galway, was established, but its system of purely secular education was disliked by the Catholics, and, with the excepdistinct by the Catholics, and, with the exception of the college at Belfast, it proved a complete failure. The Catholic University was established in 1854, and supported by private subscriptions. Mr. Gladstone's Irish University Bill of 1873 was the most complete of the many schemes which endeavoured to reconcile these conflicting institutions; its aim was to make Dublin University the one central university to which the other colleges might affiliate themselves, but it satisfied no one, and was thrown out by the Commons. Tests were, however, abolished in Dublin University, and the Queen's University superseded by the Royal University, for which a charter was granted in 1880. In 1908 an Act was passed providing for the foundation of two new universities in Ireland, having their seats at Dublin and Belfast, and for the dissolution of the Royal University. The Grammar Schools of Ireland date from the time of Queen Elizabeth, who provided that a school should be maintained in every diocese; but though grants of forfeited land were given for the purpose by the Stuarts, the scheme was never thoroughly carried out. For the education of candidates for the Catholic priesthood, Maynooth College was founded in 1795, and after a stormy career, received a building grant of £30,000 in 1845, as well as a grant annually renewed till 1869, when it was commuted. By the Intermediate Education Act of 1878 a million of the Irish Church surplus was set aside for the encouragement and endowment of intermediate education, The examinations under this Act show a steady increase of numbers. Primary Schools were established in the reign of Henry VIII., who ordained that the incumbent should maintain a school in every parish. This duty was, however, shamefully neglected, and the Charter Schools (q.v.), started in 1733 by the Protestants, with the avowed intention of the conversion of the children of the poor, failed utterly, through the hostility of the Catholic priests, the falling off of private benefactions, and the peculation of the annual Parliamentary grants. In 1811 the Kildare Place Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor on the Principle of Secularism was founded in Dublin, and in 1819 it received a Parliamentary grant. This was ultimately withdrawn, on account of the outcry of the Catholics, but in 1833 it was vested in Commissioners of National Education, by whom it has been excellently administered. An Act of 1892 introduced compulsory education and provided for grants to denominational schools, Education in Scotland. It is impossible to fix with any accuracy the date of the first establishment of schools in Scotland, but there are indications in the historical records that they existed from a very early period. Learning has in Scotland always been in advance of the arts and refinements of civilisation, which in other countries usually precede letters. For the first foundation of her schools, as for the introduction of her earliest arts and industries, Scotland is indebted to the Church. As early as the twelfth century there is mention of schools existing in certain burghs in connection with the religious houses in the neighbourhood. With the building of every ca..hedral church a school would spring up in the city for the instruction of the choristers, and though the teaching was mainly intended to fit the scholars for taking part in the religious services, it was not confined to choral singing and chanting; for as the service of the Church was wholly in Latin, a knowledge of Latin was absolutely necessary for all who took part in the service, and the Latin grammar was therefore taught in the choral schools. Thus the choral school of the Church easily developed into the grammar school of the burgh. We have no exact information as to the number of these burghal schools or the course of instruction pursued even at so late a date as the Reformation; but while art was still in its infancy, and all the appliances of domestic life were of the rudest, the value of knowledge and the desire for it was felt by the nation, and expressed by a way of "Education Acts" passed by the Parliament. The first official m. ... national education is in 1496, Act of Parliament was passed requiring "through all the realm that all barons and freeholders that are of substance put their eldest sons and heirs to the schools, fra they be aught or nine years of age; and to remain at the grammar schools until they be competendy founded, and have perfect Latin; and thereafter to remain three years at the schools of art and jure, so that they may have knowledge and understanding of the laws," under pain of a penalty of £20. In 1579 another Act ordained that "song-schools be provided in burghs for the instruction of the youth in music." In 1621 an Act exempts colleges and schools from payment of a taxation; and in 1633 an Act declares that every "plough- or husband-land according to the worth" should be taxed for the maintenance and establishment of parish schools. spite of these enactments, however, on the re-establishment of the Presbyterian Church it was fourd that the existing means of education was not sufficient to meet the wants of the people, and that many parishes were without schools. An Act, therefore, "for settling of schools" was passed in 1696, which orders the heritors (landowners) of every parish in the kingdom to "provide a com-modious house for a school, and settle and modify a salary for a schoolmaster, which shall not be under one hundred nor above two hundred marks." This Act was the basis of the parochial school system of Scotland, and this system continued in operation till the whole machinery of education was revised, and the Education Act of 1872 passed, when it was again found that the existing means of education was inadequate to the population. This was due in the towns to the influx of strangers caused by the increase of trade and manufactures. In the rural parishes, too, the heritors had in many instances so neglected their duty that there was no house for either the school or the teachers. The returns showed that 1,000 new schools were required, and that 54,671 children were without accommodation. The Education Act was therefore passed, the principles of which are the same in substance as those of the Act of 1494: namely, that every child in the kingdom shall have the means of education placed within its reach, and that it shall be compelled to make use of them. The Act places the management of the parish school in the hands of a School Board elected by the ratepayers. In 1901 another Act was passed which declared that it shall be the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between the ages of five and fourteen years of age.

Edward (Eadward) the Elder, King (b. 870, a. 901, d. 925), was the son and successor of Alfred. He had already distinguished himself in the wars against the Danes, and seems to have been unanimously chosen king on his father's death; but Ethelwald, a son of Etholred, put forward his claim to the throne, and having failed to excite a rebellion in Wossex, fled to Northumbria, where the

Danes made him their king. In 904 he got descession of Essex, and the next year ravaged lercia. Edward, in return, invaded the Danelagh, and harried it. The Kentish men, against his orders, remained behind, and a battle ersued, in which the Danes were victorious, but their king, Eric, and Ethelwald were slain. In 906 Edward made peace with Guthrum, the son and successor of Eric. Edward now began, with the aid of his sister, Ethelfieds (Æthelfiæd), the "Lady of the Mercians," to construct fortresses against the Dames at Chester, Tamworth, Warwick, Hertford, and other places. These fortresses were mostly constructed of stone or brick, a great improvement on the old system of earthworks. In 910 the Danes broke the peace, and were defeated by Edward at Tettenhall, and in the next year at Wednesfield. On the death of Æthelfæd in 918, Edward took possession of Mercia; "and all the folk there, as well Danish as English, submitted to him." In 921 the Danes failed in an attack on Towcester, and in 922 "all the people in Essex, East Anglia, and the rest of Mercia submitted to him," and in the same year the Welsh kings "sought him to lord." Lastly, in 924, "the King of the Scots, and the whole nation of the Scots, and all those who dwell in Northumbria, as well English as Danes, and Northmen, and others, and also the King of the Strathclyde Britons, and all the Strathclyde Britons, sought him to father and to lord." Edward had thus in some sort gained a supremacy over all Britain. Wessex, Kent, and Sussex were his by inheritance, and Mercia, Essex, and East Anglia by conquest from the Danes. Besides this, Northumbria, Scotland, Wales, and Strathclyde did homage to him as overlord. Edward died in 925, and was succeeded by his son Athelstan. He seems to have had three wives and a numerous family; three of his sons reigned after him, and of his daughters, one married Charles the Simple, King of the West Franks; another (Eadgifu) Louis, King of Arles; Eadhild married Hugh the Great, Duke of the French (the father by another wife of Hugh Capet); while Edith became the wife of the Emperor Otto I. Another daughter was given to a prince near the Alps, and another to Sitric, the Northumbrian king. Of King Edward Mr. Freeman says: "It is only the unequalled glory of his father which has condemned this prince, one of the greatest rulers that England ever beheld, to a smaller degree of popular fame than he deserves. His whole reign bears out the panegyric passed on him by an ancient writer. Florence of Worcester, that he was fully his father's equal as a warrior and a ruler, and was inferior to him only in those literary labours which peculiarly distinguish Alfred among the princes of the

Edward (EADWARD) THE MARTYR, KINO (s. 975, d. 978), was the eldest son of Edgar, whom he succeeded at the age of thirteen. His election was opposed by his step-mother, Elfrida (Ælfthryth), on behalf of her own son, Ethelred. Edward, howover, gained tho support of Dunstan, and was accordingly elected. His short reign is unimportant, except for the banishment of Oslac, tho Earl of Deira, who had been appointed by Edgar. His accession seems to have led to a reaction against the monastic policy of Edgar, but little can be certainly said on this point. He was treachcrously murdered in 979, without doubt at the instigation of his stepmother, though the story of the tragedy having taken place at Corfe Castle, and the details of the crime, are only found in the later chroniclers. His cruel and untimely fate gained him the surname of the Martyr, though it cannot be affirmed that he was a martyr either to religion or to patriotism.

Edward (EADWARD) THE CONFESSOR (s. 1042, d. 1066) was the younger son of Emma and Ethelred the Unready, and was born probably about 1004. This Emma-or, to call her by her English name, Edith—was the daughter of Richard Sanspeur, great-grandfather of William the Conqueror, who was therefore second cousin to Edward. The early days of Edward and his brother Alfred were spent in Normandy, at the court of their uncle, Richard the Good; for they had been carried there by Emma at the time of Sweyn's success in 1013, and did not return to their native land on their mother's marriage with Canute (1017). Hence the two young Athelings grew up to manhood abroad, and learnt to prefer the Norman-French customs and life to those of England. It is uncertain whether Edward any share in the invasion of England that led to Alfred's death in 1036; but Robert the Devil seems to have made at least one effort for the restoration of his cousins a few years before this date. When Hardicanute (Harthacnut) succeeded his brother Harold, it was not long before he invited his half-brother Edward to return home, and thus be at hand to assume the throne should any misfortune happen to himself (1041). Accordingly, in the words of the Chronicle, on Hardicanute's death, in June, 1042, "all folk chose Edward, and received him for king," though the coronation did not take place at Winchester till Easter next year. There seems to have been some opposition to Edward's succession—one party preferring the claims of a Danish pretender, Sweyn Estrithson, Canute's nephew—but the eloquence of Bishop Lyfing and Earl Godwin carried the day in favour of Ethelred's son. A year or two later, Magnus, King of Norway and Denmark, was preparing to make good his pretensions on England, but was prevented from carrying out his project by the attack of his rivals, Harold Hardrada and Sweyn (1045). It was probably for her connection with Sweyn's party that the Witan stripped Emma of her treasures (1043); while the dangers of this Danish element led, a year or two later, to the banishment of the great Danish lords in England, Sweyn's brother Osbeorn, and Osgod Clapa (1046). From this time the new king's throno was secure.

Meanwhile, Edward had married Godwin's daughter Edith, and the power of the great earl's house was growing every day. At the time of Edward's accession there were four great earldoms, of which only one, Wessex, was in the hands of Godwin. Siward held Northumbria, Leofric Mercia, while another earl, whose name is lost, ruled . st Anglia. But in 1043 Godwin's eldest son, Sweyn, received an earldom irregularly carved out of the western parts of Mercia and Wessex, including Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Berkshire, and Somerset; about the same time his nephew, Beorn, received the earldom of the Middle Augles, and his second son, Harold, that of the East Angles (1045). But Edward could never forget the land of his early life, and was constantly bringing foreigners over to hold rule in England. His nephew, Ralph, was made Earl of Worcester and Hereford in succession. It was, however, by mani-pulating the ecclesiastical appointments that Edward found his readiest way of placing the strangers in high office. In especial, a Norman monk, Robert of Jumièges, was nominated Bishop of London (1044), and some six years later Archbishop of Canterbury (1051); while another Norman, Ulf. was made Bishop of Dorchester (1049). But all the time these and many other Norman strangers were swarming into the land, the house of Godwin was becoming more and more the centre of the national party. In 1051 things came to a climax. In this year the king, who had a few months previously rejected the choice of the Canterbury monks and Godwin for the see of Canterbury, gave the great earl still further offence by requiring him to punish the men of Dover for vengeance they had inflicted on the insolent followers of Baldwin of Flanders. This Godwin refused to do without giving the offenders fair trial. About the same time he had another charge against the king's foreign friends; for the "Welahmen," or French, had built a castle in Sweyn's earldom of Hereford, and were working all the harm they could on the people thereabouts. Godwin, being summoned to attend a meeting of the Witan at Gloucester, gathered his own men and those of his sons at Beverstone, not far from Malmesbury, while the rival hosts of Siward, Leofric, and Ralph supported the king at Gloucester. The meeting place was transferred to London, and Godwin's case was brought forward apparently before he could arrive himself. Sweyn was outlawed once more, and Godwin and Harold summoned to appear as criminals. In these circumstances flight seemed the wisest course: Harold crossed over to Dublin, and Godwin to Flanders, whence they returned next year to drive out the Norman offenders with Arch-Lishop Robert and Bishop Ulf at their head (1052). Next year, however, the great earl died, and was succeeded in his West Saxon province by his eldest living son, Harold; for Sweyn had died on his way back from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Sept., 1052). Upon this, East Anglia was given to Leofric's son Ælfgar; while about the same time Siward undertook his expedition against Macbeth, and proclaimed Malcolm King of Scots (1054). On Siward's death, next year, his earldom was given to Harold's brother Tostig. In the same month Ælfgar was banished from the kingdom, but soon returned to aid the Welsh in their foray upon Hereford. Harold was now the most prominent man in the kingdom, and to him war entrusted the task of beating back the invaders, though in the reconcilement of Gruffydd he seems to have had the co-operation of Ælfgar's father, Leofric (1056) -apparently a token of some approaches to amity between the two great rival houses. East Anglia was now given to Harold's brother Gyrth, while another brother, Leofwin, had Kent and Essex, and the other shires of south-east England. In 1062 Gruffydd of Wales once more invaded England. But Harold and Tostig united their forces for the purpose of harrying his land; the English soldiers were bidden to adopt the arms and tactics of the Welsh, and before the year 1063 was out Gruffydd was dead, and his kingdom divided between two native princes, who swore fealty to Edward. In 1065 Northumberland rose in rebellion against Tostig, and elected Leofric's grandson, Morkere, as its earl. Morkere, in combination with his brother Eadwine, who had been Earl of Mercia since about the year 1062, appeared in arms at Northampton, perhaps meditating a division of the kingdom, and certainly declaring that the Northumbrians would no longer support the tyranny of Tostig. Edward would have pushed matters to extremes, but Harold persuaded the Oxford gemot to confirm the wishes of the Northerners. Accordingly the Northumbrians were promised a renewal of Canute's laws, and Tostig was banished. This was the last important event in Edward the Confessor's reign. At the end of the year 1065 his great church of Westminster was consecrated, and on Jan. 5, 1066, the king died. Edward had no children, and for many years Harold's position in the kingdom had been such that it was scarcely possible, under all the circumstances, to elect any other successor. Pious, meditative, and given up to religious exercises, Edward, as it has been often said, was men fitted for a Norman cloister (han the English throne. His virtues earned him popular respect; but he was deficient in practical vigour, and during a large part of his reign the actual business of administration was managed by members of the house of Godwin.

Edward I., Kmc (b. 1239, s. 1272, d. 1307), was the son of Henry III. At fifteen he married Eleanor of Castile, and soon afterwards his father gave him Gascony, Ireland, Bristol, and the march between the Dee and the Conway, where he had early experience of Welsh warfare. He sided with his father at the time of the Parliament of Oxford, 1258, and was carefully watched by the barons. party calling itself the bachelorhood of England ("Communitas bachelerise totius Anglise"), which, in 1259, urged the baronial government to fulfil its promises, found a leader in Edward who acted probably in leader in Edward, who acted probably in concert with Earl Simon against the council formed at Oxford. This concert was soon broken, and Edward joined his father's side. In 1263 he seized the property of the Londoners deposited in the Temple, and seems to have been much hated throughout the kingdom. His rash pursuit of the Londoners at Lewes caused the defeat of the royal army. He was kept in a kind of captivity until he escaped (May, 1265) from Hereford. The same year he won the decisive victory of Evenham. The pacification of the country was due to his wisdom as much as to his energy. While he was active in reducing the strongholds of the Montfort party and in crushing freebooters, he successfully advocated a healing policy. In 1270 he went on the Crusade, and distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1272 he narrowly escaped assassination. That same year his father died, and Edward was at once acknowledged as king. He heard the news on his way home. He landed in England, and was crowned in 1274. Edward profited by the troubles of his father's reign. He knew the needs of his people, and set himself to meet them by good laws. He worked not only for, but with, his people, and thus was led to give to all alike their share in the work. He was valiant and prudent, and, above all, faithful to his word. From his education he had imbibed French tastes and thoughts. They encouraged his love of power. The legal turn of his mind made him take advantage of subtleties which favoured his wishes; but what he had promised he fulfilled, at least to the letter, at any cost. His kingly pride, his love of order, perhaps, too, his love for his people, caused him to strive for the supremacy of England in this island. Edward at once began to amend the evils of the civil wars. In 1275 his first Parlisment passed the First Statute of Westminster, reciting former good laws and usages; it also granted the king a payment for the export of wool and leather, the first legal origin of the customs. [Customs.] As in many cases wrongful claims were upheld by might, a commission was appointed to inquire into men's rights. When its report was made, the circuit judges were empowered to issue a writ, declaring the grounds upon which men held their lands, levied tolls, &c. Want of money caused the issue of a writ compelling all who had £20 in land to be knighted, or pay a fine. This increased the body of knights, and tended to merge the smaller feudal tenants in the great body of frecholders. Another blow was given to feudal distinctions by the Statute of Winchester. This statute re-organised the national force which had been constituted by the Assize of Arms [Henry II.], and made it a means of keeping order. The rights of the feudal lords, and of the king as chief of them, were preserved by the Statute of Mortmain (De Religiosis), which forbade grants of land to ecclesiastical bodies, for by these grants the lord was robbed of his rights. This measure was provoked by an attempt of Archbishop Peckham to extend ecclesiastical privileges. Edward, however, like Henry II., would have no such encroachments. A statute called Quia Emptores, made in 1290, which stopped a tenant from granting land, to be held of himself and not ofh' d, had the same effect as the Statute d, had the same effect as the Statute of Mortnain as regards the rights of the king and other feudal lords. Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, who had been on the side of Earl Simon, was brought to submission in 1276. His brother David was his enemy, and was favoured and rewarded by Edward. The brothers were reconciled, and in 1282 rose against the king. Llewelyn was defeated and slain. David was taken, and put to death as a traitor at Shrewsbury. By the Statute of Wales, 1284, Edward endeavoured to introduce English law and organisation into that country. The Welsh war added to the king's needs. The bulk of the revenue now came from taxes on personalty and customs. Parliamentary assemblies of different kinds were often called to make grants, until, in 1295, Edward called an assembly of the three estates of the realm, which have from that time been held necessary parts of Parliament. [PARLIAMENT; CONVOCATION.] As representatives of the freeholders, and not the lesser tenants of the crown, sat as the third estate, Parliament expresses the success of the policy of Edward, which Dr. Stubbe has defined as "the elimination of the doctrine of tenure from political life." To please the people, and so to gain money, Edward, in 1299, banished the Jews. [Jews.] On the failure of the heirs of William the Lion, Edward was called (1291), as overlord of Scotland, to settle the succession to the throne of that kingdom. He decided in favour of John de Baliol. Edward took the opportunity of defining and increasing the subordination of the Scotch king to the English crown. He allowed appeals to be made to his court by the Scotch barons against Baliol. This soon caused war, and in 1296 Edward conquered Scotland, deposed Baliol, and ruled the kingdom as his own, Meanwhile, Philip IV. of France fraudu-lently seized on Gascony. War followed, and the Scots looked for help from France. A constitutional crisis now occurred in England. Edward had made heavy demands on the wealth of the Church. In obedience to a bull of Boniface VIII., Archbishop Winchelsey and the clergy refused (1297) to pay any more taxes on their ecclesiastical revenue. The king, in return, put them out of the protection of the law. The merchants were angry because the king heavily taxed and seized their wool; the earls disliked the whole policy of Edward, which lessened their power; all classes were united against the royal authority. Edward commanded the Constable and Marshal to lead a force to Gascony, while he went to Flanders, and they flatly refused. The archbishop and the king were reconciled, and Edward set sail, but the attitude of affairs was so threatening that he was forced to grant the Confirmation of the Charters by which he renounced taxation, direct and indirect, without the consent of the nation. This great concession is an epoch in our constitution. Edward loyally kept his word, and by the Articles upon the Charters (1300) confirmed it afresh. Some irritation lingered in men's minds, which was especially visible at the Parliament at Lincoln (1301). In consequence of his anger at the proceedings at Lincoln, Edward, by agreement with the foreign merchants, levied some new customs, the origin of our import duties, with-out consent of the Estates. This, though quite against the spirit, was not contrary to the letter, of his promise. He also obtained from the Pope absolution from his word, but did not take advantage of it. In these two matters alone did Edward seem to deal with his people with legal subtlety.

In 1297 a revolt took place in the Lowlands under William Wallace, who defeated the English near Stirling. The revolt was crushed the next year by the defeat of Wallace at Falkirk. The war, however, lingered on until 1304. Meanwhile, peace was made with France, and Edward married Margaret, sister of Philip. In 1305 Wallace was taken, and put to death. Edward now fully annexed Scotland, and designed that it should send representatives to the English Parliament. But in 1306, Robert Bruce, grandson of one of the claimants in 1291, who up to this time had adhered to Edward, revolted, killed the regent Comyn, and was crowned king at Scone. Bruce was defeated by the Earl of Pembroke, but still remained unconquered. Edward marched northwards against him, and on his march, died at Burgh-by-Sands, in 1307, in his sixty-ninth year. The perfection of the Parliamentary system, the organisation of the law courts, the great statutes which he caused to be made, and the general progress of the constitution, mark the reign as of the first importance. They were the fruit of the wisdom, the legal genius, the patriotism, and the good faith of the "greatest of the Plantagenets," as Edward in the patriotism and deservedly styled.

Edward II., Kmg (b. 1284, s. 1307, d. 1327) was the fourth son of Edward I. and Eleanor of Castile, but the death of his three elder brothers made him heir to the throne when an infant. He received the title of Prince of Wales in 1301. In 1297 he was appointed regent in his father's absence, and in this capacity signed the Confirmatio Cartarum. In 1306 he was solemnly knighted by his father, whom he accompanied on his expedition to Scotland. During this expedition Edward I. died, having on his death-bed entreated his son not to recall Piers Gaveston, his comrade and favourite, who had just been banished, and to continue the war against the Scots. Both these requests, or injunctions, were disregarded; the Scotch expedition was abandoned, and Gaveston was not only recalled, but created Earl of Cornwall, and during the king's absence in France made "custos" of the kingdom. From this date till 1312 the barons were struggling against the favourite and the king's misgovernment. In 1311 Edward consented to certain "Ordinances," which practically put the royal power into commission, and in 1312 Gaveston was seized by the barons, and put to death. The revolution threw all power into the hands of Thomas of Lancaster and his confederates, who appointed ministers and settled the royal revenue without consulting the hing. The defeat at Bannockburn in 1314 destroyed what little infinence Edward possessed, and till 1321 Lancaster was supreme. In this year Edward got a new favourite in the person of Hugh le Despencer, and the highhanded conduct of Lancaster alienated many of the barons from him, so that in 1322 the king was able to get together a sufficient force to defeat him. Lancaster was at once beheaded, the Ordinances of 1311 were repealed, and the baronial party for the time crushed. The latter part of the reign is obscure. It would seem that the queen was jealous of the power of the Despencers; at all events, she intrigued with Roger Mortimer, now the leader of the barons, against her husband. She had been sent over to France to arrange a dispute between her husband and her brother, and being followed by Mortimer her brother, and being followed by Mortimer and others, she collected troops, and landed in Magland, where she was joined by many of the barons. The Despencers were executed and the king himself taken prisoner, and shortly afterwards compelled to abdicate. The fate of Edward is somewhat doubtful, the state of Edward is somewhat doubtful, though it is generally accepted that he was secretly murdered in Berkeley Castle on Sept. 31, 1307. The character of Edward il. was singularly despicable. He was devoid of selfcontrol, firmness, and dignity, and spent his time in the society of favourites and parasites. His reign is a miserable one; defeat and disgrace abroad, treachery and misgovernment at home: nowhore can we find conduct that is praiseworthy. people, contrasting the irresolute and weak-minded king with his noble and brave father, were led to believe that he was no true son of Edward I., but a changeling, and not a voice was raised against his deposition. Edward II. was the weakest of the Plantagenets, and showed little of the vigour and capacity for government which distinguished most of his family. "He had never," says. Dr. Stubbs, "shown himself sensible of the dignity and importance, much less of the responsibility, of kingship." By his marriage with Isabella of France he had two sons, Edward and John, and two daughters, Eleanor and Joan.

Edward III., King (b. Nov. 13, 1312, s. Feb. 1, 1327, d. June 21, 1377), son of Edward II., was born at Windsor. On the deposition of his father the young prince was appointed guardian of the kingdom (Oct. 1326), and crowned early the following year. During his minority the government was entrusted to a council of regency, of which Henry of Lancaster was the chief. The administration, however, was really usurped by Queen Isabella and her favourite, Roger Mortimer. But the latter was unpopular with the baronage, and had incurred general dislike by the treaty negotiated with the Scots in 1328, by which the independence of Scotland was recognised. In 1330 the king, who deeply resented Mortimer's arrogance, found ne difficulty in forming a powerful combination against the favourite. Mortimer was accordingly seized at Nottingham, taken to the Tower (Oct. 1330), and executed a month afterwards; while the queen mother was imprisoned at Castle Rising, where she passed the remainder of her life. Henceforward the government was in Edward's own hands. He immediately renewed the English attempts on Scotland, assisted Edward Baliol in his endeavour to drive out the Bruce dynasty in 1332, and invaded Scotland in 1333. In July of this year he inflicted a great defeat on the Scots at Halidon Hill; reduced the south of Scotland to submission, and caused Baliol to be proclaimed king of the portion beyond the Forth. The country, however, was far from subdued, and Edward's nominee, Baliol, was driven from his throne, and obliged to quit the country till restored by the English. In 1336 Edward again led a great expedition into Scotland, and ravaged all the south-east of the country. Mean-while difficulties with France were arising chiefly because of the disputes between Philip of Valois and the Flemings, the interruption to the Anglo-Flemish trade, and the aggression of Philip on Aquitaino. In 1338 (July) Edward went to Flanders, engaged in an alliance with the popular chiefs who were opposed to their count, and concluded a league with the Emperor Louis V., who appointed him Vicar-General of the Empire. In the following year Edward advanced into France, but the French retreated before him. In 1340 the English fleet, commanded by the king, won a great naval battle over the French at Sluys, after which the army landed and laid siege to Tournay. A truce was concluded for nine months and Edward suddenly returned to England to effect an administrative revolution by displacing the Chancellor and Treasurer, and imprisoning several of the judges, under the impression that the cor-ruption of the chief officials of the government had prevented his receiving the proper return from the taxes. Mistrusting clerical influence, Edward appointed a layman, Sir Robert Bourchier, Chancellor. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Stratford, came forward as the champion of constitutional liberties, and after a violent dispute, Edward summoned a Parliament, and in return for large grants agreed to confirm the privileges of the barons and clergy. In Oct., 1341, however, the king revoked the statute, confessing that "he had dissembled as he ought" owing to the pressure put upon him. He did not renew his operations in France till 1342, when he again led an expedition against France. Nothing effectual, however, was done till 1346, when Edward landed at La Hogue, in Normandy, intending to join the Fiemings. But the French king, with a large army, was between him and Flanders on the right bank of the Seine. By a feint upon l'aris Edward crossed the river, and advanced towards the Somme, which he also crossed near Abbeville, and then won the great victory of Crecy (Aug. 6, 1346). Advancing to Calais Edward blockaded the town, and captured it after a twelvemonth's siege. The exhaustion of his own kingdom was so great that the king was unable to follow up these successes, and returned to England after concluding a truce, which was renewed from time to time. The war began afresh in 1355. The king himself led an army from Calais but effected nothing, and was obliged to return home to repel a Scottish raid. He advanced into Scotland, laying waste the border districts with great cruelty. In France the campaign of the Black Prince in the south-west was signalised by the splendid victory of Poictiers, and the capture of the French king, John (Sept. 19, 1356). During the truce that followed, the Scotlish king, David, taken prisoner at Neville's Cross (Oct. 17, 1346), was released, and peace was made with Scotland. In 1359 Edward again invaded France, and laid waste Champagne. In 1360 (May 8) peace was made at Bretigny, and the English obtained Gasceny and Guienne, with the counties of Saintonge, Perigord, Limoges, Cahors, besides Calais, and a sum of three million marks as ransom for the French king. The treaty, however, was not carried out, and the war continued at first in Britanny, and afterwards in the south, where Aquitaine and Guienne were gradually recovered by the French, so that at the end of Edward's reign little remained of all his conquests but Calais and Bordeaux.

The later years of Edward's reign were passed in a state of partial retirement from public affairs. Old before his time, and worn out by the fatigues of his toilsome career, Edward resigned himself to the influence of his mistress, Alice Perrers, and allowed the government to be largely carried on by John government to be largely carried on by John of Gaunt. Of the struggles between the baronial and clerical parties, and between the reforming party in the Good Parliament, who looked to the Black Prince, and the Lancastrians, the king was an almost passive spectator. In 1376 Edward the Black Prince died, and the king was called upon by the Parliament to take action against rangl and Parliament to take action against papal and clerical encroachments. This, however, he refused to do. The following year saw the influence of the Lancastrians restored, and a Parliament elected under their influence, which reversed all the measures of the Good Parliament. In 1377 the old king, who had now lost all consideration and influence, died almost alone, having been deserted by nearly all his relatives and attendants before his death. The splendid military exploits of Edward's reign in later times threw a false glamour round his reign. But though military glory was the ambition of his life, there is little reason to credit him with much skill as a general. His successes were due to the splendid fighting material at his command rather than to his strategical or tactical ability. Nor can he be said to merit the name of statesman. He was neither great as an administrator nor a legis-lator. His financial management was so bad that he was constantly overwhelmed by debt, his conquests were transient and ill-conceived; and he altogether failed to realise the gravity of the constitutional and social crisis which was coming to a head in his reign. And though anxious to shine as the ideal champion of chivalry, he was both cruel and treacherous.

Edward IV. (5. Sept., 1442, s. June 29, 1461, d. Ap. 9, 1483), the son of Richard, Duke of York, and Cicely Neville, sister of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, was born in the castle of Rouen, when his father was Governor of France. He was brought up by Sir Richard Crofte, in the castle of Ludlow. When the Duke of York advanced his claim to the crown in 1460, the young Earl of March was sent to gather troops on the Welsh borders. There he heard the news of his father's defeat and death at Wakefield on Dec. 21. He hastened northwards, but was pursued by Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, on whom he turned, and inflicted a crushing defeat at Mortimer's Cross, near Wigmore, on Feb. 2, 1461. The advance of Queen Margaret's lawless northern troops excited the fear of the Londoners. Edward, therefore, on marching to London, was hailed as king on March 4. Joined by his cousin Richard, Earl of Warwick, he hastened northwards, and met the Lancastrian army at Towton, where he won a bloody battle on March 29. He returned to London, and was crowned on June 29. The Parliament, which met in November, recognised Edward IV. as succeeding to the rights of Richard II., and attainted Henry VI. of high treason. The youth, the handsome appearance, the geniality, and the practical vigour of Edward IV. made him at once popular, and gave every expectation of a prosperous reign. Queen Margaret, with foreign help, still held out in Northumberland; but the victories of Hedgeley Moor and Hexham in 1464, and the capture of Henry VI. in 1465, seemed to secure Edward IV. on the throne, and the Commons recognised the fact by granting him tunnage and poundage for life. But the young king imperilled his position by an imprudent marriage with the Lady Elizabeth Grey of Groby, the widowed daughter of a Lancastrian baron, Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, who had married Jacquetta of Luxemburg, widow of his former master, the Duke of Bedford. This marriage displeased the Earl of Warwick and the Nevilles, who had planned a Burgundian or French alliance, which would have secured Edward IV.'s throne from foreign attacks in aid of the Lancastrians. The marriage was celebrated secretly in May, 1464, and was not declared till Sept. 29. Soon Edward IV. showed an intention of raising his wife's relations to power as a counterpoise to the Nevilles, who tried to keep him dependent on themselves. The breach between the king and the Earl of Warwick rapidly widened, and in 1467 there was an open rupture. Warwick wished for an alliance with France, but Edward IV. turned to Burgundy, and promised the hand of his sister Margaret to the young Duke Charles the Bold. The king's brother, the Duke of Clarence, followed the usual policy of the hoir presumptive, and sided with Warwick. The hopes of the Lancastrians revived. Edward IV.'s popularity had gone, and in 1469 there was a rising in the north of discontented peasantry, led by "Robin of Redesdale." The Duke of Clarence declared his alliance with the Earl of Warwick by marrying his daughter Imbella. Warwick and Clarence joined the malcontent Commons in pressing for reforms. Edward IV. was unprepared for resistance, and was made prisoner by Archbishop Neville. But Warwick asw that a division between the Yorkists meant the success of the Lancastrians. Edward IV. was released, and a pacification was made. In March, 1470, there was a rising in Lincolnshire, headed by Sir Robert Wolls, which Edward IV. put down with promptitude and sternness. At the same time he gained proofs that Warwick and Clarence were plotting against him. They fled to France, and entered into negotiations with Queen Margaret. Edward IV. showed unexpected carelessness, and when, in Sept., 1470, Warwick landed in England, Edward IV. was not prepared to meet him. Finding himself deserted on every side, he fled to Flanders, and a Lancastrian restoration was easily accomplished. Gathering a few troops, Edward IV. landed on March 14, 1471, at Ravenspur, where Henry of Lancaster had landed in 1399. Like him, he declared at first that he had only come to claim his ancestral possessions, the duchy of York. Soon he was proclaimed king, and pressed on to Coventry, where Warwick was stationed. Warwick, advised by Clarence to await his arrival with reinforcements, refused to give battle. Clarence betrayed his father-in-law and oined his brother, who hastened to Lon-

Warwick pursued, and a bloody battle was fought at Barnet on Easter Day (April 14, 1471), in which Warwick was slain. The victorious king then turned against Queen Margaret, who had landed at Weymouth. He overtook her forces at Tewkesbury, where he again conquered on May 4th, and treated his captives with ruthless severity. On May 21st Edward IV. returned in triumph to London, and on the same night Henry VI. died in the Tower. Edward IV. was now rid of his enemies. The Lancastrian claimants were destroyed, the powerful nobles had fallen.

Edward IV. was secure upon the throne, the people were weary of war, and there was no one to oppose the will of the king. Edward IV. used his victory as a means of extortion. He gathered large sums of money, and his obsequious Parliament granted him large supplies. He obtained money by benevolences, and was a skilful beggar. One day he called on a rich widow, who gave him £20 for his pretty face, and doubled the sum when he gave her a kiss. The professed object for which he gathered money was a war against France. He allied himself with Charles of Burgundy, and revived the old claim of Edward III. on the French crown. In July, 1475, he led an army to Calais. The expedition was a failure. The Duke of Burgundy was engaged elsewhere, and did not join him. He sent him a message to advance to St. Quentin; when Edward IV. arrived there, he was greeted by a fire from the walls. Indignunt at such treatment, he listened to the overtures of Louis XI., who was willing to pay u large sum for the friendship of England. The English nohles were open to the bribes of France, and a truce for seven years was concluded, on condition that Louis XI. paid 75,000 crowns, gave Edward IV. a pension of 50,000 crowns, and betrothed the Dauphin to Elward IV.'s daughter Elizabeth. The two kings met, Aug. 29th, on the bridge of Pecquigny, which was divided by a lattice-work into two halves. There the peace was sworn, and Edward IV. returned inglorious to England. Edward IV.'s policy of peace was, however, wise for England. Commerce flourished, and the king himself was a successful merchant. He was given to pleasure, and loved magnificence. His court was disturbed by the quarrels of his brothers, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester. Clarence was way-ward, and at last Edward IV. resolved to rid himself of his troublesome hrother. Before a Parliament, which was summoned in 1478, Edward IV. accused Clarence of many offences, chiefly of plotting with the Lancastrians in 1470. Clarence was attainted, and met his death in the Tower. For the next five years there was no Parliament. Edward IV. preferred to raise money by stretching his pre-rogative to the utmost. The disturbed state of Scotland under James III. gave Edward IV. some hope of extending his power in that direction, and the Duke of Gloucester was sent with an army to help the Duke of Albany against the Scottish king. No permanent result was gained. Nor was Edward IV. more successful in his scheme for founding a strong dynasty by means of family alliances. He projected marriages for his daughters, hut they all failed. Louis XI. of France did not abide by the Peace of Pecquigny, but in 1483 contracted the Dauphin to Margaret of Anstria, rejecting the marriage with Elizabeth of England. Edward IV. was stung by the feeling that he was regarded as an upstart by the courts of Europe. He showed signs of again reviving his military schemes, but was seized hy an illness, the result of evil living, and died on April 9, 1483, in his forty-first year. He was a favourer of learned men, cultivated, and magnificent. His personal qualities made him popular to the end. But he was cruel, extertionate, and profligate. The death of Clarence shows that he was without natural feeling, and had all the cold-heartedness of a selfish libertine. In the wickedness of his private character he is rivalled only by John amongst the kings of England.

Edward V., Kino (b. Nov. 4, 1470, r. April 9—June 22, 1483, d. 1483), the eldoat son of Edward IV., was created Prince of Wales in 1471, and in 1479 Earl of l'emthe Welsh Marches, being under the guardianship of his uncle, Earl Rivers, and uttended hy other members of the Woodville party. He was at Ludlow when his father died, and almost immediately set out for London. On April 29 he reached Stony Stratford, where he was met the next day by the Duke of Gloucester, who had arrested Lord Rivers and Lord Richard Grey at Northampton. The king renewed his journey under Gloucester's charge, and reached London on May 4. The Council seems to have already recognised Richard as Protector, and the coronation was fixed for June 22. The young king was lodged in the Tower, his mother having taken sanctuary at Westminster on hearing of the arrest of Rivers and Grey. On June 13 Hastings was arrested and executed, and about the same time Rivers and Grey were beheaded at Pontefract, whither they had been taken by Richard's orders. Shortly after this the queen was compelled to deliver up the young Duke of York to Richard, who sent him to join his hrother in the Tower. The king's deposition seems now to have been determined upon. On June 22, Dr. Shaw, hrother of the Lord Mayor, delivered a sermon at Paul's Cross, in which he insisted that Edward V. and his brother were illegitimate, Edward IV. having been married, or at all events betrothed, to Lady Eleanor Butler previously to his marriage with Elizabeth Woodville. On the 25th a deputation of nobles and citizens of London waited on Richard, offering him the crown, which he accepted, and the next day began to reign as Richard III. Meanwhile, the two young princes remained in the Tower, where, at some time between June and October, they were certainly put to death by their uncle's The mystery in which this crime orders. was involved has led many viters to doubt whether the murder actually took place, but it must be remembered that even on the supposition that Richard, Duke of York, escaped, Edward must have been murdered, and it would have been the height of folly for Richard III. to have put one of his nophews to death and allowed the other to escape. Nor are the murderers likely to have done their work so badly as to have suffered the escape of a boy, who, even if not taken by surprise, would have been utterly unable to resist them. Mr. Gairdner, who has thoroughly investigated the whole circumstances of the case, suins up the details of the murder thus: "Some time after Richard had set out on his progress (August, 1483), he sent a mes-senger named John Green to Sir Robert Brackenbury, the Constable of the Tower, commanding him to put his two young nephews to death. This order Brackenbury would not obey, and Green returned to his master at Warwick. Richard was greatly mortified, but sent one Sir James Tyrell to London, with a warrant to Brackenbury to deliver up to him for one night all the keys of the Tower. Tyrell thus took the place into his keeping, and engaged the services of Miles Forest, one of those who kept the prince's chamber, and John Dighton, his own groom, to carry out the wishes of the tyrant. These men entered the chamber when the two unfortunate lads were ssleep, and smothered them under pillows; then having called Sir James to see the bodies, buried them at the foot of a staircase." The details of the murder were obtained from a confession made by Sir James Tyrell in 1502, when he was imprisoned in the Toweron a charge of treason, and there is no reason for doubting its substantial accuracy; in addition to which, the story was corroborated by a discovery made in the reign of Charles II., when, under the staircase leading to the chapel in the White Tower, the skeletons of two young lads, whose apparent ages agreed with those of the unfortunate princes, were found buried.

Edward VI. (b. Oct. 12, 1537, s. Jan. 28, 1547, d. June 21, 1553), was the son of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour, and was born at Hampton Court. He was carefully educated under the attention of reforming divines, and became a sealous adherent of the new views of religion. By the will of Henry VIII. he succeeded to the throne under the regency of a council of sixteen members, most of whom were Reformers; and, in defiance of the will, the king's uncle, Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, afterwards Duke of Somerset, obtained for himself the title of Protector, with the practical control of the government. In religious matters the young king was willing to second the reforming projects of Cranmer, and willingly assented to the publication of the new Liturgy in the Prayer Book of 1549, and the Act of Uniformity. As early as 1542 a plan had been set on foot for the marriage of Edward with the Infant Princess Mary of Scotland; and it was partly in order to force this marriage upon the Scots that Somorset undertook the expedition in 1549, which cul-minated in the fruitless victory of Pinkie. The ill-success of Somerset's policy, both in home and foreign affairs, brought about his fall. The king, who had chafed at the studious and retired life to which the Protector compelled him, easily yielded to the influence of the Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and was probably no unwilling actor in the series of events which established the latter's ascendency. Edward, though, as his literary remains show, he now took a lively interest in public affairs, was still studious and much interested in religious matters. In 1552 Cranmer issued a revised Liturgy, known as the Second Prayer Book of King Edward VI., and the Forty-two Articles, which were of a thoroughly Protestant tendency. [ARTICLES.] Meanwhile Edward's health was failing. He was always delicate, and his health, it is said, had been greatly injured by Warwick's removal of him to Windsor in 1550. Convinced of the necessity of preserving the Protestant settlement, he allowed himself to be persuaded by North-umberland to alter the settlement of the crown as arranged in Henry VIII.'s will, and to make a will excluding Mary and Elizabeth from the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey, the daughter of Henry's niece, Frances, Counters of Suffolk, and daughter-in-law of Northumberland, which was subscribed by the Privy Council, June 21, 1553. Then Edward failed rapidly, and on July 6 died, Northumberland being supposed by many people to have hastened the end by poison. There is, however, no authentic evidence to confirm the suspicion. Edward would seem to have had much of the Tudor talent and some of the Tudor vices. His abilities were considerable. He was an accomplished scholar for his age, and his writings show a sagacity altogether beyond his years, and giving great promise for the future.

Edward VII. (b. Nov. 9, 1841, s. Jan. 22, 1901, d. May 6, 1910), eldest son of the late Queen Victoria. Educated at both Oxford and Cambridge, he visited Italy in 1859, America in 1860, Germany in 1861, Turkey and Egypt in 1862, and the Emperor of the French at Fontainebleau in the same year. In 1871 his life was imperilled by an attack of typhoid fever, and his recovery, in February, 1872, was celebrated by a National Thanksgiving Feetival. Between Nov. 8, 1875, and March 13, 1876, he was visiting India. He married, March 10, 1863, Alexandra, daughter of Christiau IX., King of Denmark. His eldest zon, the Duke of Clarence, died Jan. 14, 1892, at the early age of 28. His being the second son, the present King George V.—

(b. 1865) married Princess Victoria Mary of Teck, in 1893. Their eldest son, Edward Albert, Duke of Cornwall, was born in 1894. King Elward visited Berlin in 1885, on the occasion of the eighty-eighth birthday of the Emperor William I. 1886 he proposed the foundation of the Indian and Colonial Institute, as a fitting memorial of Queen Victoria's Jubilee. In 1888 he was again in Berlin, as a guest at the marriage of Prince Henry of Prussia. Next year his eldest daughter, Princess Louise of Wales, was married to the Duke of Fife. In 1894 he went to Russia, in company with Queen Alexandra, being summoned to the deathbed of the Emperor Alexander III. In 1896 his second daughter, Princess Maud of Wales, was married to Prince Charles of Denmark. In 1897 he inaugurated "The Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund," in commemoration of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee. In 1898, while visiting Baron F. de Rothschild at Waddesdon Manor, he fractured his knee-cap. On April 4, 1900, at the height of the anti-Br tish feeling excited on the Continent by the Boer War, an attempt was made upon his life in the Brussels Railway Station.

He succeeded to the throne on the death of Queen Victoria, Jan. 22, 1901. His legal title differed in important particulars from that of any of his predecessors, and for that reason is noted hereunder. He reigned as "Edward VII., by the grace of Gol of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." June, 1902, King Edward's Coronation had to be postponed nearly at the last minute owing to his seizure by serious illness, which necessitated a surgical operation. The operation was performed with success, and the Coronation took place on August 9, amid all possible signs of enthusiasm. The King commemorated the event by presenting Osborne House to the nation. In 1903 the King paid important visits to several Continental States, to Pertugal and Italy in April, to France in May, and to Austria in August; President Loubet in July, and the King and Queen of Italy in November, returned these visits. The interchange of courtesies between the King and President Loubet was happily symptomatic of improved relations between Great Britain and France, evidence of which has been afforded by the Anglo-French Agreement (April, 1904). During 1903 the King also visited Scotland and Ireland. In 1904 tha King paid another visit to Ireland, and the same year he was entertained by the German Emperor during the progress of the Kiei Regatta. In 1905 the King again met President Loubet in France. In 1908 the King exchanged visits with the Frer h President, M. Fallières, and afterwards dined at the English Embassy in Paris. Later in the same year he paid a much discussed visit to the Czar of Russia, and in 1909 entertained the Czar in England. In 1900 also (November) he received the young King Manuel of Portugal. In March, 1910, the King stopped at l'aris en route for Biarrits, and exchanged visits with the French President. Whilst at Biarritz he caught a slight cold, but on his return to London, April 27, he seemed to have quite recovered. On May 5, it was announced from Buckingham Palace that the King had for two days been suffering from bronchiti and on May 6 he died.

Edward THE ATHELING (d. 1057) was the son of Edmund Ironside, and on the death of his father, in 1017, he was sent first to Sweden, and afterwards to Hungary. Here he lived under the protection of King Stephen, whose niece, Agatha, he married. In 1055 Edward the Confessor sent for him as being the nearest heir to the throne, and Edward came to England in 1057, but died about three children—Edgar the Atheling, Margaret, and Christina.

Edward the Black Prince (b. 1330, ... 1376) was the eldest son of Edward III. and of Philippa, and was born at Woodstock, June 15, 1330. He was created Duke of Cornwall in 1337, and Prince of Wales in 1343. When only sixteen years of age he was in nominal command of one of the divisions of the English army at Crecy, and throughout the French wars he played an important part. In 1355 he commanded the army which invaded south-eastern France. The next year, marching northwards, he met and defeated the army of King John (Poictiers, Sept. 19, 1356). In 1361 he married Joan. the "Fair Maid of Kent," and in 1362 was created Duke of Aquitaine, and received as his patrimony the possessions of the English crown in the south of France, the government of which he assumed in 1363. In 1367 he undertook an expedition into Spain, to assist Don Pedro of Castile in regaining the throne of which he had been deprived by Henry of Trastamare, aided by the French. Assisted by a large body of the Free Companies, he crossed the Pyrenees at the head of 30,000 men, and at Navarrete the Hisck Prince won the third of his great victo ies, and completely de-feated Pedro's rival, Prince Henry, with his French allies under Du Gueselin. But the prince's army rapidly wasted away by sickness, and with his own health fatally impaired, he was compelled to recross the Pyrenees. On the breaking out of war once more between England and Franco in 1369, Edward took Limoges by storm, and mercllessly put to death all the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex. In 1371 he returned to England, and began to take a prominent part in English politics as the champion of the constitutional policy against the corrupt court and Lancastrian party. He tooka large share in originating the measures of the "Good Parliament" of 1376, though by his death (June 8 of that year) the work was to a great extent undone. The prince was a gallant soldier, but his victories were probably due to the great superiority of his troops over the enemy rather than to his own generalship. Though full of the spurious knight-errantry of the day, he was mercilessly cruel in his campaigns. But in his later years he showed some understanding of the political difficulties in England, and was very popular with the Commons.

Edward, son of Henry VI. (b. 1453, d. 1471), was the only child of the king by Margaret of Anjou. In 1454 he was created Prince of Wales; the Yorkists asserting that he was either a bastard or a changeling. After the battle of Towton, he accompanied his mother to Scotland. In 1470 ite married Anne Neville, daughter of the Earl of Warwick. In 1471 he fell in the battle of Tewkesbury, or was put to death and deately afterwards; but the story that were stabled by Richard of Gloucester rests on no good authority.

Edward, son of Richard III. (b. 1473, d. 1484), was the only child of this king and Anne Nevillo. In 1477 he was created Earl of Salisbury, and in 1483 Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, and appointed Lord-Lieu want of Ireland. In February, 1884, the n. abers of the two houses of Parliament took an eath to support his succession to the throne, but two months afterwards he died.

Edwin (EADWINE), King of Northumbria 616—633), was the son of Ella, King of Doira. Having been exiled by Ethelfrith he took efuge with Redwald of East Anglia. After the death of Ethelfrith, he obtained possession of the two kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia, the sons of Ethelfrith having fled to Scotland. He conquered the little British kingdom of Elmet, obtained suzerainty over Man and Anglesey, extended his kingdom to the Firth of Forth, and founded Edinburgh, which derives its name from him. His most powerful rival was Cwichelin of Wessex, who attempted his assassination. This project falled, and Edwin defeated him in 626; but l'enda having made Mercia independent of Northumbria, in alliance with the British prince Caedwalla, defeated and alew Edwin at Heathfield in 633. Edwin's reign is chiefly important for the conversion of Northumbria to Christianity. His second wife was Ethelburh, daughter of Ethelbert of Kent, who brought with her Paulinus the bishop, and their influence, aided by Edwin's escape from assassination and his victory over the West Saxons, was the means of his conversion. He was baptised at York by Paulinus, who was made the first archbishop of that see. So great was the peace and tranquillity of Northumbria under Edwin, that it was said that a woman with her new-born babe might have travelled from sea to sea without sustaining injury.

Bode, Ecclesiastical History.

Edwy (Eapwio), Kino (955-959), was the son of Edmund, and succeeded to the throne on the death of his uncle, Edred. The account of his reign in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle la extremely meagre, and subsequent writers who attempt to supply details evidently write with strong prejudice. What we can gather for certain is that his brother Edgar was appointed sub-king of Northumbria and Mercia; that ln 957 he made himself practically independent of Edwy; that he was the enemy of Dunstan, and the vigorous opponent of his policy, and that of the ecclesiastical reformers. His marriage with Elgiva was uncanonical, and seems to have occasioned general discoutent. In 958 Odo, the archbishep, divorced them, and the next year Edwy died-whether murdered or not it is impossible to decide. Ethelward tells us that "he was called by the common people the second Pankalus, meaning all-beautiful," and that he was "much beloved." On the other hand, John of Wallingford, a thirteenth century chronicler, says of Edwy: "He loved the peace of this world, which panders to all vices, and is the mere ape of virtue, and to it he limited his tastes. For he was given to the pleasures of the flesh, was negligent, loved only those who favoured his excesses, and hated the good." This is a fair specimen of the way he is spoken of by the monkish historians, who, having taken Dunstan as their hero, naturally regarded Edwy as the type of all that is bad; the king evidently opposed "the policy which strove everywhere to substitute monks for secular canons." [DUNSTAN.]

Angle-Seron Chron.

Egbert, King of the West Saxons (800 836), was born about 776. On the death of Cynewulf, he laid claim to the throne, but Brihtic was elected, and he fied to Offa, King of Mercia. Thither the vengeance of his rival fellowed him, and he took refuge at the court of Charles the Great. A close friendship arose between the twe, and Egbert modelled his career on that of his benefactor. In the year that Charles was crowned Emperor at Rome, Egbert, in his absence, was elected, on the death of Brihtic, to the throne of Wessex. He returned to England, and at once set himself to win for himself a superiority over the island, as Charles had established a dominion on the Continent. The greater part of his reign was spent in a struggle with Mereia, a contest which began before his return to assume the crown, and culminated in a great victory over Beornwulf at Ellandune (823), after which he annexed the little kingdoms which had become Mercian dependencies, and four years later the great kingdom itself was reduced. The smaller kingdoms of East Anglia, Kent, Essex, and Sussex had previously submitted to him without a blow, and shortly afterwards Northumbria, a prey to internal dissensions, owned his overlordship. Having thus founded the Kingdom of England, Egbert set himself to reduce tho Welsh, and was as successful as he had previously been ovor the Celtic inhabitants of Cornwall. Over the Celts nerth of the Dee, however, his power did not prevail. In this year he assumed the title of Rex Anglorum, but he never, libe Charles, ventured to aspire to Imperial honours. Towards the end of Egbert's reign an old enemy, the Danes, began to re-appear. In 835 he won over them and the Cornish Welsh a great battle at Hengestesdun, which for the time checked their invasions. Almost uniformly successful in war, Egbert displayed a wise moderation in confining his efforts to the acquisition of a great independent monarchy.

Egfred (ECOFRITH), King of Northnmbria (670-685), was the son and successor of Oswy. The chief interest of his reign lies in his relations with St. Wilfred (1.v.). He was defeated by Ethelfred, and compelled to restore Lindsey. He undertook an expedition against Ireland, and after having conquered Cumberland, was slain by the Picts at the battle of Nectansmere (685).

Egypt, Relations with. The series of events which issued in the establishment of a British Protectorate over this part of the dominions of the Sultan of Terkey may be said to have begun with the sale to Great Britain by the Khedive Ismail, in 1875, of 177,000 shares in the Suez Canal for £4,000,000. An inquiry into the finances of the country consequent npon this transaction showed that they were deeply involved, and a dual English and French control was created. In 1882 the English and French war-ships were sent to Alexandria to everawe Arabi Pasha, who had defied Ismail's successor, Tewfik, and on the 11th of July, the French vessels having been withdrawn, the British Admiral bombarded and then occupied the city. Shortly afterwards Arabi was defeated at Tel-el-Kebir and deported to Ceylon, and since then Egypt has been governed under British supervision—an arrangement which has led to much friction with France. [Gordon, Chas. G.; SOUDAN.]

Eldon, John Scott, 1st Earl (b. 1751, d. 1838), was born of humble parents at Newcastle-on-Tyne. At school he evinced such remarkable ability as to awaken the interest of a wealthy neighbour, who assisted in sending him to Oxford. He obtained a fellowship at University College, and was called to the bar in 1776. He rose rapidly, and was assisted by the friendship of Lord Thurlow. In Parliament he warmly opposed Fex's East India Bill, and on Pitt's accession to office, gave him really important support. In 1788 his services were rewarded by his appointment as Solicitor-General. In 1793 he became Attorney-General, and in that office he found ample employment in the prosecutious which were shortly afterwards instituted against Horne Tooke and other supposed revolutionary characters. In 1799 he succeeded Eyre as Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Eldon. When Pitt two years afterwards, resigned on the Catholic Question, Lord Elden accepted the Great Seal at the king's express desire, and while holding that office he gained the entire confidence of George III. On the accession to power of Fox and Lord Grenville he resigned, but again became Lord Chancellor in 1807. For the next twenty years he remained in uninterrupted possession of the woolsack. He warmly took the part of the Duke of York in 1809, and vigorously opposed alike any relaxation in the severities of the penal code and any concessions to the Roman Cathelies. On the question of Regency, in 181!, Lord Eldon incurred very warm censure from Lord Grey, for having on several occa-sions forged the king's signature, when the king was himself incapable of signing his name. On the Prince of Wales becoming Regent, Lord Eldon soon ingratiated himself with his new master by taking a very decided part against the Princess Caroline. In 1814 he became an object for the vengeance of the meb in the Corn Law Riets. As the outcry for Catholic Emancipation became stronger, he mere strongly than ever opposed the measure; and when Canning became Prime Minister (1827) he resigned the seal to Lord Lyndhurst. He never held office again. though to the very last he continued to oppose the measures of the Whigs. As a judge, Lord Elden holds high rank, and contributed much towards making our system of equity into a perfect whole. Sir II. Maine calls him

"the first of our equity judges who, instead of enlarging the jurisprudence of his court by indirect legislation, devoted hinself through life to explaining and harmonising it." His great fault was his hesitation in deciding cases, the result being an enormous increase in the cost of litigation, and a general feeling among the public that Chancery proceedings were interminable. But the country owes a debt of gratitude to him for having instituted the office of Vice-Chancellor, and thus relieving the stagnation on the Chancery side.

Eleanor of Aquitaine (b. 1122, d. 1204) was the daughter of William, Count of Poitou, and heiress not merely to that province, but also to Saintonge, Auvergne, Perigord, Angoumois, Guienne, and Gascon: In 1137 she was married to Louis VII. of France, thereby uniting the south with the north of France. With him she went on the Second Crusade, and her conduct on the expedition and subsequently was so light, that ir. 1152 she was divorced from Louis, though the nominal ground for the separation was consanguinity. In the same year she married Henry of Anjou, who, two years later, became King of England. From him she becamo gradually estranged, and in 1173 encouraged her sons to rebel against their father, for which she was seized and imprisoned, and remained ir captivity, with but short intervals, for sixteen years. On her husband's death, she was released by Riehard, and made regent of the kingdom in his absence; and during his reign she did all in her power to repress the ambition of John and thwart the designs of Philip Augustus. She collected the ransom for Richard, and herself conveyed it to Germany. At Richard's death, sho came forward again as John's chief adviser. She used her influence to exclude Arthur, and took command of the army that reduced Anjou to submission, and subsequently went to Spain to fetch her grand-daughter, Blanche of Castille. To the last moment of her life she was engaged in political affairs, and shortly before her end was striving hard to keep to their allegiance the English barons, while Philip Angustus was attacking Normandy.

Benedict of Peterborough, Chronicle (Rolls Series); Lyttelton, Life of Henry II.

Eleanor of Britanny (d. 1241) was the daughter of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Constance, Duchess of Britanny. After the death of her brother Arthur, she inherited his claim to the English crown, hut was kept a prisoner by John in Bristol Castle, where she remained for many years, till she was permitted to retire to the nunnery at Amesbury.

Eleanor of Castile (d. 1290), wife of Edward I., was the sister of Alfonso IV. of Castile. At her marriage with Edward in 1254, her brother renounced his pretensions to Gascony. She accompanied her husband on his crusade, and legend said saved his life by sucking the poison from his wound, and was crowned with him in August, 1274. Her amiable character made her greatly beloved by the people. If the least complaint of oppression came anyhow to her ears, she endeavoured to redress the wrong, and her large revenues were so administered that an oppression by her filters was possible. On her way to join her husband on his expedition to Scotland, she died at Grantham in November, 1290. Her body was conveyed to Westminster, and at each place where the funeral procession halted a richly-carved cross was erected. Thirteen in all of these crosses were raised, but only three, those at Northampton, Geddington, and Waltham, remain.

Strickland, Lives of the Queens of England.

Eleanor of Provence, Queen (d. 1291). wife of Henry III., was the daughter of Raymond Berenger, Count of Provence. The marriage of Henry and Eleanor took place in 1236, and the young queen almost immediately obtained a complete ascendency over her husband, which she used for the purpose of advancing her friends and relatives. Her uncle, Beniface of Savoy, was made Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and other important offices were conferred on the queen's nnmerous relatives, who drained the land by their rapacity and extortion. Still, the Provençal marriage was not without its good results. Provence was at this time the most cultured state in Europe; literature and the arts flourished, and the conrt was the chosen residence of the tronbadours and scholars of Some of this culture found its way into England, but it hardly compensated for the great unpopularity which this influx of foreigners brought on the king and queen. A quarrel with the citizens of London on account of a heavy duty which she insisted they should pay her as queen on all ships unladen at Queenhithe, and the rigorous exaction of "queen gold," only increased the general hatred of her. During the king's absence from England in 1253 she was appointed Keeper of the Great Seal, and actually sat as a judge in the Court of King's Bench. In 1286 the hatred of the Londoners against her culminated, and it needed a considerable military escort to conduct her in safety from the Tower to Windsor. In the Barons' War, which she more than any one had helped to bring about, she showed great determination and courage, and after the battle of Lewes had to take refuge in France. After the fall of De Montfort, she returned, and had her revenge on the citizens of London, who were fined 20,000 marks for their conduct towards her. Soon after Edward I.'s accession she retired to the convent of Amesbury, where she died in 1291.

Eleanor, daughter of King John (d. 1274), was married first to William Marshall the Younger, and in 1238, secondly, to Simon de Montfort. This latter marriage seems to have been a secret one, and quarrels soon arose between Henry and De Montfort concerning it. After the death of her husband at Evesham (1265), Eleanor retired to France and entered the nunnery of Montargis, where she remained till hor death.

Elections, PARLIAMENTARY, are held in virtuo of writs issued either by the crown for a new Parliament, or in cases of vacancy while the House is in session out of Chancery by the Speaker's warrant by order of the House. These writs are addressed to the sheriffs. Until 7 Hen. IV. the sheriff had to make the return in person in forty days. The election was made in full county court, at the next meeting of the court after the writ was received. It appears that some persons were specially summoned to the election, for at the beginning of the fifteenth century the county court was no longer generally attended by great people. Much irregularity seems to have prevailed in the election of knights of the shire during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Sometimes a crowd of the lower class attended the court; sometimes the election was made by a few great people or their stewards; sometimes it was managed by lawyers or interested persons, and often the sheriff ordered matters as he liked. To secure the return being in accordance with the election, it was ordered by 7 Hen. IV., c. 15, that it should be attested by the persons electing in an indenture attached to the writ. indenture, however, was only signed by a few of those who attended the court, and it seems that sometimes the electors chose certain of their number to exercise the common right of voting. When this was the case, the delegates signed on behalf of the whole body. Elections for cities and boroughs were formally made in the county court under the Plantagenet kings. The obligation of payment of members' wages caused the towns to be analous to escape from representation. When the electors of a borough had made their choice, it was reported to the sheriff in the court. In case they failed to elect, he caused members to be chosen from them along with the knights of the shire. The ceremony which came in later times to be called the nomination, and to be incorrectly regarded as something different to a mere preliminary of the election, was the ancient election itself in the county court. If more than one candidate was proposed, the election was decided by a show of hands. As a seat in Parliament became an object of ambition, the custom arose of taking a poll of other electors who might not at the time be present at the court. A poll was taken only when demanded, and it was at first incorrectly regarded as an act of grace on the part of sheriffs to grant the demand. There was no limit to the time during which the sheriff might keep open the court for the purpose of the poll, save the date on which the writ was returnable. Polling ir the eighteenth century sometimes lasted for & month, and in cases in which great efforts were made to secure a seat, the whole period was filled with drunkenness and riot. disgraceful scenes which marked the West-minster election, 1784, resulted in an Act, 25 Geo. III., c. 84, limiting a poll to fifteen days, and ordering that the scrutiny of votes should be closed six days before the return was made. In the ninth year of George IV. this period was shortened to nine days in the case of boroughs; by 2 Will. IV., c. 45, to two days both in borough and county elections, and by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 15, to one day in both. By 35 and 36 Viet., c. 33, the Ballot Act [BALLOT], a poll follows a disputed nomination as a matter of course, without being specially demanded. The use of voting papers in university elections, provided for by 24 and 25 Vict., c. 53, still continues.

Disputed Elections were, up to the time of Heary IV., decided by the crown. From 1410 inquiry as to the accuracy of the shcriff's return was made by the judges, the ultimate decision still remaining with the crown. Tho House gained the right of deciding these questions at the close of the sixteenth century. In 1553 a committee of the House decided against the validity of the election of Nowell, a prebendary of Westminster. It successfully upheld its right of judgment in these matters against the will of Queen Elizabeth in 1586, in the Norfolk election case, and in 1604, in the case of Sir F. Goodwin, obtained from the king the admission that it was the proper judge of returns. This jurisdiction was exercised at first by committees specially appointed, and then by the Committee of Privileges and Elections. It became the custom to admit members who were either privy concillors or barristers to this committee, though not nominated to it. From this cause the committee, by the end of the seventeenth century, was held to be open; and for the sake of orderly management these cases were soon tried at the bar of the House. Election petitions were thus decided by a trial of the strength of contending parties, without regard strength of contending parties, without regard to the facts of the case. To remedy this evil, the Grenville Act, 1770, provided for the election of a committee (by a mixed system of ballet and selection) for the adjudication of election cases. Although this Act effected an improvement in the manufact of the House it improvement in the practice of the House, it still left election questions within the area of party polities, and by allowing either party to strike out a certain number of the names chosen by ballot, to commit the decision of thes cases to the weakest men of both sides. By the Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices Act 1868, 31 and 32 Vict., c. 125, these questions were placed under the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, as far as concerns the facts of an election which has been questioned by petition. Such petition must now, by this Act, he presented to the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice, and tho corresponding courts in Scotland and Ireland. A judge of these courts tries the petition in the county or borough to which it refers. After he has heard the case, he makes a report to the Speaker as to the validity of the election, the prevalence of corrupt practices, the knowledge of the candidate concerning such practices, and the names of those who are guilty of them. The House then acts on the report in the same way as it would have acted on the report of an election committee. It has thus not surrendered its constitutional right of deciding questions involving the right to its seats; but has merely made over the investigation of some of them to a Court of Law.

Corrupt Practices at Elections.—These, besides direct bribery, include treating and undue influence of various kinds. By the Corrupt Practices Act, 1868, if the judge reports particular persons as guilty of such practices, the report is laid before the Attorney-General, who institutes a prosecution against them at his discretion, without the intervention of the House. If the report declares that such practices have extensively prevailed in a constituency, the House generally suspends the writ, and if the report is confirmed by further inquiry, disfranchises the constituency by Act of Parliament. The various acts which imply undue influence or corruption were carefully defined by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1883, and very stringent penalties enacted against principals as well as their agents found guilty of these practices. [BRINERY.] The House is very strict as regards influence, and in 1641 and 1802 made declarations to the effect that any interference in election matters by peers was a breach of privi-lege. From the scope of the latter de-claration Irish peers elected for a seat in the House are exempt. In practice, Peers take part until the writ is issued, and frequently lend conveyances for voters.] To secure the freedom of election, an Act (10 and 11 Vict., c. 21) orders that soldiers shall be restrained in barracks during the day of a poll, except for the purpose of voting or on necessary duty. Electers.—When the influence of feudalism on the constitution was destroyed, the lesser tenants-in-chief were merged in the general body of freeholders. In the Parliament of Edward I. the Commons did not consist of the lesser tenants of the crown mentioned in the Great Charter, art. 14, but of representatives elected by the freeholders in counties, by certain electors in boronghs, and by the clergy. In counties, the original clectors were those who composed the county court in which the election was held. By the end of the fourteenth century it seems that many came to, and took part in, an election who were not suitors of the court. While an Act of 1406 restrained the undue power of the sheriff in making returns, it did not give the freeholders the sole right of election. This was not secured until 1430, (8 Hen. VI., c. 7), and was then limited to a part of them. This Act declares that elections are wont to be made "by persons of small substance and no value," and limits the right of voting to resident holders of free land of the clear annual value of 40s., and two years after it was enacted that the qualifying freehold should lie within the county. By these statutes the quality of tenure, and not the quantity of interest, was regarded. For instance, a life estate in a freehold above the specified value conferred a qualification, while no estate in copyhold could do so, even though it were one of inheritance; and copyholders were expressly excluded from the fr inchise by 31 Geo. II., c. 14. The franchise in cities and boroughs before 1832 was not determined by any general statute, but by special acts, by charters, or by usage. Thus in London, the parliamentary franchise followed the municipal, and was exercised at different periods by representatives of the wards, by the common councilmen, and by the liverymen of the companies. The oxclusive policy of corporations tended to restrict the franchise in most chartered boroughs, so that ultimately a co-optative oligarchy alone had any voice in the election. In some others it had a popular character, and, in default of any contrary usage or charter, belonged to inhabitant householders, or else, as in Bristol, which was a county of itself, to the 40s. fresholders. Borough franchise, indeed, was altogether a matter of local law. The representation of the clergy was the same in extent and mode as in the election of proctors for Convocation (q.v.). University representation was established by James I., and in this case the right to vote has belonged to all who by their degree constitute the governing body of the University even though non-resident. By the Reform Act of 1832, 2 Will. IV., c. 45 [REPORM; REPRIMENTATION], the qualification was extended in counties so as to include (1) copyholds, of which persons were seised either in law or equity, either of inheritance or for life, of the clear annual value of £10. (2) Leaseholds, for the unexpired portion of a term of sixty years of the annual value of £10, or of a torm of twenty years of the annual value of £5. It also created (3) an occupation qualifi-cation for a tenant of lands, &c., at a clear rent of £50, paid yearly. While, however, it preserved the qualification conterred (4) by freeholds of inheritance, it provided that freehold estates for life, of which the annual value was less than £10, should not confer a vote, unless there was bona fide occupation, or where such freeholds had been acquired by marringe, devise, &c. As regards cities and boroughs, the Act retained some rights permanently, e.g., those of the freemen and liverymen of London, of freeholders and burgago tenants in cities which were also counties, &c. Some rights were retained tomporarily, as those of freemen and burgage tenants in boroughs, of inhabitant householders, &c., and the franchise was extended in favour of the sole occupiers of any premises of the annual value of £10. In Scotland, the county franchise was fixed (2 Will. IV., c. 65) at a £10 ownership, and included some classes of leasehold. The borough franchise included £10 householders. In Ireland at the time of the Catholic Emancipation Act, the qualification in counties was raised from a 40s. to a £10 freehold. Iu 1832 it was extended by the admission of certain leaseholds and £10 copyholds. By the Reform Act of 1867, 30 and 31 Vict., c. 102, the franchise stood thus—in counties, (1) the old 40s. freeholders in fee; (2) the holders of a life estate from 40s. to £5, if of freehold tenure and with occupation; (3) of any life estate above £5; (4) of the remainder of a lease of sixty years of the value of £5; (5) occupiers of land, &c., for twelve months, rated at not less than £12; (6) occupiers whose rent is assessed at £50. In cities and boroughs it was extended to (1) all resident householders or rated occupants of dwelling-houses, after payment of one year's rates; (2) all rated occupants of premises other than houses, of the value of £10; (3) all who have for twelve months been in the separate occupation of the same lodgings, which are, if unfurnished, of the yearly value of £10. The lodger franchise has, by 41 and 42 Vict., c. 26, been declared to include an office, studio, shop, &c. A change of apartments in the same house is not held to be a change of lodgings. In Scotland, by 31 and 32 Vict., e. 48, the franchise is granted, in counties, to a £5 ownership and a £14 occupation. A household and a lodger franchise were also fixed in boroughs. In Ireland, by 13 and 14 Vict., c. 69, an estate in fee or for life of the annual value of £5, or an occupation of the value of £12, conferred a vote for a county, and a rated occupation of £8 for a borough election. By the Irish Reform Act, 1868, a household occupation rated at £4 and a lodger franchise of £10 were created in boroughs. In 1884, Mr. Gladstone introduced a Reform Bill apply. ing to the whole of the United Kingdom, and assimilating the franchise in counties with that in boroughs. By this measure, which was fellowed in 1885 by a Redistribution Act, the franchise as granted to (1) all resident male house! ders or rated occupants of dwelling-houses; (2) lodgers; (3) certain persons not occupying separate tenements or apartments, but living in houses occupied by others, who were to vote under what was called the "service franchise. Disqualification under all the reform bills attaches to females, aliens, infants, &c., to all peers except such Irish peers as have been elected to a seat, to certain revenue officers, to those in receipt of parochial relief, and to some few others. [The disabilities of the police were removed in 1887.] Irish Catholica were admitted to the franchise in 1793, on taking the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. In 1829, Mr. Peol, among other measures of Catholic Emancipation, carried a new form of oath, by which Catholics were enabled to vote without doing violence to their convictions. And, finally, by 5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 36, all electoral oaths are done away. Every one claiming to exercise a right to vote for a member of Parliament must see that his name is registered in a list drawn up by the overseers of the parish in which his qualification lies. These lists are afterwards revised in open court by revising barristers, who decide on objections and claims. An appeal lies to the Common Pleas from the decision of these officers.

Persons Elected .- During the fourteenth century, the terms of the writs which specified the condition of men who were to be elected were constantly varied. Efforts were made to procure the election of "belted knights," or at least of squires of good position, as county members, and of men of the higher class of burgesses for borough members; and to exclude sheriffs, lawyers, and "maintainers of quarrels." It was important that the representatives of the Commons should be of a rank which would make them independent of crown influence or of private advantage. Notwithstanding these efforts, it was often found impossible to secure men of the position required by the writs. The exclusion of the clergy in 1371 was the result of special circumstances. Lawyers were several times excluded (e.g., 1402) because it was thought they took advantage of their position as members to forward the interests of their clients. By 1 Hen. V., c. 1, residence was declared a necessary qualification. This statute was, however, constantly disregarded, and is expressly repealed by 14 Geo. III., c. 58. A qualification in real estate was adopted 9 Anne, c. 5, and was fixed at £600 a year for county, and £300 for borough members. By 1 and 2 Vict., c. 48, personalty might be reckoned in making up the required sum, and now by 21 and 22 Vict., c. 26, all property qualification is abolished. Disqualification attaches to females, aliens, infants, &c., to all peers, except Irish non-representative peers, to clergy of the Church of England (by 41 Geo. III., c. 63), to Roman Catholic clergy (by 10

Geo. IV., c. 7), to sheriffs and other returning officers as regards their own sphere of office, to government contractors, bankrupts, and those convicted of felony or of corrupt practices at elections under the Acts on that subject. Persons holding certain places of profit under the erown, which do not include those of the various ministers and officials at the head of the great departments of the State, were disqualified by 6 Anne, c. 7. In most cases, pensions held during pleasure entail disqualification. The Catholic Relief Bill, 1829, admitted Roman Catholics to Parliament on taking a special oath provided for such cases. Jews were shut out from the House by the terms of the Parliamentary oath until 1858, when the oath was so altered that they were able to take, it. [Одтна.] By the 29 and 30 Vict., c. 19, religious disabilities were removed, the sole condition of admission to the House of a member not otherwise disqualified being that he take the oath prescribed by that statute. From this obligation Quakers and some other religious bedies have been exempted, and by an Act of 1888 the relief was extended to persons of no religious belief.

Eligar (Eligan), son of Leofric, was made Earl of East Anglia on the outlawry of Harold in 1051, but in the next year, Harold being restored, he lost his earldom. In 1053 he once more received the earldom. In 1055 he was banished, when he allied himself with the Welsh, but was compelled to submit by Harold, who restored him to his earldom. On the death of Leofric he was made Earl of Meroia. In 1058 he was again outlawed, and again pardoned. He died probably in the year 1052, and was succeeded in his earldom by his son Edwin. His daughter Aldgyth married (1) Griffith, Prince of North Wales, and (2) Harold.

Elgin, James Bruce, 8th Earl of (b. 1811, d. 1863), entered Parliament as member for Southampton in the Conservative interest in 1841. In 1842 he resigned his seat in the Commons on being appointed Governor-General of Jamaica. In 1846 he was sent to Canada and carried out the conciliatory policy of his father-in-law, Lord Durham. He was raised to the English peerage with the title of Baron Elgin. From Canada he went to China as special ambassador, and successfully negotiated the Peace of Tientsin after the capture of Canton and the ront of the Celestials. In 1859 he entered Lord Palmerston's cabinet with the office of Postmaster-General. In consequence, however, of the refusal of the Chinese to receive his brother, Mr. Bruce, as envoy in accordance with the treaty, he was sent again to sustain English anthority, and was once more completely successful (1860). He was shortly afterwards appointed to succeed Lord Canning as Governor-General of India, where he died. His son and successor in the title, Victor Alexander, Earl of Elgin, was Governor-General of India, 1894-99, and Secretary for the Colonies, 1905-8.

Elgiva (ÆLPEIPU) was the wife of King Edwy (q.v.). As she was within the prohibited degrees, Dunstan and Odo endeavoured to get Edwy to divorce her, and at length, in 958, this was done.

Eliot, Sin John (J. 1592, d. 1632), a member of an old Cornwall family, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and studied law in London. In 1614 he entered Parliament as member for St. Germans, and at once rose into prominence as one of the foremost orators of the time. In 1628 Eliot came forward as one of the prominent champions of constitutional rights. In the Parliament of 1625 he was strongly in favour of putting into execu-tion the laws against the Roman Catholic recusants. In the second Parliament of Charles I. (1626) Eliot was the recognised leader of the constitutional party. He moved an inquiry into the mismanagement of the government, and was foremost in demanding that the conduct of Buckingham should be investigated. In consequence (May 11, 1626), he was imprisoned in the Tower, but set at liberty after a few days. In 1627 Rilot was one of those who, with Hampden and Wentworth, refused to contribute towards the forced loan levied by the crown, and was imprisoned in the Gatchouse. In the Parlia-ment of 1628 he was again forcement in the attack on reyal misgovernment, and bore the chief share in drawing up the Remonstrance and Petition of Right. On the dissolution of the Parliament he was imprisoned in the Tower (March, 1629). He was kept in confinement, and his health was broken by the harsh treatment he received, and on Nov. 27, 1632, he died. During his imprisonment he wrote a treatise called Monarchy of Man, which embodied his views on the theory of constitutional monarchy. Eliot was one of the ablest as well as the most estimable of the popular leaders of Charles I.'s reign, "Great as his intellectual powers were," says Mr. Gardiner, "it was not by mere force of intellect that he won his way to distinction. It was the moral nature of the man, his utter self-forgetfulness, which made him what he

Elizabeth, Queen (b. Sept, 7, 1533, s. Nov. 17, 1558, d. March 24, 1603), the daughter of Henry VIII. by his second wife Anne Boleyn, was born at Greenwich. On the death of her mother, she was sent to the castle of Hunsdon, where she and hor half-sister Mary were brought up by Lady Margaret Bryan. Afterwards sho shared the studies of hor half-brother Edward, who became greatly attached to her. On the accession of Edward VI., sho was committed to the care of Cathorine, the Queen Dowager, who soon married Thomas Seymour, the brother of the Protector, Somerset. Thomas Seymour showed that he rourished ambitious schemes, and he was suspected of using the opportunities which his marriage gave him of trying to win the affections of Elizabeth. Catherine died in 1548, and Thomas Seymour's conduct towards Elizabeth was one of the charges brought against him, and was the subject of a rigorous inquiry, in which the young girl conducted herself with great dexterity. Seymour was be-headed, and Elizabeth was closely watched at Hatfield. Here she pursued her studies under the direction of William Grindal and Roger Ascham, and acquired a reputation for learning. In the plot of Northumberland to secure the throne for the Lady Jane Grey, Elizabeth took no part, and on Mary's accession, was treated by her with consideration. The Imperial ambassadors doubted about Elizabeth, and Mary worked hard for her conversion to Romanism. Elizabeth judged it wise to give way, and on Sept. 9, 1553, attended the mass. As Mary's marriage project with Philip of Spain advanced, her suspicions of Elizabeth increased, and in December Elizabeth left the court, and retired to Ashridge, in Buckinghamshire. Mary wished to marry Elizabeth to Edward Courtenay, but Courtenay refused. Wyatt's rebellion brought Elizabeth and Courteray into suspicion. Elizabeth was arrested in Feb., 1554, and was thrown into the Tower. Every effort was made to obtain evidence against her, but without success. In May she was released, but was committed to the care of Sir Henry Bedingfield, and was sent to Woodstock. Philip of Spain, on his arrival in England, showed more consideration towards Elizabeth. He wished to marry her in such a way as to promote his own political plans. First, a marriage with the Duke of Savoy was proposed, and in April, 1555, Elizabeth was summoned to Hampton Court, whence, at the end of the year, she went to Hatfield. It needed all her cleverness to escape the marriage with the Duke of Savoy, which would have sent her away from England. When this was abandoned, there came a proposal for Eric of Sweden, son of Gustavus Wasa, which was also refused. Elizabeth in her early days found herself surrounded by snares. She learned to trust no one, to act circumspectly, to assume an ambiguous attitude which did not commit her to anything definite, and to be prepared for any emergency. Mary on her death-bed, Nov. 6, 1558, nominated Elizabeth as her successor, in the hope that she would maintain the Roman Catholic religion. Philip of Spain trusted that he would find in Elizabeth a complaisant ally. When Elizabeth succeeded to the crown, on Nov. 17, 1558, she had already gained a large experience of the world and the difficulties which beset her. She never forgot that her position must be maintained by herself alone, and that her interests were not those of any particular party or system. She never laid aside her skill in balancing herself between opposing parties and husbanding her resources so as to profit by their mistakes.

At the accession of Elizabeth England was without money and without resources, and was engaged on the side of Spain in war with France. Philip II. wished to maintain the English alliance, and offered his hand to Elizabeth. But the marriage with Philip needed a dispensation from the Pope; and Paul IV. was under the influence of France. He was ready to impugn the legitimacy of Elizabeth. Whatever doubts she might have had about her policy on her accession, she soon saw that the defence of Protestantism at home and peace with France abroad were necessary for her own security. Her first measures were directed to a religious settlement. In this matter she reverted to her father's plan: freedom of the English Church from the supremacy of the Pope, and from beliefs and practices which were unknown to the primitive Church, but a retention of its Catholic foundation. This plan suited neither the Calvinists nor the adherents of the old faith. But Elizabeth appointed a committee of divines to revise the Prayer Book of Edward VI., and Parliament in 1559 reestablished the royal supremacy, approved the revised Prayer Book, and enforced its use by the Act of Uniformity. Many of the bishops refused obedience, and were deprived of their sees. The new Archbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Parker, was the chief helper of the queen in carrying out her ecclesiastical policy, and a body of commissioners, who afterwards grew into the Court of High Commission, were appointed to exercise the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the crown.

But the greatest danger that Elizabeth had to face was the fact that the next in order of succession to the English crown was Mary Queen of Scots. The party in England that was favourable to the old religion would have welcomed her against Elizabeth. Mary was supported by the influence of the Guises in France, and it was possible that Philip of Spain might unite with them to put down heresy in England. Elizabeth was urged by Parliament to marry; and she looked round for some foreign alliance. But she clearly saw the difficulties that beset her. If she married a Protestant, she would destroy the hopes of the Catholics in a peaceful accession of Mary; if she married a Catholic, her husband would either be some insignificant person, or her marriage would draw her into political combinations which would merifice the independence of her position. Many husbands were proposed, but she refused them all. It was thought that her personal preference was for Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester; but she abstained from a marriage which would be unpopular and politically useless. She used marriage projects as means of political temporising, to a degree which was often ludierous. She a degree which was often ludierous. She encouraged in her court a fantastic devotion to her person, and gioried in the title of the "Virgin Queen." The progress of the Reformation in Scotland gave Elizabeth a means of strongtheniug herself against Mary. In Jan., 1560, she entered into the Treaty of Berwick, by which she undertook to aid the rebel lords in consulting the Evench, who under the queen expelling the French, who, under the queen regent, Mary of Guise, garrisoned Edinburgh. She was rewarded by the withdrawal of the French, and the agreement that Marv and Francis II. should lay aside their pretensions to the English crown. In Dec., 1560, Francis II. died, Mary refused to sign the Treaty of Edinburgh, and in Aug., 1561, landed in Scotland, the avowed agent of the policy of the Guises. For the next few years the history of England centres round the secret war which was waged with feminine astuteness between the two queens. Elizabeth wished Mary to resign her claim to the English succession, offered her an alliance, and agreed to recognise her as successor. Mary refused to give up her claim for a doubtful boon. She hoped to win back Scotland to Catholicism, and looked about for a husband who would help her. When, in 1565, she married Darnley, it was a great blow to Elizabeth, who aided Murray and the rebel lords, but afterwards disavowed them. The birth of a son to Mary still further strengthened her position; but the murder of Darnley and the marriage with Bothwell destroyed Mary's hold on Scotland, and relieved Elizabeth from some anxiety. Mary's flight to England in 1568 placed Elizabeth in a difficult position. She could not make common cause with rebels against their queen, and thereby give a daugerous example; she could not restore Mary to the Scottish throne against the wish of her subjects; she could not leave Mary at large in England to be a centre for Catholic plots; and she did not wish to send her to France, where she would be an instrument in the hands of the Catholic party. The "Casket Letters" (q.v.) were used to blacken Mary's character; she was refused an interview, and was kept in confinement in England. It was not a magnanimous policy, but it was characteristic of Elizabeth's caution. Still, Mary as a prisoner was powerful for mischief. There was a plan to marry her to the Duke of Yorfolk, and there was a dangerous rising in the north in favour of the old religion. The Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland advanced to Durham, and ordered the mass to be celebrated in the cathedral. But the Catholics as a body did not rise; the rebellion was put down with severity by the Earl of Sussox, and England at the end of 1569 was again peaceful.

In 1870 Pope Pius V. proceeded to the excommunication of Elizabeth, and religious strife was consequently aroused in England. Parliament in 1871 retaliated by repressive measures against the Catholics. It was declared high treason to call the queen a heretic or to name her successor. The Established Church was more vigorously act up as a standard of orthodoxy, and Catholics and Puritans were alike required to conform. The scheme for the liberation of Mary and her marriage with the Duke of Norfolk was revived by foreign aid. A Florentine, Ridolfi, negotiated between the English conspirators and the Pope and Philip II. Supplies were to be furnished from abroad, and the Duke of Alva. from the Netherlands, was to help with 10,000 men. The plot, however, was discovered by the vigitance of Burleigh, who had succeeded in organising the intelligence department of the government into great efficiency. The Spanish ambaseador was dismiss of from "gland; the Duke of Norfolk was imprise to the Netherlands and the doubtful condition of France from taking any steps against England for the time, and from 1672 to 1576 England was left in peace. In 1576, Philip II.'s half-brother, Don

John of Austria, was sent as governor to the Netherlands. He was ambitious of invading England and marrying Mary of Scotland. He failed, however, to pacify the Nether-landers, and his failure led to his untimely death through disappointment. To obtain foreign help, the Netherlands welcomed as their prince the brother of the French king, the Duke of Anjou. Negotiations were long continued for the marriage of the Duke of Anjou to Elizabeth, which would have marked an alliance of England and France against Spain. If Elizabeth could have been certain of securing this end, she would have consented to the marriage. As it was, she affected great coyness as a means of gaining time. Her doubts were justified. The Duke of Anjou failed in the Netherlands, because he tried to override the constitution. Elizabeth mw that there was no hope of a firm alliance with France. In England she was exposed to the incessant plots of the Catholic party, who tried to rais: Ireland against her. In 1879 James Fitzmaurice, brother of the Earl of Desmond, landed with Spanish troops, and took possession of the Fort of Smerwick, near Kerry. It was instantly besieged by the deputy, Lord Grey de Wilton, and was driven to surrender, whereon the Spaniards were massacred by a body of troops under the command of Sir Waiter Raleigh. Hatred of Spain had become a principle in the minds of Englishmen, and their attempt on Ireland was mercilealy put down. More active than soldiers were the Jesuit missionaries, who, in 1580, were sent to England to revive the spirits of the Catholies. With unllinching haldness and great dexterity they travelled about England, and organised the Catholic party. Chief of these Jesuits was Campian, who was taken prisoner and put to death for conspiring against the queen. The Catholics were severely persecuted, and the Protestant spirit of England was quickened by perpetual suspicion. A plot to assessinate Elizabeth, of which Francis Throgmorton was the chief agent, was discovered in 1584, and again the Spanish ambassador was ordered to quit England. The sentiment of loyalty to the person of Elizabeth grew strong among the people, and a voluntary association was formed for her defence. Its members undertook to prosecute to death all who should attempt the queen's life, or in whose behalf such attempts should be made. This was a threat against Mary, whose death was thus sure to follow immediately on the assassination of Elizabeth.

Meanwhile, the hostility between England and Spain was becoming more and more apparent. France, und r the pressure of the religious wars, had admitted Spanish influence, and had withdrawn all appearance of help from the Netherlands. Elizabeth found it wise to send help to the Netherlands, but she sent as little as she could. She never believed that they would make good their stand against the Spanish power, but with a niggardly hand she helped them to prolong their struggle. In the end of 1585 the Earl of Leicester was sent to Holland with English troops. Leicester did little more than besiege Zutphen, and Elizabeth negotiated with Spain, and was ready to betray the Netherlands if thereby she could have secured peace. Philip II., however, was irritated against England, both on account of the help sent to the Netherlands, and still more on account of the damage done to Spanish trade in the West Indies by the piratical raids of Sir Francis Drake. A Spanish invasion of England was imminent, and plots against Elizabeth's life were resolutely carried on. At the end of 1586, a plot, contrived by Antony Babington, was discovered by the Secretary, Sir Francis Walsingham. He allowed it to proceed till he had obtained evidence which implicated Mary of Scotland. Then Babington was executed, and a commission was appointed to try Mary, who was found guilty. For a long time Elizabeth hesitated to put Mary to death. At last she signed the warrant, but gave no orders that it should be carried into effect. Mary was beheaded in February, 1587, and Elizabeth professed that it was done without her knowledge. She tried with characteristic duplicity to free herself of personal responsibility, but England rejoiced that it was rid of one who was such a fertile source of danger and disturbance.

Mary's death brought the Spanish invasion nearer. So iong as Mary lived, Philip II. was bound to fight in her name; on her death he put forward his own claim to the English erown. A raid of Drake on Cadiz, in April, 1587, stirred Philip II. to greater indignation. In May, 1588, a large fleet, known as "the Invincible Armada," set sail for England. Its huge ships were ili-suited to the task. The preparations for a junction with ships from the Netherlands failed. The Armada was thrown into disorder by the smaller and swifter craft of the English. A storm completed its discomfiture, and England was saved from a landing on its shores. During the days of peril Elizabeth showed great courage, and addressed in stirring words the volunteers who gathered at Tilbury. She was personally brave, and knew how to deal with her people. The defeat of the Armada gave an impulse to English seamanship, which had been growing rapidly during Elizabeth's reign. Then for the first time the English showed those qualities which have secured for them the mastery of the sea. An aggressive war against Spain was rapidly planned, and the Portu-guese were urged to revolt from Philip II. In 1580 an expedition was undertaken against Lisbon, which failed in its main object, but convinced the English that Spain was not such a formidable fee as they had thought. From this time English privateers cruised tho Spanish main and crippled the Spanish trade. Sir Waiter Raleigh was energetic in urging schemes of colonisation in opposition to Spain. In 1584 he coionised Virginia, which he called after the Virgin Queen. In 1592 he penetrated to the Isthmus of Darien, and in 1595 to Guiana. Though little was done at the time, the way was prepared for future offorts.

Spain was beaten back both in France and in the Netherlands, and Elizabeth, in her old age, was inclined to peace. But the martial ardour of England was aroused, and the Earl of Essex was eager to distinguish himself. In 1596 an expedition was made against Cudiz, which was sacked by Essex. Next year he and Raleigh set out on what was known as "The Island Voyage," which was a failure, owing to quarrels between the two commanders. Elizabeth and Burleigh were more and more desirous for peace. But troubles broke out in Ireland, where Hugh O'Neil, Earl of Tyrone, gathered together the tribes of Ulster, and surprised the Fort of Blackwater. Ireland, Elizabeth found occupation for the energy of Essex, whose ambition was boundless and whose popularity was great. But Essex, contrary to his orders, entered into negotiations with Tyrone, and concluded peace. When he returned to England in 1599, he was called to account for his conduct. He had many enemies, and was disgraced, being confined as a prisoner in his own house. At last, trusting to his popularity, he mude a desperate rising, in the hopes of getting the queen into his hands. The people refused to follow him. He was taken prisoner, found guilty of high treason, and beheaded in February, 1601. Elizabeth sorely felt tho necessity of putting Essex to death, and never quite recovered from her grief. As she grew old she missed the homage of her people. The expenses of the Irish war forced her to apply to Parliament for money, and Parliament attacked the royal grauts of monopolies. Elizabeth gave way with good grace, and her last years saw the defeat of Tyrone's forces by Lord Mountjoy, in 1602. Elizabeth had a growing feeling of want of sympathy between herself and the now generation which she had fostered. Her last days were unhappy, and she died in March 23, 1603, after indicating the King of Scotland as her successor.

Elizabeth lived in perilous times, and the fortunes of England were curiously interwoven with her personal security. She found England discouraged, disunited, and poor; she loft it with a strong national spirit, prosperous, and resolute. Her policy was shifty, but her means were scanty. She knew how to choose wise advisers, but she never entirely trusted them. She knew how to play upon human weakness, and she was better served at smaller cost than any other sovereign. England, in her reign, made great advances in every way, and then first assumed the chief characteristics which still distinguish it. Though many of Elizabeth's doings were unworthy, she never forget the interests of her people, and she never lost their affection. It is her greatest praise that her objects were those of her people, and that England prospered under her rule.

Elizabeth Woodville, Queen, wife of Edward IV. (b. circs 1431, d. 1492), was the daughter of Sir Richard Woodville (afterwards Earl Rivers) by Jacquetta of Luxemburg, widow of John, Duke of Redford. She married first, about 1452, Sir John Grey, son and heir of Lord Forrers of Groby. He died in 1461, leaving her with two sons, Thomas, afterwards Marquis of Dorset, and Richard. The Woodvilles and the Greys were alike strong partisans of the Lancastrian cause, and on the accession of Edward IV. the widow of Sir John Grey was deprived of her inheritance, and obliged to remain at her father's house at Grafton in Northamptonshire. Here she made the acquaintance of Edward IV., who privately married her in 1464. During the period of Lancastrian supremacy, on the flight of Edward IV. and the restoration of Henry VI., Elisabeth took refuge in anctuary, and here her son Edward was born. On the death of her husband she had once more to take sanctuary. In 1484, she was induced to leave her retreat, and went, with her remaining children, to Richard. There can be little doubt that she connived at Richard's scheme for marrying her eldest daughter Elisabeth; but this plan ltichard was obliged to give up, and after the battle of Bosworth Elizabeth gladly weddod her daughter to the victor Henry.

Elizabeth of York, Queen, wife of Henry VII. (6.1465, d. 1603), was the daughter of Edward IV. and Elizabeth Woodville. After being almost betrethed to Richard III. she was married to Henry VII.

Ella (ÆLLE) (d. 517) was the founder of the kingdom of Sussex. He is said to have come (in 477) with his three sons, Cymen, Wlencing, and Cissa, to Cymenesora, which is identified by Lappenberg with Keynor in Selsea. He fought a great battle with the Britons, the issue of which was doubtful. Having obtained reinforcements, he captured the great fortress of Anderida (q.v.) in 491, and destroyed the British power in Sussex. Ella is said to have reigned forty years, and to have been succeeded by his son Cissa. [Brewalds.]

Ellenborough, EDWARD LAW, EARL OF (b. 1790, d. 1871). He was the son of Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, and entered Parliament in 1814; but removed to the Upper House on succeeding his father as Baron Ellenborough in 1818. In 1841 he accepted the Governor-Generalship of India. Under his adminstration in that country was accomplished the expedition into Afghanistan, under Generals Pollock and Nott, which resulted in the recapture of Ghuzi and Cabul. The conquest of Scindo by Sir Charles Napier, in 1843, was also undertaken by Lord Ellenborough's government, but his policy did not meet with the approval of the Court of Directors, and in 1844 he was recalled by that body. The Duke of Wellington, however, defended Lord Ellenborough's policy in Parliament, and on his return home he was created an earl.

Elmham, Thomas or (d. circa 1426), was a monk of St Augustine's, Canterbury, and afterwards Prior of Leyton, in Nottinghamshire. He wrote a Life of Henry V., and a History of the Monastery of St. Augustine's from 596 to 1191. Both these works have been printed in the Rolls Series.

Elphinstone, Mountstuart (b. 1779, d. 1859), was sent to India as a writer in 1795. In 1801 he was appointed assistant to the Resident at Poonah. Ho was present at Assye. After the war he became British Resident at Nagpore. In 1807 he was sent on a mission to Cabul. In 1810, on his return, ho was appointed Resident at Poonah. He fought the battle of Kirkee in 1817, when Bajee Rao attacked the Britis'. Residency. In 1818 he was appointed Commissioner of the Poonah territory; and he became Governor of Bombay in 1819. In 1827 he returned to England. In 1834 he was offered the Govornor-Generalship, but refused. The rest of his life was uneventful, and he died peacefully in his eightieth year.

Kaye, Indian Officers; Elphinstone's Memoirs (1984).

Ely, The Isle of, was originally an oasis in the midst of the marshes of Cambridgeshire and the fen land. It owes its chief fame to the great abbey which was founded there by St. Etheldreda in 673. In 970 it was refounded by Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, and settled with Benedictines, having been, a hundred years previously, destroyed by the Danes. It was here that Hereward formed his Court of Refuge, which in 1071 was taken by William the Conqueror. In 1108 Ely was made the seat of a bishopric by Henry I. After the battle of Evesham and the surrender of Kenilworth, some of the barons escaped to Ely, but their stronghold was taken by Prince Edward in 1267.

Emancipation, Catholic. [Catholic Emancipation.]

Emancipation, NEGRO. [SLAVE TRADE.]

Emigration, in its restricted sense, is used for the departure of persons from a country with a highly organised society and thick population to settle in one with abundance of uncultivated soil. The word is opposed, nevertheless, to colonisation, which implies rather the first settlement in a new land, whereas emigration signifies that the country of which it is the object has already made some advance in civilisation. Hence emigration in its proper sense cannot be said to have systematically begun in England previous to 1815, on the termination of the great war with the French Empire. In that year the number of emigrants was only 2,081; in the following year it had increased to 12,510, and it was 34,987 in 1819. The average annual number of those who omigrated in the ten years from 1825 to 1834 was 50,304; from 1835 to 1844 it was 75,923, thus showing a steady rise, though there was a drop during the first half of the latter decade. During the five years ending 1853 the average ross as high as 323,002, an exceptional rate, prohably due to such extraordinary causes as the Irish famine, the gold discoveries in Australia and California, and the development of the resources of America through the adoption of free trade in England. The average sank to nearly a half during the Crimean War, and in 1860, when the struggle between the Northern and Southern States was raging, the total was only 91,770. In 1870 it was 256,940; in 1880, 332,294, the increase being chiefly Irish emigrants. In 1893 the number was 307,633, which depression in the colonies and America reduced by one-half in 1896; in 1908 there were 386,411 emigrants (these figures include foreigners in transit via British ports). Tho countries to which our emigration is chiefly directed are British North America, the United States, Australia, and South Africa. The first of these was in favour until 1835, after which the outbreak of the Canadian rebellion, the preference of the enormously increasing number of Irish emigrants for American institutions, together with other and more general causes, turned the scale; nor is it probable that even the recent legislative restrictions on immigration into the States will soon equalise numbers which in 1998 were respectively 198,321 and 95,428. It should be observed that the Scotch emigrate less readily than the other inhabitants of the British Isles; the numbers in 1908 were 172,982 English, 38,352 Irish, and 42,273 Scotch. The fact that emigration was pioneered by the movements of whole communities driven forth by religious persecution, and bound for unknown and uncivilised lands, is the main cause of the tendency of earlier emigration to base itself on organised schemes. Thus Wakefield's scheme of combined emigration had its prototypes in the Pilgrim Fathers, and afterwards in the ill-fated Darien expedition. Now, however, such precautions are generally unnecessary, except when dealing with a pauperised and helpless class like the Western Irish. All that need be done is to provide for the safe and cheap transit and reception of individuals. This first responsibility was placed in 1831 in the hands of the Emigration Commission, part of whose duties was to distribute useful information, which is no w done by the Emigrants' Information Office. It was regulated by law in various Passengers Acts providing for the comfort and protection of emigrants, the first of which was passed in 1835, and those new in force in 1855 and 1863. The welfare of settlers is watched over in the colonies and the United nd

States by government immigration agents, who supply all information free of cost. State emigration has been frequently adopted as a rolief for pauperism, notably by the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, and the Irish Land Act of 1880. On the other side, the colonies have offered advantages in order to secure manual labour. The graver dangers of the introduction into our colonies of inferior races, such as the Chinese into Australia and British Columbia, have been met by legislation.

Emmett, Robert (b. 1778, d. 1803), an Irishman, whose unhappy fate inspired some of the finest of the "Irish Melodies" of Thomas Moore. Emmett was in sympathy with the objects of the Society of United Irishmen, and for complicity with the Rebellion of 1798 was expelled from Dublin University. He then withdrew to the Continent, but returned in 1802, and in 1803, at the head of an undisciplined mob, attempted to seize the Arsenal and Dublin Castle. He was captured, condemned for treasor, and executed.

Empire, RELATIONS WITH THE. Cut off from the Roman Empire by the English Conquest, Britain began again to have dealings with the "world state," when Christianity and political consolidation had renewed civilisation and intercourse with the world. The Mercian overlords of the eighth century corresponded on equal terms with the great house that was soon to restore the glory of the Cesars. Charles the Great's jealousy of Offa led to his support of the exiled Egbert of Wessex, whose accession to the West Saxon throne must have strengthened the relations of the two powers, and who may have found in the Carlovingian Empire a model for imitation. The presence of learned men like Alcuin in Charles's court had a similar tendency. The correspondence of Ethelwulf with Louis the Pious, whose granddaughter he afterwards married, kept up the connection. Athelstan's sister's marriage to Charles the Simple, and his support of Louis "Ultramarinus," continued the dealings with the Carlovingian house, even when empire nad almost stepped from it. English dealings with the Saxon Emperors were still more intimate. Henry the Fowler married his son Olto to Athelstan's sister, and Giesebracht points out the similarity of Henry's power in Germany and that of the West Saxon overlords in England, and even suggests conscious imitation. With the acquisition of the Imperial dignity, Otto aspired to a far higher power than his father. But if Henry copied Athelstan, the second coronation of Edgar at Bath as "Emperor of Britain" suggests that that monarch aspired to rival Otto's crowning by John XII. The assumption of Imperial titles by the great early English kings shows that they aimed at least at absolute equality in dignity with the Emperors. It is remarkable that under such circumstances good relations were maintained. The innumerable coincidences of law and usage between England and the Empire, though in the main instances of parallel development rather than of influence, may in some cases illustrate the effects of this constant intercourse. The Norman Conquest allied England with the Papacy, but the continuity of the national tradition soon tended to re-unite English king and Roman Emperor in a common hostility to the Hildebrandine Papacy. William and Henry I.'s contest with Anselm is the English reflection of the Investiture Contest. But the superior prudence of the English monarchs avoided that direct breach with the Church which was, perhaps, inevitable in Germany. Even marriage alliances, such as that between Matilda and Henry V., did not result in joining England with the Empire in its extreme measures, but rather led to the Concordat of Worms, which the agreement etween Henry and Anselm had anticipated With Henry II. begins another period of still closer relations. Henceforth the Imperial alliance becomes one of the permanent traditions of our mediæval foreign policy. Henry married his daughter to Henry the Lion, and instituted close friendship with the Guelfic house without impairing his friendly relations with the rival Hohenstaufen on the Imperial throne. In fact, Frederick Barbarossa's contest with Alexander III. necessarily produced close relations with Henry, engaged in his struggle with Becket. Only the prudence of his advisers prevented Henry being bound by his ambassadors to support Barbarossa's schis-matic Pope. The Third Crusade was entered into by Frederick as by Richard I., although the English monarch had given a home to his nephew Otto after the fall of Henry the Lion had driven him from Germany. Hence the jealousy of the Emperor Henry VI., Richard's captivity on his return, and humiliating surrender of the Imperial crown of Britain to the German Emperor. Henceforth, hostility to the Hohenstaufen Emperors became the great principle of Richard's and John's foreign policy. But the battle of Bouvines put an end to the hopes of the Guelfic line, and the house opposed to England became undisputed Emperors. Gradually the strong bonds of connection were renewed, and the sister of Henry III. became the bride of Frederick II. All England watched with keen interest that Emperor's struggle with the Papacy, though Henry himself was too much bound by his papal connection and personal religious scruples to give him any help. But so long as his nephow remained alive as Frederick's heir, Henry rofused to join in the papal erusade against the Hohenstaufen. acceptance of the Sieilian throno for Edmund of Lancaster was only when his sister's son was dead. But the great connection between England and the Empire in this reign is the election of Richard of Cornwall, Henry's brother, as King of the Romans. Though never master of Germany, Richard was yet the most powerful of the claimants during the Great Interregnum. His influence led directly to the close commercial dealings between England and the Hansa. He obtained for his brother great privileges for the Steelyard, and imported Harz miners to work the tin mines of his Cornish earldom. But with the fall of the Hohenstaufen the glory of the Empire had departed; though in its weakness, as in its strongth, it adhered to its English connection. Rudolf of Hapsburg had a scheme for renewing the middle kingdom in conjunction with Edward I. Adolf of Nassau served as a hireling in the army of that same monarch; Louis of Bavaria was closely allied with Edward III. They married sisters, and had in the French king and the Avignon Popes common objects of hostility. At Coblenz, in 1338, Louis made Edward Imperial Vicar. But the quarrel for the Hainault succession broke up a friendship which Louis' weakness made unprofitable to England. Even then he found in the Englishman, William of Oekham, a warm defender of his theoretical elaims. The Luxemburg house now acquired the Empire, and their alliance with France brought a now coolness between England and the Empire, that was not fully ended till Richard II. married Wenzel's sister, Anne of Bohemia. [BOHEMIA, RELATIONS WITH. The friendship of Sigismund and Henry V., their common religious and European policy, was a fitting crown to the mediaval dealings of England and the Empire; for after Sigismund's last assertion of the international power of the Empire at Constance, that splendid theory eeased to have any practical working. England continued the friend of the nominal Emperors, but it is with the rulers of hereditary dominions, not with the nominal Emperors, that these dealings really occurred. [BURGUNDY, RELATIONS WITH.] Charles V., who for a time aspired to a renewal of the Imperial power, inherited not only the Imperial, but the Burgundian and Spanish alliances of England, and was thus united to her by a triple bond. Even this was sundered by the Reformation, though the old Imperial alliance may be regarded as renewed in the dealings of England with the German Protestants. With the rise of Louis XIV.'s ascendency, the Anglo-Imperial alliance is renewed, and continued with few breaks till the end of the Empire in 1806. [Austria, Relations with.]

Pauli, Englische Geschichte, brings out very clearly the general dealings of England and the Empire in mediseval times; Giesebracht's Die Deutsche Kaiserreit and Von Raumer's Geschichte der Hohenstaufen may be referred to for more detailed information. [T. F. T.] [T. F. T.]

Empson, Sir Richard (d. 1510), was the son of a tradesman at Towcester. He devoted himself to the law, and came under the notice of Henry VII., who employed him in public duties, and especially in financial affairs. Together with Dudley, Empson was the chief agent of the illegal or quasi-legal extortion of Henry's reign. Ho incurred great unpopularity in consequence, and was executed with Dudley at the beginning of the next reign. [Dudley.]

Engagement, The, 1647, was a name given to a compact made at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, with the Scotch Corumissioners, by which Charles I. engaged to support the Covenant and the Presbyterian party; the Covenanters, on the other hand, promising to assist him against the l'arliament. [CHARLES I.]

Englefield, THE BATTLE OF (871), fought between the English, nnder the ealdorman Ethelwulf, and the Danes, resulted in the victory of the former—Sidroc, one of the Danish jarls, being slain. Englefield is a village in Berkshire, about six miles west of Reading.

English Conquest of Britain, THE. A close connection is discernible between the differing forms of Roman power in the island and the history of this great movement. From the cessation of that power in its temporal form sprang the conditions that gave it birth; with the introduction of the spiritual form it entered upon a new stage, whose beginning may be taken as marking not merely its complete success, but its virtual ending. As an historical landscape, therefore, it may be said to lie between the year 410, the date of the departure of the Roman officials, and 596, that of the arrival of St Augustine. But these dates enclose the darkest period of British history; next to nothing that is trustworthy has been recorded of the details of the Conquest; and not withstanding the huge contributions that genius and scholarship have made to the subject of late years, the fraction of solid, or even probable, fact remains as meagre as ever. And our best authorities differ as widely as men can differ regarding the value and interpretation of the fragmentary and confused accounts that tradition preserved among the conquerors; between qualified acceptance and almost unqualified rejection our most masterly historical intellects are divided. Anything like an exact account is impossible.

When the authorities of the Empire parted. with the trust of defending Britain they left to the inhabitants their excellent military organisation, which had hitherto held in check or repelled the various assailants of the province. At first the Romanised Britons showed some capacity for working it from their own resources; armics of their own raising, led by chiefs of their own blood, seem to have stepped into the vacant positions, and maintained the system of defences that Rome had ereated in comparative efficiency. these, the most valuable was the line of fortresses that kept guard upon the Saxon shore, along which the most persevering, relentless, and formidable enemies of Britain, the Saxons, had been prowling in their "keels" for generations, plundering and ravaging the neighbouring lands, and possibly forming scattered settlements upon them. The liberated Britons naturally continued upon this harassed frontier the vigilance their Roman masters had before observed; and the office of Count of the Saxon Shore, hitherto perhaps the most responsible in the country, is thought to have been retained, and to have been first filled under the altered circumstances by one Ambrosius, or Emrys, whose faithful discharge of his trust appears to have won him the lavish admiration of his countrymen. It would seem that under his guidance the Britons gave some promise of ability to maintain their position.

Soon, however, the prospect darkened. The awful crisis in the history of the island which Roman valour and skill had so long kept back again approached, and the necessary warlike vigour and civil virtue for coping with it were no longer forthcoming. After a brief quiescence, the old inveterate foes of Romanised Britain swarmed again to the attack; the Picts from the North, the Seots from Ireland, descended on her towns and fields, and spread slaughter and ruin wherever they went. Above all, the German "Nook" sent forth in new abundance its untiring bands of hardy and merciless adventurers—called Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, but soon to bear the common name of English -who sailed up and down the eastern coast, and landing at unguarded places, pillaged and plundered almost unchecked. Then the loose-jointed political and nilitary organisatien of the Britons fell to ...ces; civil discord paralysed the state; the struggles of rival princes—tyrants, as they were called—the rage of factions, wasted the strength of the people; famine and pestilence thinned their ranks; and the little hardihood that Roman rule had left in the native character thus missed its small measure of effect. The fitful efforts of isolated chieftains to stem the terrent of calamity having proved unavailing, it would seem that the southern Britons were tempted to try the course of making allies of one class of their assailants against the other, and applied to the Saxons for help. The Saxons eame to their help, nothing loth, and so got within the defences of the Saxon Shore, secured their footing in the land, and after driving back the Picts and Scots, quickly found a pretext for turning their arms against their hosts, and wrested from them a considerable share of the soil they had come to defend.

Whether such was the actual form of the event or not, we may accept as an historical fact that in the middle of the fifth century (450, 449, or earlier), an alien race of German origin seized upon a part of south-castern Britain with the fixed purpose of keeping it, and thus sot an example which, cheerfully and promptly followed by their kinsfolk, led to the complete transfer from a substantially Celtic to a substantially Teutonic population of the greater part of the country that is now called England. Later records give us a few names of men and scraps of incidents belonging to this momentous process, which can hardly be altogether fictitious. According to these, Kent, the first-fruits of German eunning and daring, was conquered and occupied by Jutish warriors between 449 and 473; Sussex by Saxon between 477 and 491; Wessex by Saxon and Jutish between 495 and 519; and in part simultaneously with these, in part after them, and till about 550, the other communities and states of the same origin-Middlesex, Essex, East Anglia, the miscellany of settlements that ultimately coalesced into Mercia, and Deira, and Bernicia—were founded, some by Saxons, some by Angles, and some by both. But shadowy as is our knowledge of the foundation of the southern settlements, of the foundation of the northern settlements we know nothing. Tho first sight that we get of these is after they have become fully established and powerful organisations. Within a century after their first landing in force the terrible strangers had got into their exclusive possession the eastern half of the island south of the Forth.

The whole of this land was won by the edge of the sword. Throughout, the work of conquest was in substance a mere killing and taking pessession; fields of slaughter, sackings of cities, massacre and depopulation, spoiling and burning of homesteads, leading into captivity, every conceivable shame and horror that can befall a race make the history of eastern Britain during this time; the indis-tinct lamentations of the vanquished, the more definite traditions of the victors, concur in proving this. From the British side Gildas exclaims, "Some were caught in the hills and slaughtered, others were worn out with hunger, and yielded to a life-long slavery. Some passed across the sea.... others trusted their lives to the clefts of the mountains, to the forests, and rocks of the sea." From the English side we learn such facts as that, in 473, "the Welsh fied the English as fire;" that in 491 the South Saxons "alew all that dwelt within" Anderida, "nor was as much as one Briton left alive:" that in 508 Cerdic and Cynric "slew a British king and five thousand men with him." And the name "Flame-bearer," given in Welsh literature to a Bernician king (Ida or Theodric), is fear-

Not that the career of the conquerors was one of unbroken success. Now and then the frenzied resistance of the Britons checked, perhaps even beat back, the advance of the English; one illustrious British hero, Arthur, by a life of valiant deeds, laid the foundation of a fame now almost entirely poetical, and one splendid victory postponed the fatal day for the Britons of the west. In whatever part of the island he fought, the fact of his fighting nobly against the invad a is now generally admitted [ARTHUN]; and the battle of Mons Badonicus (416 or 420), whatever its site, whether gained by Archur or another, was undoubtedly a defeat for the English, and secured the Wolsh a breathing-space of somo length. But neither devoted courage nor flashes of success could save British civilisation from the ruin that was coming upon it like a fate; the onward march of the ruthless German swordsmen was arrested, only to begin anew after a time with undiminished ferocity.

This fresh advance, which began about 560, and carried the West Saxon arms to the Severn, and almost to the Dee, has this special interest: that the persons and events that belong to it are unmistakably historical. Whatever misgivings we may have about Hengist, Cissa, and Cerdic, we cannot but feel confident that Ceawlin and Cuthwine really lived, and that the victory of the former at Deorham (577), and of the latter at Bedford (571), were real achievements. Undoubtedly, too, the area of permanent English occupation was much extended by the aggressions of these princes; it had certainly now reached the Bristol Channel.

The manner of the conquest is well expressed by Bi hop Stubbs:—"The conquest of Britain was the result of a series of separate expeditions, long continued, and perhaps, in point of time, continuous, but unconnected, and independent of one another. It was conducted by single chieftains, who had nothing in common with the nation they attacked, and who were about neither to amalgamate with them nor to tolerate their continued existence." This last statement is not undisputed. While one school of historians has no doubt of the utter effacement not merely of the British nation, but even of the British population throughout the conquered districts, another maintains that a not inconsiderable portion of the conquered must have been spar d and that their descendants ultimately mixed with the descendants of the conquerors; that, in fact, modern England is not an exclusively Teutonie, but largely a Celtic, nationality. The truth, perhaps, is that the practice of the conquerors varied:

while extermination was tho rule in their earlier conquests, they allowed many exceptions to it as the tide of war went west. But of the substantial effacement of British civilisation there can scarcely be a doubt; in this respect the conquest was simply a destroying deluge of barbarism, that swept away almost every trace of the greatness that once had been.

Englishry, PRESENTMENT OF, was a system introduced by William the Conqueror, whereby if a man were found murdered, it was assumed that he was a Norman, and the hundred fined accordingly, unless it was proved otherwise. It fell into disuse about the time of Bic ard I., the two races having mixed to such an extent that it was impossible to say who was an Englishman and who was a Norman. It was not, however, finally abolished till 1339.

Erastians, The, were so called because they held the views of the Swiss theologian Erastus (1524-83) on the inability of the Church to exercise discipline by censure, excommunication, &c.; its province being, according to their theory, confined to teaching. There never was an actual sect of Erastians in England; but their ideas on Church government were advocated by many leading divines, and in the Westminster Assembly (1643—49) were represented by the powerful eloquence of Whitelocke, Lightfoot, and Selden. A proposition, however, condemnatory of their doctrines was carried almost unanimously, and, though the "Chapter of Church Censures" in which it occurs was never formally ratified by Parliament, Erastianism failed from that time to take deep root. The word frequently occurs in the history of the disputes which resulted in the secession of the Free Church of Scotland, and is sometimes used by English High Churchmen-in both cases with reference to those who deny the Church the right of self-government.

Errol, FRANCIS, EARL OF (d. 1631), was Constable of Scotland, and one of the signers of the "Spanish Blanks" (q.v.). He was converted to the Romish Church by a Jesuit named Father Edmond Hay, but in 1597 found it to his interest to return to the Protestant party, and to obtain the revocation of his forfeiture.

Erskine, Thomas, Lord (b. 1750, d. 1823), the third son of the tenth Earl of Buchan, was educated at the High School, Edinburgh, and St. Andrews University. At the age of fourteen he entered the navy, but after four years, disgusted at not being promoted, he exchanged the navy for the army. After seven years in his new profession, he left it to enter at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1778 both took his degree and was called to the bar. His first brief was held in defence of Captain Baillie, a naval officer who had been doomed by the ministry for daring to expose the abuses permitted by the Admiralty. Erskine's fame was made at once, and was confirmed in the following January by his brilliant defence of Admiral Keppel in court-martial, which was followed soon afterwards by his equally powerful speech on behalf of Lord George Gordon. In November, 1733, he was returned to Parliament for Portsmouth, and did his ntmost in support of Fox's India Bill. His fame is specially connected with his constant efforts to establish the rights of juries in libel cases. In 1794 he made a bold stand against the doctrine of constructive treason which it was attempted to lay down in the trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. For the next twelve years he was recognised as leader in the courts at Westminster and was in all State trials to be found retained for the defence. In Parliament he was a firm supporter of Fox, and followed him in his temporary retirement from the House. Addington offered him a place as Attorney-General in 1801, but Erskine declined it. On the accession to power of the Fox and Grenville ministry in 1806, Erskine received the Chancellorship During his short tenure of that office h. had the satisfaction of announcing the passing of the Bill for the Abolition of Slavery. For the fifteen years after retiring from office in 1807, he took little part in politics. On the trial of Queen Caroline, he broke away reluctatly from his long-standing friendship with the Prince Regent, because he felt bound to support the cause of a woman whom he considered to be innocent and Escheat (from the Norman-French eschet; escheoir, to fall) means the reversion of land to the lord. It could happen in two ways:

(1) per defectum sanguinis, through want of heirs; or (2) per delictum tementis, through the crime of the tenant, in cases of treason or felony; the distinction between it and forfeiture (q.v.) being, that the first is regarded as a natural event, the second as the direct consequence of an illegal act. It affected tenants in fee-simple only. The law of escheats was introduced into England by the Normans, and, in the troubled state of the times, it was not unusual for the estates of some great noble to fall to the crown. They either continued in the possession of the king, under the title of an honour, and were administered like a shire, or were granted out again as an hereditary flef. In the first case, the immediate tenants were protected by Magna Charta from being treated as tenantsin-chief to the crown, and need only pay such dues as they would have owed to their mesne lord. The wanton bestowal of escheated lands upon favourites and relations was a frequent charge against weak kings like Henry III. and Richard II., while Edward II. in 1309 was accused of depriving men of their lands who had a perfectly good title, a practice which the royal officers of Henry VII. carried to a state of great perfection. Escheat propter delictum the land pas ed to the next heir, subject to the superior right of the crown in the case of treason for life, in the case of felony for a year and a day. It was confined in 1833 to cases of treason or murder, and the law on the subject was further defined in 1838. By the Folony Act of 1880, administrators were appointed to the convict's property, and it could be resumed if his sentence expired. Escheat propter defectum is now most common in cases of bastardy. The land passes to the sovereign, except in the case of copyhold estates, which go to the lord of the manor.

In Scotland there was escheat for debt as well as for treason; it was abolished in 1737. Single escheat, however, by which the prisoner's movables are forfeited to the crown, still exists as a punishment for crime.

Roman times the district lying to the north of the lower course of the Thames was inhabited by the tribe of the Trinobantes. In this region the Romans founded many of their most important towns, such as Camulodunnm, London, and Verulam; and towards the end of the period of their rule it formed part of the domain of the "Come. Littoria Saxonici," or Count of the Saxon Shore. When the Roman power was weakening, Essex seems to have fallen an easy prey to the Teutonic invaders; but there is no record left to tell us of the exact p. cees or time of this invasion. It seems probable, however, that the stack was made by way of the estuary of the Stour and Chelm, rather than

up the Thames Valley; and we know that the conquest was achieved by Saxons, and not by Anglian tribes, such as colonised the neighbouring counties to the north. The East Saxons do not seem to have spread far inland, being, in all probability, checked in their onward course by the great wood district lying to the west, whose relics still survivo in Hainault and Epping Forest. In the same manner the South Saxons' progress was barred by the Andreadesweald, and for this reason neither Sussex nor Essex over developed into one of the great kingdoms. But the East Saxons, though they do not appear to have ever had a Bretwalda, as the South Saxons had, were in one respect happier than the South Saxons; for it was into their hands that the great town of London fell. We read in Bede that by the year 604 it was the "Metropolis" of Sebert, King of the East Saxons, and about the same year it becamo the seat of Mellitns, whom Ethelbert of Kent sent to preach to that tribe. Bede tells us how, on the death of 'ebert (616), the country relapsed into Paganism, from which It was not converted till many years later. Mellitus was driven to Gaul, and seems to have returned only to occupy the metropolitan see of Canterbury, leaving London without a bishop till 654. On the accession of Sigebert, who had been baptised by Finian, Bishop of Lindisfarne, Ceadda was invited from Mercia to undertako the offico of Bishop of the East Saxons, the see of London was renewed, and before the century was out an East Anglian king (Sebbi) had exchanged his crown for the garb of a monk in London. By this time the East Saxons seem to have been in greater or less subjection to Mercia; and though a late legend speaks of their largely increasing their bounds to the north and west, this kingdom seems to have for the future fluctuated between Mercian and West Saxon rule. At last, after the battle of Ellandun, the Chronicle tells us how the East Saxons "turned to Egbert, because they had formerly been forced from his kinsmen unjustly." Probably the old line of East Saxon kings had now died out, and the people were more willing to have a Saxon than an Anglian ruler. But Essex was not as yet thoroughly merged in the West Saxon kingdom; on Edgar's death it was detached from Wessex, and given, with Kent, Surrey, and Snssex, to Athelstan (836). Wo have now reached the times of the Danish invasions. When East Anglia was over-rnn, and St. Edmund martyred by these marauders, Essex seems to havo shared the fate of its northern neighbour, and some years later, by the Treaty of Wedmore (878), was, together with London, left in the hands of Guthrum. Later on we find the Essex Danes taking a prominent part in the invasion of 894, and next year the whole Danish army that had already harried North Wales retired by way of Northumberland and East Anglia to the Isle of Mersea, on the Essex coast. With Edward the Elder, however, the tide began to turn against the strangers; in 913 he built the burgh of Hertford, and in midsummer of the same year brought his army to Maldon, while the fortress of Witham was building; "sud a good deal of the folk submitted to him who were before under the power of the Danish men." In 921 the inhabitants of Kent and Surrey, aided by many East Saxons, wrested Col-chester out of the hands of the Danes, though not without destroying the town. However, before the year was Edward had repaired anently taken the for the army of East the fortress and district into his y Anglia swore fea , him at the same time. Towards the end of the century (991) Essex was once more exposed to the ravages of the Panes, and when Ethelred promised them tribute in 1011, Essex is mentioned as one of the districts they had over-run. When England was divided between Canute and Edmund Ironside (1016), Edmund received East Anglia and Essex, together with district south of the Thames-a suro that there was not a very large number of Danes settled in the two first-mentioned provinces. From this time the history of Essex belongs to that of England generally. In the days of Edward the Confessor it formed a part of Harold's East Anglian earldom, and towards the end of the reign part of Leofwine's anomalous earldom, which included Kent, Surrey, and much besides.

A Barony of Essex was held under William I. by one Swene, who possessed twenty-two lordships in that county; but the lands were confiscated on the defeat of his grandson, Henry de Essex, in judicial combat (1163). In the meanwhile, tho Empress Maud granted (1144) the Earldon of Essex, with the third penny of the county, to Geoffrey de Mandeville, from whom it passed successively to his two sons. Earl of Hereford, in whose family it continued nntil Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of North-ampton, Hereford, and Essex, died (1372), without male issue. The latter's elder daughter and co-heiress, Eleanor, then gave the title to her husband, Thomas of Woodstock, son of Edward III., and afterwards Duke of Gloucester. On his murder (1397), the earldom of Essex lay dormant until it was revived in favonr of Thomas's eventual heir, Thomas, Lord Bourchier, Count of Eu, in Normandy (1461). With the death of his grandson (1539) it became extinct, and was immediately re-granted to the famous Thomas Cromwell. On Cromwell's attainder, in 1540, his hononrs became forfeit, and in 1543 the carldom was given to William Parr, brother of Queen Katharine Parr, and husband of the only daughter of the last Bourchier, Earl of Essex. Parr was afterwards created Marquis of Northampton (1546), but attainted in 1553. In 1572 the earldom of Essex was once more revived in favour of Walter Devereux, second Viscount Hereford. His son Robert was attainted in 1601, but the honours were restored two years later to his son, Robert, on whose death without issue (1646) the title became extinet. Finally, in 1661, Arthur Capell, second Baron Capell, was created Earl of Essex and Visconnt Maldon, and by his descendant the title is at present held.

Essex, WALTER DEVEREUX, EARL OF (b. circa 1540, d. 1576), son of Sir Richard Devereux, succeeded his grandfather as Viscount Hereford (1558); married (1561) Lettice, daughter of Sir Francis Knollys. He distinguished himself by his fidelity during the conspiracy of the Duke of Norfolk and the rising of the North, and was therefore created Earl of Essex (1572). The following year he undertook, with other noble adventurers, the conquest of Ulster; but, owing it is supposed, to the machinations of Leicester, his expedition was a total failure. In 1574 he was appointed Governor of Ulster, with an independent commission, and in 1576 Earl Marshal of Ireland. He succeeded in effecting no permanent conquest, but signalised himself by the treacherous murder of his guest, Sir Brian O'Neil, and by ordering the massacre of the women and children of the Scots of Antrim on the Island of Rathlin. He died in September, 1576.

Essex, Robert Deversux, Earl of (b. 1567, d. 1601), entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1577. On his appearance at court, in 1584, he became at once a favorrite with both queen and people. In 1585 he accompanied Leicester to Holland, distinguished himself at Zutphen, and was, in 1588, appointed General of the Horse in the army raised to meet the Spanish Armada. In 1591 he commanded the auxiliaries sent to assist Henry IV. in Normandy, but his chief military exploit was the capture of Cadiz in 1596. Not content with his great position as favourite, and his reputation as a soldier, he also aimed at eminenco as a statesman, and from 1592 devoted himself to the study of foreign affairs. He headed the party that demanded the vigorous prosecution of the war against Spain, opposed the cautions policy of Burleigh, and entered into communication with King James, whom he urged to demand recognition as the queen's heir. On the death of Burleigh, however, his son succeeded to his power, and Essex, a few months later, eager for an opportunity of raining power and credit, e tained the post of Lord-Lieutenant of Ir and, and was charged with the task of suppr sing Tyrone's rebellion (March, 1599). H. conduct in Ireland exposed both his ability and his honesty to injurious suspicions. Instead of at once attacking the main strength of the rebels in Ulster, or consolidating the English power in Leinster, he wasted his time and his army in marching and counter-marching, in gaining little victories, and achieving no substantial success. When he did attack Tyrone, he speedily admitted him to peace, on terms which seemed to be dictated by private ambition rather than by public policy. For this he was, on his return to England, disgraced, tried by a special commission, dismissed from all his offices, and was for a time in custody. Believing his punishment to be the work of his enemies in the Council, he set on foot a conspiracy to force his way into the queen's presence, and to remove his opponents from the government by arms. But his from the government by arms. But his attempted coup d'état failed, and he was apprehended, tried by the Lord High Steward's Court, sentenced to death for high treason, and executed on Feb. 25, He affirmed that his design was merely to go with his friends and petition the queen, and to gain their petition to remove from the queen's chamber Raleigh and Cecil, his cnemies; that he had never in any way intended to hurt the queen. By the raling of the conrt in this case, it was held treason to compel the king by force to change his policy.

(b. 1592, d. 1646), son of the preceding, was educated at Eton, and at Merton College, Oxford. In 1606 he married Frances

Howard, from whom he was divorced seven years later, in order that she might marry the Earl of Rochester. He distinguished himself as a soldier, serving in the Palatinate (1620), in Holland (1622--3), in Mansfold's army (1624), and in the expedition to Cadiz (1625). On the outbreak of the Scotch rebellion, he was appointed by Charles I. licutenant - general of the English army. He is described as being then "the most popular man in the kingdom, and the darling of the swordmen." At the opening of the Long Parliament he sided with the popular party, urged the execution of Strafford, and though helding the office of Chamberlain, refused to follow tho king to York. He was appointed in July, 1642, general of the army raised by the Parliament, and commanded at Edgehill (Oct. 23). In the spring of 1643, after capturing Reading, he murched on Oxford, but was provented by bad weather and sickness amongst his troops from besieging it. In the autumn of the same year he performed his greatest exploit during the war, the relief of Gloucester (Sept. 6), followed by the victory of Newhury (Sept. 20). In June, noxt year, he marched into the west of England to relieve Lymc, leaving Waller the task of pursuing the king. After relioving Lyme, and taking some of the royal fortresses in Devon and Dorsot, he proceeded into Cornwall. There he found himself, contrary to his expectations, unsupported by the country, and distressed for provisions, whilst the king, who had defeated Waller, prevented his retreat, drove him further west, and speedily reduced his army to extremities. The cavalry broke through the king's lines, and came safe away; Essex himself escaped by sea; but the infantry were forced to surrender (Sept., 1644). Nevertheless, the Parliament appointed him to command the new army which was being collected. Illness, however, prevented him being present at the second battle of Newhury, and on April 2, 1645, he laid down his commission in obedience to the Self-Denying Ordinance. As a general, he exhibited great irresolution, and too often ailowed his judgment as a soldier to be overruled by political considerations. Clarendon

Essex, Arthur Capel, Earl of (b. 1631, d. 1683), son of Arthur, Lord Capel, created Earl of Essex in 1660, was a leading member of the Country Party in the reign of Charles II. From 1672 to 1676 he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1679 he was appointed First Commissioner of the Treasury, but resigned before leng. In 1683 he was concerned in the Revolutionary Plot, and was arrested and committed to the Tower.

But before his trial could come on, he was found to have committed suicido. Macaulay characterises him as "a man of solid, though not brilliant parts, and of grave and melancholy character."

Estates of Scotland, THE. In Scotland the Representative Assembly of the nation had more in common with the French than with the English Parliament. The deputies of the "Three Estates," that is, the clergy, the barons, and the burgesses, sat in one chamber. The Chancellor was President. The officers of State had seats in virtue of their offices; and the judges of the Court of Session sat round a table in the centre of the hall, between the barons and the commons. The earliest laws of the kings of the Scots were passed in "Assizes." The first faint indications of a National Council appear in the reign of Alexander I. This council is called the Curia Regis from the reign of William the Lion till the death of Alexander III. The Assembly which met at Scone in 1286, to determine the succession of the crown, is the first recorded meeting of the Parliament. It consisted only of the great tenants of the crc., met to choose their liege lord. In the appeal to Edward to adjudge the crown, and in the Treaty of Brigham, 1290, the "community" is mentioned for the first time as having a voice in the affairs of the nation; and to the treaty between John Baliol and Philip of France tho seals of six hurghs are appended. The Parliament of Robert Bruce at Cambuskonneth was the first in which the representatives of the "Third Estate," the deputies of the burghs, had a place. From this time their place in the National Council was secure. The agreement for the payment of the ransom of David II. bears the scal of seven burgesses, as well as those of hishops and barons. At first each royal burgh was required to send two members to Parliament; but as the hurghs were privileged to hold their own Court of the Four Burghs, which had sovereign authority in all burghal disputes and questions, they were disposed to shirk Parliamentary attendance; and in 1619 it was enacted by the Convention of Burghs that each hurgh should send one member only te the Estates, save Edinhurgh, which was to send two. Commissaries to represent the lesser barons date from the reign of James I. By an Act of 1428 these lesser barons were relieved from their attendance, on condition that they elected two commissaries for each shire. Every one holding land from the crown was to have a veice in the election. A statute of James VI, limited the right of voting to "ose who had their land in free tenantry and lived within the shire. The statute of 1661 extended this right to all who held lands of the king to the extent of £1,000 Scots real rent. There was no regular: 0

attendance of the commissaries till late in the reign of James VI. 'The commissaries and the members of the burghs were paid for their attendance. An Act of 1661 fixes their pay at £5 Noots per day during their attendance and their journey to and fro. All the work of the Scotch Parliament was done by permanent committees-the practice of debuting in full Parliament being unknown. When the Estates met they elected a committee composed of members from each of the three divisions. To this committee the work of discussing and maturing the measures to be passed was handed over. The Estates did not sit while the committee was at work. When the Bills were ready, they met and passed them. This committee was called the Lords of the Artieles. This practice began in the reign of David II., to let the members go home to get in the harvest. In the reign of James I. it had become established as a regular part of parliamentary procedure. There was no fixed rule for choosing the Lords of the Articles, either as regarded their number or the mode of their election. This uncertainty led to the struggle between the Estates and Charles I., in 1633. The Lords of the Articles then numbered thirty-two, and an attempt was made to rob the majority in the Estates of its power against the crown by adroit management in their election. Eight bishops were first elected; they in their turn chose eight barons, and barons and bishops together chose eight commissaries and eight burgesses. Thus the whole committee were picked partisans of the bishops. The Estates protested, each division claiming the right to elect its own delegates. This matter of the election of the Lords of the Articles was again fought over in 1689. The Parliament which had put William on the throng demanded the right of discussing measures in plain Parliament, after the English fashion. The king at first refused to agree to this, and offered to increase the number of the Lords of the Articles to thirty-three, and to leave the Estates perfect freedom of election; but the Estates were firm in their demands. William yielded, and an Act of 1690 finally abolished the Lords of the Articles. The Estates were formerly the highest court of justice, and professed to give "remeid of law" in cases of appeal against the justiciars and sheriffs. To manage this judicial business, a committee, called the Lords Auditors of Complaints, was appointed, but its powers only lasted while Parliament was sitting. In 1503 it was made permanent; the members, to be chosen by the crown, were to sit continually in Edinburgh. By James V. the Lords Anditors and the Lords of the Council were united to form the Court of Session. Thus it was that the "Estates" grew out of the council of the king; to the barons were joined the clergy, and in the fourteenth century the representatives of corporations. The lesser barons were not regularly represented by commissaries till the latter part of the sixteenth century.

Scottish Statutes, published by the Record Comnimion; Ancient Laws and Customs of Burghe; f Scotland; Innes, Lectures on Scottish Legal Antiquities; Stevenson, Documents connected with the Hist, of Scotland; E. W. Robertson, Scotland under the Early Kings; J. H. Burton, Hist, of Scotland.

Estates of the Realm, THE, are defined by Bishop Stubbs as "the several THE, are orders, states, or conditions of men who are recognised as possessing political power." As originally constituted in England they were the nobles, the clergy, and the commons. The mistake of describing the three Estates as consisting of the King, Lords, and Commons, is quite as old as the fifteenth century, and is due to the failure of the Parliamentary representation of the clergy as a separate Estate. This failure has caused the Estates to assume the Parliamentary form of Lords Spiritual, Lords Temporal, and Commons. The precedence given to the clergy would appear to be a matter of courtesy; the Commons (communitas communitatum, the general body into which organised bodies of freemen are combined) is always the third Estate. It was some time before the three Estates assumed their final form. At one time there seemed to be son 3 probability that there would be a sub-estate of the lawyers, who were much favoured by Edward I., and of the merchants, who were frequently consulted previous to the imposition of taxation upon their order. It was some time, too, before the lesser nobility separated from the baronage, and before the prelates were included in the latter body, the lesser clergy preferring to assemble in Convocation. In Scotland the three Estates comprised the prelates, the tenants in thief, great and small, and the townsmen. In 1428, James I., in imitation of the English system, instituted commissioners of shires, to supersede the personal appearance of the minor tenants-in-chief; then the three Estates becamo the lords lay and clerical, the commissioners of shires, and the burgesses, who throughout their history continued to sit in one house. In 1640, the Parliament re-arranged itself into three Estates-the nobility, the barons, or representatives of the smaller freeholders, and the burgesses with their commissioners, to the exclusion of the bishops, but this was repealed on the restoration of the episcopacy by Charles II.

See the admirable discussion of the whole subject in Stubbe's Const. Hist., ii., chap. xv. Also Lorde' Report on the Dignity of a Peer, and Erskine, Institutes of the Law of Scotland.

Estates, The Committee of the, was appointed by the Scotch Parliament of 1640 to act in permanence during the recesses, both in the camp and at the capital. It consisted of so many from each of the three Estates, which were now defined to be the nobility, barons, and burgesses. It dissolved in 1648.

after the battle of Preston, but a new Comnittee was formed by Argyie and his friends, who treated with the victorious Croinwell. After the battle of Worcester, those of the Committee of Estates who had supported the coronation of Charies II. at Scone were sent as prisoners to London. The Committee was resumed after the Resteration, pending the arrival of the Commissioner, Middleton. It signalised its short reign by committing to prison some Remonstrant elergy.

Ethandun, The Battle of (878), was the great victory of Alfred over the Danes after his retirement to Athelney; this ied immediately to the treaty with Guthrum. [Alfued.] Ethandun has been identified with Edington, near Westbury, Wilts; with Yatton, five miles north-west of Chippenham; and with Heddington, which is on the Roman road between Bath and Marlborough.

Ethel is defined in the Anglo-Saxon dictionaries as equivalent to terra hereditaria and fundus paternus, or sometimes, in a wider sense, to patria. It is the word used to translate country in the Anglo-Saxon version of St. Inke. It is the same word as the odal of the Scandinavian races. Though perhaps not etymologically connected with "alod"—a relationship which, however, some scholars allow-it has practically the same signification, and denotes the land which in early Teutonic days belonged indefeasibly to the head of each househeld, and which its owner held, not of the king's gift or any other man's favour, free from all burdens save that of the public defence. Perhaps from the very earliest days the ethel may have been subject to assist in the repair of bridges and the maintenance of fortifications, as well as to serve in the fyrd; but the "trinoda necessitas" is said not to appear in genuine Anglo-Saxon documents before the beginning of the eighth century. The alod, or ethel, was the primitive homestead, the possession of which marked out the fullyqualified freeman from all other men. By virtue of this ownership he was justified in taking part in the council of his nation, and in fighting in its wars. For the title-deeds of his estate he looked primarily to no written evidence, but to the undisputed possession by which he and his ancestors had held the soil. Later, as more and more of the folk-land was changed into book-land, and the greater secu-rity of chartered proof became evident, the owner of an ethel gradually took to the custom of receiving charters. Many of the smaller allodial holders, indeed, seem to have sold their land to the wealthier lords, or to have commended themselves to a patron, and so received back their old estates as a gift. The word ethel, or athel, occurs in many compounds, both in the names of persons and places, e.g., Athelstan, Atheling, Ethelred, Athelney, &c. [ALODIAL LAND.]

Ethelbald (ETHELBALD), King of the West Saxons (855 — 860), succeeded his father, Ethelwulf. His marriage with his step-mother, Judith, is the solitary fact we know about him with certnicity, as there is a gap in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle from 855 to 860.

Ethelbald (ÆTHELBALD) (b. 716, d. 757), King of Mercia, was descended from one of the brothers of Penda. He was persecuted by Ceolred, and took refuge in the marshes of Fenland. On the death of Ceolred, he was unanimously chosen king. His reign was distinguished by many successful conflicts against the Britons, and though he failed to subdue Northumbria and Wessex, he assumed the title of "Rex Britannie." He was defeated by Cuthred of Wessex at Burford, in 752, and again, in 757, at which battle he is supposed to have been slain.

Ethelbert (ÆTHELBERHT) (s. 860, d. 866), King of the West Saxons, succeeded his father, Ethelwulf, in the kingdom of Kent, and his by ther Ethelbuld in Wessex, though according to his father's will the latter kingdom should have gone to Ethelred. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle tells us that "he held the kingdom in good order and great tranquillity." Most of his reign was occupied in repelling the incursions of the Danes, who were at this time strong enough and bold enough to attack Winchester, the royal city of the West Saxon kings.

Ethelbert (ÆTHELBERHT) (b. 560? d. 616), King of Kent, ranks as the third Bretwalds. We are told that "in the infancy of his reign he was such an object of contempt to the neighbouring kings, that, defeated in two battles, he could scare ly protect his frontier; but in riper years he quickly, by successive victories, subjugated every kingdom of tho Angles, with the exception of Northumbria." This statement of William of Malmesbury is greatly exaggerated, and probably means little more than that he conquered Sussex and Essex, and obtained a nominal suzerainty over the other kingdoms. His marriage with Bertha, daughter of Charibert, King of the Franks, is the important event in his reign, as it led indirectly to the coming of St. Augustine and the conversion of Ethelbert to Christianity (597). Ethelbert was the first king among the Angle-Saxons who drew up a code of laws.

Ethelfieda (ÆTHELFLÆD) (d. 919), was a daughter of King Alfred. She was married to the Ealdorman Ethelred, and, together with her husband, ruled over Mercia. She was of great assistance to her brother Edward in his wars against the Danes, and joined him in rebuilding Chester and other ancient towns that had fallen into decay. In 916 her troops defeated the Welsh at Brecknock. Her husband died in 912, and she left only a daughter, Elfwin, whom Edward deprived of the government of Mercia, and forcibly carried off to Wessex. Ethelfieda seems to have had the title of "The Lady of the Mercians," expressive of the power she possessed, and the relations in which she stood to Edward.

Ethelfrith (ÆTHELPRITH), King of Northumbria (593—617), was the son and successor of Ethelric. He married a daught of the Ella of Deira, and incorporated that state with his own kingdom of Bernicia, having driven Edwin (q.v.), the son of Ella, into exile. He was a far-sighted and successful king. He defeated the Scots and the Britons, and captured the city of Chester. He destroyed the monastery of Bangoryscoed, and put all the monks to death, asserting that as they prayed for his defeat, they were, though unarmed, fighting against him. Ethelfrith, having learnt that his brother-in-law, Edwin, had taken refuge with Redwald of East Anglla, demanded that he should be given up; and on his request being refused, war ensued, in which Ethelrith was defeated and slain.

Ethelheard (ÆTHELHEARD) (s. 725, d. 740), King of Wessex, succeeded his brother-in-law, Ina. He was descended from Cerdie, but belonged probably to a distant branch of the royal house. His election was opposed by the Atheling Oswald, but unsuccessfully. His reign was an unfortunate one; the British recovered something of what they had lost, and the Mercians captured Some.ton (733), an important border fortress, now a mere village, between Oxford and Banbury; and Wessex was obliged, in some degree, to own the Mercian overlordship.

Ethelhun (ÆTHELHUN), called "The Proud Ealdorman," robelled against Cuthred of Wessex in 750, but was defeated, and pardoned. In 752, it was chiefly owing to his bravery that the West Saxons won the battle of Burford.

Ethelnoth (ÆTHELNOTH), Archbishop of Centerbury (1020—1038), had been one of the chaplains of Canute, and was one of that king's chief advisers. It is to him that we must attribute much of Canute's civil and ecclesiastical policy. Ethelnoth was a man of large views, and being himself a secular, did much to improve the position of the secular clergy. During Canute's absence from England, Ethelnoth was one of the regents of the kingdom, and to him the king addressed his famous letter describing his visit to Rome. On Canute's death, in 1035, Ethelnoth refused to crown Harold, and prohibited any of the bishops doing so.

Ethelred (ETHELRED) I., J. g of the West Saxons (866—871), was the son of Ethelwulf, and succeeded on the death of his brother Ethelred. His reign is important for his great structure. for his great struggle with the Danes. At first the invading host attacked the tributary provinces. Northumberland, disputed between rival kings, fell an easy prey, and one or two other provinces received a tributary crown at the hands of the heathen invaders. They next entered Mercia. The West Saxon monarch, hastening to the relief of his vassals, was unable to dislodge the invaders from Nottingham, which they had seized. East Anglia was completely conquered, and its king, Edmund, put to death In 871 the Danes attacked Wessex, and made Reading their head-quarters. Thence they sallied forth, and no less than nine pitched battles ("folk-fights"), besides numerous smaller engagements, were fought between the Danes, led by Bagsecg and Halfdene, and the English, under Ethelred and his brother Alfred. The most important of these fights took place at Ashdown, in which the English were completely victorious; but in many of the other battles the Danes got the upper midst of this struggle Ethelr nd. Etheired (ÆTHY LD) II., KINO (b. 968, s. 979, a. 116), somet mes called the "Unready" of Purposeles.—the son of Edgar by Elfrida, was born in the year 968, and succeeded on the murder of his half-brother Edward. During the early part of his reign the government was in the hands of his mother, and very probably Dunstan (q.v.) remained chief adviser. We read of incursions of the Danes from the very commencement of this reign, but it was not till after the death of Dunstan, in 988, that we have the beginning of Danish attempts at settlement. In 991 East Anglia was attacked, and the great battle of Maldon fought, in which the brave Ealdorman Brihtnoth was slain. In this year too, by the advice of Archbishop Sigeric, the fatal plan of buying off the invaders was adopted. In addition to foreign enemies, Ethelred had to contend against treason at home, his two favourites, Elfric, Ealdorman of Mercia, and Edric Streona, frequently betraying his plans to the Danes. After re-peated raids on England, Olaf of Norway was bought off in 994. But the Danes still continued their incursions. In 997 Devon and Cornwall, in 998 Dorset and Hampshire, and in 999 Kent, were carried by them. In 1000 Etholred led an army into Cumberland against Malcolm, who had refused to pay money for buying off the Danes, and in the same year an English force invaded Normandy unsuccessfully. The quarrel with Normandy was, however, soon made up, and in 1002 Ethelred married Emma, the sister of the Norman duke. In that year the sum of £24,000 was paid to the Danes. This year also saw an attempt to exterminate the Danes by the massacro of St. Brico (1002), which, far from accomplishing its purpose, only lea to Sweyn gathering a large force together to avenge the slaughter. He captured Exeter and Salisbury, and met with no resistance, savo in East Anglia. In 1006 "the great fleet came to Sandwich, and did all as they were went; they ravaged and burned and destroyed wherever they went." Once more they were bribed to leave England. In 1008 Ethelred got together a fleet to oppose the Danes, but quarrelsamong the commanders and a great storm ruined this project, and tho last chance against the invaders was gone. In 1009 London was ineffectually attacked, but Oxford was burnt, and "at length there was no head man who would assemble forces, but each fled as he best might; nor at the last would even one shire help another." In 1013 Sweyn made another great attack on England. The North at once submitted t him, and by the end of the year he was master of the whole country, and was acknowledged king, and Ethelred fled, with his wife and children, to his brother-inlaw's court in I'mandy. But Sweyn's death, in February, 1014, enabled Ethel-red to return. With the aid of his son Edmund ho drovo out Canute, who had been chosen king by the Danish portion of the inhabitants. But Canute returned in 1015, and ravaged Wessex; next year ho passed into Mercia and Northumbria, which submitted to him. While he was preparing for the final conquest of Wessex, Ethelred died (April 23, 1016). Ethelred was twice married, his first wife being Ælflæd, and his second, Emma of Normandy. Of Ethelred the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle says, "he held his kingdom with great toil and great difficulties the while that his life lasted." Among tho West Saxon kings, Mr. Freeman remarks, "Ethelred stands alone in presenting tho wretched spectacle of a long reign of utter misgovernment, unredeemed, as far as we can see, by any of those personal oxcellences which have sometimes caused public errors and crimes to be forgotten.

Anglo-Sazon Chron.; Lappenberg, Anglo-Sazon Kings; Freeman, Norm. Conq., vol. i.

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED), King of Mercia

(675-704), was the son of Penda and brother of Wulfhere, whom he succeeded. He married Osthryth, sister of Alfred of Northumbria. He defeated Lothaire of Kent in 675, and ravaged tho whole of that kingdom. The remainder of his reign was peaceful, savo for an attack on his brother-in-law, whom he compelled to restore the province of Lindsey to Mercia. He resigned the crown in 704 in favour of his nephew, Cenred, and became a monk in the abbey of Bardesey, where he died, in 716.

Ethelred (ÆTHELRED), King of Northumbria (774—779 and 789—793), was the son of Ethelwald. In the fifth year of his reign ho was compelled to abdicate and fly the country, but the death of Alfwold and the bad government of Oswold afforded an opportunity for his return. He attempted to strengthen himself by the murder of his uncle, but in the sequel was himself assassinated by some of his thegns.

Ethelwald (ÆTHELWALD) Moll, King of Northumbria (759—765), succeeded after the murder of Oswulf. His parentage is unknown, but very probably he was one of the thegns who assassinated Oswulf. Civil war distracted his reign, and he was eventually defeated, and obliged to resign his throne.

Ethelwald (ÆTHELWALD) was the son of Ethelred I. In 901 he rebelled against Edward the Elder, and seized Warcham, saying that he would either live there or die there; but on the approach of Edward, he fled to the Danes in Northumbria. In 904 he subdued Essex, and persuaded the East Anglian Danes to invado Mercia, but in 905 was slain in a skirmish.

Ethelweard (ÆTHELWEARD), or as ho styles himself "Fabius Quæstor Ethelwerdus," was the author of a Latin Chronicle of the Saxon Kings of England. Of the author nothing is known with certainty, beyond the fact that he was (according to his own account) the great-grandson of King Ethelred, brother of Alfred the Great. He probably died in the closing years of the tenth century. Ethelweard's Chronicle extends from the Creation to the reign of Edgur. It is for the most part a mere Latin abridgment of Bede's Ecclesiastical History and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; but, says Sir T. Hardy, "he has the merit of being the only Latin historian in an interval of two centuries."

Ethelweard's Chronicle was first printed by Sir H. Savile in 1896, in Scriptores Post Bedam, and has been reprinted in the Monumenta Historia Britannia.

Ethelwulf (ÆTHELWULF), King of the West Saxons (s. 837, d. 858), was the son of Egbert, whom he succeeded. His reign was occupied in great measure in repelling the Ethelwulf marched against them, and routed them at Ockley; and in 85" he assisted Burhred, King of Mercia, against the North Welsh, "and made them all obedient to him." In 855 the Danes, for the first time, wintered in England, and in this year Ethelwulf made a pilgrimage to Rome, whither he had sent his youngest son, Alfred, two years previously. On his way home he married Judith, danghter of Charles the Bold, King of the West Franks, and grandson of Charlemagne. During his absence, Asser tells us, his son, Ethelbald, conspired against him, and Ethelwulf, on his return, to avoid a civil war, gave up Wessex to him, retaining only Kent for himself. Ethelwulf is best known for his famous "Donation," which is often said to have originated the system of Tithes (q.v.). In reality, it was merely "the devotion of a tenth part of his private estate to ecclesiastical purposes, the relief of a tenth part of the folk-land from all payments except the Trinoda necessitas, and the direction that every ten hides of his land should provide for one poor man or stranger."

Eustace (d. 1153), the second son of King Stephen, was heir-apparent to his father hy the death of his elder brother, Baldwin. Stephen was extremely anxious that Eustace should be crowned king in his lifetime, thus ensuring the succession to him, but this the Pope refused to allow, it being evident that such a course would only perpetuate the period of civil war. Eustace died in 1153, and thus the way was open for the compromise between Stephen and Henry II., which was effected by the Treaty of Wallingford. Eustace married Constance, sister of Louis VII. of France, but left no children.

Eutaw Springs, The Battle of (Sept. 8, 1781), was the last serious engagement in the American War of Independence. On the departure of Lord Rawdon for England, Colonel Stewart had succeeded to the command at Charleston. Greene was too strong and too nnembarrassed to remain any longer quiet, and he descended from the Santee Hills, with the intention of driving the British into Charleston, and there blockading them. Stewart met him at the Eutaw Springs. At first the English were repulsed along the whole line, but they gained time to rally, and returning to the attack, drove the Americans from their positions, and remained masters of the field. Their loss, however, was seven hundred men, who could be ill spared, especially in their then critical condition of affairs. Stewart was too much weakened to reap any results from his victory, and was compelled to fall back to Charleston Neck, and to look on while Greene overran South Carolina and Georgia.

Evelyn, John (b. 1620, d. 1706), served in several official positions during the reign of Charles II. He was one of the Council for the Management of the Plantations, and a member of the Board of Trade, and in 1695 he became Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. Evelyn wrote several works on horticulture, architecture, and general literature. He was also the author of a Diary, which, together with his letters, was first printed in 1818, and has been frequently republished. Evelyn's Memoirs are of great value for their sketches of persons and society during the latter half of the seventeenth century.

Evesham, THE BATTLE OF (1265), was fought during the Barons' War between Prince Edward and Simon de Montfort. The quarrel with the Dc Clares and the escape of Prince Edward had arrayed a formidable band of enemies against De Montfort. The royalists were in the Welsh Marches, whither Simon set out against them; but by the capture of Gloucester they cut off his retreat, and having routed the younger Simon, Edward marched to Evesham, where De Montfort was waiting for his son. On August 4 the armies met, and De Montfort at once perceived that he was altogether outnumbered. "God have mercy on our souls," he cried, "for our bodies are the prince's!" In vain he attempted to force his way to Kenilworth, and at length all he could do was to draw his troops round him in a comact ring, and await the attack of the royalists. His son Henry fell at his feet, and at last tho earl himself rushed into the thickest of the fight, and was hewn down. The royalists refused quarter, and terrible havoc was made of the baronial forces. "The victory of the king's party at Evesham," says Mr. Blaanw, "was so complete, that the disproportionate loss on the other side, betokening more a surprise than a battle, caused it to be thus described hy Robert of Gloucester: 'Such was the murder of Evesham, for battle none it was!'" The royalists had distinguished themselves by red crosses on their arms, and the few who fell in the action owed their death to neglect of this precaution, being killed by their own comrades in mistake.

Evesham, The Chronicle of, is a monastic record, containing a history from the foundation of the abbey at the end of the seventh century to the year 1415. Though of slight historical value, it is important for the accurate and detailed picture it gives of the inner and daily life of a great abbey.

Exchequer was the name of the court in which, after the Conquest, the financial

business of the country was transacted. name arose from the chequered cloth, like a chess-board, which covered the table of the court. The chequers were probably useful in counting money, for which purpose counters were used as late as the reign of Edward II. The organisation of the court dates from Henry I., and it seems to have been originally merely a specialised financial committee of the Great Council. Its principal officers were the great officers of the state and household, with certain others, councillors or judges, appointed by the king, who were called Barons of the Exchequer (Barones Scaecarii). The court was generally held at Westminster, but was not fixed there in the twelfth century. Henry II. restored the court, and a full account of it as it existed in his reign is contained in the work called Dialogus de Scaccario. Two full sessions were held each year, at Easter and Michaelmas. At these the sheriffs gave in their accounts. These accounts were rendered in three divisions: in the profer, at which the sheriff paid the larger part of the money in hand; the visus compoti, or statement; and the summa, or final balance, with vouchers. All the revenue from the ferm or rent of the counties, the danegeld, pleas of the crown, aids, and other feudal dues, were thus brought into the Exchequer. The accounts with the sheriffs were kept by tallies, or pieces of wood inscribed and notched. These were divided down the middle, and onehalf was kept by the sheriff and the other by the court. Payment of the ferm of the counties was made in money instead of in kind in the reign of Henry II. Besides the receipt of revenue, the business of the Exchequer included jurisdiction in cases which affected the revenue by the payment of fines; it recorded agreements, charters, and feoff-ments; and it sometimes seems to have acted as a political council of state, especially in matters of foreign treaties. When the office of Justiciar became extinct, the place of president at the Exchequer Board, which formerly belonged to the Justiciar, was taken by the Treasurer. By 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 15, the whole position of the Exchequer as regards the receipt of revenue was changed. For this purpose its organisation consists of a Board, at the head of which is an officer called the Comptroller-General. All revenue is paid into the Bank of England to his account, and all payments made by the Exchequer are made in virtue of warrants from the Treasury

The Exchequer must also be considered with reference to jurisdiction. No small part of its judicial business was lost by the separation of the Court of Common Pleas from the King's Bench (Magna Charta, art. 17). It still retained jurisdiction in revenue cases, and in the pleas of all who were in any way connected with the court. Special leave was also given to implead in the Exchequer as an indulgence. Like the other courts, the Exchequer drew business to itself wherever it was possible. This usurpation of jurisdiction was made a subject of complaint, and by the Articuli super cartas (28 Ed. I., c. 4) it was provided that no common pleas except those of privileged persons should be heard in that court. From the reign of Edward II. a regular series of Chief Barons begins. With this separate organisation, however, the nsurpation by the Exchequer of jurisdiction properly belonging to other courts continued. It drew jurisdiction to itself by means of a writ of que minus, in which it was suggested that the plaintiff was indebted to the crown, and needed payment from the defendant to enable him to pay the king. Courts of Exchequer were set up in Scotland and in Ireland, when those countries were united to England as regards legislation. The fiction of the writ of quo minus was abolished by 2 Will. IV., c. 39—the Uniformity of Process Act—and a proper jurisdiction was given to the Exchequer. An equitable jurisdiction also pertained to this court, which was extended by the same means as those used in its common law sidc. While, however, the barons were the judges on the common law side, the Treasurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer presided in equity cases. The appointment of the Chancellor dates from the reign of Edward II. In his oath of office he bound himself to use the seal of the Exchequer for no writs of other courts while the Chancery was within twenty miles. The last case in which the Chancellor exercised judicial functions was in 1735. The equity business of the Exchequer was transferred to the Court of Chancery by The Court of Exchequer has now become, by the Act of 1873, the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice. The Chanceller of the Exchequer has now no judicial functions, and is the member of the cabinet who is at the head of the financial administration and acts as Minister of Finance.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber was erected as a statutory court by 31 Ed. III., c. 12, to decide cases on writs of error from the common law side of the Exchequer. Its judges were the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, and the justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas. This court was re-organised by 27 Eliz., c. 8, which may indeed be more properly said to have created a new court, having jurisdiction in appeal from the King's Bench. By 1 Will. IV., c. 70, a new court was erected, for the judgments of each common-law court were made subject to revision by the judges of the other two courts sitting in the Exchequer Chamber. The appellate jurisdiction of this court was transferred to the new Court of Appeal, founded by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict., c. 66, s. 18).

Excise, THE, is generally defined as a duty charged before their sale on goods which are manufactured and consumed at home; but it is sometimes used of any tax laid upon the retail trade. It is generally supposed that this tax was first levied in England by the Parliamentary party in the time of the Civil War; but it is obvious that some of the imposts of the later Angevin kings may have been exacted in this way. However, it was not until 1643, when an excise on liquors was imposed, in imitation of the Dutch, by an ordinance of both Houses, and afterwards by the king's rival convention at Oxford, that it became a recognised source of revenue. After the Restoration half its produce was assigned to the erown in compensation for the surrender of the revenues derived from feudal tenure, whereby the burdens of the rich were transferred to the whole nation. James II. obtained from his first Parliament extra excise and custom duties, valued at £900,000 a year, but only £300,000 of this, taken from the excise, was granted to William and Mary, although the revenue granted to Charles II. was continued. At the same time, Parliament declared the excise to be "the most easy and indifferent levy that could be laid upon the people." This view was not shared by the nation at large, and the excise long continued to be a most obnoxious tax, the popular prejudices, caused partly by the practice of letting out the duties in farm, and partly by the obscurity of the statutes bearing on the subject, being even entertained by men like Blackstone and Dr. Johnson. Sir Robert Walpole, in 1733, found these prejudices fatal to his Excise Scheme. He wished to conciliate the country gentlemen by diminishing the landtax to one shilling, and for that purpose imposed a duty on salt. When the new tax was found to fall short by two-thirds of the required amount, he proposed-not indeed, as had been reported—a general system of excise, but the substitution of exeise duties for customs duties on wine and tobacco. By this means smuggling would be lessened, while by a system of warehousing without tax for reexportation, London would become a free port. The Opposition, however, raised a most violent outcry against the measure, and the general dislike to it was so great that it was thought an attempt to enforce it would have been mct by armed resistance in some localities, the ministerial party dwindled rapidly away, and Walpole was compelled to withdraw the bill based upon his resolution. Subsequent ministries, however, increased the amount of the excise duties, partly to decrease drunkenness (for instance, in 1746 a tax of 20s. a gallon was laid on spirits, and in consequence smuggling increased a hundredfold), and levied them on a large number of commodities. This was especially the case during the great struggle with Napoleon, when the excise included taxes on nearly every conceivable article of home manufacture and consumption—licences to permit persons to carry on certain trades, to shoot game, post-horse duties, duties on sales by auction, and other imposts. A great many of these duties have, however, since been abolished, and others have been transferred to the customs. The excise is now almost confined to British spirits and malt liquors. The management of the excise has also been simplified, notably in 1823, when the separate boards for the three kingdoms were abolished, and in 1848, when the Board left Gresham House, and was merged with those of stamps and taxes into the Inland Revenue Board at Somerset House. Exclusion Bill, The, was first brought into the House of Commons in 1679. It disabled the Duke of York, as a Papist, from succeeding to the crown, should he outlive his brother. It met with considerable opposition in the Commons, but eventually passed by 207 votes to 128, upon which Charles dissolved Parliament. He was, however, soon obliged to summon it again (October, 1680), and the Exclusion Bill was again passed by the Commons; but the Lords, chiefly through the influence of Halifax, rejected it by 63 to 30. In January, 1681, the Commons voted that no supplies should be granted till the Exclusion Bill was passed, and refused to entertain Halifax's proposal, by which James was to rule only in name, a regent being appointed on his accession to the crown. Again the Parliament was dissolved (January 16, 1681), but not before the Commons had voted that the opponents of the Exclusion Bill were traitors bought with French money. Again, in the Parliament which met at Oxford in March, 1681, the Commons insisted on the passing of the Exclusion Bill. But this Parliament was in like manner dissolved, and Charles summoned no more Parliaments during his reign and consequently, the Exclusion Bill fell through. The Exclusion Bill had proposed that the erown should descend to the heirs of the Duke of York on Charles's demise, in the same manner as if the duke was himself dead; but in spite of the temper of the times a great deal of opposition to the measure arose from the fear that Shaftesbury and others were desirous of making Monmouth king.

Exeter was probably a hill-fort of the Celtio inhabitants of Damnonia. Its ancient name Caer Wise became Isea, or Isea Damnoniorum in Iatin, and Exancesster in Anglo-Saxon. Conquered by the English at an uncertain date, the city was strongly fortified by Athelstan. It was several times besieged by the Danes in the reigns of Alfred and Etholred II., and captured by Sweyn, owing to the treason of its governor, Hugh the French, in 1003. It was erected an episcopal see by Edward the Confessor in 1046. In 1067 Excter was besieged and captured by William the Conqueror. In Sept., 1497, it was unsuccessfully besieged by Perkin Warbeck, and in 1549 it successfully stood a great siege against the Western insurgents. Throughout the Civil War, Exeter was for the most part Royalist. It was captured by Princo Maurice in 1642, and remained in the hands of the king's adherents till nearly tho close of the war, when it was retaken by Fairfax (1646). It was the first importent place in England reached by William of Orange, who entered Exeter Nov. 9, 1688. The cathedral, which was commenced by Bishop William of Warlewast in 1112, or perhaps earlier, was not completed till late in the fifteenth century.

Exeter, Peerage of. In early times tho Earls of Devon were frequently styled Earls of Exeter. The first distinct peerage deriving its name from the city was the aukedom of Exeter, conferred, 1397, upon John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, third son of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent (son-in-law of Edr und Plantagenet, Earl of Kent), in 1399: nowever, the duko was degraded, and his honours became forfeit. In 1416 Thomas Beaufort, youngest son of John of Gaunt, was created Duko of Exeter for his life. Afterwards, 1443, John Holland, son of the first duke, was created duke, having been restored in blood and honours twenty-six years earlier. Tho dukedom, however, again became forfeit on the attainder of his son Henry, 1461. In 1525, Henry Courtenay, Earl of Devon, was made Marquis of Exeter, as was also his son Edward, 1553, the father having been attainted in 1539; on Edward's death, without issue, 1556, the title became extinct. In 1605 Thomas Cecil, second Lord Burghley, was created Earl of Exeter, and the honour still remains in his family, Henry Cecil, tenth earl, having been advanced to a Marquisate of tho same style, 1801.

Exeter, Henry Holland, Duke of (d. 1473), was the son of John, Duke of Exeter. He was one of the principal leaders of the Lancastrian purty, though he married Anne, daughter of Richard, Duke of York. Ho fought in the battles of Wakefield and Towton, and after the latter, escaped to Scotland, and was attainted by Edward IV. He afterwards returned, and fought in the battle of Barnet, where he was left for dead on the field, but recovering, fled to France, where he was in such abject poverty that he was obliged to beg his bread in the streets. In 1473 his corpse was discovered on the seashore near Dover, without any clue as to how it got there.

Exeter, Thomas Beaufort, Duke of (d. 1427), was the son of John of Gaunt and Catherine Swynford. He was appointed Captain of Calais in 1407, and in 1410 succeeded Arundel as Chancollor. He held the Great Seal for two years, and on his resignation, was created Earl of Dorset. He was one of the commanders in the French wars of Henry V. and Henry VI.'s reigns, and in 1415 was made Duke of Exeter. He was taken prisoner in the battle of Beaugé in 1421, but was released soon after, and was one of the Council during the minority of Henry VI. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir T. Neville, but left no issue.

Exeter, Thomas Cecil, Earl of (b. 1542, d. 1622), the eldest son of Lord Burleigh, was one of the leaders of the queen's troops against the northern rebels in 1569; he took part in the Scotch expedition in favour of the Regent Murray, and subsequently did good service in the Low Countries, in reward for which he was made Governor of Hull, 1585. He was created Earl of Exoter by James I., 1605.

Exhibition, The Great (1851). The idea of holding a great international exposition of the industrial products of the world, if it did not originate with Prince Albert, the husband of Queen Victoria, was taken up by him with so much energy, that the credit belongs to him. Under his auspices a Royal Commission for this purpose was issued in Jan., 1850, and on May 1, 1851, the exhibition was opened by the Queen in Hyde Park. It remained open till Oct. 15, 1851, having attained a success beyond all expectation. The buildings of glass and iron were subsequently removed to form the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. A second international exhibition was held from May to November, 1862; and since then many others have been held in London and almost every civilised capital.

Exton, Sir Piers, is supposed to have been a relative of Sir Nicholas Exton, who was Lord Mayor of London in 1386 and 1387. Exton is said to have murdered Richard II. in Pontefract Castle, but the whole circumstances of Richard's death are too obscure to allow us to charge him with the crime with any degree of confidence.

Extradition is the surrender of fugitives from justice by one state to another. No systematic usage in this matter prevailed until the nineteenth century. I'erhaps the only early treaty containing a provision as to extradition was that of 1174, between William of Scotland and Henry II., wherein it was agreed that persons guilty of felony in England taking refuge in Scotland should be given up, and vice versá. But the other mediaval treaties usually quoted-s.g., the Intercursus Magnus with Flanders in 1497appear to have contained nothing more than general promises not to harbour rebels. The question of extradition seems to have been first investigated by Grotius and the jurists of the seventeenth century, who laid down the principle that states were bound, either by the law of nations or by reasons of "comity," to give up fugitive criminals; but the earliest distinct statement of English common law was the declaration of the Court of Exchequer in 1749, that "the government may send a prisoner to answer for a crime wherever committed." Yet such dieta, though recognising the duty of extradition, were of slight autherity, and action upon them could have been prevented by an appeal for a writ of Habeas Corpus. England for the first time bound itself by treaty at the Peace of Amiens in 1802, in which it was agreed with France that fugitives charged with forgery, fraudu-lent bankruptcy, or murder should be sur-During the early part of the rendered. nineteenth century the law of extradition was rapidly developed in the United States, owing to the need of some arrangement between the States forming the Union and between the United States and Canada. In England, however, the history of extradition really begins with the treaties of 1842 with the United States, and of 1843 with France. In 1852 a new convention was made with France, and in this, for the first time, exception was made in the case of persons charged with political offences. Each of these treaties had been confirmed by Act of Parliament, the constitutional doctrine being that, though the crown could make extradition treaties, the executive could not carry them out without statutory authority. On the other hand, "it may be regarded as certain that England will not surrender fugitives except under a treaty' Wheaton, International Law, ed. Boyd, § 116, b). The Extradition Act of 1870 empowered the executive to carry out extradition treaties made in accordance with its provisions, viz., that no fugitive should be surrendered for a political offence, nor tried for any but the crime for which he was demanded. Under this statute extradition treatics have been made with almost every European state, and with some others.

Pabyan, or Pabian, Robert (d. 1512), was an English chronicler of the fifteenth century. He was a prosperous I ondon citizen, and became sheriff in 1493. His book, A Concordance of Histories, begins, as usual, with Brutus, and is a commonplace compilation up to his own time, when it becomes moderately useful as contemporary, if uncritical, evidence, and is especially full on London history. The first edition was printed in 1516.

Pactory Legislation. The great development of English industry towards the The great end of the eighteenth century, unaccompanied by any State regulation or supervision, led to gross and wide-spread neglect of the commonest precautions for the preservation of the health of the workers. the health of the workers. In the nine-teenth century a long series of Acts were bassed designed to protect the health of labourers in factories and workshops, and Health and Morals Act of 1802 (42 Geo. III., c. 73), was passed at the instance of Sir Robert Peel the elder. It provided for the cleansing and ventilation of factories; but the scandals of the apprentice system had produced the Act, and it was mainly directed to limiting the hours of apprentices' work to twelve a day, the prohibition for them of night work, with some arrangements for their clothing, education, and moral well-being The Second Factory Act of 1819 (59 Geo. III., c. 56) vas passed on the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons, appointed in 1816. Its operation was limited to cotton-mills. By it, children under nine were not to be employed at all. Estween nine and sixteen, they were not to work over twelve hours a day, and night work was prohibited. In 1833, Lord Atthorpe's Act (3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 103) became law. It introduced the "half-time" principle for "children" (i.e., those between nine and thirteen) and their education and thirteen), and made their education out of work hours compaisery. The provisions confined by earlier Acts to cotton-mills were made more general, and a new departure was made by some provision for the welfare of "young persons" (i.e., those between thirteen and eighteen). Inspectors were appointed to see the Acts carried out, as the justices had proved but incfficient executors of previous legislation. But a more general law was still wanted, and Sir Robert Peel's Factory Act, 1844 (7 & 8 Vict., c. 15), was passed. Lord Ashley's long and philanthropic agitatien had won two victories over the government in the House of Commons in favour of a ten nours' limit to the labour of women and children. At last, Peel agreed to accept a twelve hours' limit, and the amended bill of Lord Ashley thus became law. Its provisions were that the working hours of children under thirteen should be diminished to six and a half hours per day; that the time during which they were to be under daily instruction in schools should be extended from two to tyo and a half hours in winter, and three he are in summer; that the labour of persons between thirteen and eighteen, and of adult women (now first brought under the Factory

Acts), should be limited to twelve hours a day; that a certificate of baptism should be produced, if demanded, to prove that the child was really of the age required by the law; that the amount of the fines imposed for the violation of the law should be diminished, but that they should be inflieted for each person improperly worked, instead of for each offence, which might include several persons; and that machinery should be guarded, to prevent accident. Inspectors were appointed to earry out the Act. In 1847, Mr. Fielden, member for Oldham, introduced and carried a bill which limited the labour of young peoplo between the ages of thirteen and eighteen to twolvo hours a day, allowing two hours out of the twelve fer meals; and ho further proposed that the same restriction should apply to females above eighteen years of age. The principle of State regulation of the labour of women and children was thus fully recognised. The piecemeal method of English legislation rendered it now necessary for the friends of the Factory Acts to get supplemental statutes passed to includo the unprotected industries. Among these were the Mining Act of 1842, which entirely prohibited female and child labour in mines. In 1845, Lord Ashley's Print-works Act was passed. In 1850 a thorough measure for supervising mines was passed (Coal and Iron Mines Act). Not till 1860 were bleaching and dye-works included in the Acts; not till 1867 were all factories included in the scope of the Factory Acts Extension and Workshop Regulation Acts (30 & 31 Viet., e. 103 & 146); and even hero small exceptions required subsequent legislation, and the mistake of the Act of 1867 in entrusting the working to local authority had to be corrected in 1871 by its transference to Government inspectors. In 1878 was passed Sir R. A. (afterwards Viscount) Cross's Factory and Workshop Act (41 Vict., c. 16), repealing, eonsolidating, and amending all prior Acts. There was further legislation in 1891 and 1895. In 1901 an Act was passed consolidating, with amendments, all previous Acts. In 1886 Sir John Lubbock's Shop Hours Act, amended 1892, limiting the hours of labour for young persons in retail shops, was passed, and a Shop Assistants (Seats) Act in 1899.

Von Plener, English Factory Legislation, trans-lated by Weinman, is the standard history. For the working of the Acts, see Report of the Factory Acts Commission. Notcutt's Law Relating to Factories will explain the present law. A briefer account can be found in Stanley Jevons, The State in Relation to Labour.

Fairfax, Ferdinando (b. 1584, d. 1648), 2nn Baron (of Cameron, in the peerage of Scotland), son of Sir Thomas Fairfax, of Denton, Yorkshire, married Mary, daughter of Lord Sheffield. Lord Fairfax represented Yorkshire in the Long Parlianient, and was appointed, in Nov., 1642, commander-in-chief of the Parliamentary forces in the northern counties. After some successes he was obliged to retreat into the West Riding before the superior forces of the Marquis of Newcastle, and suffered a severe defeat at Adwalton Moor, near Bradford (June 30, 1643). With the remainder of his troops he mado his way to Hull, which he successfully held against Newcastle's army, until ho forced t'em to raise the siege (Sept. 2—Oct. 11, 1 43). He took part in the battle of Marsten Moor, and on the capture of York by the combined army (July, 1644) was appointed its governor. He resigned in consequence of the Self-Denying Ordinance, and diod March 14, 1648.

Pairfax, Thomas, 3RD Lord (b. Jan. 12, 1612, d. 1671), son of the preceding, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and married Anne, daughter of Lord Vero (1637). He served in the royal army against the Seots, and was knighted by the king for his services. When the Civil War began he acted as his father's lioutenant in Yorkshire. On Jan. 23, 1643, he recaptured Leeds, and on May 21st Wakefield, making on the latter occasion 1,400 prisoners. After the defeat at Adwalton Moor, at which he was present, he made his way to Hull, but during the siego joined Cromwell in Lincolnshire with his Yorkshire horse, and helped to gain the lattle of Wineeby (Oct. 12, 1643). On Jan. 28, 1644, he defeated the king's Irish troops at Nantwiell, and reconquered the county of Cheshire for the Parliament. On April 12th he defeated Lord Bellasis, the Governor of York, at Selby, taking 1,600 prisoners. Ho took part in the siege of York, and commanded the right wing of the Parliamentary horse at Marston Moor, and after the rout of that wing joined Lord Manchester's division. After tho victory he was occupied in reducing the Yorkshire fortresses. These successes led tho House of Commons to appoint him commander of the New Model Army (Jan. 21, 1645). Ho took the field at the end of April, 1645, with the intention of relieving Taunton, but was recalled from the West to besiege Oxford. On the news of the king's capture of Leicester, he raised the siege of Oxford (June 5), and overtook and defeated Charles at Naseby (June 14). Then he turned westward again, relieved Taunton, defeated Goring at Langport (July 10), and captured Bridgwater. Bristol, Tiverton, and other Royalist strongholds. With the defeat of Sir Ralph Hopton at Torrington, early in 1646 (Feb. 16), the subjugation of the West was completed, and the surrenders of Oxford (June 24) and Raglan (Aug. 19) brought the first Civil War to an end. In the quarrels which took place next year between the army and the Parliament, Fairfax, after labouring hard to effect a reconciliation, east in his lot with the army, and shared the responsibility for the expulsion of the eleven members. On the outbreak of the second Civil War, Fairfax defeated the Kontish Royalists at Maidstone (June 1, 1618), and after ten weeks' siege obliged those who had taken refuge in Colchester to surrender. He seems to have been willing to approve of the trial and deposition of the king, but he refused to sit in the High Court of Justico, and on June 25, 1650, resigned his command rather than invade Scotland. During the Protectorate he took no part in public affairs. In Richard Cromwell's Parliament he represented Yorkshire, and after the dissolution of that assembly was appointed by the Rump a member of the Council of State, but did not act. When Monk marched into England Fairfax raised volunteers, was joined by a large part of Lambert'e forces, and occupied York. He openly declared for a free Parliament, and for the restoration of the king (Jan., 1660), thus exercising an important influence in bringing about the Restoration. His death took place in 1671. He was an able general and an honest man, hut had none of the qualities of a etatesman, so that, to use the phrase of Clarendon, he was throughout "overwitted" by Cromwell.

Palconberg, ELIZABETH, COUNTESS OF (b. 1637, d. 1712), was the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell; she was married in 1657 to Viscount (afterwards Earl of) Falconberg. Always attached to the Church of England, she exerted herself in favour of the Restoration. During Charles II.'s reign she frequently appeared at court.

Falconberg, WILLIAM NEVILLE, LORD (d. 1462), was the son of Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, and brother of the Earl of Salisbury. He distinguished himself in the siege of Orleans and other operations in France in Henry VI.'s reign. He espoused the Yorkist cause, and fought at Towton. In 1461 he was made Earl of Kent.

Falconbridge, or Fauconberg, The Bastard or, was an illegitimate son of William Neville, Lord Falconberg. In 1471 he landed in Kent to make a last attempt in favour of Henry VI. He got together some men, and forced an entrance into London, with the design of liberating Henry from the Tower. But when he burned Aldgate and London Bridge, the citizens rose against him, and he was compelled to retire. This attempt made it necessary for Edward to put Henry to death.

Falkirk was the scene of a battle between the Scotch and the English, July 22, 1298. This was fought in the valley between the town of Falkirk and the River Carron, resulting in a victory for the English, who were commanded by Edward I., the Earl Marshal, and Anthony Beck, Bishop of Durham, over a far inferior Scotch force, led by Wallace and Sir John Grahame, the latter of whom was killed. Wallace had arranged the Scottish pikemen, on whom he mainly relied, in four circular bodies, connected by archers. The front was defended by palisades, and by a morass beyond them. Behind the main body was marshalled the cavalry, to prevent retreat. Well might Wallace say, "I have brocht you to the king, hop gif yo can." The first attacks of the English, led by the Earl Marshal, failed through the English becoming entangled in the morass. The Bishop of Durham then attempted a flank charge, to avoid the bog, but was equally uneuccessful. A third attack by the king in person changed the fortunes of the day. The circles were broken by the English archers, and the mounted knights completed the destruction of the enemy. The Scottish army was completely shattered, and Wallace, though he escaped from the field, remained a hunted fugitive for the short remainder of his life.

Palkirk, The Battle of (1746), was fought between the royal troops and the Young Prete der. the former being defeated.

Falkland, Hen. r Carry, Lord (d. 1633), was Deputy of Ireland between 1622 and 1629. His inquiry into defective titles, and transplantation of many native septs in favour of English settlers, were among the causes of the Rebellien of 1641. But his comparatively mild government was ill solapted to earry out Charles I.'s policy, and he was removed to make room for Strafford.

Falkland, Lucius Carey, Lord, son of the preceding (b. 1610, d. 1643), was educated at Dublin, and served in the Low Countries. Returning to his seat of Great Tew, in Oxfordshire, ho gathered round him there, : id at the neighbouring university, a small band of liberal theologians. In 1640 he entered the Long Parliament. A devoted lover of Constitutionalism, and an opponent of arbitrary power in any shape, Falkland had no sympathy with the government of Strafford and Charles; hut he believed that the royal government might be amended or reformed. He accordingly became the leader of that Parliamentary Royalist party that almost succeeded in preventing the passage of the Grand Remonstrance. He very unwillingly joined the war on the Royalist side, and almost courted the death he met at Newbury, his last words being "Pe e, peace." His personal gifts, liberal spin, and relations to the parties of hie time, invest his career with unusual interest.

Falkland Castle, in Fifeshire, was the scene of the Duke of Rothesay's murder in 1482. In 1592, Lord Bothwell made one of his numerous attempts to seize James VI. while he was in the castle.

Falkland Islands, THE, are a group of islands lying in the South Atlantic, and consisting of East and West Falkland, together with about two hundred smaller islands; they were discovered by John Davis in 1592. In 1690 an English navigator, named Strong, gave them their present name. In 1765 Commodore Byron took possession of them for the crown of England. In 1764 a French colony had settled there, but Spain got rid of this in 1766 and expelled the English garrison in 1767. This nearly led to war, but after much negotiation the Spanish garrison was withdrawn in 1771. The uncertainty of the tenuro on which England now claimed to hold the islands, without occupying them, ufforded a theme for Junius and for Samuol Johnson. In 1820 the Bucnos Ayres Government formed a settloment and so rovived tho dormant British claim, which was made effective in 1832. Now they are chiefly used as a whaling-station and for the purposes of sheep-farming. Thoy are ruled by a governor, assisted by an executive council and a legislative council, both of which are appointed by the crown. The population is about 2,200.

Pamily Compact, The, is the name applied to various treatics between the Bourbon Kings of Spain and France during the eighteenth century. The first compact began in 1733, and being specially directed against English trade led, in 1739, to a war botween Spain and England. The more famous compact was in 1761, and its object was to associate Spain to France in the Se. a Years' War. Pitt had timely warning of the agreement, and the refusal of George III. to sanction an attack on Spain led to his resignation. But when the compact became known, war was inevitable.

Pamine, The Cotton, is the name generally given to the distress among the cotton operatives in Lancashire, in 1862-64, due to the stoppage of their raw material by the blockado of Southern ports in the American War of Secession. Great efforts at relief were mado: in April, 1863, the gifts for this purpose, in money and kind, were estimated by the chairman of the Central Relief Committee at over £2,000,000. By 1864 the distress was over.

Farnine, The Potato (Ireland). In 1817 a failure of the potato cope caused the superabundant cottier population of Ireland to experience sovere distress, which, coming after several years of scarcity, soon became as serious as an absolute famine. Despite the repeal of the Corn Laws and the exertions of Stato and privato benovolonce, many perished, and more escaped by emigrating to America. Among the political consequences of the famine was the revolutionary movement of Smith O'Brien in 1848, but more important was the social and economical revolution which the famine effected. The diminution of the population from eight millions to not much more than five; the disappearance of cottier tenancy in many parts of Ireland; great changes in the ownership and cultivation of land; the introduction of the "English system" of competition and free contract; the raising in some degree of the standard of living; and the creation of a new set of griovances, while old ones were removed—all flowed from the potato famine.

Famines, Indian. The irregularity of the rainfall of a tropical climate, hostile invasion, plagues of locusts, storms, imperfections in the system of transport, and excessive export of grain, have been the many causes of Indian famino. A dense and poor population, whose increase is checked by no prudential restraints, and which has fow manufactures as a refuge when agriculture fails, must always be liable to experience the worst forms of such scarcities. The removal of the old positivo checks on population by the strong government of the English has, if anything, increased the tendency to famine, though better organisation of relief has made their effects often less disastrous. But in the early years of English rule in India (notably in 1770, 1781—83, and again in 1790—92) there were severe famines. The experience of these years led to the beginning of those remedial measures which have in recent times made Indian famines, which still recur with disastrous frequency, much less terrible. In 1860 and 1861 no rain fell between the Jumna and the Sntlej, and the sufferings of the people were frightful. No less than 500,000 human beings are believed to have perished, and the whole of the population, notwithstanding the benevolent exertions of government and individuals, and the receipt of large subscriptions from England, endured misery which it was hopeless to alleviate in proportion to the existing necessity. In 1865 rain failed in Orissa, and scarcity began to prevail, which passed into absolute famine almost without notice, and certainly without precaution. Till it reached an alarming height, the government of Bengal was inactive, and the time passed by in which supplies of grain could be sent by sea. When the people were perishing in thousands, no vessel could approach the coast, and the supplies forwarded by land were utterly insufficient to meet the general wants. The immediate dethe general wants. The immediate de-struction of human life was estimated at two millions, and the amount of human suffering had been incalculably great. country estimated to contain no less than 28 millions of people, comprising several important provinces of Bengal and Behar, the great harvest of the year was hopolessly withering for want of rain. The April crop of 1874 also proved a failure. The government made great efforts. The stock of rice it purchased amounted to 500,000 tons. The difficulty, however, was how to distribute it; but the government overcame this so effectually, that it is said that fewer persons died of starvation in Bengal and Behar than in an ordinary year. The cost of the relief operations was ten millions. In 1876 and 1877 the rainfall was lamentally deficient, and in the latter year failed altogether over parts of hadras, Bombay, Hyderabad, and Mysore. In 1876 the area of failure was so vast that famine prices were inevitable. All that could be were employed on public works; gratuitous relief began on a large scale, and the activity of the government staved off a vast amount of distress. Much the same may be said of the famine of 1896-7, which affected also North-Western India and Bengal. In 1899-1900 occurred another dreadful famine, affecting tracts covering 475,000 square miles, while at one time 6,500,000 persons were receiving relief. A great deal has been done of late years in the way of permanent irrigation works and railways, with a view of preventing the recurrence of famine.

Pamosus Libellus was the title of a document sent by Edward III. in 1341 to all the bishops and chapters in the kingdom, containing the recapitulation of all the charges which the king had brought against Archbishop Stratford.

Farm, especially in the forms firma comitatus (farm of the shire), and firma burgi (farm of the borough), was the technical name for the composition paid—in the former case hy the sheriff, and the latter hy the rudimentary corporation [Towns]—to the crown or lord in return for the privilege of collecting and appropriating the taxes of the district.

Farnham Castle, the residence of the Bishops of Winchester, overlooking the town of that name in the S.W. anglo of Surrey, was huilt by Henry de Blois, destroyed by Henry III. as adulterine, but rebnilt subsequently. It was governed by Denham for Charles I., and captured by Waller in 1642, when its fortifications were finally demolished.

Past Castle, a famous stronghold on the coast of North Berwickshire near St. Abh's Head, was the place to which the conspirators in the Gowrie plot (q.v.) proposed to carry off James VI.

Pastolf, Sir John (d. 1459), was an English general of some reputation in the struggles for the retention of France under Henry VI. In 1429 he was thoroughly beaten at Patay hy the Maid of Orleans. In the Paston Letters we have copious accounts of his private life; these show him to have been hard, grasping, and litigious. It has been suggested that he was the prototype of Shakespears's Falstaff, with whom he has nothing in common, except it be in the resemblance between their names.

J. Gairdner, Introd. to Paston Letters,

Favourite, a word of ill-omen in English history, is generally used to designate a person who, having ingratiated himself with the sovereign, uses his power unworthily and for his own ends, who unduly influences his master, and who, without sharing ministerial responsibility, becomes practically the chief minister of the realm. We can hardly consider such men as Edric Streoms (q.v.) in the light of favourites, and besides, the Anglo-Saxon constitution did not afford much opportunity for the favourite. The Nerman kings were too wise to endanger their position by favouritism, and the same may be said of the early Plantagenets. Flambard and Falkes de Breauté are unworthy instruments in the hands of unscrupulous kings, and the power of such creatures is not derived from the mere favour of royalty. The real beginning of favouritism in England may be seen in the Poitevins and Savoyards who thronged to the court of Henry III., and of whom the unknown satirist of the day says :-

"A paltry set of curs is troubling all the land— Drive out or let them die, that base ungodly band."

Edward II.'s favourite, Gaveston, is typical of the class - handsome, brave, and high-spirited, armed with all the accomplishments of the age, but arrogant, self-seeking, and utterly reckless of consequences, whether to himself or to his master. The opposition is heightened by the fact that he is a foreigner, but the same objection cannot be urged against the Despencers, who succeeded Gaveston in Edward's affections. Here the opposition is personal, and is directed also against those influences which tend to separate the king from his barons. But the displacement of the Despencers and their weak-minded master only brings on the scene a far more criminal favourite than any that had appeared before. For nearly four years England is under the rule of Roger Mortimer, whose criminal intrigue with the queen is the chief source of his power. At the end of Edward III.'s reign the king falls for a time under the influence of a worthless woman, Alice Perrers, who ahuses her power, not only by ohtaining lands and possessions for herself, but by interfering with the course of justice. The next reign is that of a young prince who makes a bold attempt to govern hy ministers of his own choice; hut favouritism creeps in, and De Vere must fall into the same category with the Despencers, even if De la Pole does not deserve the title of favourite. Henry VI. and his queen, by the power they gave to Suffolk and Somerset, alienated the nobles, and laid themselves open to the charge of favouritlem, an accusation which their antagonists were only too glad to take up. The influence of such a woman as Jane Shore in the time of Edward IV. was probably not very great, though Richard III. thought it worth while to make a severe example of her. The Tudors were far too able und far too determined to desire or need the aid of favourites, and the relations of Leicester and Essex to Queen Elizabeth were rather of a personal than of a political character. James I.'s nature needed some friend to lean upon, and he found his favourite, first in Somerset, and, subsequently, in Bucking-ham. Charles II. was too astute to injure his position by favouritism, and the secret advisers of James II., such as Father Petre, based their influence on religious rather than on personal grounds. The Dutch followers of William III. were unjustly stigmatised as favourites, a name more deservedly applied to Ludy Marlborough and Mrs. Masham in the next reign, or to the venal mistresses of the first two Georges. Constitutional government made favouritism impossible. Bute was stigmatised as a favourite, but George's effort to make him supreme in the councils of the nation was mainly part of that king's persistent policy to nominate his own ministers. Favouritism may now be considered extinct, and the methods of government have become of such a character that its revival is hardly [F. S. P.] likely.

Pawkes, Guy (b. 1570, d. 1606), was the agent and most famous conspirator in the Gunpowder Plat. A Yorkshireman by birth, he became a Catholic, and having wasted his patrimony, served with the Spanish army in the Netherlands, whence he returned to attempt to carry out the well-known conspiracy with which his name is inseparably connected. He was executed in 1606. [Gunrowder Plot.]

Fealty is, as its etymology shows, a promise of thity, made by one man to another. As used in a technical sense in feudal law it differs from homage, in that it had no connection with the holding of land, and from allegiance, which was duo to the sovereign only, and was a national, not a feudal obligation. The oath of fealty was taken ut the time of doing homage, and when not taken to he king, in words something like these—"Hear you this, my lord A, that I, B, from this day forward will bear you faith of life ar. limb, saving my faith to the king and his heirs (i.e., saving the oath of allegiance which was taken by every subject), and the services which belong to you for the fees and tenements I hold of you, lawfully will perform to you, as they become due, to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints." On the Continent generally, and in palatinate jurisdictions in England, the oath of fealty would be taken absolutely without any saving clause reserving duty to the monarch as above. [FEUDALISM.]

Pearchar Pada (i.e., the Tall), chief of the Dalriadic tribe of Cinel Loarn, endeavoured unsuccessfully to throw off the yelse of the Britons and Angles, in 678, in which year three battles were fought. In 685 he joined forces with Brade, son of Bile, and advanced with great success against his enemies. He died 697.

Feckenham, John (d. 1585), last Abbot of Westminster, was under Henry VIII. an Anglican, and Bonner's chaplain. He was imprisoned throughout the reign of Edward VI., and rewarded by Mary with the abbacy of the revived monastery of Westminster. He is described as "a man full of tender and gentle humanity," and all parties speak well of him. He attended the first Parliament of Elizabeth, but was deprived and imprisoned, and though regaining partial liberty in 1578 by partial conformity, was again imprisoned till his death.

Pelony. The original meaning of this word is still obscure. According to Mr. Skeat (Etymol. Dict.), "felon" is of Coltic origin, from a verb meaning to betray, deceive, fail. This may explain the fact that the early feudal lawyers constantly used the term "felony" to describe an act of treason or disobedience to a lord "by which a flef is lost "-e.g., refusal to follow the lord to war, or neglect for a year and a day to ask investiture. Thus the term became associated with the idea of forfeiture, and was extended to r. es of such a nature as to induce forfeiture o. lands or goods. Hence arose the division of crimes into felonies and misdemeanours, though no clear definition of either word is possible. Not all crimes involving forfeiture are felonies; for this would include misprision of treason, which is only a misdemeanour. "If felony is defined as a crime punishable with death, it excludes petty larceny, which was never capital, and includes piracy, which was never felony. Felony was substantially a name for the more heinous crimes, and all felonics were punishable by death, except petty larceny and mayhem (i.e., maining), which came by degrees to be treated as a misdemeanour. If a crime was made felony by statute, the use of the namo implied the punishment of death, subject, however, to the rules as to benefit of clergy. Thus, broadly speaking, felony may be defined as the name appropriated to crimes punishable by death, misdemeanours being a name for all minor offences" (Ste, nen, Hist. of Crim. Law, ch. xx.). There are two main differences as to procedure in cases of felony and misdeme nour. In the first place, a warrant is not necessary for arrests for felony, while, as a rule, it is necessary for misdemeanour; and secondly, a person committed for trial for felony is not entitled to be builed, while a person accused of misdemeanour is usually so entitled. Since, however, milder punishments have been substitute. for death, and the Felony Act of 1870 has abolished forfeits en the distinction between felonies and missemeanours has become of little practical importance.

Felton, John (d. 1628). A dismissed officer of the army who, partly from private wrongs, partly from fanaticism, assassinated the Duke of Buckingham in 1628, at Portsmouth. He was hanged at Tyburn.

Fenian Conspiracy, THE. The name is said to be derived from Fion or Finn MacCoul, the Fingul of Macpherson's Ossian. The Fenians formed at one time a sort of standing militia in Ireland. The Fenian "brotherhood" was formed in Ireland and the United States, to liberate Ireland from the connection with England and establish a republic. Secret drillings in connection with this society began to take place frequently in 1864, but the society is supposed to have been formed as early as 1858. On Sept. 15, 1864, the Irish government of Lord Wodehouse at last became possessed of information convincing them of the treasonable character of these proceedings. In consequence, between the 16th and 30th of that month, sixty-five persons were arrested in Dublin and about twenty in Cork, while O'Donovan Rossa, who was one of the conspirators, also had his paper, the Irish People, confiscated. Stephens, the "Head Centre," was arrested, but was enabled to make his escape. A commission had since November been sitting in Ireland to try the prisoners, and many of them, including O'Donovan Rossa, were convicted of treason felony, and sentenced to periods of penal servitude varying from five to ten years. Important discoveries of documents had also been made. In May, 1866, the American Fenians made a raid into Canada, hut were promptly repulsed. Late in the autumn large stores of arms were seized, and the garrison of Ireland largely increased; hut no blood was shed. In 1867 the rebellion so long threatened seemed at last to be hreaking out. On Feh. 11th came an attempt to surprise Chester, and on the 12th an out-break in Kerry. The defence of Kilmallock police barracks, however, showed the feebleness of the movement. In March followed an attack on the barracks at Tallaght; it was repulsed, and 208 prisoners were brought into Dublin. The spirit of the Fenians in Irciand was now quite broken; thus, 1,000 men who held the market-place at Drogheda fled at the approach of a few policemen. In May a special commission began to sit to try the rebels, and many of them were convicted. None were, however, executed. On Sept. 18 an attack was made on a police van at Manchester, and on Dec. 13 the attempt to hlow up Clerkenwell Gaol. In Ireland, in 1868, attacks on isolated martello towers became frequent, and the Habeas Corpus Act was again suspended till March 1, 1869. In 1870 a Fenian raid into Manitoba was driven back by the militia, and, in 1871 a similar attempt was roughly put down by United States troops, General Grant having issued a proclamation against them. In Jan., 1871, most of the Fenian convicts had been released, and were uproariously welcomed in the United States. But the organisation of Irish sedition passed into different hands, and the Fenian leaders lost their influence. The French Communist General, Cluseret, who had been in the Fenian service, says, most probably with truth:—

"Their insurrection was foolishly planned, and still more foolishly executed."

Fennington Bridge, The Battle of (1549), was fought in Devonshire between the royal troops, under Lord Russell and Sir Poter Carew, and the Cornish rebels, who were completely defeated.

Fenwick, Sir John (d. 1697). A zealous Tory member of the Parliament of 1685, who became, after the Restoration, one of the most ardent Jacobite conspirators. In 1695 he joined Charnock, Porter, and others in designs against the king, which ripened next year into the Assassination Plet. His fellow-conspirator, Porter, informed the government of the whole intrigue, and Sir John attempted to escape to France, but was arrested near Romney Marsh. He was committed to the Tower. In order to gain time, he offered to disclose all he knew touching the Jacohite plots. His artful confession, while silent about the real Jacohite plotters, contained a great deal of evidence—mostly true, no doubt - against Marlborough, Godolphin, Russell, and Shrewshury, who had from time to time intrigued with the court of St. Germains. Furious at the charges brought against their party, the Whigs determined to pursue the subject. Fenwick was examined by William, hut refused to make any disclosures. He had heard that his wife, Lady Mary Fenwick, had succeeded in getting Goodmanonly other witness against him-out of the country, and Porter's evidence remained unsupported. But the Whigs, not to be baulked of their prey, hrought in a bill of attainder against him, which the Commons passed, by 186 to 156. The bill passed through its first stage in the Lords without a division. After a violent struggle, the second reading was carried, by 73 to 53, and the third, by 68 votes to 61. On Jan. 28 Fenwick was executed. Hallam's opinion on the act of attainder is Feormfultum, corresponding to the Naturalia of the Franks, was in Anglo-Saxon times partly a tax, partly a gift in kind, lovied on the produce of the land for the support of the king and his household.

Pergus, Lord of Galloway (d. 1161), was contemporary with David I. of Scotland. whom he assisted with soldiers at the Battle of the Standard. In 1160 he joined the sons of Malcolm MacBeth against King Malcelm, but was forced to submit to the royal power. He retired to a monastery, and died 1161. He married Elizabeth, natural daughter of Henry I.

Fergus Mer (d. 501), son of Erc, King of Irish Dalriada, crossed over at the end of the fifth century with his brethers, Learn Mor and Angus, and founded in Argyleshire a Scottish colony, which afterwards developed into the kingdom of Dalriada.

Ferguson, Robert (d. 1714). A Scotch clergyman who got a living in Engl. id, but, being a Presbyterian, was expelled 1. 1762, and became a schoolmaster and Dissenting present the was a man of bad character, and tantly involved in plots. Being a furit ship, he was expelled from England after to failure of the Rye House Plot. Ho then went to Holland, instigated and took part in Monunouth's rebellion, escaped after Sedgemoor, and joined William III.'s expedition. Disgusted, however, at his inadequate reward, he turned Jacobite, and shared in the Assassination Plot and Montgomery's Plot. Notwithstanding his connection with so many conspiracies, he escaped every danger, and died a natural death.

Ferozeshar, The Battle of (Dec. 21, 1845), was fought between the Sikhs under Lail Sing, 35,000 in number, with 100 guns, and the English under Sir Hugh Gough. The English began operations by attacking at night the entrenched camp of the enemy round the village of Ferozeshar; but the storm of shot was terrific, and entirely frustrated the rash attempt to carry the camp by a charge. When day dawned the assault was renewed, and as quarrels had broken out among the Sikh leaders, the resistance was comparatively feeble, and the Sikhs were fluilly put to dight. That this battle was the most severe ever fought in India was due almost as much to the rash blundering of the English as to the valour of the Sikha. [Sikh Wans.]

Terrar, Robert, Bishop of St. David's (d. 1586), was deprived of his see by Mary, having previously been imprisoned by Northumberland, at the instance of some of his clergy who accused him of neglect of duty. He was condemned for heresy, and burnt at Carmarthen, March 30, 1555. Mr. Froude says of him:—"He was a man of large humanity, justice, and uprightness, neither conspicuous as a theologian nor prominent as a preacher, but remarkable chiefly for good sense and a kindly imaginative tenderness." This seems a rather exaggerated view of a very ordinary man, who, with excellent intentions, was quite unable to cope with the difficulties of his position.

Ferrers, Gronge (b. 1512, d. 1579). A lawyer, dramatist, and poet of some celebrity, mainly remembered from his connection with a famous case of privilege of l'arliament. In 1543, while member for Plymonth, he was imprisoned for debt. Parliament took up his case, and compelled the Sheriff of London, with his officers and the creditor as well, to appear at the bar, and sent them all to prison. A remarkable trial followed, leading to Ferrers's release by virtue of his privilege. Henry VIII., In whose service Ferrers was, warmly took up his cause.

Ferrybridge, The Battle of (1461), was fought just before the battle of Towton. The Yorkists who were at Pontefract attempted to secure the passage of the Aire at Ferrybridge; but a body of light cavalry under Lord Clifford was detached by the Lincastrians, attacked and defeated the Yorkists, and slew Lord Fitzwalter their leader. The Yorkists, however, succeeded in crossing the Aire at Castleford, three miles higher up the river, and in attempting to regain the main body of the Lancastrians at Towton, Clifford was defeated and slain.

Pethanleag, The Battle of (584), was fought between Ceawlin and Cutha, Kings of the West Saxons and the Britons. Cutha was slain, and Ceawlin, though he took many towns and countless booty, says the Chrenicle, returned in anger to his own country. Henry of Huntingdon says that the English were defeated, but afterwards rallied by Ceawlin, and so won the lay. Dr. Guest identifies his Fethanleag with Faddiley, near Nantwich, in Cheshire, and regards the battle as a critical one in the conquest of the Severn Valley by the English. As compared with the great victory of Deorham in 577, which gave the Welsh the Lower Severn, it was a check on the English. If, as Dr. Guest holds, Ceawlin's destruction of Uriconium, lamented in the Welsh elegy on the death of Cynddylan, marked the beginning of the campaign, the defeat of Facilies left the Middle Severn Welsh until the days of Offa, and even Chester until the reign of Ethelfrith.

Feudalism (for etymology see Fire) is in its most general sense defined as an organisation of society based on land tenure. It is applied specially to the system which arose in Westorn Europe after the dissolution of the Carlovingian Empire, and also loss fully to special and analogous systems which sprang up among the Germanie peoples not directly included in that empire—as England or Sweden—but where similar tendencies afterwards manifested themselves. We must distinguish feudalism in its legal, political, and even in its vaguer social aspects. Legal feudalism Indicates a certain method of land tenure. Political feudalism followed when every regalian right became attached to ownership of land by a feudal tenure. The social ideal of a feudal society necessarily followed at a later stage.

The main source of fendalism, both in England and on the Continent, is to be found in the primitive German Constitution. The settlement of the wandering nations had made that promitive personal polity a territorial one, and its essentially unprogressive character on the old lines necessitated a new system to meet the varying needs of a progressive society. Contact with dying Imperialism precipitated but did not create this process out of which feudalism sprang.

In the Frankish Empire, Charles the Great bound together the national German state of the Franks, the traditions of Reman law and empire, and his own gift of a powerful administrative system. Under his feeble descendants this system broke down. After the anarchy which this process occasioned, the organised anarchy of feudalism arose, from the beneficiary system, the practice of amendation, and the grants of immunity w were superadded to them. The king wa the habit of granting lands out of his an vist estates to followers on the special promise of fidelity, and lesser proprietors in full sovereignty surrendered their nominal alod to a great church or noble, to receive it back as a consuit protected by a powerful patron. These lands were the beneficia, the territorial source of feudalism, and the condition on which they were very commonly held was mili-tary service. Commendation was personal, and consisted in a man submitting himself to a lord, whose vassal and man [Homage; Vassal] he became. "The union of the beneficiary tie with that of commendation," says Dr. Stubbs, "completed the idea of fendal obliga-tion." The third element arose as follows. The national courts had become stereotyped or ineffective, and it became customary to unite to the grant of a beneficium a grant to its lord of power to exercise full jurisdiction within it. Thus the flef or benefice was withdrawn from the national system, and when these grants of immunity from the courts of the gan became general, and when political functions followed judicial ones, we have the complete feudalism of eleventh century France—when, though ties of feudal dependence united the meanest vassal to the crown as supreme overlord, the national system had become obliterated, central power nominal, and all real power in the hands of a multitude of landowners, who had every regalian right in their own estate. This was the system which the barons of Normandy lived under, and which they would fain have brought to England with them.

In England, however, a similar but independent process had set in. The Comitatus of the old Germans which had died out in Gaul, became in England the source of a new organisation of society. The king's thems, the comites in a later stage, received with grants of folkland, grants of immunitles from the jurisdiction of the popular courts, which resulted in the establishment of practical feudalism on these soken or franchises. The free man bowed his neck for bread or protection. Everything became territorialised. What was originally the exception rapidly tended to become the rule. The great earls, as on the Continent, gradually threw off their neutral character. Harold suggests the parallel of Hugh Capet, and Continental feudalism found a soil ready to regive it.

William I. and his sons brouge with them feudal theory and feudal practice. To him, as to his barons, no legal theory of tenure was possible but the feudal one; and the generation after the Conquest saw feudalism in its legal aspect established universally in England. But William had seen how feudalism as a system of government meant mere anarchy in Normandy, and did his best to prevent its introduction into England. The barons naturally desired as much power here as at home; but savo in the Border Palatinates [PALATINE COUNTIES; BORDERS], and then in Wales and Ireland, which the barons won as independent adventurers, the Norman kings refused them this. Rebellion after rebellion broke out and was crushed. At last Henry I.'s defeat of Robert of Belesme settled the question for his reign. Under Stephen the barons won the day, and then alone did feudal government prevail in England. Henry II, in 1174, put down the final revolt of the feudal party. His administrative system rendered his triumph permanent. Only under Henry III.'s minority were there some slight tendencies to a fendal survival. Edward I. destroyed the political importance of land tenure. Hence-forth the barons fought, not to abolish the central state in favour of feudal localism, but to get the machinery of the central state into their own hands. They fought, not to get rid of the crown, but to put the monarchy in commission. The chivalry of the fourteenth century, though the result of a feudal ideal, was powerloss to bring back real fendalism. The baronial power perished with the Wars of the Roses. The legal theory remained, with its obligation of fealty and homage, its incid. ats of aids, wardships, marriage, its inilitary service, and other effects.

James I. unsuccessfully attempted to abolish feudal tenures. An Act of 1660 actually effected this. The very indefinite sense in which feudalism is semetimes used as indicating the power of the landed aristocracy need not be dealt with. Yet the English land law remains full of vestiges of feudalism. Every copyholder still owes to the lord of the manor tho feudal incidents. Lands of the intestate and kinless deceased still escheat to the noxt lord.

For English feudalism, Stubbe's Constitutional History is the supreme authority. Waltz's Deutsche Verjassungeschichte stands in similar relation to the feudalism of the Frank Empire. The eighteenth century treatises and the law books are all tainted by the false theory of the origin of feudalism, which Waitz snally demolished. Many of the French writers whose works would otherwise be of great value, suffer from the same defect. Both's Gaschichte des Benesiciativeseus and Feudalität, is a supplement and check on Waitz, with whom he is at variance on some important points. References to the special articles on each of the feudal incidents will supply the details of the fendal system in England.

Feversham, Louis Duras, Earl of A French noble, nephew of Turenne, who entered the English service nnder Charles II. and James II., commanded the army which defeated Monmouth at Sedgemoor, and, though his incapacity in that campaign was only equalled by his brutality, was made general-in-chief of the army that James II. collected to overawe his people. In 1688 he disbanded that army, and was for a time imprisoned by William III.

Pisf, or Pee (Lat. feudum, feodum), is derived from the old German word for eattle (modern High German, Vieh; old High German, fihu; Gothic, faihu; Old English, feoh), which got to be need in the sense of money or property in general (cf. pecunia). It is very doubtful whether the second "yllable has any connection with od, also meaning property. The word first appears in the ninth century, and gradually acquires the technical meaning of land held of a lord by foudal tenure [Feunalism] or military service.

Figures. [SAY AND SELE, LORD.] Fiennes, NATHANIEL, second son of Lord Say and Sele, was educated at Winchester and at New Collego, Oxford. He was elected member of the Long Parliament for Banbury, and became a leader amongst the "Root and Branch" party. He was appointed in 1641 one of the committee to attend the king to Scotland. In 1642 he accepted a colonel's commission in Essex's army, and took part in the battle of Edgehill. In the following year he surrendered Bristol to Prince Rupert (July, 1643), under circumstances which made him suspected of either treachery or cowardice. For this he was accused by Walker and Prynne, tried by court martial, and sentenced to death. His former services, and his family interest, secured him a pardon, but he was obliged to abandon public affairs, and leave the kingdom for several years. Ho returned, regained the confidence of his party, and became, in January, 1648, a member of the Committee of the Two Kingdoms, but was expelled from Parliament by Pride's Purge. In Cromwell's first Parliament he represented the county, in the second the University, of Oxford. He became a member of the Conneil of State (1654), Commissioner of the Great Seal (1655), one of Cromwell's lords (1657), and was one of the principal speakers in the discussions concerning the offer of the crown to the Protector (1657). He assisted in proclaiming Richard Cromwell, and adhered to his party till the re-establishment of the Long Parliament deprived him of his office. After the Restoration he retired into private life, and died in 1669. Ficnnes was an eloquent speaker, and a man of decided opinions, but irresolute in action, and constitutionally of the Presbyterian party."

Fifteenths was the name given to a grant voted by Parliament to the sovereign, which was originally, as the name implies, a tax of one fifteenth on movables. But in the reign of Edward III. a valuation was taken, and henceforth when Parliament voted a fifteenth each parish voted a fixed sum, according to that valuation. What for the counties was a fifteenth was in towns a tenth, which followed the same rule. The whole amount of a tenth and fifteenth, in Coke's time, was only £29,000.

during which the millennial reign of Christ on earth would take place. The previous four monarchies were the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman. But such fanatics could not but be in opposition to any established government, and Cromwell had some difficulties with them. In 1661, the revolt of Venner was largely supported by this sect.

Fiji Islands, The, are a group of about 250 islands, of which about a third are inhabited. They lio between 177° E. and 178° W. long., and between 15° and 20° S. lat. The largest of the islands is Viti Levu, and the only other of any size is Vanua Levu. Tho Fiji group was first discovered by Captain Cook, in 1773. They were ceded to England by the native chiefs, in 1874, and are at present governed by a High Commissioner. Fiji is an important station between Panama and Australia, and the High Commissioner is in a position to regulate the Polynesian labour traffic.

Filmer, SIR ROBERT (d. eirca 1653), was a gentleman of Kont, who matriculated at Cambridge (1604), fought for the king during the Civil War, and wrote in defence of monarchy. His chief works were The Free-holders' Grand Inquest (published 1679), A Treatise on the Functions of the Commons in Parliament, written in answer to Prynne, and Patriarcha (published 1680). Filmer started by denying the doctrine that mankind is naturally endowed and born with freedom from all subjection, and at liberty to choose what form of government it pleased; and that the power which any one man hath over others was at first bestowed according to the discretion of the multitude. He went on to derive regal authority from the authority of a father over his family, as it was exercised by the patriarchs. From the patriarchs, by hereditary descent, this authority was transmitted to different royal houses. The royal authority, therefore, resembled the natural authority of a father over his children. Tho kingdom and its head, like the family and its head, existed by divine ordinance. The king received from God "his royal charter of a universal father," and ruled, therefore, by divine right. The subject was, in consequence, bound to absolute obedience, and had no right to depose a king or alter the line of succession. Filmer's book was published in the midst of the discussions on the Exclusion Bill, and his theory supplied a powerful argument to those who denied the competence of Parliament to exclude James from the throne. Speaker of the third, which met in 1628 speedily showed himself a decided partisan of the king, and, in 1629, he refused to read a remonstrance against tunnage and poundage after the king's message for the adjournment of Parliament had been delivered. A tumult occurred, during which the Speaker was held down in his chair, and Holles read the protestation to the House. In 1637 Finch was made Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in which capacity he delivered judgment against Hampdon in the case of In 1640 he was made Lord ship-money. Keeper, but, fearing the vengeance of the Long Parliament, he fied from England, at the end of the same year, to Holland, where he remained till 1660, when he returned to England, and took part in the trials of the Regicides. The character of "an unprincipled lawyer and a time-serving minister," which Mr. Foss gives him, seems to be only too well deserved, and he died universally despised.

Fines, THE STATUTE OF, an Act of the fourth year of Henry VII., was based on a similar one of Richard III. It enacts that a fine, levied with proclamations in a public court of justice, shall, after five years, be under ordinary circumstances a bar to all claims upon lands. Its main object was to give security of tenure to existing tenants by fixing a short term of prescription; a measure very necessary just after the Wars of the Roses. It did not, as some have thought, give liberty of alienation with the view of luring on a spendthrift nobility to ruin.

Finglen, The Battle of (719), near Lochavich in Argyleshire, was fought between Selvach, King of Dalriada, and his brother, Aincellach, whom he had drivon out in 698. Aincellach made a desperate effort to recover his kingdom, but was slain.

Finlay Question, The. Mr. Finlay, the Greek historian, had settled in Athens when Greece became independent. Some of his land had been seized for the purpose of rounding off the new palace gardens of King Otho, and Mr. Finlay had declined to take the terms offered him, which had been accepted by all the other landowners in a similar position. He appealed to the English government, and his case was lumped with the Pacifico and the Fantôme case into one grand grievance, for which the British government demanded compensation. [Pacifico.]

Fire of London, The Great (Sept. 2—6, 1666), broke out accidentally in a house near London Bridge, but a strong east wind caused it to spread with great rapidity, and for five days London was given up to the flames. Two-thirds of London was destroyed—eighty-nine churches, including St. Paul's Cathedral, and more than 13,000 dwelling-houses. But the fire though destroying so much, was most benencial in thoroughly cradicating the plague. The fever dens in which it continually lurked were burnt, and the new houses which were crected were far more healthy and better arranged. The fire was attributed to the hated Papists, and on the Monument, which was creeted to commemorate it, the Romanists were directly charged with being the authors of the terrible conflagration.

First of June, THE BATTLE OF THE (1794), was a naval engagement fought during the wars of the French Revolution. Tho French had eollected a fleet of twenty-six ships at Brest, which put out on May 20 to meet a convoy of corn ships expected from America. On the 28th Lord Howe with tho Channel fleet brought them to a partial engagement; but it was not till June 1 that he was able to bring about a decisive encounter. Having the wind of the enemy, he resolved to break through the French fleet, and fight it to locward. The enemy lay in close line of battle, stretching from east to west, and Howe's object was not to come down on it perpendicularly, but to sail abreast of it until each ship got an opportunity of breaking through it. It was impossible, however, to carry out the manceuvre in detail, and five only of the ships, besides the flag-ship, succeeded in passing through, while the rest engaged the emy on the windward side. But in whatever position the British ships elosed with the enemy, their mode of fighting was too fierce to be long resisted, and after a few hours the French ships which were able began to move off; nor was the pursuit vigorously carried out. As it was, however, eight ships had been lost to the enemy, and 8,000 men, while the English admiral returned his lesses at 1,150 in killed and wounded; but the corn ships escaped to Brest. The moral effects of the victory were greater than the material. [Hows, Loun; Briddent, VISCOUNT.]

Fish, SIMON (d. 1631), an associate of Tyndall, and one of the earliest English Protestants, became famous as the author of the popular attack on the clergy called the Supplication of Beggars, which led him into a controversy with More.

Fisher, JOHN, Bishop of Rochester (b. 1459, d. 1535), was born at Beverley. After a distinguished Cambridge career, in which he took a prominent part in bringing the studies of that university abreast of the new learning, both in Greek and theology, he was chosen in 1504 Bishop of Rochester, and was also from 1505—8 Master of Queen's Colloge, Cambridge. A man of honesty, piety, and determination, but of strict conservative principles, he became one of the leaders of the party opposed to Henry VIII.'s divorce, listened to the Nun of Kent, opposed the royal supremacy, and was imprisoned in 1534, and attainted. His untimely appointment as cardinal by Paul III. led to his execution, after trial by a special commission, on June 22, 1535.

Pishguard is a small town in North Penbrokeshire, on a land-locked haven. Near here, at Lianwnda, 1,400 French soldiers, the scum of every gaol in France, landed on February 22, 1797. Frightened, as the story goes, by the red coats and tall hats of the old Welshwomen, they surrendered on February 24 to the ill-armed local militia under Lord Cawdor. In 1908 Fishguard was made a port of connection with Ireland, and in 1909 with America.

Pitton, Alexander, a barrister of no reputation or character, was made Lord Chancellor of Ireland by James I. in 1688. Fitz-Aldhelm, WILLIAM DE, was sent by Henry II., in 1171, to treat with Roderick O'Connor. He was again in Ireland as Henry's envoy, with the bulls of Adrian IV. and Alexander III. In 1176 he became Strongbow's successor as Governor of Ireland. He was strongly opposed to the Geraldines, and defrauded Fitz-Maurice's sons of part of their inheritance in 1177. He was recalled, not having signalised himself in any other way.

Pits-Athulf, Constantine (d. 1222), was the leader of a riot in London in 1222, which, though it owed its origin to trivial circums ances, became most serious in its results, and is supposed to have been secretly fomented by Louis of France. It was, however, summarily put down by Hubert de Burgh; Fitz-Athulf was hanged and his followers fined or mutilated.

Fitsgerald, Lord Edward (b. Oct. 15, 1763, d. June 4, 1798), was a younger son of the Duke of Leinster, and married the reputed daughter of Philippe Egalité. In 1784 he was a member of the Irish Parliament, and opposed the Address. In 1793 he was compelled to apologise for words reflecting on the Lord-Lieutenant. Just before, he had gone to Paris as envoy of the United Irishmen. In 1796 he took their oath, and again went over to the Continent, met Hoche in Switzerland, and settled on a French invasion. On his return to Ireland he kept up a constant correspondence with France through his wife at Hamburg. In Oct., 1797, a "person," as he is called, gave information of this to Pitt, and allowed himself to be employed as a spy, but he refused to come forward as a witness, and the government could not, therefore, arrest Lord Edward. On March 12, 1798, he escaped, while his fellow-conspirators were seized. A reward of £1,000 was offered for his apprehension, but he continued undiscovered in his hidingplace in Dublin. Finally, however, he was betrayed by a man whose name never transpired, and on May 19th between five and six o'clock he was seized on his bed. He stabbed Ryan and Swan, two of the officers, but was disabled by a pistol-shot and was captured. The seal of the United Irishmen and a plan for the surprise of Dublin was found on him. Before he could be tried, he died of his wounds (June 4, 1798).

Pitagers , MAURICE, one of the Norman conquerors of Ireland, was the second son of Nesta (former mistress of Henry I.) and tierald, Lord of Carew, in Pembrokeshire. He landed at Wexford in 1169 in company with Fitz-Stephen. He is mentioned as a leader in the sally from Dublin which led to O'Connor's flight in 1170. He was with John de Lacy when O'Ruark was killed, and got Wicklow Castle as a fief. He died in 1176. Giraldus says of him that he died leaving no man behind him stronger in constancy and faith. His sons were deprived of Wicklow, but got other estates instead. He is the ancestor of the houses of Kildare and Desmond, and of the Fitzgerald family generally.

Pitzgerald, LORD THOMAS (d. 1536), son of Gerald, ninth Earl of Kildave, and vice-deputy for him. On his father's arrest by Henry VIII., Lord Thomas excited in 1535 a somewhat formidable revolt in Ireland, which for a time was very successful. But the storming of Maynooth, the great strong-hold of the Fitzgeralds, by Skeffington, led to the ruin of their cause. After a long period of wandering, Thomas surrendered to the English, and was hung with his five uncles at Tyburn on Feb. 3, 1536.

Fitzgerald, Sir Thomas Tudkin (d. 1810), was High Sheriff of Tipperary during the rebellion of 1798. He committed and encouraged the most frightful barbarities. One man named Wright was flogged nearly to death for having a note in French in his pocket. After the rebellion he was fined £500 by a jury on this account; but government paid his fine, and in 1801 made him s baronet. Froude says that his severities prevented an outbreak in Tipperary.

Fitzgerald and Vesci, Lord (d. 1843) an Irish Tory politician of some mark, represented Clare in the House of Commons till turned out by O'Connell, on seeking reelection after appointment to office. From 1828-1830 he was Paymaster and President of the Board of Trade; and from 1841-1843, President of the Board of Control.

Fitzgerald, FAMILY OF. Their reputed ancestor was William, Castellan of Windsor in the Conqueror's reign; from him was descended Gerald, father of Maurice Fitzgerald and William Fitzmanrice: the latter is the ancestor of the Knight of Kerry and of the Marquis of Lansdowne. Maurice Fitzgerald, the founder of the house, secured large grants, among them the barony of Offaley. In 1205 his son became Baron of Offaley. The baron's brother was Lord Justice, and fought against the Marshalls on King John's behalf. The younger brother of the seventh Lord Offaley, Maurice, was, in 1329, created Earl of Desmond, and the Lord Offaley himself became Earl of Kildare. From this time the Fitzgeralds became practically the rulers of Ireland, or at least of the English part of it. The destruction of the houses of De Burgh and De Lacy left the Butlers as their sole rivals. From the defeat of Edward Bruce to the reign of James I., the history of Ireland is made up of their constant wars with the Butlers. For the destruction of their immense pover, see the articles on the Earls of Kildare and Desmond. The first branch is still represented in our own day by the ducal house of Leinster.

Pitzgibbon, John (b. 1749, d. 1802), 785 created Baron Fitzgibbon in 1789, Viscount in 1793, Earl of Clare in 1795. He distinguished himself greatly at Trinity College, and was even then the rival of Grattan. He soon made a name at the bar. In the year 1787 he first signalised himself as Tory member for Dublin, by speaking against the vote of thanks to the Volunteers, then at the height of their popularity. His second great speech was directed against Flood's Reform Bill, which was lost. In 1784 he became Attorney-General, and as such had the conrage to attack the Sheriff of Dublin, as he was assembling the freeholders to elect representatives to a new illegal congress. In 1785 he fought a duel with Curran. On Jan. 31, 1787, he brought in a Conspiracy Bill, and he was one of the few Irishmen who opposed the Regency Bill in 1788. In 1789 he became a peer and Lord Chancellor, During Lord Camden's administration, he was virtually Governor of Ireland, and was the mainstay of the government during the Rebellion of 1798. The insurgents hated him more than any other man. Lord Cornwallis, though he came out to Ireland prejudiced against him, declared later that he was "by far the most moderate and right-headed man in the country." He defended the Union in a great speech on Feb. 10, 1800, in the Irish Parliament. In the following year he made a bitter attack on the absentee Whig lords in the English Parliament. In 1802 he died, and his burial was nearly interrupted by a furious mob. A typical upholder of the Protestant ascendency, Fitzgibbon is Mr. Froude's special hero.

Pitz-Gilbert, RICHARD, or RICHARD DE CLARE, was a Norman baron, nearly related to William the Conqueror. He accompanied William to England, and received lavish grants of land, among which was the manor of Clare, from which he took the name which his descendants likewise adopted. He was appointed joint regent of England during William's absence in 1073, and in 1076 was instrumental in quelling the rebellion of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. He lived on till the reign of Henry I.

Fitzharris, EDWARD (d. 1681). An Irish adventurer, who in 1681 concocted a libel upon the king and the Duke of York, in which he advocated the deposition of the one, and the exclusion of the other. This manuscript he probably intended to place in the study of one of the prominent Whig statesmen, and then, by discovering it himself, earn the wages of an informer. He was, however, betrayed by an accomplice, and sent to the Tower, where he invented a Popish Plot for the murder of the king, and the boiling down of the leading Whigs ir a jelly, to be used for anointing future F sh kings. Fitzharris was impeached by the Commons, but the Lords deelared that they had no power of trying a commoner, as that would be a violation of Magna Charta, while the Commons asserted their right of impeachment. Fitz-Herbert, Mrs., a Roman Catholic lady, with whom George, Prince of Wales, in 1787, went through the cereusony of marriage. If the Royal Marriage Act had not invalidated this marriage as contracted without the royal consent, the Act of Settlement would have deprived George of his rights of succession. To get his debts paid by Parliament, George (there is reason to believe) persuaded Fox to publicly deny his marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert, though he denied that he had instructed Fox

* Fits-Jocelin, REGINALD, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1191), was the son of Jocelin,

Bishop of Salisbury, and was elected Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1174. Almost immediately after his election he was seized with illness, and expired in less than a month.

Fitz-Maurice, James (d. 1579), was the brother of the sixteenth Earl of Desinond, and far superior to him in address and military skill. When the head of the family was made a prisoner by Sidney, he roused the Geraldines, and, uniting with other chiefs, he took Kilmallock. He went over to Spain to get help in 1570, but on his return, had to submit to Sir John Perrot in 1571. He then again went abroad, and in vain tried to induce France and Spain to come to the aid of the Irish Catholies. Pope Gregory XIII., however, entrusted him with a force of a few hundred men, and he set sail with them in 1579, and landed at Smerwick. Not finding thero the support he expected, he went off into Tipperary, where he was soon afterwards slain in battle.

Pitz-Nigel, RICHARD, or FITZ-NEAL (d. 1198), was the son of Nigel, Bishop of Ely, and great-nephew of Bishop Roger, of Salisbury. He was appointed Treasurer of England in 1165, which office he seems to have held till his death, having also been mado Bishop of London in 1189. He was the author of a history of Henry II.'s reign, entitled Tricolumnus, which is probably the busis of what used to be attributed to Benediet of Peterborough; but his more famous work is the Dialogus de Scaccario, which his position and connection with Nigel and Roger made extremely important and trust-worthy.

Pits-Osbern, Roger, Earl of Hereford, was the sen of William Fitz-Osbern. In 1075 he entered into a plot with Ralph Guader against William I., the immediate cause being the king's refusal to allow the marriage between Ralph and Fitz-Osbern's sister. Being defeated and taken prisoner, he was sentenced to deprivation of his lands and titles and perpetual captivity. [Norwich, Bridal of.]

Pitz-Osbern, William (d. 1071), was a Norman baron, somewhat distantly connected with the Conqueror. He was very instrumental in obtaining the sanction of the Norman nobles to the invasion of England, and commanded one of the wings at the battle of Hastings. He received the Palatino carldom of Hereford as his reward. During the king's absence in Normandy he acted as regent, and, in 1069, assisted in suppressing the insurrections in the north and west of England. In 1072 he went over to Flanders, where he was slain, while fighting in a civil war.

Fitz-Osbert, William (d. 1196), known also as William Longbeard, the first demagogue in English history, served in the Third Crusade, and is described as a man of great eloquence. In 1196 a poll-tax was levied on London, and Fitz-Osbert organised a resistance te it, and enrolled, it is said, more than 50,000 men. He held meetings, denounced the oppression of the governing bourgeoisie, and proclaimed himself the saviour of the poor. The Justiciar, Hubert Walter, collected troops, and speedily awed the city into submission. Fitz-Osbert took sanctuary in St. Mary-le-Bow, where he was attacked by fire, and eventually captured. He was at once tried, and put to death as a traitor. Of his character and aims it is difficult to judge, as contemporary writers express such very op-posite views. William of Newburgh says:— "The contriver and fomenter of so much evil perished at the command of justice, and the madness of this wicked conspiracy expired with its author; and those persons, indeed, who were of more healthful and cautious dispositions rejoiced when they beheld or heard of his punishment, washing their hands in the blood of the sinner." On the other hand, Matthew Paris says :- "So perished William Longbeard, for endeavouring to uphold the cause of right and the poor. If it be the cause which makes the martyr, no man may be more justly described as a martyr than he."

Pauli, Englische Geschichte; Hook, Lives of the Archbishops; William of Newburgh.

Fits-Peter, Geoffrey (d. 1213), was probably the son of Simon Fitz-Peter, one of Henry II.'s justices. He himself acted as an itinerant judge, and Richard I. placed him on the council which was to act, with the Justiciar, during the king's absence on the Crusade. In 1198 he was appointed Justiciar, which office he contrived to hold till his death. His administration was characterised by great sternness and rigid impartiality, and he did what he could to restrain the excesses of John, who, on hearing of his death, exclaimed, with an oath, "Now, for the first time, am I King of England." Fitz-Peter was created Earl of Essex in 1199.

Pitz-Stephen, Robert, a Norman conqueror in South Wales and Ireland, was the son of Nesta, the former mistress of Henry I., and of Stephen de Marisco. When Dermot came to Wales to collect succours, he was the captive of a Welsh prince; but on his release, in 1169, he led thirty knights, sixty men-at-arms, and three hundred archers to Ireland. With this force he took Wexford; but, in 1170, he was induced by treachery to surrender at Carrig. When Henry II. landed, in 1171, he was taken before him at Waterford as a traitor. He was, however, restored to favour, and entrusted with the custody of Wexford. He followed Henry abroad, in 1174: we sent over to Ireland, again recalled, but finally in 1177, invested with the command in southern Munster. In 1182 he was besieged in Cork, but rescued by Raymond le Gros.

Fitz-Stephen, WILLIAM (d. 1191). A monk of Canterbury, the eye-witness of the murder of his master, Becket, whose biography he wrote, to which was prefixed a remarkable description of London (printed in Leland's Itinerary, vol. viii.).

Fitz-Urse, REGINALD. A knight in the service of Henry II., and one of the murderers of St. Thomas. [Becket.]

Fits-Walter, Milo (d. 1146), was one of the itinerant justices in the reign of Henry I. On that king's death he assisted Stephen in his attempt to gain the crown, but before long he deserted the king, and strenuously supported the Empress Matilda, who gave him the title of Earl of Hereford, together with considerable lands and privileges. He was accidentally killed in 1146.

Fits-Walter, ROBERT. A northern baron, who, as an old enemy of John, was selected by the baronial confederacy as the leader in the struggle that finally resulted in the grant of Magna Charts.

Pitz-William, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1542), was a famous naval commander of Henry VIII.'s time. In 1513 and in 1522-24 he defeated the French, and in 1537 was made Earl of Southampton and Privy Seal.

Fitswilliam. WILLIAM, 4TH EARL (b. 1748, d. 1833), was of the distinguished Yorkshire Whig family, and nephew of Rockingham, and opposed the American War and Pitt's earlier ministry. Taking panio at the French revolutionary excesses he dearted Fox. He was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, but recalled, because too liberal, just before 1798. This alienated him from the government, and he became President of the Council under Grenville, in 1807, and lived to share in and see the success of the Reform Bill agitation. He was one of Five Boroughs of Mercia. A rude confederacy of Danish boroughs, corresponding, as some have thought, to the older divisions of no:†:-eastern Mercia. They were Derby, Lincoln, Leicester, Stamford, and Nottingham. They were each ruled by their "jarl," with twelve lawmen administering Danish law in each, while a common court existed for the whole confederacy. They were conquered by Edward the Elder; and reconquered (probably in 941) by Edmund, who seems to have allowed them full enjoyment of their local privileges. [DANELAGH.]

live Members, THE. In January, 1642, Charles I., believing that the Parliamentary leaders intended to impeach the queen, resolved to prevent it by impeaching her assailants. He selected, as the chief offenders, five members of the House of Commons, John Pym (Tavistock), John Hampden (Buckinghanshiro), Denzil Holles (Dorchester), Sir Arthur Haselrig (Leicestershire), and Wil-liam Strode (Dorchester). Lord Kimbolton was included in the same impeachment on January 3. Sir Edward Herbert, the Atterney-General, laid the charges before the House of Lords, who at once appointed a committee to inquire whether his procedure had been according to law. On the same day the king sent the Sergeant-at-arms to the House of Commons with orders to arrest the five members. Charles was urged on by Lord Digby and the queen to arrest the members himself, and about three o'clock on the afteraoon of January 4, started from Whitehall with about four hundred armed men to apprehend them. The accused members had been warned by a message from Lady Carlisle, and escaped by the river into the city. The king entered the House, leaving about eighty armed men in the lobby, and made a speech in which ho said that since they had disobeyed his orders, he had come to arrest the members himself. He commanded the Speaker to tell him whether the accused members were present; and when Lenthall refused to do so, and the king saw with his own eyes that "the birds were flown," he retired, saying, "I assure you, on the word of a king, I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other." The House adjourned till the 11th, appointing a committee to sit in the interval at Guildhall. This committee voted, on the 6th, that the impeachment, the personal issue of the warrants by the king, and the attempt to arrest the impeached members were alike illegal. Addresses and petitions on behalf of the accused members poured in from the city and the country. On the 11th the Commons returned in triumph to Westminster, and two days later the king announced that, as the legality of the impeachment of the members had been doubted, he would now abandon it, and proceed against them "in an unquestionable way." The justifiable distrust caused by this attempt induced the leaders of the Parliament to demand substantial securities from the king, and so led to war.

Pive-Mile Act, The (1665), enacted that no Nonconforming clergyman should come within five miles of any corporate town or any place where he had once ministered (except when travelling), nor act as a tutor or schoolmaster unless he first took tho oath of non-resistance, and swore to attempt no alteration of the constitution in Church or State. It was one of the series of repressive measures, popularly known as the "Clarendon Code," and was aimed at depriving the ejected clergy of their means of livelihood, both by preaching and teaching.

Flag, Honour of the. From you early times the English required foreign ships to salute English vessels within the narrow seas by lowering their flag. This question was vehemently contested by their commercial rivals, the Dutch, and was one of the smaller points of the chronic dispute between the two nations in the middle of the seventeenth century. The Dutch admitted the claim in 1673.

Flagellants, The. A sect of fanatical enthusiasts of the thirteenth century, who formed special fraternities for the observation of flagellation as a solemn and public religious ceremony. Started in 1210 by St. Anthony of Padua, this order became widespread through the teaching of Rainer of Perugia. In the reign of Edward III., 120 of them crossed into England, but their long processions and self-inmolation did not produce a single convert.

Flambard, RALPH (d. 1128), was . . . man of low origin, who after Lanfranc - weath became the chief minister of William Rufus. To his malign influence may be attributed much of the tyranny and oppression of this reign. He devised new impositions, and enriched himself as well as the king, by keeping the seeand abbeys vacant. Un r him the position of Juniciar gradually become a definite office. In 1099 he was made Bishop of Durham. On the accession of Henry I. he was at once arrested and imprisoned in the Tower, from which, however, he very soon managed to escape, and took refuge in Normandy with Robert, whom he encouraged in his invasion of England. Henry subsequently allowed him to return to his bishcpric, where he remained peaceably till his death, occupying himself chiefly in architectural and ecclesiasal works. His character is painted in the darkest characters by the chroniclers. William of Malmesbury says, "If at any time a royal edict was issued that England should pay a certain tribute, it was doubled by this plunderer of the rish, this exterminator of the poor, this confiscator of other men's inheritance. He was an invincible pleader, as unrestrained in his words as in his actions, and equally furious against the meek or the turbulent. Wherefore the king used to laugh and say, 'that he was the only man who knew how to employ his talents in this way, and cared for no one's hatred so long as he could please his master.'"

Flammock, Thomas, was a Cornish attorney, whose harangues incited the Cornishmen to revolt, in 1491, against Henry VII.'s excessive taxation. He led them on their march to Blackheath, and on the suppression of the revolt was hanged as a traitor.

Flanders, RELATIONS WITH. Nominally a fief of France, Flanders was very early of sufficient importance to have close dealings with England. The name "Baldwinsland," given by the early English to the country, suggests the frequency of the dynastic relations between the courts. The first Count Baldwin married Judith, the Frankish widow of Ethelwulf of Wessex, and their son married Elfthryth (Elfrida), a daughter of Alfred the Great. Dunstan found in his exile a refuge in a Flcmish monastery. Godwin, in 1051, was warmly welcomed by the great Baldwin, whose dealings with England were singularly intimate. He died soon after his son-in-law, William I., had conquered the kingdom. Later in William's reign, Gerbod of Chester, and William Fitz-Osbern found captivity and death respectively through warlike intervention in Flemish quarrels. Another Baldwin supported William Fitzobert against his uncle Henry I. Flemish ercenaries and William of Ypres fought r Stephen. Count Philip joined in 1173 great confederation which the younger Henry had excited against his father Henry II. But gradually the old changing relations settled down into a general friendship, when not only dynastic accidents, but a commen policy of alliance against the encroachments of the French kings, and the growing pressure of economical necessities, firmly bound together the two countries. Count Ferdinand joined John and his nephew, Otto IV., in the confederacy that was dissolved by the battle of Bouvines (1213). Edward I. ended, by the Treaty of Montreuil (1274) with Count Guy, the hostilities between his father and Margaret of Flanders. Guy, on the whole, gave Edward efficient support against Philip the Fair. But the growth of the cloth trade in Flanders had bound its great towns to England, whence eame the raw wool which Ghent or Ypres made up into cloth, and the Hanse factories of London and Bruges may have added a further link. On the other hand, the rising power of the towns compelled the Flemish counts to rely on French help; and thus, while the alliance of England and the towns was strengthened, her relations with the counts grew cool. At last, in 1335, Jacob van Artevelde, the Ghent leader, concluded a firm alliance with Edward III. against Count Louis and Philip VI., which continued till Artevelde's death, in 1345. The renewed disturbances at Ghent, under Philip van Artevelde in 1381, were in close analogy and direct connection with the contemporary revolutionary movement under Wat Tyler, and even Bishop Spencer's crusade against the Clementists practically turned to the help of the Flemish townsmen. But the accession of the Burgundian house to Flanders restored the old friendship of the princes, though partly at the expense of the popular party. In 1496 the treaty styled Magnus Intercursus expelled Perkyn Warbeck from Flanders, and allowed full freedom of trade between the two countries. But henceforth Flanders is only a fragment of a larger state.

Plavia Casariensis was one of the districts of Roman Britain. It probably comprised the North.

Pleet Prison, a famous London gaol, a king's prison since the twelfth century, was situated on the east side of Farringdon Street, on the bank of the Fleet rivulet. The Fleet was burnt down by Wat Tyler, and became of great historical interest, as the prison of reliious offenders on both sides, under Mary and Elizabeth, and of the victims of the Star Chamber. On the abolition of the Star Chamber, it became a prison for debtors and those committed for contempt. It was again burnt in the Gordon riots, and abolished in 1841. In the eighteenth century the Fleet became famous for the irregular marriages contracted there by clergymen of abandoned character, and in prison or within the precincts for debt. Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753) put an end to this abuse.

Pleetwood, CHARLES (d. circa 1692), the son of Sir William Fleetwood, was one of those gentlemen of the Inns of Court who enlisted in the body-guard of the Earl of Essex. He also served in the army of the Eastern Association under Oliver Cromwell. In the New Model he commanded a regiment of horse, and, after the capture of Bristol, was appointed governor of that place. In Oct., 1645, he became member for Buckinghamshire. He took no part in the king's death, though his brother George sat amongst the judges. In 1650 Fleetwood was lieutenant-general of the army under Cromwell which invaded Scotland. As such, ho slured in the victory of Dunbar, and played a very important part in the battle of Worcester. On the death of Ireton, Fleetwood married his widow, Cromwell's daughter Bridget; and, after the commandership-in-chief in Ireland had been refused by Lambert, Fleetwood was appointed to that post (Junc, 1652). In March, 1654, he became Lord Deputy, but was recalled to England in the summer of 1655, probably because he was not sufficiently active in pushing on the transplantation of the Catholics and suppressing the exercise of the Catholic religion. On his return, he took his place as a member of Cromwell's Council, and as one of his major-generals. Notwithstanding his relationship to the Protector, he opposed his taking the crown, but accepted a place in his House of Lords. Fleetwood had some expectation of being nominated Cromwell's successor, but, nevertheless, accepted the appointment of Richard Cromwell. However, he headed the party among the officers which wished to make the army independent of the civil power. Their plan was to make Fleetwood commander-inchief, independent of the Protector, and practically a co-ordinate power with him. Not succeeding in this, he and the Council of Officers forced Richard to dissolve Parliament. The Rump, directly it was restored, appointed him commander-in-chief of the land forces in England and Scotland, and one of the Commission of Seven, who were to appoint officers (May, 1659); but as they attempted to subject the army to the Parliament, he broke up the House (Oct., 1659), and established the "Committee of Safety." Monk's advance, and the spread of disaffection in army and people, obliged him to recall the Parliament, though Whitelocke very nearly persuaded him to bring back the king instead. Ho was deprived of his office by Parliament, and, after the king's return, perpetually incapacitated from public employment. He is said to have lived till 1692.

Pleming, Sir Thomas (d. 1613), a prominent member of the Parliaments of 1601 and 1604, was Recorder of London (1594), and Solicitor-General the following year. He took part in the trial of the Earl of Essex, and became Chief Baron of the Exchequer in 1604. Coke calls him "a man of great judgment, integrity, and discretion."

Flemings in England. At various times, large colonies of Flemish settlers have been brought over to England. The close commercial and political rolations of the two countries largely occasioned this emigration. Henry I. is reputed to have settled Lower and Southern Dyfed with Flomings. He cortainly thoroughly expelled the Welsh, and planted the country with Teutonic settlers, who speedily became English, and have remained so to the present time, without any tendency to amalgamate with the surrounding Celts. Not to mention the Flemish merconaries of Stephen's reign, we find large numbers of Flemish weavers settling in England, especially in the eastern counties, where Norwich became the great seat of the clothing industry. These Flemings taught the English to make up their own wool into cloth, instead of exporting it to the looms of Flanders. Later still, the Reformation led to a large emigration of Flemish Protestants into England.

Flets. The name usually given to a very valuable work on English law, written some time in the reign of Edward I. Its date is approximately fixed by the fact that the Statute of Westminster the Second (13 Ed. I.) is the last statute quoted. It derives its name from the fact that it is said to have been written by an unknown prisoner in the Fleet.

Fletcher, Andrew, of Saltoun (b. 1655, d. 1716), was educated by Bishop Burnet, then minister of Saltoun. Ho first appears as Commissioner for East Lothian in the Scotch Parliament; but his opposition to the court occasioned his outlawry and the confiscation of his estates. In 1685 ho engaged in Monmouth's rebellion [MONMOUTH], but quarrelled with a fellow-officer named Dare, and shot him. Monmouth was obliged to dismiss Fletcher, who withdrew to the Continent, and entered the Austrian service against tho Turks. In 1688 he joined William of Orange at the Hague, and after the Revolution his estates were restored to him. He soon joined the "Club," a body of politicians who were dissatisfied with the Revolution Settlement in Scotland. Proud of his good family and theoretical Liberalism, Fletcher hated monarchy and democracy: and desired to make Scotland an oligarchical republic, of the Venetian or Bernese type. At this time ho published two Discourses concerning the affairs of Scotland, in one of which he recommended predial slavery as a remedy for pauperism. He formed a friendship with Paterson, the originator of the Bank of England, and supported his Darien scheme. In Anne's reign he led the "Patriots" in their opposition to the Union. In 1703 he introduced his "Limitations" for Queen Anne's successor, some of which strangely anticipate modern Liberalism, and was a prime mover of the "Bill of Security," which passed in 1704, while the "Limitations" were accepted in 1705. But, finding he could not withstand the Union, he exerted his influence more practically to secure freedom of trade. This attitude, rather than any real connection with the Jacobite conspiracies, led to his arrest in 1708.

Pletcher, RICHARD (d. 1596), Bishop of London, "a comely and courtly prelate," was made Dean of Peterborough (1583), in which capacity he attended Mary Queen of Scots at her execution. Ho was a great favourite of Elizabeth's, by whom he was advanced successively to the sees of Oxford, Worcester, and London, but lost her regard on his marriage, for which he was suspended. He was the father of Fletcher the dramatist, and the uncle of Phineas Fletcher, the poet.

Fleurus is a small town, fifteen miles west of Namur, famous for several battles, and especially those in 1690 and 1794. In the former engagement (July 1, 1690), the Duke of Luxemburg gained a well-contested victory over the Dutch and Imperialists under the Prince of Waldeck. The latter (June 26, 1794) resulted in victory for Marshal Jourdan over the Prince of Coburg.

9, 1513), was fought between James IV. of Scotland and the English under the Earl of Surrey. The most noteworthy stances of this engagement are: (1)

ilful movement by which the Earl rey succeeded in crossing the river and catting off all communication between King James and Scotland. (2) The omission of the Scots to take advantage of the favourable moment for attack presented by the passage of the English army over the river. (3) The utter defeat of the English right wing under Sir Edward Howard, and the loss of this success to the Scots through the misconduct of the troops of Earls Huntly and Home, who, instead of fellowing up their victory, abandoned themselves to pillaging the baggage of both armies. (4) The prowess of the English archers, whose murderous volleys threw the Scottish right, led by Lennox and Argyle, into complete confusion, and rendered their subsequent defeat and ruinous flight a comparatively easy matter. (5) The desperate resistance against over-whelming numbers made by the Scottish centre, and the death of James IV. during the heat of the contest. (6) The indecisive. ness of the conflict. Notwithstanding reverses elsewhere, and the death of their king the Scots succeeded in holding Flodden Hill during the night, and only abandoned their position at the dawn of the next day on learning the real state of affairs. Meanwhile, on the English side, the contest had so nearly resulted in a defeat that Surrey was quite unable to prosecute the war with any vigour. The loss of the Scots in this battle was from 8,000 to 10,000 men; that of the English from 6,000 to 7,000. At the commencement of the battle, the contending armies mustered respectively 30,000 and 32,000 men.

Plood, HENRY (b. 1732, d. 1791), was the son of Warden Flood, Chief Justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. He studied at Dublin and at Oxford, and in 1769 entered the Irish Parliament as member for Kilkenny; and about 1761 he became the idol of the Irish patriots. In 1767 he successfully opposed an attempt made by government to increase the Irish army. In 1773 he was the most vigorous supporter of the Absentee Tax, and the real leader of the Opposition to the Castle. In 1774, however, he came to terms with Lord Harcourt, the Lord-Lieutenant, and finally contented himself with a vice-treasurership, a sinecure of £3,500 a year. In 1779, however, he again deserted the government, and advecated free trade. In 1781 he attacked the Castle expenditure. His name was now struck off the list of Privy Councillors, and he lost his placo. He then tried to supplant Grattan, and recover his old position, but was twice defeated. In 1782 ho stood forth a defender of Protestant ascendency. When Grattan was rewarded for his services, his friends tried to get a reward for him, too, but failed, and a bitter personal attack on Grattan being unsuccessful, he left Ireland for England. In 1783 he returned. Another quarrel with Grattan would have ended in a duel if they had not both been ordered into custody. Flood now took the part of the Volunteers, and agitated for a Reform Bill: he was, however, averse to the Catholic claims. In 1784 his great motion for Reform was defeated, and his influence continuing to decline, he again went to England in 1787 Since 1785 he had had a seat in the English Parliament, but he was little appreciated, and a motion for Reform brought forward by him in 1790 was a failure.

Froude, English in Ireland; Plowden, Life of Grattan.

Plorence of Worcester (d. 1118). A monk of Worcester, and compiler of a Chronicle from the Creation to the year of his death. The earlier part is taken from Marianus Scotus; and the English part previous to his own age is a free translation of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle with occasional additions. For his own period, Florence is very valuable, and though not possessing the literary merit of William of Malmesbury, is lucid, honest, and fair. Florence of Worcester's Chronicle has been published by the English Historical Society.

Florida, The, was a ship built in Birkenhead, nominally for the use of the Italian government. She got out of the Mersey without the slightest difficulty, although the American government had warned ours of her real purpose as a Confederate privateer. Within three months she had eaptured fifteen vessels. Thirteen of these she burnt, and the other two were converted into cruisers by the Confederate government. The damage done by the Florida was included in the Geneva award with the Alahama and other claims. [Geneva Convention.]

Ployd's Case (1621). Floyd was a Catholic barrister, who, in prison, had uttered disrespectful language against the Elector Palatine and his wife. Parliament, then sitting, and disgusted at James's obstinate aversion to their zeal for the cause of the Palatine, inflicted on Floyd a heavy fine, together with whipping, the pillory, branding, and imprisonment. The Commons took the initiative, but the Lords inflicted the sentence. This case illustrates the indefinite right of Parliament to exercise jurisdiction even over those not its members, and for offences not directly against the House.

Hallam, Const. Hist.

Flying Squadron (Squadrone volante) is the name of a party of Scotch politicians, formed about 1705. It was borrowed from the famous "Flying Squadron" of independent cardinals during the previous generation at the Papal Court. Lord Tweeddale was the leader of this "New Party," which, by keeping clese together, and joining first one side and then the other in the Union debates, had for some time a good deal of power. It had the fat of the Union question in its own hands, and its adhesion to the cause of the government in 1706 secured the triumph of that measure.

Poley, Paul, a Tory politician in the reign of William III., began his political career as a Whig, but about 1690 became a Tory. He was so wealthy—his father was a successful ironmaster—that it was unnecessary for him to follow law as a profession; but he had studied it earefully as a science. Ho paraded his independence and disinterestedness rather ostentatiously, and "was so much afraid," saya Macaulay, "of being thought to awn that he was almost always growling." In 1695 he was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, and was again re-elected at the close of the year. In 1696 he proposed the atablishment of the Land Bank.

Poliot, Gilbert (d. 1187), was a monk of Clugny, and became Bishop of Hereford and, subsequently, of London. He is mainly remarkable by his zeal for the cause of Henry II., and in the disputes with Becket was sent to Rome by the king in 1164 to represent his case to the Pope. He was excommunicated by Becket, but the Pope withdrew the sentence; a second excommunication shortly afterwards followed, but on that occasion the Pope confirmed the archbishop's sentence, and Foliot was suspended from his functions, and not restored till after Becket's death. Foliot was a man of learning, and his letters are of considerable value, but he has been traduced without mercy by the partisans of Becket.

John of Salisbury ; Robertson, Becket.

Folkland. The public lands of the nation in old English history. When the English came to Britain, though individual property in land was the rule, the idea of corporate property in it so far existed that after giving to each individual, family, or township their appropriate share, it was natural that what remained over should continue the property of the tribe or nation. With the conselidation of the original states into a single kingdom, the aggregate amount of folkland became very large. It was under the control of the king with the counsel and consent of his Witan. As time went on, largo grants of folkland were made, both to individuals who had done services to king and people, and to communities, Thus the new nobility of services and the monasticies received their endowment from this source. Land thus cut off from folkland was called boeland (q.v.), i.e., land granted by boc or charter. The alienation could be made only with the consent and witness of the Witan. Temporary rights over folkland were also frequently granted in the form of leases for services or money payments. These became in time fixed and constant, so that the land became practically in possession of the leseees. Thus folkland was being constantly diminished in quantity; and as, meanwhile, the development of the theory of royalty subordinated the Witan to the crown, the king, as representative of the nation, acquired practically the disposal of it. Ultimately, about the time of the Norman Conquest, the remnant of folkland became terra regis, the king's domain; and the private property of the crown, hitherto distinct, became merged with it. It is only in recent times that the distinction of crown or national lands and the private estato of the sovereign has been restored. But a long series of land grants by every weak or foolish king, despite occasional resumptions, has reduced the crown lands to a comparatively trifling amount. They are now under the control of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. Folkland. as distinct from the royal domain, was peculiar to England. The "commons" in possession of the township, or some smaller community, were not considered a part of it, though also, in a sense, the property of the people.

Until recently, the nature of folkland was very imperfectly understood. See for the various old theories Schmid's Gesetzs der Angel-Sachsen; for the view now universally accepted, see Stubba's Const. Hist., and the authorities there quoted; and especially Kemble's Sacons in England; and K. Maurer's Kritische Ueberschau.

Folkmoot, the meeting of the people, is the old English name for the great assembly of the nation for political, judicial, and general deliberative functions. Tactus tells us how the Germans of his time consulted the whole nation on all important matters, and the Campus Martius or Madius of the Franks was in later times the folkmoot of that nation. Among the Scandinavian peoples such moots continued to a much later age, as the Icelandic Althing, and the great Swedish Ting, which met at Upsala. In England, there never was a true folkmoot of the whole nation which assembled together at any single place until the establishment of the House of Commons. The Witenagemot (q.v.) was, though indirectly a national senate, directly nothing more than a gathering of magnates. The Shiremoot or County Court (q.v.), however, composed of the re-presentatives of every township within its jurisdiction, was a complete folkmoot for the district comprised in the shire. The House of Commons, formed by concentrating in a single assembly the representatives of the shires, was its lineal successor and r. tural development.

Fontency, THE BATTLE OF (May 11, 1745), was fought during the Austrian Succession War, and resulted in a victory for the French. The Duke of Cumberland advanced with 50,000 English, Dutch, and Austrian troops to reliove Tournay, besieged by Marshal Saxe. The French. while continuing the siege, took up a very strong position south of the town to cover their operations. On their right was the Scheldt, along their front a steep and narrow valley, at their left a wood with forts. This strong position the allies attempted to take. The Dutch under the Prince of Waldeck, after a spiritless attempt had failed, withdrew from the field. But the mass of the English and Hanoverian troops won the heights opposite them; and if supported by the Dutch, must have retained their position. As it was, fresh troops from the French side gradually forced them to retire, with a steadiness as great as that displayed during their advance. The capture of Tournay followed this French victory; but it was rather the withdrawal of troops to Scotland to oppose the Pretender than the effects of Fontenoy that made the subsequent campaign in Flanders so disastrous to the allies, Foreign Legion, The. Prince Albert's special idea during the Crimean War was to raise a foreign legion, and instructions were given to the English ministers at foreign courts to ald this project. The result was a series of collisions with foreign powers, and especially a serious quarrel with the American government, on account of the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, the English minister, for his proceedings in this direction. In the end some few Swiss and other foreigners were enlisted, who novor did anything of Importance.

Poreign Enlistment Act, The (1819), forbade British subjects to take service with a foreign stato without royal licence, and also the equipment of ships to be used against a power with which England was at peace. It was specially suspended to allow Sir do Lacy Evans to raise a British Legion against the Carlists in Spain in 1835. The Alabama and other affairs led to some trials in 1862 and 1863, the proceedings of which showed that the Acts required amendment. This was done by a new Foreign Enlistment Act, passed in 1870.

Porest, Miles, was one of the murderers of Edward V. and his brother Richard in 1483. As a reward he was made keeper of the wardbe at Barnard Castle; but after the death of he shard III., he took sanctuary, where, according to Sir Thomas More, he "piecomeal rotted away."

Forests. Forest, from the Norman Conquest to the Commonwealth, bore the technical signification of crown land reserved for the purposes of the chase, and, as such, cultivated and inhabited on sufferance if at all. A forest was defined as containing eight things: soil, covort, laws, courts, judges, officers, game, bounds. It comprised both "vert"—i.e., trees, underwood, and turf—and "venison"—i.e., the hart, the hind, the hare, the boar, tho wolf, which are beasts of forest; the buck, doe, fox, marten, which are beasts of chase; the rabbit, pheasant, partridge, quail, mallard, heron, &c., which are beasts and fowls of warren. The land subject to forest law need not be all wooded, e.g., Cornwall was "forest" under John. But the forest districts did, of course, mainly coincide with the great woods which, in old days, had made even the Roman roads deflect from a straight course, and which had then, under Roman rule, been cleared away by the legionary, the metal-worker, the citizen, the peasant, to grow up again in time to check the advances of Angles and Saxons, to force this advance to take certain lines, and to limit its first results to the establishment, at least in Mid-England, of petty and isolated "folks." Thus the West Saxons found their natural boundaries determined by Andred's Weald on the east, by Selwood on the west, as decisively as by the Thames and the sea on the north and on the south. Kentish folk, East Saxons, and East Angles were cut off from each other by marsh and wood; so were Mid-Angles from West Angles, Deirans from Bernicians; while along the Severn, la the l'eak district, and in the hills of the kingdo: t of Elmet, the nature of the ground long barred the way westward, and from the Clyde to the Parret, the Welsh confronted the invaders in a long continuous line until the seventh century. The mighty Andred's Weald, even in Bede's day, lay stretched for 120 miles from Hampshire to t'e Melway. The Wire Wood covered what are now Worcestershire, Shropshire, a 11 Staffordshire, as Arden once covered Warwickshire. Epping Forest was part of a greater whole, which extended from London nearly to the Wash, as another such region from the Peak to the Trent; from the l'eak to the Tees was little but desert: from Tees to Tyne was one great forest in St. Cuthbert's days. These great woods were being rapidly cleared or opened out, when the Norman kings came and largely increased them; as by the de-populating and "afforesting" a district containing twenty-two charches, to form the New Forest. But they also introduced the new Forest Laws, by which the Conqueror, who "level the tall stags as if he had been their father," inflieted a cruel penalty (the loss of eyes) for hunting the royal deer. The so-called Forest Laws of Canute, a palpablo forgery of the twelfth century, probably represent the state of things under Henry I.; they make it capital " to kill a stag as to kill a man;" merely to hunt a decr was punished by the lash, if the offender were a villein; if a freeman, by a heavy fine. Within the forest bounds, no bows were to be carried without a licence, no dogs were to be kept but mastiffs, and those to be "lawed" by cutting off the claws of each forefoot. In Henry II.'s Forest Assize the third offence is capital; and even Edward I allows a trespasser who should resist the have und cry to be lawfully slain, and requires a solemn inquest and verdict to be taken upon the body of a dead stag. The same jealous watch was exercised over "vert" as over "venison." The forest cour 3 and officers, under the hand of Henry II., became an exact analogy of the shire system, to which they stood as it were as rivals. The Court of Reguard was indeed held only every three years, for the "lawing" of dogs, agist-ment of cattle, &c. But the wood-mote, or Court of Attachment, met every forty days, and therein the foresters made their presentments to the verderers, a jury of inhabitants. Presentments reaffirmed went before the swainmoot, which met thrice a year; while final judgment was given at the Justice Seat, or occasional visits of itinerant forest jostices. This last office was abolished in 57 George III., the criminal law of the forest having already been almost wholly repealed in 7 George III. Nothing stood more in the way of that alliance between the king and the English people against the Norman baronsge that alliance on which hung, for more than a century and a half, the very existence of the throne—than this tyrannous forest system. Even in his great need, in the very charter by which he purchased his accession, Henry I. insists on retaining his father's forests; and Stephen, too, who gave up everything, could not bring himself to keep his promise of giving up the forests which Henry 1. had added. Henry 11. developed them into an organisation under a muster forester and sixteen forest justiciaries. John was forced into an engagement to give up those added by himself, and "to consider the extensions made by his father and brother;" but we find one of the grievances at the Parliament of Oxford, in 1258, is that neither this, nor the engagement made in 1217 by Henry III.'s ministers, in his name, had been carried out. It was not until the last year of the century that the often-pro-mised "perambulation" was made, and the forest bounds reduced, by a strict inquiry between the royal officers and the local representatives. It was characteristic of the shortsightedness of the Stuart kings that they revived this old source of discontent. Traces are to be found under James I. of attempts to restore the old claims in their fulness, and at last Noy's bullying chicanery wou a suicidal victory in the decisions of 1633-37, which inquired into all alterations made since John and Henry II., and undid much of the "Perambulation" of 1500.

The forest policy of the earlier kings is not to be explained by a royal infatuation for the pleasures of the chase. The forests, in fact, offered to the king (1) a revenue, (2) an armed force, (3) a jurisdiction altogether outside the ever-narrowing circle of his constitutional position. Thus (1) the crown derived considerable profits from such rights as the "pannage" of swine and the agistment of cattle within these vast domains; the chiminagium, or tax on carts which came to tako fuel, charcoal, or bark; the "pleas" of the forest courts, and the fines ou offenders. But too often the forests were treated as an inexhaustible treasury, wherefrom to make grants to courtiers. Again (2), the host of stewards, foresters, reguardors, agistors, woodreeves, and bailiffs were a rude substitute for a standing army and a royal police. (3) The code of forest law, too, stood out in relief from the common law; what was "not justice in itself, was justice according to the forest law," and these courts could enforce an attendance even from the great lord who claimed a franchise superior to hundred and shire moot, even from the clergy, who could in other cases appeal to their ordinary. They were, indeed, as Henry II.'s Treasurer calls them, "the shrine and bower of kingship," a royal counterpoise at once to the baronial "liberty" and the popular

"shire-moot," an imperium in imperio. The king claimed a supervision over the very parks and woodlands of his earls and barons, bishops and abbots, whether within a forest's bounds or not. "A subject," mys Coke, "cannot have more than a chase, unless by express grant, first, of the privilege of a royal forest, and then of the jurisdiction belonging thereto."

To a people feeling the ordinary courts an irksome burden, the added duty of attendance at the forest courts must have seemed intolerable. And yet, till Magna Charta, this was enforced, probably in more than half the shires, on all alike, whether dwellers in forest bounds or not. In the Forest Charter of 1217, concessions are made which show how weil grounded the complaints were; tho swain-moot is to be convened not more than three times a year, and the Court of Attachment every forty days; the necessary officers and parties alone are bound to attend. The keepers of royal castles are forbidden to hold forest plens; the same rules henceforth are to be binding on the barons' and prelates' conduct to their mesne vassals.

The forests reached their widest extent in the reign of John. Not merely were there such woods as Delamere, Windsor, Whittlebury, Dean, the New Forest, Andred, Sherwood, Selwood, Arden, and such hili districts as the Chilterns, the Peak, Exmoor, Dart-moor, the Yorkshire Wolds; but whole counties were reckoned as forests, and subject to forcet law, e.g., Devonshire, Cornwall, Essex, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, Edward I.'s concessions then "disforested" an immense proportion of lands hitherto included, perhaps two-thirds of the whole. But Henry VIII. added Hampton Court, the royal rights still weighed on twenty counties in the Tudor reigns, and the number of royal forests was still reckoned at sixtyeight in the oighteenth century. The Commonwealth Commission, which sat to carry out the remedial Act of 1641, did not act on the suggestion made for a complete sale of them; but the reductions it effected were not whelly lost at the Restoration. Most of the forest laws, and many of the forest dues, became obselete. And now the people began to encroach upon the crown. When investigation was made at the end of the eighteenth century, and early in the nineteenth, it was found that endless unlicensed enclosures had been effected; iniquitous transfers made under colour of sale; timber was stolen, mines neglected, plantations mismanaged; officials had transformed themselves into owners; and there were only twenty forests which could supply timber for the navy. But under the provision of several Acts of George III., and the Consolidating Act of 10 George IV., c. 50, a better system of management was inaugurated about 1809. Twelve of the twenty royal forests then remaining were re-inclosed and re-planted, and a commission appointed in 1838 gradually simplified their organization, and improved their yield, tili, a few years ago, the eight royal forests which remained yielded an average profit of £8,000 a year, as against an actual iose in 1846—7—8, due to former mismanagement. Some have been soid, as Sherwood to the Duke of Grafton, and some opened out to agriculture, as large parts of Windsor. The office of Woods and Forests was separated from the department of Public Works in 1861. This by no means represents the whole result of their work, for much of the old forest domains are now classed as crown lands, and on them the revenue has risen from £250,000, in 1853, to over £500,000, a sum which more than covers the King's Civil List. It is singular that in this way those royal demosne lands, of which the forests once formed the main part, after straining the relations between crown and people for centuries, and assisting unduly to magnify the prerogative, while they soon failed to add to its real strength, or materially to aid the Exchequer, have at last been made to cover the cost of the monarch's establishment.

Porfeiture of Lands. (1) FOR TREASON. The irliest law of treason, that of Alfred, that if a man plotted against the king's life, he should be "liable in his life and in all that he has." and in the first detailed discussion of the subject, that of Bracton (temp. Henry III.), forfeiture is set down as one of the penalties. From this period the law was unchanging until 1870. The traitor forfeited to the crewn for ever all his freehold lands, whether entailed or not, all rights to freehold lands which he then had or might afterwards acquire, and all interests in land for life or other term of years. Sentence of forfeiture was retro-active as far as the date of the act of treason; it therefore annulled all deeds of conveyance, &c., which might have been made since, but did not affect a wife's jointure which had been settled on her previously. Dower, on the other hand, was forfeited by 5 and 6 Edward VI. As forfeiture was a consequence of attainder, if the rebel was killed on the ficid, executed by martial law, or died before judgment was pronounced, his lands were not forfeited. In Scotland conviction for treason did not bring with it forfeiture of entailed lands. At the Union it was thought necessary to make the law uniform in England and Scotland, but as this met with much opposition from the Scots, it was enacted (7 Anne) that though for the present forfeiture should follow treason in Scotland as in England, it should cease in both countries upon the death of the then Pretender. After a second Act immediately before the rebellion of '45 had secured the continuance of the penalty, the whole clause relating to the ultimate cessation of forfeiture was abolished by 39 George III. (2) For MURDER. The criminal forfeited to the crown only the profits of his entailed estates, and the possession for a year and a day with right of 'wasto" of lands in fee simple. After this the lands were escheated to the lord. Possession by the crown for a year and a day originally followed all convictions for felony, though it became customary to pay a composition to prevent the use of the right of entry. By 54 George III. forfeiture for a year and a day was abolished for all felonics except treason and murder, and finally the Felony Act of 1870 abolished attainder and its consequent forfeiture altogether. Forfeiture of goods and chattels followed conviction for any felony, and did not need, as in the case of lands, to be preceded by attainder. This also was abolished in 1870. [W. J. A.]

Forman, Andrew (d. 1522). A Scottish ecclesiastic and statesman of the early part of the sixteenth century. He became Bishop of Moray, was ambassador to ratify the alliance of Scotland and England at the accession of Henry VIII., but soon after attached himself to France, was made Archbishop of Bourges, and persuaded James IV. to begin the war of 1513 against England. In 1515 he was made Archbishop of St. Andrews at the request of Albany. In 1517 he became one of the Council of Regency in Albany's absence. Forman was able, versatile, and magnificent. He has been compared to Wolsey, but his want of fixed wrinciple or policy make the comparison very unjust to the latter.

Fornham St. Genevieve, The Battle of (1173), was one of the victories won by Henry II. over the rebellious barons who allied themselves with the French king. Here Robert de Beaumont and his Flemish merce aries were totally defeated by the Justiciar, Richard de Lucy. Fornham is two miles from Bury St. Edmunds.

Porrest, Dr., was an Observant Friar and confessor to Catherine of Aragon, a strong opponent of her divorce and of the royal supremacy, and was executed in 1538, being hung in chains over a slow fire, so that his "treason" and heresy should both receive their legal punishment.

Forster, Wm. E. (b. 1818, d. 1886), was educated at the Friends' School, Tottenham. In 1861 he was returned to Parliament in the Liberal interest for Bradford, and in Lord Russell's administration he was Under-Secretary for the Colonies. As Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education he passed the Education Bill (1870) through the Commons. On Mr. Gladstone's retirement in 1874 he was one of the candidates for the Liberal leadership, but resigned in Lord Hartington's favour. In 1880 he became Chief Secretary for Ireland, but resigned in 1882 on Mr. Parnoll's release. He ardently supported the Northern cause in the American War of Secession, took a middle course in the Eastern Question (1876-78), and was keenly interested in Imperial Federation.

Sir Wemyss Reid, Life.

Fort Duquesne was the most celebrated of the ring of forts built by the French about the middlo of the eighteenth century to connect Louisiana with Canada. It was situated in the upper valley of the Ohio. Against it, in 1756, General Braddock led his ill-fated expedition, but shortly after, the English conquered the fort and renamed it Pittsburg, in honour of the great War Minister. It is now, under its new name, the great seat of the American iron and coal trades.

Fort Erie, on Lake Ontario, was bosicged and taken by the British troops, under Sir George Drummond, after the battle of Lundy's Lane, in 1814.

Fort George, on Lake Ontario, near Niagara, was the scene of frequent skirmishes during the American War of 1812-15. In 1813 it was taken by the Americans from General Vincent, and was again invested by General Brown in the following year.

Fort Teviot, five miles south of Perth, was the capital of the old Pictish kingdom.

Fort William, close to Inverlochy in South Inverness-shire, commands the sea entry to the Highlands, and was built in 1691 by General Mackay. It was successfully attacked by the Jacobites in 1715 and 1745.

Fort William. [CALCUTTA.]

Fortescue, Sir John (d. after 1476), was descended from an old Devonshire family, and in 1442 was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench. He was a strorg partisan of the Lancastrian cause, and in the first Parliament of Edward IV. was attained of high treason. He fled to Scotland, and afterwards to France, where he became the tutor of the young Prince Edward, for whose instruction he wrote his famous work, De Laudibus Legum Angliae. He was present at the battle of Tewkesbury, and in 1473 obtained a reversal of his attainder by retracting what he had written against Edward IV.'s title to the crown. His book (best ed., Plummor's, 1885) is of much interest, from its picture of a constitutional ideal that had almost been realised in the preceding generation.

Forties, The, was a name given to the Irish forty-shilling freeholders in the early part of the nineteenth century. The Irish election law had never been altered, and in old days, when the landowners could depart on their tenantry, it had been a favour to practice with them to increase them, in order to have more voters under their control. In 1826, however, in two cases they followed the priests and O'Connell, and there out two landlords candidates. In 18.5 they returned O'Connell for Clare. In 1829 the Emancipation Bill was accompanied by a measure raising the franchise to £10, and thus sweeping them away. O'Connell was much blamed for not raising his voice on their behalf, but he was probably afraid to endanger Emancipation.

Fortrenn was a province of Celtic Scotland, comprising the districts of Menteith and Stratherne, and extending from the Forth to the Tay. After the re-establishment of the Pictish power by the victory of Nectansmere, the name Fortrenn began to be used as synonymous with the kingdom of the Picts.

Foss Way was a Roman road, probably running from Ilchester to Lincoln, crossed by the Ermine Street. Another road in Dorsetshire had the samo name. [Roman Roads.]

Foster, Sir John, was sent in 1565, in conjunction with the Earl of Bedford, on a mission to Mary Queen of Scots, on behalf of the Earl of Murray. In the rebellion of the northern earls, 1569, he did good service on the royal side, and in the following year harried Teviotdale. In 1572 he was charged, as Warden of the Midule Marches, with the duty of superintending the execution of Thomas, Earl of Northumberland. In 1585 he was taken prisoner by Ker of Ferniehurst, the Warden of the Scotch Marches, near Riccarton.

Fosterage, The Custom of. The Irish in mediaval times were remarkable for their affection for their foster-children, and Giraldus Cambrensis goos so far as to say "That the Irish loved their foster-children, and were cruel to their own relations." Fosterage was one of the chief means by which they influenced their conquerors, and the Statute of Kilkenny in 1367, and soveral other statutes, were passed to prevent this form of degeneracy. Sir J. Davis says of it, "Yet in Ireland they put away all their children to fosterage, tho potent and rich men selling, the meaner sort buying, the nursing of children, and the reason is because, in the opinion of this people, fosterage hath always been a stronger alliance than blood, and the foster-children do love and are beloved of their foster-fathers and sept more than of their own natural parents and kindred, and do participate their means more frankly, and do adhere to them with more affection and constancy." The Statute of Kilkenny had made fosterage with the Irish high treason, but the custom continued till Cromwell's time.

Fotheringay Castle, in Northamptonshire, was founded after the Norman Conquest by Simon de Liz, and subsequently rebuilt by Edmund Langley, Duke of York. In 1452 it was the scene of the birth of Richard-III.; after the discovery of Babington's plot, Mary Queen of Scots was confined, tried, and executed in Fotheringay Castle. It was entirely demolished by order of James I.

Fougères, The Capture of (1449), was made by a body of English troops with the connivance of the Dukes of Somerset and Suffolk in flagrant violation of the truce which had been made between England and France. Fougères, which is situated in Brittany, close to the Frontiers of Normandy and Maine, was at this time a place of great wealth, and by its capture the English obtained enormous booty, but the glaring breach of faith threw the Duke of Brittany into the arms of France, and hastened the expulsion of the English from Normandy, completed in 1450.

Poundling Hospital, The (Dublin), had large private funds amounting to £16,000 a year; about 120 noblemen and gentlemen were on its committee. Yet when De Blacquiere, in 1789, moved for a committee of inquiry, a motion which Grattan (q.v.) resisted unsuccessfully, the most terrible mismanagement was exposed. It was discovered that out of 2,180 children sent to the institution in one year, 2,087 had disappeared, and the teach child cost the public £120. The committee also had never had a quorum, except when a place was to be given away.

Four Masters, The Chronicle of the, was written by Michael, Conary, and Cucogry O'Clerighe, and Fearfeafa O'Mulcenry, who compiled in Irish, from original documents, the annals of Ireland from 2242 B.c. to A.D. 1616. The writers did their work in a Franciscan monastery in Donegal in 1632-36, under the patronage of Fergus O'Gara, a native chieftain. Nearly all the MSS. they used were lost in the conflicts of the next few years. The work is the most important of the collections of early Irish annals, though, of course, largely mythical.

The work, printed in O'Conor, Rerum Hibernicerum Scriptores, vol. iii., has been translated and edited by J. O'Donovan, 1848.

Fourmigni, THE BATTLE or (1450), was one of the last battles of the Hundred Years'

Fowler, Sir Henry. [Wolverhampton,

Viscount.] Fox, Charles James (b. 1749, d. 1806), was the second son of Henry Fox, afterwards Lord Holland. Educated at Eton and Oxford, he afterwards travelled on the Continent, and while still in Italy, he was returned M.P. for Midhurst, as a supporter of Lord North. His success was immediate, and was the more readily assured since he took the side of the majority. His brilliant and reckless support was rewarded by his appointment in Feb., 1770, as a junior Lord of the Admiralty. This position he retained for two years, and then, after attacking Lord North with much warmth on the Church Nullum Tempus Bill, in Feb., 1772, he resigned, and thus felt himself at liberty to oppose the Royal Marriage Act. He was again taken into the ministry as a Lord of the Treasury; but his fiery spirit was too independent to allow him to remain long in any subordinate post. He instituted a mutiny in the government ranks, which resulted in Lord North's defeat. Henceforth, his great social influence and greater debating powers were enlisted on the Whig side. He openly opposed Lord North's ministry, especially in regard to their American policy, and at once became a recognised leader of the Whigs, and a close friend of Burke, whose views ho now began to share. In 1779 he made a most violent attack upon Lord Sandwich, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and moved that he might be excluded from the king's councils. He had now come to be the acknowledged leader of the Opposi-tion in the House of Commons; and was selected by the Radical electors of Westminster as their champion along with Admiral Rodney. He still continued to attack the ministry with the flercest invectives, and even threatened Lord North with impeachment. In 1782 Lord Rockingham formed a cabinet, in which Fox was one of the Secretaries of State. With Lord Rockingham's death in July, Fox's share in the government came to an end. He distrusted Shelburne, and would not serve under him. Before a year was passed, Sholburne, unable to withstand the strictures with which Fox greeted his peace proposals, resigned; and Fox became the colleague of Lord North, as Secretary of State, under the nominal lead of the Duke of Portland. An alliance so unnatural could not last long, and the government was defeated on Fox's India Bill, chiefly through the king's influence. After the dismissal of the Coalition ministry, Pitt came in with a minority to back him; but Fox did much to ruin the cause of his party by the factious and violent opposition which he offered to all Pitt's measures. Pitt soon became firmly established in his position; but Fox continued to harass him with attacks at every point. he opposed his India Bill, and tried to make capital out of Pitt's measures for the relicf of Ireland. In 1786 he obtained a splendid opportunity of displaying his eloquence and abilities in the prosecution of Warren Hastings; but in this great trial he seems to have been eclipsed by his illustrious companions. Two years later he warmly espoused the unconstitutional position desired by the Prince of Wales on the question of the Regency Bill, but he was battled by the patient resolution of Pitt. In 1789 canie the news of the destruction of the Bastille. Fox at once hailed with delight what he deemed the uprising of an oppressed people. In 1791 he passed the celebrated Libel Bill. With greatly diminished following, Fox still continued to watch with sympathy and enthusiasm the course of the Revolution in France, and furiously opposed the notion of war with that country. In 1795 he employed his most vehement oloquence in opposing in vain the Sedition and Treason Bills. Seeing that he could effect nothing, Fox retired in 1797 into domestic privacy at St. Anne's Hill. In 1804, on the resignation of Addington, Pitt, well aware of his difficulties, was very anxious to form a cabinet on a broad basis, where faction might be sunk in patriotism. With this object in view he desired the co-operation of Fox; but the king would not hear of it. On Jan. 26, 1806, Pitt died, and the king at length overcame his prejudices and had recomse to the Opposition, out of which a ministry was formed with Lord Grenville as Prime Minister, and Fox as Foreign Secretary. Fox now abandoned his passionate longing for peace with France before the necessity of saving Europe; and in his efforts to achieve this object, he was as resolute as Pitt. But Napoleon took advantage of his still strong desire for peace to carry out his own schemes for the conquest of Europe; and the fatal indecision of the ministry left Prussia unaided to oppose Napoleon's combinations, and to be defeated at Jena. Death, however, came to Fox just in time to save him from witnessing the overthrow of his most cherished hopes. While negotiations were still pending between England, France, and Russia, Fox died Sept. 13, 1806. To a real passion for liberty, very unusual with eighteenth century Whigs, Fox added honesty, manliness, and consummate eloquence. His sweet disposition effaced the memory of his private irregularities; his general straightforwardness atoned for occagioral factiousness.

teorge III.'s Reign Jones, Mem. of Reign of George III.; Massey, Hist. of Eng.; Adolphus, Hist. of Eng. [W. R. S.]

Fox, RICHARD (d. 1528), Bishop of Winchester, was born at Grantham, and, by the favour of Cardinal Morton, made Bishop of Exeter, Durham, and Winchester, succession. He was a prominent minister and diplomatist under both Henry VII. and his son, until thrown into the shade by Wolsey. He was also zealous for the "New Learning," and founder of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and several schools.

Fox, Sir Stephen (b. 1627, d. 1716), was of humble stock, and began life as a choir boy at Salisbury. Thence he became a member of Lord Percy's household, and took some share on the Cavalier side in the Great Rebellion. Clarendon persuaded Charles II. when in exile to make Fox his business manager-an office he filled with great discreetness. He made the scanty finances of the exile adequate to support him. After the Restoration his promotion was rapid. He was made Paymaster, Master of the Horse, and Lord of the Treasury, sitting in the House as member for Salisbury. He became very rich. Despite his gratitude to the Stuarts, his name appeared on every commission of William III.'s Treasury. He took a large part in the foundation of Chelsea Hospital. Of his two sons, Stephen became Lord Ilehester, and Henry became Lord Holla: and father of C. J. Fox.

Trevelyan, Early Life of C. J. Fox.

Foxe, John (b. 1516, d. 1587), the martyrologist, was compelled to quit England during the Marian persecution, but on the accession of Elizabeth returned, and was made a canon of Salisbnry. A friend of many of the most noted men of the age, Foxo would have obtained the highest dignities of the Church had he renounced his Calvinistie views. His Acts and Monuments, commonly known as the Book of Martyrs (first published in 1563) is a vast but prejudiced and uneritical compilation of the annals of martyrdom, which, though containing much useful matter, is too nasafe a guide for the historian to follow, unless substantiated from other sources.

France, Relations with. Long before France, in the modern sense, was constituted, England had frequent dealings with the territory now known by that name. The old English monarchs were often in close relations with the Carlovingian Emperors. [Empire. Relations with.] French history strictly begins in 987, when Hugh Capet, Duke of the French, assumed the crown of the Carolings, and, like Harold, founded a monarchy, national in idea but feudal in reality. The abandonment of the Carlovingian kings by the

Norman dukes was among the chief causes of Hugh Capet's success; but there was a natural enmity between the weak suzerain and the mighty vassal that transferred itself to England when William of Normandy became English king. French ideas, manners, military system, architecture even, had already come into England with Edward the Confessor. After the Conquest the governing classes were practically Frenenmen. But the political relations with the French monarchy, which it is our main business to trace here, were necessarily determined by William's hostility to the Parisian king. The subsehostility to the Parisian king. quent national hostility between France and England sprang much more largely from the uneasy relations of the early Capetians to their over-powerful vassals than from English dislike to what was French. William I. fought against Philip I. for the possession of the Vexin, and met his death during the campaign. In 1094, Philip vainly helped Duke Robert against William II., and again, in 1097, fought with the English king about the Vexin. Louis VI. was a more redoubtable antagonist than the weak Philip. But the reunion of England and Normandy after 1106 made Louis' efforts to weaken Henry fruitless, and the Treaty of Gisors (1113) ended war for a time. But in two or three years the war was renewed, until the English victory at Brenneville (1119), and the mediation of Calixtus II., produced another peace. The subsequent efforts of Louis were of little importance. The reign of Stephen suspended foreign relations; but Henry II., from the very fact that he ruled more of France than the French king himself, was the more likely to be his unwilling vassal. In 1159 Henry was involved in the War of Teulouse, but in refusing to wage open war with his lor, Louis VII., showed a scruplo that was not experienced by Louis, who never lost an opportunity of attacking Henrye.g., in 1167-8, during one Becket quarrel; in 1173-4, when Louis helped the younger Henry to revolt against his father, and set on foot a powerful but nnsuccessful coalition against the Angevin. Later in the reign, when Louis stirred np Richard and John against their father, the relations of England and France for the first time assumed that aspect of lasting hostility that influenced all subsequent history. The temporary suspension of enmity for crusading purposes—the joint Crusade of Richard I. and Philip Augustus [CRUSADES]—led only to a quarrel in Palestine, and Philip's premature return to arrange attacks on Normandy. John, Philip's old ally, became his enemy on his accession to the throne. Philip's conquest of Normandy in 1204, his alliance with Innocent III. against the excommunicated English king, the crowning victory of Bouvines (July 27, 1214) over every branch of the German race, sufficiently indicate the relations of England and France under John.

But attle national opposition was there as yet at the revolted barons, enraged at John's repudiation of the Great Charter, invited Philip's son Louis to avenge their wrongs, and occupy their throne. Nothing but John's opportune death and the wisdom of Pembroke could have saved England from at least a temporary union with France.

Fra

Though the results were not at first apparent, the separation of England and Normandy had revolutionised the relations of England and France. The countries henceforth pursue a separate course. The feudal hostility be me national. England became conscious of national identity. Though French still in manners and speech, the barons of England were no longer French in feeling. Strengthened by the annexations of l'hilip Augustus, the French monarchy was now a sufficient basis for the development of French national sentiment. One thing alone retarded this change of relation—the retention of Guienne by Henry III. and his successor. In consequence of this there was still a feudal element in the relations of England and France. Besides being English monarchs, Henry III. and even Edward I. were also feudal petentates in the separatist south. In both aspects they were equally hostile to 'he l'arisian monarchs.

Under Henry III.-in whose reign a new importation of French manners, and the great absorption of French words in the English tongue occurred-the struggle for Poitou, lost in about 1229 by the English and in vain attacked in 1242, was counterbalanced by the conscientious moderation of Louis IX., which led to his selection as mediator between Henry and the barons in 1264. But the Mise of Amiens disgusted the national party, and led the way to the struggle of Edward I. and Philip the Fair; while the rival claims of English and Angevin claimants to the Sicilian throne had added previously a new element of difference. Yet, in 1286, Edward mediated between France and Aragon, though his award was repudiated. In 1294 a great war began, during which Edward for a time lost Gascony, and in which Scotland, then struggling against Edward for national independence, first became the hereditary ally of France. In 1297 tho war ended, and in 1299 Boniface VIII.'s mad action led to the definite Treaty of Chartres. Edward II., though married to the sister of Charles IV., fell into difficulties with that monarch in 1324; the revelution of 1327, however, put these into the background.

In 1328 the old line of French kings died out, and the accession of Philip of Valois was contested by Edward III. as the son of Isabella. In 1337 French help to Scotland hed Edward to prosecute his claim by arms. So began the Hundred Years' War between France and England. After a period of brilliant victories, Edward III. forced on the French the Treaty of Bretigny (1360), but Charles V, profiting by Edward's dotage, and the minority of Richard II., reconquered all he had won save Calais. The marriage of Richard II. with Isabella of France, in 1397, coinciding with that monarch's arbitrary stroke for absolutism, marks a curious approximation between the two countries, during the pauso between the acts of the great struggle. It led to the friendship of the Armagnacs for the deposed Richard which was, perhaps, tho beginning of that Anglo-Burgundian alliance that alone made possible the brilliant successes of Henry V. Under him the second heroic period of the Hundred Years' War was fought, and the Treaty of Troyes (1420) made Henry son-in-law and successor of the French monarch. Edward III. had the assistance of the feudal south, but Henry V. was the ally of the monarchical north of France, a different native faction contributing to each king's success. Thereafter the minority of Henry VI. and the national enthusiasm engendered by the Maid of Orleans, led to the loss not of Paris only or of Normandy, but of the ancient possession of Guienne. The death of Talbot, in 1453, ended the Hundred Years' War and the hopes of English domination in France. Calais, Edward III.'s great prize, alone remained of all the conquests.

The question of peace or war with France was now one of the chief points of dispute between the court and constitutional parties. The unpopularity of Suffolk, and the popularity of York, were largely the result of their adopting a statesmanlike and popular view respectively. But the alliance, first of the Lancastrians, then of Warwick, with France, forced Edward IV., however unwillingly, to the Burgundian alliance; and though Charles the Bold's abandonment of his cause led to the Treaty of Pecquigny (1475) and friendship with Lou's XI., yet before Edward's death that monarch had repudiated the English alliance. In vain Richard III. sought the friendship of France. Charles VIII., no less than Francis of Britanny, helped Henry of Richmond to the throne; though Henry VII.'s constant Spanish policy, the war of the Breton succession, and the French support of Warbeck, despite the Treaty of Etaples (1492), show that the normal hostility of England and France still continued.

With Henry VIII. a new era in foreign relations began. Instead of the long-standing traditional policy of the Middle Ages, the policy of interests begins with the establishment of the political system of Europe, the dectrine of the balance of power, and the growth of modern diplomacy. In the early part of his reign, Henry was eager to win new Crecys and Agincourts at the expense of the traditional enemy. But besides this, a new motive—the desire of adjusting the balance in Italy—led Henry to join the War of the Holy League against France (1511-1514). For a few years old and new motives coincided to keep Honry true to his traditional hostility, and the first war of Francis I. and Charles V. (1521-1529) saw Henry again the enemy of France. But the negotiations of 1520 clearly show that Henry's main motive had reference to the political exigencies of the moment, rather than to any traditional theory of policy. The withdrawal of England from the war, after the battle of Pavia (1525), the moment that Charles had an overwhelming advantage, illustrates Henry's regard for tho balance of power. The alliance with France in 1526, the long and wearisome negotiations to enlist France on the side of Henry's divorce, equally indicate the new state of things. Francis played Henry false, and deserved the English attack in 1543, which, successful during Henry's life, led to disastrous failure during the weak rule of Somerset. Northumberland was the friend of France; but the accession of Mary, with the consequent Spanish alliance, was the cause of a fresh war between the two countries, during which France gained Calais. The Treaty of Cateau Cambresis (1559) ended the war, but the accession of Francis II., the husband of Mary of Scotland, and tool of the Guises, and the ambiguous compromise as to the restoration of Calais, kept alive the enmity.

The Treaty of Cateau marked the beginning of a new era. Political considerations were subordinated to religious ones; and during Elizabeth's reign, despite her personal feelings, the Huguenots were the natural allies, the Catholic League the natural foes, of the English. The accession of Henry IV. ended the active period of Catholic reaction, and led, for the first time, to a hearty national alliance of Franco and England against Spain. For the next half century religious hatred of Catholicism, and political fear of the overweening Spanish monarchy, continued to produce this approximation between the old rivals. James I.'s Spanish policy was unpopular and unsuccessful. In 1624 a French alliance was adopted, and Charles I.'s marriage with Louis XIII.'s sister, though it did not prevent the war of 1627, kept the two nations on fair terms during the whole reign of that monarch. Richelieu's underhanded support of the Scots rather strengthened than weakened this position. The vacillating foreign policy of the first Stuarts made it impossible for fixed relations, eithor friendly or hostile, to be established; and it was reserved for Cromwell to revivo the foreign policy of Elizabeth, and, in league with Mazarin, to humble effectually the pride of Spain. But Elizabethan policy was now obsolete. Cromwell's friendship with Franco is largely responsible for the aggressions of Louis XIV. Under Clarendon, who closely fellowed Cromwell in foreign policy, the same policy of French alliance became a source of that minister's unpopularity. Tho Triple Alliance (1667) of the Cabal was the beginning of the policy of combined resistance to Louis XIV., of which ultimately England was to be the centre. But Catholio and despotic leanings, love of bribes, and fear of decided action, kept England's general influence on the side of France, so long as Charles II. and James II. were on the throne. Only under Danby, when the Orange marriage and the decided action of 1677 were effected, did England in any vigorous way set itself against French aggressions. The great development of French influence on literature, culture, manners, and fashions helped to maintain this French friendship. But with tho Revolution of 1688, the princo who was at the centre of the European opposition to the universal monarchy of Louis XIV. became King of England, and tho addition of the whole weight of England to the coalition led to the ultimate defeat of France. The war of 1688 way for the War of the Spanish Succession (1702—1713). The well-contested defeats of William, and the crowning victories of Marlborough, broke up the power of France, even when the connection of the dethroned Stuarts with France, and the doctrine of laissez-faire in European politics, kept up a French party in the country, which secured the conclusion of the Treaty of Utrecht (1713). This Tory alliance with France, strangely enough, endured for twenty-five years of Whig ministry. The Regent, Philip of Orleans, and the ministers of George I., were, from widely different reasons, equally anxious for its maintenance. Philip drove away the Pretender from France, and, in 1717, the Triple Alliance of England, Holland, and France was effected to maintain the Treaty of Utrecht against the efforts of the reviving monarchy of Spain. The peace policy of Walpolo and Fleury kept this state of things alive. It was during this period of unity that the close literary and philosophic intercourse between France and England, which was to make the doctrines of Locke and Newton the common property of Europe, was effected. But the revival of Spain was not very real. When prosperity visited France anew, her ministers were anxious to revive the schemes of Louis XIV., and, besides regard for the political balance of Europe, tho rivalry of England and France in America and India, the efforts of both nations at colonial expansion, proved a new and deep-seated source of hostility. Thus, in the War of the Austrian Succession (1740 -1748), and still more in the Seven Years' War (1756—1763), England and France were again involved in war. The glories of Pitt's great ministry led to the vast extension of the Indian and colonial empire of England, even though the desiro of Georgo III. to leave foreign politics alone, and devote himself to the restoration of the royal power, led to the premature Peace of Paris (1763). For the next few years there was peace, but little cordiality, between France and England. At last peace was broken by the French, who openly helped the revolted colonists of America (1778). A fierce war was now waged between that year and 1782, terminated by the Peace of Versailles. During the next few years Pitt kept on good terms with a nation already on the verge of a revolution; although acts like his intervention in Holland would, in more fiery times, have led France into war. But Pitt's fameus commercial treaty with France (1786), which revived a trado between two countries fast drifting into commercial as well as political alienation, is the chief mark of his French policy, and the "Anglomania" in France of the peried antecedent to the Revolution was one effect of the increase of pacific relations.

At the outbreak of the Revolution Franco and England were on better terms than since the days of Walpolc. That event, hailed by all but a few as the beginning of a brighter state of things in France, brought the nations still nearer together in sympathy. But it was soon seen that the course of the French Revolution was very different to what had been hoped for. Very early Burke sounded the alarm, and the growing ascendency of the Jacobins soon confirmed his prophecy. Henceforth, sympathy with the Revolution was attended with social ostracism, and remained only with the few staunch Whigs who still fellowed Fex as their leader, or with professed Radicals and agitators. In 1793 the great war of England against the Revolution began, and continued with but two slight breaks (the few months after the Treaty of Amiens, and the few months of Napoleon's eaptivity in Elba) until 1815. It became in turns a war of reactionary propaganda which would make no peace with a "regicide" Directery, a hopeless struggle for the balance of power in Europe against the aggressions of Napoleon, and finally an heroic defence of the English nation, and in a sense of the principle of nationality generally, against the lord of all Europe. In 1815 the restoration of the Bourbons ended, so 'ar as was possible, the work of the Revolution, and a common attachment to some at least of the principles of the Holy Alliance united Tory England with the nien of the Resteration. Since 1815 a slow but growing cordiality has replaced the old tradition of international hatred. On several occasions relations have The Spanish become extremely strained. Marriage Project of Louis Philippe, the question of the Lebanen, the 1-regulated ambition of Napoleon III. | VOLUNTEER Corrs], and, mere recently the Egyptian difficulties and the jeclou of French colonial enthusicsm, have produced unpleasantneses that at an earlier period would doubtless have ended in war. But Napoleon III. finally determined on the English alliance, and the common Crimean and Chinese Wars, and still more, Cobden's famous commercial treaty, developed more friendly feelings, which in England, at least, are well established, and have issued in the international agreement of 1904, dealing with the principal recurring causes of friction.

In English, Dean Kitchin's History of France gives the best general account of French history. The compendium of M. Th. Lavallee, and M. Henri Martin's fuller Histoire de France, are standard French authorities. Von Ranke's works are the fullest for the international dealings of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, especially his History of England and Französische Geschichte.

Franchise. [ELECTION.]

Francis, John, a youth of 19, shot at Queen Victoria (May 30, 1842), for which he was condemned to execution, but the sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life. The absurdity of indicting such a man as a traitor led to an Act punishing such cases by imprisonment and whipping.

Francis, Sir Philip (b. 1740, d. 1818), entered the Indian Civil Service, and was sent, in 1774, to Bengal, as a member of the new council appointed under the Act of 1773. He distinguished himself by the violence of his opposition to Warren Hastings. Returning to England in 1781, he entered Parliament in 1784, where he joined the Opposition, and stimulated Hastings'a impeachment. Many, including Lord Macaulay, have regarded him as the author of the Letters of Junius. [Junius.]

Frank Almoign (libera eleemosyna, i.e., free alms), was the name of a peculiar species of clerical tenure. The general condition of grants of land in frank almoign was, that the grantees should pray or say mass for the grantor and his kin; but no particular service was specified. It was a "nobler" tenure than the analogous tenure by divine service, in which the service was fixed. Frank almoign was always an exceptional tenure, as the great bulk of Church lands were held by ordinary lay tenure, such as knight-service and socage. The Act of 12 Car. II. exempted this tenure from abolition.

Frank-pledge, Frithborh, or (in the North) Tenmannetale, was an association of ten men, under the borhs-ealdor, frith-borge-head, or capital pledge, who were to be standing securities for each other, bound to produce any one of their number if called upon by the law to do so, and, if he is unable, liable to pay for what he has done amiss unless they can purge themselves from all complicity in the matter. The associations were called tithings, and every man was obliged to be a member of one such body. The frank-pledge may be regarded as a sort of artificial prolongation of the family tie, or, as based on the principle of the law of Athelstan, that every man should have a security for him. This law of Athelstan's, re-enacted with additions by Edgar and Canute, resulted in the frank-pledge, which we first find described in the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor—and, therefore, to have been not earlier than the Conquest. The View of Frank-pledge was an important item of business in the local courts, and ultimately reverted to the court leet. In later views the capital pledge and other representatives of the tithing often had the duty of representing their township in the shire moot. This brought together the conceptions of township and tithing, and in this, says Dr. Stubbs, was the chief historical importance of the frank-pledge.

Frederick, PRINCE OF WALES (b. 1707, d. 1751), was the son of George II. and Caroline of Anspach. Before coming to England, he quarrelled with his father because his intended marriage with Princess Wilhelmina of Prussia was broken off. On his arrival in England he joined the party that was in opposition to Walpole, taking Bolingbroke as his political adviser. Tho Idea of a Patriot King was written by that statesman as a guide for the prince when ho should ascend the throne. In 1736 Frederick married Augusta of Saxe-Coburg; but this did not tend to the union of the royal family. He demanded (1736) that his income should be fixed by Parliament. The king's overtures were rejected; and after an animated debate, the ministers were victorious. The prince thereupon hurried his wife from Hampton Court to the empty palace of St. James's, when she was on the point of giving birth to a child. For this the prince was peremptorily ordered by George to leave the court; Queen Caroline remained implacable, refusing to see him on her death-bed. Frederick withdrew to Norfolk House in St. James's Square, and became the leader of the Opposition. On the fall of Walpole Frederick headed the Opposition as they went to pay their respects at court; but his reception by the king was merely formal. No reconciliation was effected, and the prince continued to oppose the ministry and court until his weath.

Free Church of Scotland, The, was formed in 1843 by the "Disruption" from the Established Church of a large body of ministers and laymen. The Tory government, at the end of Queen Anne's time, passed (1712) an Act restoring patronage in Scotland. It was extremely unpopular at the time, and since has been the chronic canse of the various schisms of the Church of Scotland. Yet the patronage conferred by the Act gave only a recognised right to the benefice and its emoluments. The spiritual office of paster could only be added to this by the "call" of the parishioners; but this "call" was frequently nominal, and, if but a fow parishioners would make it, "a forced ettlement" of the presentee could be effected. The beginning of the nineteenth century, saw the acquisition by the Evangelical party of a majority in the General Assembly over the Moderates or Latitudinarians. In 1834 the Assembly passed the Veto Law, which declared it to be a fundamental article of tho Church's doctrino that no minister should be intruded into a parish against the will of tho peoplo, and declared that a majority of male heads of families, full members of the Church, should be able to bar an obnoxious presentee. This was an attempt to make the call a reality in all cases. Before long this Act ereated litigation in the Court of Session, as well as great controversy on the relation of the ecclesiastical and civil powers. At Auchterarder, the call of the presentee was signed by two heads of families only, while the great majority of the parish expressed vehement dissent. Yet the Court of Session declared the presentment legal under the Patronage Act, and the House of Lords, on appeal, confirmed their decision; while at he same time the Scotch judges were accused of extending their jurisdiction on other points into spiritual matters eognisable by the Church alone. In 1842, after tedious litigation, the Auchterarder case was finally decided. In May, 1843, at the time of the meeting of the General Assembly, four hundred and twenty ministers, led by Dr. Chalmers, the most famous elergyman of his day, left the Established Church; and, leaving the hall of the Assembly, met in another room, as the first General Assembly of the Free Church, with Chalmers as Moderator. The bulk of their eongregations followed them. The organising power of Chalmers, shown from the first by the Sustentation Fund for ministers' salaries, and the scheme for the education of the clergy of the new Church, triumphed over the financial and social difficulties of the new undertaking. In four years seven hundred Free churches were built. The Free Church simply reproduced in doctrine, diseiplino, and organisation the Established Church; save that, of course, the right of appointment to benefices was strictly eonfined to the congregation, and the "Erastian" dependence on the State avoided; though, as a theory, the "voluntary principle" was repudiated by these Hildebrands of the Reformed Church.

In 1900 the United Free Church of Scotland was formed by the union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians. A small minority of the Free Church Assembly, however, maintaining that the union was all review, claimed the property vested in the Free Church, and ultimately appealed to the House of Lords, which upheld their contention. The decision created such widespread discontent, that Government in 1905 appointed a committee of inquiry. Following on the commissioners' report, an Act of Parliament was passed under which an Executive Commission allocated the property, etc., as between the two churches.

Freehold. The term "liberum tenementum," " free tenement," appears soon after Doniesday in the sense of land held by a freeman by a freo tenure, i.e., by knight-service or socage. It was thus opposed to base or villein tenure. Freeholds were granted or conveyed by the process of feoffment, i.e., an act of formal delivery of possession (livery of seisin), accomp vied by words describing the nature of the interest conferred and the services to be rendered in return. But in Bracton (temp. Henry III.) the term "freehold" had come to have also a special sense, and to be applied to what had previously been only one characteristic of freehold tenure, namely, a right over land for a period without fixed or specified termination. Hence arose the term "freehold estate." "Estate" in English law means the interest which a holder has in the land, and especially the "quantity of interest" as measured by its duration. Estates are divided into such as are freehold, and such as are less than freehold, the former including estates of inheritance or for life, the latter estates for years (or leases), or at will.

Ho also wrote many other works, historical and architectural.

Free Trade Agitation. [Corn Laws; Corner; Peel.]

French Revolution, WAR OF THE, is the name generally, though not very accurately, given to the series of great wars which arose out of the French Revolution, and lasted with two short intervals of peace from 1793 to 1815. England made at first no attempt to interfere in the internal troubles of France, and refused to take part in the first coabtion against her. In the spring of 1792 Pitt reduced the navy, remitted taxation, and confidently looked forward to fifteen years of peace. In the autumn of the same year the position of affairs was entirely different. The French had expelled their invaders, and proceeded to annex Savoy, and to conquer Belgium, which they threatened to incorporate with France. The Convention offered the aid of the French arms to all people desirous of liberty, and French ministers. intrigued with the disaffected party in England and Ireland. Pitt vigorously protested against the annexation of Belgium and the opening of the Scheldt, called out the militia, and introduced bills to subject aliens in England to strict supervision, and to prevent theexport of corn and war materials to France. The French government refused any concession on the two questions of Belgium and the Scheldt, and protested against l'itt's precautionary measures. In the midst of negotiations on the subject, the execution of Louis. XVI. took place (Jan. 21, 1793), and the government at once ordered the French minister to leave England. Pitt attempted to continue negotiations in spite of this, but on the first of February the French govern-ment declared war. England sent 30,000 men to the Nethorlands under the command of the Duke of York. The Austrian victory of Neerwinden (March 18) had forcod the French to retreat, and the allied troops spent the summer in besieging the frontier fortresses. In November the Duke of York laid siege to Dunkirk, but was forced to raise it again with the loss of his artillery. An oxpedition sent to the Norman coast to assist the Vendeans, arrived too late, and another which occupied Toulon in August. was forced to abandon it in December. Next year the allies were still more unfortunate. The French reconquered Belgium, and during the winter the Duko of York was driven out of Holland, and the Prince of Orange obliged to fly to England. Lord Howo's great victory of June 1, the conquest of numerous West Indian islands, and the revolt of Corsica, were a partial compensation for these defeats. In 1795 the coalition broke up altogether. Prussia made the Peace of Basel (April 5), and began thereby a neutrality which lasted for eleven years. Spain made peace on July 22, to be followed a year later by an offensive and defensive alliance with France, and a declaration of war against England (Oct., 1796). The smaller powers mostly followed the example of these two nations, and the burden of the war henceforth rested on England. Austria, and Sardinia. The year 1795 was marked by the failure of two English expeditions, one to Quibere, the other to the eoast of La Vendée. . . a the other hand, the alliance of Holland with France resulted in the English conquest of the Cape of Good Hope (Sept. 16). The Continental war, the next year, was decisive; Bonaparte's Italian campaign more than counterbalanced the reverses of Moreau and Jourdan, in Germany. In May the King of Sardinia withdrew from the coalition. In March England made an unsuccessful peace overture, which was followed in October by the despatch of Lord Malmesbury to Paris, to negotiate a general peace. England offered to restore all its. colonial conquests, and demanded a similar restoration of the French conquests. Above all it refused to admit the annexation of Belgium to France, and the rupture of the negotiations followed.

The year 1796 ended with an abortive attempt to land a French army in Ireland. The year 1797 brought the danger of invasion nearer still. In April Austria signed the preliminaries of Leoben, which were, in October converted into the Treaty of Campo Formio. England was left to carry on the war alone, and that in a very unfavourable position. The Funds had sunk to little more than fifty, and in February cash payments had to be suspended, whilst in May and June the mutinics of the fleet made Great Britain for some weeks defenceless. The French government had formed the design of uniting the Spanish and Dutch fleets to their own fleet at Brest, and so sweeping the English fleet from the Channel, and rendering a landing possible. But the two victories of St. Vincent (Feb. 14) and Camperdown (Oct. 16) frustrated this plan; and though Bonaparte made some proparations for an invasion of England, he preferred the less perilous expedition to Egypt (May, 1798). A month after his landing, Nelson, by the victory of the Nile, destroyed his fleet and cut him off from France (Aug. 1). Renewed acts of aggression by the Directory in Switzerland and Italy, Bonaparte's absence, and Nelson's victory, made the formation of a new coalition possible. In 1799 the combined armies of Austria and Russia drove tho French out of Italy; but General Massena successfully defeated the Austro-Russian invasion of Switzerland, and General Brune repulsed an Anglo-Russian expedition to Holland. Bonaparte's return te France was followed by the overthrow of the Directory (Nov. 8, 1799), and an immediate resumption of the offensive. In 1800 Austria was attacked both in Italy and Germany, and the victories of Marengo (June 14), and Hohenlinden (Dec. 3), were followed by the Peace of Luneville (Feb. 9, 1801). England was again left to carry on the war alone, for Russia had quitted the coalition, and made a dispute about the right of search the foundation of a maritime league (Dec., 1800). which renewed the Armed Neutrality (q.v.) of 1780. This league consisted of Denmark, Sweden, and Russia, but it was almost immediately broken up by the battle of Copenhagen (April 2, 1801) and the death of the Emperor of Russia (March 23). Two days before, an English expedition had defeated the French at Alexandria, and the conquest of Egypt, with surrender of 24,000 French soldiers, soon followed. Though Bonaparte still threatened an invasion of England, and collected troops and gunboats at Boulogne, the English supremacy at sea rendered it merely a threat. Both countries were ready to come to terms. The negotiations at Paris, in 1796, had been followed by similar negotiations at Lille in 1797, and the English government had declined to treat in answer to Napoleon's overture in Dec., 1800. But this, the fourth attempt to bring about an understanding, was more fortunate, and the preliminaries of peace were signed in Oct., 1801, while the treaty was finally ratified on March 27, 1802. By the Treaty of Amiens, England surrendered all its conquests except Trinidad and Ceylon. It was agreed that Malta should be restored to the knights of St. John, but as the renewed aggressions of Napoleon gradually made it evident that it would speedily be seized by France, the English government refused to surrender the island. They believed that Napoleon meant to make Malta the stepping-stone for a new attack on Egypt, and Egypt the starting-point for an attack on India. War was declared on May 18, 1803. A French army under Marshal Mortier easily overran Hanover. A great flotilla and army were assembled by Napoleon at Boulogne for the invasion of England, and in December, 1804, the rupture between England and Spain placed an additional navy at his disposal. His plan for effecting a landing was based on the union of the three fleets of Toulon, Rochefort, and Brest, with the Spanish fleet, in order to secure the command of the Channel. Meantime, a third coalitien was being formed. In April, 1805, an offensive and defensive alliance between England and Russia took place, and the league was completed by the accession of Austria (August), Sweden (August), and Naples. The naval combination fell through, and the Toulon fleet, which had succeeded in uniting with the Spaniards, was destroyed with them at Trafalgar (Oct. 21, 1805); but the coalition was shattered to pieces by the capitulation of Ulm (Oct. 19), and the defeat of Austerlitz (Dec. 3), followed by the Treaty of Presburg (Dec. 26). In England the Addington ministry, which had commenced the war, had been superseded in May, 1804, by the return of Pitt to power.

Pitt's death (Jan. 23, 1806) led to the formation of a ministry under Fox, which opened negotiations with Napoleon. But Napoleon's Continental policy rendered peace impossible. Just as the Directory had surrounded France with subject republics, so ho wished to surround himself with vassal princes. One brother was established in Holland, and another became King of Naples, and the organisation of the Confederation of the Rhine founded his rule in Germany. Russia's declaration of war (Oct. 1, 1804) was answered by the victory of Jena (Oct. 14), and the army of Russia, after the doubtful battle of Eylau (Feb. 8), met with a severe defeat at Friedland (June 14).

Dardanelles (Feb., 1807), but these useless diversions gave no real aid to the common cause. The Peace of Tilsit (July, 1807) put an end to the fourth coulition, and enabled Napoleon to turn the ferces of the Continent against England. By the Decrees of Berlin (Nov. 21, 1806) and Milan (Dec. 17, 1807) he prohibited all direct or indirect trade with the British Isles. The secondary states, which still remained neutral or allied with England, were to be forced to adopt the same system, and to place their naval forces at his disposal. With the aid of Russia, Sweden was forced to adhere to the Centinental system, and a combined Spanish and French army occupied Portugal (Nov., 1807). Denmark, after an English expedition had obliged it to surrendor its fleet (Sept., 1807), allied itself with France. But for the success of Napoleon's schemes, the mere alliance with Spain was not sufficient. In order to make use of the vast resources and great colonies which misgovernment made of little value, he needed the complete control of Spain, and this he sought to secure by placing his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne (June, 1808). With the insurrection which in consequence breke out in Spain, begin new period in the history of the wars who orang out of the Revolution. Hitherto '. had been the wars of states; henceforth they were to be the wars of nations. The idea of nationality inspired the peoples of Europe, and became the strongest support of its rulers in their resistance to France. Austria, fired by the example of Spain, took up arms again (April, 1809), but it could not rouse Gemany to revelt, and after the battles of ern (May, 22) and Wagram (July 6) was ged to sign a ruinous peace at Vienna (Oct. 14, 1809). Ligland seized the opportunity of the Spanish revolt. In the summer of 1808 an English corps expelled the French from Portugal, whilst another advanced to take part in the defence of Spain, but was forced to retreat and re-embark, after winning a battle at Corunna (Jan. 16, 1809). The English government, however, instead of concentrating its strength on the war in Spain, wasted 40,000 men in a useless expedition to Walcheren. But, in spite of inefficient support, Sir Arthur Wellesley was able to recover Portugal (1809), and to maintain himself there, in 1810 and 1811, against repeated attacks. [Peninsular War.] In April, 1812, war began between Napoleon and Russia, and in the same month Lord Wellington captured the border fortress of Badajoz, and assumed the defensive in Spain. The news of his victory at Salamanea (July 22) reached the French head-quarters the day before the battle of Borodino (Sept. 7), and about a month before the French entered Moscow, the English army occupied Madrid (Aug. 12—Sept. 14, 1812). Lord Wellington raised the siege of Burgos on Oct. 18, and on the 19th, Napoleon quitted Moscow. The enthusiasm of the German people forced their sovereigns to take up arms. Russia was joined by Prussia (March 1, 1813), Sweden (March 3), and Austria, and the battle of Leipzig (Oct. 16—18) freed Germany, as that of Vittoria did Spain (June 20).

Whilst Wellington crossed the Bidassoa in September, and established his winter quarters in the south of France, the allied armies began the passage of the Rhine on the last day of 1813. After a campaign which lasted three months, Paris was taken, and Napoleon abdicated (April, 1814). The brother of Louis XVI. was called to the French throne, and Franco reduced, with some small exceptions, to the limits of 1792. The allied sovoreigns, at the Congress of Vienna, were still disputing about the settlement of Europe, when Napoleon seized the opportunity which the discontent. of the nation afforded, and re-entered Franco (March 1, 1815). The four great powers immediately re-formed the coalition against him (March 25), and the battle of Waterloo (Juno 18) was followed by his second abdication, and his exile to St. Helena. By the second Treaty of Paris (Nov. 20), France was sentenced to pay indemnities and expenses amounting to more than 60 millions, to a further loss of territory, and to a fivo years' occupation of her border fortresses.

Europe was reorganised by the Treatics of Vicnna. The great states issued from the wars of the Revolution more powerful and more compact. The republics of Poland, Venice, and Genoa, the ecclesiastical states and most of the smaller principalities of Germany, had been absorbed by stronger neighbours. But the sovereigns and statesmen who arranged the rewards and compensations due to states, disregarded the claims of peoples. The Revolution had drawn its force and its proselytising power from the general desire for political freedom; the opposition to the Empire had been inspired by the desire for an independent national existence. Neither of these feelings was satisfied by the Vienna settlement and so it was not permanent.

settlement, and so it was not permanent.

During the same period, England had grown greater outside Europe. In the West it had acquired a few more sugar islands; in the East it had excluded French influence from India, and greatly extended its own power in that country. It had also acquired the outposts and approaches of India, Ceylon, the Maunitius, the Cape, and Malta. But these accessions of territory had been gained at the cost of crushing taxation, and by the addition of more than 600 millions to the national debt.

Frendraught, THE BURNING OF (1638). A reconciliation had just taken place at Strathbogie between the Gordons and their enemies, the Crichtons, who were escorted home by Lord Aboyne, Robert Gordon, r-t others. Pressed to remain at Frendraugus for the night, the Gordons were burnt to death in the tower by accident or (more probably) design.

Trere, Sir Henry Edward Bartle (b. 1815, d. 1884), entered the Indian Civil Service in 1834. In 1847 he became British Resident at Sattara, and in 1850 Chief Commissioner of Scinde. In 1862 he was appointed Governor of Bombay, and in 1867 he returned to England and was made a member of the Indian Council. In 1872 he was sent to the East Coast of Africa to inquire into the Slave Trade, and the following year signed a treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar abolishing the traffic. In 1877 he was made Governor of the Cape and High Commissioner for South Africa. Here his policy, especially in declaring war with Cetewayo, earned him the censure of the Heme Government, and he was superseded in the High Commissionership, and eventually recalled in 1880. His personal integrity, hewever, was undoubted.

Frere, John Hookham (b. 1769, d. 1846), a literary man of some nete, was, as the friend of Canning (being his partner in the Anti-Jacobin), sent on various embassies and political missions of importance. Besides a mission to Lisbon, he was twice Spanish minister during the critical period of the dealings of Ferdinand VII. and Napoleon. The failure of Sir John Moore was, in public opinion, largely attributable to Frere's advice; and his recall from Spain ended his public life.

Prescobaldi, The, were Florentino mere' unts who advanced money to Edward I. and Edward II. on the security of the Customs, which they were allowed to collect. They became almost as unpopular as the Jews had been, and one of the Ordinances of 1311 ordered their banishment from the country.

Priars, The, were members of orders founded in the thirteenth century in the Church, for the purpose of preaching among the people. Their example in early times was powerful, but as they gained wealth they tended to sink into indolence. In the end of the twelfth century, the preachers of the Waldensians, and other heretical sects, set forth a new idea of the religious life, as concerned with activity for the good of others. These sects were repressed: but their conceptions were fruitful, and the struggle against them convinced some ardent minds of the need of active preaching amongst the people. Francis of Assis, in Italy, began, in 1207, to gather round him a society animated by the principle of fervent love, which was to be carried out by entire self-sacrifice. His order rapidly spread, was provisionally sanctioned by Pope Innocent III., in 1209, and was established by Honorius III., in 1223. It was called the "Orde Fratrum Minorum;" with it was incorporated, under the same rule, a female order of St. Clara, the sister of Francis; and a third order, the Tertiaries, comprised those who, without abandoning their secular life, adopted a rule of a recommendation.

adopted a rule of penitence. Contemporary with Francis, a Spaniard, Dominic, a canon of Osma, formed a society for the special purpose of preaching against hereties. In 1216 this order of the Friar Preachers was established by Honorius III., and adopted also the rule of evangelical poverty. Later came the order of Carmelites, so called because they were originally founded in the Holy Land, and dwelt in the seclusion of Mount Carmel. They had their rule of rigorous fasting, silence, and solitude, and were transplanted into Europe in 1238. Finally, the Eremites of St. Augustine, established in 1256, took their rise from the union of many cenobite establishments in Italy. All these orders followed the example of the Franciscans, in having Tertiaries, and in renouncing worldly possessions. They were often distinguished by the colours of their cleaks. The Carmelites were known as the White Friars, the Dominicans as the Black Friars, and the Franciscans as the Gre Friars. The survival of these names in London and many other English towns testifies to the extent of their settlements. The Dominicans and the Franciscans were by far the most important of these orders, and exercised great influence on the social and political development of England. The Dominicans came to England in 1221, the Franciscans in 1224.

The friars, in their early days, did a great work of social reform; and as this work grew under their hands, they felt the need for learning. Consequently the mendicants began to throng to the universities, and it was through the activity of the Franciscans that Oxford became famous throughout Europe. The first Franciscan provincial in England built a school in the Fratry at Oxford, and prevailed on Robert Grosseteste, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, to lecture there. Grosseteste founded a school, which was carried on by Adam Marsh, or De Marisco, who may be reckoned as the founder of that great school of theology which ruled the thought of Europe till the Revival of Learning. Alexander of Hales, John Duns Scotus, and William of Ockham, made English theology famous; and the Franciscan, Roger Bacon, is the foremost name in physical science throughout the Middle Ages.

The immediate influence of the revival of theology under the friars in England was greatly felt in the constitutional struggles of the reign of Henry III. Bishop Grossetesta and Adam de Marisco were the chief counsellors of Simon do Montfort. The teaching of the friars gave a religious basis to the theory of the relations between king and people, on which the struggle was founded. They set forth the responsibility of the king to God, his duty to rule for the good of his people, his obligation to listen to the advice of the community, and to govern according to its will. The Latin poem on the battle of Lewes (Wright, Political Songs, 72, &c.) mets forth in striking language the political views of the friars. Moreover, these opinions were not confined to the closet. They were spread by the preaching of the friars amongst all classes, especially in the towns. The friars wandered from place to place, gathered a crowd around them in the epen air, and in homely language, with rude illustrations, poured forth a discourse in which the condition of current affairs was used as a motive for amendment of life and as a call to repentance. The friars greatly influenced popular opinion, and secured popular support to the cause of the barons against the king. The summons of representatives of towns to Parliament by Simon de Montfort, in 1254, was a recognition of the quickened political life which was largely due to the activity of tho

As the importance of the friars increased, their zeal diminished. Their rule of strict poverty was gradually modified, till there "rose a schism in the Franciscan order tetween the more rigid party of the Spiritual Franciscans and the laxer party, which was supported by Pope John XXII. (1317). In the course of the conflict William of Ockham attacked the Pope, and proceeded with keen logic to examine the limitations of the papal headship over the Church. The domocratic spirit of the Franciscans was turned even against the Papacy, which it had at first laboured to exalt Moreover, the friars raised against themselves the hostility of the other monastic orders, who struggled to check their growing importanco, and were aided by the secular clergy. This conflict raged chiefly in the universities, where the friars possessed themselves of the professorial chairs. When this battle had been won by the friars, tho struggle continued between the Dominicans and Franciscans, till gradually the Dominicans took a sphere of their ow part from the Franciscans. They were left at possession of the Inquisition, and graduary lost the character of a mendicant order. The Franeiscans were then left to work amongst the masses, and strove to increase their influence by pious frauds, and by superstitious inducements, that they might lead their penitents to bequeath money for charitable purposes.

The opposition to the mendicants in England was begun by Richard Fitz-Ralph, Bishop of Armagh (1350), who attacked their principle that mendicancy was practised by Christ and the Apostles, and also pointed out the mischief that they did (Defensorium turatorum, in Brewn, Fasciculus Rorum, il., 466, &c.). They over-rode the parish priest, layaded his parish, heard confessions, and granted absolution on easy terms. Ecclesiastical disciplino was subverted that the mendicants might be enriched. Children were onticed from their homes and induced to join the order. So great was the influence of the mendicants at Oxford, that parents were afraid to send their sons there lest they should be entropped by them. From this time we find many complaints against the mendicants. They worked for their own interests, and were despised by the more reflecting people. The l'relogue of the Visio: of Piers the Plowman (about 1377) 8ays .-

"I fonds there Freris, alle the foure ordres, Preched the peple, for profit of hem-selven, Glosed the gospel, as hem good lyked, For covitise of copis, construed it as thei wolds."

The picture of the Friar in the Prologue to Chaueer's Canterbury Tules, shows with humour the ordinary character of the friar. The friars were attacked by Wyelif in 1381, when he entered upon his breach with the doctrinal system of the Church. At first he had more sympathy with them than with the "possessionati," the monks who held property. He attacked them chiefly because they were the staunchest adherents of the Papacy. The friars in return were the bitterest opponents of the Lollards. During the fifteenth century, the friars ceased to have any special influence or importance.

Friend, Sir Jour (d. 1696), was a Jacobite conspirator in the reign of William IVI. He was given a colonel's commission by James, and enlisted men against the day when the French should appear in Kent (1696), but refused to take any share in the infamous Assussination Plot (q.v.), although he kept the secret. On the discovery of the conspiracy, he was tried, harshly denied the assistance of counsel, and, refusing to betray his confederates to a committee of the House of Commons, was executed on April 3.

Friends of Ireland, The, were a society founded by O'Connoll in 1830, to promote the repeal of the Union. It was declared illegal by the Irish government: but, though dissolved, at once took a new shape as the Society of Irish Volunteers. This too was, however, dissolved, in accordance with the Coercion Act of 1833.

who made settlements on the Firth of Forth, and probably in other parts of northern Britain. Nennius calls the Firth of Forth the Frisian Sea.

Frith, in Anglo-Saxon law, answers to the later phrase, "the king's peace." It was enforced by national officers, and any breach of it was considered a contempt of the king, and punished by a fine. The frith was a personal, not a territorial, peace.

Frith-gild was the name given to certain gilds or clubs established during or before the reign of King Athelstan, for the maintenance of peace, the repression of theft, the fracing of stolen cattle, and the a demnification of the parties robbed, by means of a common fund raised by subscription of the members. These gilds took the place of the old organisation of the family, as is shown by the wergild being in certain cases pald to the gildbrethren instead of, as in earlier times, to the family of the murdered man. The statutes of these gilds are contained in the Judicia Civitatia Londonia set forth in the reign of Athelstan, under royal authority, by the bishop and reeves of the city. [GILDs; Towns.]

Probisher, Sir Martin (d. 1594), one of the great navigators of the Elizabethan period, set sail in 1576 with the object of discovering the North-West Passage, whilst in 1578 he endeavoured, though ineffectually, to found a settlement north of Hudson's Bay. Seven years later he accompanied Sir Francis Drake on his voyage to the West Indies, and in 1588 did good service against the Spanish Armada. He was killed in action whilst trying to capture the fort of Crozon, near Brest, on behalf of Henry IV. of France, from the combehalf of Henry IV. of France, from the combehalf of Menry IV.

Froissart, Jean (b. 1337, d. 1410), was born at Valenciennes, and was most likely the son of a merchant. From his childhood he was destined for the church, but soon distinguished himself by poetry which secured him the patronage of John of Hainault, father-in-law of Edward III. In 1301 he went to England, and was recommended to the favour of Queen Philippa. The queen appointed him clerk of her chapel, and he remained at the English court and in the service of English princes several years. The queen died in 1369, and Froissart returned to Flanders, where he found new protectors in Wencesias, Duke of Brabant, and Robert of Namur. The Duke of Brabant appointed him curé of Lestines, near Mons. Under the inspiration of Robert of Namur he composed the first book of his Chronicles. After the death of Wenceslau, Froissart became the chaplain of Guy de Châtillon, Count of Blois, who also appointed him canon of Chimay. He accompanied his master in journeys and expeditions, during which he collected material for his Chronieles. He made hie last visit to England in 1395. The Chranicles of Froissart embrace the years 1225 to 1400. They are divided into four books, of which the first and most important stops at 1378; the second finishes at 1385; the third at 1388, and the fourth extends from 1389 to 1400. Of the first book there are three distinct versions, the first written between 1360 and 1380, the second between 1380 and 1383, and the third at some period after the v 1,00. The earliest version, written w. wart was under English Influence, la it a lay coloured by partiality for the English cause. In the best version written after the death of Richard II., his tone towards England is severe and hostile. Moreover, Froissart bases his marrative in the early version on the earlier Chroniele of Joan lo Bel. But in the later versions he relies on original sources of information, and expands his record of events. The Chroniele of Jean le Bel ends in 1361, so that after this date he is entirely an original chronicler.

Proiseart, Chroniques, ed. Kervyn de Lettenhove, 30 vois ; the valuable ed. Simeon Luce, 5 vois, poblished 1869, contains only the period of Lettersture Française au Moyen. Age. The Chronieles have been translated into English by Lord Berners, 1525, and by Mr. Johnes in 1806.

Frontinus, Sextus Julius, was sent by Vespasian into Britain in a.n. 76, where he conquered the Silures; he was succeeded by Agricola. He was a writer on military and agricultural subjects.

Froude, James Anthony (b. 1818, d. 1894), one of the most brilliant but not the most exact of English historians, was educated at Westminster and at Oriel College, Oxford. On Professor Freeman's death in 1892 he succeeded to the Regius Professorship of Modern History at Oxford. His chief historical work is The History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth (1856-70). He also wrote The English in Irsianai in the Eighteenth Century (1871-74), The Divorce of Catherine of Aragon (1891), and The Spanish Story of the Armada (1891).

Frentee D'Onoro, THE BATTLE OF (May 5,1811), was fought during the Peninsular War between the English, under Wellington, and the French, under Massena. Massena advanced, with 45,000 men, to relieve Almeida, which Wellington was blockading. Though in command of hardly more than 30,006 men, the latter resolved to fight rather than give up the blockade. Operations extended over two days. On the first, the approach of night prevented anything decisive; but next day, Massena, newly reinforced, made his great attack. After a hard-fought day, the French slowly withdrew at evening out of gunshot; but there was no retreat. The capture of Almeida was secured by this check on Massena.

Napier, Peninsular War.

Fulford, THE BATTLE OF (1066), between the Earls Edwin and Morear and Harold Hardrada and Tostig, resulted in the defeat of the English, and the acceptance by the men of York of Harold Hardrada as their king. Fulford is on the Ouse, about a mile south of York.

Fuller, Thomas (b. 1608, d. 1661), was educated at Cambridge. He was appointed a prebendary of Salisbury, and in 1641 lecturer at the Savoy. In the Civil War he was chaplain to Sir Ralph Hopton, and assisted largely in the defence of Basing House against the Parliamentarians, and was afterwards in Exeter during the siege of that city. At the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to the king. Fuller was the author of The Church History of Britain, 1655, a History of the Worthies of England, 1662, and other works. His historical writings, though of no great authority, have always been popular from the humour and quaint beauty of their style.

Puller, WILLIAM, was an informer, who attempted, in 1691, to revive the trade of Titus Oates by pretending a Jacobite conspiracy; but no one listened to him, and ho was put in the pillory. He tried the same method in 1701, with even worse success. When the Tories came into power, he was sentenced to be flogged, pilloried, and fined; and being imprisoned in default of payment, died in prison, probably in 1717.

Furrackabad, The Battle of (Nov. 14, 1804), resulted in a victory for the English, under Lord Lake, over Holkar with a great army of 60,000 men. The English casualties amounted to two killed and twenty wounded.

Eyrd was the national militia of the Early English. On every free man, by virtue of his allegiance, military service was imperative. Fyrd-bet was one of the three inseparable burdens on the possession of ethel or boc-land. In Tacitus' time, the host of the Germans was simply the gathering of the whole nation in arms. It continued the same to a late period. But as the State grew in extent, the difficulty of collecting the whole fyrd together became very great, and, practically, this was hardly ever done. The array of the fyrd of each whire was left to the caldorman, and the fyrd of the shire was the shire-moot in arms. It was more often the fyrd of one or two shires, which had local cohesion, that gained glory by stout fighting, than the larger aggregations of the popular army; for example, Brihtnoth's famous fight with the Danes at Maldon. But the cumbrous nature of the fyrd system led to its gradual supertession, even before the Conquest. The feudal thegnhood, with their retainers, the mercenary huscarls of Canute-illustrate the earliest developments of those baronial and stipendiary forces which ultimately were to make the national force obsolcte. Yet William I. national force obsolcte. called out the fyrd more than once, and Rufus branded as nithings those who refused to come, and cheated the fyrd out of their moneys for maintenance. At Northallerton, the fyrd of the northern counties repelled the Scottish invasion; and it was the national militia that saved Henry II. from the feudal coalition of 1173. Henry's Assize of Arms entirely recognised the principle. Under Henry III. and Edward I., the fyrd was revived, and made useful by the Statutes of Winchester, and the system of Watch and Ward. The growth of the art of war made such expedients obsolete in their turn; but the militia of modern times, with its quasicompulsory service, and until recently the posse comitatus, which, in theory, could be convoked by the sheriff, continue the principle at the root of the fyrd down to our own day.

Fyrdwite was the penalty for neglecting to serve in the fyrd (q.v.).

Ga, the old English form of the High Dutch gau, occurs, though rarely, in early constitutional history. Like gau, it must correspond to the pagus. Some have contrasted the natural ga with the artificial shire or division. The southern counties of England are of the ga type—of very ancient origin, and built on national or tribal distinctions. The Mercian shires appear mero administrative "departments" of later date.

Gaderi, The, were an ancient British tribe inhabiting the western part of Northumberland, the part of Cumberland north of the Irthing, the western part of Roxburghshire, the county of Selkirk with Tweeddale, a great part of Mid-Lothian, and nearly all West-Lothian.

Gael, the English form of Gaidhel, is used in two senses. (1) As the name of the great branch of the Celtic stock, including Highlanders, Irish, Manx, and, probably, the old race that wrote the Oghams. (2) More specially it is confined to the Scotch Logalanders. Mr. Rhys suggests that the term Gael shall be used only in the restricted sense, while the archaic form Goidel, by which every tribe of this stock has known itself as far back as we can trace, be used for the wider term. [Celts; Picts; Scots; Baitons.]

Gafol-land (Gafol-tribute) was folk-land (q.v.), let out to rent.

Gage, Sir John, was appointed one of the Council to assist the executors of Henry VIII., 1547, during the minority of Edward VI., and became in the next reign a valued supporter of Queen Mary, for whom he did good service during Wyatt's rebellion. During the imprisonment of the Princess Elizabeth in the Tower, 1555, Gage acted as her gaoler.

Gage, GENERAL THOMAS (b. 1721, d. 1787), was the second son of Viscount Gage. In 1774 he was appointed Governor of Massachusetts in the room of Hutchinson. He did his best in this difficult position to prevent an actual outbreak of hostilities, and instituted a conciliatory policy. His hand was forced, despite his efforts to maintain peace. The delegates at Philadelphia set his authority at defiance, and, when Gage recalled the writs for the assembling of the representatives, met in spite of him, and enrolled the "minute men." Still Gage refused to resort to coercion, though he fortified Boston Neck and thus commanded the town. In April, 1775, he sent a body of troops to destroy some stores collected at Concord. The colonists opposed the troops, and the first blood was shed at Lexington. The people at once flocked to arms in numbers, which terrified Gage into inactivity; but in May reinforcements arrived under Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton, and Clage at once issued a proclamation offering a general pardon, and declaring martial law to prevail. This, however, failed to attain its coject; and on the 7th June Gage took decisive action in the oattle of Bunker Hill. The victory was not followed up, and on Washington's arrival the British were blockaded in Boston. In October Gage resigned his command to Sir William Howe, and returned to England. He was very much blamed by the government for not taking active measures earlier.

Gagging Acts. A name popularly assigned to the measures of reactionary periods interfering with freedom of speech, or writing, or public meetings. Such were the Acts of 1795 against seditious meetings, and one of the Six Acts of 1819 against public assemblies and cheap political pamphlets. The name has also been applied to a long string of Irish measures of coercion.

Gaika (d. 1829), a Kaffir chief, was regarded by the British government as the ruler of Kaffirland; and it was through interference on his behalf by the Governor of Cape Colony, that the Kaffir War of 1818 was brought on. In 1822, a treacherous attempt made by the colonists to seize this chief almost led to another war.

Gaimar, Geoffrey (f. circa 1150), wrote in French a poetical Chronicle of England from the arrival of Cerdic to the death of Rufus. There is an edition of Gaimar published by the Caxton Society, and the early portion will be found in the Monumenta Historica Britannica.

Gainas, The, were an Anglian tribe occupying the northern part of Lincolnshire. From them the name of Gainsborough is derived.

Galgacus, a Caledonian chief, offered a desperate resistance to Agricola on his famous expedition into the north of modern Scotland (81).

Tacitus, Agricola.

Galloway, the same word as Galway, i.e., land of the Gael, is (1) in its widest sense equivalent to the south-western district of Scotland, but (2) is more generally used in a narrower sense to include the small Goidelic settlement, isolated among the Brythons of Strathclyde, or Cumbria, that included the modern shires of Wigton and Kirkcudbright and part of Dumfries. A range of hills and moors cut Galloway off on the north and partly on the east, while the sea formed its boundary on the south and west. Some have regarded the presence of this intrusive Goidelic colony as the result of an invasion from Ireland, similar to that which conquered Dalriada (Argyleshire), but the general theory is that it was a survival of the earlier branch of the Celts, forced westward by the invading Brythons. In Roman times the Novantae held this region. They are, probably, the same as the later "Picts of Galloway," though what was their precise connection with the Picts proper it is hard to define. With all Cumbria, Galloway became, in the seventh century, dependent on the Angles of Northumbria; but long after Strathclyde had regained its freedom, it remained, at least nominally, subject to the decaying state. Bede's time, Ninian's old bishopric of Whithern (Candida Casa), was still an English see, till a long break in the line of bishops, after 796, marks the revival of the native race. Thus Galloway preserved its separate identity against English, Cumbrian, and Scot, and in the twelfth century was still "terra Pictorum," and its inhabitants formed a separate division in the Scottish army at the Battle of the Standard, distinct even from the "Cumbrenses." Their restless vigonr was equally shown in their constant resistance to the encroachments of the Norman barons, which English and Scottish kings equally favoured. On the whole Galloway leant on England to avoid the nearer danger from Scotland. The revived see of Whithern depended on York till the fourteenth century, and Fergus, Prince of Galloway, sought in vain by a marriage connection with Henry I., to avoid his country's subjection to Malcolm Canmore. In 1174 tho captivity of William the Lion led to the revolt of Uchtred MacFergus. Again,in 1185, the rising of another son of Fergus, Gilbert, was suppressed, and Henry IV., tired of the double dealing of the Gallwegians, handed them over to Scotland. Yet Alan of Galloway acts as an English baron; his name appears in Magna Charta, and his daughters married Norman nobles. This last step com-pleted the subjection of the state. On Alan's death his sons-in-law divided the land, and with the help of Alexander II. put down the last native rising. The acquisition of the throne by Baliol, grandson of Alan, through his mother Devorguilla, perhaps facilitated its absorption. Yet, even in Buchanan's time, a part of Galloway used its Celtic speech, though it must very soon after have become extinct.

Gallowglass. A name given to Irish mercenary soldiers. They served on foot, had defensive armour, and carried huge axes.

Galway, HENRI DE MASSUE, EARL OF (b. 1648, d. 1720), originally bore the title of the Marquis de Ruvigny. A French Protestant general, he was sent over by Louis XIV. to intrigue with the Opposition leaders, Buckingham, Russell, and Holles (1678). On the revocation of the Ediet of Nantes, he followed his father into England. Soon after the ac-cession of William III., he was placed in command of a regiment of Huguenot cavalry, raised by the energy of his father, who died in 1689. He served in Ireland, and, after the departure of William, became major-general. During the siege of Limerick, he was chosen to hold a conference with Sarsfield. For his services he was created Baron Portarlington, and a property given him from the forfeited Irish lands. In 1693 he took part in the abortive expedition from St. Helen's, commanded by Meinhart Schomberg. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Landen (1693), but his captors allowed him to escape. He was sent to Piedmont as English envoy, but could not prevent the Duke of Savoy from deserting the coalition (1696). He was created Earl of Galway in 1697. After the outbreak of the Succession War, he was sent to Portugal as second in command, on the recall of Schomberg (1704). He met with many reverses, and on his return, the Tories, urged on by the angry Peterborough, instituted a severe examination into the conduct of the war. His reply was complete, and his condnetwas defended by the Duke of Marlborough. But the Commons passed a resolution that hehad acted contrary to the honour ef the Imperial crown by allowing the Portugueseregiments to take precedence of the English. The rest of his life was spent in retirement. "It would seem," says Mr. Wyon, "that Galway, although destitute of any great natural abilities for war, was as consummate a general as study and experience, joined with a conscientious sense of responsibility for the safety of his men, can make." Yet he was always on the losing side.

Galway Election, The, 1872, was-carried by the influence of the priests, and more especially the Archbishop of Tuam, and Captain Nolan was elected. On a petition being lodged a gainst him, and the seat being-claimed for Captain Trench, Mr. Justice Keogh went down to try the case, and declared Captain Nolan to have forfeited the seat by reason of intimidation of the voters by the priests, on whose conduct the judge-reflected in very strong language. Mr. Butt brought the matter before the House of Commons, but Keogh was absolved by an overwhelming majority.

Gam, Sir David (d. 1415), a Welsh chieftain, was one of the opponents of Owen Glyndwr, whom in 1402 he attempted to assassinate, but the plot being discovered he was imprisoned, and not released till 1412. In 1415 he raised a body of troops to assist. Henry V. in his French expedition, and fought most valiantly in the battle of Agincourt, where he was mortally wounded, and received the honour of knighthood as he was: expiring on the field.

Gambia, on the west coast of Africa, was visited very early by the Portuguese for the purpose of obtaining slaves, and formed a settlement until 1588. In 1620 an English factory was established there. For many years there was an intermittent contest. between England and France for possession. of the Gambia, which was confirmed to England by the Treaty of Paris, 1815. Since that date much of the surrounding territory has been acquired by purchase by the British government, and settlements have been formed with the object of stamping out the slavetrade, and of establishing commercial relations of a legitimate nature. In 1842 thegovernment of Gambia was separated fromthat of Sierra Leone, and vested in a governor, aided by executive and legislative councils; in 1866 it was, however, again made subordinate to the Governor of the West African Settlements. In 1888 it once more became a separate celony. The climate is very unhealthy... R. W. Martin, British Colonies.

Gambier, James, Baron (b. 1766, d. 1833), was a distinguished admiral. In 1807 he commanded the fieet sent against Copenhagen, and was in reward created a baron. From 1808 to 1811 he commanded the Channel Fleet, during which a court-martial acquitted him of any culpable share in the disaster of Aix reads.

Game Laws. The earliest game laws were passed in the same period as the laws concerning vagrancy, and were due to the same causes. The first of these, that of 1389, after reciting that artificers and labourera keep dogs and go hunting on holy days in the parks and warrens of lords and others, enacted that no person not possessing land worth 40s. a year should keep a dog for hunting or use ferrets or nets to take game, nnder pain of a year's imprisonment. In 1494 any person taking pheasants or partridges without leave upon another's land was made liable to a penalty of £10, equivalent to £150 of present money. But this statute can never have been enforced, for an Act of 1581 imposed a fine of 20s. for every pheasant and 10s. for every partridge taken in the night. In 1604 all shooting at game with gun or cross-bow was absolutely forbidden (apparently as unsports-manlike) under a penalty of 20s. for each bird or hare, or imprisonment for three months in default; but persons qualified by birth or estate were allowed to course, and also to net pheasants and partridges. Five years later the property qualification was raised; hawking was forbidden during July and Angust, and pheasants and partridges were to be taken only between Michaelmas and Christmas— "take" being probably soon construed to include shooting. In 1670 owners were allowed to appoint gamekeepers; no persons save freeholders of £100 a year, 99 years leaseholders of £150, or heirs-apparent of a squire and others of higher degree, were to possess guns, bows, or sporting dogs, and game-keepers were given the right of search. All these Acts were repealed in 1832, and the only carlier statute still in force is that of 1828. "This Act for the first time made poaching by night a crime, instead of an offence followed merely by fine. Taking, or trespassing by night with intent to take, game or rabbits was to be punished with imprisonment and hard labour not exceeding three months for the first offence; not exceeding six months for the second; and transportation for seven years or hard labour not exceeding two years for the third. Resistance with any weapon could be punished with transportation up to seven years; and if a party of three or more, of whom one is armed, are found trespassing by night for the purpose of taking game, each of them may be sentenced to transportation not exceeding fourteen years. The Act of 1832 abolished all qualifications for sporting, and also the earlier prohibition of the sale of game, and imposed new penalties for poaching by day, viz., a fine of £2 for trespassing in pursuit of game, and of £5 for resistance or refusal to give names. Thus, then, before 1832 the right to kill game was the privilege of a class, and after 1832 became an incident of ownership or possession as might be arranged between landlord and tenant. By the Ground Game Act of 1880 the occupier was given the right to kill harcs and rabbits concurrently with the landlord, and was forbidden to contract himself out of this right. A close time for the sale of hares, to check their diminution, had consequently to be established in 1892. [Forests.]

Gamelin, Bishop of St. Andrews, was Chancellor of Scotland at the beginning of the reign of Alexander III. (1249); of this office he was deprived by the intrigues of Henry III. The English party subjected him to so much persecution that he sought redress at Rome, where the Pope espoused his cause, and ordered the excommunication of Alan Durward.

Gardiner, Stephen (b. 1483, d. 1555). Bishop of Winchester, was a celebrated prelate and statesman. He was bern at Bury St. Edmunds about 1483, and was educated st Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he became Doctor of Laws in 1521. In 1525 he was elected to the mastership of his college, and he became Chancellor of the University in 1540. To a man like Gardiner academical distinctions were far from being all-sufficing. He took a secretaryship in the family of the Duke of Norfolk, and shortly afterwards in the house-hold of Cardinal Wolsey. In this latter employment he speedily obtained the confidence of the king, as well as of his more immediate master, a success which was soon followed by his admission into the Royal Council. In 1528 he was sent with Bishop Fox on an embassy to the Pope, to negotiate the question as to the king's divorce from Catherine of Aragon, and his first prefer-ment in the Church, that of the archdeaconry of Norfolk, was the reward for his tact and energy. On Wolsey's discrace Gardiner was attached entirely to the king's service as Secretary of State, and having succeeded, with the assistance of Bishop Fox, in persuading the University of Cambridge to pronounce formally against marriage with a brother's widow, in 1531, he was appointed. to the archdeaconry of Leicester, and shortly after to the bishoprie of Winchester. His book, D. Vera Obedientia, upheld the royal snpremacy. For the rest of Henry's reign Gardiner was among the foremost of the conservative party in the Council. Powerful during the reactionary years 1539-47, ho lost ground just before Henry's death, and the king withdrew his name from his will, of which he had previously been appointed one of the executors. With the exception of a few months in the early part of the year 1548, Gardiner was a stato prisoner throughout the whole of the roign of Edward VI. Several attempts were made to induce him to subscribe to terms of reconciliation with the party then in power, but all to no purpose, and in the spring of 1552 he was formally deprived of his see for disobedience and contempt of the king's authority. With the accession of Queen Mary, in Gardiner's fortunes improved. He 1553, Gardiner's fortunes improved. once again exercised his episcopal functions in performing the obsequies of the late king. and on August 23, 1553, he was made Lord Chancellor. Throughout the whole of Mary's reign Gardiner acted as her chief adviser in all eivil matters, and his influence in the affairs of the Church was second only to that of Cardinal Pole.

Gardiner's watchfulness enabled Mary to be beforehand with the risings that took place early in 1554, and Wyatt's revolt, being thus pushed into action prematurely, was suppressed with comparative ease, in spite of its formidable character. In his subsequent dealings with the presumed sympathisers of Wyatt, however, Gardiner's merciless rigour alienated from him the support of the more moderate members of Mary's Council, and the feeling of coldness towards him, thus originated, changed at once to one of indignation and active hostility when he proposed that the Princess Elizabeth should be also sacrificed for her sister's more perfect security. Much has been written for and against Gardiner in the matter of his treatment of the Reformers. It is, however, beyond question that the eruel measures of Mary's reign against the Protestant party were very largely of his devising. Gardiner died after a short illness, which seized him soon after opening Parliament, on October 21, 1555, and which terminated in his death, on November 12 following, at Whitehall. An Anglican under Henry, Gardiner became a Papist under Mary, after Edward's reign had demonstrated the futility of Henry's position. In De Vera Obedientia he had attacked the Papal supremaey, in his Palinodia Dieti Libri he set forth his ebange of opinion upon the matter.

Gargrave, Sir Thomas, Speaker of the first Parliament of Elizabeth, "with the Privy Council and thirty members of the House of Commons," was deputed to recommend the queen to seek a husband. In 1570 he acted as erown prosecutor to the Council of York during the trial of those who had taken part in the Northern Rebellion. Sir Thomas, who was a member of the Council of the North, had been knighted by Warwick during the Scotch War of 1547.

Garnet, Henry (b. 1555, d. 1606), became, in 1575, a Jesuit, and, in 1586, provincial of the order in England. He was executed, in 1606, for complicity in the Gunpowder Plot.

Garter, The Order of the, was founded by Edward III., in or about the year 1349. It is the highest order of English knighthood, and consists of not more than twenty-five-knights, excepting members of the royal family and illustrious foreigners, who are not counted. The installations of the order are held in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, where the banners of the several knights are suspended. The badge of the order is a gold medallion, representing St. George and the Dragon, which is worn suspended by a blue ribbon. The garter is of dark-blue velvet, and is worn on the left leg below the knee.

Gascoigne, Sir William (d. 1419?), was appointed one of the king's serjeants, in 1397, and, in 1400, was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench. In 1405 he refused, according to some authority, to pronounce sentence of death on Archbishop Scrope; and his independence was still further shown, according to popular tradition, by his committal of the Prince of Wales to prison for striking him upon the Bench. Whether these stories be true or not, it is certain that one of Henry V.'s first acts was to remove Gascoigne from the chief justiceship. This dismissal might be otherwise accounted for, as Gascoigne was an old man, long in office, and a country gentleman of large property.

Gascony, The Duchy of, corresponded, roughly speaking, with the Roman province of Novem Populania. On the fall of the Empire it became part of the great West Gothic kingdom stretching from the Loiro to the Straits of Gibraltar, but seems to have become more or less independent on the death of Clovis (511), though he and his sons overthrew the rival Teutonic powers in Gaul. Towards the end of this century the Basque tribes swarmed down from the Pyrenean slopes (587). These invaders, the Wascons or Vascons, have given the district its present name, and appear to have settled northwards of the Garonne. In 602 they recognised themselves as being tributary to the Frankish kings, and received a duke of their own, Genialis. About the year 636 Dagobert conquered them once more, though his successors found them always setting up their own dukes, whose sway reached from the Garonne to the Pyrences. Charles the Great gave them a new ruler in the person of Lupus or Loup, but despite this they seem to have been his assails ts in the famous battle of Ronec alles. A fer years later Gascony was restored to the son of Lupus. It was not till 872 that, according to M. Guizot, the duchy of Gascony became hereditary. Some hundred and fifty years later (circa 1036), the title of Duke of Gascony passed over to the Dukes of Aquitaine, and from this time its history must be read in connection with the last-mentioned country. Soon after the marriage of Eleanor, danghter of William X., Duke of Aquitaine, to Prince Henry (1152), it became part of the English possessions in France. After the loss of Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, it still remained an English dependency, but daily became less firmly attached to the English crown. Moreover, it was divided against itself, its great nobles as a rule adhering to French, and its great cities to English, interests. By the Peace of Bretigny (1360), it was handed over to Edward together with Aquitaine, without any reservation of homage to the French king; and Edward in return for this renounced his claims on the crown of France. A century later (1453) it was finally reunited to the French kingcom.

Gascoyne, General, The Motion of (1831). On April 12, after Lord J. Russell had stated the modifications which ministers proposed to introduce into the Reform Bill, General Gascoyne moved that "the total number of members returned to Parliament for England and Wales ought not to be diminished." This motion was carried by 299 to 291, though it was quite evident that it was merely intended to embarrass the ministry.

Gaspee Schooner, The, commanded by Lientenant Duddington, made itself conspicuous by its activity against smnggling. It had more than once a tacked the Newport, a Providence packet. So on one occasion when it was driven accidentally ashore, the citizens of Providence captured, plundered, and burnt it (1773).

Gates, Sir John (d. Aug. 22, 1553), one of the strongest partisans of Northumberland, was condemned and executed for his share in the conspiracy to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. His fellow conspirator, Sir Thomas Palmer, suffered execution at the samo time.

Gauden, John (b. 1605, d. 1662), was in early life of Puritan tendencies, and sat in the Westminster Assembly, but was expelled from that body. His zeal for Charles I. led to his publishing Eikon Basilike, a work of which he is generally reputed to be, at any rate very largely, the author. At the Restoration he was made Bishop of Exeter, and, in 1662, he was translated to Worcester. Ho was much disgusted at the richer see of Winchester being refused him. Clarendon describes him as covetous, shifty, and self-seeking.

Gaunt, ELIZABETH (d. 1685), was burned to death in London for assisting Burton, one of the Rye House conspirators, to escape after the defeat of Monmouth at Sedgemoor.

Gavelkind (A.-S. Gafol) has been defined by Mr. Elton as "the tenure of socage according to the customs of Kent, and not merely a peculiar mode of descent known upon freehold and copyhold alike in several counties." Before the Conquest, the tenants on another man's land held their estates for payment of rent which was generally discharged by labour and in kind rather than by money. Lawyers are pretty generally agreed that the Kentish estates held by this tenure represent the socage tenure which before the Conquest was common to the country at large, but has only in this single county succeeded in holding its own against the changes introduced by the growth of the feudal system. The chief customs incidental to gavelkind are: that, on the death of a landowner, his landed property is to be divided amongst all his sons, and does not pass in entirety to the eldest-born; that a tenant can alienate his land at the age of fifteen; and that lands do not escheat on attainder for felony, &c. All lands lying in Kent are reckoned to be held by this tenure unless it can be proved otherwise, and it is said that during the reign of Henry VI. there were not more than thirty or forty estates that did not come under this heading.

Gaveston, Piers (d. 1312), was the son of a Gascon knight who had been a servant of Edward I. Piers was selected by the king as the comrade of Prince Edward, and speedily acquired a great influence over the weak mind of the young prince. The king, seeing the danger of this, had banished Gaveston, in February, 1307, and on his death-bed commanded his son never to recall him. But Edward II. was no sooner king than Gaveston returned, and was made Earl of Cornwall. He at once became the chief man in the kingdom, was appointed Custos of the Realm during the king's absence, and many valuable possessions and wardships were heaped upon him. He was an accomplished knight, of great bravery and ambition, but insolent and avaricious, and his head was completely turned by the favours lavished upon him. He indulged in coarse satire against the nobles, and surrounded himself with a train of retainers, many of whom were notorious robbers and homicides. In May, 1308, Edward was compelled to banish him; but his exile was converted into a new dignity by his being made vicercy of Ireland. In this capacity he showed some courage and skill, but the king could not live without him, and he returned to England, in 1309. Banished again in 1311, he was recalled in January, 1312, when the barons determined to destroy him. He was besieged in Scarborough Castle, and surrendered on promise of his life. But he was scized by the Earl of Warwick, and, on June 19, 1312, beheaded on Blacklow Hill.

Gazette, The London, is said to be the oldest English newspaper, and the official channel of all public announcements. A Gazette was first published in 1642, but the first of the existing series was issued at Oxford, Nov. 7, 1665, whither the court had gone to escape the Great Plague. On Feb. 5, 1666, the London series began. Until after the Revolution, its meagre two pages, published twice a week, formed the only newspaper.

Geddes, Jenny, was a woman who is said to have thrown a stool at the head of the Bishop of Edinburgh, on the occasion of the riot in St. Giles's Church, when Laud's Liturgy was first read in Scotland, Easter, 1637.

Geddington, The Council or (1188), was the assembly which enacted the Saladin Tithe, the first tax on movables.

Geese, The Wild, was the name given to young Irishmen who were recruited for the Irish Brigade in the French service, largely from Kerry. In 1721, as many as 20,090 are said to have left the country. In 1730 and 1741, French officers were allowed to recruit in Ireland by the government. The time when the Wild Geese were most numerous, however, was the Spanish War (1739—1748).

Gelt, The Battle of the (or Chelt), was fought in North Cumberland, Feb., 1570, between the royal troops under Lord Hunsdon, and the rebels and borderers under Leonard Dacre. In spite of the desperate bravery of the insurgents, they were completely defeated.

General Warrants, for the apprehension of all persons suspected without naming any one in particular, were frequently issued for offences against the government by the Star Chamber and under the Stuarts, as well as during the first half of the eighteenth century. In the case of Wilkes and No. 45 of the North Briton, a general warrant was issued by Lord Halifax, under which forty-nine persons were arrested. Wilkes, on the ground that the warrant was illegal, brought an action against the Under Secretary of State and obtained £1,000 damages. In 1765 general warrants were pronounced illegal by Lord Mansfield and the judges of the King's Bench, on the ground that no degree of antiquity can give sanction to a usage bad in itself, and that "general warrants are no warrants at all because they name no one." This opinion was confirmed by the House of Commons in 1766.

Geneva Convention, The, sertied a serious disagreement between Great Britain and the United States of America. During the civil war between the Northern and Southern States of America, a ship called No. 290 was built at Liverpool to act as a privateer in the service of the Southern States. Before she was completed her destination and purpose were made known to the English government, but owing to difficulties in the law and the illness of a lawofficer of the crown, the orders given to arrest her did not arrivo at Liverpool until after she had left that port on the pretence of a trial trip. She left the Mersey on July 29, 1862; proceeded to the island of Terceira; took in equipment and armament; and began to act against the Northern shipping, assuming the name of Alabama. On June 19, 1864, the Alabama was sunk off Cherbourg, in an engagement with the Federal war steamer Kearsage. After the conclusion of the war, claims for compensation for the damage done by the Alabama and other cruisers were made against the British government. After many attempts at settlement had failed, it was arranged, in February, 1871, that a joint commission should meet at Washington to settle the Alabama claims and other outstanding differences between the United States and Great Britain. On May 8 the high joint commissioners signed the Treaty of Washington, which established a board of arbitration for considering tho Alabama and similar claims, "which are to be recognised as national, and are to be settled on the principle of responsibility for depredations where the government had not exercised the utmost possible diligence and caution to prevent the fitting-out of privateers." After the signature of the treaty a question arose between the two governments as to what classes of claims should be submitted for arbitration. The British government was willing to compensate all private individuals for any loss they might have suffered by the action of the cruisers. The American government demanded, in addition to this, the costs of pursuing the privateers, the losses incurred by higher premiums for insurance, and by the prolongation of the war. After a correspondence, the Americans declared that they could not withdraw from the case which they had submitted, and they left the responsibility of abrogating the treaty to England. The tribunal of arbitration met at Geneva in December, 1871. It consisted of Sir Alexander Cockburn. who was nominated by England, Mr. C. F. Adams, by America, Count F. Sclopes, by Italy, M. Jacob Staempfli, by Switzerland, and the Viscount d'Itajula, by Brazil. Lord Tenterden and Mr. Bancroft Davis were appointed the agents respectively of England and America. The case and countercase were presented on April 15, 1872, and the final decision was given on September 14 of the same year. In the meantime the tribunal had determined that the indirect claims did not constitute a valid ground for compensation, and should not come within the purview of the tribunal. This decision was accepted by the American government. The tribunal of arbitration found unanimously that Great Britain was liable for the acts committed by the Alabama, "having failed by omission to fulfil the duties prescribed by the first and third of the rules established by the sixth article of the Treaty of Washington." With regard to the Oreto, afterwards called the Florida, all but Sir Alexander Cockburn found that Great Britain was liable for the acts committed by that vessel. Three of the arbitrators found against Great Britain in the case of the Shenandoah, on account of the negligence shown by the authorities at Melbourne in permitting the clandestine enlistment of men within that port. With regard to the tenders, the tri-bunal nnanimously found "that such tenders or auxiliary vessels being properly regarded as accessories, must necessarily follow the lot of their principals, and be submitted to the same decision which applies to them respec-tively." With regard to the other vessels mentioned in the claims, the tribunal decided that partly Great Britain was not responsible, and that partly they were excluded from consideration for want of evidence. They rejected the claims for expenditure incurred in the pursuit and capture of the cruisers, and they fixed the sum to be paid by Great Britain at 15,500,000 uollars in gold, amounting to £3,229,166 13s. 4d. sterling. [O. B.]

Geoffrey, Archbishop of York (b. 1158? .d. 1213), was a reputed son of Henry II. by the Fair Rosamond. In 1173 the king procured his election to the bishopric of Lincoln, and in 1191 he was made Archbishop of York. In 1174 he aided his father against his rebellions brothers, and seems to have been appointed Chancellor about this time, an office he continued to hold till his father's death. He distinguished himself greatly in the war against France (1187-89), and was the only one of Henry II.'s children who was present at his death-bed. During Richard I.'s absence from England, he quarrelled with Longchamp (q.v.), and the violent conduct of the latter on this occasion was one of the causes of his dismissal from office. His opposition to John's oppressive taxation cansed his banishment in 1207, and he remained in exile till his death. "The affectionate duty which he showed to his father," says Mr. Foss, "must incline us to a favourable interpretation of his conduct in the two succeeding reigns, and induce us to attribute his misfortnnes to the irritability of Richard and the overbearing tyranny of John, each of whom his independence of character and his strict sense of justice would, though in a different manner, excite. . He must ever hold in history the character of a valiant soldier, an able commander, a wise counsellor, and an excellent son."

Geoffrey of Anjou (b. 1114, d. 1151), the father of Henry II., was the son of Falk V: of Anjou. On the death of the Emperor Henry V., Henry I. determined to marry his daughter Maud to Geoffrey, the heir of Anjou. The match was, from one point of view, a wise one, as it put an end to the series of wars between Normandy and Anjou which had raged for so long, but the Angevin match was unpopular with the Norman nobles and prevented Maud's being recognised as queen. During the civil wars between Stephen and the Empress Maud, Geoffrey was principally occupied with endeavouring to enforce her claims to Normandy.

Geoffrey of Britanny (b. 1158, d. 1186), a son of Henry II. and Eleanor, was married when a child to Constance, daughter and heiress of Conan, Duke of Britanny. In 1173 he joined his elder brother Henry in rebellion against his father, and put himself forward as the champion of Breton independence. Tho conspiracy was defeated, and Henry forgave his sons. In 1180 Geoffrey placed himself at the head of the Poitevins who were in rebellion against Richard; defeated in this attempt he retired to the court of Philip Augustns, where he spent the remainder of his life. He met with his death in a tournament at Paris, where he was accidentally thrown from his horse and trampled to death. By his marriage with Constance he had two children, Arthur and Eleanor.

Lyttelton, Henry II.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (d. circa 1164) was a writer of the twelfth century, of whose personal history scarcely anything is known. Like Giraldus Cambrensis, he sprang from the Norman settlers in Wales. He was Archdeacon of Monmouth, and was taken under the protection of Robert, Earl of Gloucester and Lord of Glamorgan, to whom he dedicated his Historia Britonum. He was consecrated Bishop of St. Asaph in 1152, and died about 1154. Of the origin of his famous History (first published in 1128) Geoffrey asserts "that his friend Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford, brought with him into England from Britanny an ancient book in the Breton tongue, containing the history of this country from the arrival of Brutus the Trojan to the year 689." Geoffrey's work was soon translated into French, English, and Welsh, and gradually became the great fountain-head of romance, ont of which the poets of successive generations have drawn a flood of fiction, that has left an indelible impress upon our subsequent literature. This work has been edited by Dr. Giles, and a translation is to be found in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Geoffrey of Mantes, Earl of Martel (d. 1158), was the son of Geoffrey of Anjou and the Empress Maud. On the accession of his brother, Henry II., to the English throne, he claimed the county of Anjou, but he was compelled to submit to Henry in 1156, and to relinquish his claims on the promise of receiving an annual pension.

George of Denmark, PRINCE (b. 1653, d. 1708), was the second son of Frederick III. of Denmark and Sophia of Luneburg. On July 28, 1683, he married Princess Anno, daughter of James II. It was hinted to him that the claim of his wife and himself to the throne might be preferred by James to that of William and Mary if they became converts to Catholicism; and George seems to have been attracted by the idea. The marriage was perhaps intended as a blind to the English Protestants. When William of Orange landed in England, George deserted James at Andover. As man after man joined the invader, Prince George uttered his usual exclamation, "Est-il possible?" "What," said the king, when he heard that his son-in-law, influenced by Lord Churchill, had followed their example, "is 'Est-il possible' gone too? After all, a good trooper would have been a greater loss." Soon after the accession of William III., ho was created Duke of Cumberland. He offored to accompany William to Ireland, but the offer was declined. When Queen Anne ascended the throne, he at once accepted the position of "his wife's subject." He was created Lord High Admiral, but a commission was appointed to perform his duties. His request to be placed in command of the Dutch army was disregarded in favour of Marlborough. In 1702 he was compelled to vote for the Bill against Occasional Conformity, although himself a notorious example of it. In 1707 an attack was directed against the naval administration. The object of censure, was, however, not so much the Prince as Admiral Churchill, the brother of Marlborough. Towards the end of his life the Tories used him as an instrument to push their interests with the queen. As he lay on his death-bed, the Whigs, in order to procure the admission of Somers to office, threatened again to assault the management of the navy. George was an exceedingly incompetent man. "I have tried him drunk," said Charles II., "and I have tried him sober, and there is nothing in him." He was a good husband, and Anne was much attached to him.

George I. (b. May 28, 1660, s. August 1, 1714, d. June 10, 1727) was the first sovereign of the present Hanoverian dynasty. Prince George Louis was the son of Ernest Augustus of Hanover, and Sophia, daughter of Frederick V., Elector Palatine, and granddaughter of James I. of England. During his father's lifetime he served in the Imperial army against the Turks, at the siege of Vienna, and on the Danube, in Italy, and on the Rhine. In 1681 he visited England, and in the following year his marriage with his cousin, Sophia Dorothea of Zell, united the two branches of the house of Lüneburg. The unfortunato princess was divorced and imprisoned, in 1694, in the castle of Ahlden, for the remainder of her life, for an intrigue with Count Königsmark. George succeeded his father as Elector of Hanover in 1698. Ho led some auxiliaries to the aid of Frederick III. of Denmark (1700). In 1701 he joined the grand alliance against France. In 1707, at Marlborough's request, he was appointed commander of the Imperial forces. He was, however, much offended at the suggestion that he should divide his forces with Prince Eugene. When at length he took the field, he failed to reduce the towns of Franche Comté. Shortly afterwards ho became reconciled to Marlborough. In 1710 he resigned his command. He drew up a memorial to the queen, protesting against the terms of the Peace of Utrecht. After the Tories gained the upper hand, he was in constant communication with the Whig Opposition, but does not seem to have taken any serious steps towards securing the succession. Ho opposed sending a writ to his son, the Electoral prince, as Duke of Cambridge; and answered the queen's angry letter in submissive terms. In May, 1714, he joined in the Treaty of Rastadt. On the death of the queen, he was proclaimed King of England, but did not arrive in this country until late in September, and was not crowned until Oct. 31. He at once nominated an entirely Whig ministry. His accession was on the whole popular, although riots broke out in several of the large towns. The following year witnessed the outbreak of the Jacobite rebellion. The government at once took vigorous measures for its snppression by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, summening troops from Hanover, and arresting the more active Jacobites. Ormond's attempts to land on the English coast were a failure. The insurrection in Scotland for a brief period assumed a formidable aspect. The English revolters were utterly defeated at Preston, and shortly before, Mar had suffcred a reverse at Sheriffmuir. To arrival of the Pretender failed to restore confidence to the Jacobite troops, and, with his flight, the insurrection may be said to have terminated. The chief events of the next year were the punishment of the rebels, and the passing of the Septennial Act. Immediately afterwards George, much against the wish of his ministers, insisted on going to Hanover, accompanied by Stanhope. He was Ð with difficulty induced to allow his eldest son to act as "Guardian of the Realm and Lieutenant" in his absence. Negotiations for the Triple Alliance were at once set on foot. George insisted on an English fleet being sent to the Baltic in order to oppose the designs of Charles XII. of Sweden against Bremen and Verden, and was anxious to declare war against Russia. Shortly afterwards Townshend, who had discountenanced George's European policy, was dismissed from office, and was followed by Walpole. In June, 1717, the Triple Alliance letween England, France, and Holland was concluded. For a brief poriod England was seriously menaced by the schemes of Charles XII. and Alberoni, in conjunction with the malcontents in France, in favour of a Stuart restoration. These were thwarted by the death of Charles in the next year. Alberoni aimed at the destruction of the Treaty of Utrecht, and directed his efforts against the Austrians in Italy. Admiral Byng was therefore sent to the Mediterranean, and Austria joining the Triple Alliance, which thereupon became a Quadruple Alliance, the Spanish fleet was destroyed off Cape Passaro, and Alberoni fell. An abortive expedition, fitted out in favour of the Pretender, to the Highlands, was one of his last efforts. Sweden and Denmark were compelled to desist from hostilities, and, in 1720, Stanhore had secured the peace of Europe. Meanwhile, at home, the impeachment of Oxford was a complete failure. The Schism Act was repealed; but the Peerage Bill, a Whig measure, was rejected through the influence of Walpole, now leader of the Opposition (Dec., 1719). The year 1720 witnessed the terrible downfall of the South Sea Scheme. The directors were punished; Sunderland was forced to resign, and the death of Stanhope left Walpole without a rival. For a brief period the hopes of the Jacobites revived; but information of Bishop Atterbury's plot was given to the English government by the French minister, Dubois. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended for a year, sums were granted for an increase of the army, a tax of £100,000 was collected from the Non-jurors, and Atterbury was forced to leave the kingdom. Soon afterwards Walpolo's jealousy caused a quarrel to break out between himself and Carteret; the latter withdrew to the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland (1724). Then the country was wildly excited by the government patent granted to Wood, giving him power to coin far-things and halfpence to the amount of £108,000. Walpole was obliged to withdraw the obnexious patent. Great excitement was also caused in Scotland by the malt-tax being changed into a charge of threepence upon every barrel of ale. The remainder of the reign offers little interest in home affairs. Abroad, Walpole was thwarted by the intrigues of the Spanish minister, Baron Ripperds. The latter wished to upset the arrangements of the Congress of Cambrai, for the maintenance of the Quadruple Alliance, and to review the old connection between Spain and Austria. Accordingly, in August, 1725, the Treaty of Vienna was concluded between Austria and Spain, with a secret treaty arranging marriages between the two houses, the restoration of the Stuarts, and the surrender of Gibraltar and Minorca. The Jacobites were very active in these intrigues with the Spanish court. In opposition to these designs the Treaty of Hanover was signed by England, France, and Prussia. Ripperda fell, but his policy was still continued. There was great excitement in England, and a squadron was despatched to blockade Porto Bello. Austria, influenced by the policy of Prussia, determined to withdraw from her unpleasant position, and preliminaries of peace were signed at Paris (May, 1727). At home, the Opposition was vehement in its attacks on Walpole, and urged the full restoration of Bolingbroko. Their intrigues were cut short by the death of George at Osnabrück, on June 9, on his way back from Hanover. Mr. Thackeray's lively sketch of George I.'s character is perhaps a better estimate than that of some more pretentious writers. "George was not a lofty monarch certainly: he was not a patron of the fine arts, but he was not a hypocrite, he was not revenge-ful, he was not extravagant. Though a despot in Hanover, ho was a moderate ruler in England. His aim was to leave it to itself as much as possible, and to live out of it as much as he could. His heart was in Hanover. . . He was more than fifty years of age when he came amongst us; we took him because he served our turn; we laughed at his uncouth German ways, and sneered at him. He took our loyalty for what it was worth; laid hands on what money he could; kept us assuredly from Popery and wooden shoes. Cynical and selfish as he was, he was better than a king out of St. Germains, with the French king's orders in his pocket, and a swarm of Jesuits in his train."

George II. (b. Oct. 30, 1683, s. June 11, 1727, d. Oct. 25, 1760), was the son of George Louis, Elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England, and the unfortunate Sophia of Zell. In 1706 he became a peer of England, with the title of Duke of Cambridge. He had married Caroline of Anspach. In spite of his laxity of morals, he was much attached to his wife, and strongly influenced by her. He greatly distinguished himself at the bettle of Oudenarde (1702). Towards the end of 1713, the Whig leaders proposed that his writ as Duke of Cambridge should be asked for in order that he might be present to thwart the designs of the ministry in favour of the Pretender.

Anne was greatly effended, and although the writ was issued, the measure was given up. In 1714 he accompanied his father to England, and became Prince of Wales. In 1716 the smouldering quarrel between the king and his son broke out into flame. The prince insulted the Duke of Newcastle, who was present as proxy for the king at the christening of the prince's eldest son. George was expelled from St. James's, and his children taken under charge of the king. He became popular with the nation, and openly raised the standard of opposition to the court and ministry. It was impossible, however, to ignore his claims to the regency during his father's absence from England. In 1719 Stanhope and Sunderland introduced the Peerage Bill as a blow at his power when he should ascend the throne. But the measure was thrown out by a large majority in the Commons. A formal reconciliation was effected by Walpole between the prince and the king in 1720. In June, 1727, on the death of his father, George ascended the English throne. His reign may be roughly divided into two parts: (1) the peace period to the fall of Walpole in 1742, and (2) the war period to the death of the king in 1760. For a little while it seemed as if Walpole had fallen. Sir Spencer Compton was directed to form a ministry; but Walpole explained his views on foreign policy to the king: he was supported by the influence of the queen, and wisely offered to increase the Civil List. Accordingly, Walpole continued Prime Minister, opposed by the Whig malcontents whom his love of power had caused to desert him, and supported by a bought majority. The difficulties with Spain were settled in Nov., 1729, by the Treaty of Seville, a defensive alliance between England, Spain,

France, and eventually Holland. English trade with South America was thus restored, and the Asiento confirmed to the South Sea Company. The Emperor, finding himself deserted, joined with England, Holland, and Spain, in the second Treaty of Vienna

(March, 1731), which practically confirmed the Treaty of Seville. In this year, Walpole, by compelling Townshend, as leader of the Upper House, to reject the Pension Bill, caused him to retire from the ministry.

For two years Walpole devoted himself to reforms at home. In 1733 his excise on salt was followed up by a proposal for a tax on wine and tobacco, and a system of warehousing to prevent frauds on the Customs. Such was the unpopularity of the measure that the minister was compelled to withdraw it. Walpole kept aloof from the war which broke out in the following year between the Empire, and France and Spain.

Through the mediation of France and England, the Definitive Peace of Vienna was eventually signed in the year 1738. The elections of 1735 were stubbornly contested, but

Walpole retained his majority. Bolingbroke retired to France, and the Prince of Wales assumed the leadership of the Opposition. In 1736 Edinburgh was agitated by the Porteous riots. In 1737 a public quarrel broke out between George and his son on the subject of the prince's jointure. The ministry was victorious, but the Opposition rallied round the prince at Norfolk Heuse. Shortly afterwards the death of the queen deprived George of a faithful wife, and Walpole of a true friend. The latter retained, however, his influence over Georgs. The Opposition attacked his peace policy, the story of "Jenkins's ear" was brought up against him, and the king was eager for war with Spain. Failing to carry their motion against Walpole's convention with that country, the Opposition second from the House. Wal-Opposition seceded from the House. pole was, however, forced to declare war (October, 1739), rather than resign, and at once the Jacobite hopes revived. The expeditions to Spain were not successful. In 1742 the elections gave the government but a small majority, and, being defeated on the Chippenham Election Petition, Walpole resigned. A new ministry, in which several of Walpole's supporters had places, was formed under Wilmington, formerly Sir Spencer Compton. On the death of Wilmington, in the following year, Henry Pelham defeated Lord Bath, the rival candidate for the Premiership. Europe was now menaced by the question of the Austrian Succession (q.v.). Subsidies were promptly voted to Maria Theresa, and an army of 30,000 English and Hanoverians sent to the Low Countries. The English fleet forced the Neapolitan king to assume neutrality. The battle of Dettingen (June 27, 1743), the last in which an English king took part, and in which George distinguished himself, resulted in a defeat of the French, after ineffectual negotiations for peace. England joined Holland, Austria, Saxeny, and Sardinia in the Treaty of Worms, Sept., 1743, for the maintenance of the Pragmatic Sanction. A counter-league, known as that of Frankfort, with France at its head, was soon formed. The French now prepared an expedition under Marshal Saxe to invade England, and restore the Stuarts, but a violent storm prevented the transports from sailing. There was now a change of ministry; Carteret being driven from office, and the Pelham administration established on a "broad bottom." The system of German subsidies was largely carried on. The campaign in the Netherlands of 1745 terminated in the defeat of Foniency. The same year was rendered memorable in English annals by the invasion of Prince Charles Edward. [Jacobertzs.] He defeated Cope at Prestonpans in September, and marched as far as Derby, to the great alarm of the government. He then retreated into Scotland, and won the battle of Falkirk near by it y diy

Stirling, but his army was cut to pieces at Culloden, in April, 1746, and he escaped with difficulty to the Continent. In the midst of this crisis the Pelhams, failing to procure the admission of Pitt to office, had resigned; but, on Grenville's failing to form a ministry, they returned to power, having gained their point. Abroad, the Duke of Cumberland's campaign in the Netherlands was not success-At length the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (q.v.) brought the struggle to a close, the terms being a mutual restoration of conquests (1748). Pelham thereupon introduced an important financial measure, proposing to reduce the interest on the national debt to three per cent. This was followed up by the Reform of the Calendar in 1751, and two years later by Hardwicke's Marriage Act. A Bill for the Naturalisation of Jews was carried, but popular sentiment necessitated its repeal. The Wesleyans became numerous, and exercised a roviving influence on religion. In 1754, on the death of Pelham, the incompetent Newcastle assumed the government. "New I shall have no more peace," said George II. A new war was breaking out with France in India and America, and the Seven Years' War was on the verge of beginning. In 1756 war began. Minerca was captured by the French owing to the weak conduct of Admiral Byng, and Newcastle, deserted by Fox, was obliged to resign. Pitt failed to form a durable ministry, until, by a coalition with Newcastle, the ministry was constituted which so gloriously carried on the war. Vigorous measures were at once set on foot on the Continent. Austria, France, and Russia fought against England and Prussia. The Continent. traditional policy of England was truly upset. [Seven Years' War.] A long series of expeditions kept up the fame of the British arms. The attack on Rochefort was unsuccessful, nor was the enterprise against Louisbourg, in America, attended with better results. Finally, the Duke of Cumberland, beaten at Hastenbeck, and surrounded by the French at Kloster-Seven, was compelled to capitulate. In India, however, Clive had gained the great victory of Plassey. In 1758, Ferdinand of Brunswick was an ointed commander in the place of can erland. After his victory at Crefeld, a large body of roops was sent to assist him. The expeditions against Cherbourg and St. Male were productive of little result. In America the English took Louisbourg, Fort Duquesne, and Ticonderoga. The year 1759 was one of the most glorious in our history. In January, Goree, in Africa, was captured; in June Guadaloupe. In August Ferdinand of Brunswick gained a great victory at Minden, and saved Hanover; in September Admiral Bos-cawen defeated the French off Lagos; in October, Wolfe beat them at Quebec; in November, Hawke defeated Conflans off Quiberon. In India the siege of Madras was mised, and Coote took Wandewash. great victories of Frederick, in the following year, may be said to have concluded the war. At the moment of prosperity, George died suddenly on October 25, 1760. Lord Stan-hopo's estimate of his character is that " he had scarcely one kingly quality, except personal courage and justice. Avarice, the most unprincely of all passions, sat unshrined in the inmost recesses of his bosom Business he understood, and transacted with pleasure. Like his father, he was fer too Hanoverian in his politics, ner whelly free from the influence of his mistresses. But his reign of thirty-one years deserves this praise, that it never once invaded the rights of the nation, ner harshly enferced the prerogatives of the crown; that its last period was illumined by the gleries of Welfe and of Chatham; and that it left the dynasty secure, the constitution unimpaired, and the people prosperous."

George III. (b. June 4, 1738, s. Oct. 25, 1760, d. Jan. 20, 1820) was the son of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and the grandson of George II. His father died in 1751, leaving him to the care of his clever mother, a princess of Saxe-Gotha, and of Lord Bute, by whom he was brought up in the Anti-Whig principles set forth in Bolingbroke's Idea of a Patriot King. After a love affair with ady Sarah Lennex, which was nipped in the bud, George married, in 1761, the Princess Charlette of Mecklonburg-Strelitz. Immediately upon his accession, the king set himself to break the power of the Whig houses. By the aid of tho "king's friends," Pitt was driven from power (1761), and his policy reversed by the Peace of Paris (1763). The incompetance of Lord Butc, however postponed the triumph of Toryism, and deorge was forced to submit to the obnexious administrations of George Grenville (1763), and of Rockingham (1766). At length Pitt, now Earl of Chatham, who had broker with tho Whigs, consented to come to the king's rescue. but a nervous disorder soon forced him to retire, and the administration was continued by the Duke of Grafton, the king all the while steadily pursuing his policy of breaking up party ties, and making supreme the influence of the crown. The persecution of Wilkes was made a personal question; but the king was as yet popular, and the unconstitutional conduct of the government excited little indignation outside London and Middlesex. At last, in 1770, ten years after his accession, George found himelf in a position to appoint Lord North Prime Minister, and for twelve years personal government obtained in England, the Premicr being nothing more than a passive instrument

In the hands of his severeign. They were years of disaster and disgrace. At home the royal influence was used una supulously to further particular measures and to heswheat the Opposition, appointments in the army were tempered with, and the business in Par-liament controlled. Abroad, the policy of coercing the American coionies, continued in accordance with the express wish of the king, was at first extremely popular in England, nor did opinions begin to change until the declaration of war had been followed by Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, and by the intervention of France in the strugg to (1778). Then North wished to resign in favour of Lord Chatham, but George e clined to " possess the erown under shackles," and by the death of the great statesman in the following year, he was left free to carry on the ' king's war," in spite of the misgivings of the Prime Minister, and the numerous resignations of his colleagues. The storm was, however, gathering to a head; disaster followed disaster in America; at home the sullen discontent of the masses found expression in the dungerous Gordon Riots; there was a strong demand for economical reform; Mr. Dunning moved his famous resolutions against the increasing influence of the crown. George attempted to stave off the inevitable by negotiating through Lord Thurlow with the Opposition, but he was checkmated by the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, and North resigned in March, 1782. Once more the king was placed under the hateful thraldom of the Whigs. During Rockingham's brief second ministry, he was forced to consent to the acknowledgment of American independence, and though he found Lord Shelburne more pliable, the powerful coalition of Fox and North, formed in 1783, came into office with the express determination to break the royal authority. George resolved to appeal to the country against the government. By a most unconstitutional use of his personal influence in the House of Lords, he procured the rejection of Fox's East India Bill, ministers were dismissed, and after Pitt, the new Prime Minister, had roused the enthusiasm of the nation by his gallant strugglo against the majority in the Commons, Parliament was dissolved in 1784, and the elections resulted in the complete victory of the crown over the Whig oligarchy. For the second time in the reign the king had been able to override the House of Commons, and he again found himself in possession of a long lease of power checked only by the fact that his minister was not a mere servant like Lord North. A period of considerable material progress followed, during which Pitt's excellent administration gained for the crown much popularity, unchecked by the king's well-known dislike to parliamentary reform. It was, however, a time of much misery to the trans, who was distressed by the irregularities his sons, and who in 1: 49 became afflicted with that mental aberration of which symptoms had appeared soon after his accession. At first he was side considerably worse by the incapacity the court doctors, but under the skilful treatment of Dr. Willis he rapidly recovered, and on April 23 personally attended the Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's llis popularity, which was partly due no doubt to the distrust with which the heir apparent was regarded, was at its height when the outburst of the French Revolution frightened even the greater part of the Whig malcontents, as well as the mercantile and properties uses, into lending their support to the three laws with the approval of the upper classes that the king and his minister entered upon that course of a pression of opir con which tended, more than anything else, to make the lower order espouse the new gospel of democracy. It is unnecessary to describe in detail Pitt's splendid efforts to keep together the European coalition, which opposed such a wavering front to the deter-mined progress of the French arms. The burdens imposed upon the nation, added to the sufferings produced by bad harvests and oppression of trade, sapidly made the war very unpopular, and with it the king, who was assumited by the mob when he went to open Parliament for the autumn session of 1795. Nevertheless, the struggle continued, though Napoleon had appeared, and the gh the victories won by finglish seamen could not stone for the defeats experienced by Continental generals. George IV. (b. Aug. 12, 1762; c. Jan. 29, 1820; d. Jan. 26, 1830) was born upon the forty-seventh anniversary of the n of the house of Brunswick. The e strict and dull a kind that it would have caused any boy of spirit to revolt. The coldness and tedium of his fathe 's court de sped quickly the worst a of the e's character. At twenty he fell desely in love with a Mrs. Fitz-Herbert, he prively married, a marriage void by of the syal Marriage Act; if it had een, it was disave cost George the throne, as Mrs. Fits-1 "rhert was a Roman Catholic. On his attaining twenty-one his father had settled on him £50,000 a year; the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall amounted to £12,000; and Parliament voted him £30,000 to start with, and the same amount to pay off his debts. Within a year his debts amounted to £160,000. The king added £16 00 to his allowance, which only served tencourage his reckless extravagance. In hope that it might come into power and he allied himself closely wi party, which his father hated. linment undertook to discharge which amounted to £650,000, on his with Princess Caroline of Brunswick George III, had selected as an eligible wife for his son. The prince was drunk when he murried her, and before nine months passed by, had openly separated from her, to return to his old habits of vice and profligacy. In 1911 he found himself compelled to accept the regency on terms which he did his best to have modified. But his conduct had disgusted his best friends, the Whige, who now began to the him in his true colours. Finding that nothing was to be got from them, he deserted them in a moment, accepted the regency on the terms proposed, and retained l'erceval as Primo Minister. His heartless conduct to his daughter, the Princess Charlotte, increased his unpopularity. In 1817 the feeling of the people made itself felt by publicly insuiting the Regent on his way tack from opening Parliament. On coming to the throne (1820) George attempted to divorce his queen, but the case had to be abandoned, and she died in 1821. Without his father's virtues George IV. had as narrow-minded a horror of change as the old king himself. Fortunately for the country he had not the moral strength, or even the obstinate courage, which had enabled George III. always to gain his point. In deference to the king's conscientions scruples Pitt had consented to waive the Catholic question. The notion of conscientious scruples influencing George IV. was nothing short of ludicrous. He, too, however, refused to submit, whereupon Peel and the Duke of Wellington offered their resignations. They were accepted, but before the noxt day the king had reflected that it was impossible for him to form another ministry, and that his father's old threat of retiring to Hanover would be only too gladly received by the nation: he surrendered and wrote to them a note begging them to remain in office, and allowing them to have their own way. Little more than a year after this event he died.

George V., Kino (b. June 3, 1865), second son of His late Majesty King Edward VII. By the death of his elder brother, Prince Albert Victor, Dake of Clarence (Jan. 14, 1892), he came into the direct line of succession. He was early intended for the Navy, and was educated in consonance with this objective. In 1878 he began his naval career, serving on the Britannia. Two years later he laid the foundation to his right to be considered the most travelled monarch of the world, by starting on a cruise in the Bacchante, during which he was made midshipman. The itinerary of this cruise was comprehensive, including South Africa, Australia, the West Indies, China, and Japan. Before returning, a tour was made through the Holy Land. His interest in naval technique was intense and practical, and he learned every detail of his profession. His steps of promotion were: Sub-lieutenant, 1884; Lieutenant, 1885; Commander, 1891; Captain, 1893; Vice-Admiral, 1903; Admiral, 1907. He married. on July 6, 1893, Princess Victoria Mary (b. May 26, 1867), only daughter of the Unke and Duchess of Teck. His Majesty has issue five sons and one daughter: Their Royal Highness Prince Edward Albert, born on June 23, 1894, heir to the Throne; Prince Albert Frederick, born 1895; Princese Victoria Alexandra, born in 1897; Prince Henry, born 1900; Prince George, born in 1902; and Prince John, born in 1905.

On the accession of Edward VII. to the throne in 1901, George had to relinquish active service, and on March 15, 1901, started on an Imperial tour through the overseas Dominions of the Crown. He was accompanied by the Duchess of York, and: on H.M.S. Ophir visited Australia, New Zealand, Sonth Africa, and Canada. Returning in November of the same year he was created Prince of Wales. His notable "Wake Up, England!" speech was delivered in the Guildhall at this time. Another momentous tour was undertaken in 1905-6to the Empire of India, when the principal cities were visited. In addition to these especially notable journeys, His Majesty has toured in Ireland (1897 and 1899), and has visited Egypt (1888), Russia (1894), Berlin (1902), Vienna (1904), Canada (1908), Germany (1908), making, it is computed, a travelled aggregate of 150,000 miles. Princes Edward and Albert, his eldest and second sons respectively, are being trained for tho Navy. On the demise of the Crown by the death of Edward VII., on May 6, 1910, he succeeded to the Crown, and was proclaimed King three days later.

Gerberoi, The Battle or (1080), was fought between William the Conqueror and his eldest son Robert, who, aided by the French king, sought to establish himself as Duke of Normandy. The action was a slight one, and Robert having unhorsed and wounded his father, expressed penitence for his rebellion, and a reconciliation was effected.

Germanstown, The Battle of (Oct. 4, 1777), fought between Washington and Lord Howe at Germanstown, on the Schuylkill River, north of Philadelphia. The English held Germanstown to protect Philadelphia, which they had recently occupied. Washington attacked them with great success at the outset, but becoming panic-stricken they fled, leaving the English in possession of the town.

Germanus, Sr. (d. 448), Bishop of Auxerre. Said to have visited Britain (429 A.D.) to combat Pelagianism. He converted to Christianity those British tribes which still remained heathen. Encouraged by him the Britons won a bloodless victory over the combined Picts and Saxons known as the Alleluis Victory (q.v.). The dedication of several churches in Wales and Cornwall to him attests the memory of his visit.

Gertruydenberg, The Conference at (1710), was an unsuccessful attempt to bring the War of the Spanish Succession to a close. The seat of the negotiations, which were begun on the side of France, was moved from the Hague to Gertruydenberg, a village at the mouth of the Waal. The Dutch demanded that the terms of the previous year, vis., the resignation of the whole of the Spanish succession and the restoration of Newfoundland to England, should be enforced with the terrible condition that

Louis should assist in ejecting his grandson from Spain. This the French king declined, although he offered a monthly subsidy towards defraying the expenses of the allies. Although this point was waived, the opposition of Austria and Savoy to these terms of peace necessitated the continuation of the war. [Spanish Succession, War of the.]

Gervase of Tilbury, an historian of the thirteenth century, whose career as a wandering scholar is very interesting, was for some time in the service of Otto IV., and was made Marshal of the Kingdom of Arles by him. Gesith (companion) Tas the old English word for the Latin come. Tacitus gives us a description of the primitive comitatus of the old German king. The comits were his personal dependents, fighting his battles, living in his house, and wholly occupied in his service. The position was coveted by tho most noble youth of Germany. As tho comitatus reappears in England, the increased dignity of the king has immeasurably increased the distance between him and his companions in arms. He now gives dignity and importance to his followers. The gesith becomes the thegn; the companion the servant. The royal gesiths are strongly marked out from the gesiths of the caldorman or bishop, who are merely his retainors or wards. Ultimately large grants of folkland reward the services of the faithful thegn. [Theon.] A new nobility of service ultimately develops from the comitatus. Extinct on the Continent, the comitatus becomes in England a chief source of feudalism. The huscarls of Canute reproduce the earlier gesiths of the heptarchic kings. The gesithcundman was a man in the rank of a gesith, and ennobled by his service.

Ghilvais, THE, are inhabitants of the province lying to the north-east of Candahar. They are a fine muscular race, expert in the use of the musket, sword, and knife, and characterised by an intense ferocity of disposition, the result of centuries of rapine and petty warfare. They have been the most resolute opponents of every invader, and have never submitted to the rulers of Cabul or Candahar, but have continued with perfect impunity their hereditary profession of levying black-mail on all who traverse their mountains.

Ghusni, The Sizon of (Jan. 21, 1839). This great fortress was strong by nature and by art, surrounded by a wall sixty or seventy feet high and a wet ditch. During the English invasion of Afghanistan it was garrisoned by 3,000 men commanded by Hyder Khan, the son of Dost Mahomed. The English battering train had been left behind, and it was impossible to break the walls with the few six- and nine-pounders which had accompanied them. A nephew of Dost Mahomed, however, for a large bribe, turned traitor and gave an accurate description of the condition and character of the defences. It was determined to blow up the gate, and then rush into the fortress. Nine hundred pounds of powder, packed in bags, were conveyed under cover of darkness to the gate and successfully exploded. The massive gate was shivered, and masses of masonry flew in all directions. Colonel Dennie of the 13th Light Infantry rushed in with the storming party over the debris, and drove back the enemy who were hastily assembling behind the breach, and a mortal struggle ensued which lasted some hours. At dawn of day, however, the British ensign floated over the citadel of Ghuzni, which was thus won with a loss of 180 killed and wounded, of whom eighteen were officers. [APOHAN WARK]

Gibbet Rutts was a camp of the Irish rebels in 1798, on the Curragh or racecourse near that place. Gibraltar, a promontory at the entrance to the Mediterranean, is situated in the Spanish province of Andalusia. The natural strength of the position—it is, in fact, the key of the Mediterranean—attracted attention at a very early date. From 712 to the beginning of the fourteenth century it was in the hands of the Saracens, by whom it was again retaken from the Spaniards, in 1333. In 1410 the rock was taken by the Moorish King of Granada, and in 1462 fell into the hands of the Spaniards, by whom it was formally annexed, 1502. In 1704 a combined English and Dutch fleet, under Sir George Rooke, compelled the governor, the Marquis de Salines, to surrender, and Gibraltar has ever since remained in the possession of the English, sustaining a well-conducted siege in 1705. In 1713 it was formally ceded to Great Britain hy the Treaty of Utrecht. Many attempts have been made hy the Spaniards to recover so important a position. In 1718 Stanhope was almost induced to surrender what he regarded as of little value and an insuperable obstacle to peace with Spain. In 1720 a projected attack, under the Marquis of Leda, came to nothing, and in 1727 the Count de la Torres and 20,000 men also failed to take the rock. In 1757 Pitt was willing to surrender the rock if the Spaniards would help in the recapture of Minorca from the French; hut they persevered in neutrality, and in 1761 joined the Family Compact largely in consequence of the desire to win it back. The most famous siege of Gihraltar was one lasting from 1779 to 1783, by a combined force of Spaniards and French, which was successfully withstood by the English under General Elliot, afterwards Lord Heathfield; a siege almost unparalleled in the annals of ancient or modern warfare. The possession of Gihraltar gives England a commanding attitude at the Atlantic entrance of the Mediterranean. The administration is in the lands of a military governor. As a "free port" Gihraltar is the seat of extensive smuggling.

By this means the details of every Catholic plot was made known to the ministers almost as soon as conceived.

In 1578, having obtained from Elizabeth a patent empowering him to take possession of any unappropristed lands he might discover, he sailed to North America, but returned without accomplishing anything. In 1583 he again set out on a voyage of discovery, and took possession of Newfoundland, but whilst on his return was lost with all his crew.

Gildas (b. 516? d. 570?) is said to have been born in the year of the battle of Mount Badon, and to have become an ecclesiastic. In 550 he retired to Armorica, hut is said to have returned to Britain, and to have spenthe latter years of his life at Glastonhury. He wrote a work entitled De Excidio Britannia, which is our sole contemporary authority for the Saxon conquest of Britain. Gildan has been published by the English Historical Society, and in the Monumenta Historical Britannia. A translation of his work will be found in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Gilds (probably from Anglo-Saxon gildan, to pay). Associations of various kinds, for mutual assistance, were of considerable anti-quity in England. Among the Anglo-Saxons three kinds of gilds may be distinguished—religious and social gilds, "frithgilds," and merchant gilds. Of the first of these, two well-known examples are the gilds of Abbotshury and of Exeter, of which the statutes, dating from the earlier part of the eleventh century, prescribe contributions towards leaste and for religious purposes, and direct provision to be made for the burial of members. The thegns' gild at Cambridge, of the same period, did more than provide for mutual help of this sort; it exacted recompense from thieves who robbed its members, and paid wergild for a hrother who slew a man righteously. Such regulations imply that a certain authority was recognised in the gild officers, and the gild itself may therefore be looked upon as a rudimentary town corporation. In the laws of Ini mention is made of the gegildan, to whom the wergild of a stranger was to be paid; and those of Alfred fix the share to be paid or received by the gegildan of a 10 in who is without relatives. The Judicia Civitatia Londonia of the time of Athelstan, describes itself as "ordained and confirmed by the hishops and reeves of London among our frithgegildss (brethren of a peace gild), as well eorlish as ceorlish," to supplement the decrees of recent Witenagemots. It provides for common banquets, and the singing of funeral psalms. But its chief object is the enforcement of mutual defence; payment is made towards a common insurance and police fund; directions are given for the pursuit of thieves and the exaction of comensation; and the members are arranged in odies of tens and hundreds under headmen. While social and religious gilds existed to the close of the Middle Ages, there is no mention of frithgilds after the Conquest.

The merchant gild (gilda mercatoris, ceapmanne gilde), or Hanna, probably arose in several towns in the early part of the eleventh century. As seen soon after the Conquest, it owns property, contains all the traders of the town, and regulates its trade. [Towns.]

town, and regulates its trade. [Towns.]

It is difficult to determine the relation between the merchant gild and the trade or craft gilds which first became prominent in the reign of Henry II. These gradually obtained movel assettion and during the form obtained royal sanction, and during the fourteenth century gained complete control of industry. In most cases the merchant gild was entirely merged in the corporation; while the trade gilds became completely self-governing, and imposed on their members minute regulations as to trade processes and personal morality. It was an industry of small shops and of general equality; for each master employed only two or three workmen (who earned at least half as much as he did, and might fairly hope to become masters in their turn), together with an apprentice or so. But with the beginning of the fifteenth century it became in some orafts very difficult to rise to the position of master, and there are traces of the formation of separate yeomen's—i.s. journeymen's—gilds. During the seventeenth century the small-shop system gave way to the domestic system, and that in the eighteenth to the factory system; and early in the nineteenth century the last remuants of the gild restrictions were abolished by statute. [Transs' Umona]

It is to be added that the Act of Edward VI. confisering all the gild endowments (except those of the London gilds or Companies), on the pretence that they were applied to superstitious uses, was one of the chief causes of the panperism which made the Poor Law of Elimbeth necessary.

Gin Act. 7 736), was proposed by Sir Joseph Jonarder to check drunkenness. He and a prohibitive duty of 20s. on every so sold by retail, and £50 yearly for a licence to every retailer. The measure was disliked by Walpole, who inserted a clause that £70,000 should be granted to the king to compensate him for the consequent diminution of the Civil List. The Act was repealed in 1743; and a new Bill was passed, by which "a small duty per gallon was laid on spirits at the still head, and the price of licences reduced to 20s."

Gipsies in England. The gipsies first appeared in England in 1514, and in Scotland rather earlier. In 1531 an Act banished them from England, and in 1541 from Scotland, under pain of death. Henry VIII., as a milder measure, shipped some gipsies to Norway. A statute of 1562 made even intercourse with gipsies felony; and, in 1592, five men were hung at Durham "for being Egyptiana." Not till 1783 was the Act of 1592 repealed. In Scotland, there are cases of executions of gipsies, for no other crime than their origin, in 1611 and 1636.

Giraldus Cambronsis (b.1147, d.1220) was the literary name of Gerald de Barry, the most famous writer and literary adventurer of his age. Closely connected with the Norman families who had conquered South Wales, the nephew of the conquerors of Ireland, and the granddaughter of Nesta, the "Helen of Wales," Giraldus was born at his father's castle of Manorbier, near Tenby. He was destined for the Church, and was educated at St. David's under the eye of his uncle the bishop. In 1172 Giraldus became Archdescon of Brecon. He plunged with ardour into a long series of quarrels with his flock; he reformed the irregular payment of tithes; informed against the married clergy, and in 1176 persuaded the chapter of St. David's to make him his nucle's successor to that see. The disfavour of Henry II. annulled the election, and Gerald in disgust went back to his studies at Paris; but for the rest of his life to become Bishop of St. David's was the steady object of his ambition, though his efforts to obtain that end were uniformly fruitless. Appointed administrator of the see by the archbishop in 1184, he was sent to Ireland as chaplain to John, son of Henry II., and, after rejecting Irish bishoprics, and writing his Topography of Iroland, returned in 1188 to accompany and chronicle Archbishop Baldwin's crusading itinerary of Wales. He kept about the court till 1192, was again elected to St. David's, and defeated after five years of litigation in 1203, and spent the remainder of his life in the retirement of mortified ambition. the historian of the Conquest of Ireland, and the compiler of the Itinerary of Wales, he has given us a more vivid idea of these countries than any other mediaval writer.

The works of Giraldus Cambrenais are printed in the Rolls Series (7 vols.), with introductions by J. S. Brewer. There are lives of Gerald is yold to the Rolls Series of History of St. David's; in vol. i. of Brewer's edition of his works; and by Sir R. C. Hoare, who has translated the Itingratium Cambries.

He is the hero of many stories, mostly dubious. He is said to have freed his country from the Danes, to have over-run Lothian, and to have subjugated Ireland: while, in consideration of certain privileges conferred on the monks of St. Andrews, he has been called "the Liberator of the Scottish Church."

He entered Parliament in 1832 as member for Newark, in the Tory and High Church interest. He toot, distinguished himself as an orator. In 1835 Peel made him a Junior Lord of the Treasury. In 1841 he became Vice-President of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint, an office which he afterwards exchanged for the Colonial Secretarysbip. Peel's revised tariff of 1842 was mainly his work. Rejected by Newark for his adbesion to Free Trade, he was returned for Oxford University in 1847. Peel's ministry soon fell, and Mr. Gladstone, like all the other Peelites, atoned for his fidelity to his leader by exclusion from office for several years. They (the Peelites) could hold office neither under Whigs nor Tories. He utilised his leisure in literary activity and in the study of the Italian question, writing, in 1851, his famous letter to Lord Aberdeen on the Naples prisons. In 1852 the hybrid ministry of Lord Aberdeen came into power, and Mr. Gladstone was made Chancellor of the Exchequer. Driven into resignation by Mr. Roebuck's motion, and the disasters of the Crimean War, he strongly opposed the Divorce Bill of 1857, accepted from Lord Derby, in 1858, the post of Lord High Commissioner to the Ionian Islands, and favoured their eventual union with Greece, which was effected in 1864. In 1859 he was again Chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Palmerston. A series of famous budgets established his reputation as a financier. His now avowed Liberalism led to his rejection at Oxford in 1865, and he was returned for South-west Lancashire. The death of Lord Palmerston was the beginning of more stirring times. Mr. Gladstone now became leader of the House of Commons, and introduced the Reform Bill of 1886, which led to the defeat of the government; but the Irish Church agitation soon brought them back into office. In December, 1868, he became Premier of the ministry which disestablished the Irish Church, passed the first Land Act, reformed the army, and abolished religious tests in the Universities. Resigning in 1874, he was returned for Leeds, and was out of office until 1880. Withdrawing for a time from the leadership of his party, he displayed great literary activity in many directions. He was brought back to politics by the Bulgarian atrocity egitation of 1876, and carried Midlothian in 1879-80. His second administration was largely occupied with Irish affairs. But in 1884 he passed his Franchise Bill, in the next year the Redistribution Bill. In 1885 the Government were defeated upon their Inland Revenue Bill, and resigned. In 1886 Mr. Gladstone returned to power and brought in a Bill for creating a separate Irish Parliament and Executive. The result of this was the fall of the Government, and a large secession from the Liberal party. His secession from the Liberal party. His fourth administration, formed in 1892, passed a Home Rule Bill through the Commons. In 1895 he withdrew from public life, and was succeeded as Premier by Lord Rosebery. He was buried in West-minster Abbey; and his Life has been written by Mr. John Morley.

Glamorgan Treaty, THE. Charles I., in 1644, unable to turn the Cessation to the advantage he had expected, and Ormonde being unwilling to grant more to the Catholics, sent Lord Herbert, son of the Marquis of Worcester, to Ireland, creating him at the same time Earl of Glamorgan. He was entrusted with a commission sealed with the king's private signet, dated March 12th, 1644, at Oxford, authorising him to grant all the Catholics might demand, if they would send over 10,000 men to his aid. Glamorgan arrived at Kilkenny in 1645, and concluded a public and a secret treaty with the Catholice. By the first the demands that a Catholic deputation had made at Oxford in 1644 were granted. These were: the aboli-1644 were granted. These were: the abolition of the Catholic disabilities of Poynings' Law, a general amnesty, and a period of limitation for all inquiries into the titles of land. The secret treaty granted to the Catholies the public exercise of their religion in all churches not actually in possession of the State Church; in return, 10,000 men under Glamorgan were to join the king in England, and two thirds of the church revenues were to be set aside to provide for their pay. This secret treaty was discovered among the papers of the Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, on his repulse from before Sligo. After this discovery, January 29, 1646, tho king sent a message to the two Houses, denying that Glamorgan had any such powers; he wrote to Ormonde in the same strain. There can be no doubt, however, that Glamorgan only fulfilled the king's instructions.

Glanvill, RANULF DE, a famous judge, statesman, and administrator of Henry II.'s reign. In 1174 he did more than anyono else to savo the north from the revolt of feudal barons and the Scottish invasion. He succeeded Richard de Lucy as Justicier in 1180, and continued in office till Henry's death. Richard I. displaced him from office and kept him in prison until he had paid the enormous fine of £15,000. This was the end of his career. As an author, Glanvill's treatise De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Anglia seems to have been composed about 1181. It is of great importance as the earliest treatise on English law, and throws much light on many reforms of Henry II., of which otherwise we should know very little. It has been printed more than once, and critical extracts are to be found in Stubbs's \lect

Glasgow owes its origin to the establishment of a church by Kentigern, the apostle of Strathclyde in the sixth century, which became the seat of a bishopric. The town which grew up round tho see was in tho domain of the bishop. In 1450 Bishop Turnbull founded the university. In 1491 the see was made an archbishopric. Alone of the Scotch cathedrals the church survived the Reformation. In 1638 a famous General Assembly at Glasgow accepted the Covenant. The Treaty of Union first gave Glasgow importance as a port, by opening to Scotland the colonial trade. Since then the city has rapidly increased. It rivalled Bristol in the tobacco trade, and, when that was diverted by the American War of Independence, Glasgow industry took new channels. At last Glasgow became the great manufacturing centre of Scotland, while the improvement of the Clyde (chiefly since 1844) made it the first port.

Glassites, The, were members of a Scotch sectarian body, that originated about 1730, when its leader, John Glass, was driven from his parish by the General Assembly for a heresy on the kingdom of Christ. Glass taught the "voluntary principle" for the first time in Scotland, and his system of church government was practically congregational. Robert Sandeman, one of Glass's followers, gave another name to the sect and distinguished it by his doctrine of faith as "bare belief of the bare truth." The public worship of this small sect is of a peculiar character.

Glastonbury Abbey is perhaus the only religious foundation in England which has kept up its existence from Roman times. Dismissing the fable of its foundation by Joseph of Arimathea, we have sufficient evidence that it existed long before Ina's conquest of that region brought it under English sway; it was famed as the burying-place of Arthur, and was much frequented by Irish pilgrims as the tomb of St. Patrick.

After Ina's second foundation, Dunstan's famous reformation and introduction of the Benedictine rule is the next great event in the history of the abbey. The church was rebuilt by Dunstan, Herlowin, and Henry II. At the end of the twelfth century there was a long struggle between the Bishop of Bath and the monks, who eventually succeeded in securing the independence of their abbey. It became very rich. Its last abbot, Whiting, was hung by Henry VIII. on the top of Glastonbury Tor.

William of Malmesbury, De Antiquitatibus Glastonensis Ecclesia, gives the legend of its origin. Proceedings of Somerset Archeological Society; Warner, History of Glustonbury.

Glencairn, Alexander Cunningham, Earl of, taken prisoner at Solway Moss, was one of the "Assured Lords," but, with the others, he threw over Henry VIII. in 1544. He joined the Protestant alliance against Queen Mary for a time, but was shortly afterwards received back into the royal favour. In 1567 he was named one of the Council of Regency.

Glencairn, William Cunningham, Earl, or, received, in 1653, a commission from Charles II. to raise troops in his cause in Scotland. After having collected a force of Highlanders, Gloncairn was replaced by General Middleton, who, however, shortly afterwards quitted Scotland, giving place to the original leader.

Glencoe, THE MASSACRE OF (Feb. 13, 1692), has left a dark stain on the reign of William III. The civil war continued to smoulder in the Highlands for several years after the death of Dundee. The management of affairs in Scotland was at this time in the hands of the Dalrymples, and Viscount Stair, their head, was President of the Court of Session, while the younger, the Master of Stair, was Secretary for Scotland. A proclamation was issued promising pardon to all who before Dec. 31, 1691, should swear to live peaceably onder the existing government. MacIan of Glencoe, who dwelt at the mouth of a ravine near the south shore of Lochleven, deemed it a point of honour to take the oath as late as possible. On the appointed day he went to Fort William, but, finding no magistrate there, he had to go to Inverary, which he did not reach until Jan. 6th. This. delay gave his enemies, the Campbells, a pretext for destroying him. Argyle and Breadalbane plotted with the Master of Stair. William was not informed that MacIan had taken the oath at all. An order was laid before him for the commander-in-chief, in which were the words, "It will be proper for the vindication of public justice to extirpate that set of thieves. The excuse usually advanced for William, that he signed the order without reading it, is probably true, but it is at beet a lame one. The order was remorse-

At last, on a given day, the passes having been stopped by previous arrangement, the soldiers fell npon their entertainers. A failure in the plan led to the escape of many. But the houses were destroyed, the cattle stolen, thirty-eight men killed on the spot, and others perished of want or cold on the mountains.

Glendower, Owen, or GLYNDWR; more accurately, GLYNDYFRDWY; called in his own time Owain af Gruffydn (b. 1359?, d. 1416?), was reputed a descendant of Llewelyn, the last native prince of Wales. He inherited considerable estates in Merioneth, and, coming to London, entered one of the Inns of Court, and subsequently became squire to Richard II., by whom he was knighted in 1387. In 1399 he was captured with the king at Flint Castle, but permitted to retire to his own estates. Lord Grey of Ruthin, one of the lords marchers, secured some of his lands, and Owen's appeal to the Parliament was disregarded, and Lord Grey received grants of other possessions belonging to him. In 1400 Owen took up arms, and, assuming the title of Prince of Wales, burnt the town of Ruthin, and, bursting into the marches, destroyed Oswestry and captured several forts. The Welsh, whose agrarian grievances were serious, repaired to him in thousands, and the strong Edwardian castles of Conway, Ruthin, and Hawarden soon fell into his hands. He repulsed three formidable armies led against him by Henry IV. in person, and in 1402 was crowned at Machynlleth. Among the prisoners taken by him was Sir Edmund Mortimer, uncle of the young Earl of March, which led him to enter into a treaty with the Mortimers and Percies having for its object the overthrow of Henry. This alliance was dissolved by the battle of Shrewsbury, but Glendower continued the contest; and official record remains of many acts that prove the reality of his power in Wales. He displaced the Bishop of Bangor, and appointed a partisan of his own; and the Bishop of St. Asaph was his ambassador to the French king, with whom he made a treaty in 1404. Receiving aid from France and Scotland, he captured many English towns and castles, and at one time penetrated with his forces as far as Worcester. In perpetual inroads he harried all the marches in a most merciless way. Twice Henry had some success against him, but was unable to effect his subjugation; and eeveral years after, when about to embark on his expedition against France, he endeavoured to enter into an arrangement with him, offering him free pardon twice. But Owen never submitted, and died in 1415, still maintaining his independence. His objects were the political and ecclesiastical independence of Wales, and the revival of learning by the creation of two national universities. In personal character and disinterestedness of aim he contrasts sharply with his contemporaries.

Glenelg, CHARLES GRANT, LORD (b. 1778, d. 1866), was the eldest son of Mr. Charles Grant, for many years M.P. for Invernesshire. He was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, and entered Parliament as member for Montrose, 1807. He represented Montrose from 1807 to 1818, and Inverness-shire from that date till 1835. From 1819 to 1822 he was Chief Secretary for Ireland; from 1823 to 1827 Vice-President, and from 1827 to 1828 President, of the Board of Trade. From 1830 to 1834 he was President of the Board of Control, and from 1834 to 1839 Secretary to the Colonies. But the Canadian Rebellion of 1838 was fatal to his reputation. He approved of Lord Durham's famous ordinance, the gist of which was that those of the rebels who had acknowledged their guilt and submitted to the Queen's pleasure were to be sent off to Bermuda, but under constraint, and punished with death if they returned. The ordinance was disallowed; Lord Durham was recalled, and Lord Glenelg retired from public life. He was the last of the C igites.

Glenfruin, THE BATTLE OF (1604), was fought in Dumbartonshire, and resulted in a defeat of the Earl of Argyle and the king's forces by the Macgregors and other clans.

Glenlivet, The Battle of (October 4, 1594), was fought near Aberdeen, between the forces of James VI., commanded by the Earl of Argyle, and the rebellious Earls of Huntly and Errol. The rebels were inferior in numbers, but were well armed and well led, and completely defeated Argyle's troops, losing only one man of note, Gordon of Auchendoun, one of the subscribers of the Spanish Blanks. (q.v.).

Glen Malure, THE BATTLE OF (1580), was fought in the Wicklow Mountains. Lord Grey de Wilton here suffered a severe repulse from the Irish septs. Sir Peter Carew, a distinguished officer, was among the slain.

Glenmarreston, The Battle of (Mureston Water, flowing from the Pentland Hills), was fought in 638. Donald Brec, King of Dalriada, was defeated by the Angles.

Gloucester was an old Roman station, deriving its name from the British camp, Caer Gloui. It quickly became a town of the English, for Bede speaks of it as a noble city. In 679 a monastery was founded here, reduced in 1022 hy Bishop Wulfstan to the Benedictine rule. It was a frequent seat of Courts and Gemots. In 1541 it was erected into a bishopric by Henry VIII.; and as such was united in 1836 with the see of Bristol, but disamited again in 1897.

Gloucester, PERRAGE OF. Robert, a natural son of Henry I., was created Earl of Gloucester, 1109, on his marriage with Mabel, daughter and heiress of Robert Fitz-Hamon, lord of Gloucester. His son William, who died 1183, transmitted the title to his three daughters: first, through the youngest, Hawise (or Isabel), to her successive husbands, John, afterwards King of England, and Geoffrey Mandoville, Earl of Essex; then to the issue of her eldest sister, Mabel, who married the Count of Evreux; and finally to the second sister, Amicia, who married Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Hereford. Three generations of the De Clares were Earls of Gloucester, until the widow of the last, Johanna, daughter of Edward I., communicated the honour, during her lifetime, to her second husband, Ralph de Monthermer. On his death, in 1307, the carldom descended to her son, Gilbert de Clare, killed at Bannockburn, whose second sister, Margaret, married Hugh of Andley, created Earl of Gloucester in 1337. At the latter's death, ten years later, the title was presumed to be extinct: it was, however, revived in 1397, in favour of Thomas, Lord Despencer, son of the eldest sister of the before-named Margaret. Thomas was, how-ever degraded in 1399, when his honours became forfeit. In the meanwhile, 1385, a dukedom of Gloucester had been created for Thomas of Woodstock, sixth son of Edward III., who was succeeded by his son Humphrey. The latter died childless in 1399. Afterwards three several princes of the blood were-created dukes by this title, none of whom left issue; namely (1) Humphrey, son of Henry IV., murdered in 1446; (2) Richard, brother of Edward IV., and afterwards king, and (3) Henry, youngest son of Charles I. There was a plan in 1717—18 of reviving the dukedom in favour of George I.'s grandson, Frederick, afterwards Prince of Wales: but this never took effect. Frederick's younger son, William Henry, however, was created Duke of Gloncester and Edinburgh, in 1764, and the peerage lasted until the death, without issue, of this prince's son, William Frederick, in 1834.

Gloucester, ROBERT, EARL OF (d. 1147), natural son of Henry I., was the great supporter of the claims of his half-sister Matilda against Stephen. He married the heiress of Fitz-Hamon, and so added the lordship of Glamorgan to the carldom of Gloucester.

Gloncester, Gilbert De Clare, Earl or (5. 1243), son of Earl Richard, threw himself into the party of Leicester, after his father's death in 1262, but soon held aloof; and though fighting with Montfort at Lewes, quarrelled with the king in the course of 1265, joined Prince Edward, and won the battle of Evecham. He kept on good terms with Edward, whose daughter Johanna he married in 1290. His ordinary capacity, however, rendered him unfit for the great position he aspired to occupy.

Gloucester, RICHAND DE CLARE, EARL OF (d. 1262), the leader of the baronial party under Henry III., acted at first in conjunction with, but afterwards in opposition to, Simon de Montfort. Like the more aristo party of the baronage, he neither under nor sympathized with Montfort's far-rea aims, and never quite forgave his fo. 218. origin.

Gloucester, Gilder De Clare, Earl of (d. 1314), son of Earl Gilbert and Johanna, the daughter of Edward I. He took the side of Gaveston, his brother-in-law, was one of the Lords Ordainers, being elected by co-optation from the royalist side, and endeavoured more than once to prevent civil war. He was slain at Bannockburn. He was the lust of his line, and his estates fell to his three sisters, whose husbands' rivalries take up a great place in the history of Edward II.'s reign.

Gloucester, Thomas or Woodstock, Dukk of (b. 1355, d. 1397), was the youngest son of Edward III. He served in the French wars, and on his return to England in 1381. took a leading part in the affairs of state. The unpopularity of John of Gaunt, caused by his abandoning the traditional policy of the house of Lancaster in favour of a court policy, and his anbsequent absence from England during his fruitless expeditions to Spain, made Gloucester the natural leader of the constitutional opposition. His chief aim seems to have been his own aggrandisement, though the misgovernment and extravagance of the king gave him sufficient excuse for in-terfering. The heavy taxation demanded for the expenses of the French war gave Gloucester the opportunity he desired, and in 1386 he threatened the king with deposition unless he consented to the impeachment of his chief minister, De la Pole, and the appointment of a commission of regency. Richard consented for the time, but attempted, directly Parliament was dissolved, to raise a force and assert his independence. But Gloucester was superior in strength, and the king's friends were either executed or obliged to seek safety in flight. Gloncester was the leading spirit in the Merciless Parliament, and practically ruled the kingdom till 1389, when Richard declared himself of age to manage his own affairs, and assumed the government himself. By John of Gaunt's influence a reconciliation was effected between Gloucester and the king, and matters went on smoothly enough—though Gloncester held somewhat aloct from the court—till 1397, when Richard suspected, it is impossible to say whether justly or not, that Gloucester was plotting against him. The duke was arrested and imprisoned at Calais, where he died, being probably murdered by the king's orders. It is said that before his death he confessed that he had been conspiring against the king.

Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Wallon, Richard II.; Pauli, Englische Geschichte.

Gloucester, Hemphrey, Duke of (b. 1391, d. 1447), was the fourth son of Henry IV. He was created Duke of Gloucester in 1414, and took part in the French wars of Henry V.'s reign, being wounded in the battle of Agincourt. On his death-bed Henry appointed him regent of England during his son's minority, but Parliament refused to allow this, and a council of regency was appointed with Bedford as Protector, and in his absence from England, Gloucester. By his reck. less folly in marrying Jacquelino of Hainault, and prosecuting her claims in Hainault and Zealand, Gloucester did much to alienate the Duke of Burgundy from the English, while his attempts to gain a foreign principality for himself were fruitless. In 1425, Gloucester's quarrel with Beaufort commenced, which continued with temporary reconciliation during the whole of his lifetime. The bright spot in Gloucester's character was his affection for his brother Bedford, who was frequently able to restrain his folly and recklessness. After Bedford's death, his opposition to Beaufort became more and more violent, Gloucester representing the war party, popular in Par-liament and the nation, while Beaufort was the leader of the peace party, which was strongly represented in the Council. It was the old struggle of the court and constitutional parties in another form. The trial and conviction of Eleanor Cobham, his second wife, was a great blow to Gloucester's influence, and this was still further injured when, in 1442, Henry VI. came of age, and the protectorate was at an end. Suffolk supplanted Gloucester as the chief adviser of the crown, and in 1447 Gloucester was accused of treason. The merits of the case it is impossible to decide upon; it is not improbable that Gloucester may have entertained the idea of making himself king, but on this point there is no evidence. At all events, Gloucester was suddenly arrested on Feb. 18, 1447, at Bury St. Edmund's, and placed under arrest, and five days after was found dead in his bed. It is impossible to decide on the cause of his death; it may have anish from chagrin, or have been the work of some person who hoped thereby to ingratiate himself with the court party, or it may (as popular legend asserted), have been caused by the orders of the Duke of Suffolk. It is certain that there is nothing to connect it with Cardinal Beaufort, and there is a strong reason for believing that it arose from natural causes. As a patron of learning, and a benefactor to the University of Oxford, Glovcester deserves high praise, but his public and private career alike are stained with grievous errors, and his influence on English politics was only mischievous. Still, he was popular with the literary men for his patronage of learning, and with the people for his advocacy of a spirited foreign policy. From these causes he was known as the "good Duke Humphrey."

Stubbs, Const. History; Brougham, House of Languager.

Gloucester, HENRY, DUKE OF (b. 1639, d. 1660), was the youngest son of Charles I. and Queen Henrietta Maria. From the place of his birth he is often known as Henry of Oatlands. Charles, just before his execution, had an interview with his young son, in which ho made him promise not to accept the crown from Parliament to the detriment of his elder brothers. After his father's death he remained in the charge of Parliament till 1662, when he was permitted to join his mother in France, Cromwell being anxious to get rid cf one whom many were anxious to proclaim king. The queen exhausted all entreaties and threats to induce him to become a Romanist, but he remained staunch to his religion; and in 1654 left her and joined Charles at Cologne. In 1658 he fought in the Spanish army, and distinguished him-self in the battle of Dunkirk. On the Restoration he returned to England, but died of small-pox very shortly afterwards.

Gloncester, William, Duke of (b. July 24, 1689, d. July 30, 1700), was the son of Prince George of Deumark and Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne. He was informally created duke soon after his birth. The untimely death of the young prince—a boy of great promise—was received with sorrow by the nation. It necessitated the passing of the Act of Settlement.

Gloncester, Eleanor Bohun, Duchess of (d. 1399), was the daughter and co-heiress of Humphrey, Earl of Northampton, Hereford, and Essex. She was married to Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, after where death, in 1397, she retired to the abboy of Barking.

Gloncester, Robert or, is known as the writer of a Chronicle in English verse more interesting from a literary than an historical point of view. It extends from the earliest times to the year 1270, and is mostly a compilation from well-known sources, though it contains original notices here and there. It was printed by Hearne.

Glynne, John (b. 1603, d. 1663), eldest son of Sir William Glynne, of Carnarvonshire, was educated at Westminster School and at Oxford, attained great reputation as a lawyer, and represented Westminster in the Long Parliament. He was a strong Presbyterian, took a prominent part in the attack on the bishops, helped to draw up the charge against Laud, and to conduct the trial of Strafford In June, 1647, he was one of the members whose punishment was domanded by the army, and was expelled from Parliament till the summer of 1648, when he was restored, only to be expelled again by Pride's Purge. Ho sat in both of Cromwoll's Parliaments, presided at Penruddocke's trial (1655), and supported the offer of the crown to the Protector. In July, 1655, he became Chief Justice, and held the post till the fall of Richard Cromwell, when he resigned. Ho assisted in promoting the Restoration, and on the return of Charles II. was made king's serjeant and knighted. Ho was employed in the prosecution of the regicides, and took part in Vano's trial. Public opinion condemned him as a renegade, and rejoiced in an accident which befell him on the day of the coronation. "Serjeant Glynne's horse," says Pcpys, "fell upon him yesterday, and is like to kill him, which people do please themselves to see how just God is to punish the rogue at such a time as this." He died on Nov. 15, 1666, continuing to practice his profession till his

Fone, Judges.

Godfrey, Sir Edmundbury (d. 1678), was a London magistrate, before whom Titus Oates made a deposition concerning the Popish Plot. Some three weeks after this deposition was made, Godfrey was feund dead in a ditch near Primrose Hill, with his own sword run through his body, a livid crease round his neck, and his pockets unrified. It was at once assumed that he had been murdered by Roman Catholics, and Lord Macaulay considers it most probable that he was really murdered by some hot-headed Romanist. Three of the queen's servants were tried for the murder, and executed. The Popish Plot agitation really began in the excitement which Godfrey's murder caused.

Godfrey (GUTREED) Hac William (d. 1212), was the son of Donald Bane MacWilliam, and, like his father, attempted, in 1211, to wrest the Scottish crown from William the Lion: The royal troops under the Earls of Athole and Fife achieved various successes, but the rebellion was not crushed until Godfrey was betrayed into the hands of the Earl of Buchan and beheaded at Kincardine (1212).

Godolphin, Sydney, Lord, afterwards Earl (b. 1645, d. 1712), was educated as a page at Whitehall. He held various offices at the Court of Charles II., including that of Groom of the Bedchamber, and sat in Parliament for Helston. In 1678 he was sent as envoy to Holland, and on his return was sworn of the Privy Coun. Il. In 1679 he was placed on the Treasury Commission. In 1680 he supported the Exclusion Bill, and persuaded Charles to dismiss the Duke of York to Scotland before Parliament met.

He became Secretary of State in 1684, and in the same year, on the resignation of Rochester, ho took his place on the Commission of the Treasury. On the accession of James, ho was removed from the Treasury, and made Chamberlain to the queen. In his official capacity he did not scruple to conform to Roman Catholic observances. In 1687, on the fall of the Hydes, he was again placed on the Treasury Commission. He was sent as a commissioner to treat with William. On the accession of William and Mary, the Treasury business was placed in his hands. In 1690 he resigned, but was recalled as First Commissioner against the will of Carmarthen. He had a large share of William's confidence, but, influenced by Marlborough, he intrigued with the Jacobites, especially with Middleton, James's Secretary of State. He was implicated in the confession of Sir John Fenwick; but William, with great magnanimity, ignored the charges brought against him. But the Whigs resolved to drive him from office, and were successful. In 1700 he was recalled to the king's councils; but in the fall of his party, in the last year of William's reign, he was again dismissed. On the accession of Anne he was made Lord Treesurer, through the influence of Marlborough, whose daughter had married Godolphin's eldest son. In 1708, Godolphin, seeing that his attempt at a composite ministry was a failure, determined to join the Whigs. He was compelled to dis-miss Harley and the moderate Tories. For the rest of his administration Godolphin was nnder the rule of the Whig Junto. In 1710, Godolphin agreed to Sunderland's advice, and impeached Sacheverell. The popular outery proved that the queen and the Tories might venture to upset the ministry. Without consulting him, Shrewsbury was made Lord Chamberlain. Godolphin swallowed the insult; but the dismissal of Sunderland was shortly followed by his own. During the tamult that followed Sacheverell's trial, both he and Marlborough intrigued with the Jacobite court at St. Germains. His character is thus described by Macaulay:—"He was laborious, clear-headed, and profoundly versed in the details of finance. Every government, therefore, found him a useful servant; and there was nothing in his opinions or in his character which could prevent him from serving any government."

Godwin (Godwine), Earl (b. circs 990, d. 1053), was, according to the most probable account, the son of Wulfnoth, the South Saxon who was outlawed in 1009. Of his early life nothing certain is known, but in 1018 we find him created an earl by Canute, and shortly after marrying the king's niece Gytha. In 1020 he was made Earl of the West Saxons, probably as a reward for his

ol on in services in the northern wars of Canute. On the death of that king he espoused the cause of Hardicanute, and on the latter obtaining Wossex Godwin became one of the chief advisers of Elama, who acted us regent. It was at this time that Alfred the son of Ethelred came to England, and was murdered by Harold. It seems impossible in the face of the evidence of contemporary writers to doubt that Godwin betrayed the young Etheling to Harold, though the accusation of complicity in Alfred's death, which was brought against Godwin in 1040, resulted in the acquittal of the earl, and Godwin continued in power. On the death of Hardicanute in 1042 Godwin was feremost in procuring the election of Edward the Confessor to the throne, and during the early part of the reign of that prince he excreised the chief power in the kingdem. His daughter was married to the king, and his sons promoted to earldoms. During this period (1043-1051) we find Godwin leading the national English party, and strenuously opposing that introduction of foreigners which was the great weakness of Edward's reign. But the Normans were too strong for him; "the appointment of Robert of Jumièges to the archbishoprie of Canterbury marks the decline of Godwin's power; the foreign influence was now at its height, and the English earl was to feel the strength of it." The refusal of Godwin to punish the burgesses of Dover for the riot occasioned by the insolence of the followers of Eustace of Boulogne led to the outlawry of Godwin and his family (1051). The next year the tide turned; the feeling of the nation showed itself in favour of Godwin. He came back from his shelter in Flanders at the head of a fleet. In most parts of England he was welcomed; he sailed up the Thames to London: the army gathered by the king refused to fight against him; and he and his family were restored to all their offices and possessions. The next year Godwin was smitten with a fit at the king's table, and died April 15, 1053. Mr. Freeman regards Godwin as the representative of all English feeling, as the leader of every national movement, and as enjoying in consequence an extreme popularity. But he was also a wise and wary statesman, able to practise the baser as well as the nobler arts of statesmanship. His vast wealth suggests a covetous disposition. He promoted his sons without much care for their deserts. But as a strong position. man and a vigorous ruler he was of the type of which England had at that time the greatest need.

Goffe (or Gough), WILLIAM, was sonin-law to Colonel Whalley, and consequently connected with Cromwell, to whom he was strongly attached. He fought in the Parliamentary army, was one of the members of the High Court of Justice, and signed the warrant for Charles I.'s oxecution. He accompanied Cromwell to Scotland in 1651. assisted in Pride's Purge, and in clearing out the Barbones Parliament. He was one of the major-generals appointed in 1656, and one of the members of Cromwell's House of Lords. He was one of the few officers in favour of Cromwell's assuming the title of king, and attached himself subsequently to Hichard Cromwell. On the Restoration he field with Whaliey to America, where he remained during the rest of his life.

Golab Singh, originally a running footman, attracted the attention of Runject Singh and rose to favour. He was given the territory of Juminoo, lying between Lahore and Cashmere. As a Rajpoot, he was detested by the Sikhs. On the death of Runject Singh, 1839, he aimed at becoming supreme in Cashmere, and oven engaged in a war with Thibet. At the end of the first Sikh war the principality of Cashmere was sold to him by the English (1840). A formidable opposition was organised against him, which was with difficulty suppressed by Major Henry Lawrence. "The arrangement," says Mr. Cunningham, "was a dexterous one, if reference be had only to the policy of reducing the power of the Sikhs; but the transaction seems hardly worthy of the British name and greatness."

Goodman, Cardell, was a Jacobite adventurer in the reign of William III. He had been an actor, a paramour of the Duchess of Clevoland, two of whose children he had attempted to poison, and a forger of bank notes. In 1695 he was confined to gaol for raising a Jacobite riot in London, in conjunction with Porter. He was one of the conspirators in the Assassination Plot, and as his evidence could procure the conviction of Sir John Fenwick, efforts were made to get him out of the country. An adventurer named O'Brien met him in a tavern in Drury Lane, and persuaded him to go abroad by offering him an annuity of £500. This ho accepted, and arrived safely at St. Germains.

Good Parliament, The (1376), gained its title from the beneficent measures it passed and its bold attitude in reforming abuses. Edward III., old before his time, was entirely under the influence of a worthless woman, Alice Perrers, through whose means John of Gaunt contrived to appropriate to himself the whole of the royal authority, and to appoint his own creatures to all the great offices of state. The Parliament which met in 1376, after an interval of three years, determined to do away with this state of things, and in this resolution they were strongly supported by the Black Prince. Peter de la Mare was chosen Speaker, and he at once demanded that the national accounts should be audited, and that trustworthy counsellors and ministers should be appointed. The Commons next proceeded to accuse certain persons—of whom the chief were Lord Latimer and Richard Lyons-of malveration and fraud, and they were con-demned to imprisonment and forfeiture. This is the first instance of impeachment. Alice Perrers was next attacked, and it was ordered that henceforward no woman should interfere in the administration of justice, on pain of forfeiture. The Black Prince having died in the meantime, the Parliament demanded that his son Richard should be brought before them, that they might see the heir to the throne. which was intended to checkmate John of Gaunt, who was supposed to be aspiring to the throne, was forthwith done. The Commons also proposed that an administrative council should be appointed, some of whom were always to be in attendance on the king; this, with certain modifications, was agreed to. But besides these acts, they presented to the king no less than a hundred and forty petitions on various subjects, of which the most important were that Parliaments might be held annually; that the knights of the shire should be freely elected, not merely nominated by the sheriff; the sheriffs should be elected, and not appointed at the Exchequer; the law courts should be reformed; the abuse of Papal provisions, &c., should be removed. The work of the Good Parliament could be carried out only under the leadership of some powerful personage, such as the Black Prince. Now that he was dead, the power passed once more into the hands of John of Gaunt, who immediately undid the work of the Parliament. Not one of the petitions became a statute. Alice Perrers regained her place and influence at court. Lyons and other offenders were par-doned, Peter de la Mare was sent to prison, and the new members of the Council were dismissed. But though the work of the Good Parliament was for the time rendered nugatory, the year 1376 forms, nevertheless, an important epoch in the history of Parliament. The responsibility of ministers, the rights of impeachment and of inquiry into grievances and abuses, were established, and were destined to receive extension and confirmation in the next reign.

Goodrich, Thomas, Lord Chancellor of England (d. 1554), made Bishop of Ely by Henry VIII., was a staunch supporter of the Reformation. In December, 1551, he succeeded Sir Richard Rich as Lord Chancellor, and in that capacity was induced, after much solicitation, to set the Great Seal to the patent altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey. He continued to support

Northumberland until he saw that the cause was lost, when he at once resigned his office and retired to his diocese, where, says Lord Campbell, "partly from his sacred character and partly from his real insignificance, he was not molested."

Goorkha War (1814 - 1816). The Goorkhas had encroached continually on the British frontier, and at last laid claim to two districts, Bootwul and Sheoraj, which they had seized, though they had been ceded to Lord Wellesley in the year 1801 by the Nabob. Lord Minto remonstrated with them, and on their refusal to retire, Lord Hastings, his successor, ordered their expulsion. Money was obtained from the Vixier, and four armies were prepared, comprising 30,000 men, with 60 guns. The Goorkhas were divided into three; onethird, under Umur Singh, guarded the fortresses on the Sutlej; two thousand were distributed between the Jumna and Kalee; the rest protected the capital. The English at first met with nothing but disaster. Kalunga was taken with great loss, and the Dhoon valley occupied, but the fortress of Jyetuk stopped the advance of the division altogether. The divisions of Generals Wood and Marley failed entirely, the one to capture Jeetgurh, the other to reach the capital. These disasters were somewhat retrieved by the brilliant success of General Ochterlony, who was entrusted with the difficult task of dislodging Umur Singh from the forts on the Upper Sutlej. After an extremely arduous campaign he succeeded in confining Umur Singh to the fortress of Malown, and in finally compelling him to make terms, which included the surrender of the fortress of Malown and all conquests west of the Kalee. This was facilitated by the operations of Colonels Gardner and Nicolls, who, with a body of irregular horse and 2,000 regulars, had cleared the province of Kumaon, and captured its capital, Almorah, thus isolating Umur Singh from Nepaul and Khatmandu. The discomfiture of their ablest general and loss of their most valuable conquests, induced the Nepaulese government to sue for peace. The conditions proposed by Lord Hastings were that they should resign all claims on the hill rajahs west of the Kalee, cede the Terrai, restore the territory of Sikkim, and receive a British Resident. The treaty was agreed to on December 2, 1816, but the influence of Umur Singh and the other chiefs induced the Goorkha government to break it, and it required another campaign under Sir David Ochteriony, and a complete rout at Muk-wanpore, before peace was finally concluded, March 2, 1816.

Gordon, Chas. Geo. (b. 28th Jan., 1833, d. 26th Jan., 1885), received his commission in the Royai Engineers in 1852, and saw service in the Crimea. In 1862, as commander of the Ever-Victorious Army, he suppressed the for-midable Tai-ping rebellion in China. In 1874 he was appointed governor of the tribes in the Soudan by the Khedive of Egypt, and signalised his two years of office by putting down the slave trade, an object to which he again addressed himseif when, in 1877, he became Governortieneral of the Sondan and the Equatorial Provinces. In 1882 he was appointed commanderin-chief of the Cape forces; and in 1884 was sent to Khartoum to bring away from the Soudan several garrisons that were homined in by the followers of the Mahdi. He was, however, himself shot in the city of Khartoum, and the arant couriers of the relief expedition arrived only to find that the city had fallen, and that its heroic defender was slain (Feb. 26, Mis saintliness and fearlessness and strange influence over men make him one of the most striking figures in modern history.

Gordon, THE FAMILY OF. The origin of this great Scottish house is extremely obscure. The first prominent bearer of the name was Sir Adam Gordon, Justiciar of Lothian under Edward I. (1305). His adhesion to Bruco gave him estates in the north that transferred the chief seat of the house from the Merse to Decside and the Spey valley. The direct male line died out in 1402; but from his female and illegitimate descendants a large circle of Gordons sprang up. His grandson was made Earl of Huntly (1445), a peerage which, oie-vated to a marquisate in 1599, and a dukedom (of Gordon) in 1684, became extinct in 1836. But the title of Marquis of Huntiy passed to another branch of the family, who had acquired the titie of Viscount Melgund and Aboyne in the year 1627, and Earl of Aboyne in 1660. Other peerages in the family were-the earldom of Sutherland (1512), the barony of Lochinvar and viscounty of Kenmure (1633)—in abeyance since 1847—and the earldom of Aberdeen (1682), belonging to a collateral branch traceable from the fifteenth century.

Gordon, Genealogical Hist. of the House of Gordon.

Gordon, Lady Catherine, was a daughter of the Earl of Huntly, and, on her mother's side, a cousin of James IV., by whom she was married to Perkin Warbeck. Taken prisoner by Henry VII., with her husband, she became a attendant to his queen, and afterwards married Sir M. Cradock.

Gordon, Sir John (d. 1562), was the fourth son of the fourth Earl of Huntly. He was one of the numerous suitors of Mary Queen of Scots, whose favour, however, he lost on the occasion of a brawl in the streets of Edinburgh. He was beheaded at Aberdeen for treason in 1562.

Gordon Biots, THE (June, 1780), were the most formldable popular rising of the eighteenth century. In 1778 a bill, brought in by Sir George Savile and Dunning, for the relaxation of some of the harsher penal laws against Catholics, passed almost unanimously through both Houses. Protestant associations were formed in Scotland; a leader was found in Lord George Gordon, a son of the Duke of Gordon, a silly young man of twenty-eight. years of age; and the agitation spread to-England. On June 2nd, 1780, a body of 50,000 persons met in St. George's Fields to petition for the repeal of the Catholic Relief Act. The mob forced their way into the lobby of the House, and, continually encouraged by Lord George Gordon, prevented the conduct of business. The House adjourned till Tuesday the 6th. The mob dispersed; but only to begin their work of destruction by demolishing the chapels of the Sardinian and Bavarian ministers. In the evening of the next day the mob renewed their ravages in Moorfields. On Sunday, the 4th, they proceeded to worse extremities. The next day the mob attacked the house of Sir George Savile, which was carried and pillaged. The alarm spread. Burke had to leave his own house and take refuge with General Burgoyne; and Lord George Gordon himself saw that the riots were proceeding too violently, and disavowed his old friends. On the 6th the Houses met after their adjournment. A motion was passed that the petitions should be considered " as soon as the tumults subside which are now subsisting." On the very same evening, one detachment of the rioters broke open Newgate and released the prisoners; others were meanwhile releasing, in the same violent way, the malefactors at Clerkenwell. Towards midnight the rioters burnt Lord Mansfield's house in Bloomsbury Square, with its priceless library, the occupants barely escaping. The magistrates did not venture to read the Riot Act; and the Guards would not act until this formality had been gone through. On the 7th the king called a Council, and showed, as usual, that where courage was required he would not be wanting. The cabinet wavered on the right of the troops to interfere until the Riot Act had been read; but the Attorney-General, Wedderburn, disposed of this difficulty, and the king insisted on prompt action. A proclamation was issued, warning all housebolders to close their houses and keep within doors; and orders were given to the military to act without waiting for directions from the civil magistrates. diers everywhere drove the rioters before them: but in some cases it was necessary to resort to the use of musketry. The returns sent in show that 200 persons were shot dead, while 250 more were lying wounded in the hospitals, and still more were no doubt carried away and concealed by their friends. On Thursday morning the plunder and confiagrations were completely at an end. One hundred and thirty-five of the rioters were arrested; twenty-one were executed. Lord tieorge Gordon subsequently became a convert to Judaism, and died in Newgate in 1793, having been convicted for libel in 1787.

Gorges, Sin FERDINANDO, was one of the supporters of Essex in his rebellion of 1601. He saved his life by releasing the ministers whom the earl had taken prisoner, and by appearing as a witness of the trial. He died in 1647.

Goring, Gronor, Lond, afterwards Earl of Norwich, a Royalist partisan who betrayed the Army Plot to Pym, but who got command of Portsmouth, which he held valiantly for Charles I. Afterwards he commanded the Royalist army in the south-west, and attempted to capture Taunton. He joined the second Civil War, and on the capture of Colchester was tried and found guilty by resolution of the House of Commons, but saved from execution by the casting vote of the Speaker.

Gorsipred, or compaternity, is a widespread custom amongst the Irish. The extremely strong feelings of attachment arising from it were among the most powerful agents in completely denationalising the Norman invaders. The Statute of Kilkenny, 1367, made it high treason to enter into take relation of godfather with natives, but exemptions were very often granted.

Gorst, The Right Hox. Sin John Eldon (b. 1836), after a distinguished career at Cambridge was for a time (1861-63) Civil Commissioner of Waikato, New Zealand. Called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1865, he took silk in 1875, and in 1886 was appointed Solicitor-General. In 1886 he became Under-Secretary for India, and in 1890 was sworn of the Privy Council. He was Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1891-92; in 1895 he accepted the Vice-Presidency of the Council, which post he vacated in 1902 on retiring from the Board of Education.

Goschen, George Joachin, first Viscount (b. 1831, d. 1907), was educated at Rugby and Oriel College, Oxford. Elected one of the members for the City of London in 1863, he became Vice-President of the Board of Trade in 1865, and in 1866 entered the Cabinet as Chancellor of the Duchy. In 1868 he was appointed President of the Board of Trade, and in 1871 First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1880-81, as Amhasendor-Extraordinary to the Porte, he effected the settlement of the Greek and Montenerrin frontier questions. His tenure of the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer (1887-92) was signalised by a measure for the conversion of the National Debt. From 1895-1900 he was First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1.00 he retired, being raised to the peerage as Lord Goschen of Hawkhurst, in Kent.

Gough, Huoh, Viscount (b. 1779, d. 1869), entered the army, and distinguished himself on many occasions during the Peninsular War. In 1837 he commanded the English army in the Chinese War, and achieved the capture of Canton. For his services he was created a baroust. In 1843 he was appointed commander-in-chief in India. He commanded during the first Sikh War, and for his services was created Baron Gough. He also commanded during the second Sikh War, and his crowning victory of Guserat was rewarded with a viscounty.

Goulburn, Hanny (b. 1784, d. 1856), was elected member for Horsham in 1807 in 1810 he was made Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, At the general election of 1812 he was elected for St. Germans. From 1812-21 he was appointed Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. He accepted the post of Chief Secretary for Ireland in 1821, and held that office until 1828, when he became Chancellor of the Exchequer. He went out of office in 1830, was elected member for Oxford University in 1831, and in December, 1834, was appointed Home Secretazy. In 1839 he was proposed as Speaker of the House of Commons, but the Whigs carried Mr. Shaw Lefevre. In 1841 he was again Ol. acellor of Exchequer. He retired with 3 P. Ped in 1846, and from that time took ac to y waive part in politics.

ven), d. 1584, was the leader in the Raid of Ruthven, for which act of midence by obtained an indemnity, 1582. On the count of his party, 1583, he was induced by takes promises of pardon to write a letter to the king confessing his guilt. On this evidence he was executed at Stirling, May, 1584.

Goverie, The Earl of the son of the preceding, joined with his brother in the Gowria Conspiracy, 1300, to kidnap King James VI.; in the struggle which ensued he was killed by Si. Thomas Erskine, a retainer of the king. He was Provost of Porth, and very popular with the citizens, who threatened to make the "king's green coat pay for their provost."

Gowrie Conspiracy, The (1600), is a name given to a somewhat mysterious affair which happened during the reign of James VI. of Scotland. On August 5, 1600, while the king was hunting in Falkland Park in Fifeshire he was met by Alexander Ruthven (brother of the Earl of Gowrie) who invited him to Gowrie House near Perth, saying that he had caught a Jesuit with a large sum of money in his possession. James being in need of money accepted the invitation, and after dinner went with Alexander Ruthven alone, to interrogate the captive. Instead of a prisoner, however, he found an armed retainer of the earl, named Henderson; Ruthven at once told the king he was a prisoner, reminding him of his father's (Lord Gowrie) execution in 1584. James, however, managed to raise an alarm in spite of Ruthven's efforts to stab him, and his attendants hastened to his assistance. Sir John Ramsay, his page, forced his way up a stair to the turret where the struggle was going on, and stabbed Ruthven twice; the conspirator, and his brether, Lord Gowrie, being subsequently despatched by Sir Thomas Erskino and Sir Hugh Herries. The king had considerable difficulty in escaping from Gowrie House, as the citizens of Perth, with whom Gowrie was very popular, wished to put him to death. It was said at the time by the king's enemies that the whole affair had been arranged by James, who wished to get rid of the Ruthvens, but subsequent evidence proved that there had been a conspiracy between Lord Gowrie, his brother and Robert Logan, to seize or kill the king. It is said that Elizabeth was privy to the scheme. Burton, History of Scotland.

Grace, ME Acr of (May 20, 1690), was issued by William III., and as such was received with peculiar marks of respect, and read only once in the Lords and once in the Commous. It excepted from its operations the survivors of the High Court of Justice which had set on Charles I., and his two nameless executioners. "With these exceptions, all political offences committed before the day on which the royal signature was affixed to the Act, were covered in general oblivion." This Act was opposed by the more violent Whigs because, they said, it had completely refuted his declaration; but it is, as Macaulay remarks, "one of his noblest and purest titles to renown."

Statutes of the Realm; Burnet, Hist, of His Own Time; Macaulay, Hist, of Eng.

Graces, THE. In 1628, the government of Ireland being greatly embarrassed by James I.'s prodigality, an arrangement was concluded, by which, in return for the Voluntary Aids, Lord Falkland, as Lord Deputy, granted, in the king's name, some fifty-one "graces" or concessions. The most important were: (1) Recusants to be allowed to practice in courts of law, and to sue for livery of their lands in the Court of Wards, on taking the oath of allegiance only; (2) the claims of the crown to land to be limited by a prescription of sixty years; (3) inhabitants of Counaught to be permitted to make a new encolment of their title-deeds; (4) a Parliament to be held at once to confirm these "graces." A Parliament was indeed held, but being called by Lord Falkland in defiance of l'eynings' Law, its acts were considered null and void by the English Council. In 1634 Strafford, Falkland's successor, promised, if Parliament voted a subsidy in its first session, to hold a second one for considering the "graces." He broke his promise and declared that the most important could not be conceded. When the system of "Thorough" broke down in England, a deputation went over to England and got all its requests granted by Charles I., 1641, but of course the Parliament was not beund thereby.

Strofford Papers; Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., 1603-

Grafton, Augustus Henry, 3nd Duke of (b. 1735, d. 1811), son of the second duke, after being educated at Westminster and Peterhouse, Cambridge, succeeded his father at the age of 22. He attached himself to the Whigs, and was one of the three peers who, for their independence in censuring Bute's peace with France in 1763, were dismissed from their lord-lieutenancies. When the Marquis of Rockingham came into office in 1765, the duke was appointed one of the Secretaries of State, but resigned in the following May, having become a disciple of Pitt. When the ministry resigned a few months later, the duke was appointed First Lord of the Treasury, while Pitt nominally received for himself the Privy Seal only, but was in fact Prime Minister. The duke did, was in fact Prime Minister. The duke did, however, become really Premier, when Chatham fell ill and retired from active business; and so he continued until January, 1770, when he retired and made way for Lord North, after being outvoted in his own cabinet. On the retirement of Lord Weymouth, and the death of Lord Halifax, the duke "was induced to accept the Privy Seal, but, with a kind of proud humility, refused a seat in the cabinet of Lord North;" but in October, 1775, as he could not convince his colleagues of the need of conciliating America, he resigned. He then joined his old leader, Lord Chatham, in his protests against the policy of the government in America. The duke remained in opposition during the remainder of Lord North's tenure of office. He was appointed Privy Seal when Lord Rockingham took office in 1782. On the succession of Shelburne to the premiership, he did not resign, but distrusted the new Premier. Soon after this he retired from polities to the quiet enjoyment of field sports, which had always occupied most of his thoughts. Eventually he became a Univarian and wrote in favour of revising the Liturgy. He is best known to posterity from the striking though exaggerated picture drawn of him by the powerful pen of "Junius," whose chief victim he was. A man of promise and ability, endowed with fortune and high position, upright and disinterested in his public conduct, the Duke of Grafton was yet a failure. He was wanting in application, and was both vacillating and obstinate. The conspicuous manner, too, in which he paraded his personal immorality gave offence even to his lax age.

Graham, SIR JAMES ROBERT GRORGE (6 1792, d. 1861), son of Sir James Graham, of Netherby, entered Parliament in 1818 for Hull. In 1824 he succeeded to the baronetcy, and being returned in 1826 for Carlisle, soon became prominent on the Whig side. On the formation of Earl Grey's ministry, he was made First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1834 he retired from Lord Grey's cabinet owing to the dissensions in it about the Irish Church question, and with a small party of friends formed an intermediate party known by the sportive title of the "Derby Dilly" (q.v.). In 1841 he accepted office under Sir Robert Peel, as Home Secretary. He was exposed to an attack of extraordinary bitterness in consequence of his ordering the correspondence of Mazzini to be opened at the Post Office (1844). The way in which he dealt with the question of the Scotch Church, and at the crisis of the Disruption, produced a most exasperated feeling against him in Scotland. He supported Peel during the crisis produced by the repeal of the Corn Laws; and in 1852 he was appointed, by Lord Aberdeen, First Lord of the Admiralty. Sir James incurred in this more unpopularity than in sny former tenure of office. He underrated both the charges and responsibilities of the war. Sir Charles Napier's failure in the Baltic and quarrel with the Admiralty damaged Graham's reputation, and he resigned.

Graham, John of Claverhouse, Vis-COUNT DUNDER (d. 1689), was the captain in a troop of horse employed in coercing the Covenanters and Cameronians in the latter part of Charles II.'s reign, and that of his successor. His cruelty made him specially hateful to the rebels. He was defeated by the Cameronians at Drumclog (June, 1679), but subsequently had a large share in Monmouth's victory over them at Bothwell Bridge, a few days later. In 1688 he was made a peer. Claverhouse was at the head of the opposi-tion to William III.'s accession in Scotland, and after vainly trying to interrupt the work of the Convention of Estates, he retired to the Highlands and raised a body of troops there for King James. On June 17, 1689, he defeated Mackay at the pass of Killiecrankie, but was himself killed in the battle.

Graham, Sir Robert, was the uncle of Malise Graham, Earl of Strathern, and the chief conspirator against James I. On Feb. 20, 1436-7, he led a band of 300 men to the abbey of Black Friars, at Perth, where the king was residing, and slew him with his own hand. The indignation aroused by this crime was so great, that all the conspirators were speedily brought to justice, Sir Robert Graham being tortured to death at Stirling.

Grammont, PHILIBERT, CONTEDE (5. 1621, d. 1707), a French noble, was for a long time one of the most brilliant and characteristic members of the court of Charles II., and his memoirs, which have been written by his brother-in-law, Anthony Hamilton, give a lively picture of the licence allowed by that monarch amongst his courtiers. [HAMILTON].

Granby, John Manners, Marquis of b. 1721, d. 1770), British general, was the eldest son of the third Duke of Rutland. In 1759 he went to Germany as second in command to Lord George Sackville. After the battle of Minden, for his conduct in which he was thanked, he was made commander-inchief, and greatly distinguished himself.

Grand Alliance, The, was the name given to the alliance between England, Holland, and the Empire, concluded at the Hague, Sept. 7, 1701. The treaty declared the desirability of compensating the Emperor for the loss of Spain, and of providing for the security of England and itolland. As, however, William could not at the moment be sure of energetic support in England, he pledged himself, in case the overture of the allies were rejected by France, only to attempt to conquer Milan for Austria, and the barrier fortresses for Holland. The alliance was afterwards joined by Prussia, Jan. 20, 1702; by Portugal, May, 16, 1703; and by Savoy, Oct. 25, 1703; and its object became the conquest of all the Spanish Empire, and especially of Spain itself. Grantham, THE FIGHT OF (March, 1643), was the result of an invasion of Lincolnshire by a Royalist force under Charles Cavendiah. They took Grantham, a garrison of the Association, with 300 prisoners, arms and ammunition.

Granville, George Leveson Gower, Earl (b. 1815, d. 1891), was first elected M.P. in 1836. In 1840 he became Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He acted on Liberal principles, and was a consistent supporter of Free Trade. In 1846 he succeeded to the peerage. In 1848 he was appointed Vice-President of the Board of Trade; in 1851 obtained a seat in the cabinet, and in December of that year succeeded Lord Palmerston as Foreign Secretary, retiring with the Russell ministry in 1852. He was appointed President of the Council in 1853, and in 1855 undertook the leadership of the House of Lords. He was re-appointed President of the Council in 1859 in Lord Palmerston's second ministry. In December, 1868, he accepted office under Mr. Gladstone as Colonial Secretary, and retained that position till July, 1870, when he succeeded the Earl of Clarendon as Secretary fer Foreign Affairs, which position he occupied till 1874. He became Foreign Secretary again on the accession of the Liberal party to power in 1880, and Colonial Secretary in 1886.

Granville, John Carteret, Earl (1690-1763), eldest son of George, Lord Carteret, early distinguished himself in the House of Lords by his defence of Whig doctrines and the Revolution settlement. In 1719 he was sent as ambassador to Sweden. In 1721 he was made Secretary of State, and in 1724 Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which office he filled with great success. In 1730 he returned and became one of the most formidable opponents of Walpole. On the fall of that minister he became Secretary of State (Feb., 1742). He, however, resigned office in 1744 (Nov. 23). He unsuccessfully attempted to form a ministry in company with Lord Bath in 1746. He succeeded to the earldom of Granville in 1744, and was appointed President of the Council in 1751. Granville was a man of brilliant genius, and an accomplished scholar; but he was somewhat deficient in steadiness of purpose and judgment.

Grattan, HENRY (b. 1746, d. 1820), was born in Dublin, and cducated at Trinity College. In 1772 he was called to the Irish par; but practice did not flow in, and, in 1775, he was raised to a mere congenial sphere by his return to Parliament for Charlemont. He at once joined the Opposition, and acquired almost unprecedented popularity by drawing up the Irish Declara-tion of Rights. He was the leading orator of the party whose success secured the repeal of Poynings' Act and the legislative independence of Ireland. In 1785 it was proposed that "the Irish legislature should from time to time adopt all such Acts of the British Parliament as related to commerce." The popularity of Flood for a time had almost eclipsed Grattan's, but his successful opposition to this measure quite restored him to extreme popularity. In 1790 he was elected to repre-sent the city of Dublin. During the unhappy period between 1790 and 1800, Grattan urged the government to adopt a conciliatory policy, and he was strongly in favour of granting the claims of the Catholics. On the question of the Union, he held consistently to his old wish to see Ireland independent, and consequently did his utmost to prevent the passing of that measure. It was of no avail; and, in 1805, he was returned to the British Parliament as M.P. for Malton, and he afterwards represented his old constituents of Dublin. His oratory was as brilliant as ever, but his views had become more moderate; and he did not escape the suspicion of having abandoned his old patriotism under the influence of flattery from high quarters. The suspicion was groundless. His old ideal of an independent Ireland had been swept away by the Union, in spite of his strenuous resistance; but the policy which held the next place in his heart—Catholic Emancipation—seems to have become a more and more engrossing passion, and he never ceazed during the time when he sat in the English Parliament to advocate that measure. On June 4, 1820, he died in London. "Mr. Grattan's," said Sir James Mackintosh, in proposing a public funeral, "was a case without alloy; the purity of his life was the brightness of his glory. He was as eminent in his observance of all the duties of private life as he was heroic in the discharge of his public ones."

Gravelines, The Battle of (1558), resulted in a victory for Count Egmont and the Imperial forces over the French. The English navy, under Lord Clinton, had some share in it, and thus wiped out in some degree the disgrace of the loss of Calais.

Graves. Thomas, Lord (b. 1725, d. 1802), served successively as Geverner of Newfoundland and rear-admiral in command of the American station (1780). He brought De Grasse to a partial engagement in September, 1781. In the naval engagement off Ushant (June 1, 1794) he was second in command to Lord Howe, and was rewarded with an Irish peerage and a pension.

Gray, Patrick (the Master of Gray), was educated in France, whence he returned to Scotland (1581), and speedily became a avourite of James VI. He was sent on a mission to Elizabeth, to whom he is said to have revealed many of the secrets of Mary Queen of Scots; and while at the English court concerted measures for the ruin of Arran, which he accomplished on his return to Scotland (1585). In the following year he was sent, in company with Sir Robert Melville, to intercede for Queen Mary, whose cause, however, he is not likely to have aided by the private intimation which he is said to have given to Elizabeth that James was, in reality, in no way averse to his mother's execution.

Gray, or Grey, John DE (d. 1214), was one of King John's ministers. In 1200 the king gave him the bishopric of Norwich, and in 1205 John caused him to be elected Archbishop of Canterbury. But the Pope refused to confirm the election, and appointed Stephen Langton in his stead. In 1210 he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ircland, an office which he held till 1213. In 1214 he was sent to Rome on an embassy to the Pope, and while returning to England died at Poietiers.

Gray, or Grey, WALTER DE (d. 1255), was the nepher of John de Grey. He was Chancellor from 1205 to 1213, in which latter year, while on a mission to Flanders, he was superseded by Peter des Roches, but reinstated in 1214. During John's struggle with the barons, he supported the king, who rewarded him with the archbishopric of York. He devoted himself to the administration of his see, and we only meet with him once more, in 1242, when he was appointed regent during Henry III.'s absence in France.

Great Britain, a name originally applied to the whole island of Britain, to distinguish it from Britannia Minor, or Britanny, and often used in poetry or exalted prose, but never for official purposes until after the accession of James I. The Lords of the Congregation, in 1559, had suggested the union of the two kingdoms under this name, and now James was to realise their aspiration. James's assumption of the title of King of Great Britain meant that he claimed, like the Old-English monarchs, to be lord of the whole island, and not merely king of both halves separately. Much opposition was made to this title in Parliament, and the judges declared it illegal. But in 1604 James definitely styled himself King of Great Britain on his coins. [United Kingdom.]

Greece, Relations with. The Greek insurrection began in 1821, and, after a long struggle, it seemed impossible for the insurgents to win their independence. A wave of Hellenic enthusiasm ran through England. Volunteers from all parts of England joined the Greek cause. In 1824 Byron perished at Missolonghi. In 1826 Lord Cochrane was made admiral, and Sir Richard Church general, of the Greek forces; but in 1827 the Turks reconquered Athens despite their efforts. Canning had reclaimed England from the policy of the Holy Alliance, and the battle of Navarino, though brought about by accident, was not necessarily opposed to his policy. But the Wellington ministry repudiated the action, and left it to the Russian invasion of 1829 to practically win Greek independence. As one of the protecting powers England found Greece a king and continued to watch over its interests, but forced on it, in 1832, the narrow boundaries into which, until recently, it was confined. The Pacifico and Finlsy affairs for a time led to strained relations; yet, in 1862 Prince Alfred was elected king on the expulsion of 1tto, but the self-denying bond of the protecting Fowers made it impossible for him to assume the throne, and England recommended Princo William of Holstein, who became George I. In 1363 England handed ever the Jonian Islands to the Hellenic kingdom; and more recently H.at. -- 20*

Green, JOHN RICHARD (b. 1887, d. 1883), was educated at Jesus College, Oxford. Besides various papers, he wrote A Short History of the English People, which was afterwards republished and enlarged as A History of the English People; The Making of England; The Conquest of England, etc.

Green, SIR HENRY (d. 1399), was one of Richard II.'s ministers in the latter years of his reign. He seems to have been extremely unpopular ca account of his extortion of money by illegal means, and on the landing of Bolingbroke was put to death.

Green Cloth, THE BOARD OF. A Board attached to the royal household, presided over by the Lord Steward. It had power to punish offenders within the precincts of the palace, and issued the warrants which were necessary before a servant of the household could be arrested for debt.

Greenwich was the seat of a royal palace much occupied by the Tudor princes, and pulled down after the Restoration. The site was assigned by William III. for the great hospital for retired seamen he there founded. Since 1869 the building has been devoted to the Royal Naval College.

Greenwood, John (d. 1593), a prominent Barrowist, was tried on a charge of promulgating seditious and schismatical opinions, and executed in 1593.

Gregg, William (d. 1708), was clerk in the office of Harley, Queen Anne's Secretary of State. He was first employed by that minister as a spy. In the course of the years 1707 and 1708 he was engaged in a treasonable correspondence with M. de Chamillart, the French Secretary of State. He slipped his letters into those of Marshal Tallard, whose correspondence passed through Harley's office. One of these packets was opened on suspicion in Holland. Gregg was tried, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to death. The House of Lords, bitterly opposed to Harley, entered on a searching investigation of the case, with the object of establishing the minister's complicity. Gregg was told that if he would make a full confession, he might hope for the intercession of the House. He refused and was hanged.

Grenada, one of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1478, but colonised in 1650 by the French Governor of Martinique; and, in 1674, on the collapse of the French West India Company, lapsed to the French crown. 'The French retained it until the Treaty of Paris (1763), when it was made over to England. In 1779 Grenada was retaken by the French, but was restored by the Treaty of Versailles (1783). In 1795 there was a negro insurrection, caused mainly by the intrigues of the French planters, the effects of which retarded for many years the progress of the island. The government is vested in a governor (who also exercises jurisdiction over the rest of the Windward Islands) and a legislative council. Each town has an elective Board for local affairs. The chief exports are sugar, cocoa, and cotton.

Grenville, Sie Bevil (b. 1596, d. 1643), a grandson of Sir Richard Grenville, a gallant officer who joined the Royalist army in 1642, defeated the Parliamentary forces at Stratton, and was slain at the battle of Lansdown (July 5, 1643). Clarendon says that the Royalist successes in Cornwall were almost entirely due to his energy; and speaks warmly of his bright courage and gentle disposition.

Grenville, GEORGE (b. 1712, d. 1770), was the son of Richard Grenville, of Wotton, by Hester, Countess Temple. In 1741 he was elected M.P. for Buckingham, which town he continued to represent until his death. In 1744 he was appointed a Junior Lord of the Admiralty, in Henry Pelham's government. In 1747 he was promoted to the same office in the Treasury; and on Newcastle becoming Prime Minister in 1754 he became Treasurer of the Navy. In 1762, when Lord Bute became First Lord of the Treasury, Grenville was made Secretary of State in his place, and leader of the House of Commons. On Bute's resignation in the following April, Grenville became at once Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the nomination of Bute, who expected to find him a very willing tool; but he soon discovered his mistake. Grenville, who feared the king as little as he did the people, complained bitterly of Bute's secret influence, and at once became odious to the king in consequence. of Lord Egremont, Secretary of State, in August, gave George an excuse for changing his ministry; and he accordingly, through Bute's means, opened negotiations with Pitt. These, however, failed; and he was again obliged to fall back upon Grenville, who strengthened his position by enlisting the Bed-ford faction on his side. But the new accession of strength did not save the ministry. The issue of general warrants, and the struggle with Wilkes, cost the ministry £100,000, and lost them any share of popularity they ever possessed. This measure was soon followed by the Stamp Act. In July, 1765, the king, seeing his way to form a new ministry, summarily dismissed Grenville and the Duke of Bedford. In 1769 Grenville became reconciled to his brother-in-law, Lord Chatham, and took an eager part in the debates on the expulsion of Wilkes. In 1770 he carried his Bill on Controverted Elections, by which he transferred that trial of election petitions from the House at large to a Select Committee of the House. [Elections.] For some time past his health had been declining, and in the autumn of 1770—only a few months after passing his Election Bill—he died. "He took pul'is business," Burke said of him in the House of Commons, "not as a duty he was to fulfil, but as a pleasure he was to enjoy; he seemed to have no delight out of the House, except in such things as some way related to the things that were to be done in it. If he was ambitious, I will say this for him, his ambition was of a noble and generous strain."

Grenville, Sir Richard (b. 1540, d. 1591), one of the renowned sailors of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was sent out to the West Indies, 1585, to inflict what damage he could on Spanish commerce. In 1587 he was a member of the Council of War, which was charged with the duty of making preparations to withstand the attack of the Armada; and did good service for his country against the Spanisrds. In 1591 he took part in an expedition under Lord Thomas Howard, which sailed for the Azores to intercept the Spanish treasure ships on their return from South America; the design of the English was discovered by Spain, and fifty-three ships of war were sent out as a convoy; a furious engagement took place, in which Sir Richard, after performing prodigies of valour, was killed; his memory being subsequently defended from any blame for the failure of the expedition by his friend Sir Walter Raleigh: "From the greatness of his spirit," says Raleigh, "he utterly refused to turn from the enemy, protesting he would rather die than be guilty of such dishonour to himself, his country, and her Majesty's ship."

Tytler, Life of Raleigh.

Grenville, WILLIAM WYNDHAM, LORD (b. 1759, d. 1834), third son of George Grenville, was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1782 he was elected M.P. for Buckingham, and in the following year accompanied his brother, Earl Temple, to Ireland, as private secretary. In Dec., 1784, he succeeded Burke as Paymaster-General, and began to give his cousin Pitt most valuable assistance at a time when he most needed it. In 1789 h was elected Speaker of the House of Comm son the death of Cornwall, but he only head the chair for four months, being then made Home Secretary, an office that afforded him more active employment. In 1790 he was raised to the Upper House, and in the following year went to preside over the Foreign Office. where he remained for ten years till Pitt's resignation. As Foreign Minister he thoroughly carried out Pitt's policy, and rejected all peace with the revolutionary government. He was the mover in the House of Lords of the Treason Bill in 1795. He was even a stronger supporter of the Catholic claims than Pitt, and during Pitt's last ministry Lord Grenville remained in opposition on this ground. On his death he combined with Fox to form the administration of "All the Talenta." That ministry, however, was but short-lived; and, on being dismissed Lord Grenville remained in opposition during the continuance of the war. The close of his life was spent in literary retirement, when he did much valuable work, the result of which has been to throw much new light on the inner workings and party intrigues of the early years of tho reign of George III. He lived on at Dropmore in Buckinghamshire till 1834, where he died on Jan. 12. Twice had overtures been made to him to take office again—in 1809 and in 1812. But Catholic Emancipation must be an essential element in any line of policy which Grenville would support. With that high sense of honour and integrity which always distinguished him and Lord Grey, they both excluded themselves from office for twenty years. As a Foreign Minister Grenville must rank above Pitt. His oratorical powers were at times the wonder of the House of Lords; but, like Fox, he was too liberal-minded not to have the misfortune to be generally in opposition.

Gresham, Sie Thomas (b. 1519, d. 1579), a famous merchant, the son of Sir Richard Gresham, Lord Mayor of London, who died 1548, first attained fame as a financier by negociating certain loans for Edward VI. in 1551. He was subsequently employed on several occasions by Elizabeth, who found him exceedingly useful in obtaining money from foreign merchants; and also in raising loans from merchants in England. In 1566 he founded the Royal Exchange, which was opened by the queen in person, 1570.

Greville, Charles C. F. (b. 1794, d. 1865), was Clerk to the Council from 1821 to 1860. He compiled a Journal, which is of considerable value as material for the history of the courts and cabinets of George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria.

Grey, LADY CATHERINE (d. 1567), was daughter of the Marquis of Dorset, and younger sister of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), after whose death she represented the house of Suffolk, which by Henry VIII.'s will was to succeed Elizabeth to the throne. After the accession of Elizabeth, Philip of Spain endeavoured to set her claims in opposition to the queen, but was unable to get her into his hands. In 1561 she was sent to the Tower ostensibly for having contracted a secret marriage with Lord Hertford, but in reality for fear she should prove a dangerous rival to Elizabeth. In 1563 Lady Cutherine's claims were seriously discussed in Parliament, and in the next year John Hales, the Clerk of the Hanaper, published an elaborate argument in her favour. She died in Jan., 1567, her death being accelerated by the harsh treatment of Elizabeth, and "having been," as Mr. Froudo says, "the object of the political schemes of all parties in turn who hoped to make use of her." Lady Hertford's marriage, which was declared null by Elizabeth's commissioners, was in the reign of James I. pronounced valid by a jury.

Grey, Charles, Earl (b. 1764, d. 1846), son of the first Earl Grey, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. He was returned to Parliament for the county of Northumberland in 1786, and joined the Whig Opposition under Charles James Fox. He displayed such ability in his first speech that he was from that time a prominent leader of the party, and as such was chosen one of the managers of the imperchment of Warren Hastings. In 1792 he became a member of the great society, "the Friends of the People," the avowed object of which was to obtain a reform in the system of Parliamentary representation. In 1795 he opposed the liquidation of the Prince of Wales's debts. In the same year he unsuccessfully moved the impeachment of Pitt. In 1797 he brought forward a plan of reform, which was rejected by 149 votes. He remained one of Mr. Pitt's bitterest opponents till his death. On the accession of Mr. Fox to power, 1806, Mr. Grey, now Lord Howick, was appointed First Lord of the Admiralty. On the death of Fox he became leader of the House of Commons and Foreign Secretary. Catholic Relief question, however, overthrew the ministry. In 1807 he succeeded his father as Earl Grey. In 1810, when the Duke of Portland resigned, negotiations were opened with Lords Grey and Grenville, who, however, refused to unite with the proposed ministry. In 1812 a similar attempt failed. In 1827 Earl Grey declined to support Mr. Canning. The sudden termination of the Wellington ministry in 1830 brought him from his retirement as the only man capable of dealing with the difficult question of Parliamentary Reform. In accepting office he stipulated that the reform of Parliament should be made a cabinet question. The support of the great majority of the nation greatly facilitated the task which Earl Grey had undertaken, and enabled him to construct his ministry without much difficulty, the most serious impediment being created by the position of Mr. Brougham, which was got over by making him Lord Chancellor. A Reform Bill was introduced by Lord John Russell on April 12, after a long discussion, General Gascoyne successfully carried his motion against the government, and a discolution became necessary, to which the king at last consented. The danger, however, became pressing, as Lord Wharnchife had threatened to movo an address in the Lords, praying the king not to dissolve. The House was dissolved the very day Lord Wharncliffe's threatened address was to have come on. The election of 1831 sent back a large reforming majority to Parliament, and on June 21, Lord John Russell again introduced the bill. The struggle from this time lay in the Lords. On April 9, 1832, Earl Grey moved that the third Reform Bill oe now read a second time. The second reading was carried by the aid of Lord Wharncliffe and the Trimmers. Lord Lyndhurst now moved in committee that the consideration of the disfranchising clauses should be postponed until the enfranchising clauses had been considered. This motion was carried against the government in spite of Earl Grey's warning to the House that he should consider its success fatal to his measure, and he resigned, May 9. The state of the country became terrible. Sir Robert Peel declined The Duke of Wellington found it impossible to construct a government. It became necessary to recall Earl Grey, and Earl Grey obeyed the summons. But before he left the presence of the king he had obtained from him a written promise that he would "create such a number of peers as will be sufficient to pass the Reform Bill." The bill was eventually carried by the personal influence of the king, though violent altercations and recriminations occurred on the subject in the House of Lords. The Reformed Parliament gave the Whigs an overwhelming majority. The first business was to consider the state of Ireland, and it was found necessary to pass a Coercion Bill. 1834 the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Ripon, Mr. Stanley, and Sir James Graham resigned. This somewhat shook the ministry, and in order to avoid any further secessions, an Irish Church Commission was hastily appointed to procure evidence. Mr. Littleton's Tithe Bill (Irish) gave another shock to the ministry, and the motion of O'Connell and Mr. Littleton on the Coercion Bill, which produced the resignation of the Premier and Lord Althorp, ended Lord Grey's political career. He resigned to save the rest of his ministry. From this time he took. little part in public affairs.

Grey, Str. Edward (b. 1862), M.P. for North Berwick since 1885, was Under Foreign Secretary from 1892-5. In 1905 he joined the Liberal Ministry as Secretary for period Affairs; in 1906 the Liberals won the election, and he returned to office.

Grey, Sin Grones (b. 1799, d. 1882), acted in 1834 for a few months as Under-Secretary for the Colonies. He returned to the same post in 1835, and held it till 1839, when he became Judge-Advocate, and afterwards Chancellor of the Duchy. In 1845 he was appointed Home Secretary. In 1854 he accepted the Colonial Office. In 1855 he returned to the Home Office; was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in 1859; became Home Secretary again in 1861. He retired in 1866.

Grey, Sie George, K.C.B. (b. 1812, d. 1898), was born at Liabon, educated at Sandhurst, and for some time held a commission in the 83rd Regiment. After conducting explorations in Western Australia, he was appointed Governor of South Australia in 1841, of New Zealand in 1845, of Cape Colony in 1854, and again of New Zealand in 1861-7. In 1874 he became superintendent of the province of Auckland; member of House of Representatives for Auckland City (1874-94), then returning to England, became Privy Councillor. He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Grey, LADY JANE (b. 1637, d. 1554), was. the daughter of Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, and Frances Brandon, daughter of the Duke of Suffolk. On the approaching death of Edward VI. becoming apparent in 1553, the Duke of Northumberland conceived the idea of aggrandising his own family by obtaining the crown for Lady Jane, and marrying her to his son Lord Guilford Dudley. Accordingly, he induced Edward VI. to alter the succession in her favour. On the young king's death Lady Jane was in-formed by the duke that she was queen, and was proclaimed by him in various parts of the country, but the people refused to recognise-the usurpation. After a brief reign of eleven days, the crown was transferred to Mary, and Lady Jane and her husband were sent to the Tower, and subsequently condemned to death. They were kept in captivity for some time, and were not executed until after Wyatt's rebellion in 1554. Lady Jane Grey, whose education had been entrusted to Aylmer and Roger Ascham, was as accomplished as she was beantiful, and was a fluent scholar in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. "She has left-us," in Froude's words, "a portrait of herself drawn by her own hand, a portrait of piety, purity, and free noble innocence uncoloured.

even to a fault, with the emotional weaknesses of humanity."

Grey, Sin John, of Groby (d. 1455), a Lancastrian leader who fell in the first battle of St. Albans, was the first husband of Elizabeth Woodville, afterwards wife of Edward IV.

Grey, LORD LEONARD (d. 1541), was the second son of Thomas, first Marquis of Dorset. Ho was sent over to Ireland, in 1535, to assist Skeffington. On Skeffington's death he became Lord Deputy, 1536. Together with Lord James Butler, he destroyed O'Brien's Bridge over the Shannon, long an object of alarm to the English, and he induced the O'Connor to come to terms. His sister, Lady Elizabeth Grey, was the second wife of Gerald, ninth Earl of Kildare, and it now became his duty to try and capture his own nephew, that nobleman's heir, an object which he did not succeed in effecting. In 1538, he attacked the Island Scots. He was, however, compelled to retreat, in spite of Ormonde's help, before the combined forces of Desmond and the O'Briens. Lord Leonard was a staunch Catholic, and this, together with the favour he showed the Geraldines and the natives, made him hated by Ormonde. Soon after his recall, at his own request in 1540, he was accused of a treasonable understanding with his kinsmen, the Fitzgeralds, and executed in 1541. Most probably he was Grey, Sin Patrick, was Captain of the Guard to James II. Having a bitter feud with the Earl of Douglas, on account of the murder of his nephew in Douglas Castle, he gave the earl his death-wound, after he had been stabbed by the king, in Stirling Castle (1452).

Grey, LORD RICHARD (d. 1483), was the second son of Sir John Grey, by Elizabeth Woodville, and consequently half-brother of King Edward V. In 1483 he was seized, together with his uncle, Earl Rivers, at Northampton by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, and eventually put to death at Pontefract.

Gray, Sir Thomas (d. 1415), was a knight of Northumberland who, in 1415, joined the conspiracy of the Earl of Cambridge to place the Earl of March on the throne. He was seized, and having confessed his guilt, was immediately executed.

Grey, LORD THOMAS (d. 1554), brother of the Duke of Suffolk, joined in the rebellion in the midland counties (1554) organised by the duke in conjunction with that of Sir Thomas Wyatt in Kent. After the defeat of Suffolk's forces by Lord Huntingdon at Coventry, Thomas Grey escaped to Wales, but was taken prisoner, and executed (February, 1554). He was a man of ambition and daring, and his unbounded influence over his brother, the duke, was believed to have drawn the latter into this enterprise.

Grey de Wilton, ARTHUR, EARL (d. 1693), was the son of a celebrated commander of Honry VIII.'s time. He was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in 1880. In that year he suffered a severe repulse in Glen Malure from the Wicklow septs. It was to him, however, that the suppression of Desmond's rebellion was largely due, and he was in command of the troops at Smerwick (q.v.). As a stern Puritan, he made himself unpopular by his severity, and was re-called in 1884. He was one of the commissioners who passed judgment on Mary Queen of Scots, and was created a Knight of the Garter.

Grey de Wilton, William, Earl (d. 1563), was Governor of Berwick in the reign of Edward VI., and in that capacity distinguished himself by several raids across the border, in one of which (1548) he took and fortified Haddington. During the rebellion in the west of England (1549) he did much to repress the insurrection. In 1551 he was sent to the Tower by order of Warwick, who mistrusted him as a friend of Somerset, though a year or two afterwards he is found slightly implicated in the conspiracy to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Made Governor of Guisnes by Mary, he kept a close watch upon the French, and had his advice been listened to, Calais would have been saved. The fall of Calais was quickly followed by that of Guisnes, which Grey found himself compelled to surrender. On his return to England he was sent to the north, where he, after a lengthy siege, made an assault upon Leath, which, however, entirely failed.

Grimston, Sm Harrotte (b. 1603, d. 1685), a strong Presbyterian, represented Colchester in the Long Parliament. He was one of the members excluded by Pride's Purge. On the king's execution he left England, and remained abroad for several years. In 1656 he was elected M.P. for Essex, but was excluded from the House. In April, 1660, he was elected Speaker of the Convention Parliament. He was also one of the commissioners sent to Charles at Breda. For his services at the Restoration, he was, in November, 1660, created Master of the Rolls. During the reign of Charles II. ha distinguished himself by asserting the right of the Commons to choose their own Speaker (1679) and by his hostility to the Catholics.

Form, Judges of England, Grindal, EDMUND (b. 1519, d. 1583), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born near St. Bees and educated at Cambridge. He was made Canon of Westminster in 1552, and Chaplain to Edward VI., at whose death he was obliged to take refuge on the Continent. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England a strong Puritan, and greatly influenced by Geneva; he waived his objections to vestments so far as to accept the see of London on the deprivation of Bonner in 1562. Grindal, who had taken an active part in the Theological Controversy at Westminster, 1559, was a sound theologian and noted preacher; but he constantly incurred the queen's displeasure for his mildness in enforcing the Act of Uniformity; yet in 1570 he was made Archbishop of York, and on the death of Archbishop Parker, 1575, was translated to Canterbury. His administration was not very successful in some ways; his Puritan sympathy made him refuse to put down the "prophesyings" of that party, and he was, in consequence, sequestered from the exercise of his jurisdiction for five years, being only restored in 1582, a year before his death, though he never regained the favour of the queen, who treated him with great and unmerited harshness. As Archbishop of Canterbury, Grindal made no mark. His difference of opinion with the queen made it impossible for them to work in harmony, yet he was a man of profound learning, deep piety, and some moderation; mild, affable, and generous, and much admired by his own Party.

Griqualand West is separated from Cape Colony by the Orange River. After the discovery of dismonds there in 1867 the district was made a British colony, and in 1877 was made a province of Cape Colony, of which it now constitutes four out of seventy divisions. The characteristic feature of the country is undulating grassy plains, well adapted to sheep farming.

Grith, in Anglo-Saxon law, is a word of narrower meaning than "frith," with which it is often coupled. It signifies a special or localised peace or protection, particularly that granted by the king or a high official. While "frith" was primarily personal, the peace of an individual, the "grith" was territorial, the peace of a district.

Grosseteste, Robert (b. 1175, d. 1253), Bishop of Lincoln, one of the most eminent of mediæval ecclesiastics and schoolmen, was born at Stradbrooke, in Suffolk, of poor parents. He studied at Oxford and Paris, where he gained a very great reputation as a student and teacher. He became " rector scholarum " at l'aris, and first rector of the Franciscans. at Oxford. He received various preferments, but in 1232 resigned all but one in order to continue at Oxford. In 1235 his election as Bishop of Lincoln gave him both a wider sphere of work and a special relation to his university. As administrator of his huge diocese he was both active and successful. A long struggle with his chapter was only ended by the personal intervention of the Pope, Innocent IV., who, at the Council of Lyons practically decided in the bishop's favour. His drastic visitation of the monasteries of his see, though hampered by the disfavour shown to him at Rome, where the gold of the monks was allpowerful, was resolutely earried through. A . sturdy champion of liberty, he prevailed in 1244 in preventing the grant of a royal subsidy, and kept together the opposition, when likely to be broken up by the king's intrigues; and he ensured the reading of the sentence of excommunication against violators of the Great Charter in every parish of his. diocese. A similar spirit actuated the refusal in 1251 to admit foreigners ignorant of English into rich preferment in his diocese, and led to a papal suspension, which, how-ever, was of short duration. In 1252 he prevented the collection of a tenth imposed upon the clergy by the Pope for Henry III.'s necessities. In 1253 he refused to induct the Pope's own nephew into a prebend at Lincoln. His celebrated letter of refusal, while accepting the ultramontane position, was thoroughly decided in its tone. After his death miracles were reported at his tomb, but the effort to obtain canonisation for so bad a papalist failed. Grosseteste had a wide acquaintance, over which he exercised great influence. The spiritual adviser of Adam de Marisco, the intimate friend of Simon de Montfort, and the tutor to his sons, he was yet the friend of the queen and even of the king. The sturdy practical temper illustrated by all his life's acts was combined with vast knowledge, great dialectical and metaphysical subtlety, activity in preaching and teaching, and real spiritual feeling; his leisure, too, was devoted to the cultivation of French love poetry.

Guadaloupe, The Island of, is a French possession in the Antilles. Settled in 1635 by the French, it resisted English attacks in 1691 and 1703, but was captured in 1759, and restored in 1763, and again in 1794 it became English. Restored in 1803 by the Peace of Amiens, it was re-conquered in 1810, surrendered to Sweden in 1813, restored to France in 1814. In 1816 the British finally withdrew.

Guader, RALPH, was of Norman or Breton origin, but was born in England. He was made Earl of Norfolk by William I., but in 1075, chiefly being irritated at the king's disapproval of his marriage with the sister of the Earl of Hereford, he organised a conspiracy for the deposition of William, and the restoration of the earls to the power they had enjoyed under Edward the Confessor. The plot was betrayed, and Balph fled to Brittany. Eventually he joined the first Crusade, and died in Palestine.

Gualo was appointed Papal legate in England in the year 1216. He strongly supported King John against Louis of France, and on John's death was instrumental in obtaining the recognition of the young King Henry. Mr. Luard says that "the preserva-tion of the Plantagenet line, and the defeat of Louis, were entirely due to the influence of Rome." He was replaced in 1218 by Pandulf.

Guiana is an extensive country in the north-east of South America. In 1580 the Dutch planted a colony, and in 1652 the English settled at Paramaribo. The English settlement did not succeed, and the land remained with the Dutch. In 1781 Rodney took possession of it, but in 1784 it was restored. Again in 1796 the English captured Guiana, and in 1803 a cession, confirmed in 1814, was made to England of the portion now called British Guiana. [VENESURLA.]

Guildford Court-house, THE BATTLE or (March 15, 1781), during the closing period of the American War of Independence, was almost the only gleam of success that shone on Cornwallis's tatal advance into the North. At the beginning of the year he entered North Carolina. Greene, with much prudence, refused to attack him, and retreated before him. On February 20, Cornwallis, halting at Hillsborough, invited all loyalists to join him; but a small detachment of them on their way to take advantage of the proclamation were cut to pieces by the Americans, and the rest took fright. Again Cornwallis advanced, and Greene at length determined to give him battle. On some strong ground near Guildford Court-house, Cornwallis attacked, and the regulars were as usual irresistible. They carried Greene's position despite inferiority in numbers and position. In results, however, the victory was signally deficient, for Cornwallis, too weak to advance, and receiving no reinforcements, had to fall back on Wilmington. [AMERICAN INDEPEN-DENCE, WAR OF. Bancroft, Hist. of Amer. Rev., iv., c. 23; Stan-hope, Hist. of Eng., c. 64.

Guiscard, ANTOINE, MARQUIS DE (5. 1658, d. 1711), was a French adventurer of good family. For some unknown offence he was expelled from France, and came to England after a variety of adventures. Godolphin made him colonel of a regiment of French refugees; and he became a companion of St. John in his wild orgies. In the year 1706 he proposed a descent on the coast of Languedoc, and twelve regiments were placed in readiness, but the expedition never sailed, probably because Godolphin thought his schemes too visionary. Guiscard was discharged with a pension of £500 a year. He almost immediately began a treacherous correspondence with the French court. On its detection he was brought before the Privy Council. Finding that overything known, and wishing for a better death than hanging, he stabbed Harley twice with a penknife he had secreted. The wounds were slight. Guiscard was soon overpowered, and died in Newgate from injuries received in the struggle. To the last he denied that the attack was premeditated.

Gunpowder Plot, THE, is the name usually given to the great Roman Catholic conspiracy of James I.'s reign. The Catholies were deeply disappointed at finding that the king had no intention of remitting the severe laws against recusancy. In their resentment a plot was formed by several Roman Catholic gentlemen. It was probably origi-Thomas Winter and John Wright in the spring of 1604; and later by Thomas Percy, ltobert Winter, Sir Everard Digby, Rockwood, Tresham, the Jesuit Garnet, and Guy Fawkes, an Englishman, who had long served as a soldier of fortune in Flanders, and was closely connected with the English Jesuita. The plot was matured in the summer of 1605. It was arranged that Fawkes was to secrete some barrels of gunpowder in cellars adjacent to the Houses of Parliament. After the explosion, which was to take place when the King and Prince of Wales were present, the young prince Charles and the princess Elizabeth were to be seized and a rising attempted in the midland counties. After the prorogation Parliament was to meet on November 5, 1605, and this was the day on which the enterprise was to be carried out. Several of the conspirators were, however, anxious to save the Catholic members of the House of Lords. A letter was received by Lord Monteagle from one of the conspirators (probably Tresham) warning him not to be present at the opening of Parliament. The letter was shown to Cecil. Orders were given to search the vaults on November 4, and Fawkes was arrested. Most of the other conspirators had taken the alarm and already fied to Dunchurch, where Sir Everard Digby had collected a large number of Catholic gentlemen. They dispersed in various directions. The leading conspirators attempted to make a stand at Holbeach. Several of them were wounded by an accidental explosion. Catesby, Percy, and the Wrights were killed in the course of the flight; most of the other leaders were captured. They were tried, and executed in January and February, 1606.

S. R. Gardiner, Hist. of Eng., chap. vii. An attempt to show that the Government excouraged the plot so as to trap the conspirators has been made by Father Gerrard, S.J. (What was the Gunpowder Plot! 1898.)

Guthram, or Guthorm (Mod. Dan., Gorm), was a Danish chief who became King of East England. After conquering Mercia, he started from Repton in 875 with half the "great host," when Halfdane went another way with the other half to colonise Northumberland. With two of bis fellow kings, he attacked Wessex by land and sea, forcing Alfred to take refuge in Atholney in 878. He then raised a great fort at Chippenham, but was besieged there by the English king, and forced by blockade to accept terms of peace. This treaty is still in existence. Guthrum was baptised, with thirty of his chief men, and in 880 he settled with his host in East England, vacant by the death of Hubba, who, with his host, was slain in Devonshire, 878. Guthrum seems to have done his best to keep the peace, though his fellowers were not always obedient, and it is not till after his death in 890 that the East English Daves became a danger to Alfred. Guthrum's baptismal name was Athelstan, which alono appears on his coins. The theory, however, that he, not the English king, was the fosterfather of Hacon the Good, reposes on a false chronology and is quite unnecessary. Guthrum was succeeded by Eohrie, or Yorick, who was probably his son. [ALFRED.]

Guthrum II., King of East England, was the son of Yorick, whom he succeeded 906. He made peace with King Edward, the terms of which were still preserved in 907. It was against him that Edward's policy of building a line of forts across the Midlands was chiefly directed, a policy which led to the submission successively of the Danes of Hertford. (916), of Bedford, under Earl Turketil (918), and finally to the campaign of 921, in which Edward defeated and slew Guthrum (for we take him to be "the king" of the Chronicle) with his son and brother, at Tempsford. Their death, and the submission of Earl Thurfrith of Northampton, the Danes of Huntingdon, the "hest of Cambridge," and the East Anglian Danes, in the same year, brought to an end the Danish rule in East England.

- Guzerat, THE BATTLE or (Feb. 22, 1849), was fought between the English and Sikhs during the second Sikh War. The army of Shere Sing, estimated at 50,000 men with sixty pieces of cannon, was drawn up in front of the walled town of Guzerat, supported on the left by a streamlet flowing into the Chenab, on the right by two villages filled with troops. The commander-in-chief, Lord Gough, by the advice of Major George Lawrence, determined to begin the battle with artillery. The fire of eighty-four cannon rained on them steadily for two hours and a half. The whole Sikh line broke and fled; the English cavalry were let loose on them, and pursued them for fifteen miles, till the army of Shere Sing was a mere wreck.

Gwalior is a protected state of Central India, which includes most of Malwa. The capital of the same name is situated on a rocky hill, rising sheer from the level plain. It is ruled by the line of Mahratta princes called Scindiah. The fortress of Gwalior was taken by Major Popham in 1780, and restored to its former ruler, the Rajah of Gohad, but in 1784 was recovered by Scindiah. In Feb., 1804, it was again taken by the English, under Sir H. White, but was restored to Scindiah the next year. In 1843, on the death of the reigning Scindiah, without heirs, the dissensions at Gwalior led to an expelition to restore order there. The English defeated the Gwalior army at Maharajpore. A treaty was concluded, by which the fortress of Gwalior was ceded to England and the native army reduced to 9,000 men (1844). In 1857, it was a seat of the Mutiny, but Scindish remained unswervingly faithful.

Gwynedd, the old name for North Wales, was a district roughly corresponding to the demains of the "Princes of Wales" who reigned at Aberffraw. [Wales.]

Gwyn, ELEANOR (b. circa 1650, d. 1687), was of humble origin, and was early in life an orange girl at a theatre. She subsequently became an actress and mistress to Lord Buckhurst, and eventually one of Charles II.'s mistresses, besides being appointed one of the Ladies of the Bedchamber to the Queen. By Charles II. she had two sons, one of whom died very young, the other was Charles Beauclerk, who was created Duke of St. Albans. Her personal beauty was very great, while her generosity and kindliness made her more popular than most of the king's favourites.

Gyrth (d. 1066) was the fourth son of Earl Godwin. He shared in his father's banishment and return, and in 1057 he received an earldom which seems to have included Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and Oxfordshire. He took part in the battle of Hastings, where he was kilted, it is said, by William's own hand.

Cannte. She married Earl Gelwin, and was banished with him in 1051. After the battle of Hastings, she begged the body of Harold to inter it at Waltham, but this was refused by William, though she is said to have offered him Harold's weight in gold. In 1067 she took refuge in the Flatholm, and went thence to St. Ouen, where she remained till her death.

H

Maboas Corpus, THE WRIT OF, is a writ issuing from one of the superior courts, commanding the body of a pri-soner to be brought before it. It rests upon the famous 29th section of Magna Charta: "No freeman shall be taken and imprisoned unless by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land." Arbitrary imprisonment, though thus provided against, was, however, not unfrequently practised by the king's Privy Council, and, in 1352, a statute was passed to prevent this abuse of the liberty of the subject, which was twice re-enacted in the reign of Edward III. Under the Tudors, prisoners, when committed Under the Tudors, prisoners, when committed by the council generally, or even by the special command of the king, were admitted to bail on their habeas corpus, but there were frequent delays in obtaining the writ. The question whether a prisoner could be detained by special command of the king, signified by a warrant of the Privy Council, without showing cause of imprisonment, was argued showing cause of imprisonment, was argued out in Darnell's case, when the judges, relying upon an obscure declaration of their predecessors in the 34th of Elizabeth, decided for the crown. The House of Commons retorted by protesting in the Petition of Right against the illegal imprisonment of the subject without cause.

The arbitrary arrest of Sir John Eliot and the other members on the dissolution of 1629 was an attempt to evade the Petition of Right, and was met by the provision in the Act which abolished the Star Chamber, that any person committed by the council or the king's special command was to have a writ of habeas corpus granted him, on application to the judges of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, without any delay or pretence whatever. Nevertheless, Lord Clarendon's arbitrary custom of imprisoning offenders in distant places revived the grievance, and the Commons, under Charles II., carried several bills to prevent the refusal of the writ of habeas corpus, but they were thrown out in the Lords. In 1676 Jenkes's case called fresh attention to the injustice of protracted imprisonment.

At last, in 1679, the famons Habeas Corpus Act was passed. It enacted that any judge must grant the writ of habeas corpus when applied for, under penalty of a fine of £500; that the delay in executing it must not exceed twenty days; that any officer or keeper neglecting to deliver a copy of the warrunt of commitment, or shifting the prisoner without cause to another custody, shall be fined £100 on the first offence, and £200, with dismissal, for the second; that no person once delivered by habeas corpus shail be re-committed for the same offence; that every person committed for treason or felony is to be tried at the next assises, unless the crown witnesses cannot be produced at that time; and that, if not indicted at the second assizes or sessions, he may be discharged; and that no one may be imprisoned out of England. The defects in this great Act have since been remedied by the Bill of Rights, which declares that excessive bail may not be required; and by the Act of 1757 "for securing more effectually the liberty of the subject," which extended the remedies of the Habeas Corpus Act to non-criminal charges, and empowered the judges to examine the truth of the facts set forth in the return. By an Act of 1862, based on the fugitive siave Anderson's case, it was provided that no writ of habeas corpus could issue from an English court into any colony where local courts exist having authority to grant and issue the said writ. The Habeas Corpus Act was extended to Ireland in 1782; in Scotland the liberty of the subject is guarded by the Wrongous Imprisonment Act of 1701.

In times of political and social disturbance

In times of political and social disturbance the Habeas Corpus Act has now and again been suspended. It was suspended nine times between the Revolution and 1745; again during the troubles which followed the French Revolution (1794—1800), after which an Act of Indemnity was passed; as again after the Suspension Act of 1817. In Ireland it has been suspended no less than six times since the Union; but since 1848 the government, in times of disaffection, have had recourse to Coercion Acts.

For Darnell's case and the Act, see Hallam, Const. Hist., chs. 7 and 13; State Tricks, and stat. 31 Car. II., c. 2. For Suspension Acts, May, Const. Hist., chap. xi. See also 56 Geo. III., c. 100, and 25 and 26 Vict., c. 20. [L. C. S.]

Habeas Corpus Act, THE, IN IRELAND, was not passed till 1782, when an Act resembling that in England was carried through the Irish Parliament. It was suspended in 1796, in 1800, 1802 to 1805, 1807 to 1810, 1822 to 1824, 1866 to 1869, and partially by the Westmeath Act, 1871, and other Coercion Acts.

Hackett, William (d. 1591), was a fanatic who, with two companions named Coppenger and Arthington, endeavoured to procure a following in London by predicting the immediate end of the world. Their divine mission failed, however, to save them from being convicted as traitors. Arthington was pardoned. This fanaticism caused the persecution of the Puritans to be redoubled; "it was pretended," says Dr. Lingard, "that if a rising had been effected, men of greater weight would have placed themselves at the head of the insurgents, and have required from the queen the abolition of the prelacy."

Hackston, of Rathillet (d. 1680), was one of the murderers of Archbishop Sharp. After the crime Hackston escaped into Stirlingshire by giving out that he and his eompanions were troopers in pursuit of the murderers. He afterwards fought at Drumelog and Bothwell Bridge, on the side of the Covenanters. He was captured at Airds Moss (1680), and soon afterwards executed et Edinburgh.

Haddington, seventeen miles east of Edinburgh, was burnt by John in 1216, and again by Edward III. in 1355. In 1547 it was taken by the English shortly after the battle of Pinkie; but was recaptured by the Scotch in the following year. It was here that the Estates of the Realm met to discuss the marriage of their young Queen Mary with the Dauphin (1548). In 1716 it was occupied by the Jacobites.

Haddon, WALTER (b. 1516, d. 1572), has been called one of the brightest lay ornaments of the Reformation. He became Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and in 1552 President of Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1565 he was sent to Bruges for the purpose of concluding a commercial treaty between England and the Netherlands. His knowledge of Law was great, and he had a principal share in drawing up the Reformatic Legum Ecclesiasticarum.

Hadrian, Emperor of Rome (117-38), visited Britain in the year 120. He restored the southern part of the island to order, and drove back the Caledonians. The wall from the Solway to the Tyne was built by his orders. [Romans in Britain.]

Hadwisa, or Hawisa, wife of King John, was the granddaughter of Robert Earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I. Her marriage with King John in 1189 gave him a share of the great Gloucester earldom of which she was co-heir, but in 1200 she was divorced on the pretext of affinity.

Hailes, Lord (b. 1726, d. 1792), was the judicial title of Sir David Dalrymple, one of the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary. He was the author of Annals of Scotland.

Haldane, THE RIGHT HON. R.B. (b. 1856) was educated at Edinburgh and Göttingen, and called to the Bar in 1879. He entered Parliament in 1885. In 1905 he became Secretary for War in the Liberal Ministry, and during his term of office was responsible for the abolition of the Volunteers and Militia, and the introduction of the Territorial system.

Hale. SIR MATTHEW (b. 1609, d. 1676), was called to the bar in 1636. He took the side of the king in his struggle with the Parlianent, and defended the Duke of Hamilton and other Royalists in 1649. Later on he subscribed the engagement to be faithful to the Commonwealth, and in 1654 was made a judge of the Common Pleas, in which capacity he showed great fearlessness and impartiality, refusing to assist in the trial of Penruddock in 1655, and on one occasion dismissing a jury which had been illegally returned at Cromwell's bidding. On the death of Oliver Cromwell he resigned his office, but in 1660 was made by Charles II. Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and in 1671 was promoted to the Chief Justiceship of the King's Bench. In private and public life alike, he was distinguished by his candour, kindly disposition, and piety; his habits and tastes were most simple, and to the end of his life he was an earnest student of theology and law. Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham, speaks of him as "a Chief Justice of so indefatigable an industry, so invincible a patience, so exemplary an integrity, and so magnani-mous a contempt of unholy things, without which no man can be truly great; and to all this, a man that was so absolutely a master of the science of the law, and even of the most abstruse and hidden parts of it, that one may truly say of his knowledge of the law, what St. Austin said of St. Jerome's knowledge of divinity, 'Quod Hieronymus nescivit, nullus mortalium unquam scivit."

Hale's Case (June, 1686). Sir Edward Hale, a convert to Roman Catholicism, was, in 1686, appointed by James II. colonel of a regiment, and Governor of Dover Castle, though he had not qualified himself for these posts according to the terms of the Test Act. A collusive action was brought against him by a servant, whereupon Hale pleaded a dispensation from the king. Eleven out of the twelve judges decided in his favour, and agreed that the king had power by his prerogative to dispense with penal laws, and for reasons of which he was sole judge. Subsequently Hale was made Lientenant of the Tower, and followed James II. in his flight, but was captured and imprisoned.

Halfdane (d. 910), a Danish leader, is mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as one of the two kings leading the Danish army at the battle of Ashdown (781). Four years later he went with part of the host into Northumbria, subdued the land, and harried the Picts and the Strathclyde Welsh. Next year (876) he divided the south part of Northumbria among his followers, who settled down in their new abodes as peaceful inhabitants. Many years later Halfdane's name again occurs in the Chronicle as being engaged in an expedition that ravaged England as far south as Tettenhall. On its return it was overtaken by Edward the Elder, and put to rout. Several of the Danish leaders were slain in this engagement, and amongst them King Halfdane. [Danes.]

Halidon Hill, THE BATTLE OF (July 19, 1333), was fought near Berwick between the English troops, led by Edward III. in person, and the Scotch under Douglas. The English were posted on a hill, and also protected by the marshy ground before them. When the Scots advanced to the attack, their troops floundered in this moras, and, being open to the English archers, were reduced to a mere fragment ere they reached the eucmy's ranks. Disorganised and hopeless, they were then slaughtered by the English men-at-arms.

Halifax, Charles Wood, 1st Viscount (t. 1800, d. 1885), was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and succeeded his father as third baronet in 1826. In the same year he had been returned to the House of Commons as member for Great Grimsby, and afterwards sat for Wareham, Halifax, and Ripon. In 1832 he was appointed Secretary to the Treasury; in 1835 Secretary to the Admiralty. In 1846 he took office under Lord Russell as Chancellor of the Exchequer, which office he held till 1852. He entered the Aberdoen cabinet in 1852 as President of the Board of Control; became First Lord of the Admiralty in Lord Palmerston's first administration, from 1855 to 1858. In Lord Palmerston's second administration he became Secretary of State for India, and President of the Indian Council from 1859 to 1866. In 1866 he was created Viscount Halifax, and took office under Mr. Gladstone in 1870 as Lord Privy Seal.

Halifax, Charles Montague, Earl of (b. 1661, d. 1715), was educated at Westminster and Cambridge. In 1687 he gained himself a wide reputation by the happy parody of the Town and Country Mouse, written in conjunction with his friend Prior. In 1688 he entered Parliament for Maldon, and was a member of the Convention which offered the crown of England to William and Mary. The new king soon granted him a pension of £500 a year; and in 1691 he was appointed chairman of a committee of the House of Commons, and one of the commissioners of the Treasury. He bore a prominent part in the debates for regulating the trials for treason. He took up Paterson's scheme for establishing a national bank, and hence may be regarded as one of the founders of the Bank of England (1694). In the same year he was ap-pointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the next was actively concerned in the measures taken to restore the currency. It was at his suggestion that a window-tax was levied for the purposes of meeting the expenses incidental to the new coinage. In 1697

he was appointed First Lord of the Treasury, and in the next two years was one of the members of the regency during the king's absence. About the same time he was attacked in Parliament, but was acquitted on all points. and even received the thanks of the House for his services. He now proposed to reorganise the East India Company, by combining the new and the old companies (1698). "The success of this scheme," says Lord Macaulay, "marks the time when the fortunes of Mon-tague reached the meridian." After this time he began to lose his popularity; public feeling was against him, and even the men of letters, despite his patronage of the greatest literary characters of his day, were unsparing in abuse. Stung by this treatment he resigned the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, and fell back upon a very lucrative sinecure (the auditorship of the Exchequer) that his brother had been nursing for him since the previous year. In 1701 he was called to the Upper House by the title of Lord Halifax; and the same year was impeached, though without success. In 1714 he was made Earl of Halifax, and died the next year. Halifax's character was most mercilessly assailed by the writers of his time; and even Pope, who was but a boy when Montague retired from the House of Commons, has attacked him in some of his bitterest and most pungent verses. Halifax is said to have been the Bufo of the Epistle to Arbuthnet, where even his patronage of men of letters is turned into scorn, and the whole charge summed up with the couplet accusing him of neglecting Dryden when alive-

"But still the great have kindness in reserve :— He helped to bury whom he helped to starve."

Halifax, George Saville, Marquis or (b. circa 1630, d. 1695), was a member of an old Yorkshire family which had been conspicuous for its loyalty during the Rebellion period. After the Restoration, he was raised to the peerage for the assistance he had rendered in bringing about that event. He was created a marquis in 1682 and made Lord Privy Seal. He opposed the Exclusion Bill in 1680, though he was suspected of intriguing in favour of the Duke of Monmouth. At the accession of James II. he became President of the Council; but he showed himself altogether averse to the Romanising measures of the king, and most strenuously opposed the repeal of the Test Act. For this he was dismissed from his offices, October, 1685. He gave his adhesion to the Prince of Orange in December, 1688, and became Speaker of the House of Lords in the Convention Parliament, 1689, and Lord Privy Seal in February of this year. He, however, subsequently joined the Opposition and resigned in October, 1689. He offered a violent opposition to the censorship of the press in 1392. The marquis refused to join himself absolutely to either party, and, in a tract called the Character of a Trimmer, defended his position as one who "trims" from one side to the other as the national interest requires.

Macaulay, Hist. of Eng.; Burnet, Hist. of His Own Time.

Halifax, George Montague Dunk, 5th Earl of (d. 1771), succeeded to the title while still a boy. In 1761 he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and a little later became one of Bute's Secretaries of State. When the last-mentioned nobleman went out in March, 1763, Lord Halifax combined with Lord Egremont and George Grenville to form the administration popularly known as the Triumvirate. It was in the joint names of Lords Halifax and Egremont that the general warrant was made out for the arrest of Wilkes. Lord Halifax has also been charged with tho authorship of the most fatal measure of this unfortunate administration, viz., the Stamp Act; but though he was a warm advocate of the bill, as his office compelled him to be, there seems no evidence that he was the actual author of it. In 1765 he was a party with Lord Sandwich to the fraud which was practised on the king in order to make him agree to the omission of his mether's name from the council of regency; and the king seems to have felt more deeply injured by him than by Lord Sandwich. Nor did his conduct in this matter give satisfaction to his colleagues; and during the last few months of the Grenville administration, complaints against Halifax seem to have been rife. The Grenville administration fell in 1765. When Lord North came into power (1770) ho was appointed Secretary of State, but died the following year.

Hall, ARTHUR, member for Grantham, who had been previously arraigned at the bar of the House of Commons "for sundry lewd speeches," was (in 1581) expelled from the House, fined, and imprisoned in the Tower, for having published a book "not only reproaching some particular good members of the House, but also very much slanderous and derogatory to its general anthority, power, and state, and prejudicial to the validity of its proceedings in making and establishing of laws." Hall had previously incurred the anger of the Honse, which suspected him of having connived at the fraud of his servant, Smalley (q.v.), whom they had sent their sergeant-at-arms to deliver from gaol in 1575. When Hall's book was condemned, its author made his submission, but was not liberated till the dissolution of Parliament. Notwithstanding his misfortunes on this occasion, he seems to have sat in later Parliaments. Hall's Case is the chief precedent for the power of expulsion which the House of Commons has always retained.

Hall, EDWARD (d. 1547), the son of a hropshire gentleman, was educated at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford. He entered Gray's Inn, was called to the bar, and in process of time became under-sheriff for the City of London and one of the judges of the Sheriffs' Court. He died in 1547, leaving behind him a History of the Union of the two Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York, which was printed in 1548. This work, which the author dedicated to Edward VI., begins with the duel between the Duke of Norfolk and Henry of Derby (afterwards Henry IV.), and goes down to the death of Henry VII. Hall may be regarded as a contemporary authority for events that too! place during the reign of the last-mentioned king. carlier reigns his narrative " is carefully compiled from the best available authorities, whether they wrote in Latin, French, or English." A list of these authorities is pro fixed to the work, which was first printed by Richard Grafton in 1548.

Hall, Joseph (b. 1574, d. 1656), Bishop of Norwich, was one of the deputies sent to represent the established religion of England at the Synod of Dort (1619). In 1627 he was made Bishop of Exeter, and Bishop of Norwich in 1641, in which year he joined eleven of his fellow-bisheps in protesting against all laws passed in their absence from the House of For this offence he was east into Lords. prison. He died at Higham, near Norwich, in 1656. Hall's chief poetical works are two books entitled respectively Toothles Satires and Biting Satires, both of which are of some value as presenting a picture of the manners of his time. He was also the author of a work entitled Hard Measure, which gives an account of the treatment he met with at the hands of the Puritan party.

Hallam, HENRY (b. 1777, d. 1859), was educated at Eton and Oxford, whence he proceeded to the Inner Temple. He was one of the early contributors to the Edinburgh Review, and a consistent Whig in politics. In 1818 his first literary venture on a large scale made its appearance—the View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages. This work, which at once established the reputation of its author, is of value to the student of English history chiefly for the sketch of our political and constitutional history down to the accession of the Tndor dynasty. Despite the fact that the same ground was sub-sequently covered by the brilliant ingenuity of Sir Francis Palgrave and the great work of Dr. Stubbs, no student of onr early history can afford to neglect the pages of these volumes. Mr. Hallam's second achievement was the publication of The Constitutional History of England from the Accession of Henry VII. to the death of George II. This work is still the leading authority on the period over which it extends; and like all the other writings of its author, is remarkable for its accuracy and impartiality. In 1837—38 Mr. Hallam's third work of importance made its appearance, The Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Conturies.

Hallam, Robert (d. 1417), held the archdeaconry of Canterbury, and was nominated by the Pope to the archbishopric of York. Henry IV., however, refused his sanction to the appointment, and Hallam had to content himself with the bishopric of Salisbury. In 1411 he was nominated a cardinal. Six years later he took a very prominent part in the Council of Constance. He died at Constance in 1417.

Hamilton, originally called Cadzow or Cadyow, derives its name from Sir Walter de Hamilton, or Hambelton, of Leicester. It was made a royal burgh by Queen Mary in the sixteenth century. Hamilton Castle is noted in history as the place in which Mary Queen of Scots took refuge on her escape from Lochleven (1568), and where her supporters mustered round her. It was the chief seat of the Hamiltons, and was taken by the Regent Murray later in the same year.

Hamilton, FAMILY OF, is descended from Sir Gilbert de Hamilton, who lived in the reign of Alexander II. of Scotland. His son, Sir Walter Hamilton, received the lordship of Cadzow from Robert Bruce. Sir James Hamilton, sixth Lord of Cadzow, was created a peer of Scotland, with the title of Lord Hamilton, in 1445. His son James was created Earl of Arran in Aug., 1563. James, second earl, was declared heir presumptive to the crown in 1543, and in 1548 was created by Henry II. Duke of Chatelherault in France. John, his second son, was, in 1591, created Marquis of Hamilton. James, grandson of this peer, was created Duke of Hamilton, 1643. On the attainder of William, the second dake, in the Civil War, his honours were forfcited; but in 1660 his widow obtained, by petition, for her husband, Lord William Douglas, the title of Duke of Hamilton. The title has since remained with his descendants. The holders of the dakedom of Abercorn are descended from Claud, fourth son of 1e Duke of Chatelherault.

Hamilton, Anthony, Count (b. 1641, d. 1720), was the son of Sir George Hamilton and nephew of the second Earl of Abercorn on his father's side, while on his mother's he was nephew of the Duke of Ormonde. He was born in Ireland, and was educated in France. On the Restoration he returned to England, and was a conspicuous momber of the court of Charles II. Under James II. Hamilton was given the command of an infantry regiment in Ireland, and the government of Limerick. At the battle of Newtown Bntler (1689) he was wounded and defeated, and was also present next year at the battle of the Boyne; but shortly afterwards followed the dethroned king into oxile, entering the French service later on. It was at Sceaux, the seat of the Duchess of Maine, that he wrote his Memoirs of Grammont, which were first printed anonymously in Fronch in Holland, in the year 1713. An English translation was issued in the following year. This work contains much information on court politics of the reign of Charles II. Count Hamilton was also the author of certain Contes, or Stories, which are highly praised by Voltaire.

Hamilton, Emma, Lady (b. 1763, d. 1815), was the daughter of a Welsh servantgirl. She seems to have lost her character in early years. After various adventures she was married to Sir William Hamilton, the English ambassador at Naples (1791). this court she soon became very intimatewith the queen, Marie Caroline, and did not hesitate to use this intimacy for the purposeof unravelling state secrets which she claimed to be of importance to Great Britain. In 1793 she made the acquaintance of Nelson (q.v.), whose mistress she soon became. His execution of Carraciolo has been ascribed, though probably wrongly, to her influence. In 1800 she returned to England with Nelson. Lady Hamilton survived Nelson ten years, and died in mean circumstances in Calais (1815). Before her death she published two volumes. containing her correspondence with Nelson. Her memoirs were published at London in the same year.

Hamilton, Sir James (d. 1540), was a natural son of James, first Earl of Arran. He was a favourite of James V. of Scotland, superintended the erection or the improvement of many royal palaces and castles, e.g., Falkland, Linlithgow, Edinburgh, and Stirling. In later years he was made a judge in heresy, and in this capacity showed himself very severe towards the Reformers. At last, being accused of treason and embezzlement, he was found guilty and executed.

Hamilton, John (d. 1571), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was the natural brother of the Earl of Arran, the Regent of Scotland in 1543, and is said by the Scotch historians to have "ruled all at court," and to have been French at heart. He was also very friendly with Cardinal Beaton. He was appointed Privy Seal and Treasurer (1543), and was strongly opposed to the Duke of Somerset's plan of marrying Edward and Mary (1547). By this time Hamilton was Archbishop of St. Andrews, to which office he had succeeded on the assassination of Cardinal Beaton. He was a strennous opponent of the Reformed doctrines, and in 1558 condemned Walter Mill to be burnt for heresy. He baptised James VI. in 1566, and about the same time.

signed a bond in favour of Bothwell. He was a member of Mary's Privy Council, and continued faithful to her cause, though in 1563 he was impanelled for saying mass, and committed to ward by her orders. Hamilton, though an archbishop, lived in open adultery, and had to obtain several Acts of Parliament for the legitimisation of his bastard children. He was a party to Dsrnley's murder; and it was ho who in 1567 divorced Bothwell from his wife, and so enabled him to marry the queen. He was hanged at Stirling in April, 1571, shortly after the fall of Dumbarton Castle, in which he had taken refuge.

Ham

Hamilton, James, or Bothwell Auch, had fought for Queen Mary at Langside, and forfeited his estate in consequence of espousing the royal side. On Feb. 23, 1570, he shot the Regent Murray from the balcony of a house in Linlithgow, belonging to Archbishop Hamilton. Within a few days he escaped to France, where he lived for some time in receipt of a pension from Queen Mary. In 1572 his name was excepted from the benefit of the truce between the members of the king's party and the queen's party.

Hamilton, James, 3nd Marquis of (b. 1606, d. 1649), succeeded his father in 1625, and was sent in 1638 by Charles J. as his Commissioner to the Covenanters, to demand the rescinding of the whole Covenant. Having failed to effect a compromise, he was empowered to make an entire surrender of the Service Book, the Book of Canons, and the High Commission. In 1639 he was again sent to Scotland in command of a fleet of nineteen vessels, conveying five regiments of royal troops. In 1643 he was raised to the rank of duke, but was subsequently imprisoned on a charge of disloyalty. In August, 1648, he was defeated by Cromwell at Preston, and taken prisoner, being beheaded in London in the following March, after a summer y mock trial before Bradshaw.

Hamilton, WILLIAM DCUOLAS, DUKE OF (b. 1637, d. 1695), appears as member of the Scotch Privy Council in the year 1686, when he was summoned by James II. to London for demurring at the king's policy of favour to the Roman Catholics and persecution of the Covenanters. On James refusing to allow religious liberty to the Covenanters, the interview came to an untisfactory conclusion, and when the Argembly the Scotch Estates also proved refractory, riamilton led the opposition. But, though he threw out hints against the dispensing power, his opposition to Jarces's arbitrary acts was but languid. At the Revolution he joined the victorious side, while his eldest son declared for James. He was elected President of the Convention by a large majority over the Duke of Athole, and, when the Convention became a Parliament, he was made Lord High Commissioner. But he attempted to bring the old influence of the crown, by means of the Lords of the Articles, to bear on the Estates, and hence a strong opposition was formed which thwarted his government for the remainder of the session. On the discovery of Montgomery's plot (1689-90) to place James on the throne, it was discovered that he had been offered the post of President of the Council. Upon this William dismissed him from his office of Commissioner, and put Lord Melville in his place (1690). From this moment Hamilton began to oppose the plans of government with such persistency that William III. was once heard to exclaim, "I wish to heaven that Scotland were a thousand miles off, and the Duke of Hamilton were king of it." He spoke with considerable wisdom on the Settlement of the Scotch Church, by which synodical government was re-established, and upheld the cause of the ministers who had been ejected from their livings. On the fall of Melville he once more occupied Holyrood House as Lord High Commissioner (1692), and is said to have subscribed £3,000 to the African Company. "He was," says Mr. Burton, "neither bigoted nor unscrupulous, but infirm of purpose. A peculiar capriciousness of political action, a wavering uncertsinty, which sickened all firm reliance, seems to have become constitutional to the house of Hamilton."

Hamilton, JAMES, DUKE OF (d. 1712), made his first appearance in history in opposi-tion to the Lord High Commissioner, the Marquis of Queensberry (1702). He led a secession of more than seventy members from Parliament. The extremely unsettled nature of his political views caused him to be excluded from the Scotch Ur 'n Commission, and he became a zealous opponent of that measure, and, in consequence, the darling of the Edinburgh mob. His influence in this year (1706) checked a projected rising of Cameronians and Jacobites. In 1707 the opponents of the Union were reduced to despair, and, as a last attempt, it was resolved to lay a solemn protest on the table of the House, and then secede from Parliament. It was to have been presented by Hamilton. At the last moment he refused to appear, pleading toothache, and when peremptorily summoned declared he had never had any intention of presenting the protest. By some it was supposed that the cause of his conduct was the claim of the house of Hamilton to the Scotch throne, and by others that Anne had commanded him to lay aside his opposition to the Union, as it was a preliminary step to a Stuart restoration. In 1708 he was looked on as the leader of a Jacobite insurrection, but the emissary from St. Germains, Colonel Hooke, was unable to obtain an interview with him. When the French invasion of 1707—8 was imminent, the Duke of Hamilton set out for England, where he was arrested; but was set free by the exertions of the Whig peers, Newcastle and Wharton, who wished to gain popularity for their party in Scotland. In 1711 h was allowed to take his seat in the House of Lords as an English peer, with the title of Duke of Hamilton and Brandon. In 1712 he was appointed ambassador to France, and it is asserted by the Jacobito Lockhart, that he was to be sent over with the view of undertaking the restoration of the Pretender. Before his departure he was killed in a ducl with Lord Mohun, in which there was every appearance of foul play. His death was regarded by the Tories as a political murder.

Hamilton, Patrick (b. 1503, d. 1528), the "proto-martyr of Scotland," had held one of the lay benefices of the Church, being Abbot of Fern, in Ross-shire. He is said to have studied theology in Germany, under Luther and Melanchtlon. In 1528 he was accused of heresy, for which offence he suffered death before the old college of St. Andrews.

Hamilton, Richard, was descended from a noble Scotch family long settled in Ireland. Though a Catholic by religion he had a seat in the Irish Privy Council, and commanded tho Irish Privy Council, and commanded tho Irish troops sent over to England in 1688. After James II.'s flight he submitted to William, and was sent over to Ireland by the new king as his envoy, having first pledged himself to return in three weeks. Finding, however, that Tyrconnel was determined on resistance, he broke his parole, marched into Ulster at the head of an Irish force, and routed the Protestants at Strabane, April 16, 1689. For some time he was in command of the besiegers of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne led the cavalry in their gallant efforts to retrieve the day. In their last stand he was severely wounded and captured. William did not revenge himself on him for his treachery, and he was exchanged for Mountjoy in 1692, and d' I in the service of Louis XIV.

Hamilton, Rowan, was a gentleman of fortune who became a United Irishman. In the year 1794 he was apprehended, sentenced to pay a fine of £500, and imprisoned. Jackson, a French sp., corresponded with him. Rowan Hamilton, however, made his escape frem Newgate as soon as he heard of Jackson's apprehension, and fled to America. He was in his absence sentenced to death, but his estates were saved; and in 1805 Castlereagh got him a pardon, and he then lived quietly in Ireland till his death.

Hamilton, William Gerard (5, 1729, d. 1796), was elected member for Petersfield in 1754. It was in the next year that he delivered the famous speech which won for him the title of "Single-speech Hamilton"

(Nov. 13). After this occasion he never addressed the House of Commons again, fearing, so it was currently reported, to lose the reputation he had acquired by his great effort. In 1761 he was appointed secretary to Lord Halifax, and was for twenty years Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland. Gerard Hamilton was one of the numerous reputed authors of Junius, and Fox is credited with having once said, in reference to this question, that he would back him against any single horse, though not against the whole field. Hamilton retired into private life in 1784.

Hammond, ROBERT, COLONEL, took part in the siege of Bristol in 1645, and was Governor of the Isle of Wight in 1647. When Charles I., in this year, escaped from Hampton Court, negotiations were opened on his behalf with Hammond, who, it was hoped, would espouse his cause, as he had often expressed dissatisfaction with the violence of the soldiers. But Hammond was a trusted friend of Cromwell, and, having married a daughter of John Hampden, was attached to the Parliamentary cause. Accordingly, he could only be induced to promise that he would treat the king as might be expected from a min of honour, and confined him in Carisbrooke Castle, though with much show of respect. While negotiations were being carried on during the next few months, Hammond frequently requested to be discharged from tho charge of the king's person, and in con-sequence was looked upon with more or less suspicion by the officers of the army, till the king was removed to Hurst Castle, whereupon Colonel Hammond was discharged from his government, Nov., 1648.

Hampden, John (b. 1594, d. 1643), was the son of John Hampden, of Great Hampden, Bucks, and Elizabeth Cromwell, aunt of Oliver Cromwell. He was born in London, educated at Thame School, and at Magdalen College, Oxford, and entered the Inner Temple in 1613. In the Parliament of 1620 he repre-sented Grampound; in 1626, Wendover; in 1640, Buckinghamshire. In 1627 he was imprisoned for refusing to pay the forced loan. When the second writ of ship-money was issued, by which that tax was extended to the inland counties, he refused to pay it. case was tried in respect of twenty shillings due from lands in the parish of Stoke Mande-ville, and out of the twelve judges seven decided for the crown, two for Hampden on technical grounds, and three for him on all counts, 1638. This trial made Hampden "the argument of all tongues, every man enquiring who and what he was that he durst of his own charge support the liberty and property of the kingdom, and rescue his country from being made a prey to the court." When a Parliament was again summoned "the eyes of all men were fixed upon him as the pilot which must steer the vessel through the tempest and rocks which threatened it." In the Long Parliament he played an important part, generally moderating by his influence the pressure of the popular party. Thus he urged the Commons to proceed against Strafford by impeachment rather than by bill of attainder, and attempted to arrange a compromise on the Church question. The king's attempt to arrest the Five Members obliged him to alter his policy and urge stronger measures. He was appointed a member of the Committee of Safety, and raised a regiment whese flag bore the significant motte, "Vestigia nulla retrorsum." He distinguished himself by his activity in the first weeks of the war, seizing the king's Commissioners of Array, occupying Oxford, and defeating the Cavaliers in many small skirmishes. Ho arrived too late to fight at Edgehill, but both after that battle, and after the battle of Brentferd, urged vigorous measures on Essex, and in the Committee of Safety argued for a march direct on Oxford. After the capture of Reading in 1643, he again counselled in vain a direct attack on the king's head-On June 18, 1643, at Chalgrove quarters. Field, in endcavouring to prevent the retreat of a body of cavalry which had made a sally from Oxford, he was mertally wounded and died six days later. Clarendon describes him as "a very wise man and of great parts, possessed with the most absolute faculties to govern the people of any man I ever knew." His influence depended not on his ability as a speaker, or skill as a soldier, but on his energy and charactor. "He was very temperate in diet, and a supremo governor over all his passions and affections, and had thereby a great power over all other men's. He was of an industry and vigilance not to be tired out or wearied by the most laborious, and of parts not to be imposed upon by the most subtle or sharp, and of a personal courage equal to his parts."

Hampden, John (d. 1696), grandson of the fameus John Hampden, distinguished hamself by his opposition to the succession of the Duke of York, on the ground of his religion. Later, he was implicated in the Rye House Plot, and was arrested, together with Essex, Russell, and others (1683). On this occasion, though his life was spared, he was condemned to pay an enormous fine (£40,000). After the Revolution, he was chairman of a committee appointed to prepare an address to William III. inveighing against the conduct of Louis XIV. The same year (1689) he is found attacking Lord Halifax, not only in the House of Commons, but before the Lords. In 1690 he failed to obtain a seat in the Tory Parliament elected that year. Disappointed in his ambition, and perhaps sahamed of the reproaches his own conduct brought upon him, he committed suicide a few years later.

Hampdon, Dr., THE Case or (1847). Notwithstanding the fact that his doctrines were in many quarters considered to be highly unorthodex, especially by the Tractarian party, Dr. R. Hampden, Fellow of Oriel and Principal of St. Mary Hall, had been appointed in 1836 Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford by Lord Melbourne. This appointment was eensured by the convocation of the university, and, in consequence, the university authorities deprived him of the privilege of granting tificates to the candidates for holy o who attended this, in 1847 his lectures. In sp Lord Jehn Russell and the crown to appoint him to the ant see of Hereford. This produced a great outcry, and a strong protest from many of the High Church elergy. The forms of election were, however, gono through, in spite of the opposition of the Dean of Hereford. The election was formally confirmed in the Court of Arches, and an appeal was made in vain to the Court of Queen' Bench. Bishop Hampden died in 1868.

Hampton Court was a palace built by Cardinal Wolsey. From Wolsey's possession it passed into the hands of the king, and has continued to be the property of the crown ever since. Henry VIII. greatly enlarged it, and formed around it a royal park. Having been, until George II.'s time, a favourite residence of the Kings of England, Hampton Court has naturally been the scene of several interesting events in the history of our royal family. The birth of Edward VI., the death of his mother, Jane Seymour, and the famons conference of James I.'s reign between the High Church party and the Puritans, all took place there. Charles I. was imprisoned there for a time during the Commonwealth, and the palace was the occasional residence of Protector Cromwell, and, in later years, of Charles II. and James II. By William III. the palace was to a reat extent rebuilt, and its park and gardens laid out in the formal Dutch style.

Hampton Court Conference (1604). On the accession of James I. there was a general feeling that some concessions might be made both to the extreme High Church and the extreme Presbyterian sections of the nation. The leading Puritans were ready to soften down their demands, and a great part of the laity-Bacon amongst the numberwere, at all events, not opposed to a compromise. On his progress to London, James had received the "Millenary Petition" from the clergy, and in the January of 1604 gave orders for a conference to be held between representatives of the Established Church and the Puritans. The Archbishop of Canterbury, eight bishops, and other Church dignitaries, were the champions on the one side; four moderate Puritans on the other. But the nomination of the last party was a mere farce. They were not admitted to the discussions between the king and the bishops, which were carried on in the presence of the Lords of the Council. In this manner, the extent of the concessions that would be granted was arranged before the complainants' case was heard; and when, on the second day, the Puritan spokesman, Reynolds, proposed some alterations in the articles, and proposed to introduce the Lambeth Articles, and to inquire into the authority for confirmation, Bishop Bancroft interrupted him, and kneeling down before the king, begged him not to listen to a "schismatic speaking against his bishops." Then the conference proceeded to discuss questions of doctrine, and James accepted Reynolds's proposal for a new translation of the Bible. The debate next passed on to the comparative value of a learned and unlearned ministry, of prayers, and of preaching; but each party wished in the first place to make its own views and customs binding on the other; the true spirit of compromise was absent. At last the subject of "prophesyings" (q.v.) came forward, a religious exercise of which many moderate men like Bacon did not disapprove; but, unluckily, Reynolds proposed that disputes during the prophesyings should be settled by the bishop and his presbytery. James took offence at the word, which reminded him of all that he had endured in Scotland. From this moment the equestion was settled, and on the third day's conference the king and the bishops agreed ns in the Prayerto a few triffir book and to the my of commissions with a view to . the best means for obtaining clergy. It was then announced the uritans that they would have to rubscribe to the whole Prayerbook, the Articles, and the King's Supremacy. And so the Hampton Court Conference ended, without any reasonable concessions having been made to the Puritan party.

Hanover, The House of, to which His Majesty Edward VII. belongs, is lineally descended from the famous Guelfs, or Welfs, of Bavaria, who, in the twelfth century, struggled for the Empire against the Hohenstaufen, and gave their name to the Papal faction of mediæval Italy. Henry the Proud became Duke of Saxony as well as Duke of Bavaria, and in 1180, on the fall of his son Henry the Lion, the allodial lands of the Guelfic house in the former duchy were saved from the forfeiture which befell their greater possessions. After the last struggle of Otto IV., aided by his uncles Richard and John of England, the Guelfs acquiesced in their new position, and in 1235 the districts of Brunswick and Lüneburg were erected into a duchy in their favour by Frederick II. After various partitions and reunions the whole of the duchy of Brunswick fell, in 1527, into the hands of Duke Ernest, a zealous adherent of Luther. His two sons effected a partition of the duchy, which has continued until the present day. The elder son of Ernest became the Duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. The present Duke of Brunswick is his descendant. William, the younger son of Ernest, became Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, and is the ancestor of the house of Hanover. A farther division of Lüneburg was made in favour of George, the only one of William's seven sons who was allowed to marry. He was made Duko of Calenberg, with the town of Hanover for his capital, Celle being the chief town of Lüneburg. After various shiftings, his second son, George William, became Duke of Lüneburg or Celle; and his fourth son, Ernest Augustus, Duke of Calenberg or Hanover (1679). The latter was an able and ambitious prince, He introduced primogeniture, and married Sophia, the daughter of Frederick the Elector Palatine, and Elizabeth, day her of James I. of England. In 1692 his onstant adherence to the cause of the Emperor was rewarded by the creation of a ninth electorate in his favour, on conditions which cnsured his hearty support to the league against Louis XIV. This electorate was properly called the electorate of Brunswick (Kurbraunschweig), but as the Dukes of Wolfenbüttel had especially appropriated the title of Dukes of Brunswick with their claims over that once free town, the new Electors were often called Electors of Hanover, which name, hitherto strictly confined to the town, was henceforth used as the name of the district as well. The Act of Settlement (1701) made the Electress Sophia heiress to the English throne. Ernest had already died in 1698, and their son George Louis, by marrying Sophia Dorothea of Celle, the daughter and heiress of George William of Lüneburg, succeeded on the latter's death, in 1705, to his dominions. Calenberg and Lüneburg were thus reunited, and the new Elector put in possession of dominions more adequate to sustain his dignity. In 1714 he became King of England. From that date to 1837 the electorate of Hanover and the English monarchy were united. In 1815 it was erected into a kingdom with large accessions of territory. But in 1837 the accession of Queen Victoria made the Duke of Cumberland King of Hanover, as males only were allowed to occupy that throne. Thirty years of arbitrary government and of violated constitutions, lod to the absorption of Hanover into the Prussian state after the war of 1866.

The house of Hanover has continued to reign in England since George Louis became

Speaking very roughly, we may divide the Hanoverian period of English history into three sections. From 1714 to 1761 the Whig oligarchy governed the country. After a few years of transition, a long period of Tory rule, 1770—1830, culminates in the reaction against the French Revolution. With 1830 begins the period of Reform, in which we are still engaged. George I. (1714-1727) ascended the throne as the pledged supporter of the Whig party, to whose triumph he owed the throne, and by whose principles alone he could claim it. Ignorant of the English language, government, and constitution, he suffered without much difficulty the authority of the crown to pass into the hands of the ministry which had the confidence of Parliament, and was content if his demands for money were satisfied, and if the foreign policy of England was framed with special regard to the interest of his electorate. Under him, as under his son, George II. (1727-1760), England, in the unmeasured language of Opposition orators, "became a province of a despicable electorate." But it may be doubted whether the policy of England and the policy of Hanover did not generally coincide, except perhaps so far as the jealousy of a petty German prince at the rise of Prussia for a time brought English influence rather to bear against the development of the great state which was ultimately to bring unity to Germany. But despite the personal hostility of George II. and Frederick the Great, the crisis of the Seven Years' War forced them into an alliance which saved I'russia and covered England with glory. George II. had been content to govern on the lines of his father; but his son Frederick, Prince of Wales, became the centre of a new Toryism that had its highest expression in Bolingbroke's Idea of a Patriot King. George III., the son of Frederick (1760-1820), began a new epoch in the history of the house of Hanover, by carrying into practico Bolingbroke's theories, and by endeavouring to securo for the king personally the exercise of those prerogatives which the practice of George I. and George II. had handed over to his ministers. His first triumph under Lord North was for a timo ended by the Coalition, but under Pitt his ideas finally gained the victory, and the new Toryism of the reaction from the French Revolution found in him a centro for its loyalty. Proud of his "British" nationality, and more intent on home than foreign polities, the dependence of English policy on Hanoverian interests nearly ecased, and the long occupation of that country by Napoleon (1803-1814), almost cut the connection between the kingdom and the electorate. Georgo IV., who, first as Regent (1810-1820), and then as king (1820-1830), was his successor, was too feeble and self-indulgent, too destitute of fixed principle and courage to maintain his father's position. He managed to stave off reform in England and Hanover; but his brother, William IV. (1830-7), while accepting the Reform Bill of 1832 in England, gave a Constitution to Hanover in 183. The constitutional rule of Queen Victoria (1837-1901), and the practical wisdom of her husband, enabled the transition back from the practice of George III. to the practice of George I, to be made without friction or difficulty. In 1901 Edward VII. ascended the throne and continued Queen Victoria's policy. It is hard to formulate any general characteristics of the rule of the house of Hanover in England. Underthem the constitution has been preserved, and the material aspects of the country revolutionised. Without any lofty ability, their good sense and power to see things as they are have made them well adapted to occupy the difficult position into which they have been elevated.

The best general histories of England during the Hanoverian period are Lord Stanhope's History of England, 1713—1783; Massey's History of the Regn of George III.; Miss Martinean's History of the Thirty Year" Peace; Charles Knight's Popular History of England; Spencer Walpole's History of England since 1815; Molesworth's History of England for the same period; and Dr. Paull's Geschichte Englands seit 1814. The constitutional history of the reign. Feorge I. and II. is given in Hallam, and that of the subsequent period in Sir Erskins May's Constitutional History, 1780—1870; while Begehot's English Constitution gives us the modern theory of the Constitution. The History of Our Own Times in pleasantly but superficially told by Mr. Justin McCarthy. Mr. Lecky's History of England during the Eighleenth Century history, and is particularly valuable for Irish affairs. The history of the house of Hanover in Germany may be found in Hune's Geschichte des Königreiche Hannover und Braunschweig.

[T. F. T.] Hanover, The Treatt of (Sept. 3, 1725), between England, France, and Prussia, was rendered necessary by the Treaty of Vienna (April 20, 1725) between Spain and Austria. By the secret article of the treaty, marriages between the two houses were arranged; Austria and Spain pledged themselves to assist the restoration of the Stuarts, and to compel, if necessary by force, the restoration of Gibraltar and Minerca. The Jacobito leaders were in direct communication with Ripperda. In opposition to this alliance, Walpole and Townshend obtained the accession of France and Prussia to a confederacy of which England was the centre. In case of any attack on one of the contracting parties, the others were to furnish a certain quota in troops, or the value in ships and money; and, in case of need, should agree concerning further succours. The real objects of the treaty were to eounterbalance the Treaty of Vienna, compel the Emperor to relinquish the Ostend. Company (which Austria had established for trade with the Indies in violation of the Barrier Treaty), and to resist any attempts that might be made in behalf of the Pretender. Its objects were successful. The Emperor withdrew from his unfortunate position, and peace was signed at Paris in May, 1727. The Treaty of Hanover was violently attacked by the Opposition during Walpole's administration. Its true justification lies in the terms of the Secret Treaty of Vienna.

Lord Stanhope, Hist, of England; Locky, Hist, of England during the Eighteenth Contury,

Eansard, Luke (b. 1752, d. 1828), was at first a compositor in the office of Mr. Hughes, printer to the House of Commons. After two years he became a partner in the firm, and in 1800 the business came entirely into his hands. He managed the issue of the report of Parliamentary proceedings which, down to the year 1803, is known as Cobbett's Parliamentary History; and after that date was continued under the title of Parliamentary Debates by Hansard. The official report of the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament is now published under the title of "The Parliamentary Debates." [Stockbale.]

Hanseatic League (HANSA), THE, was a powerful commercial league very closely bound up with English foreign trade. The Teutonic hansa (it first appears in the Gothic translation of the New Testament), signifies a company of men both in a military and non-military sense. So it is used (Luke vi. 7) for a great company of people, and St. Mark (xv. 16) for a band of soldiers; hence comes its more general meaning of any kind of union or assemblage. In the earliest days of the Middle Ages, all foreign merchants stood outside the law of the country in which they were settled for trading purposes; being neither sharers in the rights, nor subject to the duties of the nation in whose midst they had planted themselves. The Hanseatie League of historical times was only a development of the principle of association which bound foreign traders in a strange country into a community for the common protection. In the first stage of its growth (as a league of merchants abroad), the Hansa may be said to have grown up chie's in London; for none of the three other great centres of Teutonic foreign trade—Wisby, Novgorod, and Bruges was of so early a date, or at the same time composed so purely of foreign merchants in an alien country. Even in the days of Edgar (959-975) there appears to have been a large settlement of German traders in London; and this settlement was early possessed of its own Guildhall or Hans-hus, and a body of officers controlling the members and possessions of the society. But it seems that the foreign merchants in London were mostly townsmen of Cologne; and it soon became the rule for all other Germans desirous of sharing in the English trade to join the Asses of the men of this city. By the end of the thirteenth century special privileges had been conferred upon the duild-hall of the Germans in London; for this society was gradually coming to embrace all the German merchants settled there (c. 1282). and this "Hansa Alemanniae" Included the smaller Hansas of separate German towns as branch houses of itself. Under the name of the Steelyard, it soon camo to play a most important part in the foleign trade of this country. The London Hansa acquired the country. The London Hansa sequired the power of judging its own numbers, and oven of settling some disputes between them and Englishmen. In 1282, in consideration of its munificent contribution towards building the new Bishops-gate, the Hansa was allowed to choose its own alderman-to represent it in the city councils, and to be the special protector of its members; but It was, at the same time, bound to make choice of a London merchant. London, however, was not the sole seat of this foreign colony, which had subordinate establishments at other places, such as Lynn and Boston. The special privileges accorded to these stranger tradesmen did not fail to awaken English jealousy in the course of the fourteenth century—the century on which the real Hanseatic League of history may be said to have assumed its true importance by becoming a league of German cities at home; and from this time its political history ceases to be in any peculiar way connected with England. But its commercial importance continued for a long period. Down to the middle of the sixteenth century it was mainly through the hands of the Hanseatio League that the produce of North Europe and Russia reached our shores; and it was this league that brought the furs and sables of Muscovy for the wealthy English, and exported the herrings which abounded on our eastern shores. But the monepoly of trade enjoyed by this league in time awakened the jealousy of the English merchants, and in the reign of Richard II., an Act was passed prohibiting aliens selling to other aliens, or even selling by retail at all (1392); and when the charter of the London Hansa had been renewed some fourteen years earlier, its members were enjoined to "aid, council, and comfort" Englishmen abroad. The exclusive privileges of the league in England were practically extinguished in 1579.

Hans-hus, The, was the name given to the Guildhall where the merchants and burghers of early English towns met to treat of their by-laws and trade regulations. So in Archbishop Thurstan's (1114) charter to Beveriey he writes: "I will that my burgesses of Beverley shail have their Hans-hus; which I will, and grant to them in order that their common business may be done... for the amendment of the whole town with the same freedom that the men of York have in their Hans-hus." Another use to which the Hans-hus was put, was as a recognised centre where purchases and saics might be conducted in the presence of lawful witnesses. The Hans at London dates at least from the time of Ethelred the Unready.

Harcourt, Simon, Loup (b. 1660, d. 1727) was called to the bar in 1683. He was elected member for Abingdon, in the first Parliament of William III. He was a strong opponent of the Revolution Settlement; and of the attainder of Sir John Fenwick; and in 1701 conducted the impeachment of Lord Somers for his share in the Partition Treaty. Next year he became Solicitor-General and Attorney-General, and in this capacity conducted the prosecution of Daniel Defoe (1703); but his legal abilities were better employed in framing the bill for the Scotch Union. He followed Harley out of office in 1708; and his able defence of Sacheverell, two years later, resulted in the acquittal of that divine. When the Tories came into power in 1710, he was appointed Lord Kee, of the Privy Seal. In the quarrel between Oxford and Bolingbroke, he sided with the latter statesman. On the accession of George I., Lord Harcourt was deprived of office. In 1717 he defeated the impeachment of Oxford, [HARLEY.] In 1721 he became a convert to Whig principles.

Harcourt, Sir William Vernox (b. 1827, d. 1904), graduated in high honours at Cambridge in 1854, being appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1854, being appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1866. In 1868 he became Liberal M.P. for Oxford City, migrating to Derby in 1880 and to West Monmouth in 1895. His letters to the Times signed "Historicus," on international law during the war in America, attracted attention. He became Solicitor-General and was knighted in 1873. He was made Home Secretary in 1880. In 1886 and 1892-95 he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and effected an important revision of the Death Duties and of the Income Tax. In 1894 he succeeded Mr. Gladstone as Leader of the House of Commons, a position he resigned in 1898, but remained a prominent Parliamentary figure till his death.

Hardicanute, or Harthacnut, Kino (s. March, 1040, d. June, 1042), was the son of Cannte by Emma. On the death of his father in 1035 he got possession of Denmark and laid claim to England. He was supported by Godwin and the West Saxons, and eventually made a treaty with his brother Harold, whereby he should reign in the south and Harold in the nor¹, but in 1037 Harold was chosen king over all, and Hardicanute forsaken because he stayed too iong in Denmark. At the same time Emma was driven out and fied to Bruges. Here Hardicanute joined her and was preparing to assert his ciaims, when in 1040 Harold died. Upon this Hardicanute was unanimously chosen king, but soon proved himself as worthless as his brother. "All his public acts set him before us as a rapacious, brutal, and biood-thirsty tyrant." His first acts were to levy a heavy Danegeld, and order Harold's body to 1.3 dug up, beheaded, and thrown into a ditch. The Danegeld led to a revolt at Worcester against the Housecarls, who were killed in their attempt to collect the tax. rising was speedily crushed, Worcester was burned, and the whole of the shire ravaged. The only other event of importance in this reign is Hardicanute's accusation of Godwin as the murderer of the Atheling Alfred. The trial which ensued resulted in the triumphant acquittal of Godwin, who, to make his peace with the king, presented him with a ship fully manned and equipped. Probably with the idea of regaining popularity, Hardicanute sent over to Normandy for his halfbrother Edward, who came and lived at his court. In 1042, while at the marriage-feast of his standard-bearer, Tovi the Proud, Hardicannte suddenly fell down dead as he stood at drink.

Hardinge, HENRY, 1st LORD (b. 1785, d. 1856), entered the army at a very early age, and was present at most of the great battles of the Peninsular War. He distinguished himself greatly at the battle of Albuera, and later, during the Hundred Days, he was entrusted with the important office of Commissioner at the Prussian head-quarters. In this capacity he was with Biucher at the battle of Ligny, but the loss of his left hand, which was taken off by a shot, prevented his presence at Waterloo. During the years of peace that followed, he entered Parliament and held office under the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, till the latter minister appointed him Governor-General of India in 1844. His first year of office was marked by the Scinde mutiny. In 1845 the disturbances across the Sutiej, which had followed the death of Runjeet Singh, grew more and more dangerous to the British dominions. The intrigues of Lal Singh and Fej Singh to obtain the supreme power at last ended in their crossing the Sutlej and invading the British territory. The first Sikh War, marked by the brilliant battles of Moodkee and Aliwal, and the crowning victory of Sobraon, lasted till 1846; and in that year Lord Hardinge was able to conclude the pacification of Lahore, by which he hoped to establish the security of the British north-west arontier. The infant Dhuleep Singh was left as nominal Maharajah at Lahore under the regency of his mother and I.al Singh; and it was finally decided that the British troops should remain for eight years, and so ensure the tranquillity of the Sikhs till the young prince came of age. Part of this plan included the transfer of Cashmere to the rule of Golab Singh. The rest of the year was occupied in suppressing insurrections in Cashmere and Scinde. In 1847 Hardinge, who, in 1846, had been created Viscount Hardinge of Lahore, returned to England. In 1852, on the death of the Duke of Wellington, Lord Hardinge was appointed Commander-in-chief, and in 1852 was advanced to the rank of field-marsh.

Hardwicke, PHILIP YORKE, 1ST EARL or (b. 1690, d. 1764), the son of an attorney at Dover, was called to the bar in 1715. His political rise was due to Newcastie and Stanhope. He first sat for Lewes in 1718, and was made Solicitor-General in 1720. From that date he became, in succession, Attorney-General (1723), Lord Chief Justice and Lord Hardwicke (1733), and Lord Chancellor (1737). He supported Walpole through his long administration; but towards the close of it he was constrained to disagree with his chief's peace policy, and became an advocate for war. On the fall of Walpole he continued to hold office under Wilmington, and, subsequently, under the Pelhams. In 1753 Lord Hardwicke introduced a new Marriage Act [MARRIAGE LAWS.], and, during the debates on it, had a violent quarrel with Henry Fox, who disapproved of it. In 1754 he was raised to an earldom. He went out of office with the Dnke of Newcastle, of whose administration he had been the chief supporter. In 1758 he persuaded the Lords to throw ont a bill for the extension of Habeas Corpus, and introduced a measure for abolishing hereditary jurisdictions in Scot-land. His last great speech was directed against the Treaty of Paris, by which the Seven Years' War was closed. Next year (1764) Lord Hardwicke died, leaving behind him the reputation of being one of the greatest Chancellors that have sat on the Woolsack since the Revolution.

Hardy, Sir Thomas Masterman (b. 1769, d. 1839), Nelson's favourite captain, was born near Dorchester. He entered the navy at the age of twelve, and was present at the battles of St. Vincent (1797) and the Nile (1798). For his bravery in this last action, Nelson gave him the Vanguard. In 1803 he became Nelson's flag-captain, and it was on board his ship, the Victory, that Lord Nelson received his fatal wound at the battle of Trafalgar. In later years Hardy commanded the South American squadron, and later still was appointed a Lord of the Λ initialty and Governor of Greenwich Hospital (1834).

Hardy, Sin Thomas Durrus (b. 1804. d. 1878), succeeded Sir Francis l'algrave as Deputy-Keeper of the Public Records in 1861. He was one of the most indefatigable students of early English history. His most important work is a Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Britain and Ireland to the reign of Henry VII. (4 vol. . Rolls Series). This work has been left in-complete, and does not extend beyond the year 1325. It contains an account of all tho original authorities on English history arranged in ehronelogical order, and not only estimates the amount of authority to be assigned to each writer, but also gives a list of MSS, and printed editions supplemented by an account of the author's life and sources of information. Sir Thomas Hardy likewise published a Syllabus to Rymer's Fudera (2 vols.), which is rendered specially valuable by its chronological tables giving the legal, civil, and ecclesiastical years in parallel columns, with the regnal years of each English sovereign, and the day of the month on which each begins.

Hardyng, John (b. 1378, d. 1465), was brought up as a dependant of the Percies from the age of twelve. He was present at the battle of Shrewsbury, and was afterwards a faithful servant of Edward, Duke of York, subsequently Edward IV. He composed a Chronicle extending from the earliest times to Henry VI.'s flight into Scotland. He vast great pains to get original document and Scotland, which he gave to the last three is in whose reigns he lived. His Chrossy, which was edited by Sir H. Edis in 1812, is not of much value, being chiefly composed of facts collected from earlier writers, and loosely thrown into rhyme. For the years of his own life he may be regarded as an original anthority. Hardy and a Chronicle was continued in proce in the next century by Richard Grafton.

Harfleur, a town of France, lying some six miles from Havre, was taken by Henry V. Sept. 22, 1415. It was besieged by the Count d'Armagnac and relieved by the Duke of Bedford the following year. The English were expelled in 1433, but once more obtained possession of the city in 1440, and held it till 1449, when they were driven out by Dunois.

Harlaw, The Battle of (July 24, 1411), was fought between the invading Islesmen, under Donald of the Isles, and the Lowland troops, under the Earl of Mer. Donald was completely defeated.

Harley, ROBERT, EARL OF OXFORD (b. 1661, d. 1724), was the eldest son of Sir Edward Harley, a Puritan who had sat in the Long Parliament, and who declared for

Har

William III. at the Revolution. Robert Harley began his political career as the Whig member for a Cornish borough; but he gradually changed his politics, and adopted Toryism. In 1690 he was appointed one of the arbitrators for uniting the two East India Companies: and in 1696 he, as leader of the Tories, proposed the Land Bank scheme as a rival to the Bank of England. Next year he moved that the army should be reduced to what it had been in the year 1680, and when the measure was carried, William was ferced to dismiss his Dutch guards. In 1701 he was chosen Speaker of the Commons. In 1704 Marlborough, who had broken with the extreme High Tories, selected him to suceeed Nottingham as Secretary of State, and in 1706 he was app inted one of the commissioners for the Treaty of Union with Scotland. Finding that the Tories were being gradually ousted from the ministry, ho used the influence of his cousin, Mrs. Masham, fer the purpose of intriguing against Marlberough. He represented to Anne that Church interests were in danger, and the queen was encouraged to create Dr. Blackall and Sir William Dawes Bishops of Excter and Chester respectively, without consulting her ministers (1707). Marlborough and Godolphin at once determined to break with Harley. It was discovered that one Gregg, a clerk in his office, was in correspondence with France, and this was made a ground for his dismissal. Though the queen was difficult to move, she yielded at last, and Harley resigned his office in 1708. On the sudden fall of the Whigs, Harley became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and virtually I rime Minister (1710), with Bolingbroke for his colleague and rival. Harley at once began to negotiate a peace with France, while at the same time he intrigued with the Jacobite court at St. Germains. Guiscard (q.v.), a French refugee, who had frequently been consulted by Marlborough, now offered to betray the English plans to the French, and on the detection of his correspondence, he stabbed Harley with a penknife while under examination before the Council. This wound, and the South Sea Company started by Harley at this time, made him very popular, and the queen created him Earl of Oxford and Lord Treasurer. Meanwhile the negotiations for peace were being carried on. Marlborough was dismissed from office, and the hostile majority in the Lords was neutralised by the ereation of twelve peers. In March, 1713, the Peace of Utrecht was signed. But dissensions broke out in the ministry. Bolingbroke wished for a Stuart restoration; Oxford was averse to such an extreme measure. Bolingbroke, in order to get rid of the Lord Treasurer, introduced the Schism Act, a measure conceived entirely in the High Church spirit. Afraid to offend the Dissenters, Oxford acted with great indecision, and was in consequence dismissed (July, 1714). After the accession of George I., Oxford was impeached by the Commons; but the proceedings against him were dropped, as it would have been impossible to substantiate the charges of treason. Enraged at the treatment he had met with, Harley wrote from the Tower, offering his services to the Pretender; but on his release he retired into the country. In 1721 the leader-ship in Bishop Atterbury's plot was offered him, but he declined it. "Oxford seems," says Lord Stanhope, "to have possessed in perfection a low sort of management, and all the base arts of party, which enabled him to cajole and keep together his followers, and to sow divisions amongst his enemies." He was also a great lover of literature, and a friend of the leading men of letters of his day-of Swift and Pope among the number. His splendid collection of MSS, still forms one of the chief treasures of the British Museum.

Harold I., King (s. Nov., 1035, d. March 17, 1040), was reported to be the son of Canute, by Elgiva (Ælfgifu) of Northampton; but the supporters of the claims of Hardicanute (Harthaenut) contended that his parentage was, in the highest degree, After Canute's death the rival doubtful. claims of Harold and Hardicanute were eagerly debated, the former being supported by Leofric, the Danish party, and the city of London; the latter by Godwin and the West Saxons, as well as by his mother Emma. The result was that Harold obtained the country to the north of the Thames, and Hardicanute got Wessex, which, during his absence in Denmark, was administered by Godwin and Emma. In 1036 the two sons of Ethelred made an attempt to recover their father's kingdom, but failed; whereupon the younger, Alfred, was taken and put to death by Harold. In 1037 the Anglo-Saxon Chroniele tells us "they chose Harold over all the kings, and forsook Harthacnut, because he was too leng in Denmark." Thus, in Mr. Freeman's words, "England again became one kingdom under one king, an union which, since that day, has never been broken." Harold at once banished Emma, who retired to Flanders, but reconciled himself with Godwin and the English party. His reign is not remarkable for anything, and of his administration absolutely nothing is known. Great corruption, however, appears to have prevailed in the Church under his government. We read of bishopries being held in plurality, and being sold for money, as well as of many other abuses. In 1039 Hardicanute, who had joined his mother at Bruges, prepared an expedition against his brother, but before it set sail Harold had died at Oxford, March 17, 1040. We do not hear of his having had wife or children. He was buried at Westminster, but, by Hardicanute's orders. his body was dug up and thrown into a ditch. Of Harold's character nothing is known. His chief accomplishment would appear to have been swiftness in running, for which he received the sobriquet of "Harefoot."

Freeman, Norman Conquest, i.

Harold II., Kino (b. circa 1021, s. Jan. 6, 1066; d. Oct. 14, 1066), was the second son of Earl Godwin and Gytha. When still young, he shared in the splendid for-tunes of his father, and about 1045 was made Earl of the East Angles. Of the early part of his official career no record remains; his public prominence began with the misfortunes of his house. In the struggle of 1051 he led the men of his earldom to Beverstone to his father's support, fell from power, and was outlawed with him; but he and Leofwine, taking a different road from their fellow outlaws, went to Dublin, where they passed the winter. Appearing next year in the Bristol Channel with nine ships, Harold landed at Porlock, slew thirty opposing thanes and many people, ravaged and robbed without stint, and then sailed away to join his father at Portland. In the restoration of the Godwin family that ensued, Harold was reinstated in his former earldom (1052). His successful activity on this occasion, and the death of his elder brother, Sweyn, marked him for special distinction; and in 1053, when his father died, he at once succeeded him as Earl of the West

Henceforward Harold was the foremost figure and weightiest influence in English politics. Till he became king, almost every important event and action of his own added strength to his position, or increased his reputation. On the death of Siward, in 1055, his brother Tostig became Earl of the Northumbrians. In the same year he rescued Hereford and the country round it from the marauding Welsh, under King Griffith and the refugee Earl Alfgar, chased the invaders back to Wales, and fortified Hereford. Two years later, Herefordshire was placed under his immediate rule; and in a short time his brother Gurth was raised to the East Anglian earldom, while the shires of the south-east were grouped into another for Leofwine. In 1058 Harold was the head of a house whose members divided among them the rule of three-fourths of England. The pious King Edward had practically placed the power of the crown at Harold's disposal. This power and his own he used to check the spread of Norman influence, and the encroachments of the king's Norman favourites. Nature and fortune now clearly pointed to him as the heir of the almost heirless king. Tall and stalwart, comely and gentle, he drew men's eyes and hearts towards him. He had, moreover, en-larged his mind, and added to his capacity by toreign travel, especially by a journey to

Rome. Yet his position was seriously compromised by an unlucky adventure. Having once been shipwrecked on the coast of l'onthieu, he was, after a short captivity, given up by Count Guy to William of Normandy, from whose compulsory hospitality he had to purchase his release by taking an oath to support his host's claim to the English throne. No trace, however, of a belief that this oath was binding can be seen in his subsequent conduct. In 1060 he founded the religious house known later as Waltham Abbey. In 1063 he was provoked by the raids of King Griffith into a systematic invasion of Wales, in which he overran the country "from dyke to sea," routing the Welsh in every encounter, and slaughtering them without mercy. Griffith's head was brought to him, whereupon he married his widow, Aldgyth, daughter of Earl Alfgar, and sister to the young Mercian earl, Edwin. In 1065, when the Northumbrians rose against Tostig, a sense of justice or policy made Harold take their part, and gain the king's sanction to the transfer of their earldom to another brother-in-law, Morcar.

The day after the king's death (Jan. 6, 1066), he "took," as the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle words it, "to the kingdom," being crowned king by virtue of some form of election and the bequest of King Edward. During "the forty weeks and one day" of his reign, his vigilance was never once allowed to sleep. His outlawed brother, and the rival candidate he had forestalled, were planning and preparing his destruction; and the former, repulsed in one or two attempts on the coast, had allied himself with Harold Hardrada, King of Norway. In September he and his ally made their invasion; and Harold had just time to march to York, meet and destroy them at Stamford Bridge, when his more terrible foe, William the Norman, came with a mighty power to challenge his crown. On October 14 the rivals measured their strength at Senlac in Sussex [HASTINGS, BATTLE OF]; and the Englishman, after un unsurpassed display of stubborn valour, was overthrown and slain at six in the evening. His body, mangled by Norman ferocity, was singled out from the enclosing heap of corpses by a former mistress, Edith Swanneck, and buried either on the sea-shore or the minster at Waltham.

Harold Hardrada (d. 1066), King of Norway, was the son of Sigurd and the brother of St. Olaf. In his early years he had served in the Emperor's guard at Constantinople, and made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He came home and reigned with his nephew, Magnus the Good, becoming sole king after Magnus's death. He had long planned the conquest of England, and was in the Orkneys with a great fleet when Tostig was beaten from the east coast. On his way to the Humber Tostig joined his expedition, and they sailed up the Humber together, and marched on York. Victorious at first at Fulford, they gained possession of York; but Harold proved too strong for them, and the Norwegian force was defeated, and the two leaders slain, at Stamford Bridge (Sept. 25, 1066).

Harrington, James (b. 1611, d. 1677), after studying at Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled abroad and entered the service of Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia. Ho subsequently returned to England and entered the household of Charles I. He was, however, a republican, and in 1656 wrote and dedicated to Cromwell a political romance called Oceana, intended to promote republican principles. With the same view, Harrington formed an association called the "Rota Club." In 1661 he was imprisoned in the Tower, but released on the plea of insanity.

Harrington, William Stanhope, 1st Earl of (d. 1756), was sent as ambassador to Spain (1717), and two years later went on a mission to the French army. He was plenipotentiary at the Congress of Soissons (1728). In 1730 he was again despatched to Spain, where he concluded the Treaty of Seville. He was immediately ereated Lord Harrington, and shortly afterwards became Secretary of State. He consistently supported Walpole for many years, but in 1738 we find him in opposition to that minister, warmly advocating war with Spain. In 1742 he was created an earl, and Lord President of the Council, but on the resignation of Lord Granville ho again became Secretary of State. In 1746 he resigned, because the Pelhams wished for the admission of Pitt to office, and was transferred to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, which appointment he resigned in 1751.

Harrison, Thomas (b. 1606, d. 1660), was a native of Newcastle-under-Lyme. At the opening of the Civil War he entered Essex's body-guard. Ho was in command of tho guard that conveyed the king from Hurst Castle to London; he was also one of the king's judges, and signed his death-warrant. Harrison was commanding on the northern border when the Scots entered England under Charles II. He obstructed their march with great ability, and took part in tho Already he had been battle of Woreester. elected a member of the Council of State (1650), but becoming "fully persuaded that the Parliament had not a heart to do any more good for the Lord and His people," he assisted Cromwell in expelling both Council and Parliament. In the "Barebones" Parliament Harrison was one of the leaders of the advanced party, and an opponent of the dissolution. Roger Williams describes him as the head of "the fifty-six party," who "were of the vote against priests and tithes," "the second in the nation of late," "a very gallant, most descrving, heavenly man, but most high-flown for the kingdom of the saints and the Fifth Monarchy." Cromwell, after vainly trying to conciliate him, deprived him of his commission and relegated him to Staffordshire. Harrison took part in Overton's plot (1654), and was suspected of taking part in Venner's (1657), and other plots, for which he was several times imprisoned. At the Restoration he refused to fiy, and was condemned to death after a very gallant defence, in which he justified the king's execution. He was executed on October 13, 1660, saying, "If I had ten thousand lives, I could freely and cheerfully lay them all down to witness to this matter."

Harrowby, Dudley Ryder, 1st Earl op (b. 1762, d. 1847), entered public life as member for Tiverton. He was a strong supporter of Mr. Pitt, under whom he held many offices in succession, till he succeeded to the peerago in 1803. The following year he was appointed Foreign Secretary, and in 1805 was despatched to Berlin with a view to forming an offensive alliance with Prussia. The battle of Austerlitz, however, put an end to all hopes of uniting Europe against Napoleon, and Lord Harrowby returned home. Three years later he became President of the Board of Control, and was created an earl. In 1812 he became President of the Council, an office which he continued to hold for sixteen years. In the days of the first Reform Bill he was requested to form a cabinet, but declined to undertake so responsible a duty, and it consequently devolved on the Duke of Wellington. On the question of Reform he became leader of that section of the peers known by the title of "the Waverers," who, though disapproving of the new measures, felt that obstinate resistance to so popular a movement would entail disaster. From this time he took little part in politics.

Hartington, Spencer Compton Cavenders, Marquis of (b. 1833, d. 1908), who became Duke of Devonshire in 1891, was returned to the House of Commons as one of the members for North Lancashire in the Liberal interest in 1857. In the year 1863 he was appointed a Lord of the Admiralty, and in April of the same year Under Secretary for War. On the reconstruction of Lord Russell's second administration in 1866 the Marquis of Hartington took office as Secretary for War. In 1868 he was returned for the Radnor Boroughs, and accepted the office of Postmaster-General in Mr. Gladstone's cabinet. In 1871 he became Chief Secretary for Ireland. When Mr. Gladstone in 1875 abandoned the leadership of the Liberal party, Lord Hartington assumed the post, but in 1880 accepted office under his old chief. He became Secretary for India, and subsequently (1882) for War, but refused to enter the Homo Rule Cabinet in 1886, became the leader of the Dissentient Liberals, and firmly supported Lord Salisbury. On the retirement of Lord Salisbury in 1902, he became Leader of the House of Lords, but resigned office in the Ministry in 1903 in consequence of his devotion to the principles of Free Trade.

Harvey, BAGENAL (d. 1798), of Burgay Castle, a gentleman of property in county Wexford, was arrested as a rebel in May, 1798, and confined, together with Colclough and Fitzgerald, in the city gaol. Being sent out to treat with the rebels, after the city had been evacuated by the troops, he was induced to become their leader; but showed such disgust at the massacre of Scullabrogue that he was deposed from his command. When the troops retook the town he con-cealed himself, together with Colclough, in one of the Saltee Islands, but they were both taken, sentenced to death, and hanged (June 27, 1798).

Hastenbeck, The Battle of (July 26, 1757), near Hameln, in Hanover, was one of the engagements of the Seven Years' War. The Duke of Cumberland, with a motley army of about 50,000 men, was defeated by the French with 80,000, and compelled to retire on Slade, near the mouth of the Elbe. [Closter-Seven: Cumber-LAND.

Hastings, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 14, 1066), is the name usually given to the great combat which took place at Senlac, near Hastings, between the invading Nor-mans, under William the Conqueror, and the English, under Harold. On the news of William's landing in Sussex, Harold held a hurried council at Stamford Bridge, and, after ordering a general muster in London, pressed southwards himself at the head of his Housecarls. At London, men flocked in from all southern England; but Mercia and Northumbria, the provinces of Edwin and Morcar, held aloof. Rejecting the advice which his brother Gurth is said to have given him, to stay behind and gather troops for a second battle if the first should issue in defeat, Harold set forth from the city, and pitched his camp on the hill of Senlac (Oct. 13). This hill he proceeded to fortify with a palisade and a ditch. After a night of con-fession and prayer, the Norman army ad-vanced over the higher ground of Telham to the valley which ran along the foot of Harold's fortified hill. The Norman army was divided into three parts, of which the left wing, consisting of Bretons, Poitevins, &c., was under the direction of Alan of Brittany; the right wing, consisting of the mercenary troops, under Roger Montgomery and William Fitz-Osbern; while in the centre, grouped round the Holy Banner of the Pope, came the Norman men-at-arms and archers, led by the duke himself, mounted on his Spanish horse. Each of these divisions was again subdivided into three groups of archers, infantry, and horsemen respectively, in which order they were to advance to the fight. On the English side, every man fought behind the barricades of ash, on foot. On the right and left were posted the light-armed recruits from the southern shires, armed with club and javelin, or even with forks and stakes; in the centre stood the English Housecarls, in their helmets and coats of mail, with shield and javelin and Danish axe. The battle commenced, at nine o'clock in the morning, with a shower of arrows from the advanced archers of each Norman division; then the heavy-armed foot came on to attack the palisade at the bottom of the hill; but they could make no impression upon the closelywedged ranks of the English defenders. The Bretons, on the left wing, seeing all cfforts useless, took to flight, and part of the English troops, against Harold's express orders, broke from their ranks in pursuit. A rumour was passed along that William had been slain, and he had to tear his helmet from his head to show them that he was yet living, while, spear in hand, he drove the fugitives back to the fight. The Bretons then took heart again, and overpowered their disorganised pursuers Despite a partial success here and on the right wing, the English lines still remained unbroken, and the enemy had to retire once more. William, however, had noticed that, firmly as the English fought in close rank behind their fortification, they had fallen an easy prey to the Breton auxiliaries when separated in the ardour of pursuit. accordingly ordered part of his army to counterfeit a flight; and once more the English swept down from the hill, only to meet with a similar fate, though a few of them managed to make good their position on an out-lying elevation. The Norman centre made its way, unopposed, up the slope to its left, which was now unprotected by its proper defenders, and when once on the hill summit had no barricade to bar its progress. But still the English held out, till William had recourse to a fresh stratagem. His archers were bidden to shoot up into the rin, so that their arrows might come down from above. This had the desired effect. The shields which were required for the protection of the head could no longer shelter the body too; and, to crown all, Harold himself was pierced in the eye by an arrow. Night was now coming on, and though the Housecarls fought on till the last man was slain, the light-armed troops, having lost their king, fled away in the darkness, pursued by the Norman horse; and the battle was lost.

Treeman, Norman Conquest, vol. iii. The accuracy of his account, especially with regard to the palisade, was first impogned by Mr. J. H. Bound, in the Quarterly Review for July, 1892, and has since been the subject of a long controversy between him and the writer of the above article, who, however, sees no reason to make any material alteration in his views as originally expressed. See Eng. Hist. Kev., vol. ix., 1894. The leading original authorities are the Gesta Guitielmi of William of Poitiers; the Carmen de Hello Hastingensi, by Guy, Bishop of Amiens; and Wace, Koman de Kou. These sources of information are largely supplemented by the invaluable pictorial account known as the Bayeux Tapestry (q.v.).

Hastings, WARREN (b. 1752, d. 1818), the son of a Worcestershire gentleman, in 1750 went to Bengal as a writer in the service of the East India Company. Here he attracted the attention of Clive, and after Plassey, was appointed agent to the Nabob of Moorshedabad for the East India Company. In 1769 he became member of the council at Madras, and in 1772 was appointed Governor of Bengal. In this capacity he devoted himself to retrenchment and reform. Half the nabob's allowance was cut off; Corah and Allahabad, the old cessions to the Mogul were resumed on pretence of a quarrel, ar. sold to the Vizier of Oude for fifty lacs of rupees; tho land tax was settled on a new basis which produced more revenue with less oppression; and lastly, in his need for money, British troops were let to the Vizier of Oude for forty lacs of rupees, in order that that prince might be able to destroy his enemies, the neighbouring tribe of Rohillas, and annex the province of Rohilcund. In 1773 Lord North's Regulating Act took effect, and Hastings became the first Governor-General of India, with powers greatly limited by those of his council, three members of which, headed by Philip Francis, came out full of prejndice against Hastings, who therefore found himself powerless, and in a perpetual minority. Nuncomar, a Brahmin, brought a charge of peculation against him. The rancorous eagerness with which the council took the matter up drove Hastings to desperate measures. Invoking the separate powers confided in the Supreme Court by the Regulating Act, he obtained the arrest of Nuncomar on a charge of forgery. Sir Elijah Impey, the Lord Chief Justice, proceeded thereupon to try, condemn, and haug Nun-comar. This bold stroke resulted in the complete triumph of Hastings over his enemies-rendered still more secure by the death of one of the triumvirate in the council, which enabled him to obtain a perpetual majority by means of his casting vote. secure in his power he turned his attention to the aggrandisement of the English power in India. Discovering that, owing to the quarrels between the other presidencies and the Mahrattas, war was inevitable, and that the latter were intriguing with the French, he determined to take the initiative, and crush the half-formed confederacy. The Bombay government embraced the cause of Ragonaut Rao Ragoba, a deposed Peishwa, and plunged into a war with the Mahratta regency, in which they were extremely un-successful, owing to bad generalship. Has-tings sent Colonel Goddard with the Bengal army to accomplish a dangerous march across India, and in 1779 Goddard overran Guzerat, captured Ahmedabad, and finding Scindiah disposed to delay and evasion, stacked and routed him April 14, 1780. Hastings, moreover, despatched another Bengal army to Malwa under Major Popham, who completed the defeat of Scindiah by capturing his almost impregnable fortress of Gwalior. Scindiah concluded a treaty with the English; and by his mediation peace was made between England and the Poonah government. In July, 1780, Hyder Ali overran the Carnatic and threatened Madras. Hastings immediately suspended Whitewell, the Go-vernor of Madras; despatched all available troops to the Carnatic, gave the command to Sir Eyre Coote, and sent large sums of mouey. The victories of Coote in 1781 restored the English position. On the news of Hyder's advance in 1780, Hastings demanded troops, and £50,000 from Cheyte Sing, Rajah of Benarcs, a tributary of the English. On his delaying, it was raised to £500,000. This being unpaid Hastings arrested Cheyte Sing, deposed him, and seized all his property. But the Governor-General, being still in want of money, persuaded Asaf ud Dowlah, Vizier of Oude, to assist in robbing his mother and grandmother, the Begums of Oude. Hastings's internal administration was most successful. He dissolved the double government, and transferred the direction of affairs to the English. He created the public offices and service of Bengal. He organised the revenue for the first time on a definite basis. This, moreover, he effected from mere chaos, without any assistance, being on the contrary constantly trammelled by orders from home, and frequently borne down by a majority iu council.

Hastings remained at the head of affairs till 1785. By the time of his return peace was now restored to India; there was no opposition in the council; there was no European enemy in the Eastern seas. But in the meanwhile the feeling against him on account of some of his acts, and notably those connected with Oude and the Rohilla War, had been growing very strong at home. At the instance of some of the Whigs, at the head of whom was Burke, he was impeached by the House of Commons. The trial began Feb. 13, 1.88, with Burke, Fox, and Sheridan as the principal managers for the Commons. The trial dragged for seven years, and in the end Hastings was acquitted (April 23, 1795). The rest of his life was passed peacefully in England. There is no doubt that Hastings was guilty of some of the worst acts imputed to him; but the surpassing greatness of the work he accomplished, in placing the English Empire in India upon a secure basis, may well have been suffered to outweigh his offences.

Hastings, Francis Rawdon-Hastings, 1st Marquis or (b. 1754, d. 1826), was the son of Sir John Rawdon, afterwards raised to the Irish peerage by the title of Earl of Moira. On leaving Oxford, he entered the army as an ensign, and was before very long engaged in the American War. For his services on this occasion he was made an English peer, in 1783. In 1793 he succeeded to his father's title, and in 1803 was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland. About the same time, he seems to have paid considerable attention to the condition of poor debtors, and the state of Ireland. In 1813 he was appointed to succeed Lord Minto as Governor-General of India, and commander-in-chief there. His first measure of importance was to declare war (1814) against the Ghoorkas of Nopaul, who had been encroaching on the British territory towards the north of Hindostan. After some initiatory reverses, the English arms were victorious, the Ghoorka limits were defined, and the war brought to an end (1816). For this success, Lord Moira was made Marquis of Hastings. The attention of the Governor-General was next turned to the Mahratta powers, who were supporting the raids of the robber Pindarees. Within a Within a very short period, the Peishwa's dominions were practically annexed, the Pindarces destroyed, the Rajpoot States protected, Scindiah forced to enter upon a new treaty, and the Holkar State compelled to yield up part of its territory, and become a subsidiary state under the protection of the British government (1817—18). Lord Hastings had succeeded in establishing the English power more firmly than ever, and in securing for India a peace which bade fair to be lasting. But it was not only as a great conductor of military operations that his name is worthy of remembrance. He was the first Governor-General who strongly advocated the education of the natives, in direct contravention of the popular notion that their ignorance contributed to the security of the English rule. Native schools and native journals were established under his rule, and with his approval, though the innovation was strongly opposed by most men of his own generation.

In 1820, Lord Hastings turned his attention to the Nizam's dominions, where, though the extinction of the Peishwa had relieved the country from its enormous arrears of tribute, every effice was put up to bribe, and ruin was imminent. Mr. Charles Metcalfe now was appointed British Resident at the court of Hyderabad; and ho, discovering that the Palmer Bank was a main source of corruption, and was compromising the British government, owing to Lord Hastings's connection with one of the partners, took such drastic measures as led to the speedy winding np of the concern. Shortly after this, Lord Hastings resolved to resign his office. He accordingly left India in 1823, and accepted the government of Malta, where he introduced many reforms. His death occurred in 1826. Though Lord Hastings wes constantly at war with the Court of Directors, it must be conceded that it was under his rule that the British power became paramount in India. His labours in India and elsewhere shattered his health, and it is said that his fortune was materially impaired by the expenses of his

Hastings, William, Lord (d. 1483), was the son of Leonard H. 'ings, esquire of Richard, Duke of York. He was a favourite of Edward IV., from whom he received considerable grants of land, besides holding the offices of Master of the Mint, Captain of Calais, and Lord Chamberlain. Though he had supported Richard against the Woodvilles, he was suddenly seized by the Protector's orders while at the council-table, and hurried off to execution on a charge of conspiracy (June, 1483). The reason of this sudden execution seems to have been due to the fact that he was unwilling to second Richard's nefarious schemes for obtaining the throne. Hastings married Margaret Neville, sister of the Earl of Warwick.

Hatfield, THE COUNCIL OF (Sept. 17, 680), was convened by Archbishop Theodore, under the auspices of the leading Anglian and Saxon kings in Britain. This council devoted itself to declaring the orthodoxy of the English Church as regards the Monothelite heresy and its acceptance of the decrees of the five first general councils and the canons of the Lateran Council of 649. John the Precentor, who had been sent over by Pope Agatho to inquire into the faith of the English Church, was present at this synod, and brought with him Bened. Biscop to instruct the English in the art. church-building; while John himself was commissioned to give instructions in church-singing.

Hatherley, WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, 187

Lord (b. 1801, d. 1881), the son of Sir Matthew Wood, was called to the bur at Lincoln's Inn, 1827. He was elected for the city of Oxford in 1847, in the Liberal interest, and continued to represent that constituency till 1852. In 1849 he was appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in 1851 he became Solicitor-General, and in 1852 Vice-Chancellor. In 1868 he was appointed a judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery and sworn of the Privy Council, and in 1868 Lord Chancellor. He resigned in 1872.

Hatton, Sir Chriscopher (b. 1540, d. 1591), is said to have first attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a ball given by the Inns of Court. He was appointed one of the queen's gentlemen pensioners in 1564, and soon became ono of her chief favourites. In 1577 he was appointed Vice-Chamberlain and a member of the Privy Council-the queen's partiality for him causing "much envy and some scandal"—whilst he also took a leading position in the House of Commons. In 1581, Hatton vehemently opposed the marriage of the queen with the Duke of Alencon, and afterwards took an active part in the proceedings against the Queen of Scots. He was a commissioner at the trials of Babington and the other conspirators, and was engaged in the examination of Curle and Nau, Mary Stuart's secretaries. He subsequently incurred the queen's anger for having urged on the despatch of the execution warrant, but was quickly restored to favour, and in April, 1587, succeeded Sir Thomas Bromley as Lord Chancellor, much to the surprise and anger of the bar, many of whose members resolved not to practise before him. Hatton, however, filled his trying post with credit; delivered his judgments with caution and never decid. difficult cases unadvised. In 1591, however, he lost the queen's regard, and died, it is said, of a broken heart caused by Elizabeth's conduct in instituting a suit against him to recover a sum of money lent to him in the early days of her favour. Sir Christopher Hatton, though essentially a courtier, was a man of ready wit and great capacity, and is said to have shown great industry when he was Lord Chancellor, and to have made himself tolerably well acquainted with the practice of the Court of Chancery.

Havelock, Sir Henry (b. 1795, d. 1857), entered the army in 1815, and in 1823 embarked for Bengal. Next year he went through the first Burmese War, earning considerable distinction for courage and energy. In 1838 he was promoted to a captaincy, and was shortly afterwards sent with his regiment to form part of the force intended to replace Shah Soojah on the throne of Cabul, After the occupation of Cabul, Havelock, with a portion of the army, retired to India, but was shortly recalled at the news of the Cabul massacre. He aided in the defence of Jellalabad against Akbar Khan (1842), and marched with the army to occupy Cabul for the second time, and revenge the English disasters. He took part in the Gwalior campaign (1843), and was present at the battles of Moodkee, Feroseshar, Ali-wal, and Sobraon. He took no part in the second Sikh War, being employed at Bombay. After a short interval spent in England he received the comman of a division under Outram, for the Persian War, 1857. When the Indian Mutiny broke out Havelock advanced upon Cawnpore, and defeated Nana Sahib outside the town. He then made his way for Lucknow, but finding his forces too weak to relieve this place, was forced to return to Cawnpore. Here he was joined in September at the Alumbagh, Lucknow, by Sir James Outram, and the two together succeeded in relieving Lucknow. Two months had hardly passed before Sir Henry Havelock died of dysentery (Nov. 24, 1857).

Hawke, Edward, Lond (b. 1705, d. 1781), became a captain in the Royal Navy in 1734. He distinguished himself in an engagement with the French fleet off Toulon in 1744, and became rear-admiral in 1747. He defeated the French fleet off Belleisle, and at the end of the year was returned for Portsmouth. In 1748 he became vice-admiral. He served in Nova Scotia (1749), and became commander of Portsmouth (1750). In 1755, though war had not yet been declared, he was directed to attack French ships of war. In 1757, on the loss of Minorca, he took command of the Mediterranean fleet, was at the head of the blockading squadron in the Bay of Biscay (1758), and in the following year defeated the French under Marshal Confians, in Quiberon Bay. In 1765 he became Vice-Admiral of Great Britain and in 1766 First Lord of the Admiralty, and ten years later was raised to the peerage.

Hawkins, Sir John (b. 1532, d. 1595), one of the most enterprising seamen of Queen Elizabeth's reign, passed most of his youth in making voyages in the interests of commerce. He has incurred the odium of having been the first to establish a trade in slaves (1562), whom he bought in Gninea and sold in Hispaniola (1562—64); on several occasions coming into collision with the Spaniards. In 1573 he was made Treasurer of the Navy, and, after having been nearly murdered by Peter Burchett in mistake for Sir Christopher Hatton, was appointed admiral of the Victory at the time of the Spanish Armada; commanding that part of the fleet which was stationed between the Lend's End and the Scilly Islands. For his able and energetic conduct at this crisis, he was knighted and received the thanks of the queen. In 1590 Sir John Hawkins made anether expedition to the Spanish Main in conjunction with Sir Martin Frobisher, and five years later sailed for the West Indies with Sir Francis Drake, but died before anything had been accomplished.

Haxey, Thomas, a prebendary of Southwell, presented a bill of complaint in the Parliament of 1397, on the condition of the king's househeld. When it was brought under the notice of Richard II., the king was extremely indignant, and demanded the name of its author from the Parliament. Thomas Haxey was pointed out as the offender, and adjudged to die as a traitor. He was, however, saved by the prompt action of Archbishop Arundel, who claimed him as a clergyman. Shortly afterwards he was pardoned. He became treasurer of York Minster in 1418. This case illustrates the fact that, in the fourteenth century, freedom of debate in Parliament was far from established.

Hayward, Sir John (b. 1564, d. 1627), was a native of Felixstowe, in Suffolk, and was a voluminous author. This writer owes what reputation ho possesses to the fact of his being one of the earliest of our English historians, as distinguished from mere annalists. On the publication of his Life and Reign of Henry IV., as the work was dedicated to the Earl of Essex, ho was thrown into prison, where he remained till the death of Elizabeth. On the accession of James I., ho published two treatises, On the Right of Succession, and The Union of England and Scotland, for which services he was received into the new king's favour, and was in 1610 appointed Camden's colleague in the office of historiographer to James's propesed college at Chelsea. A few years later he wrote his Lives of the Three Norman Kings of England, at Prince Henry's request, and was knighted six years later (1619). After his death two works were found among his MSS. : The Life and Rayne of Edward VI. (published 1630), and Certain Yeres of Elizabeth's Rayne. The former of these two productions is mainly based on Edward VI.'s diary, and the latter extends over the first four years of the queen's reign. Both are trustworthy and well written. They have been published for the Camden Society with an introduction and life of the author by Mr. John Bruce (1840).

Head, Sir Francis (b. 1793, d. 1875), was in 1836 appointed Governor of Upper Canada. He was a man of great ability, and eminently successful in dealing with the national party, who were at that time clamouring for reform. Though possessed of much caution, and careful to follow out his instructions from home, he was powerless to avert the insurrection which broke out in Upper Canada at the end of 1837. By his prompt measures, however, he prevented its gaining any considerable ground. In 1838 he retired from his office, owing to a disagreement with Lord Glenelg, the Colonial Minister.

Head-borough (Head-pledge), THE, signified the chief man of the Frank-pledge (q.v.). This officer was also known by the name of borough-head, tithing-man, &c., according to the local custom. This headborough was the chief of the pledges; the other nine who were with him and made up the group were called hand-boroughs. The duties of the head-borough are defined in one of the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor. If any momber of the frank-pledge or tenmannetale had done an injustice to anyone olse, and had fled away to escape punishment, the head-borough at the end of twenty-one days had to appear before the justice with two other members of his frank-pledge and six neighbours, and exculpate the body of which he was the head from all complicity in the original wrong and the flight of the evil-doer.

Hearne, Thomas (b. 1678, d. 1735), a learned English antiquary, was the son of the parish clerk at Littlefiold Green, in Berkshire. His abilities attracted the attention of a gentleman, who first sent him to school and then to Oxford. In the year 1701 he was appointed assistant keeper of the Bodleian Library. In 1716 he was deprived of his office for political reasons; but he still continued to live at Oxford and pursue his antiquarian studies. His principal works were editions of Leland's Collectanes, of Camden's Annals, Roper's Life of Sir T. Mere, Fordun's Scotichronicon, William of Newbury, Robert of Gloucester, Benedict of Peterborough, and Alfred of Beverley. But besides these he issued many other of our old chroniclers.

Hearth Money was a tax of two shillings on every hearth "in all houses paying to Church and poor." It was first imposed by Parliament, 1663, and abolished in 1689. It was always a very unpopular tax. Under the name of "Chimney Money" it dates, as a tex paid by custom, from the Norman Conquest.

Hearts of Steel, The, was an organisation formed in 1772 among the Protestant tenants of Tyrone and Antrim. The landlords had been largely increasing the rents of their tenants, and had taken up with cattle-farming on their own account, with the result that Protestants were replaced by Catholics. The tenants not only sent a petition to Parliament and to the Lord-Lieutenant, but they also showed their hostility to the intruders by destroying their cattle and burning their houses. An Act was passed against them, and troops sent to the north. On the appearance of the latter the movement collapsed, but was followed by increased emigration.

Heath, Nicholas (d. 1578), Archbishop of York and Lord Chancellor, was originally chaplain to Cardinal Wolsey, and obtained the lavour of Henry VIII., who appointed him successively to the sees of Rochester and Wercester. In 1551, owing to his opposition to the Refermation, he was deposed from his see, but was reinstated on the accession of Mary, and shortly afterwards made Archbishop of York. At the end of 1555 he succeeded Bishop Gardiner as Lord Chancellor, and speedily proved his utter incompetence as a judge. On the accession of Elizabeth, Heath was deprived of the Great Seal, and on percelving that the queen intended to re-establish the Protestant religion, declined to assist at her coronation. He shortly afterwards refused to take the oath of supremacy and was deprived of his archbishopric, spending the rest of his days in "study and devotion."

Heathfield, THE BATTLE OF (633), fought between Penda of Mercia and Edwin of Northumbria, resulted in the defeat and death of the latter. The place is probably to be identified with Hatfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Heathfield, George Avoustus Elliot, Baron (b. 1717, d. 1790), commenced his military career by serving as a volunteer in the Prussian army. On returning home ho first entered the ranks of the Engineers at Woolwich, from which he exchanged a few years later into the Horse Grenadiers. With these troops he served in Germany, and was wounded at Dettingen. After taking part in the expedition to Cherbourg and Havennah, he was appoiled to the command of the forces in Ireland (1775), but, owing to some difference with the authorities at Dublin, he very soon resigned his post, and returned to England, whence he was despatched, as governor, to Gibraltar. In 1779 began the siege of that important port, and for four years were the governor's ability and endurance taxed to their utmost. In every respect did Elliot show himself equal to the occasion, and he has been handed 'own to posterity as having conducted the most stubborn defence of modern warfare. The value of his services was recognised at home, though somewhat tardily. He remained at the post he had held so gloriously till 1787, when he returned to England, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Heathfield. In 1790 he died of paralysis, just as he was going to set out again for Gibraltar. "Ever resolute and ever wary," says Lord Stanhope, "and prevailing by example as much as by command, he combined throughout the siege the spirit to strike a blow at any weak point of the assailants with a vigilant forethought extending even to the minutest measures of defence."

Heavenfield, The Battle of (634), was fought between Oswald of Northumbria and the Britons under Cadwalla. Oswald is said to have reared a cross with his own hands before the battle commenced. The Britons were utterly routed.

Mebrides, THE, were known to Ptolemy under the name of the Ebudse. The Scandinavians called them Sudrey-jar or Southern Islands, in contradistinction to the Northern Islands of Scotland-the Orkneys and the Shetlands. Towards the very end of the eighth century these islands became subject to the incursions of the Vikings. Previous to this period they may have been inhabited by Celtic tribes, differing, more or less, from those upon the mainland of Scotland; though Mr. Rhys has adduced reasons which tend to show that these tribes, as well as the Picts, may have been largely tinctured with the blood of an earlier, and not improbably a non-Aryan race. In the ninth century the Hobrides were colonised by bands of Norwegian settlers, fleeing from their native country before the growing power of Harold Harfagr. When, however, these exiles began to send exreditions against their old home, Harold fit out a great fleet and reduced these islands, from which time the Hebrides, as well as the Orkney and Shetland Isles, were for a considerable period subject to Norwegian rule, though they must be considered, according to Mr. Skene, to have been "rather the haunt of stray Vikings" than subject to any distinct ruler. About the year 989 Sigurd, Jarl of Orkney, seems to have made good his claim on these islands against that of the Danish king of the isles, who appears to have been connected with the Danes of Limerick and Dublin. But even Sigurd must have held his rule subject to the King of Norway. By the middle of the eleventh century the Danes of Dublin and Limerick had seized npon Man, and began to contest the Hebrides with the Norwegian Earls of Orkney. When Duncan was murdered or slain in battle (1040), the Hebrides formed part of Thor-finn, the Earl of Orkney's dominions. Soon after his death (1057?), however, these islands fell into the power of an Irish King of Leinster. When Godred, whom the Irish historians call Fing of the Duble 1075. Danes, conquered the isle of Man (1075?), he does not seem to have been long before extending his authority over the Hebrides also. Before his death, h wever, his newly acquired territories were wrested from his hands by Magnus Barefoot, King of Norway (1093—1103), who so soon perished in his attempt on Ireland, but not before the Scotch King E ar had relinqui hed the Western Isles entirely. Upon thi Magnus's son Sigurd, whom he had left as his ruler in the isles, quitted his new principality for his native land, and the Norse colony then broke up into separate states. Ultimately, however, Godred Crovan's son Olaf succeeded in establishing himself in the Hebrides, which he ruled for forty years (1113—1153). But it now appears that the mutivo Celtio or pre-Celtic race, which had, surhang been driven to the more inaccessible perhaps, been driven to the more inaccessible parts of the islands, were preparing to assert themselves against the Norse strangers. They were led by one Somerlaed, who, notwithstanding his Teutonic name, was of Celtie descent. Somerlaed pretended to be fighting on behalf of his son and Olaf's nephew against his brother-in-law; but in 1156 the isless were divided into two halves, of which the southern half seems to have been practically in the hands of Somerland, who held it subject to the King of Norway. From this time there were two sovereigns bearing the title of "King of the Isles." In the first half of the thirteenth century Alexander II. demanded the restoration of the Hebrides from Hakon, King of Norway, on the ground that Magnus Barefoot had robbed them of the Scotch crown. On being refused he was preparing to avail himself of a disputed succession, when he died suddenly in 1249. When Alexander III. grew to manhood he began to contemplate the subjection of these islands, and whon Hakon, hearing the complaints of his subject kings, and coming to their relief was utterly defeated at the battle of Large (1263), it was not long before he ceded the disputed territories to the Scotch king, in return for a payment of 4,000 marks down, and a pension of 100 marks a year (1266). By this treaty the Archbishop of Trondhjem was still preserved in his metropolitical rights over the Sudreys and Man, rights which he seems to have preserved till at least the year 1400. The rule of the islands seems to have remained in the hands of the descendants of Somerland, and towards the end of the Surteenth century John Mac-donald of Islay adopted the style of Lord of the Isles, a title which James V. forced another John of Islay to relinquish some hundred and fifty years later.

Hedgeley Moor, THE BATTLE OF (April 25th, 1464), was fought during the Wars of the Roses, between Margaret of Anjou and the Yorkists under Lord Montague. Margaret, who had retired to Scotland after the buttle of Towton, collected forces and invaded England in the early part of 1464. She took several northern castles, and was joined by Somerset and the Percies; but Montague, who was sont against the Lancastrians, totally defeated and also Sir Ralph Percy at Hedgeley Moor, some miles south of Wooler in Northumberland.

Relena, St., The Island or, owes its name to its having been discovered by the Portuguese on St. Helena's day, May 21, 1501. In the latter half of the seventeenth century the East India Company got possession of the island, and from this date it has remained in the hands of the English. St. Helena was a station of great importance so long as the ordinary route for India passed round the Cape of Good Hope. Since the opening of the Suez Canal it is a place of historic interest only, owing to its having been chosen as the place of exilo for Napoleon, who died here in 1821.

Heligoland (Holy Land), an island in the North Sea, was taken from Denmark in 1807, and in 1814 was formally ceded to Greet Britain, under whose rule it remained until 1890, when it was given up to Germany in exchange for possessions in East Africa. It is now attached to Schleswig-Holstein. The climate is mild and very healthy. During the Napoleonio wars this island was of very considerable importance to English commerce, as a station whence English goods could be smuggled into the Continent when the European ports were closed to our vessels by the Berlin and Milan decrees.

Hemingburgh, Walter De (d. after 1317). sub-prior of Gisburn, in Yorkshire, wrote a Chronicle extending to the year 1297, which was continued, apparently, by a later writer to 1307, and by a still later to 1346. Whatever the his'ory of its compilation, Hemingburgh's Chronicle is undoubtedly of very considerable value for the reigns of the first three Edwards. It extends from the Conquest down to the year of the battle of Crecy, but it is only for the last three reigns that it seems to be an original authority. The work is remarkable for the number of documents and original letters preserved in it, notably, the Latin draft of Edward I.'s Confirmatio Cartarum, to which the name Statute De Tallagie non Concedende has been erroneously applied. The style of this writer, also, is much above that of the ordinary monkish annalists.

The Chronicle of Walter de Henningburgh have been edited by Mr. Hamilton for the Early English Text Society (1848).

Henderson, ALEXANDER (d. 1646), was one of the leaders of the Presbyterian party in Scotland in the seventeenth century. In conjunction with Johnston of Warriston he drew up the demands of the Covenanters in 1638, in which year he was Moderator of the Glasgow Assembly. Lie was one of the Scotch commissioners at the Pacification of Berwick (q.v.), and at the Treaty of Ripon (1640). He died, it is said, of remorse at having opposed the king, "regretting the excess to which affairs were carried."

Hengest (d. 488) was one of the two leaders of the first band of Teutonic settlers which came to Britain. By some writers, the fact of the name Hengest meaning a horse is regarded as proving that his existence is a myth; but there seems no reason for adopting that theory of necessity, as we know that among the Teutonic peoples names derived from animals are of frequent occurrence. It is true that our earliest authority, Gildas, does not mention the names of any of the Saxon invaders, and Bede only says, "the two first commanders are said to have been Hengest and Horsa." But, on the other hand, Nennlus and the Angle-Saren Chronicle distinctly mention these two brothers as the chiefs of the Teutonic invaders who came to the aid of Vortigern, and they are represented as being the sons of one Wintgils, who was a great-grand-son of Woden. Dismissing all the later legends which accumulated uround Hengest's name, the following is a very brief sketch of what we know of him. Together with his brother, Horsa, he came to Britain, probably (though the chronology is very uncertain) about the year 450. It is possible they may have been exiled, as Nennius tells us from Germany, or may have been actually invited over by Vortigern. At all events, they landed at Ebbsfleet, and agreed to assist the British kin ast the Picts. In theso wars they wer d the Isle of Thanet. as a reward of But shortly afterw is we find them turning their arms against Vortigern. They were defeated at Aylesford, in which battle Horsa was slain. But the tide soon turned. After numerous victories, Hengest and his son, Æsc, conquered the whole of Kent; fresh swarms of Teutons arrived; and the Britons were entirely driven out of the south-east corner of the island. Such is the story of the conquest of Kent as it has been handed down to us; but it is impossible to say how much or how little authority is to be attached to details which cannot well have been preserved in writing at the time of their

Anglo-Saxor Chronicle; Nennius; Bede; Green, Making of England.

Hengest Down, or Hingston Down (HENGESTESDUN), is situated on the west or Cornish side of the Tamar, between that river and Callington. Here, in 836 or 837, Egbert totally defeated the combined forces of the Danes and the West Wesh.

Eengham, RALPH DE (d. 1311), after filling several minor judicial offices, was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in 1274. In 1289 he was removed, together with most of the other judges, on a charge of malvernation of justice; but he subsequently regained the royal favour, and became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in 1301, but was degraded by Edward II. to the post of puisne judge of the court. His two works, De Essentis pre Defaltic et Formulis Placitandi, commonly known as Hongham Magna and Hengham Parca, were edited by Selden in 1016.

Menrietta, Duchess of Obleans, daughter of Charles I. (b. 1644, d. 1670), was born in Exeter, whither her mother had retired during the Civil War. In 1646 she was taken in disguise to France, where she lived with her mother till, at the Restoration, she was enabled to return to England. In 1661 she was married to the Duke of Orleans, only brother to Louis XIV., by whom she had three children. She was employed, in 1670, by the French court to negotiate the Treaty of Dover with England, but very soon after her return to France she died suddenly. Rumour ascribed her death to the effects of poison administered by her jealous husband.

Henrietta Maria, Queen (b. 1609, d. 1669), wife of Charles I., was the youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France. After the failure of the Spanish match, both James I. and Buckingham were very anxious that Charles should ally himself anxious that Charles abould ally himself ith Henrietta, and for this purpose netiations were opened in 1624. The marriage took place in 1625, and by the marriage treaty Charles agreed to suspend the penal laws against the Catholics, and allow the queen the free exercise of her religion. But it soon became evident that Henrictta was a tool in the hands of the Catholics, who thronged around her, and not only compelled her to refuse to be crowned with her husband in Westminster Abbey, but on one occasion at least forced her to take part in a pilgrimage to Tyburn, where the Roman Catholic "martyrs" had been executed. At last Charles, exasperated by this conduct, drove her Roman Catholic attendants from England. As long as Buckingham lived the queen took very little part in public affairs, but after his death she exercised a great influence over Charles, who could hardly have had a worse adviser than a frivolous, passionate woman, fond of power, but careless of the use she made of it. Though Strafford's refusal to grant places in Ir land to her nominees made him little acceptable to her, she used her influence to prevent his condemnation, but subsequently, being frightened by the outcries of the people, and fearing for her own and her husband's safety, sho entreated Charles to assent to the attainder. king made the foolish attempt to arrest the Five Members in 1642, and soon after this, when civil war was inevitable, the queen escaped from England taking with her the crown jewels for the purpose of purchasing arms for her husband. She returned to England in 1643, and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by the Parliament. Eventually she joined her husband, and subsequently proceeded to the West of England, whence in 1644 she escaped to France. In 1643 she was impeached by Pym for the help she lad given her husband, but after the impeachment had been unanimously voted by the Commons, and sent up to the Lords, no more was heard of it. Queen Henrietta remained in France till the Restoration, being frequently in great poverty. She made strenuous efforts to convert her children to Roman Catholicism, and succeeded in the case of her youngest danghter Henrietta; but the young Duke of Gloucester resolutely withstood all her endeavours. On the Restoration she returned to England, and Somerset House was granted as her residence. Fearing the plague of 1665, she returned to France, where she remained till her death. While in France she was supposed to have married Henry Jermyn, afterwards Earl of St. Albans, but there is no direct evidence for this, and at all events the marriage was never acknowledged.

Henry I., Kino (b. 1068, c. Ang. 3, 1100, d. Dec. 1, 1135), was the youngest son of William the Conqueror. His education must have been carefully attended to, and he seems to have been, to some extent at least, familiar with Latin. He was dubbed knight by his father and Lanfrano at Whitsuntide, 1086. Next year, on his deathbed, the Conqueror left his youngest son five thousand pounds of silver, prophesying at the same time, according to the chronicles of the next century, that he would succeed his brothers in their dominions. With his father's bequest Henry bought the Cotontin and avranchin from his brother Robert, and is found later assisting Robert against William and the revolted city of Ronen (1090). In 1091, when peace was restored between Robert and William by the Treaty of Caen, the two brothers, not content with having taken away Henry's right of succession, made war against him for the purpose of stripping him of his lands. Driven from St. Michael's Mount, Henry accepted the lordship of Domfront in 1993. Almost immediately after this, he was reconciled to William and won back part of his old possessions from Robert. On the day of William's death, Henry also was hunting in the New Forest; and on hearing the news, he at once hastened to Winchester to seize the treasure and to put forward his claims to the crown After some discussion, in which several members of the Council maintained the rights of the absent Robert, Henry was elected king, chiefly, we are told, by the influence of the Earl of Warwick. Two days later he was crewned at Westminster, and swore to abolish the wrongs from which the country had suffered under his brother's rule, to maintain peace, repress disorders, and deal justice with mercy. Henry immediately issued a Charter, promising to maintain the privileges of the Church, the vassals, and the nation. As an earnest of his inten-tion to observe these pledges, he impri-soned Flambard, the chief instrument of his brother's tyranny, an l invited Anselm, the object of his brother's hate, to return to England. Before the year was out Anselm had come back and married the new king to Edith, the daughter of Malcolm Canmore and niece of Edgar Atheling. Meanwhile, Robert had returned from the Holy Land and began to claim the crown according to the terms of the Treaty of Caen. The great Norman nobles were not unwilling to assist him in his pretensions. Robert of Belesme, Ivo of Grantmesnil, and many other Norman barons would have preferred the lax indolence of the elder to the stern justice of the younger brother; while Henry laid his chief trust in the influence of Anselm and the fidelity of the English. When the two armies met near Winchester, the great barons on both sides seeing that whoever should conquer, their position in the land w ald be rendered insecure, prevailed on the probrothers to make peace. Henry was released from his oath of fealty to Robert and was acknowledged King of England; but on his part promised to pay Robert a pension of £3,000 and to restore the Cotentin (1101). Three years later the quarrel broke out again and was once more appeased without hlood-shed; hut in 1206 Henry crossed over to N mandy, defeated his brother at the battle hebrai and entered upon the possession suchy. Robert was imprisoned till his in 1134.

canwhile, Henry had been occupied in restoring order and good government to England. The great Norman lords who had sided with Robert—the Malets, the Lacys, the Grantmesnila, and Belesmes—lost their castles and were imprisoned or forced to relinquish their English estates; but as a rule were left in possession of their Norman ones, though even across the water their castles were garrisoned by the king. In all these instances, after each rebellion, whether of 1101, 1104, 1118, or 1123, Henry's great object was to restrain the independence and extortion of the barons. Not content with forfeiting the English estates of the great families of the Conquest, Henry put into full working order a strong administrative body-consisting for the most part of new men advanced by him because of their capacities for doing his work--to ferm a counterpoise to the older barons. These men, who owed their whole position to the crown, were employed by the king to make circuits round the country, not only for the purpose of assessing and collecting taxes, but also for that of redressing abuses. In this way he set the example, which his grandson was to improve upon and enlarge, of en-forcing the royal authority everywhere, and bringing the royal justice within the reach of all people who suffered from the extortion. the cruelty, or false justice of the local and baronial courts. Though the main interest of Henry I.'s reign lies in the orderly increase of the Norman system of centralisa. tion, yet it was by no means devoid of political or dramatic incident. In 1102 Robert de Belesme, the cruel and tyrannical Earl of Shrewsbury, and the son of William tho Conquerer's great friend, Montgomery, was besieged in his castle of Bridgnorth. The English were only too glad to aid in Robert of Belesme's downfall, and called on the king to rejoice that he became a free man from the day when he banished Robert of Belesme (1102). The captive Duke Robert had a young sen, William: Louis VI. of France and Fulk, Count of Anjeu, were induced to espouse the boy's cause. The former promised to invest him with Normandy; the latter to give him his daughter, Sibylla, in marriage. Mean-while, Fulk, supported by his suzerain, Louis, laid claim to Maine, in opposition to the pretensions of Henry: and peace was only re-established between the claimants (1113) at the expense of William, who now found a refuge with Baldwin of Flan-Once more, after fivo years' quiet, a coalition was formed on behalf of the young prince, and once more Louis and Fulk espoused his eause. But this effort was fruitless too. At the battle of Brenneville (1119) the victory lay with Henry, and before long Calixtus II. reconciled the two kings. In 1120 the English king lost his only son, William, in the White Ship. Three years later he was threatened with another coalition, for Fulk of Anjou had once more espoused the cause of William. Fitz-Robert and several of the greatest barons in Normandy had promised assistance. But Henry was too quick for his enemies, and landing in Normandy he soon reduced the castles of the insurgent barons (1123-24). A few years later Louis gav, his sister-in-law, Adeliza, in marriage to the young prince, granting him at the same time the Vexin and other districts on the borders of Normandy, and also investing him with the county of Flanders (1127).

The newly-made count, however, was slain

next year while endeavouring to make good his claims. With the rebellion of 1124

Henry's home troubles seem to have ceased, and the rest of his reign was occupied with the extension of his authority and the attempts to secure the fidelity of his barons to his daughter, Matilda, and her infant son, Henry. This lady had in 1114 married the Emperor Henry V., but having lost her husband before many years were past, was then contracted to Geoffrey of Anjou, the father of Henry II. In 1126, 1131, and 1133 the whole council of the kingdom were sworn to maintain her rights or those of herself and her little son (Henry II., born 1133).

It remains to say a few words on the ecclesiastical history of this reign. It was largely with the assistance of Anselm that Henry I. had been enabled to secure the crown, and by mutual consent the question of investitures was for the moment waived. But when the immediate danger was over, Anselm was summoned to do homage and consecrate the bishops whem the king had invested. After the Synod of Westminster, Anselm left England once more (1103), and only returned in 1106, after having come to a compromise with Henry on the disputed points. Before the close of the reign two new bishoprics were created—those of Ely (1109) and Carlisle (1133), and, in 1123, the new order of the Cistercians, founded by an Englishman, Harding, planted their first colony at Waverley in Surrey. Henry's reign was also signalised by the practical completion of the conquest of South Wales by a series of Norman adventurers, who established for themselves feudal lord. ships within its limits, driving the Welsh to the hills, or subjecting them to their sway. In some places, as in southern Pembrokeshire, colonies of Fleming or English settlers were planted, and the Welsh absolutely driven out. Henry also managed to secure the nomination of the South Welsh bishops. Their consecra-tion by the Archbishop of Canterbury completed the ecclesiastical subordination of South Wales to the English metropolitan.

The chief contemporary authorities for the reign of Henry I. are the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: Eadmer, Historia Novorum; Ordericus Vitalis, William of Malmesbury, and Henry of Huntingdon. The best modern works on this period are Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. v.; Stubbs, Const. Hist. and Select Charters; Church, Life of Anselm.

Henry II., Kino (b. March, 1133, s. Oct. 25, 1154; d. July 6, 1189), was born at Le Mans, and was the son of Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, and Matilda, daughter of Henry I. and widow of the Emperor Henry V. He was still an infant when brought over to England in 1141 and placed in charge of his uncle, Robert of Gloucester. He afterwards went to Scotland, and was knighted by King David, in 1149. In 1151 Louis VII. conferred Normandy on him, and in the same year he succeeded to Anjeu.

while, in 1152, his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine gave him a large and rich territory in the south of France. Master of such resources, his expedition to England in 1153 could not but be successful. The Treaty of Winchester gave him the succession after Stephen's death. Within a year his rival died, and Henry's succession was socured without disturbance. He was crowned Dec. 19, 1154. The long and important reign of Henry has teen divided by Bishop Stubbs into four epochs—from his accession to the Becket quarrel (1154—64); the period of his strife with the archbishop (1164—70); from Becket's death to the death of the younger Henry in 1183; and from thence to Henry's own death in 1189.

The first period of Henry's reign was mainly devoted to his work of restoration. He found the great administrative system of his grandfather thoronghly annihilated during the anarchy of Stephen's reign. "Adulterine" castles were thickly spread over the whole land. Peace and order there were nonc. The revenue had declined from £60,000 to £20,000 a year. With the help of the surviving members of the family of Roger of Salisbury, and of Archbishop Theobald, Becket the Chancellor, and the Earl of Leicester, Henry succeeded, through tact, energy, and perseverance, in a thorough restoration of the "avite consuctudines" the system of government in the State which Henry I. had left behind him. The feudalists were disarmed, good government restored, the coinage reformed, the War of Toulouse successfully carried out. The whole ten years are years of prosperity and orderly

In 1162 Becket succeeded Archbishop Theobald at Canterbury, and Henry soon found that his old minister was thoroughly resolved to oppose his design to subject Church as well as State to the snpremacy of the law. An attempt to compel an acknow-ledgment, merely, of the royal jurisdiction on the part of criminous clerks precipitated a conflict already imminent. In 1164 the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.) were presented to the archbishop for acceptance. Becket's reluctant acquiescence was soon withdrawn. Henry called his archbishop to account for his chancellorship, and after a stormy council at Northampton, the archbishop withdrew beyond the seas, and the king took possession of his temporalities. somo years an active warfare was carried on between king and archbishop, which nothing but the tact of Henry's ministers prevented from being confused with the great struggle of Frederick Barbarossa and Alexander III., of which it was the English counterpart.
When in 1170 a hollow reconciliation was effected, Becket returned only to meet his death at the hands of indiscreet partisans of the king. It is most remarkable evidence of Henry's versatility and energy that the period of the Becket strugglo was the period of his reatest constructive reforms, of the establishment of the new judicial system by the Assize of Clarendon (1166), and of the successful conquest of Britanny.

The death of Becket brought Henry's ecclesiastical troubles to a crisis. The coronation of his eldest son, Henry, had conciliated neither his family nor the baronage. Henry hurried away to Ireland to escape from his difficulties, and to receive the homage of the Norman nobles, who had within the last few years appropriated a large part of the island. On his return, the Pope's need of English aid made his reconciliation with the Church at Avranches an easy matter (1172). But the great feudal revolt of 1173-74, which simultaneously broke out in England and the Continent, and was actively favoured by the Kings of France and Scotland, the Count of Flanders, and Henry's own sons, may have been an indirect consequence of the Becket quarrel. Afte. a hard struggle Henry gained the day. The last of the feudal risings was suppressed, and the monarch, strong in national support and in his system of government, was henceforth able to devote his best energies to administrative and judicial reconstruction. The Assize of Northampton (1176), the Assize of Arms (1181), the Assize of the Forest (1184), were the great legislative acts of this period. No less important were Henry's fertile schemes for the perfection of the judicial system, his strong and firm government, his good peace and prosperity.

But Henry's own sons were now his worst enemies. He had done his best for them. Ho had crowned Henry, secured Britanny to Geoffrey, Aquitaine for Richard, and proposed to give John Ireland. But the malign influence of their mother and Louis VII. drove their turbulent and thankless spirits into a series of risings that embittered Henry's last years. In 1183 the younger Henry died.

The death of the young king did not check the rebellious attempts of Henry's remaining sons. Their persistent ostility seriously checked the course of home reforms, and even the preparations for the Crusade. Philip Augustns was as rancorous an enemy to Henry as Louis VII. had been, and his alliance with the king's sons seriously diminished the power and prestige of Henry in Europe. In the midst of failure and desertion the old king died.

Henry II.'s reign was a "period of amalgamation." The Norman central and monarchical system, and the old English local and popular system, hitherto existing side by side, were connected by Henry and combined into a single whole, out of which, a generation later, the English Constitution began to develop. His bureaucratic system dealt a death blow to feudalism, and even set definite limits to the power of the Church. A thorough despot and cosmopolitan, he established that alliance of king and people which produced the national English monarchy. The conqueror of Ireland and Scotland, Henry revived that empire over all Britain which the great Anglo-Saxon kings had aspired to. The ruler of a third of the modern France, he began that policy of constant warfare with his nominal overlord which coloured the whole mediæval history of England. His great Continental position rendered Henry the first European sovereigns. His friendly relations with the Empire, Spain, and Flanders, began the close connection with England's three traditional mediæval allies. A man that could do all this was of no ordinary character. Strong, persistent, far-seeing and hard working, he was at once a great statesman, legislator, administrator, warrior, and diplomatist. But he was unscrupulous, passionate and revengeful—hard and cruel upon occasion and his domestic difficulties perceptibly changed his character for the worse towards the end of his reign. Yet with all his defects he did a good work for England. The excel-lence of the results must excuse the selfisnness of his aims.

The copious works of Giraldus Cambrensis, edited in the Rolls Series by Brewer and Dimock, are useful though not always trustworthy, especially so are the Expagnatio Hibernia and Itinerarium Cambriae, Dr. Sinbbe's works are authoritative for the reign of Henry II., both his Constitutional History and his exhaustive Proface to the editions of Benedict of Peterborough and Roger of Hoveden in the Rolls Series. Lyttelton's Life of Henry II., though old-fashioued, is still useful. For the Becket struggle see Robertson, Life of Becket; Giles, Letters of Becket; Materials for the History of Archbishop Becket.

Henry III., Kine (b. Oct. 1, 1207, s. Oct. 19, 1216, d. Nov. 16, 1272), was the sen of John, and Isabella of Angouleme. His long reign falls into three epochs—the period of the regency, the twenty years (1232—1252) of misrule, either under some foreign and unpopular minister or the king in person, and the last twenty years of the baronial struggle.

The tyranny of King John had alienated every lass of his subjects, and the barons who had won Magna Charta had called in Louis of France. But the wisdom of the Regent Pembroke, the strong support which the RomanChurch gavo to its infant vassal, and the acceptance by church and crown alike of the Great Charter, ultimately resulted in the expulsion of the foreigners, and in the suppression of a feudal survival that had threatened to prove serious. Pembroke died in 1219. Archbishop Langton got rid of the tyranny of the papal legates in 1221. In the same year William of Aumâle, the feudal champion, in 1224, Falkes de Breauté, the representative of John's foreign mercenaries, were subdued.

In the year 1227 Hubert de Burgh got rid of the Poitevin Bishop of Winchester. Even the baronial opposition were national in their aims. There were thus not wanting signs of the development of English constitutionalism.

In 1232 Henry dismissed De Burgh, and became his own minister. But his weak and shiftless character, his incapacity for constant application, his delight in mere external splendour, his want of a settled policy, his attachment to his family, all led him to lean on some stronger support than himself. Peter des Roches, recalled in 1232, was indeed dismissed in 1234; but in 1236, Henry's marriage with Eleanor of Provence brought a swarm of her worthless kinsmen and dependents into England. Foreign fashions spread widely; foreigners administered Church and State. The English language, which had kept itself comparatively free of French words up to this perio!, was now inundated with them. No doubt an increased connection with the Continent had its good points; but its effects on government were altogether bad. A strong aristocratic opposition to Henry was now established. In 1242 the barons refused to grant an aid for the war in Poitou. In 1244 barons and elergy protested against the royal misgovernment. But in 1246 the Count of La Marche and his sons, Henry's half-brothers, came into England. The Pope exacted tax after tax from the clergy. Among churchmen the resistance of Grosseteste was almost singlehanded. The nobles were equally disorganised. Without leaders, the people were powerless to withstand the wretched government of the foreign favourites.

At last, in 1252, a leader arose. Simon of Montfort, a Frenchman, who had acquired the earldom of Leicester, and whose marriage with the king's sister had almost provoked a revolt, was in that year dismissed from the government of Gascony. Eager for revenge, the hated foreigner became an efficient leader of the national party. The folly of Henry in accepting the Sicilian crown for his son Edmund, his lavish expenditure on a futile adventure that led to nothing but the aggrandisement of the papacy, completed the measure of baronial in lignation. In 1258 the opposition culminated in the Mad Parliament, which compelled the acceptance of the constitution known as the Provisions of Oxford, that practically substituted a baronial oligarchy for the royal power. Hitherto the opposition had been unanimous. But while the bulk of the baronage were now disposed to rest content with their triumph, Montfort had larger schemes of popular government. He quarrelled with Gloucester, the leader of the aristocratic party. In 1261 Henry availed himself of this feud to regain power; but in 1263 war began again. Both parties had competed with each other for popular favour by summoning representatives of the shire communities to a national council.

The triumph of Montfort at the battle of Lewes led to his famous Parliament of 1265, in which burgesses as well as knights of the shire were summoned, and a new paper constitution, which put the government into the hands of the community, was drawn up. But the democratic Caesarism of Montfort led to a quarrel with the son of his old enemy Gloucester. Edward, the king's son, escaped and collected an army. Montfort was alain at Evesham. The capture of Kenilworth ended the war. For the rest of the reign peace was secured. But real power had now escaped from Henry's hands into those of his son, who knew how to appropriate the results of Montfort's policy, and reconcile the monarchy with nationality. Henry died on Nov. 16, His extreme incompetence as a ruler blinds us to his private respectability. His reign, though its details are beyond expression dreary, is of the ...st importance in English history. It was the period of the growth of the constitution, of the concentration of the local machinery into a national represen-tative assembly, of the development of English nationality in opposition to royal and papal tyranny. It was a period of great men, of great, if ill-regulated esigns, and of great originative and creative power. It saw the religious revival of the thirteenth century, the establishment of the mendicant orders in England, and the development of culture through the universities. But to all this development Henry was little more than an insignificant figure-head.

Henry IV., King (b. 1367, a. Oct. 13, 1399, d. Mar. 20, 1413), was born at Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, being the eldest son of John of Gaunt and of his first wife, the heiress of the house of Lancaster. At the age of fifteen he married Mary Bohun, daughter and co-heiress of the last Earl of Here-ford. In 1385 he was called to a seat in tho House of Peers, by the title of Earl of Derby. lle at first took part with the uncles of Richard II., in their endeavours to retain the government under their own control; but later on supported the king in trying to draw into his hands an absolute power. It may be suspected that this was done with the sinister design of making Richard unpopular with his subjects. It would seem that Henry was, to some extent, privy to the death of the Duke of Gloucester, the king's uncle, in 1397; but the following year he again changed round, accused the Duke of Norfolk of the murder of (floucester as well as of treasonable practices, and challenged him to wager of battle.

On the combatants presenting themselves at Coventry on Sept. 16, 1298, to try the issne, they were both banished by Richard, Norfolk for life and Bolingbroke for ten years. The following year John of Gaunt died, and Richard seized his lands. On receiving intelligence of this act, Henry, who knew himself to be as popular in the country as the king was unpopular, determined to return to the country on the plea of claiming his lawful inheritance. The king had set out upon an expedition to Ireland, when Henry landed at Ravenspur, July 4, 1399. Bolingbroke was everywhere received with enthusiasm, and soon decided to put forward a claim upon the crown. Richard returned early in August, but upon landing, his army immediately began to desert him. He was forced to disguise himself, but was seized near Conway on August 19. Henry called a Parliament, which, on October 13, pronounced the depo-sition of Richard, and transferred the crown to his cousin. It need not be pointed out what an important act this was from a constitutional point of view. Richard died in prison in the beginning of the following year in circumstances that gave rise to suspicions of Henry's energies were, henceforth, entirely devoted to strengthening his position on the throne. He supported the orthodox Church party against the attacks of the Lollards, to whom his father, John of Gaunt, had been markedly favourable, and one of the most important enactments of his reign was the Act De Heretica Comburendo (1401). It must not be supposed that these persecutions were popular with the clergy only. The contrary is proved by the traditional character which attached to the name of the most conspicuous Lallard of the succeeding reign, Sir John Oldcastle-a traditional character which, if it was not identical with, certainly bore considerable resemblance to that of the fictitious Falstaff. For the rest, Henry's reign was chiefly occupied in crushing domestic rebellion, and in meeting the attacks of the Scots and Welsh. In the first year of his reign he was at war with the Duke of Albany, the regent of Scotland, and with Owen Glendower, who had raised a national revolt among the Welsh. The Scots under Douglas were decisively defeated, and their leader captured at Homildon Hill oy Harry Hotspur, son of the Earl of Northumberland (Sept. 14, 1402). The expedition into Wales, in which Henry, the Prince of Wales, took part, was less auccessful. In 1403 breke out the formidable rebellion of the Percies, who were now leagued with Douglas and Glendower. On the march of the first two to join their forces with the latter, they were intercepted by the king's army, and forced into an engagement at Shrewsbury (July 21, 1403), where they were completely defeated and Harry Percy slain. Northumberland was, on this occasion, pardoned. Two other rebellions of less consequenee broke out in the north, in the last of which (1408), Northumberland was again deeply implicated. It was crushed at the battle of Bramham Moor, in which Northumberland fell. In the interval between these two events, Henry was fortunate enough to capture the heir apparent of Scotland (James I.), who was being sent to France (1406).

After 1408, Henry, no longer in fear of rebellion, began to turn his attention to the affairs of France, where the quarrels between the parties of the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Orleans had brought the country to the verge of civil war (the assassination of the Duke of Orleans, which made this war inevitable, took place on November 23, 1467). Henry took the part of siding first with one party and then with the other, so as to weaken both as much as possible. During the last three years of his life the king was subject to fits of epilepsy, and the Prince of Wales, who had already highly distinguished himself in the field, generally presided at the Council. The growing popularity of this prince is said to have excited the jealousy of his father, and caused some estrangement hetween the two. Henry died March 20, 1413. By his first wife, Mary Bohun, he left feur sons-Henry; Thomas, Duke of Clarence; John, Duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester; and two daughters. After his accession, Henry married Joanna, daughter of Charles II. of Navarre, but had by her no issue. The interest of Henry I'l's reign depends upon the success of his policy in founding tho heuse which, in the persen of his successor, made itself so famous, and in that of the third descendant again fell. It is still more remarkable us the period of the restoration of Anglican orthodoxy against Lollardy, and as the period of mediæval censtitutionalism.

Henry V., King (b. Aug. 9, 1387, s. Mar. 21, 1413, d. Aug. 31, 1422), the eldest son of Henry IV., was born at Monmouth. He was, at a very early age, practised in arms, and was sent, when fifteen, to take command in an expedition against Owen Glendower, and one year later, took a part in the important battle of Shrewsbury. The character of this monarch must always be one of great interest to the historical student, for he was prohably the most popular king who ever ruled in this country. Later tradition, apparently to give a zest to his subsequent merits, has represented him as passing his youth in dissipation, and in indifference to his reputation; and his biographer, Elmham, admits something to support this charge. This period of temporary obscurity could not have occurred, as Shakespeare represents it to have done, before the battle of Shrewsbury. It has been suggested that Prince Henry was disgusted with the jealonsy which his father felt for his rising talents, and for a while absented himself from state affairs, and, in fact, while about 1410, we find him at the head of the Council, he appears afterwards to have yielded his place to his next brother, the Duke of Clarence. He was crowned on April 9, 1413. By his first acts he gave evidence of the security which he felt upon the throne. He released the young Earl of March from his captivity, and rein ated the son of Harry Percy in the family honours and possessions. In his internal administration he seems to have been disposed to follow the general lines of his father's policy. But he had less sympathy with the Lollards, who were now perseeuted with relentless rigour. Among the vietims is to be counted Sir John Oldcastle, commonly called Lord Cobham, in 1417. Henry was, however, supposed to have been not altogether unfavourable to a schemo for confiscating a portion of the revenues of the Church which was warmly advocated by the majority of the lay peers at this time. The abolition of the alien priories is sufficient evidence of this. It was to turn the attention of the king in another direction that Archbishop Chichele persuaded Henry that in right of his descent from Edward III., he had a valid elaim to the crown of France, which the present distracted state of that kingdem gave him a favourable opportunity of asserting. The proposal was received with favour by all classes, and in pursuit of this object Henry set sail for Harffeur, Aug. 10, 1416.

The details of Henry's invasion form an important and exceedingly interesting chapter in military history, but can only be given here in brief summary. The first under-taking was the attack on Harfleur. The place was strongly defended, and nearly surrounded by water, so that the siege, of which the contemporary authorities give us a tolerahly detailed account, dragged on for six weeks. During this time the English army, which at first consisted of about 20,000 foot and 9,000 horse, diminished to not more than a third of that number. It appeared impossible to continue the war without obtaining fresh reinforcements from England. In erder, however, not to seem to retreat befere the face of the enemy, Henry dctermined to embark from Calais, and before leaving Harfleur he sent a challenge to the Dauphin, offering to meet him in eight days, which was not accepted. This is a curious instance of the strategy, or, to speak more truly, the want of strategy, which characterised the warfare of those days. The safety ef Henry's army might seem to have depended upen his keeping his movements as secret as support possible; on the contrary he waited eight days for the reply of the Dauphin, and then Shakeset out (Oct. 8) upon his perilous march. The English, proceeding by Pécamp and Eu, ore the ggested arrived at Abbeville on the 13th, but finding ith the that the Somme was strongly guarded at this point, were induced to make a detour by rising himself Amiens and Neslc. Henry VI., Kino (b. Dec. 6, 1421, c. Sept. 1, 1422, d. May, 1471). The reign of this prince was the third act in the historic drama of the house of Lancaster, and that which was destined to witness the undoing of all that had been accomplished in the two previous reigns. Henry VI. was born at Windsor, and was less than nine months old at the time of his accession to the throne. Charles VI., his grandfather, died a few months later. The regency of the two kingdoms, to which the yeung king was considered the heir, had been settled by Henry V. The Duke of Bedford was appointed to the more arrhone duty of governpointed to the more arduous duty of governing the English possessions in France, and of prosecuting the war in that country, while the English regency was assigned to the Duke of Gloucester with the title of Lord Protector. Among Henry V.'s dying injunctions to his successor was to do all in his power to maintain the alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, and this advice Bedford did his best to carry out. At first he was eminently successful in all his undertakings. The Dauphin (Charles VII.), who hoped to rally his party now that his greatest rival was dead, led his army into Burgundy. He was deeisively defeated at Crevant, and the next year still more decisively at Verncuil (Aug. 16, 1424). The Duke of Bedford commanded in person at this great battle, which has been well described as a second Agincourt. Meanwhile, however, the Duke of Gloucester had contrived, by espousing Jacqueline of Hainault, to alienate Burgundy from the English interests, and though Bedford did his best, by enormous concessions, to retain his friendship, it was not long before Philip passed over altogether to the side of Charles VII., and drew which him the Duke of Britanny. The Pope, too, at this time wrote an appeal to Bedford to design from his attempts to force the to desist from his attempts to force upon the French people a sovereign in defiance of the rights of succession, and the public opinion of Europe was steadily turning against the English. It was at this juneture that Joan of Arc came forward alleging her dinne commission to rescue the country from its invader. At the moment when Joan obtained her first audience with Charles VII. the English were in the midst of the protracted siege of Orleans. Bedford had been induced, in opposition to his own judgment, to undertake this operation with the view of carrying the war into the country beyond the Loiro, which adhered altogether to the party of Charles. All Franco had begun to look upon the siego of Orleans as decisive of the issue of the whole wur. Joan made her way into the city on April 29, 1429, and nine days later compelled the English to raise the siege. The next act of Joan was to conduct the king to be crowned at Rheims, which she effected on July 17, after having defeated the English at Patay in ...e preceding month. These events ended the achievements which Joan had proclaimed it her mission to perform. She accomplished, however, still more for the cause of France's deliverance by her deuth. Taken prisoner by the English at Compiegne on May 23, 1430, she was carried to Rouen, unjustly condemned for sorcery, and burnt in the May of the following year. But the effect of her achievements upon France did not pass away with her death. The national spirit had been roused, and the result was that the struggle became now a national effort to expel the alien invaders. From that time the cause of England was virtually lost. It is not necessary to follow in detail the stages of its decline. By the Treaty of Arras (Sept. 21, 1435), Burgundy finally threw in his lot with Charles, und the event is said to have been the cause of the death of Bedford, which shortly followed. The war dragged on with diminishing kopes on the English side, and increasing discontent at home, for ten years more. In 1444 a truce was made between the two countries; and in the following year a marriage was arranged between Henry and Margaret, daughter of the Duke of Anjou and Lorraino, and the niece of the King of France.

Henceforward, the interest of events abroad depends mainly upon the effect which they had upon public feeling at home—the degree in which they embittered the different parties of Er_lish statesmen and tended to bring about the Wars of the Roses, which soon ensued. Two years after the king's marriage, the two rival statesmen, the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort, died. The Duke of Suffolk now came to be the trusted minister of the crown. He had been chiefly instrumental in bringing about the king's marriage, and he was on that account the favourite of Queen Margaret, by whom the king was entirely governed. But as the royal marriage and the queen herself became every day more unpopular in the country, the general distrust of the duke kopt pace with his favour at court. The Duke of York new ecupied, and with much more desert, the place in popular estimation that Gloucester had held a few years before his death, while tho continued losses of the English were attributed to the treachery of Suffolk and the queen. At longth Suffolk was, at the instance of York and his party, impeached of high treason, was banished by the king, and seized and beheaded, probably by a pirate, in the course of his passage to the coast of France. He was succeeded by the Duke of Somerset in the queen's fuvour. York was removed from tho country by appointment as Regent of Ireland, and the defence of the possessions in Franco was entrusted to Somerset. In 1450, a foretaste of the civil war was experienced in tho rebellion of the men of Kent, under Jack Cade, who called himself John Mortimer, and professed to be a cousin of the Duko of York. After this rebellion had been suppressed, York returned to England, with a following of several thousand men, and insisted upon a reform of the Council. This was granted, and the appeal to arms was, for a while, deferred.

Meanwhile, the affairs of the country across the Channel had gone from bad to worse. There was no longer any question of retaining tho more recent acquisitions. The most ancient possessions of the English in Franco were about to be lost—Normandy in 1450, Guienne in 1453. During the defence of the latter place, the brave Lord Shrewsbury, his sons, and about thirty knights, fell in one engagement. In August, 1453, the king began to exhibit signs of mental alienation. It now became clear to all that, sooner or later, the queen and Somerset on the one hand, and the Duke of York and his partisans upon the other, would appeal to the sword to settle their disputes; and the noblemen throughout the country began to arm their retainers. York was appointed Protector in April, 1454. But in January of the succeeding year the king recovered his faculties, and the appointment was, of course, annual The queen and Somerset now began to thank of taking vengeance upon York, who was obliged to retire to the north. There he was joined by the most powerful among his udherents, and definitely took up arms, and marched upon London. On May 22, 1455, the army of York encount ed the forces of the king at St. Albans, and here was fought the first battle of the Wars of the Roses. Somerset was slain, and the victory remained with the Yorkists; so that, on the king again becoming deranged, York was once more made Lord Protector. The war now slumbered for four years. It broke out again in the autumn of 1459, when Lord Audley, with the king's forces, was defeated by the Earl of Salisbury at Blore Heath (Sept. 23). But on the approach of the king the Yorkists were obliged to disperse, and their leaders were attainted by the Parliament of Coventry in the following November. Soon, however, they recovered their position, and entered London in trium ph, in July, 1460. Immediately after was fought the battle of Northampton, in which the king was taken prisoner (July 10, 1460). On Oct. 16 the Duke of York, for the first time, laid claim to the crown. Meanwhile, the queen had fled to the north, where she succeeded in raising an army. York hastened to meet her, and on Dec. 30 was fought the battle of Wakefield, in which the army of York was completely defeated. The duke himself was slain, and his second son, the Earl of Rutland, was murdered after the battle. Edward, Earl of March, now succeeded to the claims of his father, and, after some indecisive engagements, the queen was decisively defeated at Towton (March 29, 1461), and again at Hexham (May 15, 1464). This brought the war to an end; but Henry was again restored for a few months in 1471, through the influence of the Earl of Warwick. Warwick was, however, defeated and slain at Barnet (April 14), and the Lancastrians were, for the last time, repulsed at Tewkesbury (May 4). On the 22nd of the same month the body of Henry was exposed at St. Pau's. It was very commenly believed that he had been murdered by the Duke of Gloucester, the brother of Edward IV.

Henry VII., King (b. Jan. 28, 1467, Aug. 22, 1485, d. April 22, 1509), was son of Edmund Tudor, Earl of Rich-90n of Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman and married the widow of Henry V. other, Margaret, was a great-grand-of John of Gaunt by Catherine nford, whose offspring had been legitimatised in 1397, but expressly excluded from succession to the throne. Henry VI. recognised his half-brothers of the Tudor house, and when Edmund Tudor died, soon after his son's birth, Henry VI. took the young Henry of Richmend under his protection. After the battle of Tewkesbury, Jasper Tudor, Earl of Pembroke, carried off his nephew to Britanny for safety. Edward IV. left no means untried to get Henry into his power. He tried to bribe the Duke of Britanny to give him up, but the duke preferred to receive an annual subsidy for keeping watch over his important guest. Richard III. sent a special envoy to Britanny to spy Henry's doings. The English exiles more and more gathered round

Henry, and saw in him their only possible head. His mother and Bishop Morton did their utmost to furnish him with money. On Christmas Day, 1483, a body of exiles took oath in the cathedral of Rheims to place Henry on the English throng, and he on his side, swore to reconcile the contending parties by wedding Elizabeth of York, Edward IV.'s eldest daughter. It needed much ratience on Henry's part to keep his party together, and to overcome the obstacles which the French court put in the way of his preparations. At length, on August 1, 1485, he landed at Milford Haven in Pembroke, and was welcomed by the Welah as a compatriot. He advanced to Shropshire, where he was joined by the Talbots. Richard III. advanced to meet him, and the two armies came in sight near the little town of Bosworth, not far from Ashby-de-la-Zouche. The battle was decided by Lord Stanley, who joined Henry's side. Richard III. was slain and Henry of Richmond was the conqueror (Aug. 22). Still there were many difficulties in his way: but he showed a resolute and far-sighted spirit. He was determined to reign as England's lawful king, and not to assume a sub-ordinate position by accepting any title through marriage with Elizabeth of York. The claims of the Lancastrian house were not popular, and Henry could scarcely pretend to be a genuine Lancastrian. He took, however, a victor's right, and on the day of the battle of Bosworth assumed the royal title. He advanced to London and had himself crowned before he summoned Parliament in November. The Act which recognised his accession made no mention of his claim, but simply declared that "the inheritance of the crown be, rest, remain, and abide in the most royal person of our now sovereign lord King Henry VII. and in his heirs." It may be said that Parliament simply registered an accomplished fact. In January, 1486, Henry VII. married Elizabeth of York, and soon afterwards made Elizabeth of York, and soon afterwards a journey northwards to pacify his dominions. There was a futile rising of the Yorkists under Lord Lovel which was easily put down, and was sternly punished. But England had been too long disturbed by party warfare for peace to come at once. In 1487, a young man, Lambert Simnel, was trained to personate the Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, whom Henry VII. kept confined in the Tower. The impostor was welcomed in Ireland, and received aid from Fianders, where the Duchess Margaret of Burgandy, sister of Edward IV., resided. He landed in England in June, 1487, but was defeated and taken prisoner at Stoke, and was after employed as a servant in the royal kitchen. This rising taught Henry VII. that he must mollify the bitterness of the Yorkist feeling, and he accordingly had Elizabeth crowned as his queen in November. He also took measures to reduce still further the power of the great barons, though the baronage had been almost annihilated in the bloody battles of the Wars of the Roses. In 1487 Parliament constituted a new commission of judges, chosen from the members of the Privy Council, with power to put down divers misde-meanours. Chief of these was the practice of maintenance, by which a lord could bind to himself a band of retainers, who wore his livery, espoused his quarrels, and were too strong for the ordinary law courts to touch. This new court of the Star Chamber outlived its original purpose, and became an abuse. Henry VII.'s policy was peaceful, and he did not aim at gaining glory for his new dynasty by foreign warfare. The daughter of his former protector, the Duke of Britanny, asked his help against France; and the English people were ready for war. Henry VII. used his people's zeal as a means for raising large supplies, but only made a show of fighting, and, in 1492 made with Charles VIII. of France the Peace of Etaples, by which he consented to be bought off by a large money payment of £149,000. A new pretender, a Fleming, Peter Osbeck, generally known as Perkin Warbeck, claimed to be a son of Edward IV., who had escaped from the hands of Richard III. By the Treaty of Etaples, Warbeck was expelled from France. He was, however, warmly supported by Margaret of Burgundy, and had many adherents in England. Henry VII. steadily pursued them, and punished them with remorseless severity. After an unsuccessful attempt at landing on the coast of Kent in 1495, 160 prisoners were hanged. In 1496 Henry VII. made a commercial treaty, known as "The Great Intercourse," with Flanders, by which liberty of trading was secured, and each party undertook to expel the other's rebels from their territory. The obvious advantages of commercial intercourse overcame dynastic politics, and Flanders was no more a seedbed of plots against the English monarchy. Warbeck took refuge in Scotland, where Henry VII.'s policy of conciliation was not yet able to overcome national animosity. Still it made so much progress that Warbeck was driven to seek his fortunes in the field, and in September, 1497, landed in Cornwall. As the royal troops advanced, Warbeck's forces melted away, and he was taken prisoner in the abbey of Beaulieu. Warbeck made an attempt to escape from prison, and led the Earl of Warwick to share in his attempt. In 1499 they were both executed, and Henry VII. was at last free from any pretender to his throne. Henry VII. devoted himself to the great object of establishing the royal power at home, and of raising the English monarchy to a strong position in European affairs. He lived economically, and seldom summoned Parliament. He used benevolences to raise money, and rigidly exercised all the old rights of the crown. He reduced the barons into complete obedience, and raised up a new class of officials. He succeeded in bringing Ireland into greater order and closer connection with England. The Deputy, Sir Edward Poynings, passed a law which made the Irish Parliament largely dependent on the English king. Henry VII. steadily pursued the endeavour of bringing Scotland into closer union with England, and in this he was helped by his alliance with France, which weakened its connection with Scotland. In 1502, peace was established with Scotland, and Henry VII.'s daughter, Margaret, was given in marriage to the Scottish king James IV.

In foreign affairs Henry VII. recognised a congenial spirit in Ferdinand of Aragon, and wished to restore on a firmer basis the traditional alliance between England and the Spanish house. A marriage was arranged between the Infanta, Catherine, and Arthur, Henry VII.'s eldest son. It took place in November, 1501, but five months afterwards Arthur died at the age of fifteen. Henry VII. and Ferdinand were both unwilling to lose the advantages of this connection. It was agreed that Arthur's brother Henry should marry Catherine. The necessary dispensations were obtained, and Catherine stayed in England, but the marriage was not celebrated till after Henry VII.'s death. The death of Queen Elizabeth in 1503 left Henry VII. free to earry farther his policy of Continental alliances. He proposed to marry Margaret, daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, whose son Philip was Duke of Burgun'y. By this marriage he proposed, amongst other advantages, to secure possession of Edmund de la Pole, son of the Duke of Suffolk and Edward IV.'s sister Elizabeth. A storm drove Philip of Burgundy on the English coast, and Henry VII., in return for his hospitality, demanded the surrender of Edmund de la Pole, who was imprisoned in the Tower. The marriage with Margaret did not take place, and Henry VII. spent his last years in devising other marriages for himself and his daughter. None of them were accomplished; but their object was to secure for his house a sure friendship both with Austrian and Spanish lines. Henry VII.'s financial policy became more and more rapacious, and he was skilful in finding ready instruments, chief of whom were Edmund Dudley and Richard Empson. When Henry VII. died on April 22, 1509, he left England paci-fied and the royal coffers well filled. He had done a difficult task with thoroughness and persistency. He gave England order, peace, and prosperity. He established firmly his own house on the English throne. He secured its position by a system of alliances abroad. By the same means he protected English interests, and gained for England an important place in European politics without fighting a single battle. His prudent use of the means at his disposal won for him in after times the name of the "Solomon of England."

[M. C.]

Henry VIII., Kino (b. June 28, 1491, s. April 22, 1509, d. Jan. 28, 1547), was the son of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York. He came to the throne a handsome and accomplished young man, whose accession was hailed with joy as a relief from tho severe and sombre rule of Henry VII. Henry VIII. increased his popularity by prosecuting the hated instruments of his father's extortion, Empson and Dudley, who were put to death on a charge of plotting to seize the royal person. He intimated his intention of carrying on his father's foreign policy by completing the marriage, which had long been deferred, with Catherine of Aragon, his brother Arthur's widow. He longed to plunge into an adventurous career of foreign policy, for which the troubled state of European affairs afforded every opportunity. Italy was the battle-field of the rival claims of the Empire, France, and Spain. The League of Cambrai-for the dismemberment of Venico had aw '-ned the Pope's jealousy against France. Holy League was formed in 1511 a, ouis XII., and Henry VIII. gladly An English army was sent under the uke of Suffolk to co-operate with Spanish troops in the south of France. But Ferdinand used it only for his own purposes; he delayed any great operat, ms, and the English suffered from the climate. Nothing was done in this campaign of 1512; but next year Henry VIII. arranged to co-operate with the German king, Maximilian, in Flanders. The bloodless Battle of the Spurs (Aug. 16, 1513) secured the fail of Terouenne, and Tournai also was taken. France retaliated on England by stirring up the Scots to break the peace which they had recently made with England. James IV. crossed the border with a large army, but was defeated and slain by the Earl of Surrey in the battle of Flodden Field. The year 1513 was successful for llenry VIII.'s ambitious schemes. But his allies were ready for a truce. Henry VIII. could not continue the war by himself. He made peace with Louis XII. in return for large sums of money, and ratified the peace by giving his sister Mary in marriage to the old king. The death of James IV. of Scotland left another of Henry's sisters, Margaret, the queen dowager, regent of Scotland. But her second marriage, with the Earl of Angus, made her unpopular, and afforded an opening for French intrigues. The death of Louis XII. and the accession of Francis I. in 1515, again led to European war, which was ended in 1518, by a confederacy between England, France, and Spain.

France, and Spain.

Henry's chief adviser was Thomas Wolsey, who rose by his abilities, and showed his capacity especially by managing the details of the campaign of 1513. Next year he was made Archbishop of York, and Chancellor. He soon was created cardinal, and made papal legate in England. His civil and ecclesiastical authority combined gave him a commanding position. He was devoted to the king's service, and bent upon exalting the royal authority. He likewise upheld stoutly the authority of the Church, though he wished to reform some of its abuses. Above all he laboured to make England influential and respected in European affairs. At home he exercised arbitrary power. From 1515 to 1523 no Parliament was summoned, but money was collected by forced leans and benevolences.

The death of Maximilian in 1519 raised the question of succession to the Empire. Henry VIII. offered himself as a candidate; but the contest really lay between Francis I. and Charles, grandson alike of Ferdinand and Maximilian. The election of Charles V. was the beginning of a long rivalry between France and the house of Hapsburg. Both wished to secure the support of England, and Wolsey enhanced the importance of the English alliance by temporising between the two powers. Charles V. condescended to visit Canterbury for a conference with Henry VIII. Francis I. arranged an interview on the plain of Ardres, with such magnificence that it was known as the "Field of the Cloth of Gold." But in Wolsey's eyes the interests of England could be better served by siding with Charles V., and in the war which followed, England saw its ally everywhere successful. France retaliated on England, as usual, by raising disturbances in Scotland, where the Duke of Albany attacked the English borders. He was, however, outgeneralled by the Earl of Surrey, and in 1523 a peace for eighteen years was made with Scotland.

In 1523 Henry VIII. had hopes of reviving the English claims on the French throne. But Charles V. had no wish to see his ally become too powerful. His object was to use the help of England to enable him to make a satisfactory peace with France in his own interests. Wolsey soon saw this, and the alliance of England with Charles V. begau rapidly to cool. The complete success of Charles V. at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, where Francis I. was taken prisoner, showed still more clearly that England had nothing to gain from her ally. Henry VIII. and Wolsey came round to the French side, and in 1528 England declared war against Charles V.

During this period Henry VIII. was regarded as a gay, pleasure-loving king, ambitious, and full of great schemes, which he was content to leave in the hands of Wolsey to be worked out. Wolsey's hand was heavy on the people, and his taxation was arbitrary that he might raise adequate supplies. Henry VIII. stood aloof from these questions. He retained his own popularity, and allowed all the responsibility and all the odium to fall upon Wolsey's shoulders. The country was prosperous and contented under a strong government, and looked with fervent loyalty upon the king who secured their peace. Henry VIII. had no male heirs. All his children by Catherine died in infancy, save a daughter, Mary. Uncertainty about the succession to the throne would again plunge England into a bloody conflict. Henry VIII. repressed all speculation about the future with stermess. In 1521 the Duke of Buckingham was condemned and executed as a traitor on slight charges of attempting to forecast the duration of the king's life. But Henry VIII. was uneasy at the want of a male heir. His wife, Catherine, was older than himself, and was sickly. So long as he remained in alli-ance with Charles V., Catherine had a political significance. On the breach with Charles V., she became an obstacle in the way of the new policy. The marriage with a brother's widow had sufficient irregularity to give grounds for a divorce, and a desire for a divorce gradually took possession of the king's mind. It became a determined object when the king fell in love with Anne Boleyn, a lady of Catherine's court. Wolsey had favoured the divorce scheme in the interests of the alliance with France. When he found that it was urged to make room for Anne Boleyn, he was dismayed, but none the less obeyed the king. The question was, however, an awkward one, and it was difficult to find good reasons for urging it on the Pope. Clement VII. was cowed by the sack of Rome in 1527, and was a traid of drawing on himself the wrath of Charles V. He consented to constitute Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio commissiouers to examine into the king's plea, and the legates sat in London in 1529. But the case was revoked to Rome, aud Henry was left disappointed. Every effort was made to override or outwit the unfortunate Catherine; but her resolution left the Pope uo chance of evading the maiu . issue, which was the validity of the dispensation issued by a previous Pope. It is no wonder that Clement VII. hesitated.

The im liate result of Henry's disappointment was the disgrace of Wolsey, who had so faithfully served his master that he had no other friend. Wolsey was brought under the penalties of the Statute of Præmunire for having exercised the office of legate. He died in November, 1530, foreseeing the great questions that would arise, "The king," he said, "is of royal spirit, and hath a princely heart: rather than he will miss or waut part of his appetite, he will hazard the loss of half a kingdom." Henry was reso-lute for his divorce, and was still anxious to obtain the papal sanction. In dragging hefore the world all the secrets of his domestic life, and showing openly his attachment to life, and showing openly his attachment to Anno Boleyn, he entered upon a career which led to momentous results. The Lutheran revolt in Germany had done much to shake the foundation of the papal anthority, and Henry VIII. had shown his orthodoxy by writing against Luther, and receiving from the Pope the titio of "Defender of the Faith." But the demand for reform was loud inside the Church, and Honry VIII. inside the Church, and Henry VIII. encouraged the Parliament of 1529 to pass measures for remedying clerical abuses. He tried to bring further pressure to bear npon the Pope by gathering opinions of the universities of Europe upon the question of the papal power to grant a dispensation for marriage with a brother's widow. In 1531 he went further, and threatened all the clergy of England with the penalties of Premunire because they had recognised Wolsey's logatine authority. They bought off the royal displeasure, but were driven in their bill to give the king the title of supreme head of the Church. Still the Pope did not give way, and next year Parliament was encouraged to continue tho war against the elergy, and tho payment of annates or first-fruits to the Pope was attacked. At last the king's patience was exhausted, and in January, 1533, he was secretly married to Anne Boleyn. The Pope threatened excommunication, whereon an Act was passed forbidding appeals to Rome. The divorce question was then tried before the court of Archbishop Cranmer; and Catherine, who refused to plead, was pronounced contumacious, and sentence was given against her. The Pope declared the divorce illegal. The breach with Rome was complete. Henry VIII. had done what he could to avoid the breach; but step by step he was drawn on until it was inevitable. The Parliament of 1534 finished the work of separating the Church of England from the papal headship, and instituting it as a national church under the headship of the king.

Henry VIII.'s chief adviser in these measures was Thomas Cromwell, who had risen to notice in Wolsey's service. Cromwell wished to re-establish the royal power as supreme over Church and State alike. The discontent created by these sweeping measures was sternly repressed. The Succession Act, which settled the crown upon the children of Anne Boleyn, was made a test of loyalty. The royal supremacy was enacted by Parliament, and it was high treason to question that title. Cromwell's spies and informers crowded the land. The monks of the Charterhouse perished on the scaffold for refusing to admit the royal supremacy. Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher were executed because they could not conscientiously take oath that they heartily approved of these changes. By these examples the discontented were cowed into acquiescence. The royal supremacy, exercised by Cromwell as Vicar-General, was used for clearing away seedplots of disaffection. In 1536 the smaller monasteries were visited and suppressed, and in 1539 the larger monasteries wer involved in the same fate. Their lands passed into the hands of a class of new nobility, who thus had a direct interest in maintaining the new state of things. The abbots disappeared from the House of Lords, and the Parliamentary influence of the Church was at an end.

There was no limit to the royal power, or to the subserviency of Parliament. Henry VIII. seems to have regarded himself as beyond all recognised principles of human conduct. In 1536 Anne Boleyn was accused of unchastity, and was beheaded. The day after her execution the king married Jane Seymour. Again the succession to the throne was altered by Act of Parliament. Henry VIII. was even allowed to nominate his successor by will. But the king's position was dangerous. In Ireland there was a serious rising of the Fitzgeralds. In Lincolnshire, an army of discontented folks presented their grievances. In Yorkshire, a more serious rising, "the Pilgrimage of Grace," was put down by the Duke of Norfolk. To guard against a rising of the old Yorkist faction in the west, the grandson of Edward IV., Edward Courtenay, Marquis of Exeter, was executed as a traitor. By the end of 1537, the disaffection created by the violent changes had been stammed and had been stamped out.

Henry VIII. desired nothing more than the absorption into the crown of the powers previously exercised by the Pope. But it was difficult to repress the seal of those who were inspired by the teaching of Luther, and discussed the doctrines of the Church with freedom. Retigious change and doctrinal reform spread more widely than Henry VIII. liked. He was willing to use it so far as it enabled him to make good his position, but no further. In 1539 Parliament passed the Bill of Six Articles, which asserted the chief points of the old system against the attacks of the Reformers. Cromwell was disposed to go further, and seek political advantages by a close alliance with the Protestant princes of Germany. In 1540 he negotiated Henry VIII.'s fourth marriage, with Anne, daughter of John, Duke of Cleves. His new wife displeased the king; the German princes were too irresolute to be of any political service. Henry VIII. repudiated his wife, and abandoned Cromwell, who was condemned by bill of attainder, and was executed. The king married Catherine Howard, niece of the Duke of Norfolk, and a reaction against Cromwell's policy set in. Catherine Howard was, in the year 1542, convicted of misconduct, and was executed. Next year Henry married, as his

The remainder of Henry VIII.'s reign was spent in war with Scotland and France, which, to his great annoyance, had renewed their old alliance. The young king, James V., married a French wife, and, in 1542, ravaged the borders; but died in consequence of the ignominious rout of his army at Solway Moss. Still the French party prevailed in Scotland, and the English generals on the borders kept and the English generals on the borders kept up a merciless system of plundering raids. Indignant against France, Henry again allied himself with Charics V., and, in 1544, cap-tured Boulogne. But Charies V. made peace tured Boulogne. for himself, and abandoned his ally. Still Henry VIII. carried on the war single-handed tili, in 1546, peace was made at Houlogne, and France agreed to pay a large pension to the English king. Meanwhile, Henry VIII.'s health was giving way, and his popularity had greatly waned. There was a secret strife between religious parties, which only the strong hand of the king could repress. The Duke of Norfolk led the reactionary party; the Earl of Hertford, uncle of the young Edward, heir to the throne, favoured the Reformers. Norfolk and his son, the Earl of Surrey, behaved so as to awaken the king's suspicions. Henry VIII. was above all things careful that there should be no disturbance during the minority of his son. In December, 1546, Norfoik and Surrey were suddenly im-prisoned. Surrey was beheaded, and Norfolk was about to share the same fate when Henry VIII. died on Jan 28, 1547.

Henry VIII. w. by nature a highly-gifted man, of a strongly-narked character, which won the hearts of all. He attached his ministers to him as few rulers have ever succeeded in doing. He used their loyal devotion to the full, and then remorselessly abandoned them. He was above all things a king. No king had a higher sense of the privileges of royalty; no king exercised them more fully, or succeeded in obtaining for them a fuller recognition from his people. Henry is equally remarkable for what he did, and for what he abstained from doing. He clothed his own caprice in the forms of justice; he elevated his own personal desires to principles of national policy; he strained the Constitution to its furthest point, but he did not break it; he was a tyrant, but he clothed his tyranny under the forms of parliamentary sanction; he so far identified himself with the general interest of his people, that they were ready to trust him with larger powers than any previous king enjoyed. In his private life his coarseness was strangely mixed with questions of the national welfare; and the morality required from the ordinary man was set aside in the case of the sovereign. Everything was pardoned in a ruler who had a hand strong enough to maintain order, and Who could hold a firm balance between contending factions. Under Henry VIII. England passed through a great crisis without material change of the constitution either of Church or State. A great revolution was accomplished with comparative peace.

Henry, Prince of Wales (b. 1594, d. 1612), the eldest son of James I., was a prince of great promise. It was for his benefit that his father wrote the manual of conduct entitled, Basilikon Doron, or The Royal Gift. He seems to have been very popular with the Scots as well as with the English, and owing to his violent dislike of Popery the young prince was the hope of the Protestant party of England; and his character and attainments offered high promise. He died in November, 1612, from a fever probably brought on by over-violent exertions. The suspicion that he was poisoned seems to have been altogether unfounded.

Henry, son of Henry II. (b. 1155, d. 1183), was married at an early age to Margaret, daughter of Louis VII. of France. His father had destined him to succeed him in England, Normandy, and Anjou, while the rest of his dominions was to be divided between his other sons. In 1172, in pursuance of this scheme, the young Henry was crowned king, and in 1173 was re-crowned with his wife. Next year Henry II., anxious to make some provision for John, requested his elder sons to give up to their brother somo few castles out of their promised shares of his dominions. The young King Henry refused, and joined the French king in the great confederation be had formed against Henry II.; but the allies were defeated everywhere, and Henry was only too glad to seek reconcili-ation with his father. But his intrigues continued both against his father and his brother Richard, his whole aim being to establish an independent dominion for himself. In 1183 these intrigues ended in an open revolt in which Henry and Geoffrey were ranged against Prince Richard and their f ther. A miserable civil war ensued, in the course of which Henry died at Martel. Of his character Giraldus Cambrensis speaks in terms of high commendation, which the facts of his life fail to justify.

Lyttelton, History of Henry II.

Henry, PRINCE OF SCOTLAND (d. 1152), was the son of David I. Stephen, soon after his coronation, conferred on him the fiefs of Northampton and Huntingdon, which his father repudiated, and at the Treaty of Durham, 1139, added Northumbria as well. Henry led a division of the Scottish army at the Battle of the Standard, 1138. He died June, 1152, to the sorrow of all, for we are told by the chronielers that he was a brave and able soldier, and walked like his father in the paths of justice and of truth. He married Ada, daughter of William de Warenne, Earl of Surrey.

Henry of Almayne (b. 1235, d. 1271) was the son of Richard of Cornwall, King of the Romans. In 1263 he joined the barons against his uncle Henry III., and was taken prisoner by the king, but in the civil war which ensued he fought on the royalist side, and took part in the rattle of Lewes. He was afterwards given as one of the hostages to the barons for the performance of the Mise of Lewes, and was by them sent over to France to negotiate a new arbitration by St. Louis. After the defeat of the barons at Evesham, Henry received valuable grants of land, and in 1268 accompanied his cousin Prince Edward on his Crusade. On his return he was murdered at Viterbo in Italy by Simon and Guy de Montfort.

Heptarchy, The, is a term often applied to the English kingdoms which existed previous to the time of Egbert. It has been used generally by most of the historians of the 18th century, and is still a common term in historical text-books. It is, however, in-appropriate, as the word Heptarchy (ἐπταρχία) strictly means a government of seven persons. Besides this, it conveys the erroneous idea that there were in England from the fifth to the ninth centuries, always seven independent kingdoms. This was very far from the case: there were often more than seven kingdoms and more frequently fewer; but if every state which at any time had a king of its own were to be reckoned, the number of kingdoms would very far exceed the number. Those writers who use the term Heptarchy, understand by it the kingdoms of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, Essex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. [For the whole subject see Anolo-SAXON KINODOMS.]

Herat is a city of immemorial antiquity, situated in Afghanistan on the high road from India to Persia, and Central Asia. Since the foundation of the Afghan monarchy in the middle of the 18th century, Herat has been more or less subject to the claims of Cabul; and when in 1838 the Persians attempted to seize it, the English helped the people of Herat to resist. The Afghans, under Lieut. Eldred Pottinger, endured a famous siege which lasted till the English Government sent a message to the Shah, informing him that his occupation of Herat would be followed by war, whereupon the Persians raised the siege Sept. 9, 1838. In 1857 England compelled the Shah to recognise the independence of Herat; in 1863 it was definitely incorporated with Afghanistan.

Sir W. Napier, Administration of Scinde.

Herbert of Cherbury, Edward, Leads (b. 1583, d. 1648), was educated at Oxford, and, after travelling abroad, where he make the acquaintance of Casaubon and other grant scholars, serving in the Netherlands under ::-Prince of Orange (1615-16), and visiting Italy, was appointed English ambassador at Paris (1618). Seven years later he retired into private life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. In the Civil War he ultimately sided with the Parliament, though at first somowhat inclined to the Royalist cause. Lord Herbert's chief historical writings are a History of Henry VIII., an account of the Expedition to the Isle of Rhe (in which he defends Buckingham's conduct), and a celebrated Autobiography. Lord Herbert also wrote several philosophical works, in which he laid down the principles of Deism.

Herbert of Lea, Sidney Herbert, 1sr Lonn (b. 1810, d. 1861), entered Parlia. ment as member for Wiltshiro in 1832, and attached himself to the party of Sir Robert Peel and the Conservatives. In 1841 the lastmentioned statesman appointed him Secretary of the A miralty, from which office he was, in 1845, promoted to be Secretary for War. In common with almost every other member of Sir Robert Peel's government, he changed his views with regard to the question of Protection, and became an ardent advocato of free trade. On Sir Robert's death, Sidney Herbert, in company with Sir James Graham, Mr. Gladstone, and a few others, formed a party by themselves called "Peelites." When the Earl of Aberdeen became Premier, nearly the whole of the Poelites took office, and Sidney Herbert once more became Secretary for War, but was not altogether successful as the head of this department at the breaking out of the Crimean War. When Lord Palmerston succeeded to Lord Aberdeen, Mr. Sidney Herbert was made Colonial Secretary. In 1859 he again became Secretary of State for War under Lord Palmerston, and introduced some important reforms. In the midst of these labours Mr. Herbert's health began to fail. He was called to the Upper House by the title of Lord Herbert of Lea in 1860.

Herbert, Sir. Thomas (b. 1605, d. 1682), was a member of the family of Pembroke, and had distinguished himself as a traveller when, on the outbreak of the Civil War, he juined the Parliamentary party. He was employed as commissary of Fairfax's army, and when Charles I. was betrayed by the Scotch, he was made one of the king's attendants. The Threnodic Carolina, which he published in 1678, gives a minuto account of Charles I.'s life during his imprisonment. Ho was made a baronet in 1660, but took no farther part in public affairs, devoting himself almost exclusively to antiquarian rescribes. Sir Thomas Herbert published an account of no travels in 1634, and this work has been subsequently reprinted. His account of Charles (as last days was re-published in 1791 and 1813.

Mereced first appears in history as the place where Bishop Putta settled (676), on the exercise of his episcopal functions after he was obliged to leave Rochester. Here, according to Dr. Bright, he may have acted as a kind of suffragan for Saxulf, Bishop of Mercia, though we are not to consider him the first of a continuous line of bishops belonging to this see. Hereford wasdestroyed by Gruffydd, of Wales, in 1055, but was re-fortified by Harold the same year. Its first charter dates from the reign of Richard I. (1189).

Hereford, THE PERRADES OF. The earldom of Hereford was held by William Fitz. Osbern, the Conqueror's Justiciary, and by his son Roger. In 1140 the title was granted by the Empress Matilda to Mile of Gloucester, from whom it passed to his son, and then to the son of his daughter, Margery, wife of Humphrey de Bohun. Seven earls were descended from the Bohnn family, until its extinction in this branch, in 1372. In 1397. Henry of Bolingbroke, afterwards king, was created Duke of Hereford, a title which becamo merged in the crown. In 1550 a viscounty of the same style was created for Walter Devereux, who was descended from Eleanor, daughter of the last earl of the Bohun family. Walter's son was made Earl of Essex (1572), but in the next generation, Robert, the famous Earl of Essex, was attainted and beheaded (1601). His son, Robert, was restered in blood and honour in 1603, hut died childless in 1646, whc... the viscounty of Hereford devolved upon his cousin, Sir Walter Devereux, in whose issue it still remains.

Hereford, Humphrey de Bohun, 10th Earl of (d. 1298), Lord High Constable of England, succeeded to his grandfather's title and estates in the year 1275. His father had been a supporter of Simon de Montfort, and the son inherited the traditions of the baronial party. This Earl of Hereford is chiefly remarkable for having headed the opposition to Edward I.'s demands in 1297, and refused to serve the king abroad. It was in vain that Edward threatened or prayed, the earl and his fellow-baron, Bigod, stood their ground, and when the Council broke up raised a force of fifteen hundred cavalry to prevent the king from seizing the wool or collecting money. This contest led to the enactment of the statute De Tailagio non concedendo. Dr. Stubbs considers that Hereford's conduct on this occasion was not dictated by any strongly disinterested motive, but actuated by revenge for his imprisonment in 1292.

Hereford, Humphrey de Bohun, 11th Earl of (d. 1322), was the son of the tenth earl, and married Elizabeth, the seventh daughter of Edward I. He inherited something of the spirit of his father, and was one of the Ordainers in 1310. Eight years later he was appointed one of the four earls in the permanent Council of 1318. In 1321 he was forbidden to attend a meeting of the aggrieved lords, at which he meditated exposing his wrongs. His great cause of complaint was the power of the Despensers, who were threatening his influence on the Welsh Marches. In the same year he was the chief prosecutor of the Despensers in Parliament, and was formally pardoned for the part he took in these proceedings. Next year he was slain at the battle of Boroughbridge (1322).

Heresy, Leoislation concerning. According to the canon law, heresy was a subject of ecclesiastical discipline. The suspected heretie was summoned before the bishop's court, was examined concerning his opinions, and was required to submit to the parental jurisdiction of his ecclesiastical father. If convicted, he submitted, did penance, confessed his errors, and amended his ways. The common law, in early times, took cognisance of heresy, but probably only in the case of those who were contumacious te their bishop, or relapsed after submission. Heresy was a subject of inquest at the sheriffs' tourn, and the punishment of avowed unbelief was burning. But in early times there were very few cases of heresy, and it did not cause any serious trouble till the rise of Lollardy. In the Assize of Clarendon heresy is noted, but heretics are treated with a leniency contrasting strongly with the legislation of later times. The Lollard reachers refused to obey the citations of the bishops summoning them to answer for their opinions. In 1382 a statute was passed enacting that commissions should be directed to the sheriffs to arrest persons certified by the bishops to be heretics, and to keep them in prison until they satisfied the Church. Archbishop Courtenay drew up a series of fourteen propositions which were condemned as heretical.
The king, by royal letter, empowered the bishops to imprison all who maintained the condemned propositions. The chief Lollard teachers in Oxford were tried, and made submission. But in the Parliament of 1383 the Commons petitioned against the statute as not having received their consent. Though the statute was not repealed, no further proceedings were taken under it, though in 1391 Archbishop Arundel proceeded under the royal letters of

The spread of Lollardy was, however, a source of political as well as ecclesiastical discontent, and in 1401 a severely repressive statute was passed, De Hæretico Comburendo (2 Henry IV., c. 15). By this Act the bishop was empowered to arrest and imprison a heretie; he was bound to to him within three months; he had power to imprison or fine him, if he were convicted; if he refused to abjure, he was to be given over to the sheriff and publicly burned. During the session in which this Act was passed, a Lollard teacher, Wil-liam Sawtre, was burned by the king's writ. Even the powers given by this statute were not found sufficient, and in 1406 the Commons petitioned tho king to enact that all officers of the crown should make inquest for heretics and present them for trial before Parliament. Though the king gave his consent, nothing was done; possibly the archbishop objected to the confusion of spiritual and secular jurisdictions. But the principle contained in this petition was turned into a statute by Henry V. in 1414. This statute expanded the law of 1401, and provided further that all justices should inquire after heretics, and deliver them to the ordinaries to be tried by the spiritual court. Heresy was now made an offence against the common law; and the secular arm was not merely used to support the spiritual power, but had the duty of initiating proceedings against offenders. This statute seems to have been sufficient to suppress Lollardy. The number of trials, howover, under all these statutes was not numerous, and the executions were few.

With the outbreak of the Reformation movement, heresy again became a crime, and the use of the old statutes was revived. The executions for opinion during the sixteenth century were carried out by virtue of them, and the legislation of that period was concerned rather with determining what was heresy than how heretics were to be tried and punished. By a statute of 1533 offences against the see of Rome were declared not to be heresy. In 1539 the Bill of the Six Articles declared what opinions were heretical. We need not follow the variations in this demnition during the two succeeding reigns. On the accession of Elizabeth in 1559, former statutes were repealed. Heresy as a simple offence was visited by spiritual punishment in a spiritual court; contumacious or relapsed heretics, after conviction by a provincial synod, were handed over to the secular arm to be burned. At the same time heresy was defined to be such opinions as were contrary to (1) canonical scripture, (2) the four general councils, (3) future declara-tions of Parliament with the assent of Con-vocation. Still Anabaptists were burnt under Elizabeth, and Arians under James I. The punishment of death for heresy was abolished under Charles II. in 1677, and the heretic was subject only to ecclesiastical correction "pro salute animae." An Act of 1698 made apostacy or denial of Christianity an offenco liable to imprisonment.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., vol. iii.; Report of Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, Appendix; Blackstone, Commentaries. [M. C.]

Heretoga (lit., the army leader) was the Angle-Saxon title given originally to the commander of the army; but in later times it seems (like its Latin equivalent "dux") to have become hereditary, and was sometimes used synonymously with the titles of "ealderman" and "earl." Heretoga is the word used in the Angle-Saxon Chronicle to describe Hengest and Hersa; whereas Cerdic and Cynric are called "ealdermen."

See Anglo-Saron Chronicle, in the Rolls Series, vol. i., pp. 21 and 24.

Hereward (d. circa 1973), called the Wake, was the son of Leofric, Lord of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. He seems to have fled from the country for some time after the Conquest, but had returned and was in possession of the Isle of Ely in 1070. Round him were soon gathered the bravest and most resolute of the English outlaws, Bishop Ethclwine, of Durham, Siward, and even Earl Morcar. Hereward's first recorded exploit was the plunder of the monastery at Ely, which had just received a new Norman abbot, Turold, from Malmesbury. The fame of his courage was now spread abroad, and we read of an unsuccessful effort made by the men vi Berkshire to join his camp. William therefore determined to crush, in person, a rebellion which was assuming such large proportions. Fixing his head-quarters at Cambridge, he commenced a regular siege, and forced the greater part of the defenders to yield (1071), but Hereward with a few followers hroke through the enemies' ranks and escaped. Legend asserted that he long continued his predatory incursions against the monastery of Ely, and that he was in later times reconciled to William by the offices of his wife Ælfthryth. According to Geoffrey Gaimar, William took him over to help in the reduction of Maine when that province revolted in 1073.

Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. iv.

Heriot (a word derived from the Anglo-Saxon Here-geat, war-gear) was the right of the lord on the death of his tenant to seize either the best beast or the best chattel of which the tenant is possessed at the time of his death. It originated from the fact that the lord used to lend his vassal horse and armour for life, which on the tenant's death reverted to the lord. The custom is by some held to have been introduced into England by the Danes, and continues down to the present day on copyhold kind, though either the lord or the tenant can compel the extinguishment of the right. Heriot differs from Relief, as it is paid out of the estate of the last tenant, not by the heir.

Hermitage Castle, in Roxburghshire, is the place where Sir Alexander Ramsay was starved to death by the Knight of Liddesdalo (1342). In Jan., 1347, it was taken by the English. In later years it passed from the hands of the Douglases to the Earl of Bothwell, who was visited there by Queen Mary, after he had been wounded in a border fray, 1561.

Herries, John Maxwell, Lord (d. 1583), though at first an adherent of the Lords of Congregation, became a supporter of Mary Queen of Scots, whom he warned in solemn terms against marrying Bothwell. On the queen's escape from Lochleven, Herries joined her at Hamilton, and, in company with Lord Fleming, was sent as her ambassador to Elizabeth, and subsequently acted as one of her commissioners at the inquiry of York. He was accused of aiding the Hamiltons against the Regent Murray, but obtained an indemnity. Lord Herries was a subtle diplomatist, and no mean rival to such men as Lethington and Cecil.

Herrings, THE BATTLE OF (Feb. 12. 1429), was fought near Rouvrai between the English a . the French. The English had been besieging the town of Orleans since the summer of the year 1428, and Sir John Fastolf was commissioned to conduct a convoy of provisions for the use of the English army. The French made an effort to prevent its arrival at the besiegers' camp, and attacked Sir John, who had only 1,700 men under him, with very superior numbers. Sir John, however, entrenched his men behind the waggons, and succeeded in routing the enemy, finishing their confusion by ordering a charge when he perceived that his opponents were disorganised. success seemed to have rendered the fall of Orleans almost unavoidable; and, indeed, the town must soon have surrendered had it not been for the appearance of Joan of Arc. The Battle of Herrings was so named from the fact that a large part of the provisions convoyed by the English troops consisted of salted fish for the use of the besiegers.

Hertford was a place of considerable importance under the Anglo-Saxon kings. An ecclesiastical synod was held there as early as the year 673. It was the sito of one of the numerous castles founded by Edward the Elder in the first decade of the tenth century. The castle was reconstructed and fortified after the Norman Conquest. It held ont for Henry III. in the rebellion of the barons, and was captured by Louis the Danphin, Dec., 1216. The castle and earldom of Hertford were conferred on John of Gaunt in 1346.

Hertford, Edward Seymour, 2nd Earl of (d. 1621), was the son of the Duke of Somerset, Protor of England. On the accession of I with, the earldom was revived in his favour (1559). Shortly afterwards (1561) Hertford was inprisoned in the Tower and fined £15,000 for having secretly married Lady Catherino Grey, who was regarded by Elizabeth as a possible dangerous rival. Archbishop Parker declared their union illegal, and the issue illegitimate. Hertford underwent a long imprisonment, and continued in obscurity during Elizabeth's reign. He was afterwards married again, and lived to extreme old age.

Her

Bervey, John, Lord (b. 1696, d. 1743), second son of the Earl of Bristol, succeeded to the courtesy title on the death of his elder brother in 1723. During most of his career he supported Walpole. In 1731 he fought a duel with Pulteney, on account of a libel against himself which Pulteney refused to disavow. Both combatants were slightly wounded. In 1740 he was appointed Lord Privy Seal against the wish of the Duke of Newcastle, and we find him subsequently intriguing with Pulteney and Chestorfield against Sir Robert Walpole. In 1743 he distinguished himself by a speech against the Gin Act. Lord Hervey left behind him certain memoirs of his own time, which form a most valuable addition to the history of the period of which Ley treat. He had the misfortune to offend Pope, who has branded him under the pseudonym of Sporus in the Prologue to the Satires.

Lord Hervey's Memoirs of the Deign of George II. were first published by Mr. J. W. Croker in 1848.

Horham, in Northumberland, was the site of a great abbey founded by Wilfrid in 674. Four or five years later he instituted it a bishoprie. In 875, however, the town and abbey were sacked and burned by the Northmen, and in 883 the diocese was annexed to Lindisfarne.

Hexham, The Battle of (May 15, 1464), was fought during the Wars of the Roses soon after the battle of Hedgeley Moor, by Montague against Somerset and the remnant of the Lancastrians. The latter were totally defeated and Somerset slain. Henry IV. found a refuge in Lancashire, while Margaret and her son fied to Flanders.

Hexham, John of (A. twelfth century), was the author of the Continuation to the History of Simeon of Durham. This continuation extends from 1130 to 1154, and is, for the most part, a mere compilation. From the year 1139 to the end it is, however, much fuller, and is specially valuable for Northern transactions, though it is not free from chronological errors. It seems to have been compiled towards the close of the twelfth century. John was Prior of Hexham, but beyond this fact nothing seems to be known of his life.

John of Hexham's Continuation is published in Twysden's Decem Scriptores.

Heylin, Peter (b. 1600, d. 1662), was educated at Oxford, and recommended by Laud for the office of chaplain to the king. During the Civil War he was stripped of his property and forced to hide himself. In his retirement he devoted himself to literature; and on the Restoration ho was restored to his benefices. Dr. Heylin's chief historical work is entitled Cyprianus Anglicanus; a History of the Life and Death...of Archbishop Laud. He was also the anthor of A Short View of the Life of Charles I., and several other works.

Hicks Beach, Sie Michael Edward (b. 1837), was Parliamentary Secretary to the Poor Law Board from February till December, 1868. In February, 1874, he took office under Mr. Disraeli as Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1878 he became Colonial Secretary, in 1885 Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the Lower House, in 1886 Irish Secretary, in 1888 President of the Board of Trade, in 1895 Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1905 he retired from active political life, and was made Viscount St. Aldwyn.

Hidage was a tax anciently paid to the king for every hide of land. Bracton reckons it with carucage as an extraordinary imposition, and not as a regular service or custom. Under Ethelred the Unready (994) the land was taxed by hides at the time of the Danish invasion, eight hides furnishing a man in full armour, and every three hundred hides a ship. [Hide.]

Hide, The, was originally the extent of land allotted for the support of one family. The size of the hide is a question which has given rise to the most various conjectures. Kemble has assigned it thirty-three acres, whereas Grimm gives tho eorresponding German huda, from thirty to forty acres. But in later times the hide was reckoned at 120 acres. Dr. Stubbs has suggested that the different sizes assigned to tho hide may be due to a confusion between a man's share in each one of four ecommon fields and in the total, which would, of course, vary from one to four, or from 30 acres to 120; but he adds the warning that this is not by any means a full explanation, and that regard must be had to local eustom. Under Norman and Plantagenet rule, when division into knights' fees seem to have become more and more paramount, it is difficult to discover that they bore any fixed proportion to the hide. In the Liber Niger de Scaccario, the size of the knight's fee varies from two and a half hides to six hides. Other authorities have reckoned it as equivalent to eight, but probably it bore no direct relation to the extent of land, but rather to its value. In Anglo-Saxon times the hide was used as a unit for rating and for estimation of a man's social and political standing. The freeman with five hides and a burh-geat seat ranked as a thegn; the freeman with forty hides as an eorl.

Dialogus de Scaccario in Select Charters; Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Kemble, Saxons in England.

Rigden, Ralph (d. 1364), a monk of St. Werburgh's, Chester, was the author of a work entitled Polychronicon, a universal history and geography, divided into seven books. It is of no great value as an original authority, but as Mr. Gairdner says, "its real interest lies in the view it affords of the historical, geographical, and scientific knowledge of the ago in which it appeared." It was translated into English by John Trevisa, vicar of Berkeley, in Edward IV.'s reign, and was one of the earliest works issued by Caxton (1480). Two years later the same printer brought out an edition of Trevisa's translation.

The Polychronicon has been published in the Rolls Series with Trevisa's translation.

High Church. This term first appears about 1703 to designate that party in England which demanded the strict enforcement of the laws against Dissenters, and the passing of such additional measures as the Occasional Conformity Bill; it was, in fact, practically synonymous with Tory. In more modern times, however, it is only used to denote those members of the Church of England who hold certain doctrines, and the name has by analogy been given to the party associated with similar doctrines in the seventeenth century. Under Elizabeth the majority of the bishops, and of the more zealous clergy, wero Calvinist in theology. Episcopacy was defended as a matter of expediency; conformity was only enforced for the sake of order, and because it was part of the established law. But towards the end of the reign, a party arose among the younger elergy, who "met Calvinism by the assertion of its inconsistency with the ancient doetrine and constitution of the primitive ('hurch, and the claim of a divine right for the Presbyterian polity by elaiming a divine right for Episcopaey. They asserted against the individualism of the Puritan theology and worship, the reality of sacramental grace, of the power of absolution, of the authoritative ritual of the Church." (Dr. Barry.) Of this school the most important writer was Bishop Andrewes (1555-1626), the most active praetical leader, Laud (1573-1645). It did not necome prominent till the later years of James I. That king, though a firm supporter of Episcopacy, and of the established ecclesiastical system, was of distinctly Calvinist sympathies. But his love of order tended to make him favour the growing party; and in 1616, Laud, its leader at Oxford, was appointed to the deanery of Gloucester, to put un end to the irregularities in the cathedral worship, which the Calvinist bishop of that see had allowed. He at once caused tho communion table to be removed from the middle of the choir to the east end of the chancel, and placed "altarwise." But his example was not largely followed; and it was not till 1622 that Laud gained much political power. In that year he had taken part in a discussion with the Josuit Fisher, on the relative elaims of the English and Roman Churches, in order to prevent if possible the conversion to Rome of Buckingham's mother. His ability then secured for him considerable influence over Buckingham, and access to Prince Charles, to whom, upon his accession, he became chief adviser in ecclesiastical matters. The new teaching rapidly spread; in its protest against the dogmatic definitions of Calvinism on predestination, it resembled, and was doubtless influenced by, the Arminianism of Holland; so that, in spite of their protests, the term Arminian was generally applied to the members of the party. In 1624 a reply by one of them (Montague) to a Roman Catholie pamphlet, wherein he had denied that the popular Calvinist doctrines were the ereed of the Church of England, called forth a remonstrance from the Commons. Montague, however, gained the king's sympathy, and wrote a second book, Appello Casarem, to explain the same principles. movement represented by Montague was, however, almost entirely a learned movement; it had little hold upon the country gentry or town traders, and irritated them by exalting the royal prerogative. In 1625 the Commons attacked the second book, and Montague was committed for a short time to the custody of the Sergeant. But Charles was now king, and Laud was supreme in Church matters. Laud was requested to draw up a list of orthodox and Puritan elergy, that preferment might be reserved for the former; and in 1628 Montague became Bishop of Chichester, and Laud himself Bishop of London. In the previous year, Dr. Cozins had prepared for the use of the queen's attendants a book of devotions, which gave to the new teaching an expression startling to the ordinary Englishman of the time: and the declaration prefixed to the Articles in 1629, which was intended to put an end to controversy, still further annoyed the Puritan elergy. In the Parliament of 1628-29 the storm broke, and one of the eelebrated three resolutions of 1629 was to the effect that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or seek to extend Popery or Arminianism, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and the com-monwealth." Undeterred by this expression of national feeling, Laud, now arehbishop, revived in 1634 the disused right of metropolitical visitation, and everywhere caused the communion table to be removed to the east end, fortified by a decision of the king in Privy Council, which was of more than doubtful legality. Laud's action aroused bitter opposition among the elergy, and was one of the main causes of the Civil War.

The Act of Uniformity of 1662 almost completely removed from the English Church the Puritum element; at the same time the country gentry rallied round the Church, and Angle-Catholic teaching no longer met with the opposition it had encountered in the first half of the century. But as the Church had identified itself with the doctrine of passive obedience, it was with great reluctance that the main body of the clergy took the oath to William III.; eight bishops and 400 clergy preferred te suffer deprivation, and created the nonjuring schism. But though the Church was thus weakened, legitimist feeling, associated with the doctrine of non-resistance, revived under Anne, who was known to favour the Tories and the claims of her brother, the Old Pretender. A bitter warfaro of words began between High and Low Church, the latter term meaning the Whig clergy, most of them Latitudinarian, with a few Calvinists. Swift declares, "our State parties, tho more to inflame their passions, have mixed religious and eivil animosities tagether, borrowing both their appellations from the Church, with the uddition of 'High' and 'Low,' how little soever the disputes relate to these terms." The tide quickly rose; in 1705 Hoadley, preaching against the doctrine of passive obedience, was condemned by the Lower House of Convocation; and in 1710, the impeachment of Sacheverell, for his sermon on nen-resistance, brought about tho victory of the Tory—i.e., the High Church party. Their period of power (1710—14) was marked by the passing of the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts, by the building of fifty new churches in London, and by the temporary withdrawal of the Regium Denum from the Irish Presbyterians. But the political ill-success of Tories and Jacobites reacted on the Church, and when Convocation was prorogued in 1717, and not again allowed to meet, the clergy were unable to create any popular mevement in their favour. During the earlier part of the eighteenth century, the majority of the bishops were Whig and Low--i.e., Latitudinarian, while the mass of the clergy were Tory and High. But the old doctrinal questions ceased to be discussed; popular preaching concerned itself with morality, and theological controversy touched rather the foundation of Christianity than its superstructure. Soon after tho beginning of George 111.'s reign, however, the Puritan remnant in the Church were roused to fresh life by the Wesleyan movement, and by the beginning of the next century, the Evangelical party had gained a preponderating influence in the English Church.

It was under these circumstances "at the Tractarian movement began at Ox I in 1833. It was thought by several that the only way to meet the ecclesiastical changes threatened by the Whigs (it was the year of the suppression of ten "rish bishopries") was to fall back on the teaching of the seventeenth century English divines. The "real founder ' of this party, according to Dr. Blunt (see article on High Church in Dict. of Sects and Schools of Thought) was Hugh James Rose, who was soon joined by John Henry Newman, John Keble, Edward Bouverie Pusey, Hurrell Froude, William Palmer, and Isaac Williams. These commenced the series of Tracts for the Times, which brought about a rapid increaseof their numbers, and excited the fiercest opposition. In 1841, the Remonstrance of Four Tutors (including A. C. Tait, afterwards. opposition. archbishop) led to the condemnation by tho Hebdomadal Council of Newman's Tract No. 90. Four years later Mr. Ward was censured for a treatiso by the Convocation of the-University of Oxford, though the proctors prevented Newman's name being included. In 1845 Newman joined the Reman Church. In spito of this and other secessions, the party centinued to spread. In the Denisen case (1856) a sentence of deprivation pronounced by Archbishep Summer upon a clergyman for certain teaching as to the Eucharist, was reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Ceuncil, though on technical grounds; und in the Bennett case (1872), high sacramental teaching was distinctly declared per-The revival of Anglo-Catholic doctrine had been accompanied by a renewed interest in archæology, and by improved ecclesiastical architecture, under the influence of Pugin and Scott. The Public Wership Regulation Act, 1874, failed to suppress the return to pre-Refermation usages known as "Ritualism," though several clergymen were imprisoned under it. Archbishop Benson's judgment in the Bishop of Lincoln's case (delivered Nov. 21, 1890; confirmed on appeal to Judicial Committee, Aug. 2, 1892) has increased the latitude permissible in ritual.

Far the best account of the seventeenth century movement will be found in Gardiner, Hest. Eng., 1603—1642. See also Blunt, Reformation of Church of England, it; Church on Andrews in Masters in Eng. Theology; Mozley on Leud, in his Essays. The most characteristic writings of the time are Montague, Appello Cesarem (1825); Prynne, Survey of Mr. Cosine his coening devotions (1628); Heylin, Coal from the Altar, replied to in Williams, Holy Table, Name, and Thing (1637); Laud, Diary; Prynne, Canterbury's Doom (1646). plan of exercising their jurisdiction in ecclesinstical matters through special commissioners. General commissions were issued hy Edward in 1549 and 1551 to a number of royal councillors, theologians, and lawyers, to inquire into heresy and nonconformity, and a somewhat similar commission appeared in 1557, though in this case it was restricted to inquiry, and further action was left to the bishops' courts. The statute (Elis, c. 1) restoring the royal jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical empowered the queen to nominate commissioners to exercise this power; accordingly two months later (July, 1659) a commission was directed to inquire, "as well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as also by witnesses, and other ways and means ye can devise," into offences against the Acts of supremacy and uniformity, heresy, adulteries, and other ecclesiastical crimes. subsequent commissions were drawn on the model of this one. In the reign of James I. frequent disputes arose with the common-law courts as to the limits of the power of the High Commission; in 1611 Coke laid down that it had no right to fine or imprison, except in cases of heresy and schism. During the whole of its existence the court busied itself in enforcing uniformity. The court was abolished by Act of the Long Parliament (July, 1641). In spite of the Act of 1641, and that of 1661, confirming it, James II., in July, 1686, created a new Court of Commission for ecclesiastical causes. It was abolished by the Bill of Rights.

The main authority is Stubbe, in Report of Eccles. Courts Commission (1888), p. 49. High Court of Justice, THE (Ireland), was established in 1652. It was intended that it should try all Catholics who had shed Protestant blood, otherwise than in open battle, since 1641. Altogether some 200 persons were convicted.

High Treason. [TREASON.]

Highlands, The, or Scotland, in a strictly geographical sense seem to commence in the south near Loch Lomond, and thence to be separated from the Lowlands by the great valley of Strathmore. But from an historical point of view the word must be considered to embrace the Celtic-speaking part of Scotland. In the eighth century there appear to have heen seven provinces, each of which was ruled over by its own ri, or king, who had a subking dependent on him. The names of these provinces (with the sub-provinces also), so far as can now be ascertained, were (1) Angus and Mearns, (2) Athole and Gowrie, (3) Strathearn and Menteith, (4) Fife, (5) Mar and Buchan, (6) Moray and Ross, (7) Caithness. Under the kings of Alban and of Scotia (889-1092), we have still seven province bearing more or less relation to the earlier seven. At this period these provinces are no longer ruled by kings and sub-kings, but each has its own mormaer, or great steward. Meanwhile, in the extreme north, Harold Harfagr had, shout the year 889, given the Orkneys to Jarl Sigurd to be held subject to the King of Norway. By about the year 969, the Earls of Oraney had conquered all the country north of the Spey. But when Sigurd of Orkney was slain at the battle of Clontarf (1014), while the Orkney Isles passed to his elder sons, to be held of the King of Norway, we read that his younger son, Thorsinn, was sent to Malcolm's court, and there invested with the jarldoms of Caithness and Sunderland. But Moray and Ross now fell off from both Norse and Scotch dependency, and were ruled by their own ri, Finleikr. By the time of Duncan's accession (1034) Thorfinn had united the Orkneys to his original jarldom of Caithness, and the Scotch king attempted to confer the latter province on his nephew Moddon, and even went so far as to support his right by arms. It was on this occasion that Macbeth, the Mormaer or Ri of Caithness, deserted, and perhaps murdered the Scotch king (1040). Scotland was now divided between Thorfinn and Macbeth. It was probably on the death of Thorfinn (cires 1057) that Duncan's son, Malcolm Canmore, was able to drive back Macbeth. About the same time the other earldoms of Thorfinn, with the exception of Caithness, seem to have been recovered by their native mormaers subect probably to vague claims on the part of Malcolm as ardri or head-king. It is during the years 1107 and 1124, when Malcolm's son Alexander was reigning over the Celtic part of Scotland north of the Forth, that we come across the first mention of the seven earls-four of whom certainly, and probably all seven, represented the old mormaers who, having lost their original title of ri, were now changing their later one for the Latin comes. During the reign of David I. (1124-53) Moray, which rose in rebellion under its mormaer, Angue, was far more firmly than ever united to the Scotch crown. Ross was thoroughly subdued by William the Lion in 1179, though an attempt was made a few years later to separate the districts north of the Tay from the rest of Scotland by setting up a new king, who combined in his own person Norse blood with that of Malcolm Canmore. After the suppression of this insurrection (1187) William forced Harold, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, to acknowledge his dependence on the Scottish king as regards the half of the latter province by the payment of 2,000 merks (1202); while Sutherland, the other half, ultimately became an earldom in the family of De Moravia, circa 1230. On the death of the last Norwegian Earl of Caithness, in 1231, his lands were divided between the last-mentioned family and that of the Earl of Angus. Lastly, about the year 1222, the sole remaining Celtic province of Argyle seems to have submitted to Alexander II. But, though the whole county was now nominally subject to ono king, yet there was a broad line of demarcation between that part of Scotland which had become thoroughly feudalised, and had been so long subject to the head king at Scone or Edinburgh, and the Celtic-speaking districts of the north and west. In 1411, Donald, Lord of the Isles, who elaimed the earldom of Moray, was defeated by the Earl of Mar at the great battle of Harlaw, which seems to have finally checke 'the dangers threatened by the growth of this Celtie and Highland power. From this time onwards the incursions of the Highlanders on the Lowlands were limited to occasional plundering raids. Till the eighteenth century the Highland districts remained a province inhabited by an alien and semi-barbarous people; and though nominally part of the kingdom of Scotland, it was in fact ruled by the various tribal chiefs under their own laws and customs. In tho wars of the seventeenth century, the Highlanders were easily enlisted on the side of tho Stuarts against the Covenanters; and they made the last stand both under Montrose and Dundee. After the suppression of the rebellion of 1715, a determined attempt was made to break up the tribal organisation. An Act was passed (1724) ordering the High-landers to be disarmed, and the disarmament was effected by General Wade (1725). The same officer also completed between 1726 and 1737, the great military roads through the Highlands, by means of which, together with a chain of fortified military posts, a vigorous police was established and plundering stopped. A happy idea was conceived of utilising the military instincts of the Highlanders for the service of the country, and regiments of Highland troops were embodied in the regular army [Black Watch]. In 1746, the national dress was prohibited in the Highlands by Act of Parliament (19 Geo. II., c. 39, repealed 22 Geo. III., e. 63). Under the influence of these measures, the Highlands gradually became as peaceable and orderly as the rest of Scotland, and by the beginning of the nineteenth century little was left to mark their distinctive character except the survival in many districts of the native language.

Hill, ROWLAND, 1st LORD (b. 1772, d. 1842), a son of Sir John Hill, a Shropshire baronet, was educated at Chester, and at sixteen entered the army. He was sent as secretary of a diplomatic mission to Genoa, whence he proceeded to Toulon, and acted during the siege as aide-de-camp to Lord Mulgrave, and afterwards to Sir David Dundas. He was wounded, and, returning to England, was soon promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of the 90th, with which he went to Egypt. In the battle of Alexandria he was severely wounded. In 1805 ho became a majorgeneral, and was despatched to the Peninsula on the first outbreak of war. Ho served at Rolica and Vimeiro, and at Corunna commanded Sir John Moore's reserve. In 1811 he succeeded to the command of General Paget's corps, and continued to be one of Wellington's most trustworthy officers. He was present in high command at nearly all the battles of the war, and always acquitted himself well on the many occasions on which Wellington entrusted him with a separate command. After his success at Almarez, where he destroyed the enemy's works after a most desperate resistance, he was raised to the peerage (May, 1814). He afterwards served at Waterloo, and was personally thanked by Wellington for his services there and elsewhere, and was second in command of the army of occupation in France in 1815. He was appointed commander-in-chief in 1828. He was a brave and able soldier, beloved and entirely trusted by his men, to whom his relations are best understood by the nickname which they gave him of "Daddy

Alison, History of Europe; Sir W. Napier, Peninsular War.

Hill, SIR ROWLAND (b. 1795, d. 1879), was born at Kidderminster. In early life he was a schoolmaster. His attention had been directed to the question of Australian colonisation, and, as secretary to Gilbert Wakefield's scheme for settling that country, he wrote a pamphlet on Home Colonies. It was in 1837 that he issued his paper on The Postage System. By a careful series of investigations and calculations, ho had arrived at the conclusion that, as the chief expenses of lettercarrying were not in the carriage itself, but in the distribution of the letters, the distance might be disregarded, and a uniform charge made for the conveyance of all home letters to any distance. He also showed how the almost nominal charge of one r any for every half ounce would, in view of ... great increase in correspondence likely to ensue on such a reduction of cost, yield an ample profit on the transaction; and, at the same time, he suggested the use of postage-stamps. Despite the or position offered to so entirely novel a scheme, a committee was appointed by the House of Commons to investigate the question (1838); and when Rowland Hill's proposals received its approbation, a bill was at once brought in for carrying out the new project (1839). On Jan. 10, 1840, the penny rate was inaugurated. Rowland Hill was appointed to an office in the Treasury, for tho purpose of superintending the execution of his retorms, but had to retire in 1842, when the Liberals were out of office. In 1846 he was presented with £13,000, as a mark of public gratitude, and when the Liberals returned to office, the same year, he was made secretary to the Postmaster-General. In 1860 he was knighted, and when, in 1864 he resigned through ill-health, he was allowed to retain his full salary of £2,000 a year.

Hoadly, Benjamin, successively Rishep of Bangor, Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester (b. 1676, d. 1761), was educated at the Catharine Hall, Cambridge. When he removed to London he appeared as the antagonist of Calamy on the question of conformity, and of Bishop Atterbury on that of nen-resistance. He was a staunch Low Churchman, In 1705, Hoadly was attacked in the House of Lords by the Bishop of London for having advocated the duty of resistance and countenanced rebellion, in a sermon preached before the Lord Mayor. Burnet, in reply to this speaker, told him that he was the last person who ought to complain of the sermon in question. A few years later Hoadly was one of the most prominent opponents of Dr. Sacheverell. In 1715 he was appointed Bishop of Bangor, and next year published his famous tract against the Nonjurors. This was quickly followed (1717) by the issue of his sermon on the Kingdom of Christ, printed by royal command. Both these works were devoted to questioning the divine authority of the king and the clergy, and were the occasion of the famous Bangorian Controversy. The matter was at once taken up by Convocation, and led to such wrangling and discord that this body was suddenly prorogued by the government. From this time (1717) till the year 1852 Convocation was allowed to meet only as a matter of form. Dr. Hoadley was translated to the sees of Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester in the years 1721, 1723, and 1734 respectively, and died at Chelsea.

Hobbes, Thomas (b. 1588, d. 1679), was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree as Bachelor of Arts in 1608. The same year he was appointed tutor to the eldest son of the future Duke of Devonshire, and accompanied his pupil in his Continental tour. Before the year 1620 he seems to have become acquainted with Francis Bacon, and was by him employed on the Latin version of the Essays. In 1631 he undertook the education of the new Earl of Devonshire, his former pupil's son. While abroad with this boy he made the acquaintance of Galileo, and spent several months at Paris, returning home in 1637. lt was about this time that he began his philosophic career. In 1642 the De Cive was printed; in 1650 his De Corpore Politico (English in everything but its title), and in 1651 the Leviathan, which made him famous.

Charles II., who had once been Hobbes's pupil in mathematics, gave his old teacher a pension of £100 a year after the Restoration, and hung his portrait up in his private room. After the Great Fire of London a bill levelled against the Leviathan was introduced into the House of Commons, and passed early in the next year (1667). The Behemoth, or history of the Civil War, was published 1679, just before its author's death, but without his consent. The last years of his life were spent in Derbyshire; and his literary labours were continued till the very end, in the quiet of the country. Hobbes's influence on philosophical thought has been equalled by few English writers. Even greater has been his influence upon political and ethical speculation. He aimed at finding a scientific explanation for the phenomena of man in society, and this gave an impulse to a movement of thought which has been followed by English thinkers ever since. His main political conception was that of the right of all men to seek their own happiness, and their tendency to seek it, even at the expense of their fellows. In a state of nature the selfishness of every man would have free play, and would only be limited by the selfishness of others. state of nature, therefore, would be a state of warfare and of suffering. Government has been instituted to limit this; and government in its perfect form should have absoluto control over civil, moral, and ecclesiastical affairs alike. The demonstration of the supremacy and irresponsibility of the sovereign power in a state, which is one of the most remarkable features in his philosophy, caused Hobbes to be often classed with the defenders of despotism, and roused against him tho champions of constitutionalism and of ecclesiastical freedom in his own day; but at a later time the conception formed the foundation of the theory of utilitarian legislation, which was worked into a regular system by the school of Bentham.

The works of Hobbes have been edited by Sir W. Molesworth, 16 vols., Lond., 1839—45. [S. J. L.]

Holinshed, RAPHAEL (d. circa 1580), is the author, or perhaps, rather, the editor, of the large folio History of England which furnished Shakespeare with much of his knowledge of English history. According to the dedicatory preface, inscribed to Lord Burleigh, the history as published was a fraction of the original scheme, which embraced the idea of a universal history, apparently on the largest scale. The work in its later form consists of (1) a description of England, followed by the history of this country down to the Conquest; (2) a description of Ireland, followed by the chronicles of that island; (3) a description of Scotland, followed by The Historie of Scotland down to the year 1575; (4) the history of the English kings down to the year 1577. Holinshed was largely assisted in his great work by the most learned men of the time, such as Stow and Harrison.

Hol

Rolkar is the family name of one of the chief dynasties of Mahratta princes. Mulhar Rao Holkar took part in the Mahratta invasion of Guzerat in 1721, and in 1735 led u large army to Delhi. He succeeded in extorting from the emperor a considerable territory in Malwa (1736), which was erected into the principality of Indore, and became the hereditary dominion of the Holkar family. After suffering a severe defeat from the Afghans in 1761, Mulhar Rao died in 1763. In 1774 his successor, Tuckagee Holkar, took a prominent part in the war against the English. He was defeated by Colonel Goddard in 1782, and subsequently joined the British alliance against Tippoo Sahib.

Holkar, JESWUNT RAO (d. 1811). In 1797, on the death of Tuckagee Holkar, a dispute arose between his sons, and Jeswunt Rao, an illegitimate son, fled to Nagpore to escape the enmity of Scindiah, who had espoused the cause of his half-brother Khassee Rao. Holkar now became a freeou lected an urmy of Patans, Mahra Pindarrics, and joined himself to Ameer Khan. Tho warfare between Scindiah and Holkar, which laid all Malwa and Khandeish in ruins, ended in the battle of Poonah, Oct. 25, 1802, in which Holkar, assisted by English troops, defeated the united forces of the Peishwa and Scindiah. The result was the Treaty of Bassein (19-2., 1802). Holkar was now alarmed in no introduction of English influence, and onverted with Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar the conspiracy which produced the Mahratta War. The reduction of Scindiah and Berar, 1803, produced no effect on Holkar, who was ecmpelled to plunder to pay his army; and the foolish contempt of the English, which induced them to underrate him and produced the disastrous retreat of Monson, gave him a new lease of life. He returned to Hindostan (1804) with a larger force than ever, and besieged Delhi. Lake's advance, however, drove him away, and he fled, followed by the English, who surprised his cavalry at Ferruckubad, and chased him in the direction of Deeg. At this fortress his disciplined army was destroyed, and after hanging about Bhurtpore for some time, ho fied with Ameer Khan to Scindiah's camp, and thence to Ajmere, and across the Sut-lej. Lake pursued him, beating him repeatedly, and at last forced him to conclude the Treaty of Raipoor Ghaut (1806), which would have greatly limited his power. The declaratory articles of Sir John Shore, however, removed all these limitations and gave him unlimited licence to plunder in Rajpootana and elsewhere, a licence of which he freely availed himself. He was troubled first by mutinies in his army, und then by an insurrection in favour of his nephew. This disturbance led Holkur to put his unfortunate kinsman to death, a crime which was soon followed by the murder of his own brother, Khassee Rao. Remorse for this double offence drove him mad, and ufter three years of restraint he died in Oct., 1811.

Holland, Thomas (d. 1400), was the eldest son of the Earl of Kent. In 1397 he was made Duko of Surrey, but was degraded in 1399. In 1400, being implicated in u plot against Henry IV., he was beheaded.

Rolland, Henry Rich, Eart of (d. 1649), was a younger son of Lord Rich. He served in the Dutch wars, and on his return to England, attracted the favourable notice of James I., who heaped honours upon him. In 1639 he was made Lord General of the Horse in the Scotch War, but seeded two years later to the Parliament. He rejoined the king in 1643, and fought with considerable bravery in the first battle of Newbury; but, finding himself coldly received by Charles, he quickly deserted to the enemy. In 1648 he took part in the abortive Royalist rising, was captured by the Parliamentary troops, tried before the High Court of Justice in 1649, and executed.

Holland, HENRY Fox, 1st Lord (b. 1705, d. 1774), second son of Sir Stephen Fox, was a political disciple of Walpole. In 1743 he became one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, under the Pelham administration, and on Lord Granville's failure to form a ministry ho was appointed Secretary for War. But dissensions sprang up among the ministry, and he violently opposed Lord Hard-wicke's Marriage Act. On the death of Pelham, his brother, the Duke of Newcastle, attempted to form a government. It was difficult to find a leader of the Commons. Nowcastle applied to Fox, as Pitt was obnoxious to the king. But they quarrelled about the disposal of patronage; and Robinson, a man of little influence, was made manager of the Commons. The next month, however, Newcastle secured Fox's services by making him Secretary of State, and removing Robinson. He soon quarrelled with his chief; and seeing that the blame for the loss of Minorca was to be cast on his shoulders, he resigned, in 1756, and was shortly followed by Newcastle. It was hoped that he and Pitt would unite, and form an administration; but his quarrel with Pitt, caused by his acceptance of office in 1754, was too serious. accepted the subordinate position of Paymaster of the Forces, whereby he lost even a seat in the cabinet, but secured a large income. On the accession of George III., he joined Lord Bute in his attack on the Whigs, and deliberately set to work to buy a majority in the House. The Paymaster's office became a shop for the purchase of votes. It is said that £25,000 was thus expended in one morning. But the whole feeling of the Commons was against him, and his colleagues refused to support him. Hints of bribery were freely thrown out, and he became thoroughly unpopular. "He had always been regarded as a Whig of the Whigs. On the sudden resignation of Bute, he retired to the House of Lords as Lord Holland. He continued to hold office for two more years, but he had ceased to play any part in politics. In 1767 he was not ashamed to solicit his old enemy, Chatham, for an earldom. Fox, though a very able man, was, in the opinion of some, a distinct failure as to his public

Holland, HENRY RICHARD VASSALL FOX, 3RD LORD (1773-1840), succeeded to the peerage while still an infant, but it was not till the year 1798 that he entered on his parliamentary career, during the whole of which he maintained the views and principles of his uncle, Charles James Fox. In 1805 the Whigs came into office, and Lord Holland was sworn a Privy Councillor, and appointed in conjunction with Lord Auckland to negotiate with the American plenipotentiaries for the settlement of some differences between the two governments. In this, however, they were not successful, as Mr. Jefferson, the President, refused to ratify the treaty. On the death of Mr. Fox, Lc & Holland entered the cabinet as Privy Seal, but early in 1807 the ministers were dismissed. He was present in various parts of the Peninsula during the Spanish War. On his return to England (1809), he became a follower of Mr. Canning, to whom he lent aid on his accession to power though he did not become a member of his cabinet. In 1830 he entered Lord Grey's ministry as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which office he continued to fill with a slight interval when his party was not in power, until the time of his death. Lord Holland was the author of, among other works, Memoirs of the Whig Party (1832).

Holland, Relations with. The name Holland, properly belonging to the Imperial county of that name, which subsequently became the leading State of the Republic of Seven United Provinces, is commonly used loosely for the United Provinces as a whole; and, though the official title of the modern kingdom is the kingdom of the Netherlands the same inexact designation is still applied to it. With the medieval county of Holland the relations of England were frequent and friendly. Count William I, fought for Otto IV. at Bouvines, and, subsequently changing sid followed Louis, the son of Philip II., to England, in 1215. Floris V. established intimate relations with Edward I., got the wool-staple placed at Dort, and secured fishing rights on the English coast. But in 129: he reverted to the French connection. Hi. son, John I., restored the alliance by his marriage with a daughter of Edward I. The new Hainault line was again closely bound to England by the marriage of Philippa, daughter of William III., to Edward III. (1328). On his son's death in 1345, Edward and Philippa made an ineffectual attempt to seize the country. In the next century the attempt of Humphrey of Gloucester to win Holland, and the counties attached to it, for his wife Jacqueline, was the means of breaking up the Anglo-Burgundian alliance which had given the English mastery of France. On his failure, Holland became included in the Burgundian dominions, which the accession of Charles V. transferred to Spain. Burgundy and Spain were both English allies, and so the old friendship was kept up. Intimate commercial relations still further tightened the bonds of union between the two countries.

The Reformation, which broke up the alliance of England and Spain, led to the revolt of the Protestant. of Holland from the absolutism and Catholicism of the Spanish monarchy. England, under Elizabeth, was also engaged in a life and death struggle with Spain. This ultimately compelled the queen, despite her refuetance, both to help rebels against their sovereign, and to take a decided Protestant line, to afford the revolted Hollanders very material assistance. At first, English help took the form of secret subvention or popular subscriptions, or of the willing bands of volunteers, who flocked to join a Protestant cause. Subsequently the queen assisted the Dutch in a more formal way. Elizabeth's first decided intervention began with the lavish grants to her lover, the Duke of Anjou, who aspired to lead the southern provinces of the Netherlands, but on his disastrous failure, and the murder of William the Silent, in 1584, Elizabeth, though declining the proffered sovereignty of the Seven Provinces, sent her favourite Leicester as governor general with a small army, receiving in return, some "cautionary towns." In 1586, Sidney fell at Zutphen. In 1587 Leicester's incompetence necessitated his recall. In 1588 the Dutch did good service by blocking up the army of Parma in their ports which the great Armada hoped to land in England. Up to the date of Elizabeth's death our relations with the Hollanders continued cordial, and materially assisted their efforts for liberty.

With James I. a new epoch begins. That

monarch's peace with Spain was followed by the restitution of the cautionary towns, and the growing theological differences between the two countries, and the increasing rivalry between English and Dutch merchants produced a deeply-rooted and enduring hos-tility. When the Twelve Years' Truce with Spain (1609—21) came to an end, James's sympathies were altogether Spanish. Holland found in France the protector she had lost in England. The Amboyna massacro was but the prelude of a long struggle of the two naval powers in the East Indies. The eventful marriage of the Stadtholder, Frederick Henry, with Mary, daughter of Charles I. (1641) rather increased than diminished the hostility of England and Holland. Flushed with tho glorious recognition of their liberty by the Treaties of Westphalia (1648), the Dutch plunged into their famous naval war with England. The passing by the Long Parlia-ment of the Navigation Act, dealt a deadly blow at the Dutch carrying trade. But the war which ensued, and lasted from 1651 to 1654, was on the whole unfavourable to Holland. The restoration of the Stuarts, closely followed by the re-enactment of the Navigation Act, rather intensified the opposition of the Amsterdam eligarchs to their commercial rival. The war (1665-1667) was on the whole favourable to the Dutch, though the Treaty of Breda lost them New Amsterdam, In 1667 the two powers united to check Louis XIV. by the Triple Alliance; but, in 1670, Charles II. signed a treaty with France to partition Holland, as Charles I. had nearly forty years earlier concluded a similar treaty with Spain. In 1672, Charles joined Louis in his great attack on Holland. But common political hostility to the tyrant of Europe now proved so strong a bond of union between England and Helland that oven commercial rivalry was powerless to separate them. The restoration of the louse of Orange personally united the two courts; and the marriage of William III. with Mary of Vork (1677) completed the alliance. The York (1677) completed the alliance. Revolution which brought William to England made it indissoluble. Henceforward, the "Maritime Powers," as England and Holland were now called, had a common policy and common interests. Marlborough simply continued the work of William of Orange. But the narrow basis of Dutch prosperity n' began to show itself. It was perhaps or y because England had won the commercial race, that her alliance with Holland had become possible. Though the Treaty of Utrecht gave the Dutch all they could wish, they gradually sank into a decided condition of dependence on their great ally. It was English influence, now extended to internal affairs, that made William IV., the son-inlaw of George II., Stadtholder in 1747. But George's grandson, William V., was a weak ruler; and despite his sympathy with George III., the rising Dutch democracy, which warmly supported the American colonists, insisted on Holland adopting the "Armed Neutrality" (1780), and rushed into a naval warwith England. But the glory of Holland had now departed, and the States willingly accepted an inglorious peace in 1783. In 1787 the English and Prussians combined to restore the Stadtholder, an act which directly led to the conquest of Holland by the French Republic, with the approbation of the Dutch democracy. Holland was forced to lend its naval strength to France, and remained in antagonism to England until 1815. It was largely through English influence that the Congress of Vienna erected Holland and Belgium into a kingdom for the house of Orange. In 1830, after the revolt of Belgium, England and France blockaded the Dutch ports, and insisted on the signature of the Convention of London in 1833, giving Belgium independence. The territory had been determined, and its neutrality guaranteed by the Fivo Great Powers in 1831.

Holles. DENZIL, LORD (b. 1699, d. 1680) was the younger son of the Earl of Clare. On entering Purliament (1624) he joined the popular party, and was one of the most ardent opponents of Buckingham. On March .2, 1629, when the Speaker was about to adjourn the House in obedience to the king's order, Holles forced him back into his chair, for which act he was fined a thousand marks and imprisoned. At the opening of the Long Parliament ho was much valued and esteemed by the whole popular party. In the year 1644 he was one of the con. nissioners sent to Oxford to negotiate with the king, showed himself very anxious to effect a reconciliation, and was consequently accused of treachery by Lord Savilc. Holles was the leader of the Presbyterian party in their contest with the Independents and with the army. In August, 1647, he was excluded from tho House of Commons, returned to share the short triumph of the Presbyterians, and was forced again to take refuge in Normandy, and to console himself by attacking Cromwell in his Memoirs. Holles reappeared in Par-liament in 1659, and was spokesman of the deputation of the Commons sent to Breda. Six months later ho sat in the court which judged the regicides, and was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Holles, in 1661. In 1663 he was sent as ambassador to Paris, recalled in 1665, and negotiated the Treaty of Breda in 1667, but utterly disapproved the foreign policy of Charles. "Save what the government of the Parliament did," he wrote, "we have not taken one true step or struck one true stroke, since Queen Elizabeth's time." His last public act was to vote for the acquittal of Lord Stafford (1680). He died February 17, 1681. Burnet describes him as "a man of great courage, and of as great pride. He had the soul of a stubborn old Roman in him."

Roly Alliance, Tax, was a treaty con-cluded at Paris on Sept. 26, 1815, between Alexander, Emperor of Russia, Francis, Emperor of Austria, and Frederick William I., King of Prussia, without the Intervention of their ministers. The Emperor of Russia was the Instigator of the step, and he is supposed to have taken it under the influence of Madame Krudener, a visionary Pietist. The main points of the agreement were as follows: (1) European Christendom was regarded as forming a single family, "the only principle either between governments or subjects is to regard themselves as members of the same Christian nation, the three allied princes considering themselves as delegated by Providence to govern three branches of the same family." (2) Three States, representing three forms of Christianity, the Greek Church, the Roman Church, and Protestantism, were asked to rise above their differences, and to torm a union depending on their common agreement. (3) Christianity was proclaimed as the foundation of all government and all civilisation, "the sublime truths which are taught us by the eternal religion of a God Saviour." "The present act has no other object than to show in the face of the universe the determination to adopt no other rule of conduct, either in the administration of government, or in the political relations with other governments, than the precepts of this holy religion, precepts of justice, charity, and peace," which were as well fitted to guide the public acts of princes as they were to guide the lives of private persons, and the only means to consolidate human institutions and remedy their imperfections. (4) The three sovereigns declared themselves bound together by the ties of a true and indissoluble fraternity. (5) They were to consider themselves in the light of fathers to a ir subjects. The treaty was offered for so atture to all European powers, except the Pope and the Sultan. Great Britain alone declined to accede to it, but tho Prince Regent declared his personal adherence to its principles.

The Treaty is printed in Koch and Schooll, Histoire des Traites de Paix, iil. 547.

Rolyrood Abbey was founded by David I. in 1123. It was plundered by the English in 1332 and 1385, and destroyed by Hertford in 1544. The foundation was suppressed in 1547. Holyrood Palace was made a royal residence by James V. in 1528, and became the dwelling-place of the Kings of Scotland. It was the scene of the murder of Rissio in 1566. Charles I. was crowned there in 1633. In 1650 it was partly destroyed by Cromwell's troops. In 1745 it was for a short time occupied by the Young Pretender. After being allowed to fall almost into ruins it was repaired in 1850, and again in 1993.

Komago (homagium, sometlmes hominium from Aomo, through the earlier Latin form hominaticum), was that profession of feudal subjection which the vassal (homa) made to his lord on receiving a flef from his hands. It could only be received by the lerd himself. With solemn ceremenies the vassal uncovered his head, lard aside sword and spear, and knelt before his suzerain, and formally declared, "I become your man for the lands which I hold of you, and will be faithful to you against all men, saving the fealty which I owe to my lord the king." The oath of fealty and the grant of the fief followed the formula of homag. Every feudal tenant on acquiring his pi y was compelled to do homage to his lore. 1 . . is hege homage, as mentioned above, there was a simple homage, in which the oath of fealty did not follow, and a homage that involved no feudal duties, such as the Palatine earls proffered to the English kings or the great peers of France (homagium per paragium), or such as tho Duke of Normandy performed to the King of Homildon Hill, The BATTLE OF (Sept. 1402), was fought near Wooler in Northumberland, between a marauding party of the Scotch under Douglas, and an English force under Hotspur and the Earl of March. The victory was won for the English by the archers, there being little or no fighting at close quarters.

Homilies, The Book of. In the year 1542 Convocation decided to issue "certain homilies for the stay of such errors as were then by ignorant preachers spread among the people," and this determination resulted in the publication of a volume of sermons, fitted to be delivered by preachers whose ability and knowledge were not equal to the task of writing their own discourses (1547). A reprint of this volume appeared in 1560. The leading writers of this first book of Homilies appear to have been Cranmer, Hooper, and Latimer, but one or two of the sermons, at least, were berrowed from earlier publications. The second book of Homilies was published in 1563.

Honduras, British, situated on the cast coast of Central America, was visited by Columbus in 1502, and was for many years in the possession of Spain, although the coast was frequently swept by English buccaneers, and a few English colonists were also settled there. In 1670 the Spaniards confirmed Great Britain's right to the Laguna de Terminos and the parts adjacent in the province of Yucatan, those places having been actually in possession of British subjects through right of sufferance or indulgence. But despite this concession, the Spaniards some fifty years later (1717) attempted to deprive the English of all share in the country, and a desultory war, which lasted forty years, was the result. It was not till 1786 that Honduras finally became British territory; and even later than this it was, in 1796 and subsequent years, again attacked by the Spaniards. Honduras was at first a de-pendency of Jamaica, but a democratic government had grown up spontaneously. About 1830 an intermittent struggle began between the "superintendents" sent from Jamaica and the popular element. It was made a crown colony in 1870, and finally separated from Jamaica in 1884. England resigned the protectorate of the Mosquito Coast by the Ciayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850.

Hong Kong, an island off the south-east coast of China, was occupied by the English during the Chinese War of 1840, and in 1842 was formally ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Nankin. Since that time the colony of Hong-Kong has become a centre of trade and a naval and military station. The government is vested in a governor, aided by an executive council of eight members, and a legislative council consisting of seven official and six non-official members, Honorius, Archbishop of Canterbury (627-653), was one of the companions of Augustine, and was famous for his skill in music. On the death of Justus he succeeded to the archbishopric. During his long tenure of office he saw the completion of the conversion of Northumbria and the evangelisation of Wessex by Birinus.

Honour. The term henour was used especially "of the more noble sort of seignieries on which other inferior lordships or manors depend by performance of some customs or services to those who are lords of them." The honour, or liberty, was one of the great baronial jurisdictions, and often consisted of many maners. Though each of the various manors composing the honour had its own separate jurisdiction, yet only one court was held for the whole; hence the rights of the honour are, in the main, those of the manor From the later Anglo-Saxon or liberty. times there existed large "liberties," whose jurisdiction lay outside that of the hundred courts, and was in private hands. The tenants in these liberties attended the court of their lord, instead of the hundred court, and were judged by the lord's steward. The greater part of the Angle-Saxon honours seem to have belonged to churches, but the thegn possessing five hides had also a right of judging on his own property. In other cases, the hundred seems to have fallen into private hands, and, under these eircumstances, would be practically a manor. But exemption from attending the hundred court did not excuse attendance at the shire-moot. Under the Norman kings, the number of these greater franchises or honours increased largely, and it was a most important part of the work of Henry I. and Henry II. to force the barons to admit the reyal officers into the privileged courts. The above remarks apply equally to the manor, which differed from an honour mainly in that the latter was composed of several distinct maners. These great honours, when they escheated into the hands of the crown, were not generally joined on to the ordinary county administration, but wero either allowed to continue in the possession of the king, and were farmed like a shire, or were granted out again as an hereditary fief. But even if retained in the king's hands, the tenants of the honour did not, according to Dr. Stubbs, rank as tenants-in-chief of the crown; nor was the king justified in claiming dues from them or their immediate lord. In later years, honours were often created by Act of Parliament, e.g., Ampthill, Grafton, and Hampton Court, by 33 Henry VIII. Again, four years later, Henry VIII. was empowered to make Westminster and Kingston-on-Hull honours if he would.

Hood, SANUEL, VISCOUNT (b. 1724, d. 1816), entered the Royal Navy in 1740. In 1754, he was in the command of a sloop stationed at the Bahama Islands. Several years later he served under Rodney in the bombardment of Havre, and passed the four years which preceded the Peace of Paris in duty off the coast of Ireland, and in the Mediterranean. In the course of the next twenty years he was created a baronet, 1778, and later was appointed rear-admiral, with the command of a squadron of eight ships which was being sent to reinforce Rodney in the West Indies, 1780. On Rodney sailing away to England with a large convoy, Hood was left in command of the fleet off the Leeward Islands. On learning that De Grasse had sailed to America, Hood hastened after him, and a partial engagement occurred between the French and English fleets. Again De Grasse sailed for the West Indies, and was followed by Hood, who baffled for some time the combined efforts of the French fleet and army to take possession of the island of St. Christopher's. The island at length capitulated, and Hood sailed away unmolested to join Rodney at Barbadoes. On April 9, 1782, Sir Samuel Hood, in command of the advanced no squadron, consisting of eight ships, came up with the French, and was at once vigorously attacked by fifteen French ships; but so ably did he fight his small detachment, that on Rodney's arrival with the centre squadron, De Grasse sailed away. The next two days were occupied in a chase; but on the 12th Rodney managed to bring the French fleet to an engagement off the north-west corner of Dominica. Hood's division was engaged with the French van, and the contest was maintained with much obstinacy and spirit, until the Ville de Paris, De Grasse's ship, struck to the Barfleur, the flagship of Hood. Hood was rewarded for this victory by the title of Baron Hood in the peerage of Ireland. On the conclusion of peace he returned home, and in May, 1784, was returned as M.P. for West-minster. In 1786 he was appointed port admiral at Portsmouth, and two years later was constituted one of the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral. In 1793 he was appointed vice-admiral of the red, and was at once ordered to the Mediterranean as commander-in-chief, with the object of taking possession of Toulon. After a siege of two months this town was reduced. At the end of 1794 he was appointed Governor of Greenwich Hospital, being soon afterwards raised to the English peerage with the title of Viscount Hood (1796). He survived his elevation nearly twenty years.

Hooker, Richard (b. 1553, d. 1600), the author of the famous Ecclesiastical Polity, was educated at Oxford, where he remained until Master of the following year he became Master of the Temple, and was involved in a controversy with Travers, a Puritan, in which he was vigorously supported by his friends Archbishop Whitgift and Bishop Sandys. Travers was suspended, and "to instity his suspended," justify his suspension we are in possession of Hooker's immortal work," which has gained for him the epithet of "judicious." The Ecclesiastical Polity has other claims to remembrance besides its literary excellence. It is in reality a defence of the Church of England as then established; and in the course of his argument Hooker has to deal with those principles which, underlying the Puritan doctrines, were at that time forcing their way into such prominence. He first of all inquires into the nature of law, and finds that it is divided into two distinct sections—laws immutable and laws variable; and then applies the touchstone of criticism to decide to which category the various texts of scripture belong. The extreme Puritans, who would have borrowed even their criminal jurisprudence from the pages of the Old Testament, are met at the threshold by Hooker's challenge. Passing on from general to particular points, he comes to the burning question of episcopacy; and here, though adhering to the belief that this form of Church government is to be found in the Scriptures, he bases his chief argument on the fact that no special form of ecclesiastical rule is laid down in its pages as being absolutely binding on all nations. The varying circumstances of different peoples will, he argues, lead them to form a mode of discipline fitted to their necessities. It is hardly necessary in this placo to draw attention to his theories of secular government, and of the king's limited power, widely as they differed from the notions generally upheld by the Church party in the ensuing reigns.

Keble's edition of the Ecclesiastical Polity.

Hooper, John (b. 1475, d. 1555, at first a Cistercian monk, became, during the reign of Edward VI., one of the leaders of the Reformation, and acquired great fame as a preacher. In 1550 he was made Bishop of Gloucester, though for some time he refused to enter upon his office, owing to his objection to obey any spiritual authority but the Scriptures, or to wear the episcopal dress. In 1552 he received the bishopric of Worcester in commendam, and "by his activity, his fervid declamation, and his bold though intemperate zeal, deserved the applause and gratitude of the well-wishers to the new doctrines." On the accession of Mary, Hooper was at once marked out as a victim, was ejected from his see, and imprisoned in the Fleet, September, 1553. In the beginning of 1555 he was condemned for heresy, and sent to Gloucester, where he was burnt on Feb. 9. "His charities," says Professor Tytler, "were extensive and unwearied; his hospitality generous and noble, his manners simple, his piety unaffected and profound."

Hopton, Sir Ralph, afterwards Lord (d. 1652), first distinguished himself in the wars of the Low Countries. On the outbreak of the Civil War he was sent into the western parts of England to assist in forming an army for the king. His success in Cornwall was complete. In 1643 he defeated Sir W. Waller at the battle of Lansdowne, but was himself severely wounded. In the same year Charles I. appointed him Governor of Bristol and created him Baron Hopton. Next year, after taking Winchester, he was defeated at Alresford by Sir W. Waller with Haselrig's "Lobsters," and was appointed a member of the Prince of Wales's council at Bristol. In 1646 he was routed by Sir T. Fairfax at the battle of Torrington, after which disaster he dissolved his army and withdrew to the Scilly Islands, and subsequently to the Continent. He died at Bruges.

Rorestii, The, were an ancient British tribe occupying the modern counties of Clackmannan, Kinross, and Fife, with the eastern part of Stratherne, and the country to the west of the Tay.

Horsa (d. circa 455) is said to have been the brother of Hengest, whom he accompanied in his expedition to Britain, where, according to tradition, he was slain in the battle of Aylesford (455). The town of Horstead, in Kent, is said to derive its name from him, and a barrow in the neighbourhood is pointed out as the tomb of Horsa. The very existence of Horsa has been questioned of late years, and his name has been made to be no more than a representation of the steed which has so long figured on the standard of Kent. But his name occurs more than once in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and there is no reason why he should not have been a real historical character, even though his name bears the signification attributed to it. [Hengest.]

Hospitallers, THE KNIGHTS, OF BRE-THREN OF ST. JOHN AT JERUSALEM, Were one of the two military orders of Cruseders. They derived their name "from their hospital built at Jerusalem for the use of pilgrims coming to the Holy Land, and dedicated to St. John Baptist." The order was instituted about the year 1092, but they do not seem to have had a house in London till the year 1100. They were much favoured by the first two Kings of Jerusalem, Godfrey of Boulogne and Baldwin, and in England soon acquired large possessions. The superior in England became in process of time a lay baron, and had a seat among the lords in Parliament. They had numerous manors scattered over different counties in England. Each settlement of Hospitallers was under the rule of a commander, who answered to the preceptors of the Templars. They were followers of St. Augustine's rule, and wore a black habit, with a white eross upon it. Their chief establishment in England was the Hospital of St. John, at Clerkenwell, founded by Jordan Briset, about 1100. Its revenue at the time of the Reformation seems to have been beween £2,000 and £3,000. Other commanderies of this order were at Beverley (Yorkshire) and Warwick. In Dugdale's Monasticon (edit. 1839) more than fifty others are enumerated.

Hotham, John de (d. 1336), was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland in the second year of Edward II., and in 1311 is found as guardian of Gaveston's houses in London. Next year he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, and in 1313 was sent on a mission to France. Two years later he was despatched to Ireland for the purpose of inducing the barons there to make a stand against Edward Bruco. In 1318 he was appointed Chancellor, and continued to hold the Great Seal till January, 1320. Some four years before this last date (1316), he had been elected Bishop of Ely. On the accession of Edward III. he was once more made Chancellor, but was struck with paralysis some two years before his death, which happened in 1336.

Hotham, Sir John (d. 1645), took a prominent part in the attack on the Earl of Strafford, having some personal grudge against that statesman. In the debate upon the Remonstrance he sided with Hyde [CLA-RENDON]. Next year (1642) Hotham was despatched by the Parliament to take command of Hull and secure the large magazines of that important town for the popular party. When Charles demanded admittance to this fortress Hotham refused him, and the Parliament approved the conduct of their officer. But he was not entirely in the confidence of his employers, who sent his son to play the spy upon his father's movements. Unfortu-nately, when Lord Digby fell into their hands, Sir John allowed his honour to be tampered with, and promised to deliver up the town on the first shot fired against it by the king's army. Accordingly Hotham permitted Digby to depart for the purpose of earrying the news to York, but soon found out that he had no power to achieve his purpose. A little later both Sir John Hotham and his son were executed for treasonable correspondence with the Marquis of Newcastle (January, 1645), and died leaving on men's minds the impression that had it not been for their weakness, the Parliament would have become the absolute masters of the whole of Yorkshire.

Hotspur. [Percy, Henry.]

Houghers, THE, made their first appearance in Connemara in the winter of 1711. They consisted of armed parties, disguised by white sheets, and spread over Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Galway, and Clare, slaughtering and "houghing" the cattle, from which last practice they derived their name. Notices were posted up, signed by "Captain Evan," bidding the shepherds remain indoors. None of the Houghers, who were evidently directed by men of birth and education, had been apprehended, when a government proclamation was issued, promising a free pardon to all who would confess. Upon this, sixteen young gentlemen belonging to the best Catholic families, came forward in Galway, and by the end of 1713 the movement had ceased. It is difficult to decide whether it was merely intended to check cattle-farming and Protestantism, or whether it had a Jacobite origin: but, in any case, the priests do not appear to have been implicated in the disturbance. Afterwards, the Houghers were identified with the Whiteboys (q.v.). In 1783 the Houghers directed their efforts against soldiers, and a bill was passed against them in 1784.

In fforts ainst Housecarls, The, or Thingamen (Husesis), were a body-guard formed by Canute from the remains of the fom-wikings, who, after the battle in which these pirates' power was broken, came to England, under Thurkill the Tall, and took Canterbury. Canute organised them into two bodies, of about 2,000 men each, picked soldiers, from all lands under his rule. "This force," says Mr. Freeman, "was, in faet, a revival of the earliest form of the primitive Comitatus, only more thoroughly and permanently organised; receiving regular pay, and reinforced by volunteers of all kinds and of all nations, they doubtless gradually departed from the higher type of Comitatus, and approached more nearly to the level of ordinary mercenaries. They were, in fact, the germ of a standing army, an institution which later kings and great earls, English as well as Danish, found it to their interest to continue." The English king's Housecarls were almost exterminated at the battles of Stamford Bridge and Senlac.

Hoveden, Roger or (d. circa 1201), one of the most valuable of our early chroniclers, was probably a native of Howden, in the East Riding of Yorkshire. He may have been introduced to public life by Bishop Hugh de Puiset, of Durham; but, in any case, he was employed in the king's service by 1174, for in this year we find him in attendance on Henry II. in France. Next year Henry sent him into Galloway, to induce the princes of Galloway to acknowledge the King of England as their lord. A few years later Roger was employed in the monastic elections of 1185, and in 1189 was justice itinerant for the forests in the north of England, from which time he is lost sight of. Dr. Stubbs has divided the Chronicle of Roger Hoveden into four parts: - part 1 comes down to 1148, part 2 extends from 1149 to 1169, 3 from 1170 to 1192, 4 from 1192 to 1201. Of these four divisions, the same authority remarks that part 1 is a copy of an earlier Durham compilation, to which he has made a few additions; part 2 is Hoveden's own narrative, but is largely indebted to the Melrose Chronicle, and is by no means free from chronological errors; part 3 is a revision, or, rather, a new edition, of the Chronicle, that goes by the name of Benedict of Peterborough, to which, however, Roger has added some important documents; part 4 appears to have been Hoveden's own work, and is of special value for the time of which it treats. Hoveden has been edited, with invaluable prefaces, by Dr. Stubbs for the Rolls Series.

Howard, The Family of. According to Sir Bernard Burke, the family of Howard was established in Norfolk in the tenth century. In the fifteenth century Sir Robert Howard married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk (who was descended from Thomas of Brotherton, son of King Edward I.), and of Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Richard Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel. Thus the estates of the Mowbrays and Fitzalans came into possession of the Howards. In 1470 Sir John Howard, son of this Sir Robert, was created Lord Howard, and in 1483 Earl Marshal and Duke of Norfolk. Among other peerages in this family are those of Howard-de-Walden (created 1597), Howard of Glossop (1869), Carliale (1661), Effingham (1554), Suffolk (1603).

Howard, Sir Edward (d. 1513), was the son of Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey and second Duke of Norfolk, the victor of Flodden. Occupying the position of Lord High Admiral of England, he distinguished himself on several occasions. In 1611, supported by his brother, Sir Thomas Howard, as a subordinate officer in his fleet, he killed the Scotch privateer, Andrew Barton, and captured two of his ships. In 1512, on ...s return from Spain, where he had conducted the English forces, under the Marquis of Dorset, Sir Edward Howard captured many French merchantmen, and made several destructive descents on the French coast. Having refitted at Southampton, and being reinforced by a further squadron of twenty-five sail, he engaged with a French fleet of thirty-nine sail near Brest, on Aug. 10. Victory once again inclined to the side of the English, but a complete triumph was prevented by the dismay occasioned to both the contending parties upon the conflagration of the two largest ships on each side, the Regent and the Cordelier, whose entire crews, to the number of 1,700 men, perished in the flames. In 1513 Sir Edward Howard was killed in an attempt to destroy the French fleet near Brest (April 25). He was succeeded in his office of Lord High Admiral by his brother, Sir Thomas Howard, who became in later years the third Duke of Norfolk.

Roward of Effendam, William, Lore (d. 1573), was the son of Thomas, second Duke of Norfolk, Marshal of England. On the charge of concealing the incontinence of his niece, Catherine Howard, Lord William was declared guilty of misprision of treason, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He soon, however, recovered his liberty, and was, under Henry VIII. and Edward VI., employed on various diplomatic missions, tho most important of which was one to the Czar of Muscovy, in 1553. Soon after Mary's accession he was raised to the peerage, and made Lord High Admiral of England. In 1554 he greatly distinguished himself in crushing the Kentish rebellion, and successfully prevented Sir Thomas Wyatt from entering London. It was owing to his influence as head of the naval power of England, that Gardiner found it expedient not to press the charge against Elizabeth of being implicated in Wyatt's rebellion; and throughout the whole reign of Mary he exercised a constant watch over the princess, by whom, after her accession, he was created Lord Chamberlain and Lord Privy Seal, as a reward for his devotion. In 1559 he was sent as commissioner to Cambrai, in conjunction with Dr. Wotton and the Bishop of Ely, and subsequently did his best to bring about the marriage of the queen with the Archduke Charles of Austria.

Howard of Effinoham, Charles, Lord (b. 1536, d. 1624), was the son of William, Lord Howard of Effingham, and grandson of the second Duke of Norfoik. In the year 1569 he held a command in the royal army during the Northern rebellion, and, in 1587, very strongly advised the execution of the Queen of Scots. In 1585, although a Catholic, he was appointed Lord High Admiral of England, and had command of the fleet during the alarm of the Spanish Armada, his resolution and bravery being conspicuous throughout the crisis. In 1596 he was associated with the Earl of Essex in the expedition against Cadiz, and was created Earl of Nottingham as a reward for his services. In 1601 ho was instrumental in suppressing the insurrection of Essex, with whom he had quarrelled after the Spanish expedition. Under James, Lord Howard continued to hold his office as admiral, and filled the post of Lord High Steward at the coronation. Though without very great experience or commanding ability, Lord Howard was fairly successful. some naval skill, and was both bold and prudent. He knew whose advice to follow, and was very popular in the navy. [ARMADA.] Lingard, Hist. of Eng.; Froude, Hist. of Eng.

Howard, Lond William (d. 1640), was the second son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, and ancestor of the Earls of Carlisle. Ho was suspected of being implicated in Francis Throgmerton's plot, 1583, but, though ho was arrer'e', no proof of his complicity could be obtained. Having become lord of Naworth Castle in right of his wife, he was made Warden of the Western Marches.

Howard of Eschick, Edward, Lord (d. 1675), was the seventh son of Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk, and was created Baron Howard of Escrick, in Yorkshire, 1628. He sided with the Parliament amonghout the Civil War, and, after the abolition of the House of Lords, consented to become a member of the Commons, where he represented Carlislo; he also became a member of the Council of State. In July, 1650, he was accused by Major-General Harrison of taking bribes from wealthy delinquents. A year later he was convicted, expelled from the House, sentenced to be imprisoned in the Tower and to pay a fine of £10,000. He was soon released, and the fine was not exacted, but he took no further part in public affairs.

Howard, John (b. 1726, d. 1790), a distinguished philanthropist, was born in London, and after being for some time apprenticed to a grocer, travelled over Europe. In 1756 he undertook a voyage to Lisbon, but on the way was captured by a French privateer, and was for a short time held in captivity. In 1773 his attention was directed to the state of the English prisons, and he visited most of the countries of the Continent to examine their prisons. In 1777, he published The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, which had the effect of drawing public attention to the abuses which prevailed, and ultimately leading to great reforms. He died at Kherson while prosecuting researches into the plague.

Howard v. Gossett, Case of. Mr. Howard, who had been Stockdale's solicitor in his action against Messrs. Hansard in 1839 and 1840, brought an action against the officers of the House of Commons, who had taken him into custody, and obtained a verdict for £100. He then obtained a second verdict against Sir W. Gossett, the Sergeantat-Arms, on the ground that the Speaker's warrant was informal. The question was once more bought before the Court of Exchequer, and here the verdict of the lower court was reversed. The case forms a constitutional precedent of some importance. As Sir Erskine May points out, "The act of the officer and not the authority of the House itself was questioned."

Howe, John (b. 1630, d. 1705), Puritan divine, a native of Loughborough. After his appointment to the living of Great Torrington in 1652, and while on a visit to London, he attracted the notice of Cromwell, who made him his domestic chaplain. He was also appointed Lecturer at St. Margaret's, Westminster. At the Restoration he returned to Torrington, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity, and became a Nonconformist minister in London. He was an erudite and cloquent preacher, and was universally esteemed for his liberality and piety.

Howe. John (d. 1722), was returned as member for Cireneester to the Convention of 1689, having previously been known as the author of some savage lampoons. He was appointed Vie-Chamberlain to Queen Mary. He proved mself c zealous Whig, and proposed sending Dutch troops to suppress a Scotch regiment, which had mutinied when ordered to the Continent. marthen and Halifax, demanding that they should be removed from the king's councils, but without effect. He was dismissed from his office in 1692, apparently for imagining that Queen Mary was in love with him. From this time he displayed the most rancorous hatred against the queen and her husband, and moved the impeachment of Burnet for writing an obnoxious pastoral letter. Shortly afterwards he became a Tory, and a zealous advocate for peace. In 1702 he received the office of Joint Paymaster of the Forces. He moved without success that the Prince of Denmark should have the enormous income of £100,000 a year on the death of Queen Anne. Howe was sworn of the Privy Council in 1708, but on the accession of George I. he was dismissed from his offices, and passed the remainder of his life in retire-

Rowe, Richard, 1st Earl (b. 1726, d. 1799), a third son of the second Viscount Howe, entered the navy at the age of fourteen, and was employed under Lord Anson. After serving for some time in the West Indies he was appointed commander of a sloop in 1745. In 1748 he returned to England, and spent three years in studying navigation and tactics. He was then appointed to perform a semi-diplomatic mission in the Mediterranean, and executed it with great skill and judgment. In 1754, while attached to Boscawen's fleet, he captured a French ship. Three years leter he was returned to Parliament for Dartmouth, and in the following year made himself con-spicuous in Hawke's attacks on the French coast, and in the same year succeeded to the famil, title and estates on the death of his brother, Viscount Howe. Once more he distinguished himself at the action in Qui-beron Bay in 1759. During the American War he was employed on that station; but his force was so small and ill provided that he could effect little or nothing. He returned to England in 1778, and in 1782 was sent to relieve Gibraltar, a service which he accomplished in spite of the superior number of the enemy. On his return in 1783 he was appointed First Commissioner of the Admiralty, and, except during the short Coalition administration hold that tion, held that post until 1788, when he resigned and was created an earl. In 1793, when the war with France broke out, Lord Howe was appointed to the command of the Channel Fleet. On May 2, 1794, he sailed from St. Helens, and on June 1 gained a decisive victory over the French. Honours were heaped upon him; and on the outbreak of the mutiny in the fleet in 1797, Lord Howe was armed with full powers to restore order in the navy. To effect this purpose he exercised so much moderation, firmness, and tact, that he soon brought back the sailors to their allegiance. As a commander, Lord Howe has been accused of being too cautious; as a man, however, he seems to have had many estimable qualities.

Howe, Sir William (d. 1814), brother of Earl Howe, was appointed commander-in-chief of the English army in America in 1775. Acting in this capacity he won the battle of Bunker Hill (1775), and took New York 1776). Next year he defeated the enemy at Brandywine River and occupied Philadelphia, but was re-called in 1778 at his own request.

Howel Dha (Howel the Good) was the most famous of the early Welsh kings (reigned 915-948). He was the son of Cadell and the grandson of Rhodri Mawr. Howel seems to have had a vague sort of overlordship over North Wales, whose chief king was his cousin, Idwal Foel. Later writers have spoken of him as king of all Wales; but he at most possessed over his contemporary princes the authority of superior ability and power. He never disputed the West Saxon overlordship, and in 922 accepted Edward the Elder as "father and lord." He seems to have attended the English witenagemots, attested charters, and there is ground for the belief that he joined the expedition of Edmund against Cumbria in 946. Howel is most famous for his collection of Welsh laws and customs, which he made at a great gathering of Welsh prelates and princes at his hunt-ing lodge, near Whitland, in Carmarthenshire, known as Ty Gwyn ar Daf. He is said to have been aided by Blegywryd, the first scholar of his time, and to have taken the laws in person to Rome to obtain papal sanction (926). But the "Book of the White House" is no longer extant, and the bulky codes which now go by the name of the Laws of Howel Dha can only in their present form be referred back to the eleventh or twelfth century, though doubtless based on earlier collections. They comprise three varying laws belonging to the districts of Gwynedd, Powys, and Dyfed respectively. They bear large traces of English influence, nd, though largely occupied with minute details of fines and court duties, are very valuable sources of information. Howel died in 948, and the peace which seems to have attended his power died with him. "He was," says the native chronicler, "the wiscet and justest of all Welsh princes, greatly loved by every Welshman and by the wise among the Saxons."

The Laws of Hevel Dha were first printed by Wotton, and afterwards more completely and accurately edited by Mr. Ansurin Owen in the Record Commission's Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales; Brut y Tycysogien; Geentian Brut; Annales Cambria; Liber Landavensis; Williams, History of Wales.

Howick, LORD. [GREY, EARL.] Hudibras. [BUTLER, SANUEL.]

Hudson, Str Jeffer (b. 1619, d. 1682), was Charles I.'s favourite dwarf. He was faithfully attached to Queen Herrietta, whom he accompanied in hor first flight from England; not long after this he was taken prisoner by Turkish pirates and sold as a slave, but before long he was released and served as a captain of horse in the royal army. When the royal cause became hopeless he again retired to France with the queen, but returned to England at the Restoration, and in 1679 was accused of complicity in the Popish Plot. On this account he was imprisoned, and died very soon afterwards in captivity.

Hudson's Bay Territories, The (or PRINCE RUPERT'S LAND), which extended over a vast area in the north-west of British America, received their name from the explorer Hudson, who in 1610 penetrated into the bay which still bears his name. It had been previously visited by Sebastian Cabot in 1517, and by Davis in 1585. The example of Hudson was followed a few years later by various exploring partics, and the regions about the bay were found to be abundantly stocked with animals furnishing valuable fur. In 1670 the Hudson's Bay Company was formed, and settlements were established in various places. Frequent collisions took place between the English settlers and the French, who in 1685 took most of the English factories. The Peace of Utrecht in 1713 restored the English possessions, and although there were subsequent attempts on the part of the French to drive out the British again, they were unsuccessful. The Hudson's Bay Company was carried on in accordance with the charter of 1670, which "authorises the governor and company to make laws and ordinances for the good government of their territory, and the advancement of trade, and to impose penalties and punishments not repugnant to the laws of England." In 1858 part of the territory was formed into the colony of British Columbia, and in 1870 the remaining portion, then known as the North West Territories, was incorporated with the Dominion of Canada (q.v.), with which British Columbia was united in 1871.

words huer and crer, both of which signify to cry aloud. In early English law it was one of the recognised processes of common law for securing the arrest of a felon. The plaintiff who had been robbed had by this process the right of acquainting the constable of the township with the wrong he had suffered, and the description of the culprit. The constable might then call upon all the inhabitants to join in the pursuit of the suspected criminal with horn and voice; and so follow up the offender's tracks to the limits of the township, at which limit this constable would generally hand on the duty of pursuit to the constable of the neighbouring parish. It was enjoined by the Statute of Westminster, 1275, and regulated by Acts made in the years 1285, 1585, 1735, and 1749.

Hugnenots. [PROTESTANT REPUGES IN ENGLAND.]

Hull, or Kingston-upon-Hull, derives ite second name from Edward I., who, seeing its advantageous position, took much trouble in fertifying the place. But it seems to have been of considerable importance even before this time. The great house of De la Pole were Hull merchants. About the year 1300, Edward, in ar ordinance having reference to the establishment of mints, appointed it one of the places for the crection of furnaces. Its prosperity, though occasionally interrupted by plague and famine, seems to have been continuous during the succeeding centuries. In 1642 the town came into great prominence as one of the most important magazines of arms in the country. Owing to this it was entrusted by Parliament to the keeping of Sir John Hotham, whose refusal to admit the king within the gates was almost tantamount to a declaration of war. Before long, however, Sir John was found in correspondence with the Royalists, treating for the surrender of his charge. For this offence he suffered death; while the town of Hull held out against the sicge of the Marquis of Newcastle.

Humble Petition and Advice, THE (1657), was the second paper Constitution of the Protectorate. When Cromwell's second Parliament met in 1657, great anxiety was felt for the course ovents would take if the Protector were to be suddenly carried off by death or murder. On February 23 Alderman Pack, member for the city of London, brought in a motion to this effect, and enunciated his proposals, which bore the title of "An Humble Address and Remonstrance." These propositions were, after a long debate, accepted by the House, in spite of the opposition of the military members. On April 4, when a committee had been appointed to discuss the whole question with him, Cromwell definitely refused to exchange the title of Protector for that of king; but with this and a few other minor exceptions, the whole of the Humblo Petition and Advice received the Protector's assent (May 25, 1657). The chief provisions of this document were, that Cromwell should name his own successor in his lifetime; that a Farliament of two Houses should be called every three years at the nurthest; that Papists be disabled from sitting in Parliament and voting in the election of members; that an Upper House be constituted, consisting of from forty to seventy members, whereof twentyone should form a querum; that the members of this Upper House should be nominated by Cromwell in the first place—the right of filling up vacancies being, however, inherent in the chamber itself; that a constant revenue of £1,300,000 a year be granted for the maintenance of the army and navy, other supplies being granted by Parliament specially, as need should arise; that the Protector's council should consist only of "such as uro of known piety and of undoubted affection to the rights of these nations, even in matters of religious faith; that this council be not removed but by consent of Parliament; that it shall uppoint to the military and naval commands on Cromwell's death; that the Chancellor, Treasurer, chief justices, &c., be approved by Parliament; that Parliament should issue a public confession of faith, to which, however, none should be compelled to assent, nor be molested for holding other views so long as they did not abuse this liberty; but that neither Papacy nor Prelacy be suffered. When, however, Purliament once more met in Jan., 1658, Cromwell found the Lower House, from which his chief supporters had been withdrawn to form the new House of Lords, calling in question all that had been done in the previous year. The Lower House new refused to recognise the Upper. Cromwell, in despair, dissolved Parliament early in 1658, and the Humble Petition and Advice fell to the ground.

Hume, David (b. 1711, d. 1776), was born at Edinburgh and educated for the law, though his own tastes ran strongly in the direction of letters. A few years after coming of age he went to France, returning to London in 1737, for the publication of his Treatise on Human Nature. It was not till fifteen years later that he published his Political Discourses (1752), and about the same time being appointed librarian of the Faculty of Advocates, conceived the idea of writing a history of England. The first volume of this work containing the reigns of James I. and Charles I. was published in 1754, and fell almost stillborn from the press. Two years later appeared the continuation of the History to the Revolation of 1688. In 1759 Hume published his history of the House of Tudor, and in 1761 the earlier portion of his history. By this time the sale of the new history was very considerable, and its author realised such sums of money from the booksellers, that he became, in his own words, "not only inde-pendent but opulent." In 1763 he was appointed secretary to the Earl of Hertford in his embassy to Paris, and in 1765 remained charge d'affaires in that city, till the arrival of Lord Hertford's successor, the Duke of Richmond. He then returned to Edinburgh, where he died. Hume's History long the most widely popular of all the general histories of England. This popularity it owes in great part to the lucid clegance of its style, and the literary skill with which it is composed: qualities which still entitle it to rank as an English classic. To the historical student its value at the present day is comparatively slight. Hume's acquaintance with the subject was not very close, and of the earlier periods and the origin growth of the constitution, he had little accurate knowledge; nor was the time taken in the composition of the History sufficient to allow of very deep research; while his narrative of events in the seventeenth century is vitiated by his strong prejudice against all who asserted popular rights. Still the literary merits of the book, and the acuteness of some of the observations of one of the greatest thinkers of the 18th century, must always give it a certain value of its own.

Hume, Joseph (b. 1777, d. 1855), was born of humble parents at Montrosc. After studying medicine at Edinburgh he was appointed surgeon to one of the Indian regiments (1797), und did not return home till 1808. From this time he devoted his attention to the practical side of English politics, and in 1812 entered Parliament as member for Weymouth—a berough which he did not long continue to represent. A few years later he was returned for Aberdeen, and after one or two changes finally became member for Montrose. The chief object which Hume set to himself as a politician was the reduction of taxation, and to secure this reduction he investigated and, when necessary, challenged every item of public expenditure. But it was not to this line of work only that Mr. Hume confined his attention. Almost every branch of domestio policy in turn called for his inquiries: he proposed reforms in the army, the navy, and the ecclesiastical courts. He secured the repeal of the laws forbidding machinery to be exported, and workmen from going abroad. He was also a determined enemy of imprisonment for debt, of flogging in the army, and the system of impressment for the navy. In such useful work he passed the last years of his life.

Hundred, The. Tacitus, describing the Germaus, says that their chiefs are assisted in matters of justice by a hundred companions, and it in war each pagus, or district, furnishes a hundred warriors and the host. These bands, he tells us, are called "hundreds," but "what was once a number is now a name only." Thus the tribe is divided into "hundreds," which are already beginning to lose their connection with a definite number of warriors, or fully free men. There is no trueo of any such division in England till Edgar's "Ordinance how the Hundred shall be held." But in the Frank kingdom the court of the hundred had been the most important part of the judicial machinery as early as tho fifth century; and an arrangement of the land in hundreds seems to have been common to most German peoples. It is, therefore, probable that Edgar's measure was not the creation of the division into hundreds, but the employment for judicial and police purposes of a primitive method of grouping. It does not, however, follow that the hundreds were all originally of the same size; the distriet given to a hundred warriors would naturally vary in size according to the natural characteristics of the country, and to the amount of land at the disposal of each tribe at the time of the allotment. According to William of Matmesbury, the division into hundreds and tithings was due to Alfred; possibly Alfred revived the hundred as a basis of rating. Connecting this tradition with the fact of the first appearance of the name under Edgar, we may regard the revival or development of the hundredal system as a part of the work of reorganisation after the Danish attack. The laws of Edgar mention a "hundredsealdor" who is to be consulted on questions of witness, and a "hundred-man" whose duty it is to pursue thieves. These may or may not be the same. In the thirteenth century the hundred was represented in the shire-moot by an elected caldorman; it is therefore likely that the hundreds-caldor, or hundred-man, was from the first an elected officer. He can scarcely be regarded as more than the convener of the court. In the twelfth century the hun-dreds were fast becoming dependent upon great lords who managed and took the profits of the court. The hundred-moot, wherein the wholo body of suitors or freeholders present were judges, and which was probably pre-sided over by a deputy of the sheriff, was held monthly. It had jurisdiction in all cases; was the court of first instance in criminal matters; and Cunute decreed that no case should be brought before the king until it had been heard in the hundred court. The laws of Ethelred direct that "the twelve senior thegas go out and swear in the relic that they will accuse no innocent man nor conceal any guilty one;" the presentment of criminals was therefore probably part of the immemorial work of the hundred court, and a representative body of twelve seems to have acted on behalf of the snitors as a sort of judicial committee. Upon the creation of the system of frank-pledges, a distinction arose between the great court of the hundred held twice yearly for the sheriff's tourn or view of frank-pledge, and with specially full at-tendance, and the lesser court of the hundred under the bailiff for petty questions of dobt. Its criminal jurisdiction was gradually taken from it on the one hand by the growth of the manorial courts-leet and of franchises, and on the other by the creation of the system of timerant justices. From the twelfth century the hundred ceased to be of much political importance.

Stubbs, Const. Hist. The laws are printed in Schmid, Gesetzte der Angel-Sachsen (see also his Gloesary, s.v. Hundred); those of Edgar and the Leges Henrici Primi are in Stubbs's Select Chaiters. See also Gneist, Self-Government; and as to Tacitus, Waits, Dentsche Verlassings, Gesch., i. 218—222.

Hundred Rolls, THE, are the result of inquisitions taken by a commission appointed by Edward I. at the beginning of his reign, to inquiro into various grievances relating to illegal tolls, encroachments on royal and common lands, unlawful tradings, oppressions by the nobility and elergy, &c. These returns are of the greatest importance to the local historian and the genealogist. They derive their names from the fact that the inquiry was conducted from hundred to hundred. A jury in each hundred gave witness to the extent of the demesne lands of the erown; of manors alienated from the crown; the names of tenants-in-capite with their services, and the losses incurred by the crown owing to subinfeudation; the extent of lands held in frank-almoign; the wardships, marriages, escheats, &c., wrongfully withheld from the crown, and many other items of importance. These Rolls were published by command of the king in 1812.

Hundred Years' War, The (1338—1453), is the name generally applied to the long period of scarcely interrupted hostility between England and France, which began with Edward III.'s assertion by arms of his claims to the French throne, and did not finally end until the expulsion of the English from France during the reign of Henry VI. As roughly and vaguely indicating, at least, the culminating century of the long mediæval struggle between the two nations, the term is a useful one enough. But it must not be taken to indicate any definite war in the way that the Thirty Years' War, or the Seven Years' War do. The long warfare was interrupted by more than one interval of peace, and more than once changed its character and objects.

Despite the claims raised by Edward III. in 1328 [EDWARD III.], the accession of Philip of Valois was peaceful, and it was not until 1338 that hostilities began. A variety of secondary causes of quarrel had long embittered the relations of England and France, when the strong support which Philip gave to the Scots made war inevitable, and Edward did his best to make the breach irreparable by his obtrusive reassertion of his old claim to the French throne. Strong in his national leadership of the English hatred of France, Edward, as Duke of Guienne, relied also on rallying the feudalists of the south to his side, while he concluded a close alliance with Louis of Bavaria, the imperial vassals of the Netherlands, and the anti-French party in the Flemish cities. From 1338 to 1340, an indecisive war was waged on the northern frontier of France, only memorable for Edward's naval victory of Sluys (June 24, 1340). The lukewarmness and desertion of Edward's allies necessitated a truce, that continued until the dispute between Jehn of Montfort and Charles of Blois for the duchy of Britanny gave English and French, as partisans of Montfort and Charles respectively, an opportunity of renewing their quarrel. In 1345 the general war was resumed. Edward again established intimate relations with Ghent, and Derby, in Guienne, won the victory of Auberoche, though compelled the next year to stand a siege in Aiguillon. In 1346, Edward, in person, landed with a great army in Normandy, and after a destructive inroad, won the famous victory of Creey (Aug. 6, 1346), gave the English enduring prestige, and the possession of Calais, which surrendered after a famous sieg. in 1347. The Black Death now compelled a truce, and the war was not renewed until 1355, when a bloody foray of the Black Prince, at the head of the chivalry of Guienne, core more fruit than Edward's abortivo expedition from Calais. During a similar inroad in 1356, the Black Prince won the victory of Poitiers, where King John of France was taken pri-soner. A period of extremo anarchy now set in, in France, which King Edward availed himself of to conclude the very favourable Peace of Bretigny (1360). The treaty was never really carried out, and the war in Britanny continued until the battle of Auray gave Montfort the duchy; and after the Black Prince had lost health and reputation in Spain, the appeal of the barons of Aquitaine led Charles V. to renew the war openly in 1369. The skilful strategy of the Constable Duguesclin avoided pitched battles, and wore down the enemy by a partisan warfare of sieges, skirmishes, and ambuscades. The capture of Limoges was the last of the Black Prince's exploits. Lancaster traversed France from end to end in 1373, but he found no enemy and could win no durable results. By 1374 all Guienne was lost except two or three towns on the coast, and in the north Calais alone remained English. The feeble government of the minority of Richard II. led the French, even under Charles VI., to retaliation on England; but the war continued very slackly, and with constant truces, antil in 1397, Richard II., intent on despotism, established 3 close alliance with France, comented by his marriage with Isabella of Valois. But the revolution of 1399 again embroiled England and France in hostilities, and nothing but the weakness of Henry IV. and the outbreak of the Burgundian and Armagnac factions prevented a gundian and Armagnac Inctions prevented a serious renewal of the war; as it was, the judicious trimming of Henry led in 1411 to his securing full possession of Guicnne. Henry V., with greater resources, renewed vigorous hostilities. On Oct. 25, 1415, the battle of Agincourt (q.v.) gave him a victory over Burgundian and Armagnae, combined for once to defend their country. In 1417 a second expedition profited by the renewal of second expedition profited by the renewal of civil strife in France; and the capture of Rouen completed the conquest of Normandy. In 1419, the murder of John the Fearless drove the whole Burgundian party on to the English side. A marvellous change of feeling brought the monarchical north of Franco to welcome the national enemy and head of the feudal separatists. Paris opened its gates to Henry, and the Treaty of Troyes (q.v.) (1420) secured him the succession to the French throne. But Henry's premature death in 1422 led the Dauphin, now Charles VII., to renew the war against the regent Bedford. Despite the victories of Crevant and Verneuil, the Anglo-Burgundian party failed to hold their own south of the Loire. The mad folly of Bedford's brother alienated Burgundy. A national reaction set in, in France, which found its highest expression in the heroic career of the Maid of Orleans. In 1423 Joan relieved Orleans and defeated the English at Patay; marched to Rheims to crown Charles king, and, though unsuccessful in her attacks on Paris, successful in the patients of the pati ceeded in rekindling the spirit of nationality through all North France. The coronation of Henry VI. at Paris, Joan's capture and execution in 1431, failed to stem the tide. In 1425 Burgundy abandoned the English at the Congress of Arras, and the death of Bedford completed their discomfiture. In 1437 Paris was lost. A peace party that recognised the fatility of continuing the war, now grew up in England, but their temporary triumph, though it led to the truce of 1446, and the marriage of Henry VI. and Margaret of Anjou, failed to secure a permanent peace. In 1448 the war was renowed, and by 1449 all Normandy fell into the hands of the French. Guienne next fell, and in 1453 Calais alone remained in the English possession in France. The outbreak of the Wars of the Roses finally prevented any prolongation of the long struggle—which had caused so much misery and had been so barren of resultsand which, if resulting in bracing up the national life of France, brought little to England but barren glory, chequered with disgrace, and a factious and unruly spirit that found its outcome in the civil wars that now fell upon the land.

Mungarian Refugee Question, THE (1851). In 1851 Kossuth, the Hungarian revolutionary leader, came to England, and was received with great enthusiasm. The Austrian government (already offended by an attack at Barclay's brewery on the Austrian general, Haynau, Sept., 1850, and by an unconciliatory note of Lord Palmerston's on the subject) looked on these proceedings with great distrust and suspicion, over-rating, much as Kossuth himself did, the value of these demonstrations. Lord Palmerston had already used English influence to protect the Hungarian refugees in Turkey, and it became almost understood that if Lord Palmerston received Kossuth at a private interview, as he proposed doing, the Austrian ambassador would leave the country. Lord John Russell grew alarmed, and the result of his remonstrances with Lord Palmerston was that the latter promised to avoid an interview with Kossuth. He consented, however, to receive some deputations from various metropolitan parishes at the Foreign Office. The addresses brought by these bodies contained strong language with regard to the Austrian government. The whole transaction was eventually made one of the charges of independent action brought against Lord Palmerston, which caused his dismissal in 1852.

Ashley, Life of Palmerston; Annual Register;

Hunsdon, LORD, HENRY CARRY (d. 1596), cousin of Queen Elizabeth, one of her truest friends and most trusted advisers, was frequently employed on confidentialmissions, and filled many posts of trust. In 1564 he was sent to France, to invest Charles IX. with the Order of the Garter, but was usually in attendance on the queen at court. Vehemently opposed to the scheme of a marriage between Mary Stuart and the Duke of Norfolk, Hunsdon, in 1569, was sent to Scotland with proposals for the delivery of the Queen of Scots into the hands of Murray, in order to get her out of the way of any movement in her favour on the part of the rebel lerds. Later in the same year, he was associated with Lord Sussex in the command against the insurgents of the north. In the beginning of 1570 he attacked the forces of Leonard Dacres on the banks of the river Chelt, in Cumberland, and completely routed them, doing such good service to the queen that Elizabeth wrote to him. In 1584 he was sent on a special mission to Scotland. During the alarm which held England in the days when the Spanish Armada was threatening, Lord Hunsdon had command of a body-guard of 36,900 men, enrolled especially for the queen's defence. A soldier rather than a statesman, Lord Hunsdon gave the queen frequent momentary offence by his plain speaking, but he remained till the end one of her most trusted supporters.

Eunt, HENRY (b. 1773, d. 1835), better known as "Orator Hunt," was born at Widdington, Wiltshire, and was a farmer in very well-to-do circumstances. In consequence, however, of some misunderstanding, he was expelled from the Marlborough yeomanry by Lord Bruce. He demanded entisfaction, and for this he was indicted in the King's Bench, found guilty, fined, and imprisoned. In prison he met with Waddington and some other Radicals, who converted him to their party. In 1812 he stood for Bristol, where for some time he had been following the trade of a brewer. The poll was kept open for fourteen days, serious riots took place, and Hunt was beaten in this, as in many subsequent attempts to enter Parliament. He now took to stump eratory, held Reform meetings at West-minster, and was especially conspicuous at Spa Fields and Manchester. A warrant was issued against him, and he was arrested at Manchester, tried and imprisoned (1820). During the excitement of the Reform Bill, he displaced Lord Stanley as member for Preston, and entered the House of Commons (1830). Here he estranged most of his former associates, and he was defeated at the 1832 election. Annual Register, 1835.

Hunt, Leion (b. 1784, d. 1859), held a clerkship in the War Office from the time of his leaving school till the year 1808, when, in company with his brother John, he started the Examiner, a journal of advanced political views. In 1812 the two brothers were fined £500 apiece and sentenced to undergo an imprisonment of two years for publishing a satire upon the Prince Regent in the pages of their paper. On his release from prison, he edited the Indicator, and about 1822 was associated with Byron and Shelley in their new venture, The Liberal, of which only four numbers were issued. Leigh Hunt received a government pension of £200 a year in 1847. He was the author of many poetical and other works, and of an Autobiography, published in 1850.

Huntingdon was the seat of one of Edward the Elder's castles, built about 916. It was made an earldom for Waltheof, son of Siward, in 1070. In the Middle Ages the history of the town is unimportant. It was one of the great centres of the Parliamentarians in the Civil War, and was plundered by the Royalists in 1645.

Huntingdon, PEERADES OF. Waltheof, Earl of Huntingdon, was beheaded in 1075. His daughter Maud married first Simon de St. Liz, and secondly David, afterwards King of Scotland, who successively bore the title of earl. The title then passed to David's son, Henry, and at his death to his half-brother, Simon de St. Liz. Afterwards it reverted to the Scotlish house, and was held by David's grandson, Malcolm, and by the latter's son William, Kings of Scotland. William, however, was divested about 1174, and Simon de St. Lis, son of the Simon last named, became earl. Then followed David, brother of William, King of Scotland, with whose son the title became extinct. A new earldom was subsequently created in favour of William of Clinton (1337), and again of Guiscard, Lord of Angle in Poitou (1377); but neither of these persons left heirs. In 1367 John Holland, afterwards Duke of Exeter, was made Earl of Huntingdon; this title was forfeited when his grandson Henry was attainted (1461). Ten years later, Thomas Grey, afterwards Marquis of Dorset, was granted the earldom, which, however, he is stated to have resigned on receiving the marquisate; the former being now granted to William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, who died without male issue. In 1529, George, Baron Hastings, was created Earl of Huntingdon, and by his family the honour is still held.

Huntingdon, Francis Hastinos, 2nd Earl of (d. 1561), was employed, in 1550, in an expedition for the relief of Calais and Boulegne, with Sir James Crofts. In 1554, he did good service to Mary in the Duke of Suffolk's rebellion, and succeeded in taking that nobleman prisoner. He married Catherine, daughter of Lord Montague, and granddaughter of Margaret, Countess of Salf-dury, and so handed on to his son a remain possibility of inheriting the English crown.

Huntingdon, Henry Hastinos, 3rd Earl of (d. 1595), was, soon after the accession of Elizabeth, regarded as her possible heir, especially by Cecil and the Protestant party; but the plan of recognising him proved impracticable. He subsequently strongly opposed the contemplated marriage between Mary Queen of Scots and the Duke of Norfolk, as one which would be fraught with much mischief to the Protestant cause. In the year 1569 he became Mary's gaoler at Tutbury, and proved himself the bitter enemy of the Scetch queen and the Catholic party. In 1581 he was sent to levy troops against Lennox, though he was prevented from taking any further steps against the regent by Secretary Randolph. Huntingdon married Lady Catherine Dudley, daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, and was, therefore, the brother-in-law of the Earl of Leicester.

Huntingdon, Henny of (d. circs 1154), was brought up by Bloet, Bishop of Lincoln, still subsequently became Archdeacon of Huntingdon. His chief work is his Historia Anglorum, which goes down to the reign of Stephen. Theimportance of this work ischiefly owing to the fact that it incorporates a number of popular songs and stories, the originals of which have been lost. His style is gran-diloquent and often turgid, and he abounds in classical allusions. His Epistle to Walter, his friend, is a cynical sketch of many of his most famous contemporaries in Church and State.

Henry of Muntingdon's works have been edited for the Rolls Series. A translation of his history is given in Bohn's Antiquarian Librar:

Earl of (d. 1470), was created earl by James II. of Scotland (1449—50). He was the head of the Setons and the Gordons, and received his title in reward for his services against the Douglas faction. He defeated the Earl of Craufurd, one of the Douglas leaders, in the battle of Brechin (1452).

Huntly, George Gordon, 2nd Marquis of (d. 1649), was appointed Charles I.'s lieutenant in Scotland, and after having refused all the overtures made to him by the Covenanters, took the field in opposition to the Marquis of Argyle (1644). Next year he refused to lay down his arms even at the command of the king, who was then under the control of the Parliament. In 1647 he was taken prisoner and beheaded at Edinburgh on March 22, 1649.

J. H. Burton, History of Scotland; Sir E. Douglas, Peerage of Scotland,

Euntly, GEOMOR GORDON, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1562), was one of the last peers in Scotland to oppose the Reformation. He was a man of vast power and wealth, his possessions lying chiefly in the north and west of the Highlands. In his earlier years he had defeated the English troops at Haddenrig (1542), and at the head of the Scotch army had narrowly watched the Duke of Norfolk's invasion of the same year, on which occasion though avoiding an engagement, he succeeded in materially checking the progress of the English. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Pinkie, where he was taken prisoner (1547). After escaping from prison, he became a great supporter of Mary of Guise, the queen-rogent, and in later years a strong opponent of the Lords of the Congregation. When Mary Queen of Scots returned to her own country (1561), the Earl of Huntly found part of the estates which had been in hi. possession transferred to James Stuart, t. e queen's half-brother (Earl of Murray), and pletted the murder of that nobleman. In 1562 he took up arms, and openly denied Mary admittance to her castle of Inverness, which he then held. The castle, however was soon taken by the royal troops, and shortly afterwards Huntly was defeated and al in at Corrichie, near Aberdeen.

Huntly, GRORGE GORDON, 5TH EARL OF (d. 1576), the son of that Earl of Huntly who fell at Corrichie, 1562, and for whose rebellion the family estates had been forfeited to the crown, was restored to his title and possessions, August, 1565. Soon afterwards his sister, Lady Jane Gordon, was married to Bothwell, while Huntly himself married a daughter of the Duke of Chatelhérault. After the murder of Darnley (1567), Huntly accompanied Mary to Beton, and was one of the councillors who presided at Bothwoll's trial. Having afterwards taken up arms against the Regent Murray, he was forced to make submission (1569), and to join the party of the government. On Murray's death (1570), the Earl of Huntly once more raised forces on behalf of Queen Mary, but was soon forced to enter into a pacification with the new regent (1573). His death ox-curred a few years later, in 1576.

Huntly, Geomos Gondon, 6TH EARL and lst Manquis or (d. 1636), was the of the supporters of James VI. after the Raid of Ruthven (q.v.). A staunch adherent of the Catholic faith, he was accused in the year 1589 of being in league with Philip of Spain, and a year or two later signed the "Spanish blanks." In 1592 he put the Earl of Murray to death, nominally as an accomplice in Bothwell's rebellion (1591), but most probably in revenge for the treatment which the Gordons had experienced from the Rogent Murray. In 1594 he defeated the Earl of Argyle, who attacked him at the instance of the government; but became reconciled to him in 1597, when he also changed his faith and obtained the reversal of his forfeiture. He was not, however, a particularly zenlous convert, as in 1616 he was excommunicated on suspicion of receiving and protecting Jesuits In his castle. In 1630 his feud with the Crichtons culminated in the loss of his eldest son at the "burning of Frendraught." Shortly afterwards the Marquis of Huntly himself died of a broken heart (1636).

Huskisson, William (b. 1770, d. 1830), the son of William Huskisson of Oxley, near Wolverhampton. was educated for the profession of medicine. Shortly before the French Revolution he accompanied his uncle to Paris, and warmly entered into the feelings of the revolutionary party. He became a member of the Club de Quatre-vingt-neuf, and of the London Corresponding Society, and turned his attention to international policy and commerce. He attracted the attention of Lord Gower, the British ambassador, who offered him the situation of private secretary (1790). In 1793 he was appointed to assist in the projected arrangement of an office for arranging the affairs of the French refugees in England. In 1795 he became Under-Secretary of State for War, and was Secretary for the Treasury under Pitt (1804) and Perceval (1807). He was Chlef Commissioner of Woods and Forests in 1814, and elected member for Liverpool in 1823. In that year he was made President of the Boar of Trado, and with him a complete alteration came over our ommercial policy, and the reign of protection began to give place and yield to free trade. In his first year he was not able do much. He offered to remit the import duty on raw cotton if the manufacturers would consent to give up the export duty. This they declined. An attempt was made to free the Spitalfields silk manufacture from restrictions such as the settlement of their wages by a magistrate, but 11,060 journeymen petitioned against this, and it was dropped. He was, however, successful in practically abolishing the old Navigation Act, sai thus freeing English and foreign shipping In 1824 he reduced the duty on raw and pun silk, and lowered the import and export duty on wool. I der Canning's ministry Hushisson still retained his old post at the Board of Trade. On the death of Canning, Hushisson succeeded Lord (ioderich as Secretary for the Colonies (1827). A quarrel, however, shortly broke out about the appointment of a chairman to a Finance Committee, which was to be formed at the opening of the session, and Huskisson at once sent in his resignation. This produced the downfall of Lord Goderich's government. In 1828 he joined the Wellington ministry, but in a very few months a singlet difference of opinion enabled the duke to insist upon his resignation. On Sept. 15, 1830, Huskisson was accidentally killed on the occasion of the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway.

Mutchinson, John (b 1615, d. 1664), was the son of bir Thomas Hutchinson of Owthorpe, Notts. During the Civil War he was Governor of Nottingham for the Parliament, a position of great importance as commanding the passage of the Trent. In 1645 he was elected member for Nottingham, and three years later sat in the High Court of Justice, and signed the king's death warrant. On the expulsion of the Long Parliament (1643) he retired into the country until it was reinstated by the army (Oct., 1659). He was returned to the Convention (May, 1660), but. though his life was F ared, he was, as a regicide, Incapacitated from public employ-ment. In Oct., 1663, he was imprisoned and died Sept. 11, 1664. Hyder Ali (b. circa 1702, d. 1782) was a Mohammedan soldier of humble extraction, the son of a petty revenue officer. He entered the service of the Rajah of Mysore, and about the year 1759 he succeeded in making himself master of the whole country. Out of the wrecks of the old principalities of South India, he soon founded for himself a compact Moham-medan kingdom, and became a most formidablo enemy to the English. He was the terror of all his neighbours, the Mahrattas of Poonah, the Nabob of the Carnatic, and the Nizam of Hyderabad; while at the same time he was intriguing with the French at Pondicherry. This roused the suspicions of the English, and more especially so when Nisam Ali deserted their side for that of Hyder. The two new allies invaded the Carnatic, but were driven back, whereupon Nizam Ali renewed his alliance with the English (1768). For the next ten years Hyder Ali was engaged in quietly strengthening his army and his state. At last, on the breaking out of war between the English and the French, in 1778, he was enraged at the English expedition sen' by way of Mysore from Madras, against the French settlement of Mahé. This action decided Hyder Ali's mind. Bursting into the Carnatic at the head of 100,000 men, he laid the whole country waste with fire and sword (1780). He had allied himself with the French; Nizam Ali and the Mahrattas had engaged to support his arms, and the case of the English seemed very desperate for a time. But Warren Hastings, the Governor-General, was more than equal to the occasion. Negotiations secured the friendship, or at least the neutrality, of the Nizam; while Sir Eyre Coote was despatched against Hydor himself. The great leader of the war was defeated at Porto Novo (1781), and all immediate danger was over from that ride. A year and a half later Hyder Ali died auddenly at Chittore (1782).

Thea is the name of territories in East-Africa on and behind the Suahili coast which the Imperial British East Africa Company (from whose initials the name is formed) was incorporated in 1888 to administer. In 1895, however, the Company surrendered its rights to the Government, who at once arranged for the construction of a railway from the coast.

Iberians, a name given to the pre-Celtic population of the British Isles, who are supposed to have been of Eastern origin, and to have followed the northern shore of the Mediterranean and the western shore of the Atlantic in their migrations. They were of short stature and swarthy constenance, and were conquered by the Celts, whose serfs they became. Traces of their language are supposed to exist in certain peculiarities of Welsh, and the Druidic religion is said to have been derived from them by the Goidelic Ceits. The population in parts of South Wales, moreover, is of the Iberian type, and Mr Boyd Dawkins in his valuable Early Man in Britain, and in several papers written previously, has also found the Iberian characteristics in the small dark Highlander and the Black Celts to the west of the Shannon.

Thhar, or Iberius, Sr. (d. circs 500), Eishop of Begerin, was probably a pupil of St Patrick, and received the name of Ibhar on becoming a Christian. He lived first in the Arran Islands in Galway Bay, afterwards on Geshille Plain, King's County, and later in the Island of Begerin in Wexford Haven. He kept a school, and soon gathered monks around him, and his memory is preserved in various local traditions. He died at Begerin.

Iceni, THE, were an ancient British tribe occupying the modern counties of Suffolk. Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, According to Professor Rhys, they were a very hardy and warlike race, but were induced to make an alliance with the Romans through jealousy of the Trinobantes and Cassivelaunus. It has been supposed that they had no kings, as many of their coins bear the inscription "Ecene. without that of any prince; that there were two factions dividing the tribe; and that the head of one faction, Bericus, invited the aid of Claudius, and so was instrumental in bringing about the beginning of the long connection of this island with Rome (43 A.D.). In later years, though apparently still posseesed of their own kings or queens, they revolted against the Roman rule in the time of Ostorius Scapula, who was appointed in 50 A.D., and again while Suctonius was occupied in Mona.

Rhys, Celtic Britain,

Tckham, Peter of (f. circa 1290), is said to bave been named from a small village near Canterbury. He spent some time at the University of Paris in close literary intimacy with Philippe de Grève, the Chancellor of the University. On leaving that place he seems to have become a monk at Canterbury. He is usually regarded as the author of Chronicen de Regibus Anglies successive regnantibus a tempere Bruti, a meagre and somewhat confused chronicle. He is also thought to have written in French, during his stay in Paris, the Genealogies of the Kings of Britain and England.

Ida, Kino of Bernicia (d. 559), is said to have been the founder of that kingdom; but this phrase is perhaps to be interpreted as meaning that he united the various petty Anglian or Saxon settlements existing in that district into one kingdom. His descent is traced from Woden, and he is spoken of as having been a wise and temperate ruler. Ida is said to have been in the prime of his life when he became king. He built himself a fortress, called by the Britons Dinguardi or Dinguoaroy, and by the Angles Bebbanburch (the modern Bamborough), which was surrounded first by a hedge and afterwards by a wall. Ida's immediate kingdom did not probably extend south of the Tees, though his power may have been felt beyond that river, for the kingship of Deira, between the Tees and the Hum'er, does not appear to have been founded previous to his death. He reigned twelve years, and is said to have fallen in a battle against the Britons. The advance of heathen power under him and his sons (six of whom reigned in succession over their father's kingdom) caused a widespread apostasy from Christianity among the l'icts.

Iknield (or Icknield) Way, The, was one of the great Roman roads through Britain. It started from near Yarmouth, and passing by Newmarket, Royston, and Baldock, it reached Dunstahle, where it crossed Watling Street. Thence, by Tring and Wendover, to Goring, where it crossed the Thames and threw off a branch known as the Ridgeway. Thence it proceeded by Aldworth, Newhury, and Tidworth to Old Sarum. Ther icross Venditch Chase, Bedbury, Marden Castle, Bridport, Axminster, Honiton, Exeter, Totnes, to Land's End. The name, as in other Roman ways, is often loosely applied.

Ikon Basilike: "or, the True Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings," was a work published some ten days after Charles I,'s death, and purported to have been written by that king in the last years of his life. It is divided into twenty-eight chapters, almost every one of which is appropriate to some remarkable incident in the closing years of its author's life. A short sketch of some event or reflection upon it is given, and to this is appended a prayer applicable to the ccasion. So chapter iii., entitled, "Upon his Majestie'a going to the House of Com-mons," commences with an explanation of the king's reasons for this step -"To call in question half a dozen men in a fair and legal! way, which God knowes was all my design; an explanation of the fact that he was attended by some gentlemen of his ordinary guard, and a declaration that he had no design of overawing the freedom of the House. After two pages of such meditation follows a short prayer of some half a page in length, calling God to witness his innocence, and praying for forgiveness on his enemies. This work had an immense sale, though to modern eyes it must seem, as Professor Masson has said, a somewhat dull performance. Fifty editions are said to have been sold within a year, an i it was in vain that Parliament gave orders to seine the book. So great was its popularity that in October, 1649, Milton had to publish his Eikonoklastes, or Image-breaker, in answer. The authorship of the Eikon Basilike has generally been attributed to Dr. Gauden, afterwards Bishop of Exeter.

Immigration. With the exception of the immigration of the Huguenot families from France to this country after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the population of Great Britain has never been very largely increased from external sources until within the last thirty or forty years. The great influx within that period of destitute Russian, Polish, Roumanian, and German Jews has drawn public attention to the evil, and in 1888 and 1889 parl amentary committees were appointed to consider the questions of foreign pauper immigration and the sweating system. Later a Royal Commission was instituted, and in its report, issued in 1903, it recommended that State legislation should be adopted and enforced to prevent the country from being burdened with undesirable aliens. In 1906 an Aliens Act—which came into operation in 1906—was passed to check the immigration of such aliens.

Impeachment is the name given to the judicial process by which any man, from the rank of a peer downwards, may be tried before the House of Lords at the in-stance of the House of Commons. In this ase the Commous are the prosecutors, while the Lords comhine in their own persons the functions of judge and jury. The process of conducting an impeachment is explained by Sir Erskine May as follows:—Somo member of the Lower House charges the accused with high treason, or any other offence of which he may be considered guilty. If he succeeds in winning the House over to his opinion, he is empowered to go to the bar of the House of Lords and there impeach the offender. committee is next appointed to draw up the articles of impeachment, which are then forwarded to the Lords in writing, with a reservation of power on the part of the Commona to add to the original counts if necessary. A day is then appointed for the trial, which constally takes place in Westminster Hall enerally takes place in Westminster Hall Certain managers ornduct the case on behalf of the Lower House, and the accused may defend himself by counsel. Witnesses are called on both sides, and the whole series of charges is gone through article by article; the accusers are bound to confine themselves to the charges contained in the articles of impeachment, and when they have finished, the offender enters on his defence, after which the prosecutors have a right of reply. All the evidence being then completed, each poer in succession delivers his verdict on the first article in the words, "Guilty [or Not Guilty], upon my honour." And so on for every count. In conclusion, the Lord Chancellor or Lord High Steward reckons up the number

Though the House of Lords may have delivered its verdict, judgment is not to be pronounced unless the House of Commons demand it by their Speaker. On the other hand, in 1679, the House of Commons protested against the Earl of Danby's right to plead the king's pardon when impeached in 1679, and by the Act of Settlement (1701) it was made part of the law of the realm "that no pardon under the Great Seal of England shall be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament."

The first case of an impeachment in which both Houses took part would appear to be at the time of the attack on Richard Lyons and Lord Latimer, in the Good Parliament of 1376. Of course in this case we cannot expect to have the full course of proceedings which have characterised the impeachments of much later centuries; and in fact it seems to have been the whole Parliament, and not the barons alone, who imprisoned these offenders. The impeachment of the Earl of Suffolk some ten years later (1386) seems to have been more in accordance with those of later times, for the Commons were clearly the prosecutors in this case, while it was the Lords who decided the question of his guilt. In a similar way, the judges who had in 1387 given their decision against the legality of the commissioners appointed in the preceding year, were next year impeached by the Commons and found guilty by the Lords (1388). From this time it ishardly necessary to carry on the instances of impeachment down to later times in any detail. The practice was not discontinued for any

The practice was not discontinued for any very long period till the accession of the house of York; but from the reign of Edward V., the institution seems to have fallen into disnes I till it was revived in the reign of James I.

Under the house of Tndor the Commons were too subservient to the royal authority to make use of their old privilege on their own account, and when the sovereign wished to be rid of an obnoxious subject he found a bill of attainder a readier instrument for effecting his ends. With the revival of the spirit of liberty in the first half of the seventeenth century, impeachments once more became frequent: the two first important instances being those of Francis Becon in 1621 and the Earl of Middlesex in 1624. Buckingham, who had been very urgent in inducing the Commons to proceed against the latter nobleman, would in his turn have been impeached a few years later had not the king dissolved Parliament for the purpose of saving him (1626). The cases of Strafford, Laud, Danby, Warren Hastings, Melville, &c., will be found alluded to under the articles devoted to these statesmen; but that of Fitz-Harris in the year 1681 deserves a passing notice as being the occasion on which the Commons attirmed their "right to impeach any peer or commoner for treason, or any other crime or misdemeanour." This claim of the Commons seems to have been practically conceded to them, but Blackstone and Lord Campbell are both agreed on the point "that a commoner cannot be impeached before the Lords for any capital offence but only for high misdemeanours."

Impressment. The practice of impresement, or compelling men to serve in the navy, seems to date back to a very early period of our history. It is said to have been in full force in the reign of John, that is, from the time of almost the first English king who was possessed of a regular royal fleet. Towards the end of the same century we find Edward I. empowering William Leybonrne to impress men, vessels and arms for the manning of his fleet. So, too, we read in the Black Book of the Admiralty that if a mariner who had been pressed for the king's naval service ran away he should undergo a year's imprisonment. The same penalty for the same offence may be traced in the legislation of later sovereigns, Richard II. (1378) Henry VI. (1439), and Elizabeth (1562-63), showing that this method of manning the royal vessels was in full force during these centuries. Towards the middle of the sixteenth century we come across what seems to be a serious attempt to make it criminal for a man to take steps for elnding impress-ment. In 1555 (2 & 3 Philip and Mary, xvi. 6), a very harsh law was passed against the Thames burgemen, according to which, if any watermen "shall willingly, voluntarily, and obstinately hyde themselves in the tyme of prestying into-secret places and out corners," they should suffer a fortnight's imprisonment and be debarred from following their calling for another year. A more generous enactment some seven or eight years later (1562-63) attempted to restrain the arbitrary character of impresements by enjoining that "no Fisherman haunting the sea should be taken by the queen's commission to serve her Highness as a mariner on the sea," without the commissioners having first consulted two commissioners having metabolic field in the peace. Still more indulgent was the spirit displayed in the 7 & 8 William III., according to which the Lord High Admiral is empowered to grant letters. "to any landsmen desirous to apply themselves to the sea services and to serve in Merchant shipps which shall be to them a protection against being impressed for the space of two years or more." The provisions of the Act of 1555, with somewhat altered details and increased penalties, however, were re-enacted after a lapse of one hundred and fifty years under Queen Anne (1705). Under George II., the impressment question was once more taken up and its stringency modified (1739-40). By a statute passed in this reign it was decreed that all persons above fifty-five and under eighteen years of age, should be exempt from impressment; and an attempt to encourage men to adopt a sailor's life was made at the same time by a clause which granted freedom from the above liability to all sailors who chose to demand it for two years from the time of their first going to sea. An Act of William IV.'s reign improved the position of the impressed sailor still further by limiting his term of service to five years -unless in a case of urgent necessity, when the admiral might enlarge it by six months (1835). By this time, however, the practice of impresement, which had been very largely used during the great wars in the opening years of the century, had been rapidly losing ground, and its place is now altogether supplied by voluntary enlistment.

Incident, The (1641), is a name given to a supposed plot to assessinate the Earls of Hamilton, Argyle, and Lanark, during the visit of Charles I, to Scotland in the summer of 1641. Although a parliamentary inquiry was instituted, the circumstances still remain shrouded in mystery; and it is scarce possible to do more than guess at the real nature of the affair. It is said that the scheme was Montrose's, and that Charles I, himself was privy to it; but there seems to be no foundation for the statement.

Income Tax. The history of the income tax as a recognised means of supplementin the other financial resources of the State, dates from the time of William Pitt's premierahip, when (in 1799) a bill was passed imposing a graduated tax on all incomes above £60 a year. This tax continued to be levied till the end of the Continental war, with the exception of the treak for part of the years 1802 and the time of the years 1802 and the time of 10 per cent. It was not renew after 1815 till the time of Sir Robert Peel's second administration (1841), when it was levied for three years at a rate of sevenpence in the pound. Time after time it was then renewed—but always for a limited period only, till at 1853 arrangements were made for its gradual extinction in seven years. Then, however, the Russian War intervened, and instead of being reduced it was doubled. From this time it has become a regular item of the revenue; and it has now almost entirely lost its original character of a special war-tax, though an increase in its rate still remains the readiest means of meeting the expenses of a war. In 1907 differential treatment was applied to earned and uncarned incomes, a lower rate being imposed on the former.

Independents. As early as 1568 a congregation of Separatists existed in London. organised upon the principle that Chincians ought to be gathered together in strictly voluntary and self-governing congregations or Churches. They numbered about two hundred, all poor, and the majority women, ander the pastorate of a certain Richard under the pastorate of a certain Richard Fitz. The first prominent teacher of this theory, however, was Robert Browne, clergyman and graduate of Cambridge, whose greatest activity was during the years from 1571 to 1581. Owing to the protection of his powerful relative, Burleigh, Browne escaped punishment, and finally conformed. But his tracts formed the great storehouse of argument for those who had accepted his doctrine—especially numerous in the eastern counties—and they were long known only as Brownists. Several Separatist churches were formed, especially in London, which met in secret, and were often discovered and dispersed by the authorities; many of their members were imprisoned and five executed. Of these, Henry Barrowe, a barrister of Gray's Inn, executed in 1593 for the publication of seditious books—i.e. pamphlets against the Established Church—was the most important, and for some time "Barrowist" was used as a synonym of Brownist. The repressive measures of the government cansed the members of a Brownist church, which had been formed in London about 1592, to fice to Holland, and they finally settled at Amsterdam. Another and more successful church was that of Nottinghamshire men at Leyden under John Robinson, and this Leyden church is the true "parent of Independency alike in England and America."

The term "Independent" is supposed to have originated in the incidental use of the term in an spology addressed in Latin and English to the British and Continental universities about the year 1604. But the early maintainers of this form of church government were careful to repudiate certain inferences which might be drawn from the use of the word. One of them wrote: "We do profess dependence upon magistrates for civil government and protection; dependence upon Christ and his word for the sovereign government and rule of our administrations; dependence upon the counsel of other churches and synods when our own variance or ignorance may stand in need of such help."

In 1620 the first settlement was made in New England by Independents coming from Holland in the Mayfower; the New World became the refuge of all who were attacked by the ecclesianti al authorities at home, and Independency became practically the estab-lished religion in the New England colonies. The example of New England was of the greatest importance when, with the meeting of the Long Parliament, the Independents at last obtained freedom of speech in England. It is not necessary here to show how the growth of Independency accompanied the victories of the New Model; and how the attempt to substitute the complete Preshyterian system for that of Episcopacy was defeated. Few of the early Independents advocated entire voluntaryism, and many accepted benefices and received tithes under the rule of Cromwell. But in such cases, while the minister preached to all the parishioners in the parish church, there was often an attempt to create, side by side with the parochial organisation, a special Independent Church. Difficulties arose when the Independent ministers refused to administer the sacrament to persons outside this inner church, and one at least of the justices on assize advised aggrieved parishioners to withhold tithes. In 1658 a synod of Independent Churches was held in London which drew up the Savoy Declaration, following in doctrine the Westminster Confession, but adding their peculiar theory of Church government. The Act of Uniformity drove Independents with Presbytcrians out of the National Church, and the rigid penal code of Charles II. prevented their meeting in worship. Later in the reign of Charles II., and under James II., they again began to form churches, and under William III. obtained toleration. But their numbers were much diminished, and it was not till the evangelical movement of the latter half of the sighteenth century that they began to recover strength. As meanwhile the English Presbyterians had lost ground, and had largely become Unitarian, they became in the nine-teenth century one of the most important of the Nonconformist bodies. During the eighteenth century they had long received a regium denum of £1,000 a year for the widows of ministers; but in the nineteenth was wrongfulness of endowment became one of their main tenets. They are now usually known as Congregationalists, and form a "Congregational Union of England and Wales," with subordinate "County Unions."

The best accounts of the history of Independency are—from the side of the Church of England, that of Curteis, in Dissent in its Relation to the Church of England; and from the Congregationalist side that of Fairburn, in his article on Independents in the Encyclopeden Prifannica; see also Stoughton, Religion in England; Gardiner, Hist. Eng.; Masson, Life and Times of Millon; Skeat, History of Free Churches.

India. Anministration. The government of India in this country since the Act of 1858 has been vested in the secretary of state, aided by a council of not less than ten, who are usually selected from men who have served with distinction in various departments of government in that country. This is the agency through which India becomes answerable to Parliament, to the country, and to the king. In India itself the supreme authority is vested in the governorgeneral or viceroy in council (subject to the control of the secretary of state in council in England, and he in his turn is aided by a governor-general's council, corresponding to the cabinet of a constitutional country, and by a legislative council, consisting of the governor-general's council, reinforced by certain provincial delegates and nominated members of the non-official native and European communities. Besides these members the India Councils Bill of 1909 also provides that there shall be elected members to complete the legislative council. For administrative purposes, India is divided into nine Provinces: Madras and Bombay (also styled Presidencies) being ruled by governors: Bengal, Eastern Bengal and Assam, the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, the Punjaub, and Burms are ruled by lieutenant-governors; the Central Provinces and the North-Western Frontier Province are ruled by chief commissioners. The governors of Madras end Bombay are appointed by the orown; the lieutenant-governors are appointed by the governor-general, with the approval of the crown; the chief commissioners by the governor-general in council. The India Councils Aot (1909) provides for the enlargement of the provincial legislative councils and the election of a certain proportion of their members by popular vote; the Act also authorises the councils to discuss annual financial statements and matters of general public interest, and gives power to ask questions.

Theoretically, the governor-general is supreme over every part of India, but practically his anthority is not everywhere exercised alike. Each province is usually broken into divisions under commissioners; these divisions are again separated into districts which form the units of administration. At the head of each district is one officer—usually styled collector or deputy-commissioner—whose principal duties are executive, magisterial and fiscal.

All over India are scattered native states of varying extent and independence. Many of these native principalities are attached to the various presidencies and provinces; others are grouped together under the superintendence of a political agent. Of this class are the Rajputana and Central Indian agencies; and others, such as Hyderabad or the Niam's territories, Mysore, and Travancore, are quasi-independent. To define, however, the relations of the Indian native states to the History. The history of the British connection with India dates from the days when Vasco da Gama made his memorable voyage round the Cape, and sighted the shores of Hindostan, on May 17, 1498. Indian products commenced to find their way to Europe first through the hands of the Portuguese, and then through the Venetians, who carried on their Eastern trade by way of Egypt and the Red Sea, thus anticipating the important route of modern times. But it was nearly a century after Da Gama's voyage that our first trading voyages were made, and it was in the last year of the sixteenth century that these commercial enterprises were organised on a recognised basis. On Sept. 22, 1599, the merchants of London held a meeting, at which it was resolved to form an association for the purpose of trading with India, and on Dec. 31 of the following year, a charter was granted to "the Governor and Company of the Merchants trading unto the East Indies," entitling them to exclusive trade with the countries between the Cape of Good Hope and the Straits of Magellan. The first vessels despatched returned home with cargoes of cinnamon, cloves, and pepper, and realised 95 per cent. profit on the capital invested. It was soon evident that the English would have to defend themselves against the jealousy of the Portuguese and Dutch, and a new charter was granted, with stringent provisions against "interlopers." In 1612 Captain Best, in command of a small squadron, was attacked in the roadstead of Surat by a vastly superior Portuguese fleet, but defended himself with such gallantry and effect that he was not only able to and all his goods at the Surat factory, but obtained a confirmation of a commercial treaty between the Mogul Emperor and the British.

During the following years subordinate agencies were started at Gogra, Ahmedabad, Cambay, and Ajmere, and at various places in the Indian archipelago. This led to numerous broils with the Portuguese and Dutch, and our relations with the latter were greatly embittered by the cruel torture and execution of Captain Towerson and about twenty sailors, at Amboyns, in 1623. For this outrage the Dutch had to pay £3,615 as compensation; but from that date until the great naval wars, which commenced in 1793, they became supreme in those parts, and practically monopolized the trade of the Indian archipelago. In 1634 the Company obtained a firman from the Great Mogul for permission to trade in Bengal, and the same year saw the expulsion of the Portuguese from the province. Five years later Fort St. George, or Madras, was founded by Francis Day; and in 1661 Bombay was ceded to the British rown as part of the dowry of Catherine of Bragansa, and was subsequently transferred by Charles II. to the East India Company. The separation of Bengal from Madras, and the appointment of Mr. Hodges as "agent and governor" of the Company's affairs, with and governor of the company and acceptable guard, was the first beginning out of which arose the appointment of Sir John Child as the first titular governorgeneral of India, with full power to make war or peace. A few years later the famous resolution was passed by the company which was destined to turn their clerks and factors throughout India into conquerors and proconsuls, and which ran thus: "The increase of our revenue is the subject of our care, as much as our trade; 'tis that must maintain our force when twenty acccidents may inter-rupt our trade; 'tis that must make us a nation in India. Without that, we are but a great number of interlopers, united by his Majesty's royal charter, fit only to trade where nobody of power thinks it their interest to prevent us. And upon this account it is that the wise Dutch, in all their general advices that we have seen, write ten paragraphs concerning their government, their civil and military policy, warfare, and the increase of their revenue, for one paragraph they write concerning trade."

Our earliest territorial possession in India properly so-called was Madras, which, as mentioned above, was founded by Day and purchased from the Rajah of Chandragiri, an annual rent of about £500 being duly paid to the representatives of the Mogul Empire. On the death of Aurungzebe, in 1707, Southern India broke up into a number of minor states. In 1744, war broke out between the French and English, Dnpleix being at that time Governor of Pon-licherry, and Clive a young writer at Madras; and two years later Madras surrendered to a French squadron, under La Bourdonnais. Indecisive hostilities followed, but the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, restored Madras to the English. Their first successes had, however, inspired Dupleix with the ambition of founding a French empire in India, under the shadow of the Mohammedan powers. At Hyderabad and Arcot the successions were in dispute, and the English and French favoured the claims of rival candidates to the throne of Arcot. A war ensued, the chief incident of which was the capture and subsequent defence of Arcot in 1751 by Clive. For some years it continued, and culminated in 1760 in a final struggle, which was crowned by the decisive victory obtained by Colonel (afterwards Sir Eyre) Coote at Wandewsch over the French. Pondicherry and Ginjee subsequently capitulated, and the French were expelled from Hindostan.

To turn to the course of events in Bengal, in 1740 Ali Vardi Khan, a usurper, but the last of the great Nawabs of Bengal, ruled ever Bengal, and in his days the Mahratta horsemen began to ravage up to the walls of Calcutta. The "Mahratta ditch," constructed to keep them off, still bears the old name. Ali Vardi Khan's grandson, Surajah Dowlah, a youth of ferocious temper, marched on Calcutta with a large army in pursuit of an escaped kinsman who had aggrieved him, and thrust the remnant of the English who failed to fly at his approach into the "Black Hole." er military prison of Fort William. Out of 146 who were imprisoned therein during that fatal night in June, only twenty-three survived. Clive and Admiral Watson promptly sailed from Madras to the Ganges, and the speedy recovery of Calentta with hut little fighting induced the Nawah to conclude a peace advantageous to the Company. But the outhreak of hostilities between the English and French found Surajah Dowlah ranged on the side of the latter. force far inferior to that of his adversary, Clive marched out to the grove of Plassey, and there hy dint of a daring attack on an angle of the camp, routed the Nawah's host (1757). Meer Jaffier, Clive's nominee, was placed on the viceregal throne at Moorsheda-bad, and enormous sums, aggregating many millions, were exacted as the price of this honour. The same year the Nawah made a grant to the Company of the landholders' rights over the district of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, an extensive tract around Calcutta amounting to 882 square miles.

In 1758 Clive was appointed the first governor of all the Company's settlements in Bengal, and defeated the Shahzada, or imperial prince, who with the aid of the Nawah Vizier of Oude, was marching on the lower provinces of Bengal. He next despatched a force under Colonel Forde to Madras, and Snally crushed French influence throughout the Nizam's territories. The return of Clive to England was followed by the dethronement of Meer Jaffier, and the substitution of Meer Cossim, his son-in-law, in his place. The new ruler, however, began to show signs of wishing to become independent, and having retired to Monghyr, proceeded to organise his army after the European fashion, and to ally himself with the Vizier of Oude. The trade privileges arrogated to themselves by the Company's servants formed a substantial grievance, and when the majority of the council at Calcutta (in spite of the wish of Mr. Vansittart, the governor, and Warren Hastings, a junior member of the council, to make some concession) refused to listen to the Nawab, the officers of the latter fired upon an English boat, and war arose. A massacre of Englishmen and Sepoys took place at Patna; and though checked by two defeats hy Major Adams, the Vizier of Oude and Shah Allum, who had succeeded as emperor, threatened Patna. It was at this juncture that the first Sepoy mutiny, quelled eventually by Major Munro, broke out in the English camp. The battle of Buxar, won hy the same officer in 1764, brought the ruler of Oude and the Mogul emperor to the feet of the British.

The following year Clive (now Baron Clive of Plassey, and for the second time Governor of Bengal) proceeded to Allahabad, and restored Oude to the Nawab Vizier on payment of half a million sterling. The dewannee, or fiscal administration of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and the territorial jurisdiction of the Northern Circars were granted to the Company, a puppet Nawab was maintained hy us on an allowance at Moorshedabad, and a tribute paid to the emperor. Thus the English received the revenue and maintained the army, and the criminal jurisdiction was vested in the Nawab. A great reform was carried out hy Chve in the reorganisation of the Company's service, their paltry salaries having led to much bribery and venality. Private trade and the acceptance of presents were prohibited for the future, while salaries were increased out of the salt monopoly.

Lord Clive left India for the last time in 1767. Five years later War-Hastings assumed the governorship, the in ... val having been marked hy a disastrous famine (1770), which is believed to have carried off one-third of the inhabitants Warren Hastings abolished the dual system of government, removed the exchequer from Moorshedabad to Calcutta. and appointed Euglish collectors to see to the collection of the revenues and the administration of justice. He also created the nucleus of a police. He was, however, much thwarted in his reforms by the wars forced on him hy native princes, by the incessant pressure from home for money, and the coustant opposition of his colleague in council, Philip Francis. Hastings reduced the large allow-ance paid to the Nawah; he resold to the Vizier of Oude the provinces of Allahabad and Kora, formerly assigned by Clive to the Emperor Shah Allum, but forfeited, as Hastings contended, hy the seizure of the emperor hy the Mahrattas, and withheld the tribute of £300,000 from the puppet emperor. British troops were also lent to the Vizier of Oude to enable him to put down the Rohilla Afghans, who had settled down in his dominions since Ahmed Shah's invasion (1761), and borne themselves with much arrogance aud oppression. Warren Hastings also improved the financial position of the Company hy the so-called plunder of Cheyte Singh and the Begum of Oude, transactions which, coupled with other alleged acts of oppression, formed the ground of the celebrated impeachment against him in the House of Lords, proceedings which dragged on their length for seven years, and eventually terminated in a verdict of not guilty. Warren Hastings was practically ruined by the cost of the defence, and

The Bombay government, being desirous of seeing a nominee of its own on the throne of Poonah, concluded in 1775 the Treaty of Surat, by which Ragunath Rao agreed to cede Sulsette and Bassein in consideration of being recognised as the sovereign. Hastings disapproved of the treaty, but on the outbreak of the war (known as the first Mahratta War) despatched energetic officers across the peninsula, who conquered Guzerat, and captured the rock fortress of Gwalior. The reverse sustained by the Bombay force, however equalised matters, and the Treaty of Salbai practically restored the status quo. Meantime Hyder Ali of Mysore, whose hostility had been roused, fell upon the British possessions in the Carnatic, and his cavalry ravaged the country up to Madras. The aged Sir Eyre Coote, the victor of Wandewash, with the aid of Colonel Pearse, hastemed to the scene, but the contest was a tough one, and the peace concluded with Tippoo, Hyder's son and successor, was based on a mutual restitution of all conquests.

In 1786 Hastings was succeeded by Lord Cornwallis as Governor-General. His administration was signalised by two eventsthe introduction of the Permanent Settlement into Bengal, and the second Mysore War. The permanent settlement of the land revenue of Bengal appears to have recommended itself to the Court of Directors at home mainly from a desire to place their finances on a more assured basis. This assessment began in 1789 and terminated in 1791, and though at first intended to be decennial, was made permanent in 1793, a step which practically inflicted enormous loss on the Indian government by fixing in perpetuum at a low standard that tax which, according to all economic principles, should be proportioned to the increasing value of the land.

The second Mysore War of 1790-92 was undertaken by Lord Cornwallis in person at the head of the British army, the Nizam of the Deccan and the Mahratta confederacy being allied to the British. It resulted in the partition of half of Tippoo's dominions among the allies, and the payment of three millions sterling as indemnity

Lord Mornington, better known as the Marquis of Wellesley, laid down during his rule the guiding principle that the English must be the one paramonnt power in India, and the gradual development of this policy culminated in the proclamation of Queen Victoria as Empress of India on the first of January, 1877. The presence of French battalions in the native states, and French intriguers in the islands of Mauritius and Bourbon, as well as in Hindostan itself, suggested to Lord Wellcaley the idea of frustrating all possibility of a French invasion of India by crushing their hopes there. The Mogul empire was quito broken up, so the tusk of establishing our supremacy in northern India was at first easy. By the Treaty of Lucknow a large tract of territory was ceded to us by the Nawab Vizier of Oude, in lieu of a subsidy for British troops, and we thus became territorial rulers as far as the heart of the North-West Province. became corrioral rulers as far as the neart or the North-West Provinces. Beyond was the confederacy of the Mahrattas, with the puppet emperor in their hands, and farther to the south the Nizam of Hyderabad, and the defeated, but not subdued, Tippoo Sultan of Mysore. The Nizam was easily dealt with; his Franch bettellion at Hyderabad was dishis French battalion at Hyderabad was disbanded, and the Nizam bound by treaty not to take any European into his service without the consent of the English government, a clause of universal application nowadays in the treaties with native ctates. Tippoo's turn came next, and on his refusal to abandon his intrigues, and throw in his lot loyally with the British, war was declared. The decision event was the capture of Tippoo's stronghold, Seringapatam, where Tippoo died bravely fighting in the breach (May 4, 1799). The victory created a profound impression on the natives, and earned General Harris a peerage, and Wellesley a marquisate. Tippoo's do-minions were partially partitioned among the Nizams, the Mahrattas, and the English, and the central portion (Mysore) erected into a separate state, under a descendant of the Hindoo Rajahs, whom Hyder Ali had dethroned. The sons of Tippoo were treated with high consideration.

The Mahrattas, however, still held aloof, and Wellesley addressed himself to the task of bringing them into the net of his subsidiary system. The Peishwaof Poonah, the recognised head of the confederacy, after being defeated by Holkar, was induced to sign a treaty with the British, greatly extending our influence in the Bombay Presidency. This led to the second Mahratta War (1802—4), one of the most noteworthy of our campaigns in the East. Sir Arthur Wellesley (afterwards Lord) of Wellington) and General (afterwards Lord) Lake led the armies, and the former in the Deccan soon won the battles of Assaye and Argaum, and captured Ahmednugger. Lord Lake in Hindostan fought with equal courage and success, winning the battles of Aligurh and Laswaree, and capturing Delhi and Agra. Scindiah's French troops were dispersed, and he himself ceded all territory north of the Jumna to the British, while the old emperor, Shah Allum, came once more under our pro-tection. Orism fell under our rule, and Berar was handed over to the Nizam. The latter years of Lord Wellesley's rule were marked by reverses, including the repulse of Lake before Bhurtpore; but, nevertheless, the result of the administration was to add the North-West Provinces to our dominions, to reduce the Peishwa, and constitute the Madrae Presidency pretty much as it is at present.

Lord Wellesley's successor was Lord Cornwallis, now an old man, whose policy during his second and short tenure of office was to practise, economy and relieve the financial pressure caused by prolonged military opera-tions. The same policy was followed by Sir G. Barlow (1805), but on Lord Minto's arrival (1807) more resolute counsels prevailed, and though enjoined to abstain from drawing the sword, he managed to consolidate Wellesley's conquests. The islands of Mauritius and Java were occupied by us, and friendly missions were despatched to the Punjaub, Afghanistan, and Persia. Lord Moira, afterwards Marquis Hastings, was in power for nine years (1814-23), during which period two important wars were waged against the Goorkha mountaineers, or inhabitants of Nepaul, and against the Pindarries and Mahrattas. The first campaign against the fermer, waged in an unhealthy and difficult country, was unsuccessful; but in the cold weather of 1814 General Ochterlony compelled the Nepaulese to sue for peace, and in the following year, after a brilliant march from Patna, forcibly imposed his terms on them within a few miles of Khatmandoo, the

In the meantime Central India was being overrun by the Pindarries, a mixed nationality of plundering bands, which appeared to have sprung out of the dibris of the Mogul empire, and which were supported by the sympathy of the Mahratta chiefs. Hastings collected an enormous army, numbering 120,000 men, and effectually crushed them (1817), but this success was coincident with the rising of the three great Mahratta powers at Poonah, Nagpore, and Indore. Elphinstone, our Resident at the court of the Peishwa, having withdrawn to Kirkee, was attacked by that ruler, but managed to repulse the onslaught. Holkar's army was defeated the following month at the battle of Mehidpore, and the fugitives having been followed up and dispersed, a pacification was established, in which Sir John Malcolm was one of the chief actors. The territory of the Peishwa was annexed to the Bombay Presidency, and he himself pensioned.

Lord Amherst's administration from 1823 to 1828 was signalised by the first Burmese War; operations rendered necessary by the aggressions of the King of Ava. The Burniese were in no way formidable in themselves, but the unhealthy character of the country lost us about 20,000 lives and £14,000,000 during the two years of hostilities. The Treaty of Yandaboo ceded the provinces of Aracan and Tenasserim to the British, the king retaining the valley of the Irrawaddy. Another important event was the capture of Bhurtpore, which had baffled the army of Lord Lake in 1805, and which, protected by its impene-trable massive mud walls, was regarded as impregnable.

The history of the British as benevolent administrators ruling with a single eye to the good of the natives may be said to have begun with Lord William Bentinck. He restored equilibrium to the budget, crippled by the Burmese War, by various important financial measures, and abolished suttee, or widowburning, and the thugs, or hereditary assassine, two institutions which had shockingly corrupted the social system of the Hindoos. It is scarcely surprising to any student of Indian history to find that even such detestable practices as these found supporters among Europeans as well as natives. In 1833 the East India Company's charter was renewed for twenty years, but on condition the Company should abendon its trade and permit Europeans to settle in the country. [East India Company.] Other events of Lord William Bentinck's administration were the appointment of a commission to codify the law, the placing of the native state of Mysore under British rule (1830), and the annexation of Coorg, with the full consent of the inhabitants.

After a brief interregnum, during which Sir Charles (afterwards Lord) Metcalfe, the senior member of council, held the vice-royalty, Lord Auckland (1836—42) began his with which is considered. rule, which is conspicuous for the memorable Afghan War, the outcome of an ill-advised resolution on the part of the British to place on the Afghan throne Shah Soojah as one who would prove a subservient tool in the repression of French and Russian influence in Asia. For fuller details of all these events. which led to the disastrous retreat from Cabul see Arghan Wars (1). The news reached Calcutta just before Lord Ellenborough's accession, and the retributive expedition of Pollock took place the same year. The following year saw the conquest of the Ameers of Scinde by Sir Charles Napier, whose defeat of 20,000 Beloochees with only 3,000 British at Meanee, is one of the most brilliant feats in Anglo-Indian history. In 1844 Lord Ellen-borough was realled and succeeded by Sir Henry (afterwar as Lord) Hardinge, whose arrival was followed, at no long interval, by the SikhWar, a contingency which had been foreseen by most ever since the death of Runject Singh, the capable and energetic founder of the Sikh kingdom. It was in 1845 that Sir Hugh Gough advanced to confront the Sikh army, numbering 60,000 men, with 150 guns. The battles of Moodkee, Ferozeshar, Aliwal, and Sobraon followed in quick succession, and the country was at the feet of the British. Dhuleep Singh, the infant son of Runjeet, was recognised as Rajah; a British Resident, supported by a British force, was sent to the Punjaub.

Probably, however, the most important results ensued from the administration of Lord Dalhousie (1848-56). Though sincerely desirous of peace, and of advancing the moral and material condition of the country. Dalevolent housie found himself compelled to fight two wars and to annex extensive territory in the Punjaub, Burmah, as well as Nagpore, Oude, and other minor states. At the same time he founded the Public Works Department with a view to creating the network of roads and canals now covering India. He opened the Ganges Canal, the largest irrigation work in India, and turned the sod of the first railway. He promoted steam communication with England via the Red Sea, and introduced cheap postage and the electric telegraph. The second Sikh War (1848—49) was marked by the disas-ter of Chilianwallah, but before reinforcements from England arrived, Mooltan fell; and Lord Gough well nigh destroyed the Sikh army at the battle of Gujerat. The Punjaub became a British province, and thanks mainly to the successful labours of the two Lawrences and Colenel (afterwards Lord) Napier, became so contented and prosperous that the Indian Mutiny failed to turn its populace into rebels. The second Burnese War in 1852 arose out of the ill treatment of some merchants at Rangoon, and resulted in the annexation of the valley of the Irrawaddy, under the name of the province of Pegu, since which time British Burmah has made the most astonishing strides in material development. full statistics we must refer our readers to the Provincial Administration Reports, which hear witness to a more rapid national progress than any other part of India can boast of. Lord Dalhousie annexed several native states, including Nagpore and Sattara, on the principle that the governors exist only for the good of the governed, and that persistent misrule cannot justify the paramount power in assenting to the continuance of the same. Oude was annexed after repeated warnings issued to the Nawabs, whose degraded rule had caused great suffering to the inhabitants. It was his last action of importance, for in March, 1856, the marquis returned home and was succeeded by Lord Canning.

The leading events of the Indian Mutiny which followed, will be found under the article so headed. The details have been excellently told by Sir John Kaye, while the share borne by Lord Lawrence is narrated in Mr. Bosworth Smith's Life of him. The causes of this great convulsion are still obscure, but may be probably traced to the excitable feelings of a fanatical though subject race alarmed by the sight of important annexations, such as those which have inevitably accompanied the development of the British power. The outbreak at Meerut occurred on May 10, 1857, and the mutinous Sepoys hastened to Delhi, which thus became the centre and rallying point of the rebellion. Under Lawrence's strong hand the Punjaub was enabled not only to hold its own, but also to send relays of troops to Delhi, which, though hold by 30,000 mutineers, was closely invested, and eventually captured by our troops numbering only one-fourth of their opponents. At Cawnpore the Europeans shut themselves up in a wretched entrenchment, whence they emerged, after nineteen days' siege, only to fall victims to the abominable treachery and cruelty of the infamous Nana Sahib. In Lucknow, the third town round which the events of the Mutiny group themselves, Sir H. Lawrence fortified and provisioned the Residency, and with a weak British regiment kept off the besieging rebels till relieved first by Havelock, and finally by Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde. The people of Oude and Rohilkhund, who had risen so masse, were next attacked and vanquished by Colin Campbell, while in Central India Sir Hugh Rose (afterwards Lord Strathnairn) conducted an equally successful campaign against the Rance, or Frincess, of Jhansi, and Tantia Topee [Indian Mutiny.]

This mutiny led to the extinction of the East India Company, for it was felt that the administration of India was now a national matter [EAST INDIA COMPANY]; and an Act was passed, to give effect to the assumption of the government by the crown (1858). The royal proclamation announcing this event took place at a grand durbar held by Lord Canning on Nov. 1, 1858, and on July 8 following peace was proclaimed. The cost of suppressing the Mutiny had, however, been so serious that Mr. James Wilson, a distinguished financier, was sent out to Calcutta to equalise the budget. He re-organised the customs, imposed an income-tax and licence duty, and created a state paper currency; and, though he died before completing his labours, what he accomplished bore excellent fruit.

Lord Elgin's short rule (1862—63) was succeeded by that of Sir John Lawrence, who saw the Bhotan War and the ensuing annexation of the Duars, and the lamentable Orissa Famine of 1866. The same year was marked by a serious commercial crisis, which injured the rising tea industry in Bengal, and caused widespread ruin in Bombay. Sir John Lawrence returned in 1869, having passed through every grade of Indian service, from an assistant magistrate to the viceroyalty, and, on retirement, was fitly rewarded with a peerage.

Lord Mayo's too brief tenure of office was occupied with several useful measures, among which the creation of an agricultural department, and of a system of provincial finance, stand out conspicuously. He led the way to the reform of the salt duties, and developed the material resources of the country by roads, railways, and canals. His death at the hand of an assassin in the Andaman Islands (1872) was a cruel interruption to a career of usefulness. Lord Northbrook, his successor (1872—76), had to contend with a famine in Lower Bengal, which was successfully grappled with by an organisation of state relief. In the coid season of 1875-76 the Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward VII.) made a tour through the country, and was greeted with an outhurst of loyalty. It was during the viceroyalty of Lord Lytton (1876-80) that the proclamation of the Queen as Empress of India (Jun. 1, 1877) gave opportunity for a durbar of unusual pomp, held on the ridge above Delhi. This scene of rejoicing was followed by a disastrous famine, which prevailed throughout the Deccan end other parts of the Madras end Bombay Presi-dencies, end which, despite the best efforts of the government, resulted in a loss of over five million lives.

The Afghan War of 1878 led to the temporary occupation of Cabul and Candahar hy the English [Archan Wars (2)]. The ep-pointment of the Marquis of Ripon in the place of Lord Lytton in 1880, was followed by the evacuation of Candehar and other Afghan positions, though it has been clearly proved that the former measure had been fully determined on by Lord Lytton previous to his resignation. Lord Ripon's measures his resignation. Lord Ripon's measures included a large extension of Lord Mayo's system of provincialising the finances, which has been attended with the happiest resulte; a scheme for the enlargement of native selfgovernment, varied according to the requirements of the different provinces; and a law, known as the Ilbert Act, which has removed one of the disabilities under which native civilians laboured in regard to their powers of trying Europeans. Regarding this Act, controversy has been too fierce to enable us to discuss it; it must be left to the judgment of posterity.

In 1884 a commission was appointed, and the north-western frontier of Afghanistan delimited. An outbreak in Chitral in 1895 necessitated a large military expedition to relieve the garrison, and two years later a large number of troops was despatched to quell the rising of the tribes along the whole border from Chitral to Baluchistan. A plague broke out in 1896, and has been more or less severe ever since. In 1897 an earthquake devastated Assam, and in the same year a famine affected an area of about 570,000 square miles with a population of 130,000,000. In 1900 occurred another famine, affecting tracts containing a population of 85 millions: and et one time over six millions were in receipt of relief. A number of representative Indian princes and chiefs, with a large contingent of native troops, came to England in 1902 to attend the coronation of King Edward. A great imperial durbar was held on Jan. 1, 1903, to celebrate the coronation of the first British Emperor of India, and a grand review of all the troops at Delhi, British and native, brought the series of durbar pageants to a ciose on Jan. 8.

In 1905 a severe earthquake occurred in Northern India, causing great loss of life and damage to property. During the winter of 1905-6 the Prince and Princes of Walce made an extensive tour through India. By the partition of Bengal-effected in 1905, reconstituting the provinces of Bengal and Assam—the Bengali-speaking population found themselves divided into two provinces under separate governments. Considerable opposition to this division was manifested hy the Bengali, and meetings were held in: favour of boycotting British goods. In 1908 the unrest assumed such a violent character that the laws relating to the Press and to explosives were very considerably strengthened, and special prosecutions under these laws were carried out in 1909,

Indian Mutiny, THE (1857-58). The causes of the Indian Mutiny are difficult to estimate, hut it may be safely asserted that it was to a large extent due to the very rapid progress which European civilimation had of late years been making in Hindostan, a civilisation which threatened to swallow or assimilate all the native institutions of the country. Under Lord Dalhousie (1818-56) the Punjaub and Oude had been annexed, and it might well seem to an Indian mind that the English were bent on entirely subduing the whole of Hindostan, regardless of the dictates of faith or justice. About the same time a rumour was in circulation which limited By the term of English rule to one hundred years from the date of the battle of Plassey (1757). The Sepoy troops had learnt to know their own worth, and having fought battles and won victories under English generalship, conceived that their success was solely due to their own valour, and fancied that they held erable ifested the destiny of India in their own hands. Added to this, in the deposed King of Delhi, Bahadur Shah, there was an ever-festering canker of rebellion and centre of disaffection which was just now rendered more dangerous than ever by Lord Dalhousie's threat of removing the Mogul's family from its old seat at Delhi. Finally, to set in flame all the smouldering ashes of discontent, there came the story that the cartridges of the new Enfield rifles which were just then being introduced among the uative troops were greased with the fat of beef or pork, and were thus rendered unclean for Mohammedan and Hindoo alike. The rebellion broke out with the incendiary fires at Barrackpore in January, 1857. The Sepoya lieson : here conceived that the new cartridges were being distributed with the sole object of being distributed with the sole object or destroying their caste, and on Feb. 25 they broke into open mutiny. Though they were restrained from violence and disbanded, these men carried the evil report through Oude and Bundelkhund, inflaming the minds of the people. On May 16 a proclamation was issued by Lord Canning, denying these reports and warning the needle against them. reports and warning the people against them. On May 10 the mutiny broke out at Meerut, being preceded by incendiary fires. The 11th and 20th Regiments of Native Infantry and the 3rd Cavalry rose, massacred their officers, and marched off to Delhi. The people of that city rose at once and butchered the Europeans. The 38th, 54th, and 74th caught the infection, shot their officers, and marching into the city, saluted the king. Meanwhile Nana Sahib was proceeding through Oude and the North-West Provinces fanning the flame. In Oude the mistakes of Mr. Jackson had made the government unpopular, and Sir Henry Lawrence, the new commissioner, was unable to remove the impression. In May, risings took place at Ferozepore, at Lahore, and Peshawur, but were put down with severity by Sir John Lawrence and his subordinates, who armed the Sikhs, and with their help reduced the Sepoys. The Punjanb thus remained faithful, and Lawrence was able to send a strong body of Sikhs to aid in the siege of Delhi. On the 17th the commander-in-chief prepared to advance on Delhi, and on June 10, Sir Henry Barnard, his control of the commander of the commande ention ostan, Barnard, his successor, advanced to within four miles of Delhi, where he was joined by Brigadier Archdale Wilson from Meerut.

Meanwhile, all through Oude, the Doab, and Bundelkhund, the rebellion broke out accompanied by massacres. In Rajpootana and Malwa the native princes for the most part remained faithful, but Scindiah's and Holkar's body-guards mutinied, and the widowed Rance of Jhansi headed an outbreak in her annexed principality. At Cawnpore the mutiny broke out, under Nana Sahib, June 5, and ended in a ghastly massacre. At Lucknow the foresight of Sir Henry Lawrence enabled the English garrison to hold ont against the rebels till relieved by Outram. But the great point of anxiety was Delhi, where all the mutinied Sepoy regiments were assembling in a final effort to restore the ancient dynasty of the Moguls. On June 8 Sir Henry Barnard invested Delhi, and on June 13 an unsuccessful attempt was made to capture the city by blowing the gates open. The besiegers were exposed to rear attacks from mutinied fegiments who kept arriving. The energy of Lawrence, however, now made itself felt; new Sikh levies came pouring in, bringing supplies, stores, money, and all necessaries. On July 17, owing to the death of Sir H. Barnard, Archdale Wilson took the command; on Sept. 6 a heavy siege-train arrived, and on the 20th, after a severe struggle, Delhi was won [Delhi, Siege or, 1857]. Meanwhile Havelock had marched into Cawnpore (July 17), after defeating the Nana, but only to find the prisoners massacred as at Jhansi. Leaving Neill to punish the rebels, he endeavoured to advance to the relief of Lucknow, but was compelled to retire, Aug. 13. On Sept. 16, however, a reschild on Lucknow and on the grand army marched on Lucknow, and on the 24th Havelock and Outram entered the besieged Residency with their reinforcements.

On Sept. 10 Brigadier Greathed, by a forced march, surprised the mutinous troops from Rajpootana and Agra and routed them, scattering them in a disorderly flight. Similar successes were obtained in Malwa, Berar, and elsewhere, and these were crowned in No-vember by the final relief of Lucknow, achieved by Sir Colin Campbell (Nov., 1857), who had arrived in India as commander-inchief in August. Meanwhile the Gwalior Contingent, under Tantia Topee, had advanced on Campore, and driven General Windham into his entrenchments, and it was only by a hurried march that Campbell could come to his assistance before the bridge over the Ganges was broken down. By the end of the year 1857 the rebellion in Bengal had been to a great extent stamped out, and the future war was restricted to Oude, Rohilkhund, parts of Bundelkhund, and Central India. In Dacca, Mhow, In-dore, Ferruckabad, and elsewhere, order had been restored; Outram was holding his own against the garrison of Lucknow, and Saugor, faithful to the last, would serve as a centre for operations in Central India. At the beginning of the year (1858) Mahomed Baha-dur Shah, the last of the Mogula, being convicted of treason and murder, was transported to Burmah. 'During January and February Sir Colin Campbell occupied himself with clearing Oude and Rohilkhund. In March he made for Lucknow, and after a severe struggle wrested the city from the enemy's hands. On May 6, Sir Colin Campbell succeeded in crushing the revolt in Rohilkhund, but the rebel leaders and many of their followers escaped. Meanwhile, the Bombay division, under Sir Hugh Rose, had advanced steadily into Central India to the relief of Saugor, and soon defeated the rebels at the pass of Muddunpore. General Roberts and Whitlock were marching triumphantly through Malwa and Bundelkhund; on April 1 Sir H. Rose defeated Tantia Topee, who was marching on Jhansi, and two days later he stormed and took the fort of Jhansi. On May 7 he attacked and routed the united armies of Tantin Topee and the Rance of Jhansi, and on May 23, after a severe struggle, he assaulted and captured the strong fort of Kalpy. Tantia Topee now proceeded to Gwalior and organised an insurrection against the authority of Scindish; but on June 17 Sir Hugh encountered and defeated the rebel force outside Gwalior, and on the 18th stormed and captured the city. Brigadier Napier pursued the enemy, and ronted them again at Alipore, thus ending the campaign. General Roberts had meanwhile stormed and taken Kotah, and the rebellion was now practically at an ond, and the time come for vengeance and reconciliation. It was undonbtedly the splendid organisation of the Punjaub under Sir John Lawrence that contributed mainly to the ultimate success of the English arms; and had this district shared in the revolt instead of, thanks to the firmness of its ruler, sending assistance to the English forces before Delhi, it is difficult to see where the disasters would have stopped. But Sir John Lawrence, from the very commencement bridled the mutinous Sepoys in the Punjaub with a stern hand, and the Sikhs were only too grateful for the blessings of English rule to rise against their benefactors. The most important political result of the Indian Mutiny was the transferrence of the entire administration of Hindostan from the East India Company (q.v.) to the crown. [INDIA.]

Indulgence, THE DECLARATION OF (1687), is the name given to the proclamation of James II., by which he declared that "as he would not force the conscience of any man himself, so neither would he allow any man to force the conscience of another." By this he hoped to show favour to the Roman Catholics without offending his Protestant subjects, whom he promised to keep in full possession of all the Church estates they had acquired at the Reformation. In order to diaguise, at all events in some degree, that the real objects of this indulgence were the Papists, he promised full freedom of worship at the same time to moderate Presbyterians and Quakers. All the penal laws against the Roman Catholics were suspended, and the king declared himself resolved for the future to employ the best men in his service irrespective of their creed (Feb. and June, 1687). In April next year, James ordered this declaration to be republished, and sent an order to the bishops that they should bid the clergy of their several dioceses read it from their pulpits after divine service, on the Sundaya, May 20th and 27th. It was their refusal to do this that led to the trial of the Seven Bishops.

Indulph, King of Alban (s. 964, d. 962), was the son of Constantine. It was in his reign, according to the Pictish Chronicle, that Dunedin or Edinburgh was surrendered to the Scots by the English—a surrender which, Mr. Skene thinks, implied the district between the Esk and the Avon. Indulph's reign is further noteworthy for the descent of the Norwegian pirates. He is said, secording to one account, to have been slain in battle with the invaders, but, according to another, he died at St. Andrews. Probably he retired to a monastery, and entrusted his kingdom to Dubh the son of Malcolm, who was his luwful successor on the tanistic principle.

Ine, or Ina, King of Wessex (688-726), was descended from Cerdic through Cuthwine, and succeeded to the throne on the abdication of Ceadwalla. He was one of the greatest of the West Saxon kings, and succeeded in reducing Kent, Sussex, and East Anglia to obedience. He also fought many battles against the Britons or Welsh, and extended the West Saxon kingdom beyond the Parret, building the fortress of Taunton to protect his new frontier. We find him fighting against the Welsh of Glamorgan, and against Ceolred the Mercian king, with whom he fought a drawn battle at Wanborough. The latter part of his reign, however, does not seem to have been so prosperous. His wars with the Britons were less successful than before, and he was tronbled by rebellions of members of the royal house, the leader of whom was Aldbert, who was eventually defeated and alain by Inc. Inc himself resigned the crown in 725, and went to Rome, where he soon died. He was great, not only as a warrior, but as a legislator, and made a collection of laws, seventy-six in number, which, with the exception of those of the Kentish kings, are the earliest known to us among the Anglo-Saxons. He likewise divided Wessex into two dioceses, placing the new bishop at Sherborne in Dorsetshire; he moreover founded and endowed several monasteries, and rebuilt and enlarged the abbey of Glastonbury.

Anglo-Saron Chronicle; Bede, Reclericatical History. The Laws of Ine are translated by Mr. Thorp in Ancient Laws and Institutes of the Anglo-Sarons.

Infangtheof was, in Anglo-Saxon times, the right of trying and punishing a thief caught within the limit of the jurisdiction to which the right belonged. It was one of the rights appertaining to a hundred or soken.

Ingoldsby, Sin Richard (d. 1685), closely related to Oliver Cromwell, and served with considerable distinction in the Parliamentary army. He was one of the High Court of Justice appointed to try Charles I., but did not attend any of the sittings, and though his signature appears on the warrant for execution, he declared that he was forced to affix it by violence, his hand being guided by Cromwell. He afterwards took part in the campaign in Ireland; ir :352 he was made a member of the Council of State, in 1654 and 1656 he sat in Cromwell's Parliament, and has made one of the members of the Upper House. He was a great favourite of Richard Cromwell, after whose resignation he was appointed one of the Committee of Safety. He was active in promoting the Restoration, and was in command of the force sent against Lambert after he had escaped from the Tower. He received a pardon from Charles II., and was created a Knight of the Bath in 1660. He sat in the Parliaments of 1661, 1679, and 1680, but took no very prominent part in public affairs.

Ingulphus (d. 1109) was one of the secretaries of William the Conqueror, and subsequently became Abbot of Croyland. To him was attributed a Description of Croyland Abboy, which is now universally considered to be a spurious production of the fourteenth century. It consists of charters, all of which are forgeries, interspersed with historical notices derived from older chroniclers. This work was first published by Sir Henry Savile in his Rerum Anglicarum Scriptorus, and from one MS. of it, which was then existing at Croyland, Sir Henry Spelman extracted the copy of dubious Laws of William the Conqueror given in his Concilia.

Inkermann, The Battle of (Nov. 5, 1854), was fought during the Crimean War. Early on the morning of Nov. 5, 1854, the stussian army, which had lately received large reinforcements, made a sortic from sebastopol. The chief point of attack was the plateau of Inkermann, where the English forces lay, and so dense were the mists that our troops were hardly aware of the enemy's advance till he was close upon them. There was little time for any regular plan of operations on the English side, and they were here at a strong diadvantage compared with the Russians, who had received definite instructions before starting. The result was the engagement became more of a hand-to-hand encounter than a regular battle. At last the French general, Rusquet, who had divined from the first that the attack was destined for the British troops and not against his own, came to their sid, and fell upon the Russians with such fury as to drive them down the slope, and thus decide the battle.

Inquest. Recognition by sworn inquest, i.e., the discovery of matters of fact by inquiry from sworn witnesses, is a custom of very ancient standing in England, and the origin of the civil jury. A process of inquiry by government officers from witnesses from the district concerned, first appears clearly in the capitularies of the Frank kings. To them it possibly came from the regulations of the Theodosian code, which prescribed a special method of investigation by imperial officers in matters touching the fac. From cases in in matters touching the fac. From cases in which the king was concerned, the method was occasionally extended in the Frank empire, but only by special permission, to the suits of churches and private persons. This system was found working by the Norman conquency of northern Grul, and became a part of he verman jurisprudence. But it was still except tal in private suits, and persons who spend it ir own cases to be tried by inquest, to be gain the duke's consent. From harmony it was introduced by the Conqueror into Lugland; the Domesday survey is a gigantic example of its employment to draw up a rate-book of the kingdom the use of the central administration; and several writs of Rufus, Henry I., and Stephen are extant, ordering inquests through men of the county or laundred, to determine the rights of churches. It is the merit of Monry II. to have made what had been "an excep tional favour" are ordinary part of English legal procedure. By the Grant Assise he substituted the more equitable method of inquest in cases concerning land, for trial by battle, which was a Norman innovation, and justly hated in England. The three processes of Darrein Presentment, Mort d'Ancester, and Novel Disseisin provided satisfactory means of settling disputes as to advowsons, and the claims of heirs and dispossessed persons. In the Assize of Arms, recognition by jury was employed to determine the liability of each individual; and, finally, in the Ordinance of the Salada. Tithe inquest by sworn jurers was used for the assessment of taxation. [For later history sec JURY.] In ordinary modern use the word is almost confued to the inquest held by a coroner with regard to a suspicious death. This seems to have been his chief duty as early as Edward I., whose statute De Officie Coronatorio (1276) is the foundation of the law on the subject.

For the history of inquest, as connected with the jury system, see Stubbs, Const. Hist., i. ch. 13, and for a more detailed account, Brunner, Entstehung der Schrungerichte, 1871. For coroner's inquest, Stephen, Hist. Crim. Law, i. 216, and Digest of Crim. Proceed., ch. 7.

[W. J. A.]

Inscriptions, CELTIC, are chiefly confined to a number of rough stone monuments, upon whose edges the inc riptions are cut in characters of a peculiar type, consisting en-tirely of long and short lines. This character is styled Ogam or Ogham. The largest number of these Ogam inscriptions have been found in Ireland—almost exclusively in Munster—but about twenty have also been found in South Wales, one in North Wales, and three in Devonshire and Cornwall. Others occur in Scotland, and especially in Fife, Aberdeenshire, and Sutherland, and some even in the Shetland Islands. Of these the Irish are very imperfectly deciphered, and the Scotch still more so, hut most of the Welsh have been satisfactorily investigated. These are nearly all bi-lingual, and a Latin translation or paraphrese makes the work of interpretation the easier. For though Irish MSS. of the fourteenth century give a systematic account of the character, yet the ravages of time, and the imperfections of the system, make it no easy task to decipher them. It is even doubtful whether some of the Scottish Ogams are of Celtic origin. The date of these inscriptions can only be vaguely ascertained. Probably, most of the Welsh are of about the fifth and sixth centuries; but it seems most likely that the character was invented at a much earlier date, for it is hard to believe that so imperfect an alphabet would have been adopted when the Roman letters were known. It is, indeed, strange, that Ogam should have survived until the ninth or tenth centuries.

It has been conjectured that Ogam is in a way derived from the Phœnician alphabet. A late Irish legend attributes its invention to a mythic Ogma. Professor Rhŷs regards the word as etymologically akin to byµos and agmen, and as a derivative of a root which is used in the senses of "a leading, a line, a row, writing, letters, and ultimately literature, or knowledge."

The historical value of the Ogam inscriptions is entirely indirect. They are nearly all mere sepulchralinscriptions of the name, and perhaps the father's name, of some forgotten chictain. But philologically their interest is very great. Careful comparison shows that the language of these inscriptions is of the Goidelic rather than of the Brythonic type—Irish rather than Welsh. They testify to the presence of Goidels in South Wales and Damnonia, spots from which nearly all traces of them have now vanished, either Irish immigrants, or the survivals of an earlier population driven westward by the Brythons, just as the Brythons themselves were at a later date driven westwards by the English. Thus they have thrown new light on the early ethnology of Britain as well as on the study of Celtic philology. Besides the Ogams, there are other Celtic inscriptions written in the ordinary Latin character, or in that modification of it to which the name of the "Irish alphabet" has been given. But the bulk of the inscriptions of the Britons, centuries after the withdrawal of the Roman legions, were written in Latin.

Inscriptions, Roman. Itoman rule in Britain began late, ended early, and never was much more than a military occupation. As a natural result the Roman inscriptions in Britain are comparatively few in number, limited in the variety of their subjects, and of inferior historical and less philological interest.

Epigraphists divide inscriptions into two main classes-inscriptions in the strictest sense written on other objects to indicate their purpose, and those which are themselves the objects, and inscribed on stone or hard metal to make them durable. The former class (tituli in Latin), are divided into sepulchral inscriptions (tituli sepulchrales); dedicatory inscriptions (tituli sacri); honorary inscriptions (tituli honorarii), or inscriptions on statues erected to mortals, either after death or during their life, but not on their tombs, in which class are included tituli operum publicorum, ciæ publicæ, the records of the names of those erecting public haildings, the inscriptions on milestones, boundary stones; and lastly, the comprehensive class of inscriptions arranged in the Corpus under the head instrumentum, which includes, for example, inscriptions on weights and measures. household articles, the tessere, or little tokens with names of individuals or dates upon them, the inscriptions stamped on blocks of metal, very namerous in a mining district like England, or on military weapons, and the leaden marks which, perhaps, were borne by soldiers as countersigns, and have been found in Britain only. Of the inscriptions made for their own sakes, which are called instruments or leges-treaties, laws, local decrees, agreements of private persons, may be quoted as examples.

Most of the above classes of inscriptions have been found in Britain, though certain classes, and particularly the instruments, are rare. Very few inscriptions of the first century remain. "They are as scarce," says Dr. Hühner, "as those of the republican period in the older portions of the Empire." The oldest is an inscription to Nero, found at Chichester, and a few leaden balls, marked with the names of Claudius, Britannicus, Nero, &c. The oldest milestones are of the time of Hadrian and the Antonines. A few military inscriptions complete the record. During the next century fairly abundant inscriptions are found in the south-eastern part of the island, and especially in the great towns, such as Camulodunum (Colchester); Londinium (London); Regni (Chichester); Aquæ-Sulis (Bath). Though Eboracum had become a great Roman station so early as the reign of Trajan, few inscriptions of earlier date than the latter part of the second century are found in the land of the Brigantes. Still further north, zones of inscriptions mark the site of the two Roman walls. But north of this district, and among the hills of Wales, the almost total absence of real Roman inscriptions attests the incompleteness of the Roman conquest. In the latter country it is only in a few garrisons, such as Isca (Caerleon), or Deva (Chester), or Segontium (Caernarvon), that they are at all abundant, and here none are carlier than the end of the second century. Many third-century inscriptions, both in the north and west, indicate the frequency of the Roman expeditions to those regions. It is, however, remarkable that very few inscriptions of the "provincial emperors," such as Carausius and Allectus, remain. Great names, such as Diocletian and Constantine, are but scantily represented. There are few important Christian inscriptions of the fourth or fifth centuries. The sepulchral inscriptions of Wales and Damnonia are not strictly Roman. The Greek inscriptions are very few. As to the historical value of the Roman inscriptions in Britain, it is hard to generalise, but, as a rule, it is not great. "They vary little in their information; a victorious legion, the death of a commander, the performance of a vow, a tribute to the memory of a departed relative, are the subjects generally commemonated." (Preface to Monumenta Historica britannica.) Yet Dr. Hübner has been able to illustrate from them some characteristics of the provincial administration and military history of Britain, and the frequency or infrequency of their occurrence is at least some index to the nature of the Roman occupation in any given locality. In many ways the inscriptions illusunte or vivify the historical knowledge which written authorities give us; the prevalence of military inscriptions in Britain testifies clearly to the character of Roman rule in the land. But the vast majority of inscriptions are too short, too obscure, too private in their reference, or too limited in their subject, to furnish us with any real historical informa-

The Roman inscriptions in Britain have been collected by Dr. Emil Hübner, is the seventh volume of the Berlin Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. Dr. Hübner's epigrant teal map of Britain at the end of the volume indicates the localities in which they have? sea found in most abundance. The same scholar's article on Roman Inscriptions in the minth edition of the Encyclopedia Britannics may be referred to for an account of these inscriptions generally. The inscriptions of historical interest have been printed in the Monumenta Historica Britannica. McCaul's Britanno-Roman Inscriptions, and Scarth's Roman Britain may be also referred to.

Institution of a Christian Man, The, is the name of a work sometimes said to have been written by Henry VIII., but is more probably the work of Cranmer and other bishops, and only stamped with the king's approval. It consists of an Exposition of the Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Angel's Salutation to Mary, and of the doctrines of Free Will, Justification, and Good Works. It concludes with an authorised prayer for departed souls.

Instrument of Government, THE, is the name given to a paper constitution of forty-two articles, called "the Covernment of the Commonwealth," by which the Protectorate of Cromwell was established (December, 1653). The executive power was vested in the Protector and a council of fifteen to twenty-one persons appointed for life. Until the meeting of Parliament, fixed for Sept. 3, 1654, the Protector, with assent of the Council could make ordinances to have the power of After this, the legislative power was vested in the Parliament alone, and, though bills were to be submitted to the Protector for his assent, he had no power to veto them if they were themselves in accordance with the constitution. Parliaments were to be called of necessity every three years, and when called could not be dissolved for five months, except by their own consent. The representative system was reformed, in accordance with the plan proposed by Ireton, and amended by the Rump. Scotland and Ireland were each represented by thirty members, while the number of members for England and Wales was reduced from five hundred to four hundred. The number of county members was largely increased, many rotten boroughs were disfranchised, and important places like Leeds, Manchester, and Halifax received representatives. At the same time, two classes of electors were disfranchised:—(1) All Roman Catholics and those concerned in the All robusts were disabled for ever; (2) all persons who had been engaged in war against the Parliament since January, 1642, except such as had given signal testimony since then of their good affection, were disabled from electing or being elected for the next Parliament and the three following. By article xii., it was expressly inserted in the writs that the persons elected should not have power to alter the government as vested by the Instrument in a single person and a Parliament. Accordingly, when Parliament, assembled in September, 1654, wished to debate the constitution, and settle the limits of the Protector's power, Cromwell, whilst drawing a distinction between "circumstantials," which they might alter, and "fundamentals," which they must leavo untouched, forced them to sign an engagement not to propose the alteration of the government in that particular. Mr. Gardiner remarks on the Instrument of Government that it was "the first of hundreds of written constitutions which have since spread over the world, of which the American is the most conspicuous example, in which a barrier is set up against the entire predominance of any one set of official persons, hy attributing strictly limited functions to each.

Insurrection Acts (IRELAND). The first (1787) enacted the Riot Act for Ireland, made all attacks on clergy or churches, the administering unlawful oaths, seizure of arms, and other similar offences, fclony, to be punished with death. It also inflicted a punishment of fine, imprisonment, or tho whip, on all who conspired to deprive the clergy of their tithes. In 1796 a similar Act was passed, but with terms, if possible, still more stringent than the foregoing; and, though it excited the wonder of the English Ministry, it passed without difficulty. The third (1807) gave the Lord-Lieutenant power, if the magistrates in special session declared a county disturbed, to proclaim it. By so doing, trial by jury was suspended, and any one out at night after dark became liable to seven years' transportation, unless he were ahle to give a good excuse. It remained in force till 1810. In 1814, 1815, 1816, 1817, 1822, and 1824, it was renewed, and a similar Act was passed in 1833.

Interdicts, Papal, may be defined as local excommunications. They deprived a certain district of all the privileges of Christian worship and ceremonies. The proclamation of an interdict put the country out of the pale of the Church. During the time that a country lay undor an interdict, all public religious services ceased; churches were closed, and the sacraments suspended. To this general rule there were a few exceptions. On Sunday a sermon might be preached in the churchyard, and on Good Friday the cross was exhibited to the people in the same place; the dead might be buried, but without the full rites of interment; infants might bo baptised; and the dying were allowed to communicate. But, beyond this, all the services of the Church ceased; the bell neither rang nor tolled; the solemn processious of the Church were discontinued; neither Virgin nor saint could be worshipped at their own Monasteries, however, preserved the right of holding their own services; but these had to be performed with closed doors, and no strangers might be present. The most famous interdict in English history was that proclaimed by Innocent III. in March, 1208, over all England. It was brought about by John's obduracy in refusing to recognise the papal nominee, Stephen Langton, as Archbiahop of Canterbury, and it was not remitted till the king had made full submission, in May, 1213.

Interest. Two principles seem in the Middle Ages to have been at work in mitigating the extent to which the usurer might take advantage of the distresses of his debtors: first, that of the mediaval Church, which, inheriting the doctrine of the Jewish Scriptures, has unhesitatingly condemned usury in all its forms; and, secondly, that of the Roman Empire, which, while recognising the necessity of paying interest on borrowed moneys, attempted to limit abuse hy fixing a legal maximum percentage, beyond which payment could not be enforced. Among the Romansthorate was at one time twelve per cent. per annum, but it was reduced by Justinian to four. It could not be expected that among the Tentonic tribes this question should have formed a part of their original common law. and hence in the Middle Ages usury was not so much regarded as an offence against the law as a sin; and it was one of the great merits of the Medisoval Church that it set its face steadily against this abuse at a time when no king had the self-denial, and no other court sufficient strength, to protect the poor from the oppression of the rich. Accordingly, usury became a recognised offence in the spiritual courts; and thus we find Alexander III. writing to the Archbishop of Canterbury that he should compel all lenders, whether ecclesiastical or others, to restore their pledges without usury. But despite the censures of the Church and the laws of Edward III., according to which the goods of a living usurer belonged to the Church, those of a dead one to the king, the practice never died out, though in many cases the actual interest was disguised under the name of expenses. Complaints were made by the Commons under Richard II. of the prevalence of this offence, but the king could only reply that it was the fault of the ecclesiastical courts, who did not use their own powers. As yet there was no thought of the State's taking the question in hand. It was a question of morality, and not of law. Some hundred years later, when the incapacity of the Church to deal with this subject became clearer, Parliament at last took the matter np. Even under Henry III. the Statute of Merton had forhidden usury to be charged on infants for debts incurred by their parents, and we have just seen the en-actment of Edward III. as regards the goods of deceased usurers. But it was not till Henry

VII.'s reign that the State, following the old Roman principle and recognising the legality of interest, fixed a rate, above which all charges should be unlawful. In 1487 a law was passed directly aimed against the "dampnable burgayns groundyt in usurye, contrarie to the laws of naturell justis," and empowering the Lord Chancellor and justices of the peace to inflict a penalty of £100 on all transactions that savoured of this kind (3 Hen. VII., 5 and 6). Eight years later, it was enacted that if the lender received back more than he had lent, he should forfeit half. The tendency of these laws is, as may at once be perceived, to restrict rather than to encourage usury. Under Henry VIII. all former Acts on the subject were repealed in 1545, and it was enacted that after Jan. 31 next no more than ten per cent. should be charged, on pain of the lender's losing threefold the debt and suffering imprisonment (37 Hea.VIII., 9). Of course the effect of this Act, whatever was intended, can only have been to stop all loans at less then ten per cent., and that it had this result is evident by the enactment of 1551-52, which pronounced all usury to be unlawful, declared that the former law had not been intended for the maintenance of usury, and lamented that, since its passing, usury had been daily used and practised in the realm. Under Elizabeth this Act was repealed, "because it hath not done as much good as it was hoped it should." Usury, perhaps, in its simplest form, had decreased, but the old evil had only takes new forms, and had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had "by shifts increased and abounded to the old evil had been supplied to the utter undoing of many gentlemen, marchauntes, and others." The old law had erred by making no distinction in the kind of offences, and punishing all alike. Accordingly lienry VIII.'s Act was revived for five years. It seems, from the wording of this Act, that men were still nominally liable to prosecution in the spiritual courts for taking any interest whatever (13 Eliz., c. 8). Under James I. (1621) it was enacted that, because of the general fall in the value of land and prices of merchandise, only eight per cent. should be allowed from June 24, 1625. This enactment was to last seven years, and the penalty of its infringement was to be treble the amount lent. Here again we see the double feeling at work—the conflicting sentiments of the injustice of all usury, and the expediency of allowing it under restrictions; for a clause is added to this bill declaring that its terms are not to be so expounded as to allow the practice if usury in point of religion or conscience. But there is no longer any mention of ecclesiastical courts; though, on the other hand, the expenses of scriveners who might negotiate a loan are jealously defined. On the Restoration, it was enacted that as previous experience had justified the lessening of the legal rate of interest from ten to eight per cent, it would be expedient to reduce it to a nearer level with that of the nations with whom we chiefly traded, and from henceforth 12 was to run at six per cent. Under Queen A2 1e, on the conclusion of the war of the Spanish Succession, it was still further reduced to five per cent., on the plea of its being good for trade and to the interest of the landowners, on whom the expenses of the war had mainly fallon. Another reason assigned for this reduction was that the great interest which could be secured for money invested at home had rendered people unwilling to embark in foreign trade. This remained the legal rate of interest till the reign of Queen Victoria, when all the previous laws for its regulation were swept away in the year 1854.

Inverkeithing, The Battle of (1317), was fought, in Fifeshire, between the Scots, under the Earl of Fife, and the English. Fife was at first diven back, but his men, being rallied by William Sinclair, Bishop of Dunkeld, at last drove the English back to their ships.

Inverlochy, The Battle of (1645), resulted in the victory of Montrose and the Royalists over the Covenanters led by Argyle. Inverlochy is near Fort William, in the south of Inverness, Inverness was most probably at one time the capital of the Pictish kingdom. In later days it possessed a strong castle, crected by the Earl of Huntly (circs 1460). In 1562 this castle was taken by the Regent Murray from the insurgent followers of the Earl of Huntly, and nearly a century later was garrisoned by Cromwell (1651). In 1689 it was pillaged by Claverhouse, and in 1746 was taken by the Jacobites, but recovered by the Duke of Cumberland after the battle of Culloden.

Taverness, John Hay (d. 1740), titular Earl of Inverness, was a favourite of James Edward, the eld Pretender. In 1726 he became Secretary of State and Earl of Inverness, and, together with his brother, Lord Kinnoul, and his brother-in-law, James Murray, ruled the prince's councils. He was, according to lockhart of Carnwath, "a cunning, false, avarisious creature, of very ordinary parts, cultivated by no sort of literature, and altogether void of experience in business; with insolence prevailing often over his little stock of prudence." Soon after he and his brother had been admitted to direct James's conduct, the Pretender's wife left her husband when he refused to dismiss his favourites. On her return, both the brothers went into calle at Avignon.

1305), was fought on the Don, in Aberdeenshire, and resulted in a complete victory for Robert Bruce over his enemy, the Earl of Buchan, and the English commanded by Mowbray.

Iona (or Hii), an island situated to the west of Mull, is famous as the place where St. Columba landed (May 12, 563) on his departuro from Ireland, and as the spot he selected for his monastery. For 150 years Iona, the cradle of the Scottish Church and of Scottish letters, was the centre of the national Church of the Dalriad Scots: but in 716, owing to the zeal of Adamnan, its abbot and the other members of the monastery conformed to the Roman views both as regards the date of Easter and the shape of the tonsure. There appears, however, to have been another party which still adhered to the old way. From 794 Iona was repeatedly ravaged by the Danes; in 818 the monastery which had been restored by Adamnan, was rebuilt by the abbot Diarmid, who deposited therein the shrine of Columba. Towards the end of the twelfth century the monastery was again rebuilt by Reginald of the Isles, who founded a Benedictine abbey there.

Tonian Islands, The, were seized by the French from the Venetians in 1797, the former being confirmed in their new possession by the Treaty of Campo Formio. Two years later, the islands were declared an independent republic under the joint protection of Turkey and Russia. By the Treaty of Tilsit (1807), they once more became French. In 1814 they were placed under British protection, and administered by British commissioners, and so remained till 1864, when they were finally handed over to the kingdom of Greece.

Ireland. The early history of Ireland is wrapped in an obscurity which the researches of scholars into the evidence afforded by archæology, inscriptions, and etymology are only beginning to dispel. The great cycle of Celtic legend has hitherto proved of little historical value. The ablest archæologists cannot distinguish the original traditions from the embellishments of mediæval annalists. Records of real events are interwoven with fragments of Greek and Roman fable, and the incongruous narrative thus obtained has been forcibly adapted to the Mosaic cosmogony.

[Cslts.]
We hear of five immigrations from the East, of incessant wars between the invaders, and of the final triumph of the Milesians or Scots. Two Scotic kingdoms gradually arose; the kingdom of Meath in the north, and the kingdom of Munster in the south. Early in the second century, Tuathal of Meath established a nominal supremacy over the entire island, but in the reign of Cond, Tuathal's grandson, the Eberian princes restored the independence of Munster. Excluded from the south, the Scots of Meath devoted their energies to a thorough conquest of Ulster. This was effected during the fifth century, under Niall of the Nine Hostages and his sons. The royal house split into two branches. The northern Huí Néill ruled in Ulster for five hundred years, while the southern family governed the great central plain. The ard rf or titular over-king of Ireland was sometimes of the one, sometimes of the other stock. The Munster dynasty underwent a similar change. The Engenian and the Dal Caisian lines divided the old Eberian kingdom between them.

From the middle of the third century to the close of the fifth, both the northern and the southern Irish planted colonies in Britain. The former settled in North Wales, Man, and Scotland; the latter in South Wales, Devon, and Cornwall. Towards the end of the colonising period, the Irish were converted to Christianity. St. Patrick is said to have begun his labours in the year 432. The whole island quickly adopted the new faith. In one respect the result would seem to have been unhappy. The remarkable system of Brehon law might, under favourable condi-tions, have done much to bind the tribes into a nation, but the sanction of the law was probably religious, and thus perished with the old beliefs. About the middle of the sixth century the migratory spirit revived in a new form. The Irish monks carried their missions to the remotest parts of Europe. At home their schools were visited by students from England and from Gaul. But outside the convent walls all was war and bloodshed. The Norwegians first pillaged the Irish coast in the year 795. They were succeeded by the Danes (852), who effected permanent settlements at the chief seaports. The monasteries were plundered and burnt, and the internal anarchy grew worse. But the end of the tenth century brought a change. The invaders under Ivar occupied Limerick, and attempted the conquest of Munster. In the struggle that followed a native ruler appeared, who, for a time, seemed destined to make Ireland a nation, Brian Boruma, sprung from the Dal Caisian line of the Eberians, routed the Danes near Tipperary in 968. Six years later he succeeded his brother Mahon on the throne of Munster. In 989 he made war on Malachy II., the titular over-king of the Hui Néill dynasty. After thirteen years of fighting and negotiation, Malachy submitted (1002). The victory of Glen Mama (1000) had quelled a desperate revolt of Leinster and the Dublin Danes. Brian was at last supreme. For twelve years he ruled Ireland strongly and well. Then the Dublin Danes again rebelled. They sought and found allies amongst all the Scandinavians of the West. It was the last desperate conflict of the Pagan Northmen with the Christian Irish. The battle was fought on the banks of the Tolka, by Dublin, on Good Friday of the year 1014. The Danes were driven into the sea, but the old king was alain by the "apostate deacon" Brodir, as he prayed for his people. His death left the condition of the country hopeless. He had destroyed the traditional supremacy of the Huí Néill; his own house were unable to make good their claims. Long and ruinous wars between the O'Néills, the O'Briens, and the O'Conors of Connaught, continued to the Norman invasion.

The

Connaught, continued to the Norman invasion.

The civilisation of the Irish Celts reached its full development before the twelfth century. They formed numerous tribes (tuath), each consisting of several septs (fine). Both tribes and septs were landowning corporations closely resembling the Teu-tonic "marks." Both divided their territories into three parts; the tuath into the demesne of the ri, or chief of the tribe, the lands of the different fines, and the tribal waste; the fine into the demesnes of the faiths, or hereditary landowners, the common, and the waste of the sept. The faiths and the bo-sires, or cow-not lemen, were the only freemen with full political rights. The faith airs fine was the chieftain of the sept. If a freeman "commended" himself to a "flaith" of his own sept, he became a ceite. He "took stock" from the flaith, with a right of grazing the flaith's demeanes, owing him in return rent, services, and homage. If he accepted only a small amount of cattle, he retained most of his civil rights. He paid a "house tribute" to his lord, and was called a saer-céile. If he accepted a large amount of cattle, he forfeited much of his freedom, and was bound, in addition to his other burdens, to afford "refections" to the lord and his train at stated times. Such a tenant was called a daer-céile, or villein. But even the daer-céile had definite rights in the sept, including the important right of enjoying the usufruct of common land, and of building a house upon it. The ri could legally compel a tribesman to accept seer stock and pay house-tribute, and this power seems to have been often illegally usurped by the faith sire fine over the members of the sept. But a saer-céile could not become a daer-céile, nor could a deer-ceile take more stock, without the consent of the sept. The sept had a veto on all contracts by its members affecting the rights or liabilities of the corporation. It was particularly jealous of contracts outside itself but within the tribe. Every member of the sept owned the site of his house in severalty. He held a portion of the common land as his allotment, and had defined rights of pasturage over the waste. As the lots were annually exchangeable, he was bound to follow the common course of tillage. He had no general power of alienation or en-cumbrance, but in special circumstances he enjoyed a limited power of disposition, with or without the consent of the sept.

The freeman who commended himself to a faith of another sept was called a "saer fuidir," or free immigrant stranger. He was a mere tenant at will at a rack-rent. Below him came the "daer fuidirs," or servile immigrants. They were men who had broken the tribal bond, prisoners of war, convicts, and other "sons of death." They were the personal dependents of the faith, and formed his body-guard. He was bound of right to settle them on his demoane, but it is believed that they were often planted by the ri upon the waste of the tribe, and by the faiths upon the waste of the sept. The rights and lands of a ri, or of a faith, passed at his death to the "agnatic" kinsman, previously chosen to succeed him. This kinsman was called the "tanaiste." The tanaiste of a faith was elected by the tribe. The tanaiste of a faith was elected by the sept. The descent of inferior tenancies was regulated by some custom resembling gavel-kind. But as civil rights depended on a property qualification, the immediate family of bi-aire often agreed to keep together as a "joint and undivided family," and elected a tanaiste. Poor kinsmen might even club together as a "joint family" and appoint a head, who then ranked as an aire. Mensal lands were assigned to the Brehons, medicine-men, harpers, smiths, and metal workers.

Oats, wheat, barley, flax, wool, madder, onions, and parsnips were grown. The dense forests abounded in game, and the rivers and lakes in fish. The wild boar, the red deer, and the wolf, and eagles, and some other large birds of prey must have been common. In winter the scanty population dwelt in the plains; in summer they drove their cattle to the mountains or the sea-coast. The domestic animals were plentiful and good. Bees were largely kept. Houses were built of wattles or hewn Those of free men consisted of timber. several detached structures, surrounded by one or more ditches and mounds. A loose woollen shirt, covered by a tight tunic, formed the dress of both sexes. A shawl fastened by a brooch hung from the left shoulder. Beautiful gold and silver ornaments were common. Toilet-mirrors, hairoil, and paint for the eye-lashes and the finger-nails were used by the women. Slings, pikes, swords, and shields were the arms in eneral use. The customs of polygamy, and the intermarriage of near kinsfolk, gave the early missionaries much trouble. The rank of the wife depended upon her dower, and upon her bearing sons. As the children of the same father by different wives had equal rights, they were all fostered outside the sept, to prevent foul play. Slavery was universal. Hides and friese were the chief exports. They were largely exchanged for English alaves at Bristol, and for French wines at Poitiers. The native artists excelled in copying and illuminating books, in working the precious metals, and in music.

In the year 1169 Robert Fitz-Stephen and Maurice Fitz-Gerald landed in Wexford, as nominal allies of Dermot McMurrough, the deposed King of Leinster. The more famous "Strongbow," Richard de Clare, followed the next year. The conquests they made were so easy and so rapid, that Henry II. feared they would establish an independent Norman state across the Channel. To prevent the danger, he came himself to Ireland in 1172. Many native ehiefs acknowledged his supremacy; many did him feudal homage in ignorance of the obligations they incurred. The conflict thus introduced between the Brehon law of the tribes, and the feudal law of the English, is the true explanation of the subsequent relations of the two races. The English persistently ignored the rights of the tribesmen in their lands, and in the choice of their chief. The Irish clung to their ancestral customs. The death of a chief might always bring a disputed succession.

Henry acted under colour of a Bull of the English Pope, Adrian IV. He was at first well received by the churchmen. The brutality of John (1185) estranged both clerks and laymen. The Norman power spread without consolidating. The crown discouraged the growth of strong principalities, and without strength order was impossible. The Irish could isolate the scattered settlements at pleasure, by seizing the passes through the woods and the hills. The foreigners fought amongst themselves, and called in Irish aid. They were compelled to serve their king in his wars with France and Scotland. Estates passed by marriage into the hands of English absentees. They were ill guarded, and retaken by the tribes. The barons themselves in the wild districts bowed before the Celtic revival. They abandoned their fcudal pretensions, and acted as native chiefs.

By the beginning of the fourteenth century, the lnglish power had sunk to a low ebb. It was ruined by the Scottish invasion of Edward Bruce. For two years he wasted Ireland. At length, "after eighteen successive victories," he was defeated and slain by the Viceroy near Faughard (1317). But he had exterminated the English yeomen, the sinews of the settlement. In 1333, William and Edward de Burgo, the heads of a great Norman house, the sons of an English Viceroy, deliberately renounced their allegiance, divided the lordship of Connaught between them in defiance of the English rule of succession, and adopted the Irish "language, apparel, and laws." Their example was followed by many. Large territories in Ulster and Leinster were reoccupied by the O'Neills and the McMurroughs. The flight of the English population was vainly forbidden by law. In 1367 the Statute of Kilkenny (40 Edward III.) records the conscious impotence of its authors.

They have ceased to dream of conquests. Their ambition is to preserve the shrunken remnant of their dominions from the insidious encroachments of the Celt. The natives are rapidly assimilating the colonists to them-selves. The statute attempts by savage penalties to isolate the English from the contagion, and to put a stop to the adoption of the native dress, language, and customs. In 1374 the great constitutional question, which, four centuries later, cost England an empire, arose in the Irish Parliament. The viceroy tried to force the colonists to send representatives to England, with power to assent to taxation on their behalf. He was firmly and successfully opposed. A few years later the Kavanaghs and the O'Briens levied black-mail on Dublin

King Richard was at last provoked to vindicate the power of the erown. He crossed the sea with a great army, but the Irish "mocked him with their light submission," so that "he enlarged not the English borders the breadth of one acre of land" (1395). Four years later he returned. A march through the Kavanaghs' country reduced his forces to a rabble. He fled from Dublin to meet Henry of Lancaster. For a century the colony continued to dwindle. Parts of four shires formed the English dominion, and these were full of native Irish. The Wars of the Roses were disastrous to the settlers. They were Yorkists to a man. They formally acknowledged Duke Richard as their viceroy, in defiance of the English attainder. They solemnly asserted the independence of their Parliament. They followed the Pretender Simnel into England. They were decimated at Sandel Castle and at Stoke. To Henry VII. the Anglo-Irish were more dangerous than the Celts. The only important Irish measure of his reign was that which made the colonial Parliament completely subject to the Council, and extended all existing English statutes to the colony (Poynings' Act, 10 Henry VII., c. 4). For the first fifty years of the Tudor rule, the Leinster Geraldines were the true lords of the settlement. Their rebellion, in 1535, brought a new force into Ireland. All over Europe the old feudal monarchies had been succeeded by despots, who embodied the national forces and the national will. Henry VIII. was the first King of England who could strike with the whole force of the State. He resolved to let the Anglo-Irish feel the blow. A disciplined force and a train of artillery reduced the Geraldine castles. The king was master of the island. He desired to rule his new kingdom well. But the greed of his servants, and his unhappy determination to thrust English manners upon the Celts, inevitably led to resistance and repression. The secularisation of the Church lands was not unpopular. Many abbeys were granted to the chiefs "as the means to make them rather glad to sup-press them." The doctrinal changes on the other hand provoked a bitter opposition. No open outbreak occurred, but on the accession of Mary, the old order was triumphantly restored. [IRIS.I CHURCH.]

The garrison of English landholders, tho bulwark of Protestantism in Ireland, was by a curious irony introduced in the name of l'hilip II. of Spain. King's and Queen's Counties were "planted" by 3 & 4 Philip and Mary, caps. 1 & 2. The third chapter of the same Act authorised the Chancellor to despatch commissioners throughout the island "to set out shires and counties," that is, to substitute English for Irish law without regard for vested rights. The disputed succession to the earldom of Tyrone brought matters to a crisis under Elizabeth. Shane O'Neill was the tancists of his tribe; the bastard of Dungannon claimed by an English patent. A war followed, disgraceful even amongst English wars in Ireland. Shane visited the queen. He was detained, in breach of his safeconduct, until he accepted terms he could not keep. On his return home, "my Lord Treasurer's man" tried to poison him. In 1566 the war was renewed. The new Lord Deputy Sidney fought O'Neill by the hands of his native rivals. The O'Donnolls defeated him near Lifford; the Scots of Antrim murdered him. His death was followed by an Act of l'arliament (11 Elizabeth, cap. 9), making all Ireland shire-land, and thereby depriving many chiefs of benefits expressly secured to them by indenture with the crown. Ten years later the Desmond rebellion (1579) was plantation system was definitely adopted. The policy of the government was not to subdue, but to destroy. Women and infants were regularly murdered. A well-planned famine removed the fugitives who escaped the sword. Munster was a desert, fit at last for the civilisation of the Raleighs and the Spensers. Half a million of acres were bestowed on English adventurers, on condition that they should plant their vast estates with English farmers. The condition was never fulfilled. The starving Celts crept from the woods and glens to outbid the strangers. But one province did not satisfy the English. Hugh O'Neill, the English Earl of Tyrone, the sen of the bastard of Dungannon, was reluctantly driven into war. Bred at the English court, and conscious of the English power, he tried to combine the impossible parts of an Irish chief and an English noble. His tribe accepted him as their leader in 1593. The next year he was summoned before the Council, and, to the queen's great indignation, suffered to return. His course could be no longer doubtful. He contrived to unite all the Ulster tribes beneath his banner, and he sought for aid from Spain. In 1598 he routed Bagnall at the Yellow Ford, and roused Munster. For three years he harassed without engaging the enemy. At length, in Sept., 1601, a strong Spanish force landed at Kinsale. at Kinsale. If Hugh could join them, his triumph was secure. They were blockaded by veteran troops. Hugh was betrayed and beuten (Dec.). In the following March he made peace on almost the same terms he had himself proposed in 1587. But al-though O'Neill had held his own in the field, he could not resist the "war of chicane," which at once began against him. He and his ally, O'Donnell of Tyrconnel the representatives of the old royal house of the Hui Neill, were forced to fly. Their lands were confiscated and "planted," and the tribesmen treated as tenants-at-will under the crown. This flagrant injustice led directly to the outbreak of 1641. The "subtle ravage of the lawyers, and the growing Protestantism of the government, which now, for the first time, had a large Protestant population at its back, gradually forced even the old Anglo-Irish Catholics into a close union with the Celts. Strafford claimed all the estates of Connaught for the crown, on the plea that the Chancery officers had neglected to enrol the patents of the owners. The Irish gentlemen offered £120,000 for quieting their titles. The offer was accepted, the money was paid; and then the Viceroy announced that he would not observe the conditions.

Meanwhile the religious tension was increasing. A Catholic revival had spread over Europe. In England the Puritans were rising into power. On Oct. 22, 1641, a vising occurred in Ulster. In December the English Commons resolved to extirpate Popery in Ireland. Then the rebellion spread. The Lords Justices were careful not to limit it; the wider, it was said at the time, the rebellion, the wider would be the forfeitures at their disposal. The struggle was very horrible. The colonists were everywhere expelled, and often murdered. The Irish chiefs did what they could to humanise the war; the English leaders encouraged the fercotity of their men. The divisions of the Irish Royalists gave Cromwell an easy victory. The act of devastation was perfected by the Sainta. Nearly half the population perished in eleven years. When the war was over, many hundreds of boys and of marriagrable girls were sold into slavery. Thirty or forty thousand men enlisted in foreign service. Three provinces were confiscated, and parcelled out amongst the soldiers and the creditors of the Parliament. By the peace of 1648, Charles I.

Whether the terrible charge of Carte, Leland, Lord Castlehaven, and Nalson, be well founded it is, perhape, impossible to determine. But it is certain that the measures of the Lords Justices were eminently adapted to appead the rebellion. It is certain, too, that from the first they looked forward to confiscations. When the seven Lords of the Pale revolted, they hastened to point out how "those great counties of Leinster, Ulster, and the Pale," lay now "niors open to his Majesty's free disposal, and to a general settlement of peace and religion by introducing of English."

promised to restore the Irish Catholics to their estates. In 1650 Charles II. confirmed the engagements of his father. He changed his mind when he was king. He "considered the settlement of Ireland as an affair rather of policy than justice," and "thought it most for the good of the kingdom, advantage of the crown, and security of his government, that the loss should fall on the Irish." By the Acts of Settlement and Explanation, he confirmed to the Cromwellians the estates of his father's last supporters. Before the rebellion, two-thirds of the fertile soil belonged to the Catholics. Under the Act of Settlement, two-thirds remained to the Protestants. The War of the Revolution gave the final blow to the old race. They saw in it a chance of undoing the wrongs of the last thirty years. Their ablest leaders, backed by D'Avaux and Louvois, desired to establish Ireland as a separate kingdom, under French protection.
The king landed in March, 1689. The Parliament met in May. Poynings' Act and the Acts of Settlement and Explanation were repealed. The Cromwellians and their heirs were dispossessed, as wrongful possessors, but bond fide purchasers for valuable consideration were to be reprised. To provide for these reprisals, the estates of the English colonists who supported the Prince of Orange were confiscated. A wholesale Act of Attainder was passed to increase the forfeitures.* But the war went against King James. He had neither money ner arms. His troops were ill-disciplined, and his counsels divided. The relief of Derry and the battle of Newton Butler, in 1689, were followed up by the passage of the Boyne, in 1690, and the decisive defeat of Aghrim, in 1691. The capitulation of Limerick was signed, after an heroic defence, on Oct. 3. The flower of the Irish soldiers followed their king into France, to "find their graves in strange places and unhereditary churches." Parliament refused to ratify the Treaty of Limerick; fresh confiscations were made; and the national faith was proscribed.

A great development of material prosperity might, perhaps, have reconciled the Irish to the conquest. The English and the Irish Parliaments vied in legislation which made prosperity impossible. Trade was crushed by the commercial jealousy of the one; society was supped by the bigotry of the other. Ireland was already excluded from the Navigation Acts. Acts of 1665 and 1680 had prohibited the importation of Irish cattle and provisions into England. The colonial trade was ruined in 1696; the wool trade with England in 1698; the wool trade with the Continent in 1699. Catholics were forbidden by Irish Acts to purchase lands, to lend on. real securities, to take long or beneficial leases. The Gavelling Act (2 Anne, c. 6) broke up existing estates. Catholic minors were placed under Protestant guardians. The Courts of Equity assigned a liberal provision to apostate wives and children. The English grantees of confiscated estates were necessarily absentees. They leased vast tracts to Irish Protestants on beneficial terms. The lessees sub-let, sometimes four or five deep. The misery of the cottier was extreme. He paid a rack-rent; he supported his priest; he was tithed by the parson. The steady growth of pasture drove him to the mountain and the bog. Famino and disease were chronic. A vast emigration set in. Before the trade laws and the Test Act, the Presbyterian artisans and yeomen fled to Gormany and America. The Catholics served under every European flag save one. At home they were a rabble. "The tendons of society were cut." When the masses came to power, they had none to lead. The penal code was so repugnant to human nature, the commercial code was so opposed to the common interest, that their regular execution was impossible. Priests, "whom the laws did not presume to exist," publicly discharged the duties of their office; smuggling became a national industry. The whole population was educated into contempt for the law. They came soon to have a law of their own, enforced by the Houghers and the Whiteboys (1761) with merciless severity. The government was a corrupt oligarchy. The hereditary revenue, which included twothirds of the taxation, made the crown independent. The judicial interpretation of Poynings' Act and the Declaratory Act of 6 Geo. I., c. 5, ensured the subservience of tho Parliament. All bills were submitted, first to the Irish, then to the English Privy Council. They were suppressed or altered at the pleasure of either. If approved by the two councils, Parliament might pass or reject, but could not amend them. The Upper House was largely controlled by the English courtiers who sat upon the Right Reverend bench. An English Act of 1691 excluded Catholics; an English test clause of 1704 excluded Dissenters from the legislature. The Catholics lost the franchise. Protestants exercised it once in a lifetime. The Parliament of George II. satfor thirty-three years. Two-thirds of the members were returned by boroughs, and the boroughs were in the hands of under-takers and patrons. The Houses met once in two years. The judges were removable at pleasure. The greatest offices were habi-tually bestowed on English non-residents. A spirit of resistance slowly grew amongst the colonists. The House of Lords vainly protested against the deprivation of its appellate jurisdiction in the Annesley case (1719). Three years later the country rose against "Wood's halfpence," and drovo

A precisely similar bill against the Irish was introduced in England five days before the Irish bill was brought in. It passed both Houses, and was lost by a prorogation. It is not mentioned by Lord Macaulay.

Walpole to submission. The struggle "had a most unhappy influence on the state of the nation, by bringing on intimacies between Papists and Jacobites, and the Whigs, who before had no correspondence with them."
In 1749 the crown worsted the Houses over an Appropriation Bill. In the next two sessions the contest was renewed, and the government outvoted. The opposition grew, the pension list swelled, the price of the horoughs advanced. Between 1750 and 1754 seats trebled in value. The influence of the middle classes was first felt at the dissolution on the demise of the crown. Their objects were to control their representatives by an Octennial Act, and to correct the scandals of the pension list. The Peace of Paris added India and Canada to the Empire. An increase of the standing army was essential to their safety. Ministers did not dare to make the proposal in England. By the concession of an Octennial Act (Feb., 1768) they secured an increase of 3,000 men to the Irish Establishment. The overthrow of the Undertakers followed. Lord Townshend and Lord Harcourt attempted by lavish bribes to create a party of "king's friends," dependent only on the crown. Between 1757 and 1777 the civil list had nearly doubled, the pension list had nearly doubled, and a million had been added to the debt. The American War brought a crisis. In 1778 the impending bankruptcy of Ireland forced Lord North to relax the commercial code in defiance of the English middle classes. The government was too poor to replace the garrisons withdrawn for the colonial war. The country was defenceless, and invasion seemed imminent. The whole Protestant population armed. In December, 1778, the Volunteers numbered 8,000; in June, 1779, 42,000; in 1781, it is said, as many as 80,000 men. They were for the most part Protestants; they were officered by the Protestant gentry, and they were thoroughly loyal to the English connection. But they resolved to free their country from the commercial tyranny of England. They began to discuss political questions and to concert their action. In Dec., 1781, came the news of Saratoga and of York Town. In the following February the delegates of 143 Ulster corps met at Dungannon. They asserted the indopendence of the kingdom, and the right to free trade. They demanded that the judges should be made independent, and the Mutiny Act limited to a single session. They condemned the penal laws, and appointed a committee to communicate with other corps. Their example was everywhere followed. Grattan pressed the demand for independence in the Commons. In April the House addressed the crown. It adopted in full the constitutional theories of Dungannon. They were accepted in May by the Parliament of England. Fox, it has been said, "met Ireland on her own terms, and gave her everything she wanted in the way she herself seemed to wish for it."

But independence was not the sole legislative achievement of the Volunteers. Between 1778 and 1782 many wholesome measures were passed. Almost all the commercial restraints were removed. A Habeas Corpus Act and a limited Mutiny Act became law. The judges were made immovable. The Test Act was repealed. Bills for the relief of the Catholics were carried in 1778, 1782, and 1792. In 1793 they were enfranchised.

Two grievances remained—the corruption of Parliament, and the exclusion of Catholics from its walls. Upon both points the patriots were divided. Charlemont and Flood feared to extend the political power of the Catholics. Grattan was their earnest advocate. greed upon the necessity of Roform, but Flood alone was ready to overawe the Houses into honesty. The Volunteer Convention showed a growing appetite for politics. Charlemont and Grattan were entirely opposed to legislation by menace. Flood's Reform Bill was rejected by a great majority, and the Convention was immediately dis-solved. For fifteen years Pitt debauched the Irish Parliament. Reform or Emancipation would alike have been fatal to the union which he presently began to design. It was to redress these evils that the club of United Irishmen was formed by Rowan Hamilton. The persistent opposition of the government, however, drove its members to disloyalty. Sympathy with the French Eevolution grew active in the north. In 1793 the Convention Act became law. At last, in 1794, Pitt seemed to waver. Lord Fitzwilliam, a known friend of the Catholics, was named Viceroy; and the expectations of the Catholics ere raised to the highest pitch. Suddenly the Viceroy was recalled. The miserable rebellion of 1798 followed. A brief and horrible agrarian rising was suppressed, and punished with the cruelty that comes of fear. Tho English minister saw his opportunity, and bought the Parliament he had degraded so ably and so long. The union with England was accomplished by the Act 39 & 40 Geo. III., c. 67, July 2, 1800, and the Irish Parliament ceased to exist a month later. For many years the country was profoundly disturbed. Robert Emmett was hanged in 1803, for plotting a second rebellion. Orange outrages prevailed in the north, and Daniel O'Connell was beginning to marshal the Catholic democracy. He determined from the first to win emanci-pation without conditions. The Liberal Protestants under Grattan, the Catholic gentry under Lord Fingall, the English Catholics, and a strong party at Rome, under Gonsalvi, were prepared to give the crown a veto on the nomination of Irish prelates, in return for the boon. The bishops themselves favoured the compromise. O'Connell opposed and beat them all. The Catholic Association (1824)

erganised the peasantry through the pricets. The Waterford election (1826) proved the nower of the movement. The return of power of the movement. The return of O'Connell for Clare in 1829 convinced the Duke of Wellington that he must choose between concession and civil war. The Emancipation Act was passed, the forty-shilling freeholders were disfranchised, and the Catholic Association suppressed. The horrors of the Tithe War led to a severe Coercion Act in 1832, and to the abolition of tithes and the substitution of a land-tax in 1838. A Poor Law was passed in the same year, and a Municipal Reform Act two years later. The National Schools were founded in 1831—32, and the Queen's Colleges in 1846. O'Connell's formidable agitation for Repeal marked the second administration of Sir Robert Peel. The prohibition of the monster meeting at Clontarf (Oct. 3, 1843) broke his power. He died at Genoa in 1847. The "Young Ireland" party, chiefly composed of Protestant jour-nalists and men of letters, made a foolish attempt at robellion in 1848. The Potato Famine of 1846—48, and the Encumbered Estates Court Act, caused a vast exodus to America. A considerable amount of English America. A considerable amount of English capital was invested in Ireland, and some years of steady progress ensued. But the enduring existence of social and political discontents was revealed by the Phoenix Conspiracy of 1858. They culminated in Fenianism at the close of the American War. FEMIAN CONSPIRACY.] In 1868 Mr. Glad-stone became premier and proceeded to legislate for Ireland. The Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed in 1869, and a Land Bill embodying some novel principles became law in 1870. Two years after the Ballot Act (1872), the Home Rule party came into prominence under Mr. Isaac Butt. He was soon ousted from his position by Mr. Parnell (1877-78), who availed himself of the distress caused by bad harvests in 1878-80 to organise the formidable Land League movement. By a second Land Act, passed in 1881, Mr. Gladstone transformed the whole system of Irish tenures. The Land League was suppressed in the same year, but immediately revived as the National League. Systematic outrages, however, still prevailed over three of the provinces. Offenders against the "unwritten law" were shot or "boycotted," and in May, 1882, Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, the Chief and Under Secretaries for Ireland, were stabled by the "Invincibles" in the Phænix Park. In 1885, nearly ninety Nationalists having been elected to Parliament under the reduced franchise, Mr. Gladstone, followed by the great bulk of the Liberal party, embraced the cause of Home Rule. Ris Bill was rejected in 1886, his government being succeeded by one pledged to maintain the Union intact. But he returned to power in 1892, and introduced a second Bill, which passed through the House of Commons but was thrown out by House of Commons but was thrown out by the House of Lords. The Local Government Act of 1896 assimilated the administration of Ireland to that of Great Britain. In 1903 another Land Act, amended in 1904, was passed. Royal visits were made to Ireland by Queen Victoria in 1900, and by Edward VII. and Queen Alexandra in 1903 and 1904. In 1908 an Act was passed for the foundation of two new universities.

	Ireton,	LEVE	(6.	16	11.	4 1	RELL	_

Treton, Henry (b. 1611, d. 1651), was educated at Oxford, and on the outbreak of the Civil War, joined the Parliamentary party, and fought at Gainsborough. In Jan., 1647, he married Cromwell's daughter Bridget. He was active in putting down the Royalist risings in 1648, and was one of the most energetio members of the High Court of Justice which condemned Charles I. to death. He was nominated in the Council of State in 1649, but his name was struck out by Parliament. When Cromwell went over to Ireland, Ireton was appointed his major-general, and on the recall of the former, Ireton was made Lord Deputy, which office, says Ludlow, who was his colleague, "he conducted with great ability, and with unbounded devotion to the public service." Parliament settled $2,000 a year on him, but he refused to take it. He died of the plague, and was buried in Westminster Abbey; but his remains were dishonoured at the Restoration with those of the other "regicides," and hung in chains at Tyburn, Irish Church, THE. Ireland was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick, in the latter half of the fifth century. The faith of the new Church was that of the rest of Western Christendom. Her organisation was peculiar to herself. The tribe was reconstituted upon a religious footing, and became a monastic community. The chief was the founder and first abbot. A number of his tribesmen and tribeswomen practised celibacy. All devoted themselves to fasting and to prayer. They were a religious family

The abbot was still a spiritual chief, to whom all members of the tribe, even the tribal bishops, were subject. His successors were almost invariably chosen from his kin. The management of the abbey lands remained with his married relations. The abbots were his spiritual descendants (ecclesiastica progenies), the stowards (airchinnechs), his descendants by blood (plebilis progenies). Of the first eleven successors of St. Columba at Iona, ten were of the same royal stock. For two centuries none but members of the Clan Sinaich sat in the chair of Patrick at Armagh. When "the family of Columba" pushed their spiritual colony into England, they regularly sent the bishops, without canonical election, from Iona to their sees.

Iri

The tribal constitution of the Celts made them monks. Their old roving spirit made them missionaries. As both they exercised a lasting influence over European Christianity. They converted England, and left it the most monastic of Latin Churches. In the twelfth century Germany was studded with their monasteries. They were the apostles of Fran-conia and Carinthia. From Naples to Iceland they have left their names. But it was in Gaul that the Irish set an enduring mark on Western civilisation. Towards the close of the sixth century St. Columba settled at Luxeuil, in the Vosges, and from that centre celonised the classic land of Latin monasticism. His disciples conformed to the wiser rule of Benediet, and were absorbed in the Benedictine order. But their labours led to the Benedictine settlement of Burgundy. Their monasteries, planted in the darkest days of Western Christianity, prepared the way for Clugny, for Citeaux, and for Clairvaux, for Pope Gregory VII., and St. Bernard. When the monk-popes of Burgundy saved Christen-tiom from an hereditary priesthood, the danger was, perhaps, greatest in the tribal church of Ireland. But the popes themselves were reared by the children of Columban. St. Malachy (1094—1148), who had been brought early under the influence of Rome, introduced the new discipline into Ireland. The Norse invasions had destroyed the monasteries. The lay administrators of the Church lands had encroached upon the title and the prerogatives of the abbots. Malachy reformed Bangor. He was nominated Arch-bishop of Armagh by Celsus, the hereditary incumbent. After a long struggle with the assertors of the tribal principle, he found himself acknowledged as Primate in 1133. He visited Clairvaux. He left his companions with Bernard for instruction. He journeyed to Rome, and was appointed legate by Innocent II. On his return he founded the Cistercian house of Mellifont, in Louth, the first regular monastery in Ireland. Eight years later he again passed into Gaul to receive the pallium from Eugerius IV. But his strength failed him at Clairvaux. He died under the roof of his friend and master in 1148. Four years after his death Cardinal John Paperon and Christian, Bishop of Lismoro, presided as papal legates over a council at Melufont. The four metropolitan sees were established, an attempt was made to introduce the canonical restraints on marriage, and some minor abuses were corrected. Many other synods were held in the twelfth century. Those of Cashel (1172) and Dublin (1186) are the most important. The first tried to introduce the payment of tithes and other English observances. The second confined itself to regulating the ritual. In both there is a marked tendency to conform to the Roman discipline. By the end of the century the traditional monasticism was everywhere superseded by the rule of the Augustinian canons. The learning of the older monks is proved by the testimony of Bede, by the classical manuscripts in their peculiar character still scattered over Europe, and by the bold and often unorthodox doctrines they maintained. Virgilius taught the existence of the antipodes in the eighth century, John Scotus Erigena npheld the views of Origen in the ninth, and Macarius seems, in some points, to have anticipated the theories of Spinoza.

From their first conversion the Danes of the eastern seaboard looked upon the tribal church as irregular. Their endeavours to place themselves under the jurisdiction, first of the Norwegian, and afterwards of the English primate, led to a separation between the two Irish Churches, which in one form or other has lasted to the present time. Bishops of Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick, were consecrated by the English primates from the days of Lanfrane. The establishment of the metropolitan sees by Eugenius was resented in England as an infringement of the rights of Canterbury. From the coming of the Normans to the final enforcement of Protestantism under Charles I., the mutual animosity of the natives and the colonists deepened the estrangement between Dublin and Armagh. Irish clerks and Irish monks were excluded from English benefices and English monasteries, while the Saxon was shut out from foundations beyond the Pale. At length the Reformation freed Dublin from its dependence by an order in council (1551).

The mendicants reached Ireland soon after their foundation, and have ever since rendered great services to their Church. Even before the Reformation "no person of the Church, high or low, great or small, English or Irish, used to preach the word of God, saving the poor friars beggars." Ecclesiastical discipline had perished in the general desolation. Great foundations like Clomacnoise and Ardagh were without vestments and church plate. Walled towns alone possessed means for the decent conduct of public worship.

The earlier measures of Henry VIII. met with little opposition. The declaration of the royal supremacy (28 Henry VIII., c. 13) was accepted by the Catholics of the Pale, and generally disregarded by the Celts. The only protest against the dissolution of the monasteries came from the Deputy and Council, who regarded it as a blow fatal to the education "of the whole Englishry of this land." The attempt made in 1551 to force the ritual of 1549 upon the Irish was the first step which provoked resistance. Tho new doctrines were preached in a foreign tongue. The new preachers were time-servers, and men of scandalous lives. Zealous Protestants refused the cure of souls whom they could not hope to instruct. On the death of Edward VI. the old rites were restored, and the Protestant prelates withdrew. The religious policy of Elizabeth is well illustrated by her reply to Hugh O'Neill's demand for liberty of censcience. "Her Majesty hath tolerated herein hitherto, and so in likelihood she will continue the same." Catholicism was a real danger to an excommunicated sovereign, and there were too many Irish Catholics in the queen's armies for a systematic persecution of the Catholic faith. The steps which gradually led to the fusion of the Anglo-Normans of the Pale, and their old enemies the Celts, into a "quasi-nation," have been indicated in the general article on Ireland. Careful provision for the Anglican Church was made in the plantation under James I., and again at the Restoration. But her position was essentially weak. The highest offices were invariably filled with English courtiers. The Archhishop of Dublin was usually one of the chief Parliamentary managers for the crown. Non-residence was shamefully common amongst the dignitaries of the Establishment, while extreme poverty hampered the usefulness of the country parsons. Their missionary efforts bore little fruit, hut as resident country gentlemen they did much to improve the social condition of the people. The provisions of the penal code affecting Catholic laymen belong to the political history of Ireland. But there were many special laws aimed directly at the priesthood. By an Act of 1703 all priests were compelled to register their names and addresses, and take the oath of allegiance. Over a thousand obeyed. In 1709 they were required to take the oath of anjuration, which they believed to be nnlawful. Less than forty submitted The rest incurred the penalty of banishment for life, and of death if they returned. All the dignitaries of the Church, from archhishops to vicars-general, all friars, and all unregistered priests, were liable to the pains of treason. Catholic education was absolutely forbidden, while the proselytism of the Charter Schools (1733) was encouraged hy heavy subsidies, and special legislative restrictions on the natural rights of parents. The penal system inflicted frightful evils on the country, hut of course failed of its object. From the first, "Popish priests spared not to come out of Spain, from Rome and from Reimes, only to draw the people into the Church of Rome." Even in the worst days hishops, arch-pricats, and vicars-general lurked disguised in obscure farmhouses. In 1732 there were 892 mass-houses, served by 1,445 priests, besides regulars, in the kingdom. Twenty years later an organised hierarchy of twenty four archbishops and hishops administered the Church, under the general supervision of the Nuncio at Brussels. The prelates were still nominated by the exiled Stuarts. After the middle of the eighteenth century many causes tended to promote a general toleration. The spirit of Locke and Hoadley prevailed amongst cducated Protestants. Educated Catholics brought home the doctrines of the Encyclopédie from France. A Gallican tinge per-vaded the priesthood. The hishops of Munster were censured by the Propaganda for approving the oath embodied in 13 and 14 George III... c. 35. The teaching of Abernethy and of Francis Hutcheson had diffused a rationalistic spirit amongst the Ulster Preshyterians. The schisms of the "New Lights" in 1726, and of the rigid Covenanters twenty years later, hroke their power. The toleration of 1778 sprang, as Charlemont said, "rather from fashionable Deism than from Christianity which is now unfortunately much out of fashion." But the latitudinarian phase soon The Evangelical movement passed away. and the Ultramontane revival emhittered the animosities caused by the rebellion and its suppression, by O'Connell's agitations, hy the Church Temporalities Act of 1833, the appropriation clause of 1835, the tithe war, and the education question. The position of the Establishment was indefensible. The enfranchisement of the Catholics (1793) sealed its doom. The Protestants realised their danger. and made an express guarantee of the rights of the Church an indispensable condition of the Union. This policy was for a time successful, hut no guarantee could permanently maintain so glaring an abuse. In March, 868, Mr. Gladstone carried resolutions condemning the existence of the Church as an Establishment. A dissolution followed in the autumn, and the Liberals acceded to power. In the first session of the new Parliament an Act "to put an end to the Established Church in Ireland, and to make provision in respect of the temporalities thereof," became law. The Episcopalians availed themselves of the change thus wrought in their position to revise their constitution and liturgy in an anti-sacerdotal sense. The Catholic Church has made great material progress during the last half century, while her discipline has been thoroughly reformed under the vigorous rule of a new school of prelates. "Secularism has of late begun to threaten her political power. The Presbytcrians are still the strongest and most numerous communion in the North.

Irish Land Acts. [Land Lagislarion, Irish.]

Irish Society, The. Under James I. a committee was formed by twelve of the London city companies, to colonise the confiscated lands of O'Neil and O'Donnell in Ulster, and the Ulster plantation, with Locdonderry and Coleraine as chief towns, was the result (1613). The charter was taken away in 1637, but restored, though with some changes, in 1670. This corporation still owns much land in the north of Ireland.

Isabella of Angoulême (d. 1246), second wife of King John, was the daughter of Almeric, Count of Angoulême. She was betrothed to Hugh of Lusignan, but when John became enamoured of her, in 1200, she was married to him, on the divorce of his first wife, Hadwisa, who was put away on the plea of consanguinity, while Isabella's betrothal was likewise annulled. After John's death she returned to Angoulême, and in 1220 she married her former lover, Hugh of Lusignan, whom she induced to transfer his allegiance from the French king to her sen Henry III. This step resulted in the war in Poitou, in which Henry and his step-father were beaten, and Isabella had, in 1244, to flee to the abbey of Fontevraud, "where," says Matthew Paris, "she was hid in a secret chamber, and lived at her ease, though the Poitevins and the French, considering her the cause of the disastrous war, called her by no other name than Jezebel, instead of her rightful appellation of Isabel." At Fontevraud she took the veil, and shortly afterwards died.

Blatthew Paris, Hist. Anglor.

Isabella, wife of Edward II. (b. 1292, d. 1358), was the daughter of Philip IV. of France. She was betrothed to Prince Edward in 1301, and the marriage took place in 1308. Her husband's attachment to Gaveston alienated her from him, and towards all his confidential ministers she displayed a settled aversion. She seems to have been very popular with the baronial party, and more particularly with the citizens of London, The insult offered to her by Lord Badlesmere, who refused to allow her to enter Leeds Castle, Kent, was the cause indirectly of the temporary downfall of the baronial party, and the defeat of Lancaster at Boroughbridge. It is doubtful whether Isabella had formed any intimacy with Mortimer previously to her journey to France in 1325, but some writers assert that it was by her means that he effected his escape from the Tower. A dispute having arisen between Edward II. and his brother-in-law, the French king, Isabella was sent over to France to arrange the matter in 1325. Having induced the king to send over Prince Edward to join her, she openly declared her intention of returning to England to deliver her husband from the hands of the Despencers. Many of the excited and discontented barons had assembled at the French court, and with their aid and the troops she obtained from Hainault, sho got together a sufficient force to enable her to venture on invading England. She landed in Sept., 1326, near Harwich, where she was joined by many of the nobles. Her party gradually gathered strength as she marched westward against the king. Edward surrendered, the Despencers were executed, and shortly afterwards the king was deposed, and Prince Edward placed on the throne. From this time till the end of 1330 the queen and her paramour, Mortimer, were supreme. Edward II. was, in all probability, put to a cruel death, the greater part of the royal revenues were placed in the queen's lands, and all attempts to give the young king a real share in the government were defeated. The terror which these two confederates had managed to establish was seen by the way in which the conspiracy of the Earl of Kent, the uncle of the young king, the Archbishop of York, and the Bishop of London, was suppressed. Kent was seized and put to death. But a more formidable movement was now made. King Edward, acting in alliance with some of the barons, suddenly seized Mortimer at Nottingham (1330), and had him speedily tried and executed. The queen was excluded from all further share in the government, and compelled to pass the remainder of her life in retirement at Castle Rising, on a yearly allowance of £3,000.

Isabella (d. 1409), was the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and at the age of eight, in 1396 became the second wife of Richard II. By this marriage an end was put for a time to the war between the two countries. After her husband's deposition she returned to France, but for some time resolutely refused to marry again, retaining her belief that Richard was still alive, and attempting more than once to join him. In 1406, being convinced of his death, she married Charles, Duke of Orleans. [RICHARD II.]

Isabella (b. 1332, d. 1379), the eldest daughter of Edward III., was betrothed to Count Louis of Flanders, in 1347. This marriage, however, was distasteful to the young noble, and he escaped into France to aveid fulfilling the contract. Eighteen years later (July, 1365), she was married to Ingebrand de Coucy, who had, in the previous year, come to England as a hostage for King John of France. Her husband was made Earl of Bedford soon after the birth of his first child (1366). De Coucy, in the course of the next few years, went over to the French interests, and was at last parted from his wife, who returned to England after her husband had renounced all his English estates (circa 1377). Two years later she died.

Mrs. Green, Lives of the Princesses of England.

Isabella (b. 1214, d. 1241), the second daughter of King John, was married to the Emperor Frederick II., in the year 1235, after negotiations had been set on foot for her marriage with Alexander II. of Scotland (1220), and even with Henry, King of the Romans (1225), the son of her future husband. In 1238 the new empress gave birth to a son, who was named Henry, after his uncle Henry III. Isabella does not seem to have enjoyed the society of her husband much, as she lived for the most part by herself at Noenta. In 1241, however, she met her brother Richard on his return from the Holy Land, though not without considerable difficulty. Isabella died at Foggia towards the close of the same year. Henry III.'s grief for his sister's death was so great that he gave the large sum of £208 68, 8d. to his almoner to be distributed among the poer in one day for his sister's soul. Her son Henry, in later years, became titular "King of Jerusalem," but died in 1254 at the age of sixteen-" a victim, as is generally supposed, to the traitorous artifices of his brother Conrad."

Island Scots, The, seem to have settled in Ireland some time during the reign of Henry VIII. These Redshanks, as they were often called, were most them Highlanders, and they issued form from their Ulster fastnesses for the sake of plunder. The efforts of the Earl of Sussex as Lord Deputy, and of Ormonde, were insufficient for repressing them. Their chief, Mac-Connel, was as a rule the close ally of the terrible O'Neils; but about 1564 Shane ()'Neil attacked them and defeated them in a great battle, killing their chiefs. In revenge for this defeat, Oge MacConnel, the brother of the slain chief, caused Shane, when a suppliant in his camp, to be brutally murdered. During the whole of the troubles of Elizabeth's reign, they held Antrim and Down; during the reign of James I., too, till the year 1619, when Sir Randal MacConnel, or MacDonald, was their chief.

Island Voyage, THz, is the name given to the disastrous expedition to the Azores undertaken by Essex and Raleigh in 1597.

Isles, Lords of the Lords of the Isles claimed their descent from Somerlaed, Regulus of Argyle, who towards the middle of the twelfth century obtained possession of half of the Sudereys. [Herrides.] Douglas has quoted a letter, dated 1292, bidding Alexander de Insulis Scotize to keep the peace within his bounds of the isles till the next meeting of Parliament. The same authority mentions an indenture, dated 1334, by which Baliol yielded to John, Lord of the Isles of Mull, Skye, Islay, and other islands, while that nobleman in return became the liegeman of the king. In later years, how-ever, John seems to have done homage to David II. (circa 1344). In 1356 Edward III. treated with him as an independent prince, and in the treaty for the liberation of King David (1357) the truce between England and Scotland included John of the Isles and all the other English allies. Though some years later John of the Isles (d. 1387) bound himself to answer for all taxes the king might impose on his domains, yet he was to all intents and purposes an independent prince, and was the first to assume the title of Lord of the Isles. He was succeeded by his son David, who claiming the earldom of Man in right of his wife, invaded the Lowlands, and was defeated at Harlaw, near Aberdeen (1411). His son Alexander, who succeeded to his father about 1426, was forced to beg pardon for the rebellion he raised against James I., "attired in his shirt and drawers and kneeling before the high altar of Holyrood Church." Alexander's son John, who was Lord of the Isles from 1449 to 1498, joined in the Douglas rebellion of 1451; and in 1481 was in treasonable communication with Edward IV., for which he was outlawed, and several of the island chieftains transferred their allegiance from him to the crown. From this time the glory of the lordship disappeared; the title was indeed resumed by a John of Islay under James V.; but it was only an empty vaunt. The real power on the western coast passed from the Macdonalds to the Campbells, though the former long kept up a kind of royal state in Skye.

Douglas, Peerage of Scotland.

Talip, Smon (d. 1366), Archbishop of Canterbury (1349—1366), was one of the royal secretaries, and on the death of Bradwardine was appointed to the metropolitan see. He is famous as an ecclesiastical reformer, and did much to remedy some of the crying abuses in the Church. He boldly reproved Edward III. for the extravagance and luxury of his court and household, and assisted in enacting the famous Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire which were levied against the oppressions of the Popes. The conduct of this archbishop on several occasions merits great praise; especially so in the case of the Flagellunts, who in the early days of his office were swarming into England. These he found on enquiry to be mere enthusiasts, and not men of loose lives; hence he left thoir frenzy to die of its own accord, and would not encourage it by persecution. In 1359 we find him ordering prayers throughout the kingdom for the success of Edward III.'s French expedition.

Italy, RELATIONS WITH. As Italy has only recently become a single state, its relations with England are very hard to define. In a sense, all the relations of England with Imperial and Papal Rome come within this question. The literary and civilising influences which the home of ancient culture has constantly exercised on mediæval England, have a still more direct claim for treatment. But the mero political relations of the various governments of Italy and England only necessitate a much more cursory consideration. The States of medieval Italy were too small, too self-centred, and too remote to have many direct political declings with the distant and barbarous English. Some of the more important transactions will be found under Empire, Relations with, Papacy, Relations with, etc. The close friendship of the Normans of England with the Normans of Naples, especially as instanced in the effect upon each other of the systems of government of Henry II. and William the Good—the long struggle of Henry III. to get Naples for his son Edmund of Lancaster—the influence of Italian lawyers and financiers on Edward I. -the want of faith of Edward III. to his Florentine creditors—our commercial dealings with Venice, are, if we leave literary connections out of sight, perhaps the most important examples of direct relations between the two countries during the Middle Ages. The struggles of Henry VIII. to enter into the European system which was formed almost in consequence of the breakup of the political system of mediæval Italy -his political alliance with the Pope and the Venetiuns—his efforts to exclude both French and Imperial influences in turn, are of small importance when con pared with the influence of the New Learning on the spiritual and intellectual life of the country, or even the indirect political influences of Italian examples of tyronny in an age when Thomas Cromwell learnt his methods of government from the Prince of Machiavelli. Despite the cessation of all religious dealings in consequence of the Reformation, and of mostpolitical dealings as the result of the subjection of Italy to the Austro-Spanish house, the literary and civilising—too often the corrupt-ing—influence of Italy on England was never stronger than during the Elizabethan age. All writers, from Harrison to Ascham and Shakespeare, largely testify to its importance. Yet, hardly excepting the constant intercourse with Venico—whose diplomatists still embodied the results of their objective study or our affairs in their despatches and Reluzioniour political de. lings with Italy were unimportant. This 13 especially the case during the seventeenth century, a period peculiarly barren in its foreign relations. James I.'s sympathy for Father Paul and the Venetians -Cromwell's intervention on behalf of tho Vaudois of Piedmont—the Travels of Duke Cosimo III. of Tuscany in England during the reign of Charles II.—the marriage of James II. with Maria of Modena—are fair instances of the sort of relations that existed between the two countries. After the Revolution of 1688 had agair. made England a great European power, our political dealings with Italy became more important. The assistance England from time to time gave to the rising power of Piedmont, excited great indignation from the Austrians. For example, the Treaties of Worms (1743) and Aachen (1748), and the consequent rupture between Austria and England. The vigour which compelled Don Carlos of Naples to abandon his allies during the same war may also be men-tioned as illustrating the natural hostility of England to the Bourbon Kings of Naples. Yet English fleets protected the Neapolitan partners of the Family Compact when, in evil days for monarchy, the French Directory and the Empire successively drove them from the mainland. Nelson's unfortunate dealings with Naples, the gallant incursion which led to the ctory of Maida, are conspicuous instances of English relations with that monarchy. The gradual emancipation of nineteenth century Italy, associated as it is with the name of Baribaldi, has constantly found warm sympathy from English public opinion, though the colder support of English diplomacy drove Cavour to seek in Napoleonic France a strange ally in a struggle for national liberty. [T. F. T.]

Jacobites, The (from Jacobus, the Latin for James), were the adherents of the Stuart cause after the Revolution of 1688. The expulsion of James II. had been effected with surprisingly little difficulty; but the unpopularity of the new government, the crushing taxation which the great war involved, the party triumph of the Whigs, the presence of James in Ireland, and the reaction which always succeeds revolution, had produced in a very short time a formidable party of friends of the exiled house. The Tories and lligh Churchmen began to realise that the Revolution could be justified only on Whig principles, when, despite the efforts of William III., the Whigs assumed the control of the administration. The very Churchmen who had led tho opposition to a Popish king became the founders of the schism of the Non-jurors. They and the Catholics could not be other than avowed Jacobites. But among the nominal adherents of William there was a class of what a prominent Whig called "Nonjuring swearers," whose acquiescence in the Revolution was at best formal, whose more active section might be relied upon to join a Jacobite revolt, and whose passive section would, at least, welcome the restoration of the exiled dynasty. A large section of the Tory party fell within the latter category. "Several in England," writes a Jacobite agent, "wish the king well who would not risk their estates for him. If he came with ten thousand men, not a sword would be drawn against him." Thus there were, besides the avowed Jacobites, the Nonjurors, and the Catholics, a very large class of Jacobite sympathisers. There were, moreover, a large number of prominent statesmen who, in an age of loose political morality, did not scruple to secure a safe retreat for themselves in the event of the restoration of King James. Many of the great Whig and Tor leaders-Russell, Leeds, Shrewsbury, Godolphin, Marlborough—carried on an active intrigue with the banished king. Besides the above classes, there was a nucleus for organisatiou in the exiled Court of St. Germain, whence many a subtle and experienced intriguer set forth to win back for the king his lost throne. The active support of the French could be relied upon; and, besides the English Jacobites, they could rely, in Scotland, on the bulk of the Highland clans, more jealous of the Whig clan of the Campbells than zealors for divine right, but ever ready to revi e the glories of Montrose and Dundee. The persecuted Episcopalian sect in the Lowlands were Jacobites to a man; and, after the Darien episode had re-kindled the national animosity of Scotland against England, the Jacobite emissaries were not without hope even that Whigs and Presbyterians might be impelled by patriotism to support the old line of Scottish monarchs. In Ireland, after the failure of James II.'s forces and the triumph of the English, there was little chance of any Jacobite movement. Religions and national sentiment brought the Irish to the side of James. The penal code and the Protestant ascendancy made revolt impossible. Still, something could be hoped for if England were to rise.

When the appeal to arms had proved unavailing in Scotland and Ireland, and a French landing had been made impracticable by the victory of La Hogue, a series of plots and conspiracies—aimed against the life and throne of William-kept up the activity of the Jacobite party. Of these, the Assassination Plot was the most famous. But such atrocities only had the effect of weakening the Jacobite cause. Combined with the sturdy bigotry of James and his traitorous dependence on the foreign enemy of England, it alienated the bulk of the Tory party, on whom the hopes of the exiled house really depended. Even the Jacobite party split up into Compounders, who were only anxious for a conditional restoration, with constitutional guarantees, and the Non-Compounders, who, in blind adherence to the theories of divine right and passive obedience, thought it downright Whiggery to impose terms on the Lord's anointed. The prevalence of Non-Compounding views at St. Germains, the refusal of James to abdicate in his son's favour or bring him up a Protestant, completed the alienation of the Jacobites from English popular senti-ment. The Peace of Ryswick was, for a time, fatal to their hope of French aid. The passing of the Act of Settlement, in a Tory Parliament, marks the lowest point of their fortunes.

Under Queen Anne, the Jacobite policy was changed. The death of James was a great help to it. His son, James III., as he styled himself-the Chevalier de St. George, or the Old Pretender, as others styled himwas at least personally innocent; and his recognition by Louis XIV., and the renewal of hostilities with England, revived the hopes of the party. But most was expected from the development of the High Church Toryism, of which Dr. Sacheverell was the popular exponent. The Scotch Jacobites might, indeed, under cover of hostility to the Union, assail the queen's throne; but the English Jacobites directed their main efforts to secure the succession on her death, to avail themselves of Anne's notorions affection for her family and dislike of the House of Brunswick, and even to obtain, by peaceful means, a repeal of the Act of Settlement. The Ministry of Harley and Bolingbroke put all the resources of the State in the hands of the Jacobite intriguers. The army was newly modelled under the Jacobite Ormonde. All possible means were taken to secure the proclamation of James on the queen's approaching death. But the quarrel of Harley and Bolingbroke, the new attitude of the Whigs in Church matters, the coup d'état which made Shrewsbury Treasurer, and tho premature death of the queen, frustrated the well-laid plan. George I. peacefully ascended the throne. The Tory ministers were im-peached, imprisoned, exiled. The death of Louis XIV., and the anxiety of the Regent Orleans to be on good terms with England, was the culminating disaster. Bolingbroke was now the Pretender's Secretary of State. His hopes died when the old king expired; but either James was too obstinate or the news cume too late to stop the revolt in the Highlands, which was the outcome of the intrigues of the last few years.

Under such gloomy circumstances, the first great Jacobite rising—the affuir of 1715 -began; the offspring of levity or despair, after the death of Anne and Louis XIV. had mado any external assistance impossible. Ormondo mado u gallant but ineffectual attempt to land in Devonshire; but there, as elsewhere, the planned revolt of the friends of James was prevented by the vigour and activity of the new government. The arrest of six Tory members of Parliament deprived the Jacobites of leaders. The University of Oxford and the western counties were dragooned into loyalty; only in Northumberland was a rising effected in England, and the choice of Mr. Forster as its loader was fatal to its small hopes of success. Meanwhile, more formidable risings had broken out in Scotland. Or. Oct. 12 Lord Kenmure proclaimed King James at Moffut. Foiled at Dumfries, but joined by Lords Nithisdale, Wintoun, and Carnwath, with two hundred horse, he crossed the borders, and joined Forster's "handful of Northumberland Foxhunters." But the Highland revolt alone possessed any real importance. This was led by Lord Mar, who, after uccepting George 1., had suddenly hurried north; and on Sept. 6 had raised his standard in Braemar. A large number of the clans joined him; and, despite his personal incompetence and failure to surprise Edinburgh Castle, he entered Perth, detached Brigadier Macintosh to join Kenmure and Forster, and ultimately advanced against Argyle, appointed to command King George's forces in Scotland. On Nov. 13 the Battle of Sheriffmuir, near Stirling, was fought, and Mar was compelled to retreat northwards. The landing of the Pretender at Peterhead could not revive the falling cause. James and Mar re-embarked for the Continent, and the insurgent army was dispersed. The southern rebels, after a fruitless march southward to Preston, in Lancashire, surrendered at that town to the royal forces. The chief prisoners were tried and executed. The last hope of the Jacobites was destroyed by the dismissal of Bolingbroke. The expulsion of the Pretender from France ratified the ulliance of England and her old enemy. So little formidable were the Jacobites now, that Harley's impeachment was dropped; and, though the intrigues of Alberoni and the plot of Bishop Atterbury for awhile revived interest in the cause, the long ministry of Walpole, his policy of conciliation and peace, and the similar disposition of the French government, postponed the hopes of the Jacobites for a generation.

In 1742, the fall of Walpole revived political intrigue, and the renewal of war with France gave the Jacobites fresh hopes of French aid. In Prince Charles, the young Pretender, the party found a more gallant and romantic loader than in James, his father. Undeterred by the disastrous storm which wrecked the French transports and ruined the projected invasion in 1744, Charles landed near Moidart, with seven followers, on July 25, 1745. Joined by Lochiel, und by other important chieftains, Charles found little difficulty in gathering a great army of the clans, and was accepted as Prince by the greater part of the Highlands Sir John Cope, the dened his strong English commander and left the road to position at Corry A .. Perth, the Duke of the Lowlands open ... Perth, the Duke of Perth and Lord George Murray joined the Pretender's cause. After the "Canter of ('ol.brigg," in which the regulars fled in disgraceful panic from the irregular Highland hordes, Edinburgh was occupied by Charles. On Sept. 20 the battle of Preston Pans inflicted on Cope the defeat he had avoided -Corry Arrack. After a brief period of i tion and gaiety, Charles started in Novem. on an invasion of England. Ho besieged and conquered Carlislo, and, helped by the inactivity of Marshal Wade, marched far into the heart of England. At Manchester some slight leeling in the Pretender's favour was manifested; but, us a rule, tho population, though not very zealous for an unpopular and foreign monarch, wero perfectly indifferent to the cause of the Jacobites. On Dec. 4 Charles entered Derby, but the division of his followers, and the vastly superior forces of Wude and Cumberland, necessitated a retreat. Meanwhile, tho Lowlands of Scotland had quietly renewed their allegiance to George when the backs of the Highlanders were turned. Followed closely by a superior army, Charles retired hastily to Glasgow; but, strengthened by new Highland reinforcements, he gave battle on Jan. 23, 1746, to General Hawley at Fulkirk. The wild charge of the Highlanders again won the day; but they dispersed to their homes with the booty, and Charles, deserted on every side, was driven to bay on Culloden Moor on April 16. Cumberland, with 12,000 regular troops, mado short work of the dispirited clansmen. The revolt was over. The Highlands were subdued thoroughly, and for the first time. The abolition of the heritable jurisdictions destroyed the power of the chiefs, and for ever put un end to Highland revolts. Charles, after many adventures, escaped to France.

The very success of the "Forty Five" demonstrated the hopelessness of a Jacobite reaction. The national, religious, and political principles of the vast bulk of the nation made it impossible. The age was not one favourable for lost causes or chivalrous hallucinations. The party which adhered steadfastly to obsolete political doctrine, which found in France its constant supporter, and in Catholicism its congenial creed, could make no way in eightcenth century England. Charles himself visited London in 1750, if not on later occasions; but he soon gave up politics for arink and debauchery. The brilliant successes of Pitt reconciled his party to the new administration. The accession of George 111. was gladly availed of as an excuse for a return to their allegiance. The new Tory party was purged from all suspicion of Jacobitism. Inder George III. that party became tri-umphant. The downfall of the Whigs was the downfall of the last hope of the Jacobites. But years before that, none but a few theorists of divino right, or the fanatics of Nonjuring, hoped for a Jacobite restoration.

Jacquetta of Luxemburg (d. 1472) was the daughter of the Count de St. Pol, and was married in 1433 to John, Duke of Bedford. After his death she became the wife of Sir Richard Woodville, and by him was the mother of Elizabeth Woodville, the queen of Edward IV.

Jamaica is the largest of the British West Indian Islands. It was first discovered by Columbus, May 2, 1494, was colonised by the Spaniards in 1509, and held by them until the English captured it in 1655. The Spanish rule proved most disastrous to the island, and it is said that when our troops took possession of the country there was not a single aboriginal inhabitant remaining. In 1605 the capital of the island, St. Iago, which had been founded by Diego Columbus in 1526, was taken by a British fleet under Sir Anthony Shirloy. In 1655 the island was captured by General Venables, and measures for its settlement were taken by Cromwell, who issued an ordinance to the effect that no duty should be levied on any goods exported to Jamaica. The island was at first governed by a military council, and many of the troops were disbanded, and induced to form settlements. In 1662 the island was divided for municipal purposes into seven parishes, under regular magistrates, and, two years later, a legislative assembly was created. By the Treaty of Madrid, 1670, Jamaica was formally ceded to England, and speedily became one of the most valuable possessions of the crown. The history of Jamaica from this time is little more than a record of slave insurrections and Maroon wars. From 1664 till 1740 the Maroons continued in more or less open hostility to the colonists, and it was found necessary to maintain in the island a large force of regular troops. In 1760 a formidable insurrection took place, which was followed by another in 1765, caused principally by the ill-treatment to which the slaves were subjected, and by the inhuman punishments inflicted on them. Thirty years later (1795) another rebellion broke out, in spite of an Act which had been passed three years before for ameliorating the position of the slaves. The attempts of the English government on behalf of the negroes, and stamore the representations which were gradelly being made in England in favour of the abolition of slavery, had the effect of stirring up much ill feeling amongst the colonists of Jamaica, who talked freely of separating from England and joining the United States. The negroes, believing that the planters were wrongfully keeping their liberty from them, rose en masse in 1831, in spite of the efforts of the clergy to restrain their violence. The rebellion was crushed with great severity and much needless cruelty. In 1833 a bill for the Abolition of Slavery was passed, and from Aug. 1, 1834. all slaves were to be set free, and to become apprenticed labourers. This act, however did but little towards alleviating the sufferings of the negroes, and in 1836 a Parlia. mentary Committee was appointed to enquire into the question, with the result that, in 1838, in spite of the protests of the Jamaica assembly, apprenticeship was abolished, thus averting another impending insurrection. The decline of Jamaica is sometimes erroneously ascribed to the abolition of slavery; it had commenced a century before, and was due to insular jealousy and misrule. When the mismanagement of affairs in Jamaica had become only too apparent in 1839, a motion to suspend the constitution of the government for five years was lost by so narrow a majority as to cause the fall of the English ministry. From 1864 till 1866 the government was carried on by a governor, council, and representative assembly. In 1865 a rebellion broke out and was repressed with great severity by Governor Eyre. On Dec. 21, 1865, the representative constitution was abolished by the legislature, this abolition being afterwards confirmed by the British Parliament. Affairs have since been administered by a governer, appointed by the crown, assisted by a legislative assembly, partly elected and partly nominated. Besides the assembly, there is a privy council, net exceeding eight in number, who are either named by the king or appointed by the governor, subject to the approval of the crown. Jammics is at the present time making considerable progress. Of her two great difficulties, that of the slaves has disappeared, and that of the mismanagement of the land is rapidly being smoothed away.

James I., King of Scotland (b. 1394, s. 1424, d. 1437), the second son of Robert Ill., was captured, when only eleven years old, by an English ship whilst on his way to the court of France to receive his education there (1405). On his father's death (1406), he was acknowledged King of Scotland, the regency being undertaken by Albany, to whose machinations his capture and subsequent long eaptivity have been ascribed. Whilst a prisoner in England, James, naturally a man of great ability, received an education which eminently fitted him to play the part of king, and made him one of the most accomplished princes of his age. After the death of Albany (1419), negotiations for his release were commenced which at last ended in his return home, where he was crowned at Scone, May, 1424. Before he left England, James I. had inarried Jane Beaufort, daughter of the Earl of Somerset, and cousin of Henry V. The effect of his English education was soon apparent on his return to Scotland; his first act was to put to death the regent Murdoch of Albany for abusing his power, a step which was quickly followed by the re-constitution of the Scottish Parliament, the reformation of the statute law, and a general valuation of all property for the purposes of taxation. In 1427 James seized and imprisoned sundry turbulent Highland chieftains at Inverness, and declared his intention of putting down the acts of lawlessuess which were so common. In 1436 he sent his daughter to France to be married to the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XI., thus cementing the connection which already existed between Scotland and the French court. Meanwhile, the king's reforms, his attempts to diminish the power of the great nobles, and the necessity of imposing taxes, gave rise to a conspiracy against him. On the night of Feb. 20, 1437, he was brutally murdered, in the abbey of Black Friars at Perth, by a band of 300 conspirators headed by Sir Robert Graham. This murder was amply avenged by his queen, whom the assassins had spared in their hurry. James I. was perhaps the ablest king Scotland had yet known; he was a man of letters, a lover of justice, a prince actuated by the desire of doing good to his country and people. He was the only poet of real genius in either England or Scotland during the fifteenth century. His King's Quair and Christe's Kirk on the Green have been justly praised. His Poetical Remains were published by Mr. Tytler in 1783.

James II., King of Scotland (b. 1430, s. 1437, d. 1460), was the son of James I. After his ceronation at Holyrood he was immediately conveyed by his mether to Edinburgh Castle for safety. The queen, alarmed at the action of Sir William Crichton, the governor of the eastle, soon centrived to escape te Stirling. Here, however, Criehton succeeded in seizing the young king, who himself did net begin to rule for some years. In 1449 James married Mary, daughter of the Duke of Gueldres. Three years afterwards, in a fit of passion, he stabbed with his own hand William, Earl of Donglas, who had been for some timo past in more er less open rebellion to the royal authority. The king was new at war with the house of Douglas, whose estates were declared forfeited to the crown (1454). In 1460 James, who was of a flery and warlike nature, crossed the English border at the head of a large army to lend nid to Henry VI., but returned without effecting his object. He then undertook the reduction of the castle of Rexburgh, where he was killed by the bursting of a cannon, Aug. 3, 1460. He was on the whole a good king. We are teld that "in the time of his later days, his realm was in quiet, presperous estate, in ne fear of outward enemies, and he kept his nobles in leving and noble ebedience, and the commons in good peace." His ability, perhaps, comes out more clearly than elsewhere in his method of dealing with the Douglas rebellion. When the Earl of Douglas made alliance with the Earl of Craufurd, James succeeded in enrolling a third noble, belonging to a rival house—the Earl of Huntly-on his own side; and even centrived to split up the great family of the Denglases by winning over one of its chief members, the Earl of Angas, to the royal party (1452-54).

this family became guardian of the kingdom. In 1469 James married Margaret, daughter of Christian, King of Denmark and Norway, receiving as her dowry the Orkney and Shetland Isles. About this time the Boyds were deprived of the estates which the royal bounty had conferred upon them, and the head of the house, the Earl of Arran, who had married the king's sister, was forced to flee into England, Shortly afterwards James oxpressed a wish to lead an army to the assistance of Louis XI. against the Duke of Burgundy, and was only prevented by the action of the Estates. Ho is said to have had his brother, the Earl of Mar, put to death, and in 1479 his other brother, Albany, was compelled to seek refuge in France. Meanwhile James's partiality for favourites of low tastes, notably two, named Cochrane and Rogers, gave rise to a conspiracy against him on the part of the Scottish nobles, who seized and hanged several of them at Lander (1482), where the king had halted on an expedition which had set out to invade England. James, too, was carried to Edinburgh, where, however, he was soon set at liberty, at the request of his brother Albany, who had now recurred from France. Before long it was remoured that the king was in private treaty with England for the purpose of getting assistance in his contemplated vengeance on his enemies. The Estates of the Realm now formed a confeders by against their sovereign, and raised a cry that the young prince, afterwards James IV., was in danger. But the king raised a large army in the North of Scotland, and attacked the rebellious lords at Sauchieburn, near Stirling. He was, however, defeated, and fled for refuge into a house called Beaton's Mill, near Bannockburn, where he was stabbed by an unknown hand, June 18, 1488. James III. was a bad ruler, and a man of avaricious and cowardly disposition. Ho was charged with drawing his chief friends from the lowest ranks of society; but how far this accusation is strictly true is considered by Mr. Burton to be a doubtful point. For, as this historian points out, the "mason" Cochrane may have been, in reality, the architect of the "noble buildings which, about this time, began to adorn Scotland;" while Rogers the "musician" may have been no mere performer of other men's music, but a great composer. In any case the rude nobility of Scotland were little car ,ble of distinguishing between the various grades of artistic work.

Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

James IV., King of Scotland (b. 1473, s. 1488, d. 1513), succeeded his father James III., after the battle of Sauchieburn, 1488, and at once found himself compelled to guard against a plot, formed for the purpose of seizing his person by Henry VII., with the aid of Lord Bothwell. In 1495 James hospitably received Perkyn Warbeck at his court, and the following year sent an expedition across the borders on his behalf. This, howover, came to nothing, and shortly afterwards James contrived to get rid of his visitor. In 1497 Henry began to make overtures of peace to Scotland, and in 1502 James IV. married the Princess Margaret of England, and joined the English and Spanish alliance. In 1512 a dispute arose with England out of the capture of some Scotch vessels in the Downs; the French alliance was vehemently pressed upon the king by the Queen of France, who appointed him her knight to maintain her own and her country's cause against their common English enemy. Urged by her entreaties and his own wrongs, James determined to undertake the disastrous campaign, which ended in his total defeat, and was followed by his death at Flodden Field (Sept. 9, 1513). The king left behind him the character of a brave soldier and a just administrator, though his private life is open to severe blame. "For his political government and due administration of justice, which he exercised during the time of his reign, he deserveth to be numbered among the best princes that ever reigned over that nation." To James IV. must be ascribed the establishment of the first officient navy possessed by Scotland, and the settlement of the Highlands, by distributing garrisons throughout the turbulent districts. With regard to the first of these two achiever ents, letters of marque were given to two Scotch sea-captains, Sir Alexander Wood and Sir Andrew Barton, who cleared the S.otch coast of English pirate vessels, and carried on their depredations against English and other nations. We are told that towards the close of the reign the Scotch navy consisted of no less than thirteen vessels, one of which, the Michael, was the marvel of its day for bulk. The settlement of the Highlands was largely assisted by using the influence of two great familiesthe Hnntlys and the Argyles—who, though Lowland in their origin, had by marriage or other means been gradually acquiring immense possessions and influence in the Highland districts; and this influence James did not scruple to manipulate, so far as he could for the purposes of strengthening the royal authority in those remote parts.

Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

James V., King of Scotland (b. 1512, s. 1513, d. 1542), the son of James IV. and Margaret of England, succeeded his father after the fatal battle of Flodden. As he was not quite two years old, the regency was entrusted to his cousin, the Duke of Albany, who was invited over from France—of which country he was admiral—to undertake this office, at the request of the Estates of the Realm (1515). The queen-dowager, who had married the Larl of Angus almost immediately after her first husband's death, was soon obliged to yield up her son, whom she had carried off for mfety to Stirling Castle. Within a year of his first landing, the regent had crushed all attempts at rebellion, and very soon left Scotland, after having placed French garrisons in several of tho strongest fortresses. In Albany's absence, Angus seemed likely to secure the chief power, had he not offended his wife, who urged the absent regent to return (1521). At last, after various fluctuations, and the interference of Wolsey, the young king was installed in Edinburgh as king, and the regency tak a away from the Duke of Albany (1524). But, despite the apparent pacification, the great nobles, Angus, Argyle, and Errol, were struggling for power among themselves, and the young king was kept in close duress, till, in 1528, he managed to escape to Stirling. James now took the government into his own hands, and Angus was driven into England. The details of domestic government, the reduction of the lawless borderers and the Highland clans, occupied the next few years of the reign.

In spite of the failure of the proposed alliance with the Princess (afterwards queen) Mary, and in spite of various border frays, a peace was concluded with England in 1534, though James rejected all proposals for a meetiug with his uncle, believing that his safety would be endanger. 3. In 1536, tho king, whilst at the court of France on a visit, undertaken with the object of marrying Mary, daughter of the Duke of Vendome, fell in love with and married Magdalen, the French king's daughter. Next year, however, the queen died, and James married Mary, daughter of the Duke of Guise (June, 1538). On his return home, the king had begun to occupy himself with domestic sffairs, and succeeded in alienating a great number of the nobility by confiscating many estates which had passed into their hands during his minority. Towards the close of his reign he roused his uncle, Henry VIII., to fury by promising to meet him at York, and failing to keep his word through Henry at once declared war on the ground that James was acting treacherously towards England, and the Scotch king could not prevail upon his nobles to cross the border. The disorganisation in his army was taken advantage of by the enemy, and the defeat of Solway Moss was the consequence. A fow days afterwards (Dec. 14, 1542), the unfortunate monarch died at Falkland, having just before his death received the tidings of the birth of a daughter, afterwards the famous Mary, Queen of Scots. From his restraint of the nobles, his lavish expenditure, his accomplishments, and his carelessness, he was a favourite with his people, by whom he was long remembered as "the King of the Commens."

Burton, Hist, of Scotland; Froude, Hist. of Eng.; State Papers, Henry VIII., with Mr. Brewer's Introduction.

James I., Kino (Jumes VI. of Scotland), (b. June 19, 1506, s. in Scotland, July 24, 1567, in England, Mar. 24, 1603, d. Mar. 27, 1625), was the son of Mary of Scotland and of Henry Darnley. He was entrusted to the care of the Eari of Mar, and of Alexander Erskine, and his principal tutor was the ceiebrated George Buchanan. In 1578 the regency was taken from the Eari of Morton, and James was henceforth, in name at least, ruler of Scotland. His reign in Scotland was, to a large extent, a quarrel with the clergy and the nobles In 1581 the General Assembly resoived to aboiish Episcopacy; and James, who had been seized by some of the nobles at the raid of Ruthven (q.v.), was unable to prevent it. In 1585 he came to terms with Elizabeth, and made a treaty with her, consenting to receive a pension. The same year he was besieged by the banished lords in Stirling Castle, and was compelled to parden them, to dismiss his favourito Arran, and to deprive him of his title and estates. Notwithstanding the execution of his mother by Elizabeth, and the disregard of his intercession, he co-operated in the preparations against the Spanish Armada in 1588, and in 1589 drew closer his alliance with the Protestant powers by his marriage with Anne of Denmark (1589). A treasonable attempt was made upon him by Bothwell in 1591, and another in 1593, and in the latter year he was seized and imprisoned by that nobleman, but soon released. In 1594 he undertook a campaign sgainst Huntly and Errol, the great Catholic nobles of the north, and after a victory at Glenlivat, reduced them, and compelled them to quit the country. . They were, however, allowed to return in 1597. The breach between James sud the Presbyterian clergy had been growing wider for some time, and was increased by the publication of his work, the Basilicon Doron, and by the appointment of bishops in 1599. In 1600 occurred a somewhat mysterious plot against his life, known as the Gowrie conspiracy (q.v.). On the death of Elizabeth, James immediately set out for England, and was proclaimed king in March, 1603, being crowned at Westminster on July 25 following. He assumed the title of King of Great Britaiu, France, and Ireland the following year. In ecclesiastical matters he immedistely manifested his preference for the High Church view. The Puritans were thwarted and punished at the Hampton Court confereuce, while at the same time the Jesuits and seminary priests were ordered to quit the kingdom (Feb., 1604). The auger caused smong the Papists by these stringent measures led to the sbortive Gunpowder Plot. Jsmes almost from the first year of his reign was involved in disputes with his Parliament. chiefly turning on the questions of money and redress of grievances. In 1604 a dispute on the subject of privilege had terminated iu favour of the Commons. The government was extravagantly administered, and the expenses of the court were very great. In order to supply the deficiency in the revenue, Cecil raised loans under the privy seal, and in 1608 issued a Book of Rates, by which the customs on various articles were considerably increased. Notwithstanding in 1610, the king was obliged to ask the Commons for a large grant, which was made the subject of much barguining, until finally the Parliment was dissolved, without any result having been attained (Feb., 1611). Cecil died the following year. The chief place in the king's favour was now taken by Robert Carr, a young Scotchman, who was created Earl of Somerset. In Nov., 1612, the young Prince of Wales, Henry, of whose charter high expectations had been formed, fell ill and died. The following year James, still adhering to Cecii's policy of opposition to Spain, cemented the alliance with the German princes by marrying his daughter Elizabeth to the Elector Palatine, Frederick V. Son reset was rained and degraded by the revolation of his wife's murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, and the management of affairs was henceforth (1615) in the hands of James's second favourite, George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham. The anti-Spanish policy of Cecil was given up, and James entered into negotiations for peace and alliance with Spain. In 1614 Parliament was reassembled, and attempts were made to secure its decility by a body of managers called Undertakers. These, however, were unsuccessful; and the "Addled Parliament," as it was called, was dissolved before any business had been done. The king now resorted to several illegal means of raising money. Benevelences were collected, patents of peerage soid, and numerous monopolies let out to private individuals. In 1617 Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been in prison since 1603, on a charge of complicity in the plots against the king, was released, and allowed to lead an expedition against Guinea, where he hoped to discover gold mines. The expedition proved a failure, and Raleigh en his return was put to death. This was done in deference to Spanish susceptibilities, and was greatly resented by the people. At the beginning of the Thirty Years' War (1618) the feeling in England was strongly in favour of interference on the part of this country in favour of the Protestant Elector. James, however, refused to interfere vigorously, and trusted to his diplomatic skill to mediate between the parties and restore peace. In 1621 another Parliament was But after impeaching Bacon, the Lord Chanceller, and inquiring inte grievances, a dispute on foreign policy took place between the king and the Commons. James in anger dissolved Parliament (Jan., 1622). Negotiations were set on foot for a marriage between Prince Charles and the Spanish

Infanta, to effect which Charles and Buckingham went to Spain in 1623. Buckingham, however, quarrelled with the Spanish minis-ters, and the match was broken off (Dec., 1623). This ied to a sudden reversal of the king's policy. War was declared on Spain in March, 1624, and Count Mansfeldt was allowed to enlist troops in England for the Protest-ants in Germany. Negotiations were set on foot for a marriage between Charles and Henrietta Maria, the French Princess, but before it was completed James died. "He had," mys Mr. Gardiner, "many diffical times, doodhumoured and good-natured, he was honestly desirous of increasing the prosperity of his subjects. . . He was above all things eager to be a reconciler, to make peace where there had been war befere, and to draw those to iive in harmony who had hitherto glared at one another in mutual defiance. . . With a thorough dislike of dogmatism in others, he was himself the most dogmatic of men. . . He had none of that generosity of temper which leads the natural leaders of the human race to rejoice when they have found a worthy antagonist, ner had he, as Elizabeth had, that intuitive perception of the po ular feeling which stood her in such stead during her long career." James wrote a variety of tracts on a number of different subjects. Most of them are absolutely worthless. They were collected in 1616.

James 13., Kino (5, 1633, r. Feb. 6, 1685—Dec., 1688, d. Sept. 16, 1701), was the second son of Charles I., and Henrietta Maria. He was created Duke of York inmediately after his birth. He accompanied his father during the Civil War, and was captured by Fairfax on the surrender of Oxford, but contrived to escape, disguised as a girl, to Holland in April, 1648. He served with reputation in both the French and the Spanish armies, and was to take the command of a force for the invasion of England if the rising of Sir George Booth in 1659 had been successful. In 1660 he returned to England with his brother, and was made Lord High Admiral, subsequently receiving large grants of land in Ireland. In 1665 he took the command of the fleet against the Dutch, and showed great ability in the conduct of naval affairs. In 1669 he avowed his conversion to Roman Catholicism. and on the passing of the Test Act in 1673 ho was obliged to resign his office of Lord High Admiral. The Whig party, headed by Shaftesbury, attempted to get an Exclusion Bill passed depriving him of his right of succession to the throne, and so great was the feeling against him that in 1679 he was induced by the king to go abroad, but before long was recalled and sent as Lord High Commissioner to Scotland, where he showed such harshness and severity that he had to be recalled in 1680. He was in that year presented by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, at Shaftesbury's instigation, as a Popish recusant, but the judge, by suddenly dismissing the jury, quashed the proceedings. He returned to Scotland shortly afterwards, where he remained till 1682. In 1684 he was restored to his office of Lord High Admiral, and to his seat in the Council, and on his brother's death in the next year succeeded to the crown. James commenced his reign with disclaiming any intention of interfering with the Church, and promising a legal form of government; but his acts were not in accordance with his declarations, and his opponents, who in the last years of his brother's reign had found an asylum in Holland, at once began to concert measures for an invasion. Accordingly the Duke of Monmouth landed in England, and the Earl of Argyle in Scotland, but both failed, and the attempt of the former especially was punished with great severity. James was emboldened by this success to proceed with hasty steps in the design which he had formed of restoring Romanism. He had, at the commencement of his reign, made arrangements with that view in Scotland and Ireland, and he now ventured to extend them to England. He claimed a power of dispensing with the penal laws, disinissed his Parliament when it showed a resolution to prose him, exhausted every effort to gain converts, called such, as well as Roman ecclesiastics, to his councils, laboured to procure the repeal of the Test Act, and forbade the controversial sermons which the clergy, justly alarmed at his proceedings, felt it their duty to deliver. This injunction was disregarded, and to enforce it a new court of ecclesiastical commission was established, which suspended the Bishop of London from his office, and afterwards perpetrated the most flagrant injustice on both universities. The king induced the judges to give a decision in favour of the dispensing power, and he followed this up by forming a camp on Hounslow Heath, the officers of which were chiefly Romanists. He had already published a Declaration of Indulgence (April, 1687), and sedulously courted the Protestant Nonconformists; but they in general mistrusted him, and declined to forward the restoration of Romanism by joining in his attack on the Church. Undeterred by this, he ordered the Declaration to be read in all churches, and on seven of the bishops petitioning against this he sent them to the Tower on the charge of libelling the king. They were soon after put on their trial and acquitted. Just at this juncture a son and heir was born to James, and was considered by the people to be a supposititious child. Meanwhile a number of the leading statesmen of all parties requested James's son-intaw, William of Orange, to come over to England to secure his wife's right to the throne, and protect the liberties and religion of the English people. Accordingly William issued a manifesto, and eventually landed in England on Nov. 5, 1688. James now attempted to retrace his steps. He reinstated the Bishop of London, made such reparation as he could to the universities, and dismissed his most obnoxious counsellors; but he could not regain the confidence of his people. His army melted away, and the prince advanced towards London. James, deserted by most of his friends, sent his queen and infant son to France, and attempted to follow them, quitting Whitehall in disguise on Dec. 11. He was, however, seized near Faversham, and brought back to London, whence in a few days he was removed to Rochester, and was then allowed to escape to France, landing at Ambleteuse on Christmas Day. He was kindly received by Louis, who warmly espoused his cause, and assisted him with troops in his expedition to Ireland in 1689. Landing at Kinsale, he was received with enthusiasm by the Catholics, and for some time seemed likely to succeed in making himself at all events master of Ireland, but the raising of the siege of Londonderry was a great blow to him and in 1690 (July 1) he was totally routed by William in the battle of the Boyne, after which he fied to France. James spent the remainder of his life at St. Germains, engaged in intrigues for recovering possession of his lost grown, but constantly finding his hopes dashed to the ground. James married first Anne Hyde (Sept. 3, 1660), daughter of Lord Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, and four sons and two daughters who died in infancy; and, secondly Mary of Modena (Nov. 21, 1673), who bore him one son and tour daughters who died young, and one son, James Edward, known afterwards as the Old Pretender.

by this country, and in 1894 the British government was the first to assent to the revision of the existing treaties, by which Japan was enabled to assume her rightful place among the nations. After the contest with China, when Russia, Germany, and France combined to deprive Japan of the principal fruits of her victory, the British government again gave expression to its sympathies by refusing to join in the concerted spoliation. During the troubles in China in 1900 the governments of London and Tokio were in close touch as to the methods and plans to be adopted in dealing with the Chinese. This recognition of the identification of the interests in the Far East of the two nations was embodied in a formal treaty of alliance signed on Jan. 30, 1902. This important document contains but six short articles and a preamble which sets forth concisely the objects which the two nations had in view. This preamble declares that Great Britain and Japan are "actuated solely by a desire to maintain the status quo and general peace in the Extreme East," and are " specially interested in maintaining the independence and territorial integrity of the Empire of China and the Empire of Corea, and in securing equal opportunities in those countries for the commerce and industry of all nations." Article I declares that neither party is influenced by any aggressive tendencies in China or Corea, but recognises that, in view of the special interests of each in these two countries, it is admissible for either to take measures to safeguard those interests if in any way threatened. Article 2 states that if oither Great Britain or Japan should become involved in a war in defence of those interests, the other power will "maintain a strict neutrality, and use its efforts to prevent other powers from joining in hostilities against its ally." Article 3 provides that in the event of any other power or powers so joining in hostilities against that ally, the other "will come to its assistance and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it." Article 4 provides that neither nation will enter into arrangements with another power prejudicial to these interests, without consultation with the other. Article 5 provides that there shall be "full and frank" communications between the two governments if at any time either should entertain an opinion that its interests are in jeopardy. final article declares the term of the agreement to be five years from the date of signature, but that twelve months notice of the intention to terminate it is to be given by one or other of the contracting powers. In 1905 this treaty, with modifications and extensions, was renswed for a term of ten years.

Java, Expenition to (1811). The subjngation of Holland by Napoleon rendered it important to British interests to occupy the Dutch settlements in the East. An expedition was therefore sent against the Spice Islands in 1809, and Amboyna, Banda, and Ternate were occupied after a feeble resistance. The island of Java alone remained, and an expedition was fitted ont against it, consisting of ninety sail, on which were embarked 2,000 Europeans and 2,000 sepoys. After some fighting, the island was occupied by the British, and under the government of Mr. (afterwards Sir) Stamford Raffles, flourished for several years, till it was restored to Holland at the general peace of 1815.

Jedburgh, in Roxburghshire, was one of the Scottish strongholds delivered to England in 1174 as security for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Falaise. About the year 1408 it was wrested from the English, by whom is was hurnt a century later (1523). In 1544 it was again hurnt, hy Sir Ralph Evers. Jedhnrgh was one of the royal burghs, and its abbey was founded hy David I.

Jeetgurh (JEETFORE), THE SIEGE OF (Jan. 14, 1815). General Wood having been appointed to take Bootwal and penetrate Nopaul, took the field Dec., 1814, after a great deal of delay, and, without any reconnaissance, allowed himself to be brought before the stockade of Jeetgurh, by the treachery of a Brahmin guide. A heavy fire was immediately commenced from the redoubt, which was garrisoned by 1,200 Goorkhas. Though the British army amounted to 4,500 men, the general, after fighting his way to a position which commanded the entrenchment and placed it within his grasp, sounded a retreat just as the enemy had hegun to abandon it. [GOORKHA WAR.]

Jeffrey, Francis Lord (b. 1773, d. 1850), was born and educated at Edinhurgh. On heing called to the Bar, he found that he could obtain very little legal business, owing to his being a Whig at a time when Tory influence was so predominant in Scotland. Turning his attention to literature, he became one of a small group of men who, towards the year 1802, planned the publication of the Edinburgh Review, of which he very soon became the editor. This periodical, which before long took rank as the leading exponent of Whig views, continued under Jeffrey's management till the year 1829. In 1831 Jeffrey was appointed Lord Advocate, and he subsequently entered the House of Commons as member for Edinburgh. In 1834 he was made a judge in the Court of Session.

Cockburn, Life of Jeffrey.

Jeffreys, George Lord (b. 1648, d. 1689), was born in Denhighshire of a respectable family. When called to the Bar (Nov., 1668), he confined himself for a long time to the Old Bailey and criminal courts, where he speedily rose to the top of his profession in this peculiar line of business. In 1671 he became Common Serjeant of the City of London. Six years later he was made solicitor to the Duke of York, and knighted; while towards the end of the next year he was appointed Recorder of London. Having placed his services at the disposal of the court, he was largely employed in prosecuting those who were accused of being con-cerned in the Popish Plot. It was in the capacity of Recorder of the City of London that he was at this time of such use to the government, which speedily rewarded him by making him Chief Justice of Chester and a baronet (1680). About the same time ho was sworn of the Privy Council. Before the close of the year 1680 Jeffreys was reprimanded in the Heuse of Commons for having obstructed the meeting of Parliament. This censure was mainly due to the instance of the City of London, on which he attempted to revenge himself by his efforts to destroy its municipal institution. After the trial of Lord William Russell and the offenders connected with the Rye House Plot, Jeffreys was appointed Chief Justice of the King's Bench (Nov., 1683), When James II. became king he was raised to the House of Lords as Baron Jeffreys of Wells, May, 1685, and almost immediately afterwards went down into the neighbourhood whence he derived his new title to try the insurgents who had assisted in Monmouth's rebellion (July, 1685). In September, 1685, Jeffreys was made chancellor, and he immediately signalised his appointment to the new office by procuring the "murder" of Alderman Cornish by a packed jury. Jeffreys was next instrumental in obtaining the verdict of the judges in favour of the Dispensing Power, and the revival of the High Commission Court. Then followed the Declaration of Indulgence. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, when James II. left London for Salisbury, Jeffreys was one of the five lords appointed to represent him in his absence. As William's cause prospered daily, the chanceller attempted to escape in a sailor's dress; he was seized by the mob in a Wapping ale-house, but, being secured by the trained bands, was carried before the Lord Mayor and committed to the Tower, where he died a few months later (April, 1689).

Jekyll, Sir Joseph (b. 1663, d. 1738), was called to the Bar in 1687. In 1697 he was appointed Chief Justice of Chester, and in the following year was returned for Eye, and received the honour of knighthood. In 1710 he was one of the managers of Sacheverell's impeachment. In 1717 he became Master of the Rolls, and in 1725 one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal. In 1733 he astonished the ministry by his vigorous support of Walpole's Excise Scheme. In the year 1736 he introduced the Gin Act, and the Mortmain Act. "He was," says Stanhope, "a very indifferent speaker, and somewhat open to ridicule in his dress and deportment, but a man of the very highest benevolence and probity." Pope has summed up his character as one "who never changed his principle or wig."

Jellalabad. THE SIEGE OF (1842), took place during the first Afghan War. On March 11, 1842, Akbar Khan made his appearance before Jellalabad, and advanced to the attack of the town with his whole army. The garrison, however, sallied out and drove him ignominiously from the field, upon which he turned the siege into a blockade. On April 1 the troops sallied, and swept into the town 500 sheep and goats they had seen from tho bastions grazing in the plain. Akbar now pitched his camp within two miles of the ramparts, to cut off foragers. On April 6 General Sale determined on an assault on the enemy's encampment. The troops issued from the gate at dawn, and were received with a flanking fire from one of the ports. This. was gallantly stormed. The advance guard under Captain Havclock meved on, repelled two charges of Akbar's splendid cavalry, and drove them into the camp. The enemy were dislodged from every point, and pursued to the river, with the loss of their guns, equipage, and ammunition.

Jenkins, SIR LEOLINE (LLEWELLYN) (b. 1623, d. 1685), was educated at Oxford. On the death of Charles I. he retired to Wales, and later to the Continent, whence he returned shortly before the Restoration. In 1661 he was elected principal of Jesus College, of which society he was a munificent benefactor. In 1664 he was engaged in reviewing the maritime laws, and in 1668 was made judge of the Prerogative Court at Cantorbury. In 1678 he was employed in negotiating the Treaty of Nimegucn, and next year succeeded Sir William Temple as the English ambassador at the Haguo. On his return home he was a strong opponent of the Exclusion Bill, for which service ho was appointed a Privy Councillor about the year 1680. Five years later he died. His Letters and Papers were published in 1724.

Jenkins's Ear, The Story or, was circulated in 1738, greatly to the prejudice of Sir Robert Walpole. At this time wir with Spain was eagerly desired by the nation, but opposed by the minister. Jenkins, who was the master of a trading sloop from Jamaica, asserted that his ship had been boarded by a Spanish guarda costa, and that, although no proof of smuggling had been found on the vessel, one of his ears had been barbarously tora off. This ear he carried about in cotton to display to his hearers. It was said at the time that he had lost it on another occasion, probably at the pillory. On being asked by a member what were his feelings when he found himself in the hands of such barbarians, "I recommended," he said, "my soul to God, and my cause to my country." "The truth of the story," says Mr. Lecky, "is extremely doubtful, but the end that was aimed at was attained. The indignation of the people, fanned as it was by the press and by the untiring efforts of all sections of the opposition, became uncontrollable."

Jenkinson, Anthony (d. 1611), was one of the most famous travellers and explorers of Elizabeth's reign. In 1557 he was sent out to Russian as the agent of the Russian Company, and made his way to Astrachan, Persia, and Bokhara, revisiting the last-named place no less than six times in the interests of commerce. In 1571 he was sent to the Czar's court by Elizabeth as her accredited ambassador.

Jewel, John. Bishop of London (b. 1522, d. 1571), was one of the most active ef the Reformers during the reign of Edward VI. Under Mary, he was com-pelled to seek an asylum in Germany, but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made Bishop of Salisbury (1559). He was one of the champions of the Protestants at the Theological Conference at Westminster in the same year. He was a strong upholder of the doctrine of the divinc right of kings, a great controversialist, and a voluminous writer. His great work, the Apology, or Defence of the English Church (1562), is mainly based on a denial of the theory that truth necessarily resides in a numerical majority; it is practically a claim made on behalf of Protestant bodies to be admitted to the Council of Trent, and while denying that Roman Catholic doctrines have the support of the great fathers, is content to rest all its arguments on the direct teaching of Christ and his apostles. This work was translated into English very soon after its first publication, and was so generally esteemed that Elizabeth gave orders for one copy of it to be placed in every parish church.

Jews in England. The first appearance of the Jews in any number in England must be reckoned among the results of the Norman Conquest. Immediately after 1066, many coming from Rouen, Caen, and other Norman cities, arrived in London in the train of the invaders. Like the forests, the Jews were declared in early Norman law to be the peculiar property of the king, and his local representative, usually the constable of the tower or castle erected to signalise the submission of a town to Norman conquerors, ruled over each settlement. The Jews were subject to tallages at the arbitrary will of the crown, and to all the feudal dues of tenantsin-chief, and the Norman kings claimed a large proportion of their wealth. But they enjoyed, in early times, no small security in return. Their religion excited little hostility. In their special districts, known as the Jewries, they were allowed to practise all their religious rites, and synagogues with schools attached to them sprang np in all parts of the country. Standing outside the authority of the Church, the canon-law forbidding trade in money did not affect them, and it was that calling that most of them successfully pursued. Their general financial skill was widely acknowledged. William II. employed them to farm the revenues of vacant sees, and at this and later dates, great barons and ecclesiastics sought their services as stewards of their estates. Many at the same time gained distinction as physicians, and in several towns, notably at Oxford, the lectures of their rabbis on medicine, and other sciences, were attended by Christian as well as by Jewish scholars.

After the death of Henry I., the security which the Jews had previously enjoyed was rapidly weakened. At the close of the twelfth, and throughout the thirteenth centuries, their position was one of growing They became the helpless victims of the kings, who made their wealth an important source of revenue. Stephen and Matilda, and their supporters, robbed them recklessly. In 1187 Henry II. demanded a fourth of their chattels, and Richard I. dcpended largely on them to meet his extravagant expenditure. Until the reign of Henry III., however, a somewhat tolerant policy was still pursued toward them by the government in matters of religion. In 1176 permission was given them to acquire burial-grounds outside the towns where they were settled. Richard I. practically legalised their own forms of oath in civil cases. John corresponded with a chief rabbi on terms of intimacy. But from the middle of the twelfth century tho people of the towns, stirred constantly by tho preachers of the Crusades to a funatical hatred of them, attributed to them, as heretics, as foreigners, and as capitalists, their poverty and misfortunes, and subjected them to every variety of persecution. In 1144 the baseless charge was preferred against the .. ews of Norwich of murdering a child to use his blood in their religious ceremonies, and this and similar accusations were repeated later in London, Gloucester, Bury St. Edmunds, Lincoln, and elsewhere. In 1189 riots took place in every town where any Jews resided. The Jewries were pillaged and fired, and their inhabitants brutally murdered. Restrictions, too, were frequontly placed on their financial dealings. The Assize of Arms forbade the Jew to take into the towns any weapon of war. In 1194 Richard I. issued a decree placing their commercial transactions more thoroughly under the control of the local officers of the crown. At the same timo special itineran' justices were to enforce the new law, and were to form at Westminster a special court, known as the Jews' Exchequer (Judworum Scacearium), for the trial of lawsuits in which Jews were concerned, and for auditing the accounts of their contributions to the national treasury. The barons introduced into Magna Carta a clause forbidding the Jews on the death of a baronial debtor to distrain the property of his survivors, and in 1218 they were ordered for the first time o

The thirteenth century witnessed little change in the position of the Jews. The first years of John's reign, and of his son's, gavo them brief respites from persceution, and speciously extended their privileges, but otherwise their history is a mere repetition of extortionate exactions and deeds of popular violence. John not only constantly levied tallages upon them, and imprisoned and tortured those unable to pay, but be confiscated the property of their insolvent debtors, and distributed it among his supporters. When Henry III. came of 'ge, ho followed his father's example, and reversed the moderate policy that bis justiciars, William Marshall and Hubert de Burgb, had pursued towards them. They were made responsible for all the extravagances of himself and his wife's relatives, who bitterly bated them, and hardly a year passed without a heavy exaction, varying from 60,000 to 10,000 marks, being made upon their property. In 1255 Henry made them over to his brother, Riebard of Cornwall, as security for a large loan. And these exactions and indignities were far from being their only difficulties. The Church now deliberately attacked their religion. The friars—the now preachers of religion in the towns—were filled with zeal against Judaism, and they sought and obtained, as at Cambridge, many synagogues for their own habitations. Simon de Montfort shared the friars' hostility to them, and the battles of Lewes and Evesham were followed by revolting attacks upon the Jews throughout the country. In vain they begged permission to leave England altogether. The king found them too valuable to lose them lightly. His refusal of their petition was followed by a harsh edict forbidding them to hold in futuro any property in land.

From Edward I.'s connexion with the Jews a similar story has arisen, but with his reign thoir mediæval history ends. He shared the antipathy for which his mother, Eleanor of Provence, was remarkable, and the statute de la Jenerie, issued in 1275, was calculated to ruin them utterly. Lending monoy at interest was absolutely forbidden, and overy Jew was to pay a poll-tax of threepence or fourpence annually. Persecution by people and priests was meanwhile left unpunished, and at length, in 1290, Edward I., excreising some self-denial, consented to expel them. About 17,000 are reported to have left the country, and the majority of them appear to have sought refuge on the coast of France and Flanders. Many, however, were wilfully wrecked in their passage, and perished at sea. The grounds of their expulsion were stated to be tho blasphemous character of their religious belief, and their oppression of the people as usurious money-lenders. Their real property was naturally confiscated by the crown.

It is frequently stated that after the banishment of 1290 no Jews came to England until the later years of Cromwell's Protectorate. but special investigation of the subject leaves little doubt that small numbers of them were present in the country from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century. Throughout this period the House for Jewisb Converts in London was seldom without some inmates. In 1594 Roderigo Lopez, a Jewish physician of Queen Elizabeth, was banged at Tyburn on a charge of treason. Charles I. borrowed money, there can be little doubt, of some of their race who came to England from Amsterdam, and Cromwell employed several Jews as foreign spies. It was not, however, till 1655 that Edward I.'s decree was practically repealed. In that year the Protector, on his own responsibility, in answer to the petition of Manasseh-ben-Israel, a Dutch rabbi, grented permission to a few Jews to settle openly in this country. Much opposition was raised to the order by the London merchants, who feared commercial rivalry, and in 1660 a petition was presented to Charles II. to reverse Cromwoll's action, but it met with no success. The king had received loans from the Jews in the days of his exile, and had already pledged bis word to maintain them in England. The first Jewish immigrants in the seventeenth century were descended from Spanish and Portuguese families who had taken refuge in Holland, and they were followed later by Jews from Germany and Poland. The English law at first allowed them few civil rights. By a statute of James I.'s reign the sacramental test was essential to naturalisation, and the various penal laws, excluding Catholics from civil and municipal office, and from the legal profession, were applicable to them. Their public worship contravened a law of Elizabeth making attendance at church compulsory, but their various places of worship in London, erected in this and the next century, were never seriously menaced. Their marriages, however, were only valid by courtesy, and all Jews were subject to the alien duties (a heavy tax imposed on all goods exported by foreignors), from which, however, James II. relieved them for a few years.

Jews

The

In commerce the English Jews rapidly gained a high reputation. In the war of the Spanish succession, a Jew contra :ted to supply tho army with hread, and it was currently reported that they entered in the same reign into negotiations with Godolphin for the purchase of Brentford as an exclusively Jewish cettlement. In the succeeding reigns several attempts were made to relieve them of their various disabilities. In 1723 they were permitted to omit from the oath of abjuration all words ohnoxious to their faith, and a little later naturalisation was allowed to all who had lived seven years in America, or had engaged in the flax or hemp trades, or who had served in the navy. Thus the principle of thoir right to naturalisation was admitted. In 1753 the Pelham ministry introduced the Jews' Naturalisation Bill, extending the privilege but not making it universal; in spite of much opposition in the Commons, it became law. Popular fanaticism and commercial jealousy were, however, roused against it in the country, and predictions of the evils that would flow from the measure excited a very bitter agitation against the Jows. In 1754 the government, in obedienco to the panic, moved the repeal of the Act. A clause, however, in Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act of the previous year gave practical legal validity to Jewish marriages.

In the nineteenth century the disabilities of the Jews were finally removed, and their cause found strong support in the city of London. In 1832 they were given the rights of freemen of the city, and by Lord Campbell's Act of 1835 they were enabled to take the oath requisito for admission to the office of Sheriff. In 1832 the Reform Bill granted them the suffrage. A motion for the abolition of all their civil disabilities was introduced into the House of Commons in 1833, and llume, O'Connell, and Macaulay spoke strongly in its favour, but after passing the Lower llouse it was thrown out by the Lords. The same fate awaited the bill on many subsequent occasions. In 1846, however, by the Religious Opinions Relief Bill, the public exercise of their religion, and the education of their children in it, were legalised. In the next year Baron Lionel de Rothschild was elected Member of Parliament by the City of London, but the law necessitating an oath which he could not conscientiously take prevented his taking his seat. In 1851 Alderman Salomons was elected for Greenwich, and he took his sent after omitting from the oath the words obnoxious to his faitb, for which he was subsequently fined £500 in the Court of Queen's Bench. Finally, in 1858, the remaining Jewish disabilities were removed by law, and the oath admitting members to the House of Commons so altered that Jews might conscientiously take it.

Tovey, Anglis Judaica '1733), with Madox's account of the Jawish Exchequer in his History of the Eschequer (vol. i.), covers the mediseval history, of which a good summary is given in Margoliouth's Juse of Great Britain (1845). See also Jacobs, Juses in Angevin England. Picciotot's Anglo Jusush Sketches (1872) gives the most elaborate inform thon on the subject from the time of Cromwell. [S. L. L.]

Jeypore. [RAJPUTANA.]

Jhansi is the name of a district in Bundelkhund, lying 142 miles south of Agra. In 1804, on the first connection of the government with Bundelkhund, a treaty was concluded with Gheo Rao Bhao, a tributary of the Peishwa, and governor of this small territory. In 1817, when all rights of the Peishwa in the province were ceded to the company, in consideration of his fidelity the territory was declared hereditary in tho family of the a e-mentioned ruler. On the death of his grandson, who died without leaving any issue (1835), the territory was given to a collateral branch of the same family; and when in 1854 the last descendant of Gheo Rao Bhao died childless, the British government declined to recognise his adopted son, and annexed the province. The Rance protested in vain at the lime; but on the outbreak of the Mutiny in 1857, she took a fearful revenge, and put to death every European-man, woman, and child-she could seize, proclaiming herself independent. She was besieged and driven from Jhansi, 1858, and was eventually slain before Gwalior fighting in the front ranks like a man. Her body, however, was not found, and was probably carried away and burut.

Malleson, Hist. of the Indian Mutiny; Annual Register, 1858.

Jhansi, THE SIEGE OF (1858). When the Indian Mutiny broke out, the fortress of Jhansi, which had for any years been in the hands of the English Government, was garrisoned by the 12th Native Infantry. Early in June (1857), the reben in broke out here, and the fort, together with the treasure and the magazine, fell into the hands of the insurgents. It was not till March, in tho next year, that Sir H. Rose was enabled to advance to this town, and establish his batteries round it. On the 30th the defences of the city and fort were dismantled, and the guns so far disabled that they no longer kept up a serious fire. The final assault was made April 2, by two columns. The town was quickly cleared, and the Ranee fled. The rebels now abandoned their positions, and tho English took possession of this formidable fortress without further opposition.

Jhindur Bhye was the wife of Runjeet Singh, on whose death she assumed the regency of the Punjab, or rather shared it with her pa amour, Lall Singh. Her intrigues brought about the reduction of the Punjab by Lords Hardinge and Dalhousie. After a series of strange and romantio viciositudes, prematurely old, well-nigh blind, broken and subdued in spirit, she found a resting place at last under the roof of her son, in a quiet corner of an English castle, and died in a London suburb.

Kaye, Sepoy War.

Jingoes was a name given during the excitement of the Eastern Question in 1878 to the party which was in favour of war with Russia. The word sprang from a pepular seng of the period, the refrain of which was—"We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do,

"We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too."

The term, however, was adopted in serious political controversy, and used to designate those who favoured an aggressive foreign policy.

Joan, wife of Edward the Black Prince (d. 1385), commenly called the Fair Maid of Kent, was the daughter of Edmund of Woodstock, Earl of Kent, son of King Edward I. On the death of her brother, without issue, she became Countess of Kent. She was married first to Sir Thomas Holland, and secondly to the Earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced. In 1361 she became the wife of the Black Prince, and five years later gave birth to Richard II. In 1381 she was exposed to the insults of the insurgents, who took possession of the Tower, whither she had fled for refuge, but her life was preserved.

Joan of Arc. [HUNDRED YEARS' WAR.]

Joan, of NAVARRE, QUEEN (d. 1437), was the daughter of Charles II. of Navarre, and was married first to John V., Duke of Bri nny, and secondly (1403) to Henry IV.

Joanna, Princess (b. 1321, d. 1362), was promised in marriage to Prince David of Scotland, by the Treaty of Northampton (1328), and betrothed in July the a mc year. On the successful invasion of Edward Luliol, the young king and queen went to France, where they wero kindly received by King Philip (1333), and whence they did not return to Scotland tili 1341. After her husband's capture at Neville's Cress (1346), she visited him in his captivity (1348). On his release in 1357, she accompanied him to Scotland, but soon after, being insulted by David's preference for his mistress, Katherine Mortimer, she returned to Edward III.'s court, and refused to return to her husband even when her rival was murdered in 1360.

Jocelin de Brakelonde (d. cùrca 1211) was a Benedictine monk at Bury St. Edmunds, where he held the offices of prior's chaplain, abbot's chaplain, guest-master, and almoner in succession. Ho is the author of a domestic chronicle of the abbey to which he belonged. This work extends from the year 1173, "when the Flemings were captured outside the town"—in which year also Jocelin became a monk—to the year 1202. When Jocelin deals with public events in this chronicle, they are chiefly such as had some connection with the abbey of which he was a member. Jocelin's chronicle has been edited by Mr. J. G. Rokewode for the Camden Society (1840), and forms the text of Carlylo's Past and Present.

John, King (b. Dec. 24, 1166, s. April 8, 1199, d. Oct. 19, 1216), was the youngest son of Henry II. and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He was Henry's favourito son, and destined to receive as his share of his father's empire the lordship of Ireland. But his petulant and arrogant behaviour to the Irish chiefs when, in 1185, he was sent on a visit to Ireland, compelled Henry to give up this scheme. Before long John joined his brother Richard in his last revolt against his father, under circumstances of peculiar treachery. Henry's schemes to win for John a rich marriage had proved no less unsuccessful than his Irish plan. But soon after Richard I.'s accession, John's marriage with the heiress of the great Gloucester earldom gave him revenue and position. During Richard's absence on crusade, John joined the popular movement for deposing Longehamp, the foreign justiciar, and, in close alliance with Philip of France, rose in revolt on the nows of Richard's captivity. But the administrative system was too strong to be shaken by John's turbulence. The rising was suppressed, and its author very leniently treated by his brother, who did his best to secure his snecession in preference to the heir of his elder brother, Geoffrey. In 1199 John became king. His reign marks the collapse of the great power which Henry II. had founded; but also shows the beginning of the national English state which emerged from its ruins. The loss of Normandy, the quarrel with Innocent III., and the struggle with the baronage which produced Magna Carta, are the great events of his reign. Philip Augustus promptly deserted his old friend when he became king, and posed as the champion of Arthur of Britanny, whom John was generally believed to have murdered, and as protector of the injured Count of La Marche, whose betrothed wife, Isabella of Angoulême, John had recently married, having divorced his first wife. After a solemn trial, John was adjudged to have forfeited his French fiefs. In 1204 Philip conquered Normandy, John making little or no attempt to protect his dominions. Anjou, Maine, and the greater part of the southern flefs which Eleanor had brought to Henry II., were speedily annexed also. Not until it was too late did John make a vigorous effort to regain them. By that time other difficulties prevented his attempts being successful. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Hubert Walter, had been a great influence for good on John. His death, in 1205, was thus a great loss in itself. But the quarrel of the king and the Canterbury monks, and the imposition of a papal nominee whom neither would accept, led to John's famous contest with Innocent III.; the interdict of 1208; the deposition of 1211, and the abject submission of the king when Philip, as executor of the papal decrees, was prepar-ing to invade England. He surrendered his kingd in to Pandulf, the papal representa-tive, and consented to receive it back as a flef of the papacy. Henceforth John was Inno-cent's ally; but his innumerable tyrannies had raised up enemies in the nation against which papal support was of little value. The death of the faithful justiciar, Fitz-Peter, in 1213, broke up the civil administration. The last check on John's tyranny was now removed;

but with unwonted energy he planned a great expedition for the recovery of Poitou, in conjunction with an alliance with the princes of Lower Germany, who supported his nephew, Otto IV., against Philip. The defeat of Otto at Bouvines, and the want of co-operation of the l'oitevins, made both schemes abortive. The refusal of the northern barons of England to serve abroad began the series of events which led to the Great Charter. The papal archbishop, Langton, took up an unexpectedly patriotic attitude. He held up the charter of Henry I. to the barons as a good basis for their demands. A great meeting of the nobles at Bury St. Edmunds declared itself against the king. The clergy, the Londoners, the ministerial prelates, in turn deserted John.

Abandoned by all but hirelings and foreigners, he was constrained, in 1215 (June 15), to sign Magna Carta. But the support of Innocent III. could still be relied upon. Isington was summoned to Rome. The Pope annulled the charter. John, with his merce-naries, spread desolation throughout the

but to appeal to Philip of France. In 1216, with a French army, reduced John to despair. His death at Newark (Oct. 19, 1216) only prevented his deposition. John was one of the worst of English kings, tyrannical, treacherous, petnlant, passionate, infamous in all his private relations, careless of all his public duties. But he was of no mean ability; and had he possessed more hersistent energy and stability of purpose, he might have reigned as snecessfully as his father. As it was, he failed in everything he undertook. The system of government which lienry II. had established had survived the neglect of Richard, but broke up under the active tyranny of John. Yet its dissolution left the nation free to work out its own development. The loss of Normandy made the baronage faally English. It was no small benefit to the nation that John's tyranny compelled barons and people, and, despite the Pope, the better elements in the Church, to make common cause against John. Magna Carta was the result of the first corporate action of the English nation, and the foundation of the mediseval constitution. Even the submission to Rome helped on in the next generation the national reaction which John's reign had done so much to stimulate.

John, 9th Lord of the Isles, and 11th Earl of Ross (d. 1498), aided James II. at the siege of Roxburgh (1460), for which ervice he was appointed a Warden of the Marches. In 1462, however, he entered into a treaty with Edward IV., which, becoming known some years later, led to the forfeiture of his carldom of Ross. But John was too powerful to be offended, and, in 1476, was created a peer as John de Isla, Lord of the Isles, by way of conciliation.

Johnston, Archibald, of Warriston (d. 1663), was a leader of the Covenanters, whose demands he is said to have formulated. He was one of the Commissioners at the Peace of Berwick (1639), and at the Treaty of Ripon (1640). The allowing year he became a Lord of Session, and is credited with having suggested the Acts of Classes in 1649. Having acted as chairman of Cromwell's Committee of Public Safety, he was condemned in his absence in 1661, and executed at Edinburgh in 1663.

Judge. [JUSTICE.]

Judith, daughter of Charles the Bold, King of Franco, in 856 was married to King Ethelwulf. She is said to have sat by her husband's side on the royal throne, but this apparently means nothing more than that she was recognised as queen, a title which had belonged to no wife of a West-Saxon king since the days of Edburga. After Ethelwulf's death, she married her stepson Ethelbald (858), and on his decease, in 860, she went back to her father's court, and subsequently took for her third husband Baldwin (fron-Arm), first Count of Flanders.

Jumièges, Robert of, Arcabishop of Canterbury (1050 — 52), was a Norman who came over to England in the train of Edward the Confessor. He was made Bishop of London in 1044, and at once came forward as the leader of the French party. His influence over the kir. was very great. "So high did he stand in he king's estimation, that if he had said a black crow was a white one, the king would sooner have believed the bishop's word than his own eyes."

And this influence was exerted to fill overv office with Normans, and destroy the national party of which Godwin was the head. The success of Robert's schomo was seen in 1050, when Edward appointed him archbishop, in opposition to the Chapter of Canterbury, who had elected one of their own number, Elfric, to the post. The triumph of the Normans seemed secured in 1051 by the banishment of Godwin and his sons; but in the next year they returned, were received with the greatest enthusiasm, and for the time destroyed the influence of their rival. Archbishop Robert was one of the first to flee before the storm, and, in company with the Bishop of Dorchester, he made his way in a crazy fishing-boat to Normandy. The Witenagemet, boat to Normandy. The Witenagemet, which met almost immediately, deprived Robert of his archbishopric, and outlawed him, and the interposition of the Pope in his favour was disregarded. He had to retire to the monastery of Jumièges, where he remained till his death.

Anglo-Saron Chron.; Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. ii.

Jumièges, William of (b. circa 1020), was a Norman monk, who eempiled a Latin history of the Dukes of Normandy from Rollo to the year 1071. His work has been greatly interpolated by later writers; but for the Conquest, and the early years of William I.'s reign, William of Jumièges is a fairly good authority. The earlier part of this writer's work is an abridgment of Dudo of St. Quentin. Only the first seven books can be looked upon as belonging to William; the eighth, and many interpolations on the previous books, being due to Robert de Monte. The narrative of William of Jumièges forms the ground-work of Wace's Le Roman de Rou.

This author has been printed in Duchesne's Scriptores Normania, and in Migne's Patrologic Cursus Completus, vol. exlix.

Jung Bahadur, Sin (d. 1877), the chief minister, and virtual ruler, of Nepaul, brought a large contingent to the help of the English in the rebellion of 1857, and assisted at the siego of Delhi (1858). Jung Bahadur had, in carlier years, assisted in the murder of Malabar Singh (1845), the chief minister of Nepaul, and after this became one of the principal governors of the country. His previous conduct seems to have been to some extent dictated by a wish to serve the Queen of Nepaul; but when ordered by her to destroy the heir-apparent and his brother, Jung Bahadur refused to obey, and before long succeeded in appointing him as ruler of Nepaul in the room of the Maharajah (1847). A tew years later (1850) Jung Bahadur paid a visit to England.

Junius, The Letters of. The first letter bearing the signature of "Junius" made its appearance in the Public Advertiser for Nov.

21, 1768. But we have the author's own assurance that he had been writing under different names for at least two years previously. It was not, however, till Jan. 21, 1769, that the regular series of political attacks under the title of Junius commenced with an assault on the characters of the Duke of Grafton and Lord North, in a letter addressed to the former of these two nobles. With reference to the duke we are told that "the finances of a nation sinking under its debts have been committed to a young nobleman already ruined by play;" while Lord North is characterised as "an object of dorision to his enemies, and of melancholy pity to his friends." The vacillation and inconsistency of the government are pointed out, and hardly any name mentioned escapes irony or abuse excepting that of Mr. Grenzille. The military part of this attack drew out a reply from Sir William Draper, in which he called upon Junius to ask pardon of "Lord Granby and tho whole kingdom for his abominable scandal." Letter followed letter between the two combatants, till on March 18 Junius once mere turned his batteries directly against the Duke of Grafton for having pardoned a cer-tain Edward MacQuirk, who had been found guilty of murder. This question is made the prelude to a flerce condemnation of the Duke's whole conduct as regards the Wilkes and Luttrell question, his private morals and his political capacity. The Prime Minister is told, "Thore is something which distinguishes you not only from all other ministers but from all other men. It is not that you do wrong by design, but that you should never do right by mistake." By the end of May the Duke of Bedford is incidentally brought upon the scene to share in the Prime Minister's abuse, and towards the end of July Blackstono is directly attacked for his reflections on Grenville. Towards the middle of September Junius addressed his first letter to the Duke of Bedford, the inheritor of a namo "glorious till it was yours:" and once more Sir W. Draper came forward for the defence. On Dec. 19, 1769, appeared the famous letter to the king, for which the printers and publishers were tried (1770), on which occasion the jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty of publishing only." The conduct of Lord Mansfield on this occasion laid him open to the attacks of the anenymous writer. Indeed, in the first letter to this great lawyer (Nov., 1770), Junius attacks him with peculiar bitterness: "no learned man, even among your own tribe, thinks you qualified to preside in a court of Common Law." In the preceding August (1770) Junius had had published his first letter to Lord North, and there reproached this statesman for appointing Colonel Luttrell Adjutant-General of the army in Ireland. With the opening of 1771 foreign politics attracted the pen of Junius, but by the middle of the year he had once more directed his attention to the Duke of Grafton, who, says the author, " is tho pillow upon which I am determined to rest all my resentments." Then followed the discussion with Mr. Horne (July to Ang., 1771). Later in the same year Lord Mans-field is again attucked for having bailed John Eyre, a Scotchman, and on Jan. 21, 1772, Junius's last letter appeared in proof of his assertion that on this occasion Lord Mansfield had done "that which by law he was not warranted to do." The same paper contained Junius's appeal to Lord Camden, "in the name of the English nation to stand forth in defence of the laws of his country," lest it "should be said that for some months past he had kept too much company with the Duke of (frafton." This letter winds up with the words "I do not cruple to affirm that in my judgment he (Lord Mansfield) is the very worst and most dangerous man in the kingdom. Thus far I have done my duty in endeavouring to bring him to punishment. But mine is an inferior ministerial office in the temple of justice. I have bound the victim and dragged him to the altar.

The question of the authorship of these letters is one which has severely taxed the critical ingenuity of the last hundred years. Hardly a single prominent statesman of the time who was not himself directly attacked by Junius, has wanted champions to assert his claim to their production. Lord George Sackville, Barré, Grattan, Burke, Lord Loughborough, Gibbon, Lord Chatham, and William Mason, Lord Temple, and many others, have all had their supporters; but none of their pretensions can be considered as valid. The weight of inferential evidence seems to point towards Sir Philip Francis, and it is certain that he was not unwilling to be considered as Junius, though he never admitted the claim in words. test of handwriting seems to tend in the same direction. But, if he be the author, it must be allowed that however much this distinction may add to his intellectual, it takes away from his moral character; for he seems to have been receiving favours from and living on intimate terms with many of those whom he assailed most ficrcely. The most, how-ever, that can be said in favour of the view that he was the writer is that he is the least unlikely of the most prominent candidates.

Junius's Letters have been frequently republished. For the controversy on their authorship see Macaulay, Reseas on Warren Hastings; Stanhope, Hist. of Eng., vol. v., appendix; Britton, Junius Elucidated; Dilke, Papers of a Critic; Lecky, Hist. of Eng. during the Eighteenth Century, iii.; W. Massey, Hist. of Geo. III., vol. i.

Jury, THE, in modern English juridical usage, ic a body of laymen, generally twelve in number, chosen by lot to ascertain, with the assistance and guidance of the judge, questions of fact only, proved before them by evidence.

They are bound by oath (hence their name) to discharge their duties properly. Unanimity is generally required of them. Juries are used both in criminal and civil cases. In the former the Grand Jury presents offender against whom there is a primd facis case, to be tried before the judge and the Petty Jury. In the latter a distinction is drawn between the Special Jury and the Common Jury, the property qualification of the special juror being higher. There is also a Coroner's Jury, on whose finding persons may be brought to trial at the assizes.

Of the origin of juries every conceivable theory has been held. It was once almost an article of constitutional faith that they were invented by King Alfred, Welsh antiquaries adding at the suggestion of Asser, who had experienced the benefits of the system in Wales. Many have stoutly maintained the exclusively English origin of this typical English institution. Northern archæologists have argued that it was brought ready-made by the Danes to England; others that it came over with William the Conqueror. The Canon law, the Roman law, the customs of the early Slavs copied by their Saxon neighbours, have also had the jury fathered upon them. Even wilder is the hypothesis of their Eastern origin and introduction into Europe by the Crusaders. The truth seems to be that the jury is a specialised development under favourable conditions of a tendency common to all the Teutonic peoples, if not to many other Aryan tribes as well. In its modern form it is hardly older than the reign of Henry II., and in many important features not so old as that. But in its broader aspect the jury simply carries on the popular judicial courts of the old German polity. It is the latest survival of the time when the law courts were the courts of the people, when the mass of the suitors were judges, witnesses, and jurors in one. It is in this sense only that the twelve assessors of the presiding officer in the shire and hundred-moot (the rachimburgi, or scabini, of the Franks), or the twelve compurgators whose testimony, added to that of their principal, was regarded as conclusive, or the sworn witnesses who represented, as it were, common fame, can be regarded as progenitors of the jury system; in strictness they were not. They shared with the jury a common representative character. Like them they were bound by oath, and were commonly of the sacred number of twelve. But the specific function of judging on matters of fact was not yet differentiated from the other elements of judicial proceedings. Only in one of the laws of Ethelred II. which refers to a committee of twelve thegas in the shire-moot, who take oath to accuse no man falsely-do we find any real analogy to the later jury; and this remarkable anticipation of the "jury of presentment" stands so much by itself that it is

n of had unsafe to generalise from such scanty data. Thus we can find no real juries among the English before the Conquest. Still less can the analogous Namd of Sweden, or the other Scandinavian tribunals of the same sort, be regarded as parents of an institution which has only collateral affinity to them. But soon after the Norman Conquest, the system of inquest by sworn recognitors, representative of the popular courts, was introduced into England by the invaders. This system may have been borrowed from the Theodosian Code by the Carolingian emperors. The Frankish Capitularies contain numerous instructions to the royal Missi to inquire into various fiscal and judicial rights of the crown, by the oath of the trustworthy men of the neighbourhood, whose evidence was regarded as the embodiment of the witness of the community, which in early times was the ultimate evidence of rights. This system survived the fall of the Carolings, and was still frequently used, both in France generally and Normandy in particular, at the time of the Conquest. There was every reason why William I. and his ministers should introduce this practice into England. Anxious to rule according to ancient precedent, and ignorant of the old eustoms of the country, these Inquisitiones were of unique value in giving them trustworthy information. The immense mass of antiquarian knowledge collected in the Domesday Survey was obtained by inquests of the royal officials before representatives of the popular courts. It was a slight step in advance to allow the means so useful in ascertaining the rights of the crown to be employed in ascertaining the rights of the subject. Both for royal and private purposes, mostly for fiscal, but also for judicial objects, Henry I. developed the system still further. But it was Henry II. who gave to the system a political and judicial importance it never had before. He made it part of the ordinary judicial machinery. He applied it to all sorts of civil and criminal suits. So far as great institutions can be the work of individuals, he is the founder of the English system of trial by jury.

The inquest had made trial by battle the ordinary means of settling disputes about freeholds. Henry II., in the Great Assize, gave suitors, as an alternative, the use of the inquest. A jury of twelve knights of the county, chosen by four knights electors, were summoned by the sheriff to appear before the king or his judges to give ovidence. Again, the Constitutions of Clarendon enjoined cases of dispute as to lay or elerical tenure to be settled by the recognition by twelve sworn men; and the three assizes of Mort d'Ancester, Novel Disseisin, and Darrein Presentment, were accomplished by the same means. In criminal cases, the precedents of the law of Ethelred. of the juratores of the shire mentioned in Henry I.'s Pipe Roll, and of the criminal jury of the sixth article of the Constitutions of Clarendon, were developed into the system of trial prescribed by the assizes of Clarendon and Northampton. By the former measure, inquiry was ordered to be made through every shire and hundred by twelve lawful men of each hundred, and four of each township, upon oath, for all suspected criminals. When the royal justices came round on their journeys, the above-mentioned jury was to present the suspected offenders to them in the county court, where they were to be tried by the ordeal. But the development of juridical science led, first, to the minimising of the ordeal, so that the presentment became the important thing, and, next, to its abolition by the Lateran Council of 1215. Even before this, an alternative to the ordeal was sometimes found in a second jury, empanelled to investigate further the truth of the presentment. After 1215 this became the universal method of procedure. The Grand Jury presented criminals. The trial, strictly speaking, was before the Petty Jury, as this second jury was soon called. This is still the ease, though the establishment of elaborate magisterial investigations has tended to reverse the original importance of the two bodies.

Juries thus established were almost peculiar to England. The Frankish inquest was never developed to further consequences in its own home. The imperfect juries of the mediæval Continent were almost entirely the result of the reflex action of the English juries. The modern Continental jury is avowedly borrowed. Thus, Professor Freeman can claim with reason that the jury is a native English growth, despite its filial relation to the Frankish inquest.

The juries of the thirteenth century differed in in inportant respects from modern juries. They were still largely witnesses. The jury of the Grand Assize, for example, were chosen from those practically cognisant of the facts of the particular case. Even when it was found impossible to summon only witnesses as jurors, it was long before the advancement of juridical science limited their functions to deciding on evidence laid before them. It was long before the jury was free from judicial censure if their verdict was disliked by the judge. Not before the Revolution of 1688 could the jury in a political case be said to have acquired full freedom. Not before Fox's Libel Act did they acquire real power of deciding on the whole facts of one important branch of trials.

The political importance of trial by jury is very considerable in English history. Though a mere administrative expedient in its origin, the fact that the county jury was a systematic representation of the shire community, selected to treat with the king or his representative, was a step of the greatest importance in the development of our representative [Parliament.] The great principle of trial by peers was embodied in Magna Carta; and, before long, the jury system came to be rega. ded as the greatest safeguard against arbitrary imprisonment, and the greatest guarantee of a fair trial, and of the personal liberty of the subject. A venal or time-serving judge—dependent for his positic... on royal favour—could only be checked by some such 1 ans. In political trials, even of the 18th century, without trial by jury it would have fared badly with an enemy of the government. Even now that the impartiality of the judges is thoroughly established, the jury system, though shorn of its original importance, and limited in its operation by the tendencies of legal reform, still keeps its own function in our judicial system.

Stubbe, Const. Hist.; Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. v.; Palgrave, English Commonwealth. The subject is treated more fully in Forsyth, Hist. of Trial by Jury, and Biener, Das Englische tienchwernengricht. Dr. H. Brunner, in his treaties Ueber die Entstehung der Schwurgerichte, gives a very full and complete view of the subject, and demonstrates very clearly the relation of the jury to the Frankish Inquisitio.

Justice, or Judge. In the old English popular courts, the whole body of suitors acted as judges. The sheriff, or hundredscalder, was simply their chairman, or moderator; and the judicial committee of twelve thegas were the assessors of the sheriff. The feudal jurisdiction of the landrica, the supreme jurisdiction of the king, invested lords of soken and monarchs with some of the attributes of the later judge. But the real differentiation of the office of judge took place subsequently to the Norman Conquest, and was due to the development of the study of jurisprudence, the increasing specialisation of the whole system of government, the organiaution on an extended basis of the royal jurisdiction, and its connection with the headless popular judicature, through the jury, by the Norman and Angevin kings. These circumstances necessitated the employment of a large judicial staff, which, if not strictly confined, after the precedents of later times, to its juridical business, and if equally employed by the king on fiscal and administrative duties, was sufficiently occupied with legal work to obtain from it its most common appellation. During the eleventh cen-tury, the word Justitia began to be used in a sense which included the persons charged with the administration of the law, as well as to indicate the abstract principles on which the law was based. The justice, or judge, received his name from the justice which he declared. The so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor speak of the sheriffs as justices; John of Salisbury gives them the same title, and the Assize of Clarendon couples them with the justices in the stricter sense. But it is possible that this title belonged specially to the sheriffs as transacting special business under the king's writ. In Henry I.'s Charter and Laws, and in some other instances, the term seems to include all landlords possessing courts of their own, or all suitors qualified to act as judices in the shire moot. But the title became gradually further limited, until it was ultimately used to indicate (1) the president, or chief officer of the Curia Regis, (2) all the members of the same court.

The chlef minister of the Norman and Angevin kings was styled the justitia, or some times the justitiarius, or capitalis, or summus justitia. His office, obscure ln origin, and perhaps developed from the Norman seneschalahip through the regents of William I., during his absences on the Continent, acquired great importance under Itanulf Flanhard, who assumed the name, if not the functions, of the later justiciar. Under Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, the great minister of Henry I., and the practical founder of his administrative system, both the name and functions of the office became more strictly defined. Until the middle of the reign of Henry III., a long and scarcely interrupted series of chief justiciars acted as permanent prime ministers, as representatives of the monarch in all relations of state, as regents during the king's absence, as royal deputieven in his presence, as presidents of the judicial system which centred in the Curia Regis, and as presidents of the fiscal system which centred in the exchequer. A similar need produced analogous offices in half the kingdoms of Europe. In Aragon and Naples the correspondence extended even to the name of Justitis. So long as the feudal spirit remained strong, the holders of the office were bishops, unable to found a legal family; but the triumph of Henry II. over the feudal separatists rendered it safe to appoint baronial justiciars. The development of the power of the chancellor, the break-up of the bureaucratic system of the Angevins and the development of a constitution in which a permanent prime minister found no place, led to gradual change in the functions of the justiciar during the thirteenth century. His political functions gradually disappeared, while the increasing specialisation of our legal system gave to his functions as president of the chief court of justice a new importance. Hubert de Burgh was the last great political justiciar. His successor, Stephen Segrave, was simply a good lawyer. He began the process of change which was completed before the end of the century. The Capitalis Justitia of Henry II. becomes the Lord Chief Justice of Edward I.

The title of justice was, however, never confined to the justiciar. Even during the administration of Roger of Salisbury, the title is frequently conferred on other members of the Curia Regis. In the Dialogus de Scaccario it is their official designation, although the same individuals sat in the Exchequer with the title of barons. Henry II. made his grandfather's system of judicial visitations a permanent part of the legal system of the country. As representatives of the sovereign, the Justices of the Curia Regis systematically perambulated the country and tried the of-fenders presented to them by the grand juries elected by the shire-moot, held inquiries into freehold suits under the Grand Assize, transacted proceedings under the three assizes of Mort D'Ancester, Darrein Presentment, and Novel Disseisin, besides acting as fiscal and executive officers of the erown. But the judicial aspect of the justice gradually became more important. In 1178 the Court of King's Bench was cut off from the Curia Regis in its larger aspect, and the clause of Magna Carta that Common Pleas should no longer follow the crown, but be held in some fixed place, led to the further differentiation of the Court of Common Pleas, which sat onstantly at Westminster, from the Court of King's Bench, now entirely devoted to judicial business. Meanwhile tho old financial system which had centred in the Exchequer became obsolete, and the Barons of the Exchequer, deprived of most of their fiscul business, became almost as much simple judges as the justices of the King's Bench or Common Pleas. The process of differentiation had already gone so far that each of the three courts had a separate staff of officials. As has been shown, the Justiciar became Chief Justice, and, as he retained a special relation to the King's Bench, a similar official of less dignity presided over the Common Pleas. Meany ile Edward I. defined and completed waat Henry I had established. The Justices Henry II. became the Justices Edward I. The various com-Itineral of Assiz r which they sat at Westmissions minster or vant on circuits, were systematised and onlarged. Instead of the separate Iters for different purposes, the justices were sent out at regular intervals on a fivefold mission -as Justices of the Peace, oi Oyer and Terminer, of Gaol Delivery, of Assize, and of Nisi Prius (q.v.). Their functions and positions were hardly changed until recent legislation consolidated the three courts, and superseded by justices the Barons of the Exchequer. The title of Justice is given by recent Judicature Acts to all judges of the Supremo Court. In the High Court of Justice, into which the three old courts have been merged, they are called Mr. Justice, and their head is the Lord Chief Justice of England, the titles of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Lord Chief Baron having been abolished. In the Court of Appeal the judges are styled Lord Justice. The title of Lord Justice had in previous times been often given to persons invested with extraordinary judicial commissions, such as, for example, the government of Ireland during the absence or vacancy of the Lord Lieutenant, or the commissions of regency that sometimes governed the country during the absences of William III., and the Haneverian monarchs on the Continent. Besides the justices of the English courts, there were special justices for Durham, Chester, the Isle of Ely, and similar Palatine jurisdictions.

In a lewer sphere the title of justice has long been given to the inferior magistrates of the first instence. The "custodes pacis," or "conservatores pacls," which it became usual for the king to nominate during the thirteenth century (e.g., Henry III.'s writ in 1233, and Edward I.'s statute of Winchester), received, by an Act of Edward III., both power to try felonies, and the more honourable designation of Justice of the Peace. "The whole Christian world hath not the like office as justice of the peace, if duly executed," was the opinien of Lord Coko, and despite the obvious objections to lay tribunals, drawn from a limited class, the system still remains, except in a few populous places where stipendiary magistrates with legal training have been appointed. The Justices of the Peace are appointed by a special commission under the great seal to keep the peace within the limits of the county in which they are ap-pointed to act. In 1906 the property qualification (£100 a year in land) for the office was abolished. They exercise jurisdiction either in lividually or in potty sessions of the justices. or a limited district, or in quarter sessions of the justices of the whole county. The latter body still combines with its judicial work administrative and fiscal business in a way that recalls the justices of the reign of Henry I.

Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Gneist, Verwellungerecht; Campbell, Lives of the Chief Justices; Foss, Judges of Eng.; Reeve, Hist. of English Law; Stephen, Hist. of Criminal Law; Haydn's Book of Dignities gives a list of the Chief Justices; Burn's Justice of the Peece is an authoritative manual on the many functions of that office. Justus, Archbishop of Canterbury (624—627), was one of the monks who were sent by Gregory, in 601, to join the missien at Canterbury. In 604 he was made Bishop of Rochester. On the death of Ethelbert, fearing persecution, he fled to France, but soon returned and resumed the charge of his sec. In 624, he became Archbishop of Canterbury in succession to Mellitus. The great event of his short occupancy of this see was the extension of the Kentish mission to Northumbria.

as that in which they came to our shores is the one given by the Anglo-Saxon phronicler and Florence of Worcester (449-45J); both of these authorities probably basing their computation upon the words of Bede, Hist. Eccles., i. 15. According to Gildas, this event must have happened after Ætius had been cousul for the third time, that is, after 446; and Nennius, too, in a very corrupt passage, seems to imply that it took place in 449. But, while accepting this date, we must not forget that there are grounds for assigning the first landing of the Teutonic tribes to a period much nearer the commencement of the century. The next question that arises is, as to the original seat and the race of these Jutish invaders. And hore it is noteworthy that neither Gildas nor Nennius seems to know them as Jutes; with the former they are "Saxons," with the latter "exiles from Germany" and "Saxous." Bedo appears to speak of them vaguely as being of "the race of the Angles or Saxons," then as "Saxons," and lastly as "Jutes." He also tells us that these Jutes originally came from the north of that "country which is called Anjulus, and which is said to have remained unoccupied from that time to our day." This passage has generally been interpreted as locating the Jutes in Jutland, which may still preserve the old root in its modern name. Lastly, we have to consider the area of the Jntish settlements in Britain. This we are enabled to do by the sid of Bede, who speaks of their having occupied Kent, the Islo of Wight, and a part of the West-Saxon mainland opposite. To this statement we may add Nennius's declaration that Hengest's son and nephew, Octha and Urisa, held much territory beyond the Frisian Sea up to the borders of the Picts. This legend may perhaps point to a Jutish colorisation of some part of S. or S.W. Scotland. [The history of the conquest of Kent will be found under the articles HENDEST, Horsa, English Conquest, and Kent.]

Junon, William (5. 1582, d. 1663), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Chichester, and educated at hierchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford. He succeeded Laud, in 1621, as Master of St. John's. In 1632 he became also, by Laud's recommendation, Clerk of the King's Closet, and, in the following year, Dean of the Chapel Royal, Bishop of Hereford, and by his translation before being consecrated to the former see, Bishop of London. By the same influence he was appointed, in 1635, Lord High Treasurer, which office he held till 1641. When the king sought advice from several of the bishops whether to consent to the bill for Strafford's attainder or not, Juxon houestly advised him that he ought not to consent if he were not personally satisfied of Strafford's guilt. Aguin, in 1648, the advised the king on the questions of conscience which arose with reference to the Treaty of Newport, and in the following January attended the king during his trial. During the Commonwealth the bishop lived in retirement in Gloucestershire, occupied in study and hunting. At the Restoration, his attendance on the king's last moments marked him out for promotion to the Archbishopric of Canterbury (Sept., 1660). But his age and his health prevented him from taking an important part either in the Savoy Conference or in the memorable meeting of Convocation which followed.

Kaffir Wars, THE, were frequent between the Dutch Boers and the Kaffirs during the Dutch tenure of the Cape of Good Hope, After this colony passed into the hands of the English, these wars occasionally broke out with renewed violence. In 1811, a re-settlement of the frontier led to a severe struggle between the colonial forces under Colonel Graham, and the Kaffirs, who, although they at first gained a victory at the White River, were afterwards completely defeated. In 1818 another war broke out, owing to the arbitrary conduct of Lord Charles Somerset, the governor of Cape Colony, who assisted one of the chiefs with 3,000 mon in a private quarrel. The result was that the Kaffira, nnder a chief named Makann.., attacked Graham's Town, and were only repul whatter reat slaughter had taken place on b .i. sides. After some further hostilities in 1829, 10,000 Kaffirs invaded the colony, in 1835, under a chief named Xoco, and devastated the eastern province. The British troops, under Sir Benjamin Durban and Sir Harry Smith, sub-sequently invaded Kaffirland, and exacted a severe retribution from the aggressors. In onsequence of this collision, it was found essary to reverse the policy of repression and extermination which had hitherto been employed. In 1846, however, another war broke out, owing to the violation of the treaty on the part of the British; an invasion of Kafirland followed, and much blood was shed on both sides. In 1851-2 there was a further renewal of hostilities, owing chiefly to the conduct of the Dutch Boers, whose treatment of the natives has always been such as to cause them to look with suspicion and hatred upon all white men. A year or two later British Kaffraria was made a crown colony, and in 1865 was incorporated with Cape Colony.

Kalpy, The Siege of (1858), occurred during the Indian Mutiny. On May 19, 1858, Sir Hugh Rose laid siege to the town of Kalpy from the north. On the 20th the rebel army made a spirited sally, but were driven back. On the 22nd, being between a double fire, they again attacked Sir Hugh's force, and were only beaten back after an obstinate combat, suffering very heavily under the charges of cavalry and the guns of the horse artillery. All that night Kalpy was cannonaded, and in the morning of the 23rd, Sir Hugh Rose's troops advanced to assault the town in two columns. But they encountered no resistance, for the encury had fled, and the whole rebel arsenal, including fifty guns, fell into the hands of the English.

Kalunga, THE SIEGE OF (Oct., 1814). On the breaking out of the Goorkha War, in 1814, General Gillespie advanced into the Dhoon valley, and coming upon the fortified position of Kalunga, summoned the Goorkha chief, Bulbuddur Sing, to surrender. The Goorkha refused, and Gillespie determined to earry the fort by assault. His men were staggered by the murderous fire directed on them as they advanced up to the wieket, when the general, irritated by the repulse, placed himself at the head of three companies of Europeans, and rushed up to the gate, but was shot through the heart as he was waving his hat to his men to follow him. A retreat was immediately sounded; but not before twenty officers and 240 men were killed and wounded. A month was lost in waiting for heavy ordnance from Delhi. On Nov. 27 the breach was reported practicable, and a second unsuccessful assault was made, with a loss of 680 men in killed and wounded. The mortars were now brought into play, and, after three days' incessant shelling, the Goorkhas sallied forth and escaped. [Goorkha WAR.]

Kandy Wars, The. Whilst Ceylon was under the rule of the Portuguese and Dutch, the Kandyan territories in the interior of the island had remained unconquered, although a kind of desultery warfare between the natives and the Europeans was kept up. In 1799 and 1800 Mr. North, the governor of Ceylon, endeavoured to induce the King of Kandy to put himself under British protec-These negotiations, however, failed; and, in 1803, Mr. North having received an accession of power by the separation of the government of Ceylon from that of Madras, at once invaded the Kandyan territories, at the lead of a force of 3,000 men.

Kars, THE SIEGE OF (1855). On the breaking out of the Crimean War, Colonel Fenwick Williams was sent to Asiatic Turkey to organise the Turkish army against the Russian invaders. On the approach of the Russians under Mouravieff, he hastened to Kars, which he provisioned for four months, and prepared to defend to the last. Earthworks were erccied wherever they seemed to be required. Mouravieff arrived before Kars in August, with an army of 50,000 men, a portion of which was detached to watch Erzeroum. In order to get rid of as many useless mouths as possiblo, Williams directed the Bashi-bazonks, or Turkish cavalry, to cut their way through the Russian army, a feat which they performed, though with some loss. On Sept. 29, under the obscurity of the morning, the Russians made a grand attack, but were met with such a stubborn resistance that they were forced to retire, with a loss of 5,000 men. Williams did his best while provisions lasted. There was no hope of relief or assistance. Selim Pasha, who might have come to his aid, refused; and Omar Pasha was too far off. On Nov. 24, therefore, Williams sent Captain Teesdale with a flag of truce to Mouravieff. The Russians displayed great generosity, and granted terms which could be accepted without loss of honour.

Keane, John, 1st Lord (b. 1781, d. 1844), entered the army in 1793, and served in Egypt, the Mediterranean, and Martinique, down to the year 1809. Having reached the rank of lieut.-colonel, he com-manded a brigade in the third division all through the Peninsular War. In 1814 he was made major-general, and served through the American War. He passed eight years in Jamaica as commander-in-chief, from 1823 to 1830, and for a year and a half of the time he administered the civil government also. In 1833, he went to India as commander-inchief at Bombay. Five years later (1838), he received orders from the government of India to organise and lead a force intended to co-operate with the Scinde army, on the north-west frontier, at the breaking out or the Afghan War; and in December he assumed the command of the combined forces. Ghazni was stormed, and the English troops entered Ghazni, and restored Shah Shujah to the throne of Afghanistan, while Dost Mahommed fled across the Oxus. For his services in this expedition, Sir John Keano was raised to the peerage (1839).

Kells, THE COUNCIL OF, was held in 1152 by Eugenius III.'s legate, Cardinal Paparo, who brought with him the pallia for the Archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam. The influence of St. Malachy was prominent at this synod, and anticipating the action of the synod at Cashel, it condemned the marriage of the elergy, and perhaps even imposed tithes.

Kemble, John Mitchell (b. 1807, d. 1857), was the son of the eelebrated actor Charles Kemble. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards studied in Germany. He devoted himself chiefly to the Anglo-Saxon language and antiquities, and became one of the first Anglo-Saxon scholars in Europe. His first works of importance were Codex Diplomaticus Evi Sazonici, 6 vols., 1839 - 48, a valuable collecticz of the charters and other instruments of the period of Anglo-Saxon rule in England; and The Saxons in England, 2 vols., 1849, which latter is a most authoritative, learned, and acute account of the laws, institutions, and social condition of the English previous to the Norman Conquest. Mr. Kemble also edited State Papers, dc., illustrative of the State of Europe from the Revolution to the Accession of the House of Hanover, which is a useful compilation for the student of this period.

Kemp, John (b. circa 1380, d. 1454), Archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from a good Kentish family, and after holding various minor preferments, was in 1418 appointed Bishop of Rochester, from which see he was soon translated to Lendon (1421). He was one of the council of regency during Henry VI.'s minority, and in 1426 was made Chancellor, and in the same year raised to the archbishopric of York. He was a supporter of Cardinal Beaufort against Gloucester, and in 1432 had to resign the great seal. After this he seems fer some years to have taken no very prominent part in public affairs, but in 1450 he was again appointed Chancellor, and continued to hold the seal till his death. Two years later he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury, and in the same year received a cardinal's hat from the Pepe. He displayed great firmness and prudence in dealing with Jack Cade and his followers, and by his wisdom and moderation kept the rivalry between the Dukes of York and Somerset within bounds during his lifctime.

Ken, Thomas (b. 1637, d. 1711), Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Berkhampstead, and educated at Winchester and Oxford. About the year 1679 hc became chaplain to the Princess Mary, wife of William of Orange, and afterwards to Lord Dartmouth, at Tangiers. Later he was appointed chaplain to Charles II., whom he attended en his death bed, and who seems to have admired the spirit of a man who dared to refuse te allow Eleanor Gwynn to lodge in his prebend's house at Winchester. He was appointed Bishep of Bath and Wells in 1685. After the western rebellion he visited Monmouth in prison, and was the protector of the unhappy victims of that comniotion. Ken was one of the "Seven Bishops" tried for petitioning against the Declaration of Indulgence in 1688. Despite his conduct on this occasion he refused to take the oaths to William and Mary, and consequently lost his bishopric, in 1691.

Kendal, Ermengard Melusina von SCHULENBERO, Duchess of (d. 1743), was one of the mistresses of George I. In 1714 she was created Duchess of Munster, in the Irish peerage, and in 1719 Duchess of Kendal. She affected great devotion, and sometimes attended several Lutheran chapels in the course of the day. On the death of the Duke of Somerset no Master of the Horse was appointed for several years, the profits of the place being paid to the Duchess. She seems now to have been looked upon as the dispenser of the king's favours, and was bribed accordingly. She received £10,000 from the South Sea Company. In 1722 she was granted the monopoly of coining halfpence for Ireland, and sold it to Wood. In 1727 she was gained over by Bolingbroke, and became the leader of a powerful combination against Walpole, although the king handed a memorial, conveyed to him through her hands, over to the minister. She is said to have been overwhelmed with grief on hearing of the death of George, and te have imagined that a raven which flew in at her window was the spirit of the king. She seems to have possessed neither beauty nor intellect, and Lord Chesterfield, who had married her niece, says that she was little better than an idiot.

Kenilworth, four miles from Warwick, was granted by Henry III. to Simon de Montfort, and on his rebellion was retaken in 1266, after a siege of six months, at which time the famous "Dictum de Kenilworth" was drawn up under its walls. In 1327 it was the scene of the imprisonment of Edward II., at the time of his deposition, and subsequently came into the hands of John of Gaunt. It was granted by Elizabeth to the Earl of Leicester, and is famous for the entertainment which he gave to the queen in 1575.

Kenilworth, Dictum DE (1266), was the name given to the treaty made between King Henry III. and the remains of the baronial party, who after the battle of Evesham shut themselves up in Kenilworth Castle, where, after a siege of several months, they capitulated. This ordinance was then drawn up, declaring the plenary power of the king, annulling the acts of De Montfort, providing that the liberties of the Church and the charters should be maintained; that all persens, with the exception of the De Montforts and a few others, might compound for their offences with a fine; and that all who submitted within forty days should be perdoned. At the same time all persons were forbidden to circulate vain and foolish stories of miracles regarding Simon de Montfort, or to repute him a saint and a martyr. The Dictum was accepted by the barons, except a few who held out in the Isle of Ely; and even these, when they submitted in 1267, were allowed the same terms as those who had yielded in the preceding year.

Ken

Eennedy, James, Bishop of St. Andrew's (b. 1406, d. 1465), a relative of James II. of Scotland, gave offence to the Earl of Crawfurd by discovering to the king the "band" that had been formed between that nobleman and the Earl of Douglas. Crawfurd, in revenge, laid waste the bishop's lands. During the first part of the minority of James III., Kennedy aeted as governor of ti. kingdom, of which he proved himself an able and conscientious guardian. Mr. Burton observes that he was the first ecclesiastic who held high political power in Scotland, and so to some extent marks the dawn of a new cra.

Kenneth I., The Hardy (d. 869), was the son of Alpin, King of the Scots, whom he succeeded (probably at Galloway) in 834, though he did not obtain Dalriada proper till some years later. In 839 he invaded the Pictish territory inconjunction with the Danes, and in 844 finally established himself on the Pictish throne, to which he had a claim by maternal descent, thus being the first to incorporate the two kingdoms. In 851 Kenneth built a church at Dunkeld, which he endowed richly, and to which he removed part of the relics of St. Columba. He was a man of warlike character, and six times invaded Lothian, burning Dunbar and Melrose. His family consisted of two sons—Constantine and Ald—and three daughters, married respectively to Run, King of Tre Britons of Strathelyde, to Olaf, King of Dublin, and to Aedh Finnhath, King of Ireland.

Chron. Picts and Scots; Skene, Celtic Scotland; Robertson, Early Kings of Scotland.

Kenneth II., the son of Malcolm, obtained the crown of Alban, in succession to Colin, 971. His first act was to invade Strathclyde, and to fortify the fords of the Forth against the Britons; his next to invade Northumbria, whose earl he carried off captive. The events of this reign are exceedingly observe; it is probable, however, that Kenneth gained a great victory over the Danes at Luncarty, near Perth, and that he was slain at Fetterairn, in Kincardineshire (995), by Fenella, Countess of Angus, in revenge for the munder of her son by the king. The story of the English chroniclers that King Edgar ceded Lothian to Kenneth, to be held as a fiet of the English crown, is without foundation.

Kenneth III., THE GRIM, son of Duff, succeeded Constantine III. as king of Alban, 997. In 1000 he was engaged in warfare with Ethelred of England. He was killed in battle in Strathearn, 1005, by his cousin Malcolm, who succeeded him as Malcolm II.

Kent, PEERAGE OF. The earldom of Kent was held, between the Norman Conquest and the fourteenth century, by three individuals:

(1) Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, brother to William I. (1067); (2) William of Ypres (1141); and (3) Hubert de Burgh (1227); none of whom transmitted the honour. In 1321 King Edward I. granted the earldom to his younger son, Edmund of Woodstock, who, however, was attainted in 1330. In the following year the title was restored to his son Edmund, who died, as did his younger brother, childless. The earldom was then inherited by a sister's son, Sir Thomas Holland, whose grandson, Thomas, was created Duke of Surrey (1397). In spito of the latter's having been beheaded in 1400, and declared a traitor in Parliament, his son Edmund received his lands and sat in Parliament as Earl of Kent (1405). On his death without issue (1+77), the title became extinct. It seems to have been revived in favour of William Nevill, Lord Fauconberg, about 1461; but he also died childless, and the carldom was granted in 1465 to Edmund G wy, fourth Lord Ruthyn, in whose family it remained until 1740. Henry, the twelfth and last earl of this creation, was raised to a dukedom of the same style in 1706. The title of Duke of Kent was revived for Edward, fourth son of King Georgo III, and father of Queen Victoria, who died without male issue in 1820.

Kent, Kingdom of, took its name from the Coltic tribe of the Cantii-whom Cæsar found inhabiting this part of our island. Tradition has recorded that in the year 449 "Hengest and Horsa, invited by Vortigern, King of the Britons, sought Britain." After the battle of Crayford, in 456, we read that "the Britons then forsook Kent, and fled in terror to London." The first Teutonic kingdom seems to have been established in England by the Jutes -- a Low German tribe who also gained possession of the Isle of Wight. It is not altogether impossible that there were two Jutish kingdoms founded in Kent, the memory of which was in later times preserved by the division of the realm into two sees, with Canterbury and Rochester respectively as reats for the "bishop's stool." For some hundred and fifty years we hear little or nothing of the kingdom of Kent, till towards the close of the sixth century, when augustine on landing in this island found Ethelbert King of Kent. Ethelbert, who appears to have ascended the throne when only a child of some eight years, had in the course of a long reign largely extended the bounds of his kingdom, and pushed his way up the Thames valley, till in 568 he was defeated at Wimbledon by the West Saxon king-the first battle between the Teutonic invaders. But despite this disaster Ethelbert's reign was one of great success for the Kentish kingdom. Some ten years before the end of the century his authority was more or less paramount as far north as the Humber, and the Kings of Essex, East Anglia, and Mercia were dependent upon him. His fame had even extended as far as the Continent; and his wife was Bertha, the daughter of the Frankish king, Charibert. The supremacy of Kent at the time of the first conversion may be considered as the main cause of the metropolitan see being fixed at Canterbury. On Ethelbert's death in 516, his son Eadbald seems to have relapsed into paganism; and on the rise of the Northumbrian power we read that Edwin was overlord of every English kingdom except Kent, and Kent, too, was closely knit to Northumberland by the marriage of Eadbald's daughter Ethelburga to Edwin. It was this marriage that led to the first conversion of Northumberland and the mission of Paulinus to the north of England. But by this time the days of Kentish supremacy were over; and the chief interest in the later history of this kingdom is the fact that its sovereigns were the first to issue a codo of laws, or to reduce their laws to writing. The codes of Ethelbert, of Lothaire and Eadrie (673-690), and of Wihtrad (690), are still extant. Despite the importance attaching to Kent as being the seat of the arch-bishopric, it seems to have henceforward held its own mong the rival kingdoms with difficulty. We read how in 686 it was ravaged by Coadwalla of Wessex, and how next year its folk burnt Cendwalla's brother Mull—an offenco which led to a second invasion by the West Saxon king. In 694 Ine, King of Wessex, received blood-money for the slaughter of Mull: and in 6°2 we read of there being two kings in the land. "Kent," says Dr. Stubbs, "in the eighth century broke up into the kingdoms of the East and West Kentings, probably on the lines of the earlier kingdoms, which are said to have been united by Ethelbert." As the power of Mercia increased it is probable that the country came more and more under the influence of the kings of that province (more especially when the royal Kentish house died out), and later under that of Wessex. As an example of the way in which Kent swayed backwards and forwards between Wessex and Mercia we may take the last few years of its separate existence. In 784 Alrie, the father of Egbert, and a descendant of Cerdie, the West-Saxon, was reigning over this kingdom. Ten years later the Chronielo tells us that the reigning king's name was Endberht Praen. Then came a time of Mercian supremacy; for Kenulf of Mercia drove out Eadberht in 796, and made his brother Cuthred king. On Cuthred's death the throne was seized by Baldred, who in 823 was driven out by Egbert of Wessex. But even now Kent was hardly an integral part of the West-Saxon realm. Egbert made it into a separate tingdom, subject to the overlordship of Wessex, for his eldest son Æthelwulf; and H18T. -25*

whon Æthelwulf succeeded to his father's throne Kent was given, with Sussex, Surrey, and Essex, to Athelstan. Again, nearly twenty years later, we read in the Chronicle that Ethelberht succeeded to the kingdom of the Kentish people in 955. There does not seem to be any reason for supposing that Kent continued separate from the rest of the kingdom after the accession of Ethelberht to the throne of Wessex (860), but we probably have traces of its Witan, and even of the Witan of one of the two sub-kingdoms into which it had been divided a century and a half earlier; when, after the king and all the "high Witan" had gone home in despair, "the East Kentish men made peace with the Danish army, and gave them £3,000." Under Edward the Confessor Kent formed part of Godwin's earldon of Wessex, but its distinct character as compared with the rest of Southern England may be traced in its being towards the latter part of the same reign separated from that province, and given, together with Essex, into the hands of Godwin's son Leofwine. After the conquest Kent seems for a time to have been created a County Palatine for William I.'s half-brother, Odo, who, however, must have forfeited this honour at the beginning of the next reign. [T. A. A.] Kent, EDMUND GREY, EARL OF (d. 1489), known in the early part of his life as Lord Grey of Ruthin, was originally on the Lancastrian side, but during the battle of Northampton he deserted to the Yorkists, to whose victory he contributed greatly by this piece of treachery. On Edward IV.'s accession, he was received into the royal favour, and created Earl of Kent and Lord High Treasurer. He managed to preserve his titles and estates till his death, notwithstanding the different changes of government.

Kentigern, St., or St. Mungo (d. 603?), was a contemporary of St. Columba, and the apostle of Strathelyde. He is said to have founded the see of Glasgow, where he seems to have long lived in quiet, till the disorders of the age drove him from that district into Wales. There he founded a monastery and bishopric in the vale of Clwyd, which received its name from his disciple Asaph. When Rydderch Hael established his rule in Strathclyde, and after the battle of Ardderyd (513), Christianity could once more revive in those parts, Kentigern was recalled to his old diocese, with Hoddam, in Dumfriesshire, for his headquarters, till he once more removed to Glasgow. Thence he seems to have proceeded on his missionary labours to Galloway and the more northern parts of Scotland, especially in the upper valley of the Dee. An old legend tells how St. Kentigern and St. Columba met before their death, and passed several days together in spiritual conversation.

Kentish Petition, THE (1701), was an expression of public opinion against the peaco policy shown by the Tories in their delay in voting supplies and in seconding the measures taken by William III. for the security of Europe against the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV. It was drawn up by William Colepepper, chairman of the Quarter Sessions at Maidstone, and signed by the deputy lieutenants, about twenty justices of the peace, and a large number of freeholders. It deprecated "the least distrust of his most sacred majesty" on the part of the Commons, and implored the House "that its royal addresses might be turned into Bills of Supply." It was sent up to London in the hands of William Colepepper, and with him went four gentlemen of the county to pre-sent it. The House of Commons was indignant at the idea of one county setting itself in opposition to the united wisdom of the country, and perhaps still more so at the indirect way in which it was first brought under its notice. The petitioners could only get their document presented at all on cond on that they, would avow mour and Howe violently their deed. denounced them. The petition was voted "scandalous, insolent, seditious;" and tho fivo gentlemen were removed in the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms. But public opinion was unanimous in their favour, being chiefly influenced by the "Legion Memorial," drawn up by Daniol Defoe, and at the close of the session the petitioners were set free. Hallam remarks that, "though no attempt was made to call the authority of the House in question by habeas corpus or other legal remedy, it was discussed in pamphlets and general conversation, with little advantage to a power so arbitrary, and so evidently abused in the immediate instanco.'

Kenyon, LLOYD, 1sr LORD (b. 1732, d. 1802), was called to the Bar in 1761.

In 1781 he made himself a great reputation by his skill in conducting the defence of Lord George Gordon. Next year ho was made Attorney-General, and in 1784 became Master of the Rolls. In 1788 he succeeded Lord Mansfield as Chief Justico of the King's Bench.

Keppel, Acoustus, Viscount (b. 1725. d. 1786), enterod the navy under Lord Anson. In 1749 he was sent to the Mediterranean, and two years later displayed somo judgment in negotiations with the Court of Algiers. On the French War breaking out, in 1757, Keppel served with distinction under Hawke, and next year captured Goree, under difficult circumstances. In 1759 he took part in the fight in Quiberon Bay, and, in 1761 and 1762 respectively, he c nducted the naval part of the operations in the capture of Belleisle, and commanded at Havannah. In 1765 he was a Lord of the Admiralty, under the Rockingham ministry. For some years he remained in England unemployed, and in 1778 was appointed to the command of the Channel Fleet. On July 27, after being reinforced, Keppel encountered the French fleet off Ushant. atterly failed to bring them to a decisive action, and tamely allowed them to escape in the night. Thereupon ensued a series of mutual recriminations between Keppel and Palliser, his second in command. A courtmartial ensued, which, after sitting for a month, declared the charges against Keppel to be unfounded. Keppel's case became a party question, and the Whigs made it a vital point to gain an acquittal. He had the good fortune to have the popular voice on his side, as well as the advocacy of Erskine, and he escaped amid the loud acclamations of the nation generally, and of the Whigs in particular. In March, 1782, he was appointed to be First Lord of the Admiralty, but resigned on the formation of the Coalition Ministry, only to resume the post, however, in four months under the samo government. On Pitt's accession to office he again resigned, and took no further part in polities till his death, in 1786. As a naval commander, Keppel showed no talent, nor even the most commonplace enterprise, and owes his position in history entirely to his own blunders and the accident of his family connection with the Whigs.

Ker, Sir Thomas, of Ferniehurst (d. 1586), was the son-in-law of Kirkcaidy of Grange, who made him Provost of Edinburgh, in Queen Mary's interest, 1571. On the capture of Edinburgh, he took refugo in England from the resentment of Morton. He was a bold soldier, and as warden of the Scotch Marches became embroiled with the English (1586), in a disturbance in which it was said t'at Arran was implicated: a demand from the English court for his surrender and trial was rendered futile by his death.

Kerns is the name given to the lightarmed Irish foot-soldiers. They are described for the first time in the Saga of Egil, which gives the Norse account of the battle of Brunanburh; and the name was used for the Irish irregular infantry all through the Middle Agus.

Ket, ROBERT (d. 1549), a tanner of Wymondham, in Norfolk, was a leader in the Norfolk agrarian insurrection of 1549. Having collected 16,000 men, he encamped on Mousehold Ilill (q.v.), near Norwich, and assumed the title of King of Norfolk and Suffolk, holding a daily court, and trying all captured landlords. On Aug. 1 Ket took Norwich, and subsequently drove out the Marquis of Northampton. But the Earl of Warwick cut off Ket's provisions, and forced him to a battle, in which he was defeated and taken prisoner, being soon afterwards hanged in chains at Norwich Castle.

Khirkee, The Battle of (Nov. 5, 1817), was fought between the English and the Mahratta troops of the Peishwa Bajee Rao. It resulted in the defeat of the latter by the English commander, Colonel Burr. The Mahratta general took advantage of a gap in the English line, to launch a select body of cavalry against it, hoping to cut the English in two. Colonel Burr's energy prevented this, and the Mahrattas, charged by the English, broke and fled.

Thords, The, are inhabitants of the part of Orissa lying south of the Mahanuddy. They are a very primitive community, retaining their old patriarchal government, habits, and superstitions. Among other customs they were long addicted to the sacrifice of human beings to the earth goddess, for the purpose of increasing the fertility of their fields. The custom was to hack the living victim in pieces, divide the flesh, and bury it in the respective plots of ground. The exertions of Major Macpherson, Sir John tirant, and Colonel Campbell, were successful in destroying the custom by disproving its efficiency (1837—49).

Kidd, CAPTAIN WILLIAM (d. 1701), was a noted pirate living in retiremer. in New York, when ho was selected by the Earl of Bellamont, governor of New York of Mass.chusetts, to suppress pirac the monican coast and elsewhere. As the Admiralty objected to fit out a man-of-war for this purpose, a ship called the Adventure was equipped, chiefly by the subscriptions of the Whig ministers. Kidd was put in command, and took with him a commission under the great seel, empowering him to seize pirates. The king's right to the goods found in possession of these malefactors was granted by letters patent to the supporters of the expedition, his majesty reserving only one-tenth of the spoil to himself. In Feb., 1697, Kidd sailed from the Hudson, and finding that plundering merchant vessels was more profitable than attacking gangs of desperate men, he soon "threw off the character of a privateer and became a pirate." It was about Aug., 1698, that this was made known in London, and Kidd was arrested at New York, to which town bad returned. He was taken to England, and there hanged with three of his companions.

Kildare, Earls of. This family traced its descent through Maurice Fitzgerald to Walter Fitzother, the Castellan of Windsor. His son Gerald became Lord Offaley in 1205. John, the seventh lord, brother of the first Earl of Desmond, was on his victory over De Vescy—till then Lord of Kildare—in 1316 created Earl of Kildare, and died soon after. The fourth earl, Maurice, was Lord Justice of Ireland, and died in 1390. Thomas, the seventh earl, was Lord Deputy till his death in 1478, and from this time the Earls of Kildare became the most powerful nobles in all Ireland, opposed, but as a rule nnsuccessfully, by the Butlers. [For the further fortunes of this family see separate articles, and the Fitzgeralds.] The ducal family of Leinster at present represents this ancient house.

Kildare, GERALD, 8th EARL OF (d. 1513), was thirty-three years chief governor of Ireland. In 1487, the earl, as Lord Deputy, actively assisted at the coronation of Lambert Simnel as Edward VI., at Christ Chnrch, Dublin. His brother, the Chancellor of Ireland, fell at Stoke. However, when the earl made his submission to Edgecumbe, the king's controller, and had an interview with Henry VII. at Windsor, he again became Lord Deputy. After Warbeck's landing in Ireland, however, his office was taken from him, and Sir Edward Poynings had him attainted. He was then sent over to England, and confined in the Tower. Many stories are told of his conduct there, and his frank avowal that he burnt the cathedral at Cashel because he thought the archbishop was in it, is said to have convinced Henry that he was no conspirator. The Bishop of Meath, his chief accuser, concluded his charges by saying, "You see what a man he is—all Ireland canrow rule him." "Then," said the king, "it is et that he should rule all Ireland." Accordingly the Earl of Kildare was again made Lord Deputy, and remained so till his death. From this time, however, he was a loyal subject, and waged incessant war against the natives, who were again encroaching on the Pale, till he fell in battle agrinst the O'Moores (1513).

Eildare, Gerald Fitzoerald, 9th Earl of (d. 1531), became Lord Deputy after his father's death in 1513, and remained so till 1519, when, in spite of his successful administra. tion, he was superseded by the Earl of Surrey. The hereditary feud with the Butlers (q.v.), meanwhile, assumed such dimensions that, though he had again been made Lord Deputy in 1524, he was summoned to England and kept a prisoner in the Tower from 1526 to 1530. In 1532, though the struggle with the Butlers was still going on, he was again Lord Deputy, but in 1534 he was once more summoned to England, though he was allowed to appoint a deputy during his absence. Gerald appointed his son, Lord Thomas, and after supplying his own eastles with artillery and ammunition from the royal magazines, he left for England. He was at once thrown into the Tower, where it is reported he was be-

Kildare, Gerald, 11th Earl of (d. 1585), was brother of Thomas, the tenth, and second son of Gerald, the ninth earl. On his father's death he was only ten years old; but in spito of all the efforts of the government to cap-ture him, he was conveyed away from Ireland to the Continent. Cardinal Pole, a relation of his mother, Lady Gray, sent for him into Italy, in which country he was educated. His estates were restored under Edward VI., and under Mary he was reinstated in all his honours. The attainder, however, was not really reversed till the reign of Elizabeth. He was active in suppressing Irish insurrections, and died in 1585 in the Tower, where he had been sent on suspicion of being conneeted with the Geraldine rebellion in the south. All his sons died early, without issue, and the family honours descended to the present house of Leinster, through a brother of his.

Rilkenny, Synod at, consisting of all the Irish bishops and delegates from the elergy, met at Kilkenny in May, 1642, and decided that no distinction was to be made between the old Irish and the new, or Anglo-Irish. A common cath of association was agreed on; the aid of foreign powers was to be solicited, and any repetition of the Ulster outrages, which the Synod condemned, was to bring down excommunication on the authors. A central council was established, and commanders were appointed for the different provinces—Owen Roe, for Ulster; Preston, for Leinster; Barry, for Munster; and Colonel

John Burke, for Connaught. In 1643 a papal legate, Scarampi, joined them; and it was under his guidance that the council opposed the Cessation. First Lord Mountgarret, and then Rinuccini, occupied the place of president of the council. In 1647, after the failure of Glamorgan's treaty, they concluded peace with Ormonde; but it was only in 1649, after Rinuccini had fled, that they were really in earnest.

Kilkenny, THE CONVENTION AT (1342). Alarmed at the attitude of the Anglo-Irish lords, Edward III. sent instructions to hisjusticiary, Sir John D'Arcy, bidding him exclude those who were possessed of great Irish estates from the high offices of State, and replace them by Englishmen whose estates lay at home. For the purpose of earrying out this measure, D'Arcy called a parliament at Dublin, which the Earl of Desmond and the other members of the Irish party refused to attend. The latter called a general meeting of those who sympathised with him; and this convention, meeting at Kilkenny in Nov., 1342, addressed a petition to Edward III. pointing out that English misgovernment had led to the loss of nearly all Leinster, appealing to Magna Carta, and stating their fears as to a resumption of grants and as to the contemplated supplanting of the English by blood by English by birth. Edward's reply to this remonstrance is not extant, but he seems to have received it graciously.

Kilkenny, THE STATUTE OF (1367), was this name, when Lionel, Duke of Clarence, was Lord Lieutenant for the third time. This statute was intended to eheck the degeneracy of the Anglo-Irish. Its ehief provisions were—the prohibition of intermarriages be-tween the English and the natives; of gossipred, and the adoption of the Brehon law by the English, who were also forbidden to make war on the natives. No man of English race was henceforth to be allowed to assume an Irish name, dress, language, or cust while no Irish were for the future t see allowed to pasture their eattle on English ground, or to be admitted to any religious-house or benefice. The breach of these provisions entailed the penalties of high treason. In addition to the above enactments, it was also provided that no 'rish were to be called in as minstrels. Come and livery are also strictly forbidden. The statute, it may be pointed out, was directed exclusively against the Anglo-Irish, and where it deals. with the natives, only does so to protect them from the lawless baronage.

Killigrew, Sir Henry, who had taken part in Sir Henry Dudley's plot against Mary (1556), was, in 1559, selected to bring the Earl of Arran to England. In 1566 he was sent on an embassy to Mary, Queen of Scots; and in 1569 was employed in negotiating for the opening of fresh ports on the Baltic to English eommeree. Three years later he was sent by Elizabeth to try to bring about the delivery of Mary Stuart to the Scots, and her execution; and was subsequently employed in some of the queen's most confidential missions.

Killigrew, Thomas (b. 1612, d. 1683), after having been a page in the court of Charles I., joined Charles II. in his exile, and was sent on an embassy to Veniee, where his profligate eonduct did much harm to his master's cause. On the Restoration, he was made master of the revels, a post for which he seems to have been well fitted. He had considerable influence over the king, and seems to have used it not unfrequently for good. Many anecdotes are told which show him as the candid friend of the king, whom he endeavoured to divert from his insatiable pursuit of pleasure, Killigrew was the author of many plays, none of which, however, are of any striking merit.

"Killing no Murder: briefly discoursed in three questions, by William Allen," was the title of a pamphlet published in May, 1657, to justify the assassination of Cromwell. It justified the recent attempt of Sundercombe, whom it compared to Brutus. The horship of the pamphlet is generally buted to Edward Sexby, the Leveller, a cngaged in promoting an alliance bean Levellers, Royalists, and Spaniards.

Kilmarnock, William Boyd, 2nd Earl or, joined the rebellion of 1745. After the battle of Culloden he surrendered himself, was carried to London, convicted of high treason, and executed on Tower Hill (1646). His title and estates were forfeited for treason.

Kilsyth, The Battle of (Aug. 15, 1645), was fought during the Civil War of the seventeenth century, and resulted in a victory for Montrose and the Cavaliers over the Covenanters, who were commanded by Baillie. Kilsyth is about ten miles south of Stirling.

Kilwardby, Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1279), was Provincial of the Dominicans in England. On the death of Boniface of Savoy, in 1270, a dispute as to his successor took place bety-sen the king and the monks of Canterbury, which resulted in an appeal to the Pope, who nominated Kilwardby to the vacant see. He proved himself worthy of the office, and adopted a conciliatory policy, at the same time introducing many valuable reforms. Archbishop Kilwardby crowned Edward I. and his wife, Eleanor of Castile, in 1274. He was also present at the great eouncil of Lyons, where the doputies of the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, expressed their longing for a union of the Eastern and Western Churches. The same year he seems to have attempted to instil something of his own spirit into the course of study at Oxford. He was a great patron of learning, and a prolific author. In 1278 he was made a cardinal whereupon he vacated his archbishopric, and retired to Rome, where he died.

Kilwarden, ARTHUR WOLFE, VISCOUNT (d. July 23, 1803), was, in 1787, made Solicitor-General for Ireland, and Attorney-General in 1789. In 1798 he became Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and was elevated to the peerage. In 1803 he was unfortunately just driving into Dublin when Emmet's shortlived insurrection was raging, and together with his nephew, was piked by the furious rebels. As a judge he was well known for his inclinations to mercy; and, being Curran's friend, was able to save that statesman from many annoyances in 1798.

Kimberley, John Wodehouse, 1st Earl of (b. 1826, d. 1902), was the eldest son of the third Baron Wodehouse. In 1852 he first took office as Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, till 1856, when he was appointed ambassador at St. Petersburg. In 1858 he eturned, and resumed his post in Lord Palmerston's second administration (1859). In 1863 he was sent on a special mission to the North of Europe to endeavour to settle the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty, and next year succeeded the Earl of Carlisle as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, resigning the post when Lord Russell's alministration retired in 1866. He held the office of Privy Seal from 1869 to 1870, when he accepted the Colonial Office. In 1874 he retired with his colleagues. In 1880 he became colonial secretar, and in 1882 secretary for India. From 1892 to 1894 he was secretary for India and lord president of the Council, and in 1894-5 foreign secretary. On the resignation of Lord Rosebery, in 1896, he became leader of the Liberal Peers.

the other. Whatever fresh prerogatives were in theory assigned to him, he was compelled to delegate them to feudal vassals, who, if nominally holding their powers from the crown, were, for all real purposes, more independent of him than the national ministers of the carlier stages of kingship. The absence of an official organisation—the merely personal character of old English kingship—makes the transition from an Edgar to an Ethelred explicable. Even a Harold could hardly have hold his own against the feudalising tendencies of the time. In fact, the election of the greatest of the earls to the seat of the house of Cerdic, was as great a triumph of the feudal principle, as the election of the leader of the national party was a triumph of the national policy. The Norman Conquest had remarkable effects upon the development of English kingship. Though necessarily introducing a large foudal element into the constitution, William I. did his best to counteract the disruptive tendencies of the foudal party by emphasising as strongly as he could the continuity of the Old English kingship, and by assigning to it fresh prerogatives such as were claimed by effects upon the development of English kingship. Though necessarily introducing a large feudal element into the constitution, William I. did his best to counteract the disruptive tendencies of the foudal party by emphasising as strongly as he could the continuity of the Old English kingship, and by assigning to it fresh prerogatives such as were claimed by continental sovereigns. He still professed to be the national king of the people as well as the feudal lord of the land. He did his best to use fully the powers which theoretically belonged even to the foudal king, however little practically they were in most countries exercised. As the custodian of law and order, as the protector of the people against the anarchy and disruption of the foudal party, the Nor-mun king was in a real sense the leader of his people. Thus the general effect of the Conquest on kingship was a great development of the royal power on the old lines. The constitutional checks were removed. The electivo element became nearly nominal. The establishment of a strong bureaucratic system, and an elaborate mechanism of organisation and administration, carried the royal power to the highest point ever known in England.

Henry II. completed what Henry I. had begun. The feudal reaction suppressed, the way was clear for the consolidation of a great despotism. It is hard to realise that the monarchy of the Angevins was a gradual evolution from the monarchy of the old West Saxon kings. But though the struggle with the Church had led to the growth of the opposition theory of the divine origin of kingship, and the results of the revived study of Roman Law doubtless entered into the idea of kingship as realised by Henry II., yet the inferiority of his own power in Normandy sufficiently indicates that the English monarchy had mainly developed from internal causes. Feudal Gaul had not much to teach the country of Edgar and Dunstan. The analogy of the Carolings was too remote to give more than the impulse to the growth of Henry II.'s despotism.

But the very administrative system which

King, is derived from a common Aryan root, mouning, originally, the father of a family, and is not connected so closely with kin us Old English asage would suggest (cyning = son of the race). The early Germans described by Tacitus were more frequently ruled over by elective principes in peace, or temporary duces in war, than by kings. One result of the migration into Britain was the universal establishment of menarchy among the old English. But the earliest kings can be regarded only as chiof magistrates, or permanent duces. The constant war with the Britons had devoloped the heretoga into the cyning. But by degrees a halo of sanctity surrounded the royal house. Descent from Woden marked it out for special reverence; and though the royal dignity remained strictly elective, it was very exceptional for the choice of the Witan to fall on any but a member of the traditional royal race. As the representative and personification of the unity of the state, as the chief magistrate ir peace, as the leader of the host in war, the Early English king acquired a position which ability and energy could always make imposing, despite the consti-tutional check of the Wise Men and the difficulties inherent in the oxercise of power in a primitive and disorderly state of society. The eonsolidation of the smaller states into greater ones was invariably attended by a great increase in the royal power. "As the kingdom increased in extension," says Dr. Stubbs, "the royal power increased in intension." The conception of the sphere and functions of kingship was enlarged. The development of the comitatus gave the monarch a faithful band of followers, who became the nucleus of a new nobility. The blessing of the Church gave the Christian prince new attributes of dignity and sanctity. The traditions of Im-perial Rome transforred to the overlord of all Britain the prestige of the emperor within the island which was his empire.

Thus throughout the Anglo-Saxon period the theory of kingship was constantly developing; but its old basis remained the same. Edgar was as much the king of the race, the personal monarch of a free people as the smallest "heptarchic" sovereign. But the growth of a feudalism of native origin side by side as yet with the old Teutonic polity gradually modified both the theory and practice of kingship. In the carliest tables of wergilds, the value of the king's life differs only in degree from the value of the life of a subject. But in the days of Alfred a rudimentary conception of treason had come into existence. The king became lord of the people, and was gradually becoming lord of the soil as well. Though still national monarch of the race, his position had become in part at least affected by the territorialising influences that attended the development of the Anglo-Saxon Constitution. But what the king gained on the one hand he lest on gavo permanence to the power of the Angevin monarchy, even when the carelossness of a Richard or the tyranny of a John had done its best to degrade the lustre of the crown, contained in itself the elements of the constitution which was to set limits to the prerogatives of future monarchs. The pure despotism of the Conqueror and his sons became a despotism tempered by precedent when the administrative system had worked long enough to establish a bureaueratic circle of administrative families and a well-defined administrative families and a well-defined administrative tradition. A baronage, which, in ceasing to be feudal, had become national, led the people to a struggle which in less than two generations from Magna Carta had established the medieval constitution of England.

The reign of Henry III. marks the transition. that of Edward I. the completion of the new theory of English kingship. The logislative and taxative powers were now reposed in the hands of the national representatives, whose power of presenting grievances was an indication of that national feeling in accordance with which a wise king would govern. Practical efficacy was given to the old Teutonic maxim, Lex fit consensu populi et constitutione regis. But the whole executive power remained with the king. He still had in his hands the destinies of the whole state. He took the initiative in everything. He governed the country, made war or peace, was the fountain of justice and honour, appointed all ministers, negotiated all treaties, and, through his cour even exercised concurrent legislativo. ative powers with those of Parliament. g as the nation trusted him, ho could a t anything; but he was therex politiens, .ho ruled by law, and the law, so far as not fixed by tradition, could only be altered by Parliament.

During the fourteenth century, though the lasis of kingship was hardly altered from the position of Edward I., there grew up, in proportion as the popular claims of a Parliamentary party, conscious of its strength, were advanced, an antagonistic series of royal assumptions. "For every assertion of national right," says Dr. Stubbs, "there is a counterassertion of royal autocracy. Royalty becomes in theory more absolute, as in practice it is limited more and more by the national will." Edward III. was certainly less able to get his own way than Edward I., yet Edward III.'s claims to override Parliament were far in ex-cess of Edward I.'s. The reign of Richard II. was a period of Parliamentary growth; but Richard was the most strenuous asserter of the divine right and indefeasible prerogatives of monarchy of any mediæval sovereign. His great attempt at despotism speedily led, however, to a new adjustment of the position of the monarchy by the Revolution of 1399.

Both the practice of the Lancastrian monarchs and the theorising of Sir John Fortescue illustrate very strongly the highest development of mediæval constitutionalism. "The origin of politic kingahip," says Fortescue, "is the will of the people. The limitations of the royal power are the glory rather than the shame of regality," as the prosperity of constitutional England and the misery of despotic France sufficiently indicate. The nomination of the council in Parliament almost anticipates the modern ministry, and shows that, even within his executive functions, Henry IV. was under the centrel of Parliament. But constitutionalism was too weak a form of government for the fifteenth century. The Wars of the Roses demonstrated its futility, and the "new monarchy," which the Yorkist Edward IV. began, and the Lancastrian Henry VII. established, shows that a new development of kingship could alone cope with the turbulence of an age of revolution.

It is a mistake to regard the monarchy of tho Tudors as in any formal sense a break in the continuity of the English constitution. But practically it was little less. The functions of Parliament were minimised, and the House of Lords packed with servile bishops, and the Commons with courtiers and placemen. But the absence of a standing army shows that Henry VIII. could rely on his people's support, and that the monarchy was strong because national and popular. The king was careful not to do illegal acts without sufficient reason for them. Even the tex regia of English history, which gave the king's proclamations the force of law, and tho sanguinary attainder of fallen statesmen, show that Parliament was on the king's side. The assertion of the royal supremacy over the Church was the chief new contribution of the Tudor period to the theory of the monarchy. The claim of imperial self-sufficiency for the English king was hardly new; but there was tho less need to theorise when the practical power was secure. Yet now that the mediæval feudal checks were removed, the proprictary theory of sovereignty, which was a result of feudalism, and regarded the nation as the estate of the king—as much his private property as the land of his nobles—directly prepared the way for the divine right theories of the Stuarts.

As a rule, the political writers of the sixteenth century spoke of "the regiment of England as no mere monarchy, but a rule mixed by oligarchy and democracy" (Aylmer); but Raleigh regards the English and French monarchies as similar in power, and the language of Sir T. Smith is much less emphatic than that of Fortescue. The troubles of an age of revolution had resulted in a theory that, in addition to the ordinary constitutional and limited prerogatives of the crown, the supreme necessity of saving the state involved in the very conception of kingship a dictatorial and paramount sovereignty, which was generally called the king's "absolute power." This perhaps necessary conception was now combined with the high monarchical theorisings of James I., and the doctrine of the rising Arminian party that the origin of government was to be found in that patriarchal society, whose monarchical constitution was the precedent for all time, that an indefeasible divine right entitled the next heir by heroditary succession to the monarchy, that all constitutional checks on the crown are of favour and not of right, and that passive obedience was in all cases to be paid to the established monarch. This was supplemented by lawyers zealous for the dignity of the fountain of justice, and by reformers who could see in the royal prerogative the only way to progress and improvement; but the antagonistic claims of Parliament soon reduced these theories into unreality. The Civil War practically decided the struggle. However Hobbes might theorise on the absolutism of the sovereign state, or Filmer on the patriarchal basis of divine rights; however parliaments might record their approval of the doctrines of passive obedience and nonresistance, the government under Charles II. was practically in the hands of two political parties, of which one might indeed be more personally favourable to the monarch, but the Torics' adulation of the royal power was turned into open rebellion when James II. took them at their word, and lost his throne.

The Revolution of 1681 was the triumph of the Whig theory of monarchy, which Locke's political treatises had developed against Filmer. The sovereign owed his position to the "original contract" between king and people. The violation of this led to an ipeo facto abdication; for the people had transferred their power to the king under a contract, which was annulled by his failure to perform his part. But not only was the power of the sovereign thus limited in theory, not only was the ultimately elective character of the monarchy re-asserted, and all the old checks recapitulated and enlarged, but the distinction between the crown and the king, between the royal office and the royal person, which the Long Parliament had used to justify their rebellion, became now an essential part of that unwritten constitutional usage which, in practice, soon superseded the old legal and theoretical constitution of the country. The influence and power of the crown went on increasing, while the king's real power became less and less. Nothing but the fiction of junists regards the nominal head of the modern English State, who "reigns but does not govern," is the real wielder of the ever-increasing executive power which is carried on in his name. The cabinet, an informal committee of Parliament, and ultimately of the House of Commons, is the real king in the mediæval sense. The old distinction of the legislative and executive power upon which the old constitution rested, has been broken down. Many theoretical powers of the soverelgn, such as the royal veto on bills, are practically obsolete.

Indirect influence, rather than acts of authority, now makes the monarch a still important factor in English politics. George III., for a time, restored the old royal right of naming ministers, but his ultimate success rested on a harmony of royal and popular wishes which, possible under the "Venetian oligarchy" of the eighteenth century, becomes increasingly difficult when three the English democracy, and made the "Patriot King" almost impossible. The continuity of English kingship, so long as it remained a reality, is very remarkable, despite the change of its forms and the fluctuations of its power.

A general view of the growth of kingship can be obtained from the Constitutional Histories of Stubbs, Hallam, and May. The primitive kingship of Germany is to be studied in Tacitus' Germania. Some parts of the Dielogus de Scaccario illustrate the Angeviu monarchy, and the formal treaties of medieval political philosophers, such as Thomas Aquinas, put medieval monarchy on its broadest basis, Mr. Freeman's writings, while fully illustrating early English kingship, bring out clearly its continuity. Allen On the Prerogative is sometimes useful. Fortescue's book, De Ludikes Legam Anglie, is the only full original statement of the constitutional position of the medieval monarchy. The preambles to some of Henry VIII.'s reforming statutes, illustrate clearly the position claimed by that monarch. Aylmer's answer to Knox's Blast against the Regiment of Women; Harrison, Description of England, prefixed to Holiushed's Chronicle; Sir T. Smith, On the Commonwealth; and some of Releigh's political writings, show the position of the monarchy under Elizabeth. James I.'s True Lee of Free Monarchies gives the theoretical, Baoon's political treaties the practical basis; and Overall's Convecquios Book, and Cowell's Interpreter, the ecclesiaatical and legal justifications of the Stuar claims. Filmer's Patriarcha is a more elaborate statement of the dlvine right position; Hobbes's Levathan, a strong declaration of the antocracy of the State, which, in practice, led to a despotism of the Cromwell or Richelien type. Locke's Treaties of Government is the text-book of eighteenth century Whigrism, and in a sense, aimed against both Filmer and Hobbes. Bolingbroke's Patriot King, marks the revival of the Tory monarchical party, which ultimately carried George III. Into power. Mr. Bagehot's English Constitution gives the best view of the present position of the monarchy.

BEONAL YEARS OF THE KINOS OF ENGLAND.—

REONAL YEARS OF THE KIHOS OF ENGLAND.—

"The importance of extreme accuracy," says Sir H. Nicolas (from whose valuable Chrenology of History the subjoined table is taken) "respecting the regnal years of the Kings of England, is at once shown by the fact that, in most Instances, after the reign of Henry II. no other date of a year occurs, either in public or private documents, than the year of the reign of the existing monarch, and that an error respecting the exact day from which the regnal year is calculated may produce a mistake of one entire year in reducing such a date to the year of the Incarnation. Every year of a king's reign is in two years of our Lord, except (which has never yet happened in England) in the case of an accession on the 1st of January. The first year of the reign of our late sovereign commenced on the 26th of June, 1830, and terminated on the 25th of June, 1831. If, therefore, the beginning of that reign be erroneously calculated—for example, from the 18th instead of from the 28th of June, 1850—every document dated on the 28th and 37th of June, 1 William IV., would be assigned to the year 1851 instead of the year 1850, and a similar mistake would cours on each of those days in every year of that reign. The effect of an error of even a few days, much mere of one entire year in the date of evants, must be evident, and a correct table of the regnal years of the Kings of England is consequently a size qud non to the historical student.

"In using this table, it is necessary to observe that it is calculated according to the common and historical year—via., from tha let of January—but as the civil, ecclesiastical, and legal year for a long period began on the 25th of March, all dates between the lat of January and the 25th of March belong, according to the civil computation, to the year before the historical year. For example, from the 1st of January to the 25th of March, in the first year of the reign of William the Conqueror, was in the civil year 1066 instead of 1067. For the same reason, Edward I'il.'s reign is sometimes said to have begun on the 25th of January, 1326, instead of the 25th of January, 1327; Henry V.'s on the 21st of March, 1413; Instead of the 21st of March, 1400 instead of the 44th of March, 1461; and the same remark, mutatic mutandis, applies to the commencement of the reigns of Edward VI., James II., Charles II., James II., William and Mary, and Queeu Anne accordingly, whether the historical or civil year be alluded to."

King, WILLIAM (b. 1650, d. 1729), Archbishop of Dublin, was born at Antrim. He was a writer of philosophical treatises, and among his works were On the Origin of Evil (1702), and The State of the Protestants in Ireland under King James's Government (1691).

King-maker, THE. [WARWICK, EARL OF.]

"King never dies, The," a legal maxim, according to which the accession of each monarch is considered as having taken place at the very moment of his predecessor's decease. This theory was unknown in the earlier periods of our history, and could not have been held so long as the right of succession was recognised as being inalienably bound up in a strict line of descent. Accordingly, on the death of the early Norman and l'lantagenet kings, there always seems to have been a period anterior to the coronation of the new sovereign, in which the lawless baren, or man of lower degree, felt himself free to commit whatever outrages he would, on the plea that there was as yet no higher potentate to whom he was responsible. "From William I. to Henry III. inclusive, the reign of each king was considered only to commence at his coronation. From Edward II.

to Henry VIII., the accession is ascribed to the day following the death or deposition of the preceding king; but from Edward VI. to the present day, the above-cited maxim has prevailed."

King of Polly, The, was a title given to Roger Mortimer, by his own son, on account of his reckless affectation of more than royal state and splendour.

King of the Commons, The, was the title used and by John Litster, the leader of the Nor olk insurgents at the time of the Propart Revolt in 1381. James V. of Scotland was also called King of the Commons.

King's Bench, THE COURT OF, was an offshoot from the Curia Regis. Its origin as a distinct tribunal is attributed by Dr. Stubbs to the arrangements made by Henry II., in 1179, by which five judges in the Curia sat constantly to hear the complaints of the people. By the beginning of the reign of Henry III., the Curia had become divided into the three branches of the Court of Common Pleas, the Exchequer, and the King's Bench, the two first entertaining causes concerned with the private suits of subjects, and with the revenue; and the last, all suits in which the king was concerned, placita coram rege, as they were called, which practically embraced the rest of the business of the old Curia Regis. The court still continued to follow the king, who was theoretically supposed to sit in banco, and this practice was continued by the Articuli super Cartas of Edward I. Shortly before the end of the reign of Henry III., the office of Justiciar became extinet, and the King's Bench received a staff of judges of its own. There was a regular succession of chief justices of the King's Bench from the beginning of Edward I. Tho denomination Curia Regis was now applied exclusively to this court. We find a constant tendency in this court, as well as in the others, to enlarge its jurisdiction. Thus the King's Bench. having cognisance of 11 personal actions where the defendant was already under custody of the court, used a legal fiction by which persons not actually in custody of the marshal of the court were assumed to be so, in order that the lawyers in that court might have more practice. This custom, which tended to confuse the system of judicature, was frequently legislated against, but without success, until the statutes 2 Will. IV., c. 39, and 2 Vict., c. 110, established one form of process, the writ of summons, for all the courts. The justices of the King's Bench sat with the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, and the justices of Common Pleas, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which was created by statute 31 Edw. III., c. 12, to determine errors from the common law side of the Court of Exchequer. A second Court of Exchequer, composed of the justices of Common Pleas and the barons of the Court of Exchequer, was created by 27 Elizabeth, c. 8, to determine writs of error from the King's Bench. Both these courts were abolished, and a new "Court of Exchequer Chamber" established by 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., c. 70. The jurisdiction of this court was, however, merged in that of the new Court of Appeal by the Judicature Act of 1873, by which great Act also the Court of Queen's (or King's) Bench became once more a part of one Supremo Court of Judicature, called the High Court of Justice, of which the judges of the Queen's Bench formed the first division. King's Friends was the name given to the secret counsellors and supporters of George III, in his attempt to restore the royal authority to its old power, and to govern without exclusive reliance on either of the two great parties of the State. This movement, in its practical issue, was a revolt against the oligarchy of the great Whig families who had in the main guided the destinies of the country since the Revolution; and the germs of the principles which it afterwards developed are to be traced in the writings of Bolingbroke, who, in Mr. Lecky's words, "strongly urged the necessity of disregarding the old party distinctions, and building up the royal authority on their decay." But as a matter of fact, the "King's Friends," though drawn from both the great parties of the State, were in the main recruited from the ranks of the Tories. George III., however, did not accept his new supporters as being members of either party; his one object was to create a body of men faithful to himself, and detached from either of the great sections of political life. This body was to be his constant adviser, and to carry out his will. Of its leaders he took counsel in private, and followed its advice rather than that of his nominal ministers. It is this state of affairs that is so bitterly sketched in Burke's Thoughts on the Causes of the Present Discontents. It has been sometimes thought that the picture drawn by the great statesman is a little highly coloured; but of the general truth of his assertions there can be no question. It was due to a knowledge of this secret power in the background that Lord Rockingham, in 1765, would only accept office on condition that "some of the particular friends of the Earl of Bute should not either publicly or privately, directly or indirectly, have any concern or interest in public affairs." For the Earl of Bute was recognised as the centre of this undue influence. But even after this protest the same condition of things continued. It was by means of this undue pressure that George III. opposed the repeal of the Stamp Act while pretending to support his ministers, and Lord Rockingham had to obtain his written consent to the passing of his measure of repeal. At last, in 1766, the king succeeded in getting rid of the Whigs, and in forming a government, under the Duke of Grafton and Lord Chatham, that should be free from party connections. On Lord North's accession to power (1770), the king consented to identify his own policy with that of his minister, and would admit none to power except those who would carry out his wishes to the utmost. When Pitt came into power (1784) this great minister was content to "mako common cause with the crown," and, according to Sir Erskine May, the royal influenco through the new premier was greater than it had been before. As a rule, their views were identical; but when they differed, the king was ready to make use of his old tactics. So, on the Catholic question of 1801, George III. is reported to have said that he should reckon any man his personal enemy who should propose any such measure. On Pitt's return to office in 1804, Mr. Addington, tho late Prime Minister, took up the position of leader of the "King's Friends," a party which then reckoned some sixty or seventy members in its ranks. The sentiments of the Portland and Liverpool ministries were so well in accord with those of the crown that the party of the "King's Friends," though still existing, had no cause to separate itself from the ostensible government.

King's Evil, the name formerly given to scrofula, which was supposed to be cured by the king's touch. Edward the Confessor is said to have been the first king who touched for the king's evil, which was done in 1058. The custom reached its height under the Stuarts, and Charles I. is said to have touched over 10,000 persons. It was continued under Anne, but was finally dropped by Georgo I. The touching was accompanied by a religious service.

Kingston, Sir Anthony (d. 1556), was sent to Cornwall as Provost Marshal after the rebellion of 1549, and is said to have behaved with great cruelty on this occasion. He presided at the execution of Bishop Hooper, 1555, and in the following year was implicated in the plot to marry the Princess Elizabeth to the Earl of Devon, and to proclaim her queen. On the discovery of the conspiracy Kingston committed suicide.

Eingsweston, The Battle of (Aug., 1549), was fought between a party of the western rebels under Mr. Coffin and the royal troops. The latter were completely victorious.

Juan d'Aguila, landed in the harbour of Kinsalo in September, 1601, having been despatched to support Hugh O'Neil's rebellion. They took possession of the castle of Kincorain, but soon lost it to Lord Mountjoy. That nobleman being shortly after joined by the Earl of Thomond and some 1,000 men, defeated O'Neil's attempt to raise the siege (Dec. 23). Don Juan, who was tired of Irish warfare, thereupon surrende it Kinsale, Castlehaven, and the other towns in his possession in return for permission to sail for Corunna with all his forces.

Kirk, Scottish. [Scotland, Church of.]

Kirk of Pield was an old and roofless church just without the walls of Edinburgh: close by this was a building which had formerly belonged to the Dominican order. It was here that Darnley was nurdered on the night of Feb. 9, 1567. [Danner]

Eirhealdy, Sir William, or Granom (d. 1573), was one of the murderers of Cardinal Beaton (1546). He was a leader of the confederacy against Queen Mary in 1567, and to him it was that she surrendered after the battle of Carberry Hill. Appointed Governor of Edinburgh Castle in the same year, he fought for Murray at Langside in 1568; but shortly afterwards joined the queen's party, and held the castle and town of Edinburgh against the regent Morton. In 1573 he was compelled to surrender the place. Morton caused him to be hanged as a traitor in Edinburgh, Aug. 3, 1573.

Kirke, Colonel Percy, was a soldier who had served for some years at Tangier, and was put in command of some troops at the battle of Sedgemoor. After the defeat of Monmouth, Kirke and his troops, who were known as "Kirke's Lambs," committed fearful atrocities in the west of England against the followers of Monmouth. Kirke was one of the first to join William in 1688, and subsequently was put in command of some troops in Ireland, and raised the siege of Derry in 1689.

Ritchener, Horatio Herbert, first Viscount Kitchener of Khartoum (b. 1850) entered the Royal Engineers in 1871, and saw servi-e in the Soudan in 1883-5. In the latter year he was made commissioner for the delimitation of the territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar. He was Governor General of the Red Sea Littoral from 1886 to 1888, and of the Soudan in 1899. In 1888 he was severely wounded in an engagement at Handoub. From that date until 1892 he was Adjutant-General of the Egyptian Army, and Sirdar from 1892 to 1899. He effected the conquest of the Soudan, breaking the power of the Khalifa at the battle of Omdur-

man. On the outbreak of the South African war he was made Chief of the Staff, and was Commander-in-Chief in South Africa from 1900 to 1902, from the retirement of Lord Roberts until the end of the war. From 1902 to 1909 he was Commander-in-Chief in India. He was raised to the peerage in 1898, and created a Viscount in 1902.

Kit-Kat Club, The, was a Whig club, instituted in 1703 to promote the principles of the Revolution and the Protestant succession. It took its name from a confectioner in Westminster named Christopher Kat, at whose house the members used to dine.

Enight, William, Bp. of Bath and Wells in 1541, was often an ambassador under Henry VIII. He was employed in 1527 at Rome to forward the negotiations for the king's divorce from Katherine of Aragon. Knight obtained more than one opportunity of seeing Clement in Henry's interest; and when the Pope escaped to Orvieto he at once followed him thither, and obtained from Clement his signature to two documents granting respectively a commission to two cardinals, for hearing and determining the cause in England, and a dispensation for the king to marry another wife. But, while affixing his signature to the documents, Clement had been careful to date them, not from Orvieto, where he then was, but from his prison in Rome.

Brewer, Leign of Henry VIII.

Enight, Charles (b. 1791, d. 1873), commenced business as a publisher in London about the year 1823. He was one of the earliest members of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, for which he published The Library of Entertaining Knowledge (1832—45). About the year 1844 he published the Pictorial History of England, a very useful and interesting work, and some years later (1856—62) his Popular History of England. Both hold a high place among our general histories.

Enighton, Henry, lived in the reign of Henry II., and was a monk of Leicester Abbey. He was the author of a Compilatio de Eventibus Anglice a tempore Regie Eadgari usque ad mortem Regie Ricardi Secundi. The earlier part is a mere compilation from previous chroniclers; but the portion which relates to the later part of Edward III.'s reign and that of Richard II. is of considerable value.

Knighton's work is printed in Twysden, Scriptores Decem.

Enightheod. The word knight is derived from the Anglo-Saxon cniht, which, although primarily equivalent to servus, was, even before the Conquest, occasionally used as equivalent to miles. It is necessary to distinguish between the personal distinction of knighthood and the legal system of knights' fees. In its wider sense, knighthood may be taken as nearly equivalent to chivalry or to feudalism, and will be found treated under those heads. Tho actual ceremony of conferring knighthood does not seem to have en known in England before the Conqu and the first instance of it wo have on satisfactory evidence is the investiture of the Conqueror's sons by their father. After the Conquest, tho extent of land held by a knight, or the knight's fee, was the nnit of the system of feudal tenure. Tho system of knight's fee was not invonted before the compilation of Domesday, though it was regularly established by the reign of Henry 1I. What the exact value and extent of a knight's fee wero is hardly ascertained. It is probablo that the 've hides of land which constituted a the before the Conquest formed one of the knight's qualifications after it; and Dr. Stubbs thinks that the extent may have varied, but that the common quantity was expressed in the twenty pounds' worth of annual value, the qualification for knight-hood. It has been said (on the authority of Ordericus Vitalis) that soon after the Conquest England was divided into 60,000 knights' fees. This, however, is unlikely, and the number has been supposed by modern authorities to have been between eight and nine thousand. Knighthood was made compulsory on all freeholders possessing an estate of £20, and was frequently enforced; as, for instance, by proclamation to the sheriffs in the nineteenth of Henry II., and by Edward I. in Writs for distraint of knighthood were issued to enforce this law, and continued to be issued down to tho time of Charles I., the only difference being that the estate for which knighthood was compulsory was raised from £20 to £40 per annum. Elizabeth and James I. issued these writs, apparently, only on one occasion in each reign; but the practice was revived and rigidly enforced by Charles I. in 1629. It was finally abolished, with all feudal tenures and customs, in 1661. Knights in the Middle Ages, from the time of Edward I. (and probably before), were either knights banneret, who were entitled to display the square banneret, and supposed to command a larger force in the field; and knights bachelors, who carried the triangular pennon, and were of inferior rank. In England, as elsewhere, knighthood was purely a personal distinction, and was never hereditary. Knights bannerets had disappeared by the sixteenth century, and were not subsequently created. In England there are now eight Orders of Knighthood: the Garter (founded in the fourteenth century), the Thistle (founded 1687), St. Patrick (1788), the Bath (1725), St. Michael and St. George (1818), Star of India (1861), Indian Empire (1876), Royal Victorian (1896).

Enights of the Shire. [Parlia-MENT; Elections.] Enclies, Sir Robert (d. 1407), was originally a leader of one of the Free Companies which devastated France in the fourteenth century. But having subsequently obtained a regular command in the English army, he greatly distinguished himself by his bravery and military skill. When the Peasants' Rebellion broke out, in 1381, he was instrumental in protecting Richard II. from the insurgents.

Knollys, SIR FRANCIS (d. 1596), "tho sternest Puritan of his day," was known during tho reign of Edward VI. as one of the most zealous of the advocates of the Reformation. The religious persecution of Mary's reign forced him to seek an asylum in Germany; but on the accession of Elizabeth, to whom he was cousin by marriage, he returned to England, imbued with the spirit of Puritanism more than ever. Mado Vice-Chamberlain of the royal household, he was subsequently advanced to the office of Lord Treasurer, whilst immediately after his arrival in England ho was appointed a Privy Councillor. In 1566 ho was sent to Ireland, when he recommended the Council in England to approve of the campaign proposed by Sidney. Two years later he was appointed the custodian of Mary, Queen of Scots, whose charms his "keen, hard sense" was supposed to despise. It was he who suggested the plan of marrying Mary to George Carey, son of Lord Hunsdon, for, "so matched, Elizabeth need have no fear of her." Knollys, "ke the rest of Queen Elizabeth's ministers, was liable to have his course of action repudiated by his mistress if she found it convenient; and in his dealings with Mary Stuart he found himself repeatedly forced to act upon his own responsibility, with the danger of a subsequent disavowal of his proceedings. Notwithstanding the occasional bad treatment he received at the queen's hands, Sir Francis remained till his death one of her most faithful ministers, though on one occasion he exclaimed that he doubted whether she were any longer fit to rule.

Knox, John (b. 1505, d. 1572), was a native of Haddington, and educated at the grammar school of that town and at Glasgow. He seems to have taken orders as a secular priest in 1530, and to have had some connection with one of the religious establishments at Haddington for some years afterwards. In 1546 he became converted to the Reformed faith, and placed himself under the protection of some of the Protestant gentry of St. Andrews. In June, 1547, the French captured St. Andrews, and Knox was carried prisoner to France, and sent to the galleys. He obtained his release in the beginning of 1549, and came to England, where he remained till the death of Edward VI. For two years he was minister of Berwick, where he put in practice, two years before it was authorised by Edward VI.'s second Prayerbook, the substitution of common bread for wafers at the Communion, and allowed sitting instead of kneeling. Knox was appointed one of Edward's chaplains, and was consulted on the composition of Cranmer's Forty-five Articles. On the accession of Mary he retired to France, and subsequently to Geneva, where he remained till 1559, and wrote several controversial and other works, including his Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, which gave great offence to Queen Elizabeth. In 1559 he returned to Scotland, and immediately joined the party of the Lords of the Congregation. In July of this year he was chosen minister of Edinburgh. He took a large share in the proceedings of the Protestant leaders henceforth, and was mainly instrumental in drawing up the Confession of Faith, accepted by Parliament in 1560. On the arrival of Mary in Scotland, she held several conferences with Knox, and at length, in December, 1562, ordered him to be tried for treason before the Council. He was, however, acquitted. After the marriage of Mary and Darnley in 1565, he preached a sermon which gave great offence to the royal couple. He was called before the Council, and inhibited frem preaching. He preached the coronation sermon when the infant James VI. was erowned, in July, 1567. After the death of Murray (January, 1569), Knox, who had incurred the enmity of Kirkcaldy of Grange, left Edinburgh, and retired to St. Andrews. He returned to Edinburgh in August, 1572, preached twice more (once when the news of the St. Bartholomew Massacre arrived), and died Nov. 24, 1572. Knox was twice married, first to Marjory Bowes in 1555, and secondly to Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree. Besides numerous epistles, discourses, and polemical tracts, Knox wrote a Historie of the Reformations of Religion within the Realm of Scotland, which is of considerable historical value.

Wostern Bengal. Having come under the operation of laws which they did not understand, they were excited by the systematic encroachment of Bengal settlers and zemindars. In 1832 they rose in arms, and the insurrection was not put down without much bloodshed. (a the suppression of the rebellion the new regulations were withdrawn, and the Koles were placed under a special commissioner. Since then they have made censiderable advances in civilisation and prosperity.

Korygaom, The Battle of (Jan. 1, 1818), was fought during Lord Hastings's war against Holkar and the Peishwa. Captain Staunton, who had been summoned to Poonah with his division, encountered the Mahratta army of the Peishwa Bajee Rao, 25,000 strong, near the village of Korygaom. The Mahrattas immediately crossed the river to attack the English troops, and the combat that ensued was most arduous and brilliant. Captain Staunton's sepoys fought with desperate valour till they were sinking with exhaustion and frantic with thirst. The approach of General Smith, who was in hot pursuit, so alarmed the Peishwa, that he retreated in the night, and thus abandoned the contest.

Kotah, The Sieds of (Mar. 22, 1858). Kotah was a strongly fortified town on the Chumbul. Its Rajah was friendly to the English, but had been coerced into rebellion by his followers. General Roberts, therefore, found there were two parties in Kotah, and was immediately joined by the Rajah, who was in possession of the citadol and palace. The rebels, about 5,000 in number, held the rest of the town. Batteries were erected by General Roberts against the northern end of the town, a reinforcement was sent to the citadel, and on the 30th the place was easily carried by assault.

Eurdlah Campaign, The (1795). When the temporising policy of Sir John Shore left the Mahrattas free to attack the Nizam in order to enforce their claims for choute or tribute, the whole Mahratta Confederacy as-sembled for the last time under the banner of the Peishwa, commanded by Hurry Punt. The Nizam, deserted by the English, had thrown himself into the hands of a French officer named Raymond, who had organised for him a disciplined army of 18,000 men, commanded and trained by European officers. The Nizam advanced to Beder, and the two armies met at Kurdlah (March 11, 1795). The Nizam's cavalry drove the entire centre division of the Mahrattas from the field, and Raymond's infantry stood their ground gallantly against Scindia's disciplined battalions. The Nizam, however, was persuaded by his favourite sultana to retire from the field, and the whole army followed him in headlong rout. Soon afterwards he was shut up in Kurdlah and captured. To secure his liberty he had to make territorie! cessions to the value of thirty-five lacs of rupees a year, besides surrendering his chief minister Musheer-ul-Mulk, who was by far the ablest man at his court, and a warm partisan of the English.

Labourers, The Statutes of, wore first enacted in 1349, immediately after the Black Death. The dearth of labourers which this plugue occasioned altered the relations between employer and employed, and the latter demanded an immediate and considerable rise in wages. To eheck this, two statutes were enacted forbidding the men to receive or the masters to offer higher wages than before the Black Death; labourers were to be compelled to work, and were forbidden to leave their employment without agreeing with their masters. These statutes were re-enacted in 1357, 1361, 1368, and 1376, but, as might be expected, they proved nugatory, and only increased the ill-feeling between masters and men, and the social difficulties which enlminated in tho revolt of 1381. [BLACK DEATH.]

Labrador was first discovered hy Sebastian Cabot in 1496, and probably visited by him again in 1513. It was explored by Frobisher in 1576, but seems to have been lost sight of till it was rediscovered by Hudson in 1610. No regular settlements were made till some Moravian colonies were formed about 1750. It was not, however, constituted a colony, and formed merely an outlying and neglected portion of the Hudson Bay territory, till the cession of the company's territory to the crown and their incorporation with the Dominion of Canada in 1868.

Labuan, an island in the Malay Archipelago, was eeded to Great Britain by the Sultan of Borneo (1847), owing to the influence of Sir James Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, who had formed a settlement there in 1846. In 1907 Labuan became a part of the Straits Settlements, and was incorporated for administrative purposes in the settlement of Singapore.

Lackland (or, Sansterre) was the name by which King John was commonly known, from his not recoiving any great fief from his father as his brothers had done.

Lack-learning (or, UNLEARNED) Parliament, The, was the name given to the Parliament which met at Coventry in 1404. It acquired its name from the fact that the king, acting upon an ordinance issued by Edward III. in 1372, directed that no lawyers should be returned as members. This Parliament is chiefly remarkable for the proposal that the lands of the clergy should for one year be taken into the king's hands for the purposes of the war with Francs.

Ladysmith, Siege of. [Boer War.] Lanland (i.e. loanland), in Anglo-Saxon times, was opposed to the ethel or alod by virtue of its being land "whose title and possession were not vested in the same person." That is, in other words, lænland was land hold and cultivated, either directly or indirectly, by one who was not its real owner in point of law, and who, in most eases, paid rent in money, kind, or service in return for the privileges he enjoyed. Læns were of two descriptions -viz., "unbooked" (which was of course the carlier custom) and "booked." As a matter of necessity our knowledge of unbooked kenland is very scanty, and is for the most part due to incidental allusions in charters drawn up at the time when the property in question was passing from the earlier to the later state; as, for example, in Kemble (cod. 617), where Archbishop Oswald grants Tidington to Ælfsige for three lives, "that he may have it as freely for bookland as he had it for lænland" (A.D. 977). Under the head of unbooked lænland, according to Mr. Lodge's view, would be comprised those parts of a lord's estato which he did not keep in his own hands (his utland), when cultivated by freemen, and all estates of folkland. It is, however, to be noted that, in common usage, folkland is only known as lænland when it has been once more let out by the original grantee. From the above instance it will be seen that booked lænland might run for several terms of lives; but it is prebable that the original term of unbooked lænland would be but for one. A single instance may suffice to show that' lænland was not in any degree looked upon as belonging to the tenant. A certain Helmstan, who held lænland of Duke Ordlaf, being found guilty of theft, forfeited hischattels to the king, but not his land, which being Ordlaf's "ho could not forfeit." It will perhaps be interesting to give in conclusion one or two examples of the rents hy which lænland was held. In the first half of the ninth century the estato bequeathed by Heregyth of Canterbury was bound to pay thirty ambers of ale, 300 loaves of fine and. coarse bread, an ox, a hog, wethers, geese, honey, butter, and salt. Forty hides at Alresford were, perhaps a little earlier, rented at four and a half shillings the hide. Tho freemen of Hurstbourn in Alfred's days had to pay forty pence per hide, with a certain quantity of ale and three horseloads of white wheat; three acres of their lord's lands were to be ploughed and sown by the tenants; hay was to be mowed and gathere i; wood cut and stacked; at Easter the had to make a payment of lambs and swes, and every week in the year, except three, they were to do any other work that might be required. This is a very good specimen of a rent of a very mixed character.

Let. The last of the carliest English laws is generally accepted as being the equivalent of the colonus in Tacitus' account of the Germanic tribes, the litus of the capitularies of Charles the Great, and the Lex Saxonum, and perhaps the lazzi or lassi of the Continental Saxons in the eighth century. t this be so, tho let is not to be considered as a mero slave, but, in Dr. Stubbs's words, is to be "distinctly recognised as a member of the nation; he is valued for the wergild, summoned to the placitum, taxed for the Church, allowed the right of compurgation, and choice in marriage. According to the same authority, " he is free to every one but his lord, and simply unfree in et tivating kand of which he is not the owner." The leet, then, in early English days would be emplayed on the estates of the great landowners or en the folk-land, and may in vory many cases have been the degraded descendant of the earlier British possessor of the soil, who, hy stress of circumstances, was now forced to till for a stranger lord the land that had once been his own or his father's, and served his lord "for hire or for land, though not yet reduced so low in the scale as the theow or wealh."

Lagos, a British crown colony until 1906, when it was incorporated with the colony and protectorate of Southern Nigeria. It is on the Gulf of Guines, formerly a dependency of the Gold Coast Colony. It was ceded to England in 1861, and has since been used as a station for the suppression of the slave trade. The population is about a hundred thousand.

Lagos, The Battle of (Aug., 1759), was one of the naval victories gained by the English during the Seven Years' War. The French ships had been blockeded in their ports during the year; but in August the Toulon fleet attempted to join the Brest squadron. It was pursued by Admiral Bostawen from Gibraltar, and attacked off Lagos in Algarve, when of its largest ships two were captured, and two others run ashore. The Portuguese reasonably complained that the neutrality of their coast had been violated.

La Hogue, The Battle of (May 19, 1692). This naval victory checked a threatened invasion of England. Louis XIV., in snpport of James, had collected an army in Normandy. Two French fleets, amounting together to about eighty ships, were collected at Brest and Toulon, under Tourville and D'Estrées. James, misled by the intrigues of Admiral Russell, believed that there was great disaffection in the English fleet. Meanwhile, the combined English and Dutch fleet of ninoty ships swept the Channel. Tourville had with him only his own squadron, consisting of forty-four ships of the line. Believing in the treachery of the English officers, he thought that he had only the Dutch to deal with. But the ill-judged declaration, whereby James exempted whole classes of Englishmen from pardon, and a stirring despatch on the other hand from Mary, had thoroughly roused the temper of the English fleet. Russell visited all his ships and exhorted his crews. The battle lasted till four in the afternoon. At first the wind was in favour of the French, and only half the allied fleet could be brought into action. But just as the French had resolved to retire the wind changed. Their retreat became a flight. Twelve of the largest ships took refuge in the bay of La Hogue, under the eyes of James. There they were attacked and destroyed, as they lay in the shallow water, during two successive days, by a flotilla of boats under Admiral Rorke.

Lahore, in the Punjaub, was the capital of the independent kingdom of Runjeet Singh from 1799. It was occupied by the British under Sir Hugh Gough in Feb., 1846, and the treaty of peace between the English and Dhuloep Singh was signed there (Mar., 1846).

Laing, David (b. 1793, d. 1878), was a learned Scottish antiquary and bibliographer. Ho edited very many works, among which are Dunbar's Poems, Sir David Lyndesay's Poems, and Nyntoun's Chronicle. He also published the Life and Works of John Knox (1847—48).

Laing, Malcolm (b. 1762, d. 1818), was the author of a History of Scotland, which is a work showing considerable research. He also wrote the concluding volume of Henry's History of England.

Lake, Gerard, Viscount (b. 1744, d. 1808), entered the army at an early age, and served during the Seven Years' War in Germany. He went through the American War under Cornwallis, and earned great distinction. In 1793 he was in the campaign in Flanders, and here also greatly distinguished himself. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the army in India. In this capacity he bore a chief share in the Mahratta War of 1803, and enhanced his reputation as a brilliant soldier. He defeated Scindia at Laswaree (Nov., 1803), and captured Delhi. He received a peerage in 1804. He returned to England in 1807, and was appointed Governor of Portsmouth.

Lally, COUNT DE, arrived in India, 1757, as commander of the French. A dashing soldier, but harsh, severe, and unconciliating, he alienated the native allies as much as Dupleix had conciliated them. For some time he maintained the war, and in 1759 besieged Madras. The siege failed; Lally was defeated at Wandewash, driven out of Pondicherry, and the French dominion was at an end in India. On his return to France he was imprisoned for eighteen mouths, tried, and condemned to death. He was conveyed to the scaffold with a large gag in his mouth, to prevent his speaking, and executed.

Lambeth Articles, Tuz (1595), were drawn up by Archbishop Whitgift, assisted by Fletcher, Bishop of London; Vaughan, Bishop of Bangor; and Tindal, Dean of Ely. They consisted of nine articles, embracing all the most pronounced doetrines of Calvinism, and were sent to Cambridge, where Calvinistic ideas were rife, with a permission from the archbishop that they should be adopted. They were, however, disapproved by the queen and Lord Burleigh, and as they were not accepted by the Parliament, they had no binding force. They were again brought forward and rejected at the Hampton Conference (1604).

Lambeth, TREATY OF (1217), was made after the Fair of Lincoln by the regent, Earl of Pembroke, acting for Henry III., and the French prince, Louis. By this trenty it was agreed that Louis should at once evacuate England, that the prisoners on either side should be released, and that a general amnesty should be granted. It also seems that a sum of money, amounting to 10,000 marks, was paid to Louis as the price of his departure.

Lancaster was a Roman station founded by Agricola, A.D. 79. It v. "stowed by William the Conqueror or R: of Poiton, who built the castle. It was Larnt by the Scots in 1322 and 1389. In the Civil War it was taken by the Parliamentarians, Feb., 1643, and by the Royalists, March, 1643. The town was occupied by the Scots in 1648 under Illamilton. It was occupied by the Jacobite insurgents for two days, Nov. 7 and 9.1715, and by Charles Edward, Nov. 11, 1745.

Lancaster, THE DUCHY AT PALATINE OF, grew out of the hon ... of Laneasi. mentioned in Magna Carta, which, having reverted to the crown on the death of William of Blois, brother of King Stephen, had been granted to the Earls of Chester, and on their extinction in 1232, to William de Ferrers. After the second rebellion of Robert de Ferrers, Henry III. erected the honour into an earldom in favour of his son Edmund, afterwards called Crouchback. The Duchy was created by Edward III. in 1351 in favour of Henry, Edmund's grandson, and in his patent of creation the dignity of an earl palatine was conferred upon him. The latter title was also given in 1377 to John of Gaunt, Duke of Laneaster, who had married Henry of Lancaster's heiress. Henry IV., his heir, being conscious of the weakness of his title to the throne, prevented the union of the Duchy with the crown, by procuring an Act of Parliament, soon after his accession, providing that the title and revenues should remain with him and his heirs for ever. Henry V. added to it the estates inherited from his mother, Mary Bohun; but a large part of it had to be put into the hands of trustees for the payment of his debts. On the attainder of Henry VI., after the accession of Edward IV., the Duchy was forfeited to the crown, and was inseparably united to it by Act of Parliament, the County Palatine, which had hitherto been kept separate, being incorporated in the Duchy. This settlement was confirmed by an Act passed in the reign of Henry VII. The revenues of the Duchy are not reckoned among the hereditary revenues, in place of which the Civil List was grunted to William IV. in 1830, but are paid over to the Privy Purse, an annual account being presented to Purliament. Burke, in 1750, reckoned the average returns at £4,000 a year, but they have since increased. The Chancery Court of the County Palatine sat at Preston: the Duchy Court being held at Westminster. Their functions appear to have been defined by Henry IV. The Court of the Duchy was given concurrent jurisdiction with the Chancery as to matters in equity relating to lands holden of the crown in right of the Duchy, and was chiefly concerned in questions of revenue. By recent Acts, the administration of justice has been assimilated to that of the rest of England, the Court of the County having been abolished by the Judicature Act of 1873. The office of Chancellor of the Duchy is now a political appointment, and is frequently held by a cabinet minister. Its duties are nominal. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, if a commoner, takes precedence next after the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Lancaster, THE FAMILY OF. The position of the royal house of Lancaster can scarcely be understood without some regard to that earlier family to whose title it succeeded. Edmund, the younger son of Henry III., had been given the earldoins of Lancaster and Leicester; to these his son Thomas had added Derby, and, through his marriage, Lincoln. When, therefore, this Thomas took up the position of leader of the baronial opposition to Edward II., he was supported by a body of vassals, many of whom-those of Lancaster and Lincoln in particular—were accustomed to war against the crown. With Thomas of Lancaster we can have no sympathy. He was unscrupulous, yet quite devoid of political ability; selfish in his objects, and retrograde and oligarchical in policy. But his action associated the name of Lancaster with opposition to the king and alliance with the clergy; and his violent death secured for him the reputation of a martyr to the popular cause. His son Henry assisted in the deposition of Edward II., but also in the ruin of Mortimer; and this Henry and his heiranother Henry-showed themselves faithful servants of Edward III., during the greater part of whose reign there is scart trace of any baronial opposition. But the last Henry's daughter, Blanche, married John of Gaunt, and carried with her the earldoms of her father; and in the circumstances of Edward's latter years there seemed every opportunity for the re-formation of an opposition. Gaunt, however, preferred to act the part of court leader against the bishops and the constitutionalists in the House of Commons, and departed still further from the old Lancastrian tradition by championing and accepting the aid of Wycliffe. It was left for his son, Henry of Derby (who had married one of the co-heiresses of Bohun of Heroford, a name also recalling resistance to the crown), to take up the position assigned by tradition to the Lancastrian family. In conjunction with Thomas of Gloucester he reorganised the baronial opposition, and though for a time he made peace with the court, and assisted in the ruin of the Lords Appellant, his banishment and the seizure of the Duchy of Lancaster made him again a popular hero; while the reaction against Richard's autocratic measures gave to Henry's accession the character of a triumph of constitutionalism.

But Henry IV. knew that the great mass of the people regarded him with indifference, and that the revolution of 1399 had been, as a contemporary says—

"For hatred more of Kyng Richardes defection, Than for the love of Kyng Henry."

The subsequent conduct of the Percies, also, showed with what motives many of the nobles had supported him. The ideas of legitimacy were still deeply rooted in the nation. Henry must have shared in this feeling, and must have felt his own position to be doubtful. It is not difficult to see that a man in his situation might easily become the cold and calculation means the whom the chroniclers of his reign describe.

Henry V. had no such doubts. He believed himself called upon to realise the claims of his predecessors to the French throne, to restore spiritual unity to Christendom by alliance with Sigismund, and even to regain the Holy Land from the infidel. Like his father, he allied himself firmly with the clergy, and supported them in their efforts to put down Lollardy; but this action was due, not to a desire to gain clerical support, but to a sincere orthedoxy. He was possessed by the idea of the unity of the Holy Roman Church, and persecution of heretics was, according to the public opinion of the time, its natural expression. He possessed all the "chivalric" virtues, but ho was more than a Richard I. or Edward III.; he was a hardworking and skilful statesman, and it is scarcely possible to decide as to the feasibility of the great plans which his early death interrupted.

In the minority of Henry VI., Bedford Gloucester, and Beaufort became the chief figures in the diuma, Bedford carrying on the work of Henry V. in France, Beaufort pursuing at home the constitutional policy of the last two kings, and both thwarted by the selfish and thoughtless Gloucester. When he arr lat manhood, Henry VI. showed himself incapable of ruling with a firm hand either in England or France. Overworked in his boyhood, of weak health, and with a tendency to insanity inherited from his grandfather, Charles VI., he became a niere tool in the hands of opposing factions. The ill-success of the French War, and the peace policy which followed his marriage, gave an opportunity to the house of York to assert its claims; and with the beginning of the Wars of the Roses, the great Lancastrian experiment of governing England in concert with a free Parliament broke down.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., ch. zvi. (for Thomas of Lancaster), and zviii. (wherein is to be noted the discussion of Henry IV.'s alleged claim through Edmund of Lancaster); Pauli, Geschichte von England, iii., especially pp. 174—180, on Henry V.

Lancaster, Edmund Crouchback, Earl or (b. 1245, d. 1298), was the son of Henry III. He was created Earl of Lancaster in 1266, and acquired large ostates both in England and on the Continent. He received the cure of Sicily from the Pope in 1253, but never obtained more than the title. He accompanied Edward I. on the Crusades, and died fighting brav ly in Gascony. Ho married twice, his second wife being Blanche, widow of the King of Navarre. Ho was called Crouchback or Crossback from having taken the Cross, though in later times the Lancastrians pretended that he was in reality the eldest son of Henry III., but was set aside as a cripple, and on this extraordinary fiction was partly founded Henry IV.'s claim to the throne.

Lancaster, Thomas, Earl or (d. 1322), was the son of Edmund, second son of Henry III., and titular King of Sicily, by Blanche, queen-dowager of Navarre. He was therefore cousin to Edward II., and uncle to his queen Isabella. He was Earl of Lancaster, Leicester, and Derby, and his wife the heiress to the earldom of Lincoln. He came forward as the leader of the barons against Piers Gaveston at the beginning of Edward II.'s reign. He was one of the Ordainers appointed in 1310, and in 1312 was present at the execution of Gaveston. In 1313 he received the royal pardon, and was reconciled with the king, but in the next year he refused to take part in the expedition to In 1316 he became practically Scotland. supreme in England, but his rule was oppressive and disastrous. His wife was carried off from him by Earl Warenne, and private war broke out between the two earls. His popularity declined, and the king, aided by the two Despencers, attempted to govern without him. Once more Lancaster came forward as the leader of the barons, and insisted on the banishment of the favourites, but his power was shortlived. His forces were defeated at Boroughbridge (Mar., 1322), and he was taken prisoner. On the 22nd he was tried at Pontofract, and being found guilty of treason was forthwith beheaded. [Lancastem, Family or.]

Lancaster, Henry, Eart, and Duke or (d. 1362), was the son of Henry, Earl of Lancaster, and grandson of Edmund, titular King of Sicily. He served in the Scotch and French wars of Edward III.'s reign, and in 1345 was made governor of Aquitaine. He was frequently employed by the king on diplomatic errands. In 1351 he was created Duke of Lancaster, and in 1362 he died of the black death. His daughter and heiress, Blanche, married John of Gaunt, who thus obtained all the honours and claims of the house of Lancaster.

Lancaster, JOHN, DUKE OF, commonly called JOHN OF GAUNT (b. 1340, d. 1399), was the fourth son of Edward III. He was born at Ghent during his father's visit to Flanders. In 1359 he married Blanche, the daughter of Henry, Duko of Lancaster, and thus became possessed of the estates of the Laneastrian family. Ho was created Duko of Lancaster in 1362. In 1367 he served under his brother in Spain, and distinguished himself at Navarette. His wife being dead, he married in 1370 Constance, the daughter of Pedro the Cruel, and assumed the titlo of King of Castile. In 1373 he marched through France from Calais to Bordeaux. On his return he took a prominent part in English politics, and was at the head of the court or ministerial party, which was opposed by the Good Parliament under the auspices of his brother the Black Prince. At the same time John of Gaunt patronised Wycliffe, and supported Wycliffe against the bishop and the Londoners at the Council of London, 1377. In 1381 his palace in the Savoy was burnt by Wat Tyler's nob. In the first years of Richard II.'s reign his influence over the government was very great, but in 1384 he was accused of treason by Latimer, a Carmelite friar, and retired from court: and though he was reconciled, and returned the same year, his importance in English politics diminished. He now devoted his attention to asserting his claim to Castile. He formed an alliance with John I. of Portugal and led an army into Castil 'n 1386. He was compelled to retire to Ga on y the next year. In 1388, having marrica his daughter Catherine to Henry of Castilo, he returned to England, where he succeeded in effecting a formal reconciliation between the Duke of Gloucester and the king. He took no prominent part in politics henceforth. After his death (Feb. 3, 1399) his estates were seized by Richard, and this was one of the causes which led to the return of his son, Henry of Bolingbroke (Henry IV.), and the deposition of Richard. On the death of his second wife he married, in 1396, his mistress, Catherine Swynford, and his children by her, the Beauforts were legitimised by patent in 1397. From one of there, John Beaufort, Henry VII. was descended. [Beaufout, Family of; Lancaster, Family of.]

Land Bank. [BANKING.]

Land Legislation, IRISH. The princlpal penal laws relating to land have been mentioned in the article on Ireland. The lrish and the English land laws were in other respects practically identical until the famine of 1846-48. That visitation would have tried the soundest agricultural economy. But the agricultural economy of Ireland was not sound. The artificial prosperity caused by the great war had led to improvident charges upon fami'y estates. The fall of prices brought embarrassment, the famine ruin. Creditors obtained no interest. The absence of purchasers made it impossible to enforce securities. The receivers of the Court of Chancery held property with a nominal rental of £750,000. The insolvent landlords could neither work their estates nor employ the starving labourers. The first condition of progress was to replace them by a class of wealthy proprietors. With this object a special commission was created by statute (11 and 12 Vic., e. 48) to facilitate sales of incumbered estates. Certain incumbrancers on land, and all incumbered owners, including owners of any limited interest which was itself charged with the incumbrance, were empowered to apply to the commissioners by petition in a summary way, for a sale of the entire incumbered interest. The petition was referred to a master, who, after due inquiry reported to the court, which thereupon ordered or refused a sale. Purchasers obtained an indefeasible Parliamentary title. The purchase money was distributed amongst the incumbrancers by the court. Twentythree millions-worth of land was sold unde: this Act between 1850 and 1858. It did much good, and some lasting evil. Many of the purchasers were Englishmen and Scotchmen. They raised the standard of farming, and applied badly needed capital to the soil. But their ignorance of the people, and their inclination to treat their occupying tenants from a purely commercial point of view, largely fostered agrarian discontent. In 1858 the commission was wound up, and a permanent tribunal with extended powers created, under the name of the Landed Estates Court. The new body can sell on the petition of any incumbrancer, or of any owner whether incumbered or not. It has a wide discretion in ordering or refusing sales, and ample powers for effecting them upon such terms and conditions as it may deem most advantageous to the parties concerned (21 and 22 Vic., c. 72).

Several important changes were introduced in 1860. The "Landlord and Tenant Law

Amendment Act" of that year (23 and 24

Vic., c. 154) is founded on the principle laid down in the third section, that the relation lutween landlord and tenant is one of contract, expressed or implied, and not of tenure.

It aims at simplifying and defining the rights of both parties where they have falled or neglected to express fully the terms of their agreement. It gives the landlord and his

the assignee of a tenant for breach of the conditions of his tenancy, that he would have had against the original tenant, and it gives

remedy in like circumstances against the

cevenants into leases, entitles tenants to remove certain fixtures, abolishes the doctrine of implied walver, limits the remedy by distress to a single year's rent, and facilitates the remedy by ejectment. The Act of 1860 looked primarily to the intention of the parties. Where they had expressed their meaning fun, and aptly the law enforced it. Where the expression was technically defective it supplied the defects. Where the agreement was silent, it annexed to it terms usual in similar contracts, and presumably intended by the parties.

The Land Act of 1870 reversed this policy.

It read into existing contracts provisions not contemplated by the makers, and it disabled

the majority of tenants from making certain contracts in the future. The chief innova-

and for improvements. Any tenant of any holding under a tenancy created after the Act, if "disturbed" in his holding by the act of the landlord, and any tenant from year

created before the Act, rated at not more than £100 per annum, if "disturbed" by the act of his immediate landlord, is declared to be "entitled to such compensation for the loss

him, by reason of quitting his holding, as the court shall think fit." The maximum is regulated by a scale in the Act amended in the tenant's interest by the Act of 1881.*

A tenant holding under a lease for thirty-one years or apwards, made after the Act, could claim for dis rbance. But "any tenant" might Claim compensation for improvements made by himself or his predecessors in title, subject to certain limitations laid down in the Act (amended in the tenant's interest by the Act of 1881), and all improvements were presumed to be the tenant's where the holding was rated at or under £100 a year. Improvements (except permanent buildings and reclamation) made twenty years before claim,

'The "court" is the county court, or the Land

Commission, since 1881.

But "any tenant"

did not entitle to compensation. In calculating the amount of compensation the period of the tenant's enjoyment of the improvement was to be taken into account. "Town parks," labourers' holdings, cottage allotments, and some other small lettings were excepted alto-gether from the Act. The Act contained provisions for enlarging the leasing powers of limited owners, facilitating sales to tenants, and authorising advances for that purpose by the Board of Works. Like the similar clauses in the Act of 1881, these have proved

The Land Law Act of 1881 (44 and 45

Vic., c. 49) further limited the power of regulating the incidents of Irish tenancies

by contract, and completely altered the terms of most submisting agreements. It divided tenants into two classes-" present" tenants, whose tenancies existed at the date of the Act; and "future" tenants, whose tenancies should be created after Jan. 1, 1883. It constituted a "Land Commission" with extensive powers, which that body was authorised to delegate to sub-commissioners nominated by the exer 'e (sec. 43). Any "present" tenant mit to a "court" of sub-commissioners 'he "fair" or

"judielal" rent of his holoung (sec. 8). A statutory term" of fifteen years is created by the decree fixing the "judicial" rent.

The rent cannot be raised, nor can the tenant be evicted during a statutory term except for non-payment of rent, persistent waste, sub-division, or sub-letting, and certain other acts specified in the statute. If eject-ment was brought for breach of these "statutory conditions," the tenant could still sell his tenancy. If the eviction was actually carried out, he could claim compensation for improvements under the Act of 1870. The Act

tenant a lease for fifteen years, renewable for ever, deprived the landlord of all direct right to evict, and "invested the court with a discretionary power of permitting eviction in the cases described." A statutory term might also be created by an agreement and declaration between the parties, fixing the für" rent, and filed in court (sec. 8, ss. 6), or by the acceptance by any tenant, present or future, of an increase of rent demanded

by the landlord (s. 4). The covenant to sur-render was avoided by the Act in all sub-sisting leases, and the lessees were to become Future tenants were not to apply to have a fair rent fixed. If, however, the landlord at any time raised the rent of a future tenant, such tenant might either accept the

or sell his tenancy subject to the increased rent. Upon such a sale he might apply to the court to decide whether the value of his tenancy had been depreciated below what it

present tenants on their expiration.

the amount of such depreciation with costs from the landlord. If the future tenant should neither accopt nor sell, he could claim compensation for disturbance and improvements under the Act of 1870. A lease for thirty-one years or upwards, agreed upon between the parties, and sanctioned by the court (called a "judicial lease"), excluded the operation of the Act during its continuance. If the lessee were a future tenant, his tenancy would absolutely determine the lease. So, too, if he were a present tenant, and accepted such a lease for more than sixty years. But if the term be for sixty years or under, the tenant would still be a present tenant at its expiration.

Even with this far-reaching measure, it was not found that finality had been reached. In 1882 an Arrears Act came into force, cancelling all arrears up to date on payment of one year's rent. In 1885 the "Ashbourne Act" enabled the State to advance the full value of their holdings to tenants who desired to buy from landlords who were willing to sell. The amount so to be advanced. £5,000,000, was greatly increased in 1891, and the process of purchase simplified by the Land Act was passed to induce tenants to purchase their holdings. The amount of money to be advanced was largely increased, and additional facilities were given to those who desired to become the owners of their holdings.

Land Tax, The, was first levied in 1690, when it was 3s. in the pound. It was originally an annual grant, and varied in amount each year; but in 1798 it was made perpetual, and was fixed at 4s. in the pound upon the valuation of 1692, provision being made for its redemption by the payment of a lump sum. This has been taken advantage of by many landowners; but at the present time there is still a large quantity of land on which the tax has not been redeemed and is still levied. Mr. Lloyd George's Budget for 1909 provided for the taxation of land values.

Land Tenure. The origin of the peculiarities of land tenure in England is exceedingly obscure. It was supposed at one time that while the so-called higher kinds of tenure, as those of the noble, the knight, the churchman, and the cultivating freeholder, were the necessary sub-divisions of feudal estates, so the very various kinds of base tenure, those of villeinage and copyhold, were the result of individual caprice on the part of the superior lord; or at best, relics, mutilated or distorted, of more ancient tenancies. Such was the view of the early writers on English tenancies, as the author of the Dialogus de Scaccario, Glanvill, Bracton and Fleta, Littleton, and his great commentator, Coke. Latterly, however, the subject has been more fully, but not finally, investigated by many inquirers, German and English A difficulty in exactly determining on the facts arises because nearly all the information which can be obtained is derived from documents, the date of which, however early it may be, is long posterior to influences which, as we know, might have modified, and almost certainly did modify, the original tenures to which the documents rufer. Thus, after the Roman period, the earliest deeds are those which belonged to monastic and other ecclesiastical foundations. But such foundations were essentially of foreign origin, and were the product of a more or less lengthened process, under which nativo custom was brought into collision with external practice, and was naturally altered by it. It is probable, too, that many of the peculiarities of what we call the feudal system have appeared at very different times, and in very different countries, not by virtuo of any definite law, but solely for the economical reason that the labour of the husbandman always provides more than is necessary for his individual wants, and that. therefore, it becomes possible for a stronger man to extract from such a person part of the produce of his labours, as tax, or rent, or customary due. In return for such a tribute, the superior might covenant to leave the husbandman in peace, or even to guarantee him from the assaults of other oppressors; and thus the levy of black-mail, practised from the days of David and his companions in exile to those of Rob Roy and his tribesmen, becomes the type of those dues and duties which, in theory at least, were always characteristic of the foudal system, and were supposed to be reciprocal between lord and tenant, and, it may be, is their origin.

It is clear that the subjection of classes was characteristic of tho times which preceded the Norman Conquest, as well as of those which followed it. There were serfs and slaves, inferior or dependent tenants, and military vassals on the estate of Earl Godwin, as well as on the estate of Earl Odo. It is probable that the country folk were no better off, and no worse off, under the rule of the descendants of William the Norman, than they were under that of the descendants of Alfred the Great. There was a change of masters, of landlords, but no change of system. It is probable that the gradual dis-continuance of a system under which fines were levied for offences, with the alternative of slavery, and the gradual establishment of a custom under which outrages were deemed an offence against the king's peace, and punishable by his judges, may have assisted the process by which freemen were degraded from their condition, and forced to accept a lower status, and may even have assisted the counter-process by which the serf gradually achieved the rights of the freeman.

things which prevailed in England when documentary evidence is clear and continuous, the following facts are obvious and universal. There was an over-lord in every manor, the manor being generally, but not always, identical in its boundaries with the parish. This over-lord might be the king, or a noble, or an ecclesiastic, or a corporation, or a private individual. The over-lord who was a subject, was liable to certain dues to the king, either fixed by custom, or granted on emergency by Parliament, and his estate was liable to forfeiture in the event of his committing certain offences, or to escheat in case he died having no heirs to succeed him. It was important that there should be a central authority; and no means were more ready and more certain to effect this result than to inflict the penalties of forfeiture on certain acts of disobedience or outrage. Beneath these lords were free and serf tenants, all of whom had a sufficient amount of arable land joined to their rights in the common pasture, and their use of the wood for fattening their hogs for the purpose of their own maintenance and that of their families. The free tenants had to pay a rent fixed in amount, either in money or kind, sometimes in labour, but the amount of either was unalterable; they were masters of their own actions as soon as this rent was satisfied, or they could transfer their holdings and quit the manor. The serf was sometimes bound to a money rent. But his liabilities were generally in labour, though even this could be commuted for money from a very early period, and constantly was commuted. When his labour was yielded, or its equivalent was paid, he was free to employ himself on his land, or for the matter of that, on any other tenant's land, or on the lord's land, at ordinary wages. But he could not leave the manor without licence, for which he paid an annual sum; he could not give his daughter in marriage without paying a fine, or send his son to school in view of his becoming a priest, or get him made a monk, without similar payments, and when his occupancy descended to his heirs, they paid a fine on admittance, and were orought under his liabilities, while sometimes his best chattel, horse or ox, or article of furniture, was forfeited to the lord under the name of a heriot. His liabilities were not in the aggregate much more heavy than those of the free tenant; in some particulars they were less, for he was not held to any military service, but his condition was degraded, and he was under social disabilities.

It appears that in early times, and till 1290, the tenants, whether lord or vassal, could not sell or alienate their estates. But they had, it is well known, the right of admitting subtenants to themselves, though probably this right was not exercised, or if exercised was difficult for the inferior tenant. At the date above referred to, every tenant was permitted, by the statute Quia Emptores, to alienate estate to another, under the condition that the new-comer should stand in exactly his position. This law made a great change, in that it put an end to the creation of new manors. Still the lord was allowed to admit new tenants to his own domain, serf or free, provided that the new tenant held on the same condition as the old. In effect, however, that which was so characteristic of ancient tenures, ceased—the subordination of ranks created at the pleasure of the lord. Whatever distinction existed was traditional, and therefore ceased to be vital. It was certain to gradually decay. But before the change referred to was made by law, the lord was permitted to create a new kind of estate, the form of which was exempted from the later alteration. This was the "estate tail," an institution the significance of which no one foresaw, as it was not employed on a large scale till nearly two centuries after its first establishment.

Such were lay estates. They were all liable to obligations—the higher, that of knight service, to military duties; the next, that of a socager, to rent; the third, that of the serf, to labour. There were also cottagers who subsisted by their labour, who had a tenement with its garden or curtilage, and who had to get their livelihood by hiring themselves as farm servants. But vast estates were held by the clergy, either secular, who correspond to the parochial clergy and the dignitaries of the Church, archbishops, bishops, deans, and chapters, who generally held land beyond the tithes with which they had immemorially been endowed, or the monks. It is said that before the Reformation tho monasteries held a third of all the land in tho kingdom. In theory the clergy were held to satisfy all obligations by their prayers, or by divine service, as it was called, and were said to hold their land by free alms. But in course of time, though not without violent struggles on their part, they were made to contribute by grants to the necessities of the crown, through Parliament. The lands of the Church were thus a fourth kind of tenure; and these four kinds were practically inclusive, for another which is enumerated that in ancient demesne, and which consisted of land which had been once the estate of the Confessor, or of the Conqueror, was possessed of certain privileges and exemptions only.

But the expression "land tenure" may be also taken to indicate the process by which these lands were occupied and distributed among the several tenants. The lord always had a manor house, in which a local udicature was held, the judge being the lord's steward, and a jury, who presented offenders, the court leet being inhabitants of the manor taken from all ranks, and the homage, of freeholders only, who registered the inhabitants on the court roll. The lord also possessed the best land in the parish, the water meadow-always of great value in a country whore there were no winter roots and no artificial grasses-and the most convenient and fertile fields. Each homestead also had its paddocks and curtilages near the house and farmyard. But the principal part of tho tenant's holding was in the common arable fields. Hero the land was ploughed in strips, generally each an acre in dimension, a "balk" or space of unploughed land being left between each one of these sets of strips. In these strips the lord, the parson, the monk, the farmer shared in varying quantities. On such land it was not easy to induce fertility, except by carrying manuro to it, for it would not be possible to fold sheep on such plots, and folding sheep was then, as now, the best way in which to restore exhausted land. This kind of cultivation, which Mr. Seebohm has attempted to trace back to very remote times, remained, and was eustomary in many parts of England down to very modern experience.

The first great change in the English land tenures were from the consequences of the Black Death in the middle of the fourteenth century. Such was the scarcity of hands that wages rapidly doubled, and even trebleu, in amount. The serf's labour had been commuted for money payments, and now the lord found that he was often receiving for labour which had been his due not more than a third of its present market value. After trying the effect of proclamations, laws, and penalties, he attempted, and, as the facts prove, simultaneously over England, to reverse the bargain. The serfs resented the action, and the tremendous insurrection of Wat Tylor, which involved two-thirds of the country and all its most prosperous districts, broke out. The insurrection collapsed, but the serfs remained masters of the situation, and the tenuro in villeinago was rapidly developed into eopyhold or customary tenancy. Within less than a century, land which in previous times could not have been held without social degradation was freely purchased by nobles und gentlemen.

The next important change came after the great Civil War of Succession. Up to this time, entails had been very rare, and only in small estates. Now, however, the landowner, who entered tho fray and belonged to the beaten party, had to incur the risks of forfeiture. But an estato tail was not liable to forfeiture on treason, perhaps not even to a Parliamentary attainder. Hence the custom arose of entailing the great estatos as a measure of precaution, since no one could forfeit what was not his, and the estate of the descendant would survive the misconduct of his ancestors. Henry VIII., however, framed a statute under which entails were made liable to the penalties of treason.

The same reign saw the vast estates of the monasteries, and not a few of those belonging to the secular clergy, flung upon the market, in amount perhaps not less than two-fifths of the whole land in the kingdom. These estates passed from the crown by grant or purchase to a new, and generally needy, set of proprietors, and great distress ensued. But there was no modification in the nature of tenures. The old divisions still prevailed-knight service, socage, copyhold, and free alms. But what had once been honourable had now become oppressive. The nobles and gentry would have gladly commuted their liabilities to the erown on fair terms, and strove to make a bargain with James. But the schemo broke down, and the policy of the king, in exacting his extreme rights, doubtless led to the formation of a Parliamentary party within the House of Lords, which gavo some weight in the struggle between Charles and the House of Commons.

The Civil War between king and Parliament doveloped a new kind of land tenure, which has continued to our own day, and has been the principal instrument by which land has been accumulated into few hands. Tho Royalist party were, after their defeat, in great danger of ruin. They knew that they had to bear serious and heavy fines, and they feared that a sentence of forfeiture might full upon them. Hence they employed two lawyers, Palmer and Bridgman, who devised tho strict settlement, under which the ancestor (say the father) was made tenant for life, with certain powers, and his descendants (say his sons) were made succeeding tenants in tail. The conveyance, according to Black. stone, was of suspicious validity, and was certainly in contravention of public policy, as it practically created a perpetuity. But after the Restoration tho two lawyers became crown officers, and in their administrativo capacity gave validity to the devices which they had invented as conveyancers. During the same period the abolition of the tenures in chivalry took place. The Court of Wards and all feudal incidents were abolished by resolutions of both Houses in February, 1646. These resolutions were repeated by an Act of Parliament in 1656, and confirmed by the act of the Convention Parliament in 1660. The crown was compensated for the loss of its hereditary revenue from the foudal incidents by the grant of half the excise, a tax established by the Long Parliament two years before the abolition of tenures in chivalry, and, like it, confirmed at the Restoration.

Action has from time to time been taken in Parliament with the view of getting rid of the incidents which still belong to copyhold tenures, and are found to be inconvenient and capricious. When this is done, there will be only one kind of tenure recognised in England. But the power of settlement still exists among us, and also the custom of primogeniture, the former being to some extent changed from its strictness by late legislation, and the latter being threatened by several causes, among which the present difficulties in which landlords and tenants stand, are probably the most dominant. The dispersion of other estates will probably be lustened by the contingency which is far from remote, that that estate in matters of succession duties will be soon put on the footing of personal property, +

Landen, THE BATTLE OF (July 19, 1693). or, as it is sometimes called, the battle of Neerwinden, resulted in the defeat of William III. by Marshal Luxemburg. By an adroit feint on Liège the French general drew the king towards him. William might still have retreated, but he resolved to fight. The allies protected their line by a breastwork and a series of entrenchments, and a hundred pieces of cannon were placed along it. On the left flank was the village of Romsdorff and the little stream of Landen, and on the right the village of Neerwinden. The fighting began about eight o'clock. Two desperate assaults on the village were repulsed, in the first of which Berwick, who led the French, was taken prisoner. Luxemburg ordered a last attack to be made by the household troops, which was also unsuccessful. But the centre and left of the allies had been thinned to support the conflict at Neerwinden, and a little after four in the afternoon, the whole line gave way. William with the ut-most bravery arrested the progress of the enemy, and made the retreat less disastrous. The French were victorious, but they had lost 10,000 of their best men. Luxemburg did not venture to molest the retreat, and William soon reorganised his forces.

Lame, SIR RICHARD (b. 1584, d. 1650), an eminent lawyer of the reign of Charles I., chiefly became known by the able way in which he conducted the defence of Strafford. lle joined the king on the outbreak of the Civil War, and on Lyttelton's death in 1645 was made Lord Keeper. But the office was little more than nominal, and Lane fled to Holland, where, after the king's death, he became Lord Keeper to Charles II.

Lanercost Chronicle, THE, contains a history of England from the earliest times to the year 1346. It does not seem to have been written at the abbey of Lanercost, in Cumberland, but at Carlisle. It is a most valuable record of Border history, and one of the most interesting of the northern chronicles.

The Lancrosat Chronicle has been edited by Mr. Stevenson for the Bannatyne and Maitland

Lanfranc (b. 1005, d. 1089), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a wealthy citizen of Pavia. After studying in various schools, he in 1039 set up a school at Avranches, Normandy. In 1042 he became a monk of the Benedictine abbey of Bec, of which he became prior in 1046. Soon afterwards he was engaged in the controversy on the Real Presence which Berengarius of Tours had started. Brought at first into hostile contact with William of Normandy, owing to the latter's marriage with his cousin, he subsequently became closely attached to the drike. In 1066 he became abbot of the new monastery which William had enabled him to found at Caen. In 1070 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. During the years of his primacy, he worked closely in accord with William. He was able, by the king's help, to gradually fill most of the English sees with Normans, and t the same time to purify and reform the national Church, stamping out simony and the marriage of the clergy. One result of his policy was to bring England into closer relations with the Church of Western Christendom, and therefore with Rome; but Lanfranc, like William, aimed at keeping up, so far as the altered conditions allowed, the old independence of the insular church, and when William refused to do homage to the Pope, and Lanfranc was summoned to Rome, he refused to obey.

Langdale, Sir Marmaduke (b. ? 1598, d. 1661), was a gentlemen of Yorkshire who raised troops for the king, and supported his cause with unwavering fidelity. In February, 1645, he successfully relieved Pontefract, and in the summer of the same year he commanded the king's left wing at Naseby. After the battle he collected fresh troops, and attempted, on the king's directions, to relieve Chester. In the attempt he was utterly routed by Colonel Pointz at Rowton Heath (Sept. 24, 1645). In the second Civil War he took up arms, seized Berwick, and formed a corps of English Cavaliers auxiliary to Hamilton's army. At Preston, where his corps formed the van, ho was taken prisoner, but contrived to escape to the Continent. Charles II. created him a baron, and at the Restoration he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Yorkshire.

Langham, Simon (d. 1376), was made treasurer of the kingdom in 1260, and held this office till 1363, when he was promoted to the Chancellorship. In 1366 he was appointed to the archbishopric of Canterbury, and resigned the Great Seal. During his primacy he did much to correct abuses which had crept into the Church, but in 1368, having been made a cardinal, he was compelled by the king to resign his archbishopric. He soon regained the royal favour, and was made Dean of Lincoln, though on the death of Archbishop Whittlessy, Edward refused to allow Langham to be re-elected to the primacy.

Langport, BATTLE or (July 10, 1645). After the battle of Naseby Fairfax marched into the west to attack Goring's army. On July 11, Fairfax, advancing from Long Sutton towards Bridgewater, found Goring's forces strongly posted on some hills on the east of Langport. The Royalists were defeated, driven through Langport, and chased by Cromwell and the horse to within two miles of Bridgewater. The victory enabled Fairfax to besiege and capture the Somersetshire fortresses.

Languide, The Battle of (May 13, 1568), was fought near Glasgow between the forces of Mary Queen of Scots, who had just escaped from Lochleven Castle, and those of the Regent Murray. Mary, in spite of the superior numbers of her army, was defeated.

Langtoft, PIEBRE DE, was probably a canon of Bridlington, in Yorkshire, and lived in the reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. He wrote a Chronicle in the corrupt Norman-French of Yorkshire, the principal object of which was to show the justice of Edward's Scotch wars.

Langtoft's Chronicls has been published in the Rolls Series under the editorship of Mr. Wright.

Langton, John De (d. 1337), was Chancellor from 1292 to 1302, during which period he carried on successfully the work of Robert Burnel. In 1305 he was made Bishop of Chichester, and shortly after the accession of Edward II. (1307) was re-appointed to the Chancellorship, which he held till 1310. He had at first supported the king, but the infatuation of Edward for Gaveston drove Langton to side with the barons, and he became one of the ordainers appointed in 1310 to regulate the royal househeld and realm. The rest ? nis life seems to have been spent in attending to the affairs of his bishopric.

Langton, Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228), is supposed to have been born at Langton, near Spilsby, but of his parentage and early life nothing certain is known. He studied at the University of Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Lothaire, who, on his election to the Papal throne as Innocent III., sent for Langton, whose reputation as a scholar and divine was very great. In 1206 be was created a cardinal. Shortly afterwards Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and a disputed election to the primacy followed. The younger monks chose Reginald, their sub-prior, while the elder, and the suffragan bishops, elected John de Gray, Bishop of Norwich, the king's nominee. On the case being referred to the Pope, Innocent rejected the claims of both candidates, and caused Langton to be chosen. The king refused to accept him, and regarded the action of the Pope as an unjustifiable interference with the rights of the king and the English Church. For six years (1207-13), John remained obdurate, various pro-posals and offers were made by Innocent, England was placed under an interdict, and the king himself excommunicated, and it required a threat of deposition to induce him to yield. But, though the papal nominee, Langton soon won the gratitude of the English by his opposition to the tyranny of John. It was he who produced the charter of Henry I. before the baronial council at St. Paul's as an indication of the claims they ought to make; and all through the struggle for the charter he was the soul of the baronial party. For a time he forfeited the Pope's favour for this opposition to the Pope's new vassal. But his great personal influence with Innocent ultimately prevailed, and the accession of Henry III. and the acceptance of the charter by the papal party restored him to full influence. He procured the recall of the papal legate Pandulf, and a promise that during his lifetime no more legates should be sent from Rome. He excommunicated the mercenaries and feudalists. His death, in 1228, was soon followed by the quarrel of Hubert de Burgh and the king. He was one of the ablest of the mediæval archbishops.

Lansdown, BATTLE OF (July 5, 1643). After the battle of Stratton, Hopton and the Cornish army were joined by the king's troops under Lord Hertford and Prince Maurice. The Parliamentary troops, defeated at Stratton, were likewise reinforced by the army of Sir William Waller, who took up his head-quarters at Bath. Waller entrenched himself at Lansdown, where he was attacked by Hopton's army on the morning of July 5. Hopton's Cornishmen stormed Waller's works, and remained masters of the field. But the losses of the conquerors were very great; they included Sir Bevil Grenville, "whose loss would have clouded any victory," and many officers. Hopton himself, wounded in the battle, was nearly killed by an explosion of gunpowd the next day. Sir William Waller's army was "rather surprised and discomforted with the i redibab boldness of the Cornish foot, than much weakened by the number

Lansdowne, William, MARQUIS OF (b. 1737, d. 1805), was sprung on his father's side from the Fitzmaurices, Earls of Kerry, one of the oldest houses of Ireland; while, by female descent, he inherited the name and fortune of Sir William Petty. Entering the army at an early age, he distinguished himself at the battle of Minden, and on the accession of George III. was appointed an aide-de-camp to the king. The next year, after representing the family borough of Wycombe for a few weeks, he was called np to the House of Peers by the death of his father, the Earl of Shelburne. In his new sphere, Lord Shelburne at once attached himself to Lord Bute, and supported the peace negotiations of 1762. In the following year he was appointed a Privy Councillor and President of the Board of Trade. But in a very few months he deserted the government, and joined the Opposition under Pitt. No place was found for him in the Rockingham ministry, but on its fall and Lord Chatham's succession to office he was made Secretary of State. In 1768 the Duke of Grafton yielded to "the king's daily instigations to remove Lord Shelburne." During the long period of Lord North's administration, Lord Shelhurne continued to act firmly with the Opposition, alike on the subject of Wilkes and the Middlesex Election, and on the policy adopted towards the American colonies. On the resignation of Lord North, Lord Shelhurne rejected the urgent request of the king that he would form a cabinet, and refused to take the place which was due to the Marquis of Rockingham. When that nobleman did become Prime Minister, Lord Shelburne was appoi ed Home Secretary, Fox being Foreign Secretary; and between these two, on Rockingham's death, ensued a disastrous quarrel, which split up the Whigs, and resulted in the Coalition. Lord Shelburne succeeded as Prime Minister (July, 1782), but with only half of the Whigs behind him, he very soon had to yield to the imposing strength of the Coalition (Feb., 1783). In 1784 he was created Marquis of Lansdowne, and for a time retired from active life. On the outbreak of the French Revolution he joined the Opposition; but he never again regained his former eminent position. Lord Albe-marle says of him that "his insight into character was shrewd and generally accurate; his eloquence was graceful and persuasive; his knowledge of business, especially that which related to foreign affairs, was extensive."

From 1895 to 1900 he was secretary for War, and secretary for Foreign Affairs from 1900 to 1905. In December, 1909, under his leadership the House of Lords refused to pass the Budget of that year before its approval by the country.

It was the work of Walter Balcanquall, Dean of Durham. Laswaree, The Battle of (Nov. 1, 1803), was fought between the English, commanded by General Lake, and fifteen of Dowlnt Rao Scindia's disciplined battalions. Lathe was a division of the county of Kent, answering to the Riding of Yorkshire, or possibly to the Rape of Sussex, and corresponding, it is just possible, either to the original counties of the Kentish folk, or to the amaller sub-kingdoms, which were againmented to make up the kingdom.

Latimer, Huen, Bishop of Worcester (A: 1485, d. 1655), was the son of a prosperous Leicestershire yeoman. At fourteen years of ag-Latimer proceeded to Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he threw himself with conspicuous energy into the special studies affected by the favourers of the New Learning. He attracted the favourable notice of Thomas Cromwell, and, on finally quitting Cambridge, he was preferred by him to the living of West Kington, in Wiltshire. By this time Latimer had earned for himself no small amount of fame as an eloquent and telling preacher; but the boldness with which he proclaimed his religious views, and his unsparing denunciations of the existing ecclesiastical abuses, frequently placed him in positions of danger, from which it required all his own native address, backed up by powerful friends at court, to successfully extricate him. In 1535, his own favour with Henry VIII., whose chaplain he was, together with the influence of Thomas Cromwell, procured his clevation to the see of Worcester. But after the enactment of the Six Articles Latimer was at once made an example of, and imprisoned for contumacy (1539). He was released in 1540, und remained in obscurity till 1546, when he was again imprisoned; but on the accession of Edward VI. he was immediately set free. He declined, however, to again undertake the responsibility of an episcopal charge, occupying himself instead with the more congenial work of an itinerant preacher. In this character, his popular preaching talents exerted a much wider and more permanent influence in the spread of his epiuiens than the most vigorous exercise of his episcopal authority could have done; and there is no doubt that his enthusiastic missionary labours contributed very largely to fix the doctrines of the Reformation in the minds of the people. On Edward VI.'s death he was again imprisoned, in the Tower and at Oxford, where attempts were made to compel him, with Ridley and Cranmer, to a disputation on the Mass. He and Ridley were martyred at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555.

Laud, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury (b. 1573, d. 1645), was the son of a clothier of Reading, educated at Reading School, and St. John's College, Oxford. He was elected a fellow of that college in 1593, ordained in 1600, and became one of the principal opponents of the Puritan party in Oxford. Iu the year 1605 he caused great scandal by performing the marriage of the Earl of Devonshire to Lady Penelope Devereux, who had been divorced from her husband on account of her adultery with the earl. In spite of this he was in 1611 elected President of St. John's, made one of the king's chaplains, and appointed successively Archdeacon of Huntingdon and Dean of Gloucester. In 1621 he was further promoted to the bishopric of St. David's. King James, it is said, hesitated considerably to entrust a bishopric to so zealous and energetic a Churchman. "He hath a restless spirit, which cannot see when things are well, but loves to toss and change, and bring matters to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain." Laud became the friend and spiritual adviser of Buckingham, and it was in order to convince the wavering mind of his patron's mother that he entered into controversy with the Jesuit Fisher on the questions at issue between the English and Roman Churches. With the accession of Charles his influence increased, and he employed it to promote and protect Arminian divines. The Commons remonstrated against his influence in 1628, but the king replied by promoting him to the bishopric of London (July, 1628), and promising him the arch-bishopric of Canterbury But it was not bishopric of Canterbury till his return from accompany me the king in his progress to Scotland that I and actually attained the archbishopric (August, 1658). Therefore, his activity during the years 1628-33 was mainly confined to the diocese of London, and to the University of Oxferd, of which he was elected chancellor in 1630. But his influence stretched beyond the sphere of his immediate action, and inspired the silencing of controversial preaching, the sup-pression of the feoffees for impropriations, and other important steps in the king's ecclesiastical policy. After 1633 he was able to work more effectually. "I laboured nothing more," he says "than that the external public worship of God-too much slighted in most parts of this kingdom-might be preserved, and that with as much decency and uniformity as might be, being still of opinion that unity cannot long continue in the Church where uniformity is shut out at the Church door." He began by reviving the custom of metropolitical visitation, and sending officials to inquire into the condition of every diocese in his province. All communion tables were fixed at the east end of the church, every clergyman was obliged to conform to the Prayerbook, a searching inquiry took place into the conduct of the clergy, and uniformity of ritual was generally enforced. In the Council he quarrelled with Cottington and Windebank, raised Juxon to the Treasury, supported Wentworth against his enemies, and struggled to contend against the influence the queen exercised in favour of the Catholics. The new canons and Prayer-book, which the king endeavoured to force on the Scots, were submitted to and amended by Laud. That the English Prayer-book was imposed on Scotland, rather than the liturgy prepared by the Scotch bishops, was Laud's doing. Throughout the two Scotch wars the archbishop, as a member of the Junto for Scotch affairs, supported Strafford in his vigorous policy. Therefore, as soon as the Long Parliament met, he was involved in the same fate, impeached (Dec. 18, 1640), committed to custody, and, after the articles against him had been passed by the unanimous vote of the Commons (Feb. 24, 1641), imprisoned in the Tower. For two and a half years the archbishop was imprisoned without a trial, his revenues sequestrated, his goods sold, and his papers seized. The trial began at last in November, 1643, the main charges being that he had endeavoured to subvert the laws, and overthrow the Protestant religion. The judges whom the Lords consulted declared that none of the charges made fell within the legal definition of treason. But this did not save him from the hatred of the Presbyterians, and he was condemned to death by an ordinance of both Houses. His execution took place on Jan. 10, 1645. The purity and lofty purpose of his life redeem the intelerance and severity with which he pursued his aim.

Lauder Bridge, The Affals of (1482). During an expedition against England, the Scotch nobles, exasperated by the arrogance of the low-born favourites and ministers of James 111., determined to put them to death, the Earl of Angus offering to be the one to "bell the cat." Accordingly Robert Cochrane, Roger Torphichen, a fencing master, Hammel, a tailor, and Leonard, a shoemaker, were seized, and hanged over the bridge of Lauder, in the presence of James III., who was himself taken to Edinburgh Castle, and placed under restraint. Lauder is in Berwickshire, twenty-six miles from Edinburgh.

Lauderdale, John Maitland, Duke of th. 1616, d. 1682), born at Lethington, took part with the Covenanters against the king, became one of the Scotch representatives in the Westminster Assembly, and commanded a Scotch infantry regiment at the battle of Marston Moor. In December, 1647, he was one of the Scotch commissioners who signed the secret treaty with the king at Carisbrooke, and took up arms with Hamilton and the Engagers. Obliged to fly from Scotland when Argyle regained power, he returned with Charles II. in 1650, was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and remained in confinement till March, 1660. He was rewarded for his services by being made Secretary of State for Scotland, opposed the re-establishment of Episcopalianism in that country, and by his skilful intrigues finally succeeded in overthrowing his rival Middleton (1663). From this moment he was virtually governor of Scotland, which he ruled through Lord Rothes and Archbishop Sharpe. "His great experience in affairs," says Burnet, "his ready compliance with everything that he thought would please the king, and his bold offering at the most desperate counsels, gained him such an interest with the king, that no attempt against him, nor complaint of him, could ever shake it, till a decay of strength and understanding forced him to let go his hold. He was in his principles much against popery and arbitrary government, and yet, by a fatal train of passions and interests, he made way for the former, and had almost established the latter. Whereas some by a smooth deportment made the first beginnings of tyranny less discernible and unacceptable, he by the fury of his behaviour heightened the severity of his ministry, which was liker the cruelty of an inquisition than the legality of justice." llis great object was to exalt the power of the crown, and though he did not scruple to use the greatest severity against the sealous

Presbytcrians of Fifo and the south-west, he aimed at preventing the Episcopalians from becoming too strong, and maintaining for the king the preponderance over both parties. Ho instigated the decree of 1669, by which a large number of expelled Presbyterian ministers were reinstated. He obtained for the king from the Parliament of 1669 the fullest possible recognition of the royal supremacy, and the control of the militia. In England he exercised a great influence as a member of the Privy Council, and was one of the persons to whom the king's treaty against Holland was confided (1670). Ho was credited with advising the king to use the forces of Scotland against the English Parliament, which, with other causes, led the Commons to demand his removal from the king's service (1674). The king created him Duko of Lauderdale in the Scottish and Earl of Guildford in the English peerage (1672). In spite of all attacks he retained his power until the Scotch insurrection of 1679. According to Burnet, "the king found his memory failing him, and so he resolved to let him fall gently, and bring all the Scotch affairs into the Duke of Monmonth's hands." He died on August 4, 1682.

Lawfeldt, The Battle of (July 2, 1747), was one of the most important contests during the War of the Austrian Succession in which British troops were engaged. The Duke of Cumberland took the field in February, while in March the French army, under Marshal Saxe, invaded the Dutch Netherlands. A revolution in that country promptly placed the Prince of Orange as Stadtholder at the head of the army. "Unfortunately, however," says Lord Stanhope, "he was found ignorant of tactics, and jealous of his more experienced but not less overbearing brother, the Duke of Comberland." The disorganised forces encountered the French at Lawfeldt, in front of Maestricht. The Dutch gave way and fled; and the Austrians, on the right, remained within their fortified position. The brunt of the battle fell upon the British on the left. The English horse advanced too far, and were repulsed, their commander, Sir John Ligonier, being taken prisoner. The Duke of Cumberland could not long maintain his ground; his re-treat however, was effected in good order. The English lost four standards, but notwithstanding their repulse, they captured six, and retired to a strong position behind the Meuse. The number of killed and wounded on both sides was great, and nearly equal. Both commanders showed great personal bravery.

Lawman was the name of an officer of Danish origin, who is met with in the Five Boroughs of Mercia, and other Daniah portions of the country. In the towns of Danish origin there were usually twelve lawmen, whose function it was to expound and enforce the law, and, in some cases, to act as a town council or governing body. In some cases the dignity seems to have been hereditary.

Lawrence (LAURENTIUS), Archbishop of Canterbury (604—619), was one of the companions of St. Augustine, whom he succeeded. Christianity flourished in Kent during the reign of Ethelbert; but on the death of that king, his son and successor, Eadbald, threw himself into the hands of the heathen party, and threatened persecution. Justus and Mellitus fled, and it is said that Lawrence was about to follow their example, when he was admonished by St. Peter to remain. He did so. Eadbald was re-converted, and Christianity became once more the religion of the Kentish kingdom.

Lawrence, SIR HENRY (b. 1806, d. 1857), obtained a cadetship in the Bengal army in 1821. He served in the Afghan campaign of 1843, and obtained his majority. In 1846, after the first Sikh War, Major Henry Lawrence was appointed British re-presentative at Lahore. In this capacity, he extinguished the revolt in Cashmere, under Isnam-ud-deen, against the anthority of Golab Singh. In 1847 he returned to England, for his health. In 1849, on the annexation of the Punjaub, he was appointed one of the Commissioners of the Board of Government, with his brother, John Lawrence, and Mr. Mansel. Differing with his brother, he was removed to Rajpootana by Lord Dalhousie. He was on the point of proceeding to Europe, for his health, in 1857, but, at the earnest request of Lord Canning, he assumed the Chief Commissionership of Oude (Mar. 20). He saw the discontent at the new revenue settlement, and ho did his best to remove it and restore confidence. He fortified, provisioned, and garrisoned Lucknow, as well as he could, as soon as he perceived the danger from the caste question. On May 19 he asked for, and obtained, plenary military and civil power. On the outbreak of the Mutiny, on the 30th, his energetic action repressed it, and expelled the mutinous sepoys. Hearing of the fall of Cawnpore, he marched out, and attacked the army of Nana Sahib, but was compelled to retreat. On July 2 the enemy besieged Lucknow, and in the evening Sir Henry was killed by a shell.

Lawrence, John Laird Mair, Lord (b. 1811, d. 1879), younger brother of Sir Henry Lawrence, was educated at Haileybury, and in 1829 received his nomination as a writer. In 1831 he was appointed Assistant to the Chief Commissioner and Resident at Delhi. In 1833 ho became an officiating magistrate and collector. In 1836 he received the post of joint magistrate and deputy collector of the southern division of Delhi. In 1848 he was made Commissioner of the Trans-Sutlej Provinces. He also occasionally acted as Resident at Lahore. At the end of the second Sikh War he was appointed, with his brother Henry and Mr. Manuel, Administrator for the Pnnjaub. He abolished the barbarous laws of the Sikhs, and introduced the Indian Criminal Code. The disarmament of the Punjaub was effected mainly through his energy and courage. In 1856 he was made a K.C.B. At the outbreak of the Mutiny, he stamped out all signs of revolt in the Punjaub. at once diverted every available soldier to Delhi, and raised from the military population of the Punjaub, troops to oppose the sepoys. For his share in suppressing the Mutiny, he was created a baronet and G.C.B. He then retired to England, and was elected a member of the Indian Council. Five years later he undertook the onerous duty of Governor-General. On Jan. 12, 1864, he arrived, and found India at peace. He devoted himself to improving the life of English soldiers in India. He provided for their moral and physical condition, for their religious study and improvement, and for sanitary reform. In 1864, in consequence of the ill-treatment of the English envoy, the Hon. Ashley Eden, war was declared with Bhotan. The war was badly conducted, but the result was, on the whole, favourable to the English. In 1865 peace was concluded. In 1866 occurred the great famine in Orissa. The year 1867 was remarkable for the completion of many railways. During the struggle between Shere Ali and his brothers in Afghanistan, Sir J. Lawrence preserved a perfect neutrality. At the end of the year 1868, Sir J. Lawrence returned to England. On March 27, 1869, he was raised to the peerage, by the title of Baron Lawrence of the Punjaub, and of Grately, in the county of Southampton. When the London School Board was formed, in 1870, he became its first chairman. In 1879 he died, having to the last taken part in the Indian debates in the House of Lords.

Leake, Sir John (b. 1656, d. 1720), was a celebrated English admiral. He entered the navy in 1677. At the siege of Londonderry he commanded the little squadron which relieved the town by breaking the boom at the entrance of Lough Foyle. Leake also distinguished himselfat the battle of La Hogue (1692). Soon after the accession of Anne he was made vice-admiral (1703), his Whig politics being greatly in his favour. After the eapture of Cibraltar Leake was left with eighteen ships of war for its defence. In 1705 he overtook and defeated Marshal Tessé, who with the French fleet, had been besigging the rock. Next year he commanded the fleet eff Barcelona. He declined to engage the Count of Toulouse, who was blockading the town, although his fleet was quite as strong as the Frenchman's; and was superseded by Peterborough. Soon afterwards a fleet of merchant vessels fell into his hands. Leake succeeded in taking the island of Sardinia with little or no resistance; and in conjunction with tieneral Stanhope, drove the enemy out of Minorca (1708). In the following year he was placed at the head of the Admiralty Board. When the Tory ministry came into office, Leake, on the resignation of Orford, became First Lord. After the accession of George I. he ceased to take any part in politics. "The admiral," says Mr. Wyon, "seems to have heen one of those men, who, however brave in subordinate positions, seem to be paralysed by the responsibility involved in a separate command."

Lebanon Question, THE. In 1860. broke out the quarrel between the Druses and the Maronites, two Syrian sects, which led to great atrocities and cruelties on both sides. The Turkish governor of Damascus did not attempt to interfere. England and France therefore took strong and decisive steps to restore tranquillity in the Lebanon. A convention was drawn up, to which all the great powers of Europe agreed, and which Turkey was forced to accept. Its provisions were that England and France should restore order; that France should supply the troops in the first instance, and that other requirements should be such as the powers thought fit. Lord Dufferin was sent out as English commissioner, and order was soon restored. representatives of the great powers assembled in Censtantinople, then agreed that a Christian governor of the Lebanon should be appointed in subordination to the Sultan, and the Sultan had to agree. In June, 1861, the French troops evacuated Syria.

Leeds, Thomas Osborne, Duke of (b. 1631, d. 1712), Viscount Latimer and Baron Danby (1673), Earl of Danby (1674), Marquis of Carmarthen (1689), and Duke of Leeds (1694), was the son of Sir Thomas Osborne, of Yorkshire. He was elected member for York in 1661, and took an active part in the prosecution of Clarendon. His official career began with his appointment as commissioner for examining the public accounts (1667), and he became successively Treasurer of the Navy (1671), Privy Councillor (1672), and on the fall of Clifford, Lord High Treasurer (1674). "He founded his policy," says North, "upon the Protestant Cavalier interest and opposition to the French." At home he pat in force the laws against catholics and Dissenters, endeavoured to impose a non-resistance test on all public functionaries, and introduced a bill to give securities to the Church in event of the succession of a Catholic king. Abroad he opposed the aggrandisement of France, so far as the king allowed him, and contrived to bring about the marriage of tho Princess Mary to William of Orange (1677). But he corrupted the House of Commons, and stooped to be the agent of Charles II. in his bargains with Louis XIV. The latter finding Danby the opponent of French policy, worked his overthrow through Ralph Montagu, the ambassader at Paris, who revealed the secret despatch by which Danby, at the king's command, asked payment for Eng-'and's neutrality. He was impeached in 1678, and though not tried, confined in the Tower till 1684. It was decided that the king's pardon could not be pleaded in bar of an impeachment by the Commons, and that the dissolution of Parliament did not put an end to an impeachment. In the next reign, finding that the measures of James II. threatened the Church, he allied himself with the Whig lords, signed the invitation of June 20, 1688, to the Prince of Orange, and secured York for the Revolution. Yet though he did not shrink from taking up arms, he scrupled to declare James deposed, and headed the party which argued that the king had by his flight abdicated, and that the crown had thus devolved on Mary. In the discussions between the Lords and the Commons which followed, it was mainly owing to Danby that the House of Lords consented to agree with the Commons, and invite William to ascend the throne. Therefore he naturally obtained a great position under the new government. He was appointed President of the Council, and became in 1690 the real head of the ministry; "as nearly Prime Minister," says Macaulay, "as any English subject could be under a prince of William's character." His second administration, like his first, was stained by systematic bribery, nor was he free from corruption himself. In 1695 it was proved that he had received a bribe of 5,500 guiness from the East India Company, and he was for a second time impeached. He escaped condemnation, and caused the sus-pension of the proceedings by contriving the flight of the principal witness; but though he retained his place for three years longer, he completely lost his power. "Though his cloquence and knowledge always secured him the attention of his hearers, he was never again, even when the Tory party was in power, admitted to the smallest share in the direction of affairs. In 1710 he made his last important appearance in debute in defence of Sacheverell, and thus explained his conduct in 1688." He had, he said, a great share in the late revolution, but he never thought that things "would have gone so far as to settle the crown on the Prince of Orange, whom he had often heard say that he had no such thoughts himself. That they ought to distinguish between resistance and revolution, for vacancy or ablication was the thing they went upon, and therefore resistance was to be forgot; for had it not succeeded it had certainly been rebellion, since he knew of no other but hereditary right." But though he disavowed the principles of the Revolution, and shrank from the logic of his actions, his name is inseparably associated with that event, and the part he played then is his best title to remembrance. His character has been very variously judged; he was bold, ambitious, and unserupulous, and he has been defined as "a bourgeois Strafford."

Leet. The court leot is one of the most ancient legal institutions of the realm, though it has now been for a long period stripped of by far the greater part of its powers. The right of holding a court of this natury-which is in many cases incidental to the tenure of a manor—appears to be traceable to Anglo-Saxon times; for there is no distinction to be made between the courts leet of the Middle Ages and the local jurisdiction of the Anglo-Saxon thegn who had "Sac and Soc" in his own estate apart from the general judicial machinery of the hundred or the shire. The court leet in theory consisted of all members of the jurisdiction or manor between the ages of twelvo and sixty-even women and servants being, according to some authorities, bound to attend; but in practice all the upper classes, from earls, bishops, and barons, to monks and nuns, were by the Statute of Marlborough exempted from attendance. The steward was bound to give from six to fifteen days' notice of the projected meeting (which was to be held once a year either within a month of Easter or Michaelmas) to "all manner of persons which are resident or deciners or owc royal suit to this leet." Proclamation having been duly made by the bailiff, excuses or "essoyncs" were then made for those who were prevented from attending, and the list called over to ascertain the absentees who are liable to be fined by the jury, which must consist of at least twolve, hut may consist of more persons. If it consist of a larger number it is sufficient if twelvo concur in any presentment; and the jury of a court leet differs from that of a court baron in that the latter may be comprised of less than twelve members. When the former has been sworn, his fellows follow by threes and fours, asserting that they will "present the truth and nothing but the truth." The business of the court is then entered npon, viz., that of presenting cnlprits. Of eulprits there were two classes: (1) Those whose offences might be inquired into here but punishable by the Justices of Assize at the next gaol-delivery; (2) Offences which might be punished as well as presented at the court leet. The first class comprised petty treasons and felonies, e.g., counterfeiting the king's seal, forging or clipping his coin, mutilation, various forms of murder prepense, manslaughter, arson, dove or pigeon stealing, the abetinent of knaves, and theft under the valuo of twelvo pence. The second class included the non-appearance of suitors and deciners (members of a frank-pledge) : noglect of any one being above twelve years in age to take his outh of lealty and fealty to the king, or to pay his due manorial services; annoyances caused to the people of the manor by tampering with or polluting roads, ditchos, and hedges. The jury might also present and punish notorious scolds, brawlers, and eavesdroppers; those who helped in a rescue or kept houses of ill-fame; vagabonds and common haunters of taverus; those who should adulterate anything they sold, be it ale, bread, lime, or flax, or who should give false measure, or sell goods at above the fair market value. The jury were likewise bound to present the officers who had failed to do their dutles-the constable, ale-taster, &c.; to inquire into any abuse of purveyance, into questions of treasure-trove, abuse of commons, and outlawry. The court leet had likewise to see that there was ne combination of labourers or tradesmen to exact excessive wages or prices; to insist on the practice of the long-bow, and to prevent the playing of such unlawful games as dicing, carding, tennis, or bowls. The jury of court leet also in many manors chose and swore in the builiff, constables, ale-conners, and hayward. Tho steward was to be considered as judge in a court leet, and he had the power to detain a stranger passing by if the full complement of his jury was not made up. He could likewise fine for contempt of court. Such were the early powers and constitution of the court leet, an institution which, after having been for many centuries in a declining condition, has now practically vanished, except from an antiquarian point of view. It takes its place by the side of the court baron, both coarts originally consisting of the same members. The court lest, however, has always been considered by the lawyers as emphatically one of the king's courts; whereas the court baron had more particular charge of local matters, such as determining services and tenures, admitting new tenants, making new by-laws, &c.

Legates, Papar, were the messengers or unbassadors of the Pope, the recipients of the fermal delegation of the papal authority within a given country. Before the Norman Conquest the presence of a papal legate in England was rare and exceptional. The earliest founders of Christianity in England were indeed in such close relation to the Popes, that there was very little need for other than direct intercourse with them. Accordingly there is no trace of papal legation between the mission of John the Precentor to Theodore's Council at Hatfield in 680 and the mission of George and Theophylact, "to renew the faith which St. Gregory had sent us" (.1nglo-Saxon Chron., s.a. 785) at the famous council of 787. During the next three centuries papal legations are equally rare. The subordinate position of Notlihelm "preco a domino Eugenio Papa," at the Clovesho Synod of 824, shows the legation invested with few of the dignities of later times. Under Edward the Confessor the mission of an envoy of Alexunder II. to counteract the adhesion of Stigand to the anti-Pope marks the beginning a now period which the Conquest further developed. But while admitting the papal d legates, and using them in 1070 to reform the Church on Norman lines, William I. stablished the rule that no legate should be admitted into England unless sent at the instance of the king and Church. Anselm claimed for the see of Canterbury a prescriptive right to represent the Pope in England. Archbishop William of Corbeuil obtained from Honorius II. (1126) a formal legatine ommission over the whole island of Britain. From this precedent grew the ordinary legation of the archbishops, which, acceptable by tical interference with the ordinary rule o' the Church, was agreeable to the Pope as implying that the independent metropolitical purisdiction of Canterbury was the result of papal delegation. The steps in the process are as follows: on William of Corbeuil's leath, Henry of Winchester was preferred to Theobald, the new archbishop, who obtained the legation, however, after the death Henry's patron, Pope Innoc no II. Henry II. for a time got Roger of York appointed legate instead of Becket; but daring the quarrel Becket received the delepointed legates, though Longchamp of Ely succeeded Baldwin, when the latter went on crusade, and llubert Walter had to give up the title on the death of Celestine III. The surrender of John gave opportunities for extraordinary foreign legates, such as Gualo and Pandulf, who almost ruled England in the minority of Henry 111.; but Langton obtained their recall, and the appointment of himself as legatus natus, and a promise that in his lifetime no other legate should be sent. Henceforth the Archbishops of Canterbury were regularly recognised as ordinary legates. In 1352 Thoresby of York acquired the same privilege for the northern province. The suspension of Chichele by Martin V. Secause he could not get the Statute of Provisors repealed, seems not to have been recognised; and Beaufort of Winchester's special delegation did not supersede the ordinary jurisdiction of Canterbury. But legati missi, legati a latere were still sent upon occasion. The missions of Otho and Othobon, and of Guy, Cardinal Bishop of Sabina, are good instances during Henry III.'s time. Wolsey combined with his small ordinary jurisdiction as Archbishop of York an extraordinary commission as legate, which became the excuse for his overthrow, and for the abolition of a power which, from the days of the Statute of Pramunire, can hardly be said to have had any legal basis in England, however conformable to the general ecclesiastical law. Nothing but the compromise of the legatus natus made the position of the legato tolerable to the national feelings of England. It involved a subordination to an alien jurisdiction antagonistic to the imperial claims of the English erown. One of the earliest steps of the Reformation was to ignore the claims of the papal legates. The mission of Campeggio in 1529 was, but for the revival of the ordinary legation of Cardinal Pole and his supersession by Peto, the last instance of papal legation in England.

Legge, HENRY BILLSON (b. 1708, d. 1764). was the son of the Earl of Dartmouth. He became Lord of the Admiralty in 1746, and Lord of the Treasury in 1747. In the followg year he was appointed envoy extrardinary to the court of Berlin, and in 1749 became Treasurer of the Navy. In 1764 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, but in 1755 he rebelled against Newcastle, refusire to sign the Treasury warrants necessary ... carrying the treaty for the Hessian subsidy to a conclusion. He was accordingly smissed. He again assumed office as Socretary of State, in 1756, but was dismissed in the following year, to be shortly afterwards reinstated as Chancellor of the Exchequer; he was, however, dismissed in 1761, owing to a quarrel with Bute. He continued, until his death, to adhere to Pitt in politics, although bound by no ties of friendship.

Legion Memorial, The (1701), was a Whig pamphlet, written to express the public disgust at the treatment by the Commons of the Kentish petitioners. It is supposed that its author was Daniel Defoe. The pampulet takes its name from its concluding words, "our name is Legion, and we are many." Its language is extremely violent, and it contains not only questions of national politics, but also a bitter attack on the Unitarians, and on John Itowe, a speaker against the Kentish Petition. It accurately represented the temper of a lung-section of the population. The Whigs were delighted, and the Tories infuriated with it.

Legislation. There was little legislation, or fermal enacting of new laws, before the Norman Conquest. The unwritten eustones and rules of law that the Angles and Scrons had brought to Britain were, from turns to time, authoritatively declared, revised, amended, added to, adapted to the advancing experience of the race, or even reduced to crudely constructed codes; and the result was called after the king by whom or at whose instance the task had been undertaken. This moderate measure of legislation would seem to have regularly been the joint-work of the king and witan; the successive issues of laws profess to have been made either by the king and his witan, or by the king " with his witan," or "with the counsel of his witan." Indeed Alfred tells us that to his laws the consent of his witan was given; and tho language of more than one ordinance of Ethelred II.'s reign states the authority of the witan alone. Mr. Kemble would rather "assert that they possessed the legislative power without the king, than that he possessed it without them." We may perhaps assume that their practical importance to this function varied with the character of the king. Very few laws were made in the reigns of the Norman kings. But in the making of these few the sovereign's will is believed to have been the sole affective force; the voice of the great and wise of the kingdom declined into an influence merely—perhaps into less. Yet it was seldom ignored; the charters and ordinances of William I. and Henry I. generally express the counsel or concurrence in some form of the higher clergy and barons, though it is likely that their approval was citen taken for granted. The tendency, however, of the succeeding reigns was to make the share of the Great Council in the work more and more of a reality. Even the strongwilled Henry II. was careful to gain its assent to the assizes or constitutions he drew up. And this tendency grew until this body was recognised as a co-ordinate power with the king in this province. In one or two instances, indeed, notably in that of Magna Carta, what now pass for laws were really treaties concluded between conflicting parties in the State. As yet the only part the peop-

had in legislation was to hear and obey the laws that were declared then b sheriffs or itinerant justices. "Lagradative action," says Bishop Stubbs, "belonged only to the wise, that is, to the royal "national council." The encorporation of Commons with this council was necessarily fellowed by the concession to the representatives of the people of a right to a share in this action. But not ut once to an important share. First their participation was either deemed unnecessary or assumed; then it was udmitted to be essential to the repeal of a law; next, laws were enacted on their petition; and for some time this last remained the usual practice. During the fourte is century the right of the Commons to esent petitions and receive answers to the... tended steadily to become the exclusive basis of legislation here were ex options, cortainly-more than once a petition to the elergy led to the framing of a statute; but the regular course was for the king to ordain the law at the request of the Commons, and with the assent of the Lords. And to several laws even the assent of the Commons is stated. But the king was still largely in fact, as in form he has always been, the author of all legislation . .nd the statutes that he ca sed to be framed on the petitions of Parliament were often inadequate, evasi e, or iseless To make sure of the fulfilment of their desires, therefore, Parliament, towards the end of Henry Vl.'s reign, adopted the practice of proceeding by bills which could not be altered without their sanction, but might originate in either House, or even with the king. The method of petition was not altogether abandoned; but its us became rare, except in private legislation. And arready in the fifteenth century the course of procedure was substantially what it is now. The three readings, the going into committee, the proposal of amendments, were established forms at least before the century ended. Then, too. the enacting clause of statutes had taken it* final form-"be it enacted by the king, our sovereign lord, by and with the advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same." The language of our legislation has varied It was generally English, but sometimes I tin, before the Conjuest; was almost exclusively Latin from the Conquest till the Mad Parliament, when French made its appearance. French did not at once drive out Latin, but became the fashion ln Edward 1.' reign, and almost universal after it. But ever since 1489 our laws have been written and lusively in English. French, however, still langues in a few phrases: le roy le reult is the expression of the royal assent, and le roy s'arise would be the form of royal refusal if such and now be given.

On his arrival at Flushing, Leicester was offered and accepted the post of governor by the States, a fact which again provoked the anger of Elizabeth, who include that the earl and the States had treated her with contempt. Before Leicester returned to England, towards the end of 1586, he had managed, " with conspicuous incapacity," to throw everything into confusion, and to bring the Low Countries to the verge of ruin. Notwithstanding this, the States again offered him the government, and he went back with supplies of men and money in 1587, though he only retained his post a few months. The following year, in spite of the incapacity he had displayed as a general, the command of the English army was entrusted to him during the alarm of the Spanish invasion; and he was about to be created Lieutenant-General of England and Ireland

Leigh, Thomas (d. 1601), a supporter of the Earl of Essex, formed a plot to obtain his release by scizing the person of the queen. It is said that the discovery of Leigh's intention caused Elizabeth to sign the death warrant of the carl without delay.

Leighton, ALEXANDER (b. 1568? d. 1649), a Scotch divine, filled the chair of Moral Philosophy at Edinburgh from 1603 to 1615. In 1629 he published two works, one entitled Zion's Plea, the other The Looking-glass of the Holy War, in which he violently attacked the bishops, counselling the Parliament "to smite them under the fifth rib," and spoke of the queen as a Canaanite and an idolatress. For this he was sentenced by the Star Chamber to have his nose slit, his ears cut, be publicly whipped, and imprisoned for life. In 1640 he was released by the Long Parliament, and made keeper of the state prison at Lambeth Palace in 1642.

Leinster, THE KINODOM AND PROVINCE or, as far as can be gathered from the Irish legends, was first colonised by the Firbolgs, a number of tribes of British or Belgian origin, and after they had been defeated by the Tuatha Dé Dananns, it was the starting point from which the Milesians (Gauls or Spaniards) overran the country. When their leader Erimon divided the country he is said to have given Leinster to Crimhthann, a descendant of the Firbolgs, which race formed the bulk of the population. About the time of the Christian era Leinster was occupied by a number of kinglets, but Tuathal Techmar. who was a member of the dominant tribe, the Scoti, broke their power, imposed upon them a fine known as the "boromean," or cowtribute, and took a portion of their territory, including the sacred hill of Tara, to form, with additions from the other kingdoms, the overking's kingdom of Meath. His grandson, Conn "of the hundred battles," however, had little hold on the country, and the King of Leinster joined Mug of Munster in a victorious struggle against the over-king. At the time of the mission of St. Patrick (432 A.D.) Leinster, which comprised the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, Queen's County, parts of Kilkenny, King's County, and Kildare, together with the part of county Dublin sonth of the Liffey, had been consolidated into one kingdom under the Maelmordas, or Mac-Murroughs. It had already been partially converted to Christianity by Palladius. The

Leinster kings seem to have been practically independent of the over-kings of the Hui-Neill dynasty (438 and onwards), and in 681 they obtained an abolition of the "boromean" tribute, at the instance of St. Moling. From time to time, however, their country was invaded from Meath, and terrific defeats inflicted upon them. The country suffered also from the ravages of the Northmen and Danes, the latter of whom took from them a considerable district round Dublin (about 850). In 984 the Kings of East and West Leinster had to submit to Brian Boru, King of Munster. who thus became king of the southern half of Ireland. With the aid of the Danes of Dublin, Leinster attempted in 1000 to cast off his yoke, but the allies were completely defeated at Glen Mama. Maelmorda was placed on the throne by Brian as sole king, but promptly began to intrigue afresh with the Danes against him, and was in consequence met by the combined forces of Brian Boru and Malachi, King of Meath. The battle of Clontarf (1014) resulted in the utter overthrow of the Kings of Leinster and Dublin. It was not long, however, before the kingdom recovered, and by the middle of the century we find Diarmait (Dermot), King of Leinster, driving out the Danish King of Dublin, and his son Murchad (Murtough), making the Isle of Man tributary; but these acquisitions were not long retained. Dermot's great-grandson, Dermot MacMurrough, having been deposed because of his treacheries and cruelties, repaired to Henry II. in Aquitaine, and obtained permission to raise forces in England against Roderick O'Connor. Hence began the Anglo-Norman invasion, which speedily resulted in the conquest of the coast towns, and victories over the tribes, into which it is unnecessary to enter here. On the death of Dermot in 1171, Strongbow, who had married his only child Eva, claimed the kingdom of Leinster, and his heiress transferred the claim to her husband, William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, who left five co-heiresses. These ladies all married English nobles, whose descendants drew their rents, and lived away in England, the estates eventually becoming forfeited to the erown under the statute against absentees. Large tracts of land were also given by Dermot to others of the invaders, and these grants were confirmed by Henry on his visit to Ireland in 1172. Thus the Leinster Fitzgeralds held by subinfendation under the De Vescis, Earls of Kildare, the descendants of one of Strongbow's daughters, until in the reign of Edward I. the De Vesci estates were forfeited, and bestowed on the Fitzgeralds, who soon became of great importance as Earls of Kildare (1316) and Dukes of Leinster. They maintained a long and arduous struggle with the Irish tribes, the MacMurroughs and the O'Tooles, who often confined them to their walled towns. In 1399 Riehard II. came to the assistance of the English Pale, but the MacMurronghs evaded battle, av. he had to retire; Kildare, and the country round Dublin, was now all that was left in Leinster to the English. This state of affairs did not mend until the reign of Henry VIII., when a double policy of coercion and conciliation was pursued with some success: the Geraldines were crushed; the estates of absentee landlords wero confiscated; MaeMurrough, who now took the name of Kavanagh, the representative of King Dermot, was pensioned, and the other chieftains won over, their loyalty being secured by gifts of confiscated Church lands. Under Mary, tierald of Kildere was Under Mary, Gerald of Kildare was restored to his earldem, and the districts of Leix and Offaly were planted with English colonists, becoming Queen's County and King's County "espectively. During the reign of Elizabeth Leinster suffered comparatively little in comparison with Ulster and Munster, the scenes of the O'Neill and Desmond rebellions, though there was continual war then between the Geraldines and Butlers. In this reign the old kingdom of Meath was added to Leinster, together with Louth, formerly a part of Ulster. James I., true to his policy of governing Ireland by English ideas, determined to effect the Plantation of Leinster. By means of a commission to incline into defective titles, he despoiled the natives, and even the Anglo-Irish, of large portions of their lands, which were transferred to "undertakers," who speedily formed a new Irish nobility. Charles I. declared large districts of land in Wieklow and Wexford to be forfeited to the crown, but such was the outcry against the proceeding that it had to be abandoned. When ('romwell repaired to Ireland, in order to subdue the rebellion which had broken out in 1641, his stern displeasure fell heavily npon Leinster, and the massacres of Drogheda and Wexford went far to break all farther opposition. In the settlement that followed, the lrish Catholie gentry were transported across the Shannon, and their lands given to Cromwellian soldiers, and adventurers who had advanced money, but after the Restoration about one-third of their estates were restored to the dispossessed Catholics. The last great Irish land settlement—that which followed the Treaty of Limerick (1691)—resulted in a further forfeiture of Catholic property, but it did not affect Leinster so much as the other provinces of Ireland, and its history as a separate province may be said to have ended with the Revolution.

Leinster, James, Duke of, 20th Earl of Kildare (d. Nov. 19, 1773), was in 1747 made Marquis of Leinster in the English peerage, in 1761 he became Marquis of Kildare, and in 1766 Duke of Leinster in the Irish peerage. Individually the most powerful and popular nobleman in Ireland, he refused to act with any other party. Hence it was that he only once was Lord Justice. In 1769 he joined the Patriots, as they called themselves. He raised and commanded the first regiment of Volunteers; when the t.ade restrictions were taken away he refused to embarrass the government, but again took the lead against them after the Mutiny Bill had been passed. He was one of the deputation to the Prince of Wales with the Regency Bill. He signed the "Round Robin," but refused to recede from that engagement; in consequence he lost the Mastership of the Rolls. He was father of Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

Leith, the port of Edinburgh, was burnt by Hertford, May, 1544. It was afterwards held by the queen regent, Mary of Guise, and a French garrison against the Lords of Congregation, and in 1560 was besieged by a combined force of Scotch and English. In 1571 it was held by the party of James VI., who nearly fell into the hands of Lord Bothwell here in 1594. During the ascendancy of Cromwell it was occupied by Lambert and Monk. In 1715 it was for a time in the hands of the Jacobite insurgents.

Lennox, Esne Stuart, Duke of (d. 1583), the son of John d'Aubigné, captain of the Scots Guard in France, and the nephew of Matthew, Earl of Lennox, came to Scotland, 1579, where his polished manners soon recommended him to the favour of James VI., who created him Duke of Lennox, 1581, having previously made him Governor of Dumbarton, captain of his guard, and Earl of Lennox. Hated by the Scotch nobles as a foreigner and a favourite, Lennox sought to increase his popularity by becoming a Protestant, and to secure his power by the ruin of Morton. He became an object of dread to Elizabeth, who imagined that he would set himself to draw eloser the connection between Scotland and France. Hurled from his high position by the Raid of Ruthven, Lennox was compelled to return to France, where he died at Paris, May, 1583. He is said, in spite of his vanity and love of ostentation, to have been a "gentle, humane, and candid" man.

Lennor, Maithew Stuart, Earl of (d. 1571), was a member of the French house of D'Aubigné. On his marriage with the daughter of the Earl of Angus and Queen Margaret, he joined the party of Henry VIII. in Scotland, but subsequently threw him over at the same time as the Assured Lords. He was the father of Darnley, on whose murder he endeavoured without avail to bring Bothwell to justice, for he dared not appear at the trial as his accuser. In 1567, on Mary's abdication, he was appointed one of the council of regency, and the following year collected evidence against the Queen of Scots at the York commission. In 1570 he was elected regent of Scotland, and at once attacked and took the castle of Dumbarton, one of the strongholds of Mary's party. He was mortally wounded by a bullet in a fray at Stirling in September, Lenthall, William (b. 1591, d. 1662), was called to the bar in 1616, and, having a considerable practice, and being a member of an ancient county family, was chosen Speaker of the Long Parliament in 1640. He does not appear to have been equal to this important position, though on the attempted arrest of the Five Members by the king (Jan. 4, 1642), he showed considerable spirit. In 1643 the Parliament made him Master of the Rolls, and in 1646 one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal. In 1647, fearing the meb which attempted to overawe Parliament, he withdrew to the army, but soon after returned and resumed his office of Speaker, which he continued to hold dewn to the expulsion of the Long Parliament in 1653. In the Parliament of 1654 he was again ehosen Speaker, and in 1656 was made one of Cromwell's House of Lords, having taken a prominent part in favour of the Protector's assuming the title of king. On the Restoration he was deprived of his judicial office, but was one of those who received the king's pardon. He thereupon retired into private life, and to the end remained unmolested by the new government.

FOX, Judges of England.

Leofric (d. 1057) was the son of Leofwine, Earl of Mercia. In 1017 he was appointed by Canute Earl of Chester, and soon after succeeded his father in the earldom of Mercia. On the death of Canute Leofric supported the claims of Harold. During the reign of Edward the Confessor Leofric occupied a middle position between the foreigners and the party of Godwin, and in 1051, when matters had come to a crisis, he prevented the outbreak of civil war by mediation. He died in 1057, and was succeeded in his earldem by his son Elfgar. Leofric and his wife Godgifu (the "Lady Godiva" of legend) were especially celebrated as builders of churches and monasteries, chief among them being the great minster of Coventry. [COVENTRY.]

Florence of Worcester, Chronicle; Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. ii.

Lectwine (d. 1066) was the fifth son of Earl Godwin. Probably in 1057 he was appointed to an earldom, which included the shires of Kent, Surrey, Middlesex, Essex, Hertford, and Buckingham. He was slain in the battle of Hastings.

Leslie, David (d. 1682), nephew of Alexander Leslie, Earl of Leven (q.v.), and an even more able commander, accompanied his uncle to England (1644) in the capacity of majorgeneral. He was present at the battles of Marston Moor and Naseby, and in 1645 defeated Montrose at l'hiliphaugh. In 1650 he was opposed to Cromwell, who defeated him at Dunbar, and in the same year was taken prisoner at Worcester, and sent to the Tower, where he remained until the Restora-tion. He was made Lord Newark by Charles II. in recognition of his services at Worcester.

Leslie, Norman, Master of Rothes, was one of the Scotch commanders at the battle of Ancrum. In 1546 he murdered Cardinal Beaton in the castle of St. Andrews, where he was himself captured by a French force (1547), and sent to the French galleys as a heretic; he subsequently escaped.

Lethington, William Maitland or, son of Sir Richard Maitland, well known as an able and inscrutable politician at an early age, for some years played an almost continuous part in the history of Scotch politics, and in 1558 was appointed Secretary of State to Queen Mary, and was continually employed as her envoy to the English court. Although he joined the Lords of Congregation, he was nevertheless in favour of extending toleration to the queen as to her religion; in 1565 he vehemently opposed the marriage with Darnley, and a year later persuaded the queen to sue for a divorce. After Darnley's murder he accompanied Mary to Seton in Haddingtonshire, but deserted her on symptoms of danger appearing in 1567, and joined the Confederate Lords on Mary's captivity in England. However, he openly joined her party, and in 1569 was arrested and sent to Edinburgh as one of Darnley's murderers, but was acquitted, and resumed his office of Secretary of State, and remained faithful to Mary until the surrender of Edinburgh Castle placed him in the hands of his enemies. He poisoned himself, May 1573. His policy was characterised by a craft and depth that made him no bad match for the astute Cecil, but his whole course of action is steeped in mystery as to its motive and its end.

Levellers was the name given to an important party during the period of the Commonwealth. Early in 1647 a considerable ultra-Republican sect appeared in the New Model Army, especially among the Adjutators. The rejection of the Army Proposals by Charles I., and the increasing hostility displayed by the Commons towards the ar. y, furthered the spread of such opinions, and many of the soldiers distrusted Croinwell himself on account of his too lenient treatment of the king, and their distrust produced the mutiny of Nov. 15. with him, considered the existing Republic too aristocratic, and little better than the monarchy to which it had succeeded. In two pamphlets, England's New Chains Discovered, and The Hunting of the Foxes (i.e. the army magnates) from Newmarket and Triples Heath to Whitehall by Five Small Beagles, Lilburne demanded that the council of state should be dissolved and the management of public affairs should be given to parliamentary committees of short duration; that greater liberty of conscience and of the Press should be permitted; that a new and reformed parliament should speedily come together, and the Self-denying Ordinance revived. Lilburne and three other of the more conspicuous Levellers—Overton, Walwyn, and Prince—were arrested and brought before the Council; they were committed to the Tower. On April 25 a mutiny broke out among a troop quartered in Bishops-gate, who refused to obey an order to leave London. But Fairfax and Cromwell came up quickly and crushed the rising; fifteen mutineers were tried by court-martial, and one, Lockyer, was shot in St. Paul's Churchyard. More formidable risings took place in various parts of the country. A Captain Thompson with two hundred troopers rose in revolt at Banbury, issuing a manifesto, but he was overpowered by his colonel. From Salisbury a thousand insurgents marched towards London; they were surrounded by Cromwell at Burford and surrendered, and the very dangerous military Levelling movement was over.

Before this, ar ther and more harmless Levelling movement had been defeated. Some thirty men met on St. Margaret's Hill and St. George's Hill, near Cobham in Survey, where they "digged the ground and bowed it with roots and beans." They were dispersed, and their leaders brought before the Council. There one of them, Everard, declared that "what they did was to renew the ancient community of enjoying the fruits of the earth, and to distribute the benefit thereof to the poor and needy. But they intend not to meddle with any man's property nor to break down any pales or enclosures; but only to meddle with what was common and untited, and to make it fruitful for the use of man; that the time will suddenly be, that all men should willingly come in and submit to this community."

Cromwell's attitude towards the Levellers appears in a speech of 16 where he declares his approval of "fire was and orders of man whereby Englar been known for hundreds of years. bleman, a gentleman, and a yeoman; and it is a good interest of the nation. Did not that Levelling principle tend to the reducing of all to an equality? What was the purport of it but to make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord?"

Leven. Alexander Leslie, Earl of (d. 1661), having gained considerable military experience in the Low Countries and Sweden, returned to Scotland, 1638, and after serving as lieutenant to Montrose, was appointed com-mander-in-chief of the Covenanting army, Feb., 1639, in the May of which year he led the Scotch army to the Borders, encamping on Dunse Land just opposite the royal forces. A collision was for the time averted, but in 1640 Leslie entered England, winning the battle of Newburn and taking Newcastle. On a treaty being concluded at Ripon, Vealie was created Earl of Leven by Charles I., who hoped to win him over to his side. In 1644 he again led an expedition into England, and was present at the battle of Marston Moor. After the execution of Charles I. Leven supported Charles II. against Cromwell, but being captured in 1651 at Angus was sent to the Tower. He was kept in honourable confinement, and released in 1654, when he retired into private life.

Lewes, THE BATTLE OF (May 14, 1264), was fought between Henry III. and the barons under Simon de Montfort (q.v.). After the failure of the Mise of Amiens, war became certain, though negotiations still went on for a while. At first the war was confined to the capture of a few castles on either side, but in May both armies found themselves in Sussex, De Montfort marching to the relief of the Cinque Ports, which were threatened by the king. The forces met at Lewes on May 13, when De Montfort made one last attempt to avoid an encounter by offering the king 50,000 marks if he would engage to carry out the Pro-visions of Oxford. Henry returned a deflant answer, and De Montfort prepared to fight. At the break of day he suddenly advanced, and seized the heights above the town, and in this strong position forced the royal army to attack. Prince Edward opened the battle, and by a furious charge broke through the Londoners stationed on the right of the baronial army, and pursued them for some miles from the scene of action. Meanwhile, however, the royalist centre and left, crowded between the heights and the river, were com-pletely defeated by De Montfort. The king himself, with his brother, the King of the Romans, was taken prisoner. Edward cut his way into the midst of the baronial troops, and, unable to retrieve the fortune of the day, was obliged to surrender also.

Lewes. Mise or (1264), was the name given to the truce made between Henry III. and the barons after the victory of the latter at Lewes. By this treaty the Provisions of Oxford were confirmed, a new body of arbitrators was appointed to decide disputed points, and to choose a council for the king, to consist entirely of Englishmen; the king was to act by the advice of this council in administering postice and choosing ministers, to observe the charters, and to live of his own without oppressing the merchants or the poor; Prince Edward and his cousin Henry of Almayne were given as hostages; and the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester were to be indemnified; and a court of arbitration to settle disputed questions was to be appointed, consisting of two Frenchmen and two Englishmen.
