OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, June 24, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING LONG-TERM TEM-PORARY EMPLOYEES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay on the table of the house a recommendation from the civil service commission regarding the permanency of three long-term temporary employees of the House of Commons—Miss L. A. Kearns, Miss I. A. Boyce and Mr. L. C. Hill.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 50, respecting a certain wharf of Saguenay Terminals Limited—Mr. Dubuc.

QUEBEC AND MONTMORENCY RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (St. Antoine-Westmount) moved the first reading of Bill No. 51, respecting the incorporation of the Quebec and Montmorency Railway Company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is a bill to incorporate a company known as the Quebec and Montmorency Railway company, to acquire the railway property operated by the Quebec Railway Light, Heat & Power company. For some years the latter company has operated a tramway system in the city of Quebec, and a railway line from the city of Quebec to cap Tourmente, a distance of about thirty miles along the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. The operation of the tramways division differs from that of the railway division, and it is desired to segregate the two properties.

As explained in the explanatory note to the bill, the terms and conditions of any acquisition by the Quebec and Montmorency Railway company will be subject to the approval of the board of transport commissioners and the governor in council, in the manner provided by the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRODUCTION AND EXPORTS OF CANNED VEGETABLES

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the value of vegetables canned during each of the years 1937, 1938, and 1939?
2. What was the value of such products exported during the same years (a) to the United States, (b) to the United Kingdom?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Consumption of vegetables in the fruit and vegetable preparations industry, 1937 and 1938.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BIRCH HILL, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, petitions, complaints and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department relative to Mabel Mitchell, former postmistress at Birch Hill, Saskatchewan, dated within two years of her registration and appointment of her successor.

RECRUITING IN QUEBEC

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, selegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the premier of the province of Quebec, or other provincial ministers, and the Prime Minister of Canada or other federal ministers or officials of the Department of National Defence or any other federal department, relative to the request of the premier of Quebec that no recruiting of volunteers be made from among the sons of farmers in the province of Quebec.

JOHN INGLIS COMPANY—DISMISSAL OF WALTER CAMM

Mr. GILLIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the Department of Labour and any other person or organization, between January 1, 1940, and the present time, relating to the dismissal of Walter Camm, on the matter of labour organization in the John Inglis Company plant of Toronto.

WAINWRIGHT NATIONAL PARK

INQUIRY AS TO DESTRUCTION OF BUFFALO, ELK, MOOSE AND DEER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): A report appears in the Ottawa Journal of this morning to the effect that the government has had destroyed 3,000 buffalo, more than 1,000 elk, 500 moose and 500 deer which had been in Wainwright national park. Is that report correct? If so, why were the elk, moose and deer not released to form an addition to the wild life of Canada?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The report is correct. The buffalo, elk, moose and deer which were in Wainwright national park were destroyed some months ago. I did not get the last part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I asked why the elk, moose and deer had not been released. I can quite understand why the buffalo or bison should be destroyed, but the moose and deer are natural to Canadian wild life and I should like to know why they were not released.

Mr. CRERAR: An opportunity was given to various public bodies possessing parks or other facilities to secure any of these animals they might wish before the destruction took place. The destruction of the animals in Wainwright national park was made necessary by the fact that they were badly infected with tuberculosis. There are several other parks in which we have buffalo, elk, and other animals. For instance, in Riding Mountain park there is probably the largest herd of elk on the North American continent. It was not thought desirable or necessary to turn these animals loose, because they would have had to be transported to some place where they could find a living. At any rate, this action was not taken.

MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED CLOSING OF OFFICE AT PUGWASH,
NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police office at Pugwash is being closed. If so, is this being done on the instructions or with the permission of the government? The people of this country were reassured recently that this force would be increased, not diminished. It might be noted that Pugwash is a large shipping point.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have asked for a report about this matter and I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon, J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to my allotted task to-day with a sense of heavy responsibility. This budget is being delivered at the most critical hour in history. The Hun is hammering at the gate. Backed by almost incredible weight of mechanized power, he has operated with cold-blooded ruthlessness. He has violated every principle of the law of nations. He has overrun one after another of the democratic countries of Europe. He has brought our gallant ally France to her knees. At this very moment the enemy of mankind stands with naked sword at the threshold of Britain herself.

For the first time in a thousand years the world has been made to realize that a new "Dark Ages" may not be the figment of a wild imagination. The incredible has indeed happened. Europe, the fine flower of western culture, is threatened with the blight of barbarism. All the things we hold dear—the democratic way of life, the Christian ideal, these age-old tenets of human relationships, fair dealing, justice, and brotherhood are threatened with destruction by those who would shut the gates of mercy on mankind.

We know now only too well that we are paying the price of long years of wishful thinking. There is no doubt that all of us in the democratic countries, governments and peoples alike, have been blinded to the stark potentialities of force and evil. Fortunately, at last, I believe, our eyes are opened and we see clearly. And if we do, it is not too late. For no one and no event can shake my conviction that in the long run truth must triumph over falsehood, good over evil, justice over might.

Obviously, the message which I must bring to-day cannot be a pleasant one. I come to you to collect part of the price to which I have referred. Nor can I be dogmatic or definitive in the proposals I make. We live from day to day—indeed, from hour to hour—and our plans must be subject to change in the light of new circumstances.

In dealing with specific measures, we have had to take into account a multitude of unusual facts and factors. Again, in determining the magnitude of the aggregate burden to be imposed upon the Canadian people, we have had to weigh many conflicting influences and to form a judgment as to how far we could go at the present time without setting up adverse factors which would tend to defeat some of the very objectives we are trying to reach. There will, I am sure, be those who will think that I have not gone far enough and probably those who will contend that I have gone too far. Still others will differ with me on details of specific measures. All that I can say is that I have spared no pains to ascertain the relevant facts, to weigh the merits of various measures and proposals, and to reach conclusions in the light of the supreme emergency which faces us to-day.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL REVIEW

Before coming to my budget forecast for the current fiscal year and the tax changes I recommend, you will expect me to review the economic and financial events and policies of the first nine months of war. To make it as concise as possible I shall limit myself to a discussion of factors which give the setting for, and determine the principles underlying, the measures which the government has to propose.

In the first war budget of last September, my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, who delivered the budget speech, laid down the broad principle of the government's policy of war finance. "We believe it is the part of wisdom," he said, "to follow as far as may be practicable a pay-as-you-go policy." Events which have happened since, and particularly those of the last few weeks, have not detracted from the wisdom of that policy, but rather have reinforced the need for a vigorous effort to apply it in every possible way.

The general policy was elaborated further as consisting of two parts: that appropriate to an initial period of quietness and hesitation, and that suitable for a second period in which rising business activity and expanding income had acquired momentum.

In the initial period of the war in which business was expected to be hesitant, if not actually depressed, the appropriate financial policy was declared to be one which would facilitate the expansion of national income and the drawing into employment of our full man-power. In order to ensure that out of rising incomes increased revenues would begin to flow to the government for the financing of the war, certain excise taxes, chiefly on luxuries, were levied, and moderate increases were imposed in the personal and the corporation income taxes. The increases in income tax were payable only after the close of the fiscal year and therefore would have a relatively slight effect in curtailing purchases by consumers. Furthermore, in order that uncertainty might be removed and that business firms might begin to adjust themselves to the war conditions, the outlines of a new and heavy excess profits tax were

These new or increased taxes were not designed to provide immediately for any large part of our heavily increased expenditures. It was also specifically indicated that our initial borrowing operations to provide part of the funds to cover the inevitable deficit in this early period would probably be of a very short-term character, so as to promote the immediate expansion of productive In harmony with this same point of view, it was emphasized that while the magnitude of the new burdens thrust upon us would make it imperative to do everything possible to conserve our resources and to economize on any expenditures not urgently needed in the national interest, nevertheless it would be "penny wise, pound foolish" to curtail expenditures so suddenly and so drastically as to aggravate seriously the unemployment problem before the stimulating effects of our war expenditures and of foreign purchases in our markets had acquired real momentum.

The initial period of quietness and hesitation, it was felt, would be of relatively short duration and would be followed by the second period during which increasing business activity, expanding production and rising national income had acquired momentum. While perhaps starting slowly, this advance would accelerate under the pressure of war orders from ourselves and our allies until gradually our economy would approach a state of full employment of its labour, capital equipment and material resources. As this second stage developed, certain modifications of financial policy would be called for. Thus it was stated that as business activities increased and idle workers were reemployed, the resulting larger incomes would necessarily become subject to heavier taxation for the purpose of ensuring that the increase in our national income was largely diverted to war needs instead of being disbursed in increased personal consumption and private investment. For the same reason, borrowings from the savings of our citizens and genuine economies in normal governmental services not urgently needed in war time, were indicated as appropriate for this second period.

In accordance with the declared policies, the government made its first financing in the form of a short-term banking operation which was definitely expansionist in character. This was a loan of $200 million arranged with the banks in November, 1939, on the security of two-year notes at a rate of two per cent. It will be recalled that of this amount $92 million was used to repatriate Canadian securities held in London. This gave the United Kingdom a substantial supply of Canadian dollars which was used to purchase Canadian foodstuffs, raw materials and war supplies.

This borrowing from the chartered banks was facilitated by appropriate monetary policy. Between August and November, the Bank of Canada's assets increased by approximately $107 million as a result of the purchase of securities and the increase in the value of its gold and foreign exchange reserves. This provided cash to meet the enlarged public demand for notes in circulation and to increase the cash reserves of the chartered banks by $33 million.

With this increase in cash reserves, the chartered banks were enabled to increase their total Canadian deposits by approximately $306 million. In the same period, they increased their current loans by approximately $147 million, mainly to finance the large wheat crop, and added to their net holdings of securities by $158 million.

Thus, financial and monetary policy accorded with the declared intention to facilitate in the initial period an increase in business activity and an expansion of national income.

By the middle of January it became apparent that business had acquired sufficient momentum to justify going to the public for a loan out of savings. We therefore offered our first war loan in the form of 31 per cent twelve-year bonds callable by lot during the last five years. Very careful preparation had been made for the campaign and the success of the loan was even greater than we had expected. Of the total subscriptions of $375 million we allotted $200 million to cash subscribers, and $50 million to subscribers who desired to convert their holdings of one of our issues which was to mature on March 1st. It was particularly noteworthy that there were over 178 thousand individual cash subscriptions to this loan and that out of that number more than 121 thousand were for amounts of $500 and less. This result was made possible by the nation-wide cooperation of institutions and individuals and, above all, by the united and enthusiastic support of the Canadian people as a whole.

Even this January borrowing was to a considerable extent expansionist in character in that it converted into government expenditures a considerable amount of idle bank savings. However, the number of small subscriptions and of arrangements made by employees of industrial firms for the purchase of bonds by instalments is convincing evidence that a surprising portion of the subscriptions represented new savings out of increasing incomes.

Passing over one or two financial operations of smaller magnitude for refunding purposes, I come to a further major step in our borrowing operations, namely, the inauguration of our war savings certificates programme on May 27th. These certificates are issued in small denominations for the purpose of facilitating regular savings and contributions to Canada's war effort by persons of moderate and small means. Supplemented as they are by war savings stamps in the denomination of 25 cents they enable all of our people to take some part in Canada's war work while at the same time acquiring the habit of thrift and building up a "nest egg" for the contingencies that may lie ahead. Unlike our periodic war loan campaigns, the sale of these certificates and stamps involves a steady effort which will produce a continual stream of funds, even more important in its influence that the actual amount of money itself. The campaign has involved a vast amount of preparatory and organizing work, and I express now our sincere appreciation of the unstinting help and support being given by patriotic citizens, organizations and business firms throughout the country. You will be interested to know that not a cent of commission is being paid to the postmasters, banks, financial institutions and commercial organizations which are selling these obligations, and the citizens who are organizing and sustaining this project both at head-quarters in Ottawa and throughout the dominion are giving their services voluntarily.

Turning now to general business conditions, there is one respect in which the business forecast made by the Minister of National Revenue last September has proved to have been unduly conservative. The fact that the results were better than he forecast was, I really think, due, at least in considerable measure, to the effectiveness of the policies which were promptly adopted. The stagnation in business which he contemplated as probable during the first few months of war was not in fact realized. It is true that for the first few weeks financial and commodity markets were upset by the shock of war and business itself was retarded by uncertainty and the disruption of certain established channels of trade. But the financial policies outlined in the September budget and the institution of foreign exchange control on September 16th restored confidence to financial markets and prevented the dumping of securities and the export of capital which might otherwise have produced serious disorganization. The prompt establishment of other controls through various war agencies, such as the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, the War Supply Board and the Agricultural Supplies Board, also made its contribution to the restoration of confidence and the rapid adjustment of trade and industry to the new war-time conditions.

There were various economic factors which also worked to improve conditions. The large wheat crop of last year, for which the initial price guaranteed by the government was realized by the producers immediately upon delivery, gave a very important stimulus to business generally. Almost equally important was the phenomenal rise during the first four months of war of Canadian exports to the United States. Our neighbour to the south experienced an intense forward-buying boom and in that we shared through greatly increased exports. Initial war orders were important in contributing to the early expansion of the textile, boot and shoe, and iron and steel industries particularly.

At the turn of the year, however, business activity in the United States receded very sharply. Seldom has there been in that country in so short a space of time so sharp a contraction in production. Under ordinary circumstances. Canadian trade and industry would have shown a similar, if less intense, recession. But as a matter of fact, while the rapid increase in Canadian business activity was slowed down somewhat, the cumulative increase in war orders and the recovery in Canadian exports to Britain, which had been abnormally low in October and November, largely offset the influence of the United States recession. Business activity in Canada flattened out in February and March but generally did not recede. In recent weeks the tempo of United States business has increased sharply and there are already indications that Canadian exports to that country are responding to a more active market. The stimulus to our business which has resulted from these exports is supplementing and reinforcing the expansion due to the acceleration of war expenditures here.

The record of the flow of business which I have outlined is clearly visible in the index of the physical volume of business in Canada. That index stood at 125 in August last, had increased to 139 in January, and stood at 137 in March-April. The increase over the same period in industrial production taken by itself was even more pronounced. A definite increase in consumers' incomes was shown in the rise of retail sales which by December had reached the highest figure since 1930, and, if allowance were made for to-day's lower price level as compared with 1930, retail sales last December would probably be found to have been the highest on record.

These retail sales have continued to be considerably higher than last year. Each month since last September, sales of automobiles have been greatly ahead of the corresponding month of the previous year. For the first four months of war, there was a marked hesitation in construction activity but since January construction has increased and through April and May the value of contracts let was 76 per cent above the value for the same two months of 1939.

According to the preliminary estimate of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, over one hundred thousand idle wage earners had been drawn into employment during the twelve months to April, 1940. The fall in the number of employable persons on urban relief rolls has lagged behind this increase in employment, but since last November the numbers on urban relief rolls have been lower than those for the corresponding months of the previous year and on the whole the reduction has been accelerating. We have no comprehensive statistics which would indicate changes in the amount of the incomes of wage and salary earners. There are however, abundant indications that as a result of elimination of short time, earnings for overtime work, an increase in the number of earners per family and increases in wage rates, total wage and salary earnings are rising rapidly.

These are days when no one can predict what the future will disclose. However, if there is no serious interruption in our export trade, the increasingly great numbers of men and amounts of materials being employed in war production will lead to a substantial increase in our national income, that is to say, the aggregate of the incomes of all the people of this country. The heightened tempo of business in the United States will also make an important contribution to the same end.

On the basis calculated by the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations our national income for the calendar year 1939 was in the vicinity of $3,800 million. Using the same method of computation we consider that our national income for the fiscal year 1940-41 will not likely be less than $4,500 million. We must see to it that by far the greater part of that increase is used for war purposes.

I need hardly say that our war effort is not in any sense to be limited by such financial calculations or by what we can comfortably accomplish. We must make the maximum effort of which this country is capable. Financial provision can be made and will be made for whatever it is physically possible for us to produce or to procure in the way of war services, supplies and materials. The limits of our effort are not fiscal; if there are any such limits they are physical, mental and moral—by that I mean the physical limits of our resources and the mental and moral capacity of Canadians to bear burdens and make sacrifices.

However, in obtaining whatever it is possible for our man-power, equipment and resources to produce or procure, it is certainly wise to adopt the most intelligent means of financing that effort. Plans already laid and approved by this house call for defence expenditures of $700 million. As I shall later explain, such a figure can only be provisional and not in any sense a limit. What concerns us this afternoon is to choose and determine what seem the wisest financial methods of paying for the maximum effort which is physically possible.

If an appropriate financial policy is not followed the ultimate result will inevitably be that the government will be frustrated in its attempt to procure goods for war purposes by the competition of consumers who seek to spend their increased buying power to satisfy civilian wants. In that event, also, the familiar spiral of rising prices, then rising wages and costs, and then prices rising still further would begin to work. Prices would rise more rapidly than wages and salaries, and, by this indirect, hidden and most inequitable process, the civilian population and particularly the wage and salary earners and the receivers of fixed incomes, would be forced to curtail their consumption not only of luxuries but of comforts and necessaries as well. Eventually in such a process our entire economic life would be disorganized; a hectic period characterized by feverish speculation, waste and extravagance would develop; and a collapse of the inflationary structure would be as inevitable as it was at the close of the last war.

The government's financial and economic policies have been so designed as to try to safeguard against that type of situation. They have been evolved with the aim to avoid unjustified price increases or speculative excesses, to keep our economy functioning as effectually as possible and to secure the necessary diversions of man-power, equipment and materials to war purposes in a way which would be the least dangerous to the economy and the most equitable as between different individuals and groups.

We recognize clearly that we still have unemployed man-power and resources, that mobilizing them into productive work will expand the national income, and that by expansion of the national income we can add enormously to the magnitude of our war effort. Consequently our policies have been and are being directed to the end of producing soundly the maximum possible increase in our national income in the shortest possible time.

I have already told you of the part played by our financial policy thus far. My colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), has already given you some indication of the steps which he has taken to organize the industrial resources of this country, to meet the expanding war demands of ourselves and our allies. In this connection the measures which he is taking are expanding daily.

In the relief estimates which have been tabled there is provision for the rehabilitation of unemployed workers and the technical training of young men and women.

There is every likelihood in my opinion that the expenditure of $700 million, and more, for war purposes plus the very large amounts which the United Kingdom is spending in this country will bring us before very long to the point when everyone able and willing to work and not needed for military service will find an opportunity for productive employment.

Already we can see evidence that shortages have appeared in certain types of skilled labour. To overcome this obstacle we must have the cooperation of Canadian employers in providing the necessary apprenticeship and other training, and of our labour organizations in facilitating the necessary entrance of young men into their trades. We must not allow bottlenecks to develop and retard our armament programme in this supreme emergency. Plans are under way to meet such possible dangers, and the government is confident that it can count upon the hearty cooperation of both employers and employees in thus promoting the maximum efficiency of our war effort. Maximum efficiency, maximum production, maximum speed, must be the supreme objective of all of us to-day.

I have only touched upon some of the measures that have been taken to increase the national income. To the extent that we can increase the national income, we can increase our war power without crippling sacrifice in our standard of living. Some reduction in personal consumption there must necessarily be, and it can easily be made by those of us who are above the minimum standard of living.

To sum up: In the measures which I shall propose we are endeavouring to ensure that at least a very large proportion of the increase in national income shall be diverted to war purposes while, at the same time, leaving sufficient stimulus to bring the country as rapidly as possible to the maximum use of its labour, its plant and its resources. In this connection it will be seen that many of our tax proposals will not require immediate payment and that much of the planned-for increase in revenue will not be called for during the present fiscal year.

One feature of our economic activity since the outbreak of war, which is of special concern and deserves special mention here, is the great increase in our imports. Most of these increased imports have had to come from countries outside the British empire, mainly because Britain herself, pressed by her own needs, has been unable to supply them.

In normal times we are able to use any excess receipts from our trade with one country to meet any deficits in our trade with another. At this time, however, when Britain has such vital need of gold and United States dollars to purchase planes and other war equipment, we cannot expect her to settle all her trade balance with us in gold or foreign exchange. Consequently, while there has been, since the war began, a substantial increase in our favourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom, a very large proportion of the surplus sterling exchange which we obtain and which formerly we were able to convert into United States dollars in order to meet any adverse balance of payments with that country can no longer be so converted.

Since the United Kingdom could not supply us with goods to pay for all her purchases here, and since, as I have just explained, the sterling with which she was able to pay for these purchases could not be converted into dollars in the normal way, other measures were necessary. The Canadian government undertook to buy and use this sterling in buying Canadian securities from Britain and thus to provide our exporters with Canadian dollars in payment of their exports. While such purchases of Canadian securities held in London will strengthen our long-run financial position on international account, nevertheless two immediate problems face us. In the first place, our domestic market must absorb new securities to a corresponding amount. In the second place, the fact that the surplus sterling arising from our trade with Britain cannot be converted into United States dollars and must be used up by repatriation of securities means that our increased sales to Britain do not help us, as they would in normal times, to pay for the heavy imports of which I have spoken from non-empire countries. The result is that we must find from some other source the United States dollars needed to pay for the greater part of our imports from that country.

To illustrate this exchange problem, let me give in a little more detail the trend of our war-time import and export trade. Comparing the eight months of war ending April, 1940 with the corresponding eight months ending April 1939, Canadian imports from non-Empire countries increased by $171 million, while our exports for the same period to non-Empire countries increased by only $86 million. In other words, an adverse merchandise balance of only $18 million in the 1938-39 period had increased to an adverse balance of $102 million in the 1939-40 period. These figures cover only merchandise trade. There are, of course, other important items which increase our net credits in our accounts with non-empire countries, namely, the export of gold, the expenditures of tourists in Canada, and the curtailment, due to the prompt establishment and efficient operation of the Foreign Exchange Control Board, of the export of capital from Canada. There has also been a small but encouraging inflow of capital from the United States. Nevertheless, it is obvious from an examination of these trade figures that rising business activity and expanding consumer expenditures in conjunction with failure of empire sources of supply have led to a very great increase in our adverse balance with non-empire countries.

More recently, and despite the utmost care in selecting as far as possible Canadian sources of supply, the government's war orders have contributed directly and indirectly to this increase in imports from hard currency countries. It is apparent that already there has developed, between consumers and private business on the one hand, and the government and firms supplying government orders on the other, an active competition for foreign exchange with which to purchase imports. The problem of policy thus posed is not one of maintaining an exchange rate. The powers of the Foreign Exchange Control Board are quite adequate to do that. The problem is to ensure that, in handling the supply of foreign exchange which may be, from time to time, available, war requirements shall take priority over other requirements, and that to some degree also the requirements of industries which are exporting goods and therefore assisting us to acquire foreign exchange, shall take priority over the requirements of domestic trade. I have dealt with this aspect of our exchange position at some length because it furnishes the background for some of the proposals which we intend to make.

But before I leave this subject of foreign exchange I should say just a word regarding our system of foreign exchange control. Within a week of our declaration of war, the Foreign Exchange Control Board was established and given the necessary powers subject to the direction of the Minister of Finance, to regulate all foreign exchange transactions between residents of Canada and the outside world. Detailed plans for the establishment and operation of such a board has been prepared in advance, in case it should be needed, and, once the need was apparent, the Board swung into effective action very quickly. The Board immediately took over as its initial resources the exchange fund which was created under the Exchange Fund Act of 1935. Subsequently on April 30th an order was made requiring all Canadian residents to sell their holdings of foreign exchange to the Foreign Exchange Control Board before the first of June. Those who in complying with the order could demonstrate a need for foreign balances in order to carry on their normal business transactions, such as commercial and insurance companies doing business abroad, have been permitted by the board to retain such amounts as are considered necessary for this purpose. The private holdings of foreign exchange so transferred to the board were of course purchased at the official rates in Canadian dollars. At the same time as these private balances were purchased, the government, by appropriate orders and transactions arranged to have the holdings of the board further increased by the transfer to the board by the Bank of Canada of the bank's gold reserves, also its reserves of foreign exchange over and above its short-term requirements and necessary working balances. The reason for all these transactions was the advisability of having all our liquid foreign resources centralized with, and managed by, the agency at present charged with the management of our foreign exchange transactions. Without going into details I can say that the main policy which has been followed by the board has been to restrict movements of capital out of Canada to the minimum while at the same time interfering as little as possible with import and export trade, the tourist trade, the payment of interest and dividends and the flow of normal, current business transactions. In carrying out its work, the board has received general and wholehearted cooperation from the people and business organizations of this country and, I may add, from the business organizations of the United States.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1939-40

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the government accounts for the fiscal year which closed on March 31. Following the procedure which was initiated last year by my predecessor, Mr. Dunning, I do not propose to weary the house with any extensive recital of the details of our revenues and expenditures, our direct and indirect liabilities, our active investments and our financing operations during the past year. All of these details I shall, when I conclude, table in the form of a white paper, in order that the house and the country may have a comprehensive record of our financial transactions during the year. As was the case last year, the white paper will be published as an appendix to the budget speech and therefore will be readily accessible. This procedure enables me to confine my remarks to summarized results rather than to burdensome details.

At the time of the September, 1939, budget, it was estimated that the total revenues for the fiscal year 1939-40 would be $516 million, including $21 million to be derived from new and increased taxes. Because business expanded more rapidly than was anticipated, the yield of both our old and new taxes has exceeded our expectations. It is now estimated that when our books for the year are closed, our total revenue will amount to $562 million. (This includes, it is true, a bookkeeping item of $20 million of credits to non-active accounts for which offsetting or contra items appear on the expenditure side of the statement.) The figure which I have given for total revenues represents an increase of nearly $47 million over the previous all-time record revenue which was received during the fiscal year 1937-38.

Dealing particularly with revenue from taxes, let me say that of the September, 1939, tax increases, only the luxury taxes were effective in the past fiscal year. Actual collections under the increased rates of the personal and corporation income taxes would not be made until the present fiscal year. The same is true of the excess profits tax. Nevertheless, tax revenues for the fiscal year 1939-40 are estimated to have been $468 million as compared with $436 million in the previous fiscal year. This increase in tax revenue, to which practically all taxes, except the income tax, contributed, was the result of increasing business activity and, in some cases, of increases in rates. Receipts from the income tax reflected the rates and the incomes of the calendar year 1938, and not the results of the accelerated business in 1939 which will be realized in the income taxes to be paid in the present fiscal year. Tax revenue from the first of September, 1939, to March 31, 1940, was $51 million in excess of the amount collected in the same period in 1938-39. This is a striking confirmation of the fact that the period which was expected to be commercially quiet and hesitant at the start at least, turned out in fact to be one of extremely active business and consumer buying.

Turning now to expenditures: In the September 1939 budget, total expenditures for the year would, it was estimated, aggregate approximately $651 million, not including the two items of capitalized defence expenditures and further losses in the marketing of wheat. Our total expenditures for last year are now estimated at $681 million. This includes all our defence expenditures and in addition a further $27 million incurred in wheat marketing. Once the war had begun, it seemed that conservative accounting could no longer justify the capitalization of defence expenditures as provided for in last year's estimates, and all such items have been charged to war expenditures. Furthermore, while at the close of the fiscal year there still remained unsold a small amount of wheat of the 1938 crop, it was clear that the losses of the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of the marketing of that crop would amount to at least $52 million. Therefore, an advance of this amount was made to the board and this enabled the board to pay off guaranteed bank advances to that amount in respect of 1938 wheat. As provision had already been made in the accounts of the year 1938-39 for setting up a reserve of $25 million in respect of possible losses in marketing this wheat, the difference between this sum and the advance of $52 million made to the Board, namely, $27 million, has as already indicated been included in the 1939-40 expenditures. When we add to our estimated expenditure of $651 million these two items of $27 million of capitalized defence expenditures and $27 million more for wheat losses, you will note that if we had spent what we estimated the total expenditure would have been $705 million. It will be seen, therefore, that since our actual aggregate expenditures were only $681 million we have done considerably better than was expected last September.

The figure of $681 million which I have given as representing our aggregate expenditures for the year may be broken down by main categories of expenditure as follows (using round numbers):

Ordinary expenditures	$398,000,000
Capital expenditures	7,000,000
Losses on and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises.
War expenditures	118,000,000
Other special expenditures including unemployment relief and wheat losses
Other charges	26.000.000

In the above item of "other special expenditures", the amount for unemployment relief, relief works and western drought area relief totalled $62 million as compared with $47 million during the preceding year. This includes a net expenditure of $7.5 million under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Under "government-owned enterprises", the main item of expenditure was the net income deficit of the Canadian National Railway, which amounted to slightly over $40 million as compared with $54 million for the preceding year. This substantial decrease is a reflection of improved business conditions and heavier traffic movement, particularly during the latter part of the year. A fact to be noted with considerable satisfaction is that while operating revenues increased by 11.8 per cent, the heavier traffic was carried with an increase in operating expenses of only 3.8 per cent.

The net result of the year's receipts and outgoings is that, because our revenues were about $46 million greater and our expenditures about $24 million smaller than were anticipated, our over-all deficit for the year will be about $70 million less than was expected. However, the actual deficit will still approximate $118 million, as compared with $51 million in 1938-39.

[Mr. Ralston.]

As a result of the over-all deficit of $118 million, the net debt of the dominion rose to approximately $3,270,980,000 as at March 31, 1940. Gross liabilities at that date are estimated at $4,028,573,000. On the other side of the balance sheet, offsetting these liabilities in part, the dominion had active assets, including cash on hand, sinking funds, and active loans and investments, amounting to $757,593,000.

At the close of the fiscal year there was outstanding unmatured direct funded debt (including treasury bills) amounting to $3,695,685,000, of which $67,196,000 were held in sinking funds against certain issues payable in London. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public aggregated $1,084,479,000 as at March 31, 1940. These guaranteed securities were decreased by $987,000 during the year. There are also outstanding certain other contingent liabilities arising out of guarantees given under relief acts and various other statutes. These are fully set out in the white paper which is being placed on Hansard.

It will also be of interest to hon, members to know that as at March 31st last the average rate of interest on the dominion direct funded debt (including treasury bills) was 3.40 per cent as compared with 3.52 per cent on March 31, 1939 and 5.02 per cent on March 31, 1930

BUDGET FORECAST, 1940-41

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to what is by far the most difficult part of my task. It is quite possible with reasonable assurance to analyse recent economic trends, to describe our fiscal policies and outline our financial operations for a year which has passed. But it is an entirely different matter, particularly under present circumstances, to forecast the future and to evolve and propose the measures which may be best calculated to meet conditions probably more unforeseeable than those of any period in our history. That, however, is a responsibility which one in my position must take and my task only differs in degree from that of my predecessors.

On the expenditure side, the estimates already tabled provide for a total expenditure on non-war activities of government of $448 million. As you know, these estimates represent a combination of the ordinary main estimates, the supplementary estimates and the special supplementary estimates which have been presented to the house in recent years. My hope is that it will not be necessary to ask parliament for any supplementary estimates for peace-time services of government, unless this parliament approves new undertakings not contemplated when our estimates were prepared.

Just here may I divert for a moment or two to mention the matter of economies in governmental peace-time expenditures. These are important because they release funds for war purposes.

If you will compare the figure I have given with the corresponding total of the estimated expenditures for the preceding fiscal year, you will find a reduction of over $77 million. That very large reduction reflects not only improvement in the operations of the national railways and in the relief situation but it is also the result of a good deal of painstaking examination and re-examination in all government departments in order to obtain the maximum economies in our departmental activities as well as to reduce or eliminate services which however justifiable in peacetime ought not to be regarded as absolutely vital in war-time. Our war effort has unquestioned priority; and the tremendous financial burden it will involve and the drain it will cause on the man-power, equipment and resources of the country make it vitally imperative that all governmental authorities-not only dominion, but-if I may go beyond federal bounds-provincial and municipal as well, should appraise with a sense of national responsibility the justification for the dollars proposed to be spent on normal activities. Every such dollar must, directly or indirectly, come out of the pockets of the people. And it ought almost to go without saying that to provide the enormous sums which must be spent by the dominion this year for defence, the ordinary expenditures of governments-all governments-in Canada must be decreased if they are not to restrict the amount that can be devoted to the driving task of defeating nazism. In the federal field, I have had the effective cooperation of my colleagues and their departmental officers in achieving the economies I have reported. The premiers or provincial treasurers of several of the provinces have discussed this problem with me and I have also had the opportunity of conferring with a number at least of the mayors of our cities and towns on the same subject. The attitude of them all was so instantly and definitely cooperative as to convince me that all that is necessary is that the position be understood to make certain that the response by all governmental authorities will be just as unhesitating and just as reassuring.

The chief difficulty which all governments face in reducing ordinary expenditures is the fact that usually so small a proportion of these expenditures is controllable and there is the further fact that significant reductions in these controllable expenditures involve throwing out of work large numbers of employees, many of them of long service and some without superannuation privileges of any kind. To give an example, the expenditures under our main estimates last year amounted roughly to $400 million. Of this amount $260 million represented what were regarded as absolutely uncontrollable expenditures; and by that I mean war pensions, old age pensions, subsidies to provinces, interest on funded debt, et cetera. This left only $140 million out of which savings might be made and of this amount $80 million was for salaries and wages. So that, apart from discharging government employees, there was only the sum of $60 million covered by those main estimates which might be subjected to reductions.

Fortunately, the development of the war programme has made, and will increasingly make possible the absorption of such persons in war activities. For some time we have had an inter-departmental committee at work to examine into and provide for the transfer of such personnel. As the house knows, there have been eliminated during the present year all ordinary public works of a capital character: but the opportunities for employment resulting from the war programme will make possible, and the demands of the war programme will, I believe, make it necessary that labour and resources should be released from the construction of these public works, most of which have in recent years been provided for primarily to alleviate unemploy-

With that interjection on economies I return to my forecast.

To our estimated expenditure for normal purposes of $448 million must be added whatever will have to be spent during the year for war purposes. Parliament has already approved a war appropriation amounting to the sum of $700 million, more than four times what was spent in the corresponding fiscal year of the last war.

Combining these two figures gives us a total of $1,148 million. But even this huge sum may not, and almost certainly will not, represent the total of our expenditures for the current fiscal year. Events are moving with lightning speed. Plans are having to be reshaped and extended almost daily, and no man can foretell what we will be called upon to provide in the next nine months. As you know, since the War Appropriation Act was passed with its grant of $700 million for war purposes, we have made heavy additional commitments and these are constantly having to be added to. There will be some offsetting factors to these new obligations. There were some commitments in our earlier estimates which may not be required due to possible alterations in military formations which depend on the nature of the duties for which they may be needed. There will be certain modifications because in some cases the estimates were based on a rate of replacements assumed to be required by active warfare in France. There will be other items which will be superseded by the emergent measures of the last few weeks.

There are many factors which make even approximate calculation very difficult, but to give the house the roughest sort of idea, I would think that we are already committed for probably another $150 to $200 million for the fiscal year, and that such reductions as may take place in our original estimates due to changes in plans will probably be more than offset by further undertakings.

Turning now to make a forecast of our revenue, our estimate is that, assuming a continuance of present trends and no serious interruption of our export trade, our total revenues for the present fiscal year on the basis of our existing tax structure will amount to approximately $650 million. This estimate is made up as follows:

Tax revenue Customs duties. Excise duties. Sales tax. Other excise taxes. Income taxes. Excess profits tax (to be superseded). Bank note circulation and insurance companies taxes.	83,000,000 170,000,000 30,000,000 166,000,000
Total tax revenue		$583,000,000
Non-tax revenue Post office receipts. Interest on investments. Miscellaneous	$ 37,500,000 13,500,000 16,000,000
Total non-tax revenue		$ 67,000,000
Total ordinary revenue		$650,000,000

Our ordinary expenditures and the amount already authorized by parliament for war purposes total, as I have said, $1,148 million. We are faced, therefore, with a probable deficit, on the basis of our present tax structure, of at least $498 million plus an indeterminate amount which may easily bring that deficit up to $700 million. Consequently, it is necessary to answer boldly and realistically two questions:

First, what part of this probable deficit is to be met by taxation, and what part by borrowing?

The same question can be put in different terms. How can we take out of the rising national money income of this country funds for the purposes of war as rapidly as, but not more rapidly than, resources, equipment and labour can be diverted for those purposes? Or, at what rate should this diversion of funds be accomplished so that the output of our industry and of our man-power shall be expanded to the limit?

The second question which has to be answered is: How can the budgetary policy of the government help to conserve foreign exchange?

Neither the house nor the people of this country will expect financial miracles. They [Mr. Ralston.]

have a right, however, to expect that the financial measures recommended shall be appropriate to the critical situation in which the country finds itself and shall ensure a mobilization on the economic front which will achieve the very maximum effort of which this country is capable.

To answer the second question first:

I now outline the fiscal measures for promoting the conservation of foreign exchange. There will be two measures submitted with that definite purpose in view.

First, it is proposed that a war exchange tax of 10 per cent shall be imposed on the value for duty purposes of all imports, free and dutiable, from non-empire countries. The tax will be subject to drawback for export as in the case of customs duties.

The government is aware that there may possibly arise the odd case of real hardship where materials or parts used by Canadian producers will be subject to this tax while the finished products, entering tax free under the British preferential tariff, will actually compete with the Canadian-made finished product to such an extent that the 10 per cent exchange tax may make it impracticable commercially for the manufacturer of the finished product to continue production. Such cases if they are established can be dealt with under existing machinery relating to the remission of taxes. They will, it is safe to predict, be very few because the apparent trade advantage given to imports from Great Britain by this tax is small in comparison with the handicaps which the higher costs of war-time production in Britain and of ocean transportation will impose on such imports.

Though the purpose of this tax is primarily to conserve exchange, it is estimated that it will be productive of considerable revenue. The estimate is that in the first full year of operation it will yield $65 million, of which $50 million will be collected in the present fiscal year.

As this is intended as an exchange tax and not a protective duty, power will be taken to prevent unjustified increases in prices as a result of this tax. The policing of price increases will be under the war-time prices and trade board and any attempt to take advantage of the tax to increase prices other than to the extent justified by an increase, resulting from the tax, in the cost of raw materials or parts entering into the product, can be dealt with by appropriate measures applicable to the industry or the individual as the case may be. It would merely add to the postwar problems of adjustment if industry made plans for permanent production in Canada on the assumption that this special exchange tax would be permanent.

The other exchange measure relates to automobiles, both imported and domestic. It is proposed that, in place of the present small excise tax on automobiles of 5 per cent on the value in excess of $650, there be substituted a heavier tax on new passenger automobiles, steeply graded so as to be, it is expected, virtually prohibitive of the purchase of higher priced cars. It is this class of automobile which accounts for the major part of our imports of finished cars, and in so far as they are produced in Canada, they require the importation of parts and materials in higher proportion than the lower priced cars. This tax will effectively help to prevent the drain on our foreign exchange which these imports cause. The proposed rates of excise tax to be imposed on the manufacturers' price of Canadian-made automobiles and on the duty-paid price of imported automobiles are as follows:

On the value up to $700 .... 10 per cent
On the excess over $700 and up to $900 ..... 20 per cent
On the excess over $900 and up to $1,200 ..... 40 per cent
On the excess over $1,200 .... 80 per cent

This tax, which is on sales by manufacturers and importers, will extend to cover also sales by dealers of new and unused cars now in dealers' hands.

It can hardly be argued that there is any undue sacrifice imposed on the Canadian citizen in asking him to postpone the purchase of higher priced cars for the duration of the war.

But the tax is not limited to higher priced cars; it falls, in a decreasing scale, on lower priced cars most of which are made in Canada but have a certain percentage of imported content. Productive capacity in Canada, and I believe also in the United States, will be more and more taken up with work on war equipment. Our production of automobiles will necessarily therefore be restricted if war work is to have priority. While not at the moment cutting off all production of passenger cars, this tax will, it is believed, restrain the demand and tend to keep it in balance with lowered production without causing the increase in price which might result from curtailed productive capacity and unrestrained demand. It is expected that any surplus of labour either in manufacturing establishments or in garages occasioned by this tax will be absorbed by war needs for the production and servicing of mechanical transport and other equipment.

Here again, then, the primary purposes of the tax are to save exchange and to release productive capacity for war purposes without dislocation of industry. Revenue is only incidental and will be comparatively small. It is anticipated that in the first full year of taxation it will yield $3,500,000 in revenue, of which $1,500,000 will be collected in the present fiscal year.

In addition to these two substantive measures of a fiscal character for conserving exchange the government through the policies of the Department of Munitions and Supply and through the operation of administrators appointed under the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, is also endeavouring to save foreign exchange in its own operations, and it may, from time to time, in respect of certain classes of civilian imports, take other measures of a non-fiscal character for the purpose of meeting this vital need as circumstances seem to require.

I should add here that there is one important way in which our supplies of foreign exchange may be increased. Canada is fortunate in the strength and extent of her gold mining industry which in the last eight years has shown such a rapid expansion. Further expansion of output is the most immediate and important means at hand for directly augmenting our supplies of foreign exchange, and I think I can appeal with confidence to those engaged in producing gold to put forward every effort to increase their production as rapidly as possible

In this connection I am glad to acknowledge assurances already from a number of important companies that it will be their policy to step up production as far and as fast as conditions permit. I realize that the rate of increase which is practicable will vary with the differing conditions at different mines, but I feel sure that the directors of each enterprise in the industry will review their situation and adjust their production policy in the light of the present need.

Even larger than our gold as a source of foreign exchange is the tourist industry that Canada has built up over many years. This year, the government provided for an increased appropriation to promote the expansion of this activity, but its effects may be at least partly offset by misinformation and misunderstandings regarding recent regulations and by unfounded rumours that have been circulated. Nearly every Canadian can help to increase our receipts of foreign exchange by stamping out these mischievous rumours and by encouraging our friends in the United States to visit us in Canada. This country is ready and anxious "to be a good host to a good neighbour".

We all should take particular pleasure in seeing that friendly visitors to this country are treated with the courtesy and cordial interest due to good and sympathetic neighbours, and that they are made to feel that we appreciate their coming. At no time have our friends from south of the border been more welcome, and we shall do everything we can to see that their coming to us and their stay with us is made as convenient and comfortable and enjoyable as it possibly can be. We want them to go back with the happiest recollections of their neighbourly visit to Canada.

The result of the two fiscal measures which I have outlined, namely, the war exchange tax and the automobile tax, will not be to reduce our total imports of merchandise from non-empire countries, of which the chief is, of course, the United States. As a matter of fact, these imports will, due to our war requirements, be greater than ever, but the important result of these measures will be that out of the total supply of foreign exchange which we can obtain by the export of our products, by the export of gold, by the sale of our tourist services, the maximum possible amount shall be made available for those purchases abroad of industrial materials, machinery and instruments of war which the imperious needs of war dictate.

As I have explained, these proposals for conserving exchange are dictated by the conditions of the present emergency. Needless to say, we regret that the exigencies of war make any such restrictive action necessary, and our fervent hope and firm resolve are that at the earliest possible moment we may be able to return to the long-run policy of this government, which is that of the progressive lowering of trade barriers and the encouragement of trade not only with the United States but with all peaceful nations. The government remains in fullest accord with the trade agreements programme in which Canada has cooperated with the United States, Great Britain and other countries, and has no intention or desire to alter by these emergency measures the permanent channels of trade.

The war exchange tax is peculiarly an emergency measure. It is of the type provided for by the war clause of the Canada-United States Trade Agreement, and action is taken under that clause. The operation of this proposed measure will, accordingly, end with the war.

I now come to the measures designed primarily for revenue. The first one is a new Excess Profits Tax Act. At the brief session of last September, parliament enacted a statute of this type. Under that legislation, a business to which the tax applied had the option to be taxed on either of two bases. Under option A, the tax was graduated according to the rate of return on capital. Under option B, the tax was fifty per cent of the excess of profits in the taxable year over those of a four-year pre-war base period. The tax was payable only in respect of profits of the year 1940 and fiscal years ending after March 31, 1940. Up to the present, no taxes have been collected under this act because the tax is not payable until four months after the end of a firm's fiscal year.

As I have already stated, this act was quickly drafted and placed on the statute book last fall in order to indicate one of the forms of war taxation which the government was adopting. In the brief time available it was impossible to give this form of taxation, new to Canada, the intensive and detailed study required to envisage its application under the varying conditions existing here. On further examination one main feature which appeared to be undesirable was the right of the taxpayer to choose between the two options. In the light of actual conditions it was found that many established firms would pay little or no tax, while others which had not been in business prior to the war, or had been operating in a depressed industry, or were undergoing rapid expansion, would be subject to what appeared to be unwarranted discrimination. There were many other situations both of substance and administration which required review. And so since the passing of the act in September the measure has been thoroughly overhauled and, as I intimated publicly over four months ago, very extensive amendments will be proposed and we have decided to recast the whole act. The new measure will be much more drastic but at the same time its application as between various industries and firms will be far more equitable.

I shall not attempt to summarize all the changes to be effected by the bill which will be submitted, but I should outline some of the main features of our proposals:

- (1) Option A will be dropped altogether and we will instead rely wholly on the general principle of the British act which was also the principle followed in option B of the old act. On this basis we will increase the tax from 50 per cent to 75 per cent on the excess of profits in any taxable year over those earned in the base or standard period.
- (2) In order to ensure that no profitable business will escape taxation, it is proposed that in no case of an incorporated company shall the excess profits tax, when combined with the corporate income tax, be less than 30 per cent of the company's total profits, whether or not such profits exceed pre-war profits. It will be remembered that the corporation income tax is 18 per cent.

The same result is achieved in the case of unincorporated businesses by provision that the excess profits tax shall never be less than 12 per cent of the total profits, whether or not such profits exceed pre-war profits.

- (3) There will be a number of provisions for adjusting the base or standard profits in the case of newly established businesses, businesses whose capital employed or whose scale of operations has been or is rapidly expanding, and businesses operating in depressed industries whose base years show losses or abnormally small profits.
- (4) In order that firms may not receive discriminatory treatment because their fiscal years happen to end on different dates it will be recommended that the tax in respect of all businesses shall apply to profits earned on and after the same date, namely, January 1, 1940, regardless of the expiry date of their fiscal year.
- (5) The tax will not apply to businesses whose profits are not in excess of $5,000, and allowance will be made for drawings in lieu of salaries not in excess of $5,000 by sole proprietors or partners.

(6) To assist in carrying out these provisions fairly and realistically, the appointment of a board of referees will be proposed.

(7) In connection with the gold mining and the oil producing industries a different basis of adjusting base or standard profits appears necessary to deal with new and expanding companies. In the present emergency, as I stressed a little earlier, it is considered desirable to encourage the development of these natural resources, particularly because of their effect in directly increasing our supplies of hard currency exchange or in decreasing our requirements therefor.

These industries also require the risking, and very often the losing, of large amounts of capital in exploratory and development work before production commences. The results obtained from these expenditures are inherently erratic, depending on the possibility of a "lucky strike." If a "strike" is eventually made, increases in the scale of production or recovery are not closely related to increases in the amount of capital employed.

Consequently, for the purpose of adjusting standard profits in the case of expanding operations, the basis used will be not capital employed but number of units of output. In the case of a new development, standard profits will be calculated by taking into account the number of units of output in the taxable year and the average price of the product during the base period.

All companies in the gold mining or oil producing industries (except companies exempted temporarily from corporate income tax under section 89 of the Income War Tax Act) will, however, as in the case of all other companies, pay in excess profits tax and corporate income tax combined a minimum of 30 per cent of the total profits, whether or not such profits exceed pre-war profits.

You can readily appreciate how difficult it is to forecast the yield of a tax such as this, but our rough estimate is that in a full year's operation the excess profits tax will yield about $100 million, of which approximately $25 million will be collected during the current fiscal year.

The next revenue measures proposed apply to individuals. They are:

First, sharp increases in the personal income tax by a revision upwards of rates throughout the whole range of taxable incomes and a lowering of exemptions;

Second, an over-riding flat rate tax, collectable at the source in most cases, in respect of all taxable incomes and including lower incomes than those covered by the income tax itself.

I will deal first with our proposals relating to personal income tax. This is the tax which in principle most nearly approximates ability to pay. We realize that increases in indirect taxes disguise the burdens imposed by the war but they are much more likely to distribute these burdens harshly and unfairly. While increases in such taxes may eventually be necessary, we are striving in this budget to deal with the situation (except in the case of particular commodities or where exchange considerations make special measures necessary) by a direct call on our citizens graded according to their means and responsibilities. We believe that a straightforward assessment of the contribution to the common cause will be loyally accepted and paid as a small price for the preservation of our liberties. Following out that principle, the government has, therefore, decided to submit not an increase in the sales tax but heavy increases in the direct tax on individual incomes.

In establishing the new rates, we have been limited by two insistent considerations. It would be popular, if it were practicable and possible, to pay the stupendous costs of war by imposing taxes only on those earning higher incomes. The stubborn fact is there is not enough income in the so-called higher brackets to produce more than a small fraction of the necessary revenue.

On the basis of 1938-39 figures, the latest which are available, the total of all incomes above $50,000 was only $35 million, and, under present rates, the tax on these would amount to $20.5 million leaving only $14.5 million available for provincial and municipal taxes and any further taxation by the dominion—to say nothing of living expenses and personal obligations. Similarly, in the group from $25,000 to $50,000, the aggregate income was only $32 million, of which taxes at the present rates would take about $10.8 million, leaving only $21.2 million. Finally, it has to be noted that the total assessed income of all persons liable to income tax in the year 1938-39 was only $730 million, and if we took from all these people the whole of their incomes in excess of $2,000 a year we should obtain only $114.5 million more than we would get on these incomes at existing tax rates. When we compare these disappointing amounts of aggregate income available in these various income brackets, however drastically we might tax it, with the $700 millions and upwards of war expenditure, to say nothing of the further expenditures of $448 million on ordinary account, it is clear that we cannot go far to meet the costs of the war simply by taxing large incomes, or even those of moderate size.

The second consideration is that the dominion is not the only taxing authority levying steeply graduated rates on large incomes. Every province in Canada, except Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, now levies income taxes and in certain cities taxpayers must pay municipal income taxes as well as provincial income taxes. Ontario, Manitoba, and Prince Edward Island are the only provinces which allow, as a deduction from income, the tax paid to the dominion. All these authorities tax at different rates. This means that unless we are prepared to be entirely arbitrary and unfair and to set up schedules of rates which when added to the rates imposed by other taxing authorities would be nothing short of fantastic, the dominion must, in fixing its schedule of rates, take cognizance of the highest schedule of rates effective in any province. This is but an instance of the chaotic situation in the fiscal systems of Canada to which the Sirois report has drawn attention and which, I regret to say, appears to be getting worse rather than better.

There will, however, be no class in the community which will not recognize the necessity of bearing some part of the war burden. In the past our exempton limits have been considerate, to say the least. No income tax whatever has been paid by the single person receiving less than $1,000 per year or by the married person receiving less than $2,000 per year. In addition, the married person got a further exemption of $400 for each child. Our rates of tax in the low and middle income groups have been low, very low indeed as compared with the rates on comparable incomes in the United Kingdom. While the increases in rates I have to propose will be substantial when expressed as a percentage of the comparatively low taxes formerly paid, the increase in the dollar amount per individual is not unduly large and will, I am confident, not be regarded as an undue burden when contributed to meet the situation which faces us all.

It is proposed that exemptions under the graduated Income Tax-that is, our present personal income tax act-which, as I have said, are at present $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons, be reduced to $750 and $1,500 respectively. The exemption for each dependent child is left, as at present, at $400. Under the proposed rates, the taxpayer, on the first $250 in excess of the exemption, will pay 6 per cent instead of the present initial rate of 3 per cent. On the next $750 of income the proposed rate is 8 per cent, and on the next $1,000 in excess of exemptions 12 per cent, and so on upwards. In the past dependence on indirect taxation has left incomes which were just above the exemption limits taxable at very low rates, and, hence, the increases are necessarily proportionately greater on the groups receiving incomes between the exemption limit and, say, $10,000, than on those receiving higher incomes Nevertheless, the rates on high incomes already steeply graduated, have also been increased as much as we consider they can practicably be increased, having regard to the taxes levied on these same incomes by certain provinces and municipalities.

I may add that we have at the same time simplified the structure of income tax rates by doing away with the old 5 per cent surtax and the 20 per cent war surtax imposed last fall and substituting therefor a schedule of higher rates throughout the whole range of incomes.

I come now to the second revenue measure applicable to individuals—and I think I should deal with this measure and then give the house illustrations of how the two measures combined work out in connection with individual incomes:

To supplement the graduated income tax we propose a national defence tax at a flat rate applicable to all incomes above $600 for single persons and above $1,200 for married persons. The rate of tax for married persons will be 2 per cent if the income exceeds $1,200, and for single persons the rate will be 3 per cent if the income exceeds $1,200 and 2 per cent if the income exceeds $600 and is not more than $1,200. But there is a proviso that in no case will the income of the taxpayer be reduced below $600 or $1,200 as the case may be. For dependent children, a deduction from tax equal to the rate of 2 per cent on the usual $400 exemption for each dependent child is to be allowed. Thus, a married person with an income of $1,400 and three dependent children would be liable to a tax of $28 (2 per cent of $1,400) minus $24 in tax credits for children, leaving $4 as the tax payable.

As far as it is administratively practicable this tax will be collected at the source. Thus employers will deduct the tax from the employee's earnings when the pay is at the rate of $600 per year in the case of unmarried employees and $1,200 per year in the case of married employees, and companies will deduct the tax from dividends and interest on registered corporate bonds. In cases where the full amount payable has not been deducted and in all other cases where the annual income amounts to or exceeds the minimum amounts of $600 or $1,200, as the case may be, the taxpayer is required to make a return as in the case of the graduated income tax.

It is recognized that there will be a good deal of additional work for employers and their staffs in making deductions and returns, and provision will be made toward reimbursing employers for expenses so incurred. Employers, however, can by their cooperation and interest help greatly in working out the methods to be adopted and in making the system operate efficiently and fairly and with a minimum of inconvenience both to their employees and to themselves. I feel sure that under the circumstances we can count upon the full cooperation of employers in this additional task which they are called on to perform in the national interest at this time.

It might be useful if I now gave a few examples showing how the new income tax rates taken along with the national defence tax which I have briefly described will affect certain classes of taxpayers. Let us take the case of the single person, with no dependents, earning $800 a year. Under our existing income tax law he would not pay any income tax since he is at present exempt up to $1,000. Under the legislation just proposed, however, the $800 single man will be required to pay the national defence tax of 2 per cent of his total earnings which is $16, and under the income tax he would pay 6 per cent on the amount of his income in excess of $750, which is the new exemption figure for income tax purposes. This income tax would thus amount to $3 (6 per cent of $50). Consequently, his total tax per year would be $19 where previously he paid no tax.

A single man with no dependents earning $1,500 would pay $100 under the new proposals where he now pays only $18.

A married man with no dependents earning $2,000 is at present just on the exemption line, and pays no tax. Under the new set-up his tax bill will be $75.

Perhaps some hon, members would be interested in knowing how the new measures will affect the position of a married man with an income of $4,000 a year. Under our existing tax he pays $84; under the new measures he will pay $355. If he has two children he will pay $223 under these new taxes compared to $45.60 under the present tax. A single man with the same income now pays $144, and under the new measures he will pay $525.

To illustrate the effect of the changes in the case of higher incomes, a married man, with no dependents, having an income of $20,000, pays $3,112 under the present tax, and will pay $6,530 under the new taxes. With an income of $200,000 he pays the dominion $103,698 under the present rates, and under the new taxes he will pay $119,430 or 59.7 per cent of his income. Adding provincial and in certain cases municipal income taxes as well, we find that the latter married man with no dependents, if he lives in Ontario, will pay $129,679 or 64.8 per cent of his total income; if he lives in Montreal, he will pay $149,516 or 74.8 per cent of his total income; and if he lives in British Columbia, he will pay $170,425 or 85.2 per cent of his total income.

Let me give a few additional illustrations to show the relative burden of our new rates as compared with the British income tax rates. Take a married man with no dependents living in Ontario. If he receives an income of $1,000, he will pay no tax in Canada—that is, he is under the exemption limits provided for by the national defence tax ($1,200 for married men) and by the regular income tax ($1,500 for married men)-while his British cousin in like circumstances would pay $14.31. If his income is $1,500, he will pay 33 per cent of the amount he would pay in Britain; if it is $4,000, he will pay 46 per cent of the British tax; if it is $10,000 he will pay 71 per cent of the British tax; if it is $200,000 he will pay 86 per cent of the British tax; and finally, if he should have an income of $500,000, he will pay 94 per cent of what he would have to pay in Britain. If he happened to live in certain other provinces, his total tax would be a considerably higher percentage of the comparable British tax and in the higher brackets of income would in some cases exceed the United Kingdom tax. Thus, a married man with no dependents and an income of $50,000, living in Quebec, would pay 107 per cent of the British tax, and if he were living in British Columbia he would pay 114 per cent of the British tax. If his income were $200,000 he would pay 99 per cent of the British tax if he lived in Quebec, and 113 per cent of such tax if he lived in British Columbia.

It is anticipated that the increases in the income tax will contribute $58 million of new revenue in a full year of operation, but none of this will be available in the current fiscal year. It is estimated that the national defence tax will provide $35 million additional revenue in a full year but only $20 million in the current fiscal year. To make it quite clear let me emphasize that this national defence tax is the only direct tax imposed by the dominion on unmarried persons with incomes from $600 up to $750 per year and on married persons with incomes from $1,200 up to $1,500 per year. On incomes of $750 and up in the case of single persons and of $1,500 and up in the case of married persons, both the income tax and the national defence tax apply.

For the convenience of hon. members, I shall now table a statement showing for a number of different incomes the amount of tax payable to the dominion under the existing income tax, the amount payable under the new income tax rates and the national defence tax combined, the total amount payable to the dominion combined with the amount payable in each of the several provinces where income taxes are imposed, and the percentage of the British tax which a man living in Ontario would pay in dominion and provincial taxes combined:

It is on the foregoing taxes that we depend for the bulk of the necessary increase in revenue, but there are a number of other changes, some of which will contribute substantial sums to the treasury and some of which are proposed largely as readjustments of unsatisfactory situations.

Smokers' supplies are again made the subject of tax increases. It is proposed that the excise tax on matches shall be increased from three-quarters of a cent to one cent per hundred. It is further proposed that the excise tax on cigarettes weighing less than two and a half pounds per thousand shall be raised to $6 from the present rate of $5. The rate on manufactured tobacco is to be increased from 25 cents to 35 cents per pound. To prevent a substantial decline in the revenue from cigarettes and cut tobacco because of these high rates, it has been necessary to impose a tax of 10 cents a pound on the sale of raw leaf tobacco and to increase the tax on cigarette papers and tubes from 2 cents to 5 cents per hundred. The tax on raw leaf tobacco will only apply on sales to consumers. The grower may sell to the merchant or dealer or manufacturer without tax. The rates under the Special War Revenue Act on cigars will also be increased. It is estimated that in a full year these new or increased rates will yield $15,540,000 of new revenue, of which $11,680,000 will fall in during the present fiscal year.

It is proposed that the present excise tax on automobile tires and tubes shall be increased from 2 cents and 3 cents per pound respectively to 5 cents and it is anticipated that from this change $1,100,000 in revenue will be derived in a full year and $25,000 in the current year.

It is proposed that a new excise tax of 10 per cent will be imposed on radios, radio tubes, cameras and phonographs. While this is in the class of sumptuary taxes there is the further consideration that the resources used in the production of most of these products are of a type suitable for producing war supplies and it is expected that such manufacturing capacity as may be affected by any lessening or lack of increase in demand due to this tax will prove useful in war work. It is estimated that the approximate yield of this tax will be $1,500,000 in the full year and $1,100,000 in the current fiscal year.

There are proposed also a number of readjustments in taxes. Since the sales tax on dressed and dyed furs is imposed at the initial point of processing and not on the finished fur garment, it is proposed that the rate be 12 per cent rather than 8 per cent as at present in order more nearly to equalize this tax with the 8 per cent sales tax which is imposed on finished cloth garments. The present exemptions under the sales tax for home canners and for farmer florists are to be restricted to fixed quotas so as to facilitate administration in confining the benefit of the exemptions to bona fide farmers. The tax on carbonic acid gas which last September was proposed to secure revenue from the soft drink trade is to be increased from 2 cents to 5 cents per pound. These revisions, it is estimated, will yield $550,000 in the full year, and $415,000 in the current fiscal year.

In addition to the major features of the budget programme which I have outlined, there will also be found in the resolutions a number of proposed amendments to our taxing statutes which either involve tax changes of a minor nature or are designed to remove anomalies and facilitate administration. For instance, in the income tax resolutions there will be a provision for clarifying and extending the definition of income to cover payments made to life annuitants under purchased annuity contracts, and the exemption now accorded to dominion government and like annuities up to $1,200 per year will be removed in respect of all new contracts. Also in order to prevent evasion of either the income tax or the excess profits tax it is proposed to give power to the treasury board to rule in any specific case that a transaction or reorganization has been of a specious character designed to avoid or minimize taxes and that therefore the taxpayer should be assessed without regard thereto.

With regard to the customs tariff: five reports from the tariff board will to-day be laid on the table. The reports on cyanides and firebrick and the two on aircraft arise out of the reference made to the tariff board on December 5, 1938. This reference instructed the board to revise the whole of the drawback schedule. The items now being reported upon relate to industries connected with our war effort. The report on the radio industry reiterates most of the recommendations made in the earlier report on this subject presented to parliament during the first session of 1939 and provides for the widening of the scope of the existing tariff items covering parts and materials of radio receiving sets and radio tubes.

The tariff changes to be announced to-day, implement the recommendations of the tariff board as shown in the reports now tabled and apart from these affect only five commodities. One of the amendments proposed provides for duty-free entry of sodium nitrates, regardless of the purpose for which imported. This material is now being used in connection with the production of alloys for steel but the existing duty-free provision did not cover this use. Material for use in the manufacture of nicotine sprays will henceforth be admitted duty free. Forgings for the manufacture of scissors and shears will be admitted at the special rates now applicable to blanks for knives, forks and spoons. The proposed amendment of the item covering dressed lumber permanently removes an anomaly temporarily taken care of by an item due to expire on July 1, 1940. The only other tariff change provided for continues the reduced rates of duty that have applied for several years to imports of rayon fabric now being used in the manufacture of certain rubber tires.

The measure enacted during the special session last September, providing for additional duties of customs, is being amended. The additional duty on manufactured tobacco of all descriptions, except cigars, cigarettes and snuff, is increased from 5 cents per pound to 15 cents per pound, and the additional duty on cigarettes is increased from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ per thousand. These increases are necessary to correspond with the additional excise duties which I have announced as applicable to domestic tobacco items.

In the case of tea, while no change is being made in the actual rates of additional duties imposed last September, the value brackets are being lowered to bring a greater quantity of the imports of tea within the scope of the tax of 7½ cents per pound. Previously the lowest rate of tax, 5 cents per pound, was allowed where the value was less than 35 cents per pound. Under the proposed change only tea valued at less than 22½ cents per pound will be entitled to the low 5 cents per pound rate. The two remaining value brackets are also reduced accordingly.

I may summarize the results of the new and increased taxes which we are recommending by stating that we expect them to produce an increase in revenue of approximately $280 million for a full year. Of this total it is expected that about $110 million will be paid into the treasury during the balance of the current fiscal year. The house will realize how difficult it is under present conditions to predict with any degree of precision the yield of some of these new taxes. But I give below the results of such estimates as we have been able to make:

	Full year	Balance of current fiscal year
Excess profits tax	$100,000,000	$ 25,000,000
Graduated personal income tax	58,000,000	nil

and application of the control of th	$280,100,000	$110,500,000

Earlier this afternoon I estimated $650 million as the probable revenue for the present year without increases in taxes. Adding the $110 million which we expect to receive as a result of these new taxes, we get a total estimated revenue of $760 million. This may be increased somewhat as a result of prepayment of taxes because a number of individuals and corporations have already reported that they intend to make instalment payments in advance on account of their taxes which will not be due until next April. We can therefore take the figure of $760 million as a conservative estimate of our aggregate revenues.

Taking our expenditures at $1,148 million, our over-all deficit for the year would amount to $388 million, but that assumes that our war expenditures will not exceed the $700 million war appropriation already voted by parliament. There are still the further war commitments already made which I have roughly estimated at another $150 million to $200 million, and these will not be all. This means that in spite of the very heavy increase in taxes which I have proposed, it is not safe to count on an over-all deficit less than from $550 million to $600 million. This will be a staggering deficit, larger indeed than our total governmental expenditures during the depression years.

Whatever the total deficit may be, it will have to be met by borrowing except to the extent of cash on hand. We shall also have to raise funds to continue the repatriation programme which I have already described

If we assume that the amount on this account will be of the order of $200 million, we may conclude that our total cash requirements for the year will be roughly of the order of $750 million to $800 million. However, we began the year with cash in hand of approximately $187 million and as a result of the sale of war savings certificates and stamps we expect to raise during the balance of the year approximately $50 million. This would leave approximately $550 million to $600 million to be raised by the issue of new long-term loans. These are impressive sums but I know that they are not beyond the capacity of our markets to absorb under the conditions of expanding business and rising national income which I believe we have every reason to expect. I repeat, the limits of our war programme are not fiscal, but physical, mental and moral.

In the foregoing calculations I have, you will note, included in revenue only the yield of the new and increased taxes which we expect to be actually paid into the treasury before March 31st, namely, $110 million. But all our tax proposals relate to incomes, profits or transactions that will be earned or made during the current fiscal year. Not for the purpose of government accounting but in order to learn the answer to the question which I posed earlier this afternoon as to the relative reliance we intend to place on taxation and borrowing, it would be appropriate to take into account the total yield of our new or increased taxes, whether or not the proceeds will be actually received before the end of the fiscal year. On this basis we would add to the $650 million estimated as the probable total revenue from our existing tax structure during the year, the whole $280 million which is the expected yield of the new or increased taxes which I have proposed, making a total of $930 million instead of $760 million. This would mean that if our total war expenditures should amount to $900 million, the programme which we are proposing is designed to secure for such war expenditures from tax revenues the sum of $482 million (that is, the difference between the figure of $930 million I have just given and $448 million of anticipated government expenditures on non-war activities). As compared with this $482 million, there would be left a gap of $418 million to be financed by borrowing or by cash already in hand. I think the house will agree that a very serious effort is being made to carry the pay-as-you-go policy as far as is practicable. Of course, this comparison of the relative amounts to be provided by taxation and by borrowing will be less favourable if our war expenditures exceed $900 million.

It is natural, Mr. Speaker, that comparisons should be made between the new tax rates and rates previously levied, and such comparisons will reveal great increases, particularly in income taxes, corporation and personal. But there are some other considerations which should be remembered. In the first place, we have not, in the lower and middle brackets at least, come near to the levels of income tax imposed in the United Kingdom. In the second place, there is every likelihood that during the present fiscal year our national income may be expected to show a very substantial increase. The government will be pouring into the income stream many hundreds of millions of dollars, while much of the taxes payable under the measures we propose will not be withdrawn from incomes until late this year, or in some cases until next year. Thirdly, with rising incomes, taxes even of this degree of severity can be borne without deprivation, and their imposition at this time will avoid the necessity of still heavier increases in taxation in the days after the war when incomes may be falling.

Fourthly, to those who may have any fear of the effects of these taxes on business in this country, I say that businessmen and individuals alike must strain every nerve to meet the needs of this hour. The taxes herein imposed on business are heavy taxes, but for the most part they fall on profits, and the more we can find practical means of paying as we go, the more we will improve the longrun outlook for business as well as individual prosperity in this country.

The proposals, Mr. Speaker, which I have outlined are an attempt to help to meet the crisis in terms of taxation. They bear upon all classes in the community. If the taxation provisions are the most drastic which have ever been imposed upon this country, they are certainly no more drastic than the present hour and the present need demand. The future may well demand still more.

I ask those who think that they are too drastic to bring both their common sense and their idealism to the rescue of their opinions. Common sense will ask them what will become of their property or incomes if Germany and Italy should conquer the British empire. Idealism will teach them that money and material things are as nothing compared with the freedom and the dignity which it alone can bring as a benediction to the life of man.

At this time everything which we treasure and the survival of the things of the spirit and mind and soul which are the most precious of all, will depend upon the willingness and the capacity of men of our blood and kith and kin to endure and to die.

We who remember our fathers and know our sons have no cowardly doubts or weak misgivings.

I will not dishonour the word sacrifice by applying it to anything except the gift of life itself. But, knowing the Canadian people, I am confident that they will shrink from no contribution to insure to the soldiers and sailors and airmen of Britain and Canada all the machines and equipment which can be produced or procured.

The overwhelming majority of men and women of the sturdy races which make up Canadian citizenship are at their best in days of trial

A farmer offers me the total proceeds of his four-hundred acre wheat crop, and all the increases of his live stock for Canada's war

The wife of a small wage earner begs me to place a heavy income tax on her own small

A small industrial firm agrees to give all its profits for the duration of the war.

A veteran of 1914, with a disability pension of $47 a month as the sole income of a family of five, sends me all he has to give, a collection of old coins, and the caretaker of one of our militia armouries sends me $20 each month.

With such examples to challenge and inspire us, I cannot believe that any man in Canada will complain about his burden, or by greed, panic or selfish fear, betray his Canadian citizenship in the hour of Canada's need.

Britain is giving her blood, her treasure, her all. We proudly share her courage, her sacrifice and her unshakeable resolution. Britain will not fall. Freedom will not perish, and Canada will fail neither the commonwealth nor the cause.

RESOLUTIONS

20. That the resolution numbered 10 hereof be applicable to payments made after the 24th

June, 1940.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to reenact the Excess Profits Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the option of using rates "A" be deleted, and that the excess profits be the difference between the profits of the year of taxation and the profits of the standard or base period.

2. That the standard profits be determined with reference to the average profits of the standard or base period being the years, 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939, except as provided in resolution 5 hereof.

3. That the rate of tax on the excess profits be increased from fifty per centum to seventy-five per centum.

4. That on all profits a minimum tax be paid by every taxpayer under the Excess Profits Tax Act, such minimum to be a tax of twelve per centum on the total profits of the business before deducting income tax, and to be payable in all cases unless the tax provided in resolution 3 hereof is greater than the said minimum tax, in which case only the greater shall be paid.

5. That a board of referees (hereinafter called the board) be established with discretionary power, subject to the approval of the Minister of National Revenue (hereinafter called the minister), to ascertain a standard of profits for new businesses or businesses depressed during the standard period subject to the following:

(a) in the case of a business depressed during the standard period the minister may direct that the board ascertain a standard of profits at an amount which they think just, being a return of not less than five nor more than ten per centum of the capital employed;

(b) in the case of a new business other than well, if it has been commenced since January lst, 1938, the minister may direct that the board ascertain a standard of profits at an amount which they think just, provided that the said amount represents a rate of return on the capital employed by the taxpayer equal to the average rate of return of taxpayers in similar circumstances engaged in the same or analogous classes of business;

(c) in the case of a taxpayer engaged in the operation of a gold mine or an oil well which has come into production since January 1st, 1938, the minister may direct that the board ascertain a standard of profits at such an amount which they think just on the basis of a presumed volume of production during the standard period equal to the volume of production in the taystion were and a presumed. duction in the taxation year and a presumed selling price for the product during the standard equal to the average selling price of the said product during the standard period.

6. That the minister may adjust the standard profits so as to ensure the comparison of like with like in the following cases:

(a) where the accounting period in the taxation year is longer or shorter than the standard accounting period;

(b) where the capital employed in the taxation year has been substantially increased or decreased over that of the standard period by the contribution or withdrawal of capital;

(c) in the case of gold mines and oil wells where the volume of production in the taxation year has been substantially increased or decreased over that of the standard period.

7. That there be exempted from the tax imposed under the said act:

(a) small businesses where the profits before any salary or drawings by proprietors or share-holders do not exceed five thousand dollars per annum;

(b) personal corporations which act solely as investment-holding agencies of individual Canadian taxpayers;

(c) non-resident-owned investment corpora-

8. That sole proprietorships or partnerships be allowed to claim as a deduction such reasonable amount for salaries paid to the proprietor, or partners as the minister may determine, not to exceed five thousand dollars per year for each.

- 9. That in the case of a taxpayer who acquired a business as a going concern since January 1st, 1938, the minister may direct that the standard profits of the predecessor may be added to those of the taxpayer if the minister is satisfied that the trade or business of the predecessor and the taxpayer is not substantially different.
- 10. That the definition of average profits during the standard period be revised to provide that only the profits of the standard period shall be taken into account when determining the average of the years during the standard period when the taxpayer was in business.

11. That, in order to prevent evasion, power be given the minister to:

(a) disallow the deduction of disbursements by the taxpayer which the minister in his discretion may determine to be in excess of what is reasonable and normal for the business;
(b) assess without regard to specious transactions or reorganizations which the treasury board has found to have no reasonable business purpose other than that of avoidance or minimization of taxation.

12. That capital be redefined having regard to the cost price of the assets presently employed by the taxpayer less depreciation or depletion thereof, and deducting borrowed money and debts, with a proviso that non-productive assets, assets not actually employed in the production of profits, and assets producing tax-exempt income, shall not be included.

- 13. That there be allowed a tax credit in respect of the amount of excess profits tax or similar tax paid to the government of the United Kingdom or to the governments of other members of the British commonwealth of nations or to the governments of allies of the United Kingdom, if such governments allow a reciprocal credit for Canadian-paid excess profits tax.
- 14. That the act shall apply to the profits of the year 1940, and in the case of a fiscal period ending in 1940 prior to December 31, that the act shall apply to that proportion of the profits thereof which the number of days of the said fiscal period in the year 1940 bears to the total number of days of such fiscal period.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, and the amendments thereto and to provide,

- 1. That section seventy-six of the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:—
- "76. (1) Except as hereinafter provided, every manufacturer and every importer of matches shall affix to every package of matches manufactured by him or imported into Canada, an adhesive or other stamp of the value of one cent for each one hundred matches or fraction of one hundred matches contained in such package.
- (2) When matches are put up in packages containing not more than fifty matches and not less than thirty-one matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of one-half of one cent for each package, and when matches are put up in packages containing not more than thirty and not less than twenty-six matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of three-tenths of one cent for each package, and when matches are put up in packages containing not more than twenty-five and not less than twenty-one matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of one-fourth of one cent for each package and when matches are put up in packages containing less than twenty-one matches each, the tax shall be payable at the rate of one-fifth of one cent per package.
- (3) No manufacturer or importer shall sell or import matches unless they are in packages."
- 2. That subsection one of section seventyseven A of the said act be amended by providing that the excise tax on packets of cigarette papers be increased from two cents to five cents for each one hundred leaves or fraction thereof contained in such packet.
- 3. That subsection two of section seventy-seven A of the said act be amended by providing that the excise tax on packages of cigarette paper tubes be increased from two cents to five cents for each one hundred cigarette paper tubes or fraction thereof contained in each such package.
- 4. That subsection four of section eighty-six of the said act be amended by increasing the tax from eight per cent to twelve per cent upon the current market value of all furs dressed and/or dyed in Canada.

[Mr. Ralston.]

- 5. That the said act be amended by adding thereto after section eighty-eight the following section:
- "88A. (1) In addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this Act, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected a war exchange tax of ten per cent on the value for duty of all goods imported into Canada, payable by the importer or transferee who takes the goods out of bond for consumption at the time when the goods are imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption.

(2) The tax imposed by this section shall not apply to any goods imported into Canada,—

(a) which are entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff, or under trade agreements between Canada and other British countries;

- (b) Which are entitled to entry under Customs Tariff items 360, 460, 690, 690a, 696a, 700, 700a, 701, 702, 703a, 704, 705, 705a, 706, 707, 708, 709; or to fish caught by fishermen in vessels registered in Canada or owned by any person domiciled in Canada and the products thereof carried from the fisheries in such vessels.
- (3) Where the Wartime Prices and Trade Board reports to the government in council that any producer or producers of goods have taken advantage of the tax imposed by this section to increase the price of such goods by an amount greater than is justified by any increases properly arising from such tax in the cost of materials or parts entering into the production of such goods or to maintain prices of such goods at levels greater than are so justified, the Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the said Board, impose upon all or any of the products of any such producer an excise tax at a rate not to exceed ten per cent of the selling price of such products for such period of time as he may determine, remove or reduce customs duties applicable thereto for such period of time and/or take such other measures and impose such penalties as he may determine."
- 6. That the provisions of section eighty of the said act levying taxes on articles manufactured or produced in Canada enumerated in schedules I and II to the said act be amended to provide that the taxes mentioned therein shall apply at the time of delivery.
- 7. That schedule I to the said act be amended by repealing section one thereof and substituting therefor the following:—
- "1. (a) Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with seating capacity for not more than ten persons each, valued at

$700 or less............. 10 per cent. Over $700 but not more

Provided that the tax collected under paragraph (b) above shall in no case exceed $250 per automobile;

Provided further that the tax on automobiles shall apply on the total price charged for such automobiles, which price shall include all charges for accessories, optional equipment, servicing, financing, warranty or any other charge contracted for at time of sale, whether charged for separately or not, but not to include heaters or radios;

Provided further that the tax on automobiles shall apply to any such vehicles in transit to dealers or others;

Provided that if a new and unused automobile is on the twenty-fifth day of June one thousand nine hundred and forty in the hands of a dealer and not delivered to another purchaser the tax shall be paid by such dealer when such automobile is delivered.

Provided further that the tax shall not apply to automobiles imported:—

- (i) Under customs tariff items 702, 706, 707 and 708;
- (ii) by a bona fide settler on a first arrival;
  (iii) by a beneficiary resident in Canada, under the terms of a will of a person dying in a foreign country."
- 8. That schedule I to the said act be further amended by adding at the end thereof the following section:—
- 9. That schedule II to the said act be amended by repealing section one thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"Cigars:-

- (b) Valued at more than forty dollars per thousand and not more than one hundred and ten dollars per thousand, per thousand.....$6

- (e) Valued at more than two hundred dollars per thousand, per thousand...............$32

Provided that the value on imported cigars shall be the duty paid value as defined in section seventy-nine of this act; the value on cigars manufactured in Canada shall include the amount of excise duty payable thereon."

10. That schedule II to the said act be further amended by repealing section three thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

"Tires and tubes:-

(b) Inner tubes for use in any such tires...... 5 cents per pound

Provided the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to the goods mentioned herein when used exclusively for the original equipment of such automotive vehicles."

- 11. That schedule II to the said act be further amended by repealing section four thereof and substituting the following:—
- 12. That schedule III to the said act be amended by striking out under the heading of "Farm and Forest," in the eighth and ninth lines the following words:

"farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production,"

- and substituting therefor the following words:

  "farm produce sold by the individual farmer of his own production, not to include canned fruits or vegetables when produced in excess of 10,000 cans of one pound each or their equivalent, per annum, nor flowers, flowering plants or bulbs, when the sales thereof exceed $500 per annum."
- 13. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fifth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty, and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Schedule to the Excise Act, 1934, and to provide:—

- 1. That the duty of excise on malt syrup as defined by paragraph (c) of section six of the Excise Act. 1934, when imported into Canada and entered for consumption be increased from twenty-one cents per pound to twenty-five cents per pound.
- 2. That the duty of excise on tobacco of all descriptions manufactured in Canada, except cigarettes, be increased from twenty-five cents per pound to thirty-five cents per pound actual weight.
- 3. That the duty of excise on cigarettes manufactured in Canada which was formerly $5 per thousand when weighing not more than three pounds per thousand be increased to $6 per thousand when weighing not more than two and one-half pounds per thousand.
- 4. That the duty of excise on cigarettes manufactured in Canada which was formerly $11 per thousand when weighing more than three pounds per thousand shall now apply to cigarettes weighing more than two and one-half pounds per thousand.

2. Resolved, that schedule A to the Customs Tariff, as amended, be further amended by deleting from The Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, being chapter two of the statutes of 1939 (second session), the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

"Manufactured tobacco of all descriptions except cigars, cigarettes and snuff-5 cents per Cigarettes weighing not more than three pounds per thousand—$1 per thousand.

Tea, when the value for duty thereof under the provisions of the Customs Act:

(a) is less than 35 cents per pound-5 cents per pound.

(b) is 35 cents or more but less than 45 cents per pound—7½ cents per pound.

(c) is 45 cents or more per pound—10 cents per pound."

and by substituting therefor the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

"Manufactured tobacco of all descriptions except cigars, cigarettes and snuff-15 cents per pound.

Cigarettes weighing not more than pounds per thousand—$2 per thousand.

Tea, when the value for duty thereof under the provisions of the Customs Act:

- (a) is less than 22½ cents per pound—5 cents per pound.
- (b) is  $22\frac{1}{2}$  cents or more but less than 30 cents per pound— $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound.
- (c) is 30 cents or more per pound—10 cents per pound."
- 3. Resolved, that schedule B to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking thereout tariff items 1042, 1044 and 1063.
- 4. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions to amend the Customs Tariff or schedules thereto shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fifth day of June, nineteen hundred and forty, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

REVENUES, 1939-40

- 3. The total revenues of the dominion from taxation and other sources, not including $20,292,000 of credits to non-active account which necessarily appears also on the expenditure statement, aggregated $541,803,000. This represents an increase of $26,952,000 or 5·2 per cent over the previous all-time record revenue received in the fiscal year 1937-38. Compared with last fiscal year, 1938-39, the increase was $42,490,000, or 8·5 per cent.
- 4. Total revenue from taxation amounted to $467,685,000, an increase of $31,978,000 over that collected in the previous year. With the exception of (1) income tax, and (2) manufacturers', importations, stamps, transportation taxes, etc., the main sources of taxation recorded substantial increases over last fiscal year. These increases arose out of taxation changes effected by the emergency budget of September 12, 1939 and improvement of business conditions generally.
- 5. The sales tax replaced income tax as the largest single revenue producer. Receipts from this tax totalled $137,446,000, an increase of $15,307,000 over 1938-39. This increase was due in part to improvement in general business activity and in part to the removal from the schedule of exemptions of electricity and gas used for domestic purposes, salted or smoked meats and canned fish, as provided for in the budget of September 12, 1939.
- 6. Income tax receipts totalled $134,449,000, a decline of $7,577,000 from that collected in the previous year. This decline was principally in the collections of the tax on corporation incomes based on 1938 earnings. Of the receipts, $77,920,000 was from the tax on corporation incomes, $45,407,000 from the tax on individual incomes, and $11,122,000 from the 5 per cent tax collected at the source on interest and dividends.
- 7. Other excise taxes including the stamp tax on cheques, etc., and the taxes on sugar, automobiles and rubber tires, matches, toilet preparations, pullman tickets, telegraph and telephone messages and other miscellaneous commodities realized $28,582,000, a decrease of $10,990,000 from the previous year. The removal of the 3 per cent tax on importations under the intermediate tariff resulted in a loss in revenue from this source of $13,612,000. The difference, namely $2,622,000, represents the net increase in other items of excise taxes.
- 8. Receipts from excise duties, mainly on liquor and tobacco totalled $61,032,000, an increase of $9,718,000. This increase was due largely to the increased duties on liquor and

- tobacco following the budget of September 12, 1939.
- 9. The greatest increase in revenues from any one source occurred in customs import duties, where a total of $104,301,000 was realized, compared with $78,751,000 for the previous fiscal year, an increase of $25,550,000 or 32·4 per cent. Of this increase it is estimated that approximately $6,600,000 was obtained from the tariff increases provided for in the September, 1939, budget. The balance of the increase reflects improvement in conditions generally due in part at least to expanding activity brought about by the war.
- 10. Non-tax revenues or revenues from services rendered by the various departments and interest on investments, totalled $73,933,000 compared with $62,310,000 in the previous year. The largest non-tax item is the receipts of the Post Office which totalled $36,729,000 during 1939-40, an increase of $1,441,000 over the preceding fiscal year. The cost of operations of the Post Office last year was practically the same as its receipts, there being a nominal surplus of $2,000. Last fiscal year there was a nominal deficit of $168,000. The Post Office accounts do not include the rental value and other costs of premises occupied and equipment used, nor do they include any credit to the Post Office for services rendered to other departments through the free use of the mails.

The second largest non-tax revenue item is Interest on Investments which totalled $13,-394,000, an increase of $231,000 over that received in the previous year.

Casual Revenue including mint handling charges and net profits on coinage, Dominion's share of surplus profits of the Bank of Canada, receipts from various provinces for services rendered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other miscellaneous items totalled $9,373,000.

The large amount shown as Premium, Discount and Exchange revenue is due mainly to the redemption of the 3½ per cent 1930-50 loan of £28,162,776, which was called for payment and paid at the current rate of sterling.

11. Special Receipts and other credits amounted to $20,477,000. The main item in this category is the credit of $20,292,000 made up of $17,682,000 of Province of Saskatchewan treasury bills written off from non-active account; $2,600,000 of Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock written off because of line abandonments during the calendar year 1939; and $10,000 representing the yearly established losses in the seed grain and relief accounts of the Department of Mines and Resources. All of these amounts necessarily appear on the expenditure statement under the heading of "Other Charges".

EXPENDITURES, 1939-40

12. The comments which follow will deal with expenditures classified by the usual main categories: Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, Special Expenditures (including relief and war), Operating Deficits of and Nonactive Advances to Government Owned Enterprises, and Other Charges. All disbursements under these categories are included as expenditure in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in net debt.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

13. Ordinary expenditures, which include interest on the public debt and the general administrative expenses of the Government totalled $397,996,000, a decrease of $15,036,000 from the previous fiscal year.

The largest decrease in ordinary expenditures is in the Department of National Defence where by reason of the war a change in policy was instituted as from September 1, 1939 which involved the charging of certain expenditures of this department to War Expenditures. These are included in the totals shown under section 15. Certain Defence Expenditures, totalling $3,770,000, originally set up as Capital have been charged to Ordinary Account pursuant to Item 205 of the Main Estimates, 1940-41. Ordinary expenditures of the Public Works Department decreased approximately $2,400,000 and special grants to provinces were reduced by $2,000,000.

There were no very large increases in the ordinary expenditures of any particular department. Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture increased by $2,290,000. Interest on public debt was up by $1,319,000. The dominion's share of Old Age Pensions, including pensions to blind persons was $933,000 higher than last fiscal year. Payments in connection with the movement of ceal under the Department of Mines and Resources increased by $2,611,000. The only other increase of any considerable amount was for the treatment and after-care of returned soldiers which increased by $1,325,000.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

14. Total expenditures charged to capital amounted to $7,029,000 compared with $5,424,-000 in the previous year. The main items in this category are expenditures arising out of dredging the St. Lawrence Ship Channel and the construction and improvements of airways and airports.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

War Expenditures-

15. Expenditures arising out of the war are treated as special expenditures. The amount actually expended and charged to the fiscal year 1939-40 was $118,340,000 divided by departments and services as follows:

Relief Expenditures-

16. Special expenditures for the alleviation of unemployment conditions and of agricultural distress amounted in 1939-40 to $62,113,-000 compared with $46,896,000 in the previous Payments to provinces under the Material Aid and Municipal Improvements Projects agreements amounted to $19,534,000 compared with Grants-in-aid to provinces the previous year of $17,037,000. The Dominion's share of joint Dominion-Provincial projects, including transportation facilities into mining areas and the development of tourist highways, increased from $7,472,000 to $8,268,000. The total cost of public works and other projects including administration for which the dominion assumed sole responsibility amounted to $25,206,000 as compared with $13,241,000 during the preceding year.

Special drought area relief in the Province of Saskatchewan was confined to the earlier months of the fiscal year, and consequently expenditures under this heading declined from $9,146,000 in 1938-39 to $1,605,000 in 1939-40. However, as an offset to this reduction, there was an expenditure during 1939-40 of $7,500,000 under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939, representing the net cost to the Dominion in connection with the acreage bonuses paid to farmers under the Act.

The following table compares relief expenditures during each of the last two fiscal years:

loans to Western Provinces under Relief Acts,

In the above table no account is taken of loans to cover labour cost of special railway works programmes and losses borne by the Dominion as a result of wheat marketing operations.

18. The last item in this classification covers losses arising from the dominion's guarantee of a price of 80 cents per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, for the Western Wheat Crop of 1938. At the close of the fiscal year under review there remained unsold a small quantity of wheat of the 1938 crop and accordingly the losses of the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of the marketing of that crop were not finally determined. It was clear, however, that these losses would amount to at least $52,000,000. An advance of this amount without interest was made on account to the board to enable it to pay off guaranteed bank advances. During 1938-39 a reserve of $25,000,000 had been set up as a reserve in the accounts in respect of possible losses in marketing this wheat and the difference between the total advance of $52,000,000 and this reserve, namely, $27,000,000 has been charged to the dominion's accounts in 1939-40.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

19. The next major classification of expenditures comprises the losses of, and non-active advances to, Government owned enterprises which are operated as separate corporations.

Canadian National Railways

20. The operating revenues of the €anadian National Railways for the calendar year 1939 amounted to $203,820,000, an increase of $21,578,000 or 11.8 per cent from the preceding year. All classifications of revenue tonnage, except forest products, showed substantial increases over 1938.

Operating expenses of the railways totalled $182,966,000 an increase of $6,790,000 or 3.8 per cent over 1938. Most of this increase was in maintenance and transportation expenses necessitated by the increase in traffic.

The net revenue available for interest on the railway's debt was $10,635,000 compared with a deficit before interest charges of $3,549,000 in 1938. After payment of interest charges of $49,814,000 due to the public and interest charges of $916,000 due to the government in respect of temporary loans for capital purposes, there was a net cash deficit of $40,096,000 compared with $54,314,000 in the previous year, a decrease of $14,218,000.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals during 1939 was $427,000 as compared with $388,000 in 1938.

National Harbours Board

21. The operations of the harbours and facilities under the administration of the Na-[Mr. Ralston.]

tional Harbours Board in 1939 recorded a small gain over 1938. Operating income for the calendar year after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation and interest on Government advances, totalled $3,723,000 compared with $3,640,000 in the previous year.

Financial assistance provided by the government to the National Harbours Board and charged to dominion expenditure in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940, amounted to $1,121,000. This amount was made up as follows: $94,000 for the operating deficits of the harbours at Quebec and Churchill; $377,000 for non-active advances for the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal; $7,000 for retirement of debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission and $643,000 for capital expenditures at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Chicoutimi and Three Rivers.

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during 1939 and the Government received $325,000 from these sources which was credited to Casual Revenue.

Canadian National Steamships

22. Total earnings, especially passenger revenue, of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited were seriously affected after the outbreak of war. The 1939 operations of the company resulted in a surplus of $154,000 after payment of interest on bonds held by the public but before depreciation and interest on advances from the government. The comparable figure for 1938 was $276,000. The 1939 operating surplus was paid to the Government in partial payment of interest. An advance of $8,000 was made to the company for capital improvements of vessels under its control.

Trans-Canada Air Lines

23. The operations of the Trans-Canada Air Lines expanded greatly during the calendar year 1939. Operating revenue increased from $591,000 to $2,350,000. The annual deficit after payment of interest on capital and depreciation decreased from $818,000 in 1938 to $412,000 in 1939.

Central Mortgage Bank

24. The operations of the Central Mortgage Bank for the period July 14 to December 31, 1939, resulted in an operating deficit of $16,000 which was paid by the dominion government. Further information as to this bank will be found under Loans and Investments.

Summary

25. The total amount charged to Government expenditures resulting from operating deficits and non-active advances to all government owned enterprises totalled $42,080,000 as compared with $58,943,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1939. The decrease of $16,863,000 was mainly due to the reduction of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. Loans and Advances to Government Owned Enterprises which are treated in the Public Accounts as Active Assets are referred to in a later section.

OTHER CHARGES

26. Other Charges, the final main category of expenditures, amounted to $25,958,000. The principal item included in this total was the write-off of Saskatchewan treasury bills from non-active assets to Consolidated Fund amounting to $17.682,000. Other items similarly dealt with were reduction of Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock of $2,600,000 representing line abandonments during the calendar year 1939 and the yearly established losses in seed grain and relief accounts of the Department of Mines and Resources amounting to $10,000. The total of these three items, namely, $20,292,000, is offset by a similar amount of Other Credits already referred to under Revenues.

The annual write-off of Soldier and General Land Settlement Loans amounted to $1,643,- 000. Capital Stock of the Canadian Farm Loan Board in the amount of $11,000 was cancelled. An amount of $1,374,000 of Saskatchewan Treasury Bills was written-off as a final adjustment with respect to drought area relief assumed by the Dominion for the period September 1, 1934, to August 31, 1935.

Pursuant to the Saskatchewan Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1936, the dominion was required to fulfil its guarantee with respect to bank loans to municipalities to the extent of $2,638,000.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

27. The grand total of the preceding expenditures, i.e., Ordinary, Capital, Special including War. Government Owned Enterprises, and Other Charges, is $680,516,000 for the fiscal year 1939-40.

28. The following table shows the percentage distribution of revenues and expenditures for a number of important items of revenue and expenditure. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. This table should only be used for the purpose of drawing broad conclusions as to the relative burdens imposed on the treasury by the several important services or obligations of government.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

29. Total revenues for 1939-40 amounted to $562,095,000, and total expenditures to $680,-516,000, resulting in an over-all deficit of $118,-421,000. In the preceding fiscal year, the comparable deficit was $50,892,000.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

Active Assets

30. In addition to the expenditures for the year, as already outlined, the dominion has made disbursements for the acquisition of investments which are considered as active assets in the Public Accounts. These active assets are deducted from the total direct debt in arriving at the figure of net debt. During the fiscal year 1939-40, the net increase in active loans and investments was $46,017,000 as compared with $27,557,000 in 1938-39.

LOANS TO PROVINCES

31. Under authority of the annual Relief Acts, 1931 to 1935, inclusive, the dominion had power to grant financial assistance to a provincial government by way of loan, advance or guarantee without limitation as to purpose or amount. Up to the close of the fiscal year 1935-36, loans had been granted to the four Western Provinces for purposes other than relief including the retirement of maturing provincial obligations, and, to a limited extent, ordinary provincial government expenditures. Since April 1, 1936, the dominion's lending power has been limited to the making of loans only where necessary to enable a province to pay its share of expenditures pursuant to agreements with the dominion entered into under authority of the relative Relief Act.

32. The total amount of loans advanced during the fiscal year 1939-40 was $12,191,966, divided as follows:—

Manitoba							.$	2,012,000
Saskatchewan								8,633,414
British Columbia								1,546,552

In addition the dominion accepted Saskatchewan Treasury Bills to the net amount of $1,614,335 in respect of certain interest accruals on previous relief loans which the province was unable to pay in cash.

33. During the year repayments of loans were made to the amount of $1,240,273 as follows:

Manitoba										$ 129,507
Saskatchewa										1,057,068
Alberta										53,698

34. The following tables show the net loans made to each province during each fiscal year and a classification of such loans on the basis of the general purposes for which the loans were given:—

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

35. In addition to paying the net income deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the Dominion made advances to the Railway for capital purposes amounting to $22,979,000, classified as follows:

A loan of $1,500,000 made in the fiscal year 1938-39 in anticipation of the passing of the 1939 budget of the railway company was repaid in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940.

The dominion purchased under authority of the War Measures Act and the War Appropriation Act approximately $15,000,000 of railway equipment for the Canadian National Railways. As of the close of the fiscal year, equipment to the amount of $6,189,000 had been paid for and delivered. This equipment is being leased to the railway company under a hire-purchase agreement extending over a period of fifteen years.

The railway company paid the second instalment of $517,000 under the terms of a hire-purchase agreement relating to certain equipment purchased by the government in 1935-36 and 1936-37 at a cost of $6,723,000 and leased to the railway.

OTHERS LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

36. During the fiscal year the government purchased a further $188,000 of the capital stock of the Canadian Farm Loan Board and an additional $2,100,000 of the Board's 3½ per cent bonds. Capital stock in the amount of $11,000 was cancelled and written off. As at March 31, 1940, the total investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board was $36,695,000.

37. In the fiscal year under review, 4,936 loans were approved under the National Housing Act in the amount of $21,924,000, [Mr. Ralston.]

bringing the total to March 31, 1940, to $52,-553,000. During the year, the dominion's share of loans actually paid out, less repayments by borrowers, was $4,393,000. The net amount of loans outstanding at the close of the fiscal year made under the authority of the National Housing Act and the Dominion Housing Act was $9,805,000. Loans under the National Housing Act are made jointly by the Government and approved lending institutions and are secured by first mortgage or hypothec, running jointly to the government and an approved lending institution. Loans are normally made not in excess of 80 per cent of the cost or appraised value of the completed property, whichever is the lesser. However, in the case of owner-occupied houses where the lending value does not exceed $2,500, a loan may be made up to 90 per cent of the said lending value. Since January 1, 1940, new applications for loans are received only in respect of the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

38. To March 31, 1940, the government has approved loans to the amount of $5,272,000 under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938 to municipalities to enable them to finance the construction of municipal self-liquidating projects. During the fiscal year under review, the amount actually paid out on such loans, less repayments, was $3,111,000.

These loans bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum and are amortized over a period not longer than the estimated useful life of the project. The province in which the municipality is located is required to guarantee the payments for interest on and amortization of each loan.

39. There was advanced during the year $947,000 to the National Harbours Board for capital construction purposes at the ports of Montreal and Vancouver. As a considerable part of the interest accrued on the obligations issued by these two ports has been paid to the government, these loans are carried as active assets on the books of the dominion.

40. Loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made in previous years for relief purposes were further reduced by $211,000. In addition, the railway company paid the second instalment of $441,000 under the terms of a hire-purchase agreement relating to certain equipment purchased by the government in the fiscal years 1935-36 to 1937-38 at a cost of $5,730,000 and leased to the railway. Under the authority of the War Measures Act and the War Appropriation Act, the dominion purchased approximately $10,000,000 of railway equipment for the Canadian Pacific Railway company. As at March 31, 1940, equipment to the amount of $2,904,000 had been paid for and delivered. This equipment is being leased to the railway company under a hire-purchase agreement extending over a period of fifteen years.

41. The government purchased capital stock of the Central Mortgage Bank to the amount of $250,000. On November 13, 1939, it was announced that the government had decided that the Central Mortgage Bank should not commence active operations for the time being. The existing state of war and the uncertainties regarding the effect which war might have on incomes and real estate values, made conditions so abnormal that the government did not feel it would be practicable to make, with any degree of assurance, valuations that would provide an equitable and permanent basis for sound debtor-creditor relationships. There was the further consideration that the adjustments contemplated by the act involved the use of the national credit on a substantial scale, and this also seemed undesirable in view of the very heavy present and prospective demands upon the national resources for war purposes.

42. There was advanced to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the sum of $750,000 for capital construction, mainly for two transmitting stations located in the maritime and prairie provinces. The corporation repaid $50,000 on account of a loan made in the fiscal year 1937-38.

43. During the fiscal year under review, the provinces of Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island reduced by $699,000 loans granted by the dominion in the postwar period for house construction. Loans for Soldier and General Land Settlement were reduced by payments of $1,116,000.

44. Investments in Sinking Funds amounted to $4,189,000. Stocks of other loans amounting to $6,987,000, held in the Sinking Fund of the 3½ per cent 1930-50 loan which was called for payment on April 17, 1940, were transferred to a bond holding account to be repurchased later for the Sinking Fund of other sterling issues. This resulted in Sinking Funds Account showing a net decrease for the year of $2,798,000.

45. The following statement shows the net changes in active investments during the last fiscal year together with comparable figures for the four preceding years:

LOAN FLOTATIONS

46. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940, the government issued obligations in the amount of $657,793,471. All these issues were floated in the Canadian market. Maturing obligations in the amount of $362,935,587 were redeemed out of the proceeds of the new issues, the remainder of the proceeds providing cash for the current purposes of government.

47. The following table gives details of the amounts, terms and purposes of the new issues and the prices at which they were sold:

48. During the fiscal year under review, the issue fortnightly of three months' treasury bills was continued. The last issue of treasury bills during the year ended March 31, 1940, was sold at a discount of .747 per cent. The average cost to the treasury of funds obtained from the twenty-three offerings during the year was a discount basis of '726 per cent. The amount of these treasury bills outstanding at March 31, 1940, was $155,000,000 unchanged from the total outstanding at the close of the previous fiscal year.

[Mr. Ralston.]

49. As at March 31, 1940, the average rate of interest on the dominion's outstanding direct funded debt (including treasury bills) was 3.40 per cent, as compared with 3.52 per cent on March 31, 1939.

NATIONAL DEBT

50. At the close of the fiscal year there was outstanding unmatured funded debt (including treasury bills) of the dominion in the amount of $3,695,685,000. Of this total, securities in the amount of $67,196,000 were held in the sinking funds against certain issues payable in London. The remaining amount, $3,628,489,000, was outstanding in the hands of the public. Other liabilities, consisting chiefly of annuity, superannuation and insurance funds, Post Office Savings Bank deposits, and trust and contingent funds, were outstanding on the same date in an estimated aggregate amount of $332,888,000. Without deducting sinking funds now shown as an asset, the gross liabilities of the dominion totalled $4,028,573,000. On the other side of its balance sheet, the dominion had active assets of $757,593,000 representing cash on hand, sinking funds and active loans and investments. The net debt of the dominion, the difference between the gross liabilities and the active assets, is therefore estimated at $3,270,980,000. The increase over the same date last year amounted to $118,421,000, namely, the amount of the over-all deficit for the fiscal year.

51. The following is a preliminary statement showing the liabilities and assets of the dominion as estimated at March 31, 1940:—

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

53. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion outstanding in the hands of the public at March 31, 1940, amounted to $1,084,479,000, a decrease of $987,000 during the fiscal year.

54. There were also outstanding on March 31, 1940, other contingent liabilities arising out of guarantees given under Relief and Seed Grain legislation and other acts. There were no new guarantees incurred during the last fiscal year.

During the fiscal year under review an amount of $52,000,000 was advanced without interest to the Canadian Wheat Board to enable the board to pay off guaranteed bank advances with respect to the marketing of the 1938 wheat crop. The guaranteed bank loans to the board outstanding at the close of the fiscal year amounted to $42,998,000. This amount constituted the board's gross liability to the banks at the close of the fiscal year and mainly related to the purchase of the 1939 wheat crop at the fixed price of 70 cents per bushel No. 1 northern, Fort William. The guarantee of the dominion to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited, referred to in previous budgets, is still outstanding. No liability accrues from day to day in connection with the guarantee as margin deposits are made to the Clearing Association daily.

At March 31, 1940, 102,365 Home Improvement Loans had been made by banks and approved lending institutions to home owners in the amount of $41,110,000. Repayments to the same date on account of these loans amounted to $24,068,000, or over 58 per cent of the total amount of loans made. dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by each approved lending institution. As 288 loss claims for $86,922 have been paid, the maximum contingent liability as at March 31, 1940, was $6,079,595. In terms of dollar losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only approximately \frac{1}{5} of 1 per cent.

Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, the dominion has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities.

The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be borne by the dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The general principle is that the dominion bears two-thirds of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amounts due, is equal to or less than the amount advanced by the dominion and one-third of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the dominion. In the case of small loans (that is, for amounts not in excess of $4,000 in the case of a single dwelling place or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling), the share of the loss to be borne by the dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. The above provisions apply to loans made under both the present National Housing Act and its predecessor, the Dominion Housing Act. Under the National Housing Act a new provision has been added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts of other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by the lending institution.

Order in Council, dated December 5, 1939, provided that after January 1, 1940, applications would be received only for loans for the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

Loans to the number of 15,054 had been approved at March 31, 1940, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, and in the amount of $52,553,000. No losses had been realized by the dominion as of that date.

B. REVIEW OF ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL CONDITIONS, 1939-40

1. The following tables and related paragraphs present a comprehensive survey of general economic conditions in Canada during the past year. For purposes of comparison figures for certain earlier years are also provided, and in the case of the more important factors statistics on a monthly basis are given covering the last two fiscal years.

The figures used throughout are those published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, unless otherwise indicated. Where an index or average figure is given for a fiscal, rather than a calendar year, it represents an average of the monthly data during the period concerned. All indexes shown as based on the year 1926 are to be construed as based on the calendar year 1926, and not the fiscal year.

A change this year in the method of compiling trade statistics at the end of the fiscal year has artificially decreased the March trade figures and artificially increased those of April, so that a valid comparison of either month with the same month in any previous year has been made impossible. This change not only affected directly the comparability of the trade statistics but influenced indirectly as well the index of the physical volume of business, many of the components of which utilize imports and exports of certain commodities as indicators of current business activity. To facilitate an accurate comparison of recent trends, therefore, in the following tables the figures for March and April of both the current and the preceding year have been averaged throughout, in the case not only of factors affected by the trade statistics, but, in order to provide comparable data, of other factors as well. In the text this average will be termed the March-April figure.

In the case of averages for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940, no attempt has been made to adjust the March figures which have been artificially lowered by the change in the trade statistics, so that in all statistics affected by trade figures the average for the last fiscal year is slightly lower than it would have been if calculated on a basis comparable with previous years. This artificial reduction might amount to about one, two or three per cent in the annual figures.

PHYSICAL VOLUME OF BUSINESS

2. The index for the physical volume of business in Canada is the most comprehensive single measure of the level of general economic and business activity. It is made up by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics from 46 constituent items weighted according to their relative importance in the economy as a whole, and is adjusted for seasonal fluctuations. Included in the making of this index are such items as mineral production, manufacturing in its chief branches, construction, electric power output, trade employment, carloading, imports and exports. Agricultural production as such does not find a place in this index, nor do fishing and lumbering as primary activities, but the processing of and trade in the products of these industries are reflected in the index. Correction is made, where necessary, for changes in the price factor in order that the index shall properly record only changes in the physical volume of business done. 1926 is taken as the base year. Following are presented the index numbers for each fiscal year since 1927 and the index for each month in the last two fiscal years.

In the remaining part of the table certain less important items in the Balance of Payments have not been detailed.

The recovery from the depressed level of business activity of 1938 which had become evident in the early months of 1939 continued throughout the year and was accelerated by the outbreak of war in September. Each month in the past fiscal year was considerably above the corresponding month in the year previous, and the average for 1939-40 of 126.9 was about 11.5 per cent above that of 1938-39. The March-April figure for 1940 was 19.2 per cent higher than that for 1939, and has only been exceeded in one month in 1929, and in January of this year.

It may be of interest to compare this expansion of 19·2 per cent in the physical volume of business with the expansion in employment in all industries of about 6·6 per cent between March-April, 1939, and March-April, 1940. This suggests that the increased production has been achieved in considerable degree by a reduction in part-time work.

AGRICULTURE

3. The gross value of agricultural production in 1939 increased by about 10 per cent over the previous year and reached the highest level since 1930. In general, it was a year of good crops, but of low prices. The wheat crop of 490 million bushels was the second largest in our history. In quality it was about normal, through relatively highly concentrated in No. 1 northern grade. The area of poor crops was very much reduced from preceding years. The average price received by the farmer at the farm for his 1939 wheat, up to December 31, has been estimated at 52c. a bushel compared with a revised figure of 59c. for the 1938 crop.

One of the most outstanding features of Canadian agriculture in the past year has been the great increase in hog production and marketings since the summer of 1939. Hog marketings in the eight months from September to April amounted to 3,213,373 compared with 2,244,765 in the eight months a year before. Indications are that hog production and marketings in 1940 will be the largest recorded in the history of the industry. Hog prices declined during the spring of 1939, and during the summer months were lower than in the previous two years. They rose during the fall months and were fairly well stabilized during the first three months of this year under the operation of the Bacon Agreement with the United Kingdom, but they have weakened in recent months as a surplus of hog products has accumulated, and in April were below the levels of the past three years.

Among the branches of agriculture most affected by the war is that of apple production, since exports of apples to British and foreign markets have been severely curtailed. The apple crop of 1939 was a very large one, exceeded only by 1933 in the last fourteen years, but the average value received per unit fell to a level lower than that for any year of the same period and, consequently, the total value of the crop was much below that of recent years. The dominion government provided assistance in the marketing of the apple crop, including special arrangements for processing apples in Nova Scotia which is more dependent than other regions upon the export market.

It will be noted in the table below that the general index of farm prices in March-April of 1940 had increased by about 10 per cent over the level of a year before.

MINING

4. The past year has seen production and employment in the mineral industry expand to new record levels. Gold mining continues to be the largest element and the volume of gold produced in the fiscal year 1939-40 showed an increase of about 5.8 per cent over the previous year, while the value of the production has, of course, been increased since September by the higher price received in Canadian dollars. Production of copper, nickel and zinc was larger in each case than in any previous year, but the value of this production was not as great as in 1937 because prices were lower than in that year. Contracts were made between the major Canadian base metal producers and the United Kingdom Ministry of Supply, providing for the sale of the bulk of the Canadian export surplus of copper, lead and zinc at prices approximately equal to those prevailing immediately before the outbreak of war.

Iron ore production commenced again in Canada in 1939 after a lapse of 16 years. Development is also proceeding rapidly to bring into production the high grade iron ore deposit at Steep Rock Lake.

Petroleum production in Alberta continued to expand though subject to pro-rationing because of the limited market available in the Western Provinces. Thirty-four new wells were brought into production in Turner Valley in 1939. Coal production in 1939 was also increased by 8.6 per cent over the previous year, most of the increase occurring in Nova Scotia, and in the first four months of this year production shows an increase of 26½ per cent over the same months of last year.

Employment in mining continued to expand despite a slight set-back during the early winter. The March-April figure this year shows an increase of 4.2 per cent over that of a year ago.

FORESTRY

5. The volume and value of forestry production in the past fiscal year, and in the calendar year 1939, have shown substantial increases over the preceding year. This was true for some months before the outbreak of war, as well as after it.

Newsprint production has increased markedly during the war period due to a greater demand in the United States and to the shutting off of Scandinavian supplies from world markets. In the first eight months of war newsprint production was 15·3 per cent above the same period a year before, and for May the industry reports production of 323,563 tons, which is a new high record, and 29·6 per cent above May of last year.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Lumber production has also been stimulated by wartime requirements, though not as yet to the same degree as newsprint production. Lumbering in eastern Canada has been favoured relatively to that in British Columbia due to the greater availability of Atlantic shipping for export. About 10 per cent more lumber was scaled in British Columbia from September to April than in the same period in the previous year. The index of lumber and timber prices during the war period has averaged about 12 per cent above the year before.

It will be noted in the table below that improved employment in logging reflects the much better market for forestry products in the past year.

FISHERIES

6. The Atlantic deep sea catch in 1939 was about 5 per cent greater than in 1938, but prices were lower due to a slackening in European demand so that the value of the catch was only about 2½ per cent higher. So far in 1940 events in Europe have kept changing the market situation, but during the early months of the year prices have been slightly higher than before the war. The normal export market for canned lobster has now been cut off by war restrictions and the dominion government has made provision for assisting in the disposal of the lobster catch. The British Columbia salmon pack in 1939 was somewhat smaller than the year before and of lower quality, but it was all marketed despite the war at somewhat higher prices than in the preceding year. The halibut catch this spring has been larger than last year, and prices received are slightly better.

MANUFACTURING

7. Production and employment in manufacturing have shown a substantial and general increase during the past fiscal year, and the average level of the production index for the year as a whole was higher than any year in the past. Activity in manufacturing increased very quickly after the outbreak of war, apparently reached an all-time peak in January and then receded slightly in the next two or three months. Unofficial information indicates that the expansion was resumed in May. The March-April figures for 1940 compared with those for 1939 show an expansion of 22·4 per cent in production and 14·9 per cent in employment in manufacturing as a whole.

Among the various manufacturing industries the most marked expansion has taken place in textiles for which the production index in March-April this year was more than double that of a year before. Many textile factories are now reported to be working at capacity. Steel production shows an expansion during the year of nearly 60 per cent. Much of this increase took place before the outbreak of war but was due in part to British armament demands. The expansion in food manufacturing reflects in part the increased exports of flour and bacon and also the increased domestic consumption of foodstuffs such as that of sugar.

Production in the automobile industry showed little change for the last fiscal year as a whole compared with the preceding one, and the figures for March-April are only about 5 per cent above those a year before. Restrictions imposed in export markets have offset the increased domestic sales of cars and the military demand for motor transports. Since the middle of March the Canadian automobile industry has received a number of substantial orders for military vehicles, however, and production in May reached a figure which was some 35 per cent above May of last year and represented the largest volume in any month since June, 1937.

CONSTRUCTION

8. Total construction during the fiscal year 1939-40, as indicated by contracts awarded, showed a small increase over the preceding year. This increase appeared both in residential and in other construction. In the period May to August preceding the war there was evidence of a recovery in private construction, both residential and business, and total contracts in this period had recovered half the ground lost in the recession from 1937 to 1938. After the outbreak of war there was a falling off in contracts other than residential, and some decline in residential contracts. Contracts for business and industrial construction began to increase about the end of the year and by March all major types of construction were showing substantial increases over the previous year. Total figures for the three months ending May 31 have not been exceeded since 1931, and this is true as well for all the major categories of construction except engineering work where in 1937 these three months showed a high figure.

During the fiscal year 1939-40 loans approved under the National Housing Act showed a substantial increase and reached a total of nearly $22,000,000 which was equal to almost a third of the value of all contracts awarded for residential construction during that year. Early in December it was announced that, in order to conserve the financial resources of the Dominion, loans under Part I of the Act would be restricted to a maximum of $4,000, and to single family houses, for applications received after December 31, 1939, and that the assistance by way of tax payment benefits under Part III of the Act would be restricted to buildings commenced before May 31, 1940. One effect of this announcement was to produce a rush of applications in December, and this shows up in the high figures for loans approved in January and February notable in the table below. Loans under the Home Improvement Plan have continued to increase and all months in the last fiscal year have shown increases over the corresponding months in the preceding year.

RAILWAYS

9. Movement of the near-record grain crop and the heavy demands placed on transportation facilities with the outbreak of war were responsible for a level of railway operations during the period since mid-year of 1939 which was considerably higher than that of any recent years. This is graphically illustrated by the striking increase in net operating income for the March-April average of 1940 over that of 1939. Carloadings during the first eight months of war show an increase of 14.4 per cent over the similar period a year earlier.

FOREIGN TRADE

10. Total Canadian trade with the rest of the world, including net exports of non-monetary gold, was just under two billion dollars in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940. Exports of merchandise increased by 16.8 per cent over the preceding fiscal year, while imports rose by 25.7 per cent. The relatively greater increase in imports resulted in a reduction of about 2 per cent in the net export balance, including net exports of non-monetary gold.

Although our foreign trade was moving upward prior to last August, the war produced [Mr. Ralston.]

an immediate stimulus to both exports and imports, so that trade during the war period showed a substantially greater proportionate increase than that of the fiscal year. Exports of merchandise in the eight months ended April, 1940, were 23.9 per cent greater than in the same period of the previous year, while imports of merchandise were 48.9 per cent greater. During this period as compared with the same period a year before our merchandise exports to the United States increased by 47.5 per cent and to the United Kingdom by 19.5 per cent, while imports from the same countries increased by 62.6 per cent and 13.2 per cent respectively. Exports to the United States showed their most marked advance during the first four months of the war when American business was expanding rapidly, while exports to the United Kingdom have shown their substantial increase since the beginning of 1940. Imports from the United States, however, have continued at a high level since the beginning of the war.

Commodity exports which showed notable gains in the war period over the same period of the previous year, and the percentages by which they increased, were as follows: Wheat flour 77 per cent, meats, chiefly bacon and ham 66 per cent, wood pulp 56 per cent, wheat 54 per cent, asbestos 46 per cent, planks and boards 35 per cent, cheese 33 per cent, and paper 22 per cent.

EMPLOYMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT

11. The general index of employment registered a gain of 4.4 per cent during 1939-40 over the previous fiscal year. Although in the early part of 1939 employment was at levels considerably below those of the preceding year, it rose gradually with increased business activity and since June each month has shown a substantial increase over the same month of the year previous. The May 1 figure this year at 118.7 for the general index was about 7.6 per cent higher than the same date in 1939 and was higher than any other May except that of 1929. Greatly increased employment in manufacturing, logging, mining and transportation contributed to this upward movement. The index of employment in construction and maintenance has recently been at levels considerably below those of a year ago owing to curtailment of expenditure on highway construction and maintenance; other branches of construction have shown increases.

The improved employment situation is reflected in the lower number of persons in receipt of relief. In each month since November, 1939, both the numbers of employable unemployed and of all persons on relief have shown a considerable reduction from the same month of the previous year. Preliminary figures for April, 1940, show a decrease of 25·2 per cent from April, 1939, in the total of relief recipients, and a decline of 11 per cent from the same month in the number of employable unemployed. The number of wage-earners unemployed in April, 1940, was estimated by the Bureau of Statistics to be about 367,000, as compared with 473,000 in April, 1939, a decrease of about 22·5 per cent. This 367,000 includes a considerable but unknown number of enlisted men who were formerly unemployed.

PRICES

12. The gradual decline of wholesale prices which had marked the latter part of the fiscal vear 1938-39 continued up until August of 1939, and the index reached a low point of 72.4 in that month. During the economic adjustments that took place in the month or two immediately following the outbreak of war, and in considerable part due to such factors as exchange movement, higher ocean freight and insurance rates, and forward buying both by consumers and producers, wholesale prices of some commodities rose fairly steeply, particularly those of certain imports and exports, including grains and animal products. The total index rose to 79.3 in October, i.e., by about 10 per cent in two months. From that point on to March the rise was more gradual and the index reached a peak of 83.2 in that month. This rise showed up mainly in a further increase in grain prices and in textile prices. Since March there has been a slight decline largely due to lower prices for animal products and grains, and the index for the week ending June 7 was 81.9.

It may be of interest in wartime to note that prices of fully and chiefly manufactured goods have followed very closely the movements of the general index, and that the index of the group "iron and its products" has risen by only about 5 per cent since August while the group "producers' equipment" has increased less than 2 per cent. It may also be worth noting that the index of our export prices had risen by about 24 per cent, and that for imports about 17 per cent between August and April.

During the six months before the war the cost of living remained at the low level to which it had declined in the latter part of 1938. Increased cost of food and, to a much lesser extent, of fuel, caused a rise of about 2 per cent in the index in the first two months of war. Since that time only minor changes have occurred in the total index. Increases in the cost of clothing early in 1940 were offset by some reduction in the cost of food. The latest figure shows an increase of only 3 per cent over that of a year ago.

While no official indexes of wage rates exist except on an annual basis, other information indicates that there have been numerous increases in wage rates, particularly in those trades where there is already some evidence of a shortage of skilled labour.

FINANCIAL FACTORS

13. The outstanding facts relating to financial conditions during the past year are, firstly, the changes in exchange rates and the imposition of exchange control, secondly, the smooth working of our credit and monetary machinery and, thirdly, the disturbances, caused to security markets by various developments in the war.

The foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar remained close to the United States dollar until about a week before the outbreak of war. Between August 24 and September 15 it fell to a discount of about 10 per cent. On September 15 the Foreign Exchange Control Board was established and after that date all sterling and foreign exchange transactions of Canadian residents were subject to its control. The official rates established by the Board were: American dollars, buying rate, $1.10, selling rate $1.11; Sterling, buying rate $4.43, selling rate $4.47. These official rates closely approximated the actual rates prevailing during the few days prior to control, and have not been changed since they were established. Practically all dealings involving Canadian dollars take place at these official rates. Non-residents of Canada are able to transfer Canadian bank balances and other assets to other non-residents, and there is a market for Canadian dollars in New York which is not subject to control by the Foreign Exchange Control Board. The small volume of transactions in this market makes its rates of little significance and also makes them rather unstable.

During the early months of the fiscal year 1939-40 the average yield on long-term Dominion Government bonds remained close to 3 per cent. In the disturbances that naturally took place on security markets at the time of outbreak of war bond prices declined sharply and the average yield on long-term dominion bonds in September was about 3.60 per cent. From September to April there was a rather irregular recovery in the prices of these bonds, and by the end of April the yield was back down to 3.25 per cent. Since that time there has been a small decline in price, and yields during the first half of June have been in the neighbourhood of 31 per cent. Canadian stock prices declined moderately in the weeks preceding the outbreak of war. After the war began industrial share prices rose sharply, particularly those of pulp and paper companies. Golds and utility stocks also began to rise before the end of September, and there was a general but mild upward movement till the end of the year. During the first four months of 1940 all groups except the paper stocks suffered a small and gradual decline. In May, however, there was general and severe liquidation which carried most groups to levels lower than any in recent years.

During the first five months of the fiscal year 1939-40 monetary and banking conditions remained stable. Cash reserves of the Chartered Banks increased slightly from $257 millions in March to $261 millions in August, while Canadian deposits of the banks increased in proportion. During the three months after the outbreak of war the Bank of Canada added substantially to its security holdings which increased from about $163 millions in August to $248 millions in November. This provided cash to meet the enlarged public demands for currency and to increase the cash reserves of the Chartered Banks from an average of $261 millions in August to an average of $294 millions in November. With this increase in their reserves the Chartered Banks were enabled to increase their Canadian deposits from $2,565,000,000 at the end of August to an all time record figure of $2,871,-000,000 at the end of November. In these three months the security holdings of the Chartered Banks rose by $158 millions, and their current loans to the public by $147 millions. From November until April the Bank of Canada gradually reduced its security holdings from $248 millions to $206 millions. The cash reserves of the Chartered Banks have fallen in the same period from $294 millions to $271 millions. Total Canadian deposits of the Chartered Banks have been reduced less than in proportion and at the end of April amounted to about $2,753,000,000. This has involved a reduction of the security holdings of the Chartered Banks of about $73 millions, which is a little less than half their increase last fall.

Total net Government and corporate bond issues in 1939, as reported by the Bank of Canada, amounted to about $237 millions, exclusive of municipal issues. This compares with $174 millions, $56 millions and $106 millions in the preceding three years. The $237 millions included net Dominion direct and guaranteed and other C.N.R. issues amounting to $177 millions, Provincial issues amounting to $79 millions and net retirements of corporation issues of $20 millions. In the first quarter of 1940 there have been net Dominion and C.N.R. issues of about $168 millions and net Provincial issues of about $40 millions.

On April 30, 1940, an order in council was passed requiring all Canadian residents to sell their holdings of foreign exchange (but not of foreign securities) to the Foreign Exchange Control Board before May 31. Some exemptions were made for those requiring a certain amount of foreign exchange to carry on their normal business. As part of this mobilization of foreign exchange resources the gold and most of the foreign exchange reserves of the Bank of Canada were transferred to the board. In order to provide the board with the funds to purchase this gold and foreign exchange, the Exchange Fund was increased by $325,000,000, which was raised by the sale to the Bank of Canada of that amount of short-term Dominion securities. As a consequence of these operations the statements of the Bank of Canada since May 1 show no figures for gold coin and bullion, and much larger figures for investments. The value of gold held by the Bank on April 30 was $225,772,887.41.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed from Friday, June 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress — Mr. McLarty — Mr. Fournier, (Hull), in the chair.

On section 3—Agreements with provinces and others.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity to make a brief statement? On Friday last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to the estimate of expenditures on direct relief for this year, and compared it with the amount allocated last year. I told him at the time that the estimate was predicated on figures supplied by the municipalities to the provinces, which in turn were passed on to us. In this connection I should like to give such information as I have available.

As I pointed out previously, our contribution of forty per cent will remain unchanged in Saskatchewan, and our estimate is necessarily based upon figures supplied by the municipalities to the province, and by the province to us. I know the committee will appreciate the difficulty of making a definite estimate, more especially for Saskatchewan, where so much depends on weather conditions. Of [Mr. Ralston.]

course we will maintain the forty per cent ratio, even though it may require the payment of an amount somewhat larger than we at present estimate. Last year the total payment to Saskatchewan by the Department of Labour, representing the 40 per cent contribution to direct relief, amounted to $2,645,-729.29. On January 11 of this year Saskatchewan suggested the closest estimate they could make would be $2,665,000, based on the forty per cent contribution arrangement. This included a small amount, not exceeding $40,000, for a provision in the agreement under which the dominion government pays fifty per cent of the cost in respect to persons who have no provincial residential qualifications.

Under date of April 16 the provincial director of relief advised the Department of Labour as follows:

We have already experienced a very substantial improvement in relief conditions due to improved crop conditions and the resultant improvement in economic conditions generally. I feel that further substantial reductions in relief costs will be possible in the next two or three months, but from that point on it is most difficult to make any forecast because the crop harvested next fall will determine, to a great extent, the extent of our relief requirements.

And again:

I may say for your information that we have had some heavy snow falls recently that have greatly improved moisture conditions all over the province, and while we are experiencing a very late spring, conditions now look fairly promising.

Since then the forecasts for the early months of the year have been fully substantiated; for example, in April and May of the current year the number on urban relief in Saskatchewan was down 44 per cent as compared with the same months in 1939. The number on agricultural relief decreased by about 65 per cent in comparison with last year. This will necessarily involve corresponding reductions in relief costs.

With the factors I have mentioned as to the uncertainty of weather conditions and the information from the province as to the wide reduction in the numbers in receipt of direct relief, the closest estimate that the department can make as to the amount which will have to be paid to the province of Saskatchewan in the current year is approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, while the bill was in the resolution stage I endeavoured to give the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) a picture of conditions as they existed in Nova Scotia at that particular time, and which made the payment of relief necessary. I want to make a few remarks on section 3 of this bill, which deals specifically with the agreements which are to be made between the federal government and the provinces.

Relief in Nova Scotia has been practically discontinued from March 31. My reason for rising at this time is to refer to a letter which I received from one of the town councillors of Glace Bay. This municipality is faced with a potential unemployment problem. At present there is a considerable number of unemployed in the town. This gentleman enclosed with his letter a press statement which had been given by the mayor during a recent meeting of the town council. I should like to quote from that press statement, as follows:

The request that R. H. McKay, deputy minister of labour, come here as soon as possible to confer with the council on the relief situation and get something arranged early was made at the town council last night after the mayor had read a letter from Mr. McKay stating that no more direct relief aid might be received from the federal government.

made at the town council last night after the mayor had read a letter from Mr. McKay stating that no more direct relief aid might be received from the federal government.

Mr. McKay's letter said that no assistance had been received from the federal government from April 1 and if there was none coming the provincial government would be unable to assist and the whole burden of direct relief would be placed on the town.

And further down:

In March there were 196 heads of families with 559 dependents and 73 other individuals on direct relief, three per cent of the population.

Some decision had recently been made by the federal government on direct relief, Mayor Morrison stated, but no agreement had yet come forth. Unless some aid came soon the end was in sight as the town couldn't hope to carry on the burden alone.

In other places there was a great deal of war work going on but the war had made no improvement here; in fact it was worse here now than at this time last year.

I know that statement is true. There are two mines in this district which are gradually being closed. The ranks of the unemployed are being added to weekly, and there are no war industries being carried on. As a result, unemloyment in this particular section is increasing. I received a letter this morning from the secretary of the United Mine Workers of America, an organization which represents 12,000 miners in Nova Scotia. He asks me to bring the situation to the attention of the Minister of Labour, since it is something which directly affects that department. It also dovetails into the question of unemployment relief. I may say that this morning I took the matter up with the deputy minister of the department and was informed that the situation described in this letter is true. There has been no change since the letter was written on June 21, 1940. It is addressed to me and reads:

This is for your information, and I hope you will bring to the attention of parliament the difficulty we in Nova Scotia are having in getting a conciliation board appointed.

On May 3 we made application for a conciliation board for the employees of the Old Sydney Collieries Limited at Sydney Mines, and the employees of the Acadia Coal Company at Stellarton, who are members of district No. 26, United Mine Workers of America. On May 6 we received the following reply:

He then quotes a number of telegrams which passed back and forth between the mine workers and the Department of Labour. I shall not take the time to read these, but will quote further from the letter:

You will note by these telegrams that Mr. Forsythe and Mr. Muise were appointed June 3. After Mr. Muise was notified of his appointment, he immediately got in touch with Mr. Forsythe and submitted the names of eight persons, prominent Nova Scotians, any one of whom he would be agreeable to act as chairman of the board. Mr. Muise was in telephone conversation with Mr. Forsythe, and Mr. Forsythe would not agree to any one of these men. He gave no reasons for not agreeing, neither did he submit any names himself. Since that time we are awaiting the appointment of a chairman.

The men effected are complaining to the executive officers continuously, asking why the board is not functioning, and it is hard for the district officers to make them believe that it is being held up on account of the appointment of a chairman. This slowness of action is having a very bad effect here. You know the wages these men are receiving, both in the Sydney Mines and Acadia districts, and they have been working for a considerable period without a contract. No action can be taken until the conciliation board has first heard their case. I have already explained to you details in connection with the application we made for a board for the Sydney and Louisburg railway.

I trust you will bring this to the attention of the Minister of Labour, for if boards are to have the desired effect in Nova Scotia they must be able to function more promptly than in this case where application was made on May 3 and up to June 21 no notification of the board having been set up was received; that is, up to date, no chairman has been appointed to act in this capacity.

Mr. Muise, our representative on the board, carried out his part and submitted the names, while the company's representative did not submit any names and gave no reason for his not accepting any of the men whom Mr. Muise was willing to accept. The following are the names of men whom Mr. Muise submitted, any one of whom would be acceptable to him as chairman of the board.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think my hon. friend should read those names. If as Minister of Labour I am to act upon a recommendation by Mr. Muise as to various representatives on the board, then the names should not be known.

Mr. GILLIS: The names which Mr. Muise submitted?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think it would be fair to tell me that, let alone make it known to the committee. If with that knowledge I selected one of those names, the operators might contend that I did so because I had been asked to do it. I have been very careful in selecting the chairman of a board, where a chairman cannot be agreed upon.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the point at issue. The operators absolutely refuse to accept any of these men.

Mr. McLARTY: That, of course, is their privilege. The operators do not have to make a selection from some panel that is submitted by the local union, and on the other hand the union does not have to make a selection from some panel submitted by the operators. If they can agree upon a chairman, very well; if they cannot agree, it is my duty as Minister of Labour to appoint a chairman.

Mr. GILLIS: The point Mr. McKay had in mind in writing was that the application has been pending now for two months, and the workers' contracts have expired.

Mr. McLARTY: I understood the hon. member to say May 23?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, and this is the latter part of June. Their contracts expired eighteen months ago. It is felt that the operators in Nova Scotia are taking advantage of the war and the men's desire to continue at work, instead of using their only weapon, which is the strike, and that the operators are simply dragging this thing along. There is absolutely no reason why the names that have been submitted should not be acceptable. They are the names of lawyers and judges, not connected with labour in any shape or form.

One of them, in fact, is a coal company official. There is no reason why the operators should take this attitude. Their refusal to accept a chairman simply means that the thing is dragging along and they are keeping wages where they are as long as they possibly can, taking advantage of the war situation. What Mr. McKay is afraid of, and what I am afraid of, is that the miners in these two sections are going to be forced into a false position through being compelled to strike regardless of the war.

Mr. McLARTY: Has the board not been set up? Is it not merely awaiting a chairman?

Mr. GILLIS: It has taken since May 3 to decide upon a chairman, and I think it is prettly nearly time for the Department of Labour to select a chairman.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): The hon, member is out of order. We are discussing section 3, which concerns agreements with provinces and others.

Mr. GILLIS: The reason why I brought this matter up was that by reason of the dispute the miners of these two sections may be on the government's hands, unemployed, if something is not speedily done. I am through with that subject, Mr. Chairman.

Another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour is unemployment among the fishermen of Nova Scotia. There are approximately 40,000 fishermen in our province, and the fisherman can very well be termed the forgotten man. Almost every phase of our economic life is discussed in practically all groups where any talking is done, yet the fisherman is seldom mentioned. I know that the federal government is assisting in the establishment of cooperatives. It has made a generous gesture in that connection which is appreciated very much, but on the whole the plight of the fisherman is deplorable. What I am concerned about is the contributing factors which put the fisherman in this plight, because, apart from direct relief, there are measures which could be taken that would be of material assistance to the fisherman.

In the town of Glace Bay, for example, a man whose earnings are $200 or $300 a year is practically on relief 365 days a year. The harbour at Glace Bay is in such a condition that it is retarding the fishing industry of that town. The harbour master of Glace Bay has written me a letter in which he sets out the facts. But first let me say that if the fishermen in that section do not receive assistance in the form of harbour improvements this season, the chances are that the harbour will have to be closed. Considerable correspondence with regard to the matter has been carried on with the Department of Public Works, but apparently nothing has been done. I should like to read this letter from the harbour master. He starts by wanting me to take a look at Glace Bay harbour. He says:

This harbour, the most eastern in all Canada, is directly on the Cabot strait and the easiest to make of any harbour on the east coast. It is 97 feet wide and 1,000 feet long, with wharf facilities of 400 feet on its north side.

At this date the entrance channel is less than 9 feet deep at low water. Our tides are never more than 3½ to 4 feet. The channel needs dredging. The bottom is muck, and the whole harbour could be deeped to 15 feet in two or three weeks' dredging.

He goes on to speak of the lobster season, and then has this to say of the swordfishing season, which is more important.

The swordfishing season commences about the middle of July, when an average of 150 boats made this harbour their headquarters. Large collection boats follow the swordfish eatch and need 13 to 15 feet of water.

With a channel only 9 feet deep at the present time, these boats are not going to be able to use the harbour. He goes on to say that some 100 Newfoundland two-masted fishing schooners as well as lumber vessels and produce vessels also use this harbour, and he continues:

If the harbour is not dredged at once it may have to be abandoned for 1940.

That is a serious situation facing the fishing industry in that section, where a fleet of 400 vessels are now outfitting to fish on the adjacent banks. He goes on to point out the possibilities for the fishing industry in that section by reason of European fishing being disrupted by the war. It should be possible to assist in the development of this fishing industry and enable it to take care of markets which now cannot be supplied from the other side of the Atlantic, where the war has disrupted the fishing industry.

I also wish to speak of conditions at Port Morien. I have received a complaint from there, and if the matter complained of were remedied it would help to relieve unemployment. About 150 boats go out of Port Morien district. A factory is established there and a certain amount of lobster fishing is done. The man who owns the factory will also buy fish of all kinds, but he has no storage facilities. According to my information, application has been made on two or three occasions for permission to establish a fish shed on the breakwater at Port Morien. At the present time men in that section lose two or three days' fishing a week because there are no storage facilities there. If permission were granted to establish a fish shed on the breakwater, these fishermen could get three or four days' fishing a week after the lobster fishing is over, instead of having to stay at home and seek relief.

These factors, all of which enter into unemployment, are matters which the Department of Labour should check up on, in order that, if at all possible, by the government providing the facilities which are required, these men would be able to carry on fishing operations. The fishermen in this way would be kept off direct relief, which is something they do not want if work can be had. I am sure that action by the department would help to relieve the situation in the different places I have mentioned.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that dependents of people interned receive relief on a higher scale sometimes than Canadians on relief. Can the minister say whether that is the situation or not?

Mr. McLARTY: I have no definite figures before me because the internment camps do not come under my department. We have to do with direct relief, but I shall be glad to make inquiry. I should be very much surprised if it were true, but I cannot answer the question offhand.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was informed over the week-end that the dependents of some of the Italians and Germans were receiving relief, and, in some instances, more than Canadians were receiving.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Those of us who come from Saskatchewan are glad to have the clear statement which the minister made this afternoon with reference to the situation in that province, because we have been considerably perturbed about it, and an impression has gone abroad to the effect that the federal government had actually intimated that there would be a reduction. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) used the phrase the other day that between the federal, provincial and municipal bodies there was "considerable passing of the buck", and probably that is the best description which can be given of what has actually occurred. The minister then made this statement:

The municipality is the first authority upon which is placed the responsibility of saying whether or not there is going to be any further relief. For that very reason the municipality is ask to pay 20 per cent of the cost of relief. Somebody, some time, has to begin to stop it; after the municipality has had its say, the province has its chance, and this government, as well as the previous government, has in most instances accepted the statement from the municipality, . . .

While on paper that may be what ought to happen, it is not what happened. It is true that when application is being made for relief, the person desiring relief goes to the municipal authorities; they in turn make application to the provincial government; and they in turn to the federal government. But when relief is stopped, its cessation is not instituted by the municipal body. In fact every day there come to my desk, and no doubt to those of other hon, members, letters from reeves of municipal councils pointing out that when a meeting is held the provincial relief officer merely intimates to them that they will have to cut down the orders a certain percentage this month. In some instances it has been intimated to them that the government will not be able to pay the councils anything in a certain month. The initiative does not lie with municipal councils. They are merely told what the pattern is for the particular month and they have to cut their cloth accordingly. There may be a reason for that. Probably the provincial government has only a limited amount of money which it can spend for relief in the particular month. But I think it is an erroneous impression to give that the municipal body decides that relief will be cut and so notifies the provincial government, and they in turn the federal government.

Regarding the minister's statement to-day, and in view of the stand which, I know, most of these municipal bodies have taken—for the fact of the matter is that the reductions which have occurred in Saskatchewan have to a large extent been the result of the financial condition of the province—I am convinced that the minister's statement will be welcomed when he says that the federal government will be prepared to continue to pay forty per cent, as they have done in other years, and that, contrary to what was feared, no maximum limit will be set.

Could I now ask the minister, unless the question would more appropriately come under the next section, whether the government has decided to abandon the farm placement scheme? It has not been used this year. Has it been decided to abandon it completely?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not believe there has been any definite decision upon that. Negotiations with the provinces have been continuing; I cannot advise definitely what state they are in; but there is no intention of abandoning the scheme.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It was not in operation this last year.

Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. McLARTY: I believe that was because certain provinces were content not to have it this last year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Speaking to this measure, one reason I have for rising is that the other day the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) accused me of having made some statements which insulted certain people. I rose at the time to ask him a question and to request him to read the statement which I made, but he would neither read the statement nor permit the question. If he will read what I said he will find that I merely repeated a story which had been told, to illustrate the fact that it might be possible for a person in gaol to receive better medical attention than a poor person who was unemployed. I did not insult the medical profession. I wish to pay tribute to that profession and, in particular, to those noble men who have remained in the droughtstricken areas along with the teachers and farmers, and fought on. I paid particular tribute at that time to the work for the prevention of tuberculosis in Saskatchewan. I believe that this work should be continued and spread across Canada, and that preventive work should be applied not only to tuberculosis but also to other diseases. There are many thousands of cases which, although not so acute as to require an immediate operation, call for preventive treatment, and the absence of it occasions much needless suffering.

With further reference to this measure, I wish to endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that there should be some federal supervision of the administration of this money. If the dominion government is making a forty per cent contribution to a province, I believe it is only just, and in conformity with the wishes of every hon. member of this committee, that we should know that that money is being properly distributed.

I should like also to endorse what the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has said this afternoon. I am in receipt of a communication from the reeve of a municipality in the constituency of Yorkton, in which he states that all provincial assistance for relief for indigents was being cut off as from the end of April, 1940; and, he was instructed, henceforth the responsibility for this relief would have to rest entirely with the municipality. Hundreds of municipalities in Saskatchewan are absolutely bankrupt. Many mortgages are being foreclosed and the owners thrown off their farms; there is no hope for them except in the way of relief, and if relief is cut off I do not know what the results will be.

I was pleased to hear this afternoon that the minister through his department intends to make grants, based upon the requests which come from the provincial government and from the municipalities. I hope that the discrepancies which have occurred in the past will not occur again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not intervened at any great length in this debate. But as it is now the 23rd of June, and about half the calendar year has expired, surely the provinces must have made their representations for relief for the remaining period of the fiscal year and the remaining period of the calendar year. If such is the case, would the minister be good enough to place on the record, at some time before this bill passes out of the committee stage, a statement of just what the provinces propose for this year? I have in mind my own province. As he is aware, we have no registered direct relief there, but do not let him or any other hon. member think for a minute that there is no occasion for some direct relief.

Mr. McLARTY: My impression is that the province of New Brunswick in some instances gives grants in aid to the municipalities, but we do not make any contribution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am coming to that. The province just arbitrarily cut off what is known as direct relief, but by force majeure they were compelled to give certain municipalities grants in aid for cases of needy persons; it had to be done. I am not so much opposed to municipal responsibility in cases where the municipalities are able to support the burden themselves, because it is left immediately on their doorstep and they must take care of the situation. But there are certain municipalities in New Brunswick which just cannot do that. I have in mind the county of Northumberland. Before the depression the county had a bonded debt of $28,000, a mere bagatelle for a county of that size. To-day their bonded debt is so large, and almost entirely for relief, that they cannot borrow another cent and cannot collect taxes. Conditions on the Miramichi river have been so bad that the municipality cannot collect fifty per cent of the taxes, with the result that it is unable to carry on direct relief. There has been no default, because the provincial treasury has come to their rescue. It has had to guarantee their bonds, and how much they have had to pay in service charges on these bonds I do not know, not having looked into the figures.

At some stage in the passage of this bill we should be told what the proposals of the provinces are. After all, the principle here is simply grants in aid, nothing being initiated by the department itself. In view of what the minister said at the opening stages of the bill, I am not going to quarrel with that position. It is true that the Rowell commission went a long way and recommended that the dominion take over the entire question. That of course would relieve the municipalities and provinces of a huge obligation, but it is so important in dollars and cents that the question should be studied with very great care. That may become necessary in certain places, with certain municipalities and provinces, but it ought not to be necessary in some of the other provinces. I do not want to express any dogmatic opinion on the question, but I suggest that the dominion should not assume this burden lightly, having regard to what we have heard to-day. Surely each one ought to carry his own burden of taxation and the responsibility in connection therewith, and we all know that the primary responsibility is with the municipality. That is the constitutional position. What proposals if any have been formulated by the various provinces for grants in aid under this bill? I refer particularly to my own province of New Brunswick.

Mr. McLARTY: I will endeavour to get as much information as I can during the dinner recess.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not ask for it now, but it might be given before the bill passes out of the committee stage or, if that is not convenient, before the third reading.

Mr. McLARTY: I was hoping that we could get out of the committee stage to-day.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has any special agreement been entered into or has there been any understanding with the provincial governments with regard to the technical training of youth? The minister stated earlier in the discussion that he hoped steps had been taken to keep open the technical schools in Canada with a view to giving summer training to some 4,000 or 4,500 of our young people. I wonder if any agreement has been entered into with Nova Scotia to this end and, if so, whether any steps have been taken in a community such as Amherst where there is considerable activity in the construction of aeroplanes. It is expected that a reconditioning establishment will be set up there for the reconditioning of aeroplanes. Have any steps been taken for training to be given in Amherst? There are mechanical schools there. They have not the advantage of a technical college, but there are a great many young men, some of whom unfortunately have been on relief, who have an aptitude for this work and desire to obtain training so as to fit themselves for service in this direction.

Mr. McLARTY: All the provinces have been approached, but I should not like to speak from memory as to the town of Amherst which the hon. gentleman mentions. However, I will get information on the question.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): On what basis would such an agreement be entered into? Does the department make the entire contribution or does the province contribute a proportion?

Mr. McLARTY: It varies in different provinces. We are going to have to be somewhat generous in our contributions to the provinces. On the question of equipment we have not finally decided upon anything. We are anxious to get it going and we have allowed some details to take care of themselves so far, because the present is the time for us to be getting underway.

Mr. POULIOT: I have three questions to ask. First, what are the actual conditions upon which direct relief may be granted to individuals in each province? Second, what is the amount of direct relief paid to each recipient in each province? Third, are the conditions of granting relief and the amount of relief to be paid to individuals decided by the dominion Department of Labour or by the province or by both?

Mr. McLARTY: The answer will have to be a general one. In the first place the aid is granted to those in necessitous circumstances; in the second place the quantum which each individual receives is determined by the municipality and the province, and our contribution is forty per cent of that of the province. I have not, however, the figures. I think the question should be asked on the estimates when the officials of the department are here. As to the amount of direct relief paid to each recipient in each province, I cannot give any information at the moment.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want to take the minister into a corner to get the information. I shall be satisfied if he will instruct his officials to send me the answer.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to. [Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a word with regard to a check-up on expenditures. Last week we heard a good deal of criticism of the manner in which they are made. In New Brunswick a very large portion of the money that this government grants in aid to the province has been spent for political effect. That ought not to be, and it never was the intention. The intention was that public works should take men off relief. Men on relief were obliged to give political assurances. What check has the department on such activities and on particular expenditures? Does the department follow the money through in any way? I am afraid it does not.

I would suggest to the minister that we forget about the past. Let us for this year. and for succeeding years if we have to have this sort of thing, have some follow-up system, apart from the question of auditing, which I think is all we have at the present time. There should be some follow-up to see that the moneys granted to assist the provinces and municipalities to perform their constitutional function are not abused for political purposes. That is stating the situation succinctly and without going into details. I hope that will be done, even if it is a departure from the experience of the past. I know there has been an audit, which is based largely on the terms of the individual agreements with the provinces, but in my view that is not enough. We should have some kind of follow-up by inspection or otherwise. And let us not have political inspectors. If I interpret my hon. friends to my left correctly, the charge in the west, if I can dignify it by that term, is that the inspection has been more or less political. These are public funds, for the alleviation of human distress, and it does seem to me that we ought not to assent to any trading on that sort of thing. I would not like to be guilty of that myself.

In 1934, 1935 and other years instructions were sent out definitely by the then government that there should be no discrimination. But I venture to say that in some instances those instructions were not followed out. Partisans will be zealous. The intention of the then government, however, was as I have said, and if we erred at all at that time it was because we did not follow it up with a check. I am not seeking to escape any responsibility that attaches to me or to the former government. If these things have happened, that is all the more reason and inducement to correct a situation which I apprehend exists in certain places, and which I know existed last year in New Brunswick. Let us treat this matter from a humanitarian point of view, not from the point of view of political gain. In fact I doubt very much whether it produces political gain. I have an idea that in the provincial election in New Brunswick last fall the government of the day lost hundreds of votes by the way in which they attempted to handle this relief proposition. I have no doubt that it reacted against them, because people resent being led to the polls. There is a certain element of coercion, and fear may be inspired.

Let me give an illustration, not of abuse of relief money, but of the way in which provincial governments treat moneys sent them by this government. I was surprised to learn the other day that some thousands of dollars had been sent out to the various provinces by the Department of Pensions and National Health for air raid precautions. The sum of $5,000 was allocated to New Brunswick. If anything substantial was to have been done in that regard, of course $5,000 would be a very small amount, even for the seaport city of Saint John. But all the money that ever was spent for air raid precautions in the city of Saint John was spent by the municipality itself, and as far as I have been able to ascertain-I speak subject to correction, because we do not want to be dogmatic about these matters-not one dollar of that $5,000 was spent for air raid precautions. If it has not been spent the money ought to be returned to the dominion treasury. It is not under the minister's department, and when the appropriate minister comes with his estimates I am going to ask him about this, but it illustrates the principle for which I am contending. If it is not checked up, that money will just go into the consolidated revenue fund of the province, a contribution from this dominion to the province, never expended and never returned.

Would the minister during the dinner recess give some consideration to the two points I have raised, namely the question of what arrangements have been or are being made or negotiated with the provinces, and the question of a check-up on the expenditure? I know he will agree with me one hundred per cent in respect of the principle which I am advocating.

Mr. MacNICOL: Section 3 provides:

The governor in council may enter into agreements:

(b) with corporations or partnerships or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

If the minister has the information, would he give the committee an outline of what it is proposed to do under paragraph (b), particularly in reference to Ontario? I notice on page 6 of the report of the dominion commission of unemployment relief under the 1939 act, in reference to Ontario, under the heading "Rehabilitation of older unemployed," it speaks of agricultural training, training in skilled trades and industrial occupations. Then on page 12, in reference to Ontario, the statement is that for the rehabilitation of higher age people, $27,500 was spent. The minister should tell us how that money was spent, how they were rehabilitated, if it means rehabilitating men who were mechanics but who through unemployment, had perhaps lost the finesse of their trade, and if so, how that money was applied to industry under paragraph (b).

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to. But I may point out that many questions have been asked that I would be much freer to answer on the estimates, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to press it.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to give the information.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member for Davenport asked a question as to what is being done with regard to the development of technical schools in Ontario, and elsewhere throughout Canada. In that connection I shall make a statement which, I believe, will cover the matter rather fully.

Arrangements have been made in eight provinces for the use of the vocational shops in technical schools during the summer vacation period. These shops will be used to provide instruction in occupations connected with industries engaged in war contract work and will be devoted chiefly to machine-shop, sheetmetal work, moulding, welding, production workers for aircraft manufacturing and, where there is a demand, motor mechanics and wood working.

The minimum age of admission is sixteen years, and at the outset a large proportion of the trainees will be drawn from the students in the senior years of the technical schools. Older men will also be admitted to these courses, provided they have had some previous experience in the trade for which training is desired.

The technical schools' facilities are being placed at the disposal of the government without charge for rental or depreciation as the municipalities' contribution. Approximately, fifty-five technical schools have been offered for this purpose distributed as follows:

Ontario	 24
British Columbia
Alberta
Saskatchewan
Manitoba	2
Quebec	 12
New Brunswick
Nova Scotia	 1

In answer to the hon, member for Cumberland, may I point out that the one in Nova Scotia is the Nova Scotia Technical college. The supervisor of youth training advises me that this is the only college really available in Nova Scotia.

The first schools were opened a week ago, and it is expected that all schools will be in operation by the beginning of July, according training facilities to a minimum of 5,000. Where necessary, a second shift will be operated in the schools with eight hours instruction a day, with a total of 350 to 500 hours during the course. These schools are in addition to those that are being operated under the regular youth training programme, but they will be coordinated with its activities.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Will night classes be organized and arranged for those in regular employment during the day?

Mr. McLARTY: That is being presently organized, but they might not be night classes. The suggestion is an eight-hour day, with a break at about three o'clock in the afternoon. But in some circumstances it might be possible to establish night classes for the training of youth.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That condition presently obtains under the curriculum of the technical schools. They have night classes on at least three nights in the week, in connection with the mechanical trades.

Mr. McLARTY: Those are in the vocational schools, under the regular youth training plan, I believe.

Mr. PERLEY: Section 3 provides for agreements with the provinces for the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. I have listened to the discussions which have taken place on the bill, and the discussion on the resolution which preceded the bill. I have listened to the debate with considerable interest, and I have felt as did the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) who prefaced his remarks the other night by saying he had not intended speaking, but after listening to the speeches from hon. members in the extreme left-hand corner of the house he had decided to say something.

After having listened to the speech of the hon, member for Wood Mountain, I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words.

I believe I have not trespassed unduly on the time of the house thus far. The question of unemployment and agricultural distress has long since reached the point where it is a national problem. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member for Wood Mountain stressed the point that the rural municipalities had the first responsibility, the province the second and the federal government the third. To my mind the rural municipalities and the provinces can no longer cope with this problem.

Why do I say that? First, many of the rural municipalities in Saskatchewan have reached the point where they cannot finance their own obligations, carry on their own road work and perform other necessary tasks. For any expenditures in connection with relief they must depend upon the guarantee of the province which they must give the bank before they can obtain any money. In turn the province comes to the federal government.

When we were discussing the resolution I heard the hon, member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) ask why men are out of work to-day. It must be remembered that we are at war, and that industry has been asked to step up production. His question was a reasonable one, namely: Why are men out of work to-day? Possibly there is a reason for that, but I think hon members will agree with me when I say that agricultural distress involves a further question, namely, that of production and marketing. I believe the government cannot divorce itself from these problems, when it deals with matters connected with unemployment and agricultural distress, and particularly is that so when it is dealing with the provinces.

In his opening observations respecting the estimates of his department, the Minister of Agriculture outlined the reorganization which had been taking place in his department in the last year or so along lines of production and marketing. I believe that is a splendid idea. Had his department been properly organized with a view to what was going to take place in the future in connection with agriculture, and had the minister in the last year or so been giving his department the attention it deserves, thousands of men could have found employment on the farms in Saskatchewan.

Someone may ask me how that could have been done. It seems to me obvious that in the future years we shall have to change our whole system of agriculture. We must change to meet changed conditions, and that change will involve intensified agriculture and the development and production on the farms of Saskatchewan of commodities they are not producing at the present time. It was only a day or so ago that the Minister of Agriculture made a statement at a point in Ontario with respect to the production of cheese and described how the production of that commodity had been stepped up. That is just one evidence of what will take place in the future.

In the last few years the Department of Labour has never had a real or constructive policy. Of course we cannot blame the present minister, because two or three years ago he did not head that department. To prove that the department has not approached the problem of unemployment in a constructive way, I need only refer to the first report of the Purvis commission which made certain recommendations. A great many of those recommendations were never carried out, and there has been no evidence that the Department of Labour intended to carry them out.

Resolution after resolution are coming to hand. I have received many of them from my province and other provinces in the west. I have received them from organized bodies, farmers' organizations, heads of industries, pool organizations, and other groups, stressing the point that the recommendations of the Purvis commission at least to some extent should have been carried out. I think hon members will agree that the heads of all types of industry, and of agriculture in particular, should have been called into action a year or so ago.

I agree with what the hon, member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) said the other evening, that in western Canada much could be done to alleviate unemployment by paying some attention to the development of industry. He referred to Winnipeg in particular. I should like to call attention to what has happened in connection with the General Motors plant in Regina. Labour could be employed in industry in western Canada just as well as in agriculture. There would be a great saving in freight to the agriculturists of western Canada if certain lines of the implements of production were produced in the west.

The federal government is just passing the buck. On Friday afternoon the Minister of Labour said that he had never been asked by the provincial government to diminish relief distribution. That may be so, but I notice that to-day he tabled the details of the appropriation being asked for by Saskatchewan. That is considerably less than it was last year, which is all to the good.

Mr. McLARTY: I would not want to mislead the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. The figures I gave were the estimates made by the department, which were based on the figures that came in. I would not want to suggest that that appropriation was asked for by Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: But the minister will admit that on Friday afternoon he said that he had never been asked by the province to diminish relief distribution? I am not objecting to that, but I do contend that relief was withheld. There was considerable distress and suffering last year because relief was withheld in those areas in Saskatchewan which qualified for the bonus plan provided by the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That relief was withheld, I believe on the direct order of the Minister of Agriculture, who has charge more or less of relief in that province. Those townships which qualified for bonuses under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act had relief payments withheld.

Mr. GARDINER: I know the hon. member does not want to make any statement which is not correct. I believe relief was paid in every municipality in Saskatchewan in which the acreage bonus was paid.

Mr. PERLEY: The provincial government stated that direct instructions were issued by the Minister of Agriculture that there would be no relief paid to those farmers who qualified for the bonus.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think any such statement was given out. If it was given out, it was not under my instructions.

Mr. PERLEY: There was a relief distribution under the arrangement which the Department of Labour had with the provincial government and the municipalities.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the way it has been done.

Mr. PERLEY: If the minister will just bide his time, I saw letter after letter which had been sent out by the municipalities, under instructions of the provincial government, stating that farmers who had qualified for the bonus would not receive any more relief.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why do you not change your provincial government?

Mr. PERLEY: I think if they had had a fair show up there, no politics being played such as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) described the other evening, the situation might have been different. He told the committee how relief orders were handed out in the polling booths on election day.

Mr. GARDINER: If you would not make so many agreements with other groups, perhaps you would get somewhere.

Mr. PERLEY: We will attend to that a little later. I may say that in the last session there used to be many of these interruptions. I should like to make just one speech while the Minister of Agriculture was glued to his seat. I was going to give him a little credit. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act which was passed at the regular session of 1939 was a relief measure and it cannot be dissociated from this measure. But as I say, many of the farmers who qualified for the bonus did not receive it in time to have it do good. It was provided that sixty per cent of the bonus would be paid in December and forty per cent in March. Under the survey which was made cortain townships qualified, but that survey was inefficient. I believe politics were played to quite an extent. I could show a number of letters in proof of that, if I so desired.

The bonus cheques which should have been delivered in December were withheld or delayed until March. Many of these were not received until March 21, a day or so before the election. Hon. members will appreciate the distress which the non-receipt of these cheques would cause to farmers having a crop of only five, eight or twelve bushels to the acre. These bonus cheques were not received in time, and the farmers were cut off relief. The municipalities should have made the survey in the first place. They eventually had to do it during the election campaign. If these farmers had received their bonus cheques in December they could have provided—

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, if I attempted to answer the hon. member at this time I would be declared out of order. When we come to discuss the estimates dealing with this matter, there will be plenty of opportunity for debate. I think the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. PERLEY: Not at all. The minister spoke the other night, and he was allowed what the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) referred to as lots of latitude and longitude.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Jean): I am not giving a decision on the point of order, but I think the hon member should restrict his remarks to section 3 of the bill.

Mr. PERLEY: That section provides for agreements to be made with the provinces for the relief of agricultural distress. This bill is a relief measure, as was the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That act was an insurance and relief measure; a little of both, but not enough of either.

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing to do with this bill at all.

Mr. PERLEY: I am making a point that farmers were cut off relief last fall because they had qualified for the bonus. If that bonus had been received in time they would have been able to acquire their seed oats and seed barley before they advanced in price. Seed oats went up ten cents a bushel and barley advanced fifteen to twenty cents a bushel. It would have been a fair relief measure if it had been properly administered.

At this session many problems should be dealt with which would relieve agricultural distress in Saskatchewan. On Friday afternoon the hon, member for Wood Mountain stated that no politics had been played in connection with the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan. I think he was generous enough to say that politics had not been played by any party. He was really funny; that was a joke. Of course, he was addressing himself to the extreme left-hand corner of the chamber, but when he spoke I was reminded of the group that used to sit here to my right from 1930 to 1935. Some hon, members will recall the time when matters pertaining to relief were brought forward by the government of the day; they will remember the opposition and the terrible wails which came from that row.

Let me recall some of them. There was the then hon. member for Assiniboia, who graciously gave up his seat to the Minister of Agriculture. No politics there! Oh, no! But he has a good job now, has he not? Then there was the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), formerly the member for Willow Bunch. He has not been given a job yet, but I think his speech the other evening was a bid for a seat in the other chamber. He has mellowed somewhat, and he may yet be taken care of. Then there was the former hon. member for Yorkton. He was defeated. Where is he now? No politics there, of course! The then hon. member for Weyburn was defeated. Where is he now? And the then hon, member for Humboldt, where is he now? There was the then hon. member for North Battleford; I think we shall hear more of him. There was another hon, member on the government side who was defeated in the last election, the former honmember for Melfort, who was vociferous in the last house, and I say, sir, that when the people of Canada are demanding national government and that the best brains be brought in to serve the country, to bring that man down here to be a liaison officer between the Minister of National Defence for Air

(Mr. Power) and the members of this house—well, he knows as much about aeroplanes as I do about elephants.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): A very good man.

Mr. PERLEY: The people of the west will express themselves about these matters, and I am mentioning them in reply to the member for Wood Mountain, who said the other evening that there was no politics being played.

Mr. WOOD: Do not overlook the former member for Hamilton West.

Mr. PERLEY: Probably a few were taken on as a just reward for their ability if the government was looking for brains. Naturally in that instance the government had to go a little far afield.

Mr. MAYBANK: Do not forget my former colleague from Winnipeg North. There was no politics there, of course.

Mr. PERLEY: Again I answer that the government was looking for brains, apparently, and the former member for Winnipeg North displayed that he had brains on several occasions in this house.

Mr. WOOD: Is that why you have never been asked?

Mr. PERLEY: How do you know I have never been asked?

The hon, member for Wood Mountain said that the farmers of the west should help themselves, and that is the statement I protest against. The farmers of the west are just as anxious to help themselves as any other class of people upon whom misfortune has fallen during the last few years, and they would have dug their wells and built their chimneys —he referred to that—if they had been given the opportunity. Under the Agricultural Assistance Act provision was made for the farmers to build their own dug-outs, in order to give them work, and they were to be paid for that work. Money was voted at the last regular session for that purpose. But no matter how much they wanted this work, they were not allowed to do it because the Minister of Agriculture allowed contractors to do the work with power machinery, drag-lines, and so on. They did so much work and did it so fast that the appropriation for that purpose was overspent by 30 per cent, and one of the first acts of the government this session was to ask the house to pass an interim supply bill to provide, among other items, payment for that work.

The hon, member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) the other evening gave the committee some idea of how relief was handled during the provincial campaign, and it was a good answer to the hon. member for Wood Mountain. There should be a proper administration of relief money and a proper check made. I endorse the plea that was made this afternoon by our leader, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that the government should see to it that a proper check and a proper administration of relief expenditures be provided.

The farmers of Saskatchewan who have been forced to go on relief, not of their own will at all but owing to conditions over which they had no control, appreciate very much the assistance given them by the other provinces, and I want to go on record as endorsing what has already been said in that respect. I am sure that ninety-five per cent of our farmers want the chance to earn their relief, and if they had that opportunity conditions would be quite different. I have dozens and dozens of letters telling of the distress in certain parts of Saskatchewan; but as the hon. member for Wood Mountain has protested against the reading of letters, many of which have already been read by the group in the corner of the house to my left, I shall not read them.

Unemployment and agricultural distress now constitute a national problem and a national responsibility. The municipalities cannot even provide their twenty per cent. If about seventy-five per cent of the inspectors and government officials who are engaged in connection with the expenditure of relief moneys were fired, the money would do much more good because a great deal of it now goes to those officials.

Mr. HOMUTH: If you fired them, the organization would break down.

Mr. PERLEY: I want to urge upon the Minister of Labour the necessity of a proper check, proper supervision and the elimination of extravagance and waste in the expenditure of the moneys to be voted for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Mr. CHURCH: The bill now before the committee deals with two matters, the alleviation of unemployment and the alleviation of agricultural distress. The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Perley) has spoken of conditions in his riding, but as I see it, that is not a subject for discussion on this bill. We must not forget that the agreements made under this bill are three-part agreements, as between the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. Over ten years ago, in 1927, when I first brought this matter to the attention of the house and asked for a three-way split in this expenditure, I was told by Mr.

Heenan, who was then Minister of Labour, that under the British North America Act unemployment relief and agricultural assistance were matters for the provinces and municipalities, not for this parliament. But in 1930, during the depression, parliament was forced to do something, and it passed the first clause of this section, giving the governor in council power to enter into agreements with the provinces and municipalities for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress.

The conditions in a particular riding have nothing to do with these agreements. There are two other parties to the agreement who will have something to say about those conditions and the relief thereof-three-fold by agreement. Saskatchewan got something which no other province ever got in the way of several votes and also a capital vote, a maintenance vote and other aids and assistance for agricultural distress directly handed over to the province. My contention, Mr. Chairman, is that if any relief is to be given, there should be a standard agreement, with equality of treatment for all the provinces. We have had a lot of useless commissions handling relief. Mr. Hopkins, over in the United States, handled relief for ten years for 127,000,000 people, and he insisted upon having a standard agreement for the state or the municipality or other relief area. The result was that he obtained more value for the money than this parliament has got.

Canada has spent one billion dollars on relief works and agricultural assistance. That is the total of federal, provincial and municipal aid herein, and what is there to show for it? Very little. The government in the past had one policy in respect of one province and another for another province, and no uniform standard aid to each and all of the provinces. For example, take the industrial provinces: the agreement in the past was lop-sided, one-sided. In the province of Quebec, where the provincial government, the municipalities and the federal administration were of one mind, it appears, according to a return to the house which I read four sessions ago to the minister, that relief was disbursed in all sorts of municipal ways-on public works, roadways, sidewalks, sewers, schools, hospitals, botanical gardens, while similar federal aid was not given to Ontario. In addition, they had what was known as the federal municipal assistance act. Ontario was not so favoured, because the provincial government did not see fit to allow the Ontario municipalities to come under that act. They did not get a single dollar by way of a municipal assistance act, as other provinces did, nor any of these municipal works which the other provinces have had.

My point is this, that if we are going to make an agreement with the provinces, it should be a hard and fast, standard agreement, uniform for one and all alike. Every province has some agricultural relief problems; every province has many unemployed on relief. Why, then, should there not be a standard agreement? Why give favours to the one at the expense of the rest of the country? I have been through the ridings of the hon. gentlemen who sit for the districts of north Muskoka, Parry Sound, new Ontario, and many other counties, including Brant, and I have observed that agriculture is suffering badly in many counties in the forgotten province of Ontario, if not as seriously as in Saskatchewan, yet to an extent which requires assistance from this government.

My second point is this. Six or seven years ago there was added a clause which is now paragraph (b) of section 3, "agreements with provinces and others", because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways wanted votes from the federal power or loans to aid building necessary equipment. The paragraph reads:

The governor in council may enter into agreements: . . .

(b) with corporations or partnerships or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

Owing to the war, the minister with the provinces will have to consider a new urgent factor of aiding individuals and firms in industry. Owing to the loss of business by Canada, the fifth trading nation that we are, the dominion will now have to take into consideration the results of the loss to it of markets by this war in France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Finland, Baltic States, some Mediterranean countries and the Black sea ports. I have here a telegram which I will hand to the minister. I do not wish to mention the name of the firm, but it is one of the largest employers of labour in Toronto. Up to the present time they have never known what it is to close their doors, but they have closed them within the last twenty-four hours. The message reads:

Factory closed due loss entire European trade. Urgently need government contracts for munitions chemicals explosives shells or anything. Have ample space and excellent organization. Coming to Ottawa later in the week. Meanwhile will you think matter over and be prepared to advise me?

This firm did a great deal for the rebuilding of the east end of Toronto and the waterfront of that city; they used to employ nearly 900 men; latterly I believe they have had 350 or 375. Now they close up and the workers are virtually out on the street. Their case comes under paragraph (b):

. . . corporations or partnerships or individuals engaged in industry respecting the expansion of industrial employment.

If their employees are unable to get other work they will have to go on relief. That is one of the matters which the minister should take up with the provinces and the munitions board because the telegram suggests the use of the plant for war orders.

Notwithstanding all the commissions which the government has appointed. I have not heard one new constructive suggestion in this chamber in the last three years. It is three years ago since I proposed that we should have a system of national service for the youth of this country for peace and war alike, whereby they could learn a trade in one of many industries, meanwhile receiving pocketmoney, lodging, deferred pay, clothing and food, and undergo a certain amount of military training. Had that been done in the period during which the government has been spending a billion dollars, the youth of this country could have long ago helped to furnish five or six hundred thousand men capable of manufacturing shells, tanks and other necessary equipment, and helped in enlisting. But the government did not do a thing about the matter or for a survey of large and small plants and a national register.

I was here three years ago with the Toronto board of education. It was on that board years ago that I started. They have three large technical schools—Western Technical, Danforth Technical, and Central Technical and vocational schools-and they proposed to give the government the use of their buildings and plant and sought federal aid. Our young people are being trained in the evenings; the city of Toronto is spending $12,000,000 a year on all kinds of education. Central Technical and Danforth Technical have eight to ten thousand young people trying to learn various trades, including the metal trade, one of the twelve key industries which the British government has brought under the national service act in the last four years. A few years ago the federal government struck off any grants for technical education, as formerly, although it is federal work in relation to industry and commerce. Let me plead with the minister that in making an agreement with the provinces he should include a vote to enable federal power and the provinces to maintain these technical schools, now doing war work for industry.

Nearly a month ago I called the attention of the government to the fact that the high schools, colleges and universities this spring and summer were turning out great numbers of pupils, and wanted to know what they were to do to use their services in the vacation. I asked for the opening, as in other years, of cadet camps for training, and in addition I suggested, as was proposed when the Toronto board of education were down here three years ago, that the technical schools be kept open for three months in the summer time and the staffs utilized to train the youth of the country, and that student labour be used in the summer months to develop Canada's natural resources. Yet nothing was done; the government would not even give the matter a thought. For some days they even declined to see the board of education delegation, telling the board to go to the provinces and to the municipalities. I suggest that the government, instead of providing some assistance to keep these schools open in the three summer months so that the employees of the John Inglis company and other munitions companies may obtain a certain amount of training at night for their help, should have the schools open the full twleve months with federal and provincial aid. I made that suggestion two years ago. The war branch work of these schools should be expanded, and the dominion should pay one-third of the cost all the year round, not merely for three months, and the province should pay one-third. The municipality should not bear the brunt of the whole thing.

Another matter I should like to mention in connection with this agreement—for, as I read Hansard, the minister has not said a word about it—is, what is to become of people forty-five years of age and over? The other evening I pointed out that there are industries which will not employ a man after he is forty or forty-five years old. What is to become of these people? They are the forgotten people in industry. The United States have a policy for them; but in Canada the man of forty to forty-five is to-day the forgotten man in industry. He cannot get a job; he cannot enlist.

It was said in this chamber the other day that as a consequence of recruiting something is going to be done to lessen relief costs. I can tell the committee that in the Royal Canadian Air Force and the army and navy at Toronto, when young people come to enlist, they are told, "We won't take you on until next fall," and they cannot get enlisted. I can name the schools from which these young men came; I can mention some of the names of those who were unable to join up as recently as last week. I tried to find out from the officers what was the reason, but I was unable to find out anything. In fact, since the present heads of that district have been in control, there is not a member of parliament who has been asked to cooperate with the military heads of No. 2 district, as the former minister wrote asking us to do last September. They have never been invited once to visit the camps and other institutions or buildings and see what is going on in that district or city. The minister, if he wants progress before next winter, should see to it that recruiting shall go on at once, day by day-not on again, off again, and on againand that the offices are kept open, if necessary at nights, in order that young people may be enrolled for war work and voluntary recruiting encouraged.

Three years ago I asked for an apprenticeship system and urged the need of controlling the entry of juveniles into employment. Hon. members will see a report of the matter in Hansard of the 31st March and a few days in April, 1936.

In our educational example, one of the chief weaknesses of the body politic is the dislike manifested by many of the most enlightened industrialists, who are really keen on education, for any organized system of part-time education and part-time employment. The problems of internal factory organization which such a system must create are many and serious; yet unless they can be solved, unless the inhibition can be removed, no thorough educational reform is possible. There is one obvious way of removing the inhibition: the five-day working week, during which the employed juvenile would receive his specific draft training in the factory, with a universal system of Saturday morning continuation classes.

This suggestion has been made but nothing has been done. I urge further that during the coming summer those who were formerly taken care of in the militia department at the cadet high school camps should be given a period of military training as in the last war as an aid to employment. In reply to a question of mine, certain figures on this matter by provinces were given some weeks ago and will be found at page 346 of Hansard. I urge that high schools, universities, students out of work and others should be taken care of by such national service training with pay.

The agreements under this section should cover all the provinces and not just some of them. There is no reason why some provinces should receive a hand-out while others are denied any benefits. There should be a better working arrangement with Ontario, which, as I have pointed out on many previous occasions, has been discriminated against.

Ontario is the forgotten province so far as expenditures under this vote are concerned. The municipalities of that province cannot qualify under the two statutes that I have named, and in my opinion the money for the larger municipalities should be earmarked when given for them to the provinces.

I hope the minister will give some consideration to these matters and to the question of real estate relief which I raised the other night, in addition to the matter of national registration for jobs. They are not new questions; far from it. In fact, I have not heard of any new suggestions made here, nor have I read of any that have been put forward in the debates since this subject has been under discussion. There should be protection for all the people of Canada. I believe in doing everything we possibly can for the youth of the country, but as regards a ministry for youth, I suggest that the whole population should be protected. Why should we make provision only for the youth of the country? I believe in protection, not just for some of the people some of the time, but for all the people all the time, including the forgotten class, those of forty and forty-five, our industrial workers who have been driven out of their jobs through no fault of their own. I believe in unemployment insurance and other aids for the rest of the population after they have passed the allotted span, and protection for all.

It seems to me that these agreements are one-sided. In this debate we are simply conducting a postmortem on the agreement that expired on March 31. Parliament was not sitting then and we are near the end of June, yet we have no agreement as passed by this house. As I say, we may be simply holding a postmortem on the money that has been or will be spent probably to the end of June.

I wish to commend the minister because he has been most active since taking charge of the department, and I trust that he will be receptive to any suggestions which will help to solve the problem that faces him. There is no reason why we should not adopt a policy of national service such as I have indicated, adapted to Canada's circumstances, in the high and public schools, nor can I see any objection to putting into force a similar policy adapted to Canada as a whole. Why should there not have been long ago a survey of all plants, large and small? Had such a survey been carried out before the war broke out, we would have been in a much better position in our struggle against the forms of agreements for each and all, and regarding the larger corporations I suggest that there should be some consideration for those industries that have closed and for those who have lost their jobs as a result of the war in Europe, as in the case of the industry I mentioned.

Mr. McNIVEN: The discussion this afternoon and to-night seems to have centred round the establishment of the fact that relief is carried on in a political atmosphere, and there seems to be a determination to convey to members of this house the impression that the centre of that activity is in Saskatchewan. It is only necessary to assure the committee that that was the burden of the campaign speeches in the provincial election of 1938, with disastrous results to those who expounded that policy, and likewise in the campaign that has recently concluded. I notice at page 1001 of Hansard that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) uses this language:

The minister wants to know about the administration of relief in Saskatchewan. Let me point out to him what happened in connection with employment upon public projects in Regina. The provincial member for Regina took the stand that unless a man had been able to get his application for work initialed by the president of the Liberal association or, better still, by the Liberal member, he could not obtain employment on a public project.

I would remind hon. members that the subject matter referred to in this speech was also referred to in the last session by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), and at that time I made an explanation which I thought was satisfactory to the members of the house. Undoubtedly it has not been called to the attention of the hon, member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and if he has me in mind when he makes the statement that on relief works it is necessary to have the application initialed by the Liberal member, then I want to assure him that he is mistaken. The provincial member to whom reference is made did make some statement in 1939 and used casual employment at the post office in the city of Regina as the horrible example. In reply I cited that in the Regina post office in Christmas of 1938 there were 143 casual employees, of whom thirty-one were on the eligible list. Of the remaining 112, sixty-nine were returned soldiers, married men with dependants. One was a single returned soldier. Of the other forty-two, eleven were single men and the other thirty-one, married men with dependants. The system followed in selecting these employees was to advise the various veterans' associations that so many positions were available and to send in their recommendations. Their recommendations having been sent in, the postmaster and I made the selections on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why would the postmaster consult a member of parliament? We have not experienced such a thing in our district.

Mr. McNIVEN: Well, it is the policy of the member for Regina City to be of service to any government employee wherever it is possible and to render the maximum of service to the largest possible number of constituents.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why would not the post-master ask the defeated candidate his opinion?

Mr. McNIVEN: Because he was defeated.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would he not be just as reputable a man in the community? I think both sides should be consulted, both the member and the defeated candidate.

Mr. McNIVEN: We had some experience between 1930 and 1935, and I do not know of any defeated candidate or anybody prominently or otherwise identified with the Liberal party ever being consulted or ever getting any employment. There was a decided difference in the administration of employment following 1936 from what obtained prior to 1935. The attack seems to centre on the Minister of Agriculture. My own city was made the centre for the distribution of fruits and vegetables, fish, cheese, beans, et cetera, in 1937, and again in 1938, and I can say for the Minister of Agriculture that he instructed us that the employment incidental to those enterprises was given on exactly the same basis as I mentioned a moment ago. Time and again I have approached the Minister of Agriculture for employment for needy persons on what is known as the prairie farm rehabilitation plan, and have been told by him that, since there was no farm rehabilitation in my constituency, the employment would be given in those centres where the work was being done, the work being undertaken there in order to give employment for people who needed it in that locality. And I had never heard it suggested that employment on projects of that kind was administered on a political basis.

Mr. McNIVEN: For the benefit of the hon. member who has just spoken, I can say that in the last five years I have never asked any man or woman what his or her political convictions were.

There is another act that comes under the administration of the Minister of Labour, and was designed to alleviate unemployment in urban centres. I refer to the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Surely no one will suggest that politics entered into the giving of employment under the terms of that act or in its administration. If it did anywhere else, it certainly did not in Saskatchewan, and more particularly in the city of Regina. In Saskatchewan the federal government had a representative, a Mr. Bingham, and the minister directed that employment on civic projects under that act should be under the direction of a committee of three, the federal representative Mr. Bingham, a nominee of the department of labour of the provincial government, and the city relief officer. As far as the city of Regina is concerned, those three men selected those who should be employed, and employment was given to those who were most in need of it, without reference to political alignment at all.

May I refer now for a moment to a remark made by the hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). I was really surprised to hear him make reference to the former member for Melfort constituency, Mr. Malcolm McLean, in the terms in which he did. It is not like the hon, member for Qu'Appelle to use language of that sort towards a former member of this house. May I say to hon, members who are not acquainted with the former member for Melfort that he sat in this house for ten years and was a good member, that he is a student, and a cultured, talented gentleman. What is more, he served in the great war along with the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), and there is no one in the house who knows his qualifications and ability to adapt himself to circumstances better than does the Minister of National Defence for Air. May I ask who, a year ago, six months ago, three months ago, knew very much about air administration? The Minister for National Defence for Air selected a man whom he knew and who, he thought had the ability to adapt himself to a new department and render a national service at this time. It was unkind of the hon, gentleman to refer to other appointments, and some which might be anticipated. If we were inclined to indulge in recriminations we could go back prior to 1935, and refer to the deputy postmaster general, the deputy minister of marine, and reference was made a moment ago to a member of the civil service commission; all of these were former members of this house from 1930 to 1935, and on or about Augutst 16, 1935, sought their present havens of refuge rather than face the electors.

I should like now to bring to the attention of the minister the plant of General Motors in Regina. That plant was built in 1928; it comprises eleven city blocks or about fifty acres in the city. If my memory serves me aright, the main building is between eleven hundred and twelve hundred feet long and from three hundred to three hundred and fifty feet wide, not including the power plant or heating plant. On the property there is another large warehouse which is used for parts. At one time that plant on an eighthour shift was turning out 210 cars a day and giving employment to over 1,100 men in the plant, with an office staff of about 200. The plant was operated last winter and is still operating five days a week employing between 500 and 530 men, and on that basis it turns out sixty-five cars a day. It is a modern, up-to-date, well-built plant. It will be closed at the end of June, and should be very suitable for the manufacture of either munitions or aircraft. In making that suggestion I have a distinct recollection of a commitment made at the outbreak of the war by Mr. Carmichael, the vice-president and general manager of General Motors, who stated publicly that the facilities of General Motors plants would be available for war work. Here is an opportunity to give employment to large numbers of people in Saskatchewan, and at the same time render a valuable service to the nation at large at this hour of crisis.

Our province has had a most difficult time for the last ten or eleven years, but it is not doing our province any good to do as was done this afternoon by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) when he said that hundreds of municipalities in our province were bankrupt. A number of our municipalities are in difficult circumstances, but to say that hundreds are bankrupt when the total number does not exceed 350 is, to say the least, an exaggeration. Then the hon. gentleman went on to say that hundreds of farmers were being foreclosed and put off their land. I do not know of any such situation. I know that for a period of four years up to about a year ago there had been only some 700 foreclosures permitted in the whole province. Those foreclosures were permitted because the farmers had abandoned their land, nobody was living on it and it was necessary to obtain title in order to do something with the land itself. It does not do my province or any other province any good to hear the assertion that there are hundreds of farmers being thrown off their land, when such is not the fact.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McNIVEN: Ask a question if you wish, but make a speech later.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have evidence to support my statement, and, if you wish, can give the name.

Mr. McNIVEN: The other evening the hon. member made reference to a situation which he described, and said that a sick man could not get proper medical care. He said that subsequently the person in question committed some minor offence and was sent to gaol, and that thereafter he received proper medical treatment. That, sir, is not correct, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. It is not correct to say that one must commit an offence and be sent to gaol in order to receive necessary medical treatment. That is a direct reflection upon the medical profession, upon the hospitals and upon the good common sense of the people of Saskatchewan.

Rather than cite these cases which are exceptions, far better would it be if the hon. member were to tell the committee that the medical profession has done yeoman service, at great disadvantage and under great hardships. It has done great service throughout the drought areas, receiving little or nothing in return by way of compensation. He might have said that a rural municipality in Saskatchewan was the first to adopt the plan of having a municipal doctor. That was away back in 1922, and since that time the scheme has spread throughout Canada and into the United States. Better would it have been to tell how groups of citizens have formed themselves into cooperatives in Saskatchewan, to supply themselves with medical and hospital services. Better would it have been to tell how certain doctors in certain urban centres in Saskatchewan have grouped together and, for a monthly consideration, are giving hospital and medical services to the citizens of that province.

The hon, member did make some passing reference to what has been accomplished in the various sanatoria for the treatment of tuberculosis, but he might have pointed with pride and satisfaction to the fact that the treatment of tuberculosis in Saskatchewan has been so effective that that province has a lower mortality rate from tuberculosis than has any other province in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: And it is free to the individual.

Mr. McNIVEN: Yes; as the minister has said, it is free to the individual. We have gone through trying and difficult times. Today Saskatchewan does not occupy the proud position she once occupied in the family of Canadian provinces. The spirit of the Saskatchewan people in the face of unprecedented difficulty has aroused the admiration of Canadians everywhere, and we will be ever grateful for the assistance rendered by both governments in the last ten years. In common with all Canadians, we are anxious to serve not only Canada but the empire to the maximum of our resources in the grave crisis which confronts the world.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the hon. member for Regina City, along with about 150 of his colleagues, was absent this afternoon, at about five-thirty o'clock, when I dealt with the subject to which he has referred, and when I paid tribute to those doctors who had rendered noble service to the farmers and others of the west. If he will read to-morrow my statement as it appears in Hansard I believe he will find that I stated in the house this afternoon what he has just intimated he would have wished me to state.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I had not intended to speak on this particular occasion, but my good friend the hon. member for Regina City brought to my mind the thought that I am interested in the welfare of the returned men, and in assisting them in securing employment. I am unfortunate in some respects, particularly because I happen to be a member of the opposition. The hon. member told us of his experience in assisting the Postmaster General to pick out certain individuals requiring employment. I have had some experience along those lines, and in that connection I should like to read a letter under date of April 17, 1940, received by one of those chaps. It states:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant advising that you have been recommended by the legion as collector of radio licences for Malita district. In reply I would suggest that you communicate with Mr. G. W. McDonald of Boissevain, who was the former member for the constituency of Souris.

Probably that is proof that I am on the wrong side of the house, if I am to be gainfully employed on behalf of those chaps, or that patronage does now prevail.

I should like to say a word respecting the bill. As has been pointed out by other hon. members, I believe there should be closer contact between the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Agriculture. In my view the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has a distinct bearing on the problem of relief, and at the proper time I shall make further references to that matter. I can well remember the speech delivered last summer by the minister when that measure was brought into effect, when he pointed out that it was hoped the institution of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would do away with relief problems in agricultural areas. I wish to commend the minister upon having taken a step in the right direction. In connection with administration there are several matters with which at the proper time I shall deal. Nevertheless it must be remembered that that measure has a distinct bearing on relief problems.

Many people in townships have received the acreage bonus, on account of the average being over twelve bushels; yet within those townships there are individuals whose yield averaged less than their seed and who have received no consideration for their seed. They require more than their average bonus to live That is a most unfortunate situation. and has arisen because of the set-up. Those people have undergone tremendous hardships. True enough, while the minister did make the statement that this was to take the place of direct relief in every respect, yet some months later he said to western Canada that those people should also receive direct relief. I must say that, in all fairness to the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: I took the position all the way through, that individuals in those townships should receive consideration for relief.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then there was great misunderstanding between the minister and provincial governments in the west.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon, member should read Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That information was distinctly passed on from the provincial departments to the municipalities—and nobody knows it better than I do, because I have been intensely interested in the municipalities.

An hon. MEMBER: You have got it wrong.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think it was a misunderstanding. I wish to give the minister credit. It was later cleared up, when he said those people should have been receiving relief. But there should be a further arrangement whereby departments of labour and agriculture would work in much closer contact. As was pointed out this evening by the hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). of necessity a great change must take place in the agriculture of the prairie provinces, if we are to exist in the future. In that respect I believe the Department of Labour could do a great deal by working in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture. Much detail might be developed along those lines.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much money was spent last year, and how much is it expected will be spent this year on the rehabilitation of the older unemployed?

Mr. McLARTY: The amount of $78,836 is given on page 13 of the report.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that this matter is more closely related to the estimates than to this section of the bill.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is stated on page 13 of the report on the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1939, that $78,836 was spent on the rehabilitation of the unemployed. Is that right?

Mr. McLARTY: I feel it would not be in the report if it were not correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As I said once before, the most important matter we have to deal with is the rehabilitation of these middleaged people. I should like to quote from page 83 of the Purvis commission report, where under the heading of "retraining essential" it states:

As repeatedly emphasized by the national employment commission retraining and reconditioning of Canada's unemployed for employment is an imperative need. In the last issue of this bulletin it was shown that approximately forty-six per cent of those on aid and employable were in the age group from twenty-six to forty-five inclusive. Many of these had previously worked in positions demanding skill. But that was years ago and their use and value in industry consequently has been much reduced.

It is stated here that $19,843,795 was expended for unemployment and agricultural assistance in Canada, with the magnificent sum of $78,836 being expended on these poor fellows to rehabilitate them. The other night we heard how well this government had followed the recommendations made by the employment commission. As far as that is concerned, it is just like throwing a peanut to an elephant. The trouble is that this government has tried to work from the bottom up instead of from the top down. There has been no guidance whatever. The employment commission recommended the setting up of an administrative body to take care of this whole problem. When we suggest that this be done. we are met with the argument that it will have to be done in the near future because it is intended to have unemployment insurance. But the government say they do not want to do it now because there are certain difficulties in the way. As I said before, surely the best brains on the other side ought to be able to get over that little difficulty and carry out the recommendation of the employment commission.

We are just in the same old boat with this bill. Not only that, at the present time there is a definite lack of enterprise on the part of this government. I should like to know what steps are being taken in order to get these middle-aged people back into skilled jobs. All the way through its report the employment commission refers to the need of trained help. We are going to need experienced workmen and we have done nothing about the matter. We have spent only a pittance upon rehabilitating these people who are now useless. The government opposite are perfectly content to hand out just sufficient relief to these people to keep them alive. The excuse is always given that Ontario or some other province will not cooperate with them. Something must be done, and I think we ought to have a statement from the minister as to what is proposed to be done in connection with the setting up of this administrative body recommended by the employment commission. We should know if we are going to get somewhere with regard to training skilled workers for our war effort.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): After recess the minister gave us some further information with respect to technical training in our technical schools and colleges. Any appropriation made for that purpose would appeal to the people to a greater extent than anything else. This will make young men available for mechanical work in connection with the war. The information brought down by the minister was not complete as to the distribution of the funds that are to be made available. According to the report there are twenty-four technical schools in Ontario, but only one in Nova Scotia and six in New Brunswick. Steps should be taken to make this training available to those young men in Nova Scotia who want to be mechanics. There is only the one technical college at Halifax, but something else should be done. Aeroplanes are now being built at Amherst, and they are establishing an industry there to recondition aeroplanes. Amherst is an industrial community, and many of the young citizens are anxious that some provision should be made to provide training for them. Cape Breton Island is an industrial centre, but no provision is being made for that area at all. The minister should bring down a supplementary report stating what his department proposes to do in order to serve the requirements of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLARTY: We are endeavouring to use every technical school in Canada regardless of what province it may be in. During the recess I discussed the question asked by the hon. member with the supervisor of youth training. He advised me that there was only one technical school or college in Nova Scotia which was available. I asked him to give me a further report in connection with the Amherst school, and I shall be glad to advise my hon. friend as soon as we have that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wonder if I could have an answer to my question? How much money is it proposed to spend on the rehabilitation of the middle-aged or older unemployed this year? I note that $78,000 was spent last year. Surely we should have some idea of how much it is proposed to spend this year in order that we may have some idea of whether this bill is any good or not.

Mr. McLARTY: That $78,000 represents the contribution of the dominion only, which is supplemented by the provinces. In some instances—the hon. member was kind enough to mention the fact—we are anxious to move faster than some of the provinces, but we have more or less to govern ourselves by the amount of their contribution. In reply to the hon. member's question, if he will refer to page 17 of the estimates, he will find that the vote being asked for this year is a revote of $45,000 plus an additional $250,000, or a total of $295,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My deskmate was called out, but he wished to ask a question with reference to an item in the table of dominion disbursements under relief legislation on page 40 of the commissioner's report. It shows $93,757.81 disbursed to the Dominion Steel and Coal corporation under the provisions of the 1933 act, and I should like to know how this appropriation comes to be there.

Mr. McLARTY: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, we shall have to leave some of these questions to be answered on the estimates. Offhand I could not state the specific purpose of that appropriation under the 1933 act. I do not want to mislead the committee. At the same time I think it will be appreciated that many of these questions would ordinarily come on the estimates, when they can be thoroughly gone into and discussed.

Mr. HOMUTH: The other day the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was speaking of the establishment of new industries. A great many old industries will also start up again. I have in mind certain sections of western Canada, certain towns of Saskatchewan and Alberta, with buildings which might be available for the production of war material. The time may come when we shall want to have some of our industries far inland; we do not know. In Ontario, where we have a high degree of industrial activity, one does not hear anything about farm relief because our farmers have a good local market, and the small produce from their farms keeps them in spending money week after week. Ontario and Quebec for a great many years have been looked upon by the western provinces with a certain amount of suspicion. They felt that these two provinces were more fortunate in being highly industrialized, with many industrial plants making profits, and conditions generally throughout these provinces better than in western Canada.

I know of nothing that would do more to promote unity and a better understanding among our several provinces than a vast industrial expansion in western Canada. Industrial Ontario and industrial Quebec are not jealous of any industrial expansion in western Canada. It is not many years ago that Winnipeg was looked upon almost as a trading centre, but to-day it is a big industrial city which provides a wonderful market for the surrounding country. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as one representing the west, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) could accomplish something of benefit to the whole country by assisting the west, particularly Alberta and Saskatchewan, to develop industrially. No province in this country has power available more cheaply than Alberta. A good many mechanics have gone out to the west, following the old slogan, "Go west, young man"; many of them have failed through no fault of their own; and if industries could be started up out there to manufacture munitions, for example, it would not only provide these men with employment but be of benefit to the country. I see no reason why textile mills could not be established in western Canada. I sometimes think we are not handling this problem on a large enough scale. Certainly nothing could do more to bind this country together than a great industrial development out in western Canada. It would do much to bring about a better understanding between the provinces. When the war is over, our war-time industries will revert to peace-time activities, and I am just wondering if it would not be possible to have developed in western Canada some of the war industries which are to be established under the Ministry of Munitions.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not quite hear what the minister said in reply to my question as to the expenditure on the rehabilitation of the older unemployed, but I understood that there was $250,000 more in the estimates this year.

Mr. McLARTY: Correct. [Mr. Homuth.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last year $203,000 was appropriated. I refer to the report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief, page 12, left-hand column, "approved undertakings". If you add together the figures for the rehabilitation of the younger men and the older age group, you have a total of $203,600, and out of that $203,600 the minister says we spent only $78,800 last year. Is it proposed this year to spend $250,000 plus what we have here, or just to do no more than we did last year?

Mr. McLARTY: It is a question which I think could be better answered on the estimates, but I can say that this amount is put in for the express purpose of being used. In exactly what provinces or localities it will be spent I shall be glad to advise my hon. friend when the estimates come up.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But the bill providing for the expenditure of this money is before us now.

Mr. McLARTY: The only answer I can give is that the amount provided is $250,000, and I assume it is estimated at the present time that that will be the amount spent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What I am interested in finding out is whether the government propose to do anything further, seeing that we are in a national emergency.

Mr. McLARTY: The answer is yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Many of these men who have had training and experience will probably have to go into the army, and we shall need these men in the worst way. This is a national emergency and we must do something about it. Certainly $250,000 will not go very far. The rehabilitation of these men takes time, and there ought to be a plan laid out and plenty of money made available. Instead of doing just what we did before, spending $78,000 out of an appropriation of $203,000, we ought to spend more than $250,000 and get something done.

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry to take up the time of the committee, but I wish to make one or two observations prompted by the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Homuth). I represent as part of my constituency a fine little town of almost 7,000 inhabitants. Formerly it had a larger population. I refer to Portage la Prairie. At one time quite a number of important industries and factories were located in that city. One by one they have "folded up" and have departed to the parent company in eastern Canada.

I agree with the hon. member who said that we should have in Canada a more balanced economy, and I cannot think of anything that would balance our economy more effectively and more quickly than for eastern manufacturers to set up industries in western Canada. They did so in the past, but when depression struck the west, and the purchasing power declined, they closed up and came back east.

In Portage la Prairie there is one particular industry which provides, I think, a legitimate grievance. I refer to a flour mill which flourished there for forty-five years. Just recently this mill was modernized. It is quite large; I believe it will produce about 1,000 barrels of flour a day; and it provided employment for many people in our city. But because the export trade had fallen off, and because flour could be manufactured more cheaply in Ontario, the mill was closed and the employees and their families, some of whom had grown up within the shelter of the mill, were thrown on their own resources. Some of them, I understand, are on relief. If there is any industry which should succeed, it is one which has the raw material right at its doors. There we had a milling industry, situated in the heart of the greatest graingrowing district in western Canada, enjoying protection, as regards their product, provided by the rest of the people of Canada, and enabled to buy their grain from the farmer at the Fort William price. The farmers of Portage la Prairie pay the freight on that wheat to Fort William; but the wheat which was sold to the mill did not go to the head of the lakes, it was ground into flour in Portage la Prairie, the freight from Fort William to the loading point was deducted, and for a payment of one cent per hundred pounds, or per bushel, they had the privilege of loading this car, after the grain had been unloaded, with their own flour and shipping it to Fort William; and the farmers paid the freight. The mill enjoyed all these concessions from the people of Canada; yet, when hard times came, your eastern industry folded up and went back to the east. The point I want to make is, has the government no influence with the manufacturers of eastern Canada? Is there no way of persuading them; yes, is there no way to force them to go out to western Canada and try to build up that country so that we may have a more balanced economy?

We buy our goods from the east and pay the freight on them to the west. I now come to another sore spot. I refer to agricultural machinery, which for the most part is made in eastern Canada, and we pay the freight to the west. To-day we are paying almost twice as much for a binder as we did in 1914, yet we are receiving the same price for our grain as we did then. It is not fair. We in the western country are up in arms. The governments of the three prairie provinces have met to discuss what should be done, and it was suggested that machinery might be manufactured in western Canada. That is an invitation to the Massey-Harris company, the Cockshutt company or any other Canadian company to establish a factory in western Canada and manufacture their goods there. I believe that such transfers of industry would conduce to a more balanced economy and a more contented people.

Mr. HATFIELD: Would the minister consider making the same agreement with New Brunswick when the new agreements are made as with the other provinces?

Mr. McLARTY: Oh, yes. We deal impartially with all the provinces. It is a matter of the request coming from the province itself. We are quite willing to enter into the same kind of agreement with New Brunswick as with any other province.

Mr. HATFIELD: The department should have a uniform basis of agreement throughout Canada. I do not think New Brunswick should be discriminated against.

Mr. McLARTY: Any discrimination is not the fault of this government. Whatever request comes from New Brunswick, or from any other province, will be considered and acted upon. By that I mean that there is no intention on the part of the federal government to discriminate against New Brunswick.

On section 5—Conditions of financial assistance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister explain the system of control used by the dominion government in reference to moneys advanced to the provinces? What is the nature of the control? What executive officers represent the dominion?

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if I understand my hon. friend correctly. Does he mean advances for material aid or for works? The matter of loans to the provinces?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. McLARTY: That is handled by the comptroller of finance. He makes the loans to the provinces; they are not made by the Department of Labour.

On section 6-Orders and regulations.

Mr. ADAMSON: I would suggest to the minister that, when he considers such orders, he should regard this bill as a three-point programme: first, for unemployment insurance; second, for health insurance; and, third, -I see the item on the next page—for youth training. I come from an industrial riding where this is a vital subject. All these items are interlocking, and unless they are carried out as one and the same programme, we shall not get as far with this measure as we should do. I have had as many as 14,000 people on relief at the same time in my riding. These orders should be made so that unemployment, health insurance and these other items shall be dealt with in an interlocking operation.

Mr. McLARTY: As the hon. member knows, we are proceeding with unemployment insurance, so that a further answer is not needed on that point. In the matter of health insurance I speak now from recollection, but in the recommendation of the dominion-provincial commission it is stated, as part of the general programme, set out in that report, that health insurance is one of those subjects which properly fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The matter of youth training we can go into fully when we are on the estimates.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Appointment of officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. POULIOT: We look at page 18 of the estimates for details of the vote on unemployment relief, but we find no details there. There is an expenditure of $155,000, but there are no details on another page as in the case of other items of the Department of Labour, at page 17 for instance.

Mr. McLARTY: To which item is the hon, member referring?

Mr. POULIOT: This section of the bill provides for the employment of a larger number of officers, clerks and employees in the relief branch. There are two arrangements with regard to staffs in the various branches of the Department of Labour. For some branches details are given showing the number of employees. I refer the minister to page 17. On page 18 there are no details of employees of the unemployment relief branch. Would it not be possible to have details for all branches of the department? There are some men in the department receiving salaries—one in particular who receives $6,000 and his work is mentioned nowhere. He is here at times in the gallery; I sometimes see him. In my humble view he does absolutely nothing. There are some others who are not working very hard, not earning their salaries by the sweat of their brow. I wonder why there are more officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. McLARTY: This merely provides, as has been done in previous years, that these officers responsible for the administration of youth training shall be paid out of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act. It is not intended to have additional employees taken on. This just carries on in the same manner as before and details will be available when the estimates are before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the minister to take a note of what I have said and to have the details of the unemployment relief branch given in connection with the estimates.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Should not the details of administration under this act be given in the report?

Mr. McLARTY: This clause is in the act by reason of the fact that no provision is made in the Youth Training Act; consequently payment of expenses is made by virtue of this act. The details of employment will be brought down in the estimates.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $120,005.

Mr. SENN: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter that concerns the activities of the department. I have the highest regard for the officials, many of whom I know personally, and I think they are capable men, but there is one matter in regard to which there seems to have been some mistake on the part of some of the officials. I would refer the minister to a return to an order of the house, sessional paper No. 1150 brought down on June 12, 1940, at the request of the mover the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor). It asked for a copy of all agreements entered into between the government of Canada, the Canadian Department of Agriculture, the Canadian bacon board or any other governmental body and the British government, the British supply board or any organization in Great Britain, relating to the price to be paid for Canadian exports of pork products to Great Britain, and for the amount of such products to be shipped to Great Britain. It also asked for copies of all letters, telegrams, correspondence, orders in council and other documents exchanged between the two governments, or organizations representing them, regarding the matter in question.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, there was some kind of agreement between the government of Canada and some governmental body in Great Britain respecting exports of bacon and pork products to Great Britain. I have before me a copy of bacon board bulletins Nos. 1 to 4. No. 1 makes the statement that the board and its advisory committee were appointed by the government on December 20, 1939, to implement the terms of the agreement made with the United Kingdom government for the delivery to the British ministry of food of 5,600,000 pounds of bacon weekly, and such additional quantities as might be required. Then it goes on to state:

The contract price is $20.18 per 112 pounds, equivalent to $18.01 per 100 pounds, f.o.b. port of export for grade A Wiltshires and relative prices for B grade and the various cuts, as provided for in the schedule of prices included in the agreement. The contract price is retroactive to include all bacon arriving in England from November 17, 1939, to October 31, 1940.

In response to this order I find the answer given: "So far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned complete bacon agreement information between British government and government of Canada not available for publication." That is signed by the assistant deputy minister. There is also a reply from the under-secretary of state for external affairs stating that there is no information available, and one also from the Department of Trade and Commerce making the same statement. I think there must be an error, because evidently there was an agreement, and I would ask the minister if he would table those agreements.

Mr. GARDINER: There is no error. The Department of Agriculture has no information on the matter. The agreement is made through the Department of External Affairs, and the British government have made it conditional that the heads of that agreement are not to be made available to the public. That is what the statement, "no information available", means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The statement is a little misleading, is it not? If it said what the minister has now stated, that the British government do not want this information to be made available, it would have been clear, and perhaps the question would not have been asked.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a question answered by two different departments, and we did not wish to make explanations concerning the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. SENN: Does the minister mean by the statement, "the heads of that agreement are not to be made known", that the agreements were not supposed to be made known?

Mr. GARDINER: The request of the British government was that the agreement as such was not to be published. The matter of prices has been discussed publicly, but we were asked not to publish the agreement as such.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In the item "travelling expenses" on page 59 there is a reduction from $11,000 to $7,000. How does the minister estimate that reduction?

Mr. GARDINER: As I stated on a previous occasion, we have been asked to cut down our expenditures for this year to assist in the war effort. We have made cuts all the way through. There are cuts in staff, and more particularly in the part-time staff, and that has made it possible for us to reduce travelling expenses somewhat in connection with certain activities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The cut in the total vote is not substantial. In the summary on page 2 of the estimates the decrease is shown as $4,827,273. I have not looked at these estimates for a number of years, and am not very familiar with them. But $18,000,000 for 1939-40 shows a substantial growth from 1930. I remember when the Department of Agriculture estimates were about $12,000,000, and we always thought that pretty large. Last year the amount was $18,000,000, and now it is back to $13,266,000 That is some progress in the right direction I should like to know about one item, the general executive assistant. How long has that official been on the payroll? I do not recall having heard of an officer by that title before.

Mr. GARDINER: The general executive assistant is Mr. Hamer, who has been on the staff for many years, and was appointed to this position on the reorganization of the department three years ago, 1937, I think.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose when he was appointed to that job he got an increase of salary?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there was an increase in his salary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what usually happens.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the relation between permanent staff as compared with temporary?

Mr. GARDINER: It is rather difficult to explain the basis on which temporaries are made permanent. I found that difficulty when I came to Ottawa. In the province I had always been accustomed to a temporary being a person who was on the temporary list for six months and then became permanent. That is not the practice here. There are persons who have been on the staff for twenty years and are still temporaries.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, thirty years.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I presume some have been there thirty years. Those on the permanent staff have certain rights that the temporary staff do not have; they become subject to the provisions of the superannuation and other such acts. There is a ratio set in all the departments; in the Department of Agriculture we are supposed to keep our temporary list up to fifteen per cent; eighty-five per cent of the employees are permanent and at least fifteen per cent are suppose to be kept temporary under the regulations of the treasury board.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are those about the percentages as they are in the department?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, very close to that, I think almost exactly that at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the policy of the minister with respect to savings in the case of vacancies occurring by death or retirement? Is it the intention promptly to fill such vacancies, or will the minister attempt to save something in war time by not filling those positions which might be considered as extra help? I mentioned this to the Minister of Trade and Commerce some weeks ago, and recommended that in war time an honest attempt should be made to save on the civil list of this country. The Minister of Finance this afternoon, speaking of salaries, intimated that it cost this country $80,000,000 for the civil list inside and out. That is a huge sum for Canada to be paying for the civil list, especially in war time. I would recall to the minister what I said to his colleague, that between 1930 and 1935, when this country was going through the greatest economic war in its history, a period which I hope will never be repeated in this country, the government of that day followed the practice of not filling positions that became vacant unless they were key positions and absolutely necessary. When we went out of office there were literally thousands of positions left unfilled, and the service of the country did not suffer one iota. Will the minister say that consideration will be given to a policy of that kind now? I should think this country could be run, aside from its war effort, for a great deal less than $80,000,000, especially having regard to the fact that prior to the last war the total budget did not much exceed that figure. We should seek for quality rather than quantity in the civil service.

Mr. REID: The government can hire but it must not fire.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member has crystallized the idea that I had in mind but to which I was not intending to give expression. Once on the government payroll, whether you are any good or not, apparently you are there for life. During all the years of my public life I have been appalled at the number of people who wanted to work for the government. I found that most of them—not all of them, I am glad to say—were men who made a failure in private life.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, most of them. That has been my own experience—and of course I can speak only from my own experience. But that experience has covered a long period of time. Of course such a situation ought not to exist. If at all possible, we should get away from that condition, and particularly in war time. I would invite the minister to make a statement of policy in regard to the very important matter to which I have alluded. We ought to be able to save something out of $80,000,000, without any detriment to the service. I believe in paying good men good salaries. I have always demanded that for myself, provided I gave the service.

Mr. GRANT: You never did, though.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not say that. The hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about—and perhaps he is not serious. I shall leave it at that.

Will the minister say what the intention of the department is to be? I notice that in the minister's office there is an increase in salaries from $87,760 to $94,150, and that increase is to a large extent made up by temporary assistance. Therefore, while the vote remains the same, the salary roll has grown. I suppose some of the difference would be made up by statutory increases.

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to the question whether it is the intention of the department not to fill vacancies when they are created by death or superannuation, it is the general intention where possible to leave the vacancies unfilled, in order to get down to the estimates for the present year. As the leader of the opposition will understand, of course, there are certain positions which, when vacated, must be filled.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: In such circumstances appointments have to be made. But the general tendency will be to move employees up, and probably leave the lower positions vacant. Of course we will take into consideration at all times what I said a moment ago, namely that there will be certain positions which, because of their importance, must be filled when they become vacant.

In connection with the increased expenditures in the department I would make one or two observations. Going back to about 1935 we find that expenditures were for certain purposes, but since that time we have had added the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. That was added in 1935 by a former government. Then there was the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, under the present government. Since that time the science services building has been erected and staffs employed therein. Legislation has been passed respecting cheese and cheese factories, and provision for certain other activities was made. Then, there has been provision for the reestablishment of settlers. Since the time I mentioned all those activities have been added to the department; and vet in this year we are carrying on the department, with those additional activities, on an estimated expenditure of $13,266,323.09 whereas last year $18,093,596.50 was provided for the activities of the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the minister will consider this point: History has shown that once a government bureau is established, a great deal of courage is required to get rid of it. I recall having a conversation with a gentleman who at one time sat for the constituency of Renfrew South, and who a few years ago became minister of Trade and Commerce. He assumed the portfolio with all the zeal of a new minister, and directed his secretary, a very capable person, to make a survey of all departmental branches. With the survey before him he came to the conclusion that he could effect a substantial saving by cutting down personnel and doing away with some of the bureaux in his department. His personal experience as told to me was this: He called the chief of one bureau before him, but before the interview was over the gentleman who had been summoned had convinced the minister that his branch was most important—even the most important in the whole Department of Trade and Commerce. Before forty-eight hours had expired, the minister was convinced that he was wholly wrong, and that instead of being abolished, the personnel of the branch ought to be doubled. Judging by the number of telegrams he received from all parts of Canada urging him not to touch the department, he was forced to the conclusion that its activities ought to be increased.

To make a long story short, my friend Tom Low threw up his hands.

Mr. GARDINER: The civil servant was let out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be so. Tom went out. He found it impossible to cope with bureaucracy. That is what actually happened, and that was his personal experience as related to me some months afterward.

I hope that when the functions of these new branches have been concluded, the minister will see that they are promptly abolished. I say that because I believe it is a fact that once they get into the governmental activities of the country, they remain there for a long time. If any useful work can be performed they will seek transfer to some other branch. I am just throwing out a friendly word of warning.

Mr. McIVOR: I suppose the leader of the opposition would say it is a dangerous thing to say anything about the civil service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I notice an item of $16,140 for temporary assistance. Is that an expenditure for what are known as permanent temporaries, or for assistants who may be called in for rush work during the year?

Mr. GARDINER: Those are temporary employees on the basic staffs of the department.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why are their positions not indicated in the same way as those of the permanent staff. They work from year to year, and there is no reason why their positions should not be indicated in the same manner.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason for their not being enumerated is that the temporary positions are reestablished every six months. That is, at the end of every six-month period they are subject to removal, although in many instances they have been working for many years.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister break up the amount of $16,140 and tell the committee how many are stenographers, how many are clerks, and so on.

Mr. GARDINER: It would take some time to do that. I will have to go through the whole staff of the department.

Mr MacINNIS: If it will take too much time, let it go.

Item agreed to.

Administration service.

2. Publicity and extension, $109,650.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There seems to be a substantial reduction in this item, and perhaps the minister could state briefly where the saving is being made. I notice there is a reduction of three in the personnel while there is an increase in temporary assistance. Apparently the item of $4,000 for advertising and publicity is cut out altogether.

Mr. GARDINER: The savings are as follows:

Permanent staff	$ 6,860
Wages	1,740
Advertising and publicity	4,000
Express, freight and cartage	500
Printing and stationery	6,020
Supplies and materials	12,000
Telephones, telegrams and postage.	500
Travelling expenses	2,700

There is an increase of $3,240 in the temporary staff, which gives a net decrease of $31,080.

Mr. SENN: I would judge that there will be fewer publications issued and circulated this year. Some of these publications are important and serve a useful purpose to the farmers and other people of Canada. Would the minister indicate just what publications will be done away with, or will the reduction simply be in the number of copies circulated?

Mr. GARDINER: Some of what might be called the permanent publications will be cut down, at least in number. There would be a smaller expense for postage if a lesser number were sent out. During war time we will probably put out special publications containing information with regard to any agreements that may be entered into with Great Britain in connection with bacon, apples or other commodities. Some of our production publications may have to be reduced in number.

Mr. SENN: Are the new publications provided for in this vote or are they covered somewhere else?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They should be in this vote.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: This particular item does not cover the cost of printing; it covers all services in connection with the sending out of the publications.

Mr. SENN: There is a most important annual publication sent out by the department entitled "The Agricultural Situation and Outlook". This publication forecasts to a certain extent the foreign and domestic market requirements and gives the farmer some idea of what will be the most profitable to produce. I understand it is to be discontinued this year. We are needing increased production because of the war and the government has promised to organize for war production. It seems to me that a periodical of this kind should be continued. The minister stated that certain publications having to do with production will likely be discontinued. Without wanting to offer too much criticism, it seems to me that this is the class of publication which should be continued. The farmer wants to know what to produce. He wants to know the requirements of the markets in Great Britain and other places. He wants to know whether his production is along the right channel. Is there any intention of issuing this annual publication?

Mr. GARDINER: This publication is not put out entirely at the expense of the Department of Agriculture. Its cost is covered partly by the Department of Trade and Commerce and by the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture. Its cost is not covered by this item. I am informed that there would be some difficulty in putting out this publication in its usual form during war time. This publication made forecasts with regard to the possible happenings in connection with agriculture in different places, and it would be difficult to give that information under present conditions. It is intended to get out in its place a periodical setting forth the agricultural activities related to war in different places.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does this vote cover advertising in the British market?

Mr. GARDINER: No; this vote does not cover the advertising which the hon. member for Mackenzie has in mind. Much larger grants are provided for that under marketing or under the War Measures Act. Advertising in Great Britain is carried on by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MARSHALL: If I understood the Minister of Finance correctly, he stated this afternoon that there would be no supplementary estimates brought down this year. Am I therefore correct in assuming that the total amount to be expended this year by the Department of Agriculture will be $13,254,-323.09?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the amount in the estimates, and I am afraid I would have great difficulty in getting the Minister of Finance to let me expend any more. There may be less expended, but there certainly is not much likelihood of the expenditures being greater. The Minister of Finance stated that he did not expect to have any supplementary estimates this year unless they were made necessary by legislation. I do not imagine there will be any such legislation passed in connection with agriculture.

Mr. MARSHALL: At the bottom of page five of the estimates is an item, "appropriations not required for 1940-41, $2,735,330." If there are to be no supplementary estimates, then it is perfectly correct to deduct that amount from these estimates. I maintain that those figures should not be included with these particular items.

Mr. GARDINER: They are not in the estimates if they are not required.

Mr. MARSHALL: Those figures have nothing to do with the votes on those pages.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are put in to make a balance.

Mr. TUSTIN: Did I understand the minister to say that there was nothing in this item to cover the printing of any of the pamphlets which are sent out? As I understand it, the item simply covers advertising and publicity for this department.

Mr. GARDINER: They do duplicating, but the original printing of bulletins is charged, not to this account but to other accounts in the different branches.

Mr. SENN: A considerable proportion of this vote has been appropriated from time to time for exhibits at fairs and for bonusing of seed fairs, providing prize money, and so forth. Is it the intention to do away with that type of publicity and extension work, or will it be continued this year?

Mr. GARDINER: The exhibits are being continued on a limited scale this year, but there is nothing in this vote for the bonusing of seed fairs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the cost of exhibits come under this vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: What is the procedure followed in having an exhibit at a fair? Does the department designate the exhibits after consulting with the fair board?

Mr. GARDINER: We first get a request from those who are holding the fair, asking us to put on an exhibit. We consider the request, the resources we have, and the benefit we would get from such an exhibit, and then if we decide to put on an exhibit we determine how much shall be spent.

Mr. SENN: In all fairness I must say that I have noticed some of these exhibits put on by the Department of Agriculture, by the health of animals branch or some other branch, and they are interesting and attract considerable attention. So far as possible I think that work should be continued.

Another portion of this vote is used for press notices sent out to the different newspapers and containing information for agriculturists all over the country. Will that be continued, and to what newspapers are these notices sent? Is there any remuneration to the newspapers for publishing such press notices? I have heard local newspaper editors at times complain that they published a good deal of this material and got very little thanks.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the intention to continue sending out that information, but whether we do so to as great an extent as before will depend entirely on the money available.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you pay for publication?

Mr. GARDINER: No; we simply send out the notices and it is left to the judgment of the newspapers whether they publish it or not, but in many instances they do.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is a reduction of about $12,000 in the item for supplies and materials, as shown on page 60 of the estimates. What is the nature of these supplies and materials?

Mr. GARDINER: Paper, ink, stationery and supplies of that kind in connection with exhibits and so forth.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is there nothing for advertising?

Mr. GARDINER: The advertising has been cut out. Any advertising we do will be done under the larger items, under "marketing" and so forth.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $3,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Who are the members of this committee?

Mr. GARDINER: It is largely composed of persons associated with the department or with agricultural colleges and institutions of that type. The executive committee consists of: H. Barton, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa, chairman; E. S. Archibald, Director, Experimental Farms Service; A. M. Shaw, Director, Marketing Service; J. M. Swaine, Director, Science Service; G. I. Christie, President, Ontario Agricultural College; W. R. Reek, Deputy Minister, Ontario Department of Agriculture; L. P. Roy, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Quebec; Robert Newton, Director, Division of Biology and Agriculture, National Research Council; T. C. McQuat, General Agricultural Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway Company; H. L. Trueman, Assistant to Director, Science Service.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are they all selected by the minister?

Mr. HATFIELD: Are they paid salaries or expenses?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no salaries for this work but there are expenses. The secretarial work is paid for.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How often did they meet last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The committee meets usually once a year, but sometimes twice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The temporary assistance I presume is for secretarial work?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is a reduction of $2,000 in travelling expenses for the advisory committee. Is a meeting not contemplated this year?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount provided for travelling expenses is not only for the advisory committee but for subcommittees as well which meet at different places more often. We shall have to cut down on some of those meetings, but the general meeting will be held.

4. Contributions to empire bureaux, $33,823.34.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This seems to be a standard item. Are we continuing annual grants to these bureaux notwithstanding the war?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there will be any difficulty about the empire bureaux functioning, but there may be some difficulty about the international institute of agriculture.

Mr. SENN: That meets at Rome? [Mr. Perley.]

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. If there is any difficulty about that one functioning, the money will not be paid, but I do not think we should remove the amount from the estimates. When the estimates were made up, there was not the same reason for discontinuing the item as now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand what is meant by entomology, but what is meant by mycology?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the systematic study of plant diseases, more particularly fungi.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) Perhaps this is not the proper item on which to bring this matter up, but the department has built a small laboratory at Fredericton. It was built under contract and is nearing completion. I was informed by the contractor when I was home that unless a little more money is spent on it and at least a roof put on the building, there will be a loss. I would hope that the minister would have that building completed. I think it is needed, and if ever the building was needed it should be gone on with now because it will take only a little more money to complete the whole thing. I hope it may be done.

Mr. GARDINER: If the leader of the opposition would permit me to defer the explanation until we get to the other item, Doctor Swaine will be here.

5. International Institute of Agriculture, $12,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister tell the committee the nature of the services performed by the international institute?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the Rome conference.

Mr. GARDINER: It is largely an international statistical service, and supplies statistics which we would find it very difficult to secure through our own staffs. The institute is an international organization and a clearing house to which different countries send statistics. We simply subscribe to it a certain amount to help pay the costs, and we are entitled to all information which is sent out.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What kind of statistics?

Mr. GARDINER: Having to do with agriculture; for example, the amount of grain that is grown in different countries and areas, statistics regarding live stock, the treatment of diseases, and that sort of thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the work still going on?

Mr. GARDINER: As I said a moment ago, there might be some difficulty about our subscribing to an organization whose head-quarters are in Rome, and if it is found impracticable either to secure the service or to make the subscription, our subscription will cease. At the time these estimates were made there was not the same reason as there is now for taking that position, and we decided to leave the item in the estimates.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are we getting the service at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: We were, until war was declared. There is some doubt whether we shall be able to continue to get it.

Item agreed to.

6. Science service administration, $25,467.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two of a staff—a clerk grade 3, and a clerk grade 2—in addition to the staff we had previously.

Mr. COLDWELL: What work is undertaken in this particular branch?

Mr. GARDINER: All of the sciences are under this branch; that is, all the studies such as entomology, as indicated in item 11; the study of diseases of plants, the study of diseases of animals, the study of chemistry in relation to plant life and also in relation to the treatment of diseases.

Mr. COLDWELL: The staff is rather small for that amount of work.

Mr. GARDINER: This item provides only for the administrative staff. Many of these activities are conducted in different parts of Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice there is an item "cooperative investigations"; and that the amount is reduced from $5,000 to $2,100. Could the minister tell us something about the work covered by this item?

Mr. GARDINER: This has to do largely with the projects carried out at the various universities and colleges associated with universities. We shall simply have to reduce the work in some directions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What sort of work?

Mr. GARDINER: It might be in any branch of science. We carry on certain types of work at one laboratory because they have the equipment to do it; other types are handled in other universities. The cooperation is between this department and the provincial department or the university staff.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Cooperative investigations?

Mr. GARDINER: Investigations carried out on a cooperative basis. The term may not be exactly descriptive of the work.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is the minister in a position to state what amount was spent last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The entire vote was spent last year.

Item agreed to.

7. Animal and poultry pathology, $146,615.

Mr. REID: Is it under this item that the Langley Prairie research laboratory comes? I notice a reduction of about $11,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it is under this item.

Mr. REID: Is it intended to carry on that station this year?

Mr. GARDINER: We will carry it on to the extent that it is possible with the money we have available, and in order to clear up the work which is now under way, to complete the investigations that are now being carried on. It may not be possible to start new investigations.

Mr. REID: I hope that the minister and the department will see their way to carry on this work, because it is the only laboratory of its kind in British Columbia. It investigates animal diseases which exist in no other province. The mortality of the cows in that district is extremely high—as high as twenty-five per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the matter? The climate?

Mr. REID: The disease is known as bovine haematuria. I believe the ordinary name is red water. But there are districts with fifteen per cent mortality. One farmer who breeds foxes has slaughtered over 200 cows in five years. Research work was started in 1934. It has been carried on year after year, and in my opinion should be maintained, irrespective of the war and of reductions in departmental estimates, with a view of finding the cause of this disease. I believe it exists only in the Fraser valley. It has existed there for fifty or sixty years. No one has discovered the cause. It is not contagious. It does not show up until an animal is two years of age; but the losses are extremely heavy. I know that our farmers are very much worried to learn that this research work is likely to be eliminated, and I plead with the minister of the department not to stop this work on the Red Water farm at Langley Prairie.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): According to what the hon. member has said, it seems to be a hopeless case. Why spend any more money on it?

Mr. REID: I do not think we should give up. Because the source of the disease has not been discovered is no reason why we should throw up our hands and say that the thing is impossible. Some research work has gone on for years. A doctor there has done considerable research in an endeavour to find out the cause of the disease, and there are reasons to hope that he will come to the root of the trouble. Just to drop the research work and allow conditions to go on as they are does not seem to me to be good business, especially because the mortality is so high.

Mr. GARDINER: Investigations in connection with red water have been carried on pretty well all over the globe, wherever this disease occurs, and it may be described as almost world wide in its ravages. The investigations at this particular point have become more or less routine. The investigators have found out certain things and have kept records of their findings. Other investigations and experiments are being carried on elsewhere with regard to the same problem. The officials think that if we are to go further we should start out on different lines from those that have been followed up to the present time. We have gone as far as we can go with the investigations now being carried on, and it is thought that this is a good time to discontinue what in our opinion has been carried as far as possible.

Mr. SENN: This is an important item. A good many of the animal diseases that are being dealt with by this department could also be discussed under health of animals. For instance, there is a very contagious disease known as Bangs which is quite prevalent all through Ontario and throughout the dominion. There is another disease known as shipping fever, which occurs when cattle are brought into the stock-yards and even when they are brought into large fairs. When the farmers bring them from the stock-yards, treatment must be given from time to time or there may be losses.

Another matter I would mention is the outbreak of hog cholera in Ontario during the past year. That outbreak has been quite serious and there are different ideas as to how it originated. A good many people believe—and the contrary has not been proved—that it was probably brought into this prov[Mr. Reid.]

ince and into the dominion through importations of United States pork in the past year. It is said that cholera can be carried in the skin of the animal, and when that skin is cut off and thrown into the garbage pail, unless it has been thoroughly fumigated or boiled it is apt to cause infection in animals that eat the swill. What investigation is being made into hog cholera throughout Canada? What efforts are being made to stamp out the disease? I should like to know if there is any truth in the assertion that it may be and probably is due to importations of United States pork into Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place to discuss the point just raised would be under item 16, health of animals. That is where the services are administered in connection with the control of these diseases, particularly hog cholera.

Mr. SENN: Are they not dealt with under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: Not in connection with this at the present time.

Mr. SENN: Shipping fever is prevalent in my own community, and it has been difficult up to the present to discover a treatment for it which was entirely satisfactory. I believe there is some kind of serum which is being produced and which, if administered at the proper time, will effect a cure, but so far there has been nothing definite or altogether satisfactory. I should like to know if this particular branch is investigating this disease. The disease has caused a good deal of loss particularly in my own community and, I fancy, throughout Canada. If any investigation has been carried on, what success has it met with?

Mr. GARDINER: The disease is not being investigated at present. In the past there have been investigations of different kinds and in different places, and information is available as to how the disease can be treated and how it can be controlled. That information is not always acted upon; it is not always available at the time the disease may develop. It develops under peculiar circumstances. It quite often happens, as the name implies. when stock is being shipped, and as a result of weather conditions, conditions in cars and so on. If the information which is available for the treatment is followed, it is fairly effective, but no investigation is being carried on under this head at the present time.

Mr. SENN: I am pleased to hear what the minister has had to say in that respect. The other disease to which I have referred is even more fatal and causes more loss to live stock men and cattle producers of Canada than the others. The disease is known as Bangs. A serum is being produced at the Ontario Agricultural College, but evidently it is not allowed to be distributed by the federal department. I do not know exactly what the reason is, but so far farmers whose herds have been affected by this disease have had trouble in getting treatment. I believe there is an underground activity going on by means of which serum is being used by certain veterinarians and farmers, but I understand it is contrary to law at the present time to sell that particular remedy or to use it. This is the department that should investigate the germ which causes this disease and try to eliminate it. What is being done?

Mr. GARDINER: An investigation is being carried on in connection with Bangs disease. It is concerned with calf's vaccination which it is hoped may be the means of preventing the disease, but it has not so far been established that it is a preventive. Experiments are being carried on by our department over at Hull across the river and at Guelph by the veterinary college there. These two experiments are being conducted in the hope that they may establish the remedy as a preventive. So far that has not been established and it is not yet recommended.

Mr. SENN: The minister says it is not being recommended. Is there any prohibition of the serum which is being produced at Guelph being used by veterinarians and sold to the public?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The department takes the position that it is not possible to release this vaccine to the public without upsetting the whole investigation that is being carried on. Until the vaccine is properly developed and produced in quantities that could be distributed properly, there will be no distribution.

Mr. SENN: What reaction would there be to it? What difficulties would arise, or in what way would it damage any investigation?

Mr. GARDINER: The present system of control is one of testing for the purpose of getting reactions and removing the reactors. If this vaccine were distributed throughout the country and persons allowed to use it, it would render the stock susceptible to the test which is now being carried on, and while they are carrying on the present policy of trying to eradicate the disease through location of it and having animals removed from contact with other animals, it is not thought wise to put out this product. The practice would upset the whole policy which the department is following at present, particularly when it is not at all assured that vaccination would be a preventive.

Mr. SENN: I ask this because I have been asked the same question a number of times by live stock men, and I could give no satisfactory answer as to why they were not allowed to use the serum.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Last year three veterinary inspectors were provided for; this year there are two. Where are these inspectors located and what is the nature of their work?

Mr. GARDINER: The three were in the Hull laboratories across the river, and this year there will be only two.

9. Botany and plant pathology, $283,193.

Mr. STIRLING: What will it be necessary to cut out under this reduction?

Mr. GARDINER: Under permanent employees the reduction is $3,135; temporary employees $1,240, wages $7,006, equipment $5,485—

Mr. STIRLING: Those are the particulars on page 62 of the estimates, but what work which has been considered valuable in the past will it be necessary to cut out?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no particular service that is being eliminated; it is cutting down expenses of the service all the way through.

11. Entomology, $430,509.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is a great saving shown under this heading. What is the position relating to grasshoppers in the west, and the arrangement as between the federal and provincial authorities for combating these pests?

Mr. GARDINER: This department does not pay what might be called the greater cost in connection with the fighting of grasshoppers, the buying and spraying of poison and that kind of thing. That is done by the provincial government. This department gives a service which amounts to the mapping of the areas and that type of service; that is included in the general expenditures in connection with this item. I am not in a position to segregate it from the total amount.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the committee some information regarding the pine bug, the bug that has been working in the white pine and spruce trees, particularly in British Columbia? That comes under this item, does it not? There were parties out last year, I think. Will they be continued this year?

Mr. GARDINER: The white pine bark beetle is the only one with regard to which we have been carrying on activities on the western coast. There will be activity in relation to it this year, but the expenditure will have to be less than last year.

Mr. STIRLING: Do those parties work directly under Ottawa, or do they come under the official at Vernon?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, under the Vernon laboratory.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it true that the Colorado potato beetle is doing excellent work in the German potato fields? I was informed the other day that a serious infestation had been discovered in Germany and neighbouring countries.

Mr. GARDINER: There is some information to that effect.

Mr. SENN: What progress is being made in fighting the corn borer in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Control work in connection with the corn borer is carried on entirely by the provinces. Investigational work is carried on by our department, and that is going on.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The army worm has been doing a good deal of damage in northern Saskatchewan. Is provision made to deal with that under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: Only the investigational work. All the work having to do with the combating of these different pests is carried on by the provincial governments.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is anything being done to secure the removal of the British embargo against potatoes from Canada on account of the Colorado beetle? They cannot secure potatoes from Germany or France, Holland or Denmark at present, so it would seem to be a good time to take the matter up.

Mr. GARDINER: Representations are made from time to time to Great Britain in an attempt to have the embargo removed, but up to date they have refused to admit them.

Mr. HATFIELD: This Colorado beetle is in Germany, France and Holland, whence they have been securing potatoes. I think they will need our potatoes now. The Colorado beetle was just an excuse by the farmers' union of Great Britain. Now, since they need our potatoes, this would seem a logical time to have the embargo removed.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. GARDINER: We shall continue to press the matter, but of course it is for Great Britain to decide whether they will take the embargo off.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH RESPECT TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house copies in English and French of correspondence with the premiers of the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Alberta on the subject of the proposed amendment to the British North America Act which will give the federal parliament the necessary authority to enact legislation to establish unemployment insurance. Previous correspondence on this subject has been tabled. It may be of some convenience to hon, members to have all the correspondence appear together in the votes and proceedings. If this course is acceptable to hon. members I shall be pleased to ask the clerk to arrange accordingly. These are interesting and historic documents. I feel it would be well to have them in printed form in some of the records of parliament.

AMENDMENT OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT TO PROVIDE FOR UNIFORM COMPULSORY SYSTEM

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

Whereas the Employment and Social Insurance Act, 1935, a statute of the parliament of Canada which, in substance, provided for a system of compulsory unemployment insurance throughout Canada, has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to be ultra vires of the parliament of Canada;

And whereas, if a uniform and effective system of compulsory unemployment insurance is to be adopted throughout Canada, it will be necessary to amend the British North America Act, 1867, to enable the parliament of Canada to enact the necessary legislation;

A humble Address be presented to His Majesty the King, in the following words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach your majesty praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, and that such measure be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to unemployment insurance.

Whereas the Senate and Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that his majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and censent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Section ninety-one of the British North America Act, 1867, is amended by adding thereto as class 2A the following:

"2A. Unemployment insurance." and inserting such class in the enumeration of the classes of Subjects set forth in section ninety-one aforesaid, immediately after class two.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1940, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, the British North America Act, 1907, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1940.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I need not refer to the desirability or even necessity of any scheme of unemployment insurance being national in its scope, because this parliament in 1935 recognized that fact by enacting legislation providing for a system of compulsory unemployment insurance. Since then many provinces and public bodies have signified their views in this matter, and more particularly before the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, where in their briefs the provinces of Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and British Columbia specially mentioned the subject.

Various other public bodies such as the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and similar associations have signified not only that they favoured such an insurance scheme but that in order to be effective it should be national in scope.

The privy council has ruled that this parliament at present does not possess the necessary jurisdiction to enact a national unemployment insurance scheme. I shall read only the concluding words of the decision of the privy council on their reference to it of the unemployment insurance act which passed this parliament in 1935:

If on the true view of the legislation it is found that in reality in pith and substance the legislation invades civil rights within the province or in respect of other classes of subjects otherwise encroaches upon the provincial field, the legislation will be invalid. To hold otherwise would afford the dominion an easy passage into the provincial domain. In the present case their lordships agree with the majority of the supreme court in holding that in pith and substance this act is an insurance act affecting the civil rights of employers and employed in each province, and as such is invalid.

I have referred to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. In its report the commission says, at page 39:

It is not surprising, therefore, that it has been generally recognized that if unemployment insurance is to be successful in Canada it must be on a national basis. The national employment commission emphasized that "there are great, indeed decisive, advantages in a national, in contrast to a provincial, system" of unemployment insurance. The Commission des Assurances Sociales de Québec, as early as 1933, pointed out that, although it is possible for member states in a federation to have schemes of their own, "nevertheless elementary prudence urges us to give a federal character to insurance against unemployment." In a memorandum submitted to the executive council of randum submitted to the executive council of the province of Quebec in February, 1939, by the Confederation des Travailleurs Catholiques du Canada, Inc., the following paragraph appears: "La C.T.C.C. tient à redire au gouvernement fédéral qu'elle est en faveur d'un système d'assurance-chômage à base contributoire...notamment, en faveur d'une assurance-chômage contributoire, établie sur le plan national, suivant les recommandations de la Commission des Assurances sociales." Commission des Assurances sociales.

After careful examination we are convinced that a system of unemployment insurance can be established which will in no way interfere with the provisions of the Quebec civil code concerning labour contracts and contracts of hiring. In our public hearings representations from most provinces and from many public bodies supported the view that unemployment insurance should be within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament. We have no hesitation in so recommending.

Ever since the decision of the privy council it has been the intention that parliament should acquire the necessary power to enact a bill of the kind which will be introduced when the address is voted in this parliament and the necessary amendment made at Westminster to the British North America Act. Always we have tried to get the approval of the several provinces to an amendment of this kind, but it is only recently that unanimity has been signified in the matter. The objection which was raised by certain provinces, and more particularly in my own province by the then premier, was that it would be possible to establish unemployment insurance by concurrent or enabling legislation of the provinces as well as of the dominion. Needless to say we should have been very glad to accept that view had we thought that such a course was feasible, but the views of the officers of the crown have always been that this could not be done. When it is said, for instance, that old age pensions have been established by way of concurrent legislation, I would point out that there is all the difference in the world because we merely contribute to the amount which is spent by the various provinces for old age pensions; we contribute as much as seventy-five per cent, but there is no provision for contributions by employers and employees, and there is not the same necessity for our invading the provincial jurisdiction as there would be in establishing a scheme of unemployment insurance. The two cases are altogether different. Indeed if, as has often been suggested and even recommended by labour unions, the old age pensions scheme should be made a contributory one, the British North America Act would have to be amended to provide for a national contributory scheme.

As to the methods of cooperation in the legislative field which we have considered one after the other, the first that suggests itself is for the provinces to delegate to parliament their powers in relation to unemployment insurance. But there are several objections to that. It is extremely doubtful that such delegation would be legally effective, because by such action parliament cannot acquire jurisdiction. Lord Watson is reported to have observed during the argument of Canadian Pacific Railway Company v. Notre-Dame de Bon Secours, (1899) A.C. 367:

I think we must get rid of the idea that either one or other (parliament or the provincial legislature) can enlarge the jurisdiction of the other or surrender jurisdiction.

In the case of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Acts, this method of delegation was resorted to and the courts have held the cooperative scheme to be unconstitutional.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

The provincial legislature may delegate its legislative powers, as has recently been held by the privy council in the case of Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy, and, conceivably, some central body, say the dominion commission, could be vested with legislative power by each of the nine provinces. But I think, first, that most of the provinces would strongly object to delegating such a power to a body not responsible to them.

Secondly, there is the objection that at any time any province may withdraw the power that she has delegated. A third objection is that the sum total of provincial powers is probably insufficient, constitutionally, to establish a national system. For instance, can Quebec raise money by a levy which may be used to pay benefits outside of Quebec? If Quebec cannot do so then its delegate on the federal commission, as I have mentioned, could not, merely by reason of the fact that it is the delegate also of eight other provinces.

Other recognized methods of cooperation are known as legislation by reference, conjoint legislation and conditional legislation.

The first two are almost identical. The first is a method whereby parliament enacts a statute which is then adopted by the provinces by reference. By the second mode of procedure both parliament and the legislature would enact the same act in the same terms. These two methods have been resorted to when doubt exists as to which legislature. the central or the local, has authority. The danger of this reasoning lies in the possibility that both statutes may be invalid because each exceeds the power of the enacting legislature. The example I have given of Quebec having no right to levy taxes within the province to be used to pay expenditure in the rest of Canada applies here. Such a taxing provision would be unconstitutional, just as a dominion act to impose taxation on Quebec citizens be spent in Quebec would Another objection is that in the enforcement of the law a difficulty would arise as to which one of the two statutes should be used and we might select the one which the court would declare unconstitutional. Then again, in the case of legislation by reference the provincial act would be bad if the dominion act was bad, since the latter was a nullity and the provincial act based on it would also be a nullity.

Conditional legislation is another mode of procedure, whereby legislation of a legislature operates upon the fulfilment of a condition. For instance, if all the nine provinces were enacting a similar insurance scheme in identical terms which would become operative as the result of some dominion action, namely by parliament or by the governor in council, the "condition" would be the dominion action. The insurance conditions and the levy would be provided for by the provincial legislatures, while the dominion, in addition to bringing the nine provincial statutes into force on a given date, would establish a central commission and would provide funds for administrative expenses. All the objections which I have submitted to the other modes of operation apply also to this one; and I am afraid, and it is also the view of the officers of the crown, that there would be danger in respect of constitutionality which would not justify the parliament of Canada in entering, before being sure of its validity, upon a big undertaking which would cost millions of money.

I have spoken only of the legal side. There are also practical objections which I desire to mention.

- 1. You would have to get the concurrence of nine legislatures each of which will, quite properly, have its own ideas, influenced by local requirements, as to the proper provisions of an unemployment insurance act.
- 2. You must hold this concurrence through the difficult first years of the application of the act, when, by practice and experience, amendments will be found desirable; and then you would have to have in each case the consent of every one of the nine legislatures before proposing these amendments.
- 3. You must persuade nine provinces to submit to administration by a body which is not responsible to them.
- 4. The necessary levy to provide insurance benefits must be imposed on the clear understanding that the funds raised thereby and turned over to the commission are to be utilized to pay benefits throughout Canada. The result might be, for example, that Quebec contributions would, in certain circumstances, be utilized to pay benefits outside Quebec.

The final and the most important objection of all is that there is nothing to prevent one or two or three provinces from withdrawing from the scheme and then the whole undertaking would be compromised.

I believe I have sufficiently shown that we cannot proceed to introduce a bill to establish unemployment insurance in Canada without resorting to the application for an amendment, which is a very simple one, to the British North America Act, and to which now fortunately all the provinces agree, so that this parliament shall be invested with full power; then the bill will be introduced.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of unemployment insurance is one which has engaged, more or less spasmodically, the attention of this house since I first entered it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on more than one occasion since 1921 and 1930 promised this legislation. There was always, of course, the constitutional difficulty. In 1930, when the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett came into power, it was so obsessed with the necessity of keeping this country on an even keel economically that, while we believed in the principle of unemployment insurance, it was not possible to proceed with the legislation at the beginning of that parliament. I have always thought that it was a great pity, from the standpoint of the wage earners of this country, to whom such an act would have been applicable in those bad years of our history, that such a measure was not put on the statute book by the Prime Minister when he first made his pronouncement in the twenties in regard thereto.

However, whatever may have been the reasons which prevented him from acting upon his undertaking to the country, he did not proceed with any such legislation, and this country and the wage earners of the country were without the benefits of unemployment insurance through the most trying period in our economic history. That is why I said not long ago that we were many years too late with respect to this social legislation.

In 1934-35 the government of the day did introduce legislation looking towards national unemployment insurance, and it was enacted into law, but not without the most vociferous opposition from gentlemen opposite, at that time sitting here, that I have ever experienced, on the plea that we had not the authority to do it. That bill was based on the theory of the treaty-making power under the British North America Act, and it was also based on the further powers that are recited in the preamble to the bill. I recall having had something to do with the preparation of that preamble, and I have always thought that if the legislation had been attacked, not by way of a stated case or reference, as was done by the government of my right hon. friend, but in a concrete case raising specifically the question involved in the reference, the result might have been different. I have no doubt in the world that if you want to get a correct solution of the problem of constitutionality the least likely method of obtaining a proper decision is that followed by hon, gentlemen opposite. However, the government of the day was defeated and went out of office, and in accordance with pledges made to the people the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred the matter to the courts. I refer to it to-day only in order to keep the record straight.

This party is pledged to the principle of unemployment insurance. We endeavoured to implement that pledge to the best of our ability, having regard to all the circumstances of the time; and the act might have been allowed to go into force and effect, as it could have been at least until it was attacked and set aside, because nearly all the machinery had been set up and one of the most capable men in Canada had been installed as the head of the scheme. May I suggest to the Prime Minister that he probably could not do better to-day, when he comes to establish his scheme, if, as and when he does establish it, than by making use of the services of the gentleman to whom I have referred. That however is merely in passing.

The act was attacked by way of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada and subsequently went to the privy council, and, as the Minister of Justice has correctly stated, the decision of that august body was that the pith and substance of the legislation was an invasion of property and civil rights. With that decision we must be content. Perhaps the Minister of Justice at a later stage will inform us whether any representations were made in opposition to the proposal and to the principle involved. Personally I have heard of none, although I do know that recently proposals have been suggested from other quarters looking to another form of insurance. So far as I am aware they are still in the nebulous stage; nothing concrete has reached me at any rate. The legislation passed by the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was declared ultra vires in 1936. The decision was rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada on January 28, 1937, and the decision of the privy council, delivered by Lord Atkin, was to the effect that in reality, in pith and substance, the legislation was an invasion of civil rights. The effect of that has been that we have lost five years at least in which we might have built up the reserve fund which is so essential to the successful operation of this social scheme. However, the Prime Minister and his government must take the responsibility for that.

The scheme is now being put forward one further step. I agree with the method adopted by the government having regard to the legal decisions. I know that the question of concurrent jurisdiction, and the other methods to which the Minister of Justice has referred, have been explored on various occasions, and there is objection, from the point of view of the legal decisions to which he has alluded and to which it is not necessary that I should refer further. The method adopted is that of amendment to our constitution, and I know of no surer means of giving powers to this federal parliament than by that method. I am not in favour of the attempt to delegate powers or to hoist ourselves by our bootstraps by assuming powers delegated from another jurisdiction—I will not say an inferior jurisdiction, because that might give offence in certain quarters. I have been attacked already on more than one occasion for having asserted the principle that we should have a strong central government. This motion, this address, is just another argument sustaining my position, that we ought to have a strong central government, because I cannot conceive of nine different systems of unemployment insurance in Canada. There must be a national system if we are to go that far, and I am further of the opinion that the passing of concurrent legislation would not be satisfactory. The passing of delegated authority would not be satisfactory, nor would the other methods to which the Minister of Justice has referred.

I am just wondering whether the Prime Minister will be able to give us any assurance that this address will be adopted and the legislation enacted at Westminster in time to make possible the enactment of a measure during the present session. I know this is a war session. I have the feeling that it is the intention of the government to get rid of parliament just as quickly as possible. I may be wrong in that; I may be doing hon. gentlemen opposite an injustice by even suggesting it. But it is understandable. Can the Prime Minister give us any assurance that the British parliament will give precedence to this measure? I am expressing no opinion; I have no opinion on that point.

This party is committed to the principle of unemployment insurance. Indeed if it had not been for hon, gentlemen opposite this country would have had it years ago; let there be no mistake about that.

I believe the Minister of Justice has adopted the proper method of attaining the end which the government now have in view. As far as we are concerned I promise the cooperation of this party in passing this address, and when the legislation itself comes down I promise him that we will examine the bill with the greatest care, will endeavour to strengthen it so far as may be necessary or desirable, and will in no way obstruct the principle of what is in my opinion very necessary social legislation for Canada.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): This resolution I think does not require very long discussion. Following the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), we hope that the government, when the resolution is carried and other necessary steps have been taken, will proceed to communicate with the British government with a view to obtaining the authority to enact this legislation immediately. The proper time to put a measure of this kind into effect is when industry is on the upturn and employment is increasing. It is not unlikely that when the war ends unemployment insurance will be as great a necessity as something of the kind was following the last great war.

This proposal to obtain power for the enactment of an unemployment insurance plan is one with which we are entirely in accord. Our predecessors in the house, labour and progressive members, ever since 1921 have been urging such an enactment, and although other groups in the country sometimes referred to schemes of this description as pernicious doles and so on, we believe that unemployment insurance should have been put into effect in the years immediately following the enactment of similar legislation in Great Britain. As has already been pointed out, it was promised by the leader of the Liberal party in 1919, twentyone years ago, so that the proposal reaches its majority just now. I suppose that because of such majority hon. gentlemen have the feeling that they ought to enact it. I hope that some other promised legislation will not be delayed such a long time.

The time has arrived when, in agreement with the provinces, this dominion should have the right to amend its own constitution. I do not like this method of appealing to some other body across the sea. If we have reached the status of a self-governing dominion we ought to be in a position to exercise the power that should lie within this country itself. It ought not to be necessary to pass resolutions of this kind in order to amend our constitution.

One other criticism that I would make is that in our opinion the powers sought are not sufficiently wide. We do not propose to attempt to-day to amend the resolution in any way, but I regret that when the government are seeking power to enact social legislation of this kind they do not seek the wider power to enact social legislation generally, not restricting it merely to unemployment insurance. I know, of course, that the Sirois report has something to say in that connection. I should like to turn to it for a moment. At page 24 this is said:

The experience of the past decade is conclusive evidence that unemployment relief should be a dominion function. By unemployment relief we mean relief or aid for unemployed employables as distinct from unemployables. Provincial responsibility for other welfare services should continue and the provinces should be enabled financially to perform these services adequately. Provincial responsibility for social welfare should be deemed basic and general. Dominion responsibility on the other hand should be deemed an exception to the general rule and as such should be strictly defined. But the dominion should be given adequate jurisdiction to perform efficiently whatever responsibilities are entrusted to it.

The power we are requesting, of course, will make it possible for the dominion to be given adequate jurisdiction to perform efficiently this particular service. The report goes on to say:

The assumption of responsibility by the dominion for relief or aid of unemployed employables would entail: (1) complete financial responsibility; (2) full control of administration.

To-day it is essential that we shall assume a greater responsibility in these matters than we have in the past. Our cities, our municipalities and our provinces are entirely unable to cope with the tremendous problem of unemployment and relief which has faced us during recent years. An unemployment insurance bill will not take care of all those responsibilities, because always there will be a large number of unemployed employables who will not come within the scope of the measure. Consequently it seems to us that the dominion ought to assume a greater measure of responsibility in regard to these matters.

The assumption by the dominion of responsibility for other types of social legislation becomes more pressing as the days go by. I have in mind old age pensions as another social responsibility which this parliament now shares with the provinces. The Minister of Justice a few moments ago explained why the old age pension scheme was undertaken in the way it was. But it seems to us that when asking for the power to deal with unemployment insurance we might have gone further and asked for the power to deal with other necessary and similar social legislation. Old age pensions is undoubtedly one of the national social schemes which will have to be developed to a greater extent than we have so far developed it in Canada. In Great Britain under war conditions they have recently increased the benefits under old age pensions, and have a contributory scheme as well. In the Sirois report there is a recommendation to that effect at page 43. Under the heading "Jurisdiction in Social Insurance -Conclusions" I find this:

We have concluded that two types of social insurance—unemployment insurance and contributory old age pensions—are inherently of a national character. . . .

Then, a little later:

The simplest method would appear to be to provide for concurrent jurisdiction in social insurance.

That is, social insurance of other types. Old age pensions and unemployment insurance are of national importance and therefore should be national responsibilities. So that while we commend this resolution and are supporting it because we agree with the object in view, we regret that when seeking this power from the imperial parliament the government did not go one step further and ask at least for power to enact social legislation of the types recommended in the Sirois report.

This legislation is long overdue. Canada remains one of the few modern countriesthat is, modern in the sense of being industrialized-without legislation of this kind on its statute books. I was glad when the Bennett administration enacted its social legislation in 1934. I agree with the leader of the opposition that if that legislation had remained on the statute book and gone into effect, in all probability the decision later rendered by the supreme court might have been different. However, that is past history. We want to see this power obtained; we want to see the legislation enacted, because after all there is another aspect of social insurance of this description that we sometimes overlook, the aspect which caused it to be put in effect in many countries after the great warthe fact that it is insurance against social upheaval. It tends to give the working people a certain measure of social security, and to that extent prevents the rise of discontent and the consequent threat to the entire social and economic structure. Following a war, measures of this description have been found necessary, and now that we are entering upon a period which, if we fulfil our obligations to our allies as I anticipate we shall, will be a period of expanding employment, with fewer unemployed employables in our midst, this is the time to enact an unemployment insurance measure, not a year from now. We are glad, therefore, to support the resolution, though we should have liked to see wider powers asked for than are envisaged in the present resolution.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there has been no enthusiasm in this group for unemployment insurance of the type now proposed. The chief reason for that is that we have recognized that unemployment insurance of the kind proposed simply is not the solution. It is characteristic of human beings to keep chasing after glittering baubles and then to discover that after all they are only baubles.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. BLACKMORE: Of course my remark excites merriment, but the day will come when all members of this house will recognize that what I am saying is correct. The solution of our problems lies far deeper than unemployment insurance. For just one reason I really wish the pious desire of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) could have been fulfilled, and that we could have tried this thing out four or five years ago. That reason is this. If we had tried it out four years ago we now should have realized that it is of very little value and that we must go to work to find a real solution.

The problem which confronts this generation is the problem of distribution. I think practically everyone realizes that we are in an age of abundance. Five years ago, when this group began to make that declaration in this house, smiles of patronizing good nature and indulgence were to be seen on the faces of hon. members, much like those we saw a few moments ago. The number of hon. members who seemed to doubt that we were in an age of abundance was very considerable. But five years of bumping our heads against the hard stones of reality have pretty well convinced everyone of the truth of that statement. Now our problem is to distribute that abundance.

Mr. THORSON: Where is the abundance in Saskatchewan, for example?

Mr. BLACKMORE: To-day the people of Saskatchewan are wondering where they are going to sell their wheat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So is this government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let the people of Saskatchewan and the people of Canada as a whole have their productive capacity liberated by a sane financial and credit system and there will be such a superabundance of virtually everything you could name that this country can produce that people will be at their wits' end to know where to market their goods, which indicates beyond any shadow of doubt that we are in an age and a land of abundance.

The national credit of this country can be used to distribute this abundance, but unemployment insurance is not one of the methods for carrying out that distribution. It is therefore only a palliative and will be found to be a disappointment. People will begin to realize the seriousness of that disappointment just when there is the greatest need for something of real value.

If we face things realistically we all recognize that to-day our greatest need is more purchasing power in the hands of the people. We need that extra purchasing power right now, first of all to raise the standard of living of our people from one coast to the other. Everyone recognizes that the standard of living is shamefully low. That is abundant evidence that we need more purchasing power in the hands of the people. If we could get that purchasing power into their hands so they could buy more, we would immediately encourage the production of butter, cream, milk and every other commodity which we can produce so generously in this country. If we could so increase our production, unquestionably we would increase our national income; for production is the thing that makes real wealth. If we could increase our national income, beyond question we could increase our national revenue; for you get national revenue from national income and you get national income from production and you do not encourage production by taxing it or by limiting the purchasing power in the hands of the people.

This measure proposes nothing more or less than a new tax on top of the painful ones imposed yesterday. I say "painful" without committing myself either to approval or disapproval of the budget. In the last analysis we are not going to tax all the people because all the people are not employed. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, we can never possibly reach all the people. We will be least likely to reach those who are suffering the most. Consequently this proposal is exactly the opposite to what we ought to have.

We need not unemployment insurance but employment insurance. Employment insurance could be obtained by giving the people work. People would be able to obtain work once there was an abundance of production. Therefore, we should be devising ways and means of increasing production in this country. Then employment would take care of itself and so would unemployment insurance. How to increase production is the problem we should be wrestling with in this house. If we could manage to extend credit in such a way that the producers could produce freely and expand purchasing power so that the people could buy that production freely, then there would be immediate employment. I submit that it is along these lines that the real solution lies.

May I turn for a moment or two to the question of centralized control. Parrot cries have been heard from one end of the country to the other, apparently actuated by some inspirer behind the scenes, all clamouring for centralized control. The idea seems to be that if you take five, six or seven families, any one of which cannot make a living by itself, and put them all tightly together so that some one can control their every movement, you are going to have every family succeed. Such is not the case and such will not prove to be the case in Canada. We do not need a strong centralized government. Do hon, members wonder why we never heard anything about this need for a strong centralized government until the last ten or fifteen years? Why was it that this country got along very well for many decades? There was no disagreement between the central government and the provincial governments until the depression came along.

Mr. MARTIN: There are different kinds of provincial governments now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does that indicate that the principle of federation as it has been followed during the past decades is wrong, or does it indicate that we are faced with a new set of conditions? We are not going to be able to solve the problem caused by overproduction or abundant production and small employment by clamping on a strong centralized government which can force the people to stand the misery they are suffering and which will give them no chance to solve their own problems locally. If we govern this country in the right way there will be no need of a strong central government. province desires to be a member of a strong British union in Canada, but every province feels that it has a right to a decent standard of living. The thing this house should be considering is how to enable the provinces to have a decent standard of living. We would then have no need for strong central governments.

My group is going to support this unemployment insurance scheme. We have but little faith in it, but we want to see the people who believe in it convinced. A tremendous number of people can convince themselves only by bumping their heads against stone walls. Probably the best thing that could happen is to let the people bump their heads. They will soon find that unemployment insurance is only a bauble, is only a glittering makebelieve that will lead but to disappointment and perhaps to despair.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and other hon. members who have spoken for particular groups have each referred to their own attitude and that of their respective followings towards an unemployment insurance act. The hon. leader of the opposition outlined the steps taken by the Conservative party during a previous administration to have an unemployment insurance act placed upon the statutes and put into force. The acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has referred to the frequent intimations which his group had given of their desire to see an unemployment insurance act placed upon the statutes. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) described the attitude of his group with respect to this particular measure. His description, if I recollect aright, was of its being a sort of stone-wall attitude. He is quite agreeable to support the measure, and I want to thank him for his support, but in doing so may I say that I hope the result will not prove as disastrous as he seems to think it will.

I might perhaps be permitted to say a word or two concerning the attitude of the Liberal party towards unemployment insurance. In so doing I should like to go as far back as the time when I had the honour of being chosen the leader of my party. I refer to the national Liberal convention which was held in 1919. At that convention a resolution was passed endorsing social legislation as part of the Liberal policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was only a chart.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was part of a chart, a chart which has been carried out increasingly ever since. At the time it was recognized that there were two matters which would have to be considered carefully in connection with any social legislation. One was the financial position of the dominion and the provinces and the other the all-important question of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion. The resolution passed in 1919 was expressed in the following words:

In so far as it may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence, old age and other disability should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces.

When the Liberal administration came into office in 1921 we indicated our hope that while we were in office we might soon be in a position to enact some measure of social insurance. It took time to gain that end. It was a new field for a federal administration to enter. Old age pensions appeared to be the obvious place to begin. It was possible to obtain the cooperation of the provinces for such a measure more readily than for one respecting unemployment, invalidity or health insurance. An old age pensions measure was enacted by the Liberal administration in office in 1927. In 1928 the same administration, continuing in office, invited this house to consider in one of its committees the advisability of following that enactment by one respecting unemploy-ment insurance. The matter was referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations. That committee made a report at the end of the session of 1928 to the effect that unemployment insurance was desirable, but the committee recognized the fact that one province could not act alone and recommended further study of the matter. The same committee met in the following year, 1929, and reported, approving the principle but noting the opinion of the Department of Justice that the jurisdiction was provincial, and a report from the Minister of Labour that the provinces had been consulted and most of them were not disposed to act. I have before me the answers given by the different provinces at that time, and they indicate quite clearly that the provinces themselves were not favourable to the enactment of an unemployment insurance measure by the federal government.

In 1933 when in opposition I made a statement to the house of Liberal principles on a number of different matters—that was not the chart; it was the occasion of the fourteen points—and one of the points was that, "As a permanent measure the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by revising industry and trade, and to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance.

Then, as my hon, friend the leader of the opposition has said, Mr. Bennett, who was then Prime Minister, introduced in 1935 his bill respecting unemployment insurance." Knowing the position taken by most if not all of the provinces to the effect that an unemployment insurance measure invade their jurisdiction if enacted as a federal act, we of the opposition of the day felt it necessary to point out to the government that they were seeking to enact, we assumed knowingly, a measure which was not within the competence of this parliament and the validity of which would be questioned immediately if an effort were made to put it into force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the Prime Minister will allow me, I omitted to say in my remarks—and he will recall that this is correct—that before Mr. Bennett introduced that legislation we had what we considered the best legal opinion in Canada, and not from one source only but from more than one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I recall that certain legal opinion was cited but it was very strongly combated by legal opinion that we on our side regarded as even better, and as events turned out it so proved. At all events what we did suggest was not that the act should not be passed but rather that before any attempts were made to put its provisions into effect, advantage should be taken of the Supreme Court Act to have the measure referred to the supreme court for an opinion which would decide beyond any question of doubt whether the proposed unemployment insurance measure, if given the force of law, would be valid and its provisions thereafter unquestioned as coming within the competence of this parliament. Hon. members no doubt are aware that there is a section in the Supreme Court Act which was enacted for the very purpose of meeting situations of the kind. The section gives the supreme court authority to determine and pronounce finally in advance so as to avoid unnecessary expense and also the inconvenience and annoyance that are occasioned by a measure being subsequently disallowed. Section 55 of the Supreme Court Act gives the court special jurisdiction with respect to references by governor in council. It reads:

Important questions of law or fact touching
(a) the interpretation of the British North America Acts, or

(b) the constitutionality or interpretation of any dominion or provincial legislation, or

(d) the powers of the parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised, may be referred by the governor in council to the supreme court for hearing and consideration; and any question touching any of the matters aforesaid, so referred by the governor in council, shall be conclusively deemed to be an important question.

The opinion of the court upon any such reference, although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to his majesty in council, be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

In other words, we of the opposition of the day felt that to put the act into force would necessarily involve a very large expenditure, also the making of a considerable number of important appointments. We expressed the view that before the people's money was used for the purpose of an enactment about which there was doubt as to the competence of parliament, it was advisable that that doubt should be removed altogether.

The leader of the Conservative party of the day would, however, not pay any heed to the representations which were made. The act was passed and found its place on the statutes and several appointments, if I recall aright, were made under it. The Conservative party was not returned to power at the election which immediately ensued. The present administration came into office and we immediately referred the question of the validity of the act to the supreme court for decision. The supreme court gave its decision, which was in accordance with the view which we held at the time we opposed the measure. An appeal was then taken to the judicial committee of the privy council in England and the privy council upheld the decision of the supreme court. My hon, friend will I think agree that in seeking a final decision by the judicial committee of the privy council in the old country, we were seeking and securing the opinion of as high an authority as was possible. It was in that way that the unemployment insurance enactment of the late conservative administration fell to the ground.

We then immediately sought to bring in a measure of unemployment insurance which would be beyond question as to its validity. The difficult but most necessary part of the whole business was to get the consent of the several provinces. That has not been an easy matter. My hon. friend has referred to our having lost a good deal of time in getting an unemployment insurance act upon the statutes. I agree with him that it is unfortunate that a lot of time has been lost, but it has been lost, not at the instance of the federal government, but at the instance of the provinces which would not agree to an enactment. by the federal government. While, however, we have lost time in that way, we have made an exceedingly important gain in another direction, which, in the end, may mean much saving of time, namely, to-day we are able to introduce an act which carries with it the consent of every single province of this dominion. That is a very great achievement. Up until this year we were unable to secure from all of the provinces an approval which would enable us to say: We have the provinces in complete agreement with us as to amending the British North America Act in a manner which will enable this federal government to pass an unemployment insurance measure without possible question as to its validity being raised either now or later on. I feel that that achievement of itself will in the long run be most valuable. We have avoided anything in the nature of coercion of any of the provinces. Moreover we have avoided the raising of a very critical constitutional question, namely, whether or not in amending the British North America Act it is absolutely necessary to secure the consent of all the provinces, or whether the consent of a certain number of provinces would of itself be sufficient. That question may come up but not in reference to unemployment insurance at some time later on. For the present at any rate we have escaped any pitfall in that direction and we are now able to bring in a measure which has the complete support of all the provinces.

I have tabled this afternoon the correspondence which has taken place between the dominion and the provinces. It is I think of a historical character. It is as important I believe as any material that appears in the volumes of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. For that reason I suggested a little earlier to-day that it might be printed in the votes and proceedings of to-day so as to be found permanently in the records of this parliament.

I do not think I need say more. As a matter of fact, not having received the consent of all nine provinces until this year, we could not possibly before this particular session have introduced in a manner which would avoid all questions a measure for the amendment of the British North America Act. There were, if I recollect aright, three provinces, namely New Brunswick, Quebec and Alberta, which prior to the beginning of this year had not given their full approval. But each of these provinces, recognizing the national importance of this measure, and, I believe being moved to see it in a clearer light as a consequence of the problems which are inevitable at this time of war and which will arise when the war is over, have agreed to join with the federal government in giving unanimous approval to the enactment of the measure.

That enables me, I hope, to answer in part the question which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked, and which was, whether the government can give any undertaking that the measure will be put through at the present session of parliament. I believe that, inasmuch as this resolution will pass the House of Commons with the approval of hon. members on all sides, and that it is pretty certain to meet with like approval in the other house, the government at Westminster will lose no time in passing the amendment which we are requesting by resolution. How long that will take in the present circumstances no one, of course, can say. But I should be rather astonished if it is not possible, notwithstanding present conditions, for the government at Westminster to amend the British North America Act, in accordance with our wishes, within a day or two. I should think that it would not be necessary to wait to send Britain the submissions by mail, but that, the circumstances being what they are, a cable from the ministry informing the British government that both our houses of parliament had unanimously agreed to the address and requesting that action be taken as speedily as possible, would be met with very prompt action on the part of the British government.

As soon as the British North America Act is amended in the particular required a bill will be introduced, and it is certainly our intention and desire to have the bill go through at the present session. There will have to be something wholly unforeseen at this moment to prevent that course being carried out by the government. It is certainly our present expectation as well as our present desire.

I may have omitted reference to some other matters which have been mentioned, but I believe the only one is that alluded to by my hon. friend the acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, who regretted that it was not possible for us to make the request to the British government somewhat larger, more all-embracing, than the one which is being made and which is confined to unemployment insurance. May I say that, if we had ventured to go beyond unemployment insurance, we would probably have met with further objections on the part of some, if not of all, of the provinces. As the correspondence will show, one of the circumstances which enabled us to get the approval of all of the provinces was the fact that we were asking for only one amendment, specifically related to unemployment insurance. I imagine the provinces have felt that they would like to wait and see just how that amendment works out before they give their consent to amendments of wider scope.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): As one who in quite a number of sessions has advocated unemployment insurance, I am going to support the resolution, and I hope that I shall be able also to support the main provisions of the bill. I appreciate the difficulty which the government has had. Having taken the stand that it was a constitutional question, they have proceeded from that point of view, after having appealed to the privy council for its decision, and are preparing to bring in a bill with the consent of all the provinces.

There are, I believe, only two other federated nations having unemployment insurance laws which have had the same problem to grapple with. In Switzerland, with its twenty-five cantons, they could not come to the same satisfactory conclusion as has now been reached in Canada, where all the provinces are in unison with regard to carrying out the plan. The result in Switzerland was that in nine of the cantons there are compulsory unemployment insurance laws; in fourteen the law is non-compulsory, and two cantons have no unemployment insurance whatever. In my judgment that is not satisfactory.

While I should like to have seen in operation during the past five years the bill which was passed by the Conservative government in 1935, I am willing to concede that if the present government felt it necessary for the sake of harmony to take the course they have done, possibly a great deal has not been lost through waiting until to-day. In the United States, of course, there was the same trouble: they have forty-eight states. I have often wondered why even the present government, at the first session, in 1936, could not have followed the United States plan. I am not saying that theirs is as good a system as the one in operation in Great Britain, but it might have been amended and reconsidered to suit our situation here. In the United States each state had the same power as each province of Canada claims to have. That is, any unemployment law could have been enacted by each individual state. That difficulty was overcome through the enactment by the federal government of an unemployment insurance act which they believed would be satisfactory to each state, and then, to induce the states to put unemployment insurance into operation, they undertook to return to each state as a federal state tax the taxes collected with relation to unemployment insurance.

I should like to have asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) after he spoke whether this government has looked into the United States federal system.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister nods his head. Then apparently the government discarded the United States system. There is no reason why if it was workable it could not have been in operation here during the last five years.

I intend to speak for only a moment or two, but I should like to comment on the opinion expressed by the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore), that unemployment insurance cannot be a success. It has been my pleasure to visit over quite a number of years many countries—Germany, Holland, France, Great Britain, and various states of the American union—which have unemployment insurance in operation, and my observation is that the legislation has been an unqualified success. In Great Britain it has been marvellously successful. I do not know what they could have done without their unemployment insurance act. With the aid of the funds which they are accumulating under their unemployment insurance law they are looking forward confidently to being able for a long period to take care of the men who will probably be thrown out of work at the conclusion of the war. Through the increase in employment in the manufacture of armaments and munitions, unemployment insurance contributions have increased to an enormous sum of money, which explains in some degree why the benefits under their present To-day the law were recently increased. British unemployment insurance act surpasses anything elsewhere and has met the fondest wishes of their working men.

I became quite a number of years ago an advocate of unemployment insurance because of my association with large numbers of working men. From time to time I saw men thrown out of work, sometimes under circumstances of peculiar hardship. I have in mind one man who was thrown out of work after thirty years, without obtaining any compensation. That was manifestly unfair. The company for whom he worked did not feel disposed to give him a pension, and as he had had nothing to do with contributing to any unemployment insurance fund he received nothing from any such source. Others who had served twenty-nine, twenty-eight, twenty-seven, twenty-six, twenty-five years, and so on, were thrown out of employment. In one case a man worked forty-five years but because of intermittent employment he was unable to put aside anything and when he was thrown out of work he had nothing to fall back on.

I am firmly convinced that unemployment insurance is one of the finest pieces of social legislation any government can enact, and I shall be glad to support it now, even though it comes five years later than in my opinion we should have had it.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): I am to some extent in accord with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in his appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to apply for wider powers than he is asking for in connection with unemployment insurance, but after listening to the reasons given by the Prime Minister I have come to the conclusion that it would be better to adopt a programme of going slowly and making steady progress in that way than to ask for too much and risk getting nothing at all. Up to that point I am prepared to give my support to the measure and I will accept the point of view put forward.

Unemployment insurance has received a great deal of thought especially from the standpoint of our industrial centres. Speaking for the people I represent, and I believe for the farmers of the dominion at large, I suggest that this is another of the measures that will add to the burden upon agriculture. We do not want to play the dog in the manger, and to say that because we are not sharing in the benefits of certain legislation we wish to deprive other citizens of those benefits. The unfortunate thing is that only a small proportion of the population of Canada will be in a position to enjoy all the privileges of this legislation.

The reason I am in harmony with the point of view of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is that I should like to see the scope of this type of legislation broadened so as to take in the farmers. I have followed with a reasonable degree of interest the social legislation of many countries, particularly where such legislation has made considerable strides, as in the United States, but unfortunately none of it makes any provision for the farmers. It seems that the farmer has to supply the food of the nation at less than cost, and in the last ten years of economic warfare he has been the real veteran. He has supplied the food of the employer in the city at less than cost and he finds himself to-day receiving a smaller portion every year of the national wealth of the country. In 1914 he received about 16 per cent of the national income. To-day he receives less than 9 per cent. It seems to me that we are putting upon society, upon the taxpayer, another burden which will increase the cost of goods to the farmer, the cost of the things he has to buy, without giving him any compensation. True, the leader of the Social Credit party emphasized that we should have a decent standard of living. Well, it has been very difficult for me to interpret the term "decent standard of living," because there are eleven million people in Canada and I have come to the conclusion that there are eleven million standards of living. One man's standard of living may be quite different from that of another.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was concerned last week about the effect of the high cost of living on the labouring population in view of the war situation. I would say to the hon. member that it is not always the high cost of living that affects us; it is the cost of high living. I am inclined to think that is largely true of the city man in relation to the man on the farm. I should like to see in our social legislation some provision for a contributory national pension scheme which would take the farmer into consideration. To-day he is not only supplying the food of the nation at less than cost, but he is making a great contribution to the education and to the social and industrial life of the country. He has mortgaged his farm to educate his sons, who have taken the industrial field and gone in for professional and academic life, using in many ways the abilities thus acquired to advance the very type of legislation that will make it more difficult for the old man to live on the farm. I should like to see the scheme of social legislation broadened so that the old man on the farm, after contributing all these years to the welfare of society, might benefit from a contributory national insurance scheme, something in which he could participate. After living all his time on the farm he would be unhappy if he moved into the city, but he could still live on the land and obtain a fair share of his living there, with a small monetary contribution in monthly payments such as many men to-day do not enjoy, although they have made their contribution to society.

When the bill comes down I intend to take the opportunity to discuss this matter further. I felt that it was my duty at this particular time to say something on behalf of a large section of the people of Canada who unfortunately, owing to the economic conditions that prevail, are struggling hard and making a considerable contribution to the national wealth of Canada without receiving anything in return. If Canada is to be a great nation we cannot afford to continue preferences to certain classes. The farmer is demanding that he come abreast in all the privileges and enjoyments of society. We should not ask from the taxpayers money to meet personal obligations. The unfortunate thing is that the man who is trying to raise his own family, live his own life, pay his honest debts, is taxed to pay old age pensions for the man who in many respects has wasted his time.

I believe that through a system of contributory insurance a man would be entitled to some of the wealth which he has created. Many are too proud to ask these privileges. I have come to the point where I am doubtful whether there is any type of non-contributory social legislation. We all contribute in some form; the unfortunate thing is the unequal distribution of the contribution we as taxpayers have been making. We are all contributors to social insurance, but unfortunately we are not all sharing in the enjoyment of it. I belong to a class representing the old pioneers of this country who, especially the farmers, were very reluctant to ask for these privileges, although they bowed their heads in assent to this advanced social legislation the privileges of which go largely to our industrial centres. Every man, I care not who he is, should make some contribution in the days when he has power to do so towards his own social security. There is a saying that all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy; but while that is true it is also true that he generally has a bank account. We should all set aside a certain part of our income. The man who does not voluntarily realize the importance of thrift should be forced to assume his responsibility to himself for the days when he cannot earn his own living.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have consistently and annually supported the principle of unemployment insurance since I was a member of the committee of this house which in 1922 recommended old age pensions and unemployment insurance. I want to see a real system, and in view of the heavy burden which the government placed on industry yesterday it is their duty and function now to tell the employers what this scheme is. Is it compulsory; is it something the administration of which is later going to be shifted off in part on the municipalities or on the provinces? The employer yesterday was given six days to adjust income taxes with his employees. Is this bill going to be a meaningless thing or not? The government say, "as soon as possible." That is what the Liberal platform said in 1919 regarding unemployment insurance but twenty-one years afterwards it is still not in effect. It could have been put into effect by this government under the power in section 91 of the British North America Act under "public debt and property".

Following the practice of the last amendment by the parliament of the United Kingdom to the British North America Act the consent of the provinces must be given in the same form as this proposed address to-day, namely an address from each province. Another question is, how is this going to affect the present relief votes? Will it enable the government to shelter itself behind the statement that we have an act of the United Kingdom for unemployment insurance and cut these relief votes? Technical education was recognized as a federal responsibility by the commission appointed in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, yet was shunted off on the provinces and municipalities, and so was old age pensions.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) must not be too sure about getting this amendment through the British parliament in a day or two. I can tell him there are other applications to amend a constitution, one of them dealing with a very grave situation in India; and the British government had to tell them that it will have to be postponed until after the war. They want home rule all along the line, something that may affect the war effort. South Africa and the southern part of Ireland have been considering like applications. Anyone who has the interests of the empire at heart realizes that these are very grave times for the mother country; and while I have supported this principle and support this application now, this is a very grave time to ask for this legislation if we are not going to put it into effect right away. "As soon as possible" does not mean anything. Will it be put into effect this year?

Until the enactment of the statute of Westminster there was no doubt that we had to go to the British parliament for these amendments. But this Dominion of Canada has a written constitution, that of 1867, and rules of strict law off it under the British North America Act. The southern part of Ireland was given a somewhat similar constitution, by the Irish treaty of 1921. The moment the statute of Westminster had been passed, although Mr. Lloyd George, the attorney general of England; Right Hon. F. E. Smith; Sir Austen Chamberlain and many eminent lawyers said at the time that the statute of Westminster would not change one word of the written constitution of southern Ireland, they changed every article of that constitution, including the abolition of appeals to the privy council. What will be the effect of the statute of Westminster on this application as far as Canada is concerned? No doubt that point will be raised when the matter comes up in the imperial parliament. I hope this will not lead to giving Canada the right to change its own constitution at will, as was given to one other dominion; the provinces must also consent to that.

These are very grave times for the mother of parliaments, and while I support the application, as I have always supported this principle, I do not want to see this a meaningless thing, just getting an amendment of the British North America Act and then having it stand for months and years. We are thirty-one years behind the mother country. She got this splendid social legislation in 1909; under the Liberal platform we were to get it in 1919, and here twenty-one years later we have not got it yet; there is only a proposal for enabling legislation, with no details or plan. This is going to open the door to applications from India and the two other dominions I have named at a very grave time for the empire. In view of the heavy burden put upon industry and agriculture by the government yesterday the government should tell the house and the country, employers of labour and the working classes, who are most anxious to have relief from the terrible social and economic burden they are suffering to-day, what this scheme is, what the details are, what the cost will be and who pays it. If it is going to mean an additional burden added to real estate we should know and the country should know before the legislation is passed.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): I shall be only a few moments in my advocacy of this resolution. Unemployment insurance is a very important part of the programme of national reform upon which this country must embark. I wish, however, to dispute the contention that it is necessary to obtain the consent of the provinces before an application is made to amend the British North America Act. In my opinion there is no such necessity. On the other hand, it is the course of wisdom to advance as advances may be properly made, and I am sure that every hon. member is very glad that all the provinces of Canada have agreed to this measure. But I would not wish this debate to conclude with an acceptance, either direct or implied, of the doctrine that it is necessary to obtain the consent of the provinces before an application is made to amend the British North America Act. Fortunately, this is an academic question at this time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I tell my hon. friend that neither the Prime Minister nor I have said that it is necessary, but it may be desirable.

Mr. THORSON: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made it perfectly clear that the question does not enter into this discussion, in view of the fact that all the provinces have signified their willingness that this amendment should be requested.

There is one other matter to which I should like to make reference. It seems to me that at this stage, and in view of the development of this country as a nation, our present method of proceeding with constitutional reform is archaic. We ought to have definitely within our own hands the power of making such constitutional amendments as commend themselves to the people of Canada, without having to take the steps that are now necessary. In view of the fact, however, that we have not yet ourselves outlined the procedure for amending our constitution, apparently this is the only road open to us. I hope that this will be an incentive to us to devise ways and means of amending our constitution, so that when other constitutional reforms commend themselves to the people of Canada we may put such reforms into effect of our own motion.

These are the only two points that I wish to make. I am sure that we are all glad that this very necessary measure of national reform is about to be implemented.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, with most of the later remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thorson) who has just taken his seat I quite heartily agree, although with his first remarks I disagree. The hon, gentleman suggested that this was one of the steps necessary to the social progress of this country. Of course we are unable to pass judgment as to the effect of this step on economic conditions in Canada until we have the actual measure before us, so that we may see in just what manner this unemployment insurance scheme is to be conducted; but if it is going to be managed in the same manner that practically all other measures are handled, we can rest quite assured, I believe, that any funds necessary for this purpose will be obtained through either increased taxation or borrowing, which in the final analysis amounts to the same thing. Consequently, while I greatly dislike to suggest it, I feel that any proposal which is going to lead to increased taxation or borrowing can be described as nothing but a redistribution of power. What we want in this country is a distribution of the wealth, which is actually and potentially great. As my leader pointed out this afternoon, that is the problem with which the government is faced. Personally I do not think it is at all necessary to obtain any amendment to the British North America Act to bring about that condition. There are at the present time plenty of facilities available which the government could use to enable the people of Canada collectively to provide for their own security.

As I have already stated, with the later remarks of the hon, member for Selkirk I heartily agree. As most hon, members know, I have been particularly interested in the constitutional aspect of our situation, and in times past have made a few addresses on this subject. As I have said before, I do not pretend to be an expert; I look at the matter merely from the point of view of a layman wishing to see conditions here of which we can be proud and which will enable us to perform our duties most effectively. As has been indicated by the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon, member for Selkirk, there should be no reason why we in Canada could not amend our constitution without referring to the imperial parliament. That situation, as I see it, is just one of the many anomalies still existing in relation to our constitutional position, and it is one which I am sure every one agrees should be removed at the earliest possible opportunity.

In connection with the power to amend our own constitution, and the contradiction that exists in that regard, once again I should like to refer to a few sentences appearing in the report of the imperial conference of 1926. I am sure most people who think of these matters must ask themselves this question: If we are a nation; if we are self-governing; if we have the right to determine our own affairs, why must we proceed to the imperial parliament to seek an amendment to our constitution? On the one hand we claim that we are independent, that we are free, that we are self-governing; on the other hand we resort to steps which deny what we claim to believe. The report of the inter-imperial relations committee, presented to the imperial conference of 1926, contains this reference to the units which compose the British empire:

They are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way sub-ordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British common wealth of nations.

If that is the condition which obtains in the relationship of the various parts of the empire to the mother country, then I also cannot see why Canada should not have the right to amend her own constitution.

It is rather unfortunate that this matter should be raised in the house at this time. In my opinion this question of amending the British North America Act is not the only issue involved in regard to constitutional matters. I believe this raises the whole constitutional position in Canada at this time; and the situation is such that I believe we ought do something definite to remedy it and put our constitutional house in order. With the hour being so serious as it is, it is most inappropriate to precipitate anything in the way of constitutional trouble at this time. Conditions being what they are in Canada to-day, there is sufficient to cause a first-class constitutional crisis. I would be much happier if the government would see fit to refrain from dealing with constitutional matters until such time as the atmosphere is more conducive to discussing and debating a measure of that

Mr. MacNICOL: The constitutional question depends upon the British fleet.

Mr. KUHL: The fear I have in connection with this method of amending the British North America Act, our so-called constitution, is that we shall be setting up a precedent or more or less giving approval or sanction to constitutional conditions which obtain at the moment. Personally I do not wish to do that. As I said previously, there are in our constitutional position many anomalies which I think ought to be removed. I shall not deal at any length with these, but I should like to suggest a few of them in order to outline the problem which still confronts us constitution-

First is the method of amending our constitution. There certainly should be some regular and established method of amending our constitution. Next we have the anomalous position which obtains with regard to the governor general. The inter-imperial relations committee indicated in 1926 the position of the governor general since the enactment of the statute of Westminster, when it stated:

In our opinion it is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British commonwealth of nations that the governor general of a dominion is the representative of the crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's government in Great Britain or of any department of the government.

It must be quite obvious to everyone from a reading of that paragraph that since 1931 the position of the governor general has been that of personal representative of His Majesty the King. That is quite proper. Yet, on the other hand, there are sections of the British North America Act which grant the governor general authority over certain matters in Canada. Section 11 of the British North America Act gives to the governor general the power to summon, appoint and remove from time to time members of the privy council of Canada. Under section 14 he has the authority to appoint a commisioner of the Yukon territory. Under section 24 he is instructed upon how to appoint the senate. Under sections 55, 56 and 57 he is given the power of disallowance over dominion legislation. Under section 90 he is given the power of disallowance over provincial legislation. If the governor general is merely the representative of His Majesty the King; if he has no more authority over governmental affairs in Canada than has His Majesty the King in Great Britain, then no such authority as is granted by these sections should be extended to the governor general.

The power of disallowance is an anomaly which should not exist in a democratic country. It is a relic of colonialism. It certainly is not compatible with the fundamental principles of democracy.

Another anomaly exists in connection with our status as citizens. We claim that Canada is a nation, and yet not one of us has the privilege of stating that he is a Canadian. There is in our statutes no provision by which we can state that we are of Canadian nationality. People who have been born in Canada should have the right to claim Canadian nationality.

I omitted to refer to the senate. To have a governmental body appointed with authority over the people's elected representative is something which I think should not be tolerated in a democratic country. There certainly should be a good deal of reform with regard to the position of the senate.

Then we refer to the government as the federal government. If my understanding of the meaning of the terms "federal government" and "federal union" is correct, there must have been a time when we ratified a constitution creating a federal union and federal government in Canada. My knowledge of history does not indicate any time in the past when we ratified such a constitution. In addresses which I have delivered in the past I have indicated—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he is travelling far beyond the confines of this resolution.

Mr. KUHL: I am simply enumerating several of the anomalies which exist in our constitutional position. The method of amending the British North America Act is one.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We are dealing with this particular amendment.

Mr. KUHL: I am simply stating that all these anomalies should be dealt with, including the method of amending the British North America Act.

I should like to refer to one more anomaly before concluding this portion of my remarks. We have no federal district in Canada. In every other federal union there is a proper federal district which is controlled by the federal government. That should be the case in Canada. Canada is the only country in the world without a distinctive national flag. We heard a great deal about this from the former member for North Battleford, Mr. McIntosh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order. The resolution before the house does not deal with a national flag. I ask the hon. member again to confine himself to the terms of the resolution as strictly as he possibly can.

Mr. KUHL: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had almost concluded that portion of my remarks. I have enumerated what I believe [Mr. Kuhl.]

are other anomalies in addition to the one which exists in connection with the measure now under consideration. I believe that the best possible advice with regard to removing the anomaly in connection with amending our constitution is to be found in the recommendations contained in the report of the special committee of 1935 on the British North America Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must again call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is referring to the growth and removal of anomalies. What we are concerned with in this resolution is an application under the existing law to amend our constitution, and I would again ask the hon, member to address himself to that question.

Mr. KUHL: Is it your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that nothing in connection with ways and means of amending our constitution can be discussed on this measure?

Mr. SPEAKER: The sole subject before the house is a concrete application to amend the constitution. If the hon member is against this method of approach he has the right so to express himself, but he is not in order in discussing anomalies in our constitution. That is not within the confines of the resolution.

Mr. KUHL: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling, but I feel nevertheless that it is drawing the line pretty closely. I shall, however, endeavour to conclude as strictly in accordance with your ruling as I can.

I believe the anomaly could be overcome by overhauling our whole constitutional position. If we are to have a constitution in harmony with the constitutional principles of democracy, we can achieve it only by a complete overhauling. I see no other way of doing it than by starting right from the beginning, with an interprovincial conference followed by the drafting of a constitution which will deal adequately not only with this question but with all the other anomalies in our constitutional position. I am sorry, sir, that on this occasion of seeking to amend the British North America Act the circumstances of the war do not enable us to deal more adequately with our general constitutional position, but I trust that before many more years have passed we shall feel more free to express ourselves and to enact measures which will adequately take care of such measures as the one with which we are now dealing.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in support of this resolution to amend the British North America Act so as to allow parliament to bring unemployment insurance into force in Canada. In an industrial riding such as mine it is an absolute necessity that workers in industries which may be tremendously affected not only by foreign affairs but even by climatic conditions must feel that they have security of employment. I am only sorry that such a measure was not put into force five years ago, and the constitutional question could have been fought out after the measure was in effect. In that connection I agree very largely with the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) in his remarks about our right to amend the constitution. While I am not learned in the law, I come from an industrial riding, and being industrially and nationally minded I cannot help feeling that this proposed measure might well go further. I feel that it does not go nearly far enough.

I hope I am not transgressing your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that we must not discuss matters which are not strictly relevant to the resolution, when I say that in my opinion the British North America Act should be made more flexible than it is now. We have had this act since 1867. It was amended in 1931 by the statute of Westminster. Now we are seeking another amendment. All legislation, no matter how perfect it may be at the time it is passed, is bound to become obsolete. Nothing is permanent except change. The act of 1867 is not applicable to conditions today and many of its clauses are archaic. I should like to make the suggestion that at some time in the future the British North America Act should be treated as we treat the Bank Act and come up for review and revision at the end of every decennial period.

This resolution deals solely with unemployment insurance, but to-day we see many of our provinces and cities setting up what almost amount to tariff barriers. The province of New Brunswick, for example, and the province of Quebec, have imposed taxes on cigarettes and other commodities which taxes, while they may be minor in their effects, do show, in my opinion, a dangerous trend in our economic life. We should have one strong federal authority with complete authority to legislate with regard to all these matters and to deal with unemployment insurance, hours of labour, fair wages, minimum wages and so forth, in a way that would give us uniform standards right across Canada, rather than the sectional differences which have been created in the past by provincial action. I realize, of course, that it is a difficult thing to do, but it is the goal towards which we must work.

Some other remarks which I had intended to make, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid would transgress your ruling, but possibly at some future time I may have a further opportunity to discuss the constitution. At this moment I shall only say that I am heartily in support of this unemployment insurance measure and I shall do everything I can to help its passage.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have only a very few words to say on this resolution dealing with unemployment insurance because the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already stated the case so far as we are concerned. We accept this instalment of social insurance, not because it is the best thing possible, but because it appears to be the only thing available at this time. I am as well aware as the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that unemployment insurance when we get it, will not be a solution of the social problems which confront us in this country. Unemployment insurance has not solved the social problems in any country where it has been put into effect. But I know of no country in which unemployment insurance has been tried that would to-day rescind or repeal that legislation. It is a step towards further social security.

The reason why I rose in my place was to reply to some remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) arising out of some observations I made a couple of weeks ago upon the standard of living among the working class. The hon, member said that he thought the trouble was not so much the high cost of living as the cost of high living. That may be true in Brant, but it is certainly not true in Vancouver East. If we are suffering, it is not from the cost of high living; we are suffering—extremely—from the cost of low living, or poor living.

The hon. member made a further statement, with which I do not believe anybody who has made a study of economic trends can agree, namely, that the farmers pay for all social legislation. It may not have occurred to the hon, gentleman that the farmers and the industrial workers are not two distinct groups, working against each other, but are complementary groups within the social economy, working together and producing all wealth. But for the function and production of the industrial worker producing the tools and machinery the farmer uses, the farmer, instead of keeping the rest of the community, would have a hard time to maintain himself. He would be digging the ground as his ancestors did, with a crooked stick, sowing his little seeds here and there, and facing starvation whenever there was a bad season. Today, because of advancement in mechanical and other sciences, the farmer in the country and the worker in the city are able to produce between them an enormous amount of goods, so large a volume that we do not know what to do with them. The phenomenon with which we are confronted is that although it is becoming more and more difficult for the individual to provide for his own social security, it is becoming progressively easier for us as national units to provide for the security of everyone. But this security can be achieved only by the various federal, provincial, municipal and maybe some forms of cooperative organizations working together and appropriating to themselves the results of their common labour.

I said a moment ago that the farmer and the industrial worker produced the whole of the country's wealth. Yet, although these workers produce the country's wealth, other people take it. That other people take it is patent, because the farmer and the industrial worker are becoming progressively more steeped in poverty.

I wish, as do other hon, members, that the government had gone further in this regard and asked for an amendment to the British North America Act which would enable us to inaugurate a comprehensive scheme of social security legislation. Other countries not so wealthy as Canada have made more progress in this direction. The Australian scheme of social security went into effect on January 1, 1939; the New Zealand scheme went into operation on April 1 last year; other countries have taken similar action. But if we cannot get a whole loaf we will take a half loaf, and if we cannot get a half loaf we will take a quarter loaf. But we shall follow the example of Oliver Twist; we shall keep on asking for more; and there is no finality as far as we of this group are concerned.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): May I have the privilege of saying a word in connection with this resolution? I should like to put on record my approval of it, for two reasons. The first is that I come from an industrial riding where in my judgment a great deal of benefit will be distributed among a very large number of people as a result of the projected measure. I should like to tender to the government the satisfaction which, I know, so many working men and women will feel on hearing of the success of this measure and their congratulations to the government for at last bringing it to a successful conclusion. My second reason is that for many years I have expressed myself on innumerable occasions as in favour of this legislation. I was present at the great convention of 1919 when it was referred to with approval by the Liberal party; and furthermore, in much more recent times I represented the province of Ontario before the privy council in England in the discussion of the measure when it was under review in the constitutional reference. On that occasion I made an effort on behalf of the province to save the measure constitutionally. We went over the various arguments which were advanced to show its constitutionality, and most of them were discarded. I pinned my faith to the one thought that it might fall within the clause: "peace, order and good government." The argument was not very strong, however, and at the time I doubted its soundness. The privy council agreed with me in the doubt. Still, it was an effort to save the measure and the advantages and benefits which I knew, and my province knew, would flow from it.

The measure has been attacked in the house this afternoon, first, by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) on the ground that it is not a cure for unemployment; second, by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on the ground that it is not a cure for social ills. Well, it does not purport to be either of those things, and it seems to me important that this measure be not damned in its initial stages by being advertised as something which it is not. It is hardly fair to attack legislation because it is not something which it does not purport to be. It is much fairer to consider it on the basis of what it is.

It is a limited measure. It does not purport to go to the root of unemployment or to prevent unemployment. What it does do is, in a limited number of cases, for certain classes, provide relief to those who have been in employment at one time and then lose their employment.

It should not be considered anything else than that, and should be judged on the merits of the proposed bill as it will be or as it is. But I am satisfied, after long consideration of this measure, that as years go by it will bring comfort and benefit to many, many thousands of our fellow citizens; and that, Mr. Speaker, is enough. On that ground, the ground of what the legislation is, not what it is not, I congratulate the government on at last bringing it to real success.

Motion agreed to.

SOCKEYE SALMON FISHERY

PRICE TO BE PAID TO FISHERMEN BY BRITISH COLUMBIA CANNERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to call the attention of the government and particularly of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) to a matter so urgent, so important, that it might well justify the moving of the adjournment of the house. Possibly, however, this method will suffice. Within a few days the sockeye salmon fishing in British Columbia will open, and on it depends ninety per cent, I should think, of the livelihood of the gill netters of British Columbia. The canners have, within the last few days, set the price which they claim is all they are able to pay, and it is so far below last year's prices that the fishermen contend, justly I think, that with the tremendous increase in the price of gear-web and so on-and the higher cost of living it will be utterly impossible for them to live, to say nothing of making a livelihood at these prices. The canners claim in justification that their action is caused by price restrictions made by the British government, and therefore the question seems to be one of national importance. It would be better public policy, it would pay the government and it would pay us all, rather than have these thousands of fishermen and workers in allied industries idle and dissatisfied all summer, to have the matter treated as a situation somewhat parallel to that with which apples were dealt with, so that there would be guaranteed to the canners such a price as would enable the fishermen to get a price at least approximating what was paid last year. I will send the telegram over to the minister.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was good enough to intimate to me before the house met that he would ask this question.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister allow me? I forgot to state that I was speaking on behalf of several members from British Columbia who are interested.

Mr. MICHAUD: I had occasion to look into the matter. The government has in fact been made aware of the decision of the British Columbia canners to pay the fishermen this year twenty per cent less than they paid last year for sockeye salmon. This variety of salmon is of the highest grade and quality, and heretofore almost eighty per cent of the annual Canadian pack was marketed in Great Britain. Owing to disturbed conditions and the relatively low price set by the British food controller for this high grade commodity, the canners are uncertain as to the possibility of being able to market the pack this year and they feel that they cannot pay more than they are now offering. Although this is no longer a matter of fishing but a marketing problem, the whole situation has created a real social problem in British Columbia, and it has not escaped the attention of the government. At the present time consideration is being given to its possible solution as well as to the methods whereby it can be solved. That is all I can say at present.

Mr. NEILL: The matter is urgent.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (York North): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if any decision has been made as to whether the house will sit on the first of July?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Many members of the house, I know, have informed the Prime Minister that they have made engagements on dominion day in their own constituencies or elsewhere and have requested that the house should not sit. I believe it is the intention of the Prime Minister to give notice on the order paper that he will move accordingly.

CAPE BRETON COAL MINES

ITALIAN AND GERMAN CITIZENS PREVENTED FROM WORKING AND NOW ON RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) a question. This morning I received a letter from the mayor of Dominion, Nova Scotia, to the effect that a great number of Italian, German and Austrian citizens, residents of that town, have been forcibly prevented from working in the coal mines and that consequently the town of Dominion is faced with the need of providing relief for these people, which it is not in a position to do. Will the minister inform the house whether he has received information in connection with this situation? If so, what steps is he taking with regard to it?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The situation is similar to one dealt with by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) some time ago. I have asked that inquiries be made into the matter through the provincial government, and I can assure the hon. member that every possible consideration will be given to the circumstances he has outlined.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPLICATION FOR BOARD OF CONCILIATION ON DISPUTE AT TRENTON, N.S., STEEL AND CAR WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Will the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) be good enough to answer another question? I have received a lengthy telegram this afternoon from the steel and car works at Trenton, Nova Scotia. A conciliation board was applied for there on May 6, but to date nothing has been done. Has the minister any information in that regard?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): I have some information on that matter. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was kind enough to notify me that on the third reading of the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act he would ask some questions in that connection, and I have had a report prepared. In view of the prior request of the leader of the opposition, I think it would be only fair to answer at that time.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM PAYMENTS ON 1939 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): On other occasions I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) when we may expect information in connection with an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop. Can the minister tell us something about that to-day? Those of us who represent wheat growers are flooded with letters telling us of the need of this payment.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of no intention on the part of the wheat board to make an interim payment until and if there is money available for that purpose. The question of making provision for an interim payment, when the money is available, is under consideration at present.

RADIO BROADCASTING

NEWS SERVICES—CANCELLATION OF TRANS-RADIO PERMIT AS OF JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to ask the government a question. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) sent notice of the question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Since the minister is not in his place, I will put the question and leave it as a notice. Has the government reconsidered the case of Trans-Radio press service? If not, has it made careful inquiry into its credentials, or in the alternative, is the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation reconsidering the matter? If so, will the decision of the board be announced immediately in order that no injustice or misunderstanding may arise concerning this matter?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall see that the Minister of Transport gives an answer to my hon. friend.

[Mr. Gillis.]

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

TO PROVINCES

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 42, to assist in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): As has already been intimated by the Minister of Labour, there is a matter which I desire to discuss on this third reading, and which I hope may be considered pertinent, because if I do not get an opportunity to do it now I do not know when the occasion may arise again.

I am familiar in a degree with the situation existing in Pictou, Nova Scotia, a county that was settled by some of the finest stock that ever entered Canada. I bow to the assistant clerk, because he is directly descended from that gallant band who came over to Canada in the Hector. During the course of my educational career in Nova Scotia nearly half a century ago, I learned that if you came over in the Hector you were of the very élite. If I had not learned it then I should have learned it in this house some years later when this house, in 1923, gave a grant for the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of the Hector. In other words, what the Mayflower is to New England the Hector was to the province of Nova Scotia and the county of Pictou.

Primarily an agricultural section, in course of time through the initiative of two or three or four very gallant Scotsmen it became more or less an industrial centre, due, I think, largely to the discovery there of coal of good quality. As a result of the initiative of these men, who grew into importance in Nova Scotia, that portion of the province became an iron and steel centre. To-day there is situated in that country, at Trenton and elsewhere, plants comparable, I believe, with anything that may be found even in central Canada for the manufacture of certain types of munitions and other commodities that might be very useful at this time in connection with Canada's war effort. During the last war the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, then managed by my old friend who was for ten years a valuable member of this house and who is now resting on his laurels in the other chamber, manufactured no less than 25,000,000 shells for the Imperial Munitions Board. Since we came here he has been urging me, and I have been urging the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to do something to utilize those plants at Trenton and elsewhere in the county of Pictou for this very important purpose. I have been content not to raise any question about the matter in this house until to-day. I received to-day a telegram transmitting a resolution unanimously passed at a joint meeting of the town councils of the towns of New Glasgow and Trenton and members of the boards of trade of those towns in which they say that they——view with alarm the grave crisis now developing in the European war, in which the safety and welfare of our British empire is involved, and the imminent and essential need of all Canadians immediately doing all humanly possible to assist in a great war effort.

And further reciting that:

It appears that the major industry in our locality, with its workmen, have thus far failed to fully use their facilities for the manufacture and production of war munitions, largely due to a continued dispute between the company and workmen over rates of pay, hours of labour and working conditions.

It is with respect to that that I desire to discuss briefly with my hon. friend the Minister of Labour the situation in that section of the country. It is further alleged in this telegram that the large plants of the Trenton steel works and the Eastern Car company are now practically idle and doing nothing towards the war effort by the manufacture of war materials, of which they have a proven capacity, as evidenced in the last war, and as shortly narrated by myself. Then it recites that the differences between the management and workmen of the steel plant to be dealt with by a conciliation board now set up may not be heard and dealt with finally for some considerable time. Then the telegram proceeds:

Therefore be it resolved that we urgently petition the government of Canada, through its departments, to immediately cause action to be taken for the prompt settlement of the differences between the men and the company.

Be it further resolved that we also petition the government of Canada to make available to these companies and the workmen sufficient orders for war materials and munitions so that these industries may be immediately utilized to their greatest capacity.

The minister has been good enough to supply me with a brief statement of the situation existing in that section. I understand that there are no less than three disputes which are presently to be heard.

Mr. McLARTY: That is just in this one case. There are many other boards set up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand from the memorandum I have received that applications were received as late as May 9 last in the Department of Labour from employees of the Trenton steel works, the Eastern Car company and the New Glasgow plant of Standard Clay Products Limited, employees of all three plants being members of local No. 1231 of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers of steel workers' organizing committee. Now I am not sure, I will ask the minister to tell me when he replies, whether that is the Congress of Industrial Organization's union.

Mr. McLARTY: It is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am not concerned about that at all; but it is further represented that the dispute in each company arose in connection with the employees' request for increased wages, and that employees' representatives were quite willing to have one board deal with all three disputes, but that the company in its reply pointed out that about March 1 last the officials and union executives met for the purpose of discussing wages and working conditions at Trenton and as a result of these negotiations an increase of 71 per cent was granted and certain other adjustments made. Without going into details of the subsequent steps it would appear that this arrangement was not ratified by the union officials, that the matter came to a strike vote and that then a conciliation board was applied for. The company appointed a gentleman in Halifax, whom I know very well, Mr. Russell McInnes, K.C., and the men appointed Mr. Wren. I am further informed that either the parties, through their representatives, or the department-I am not sure which-agreed upon Professor MacKenzie of the university of Toronto as chairman of the board, but that as yet the board has not functioned, that for more than a month there has been delay and nothing has been done. As a result, while some work is going on in that locality under agreements which had previously expired, this festering sore is still there and, so far as I know, there has been no move made to get this conciliation board to function.

I am not concerned with the merits of this dispute. I do not know enough about it to express any opinion, and I do not think it would be my function to do so even if I had information. I am rising to ask the minister to see that this board gets on with its job and reaches a final conclusion so that industry and labour in that district may get back into unison. Then we will see if something cannot be done by way of getting some munition or war supply orders in that part of the country, which has demonstrated on many occasions that it can do a good job.

Mr. MARTIN: That is true of other places.
Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting that it is not.

Mr. MARTIN: Just generally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not referring to any other place at the moment. My hon. friend can do that in his turn, if he wishes. I want the minister, if he will, to insist that action be taken, no matter who is to blame for the delay. My information from the department indicates that in this instance the company has not been willing to proceed. That may or may not be true. The reason alleged, I understand, is that they have many of these disputes with their employees all over Nova Scotia—I hope I am correctly interpreting my information—that they have only one office staff to attend to the adjudication or trial, shall I say, of all these disputes, that they can do only one thing at a time, and so forth. That is not good enough. Here we are at war and an important industry in Nova Scotia, the biggest industry in that province, for which I hold no brief at all, is tying up the works, in a degree, with all these labour disputes. This government has asked for great power over men and resources in this country. Surely the government can go down there and get these things straightened out in jig time.

There is one thing I should like to add, because no doubt the hon, member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will have something to say about the matter later. Before you can get anywhere in a matter of this kind you must have some good will on both sides. The company must have the will to adjust these matters, and the men in their turn must have the will also. What I should like to see, in behalf of the people of New Glasgow and Trenton, in behalf of the community as a whole, and in behalf of Canada's war effort-because here is a real opportunity to make a contribution to the war effort of this country—is some effort made to get these matters adjusted and out of the way so that industry, as represented in that locality by this company, can function. I cannot understand why a whole month should be permitted to elapse without this board meeting. I may be wrong in that statement; my information may be too meagre to warrant it, but if that is true it ought not to be at this time, or even in time of peace. All I can do from my place in this house is to call the attention of the minister to the situation and ask him to act. I believe he will act, and I should like to say to him, do not draw back or withhold action because Michael Dwyer says so. I am not going to say anything more about that; the minister can take his own implications from my words.

Mr. ISNOR: Then why say it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I know something of what I am talking about, and it was not really necessary to make that interjection. I am suggesting to the minister that he should not withhold any action because of any representations which may be made to him by an official of the steel company. Let us get action, for the good of the people of Pictou,

Mr. H. B. McCULLOCH (Pictou): I have taken up this matter with the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), and he has promised immediate action. As far as Michael Dwyer is concerned, the words the minister used were that he thought he would have to step on Mr. Michael Dwyer's toes.

With regard to the work at Trenton, six hundred men are working there to-day. It is true that the car works will be idle following delivery of the last two hundred cars for the Sydney and Louisburg railway. A vote was taken by the men at the steel plant, and 62 per cent voted to work on Saturdays, at a pay increase of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Mr. Barrett came up from Sydney and refused to let them work. I understand the boards of trade of Trenton and New Glasgow have tried to interview Mr. Clawes and Mr. Barrett, and the last word I had was that Mr. Clawes would give them a few minutes. It seems remarkable to me that Mr. Clawes and Mr. Barrett can refuse to let the men work in Trenton. I do not believe that an increase of 7½ per cent is enough for the men working there, since they are receiving smaller wages than are paid in other steel plants throughout the country. but as far as the conciliation board is concerned, the minister has given me his word that everything will be rushed as much as possible.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the minister give further consideration to the five matters I mentioned last week? We are taking away further the revenues of the municipalities by way of the income tax, and so on. In these new agreements with the provinces will the government give consideration to relieving real estate of some of the burden of taxation by federal aid to help more to provide for relief and hospitalization? Then there is the question of those men, forty-five years of age and older, who cannot find employment in industry, and there is also the question of those employees who have been laid off by industries which have closed up altogether on account of lost markets in war areas, as I mentioned last week.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to have a reply from the minister to the questions I asked at six o'clock.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): As I understood the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), he was asking what this government was doing to relieve the tax burden on real estate. I take it that he means that we should absorb a larger amount of the relief costs. If that is so, I think he will agree with me when I say that in view of the large expenditures being made by this government upon our war effort, in view of the fact that we still have to consider the report of the dominion-provincial commission, any promise which I might make, other than merely that of consideration, would be neither warranted nor fair. The hon, member asked also what was being done to provide employment for men over the age of forty-five years. Perhaps that question could be more correctly stated in these words: What are we doing to provide employment for these men in the aftermath of the war? In answer to that question all I can say is that we are at present making every possible effort to retrain men who are over that age and who have some degree of skill.

The hon, member also directed attention to a plant in Toronto which had been closed because its export business to Europe had been seriously impaired by the war and suggested that this plant could be used in manufacturing munitions or other war material. As far as the Department of Labour is concerned, we are anxious to see employment increase to the maximum. However, the matter of whether or not this particular plant or any other plant receives a munitions order or an order for other war material is something which would scarcely fall within the Department of Labour. While I am on my feet—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the minister closing the debate?

Mr. McLARTY: I did not intend to close the debate. If my rising now closes the debate, I would ask that my answers be waived for the present and be placed on the record later on. I did want to reply to a matter raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. McLARTY: If the house is ready for the question, perhaps I could reply to the leader of the opposition. Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister stated that the report of the dominion-provincial commission has yet to be considered. Is he in a position to indicate when or in what manner that report will be considered?

Mr. McLARTY: I am afraid that that decision rests in hands other than my own. I am not in a position to give an answer to that question.

The leader of the opposition referred to the setting up of industrial disputes boards in connection with certain firms in eastern Canada. During the recess I have endeavoured to go into the facts mentioned by the leader of the opposition.

I must say quite frankly that this Trenton steel works' matter has been one of the most difficult problems with which I have had to deal under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Three companies are involved and I believe it is fair to say that they are interlocking. As the leader of the opposition pointed out this afternoon, there is just the one union interested. Three boards were applied for, but the representatives of the employees were content to accept one board. The difficulty arose in connection with Standard Clay Products company. In this case the logical thing seemed to be to set up, not three but probably two boards.

The request was received on May 9 and immediately a wire was sent to the company asking for an immediate answer. The leader of the opposition has suggested that I should beware of the blandishments of certain individuals. I have always regarded my functions in connection with the setting up of boards under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act as being at least of a quasi-judicial nature. In order to be strictly impartial I have endeavoured in each case to appoint either a supreme court or a county court judge. In this I do not criticize the present board or any members of it. I had thought the policy advisable because of their capacity to weigh evidence and because of the fact that they would be regarded as being strictly impartial.

When the application for these boards was received, the company's reply indicated that on March 1 an agreement had been entered into between the employees and the company, whereby the company agreed to an increase in wages of 7½ per cent. I shall not endeavour to prejudge the matter and say whether or not that was fair, but it was voted upon and apparently 62 per cent of the employees agreed. The agreement was not signed because it was alleged by the employees and their representative that it had been secured by what they termed unconstitutional action.

Before a board could be set up it was necessary that an investigation should be made. This investigation was made and a strike vote was held. The result was in favour of a strike, and under those circumstances a board was set up after hearing the representatives of the employers and employed on May 28. They agreed on the appropriate chairman of the board. This decision was not made by the Minister of Labour. My recollection is that this decision was made reasonably early in June.

The employees were asking for one board, but the company was asking for three. The leader of the opposition referred to a shortage of office staff, but I think he made it quite clear that the shortage was in the offices of the three companies and not in the Department of Labour. They contended that they could not possibly prepare for all three boards in a reasonable time.

An effort was therefore made to secure a reduction in the number of boards. Since the order in council was passed on November 7 of last year, a great number of boards have been appointed. It is cheaper to appoint boards than to have strikes.

The employees and their representatives approached the Department of Labour with the thought that by proper consideration and consultation with the employers the time which might be involved in the sittings of the three boards could be considerably reduced. No later than last week a representative of this particular union which functions in all three branches of the industries took up the question of dealing with the three applications as one with the representative of the employees, with the deputy minister of labour. This was arranged, and last Friday there was supposed to be-unfortunately I have not heard whether it took place or not-a meeting between the representatives of labour and the employers.

I understand that the chairman of the board, who as I say was not appointed by myself as Minister of Labour but was agreed upon between the employers and the employees, was in Halifax. My advice is that the board is now functioning. I say that with this qualification, that my advice came from the best possible source but I cannot guarantee it to be reliable. I shall, however, bear in mind the observations of the hon. leader of the opposition and see that everything possible is done to expedite the matter.

When we have passed an order in council requiring consideration by a board before any strike or lockout takes place, I think the least this department can do is to see that the board functions with expedition and as rapidly as possible. I regret the delay that has occurred. I do not place any responsibility for it upon anybody whatsoever, because this has been the most complicated situation concerning the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act with which I have had to deal. I hope that the board will start to function at the very earliest possible moment, and I shall be glad to see that this is done.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS AND PROCESSORS —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 24, to amend the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments made by the senate are similar to those which were made to the Cooperative Wheat Marketing Act. The first section of the bill has been dropped; that does not change the meaning at all. Then "one only cooperative plan" has been substituted for "a cooperative plan" in line 7, page 2 of the bill, and wherever else it occurs throughout the bill. Those are the only changes made by the senate, and we are prepared to accept their amendments.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms service.

12. Experimental farms administration, $60,305.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did we dispose of item 11 last night?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not looked at Hansard, and I am not sure whether the minister replied to my question last night about completing the laboratory at Fredericton. I did want to get an answer to my question.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): If I might revert to that item for a moment, Mr. Chairman, the department is making inquiries into the possibility of completing the work which was intended to be completed at the Fredericton station. While we are not in a position to state definitely that the work will be completed, every effort will be made to have it completed at least to the point where we can make use of the building.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far so good. Has the minister any estimate of the remainder of the cost? I think it would be a pity to stop the work now.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that information under my hand at the moment.

Mr. WRIGHT: Has the minister received any requests that experimental farms be turned into producing units for the duration of the war?

Mr. GARDINER: When we reach item 14 it will be found that a number of stations are being closed. Perhaps we can discuss the question on that item rather than on this, which has to do with the general administration of experimental farms.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service.

13. Central experimental farm, $589,435.

Mr. SENN: There is quite a large reduction in the vote for this particular branch. I notice there is a large reduction in wages. What is the reason for that? Is it the intention of the department or of the farm manager to lessen the activities of this branch?

Mr. GARDINER: As I have said in connection with a number of other items, we have had to cut down all our expenditures because of the necessity of having a greater amount of money available for war services. We have made provision for cutting out certain services at the central experimental farm. It is not intended this year to carry on the chrysanthemum show which has been held year after year, and flowers for the show will not be provided. The intention is to maintain the different varieties that we have at the farm but not with the idea of putting on a show in the fall. A number of features of that kind are being dropped this year, together with associated labour.

Mr. SENN: Is there any revenue from the central experimental farm? If so, where does it appear in the accounts?

Mr. GARDINER: The revenue does not appear in the estimates, but I have before me figures showing that the revenue from the Ottawa farm was $27,958.36, and the total revenue from the farms, $213,083.07.

Mr. SENN: I can readily understand that experimental farms are for experimental purposes and that they cannot be expected to pay their way; they have not done so, by a very large amount. From time to time there has been a certain amount of discussion about the inability of farmers to pay their way or to make a reasonable profit on their operations, whether upon large farms or upon small farms. I have often thought it might be a good thing if the department would undertake to operate a farm of reasonable size with the purpose of showing farmers how to operate their farms for a certain length of time at a profit. I believe, if that were tried, it might open the eyes of some people as to the meagre profits which are made on farms and the difficulties under which farmers live. Is any such scheme on foot, or are the farms merely for illustrative, experimental and demonstration purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: It is true that the farms are operated for experimental and demonstration purposes. They are not operated with the purpose of making them pay. I do not believe it would be possible so to operate a farm which is carried on for experimental purposes. It might be possible to run some of the smaller farms on a paying basis in a greater degree than they have been, possibly during the war period, as was suggested on this side of the chamber a moment ago; and we intend to reduce costs in connection with some of the farms, at least, during the next year or two while we are in the difficulties of a war period.

Mr. SENN: If it is not possible to operate a whole farm to demonstrate whether it can be run at a profit, the department might take a field of grain, carefully calculate all the expenses of planting, cultivating, harvesting, threshing and marketing the crop, and establish in that way how it is possible for farmers to produce at a profit.

Mr. GARDINER: That is done to a degree on the farms now. For example, farms with field crops are operated under the husbandry branch and records kept of the cost of production.

Mr. SENN: With what results?

Mr. GARDINER: With the idea of determining what particular crop will pay.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister say what result has been obtained in any particular line?

Mr. GARDINER: I have a synopsis of it here, but not in detail.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It would be an interesting type of experiment for this branch to carry on, to see whether one of their farms can be carried on upon a profitable basis over a period of years.

Mr. GARDINER: There are what are called major and minor activities of the field husbandry branch. Under minor activities are included farm machinery investigations, to determine the type of machinery which is most useful on certain kinds of soil. Weed eradication is another activity. Also investigations are carried on of the cost of producing and the methods of harvesting and storing crops. The costs of all phases of these operations are taken under consideration in those investigations. Also there are silage production and meteorological studies. All these are known as minor activities. The experimental and investigational work constitutes the major activities.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the acreage of the central experimental farm in Ottawa?

Mr. GARDINER: There are 827 acres owned and 350 acres leased.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is $626,000 the amount of the loss, or was there some revenue?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the cost of carrying on the experiments on that land.

Mr. HATFIELD: What was the revenue?

Mr. GARDINER: I stated the revenue a few moments ago—$27,958.36.

Mr. McIVOR: There is an experimental substation in our district. I do not know whether it yields any cash profit, but it would be hard to overestimate the value of the work which has been done in that community, especially through the lessons which have been learned by young farmers. It is a credit to the community and to the department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice an item, "senior assistant architect, $2,880." Last year there was provision for an assistant architect with a salary of $2,640. Has a promotion been made?

Mr. GARDINER: The position of senior assistant architect is vacant and has been vacant since last year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is the senior assistant architect the same person who was the assistant architect?

Mr. GARDINER: The assistant architect has been moved up to the position of senior assistant, and the assistant's position has not been filled.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the minister explain the reason for an increase of $40,000 in the item, "temporary assistance", on page 65 of the estimates? It seems a large increase.

Mr. GARDINER: Permanent salaries, reclassification, $30,000; temporary salaries, reclassification of new positions, $39,480. The explanation is this. The labouring staff has been reclassified this year. Those staffs which before were known as labourers are now temporaries.

Mr. HATFIELD: Rents have been increased. What is the reason? Feed last year was $20,000; it has been reduced to $17,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Of the lands operated by the central experimental farm 827 acres are owned and 350 acres rented.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is it necessary to buy feed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, feed would have to be purchased. There are feed products of different kinds not grown on the farms but used for experimental purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to the general expenditure, the permanent staff at the central experimental farm has been increased from 91 to 102, notwithstanding that three quite important positions have not been filled, and there seems to be one new position, that of soil specialist, which was not there before. There is a very large increase in the cost and some increase in the number of agricultural scientists. On the whole, whatever saving there is in the department seems to be at the expense of common labourers, and if we were to take into account the cut in wages for ordinary labour, it would be found that the grant this year is very much higher than it was last year. In other words, the difference between $164,000 and $237,000 is much greater than the total reduction in the vote, which is only $37,515. We seem to be spending more money than usual for high-class scientific men and letting out a lot of labour to swell the unemployment relief roll.

Mr. GARDINER: The increase is explained for the most part by the reclassification of those who were on wages before. Two temporaries are increased. The suggestion that much of the saving will be in labour is correct. As I stated at the beginning of the discussion, some of the work that is being done away with this year, such as preparation for the chrysanthemum show, is summer labour, and since we are not carrying that on, we shall not be engaging as much labour in the summer as previously.

Mr. MARSHALL: A new position of photographer has been created. What work does this person do that could not properly be carried out by the motion picture bureau?

Mr. GARDINER: This person is reclassified by the civil service commission as a senior clerk and he does photography.

Mr. MARSHALL: He does not hold the exclusive position of photographer?

Mr. GARDINER: Not alone; he is a senior clerk who does some photography.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With regard to temporary assistance, I understood the minister to say that of the $98,400, the sum of $39,480 represented new positions. If so, what is the description and the number of the positions so created?

Mr. GARDINER: This is not an increase in employees but a reclassification of what was previously called labour. These persons are now employed under the civil service commission, whereas before they were engaged as labourers. They are now put into the service and classified as temporary employees and to that extent there is apparently a greater number in the salary list, but that does not mean an increase in expenditure. If the hon. member will take the next item just below, there is a reduction from $237,000 to $164,000, and in the item immediately above there is an increase. Wages are taken out of one and put in as salaries in the other.

Mr. FAIR: At what rate are the labourers paid and how many hours do they work?

Mr. GARDINER: The wages are from twenty-eight to forty-two cents an hour, and they work ten hours a day.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the minister given any consideration to transferring some of the experimental work which is done at the central experimental farm at Ottawa to the experimental farms in the west, particularly that class of experiments which pertain chiefly to western production? We have at Indian Head, perhaps the second best experimental farm in Canada, a splendid farm. Could not some of that work be carried on there, where more of the people interested could see it? I think much good would come from such a transfer.

Mr. GARDINER: The type of work which is essentially for the west is not done at the central experimental farm. Some of it is done at Brandon, other classes at Indian Head, others at Swift Current and other farms further north. The work which is done here is of a type suited to this section of Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there not a great deal of experimental work carried on here in respect to grain, and feeding costs, that could be carried on more advantageously at Indian Head?

Mr. GARDINER: There is some crossbreeding of grain and other plant life done here, but when it has been developed to the point where an attempt is made to accustom it to the climate and conditions of certain sections, it is transferred to those sections for completion.

Mr. SENN: There is no doubt much valuable experimental work done at the central experimental farm. But unfortunately the public, and I believe members of parliament, do not know what is being carried on. For instance there is the division of animal husbandry. It might be interesting for the committee to know what breeds of animals are kept there and what experiments are going on.

A few years ago a new breed of hogs was imported into Canada, the breed used in Denmark where they produce such superior bacon. Those hogs were, I believe, experimented with at the central farm for some time. I remember a certain hon. gentleman who became enthusiastic about the record of those hogs.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was it a good record?

Mr. SENN: He seemed to think so. He was the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair). I do not see him in his seat for the moment, but I remember speeches he made expressing his enthusiasm. What is being done in the way of experiment with Landrace hogs, and with what results?

Another important agricultural venture in this country at present is the production of flax, which is greatly needed for war purposes. I believe experiments have been going on for some time at the central experimental farm and other places as to the best procedure in growing flax and the areas where it can be grown best. Would the minister enlighten the committee as to such experiments?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as live stock is concerned, we have Holstein, Ayrshire and shorthorn cattle, that is two of the dairy breeds and one of the beef type. In hogs we have the Yorkshires. We discontinued the experiments in connection with Landrace hogs after investigations extending over some four years. In horses we have Clydesdales. In poultry, chickens, we have Leghorns and Plymouth Rocks. In sheep we are experimenting with different breeds in order to provide suitable breeds for both eastern and western farming. In field crops we are carrying on the usual experiments.

Mr. SENN: In what way did the Landrace hogs fall down, and what is the prospect of their ever being produced profitably in this country?

I also mentioned flax. Are any experiments going on regarding flax?

I understand that about a year ago or more some breeding horses were brought to this country. What were those breeds, from where did they come and what was the price?

Mr. GARDINER: As to the hogs, the experiments for the four years did not show any particular weakness in the Landrace hog as a hog to be bred in this country, neither did they show any particular advantage on balance over the Yorkshires, which had already been generally distributed from coast to coast, so it was thought that there was no advantage in encouraging farmers to change from the Yorkshires which were very well established in Canada.

Mr. SENN: Were there any experiments in cross-breeding?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, there was considerable experimenting. I think the hon. member for Haldimand went out with us four or five years ago—

Mr. SENN: No I was not there.

Mr. GARDINER: Well the results of the experiments were seen by many who visited the farm. At present the hogs are not there. There was some difficulty about obtaining boars from Sweden or elsewhere in order to keep up the proper cross-breeding of this type through Canada, so the experiment was discontinued.

Regarding flax, hon. members will recall that during the last war the acreage seeded to flax was greatly increased, I think from somewhere round twelve thousand acres to about forty thousand acres. After the war considerable difficulty was experienced as a result of the changes made; there was too much land under flax, and factories had been built to treat it which could not be fully employed after the war was over, so considerable financial difficulty arose. When this war began, similar demands were made for flax. Just prior to the war we had been carrying on certain investigations as to machines used in Belgium and elsewhere, largely produced in Belgium, for processing flax. Those machines had been introduced at two points I think, one in Ontario and one in Quebec, for experimental purposes, and those experiments were quite successful. As a result the acreage seeded to flax has, I believe, been about doubled up to the present as compared with years just preceding the war, the idea being to produce some of the flax fibre which is required to supply the needs of Great Britain and also to supply seed for Great Britain and for Ireland. The department is attempting to keep control over the sale of the seed. We took possession of the seed last year at a price and distributed some to the different areas where we thought flax could be grown to best advantage, and the remainder was sold to Ireland or England to be used there. We are keeping control over the seed, hoping thus to keep some control over the acreage seeded in Canada, and so take the industry through the war without the difficulties arising that were experienced after the last

Mr. WRIGHT: Is a rust-resistant barley being developed at the central experimental farm? If so, how soon will it be ready for distribution?

Mr. GARDINER: There are three or four strains of rust-resistant barley at the central experimental farm here and at Winnipeg, but none of them is yet ready for distribution.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): To go back to the subject of flax for a moment, from the minister's remarks I gathered that the ebb and flow of activity within the department as far as flax is concerned depend on market conditions and requirements. I also gathered from his remarks that there has been a substantial expansion in the acreage seeded, to perhaps twice the former acreage. I should like to ask two questions. First, is there any sizable quantity of seed in the hands of the government? The second question is based on the first, and perhaps the minister might enlarge upon it for the benefit of the committee, since probably he knows more about it than we do. It is a fact that the price of flaxseed has dropped materially, and now is almost half what it was. In view of that, and in view of the fact that the policy seems to be to harmonize the effort in accordance with the economy of the situation, would the minister feel disposed to peg the price of flaxseed?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that there has not been any material increase in the price of flaxseed during the last four or five years.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There has been a decrease to about one-half.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no decrease, either.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Oh, yes.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: Of course I must take my information from the officials of the department, and they tell me there has been no change in the price of fibre seed. I think what my hon. friend may have in mind is the quotations we see in the newspapers from day to day for flax, but that is not fibre seed. I am informed that fibre seed has remained at a practically set price for the last four or five years. Certainly there has been no increase or decrease since last year, because last fall we took possession of all the flaxseed there was in Canada. We did that because in the last war, if I remember the situation correctly, that was not done, and because of the limited amount of fibre seed in existence in the world, a small group of individuals was able to get control of that seed and force up the price very quickly. That was avoided this time by the government taking possession of all the fibre flaxseed there was in Canada and simply telling the people in Ireland, who were putting forth an effort to get this seed very early in the season, that the government had all the seed, which would be distributed first to those we thought should be growing flax this year in Canada, and then the remainder would be distributed to Ireland and England. That is still the position. We have in Canada a few hundred bushels of the flaxseed that was not distributed last fall, but there is a very small amount left. So far as I know there has been no variation in price since last year, because we set the price and it was all handled at that price.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any information to give the committee with regard to the development of rustless wheat? I believe the central experimental farm is working on an improved strain of regent wheat. There was some criticism of regent wheat last year, I know, in the area round Rosetown. I know one grower who shipped his regent wheat because he did not care for it. It was graded No. 2, while the thatcher and apex were graded No. 1. I wonder if that was on account of the fact that it was not breeding true to type. What experiments are being conducted, and is an improved strain of regent or rustless wheat being developed at the central experimental farm just now?

Mr. GARDINER: Regent wheat is possibly as good as any of the rust resistant wheats which exist in sufficient volume to be distributed. Certain investigations are being carried on with regard to other varieties. Possibly it could be said that in certain areas some of the varieties being developed would be more suitable than regent wheat. Anyone who has grown wheat in western Canada realizes, I think, that there are certain varieties which grow well in the open prairie country and produce high quality wheat, which, if grown up in the northeastern section of the province, would not produce as much to the acre or such high quality wheat, and vice versa. There are wheats that grow well up in the north and keep their colour well which, if grown down on the prairie, would not produce to the same extent or the same quality. Experiments are being carried on, but I do not think it would be wise to make any statement which would lead people to believe that there may be a better wheat in existence than regent, until such time as we are certain both with regard to the variety itself and with regard to the amount available.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I should like to ask a supplementary question. Last year I believe the department distributed a great deal of regent wheat in small quantities. How did the results last year compare with thatcher and apex? Could the minister give us any information as to the experience of the department?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be very difficult to answer the question in a general way, that is, to say one was better than another. In some districts regent was better than thatcher or any of the other varieties. In other districts apex was better than the others. I do not know that I could say thatcher is better than the others, yet in some districts the yield of thatcher was considerably better than that of the other varieties; and taking into consideration the quantity obtained per acre, along with the grading of the wheat, probably thatcher paid the farmers better than the other varieties, in those particular areas. I should not like to say one was better than another. Personally I like the look of any of the wheats better than thatcher, particularly in a difficult year, but last year, with the conditions existing, I had it proved to my own satisfaction that thatcher produced more than any other kind of wheat I have attempted to grow on the farm I operate in the west.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the experiments carried on with respect to rust resisting grain is of tremendous value and benefit to western Canada, and I believe the department should be commended for the work that is being carried on. There is however, one thing I should like to impress upon the minister. As he knows, the experience with rust resistant wheat has been that when we get a variety which is nearly one hundred per cent rust resistant, it retains that quality for only a few years. For instance, marquis used to be practically rust resistant, but now it is almost as bad as red fyfe in that respect. Thatcher is now considered almost one hundred per cent rust resistant. Could the minister give us any information as to how quickly wheat deteriorates in this respect? I think it important also that the department should be working on a variety to take the place of thatcher, because I think there is some evidence already of thatcher deteriorating from that point of view. Then, when the time comes, if we must have another variety to take the place of thatcher, a sufficient volume would be on hand to permit of distribution, and within a year or two there would be enough available to seed those areas in the west where they absolutely must have a rust resisting wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: My information is that as long as the strain of the wheat is kept pure the wheat will remain rust resisting. I think the difficulty is largely that in growing wheat on a farm in western Canada we may sow a pure strain of wheat, but if we have been growing wheat on that farm for a considerable number of years, after we have used seed from the same land over and over again probably the strain depreciates in purity. In other words, we probably get a mixture of marquis, thatcher and regent or any other wheat we may have been growing on the farm. To the extent that the strain deteriorates in purity the wheat becomes less rust resistant. That is the theory which our officials hold in that regard. I would not attempt to refute a statement of that kind because it is made by those who are as close as we can get to experts in connection with the handling of these seed strains.

Mr. PERLEY: Absolutely pure and free from other varieties.

Mr. GARDINER: There are some strains in the same variety of wheat which are not quite as rust resistant as others. It may be that there is a mixture of these strains and after three or four years you will have more of one strain than another. The result may be that your wheat is not 100 per cent rust resistant. For instance, farmers in western Canada found some rust in their fields of thatcher wheat, and they came to the conclusion that that wheat was only 65 or 75 per cent rust resistant. I am informed that this is not true. I am told that if you have a real rust-resistant strain of thatcher wheat it will be rust resistant.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us some information with respect to experiments being carried on with rust-resistant oats?

Mr. GARDINER: The vanguard oat which is seeded in western Canada was developed at Winnipeg. It is resistant to stem rust. The [Mr. Perley.]

urban oat was developed at the Ontario agricultural college and is resistant to leaf rust. Crosses between these two varieties are being produced and are proving quite promising. These may turn out to be the most valuable of the different strains that are being developed.

Mr. QUELCH: What has been the experience of the department with canus wheat? I believe some 600 bushels were distributed among the farmers in the drought areas of Alberta. This seed is supposed to be very drought resistant.

Mr. GARDINER: The department has had very little experience with it. It has some drought resistant qualities, but the department is not prepared to recommend it or to give any information with regard to it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In view of the somewhat chaotic conditions which prevail in the European wool market, perhaps the minister could state what is being done to develop a wool-type sheep which could adapt itself to the various climatic conditions of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: There are two experiments being carried on. One is in connection with the Corriedale, a sheep being produced largely in New Zealand and Australia. It is thought that this sheep will develop into the best variety to suit our conditions, particularly in the west. Another experiment is being carried on in connection with crossing the romney and ryeland sheep. It is hoped to develop a variety which will be suited to our conditions.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many of these sheep are now on experimental farms?

Mr. GARDINER: About a thousand of each.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not want the record to go unchallenged. The minister has suggested that there has been no change in the price of flaxseed during the last four or five years. He intimated that perhaps my information had been obtained by reading the daily press. I was speaking from memory at the time, but I now have before me the report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1939. I am sure that this report must be correct. It states:

The seed yielded on the average eight bushels of mill-run per acre and No. 1 grade sold for an average price of $3 per bushel on the Irish market. This was a drop of $1.10 a bushel from the average price received the previous year.

I know the minister will suggest that the information in this report is twelve or eighteen months old, but I wanted to get the up-to-date figures. I understand, from the press in this case, that since that time the price has again gone up beyond $2.50 a bushel. But during the last two or three months the market price of this commodity has dropped considerably, along with prices of many other commodities. Some encouragement was given to doubling We are looking forward to an acreage. increased national income to the extent of many hundreds of millions of dollars, but with this general drop in commodity prices we may have considerable difficulty in reaching the objective we have in mind. This may be a small matter, but I am bringing it to the attention of the minister in an effort to get up-to-date information similar to that given in his report for the year ended March 31, 1939. I have no doubt that his assistants will have the information to March 31, 1940. I should like to have this on the record for reference when making a general study of commodity prices. I should like to know how soon we are going to get back to better prices in order that we may be helped out in solving the major problem I mentioned.

Mr. GARDINER: The information which I gave in the first place was correct. This report is for the year ended March 31, 1939, and the figures given refer to a period earlier than that. In 1938 one Quebec company sold fibre flax seed in Ireland for $3.50. At the same time the Ontario people sold their flax for $5. From that time down to the present the price has ranged from $5 to $5.50. This year we are selling certified fibre flax seed in Ireland at $5.50; uncertified at $4.50 and No. 2 at $4. This price has been set and will be maintained throughout the year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have some information in connection with the Fredericton station in which I am personally interested. I should like to know what the vote was last year, what was expended last year and what the vote is this year. I should like to know what work is being carried on. I understand the superintendent has been trying to interest the farmers of central New Brunswick in the breeding of Percheron horses and certain types of cattle and also endeavouring to have them improve their pasture and other things like that. These are three things I know of. Perhaps the minister would give me the expenditure and what line of work is being carried on at the station.

While I am on my feet and the minister is conferring with his assistants, I should like to give a certificate of character and efficiency to the Fredericton superintendent. I believe he has the confidence of all the farmers of central New Brunswick. The only complaint I have to make is that the farmers do not utilize this station more to their own advantage. They seem to be, shall I say, careless in utilizing this important institution right in their midst and are not taking full advantage of the demonstrations, experiments and capacities of that little experimental station, because after all it is a small one.

I should also like to pay tribute to one or two of the superintendent's assistants. I know these men well; they are friends of mine. I do not mean political friends because they have no politics so far as I know, although I did succeed in carrying a majority at the poll that was held at the station, but that is in passing. I want to see the work of this farm extended if the opportunity offers, because I realize that New Brunswick is much more backward in scientific farming than it ought to be. I am afraid that some of our farmers. not so many I hope as used to be the case, are content to do just what they did the year before, and perhaps a little less. I can understand that because the returns to the farmers in recent years have been exceedingly small. I am interested in seeing farming a success in New Brunswick because I can say without boasting-in fact, I am rather grieved over it—that I have probably more money invested in York county farms than any other man in York county, but not on a purchase basis. I am interested, however, in seeing that our farmers take advantage of this institution. Perhaps the minister would be good enough, for the benefit of myself and others who read the press, to give a short account of what is being done there.

While I am on my feet I invite the minister to come down to Fredericton. We used to have a visit occasionally from the gentleman who was Minister of Agriculture from 1921 to 1930, and I regret he is not in parliament because I always enjoyed knowing him and talking to him. He was good enough to come and visit us on occasion and he helped that little farm out. I now extend an invitation to the minister to come down to Fredericton and see us. The only time he has ever visited us has been on the occasion of a general election, and he has always been too busy to do anything with respect to our experimental station.

Mr. GARDINER: While I have been in Fredericton, I have not been there since I have been Minister of Agriculture. Had I been there since I have been minister I certainly, even at election time, would have visited the farm.

In answer to the hon, gentleman's questions as to the activities of that farm, we have at the Fredericton station one of the best Percheron sires that we have in the service. We are attempting to encourage the development of Percheron horses in that area. We also have a herd of Holstein cattle, which has been improved from time to time in the hope that we may be able to assist in the improvement of dairy herds in that section.

We are also carrying on active experiments in potato production, particularly the development of disease-resistant varieties of potatoes.

These are the chief activities, and there will not be any reduction made in any of them this year; in fact, they may be enlarged slightly. On the other hand there will be the necessity of cutting down in connection with horticulture at that point in order to maintain our financial position there relative to some other places.

So far as the building is concerned, I should have dealt with that last night when Doctor Swaine was here, but he will be here when we take up item 33, science service buildings. I can, however, say now with a little more confidence than at the beginning of the discussion this evening that the intention is to try to find sufficient funds in our votes this year to complete the closing-in of that building and getting it in shape where it can be of some use.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you. I also asked about the expenditure last year for the Fredericton station and the vote this year. I should like to have the information on record.

Mr. GARDINER: It was $52,325 last year, and this year it is $49,545, a slight reduction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have there been any notable developments in horticulture at the central experimental farm during the past year?

Mr. GARDINER: Some interesting experiments have been carried on this year, particularly developments in connection with vegetables and in the manner of using what would otherwise be wasted fruits. In that connection investigations relating to horticulture have been carried on, which are of considerable benefit to the industry in different parts of the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have there been any special developments in flower growing?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there has been nothing particular done in that regard this year.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have any experiments been carried on to determine the most economical size of farm in the west? Is it a half section, a section or two sections?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot say that experiments have been carried on, but a study has been made of that subject by the economics branch under Doctor Booth in order to try to determine what is the most economical unit both east and west. Of course, anyone farming in the west knows that a unit as applied to one area could not necessarily be applied to another area.

Mr. WRIGHT: What have been Doctor Booth's findings?

Mr. GARDINER: There are no definite findings that could be applied generally, but generally speaking the family sized farm in eastern Canada, particularly Ontario and Quebec, has been found to be about 100 acres. Some have more and some have less. In many parts of the west the family sized farm is half a section, and in some other parts three quarters of a section.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Professor Hopkins carried on experiments to determine the economical unit. I have the data in my office, but speaking from recollection I think he found the two-section farm in the prairie provinces, with motorized equipment, to be the most economical unit.

Mr. GARDINER: I think his investigations were carried on to determine the relationship between certain sized farms and certain specialized machinery for the operation of farms. If you are going to operate a farm with a certain type and quantity of machinery, you require a certain size of farm in order to operate economically. If you put on a half-section farm the full line of equipment which you could use on a two-section farm, your overhead would probably be too high. It was that kind of investigation which was being made.

Mr. FAIR: In view of the fact that grain prices have been extremely low for the last ten years, is the central experimental farm at Ottawa or are any western experimental stations conducting an investigation into the average cost of raising wheat and other coarse grains at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Experiments are being carried on in the matter of cultivation. I remember that when I visited the Swift Current farm last summer, in going by the experimental plots I was told by Mr. Thompson, who is in charge of that farm, the results of the experiments which were being carried on in connection with different types of operations. The experiments there bore out, I believe, the experiences of most farmers in that section of the country. They indicated that certain types of machinery produce better results than certain other types, and in some instances the less costly types produce the best results. That experiment has been going on for quite a number of years. It is sometimes difficult for those who are carrying on the experiments to prove their results in competition with high-powered salesmen who are selling other types of machinery.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wonder whether in any of these experimental farms there are fields sufficiently large to enable a computation to be made of the cost of producing wheat on, say, a quarter-section?

Mr. GARDINER: The size of the farm at Indian Head is approximately 1,500 acres, and of the farm at Swift Current, about 2,000 acres, and of course it is possible to carry on experiments there as to the expense of operating, say, a quarter section of land. But that work is being handled in an experimental way. I doubt very much if one could take the information which is available and conclude that the same standards are applicable to an ordinary farm. I drive constantly past a rented farm which forms part of the Indian Head experimental farm. It was operated for many years by a man named Patterson; I do not know whether it was his original homestead, but he lived there as long as I can remember and many years before. I was acquainted with the area. For a number of years he has rented that property to the experimental farm and it has been run as a farm unit, but a great deal of experimental work has been carried on alongside the growing of grain crops and field silage.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister any information as to the cost of operating with a diesel caterpillar compared with a gasoline tractor?

Mr. GARDINER: The Swift Current farm has been specializing in costs of operating diesel and other tractors, as well as farm machinery generally. Pamphlets giving that information are published by the department and can be obtained by any hon. member.

Mr. FAIR: Did I understand the minister to say that Yorkshires are the only type of hogs being kept on the central experimental farm at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask, then, what was the result of the experiments some time ago with Landrace hogs?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe that information will be found on Hansard in the morning. My hon, friend may not have been here, but I have already given it twice this evening.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What progress has been made by the department in encouraging the raising of beef cattle in the maritime provinces? I understand that certain districts have been proposed for the raising of beef animals and that the department is offering some encouragement to those districts.

Mr. GARDINER: There is not a beef herd at the Amherst farm in Nova Scotia. The herd there is a dairy herd. The herd at Kentville is a general purpose herd, and cannot be called a beef herd; it consists of general purpose shorthorns, a milking strain. I cannot say that we are encouraging, with either of these herds, a straight beef type of cattle. But there have been some experiments carried on in feeding beef cattle at these farms. I have not before me information as to the results of these experiments, but it is in print and can be had by any hon. member who is interested.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understand that the department has made proposals to certain areas that they specialize in the raising of beef animals. Quite large districts in the maritime provinces are involved. I should like to know, if that is the case, what preparations have been or are to be made, how the work is being undertaken, whether by the department or through individual or community stock raisers, and what progress has been made.

Mr. GARDINER: A survey is being carried on in the maritime provinces to determine areas that may be suited to the production of beef cattle. That survey will be continued.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): No appropriation has been made?

Mr. GARDINER: No special appropriation, but the survey is being carried on along with the general activities of the department.

Mr. FAIR: I have been here since eight o'clock, and I should like to get back for just a moment to the hogs. Possibly we are in good company in that line. While the minister has already given two explanations, I have not been able to hear what those explanations were. I am waiting to see what Hansard says in the morning. Although the minister may have given a very short explanation, I believe some hon members are quite interested in the experiments which are being carried on in connection with Landrace hogs.

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot of course guarantee that my hon. friend is going to hear me this time. I have already given a rather lengthy statement on the matter. The Landrace hogs were brought some years ago from Sweden. Experiments were carried on with the breed for, I believe, about four years. Finally it was found that they displayed no sufficient advantages over the Yorkshire type, which had been fairly widely distributed over Canada, to warrant the department going further with the experiments and making an additional distribution of those hogs throughout the country. In other words, it was found that the Yorkshire is suiting the purpose in Canada so well that it would not be wise to confuse people by encouraging them to produce and maintain another variety.

Mr. FAIR: Thank you.

Mr. HATFIELD: I understood that some years ago all experiments were made at the Ottawa farm. That system was changed a few years ago, and at the present time experiments are made at various branch farms throughout Canada for the whole Dominion—on potatoes at Fredericton; on wheat, in the west; in respect of horticulture, on the Ontario branch farms. In view of that system, what is the reason for the increase in acreage of the central experimental farm?

Mr. GARDINER: As I stated a moment ago, special work is being carried on at Fredericton with regard to potatoes, but some intensive experimentation is being carried on at the central experimental farm in connection with all the different varieties of farm products. That is possibly on account of the fact that different kinds of farm products are produced in this section of the dominion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A development in northern Saskatchewan which during recent years has been changing agricultural economy has been the phenomenal increase in the growth of alfalfa. Can the minister give us an idea of the experiments that are taking place in that direction and say whether a new hardy alfalfa seed is being developed and, further, whether any of the institutional farms are being used for experimental purposes in that regard?

Mr. GARDINER: The laboratory at Saskatoon has developed a new type of alfalfa which is suited to that section of the country, and up in the area near White Fox, and to the north of Nipawin, which is in the northeastern section of Saskatchewan, there has developed in the last few years an industry associated with the growing of alfalfa seed, very much as in certain sections of the east development has taken place where the flax seed is grown even for use in Ireland. In the section to which I refer they are producing alfalfa seed which is being sold down through the American states to the south and in certain sections of western Canada and in the east as well.

Mr. FAIR: From time to time applications are invited for positions that become vacant at the central experimental farm. In the notices sent out certain minimum and maximum salaries are set out, and I have been informed that after applicants have been accepted they are not paid the minimum specified in the applications. I should like to know whether this report is correct, and, if so, why applicants are not paid the stated minimum.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume the reference is to part-time or temporary graduate employees who do come in at lower rates sometimes than those indicated in the civil service list, but anyone who applies in the usual course under the civil service commission for one of the permanent positions in the department is paid the minimum and maximum salary, starting with the minimum and gradually rising to the other.

Mr. FAIR: Has there been any dissatisfaction at the farm during the past twelve months or so in that regard?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no dissatisfaction that has been sufficiently serious to have been brought to my attention. I cannot say that there is no one working for the department from one end of Canada to the other who is dissatisfied with his or her salary, but there has been no general dissatisfaction.

Mr. FAIR: I was referring only to the central experimental farm, and if the information is incorrect I shall be glad to be told so.

Mr. GARDINER: There may be some who are not satisfied; I am not in a position to say. There may be some who have accepted positions and who may have qualifications that would entitle them to a higher position, but they have applied for work and have been offered work at a certain rate of pay, and work which would properly pay the rate offered to them. They may not be satisfied; I do not know. If they are not, it is possible we could get someone else to take their place.

Mr. FAIR: The point is that the positions are advertised at certain minimum and maximum rates, and after the applicant has been appointed he receives less than the minimum specified.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know of any such cases, but there may be some. You could not have a staff of the size of ours without having someone who would be dissatisfied with his salary.

Mr. FAIR: I am not discussing that at all. I am saying, the complaint is that the salary paid does not come up to the amount specified when the application is sent out.

Mr. GARDINER: We follow the civil service regulations strictly and everything has been done in accordance therewith.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service.

14. Branch farms and stations, and illustration stations, $1,309,276.

Mr. PERLEY: In this vote there is a considerable decrease amounting to about $185,000. I understood the minister to say earlier in the evening that certain of these substations might be closed. I trust that none in Saskatchewan will be closed. The main experimental farm in that province is at Indian Head. It is perhaps one of the finest farms of the kind in Canada. We have also five stations and one substation. I wish to pay my respects to the superintendent at Indian Head, Mr. Gibson. He is doing wonderful work. Hardly a day passes in the summer, in the months of June, July and August, when there is not a field day at that farm. Different societies go there and hold picnics, and the superintendent is doing invaluable work demonstrating what is going on at the farm. He should be complimented upon his patience. He helps a number of clubs and different organizations, and his work is highly commendable. The committee will be interested to know that we not only grow wheat in Saskatchewan but can grow the finest varieties of fruit. At page 82 of the report of the department there is this paragraph with regard to the experimental farm at Indian Head:

Fruit trees came through with little injury. A heavy crop of bloom developed into an overabundant crop of fruit. . . . Some large apples and tender varieties of plums reached maturity.

I refer to this paragraph because, driving through the farm last fall, I noticed a heavy crop of apples on some trees and I was surprised to see apples on the ground. I inquired at the office and was told that they were not giving them away, and I am sure there were a good many people out there who would have been glad to gather up the apples under the trees. I mention this to show that we can grow apples in our part of the province. The minister might give us some information with regard to the experiments carried on there particularly with fruit.

We have a substation at Regina and I would ask the minister to indicate some of the results of the experiments there in connection with soil drifting. Would he make a statement as to the revenue derived from the five stations in that province? I understand there is grain sold and there must be considerable revenue from some of the stations.

I notice also in the reports of the experimental farms at Indian Head and Melfort that there has been a transfer of the herds; the Ayrshire herd was taken from Indian Head to Melfort and the shorthorn herd was taken from Melfort to Indian Head. What recommendation was made for this, and what is the advantage of the transfer? While I am all in favour of the shorthorn breed—it may be the best breed for Saskatchewan generally—I think the Ayrshire breed tends to encourage dairying, and possibly both breeds could be carried advantageously at the one station.

The minister made reference to the Patterson farm at Indian Head. I believe that farm was given to the department without rental on the understanding that the buildings would be kept in repair and the land not allowed to go back. I think reference should be made to the fact that Mr. Patterson gave the use of that farm as a contribution to agriculture in western Canada. A year or so ago he died and I believe the farm is now under a different arrangement, but I think Mr. Patterson's action should be commended and brought to the attention of western Canada, in giving for a number of years one of the finest sections of land in western Canada-there is hardly a foot of waste land on it-to the department for experimental purposes without rent.

Mr. GARDINER: I must correct the suggestion just made. Probably it was at one time the intention of Mr. Patterson to leave that farm to the government, but when he made his will he did not do so. The farm does not belong to the government, and will not unless the government buys it. We have paid rent for the farm and buildings ever since it was first turned over, a fairly good rent. It is not the intention of the government to rent that farm beyond this year. Mr. Patterson's first thought probably was that when he passed on, the farm might be turned over to the government, but that did not materialize.

Mr. PERLEY: I am sorry to hear that. The general impression in that part of the province was that he gave the use of the farm without rent. Of course I understood that when he passed on, some other arrangement would be made.

Mr. GARDINER: Regarding fruit growing, experiments are being carried on towards the development of varieties suitable to the west. That work is largely done at Morden, Manitoba, and has been going on for a number of years. Cross grafting of trees in order to produce hardy varieties is being done largely there. Some varieties are transferred later to Indian Head for further development under conditions there.

As to giving away apples, there is difficulty about giving away anything from the experimental farms. There is not enough for the whole population, and if it is given to some people and not to others, there is trouble. These trees are there for experimental purposes. It is possible that some fruit is allowed to rot under the trees, but perhaps people in the locality do get some of it in spite of the fact that there is no general policy of giving it away. I understand that all sound fruit is gathered and sold.

Mr. RICKARD: What varieties are there?

Mr. GARDINER: They are not the usual varieties that one finds in eastern Canada. They are mostly hardy varieties brought from Russia and similar places, or hybrids of some kind.

Mr. STIRLING: Are farmers taking up the notion of growing apples there? Could the minister set at rest the suggestion that the garden of Eden was originally there?

Mr. GARDINER: Fruit trees are being grown on farms; some have very creditable orchards. That is particularly true I think in the Melfort and Tisdale regions, which are much further north than Indian Head but seem to be better suited to the growing of fruit trees. I think, however, most people who try to grow fruit trees in western Canada find that—

Mr. STIRLING: That it is difficult.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it is an interesting pastime, but I do not think you can grow fruit cheaper there than it can be imported from somewhere else.

Mr. PERLEY: They have discovered that the flavour of apples grown there is much better than that of those grown in the Okanagan valley.

Mr. HANSELL: I have been looking at pages 65 and 66 of the estimates for some information on this item but do not find what I am after. When driving along the roads out west I have noticed farms with signs on the fences indicating that they are experimental stations of some kind. On making inquiry I have not been able to satisfy myself entirely as to what these places are. I know they are not government-owned stations because in some instances I knew the man who owned the farm. But just how he operates it, and what use it is to the Department of Agriculture or to the country, I have not been able to learn. Would the minister tell us about these stations?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: There are illustration stations across Canada, 171 of them all told at present. These stations are set up on a similar basis in the different parts of Canada. A certain part of a farm is rented; the farmer does the work; the seed is supplied by the government; it is seeded under direction of the experimental farms, and records are kept as to the results. The farmer has all the product from the plot, but the neighbours in the vicinity have the advantage of seeing the experiments carried on and the results.

Mr. HANSELL: The strange thing I found as I made inquiry about these stations is that the people living in the communities do not seem to know much about them. I have heard such remarks as this—although I feel that the remark is not true—"Well, it may be a good Liberal station", the inference being that there may be patronage of some sort. I say I do not believe that is true, because I know one or two of these stations in or near my own constituency that are operated by men who I am certain are not Liberals. As a matter of fact, one of them is—

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful.

Mr. HANSELL: I hope the gentleman to whom I refer will not lose his job now.

An hon. MEMBER: You may lose his support.

Mr. HANSELL: No, the gentleman to whom I have reference is a very strong supporter of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. What remuneration is paid the men who work these plots of land?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no wage at all. They are paid $1 an acre and, as I said before, they get the results of their labour on that acre just as they do in connection with any other acre of the farm.

With regard to the other point, as to whether the neighbours are made acquainted with what is going on, there is at least one field day held on each of these plots, and on many of them there are two field days. The average attendance at these field days runs from one hundred to five hundred, so quite a number of people do take advantage of the fact that these stations are there. With regard to the political stripe of the people who operate them, I think there are some good farmers who are not Liberals.

Mr. HANSELL: How far are the stations apart, or how are certain locations chosen?

Mr. GARDINER: They are about fifty to seventy-five miles apart, as a rule, in certain areas; but with only 171 of them scattered over Canada it would not be possible to have them every seventy-five or even one hundred miles.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to make a few remarks with regard to something that is regarded as almost a tragedy in the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house, something which is regarded as quite a setback to agriculture in a large part of northern Saskatchewan. I am informed that it is proposed to close the long established experimental station at Rosthern. This station was opened in 1909 by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is situated in the centre of one of the finest farming districts in Saskatchewan. Doctor Seagar Wheeler lives within about five miles of that station, and it will be remembered that Doctor Wheeler was three times wheat king of the world, something never accomplished by any other person. As a matter of fact, since that station has been in operation, it has had a tremendous influence in the district which it serves, which includes not only the constituency of Rosthern but also North Battleford, The Battlefords and the territory tributary to Saskatoon, together with a great part of the constituency of Prince Albert, which is represented in this house by the Prime Minister. This district is settled to a large extent by people from continental Europe, and the service performed by that station in teaching these people the best methods of Canadian farming can never be measured by officials here in Ottawa.

I am told that certain experiments which have been carried on in the past have been brought to a conclusion, and that therefore there is no further reason for keeping open that station. I think everyone in this committee will agree that where experimental stations fall down is in not getting the benefit of their experiments across to the people, rather than in the experiments that are carried on. It would be better to get half the information obtained across to the people at large than to carry on experiments twice as important and get very little across to the people.

So, Mr. Chairman, when you have a long established experimental station in the middle of a district which needs and uses the advice and assistance of the officials of that station, it seems to me a retrograde and terrible step for any government to close that station just for the sake of saving $10,000 or less. The station has been in existence for thirty-one years, and each year more and more people come to it to get advice, particularly as to the best methods of improving their live stock. I live within a mile of the Rosthern station, and each year I have seen more and more people going there to get advice and assistance with regard to improving their farming methods. In that district there has been a tendency to change from grain farming to mixed farming, and the officials have given most valuable advice to the farmers with regard to that trend. For instance, recently a brooder house was set up to show how, at small expense, pigs could be farrowed in the height of winter without risk, in order that they might be marketed to greater advantage. I venture to say that since that building has been established, at least a thousand farmers have visited and examined it, and who can say in dollars and cents what value that has been to the whole district?

I look at the estimates and find an item of some $598,000 for the central experimental farm at Ottawa. When I compare that sum with the small amount that would keep the Rosthern station open; when I consider that almost as many real farmers visit the Rosthern station as probably visit the Ottawa experimental farm, I cannot keep silent in this committee. We have a deputy minister in another department which I will not mention now, drawing $10,000 a year and doing no work to speak of at all. When I think of that and realize that in order to save this amount of money we are closing a station serving hundreds of farmers in a large section of a great province such as Saskatchewan, a station that gives work to perhaps thirty people who need it badly, looking after the shrubs, gardens and so on, people who make perhaps $200 during the summer by hard work; when I see them about to be thrown out of work and remember a deputy minister in one of our government departments as already indicated, getting the salary I mentioned, I cannot keep silent in this committee. I must rise and say that I do not approve any such policy. That station has been teaching good Canadian farming methods to hundreds of farmers, who have come from Prince Albert, from North Battleford, from Melfort and from over a hundred miles around, in order to get the benefit of the advice of the officials stationed there. Year after year they receive the advantage of the experiments carried on at that station; it is doing better and better work in that way all the time, and I am informed that on a bare carrying basis, taking into account the revenue obtained, that station probably could be operated for less than $10,000 a year.

Then there is the question of foundation live stock. There has been built up on that farm probably one of the finest herds of Holstein cattle in Canada. There has been built up also a fine herd of Yorkshire hogs. I have seen people come there from all over northern Saskatchewan to buy animals as foundation live stock for their herds. Is anyone going to say that the maintenance of a herd which makes available the best foundation live stock that can be procured in Saskatchewan is not worth $10,000? The men who will be thrown out of work are older men with families. They could not make a better contribution to the winning of this war than by assisting our farmers in producing the very best live stock and learning the best farming methods. I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) make his budget speech. Our effort should be to place our economic machinery, including our people, to the best possible use. Money should not be the determining factor. Are we increasing the efficiency of the people of western Canada by closing a station which has given leadership and provided advice and instruction to a whole section of Saskatchewan? Are we helping to strengthen Canada by closing that station?

Those hon, members who have visited the prairie west know something of the homes which have been established there. The tendency has been to tell the people that because they are going to bring up their families in that part of the country, because their children will first come in contact with the world there, they should try to improve their home conditions and make them more congenial. There has been a real campaign to urge people to plant trees, particularly fruit trees to provide a certain amount of fruit for their families and make real homes for themselves. At times there has been a tendency to scoff at what can be done in connection with the growing of fruit in Saskatchewan.

Just a year ago I visited the farm of Doctor Seager Wheeler where there are fifty acres under fruit. There is a splendid fruit orchard at that experimental station. I have seen literally tons of fine plums, crabapples and cherries which could not be disposed of in those orchards. People go to that experimental station and they are told what fruit trees will be suitable to their locality. There is a horticultural branch of the experimental station at Morden, but I am told that things can be grown there which cannot be grown in any other part of western Canada. I am told also that anything that will grow at Rosthern will grow in almost every part of the west. There is nothing more discouraging to people who may not have much in the way of funds than to spend money on fruit trees and have them die the first winter. They soon give up the idea of trying to go into fruit. Different trees are tested at the Rosthern station and information is available as to what trees are suitable to the different localities. People obtain this information and then go home and establish orchards. To-day we see farm after farm with nice orchards, all of which tends to make these people feel more at home in the place where they may have to spend the rest of their lives.

Is any official at Ottawa going to tell me that a work which helps to make real homes for hundreds of people in western Canada is not worth $10,000? I hope the committee will pardon me for speaking perhaps too feelingly in the matter, but I cannot help doing so when I think that some official in the Department of Agriculture is advising that this wonderful work for our people should be discontinued in order to save $10,000 or perhaps even $14,000 or $15,000. Any hon member who had at heart the interest of his constituents would not fail to raise his voice with some feeling.

Year after year field days are held at that experimental station and these are attended by hundreds of people. The minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan, one of the outstanding agriculturists in this dominion, attended and gave a fine and instructive address at the last one. This is the only place in that district where an affair of this kind can so advantageously be held. Hundreds of people have benefited by visiting that farm. They come from as far away as 150 miles and obtain the very best ideas for improving their live stock and receive the latest information as to what fruit trees will be suitable to their farms. Not only do the people in the immediate neighbourhood appreciate the work being done on that farm; it is appreciated by people all through northern Saskatchewan. I have a letter here from the Prince Albert board of trade, a city which is represented in this house by the Prime Minister. I do not want to weary the committee. but I want to do everything in my power to plead with this government not to make the mistake which I think they will be making if they close that farm. This letter is dated June 5, 1940. Hon. members will note it is from the Prince Albert board of trade, not the Rosthern board of trade. It reads in part:

In our opinion it would be a tremendous mistake, as the present staff enjoys the confidence of all the people in this part of the province and they are doing a most valuable work. While the difference between the cost of operation and the revenues received does not involve a very large amount of money, in the alternative, but we very much prefer the first suggestion, it could be carried on in a modified form during the war and then put back on its present status.

We feel it would be preferable to shut down another station not as highly developed and retain Rosthern.

We have asked Mr. King to make the strongest representations possible on our behalf.

I do not think I am breaking any confidences by reading that last paragraph. That is the attitude of the Prince Albert board of trade. I should like to read a telegram, dated June 14, which I received from the same organization. It reads:

Understand definite word has been received to close Rosthern experimental station. People here anxious to have same retained if at all possible. Could you give us any lead which would assist to bring this about. Wire reply.

I come now to Saskatoon, which is to the south of Rosthern. This constituency was formerly represented in the house by the late Doctor Young. I shall read just a paragraph from a letter received from the Saskatoon board of trade, under date of June 5, 1940, as follows:

The Saskatoon board is well acquainted with the many strenuous duties the government must undertake in these days of conflict, but we feel that if it is at all possible, the services of this station should be maintained for the province of Saskatchewan. The station has been of real service to agricultural interests of the whole province, particularly the northern section.

We assure you the Saskatoon board of trade will support any move which will keep this experimental station in operation.

I have another letter here from a member of the legislature for Prince Albert city. He says:

I wish to point out that this is one of the oldest experimental stations in the province of Saskatchewan and in years gone by has given most valuable service to the agricultural districts in this part of the province and if it is discontinued at this time the loss from an agricultural point of view will be serious.

The dominion government has a large investment there at the present time which has been built up over a great number of years and to allow that investment to simply disappear at the present time will undoubtedly mean a setback to agricultural educational activities in this part of the province, and in view of the serious times which agriculture has had to contend with during the last decade it seems to me absolutely imperative that this station should be kept in operation even if only on a restricted basis in view of present difficulties in financing Canada's war-time economy.

I have letters here from the Prince Albert Horticultural society commending the splendid work which that farm is doing in horticulture. This is not from the Rosthern district but from the Prince Albert district—sixty miles away. Is it not likely that the people out there would know more about the good effect of the work done than some officials at Ottawa?

I have a letter from the Prince Albert Agricultural society pointing out the good work that has been done at Rosthern in providing foundation live stock to all parts of northern Saskatchewan. I shall not weary the committee by reading it because I appreciate vey much the sympathy which has already been extended in giving me time to read as much as I have done. I should like, however, to read a sentence or two from a letter from a member of the legislature from Saskatoon city. He says:

However, I believe it would be a very serious move for the government to make unless it is an absolute necessity.

I know you will do your utmost to do whatever is in the best interests of Canada and, in my opinion, the Rosthern experimental farm should be kept open. I am simply writing you to tell you that you have my full support.

I have letters and resolutions from pool organizations and other organizations within a radius of practically one hundred miles of the Rosthern experimental station, urging me and begging me to do something to see to it that this facility which has been given to our hard-pressed farmers of western Canada is not withdrawn—a station that was established there for the service of thousands of our farmers by our late great leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier. If it is so necessary to save money, they suggest that the Rosthern station be put on a subsistence basis, because the income is quite substantial, and that it be carried on upon that basis until after the war.

There is an investment there of over $119,000, and I understand it is proposed, Mr. Chairman, to sell that farm and auction off the stock that is on it. Some of the cattle there are of such a high quality that if they get into the hands of people who are not fully qualified to look after them and make the best use of them for breeding purposes, they will be of very little use to the community as a whole. At the station they are used to provide foundation live stock to supply that whole area to the best advantage. Here we have an investment of $119,000 which it is proposed to wipe out, to do away with all the advantages which that farm gives to the people of northern Saskatchewan, when it is suggested by people in whom I can have confidence that. if it is absolutely necessary, by cutting down on expenditures that are not absolutely essential, the farm could be carried on at a net expenditure of between $5,000 and $10,000. When I see how much money is voted to beautify the city of Ottawa, hundreds of thousands of dollars, and read the other items in the estimates, and then see that in order to save money it is proposed to wipe out the one thing of real value to our farmers, that has been given to the district which I have the honour to represent, on the say-so of some people in Ottawa that that farm is no longer serving a useful purpose, I must rise in my place in this house and urge and beg the Minister of Agriculture to reconsider the closing of that farm.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice in the minister's report on the work of the experimental farm at Melfort, Saskatchewan, mention is made of considerable experimental work done in connection with the sugar beet industry. Can the minister tell us what success there has been in that particular field, where the seed is procured, and whether we are developing in Saskatchewan sugar beets suitable for making refined sugar?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister answers that question, surely he will have something to say to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) who has just spoken. I have no information at all with regard to the merits of closing that farm, but I have a good deal of sympathy for the case which the hon. member has made. In the course of his remarks he made some serious reflections upon the deputy minister of agriculture and some of the higher officials of the department, and it seems to me—and I offer this with the utmost good-will—that the minister just cannot sit silent.

Mr. GARDINER: I had no intention of doing so. There may be five other speeches to make after I have the floor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister will excuse me. I apologize for being a little premature. I thought he was not going to reply. Certainly we cannot let this item pass without the minister making some defence of his own officials who cannot be here to speak for themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: Another member over there rose to ask a question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister did not rise.

Mr. GARDINER: I had not the opportunity. The hon, gentleman over there had the floor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry; I did not see him.

Mr. GARDINER: To answer first the question that has just been asked, experiments are being carried on by all our farms having to do with sugar beets, the reason being that we are attempting to get records of the production and sugar content of sugar beets being raised in different sections where we operate farms. Experiments are being made at Melfort in common with our other farms that are operating.

To come down to the question that has been raised by the hon member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), it will be noticed that this item has been reduced by $185,000. The Rosthern farm is not the only farm that is being closed.

Mr. BROOKS: I was going to ask the minister if he would tell us how many farms in each province have been closed.

Mr. GARDINER: There are none closed to date.

Mr. BROOKS: Or are proposed to be

Mr. GARDINER: Take the farm at St. Joachim. The expenditure there last year was $6,000. This year we are cutting that down to $5,125, with the intention of closing the farm. At the Cap Rouge farm we spent last year $27,851, and we are spending this year $10,564, with the intention of closing it.

Mr. BROOKS: Where is that?

Mr. GARDINER: In Quebec. At the Farnham farm last year we spent $20,502, and this year we propose to spend $8,122, with the intention of closing the farm at the end of the season. The Rosthern farm has not been run for $10,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He said net.

Mr. GARDINER: It cost $27,812 last year.

Mr. TUCKER: What were the revenues there?

Mr. GARDINER: The revenue was $4,323, leaving a net cost of $23,000.

Mr. TUCKER: Does that include the cost of the construction of the conservatory, and the new piggery? They cost about $12,000, I believe.

Mr. GARDINER: No, I understand it does not include the cost of buildings. At Windermere farm we spent $14,518 last year; we are spending $6,926 this year, with the intention of closing it. We expect to save $9,000 by closing the farm at Tranquille.

Those are the six farms, and there are nineteen demonstration stations which are being closed in the different provinces across Canada. By this means we reduce the expenditure this year by $185,430.

This is not the first time the department has indicated a desire to close the Rosthern farm, and at least some others which I have mentioned. It has been for some time the opinion of the department that the usefulness of the work which was started many years ago at some of those places has ceased. Certain work was done in those areas to demonstrate what could be accomplished under the soil conditions existing there, and the department believe they have carried on those experiments for a sufficient length of time to demonstrate what they had in mind to demonstrate.

There were other reasons why it was decided that the Rosthern farm should be closed with a view of reducing the expenditure on experimental farms. But I wish to emphasize that, had the department and their officials had their way, those farms would have been closed sooner or later irrespective of the war; and since there is a war on, and it was necessary to keep down expenditures this year in connection with experimental work, it was thought that any reductions should be made at places where, in the opinion of the department, work should be discontinued in any event.

A special reason why it was thought wise to choose the Rosthern farm as an object of reduced expenditure is that it operates a comparatively short distance from Saskatoon. At Saskatoon we have a forestry farm which is developing trees suitable for the northern section of Saskatchewan. Also at Saskatoon is an agricultural college of the provincial government, associated with the university of Saskatchewan. If I remember rightly, that farm contains 1,600 acres of land, or ten quarter-sections. Much of the experimental work, particularly with forage crops, which was being carried on at Rosthern is now being done on the Saskatoon farm. Therefore it was not considered necessary to continue that work at Rosthern and it has been discontinued there for some considerable time. The work which has been conducted there for the last number of years has had to do with the development of live stock for that area, and the breeding of hardy fruits has been experimented with during the last two or three years.

In view of this experimental work which is being carried on at Saskatoon by the province, and at the forestry farm at Saskatoon; in view of the further fact that we have one experimental farm at Melfort, to the east of Rosthern, and another one at Scott, to the west of Rosthern—

Mr. ROWE: How many in the province?

Mr. GARDINER: There are five in the province—we decided that the Rosthern farm should be closed at the end of the present year. Some representations have been received as to other uses which might be made of the farm either by the province or by groups of people in that section, but I do not think I am in a position to discuss these representations with the committee at the present time. It may be sufficient to say that the suggestions have to do with ways and means of utilizing the farm with the aid of expenditures to be made from elsewhere. But those discussions have not gone sufficiently far to warrant me in saying that the proposals will materialize.

With regard to the officials I would only say this, that I do not believe there is any man working in connection with agriculture anywhere in Canada who spends longer hours and gives more conscientiously of his time to the work than the present deputy minister of the department. I have had reason during the last five years to know the time that he gives to it and his ability to be the chief administrative official of the department. The entire speech of the hon. member for Rosthern has been the finest eulogy of the officials of the Department of Agriculture to which I have listened in this chamber. If those officials were giving a service which was so well thought of and which could be appropriately described in the terms used this evening by the hon. member for Rosthern, then those officials must have ability second to none among the people who are interested in the promotion of agriculture in this country. That is one of the reasons why, when a question was asked on the administrative item as to whether it would not be well to close those farms and operate them merely as cropproducing units for the purpose of indicating whether a farm could be run as a paying proposition, I preferred to leave the discussion until this point, because I was quite certain that, when I would intimate to this committee that we were going to close some of those farms, there would be many who would be prepared to rise in their places and say that those experimental farms had done real service in every section of Canada, and that if we attempted to close down any one of them and utilize it merely to demonstrate whether money could be made at farming, we would soon find from all corners of the chamber the most decided opposition to that procedure.

I want to say again that the speech delivered this evening by the hon. member for Rosthern demonstrates that the departmental officials are doing a good job and that the people in the areas where those farms are operating realize that they give valuable service. I am sorry that the time has come when we believe it necessary as well as advisable to close them in the interests of future experimental work in this country. I am pleased that it is possible to do so at a time when certain sums of money, totalling $185,000, can thereby be released for expenditure on the war services of the country.

Mr. ROWE: Did the minister state how many farms and stations were being closed?

Mr. GARDINER: Six farms and nineteen illustration stations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there no protest from Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER: Not up to the moment.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not want to take up too much time, but I should like to ask the minister if he does not think that, by transferring elsewhere the higher-paid officials, or some of them, and carrying on that farm on a subsistence basis, it would be possible to operate it with a net expenditure of about $9,000 at the outside over and above receipts?

Mr. GARDINER: We are carrying it on this year at an expenditure of $8,000, but we are not doing real experimental work on the farm. If we carried it out merely on a maintenance basis, we would not be doing anything that any other farmer in the community is not doing. The farm of Seager Wheeler, which is across the road and to which the hon. member has referred, has been operated for many years by Seager Wheeler, and some of the most important experimental work carried on in the west has been done by him on his own farm. It is true that for a few years the department employed him. We gave him an honorarium of $1,500 a year over a period of years until he reached the age of seventy, and by means of that honorarium he carried on much experimental work in connection with fruit. In addition he was responsible for the production and propagation of some of the best strains of wheat we have had in the west.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When was the allowance discontinued?

Mr. GARDINER: About two years ago.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know anything about the merits or demerits of the Rosthern farm. The hon. member representing that district put up a battle in defence of the farm, but he said something with reference to the officials of the department of the sort that I have listened to from several members on various occasions. It is something that does not appeal to me as a new member. It strikes me that a public servant who cannot rise and defend himself should not be so criticized unless there is great justification. I have been intensely interested in agriculture for many years, and I know, from personal contact with the deputy minister of agriculture and the director of experimental farms for Canada, that in these gentlemen we have two of the most efficient public servants in the country, men who give long hours of work and are quite efficient in the discharge of their duties. It is not becoming for members to cast reflections upon either of these public servants, as has been done this evening—and I have heard the same thing on other occasions from other hon. members with regard to different departments. Such criticism should not be made without proper justification. I wish to pay a tribute to the fine work rendered the country under two different governments by the deputy minister of agriculture and the director of experimental farms. I have known of new offices created in the last few months in connection with which salary and living allowance were much higher than either of these public servants receives, and I doubt very much whether the men appointed to those offices will render one-quarter of the service that these men are giving the country. I want to compliment them upon the splendid work they have done.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon, member has raised a point that has been rather disturbing to me. It seems to me that we are getting away from parliamentary government and moving towards bureaucracy. If members of the civil service make recommendations or say something about somebody or suggest that something should be done and a member of the house ventures to disagree with him, that member is supposed to be casting reflections upon him. I do not cast reflections upon anyone, but when I am elected by the people I have as much right to have an opinion as to what is best for the country as civil servants have. I think it is time we began to see where we are drifting in this matter. If the members of this house feel that an expenditure on a subsistence basis of nine or ten thousand dollars can carry the Rosthern farm, in order to have it expanded again when financial conditions are better, and the department says "No, in our opinion, it should be closed," what happens? I leave it to the hon, members here. But we are the ones that are answerable to the people; we are the ones elected to run the country. But who is tending more and more to run it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government.

Mr. TUCKER: The leader of the opposition says, "the government." I know that a busy minister is in such a position that he cannot look into all the details of his department. The civil servant responsible makes a recommendation to him. He may make that recommendation with the most honest intention, but he may be mistaken, he may be misinformed, just as members may be mistaken at times. It is our duty in such a case to rise in our places and bring the matter to the attention of parliament itself. If it is coming to the stage where a member cannot do that without being accused of criticizing, casting reflections, and so on, what is to become of parliamentary government? Almost every day, I talk with various members and they say they do not know what is going on. The departments are so busy that the ministers do not know what is going on. Civil servants may think they are right. Doubtless they think members of parliament are just a nuisance; nevertheless we are sup-posed to have democratic parliamentary government in this country. In what I said, and in quoting the opinion of people right on the ground, I have been trying to show that in this case officials may have made a mistake, so far as agriculture in northern Saskatchewan is concerned. I admit I may be wrong, but it was my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the committee. At any rate, I wish to thank hon. members for the sympathetic hearing they have given me, right or wrong.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to block my own estimates, but there is one point I should clear up. I knew all about this item when the decision was made to cut it out, and I examined into all the farms before any of them were cut out. I take full responsibility for all the reductions which I have recommended to the house and full responsibility for all the increases, and I think the officials of the department will agree with me when I say that I personally put up all the arguments to the officials against closing Rosthern and some of the other farms that have been mentioned on the floor to-night. But I was convinced by information placed before me that this farm eventually ought to be closed. I was convinced that Windermere farm eventually ought to be closed, and that the others I have spoken of ought to be closed some time in the very near future; and having been thus convinced, I came to the conclusion that the proper time to make the recommendation was now when we need the money for other purposes.

I do not want any hon, member to have the idea that this is merely a recommendation of officials of the department. The initial suggestion of reduction was my recommendation, coming not from officials at all, but from the government of Canada through the treasury board of which I am a member. It was suggested that the regular estimates of my department were to be cut down by at least $2,000,000, and in order to make up that $2,000,000 we had to do certain things. One of the things we decided to do was to reduce now what we intended to do sooner or later in any case, namely, by closing down some of the experimental farms. I was responsible for pressing reductions on the officials. They are responsible for recommending to me the selections and giving reasons as to why the particular farms which have been closed should be closed. But I finally made the decision and I take all responsibility for it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Have any farms or illustration stations been opened in the last five years?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact number, but very few have been opened within the last five years; two substations, one in British Columbia and one in Quebec, I understand.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the number of dominion experimental farms throughout Canada, and their distribution by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: There are twenty-six main farms.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many in Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER: There will be four left in Quebec; three are being closed there. In Ontario there are two.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Which ones are being left in Quebec?

Mr. GARDINER: Sainte Anne de la Pocatière, Lennoxville, L'Assomption, Normandin and a small substation.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there one in Hull?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not in Hull. We have a laboratory over there.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is part of the central experimental farm, is it? Just a laboratory?

Mr. GARDINER: That is right.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister answered part of my question in regard to experimental work with sugar beets, but I did not hear him reply to the question whether sugar beets produced in Saskatchewan are satisfactory for the refining of sugar, and whether seed is being produced.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the sugar beet produced in Saskatchewan has a good percentage of sugar. In dry years the yield per acre is light; that is the chief drawback.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where is the seed procured?

Mr. GARDINER: The seed has all been imported in the past, but provision has been made under the agricultural supplies board to get seed from available sources of supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: To what extent can this industry be expanded in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: In eastern Canada it can probably be expanded. In western Canada the extent to which it can be expanded is limited by the consumption of beet sugar in that section of Canada. That is to say, sugar produced from beets in western Canada cannot economically be shipped out of western Canada. The only reason why they can be produced there notwithstanding the higher cost of production is the cost of freighting sugar in, sugar being a fairly heavy commodity. The last figures I recall, which may not be correct now, were that you could produce a ton of sugar beets in certain sections of Ontario for at least a dollar a ton less than in some sections of western Canada. Their production under irrigation in western Canada is possible because of the fact that it would cost too much to ship sugar out from the east.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point of my question was rather different. I was thinking of the possible necessity in the future of shifting the emphasis from one kind of crop to another, and I wondered how much room there is for the expansion of the sugar beet industry in Canada, that is, what proportion of our sugar consumption is produced from beets in Canada at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: The whole question of tariffs and all that is involved. I should not like to state the extent to which you could increase the production of sugar in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: What percentage of our sugar consumption do we produce?

Mr. GARDINER: About fifteen per cent of our requirements.

If there are more questions I shall have to ask that this item stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

281. Departmental administration, $190,415.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I see the staff is practically the same as it was before. Having regard to the fact that public works have been stopped, is there no opportunity to save some money here? I understand that the Department of Munitions and Supply has brought in quite a number of people from outside in connection with buildings being erected for war purposes in various parts of the country. Is any use being made of the departmental architects, engineers and other officials, or are we hiring people outside and charging their salaries under war appropriation, [Mr. Gardiner.]

while our own officials, who are, I think, quite competent, are not being used?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): This item covers the expenditures of what may be called the main office. It provides more particularly for the minister's branch, the branch of the deputy minister and the assistant deputy minister, the secretary of the department, the purchasing agent and the private secretary's office. The number of employees under that vote is about the same as last year. There is no very great reduction in the estimate as far as employees are concerned. At present the employees of the department are well occupied because closing the contracts and completing the work started during last year and early this year require the work of a number of employees to ascertain to what extent the work had been done and to gather the information necessary to close out the contracts. Our people will be occupied in that work for a few months. Afterwards it may be that we could release their services to other departments. Although the Department of Public Works is not doing very much on its own account, we are doing certain works out of moneys transferred to us by the Department of National Defence, for example, and the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The research building was erected by the Public Works department out of moneys transferred from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

A committee has been set up, as the leader of the opposition knows, with the object of transferring to the new departments such officers and employees as have not sufficient work in their own departments, but so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned, few transfers have been made because up to the present we have required the services of our employees to complete and close out the contracts already undertaken. Practically all our officers and employees will be busy until the contracts are definitely closed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that apply also to the engineers in the outside service? Nothing is being done now at the Halifax agency, for example, with the exception of repairs and that sort of thing. I do not think there are any big contracts under way there. Why could not some of those engineers be used? The point I wish to make is that here is a real chance for the government to exercise some economy. Two months of the fiscal year have gone by. Some time ago word came from the Minister of Finance to cut down these expenditures. I am serious about this; I am not asking these questions just for fun. I suggest to this house and this committee that if this war is going on for a long period of time, as it may; if this country is going to be asked to vote huge sums of money for our war effort and to undergo such strenuous taxation as was indicated by the Minister of Finance, then this government and the Department of Public Works—which I mention because it is the one immediately under review—must cut down these services to the bare bone.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman; the government itself must go to work and cut down other services I could mention. What will the people of this country think when forty or fifty people will be taxed under this budget and bring in only enough to pay the salary of Mr. Brockington, $9,000 a year plus $12 a day allowance for living expenses, to write the Prime Minister's broadcasts and speeches? That is his main job. I wonder what the people of Canada are thinking about when they tolerate that sort of thing; yet we are being taxed to the limit for our war effort.

These things must stop, and I serve notice upon the ministry now that I intend to scrutinize every one of these items. I have nothing against Mr. Brockington. He is a very able man. I have heard his speeches over the radio, and his English is magnificent. But we can save that $9,000 salary and $12 per day living allowance. Why, his expenses alone constitute a good sized salary for any man. I am not objecting to Mr. Brockington; I am objecting to the government making that sort of expenditure to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the leader of the opposition?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I think if you worked as hard as I do you would think you earned your salary.

An hon. MEMBER: You get $12,000 a year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not got it yet. I hope I will earn it. In any case, the salary of the leader of the opposition was fixed by statute after the most careful consideration, and it has been agreed to by both parties. But nobody was ever consulted when it was decided to set up a public relations officer, or whatever it may be, and pay him $9,000 a year. I should like to know out of what vote that salary is being paid.

Mr. CRERAR: Not out of this one, anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure it is not, but I am taking this opportunity to serve notice—and I think I am justified in doing so—that expenditures of this sort will be questioned in this house, and justifiably so. I am sure in his heart the minister will agree with me.

Mr. CARDIN: I feel that the Department of Public Works cannot accept the criticism of the leader of the opposition and cannot agree to the idea that we are not doing everything we can to reduce expenditures. If hon, members will look at the estimates for this year they will see that my department has submitted itself to a very substantial reduction. If they compare the figures for this year with those for last year, they will see that the decrease amounts to about $17,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree.

Mr. CARDIN: That is a good reduction, and I think I deserve the commendation of the leader of the opposition for having submitted myself to such a reduction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to give you that when the time comes.

Mr. CARDIN: All possible reductions are being made, but we must retain the services of our employees and officers to protect the properties in our charge. Numerous repairs must be made to wharves and buildings all over the country, and we need our officers to look after these. We are not doing any new work, but as I explained a moment ago we need the services of these officials to gather all the information necessary to close out the contracts, pay the compensation which may be due the contractors and pay for the material already on the sites, although it may not have been used. All this takes time, and we must gather all this information before we make settlements and definitely close the contracts. As far as the Halifax office is concerned, that may be discussed under another item. As I have stated, the item under consideration covers only what we may call the central office at Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. CRERAR: I should like this item to stand and to call an item under the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is eleven o'clock. I think you have done very well to-night.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

77. Departmental administration, $129,300. The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, not by any means.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before that is done, I should like to say to the minister that when his estimates are taken up I will expect him to give the committee a full explanation of the recent changes in his department and the occasion therefor. I shall not mention the other things I have in store for him.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 26, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPROVAL OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION RESPECTING CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay on the table of the house a report of the civil service commission recommending the appointment of Miss Gladys Northcott as clerk, grade 4, in the law branch of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission laid on the table of the house on the 26th instant, recommending the appointment of Miss Gladys Northcott as clerk, grade 4, law branch of the House of Commons, be approved.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have some little explanation from the Prime Minister. In all the years I have been a member of this house I never heard of such a motion before. It may be a new departure. I think the house ought to be informed of what is really going on, and why.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house has to approve appointments of its clerks where recommended by the civil service commission. The civil service commission has recommended this particular appointment of Miss Northcott as clerk, grade 4, in the law branch of the house. In making the motion I am simply taking the necessary step to have the commission's recommendation approved by the house.

It is the usual formal way of proceeding with respect to appointments of officials of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought it was always done through the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, the house approves the recommendation of the civil service commission with respect to its own staffs. A day or two ago the civil service commission also recommended that three long-term temporary employees of the House of Commons be made permanent. In a moment I should like to make a similar motion regarding that particular recommendation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not opposing this at all, but with respect to the first case I would ask if ever this procedure was adopted before.

Hon. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It was done on many occasions in the last parliament, when, for instance, certain long-term temporaries on the staff of the House of Commons were recommended for permanency, a competition was held under the auspices of the commission and the commission recommended permanency. It is the custom to introduce a resolution in the house and have it adopted confirming the appointment recommended by the commission.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the recommendation from the civil service commission regarding the permanency of three long-term temporary employees of the House of Commons, namely, Miss L. A. Kearns, Miss I. A. Boyce and Mr. L. C. Hill, be approved.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister a question on this motion? Does making these officials permanent instead of temporary involve any reduction in salary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not necessarily. I should think it would leave the salary scale about where it has always been.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. HANSELL:

- 1. What is the salary of the governor of the Bank of Canada?
- 2. What are the salaries of each of the other officials of the Bank of Canada at Ottawa, excepting secretarial and office staff?
- 3. What are the salaries of each of the directors of the Bank of Canada, what other remunerations do they receive, and how much is allowed per day for travel and living expenses?
- 4. How many times, and on what dates did the directorate of the Bank of Canada meet since January 1, 1936?
- 5. Does any member of the dominion government sit on or with the directorate of the bank? If so, what powers does such member have?
- 6. Are the minutes of the meetings of the directorate available to the members of the House of Commons?
- 7. Is any or all correspondence exchanged between the Bank of Canada and the Bank of England available to the members of the House of Commons?

Mr. RALSTON:

- 1. Salary of the governor of the Bank of Canada, as fixed by order in council, is at the rate of $30,000 per annum.
- 2. The salaries of the deputy governor and assistant deputy governor, as fixed by order in council, are at the rate of $20,000 per annum and $10,000 per annum respectively: no information concerning other officials and employees.
- 3. Each director receives a fee of $150 for attendance at board meetings and an expense allowance of $20 per day for time spent in travelling to and from board meetings. The director who is a member of the executive committee receives a fee of $50 for attendance at committee meetings and the same travel allowance as above. No other remuneration is paid to directors. (The governor and deputy governor of the bank and the deputy minister of finance, who are members of the board and of the executive committee, do not receive any remuneration or expenses for attendance at board or committee meetings).
- 4. The board of directors of the Bank of Canada met on the following dates subsequent to January 1, 1936: (1936) Jan. 22, Feb. 25, May 20, Oct. 7, Dec. 7. (1937) Jan. 22, Feb. 23, June 22, Aug. 10, Nov. 12. (1938) Jan. 21, Feb. 22, May 30, Sept. 12, Nov. 7. (1939) Feb. 6, April 24, June 26, Sept. 11, Nov. 20. (1940) Feb. 9, April 19 and June 14.

In addition, the executive committee of the bank has met at least once every week.

- 5. No, but in accordance with the provisions of section 5, subsection 2 of the act, the deputy minister of finance is a member of the board, but has not the right to vote.
  - 6. No.
  - 7. No.

CAMP BORDEN AND TRENTON AIRPORTS—REPAIR FACILITIES

Mr. COCKERAM:

Are there sufficient repair facilities available at Camp Borden and Trenton airports to enable ground personnel to keep the maximum number of planes in operation?

Mr. POWER: At the present time there are not sufficient repair facilities available at Camp Borden or Trenton to keep the maximum number of planes in operation. Existing facilities are being expanded as rapidly as possible and the Department of Munitions and Supply is organizing the industry to undertake overhauls and to do major repairs. The R.C.A.F. will undertake running maintenance repairs only.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT—PERSONNEL OF GENERAL COMMITTEES EXPENDITURES

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

- 1. What is the personnel of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act committees in (a) Manitoba, (b) Saskatchewan, (c) Alberta?
- 2. What remuneration did they receive in the form of (a) salary; (b) expenses?
- 3. What was the amount spent in each of the prairie provinces?
- 4. By provinces, what was the amount (a) received for machinery sold, (b) spent in the purchasing or leasing of land?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. There are no provincial committees under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act but general committees are as follows:—

Advisory committee on water development:
J. Vallance, Regina, Sask., chairman; W. L.

*TRANSPORTATION OF ALBERTA OIL TO ONTARIO

Mr. BLACKMORE:

Has the Minister of Transport and Supplies considered the advisability of using his newly acquired powers to require that the Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway should transport Alberta oil to Ontario at such rate as would enable Ontario people to buy, economically, Canadian produced gasoline?

Mr. HOWE: Consideration has been given to acquiring a better distribution of petroleum products, and a controller of petroleum products has been appointed with powers to deal with the matter, after a thorough investigation to that end.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may be allowed, I would call the minister's attention to the fact that he has not dealt with the crux of this question, in that the hon. member is asking the minister to require the two railways to "transport Alberta oil to Ontario at such rate" et cetera. The minister did not deal with that aspect.

Mr. HOWE: I think the crux of it is in the words, "considered the advisability".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I would not say so.

Mr. ROWE: The minister is expected to do so, anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That goes as a matter of course.

ASSISTANT GRAIN COMMISSIONERS IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

- 1. How many assistant grain commissioners are there in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta?
  - 2. What are their names and addresses?
- 3. What salaries did they receive during the years 1938 and 1939?
- 4. What was the total number and the total amount of the claims or complaints received by each during said years?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

- 1. One assistant grain commissioner in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.
- 2. Manitoba—T. J. Harrison, 206 Grain Exchange, Winnipeg; Saskatchewan—R. S. Dundas, 618 Federal Bldg., Saskatoon; Alberta —W. H. Blatchford, 625 Public Bldg., Calgary.
- 3. During the years 1938 and 1939 each assistant grain commissioner received $7,500 per annum.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS— W. A. KINGSLAND

Mr. WHITE:

1. Is Mr. W. A. Kingsland, former vicepresident and general manager of the Central division of the Canadian National Railways, now under superannuation, and, if so, what is the amount of his annual retiring allowance?

2. Is this the same Mr. W. A. Kingsland who is or was vice-president of the Dufferin Shipbuilding Company?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

Note: Amount of Mr. Kingsland's retiring allowance is considered by the management of Canadian National Railways in the same light as official salaries, which are matters of domestic railway concern, not to be disclosed except as may be determined by the select standing committee on railways and shipping.

*PRAIRIE AIRWAYS LIMITED

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Prairie Airways Limited been given a contract at the airports in Regina and Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, or either of these, by the terms of which said company will train or provide training for pilots for service in the air force?

2. If so, what are the terms respecting remuneration or payment for such training?

3. Have contracts of a similar kind or nature been entered into elsewhere?

4. If so, with whom?

Mr. HOWE: The answer as the question is framed is, no. It is my understanding that Prairie Airways Limited has been given a contract by the Department of National Defence to conduct an air training school at one of these airports. This question seems to refer to a contract for the construction of an airport.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT-LOANS BY PROVINCES

Mr. COLDWELL:

What were the number of loans and amounts, by provinces, made to date under (a) part I of the National Housing Act; (b) part II of the National Housing Act?

Mr. RALSTON:

(a) The National Housing Act, 1938, which repealed and reenacted the Dominion Housing Act with important amendments, was passed on July 1, 1938, but lending operations under the new act did not begin until about August 1, 1938. Details of loans under part I of the National Housing Act from August, 1938, to May 31, 1940, are as follows:

Province	No. of loans	Family housing units provided	Amount

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

AEROPLANE ENGINES

DECISION OF MR. FORD WITH RESPECT TO MANUFACTURE FOR BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government to a press dispatch from Washington, under yesterday's date, in which it is indicated that negotiations between the United States government and Mr. Henry Ford for the mass production of aeroplane engines collapsed yesterday.

It has been announced by Mr. Knudsen, of the national defence commission, that Mr. Ford refuses to manufacture engines for Great Britain and has thus forced cancellation of plans for early mass production of Rolls Royce motors by the Ford motor company, and that the national defence advisory commission will seek cooperation in the production of this important military equipment elsewhere. Having regard to the fact that the French fleet may be delivered to the German government and that therefore, as a result of this and other factors, western civilization on this hemisphere faces immediately a situation of dire peril, what action is this government taking to protect Britain's position?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will leave it to my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to reply to the part of my hon. friend's question which refers to the manufacture by the Ford company of aeroplane engines.

As to the latter part of the question, it involves the whole defence effort of the country and could not very well be replied to offhand.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The facts of the situation are, I think, that the committee recently appointed by the President of the United States to obtain production of war materials in the United States were negotiating with the Ford company for an order on behalf of the United States government, combined with an order for the British government placed by the Anglo-French commission in New York. The situation appears to be that the transaction has collapsed.

As far as Canada is concerned, the Ford motor company, of course, is a public company with wide ownership and it has been doing splendid work in the production of war materials.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not speaking of the Ford Motor Company of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I assumed that the Canadian interests of Mr. Henry Ford would be through the company in Canada in which he is a shareholder.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had entire reference to the United States company, which is not, as I understand it, publicly owned. I had no reference to the Ford Motor Company of Canada. I should like to have that made absolutely clear.

BRITISH CHILDREN

ARRANGEMENTS AND FACILITIES FOR EXTENDING
HOSPITALITY OF CANADA FOR DURATION
OF WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) of which I have given him notice. My question is based on an appeal over the radio by Mr.

J. B. Priestley from England, some little time ago, to which I listened, in which he stated that his wish and the wish of people over there was to be able to evacuate about a million children from Great Britain. It is based also upon a telegram which I have received from Toronto. I crave the permission of the house to read the telegram in order to make my question clear:

Douglas G. Ross, M.P.,

Ottawa, Ont.

Undersigned deeply disappointed to learn from radio sources Great Britain that evacuees to be restricted to relatively small numbers. If this due lack of facilities Canada urge immediate reconsideration proposed bases of handling here in belief that mass evacuation imperative from military as well as humanitarian point of view. The five undersigned officers of this company personally offer immediately two houses one in Toronto, one in Ancaster and will undertake to equip and maintain in each house mother and help. Undersigned as responsibile citizens undertake personal responsibility in securing proper and qualified persons to manage these houses. Facilities believed to be adequate for housing twenty-five children. Purpose this wire to emphasize that present emergency involves mass evacuation and that previously well prepared plans now inadequate. Undersigned only officers present at discussion others no doubt eager cooperate. Please wire reply care Manufacturers Life.

A. Mackenzie,
Assistant General Manager,
C. L. Holmes, Actuary,
R. E. Dowsett, Secretary,
S. M. Thompson, Treasurer,
Manufacturers Life Insurance Company

I should like to ask the minister:

- 1. Whether the evacuees from Great Britain are to be restricted to a relatively small number, and, if so, what number?
  - 2. Is this due to lack of facilities in Canada?
- 3. What arrangements are made for the payment of passage from Great Britain?
- 4. What arrangements can be made with respect to those people in England who wish to pay for the support of their children while here?
- 5. What restrictions, if any, are being placed on the permission given for these children to come to Canada, by the government of Canada?

Would the minister care to make a statement?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): My hon. friend's question is based apparently upon a statement by Mr. Priestley in Great Britain some time ago in which he expressed the wish that one million children could be evacuated. I know nothing of this, but I assume it was merely a statement of Mr. Priestley's own views on the matter. Not so long ago the British government expressed the opinion to us that they were doubtful whether many children would come to Canada except in gravest emergency, and in any event they made it quite clear that no children would be sent to this country without the approval of parents or guardians.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fair enough.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the information we have. As regards the expression of opinion in the body of the wire which my hon, friend read, to the effect that the gentlemen signing it wish to emphasize that the present emergency involves mass evacuation, that is a matter wholly for the British government to decide. I doubt the wisdom of accepting as fact statements that may be made on this matter by various individuals over the radio.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are we to take that as applying to all radio broadcasts, including those of the Prime Minister?

Mr. CRERAR: May I make it clear to my hon, friend who leads the opposition that these statements over the radio emanated not from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but from the British Broadcasting Corporation. Statements of this kind are often inaccurate. I hope to make a statement to-morrow outlining in some detail what has been done up to the present time. So far I have not been able to do so because of communications passing between ourselves and the British government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister say that in addition to a statement with regard to what has been done up to the present time he will make a statement as to what may be done in the future? That is more important.

Mr. CRERAR: That, I hope, will be covered to the satisfaction of my hon. friend in the statement I shall make, as will the other questions which the hon. member has asked, based upon the telegram.

RADIO BROADCASTING

NEWS SERVICES-CANCELLATION OF TRANS-RADIO PERMIT AS OF JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Yesterday a question was directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) regarding Trans-Radio press services. Can he make a statement to-day on the matter?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The matter of news services employed by the [Mr. Crerar.]

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and associated stations is one for the board of governors to determine; it is within their exclusive province. The board will be meeting in Ottawa to-morrow to discuss that very situation, and I have no doubt they will decide the matter wisely.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

POSITION WITH RESPECT TO ENTRY OF UNITED STATES NATIONALS INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon, R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to address to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) an interrogatory, of which I have sent him notice, on a matter of considerable public importance. The position with respect to passports for Canadian nationals entering the United States has been clarified by the announcement made over the week-end, but the position with respect to entry of United States and other nationals into Canada has so far not been clarified, and we are still in the dark as to what the real position is. When I referred to this matter on a previous occasion the Prime Minister intimated that it was hoped to arrange for a measure of reciprocity. So far nothing has been announced.

The matter is of considerable importance and, in my opinion, exceedingly urgent. We are now near the end of June. Our tourist season in Canada, at best, is of very short duration. If we are to have any tourist business this season the position should be clarified at once and a public announcement made. I would ask the Prime Minister to tell the house and the country what the present position is and when we may expect a final decision on the part of the government; and if it is possible to make an announcement now, I think it should be made.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon, friend was kind enough to intimate that he would ask the question and I am prepared to make an immediate reply.

As previously announced, the government have for some time past been giving careful consideration to the question of border control. We recognize the necessity of special vigilance in view of war conditions. We also recognize the desirability of interfering as little as possible with legitimate access to Canada by visitors from the United States.

The United States authorities have recently instituted a system of passports and visa control on all borders of the United States, to become effective on July 1. I may add that in order to avoid disruption in essential services arrangements have been made to postpone the visa regulation until July 15 for the operating personnel of railway trains, aircraft, vessels and buses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just for the crews?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all. Under this system it will be necessary for a Canadian who intends to visit the United States to obtain a passport from the Canadian authorities and then to secure a visa or permit from one of the United States consuls stationed at different points in Canada.

We have taken steps to review and strengthen the existing system of border control, including stricter immigration inspection at the border and special provision in certain areas which have usually not required attention. The protection of vulnerable points is, of course, being continued and will be increased.

All circumstances considered, it has been deemed desirable to continue for the present the practice of not requiring passports from United States citizens. All that will be necessary is for the visitor to satisfy the Canadian immigration authorities that he is a United States citizen and that he is coming to Canada for a legitimate purpose. There will be no unnecessary delays or hindrances placed in the way of tourists, who will continue to receive the cordial welcome that has been extended to them in the past.

United States visitors will see in Canada a country intensifying its war effort against nazi and fascist aggression and tyranny, but a country which at the same time is at peace with and in increasing accord and friendship with its great democratic neighbour. If at the end of the summer season it should be found necessary to establish a system of passport control and to set up the necessary Canadian consular service in the United States, ample notice of such intention will be given.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): I ask the Prime Minister to forgive me for not having given notice of this question, but I did not expect the matter to come up. It relates to the visa on a passport. The obtaining of a passport is a trifling matter, but people in southeastern British Columbia cannot get one visaed at an expense of less than three or four days of travel and at least $50 to $75 in money. I would ask the Prime Minister to make representations to the United States legation; for that of course is the only channel through which that representation can be made. The various boards of trade out there are passing resolutions and sending communications which are useless, because there is but the one channel through which anything can be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have already been making representations with respect to the difficulties that are likely to arise. The United States regulation has been passed rather hurriedly, as my hon. friend knows, and he will find, I think, that there will be every disposition on the part of the United States authorities to meet us in the reciprocal spirit to which I have referred; when I spoke of reciprocity, I did not mean identical action, it was reciprocal as contrasted with anything of a retaliatory nature, reciprocal as being in the spirit of seeking to meet the mutual needs and embarrassments with which we are faced.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Has any arrangement been made in regard to travel by boat? Has the regulation been waived in regard to travel on boats as well as on rail-ways and aeroplanes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only information I have is what I have given the house, but I will look into the matter of my hon, friend's question.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The reason I ask the question is that we are faced with a strange situation in the Yukon. To come out of the Yukon to other parts of Canada it is necessary to pass through Alaska, and when that regulation goes into effect Canadians crossing Alaska will have to have a passport, and a visa from a United States consul. There is no United States consul in the Yukon, so that Canadians can neither go into nor come out of the Yukon. I have put it up to the United States consulate here to-day, but I should like to have the cooperation of Canada's government as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have the same situation in western New Brunswick.

NATIONAL DEFENCE TAX

QUESTION OF APPLICATION TO WAGES EARNED OR ACCRUING DUE DURING AND AFTER JULY, 1940

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston): I have received a request from three employers of labour for an explanation regarding the deduction of the national defence tax from the wages of employees.

They have only four more days, they say, in June to comply with this requirement. The provision in the budget in this regard is not clear. I quote:

That every employer be required to deduct the tax imposed in respect of earnings of the employee earned or accruing due during and after July, 1940.

That every employer remit the tax collected at the source on the 16th day of September, 1940, and on the 15th day of each month thereafter.

These employers say that they pay their men for June on July 1. Does this requirement mean that the tax will be deducted from the June wages of these men on July 1? The words are not clear. I would ask the minister to state what the words mean.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): In the resolution and the act itself the meaning will be made clear. I believe the intention is that wages from July 1 shall be subject to the deduction.

Mr. CHURCH: Then wages due for all June and paid on July 1 will not be deducted or included in the return, as the press in some cases has stated it must be?

Mr. RALSTON: That will be dealt with in the bill. I think the intention is that wages earned from and including July 1 will be subject to the tax.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

CALLING UP OF CLASSES UNDER THE NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Is it the intention of the government to carry out some scheme of registration under the mobilization act before the first class of men is called up for training under this act? If it is not, will the Prime Minister give the house information as to when the first men are likely to be called up?

Right Hon, W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government is proceeding with the preliminary plans for registration. Just what will take place either before or immediately thereafter, or how soon some of the classes to which my hon. friend refers may be called up is a matter which necessarily will have to be considered by the departments concerned. Information will be given to the house as soon as the matter is definitely decided. I regret that I cannot go any further than that in replying to the hon. member to-day.

[Mr. Church.]

BEAUHARNOIS POWER COMPANY

PROPOSED APPROVAL FOR DIVERSION OF ADDITIONAL 30,000 CUBIC SECOND FEET—CONCURRENCE

IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 9, respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

He said: The bill in question has but one operative clause, which provides for the diversion of an additional 30,000 cubic second feet through the Beauharnois canal. It provides that this diversion shall take place "in such manner, upon such terms and conditions and with such limitations and reservations as may be prescribed by order of the governor in council." The amendment offered by the senate adds to that a certain direction to the governor in council in preparing the order in council. The added clause is:

1. Page 2, line 14.—After "council" insert "which order shall provide that Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company shall settle, pay and fully provide for the claims of riparians and other persons, including navigation companies, who may sustain any loss or damage by the exercise or in consequence of the exercise, in whole or in part, of the right by this act granted, including the execution of any remedial or control works incidental to such exercise of such right, erected by or for the said Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company."

I do not know that there is any objection to the amendment. Provision would in any case have been made in the order in council to protect any persons or corporations damaged by the diversion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the proposed diversion?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this not go a little further than that?

Mr. HOWE: Well, it seems to me it is a clause which would delight the heart of a lawyer anticipating litigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A lawyer drew it.

Mr. HOWE: To me it seems vague. It says "who may sustain any loss or damage", that the company "shall settle, pay and fully provide for the claims of riparians and other persons". It seems to me it might at least say "lawful claims".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, that is understood; they must be just claims.

Mr. HOWE: Another vague part is the point which my hon. friend has raised. Does it refer to the 30,000 cubic second feet granted by this bill? I take it it does, because it is an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it the government's interpretation that this amendment refers to damage claims arising by reason of the previous diversion of 40,000 cubic second feet?

Mr. HOWE: I asked that question of our legal advisers, and I am advised that it refers entirely to claims arising out of the diversion of the 30,000 cubic second feet referred to in this bill—which opens up a very delightful avenue of speculation, it seems to me. However, after receiving the advice of our legal advisers I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Before this motion is adopted I want to point out two or three principles which have been overlooked by the house in connection with this application. This is purely a power bill; not by the widest stretch of the imagination can it be said to be a navigation work and a work for the general benefit of Canada, except in a very technical way. It is not in any sense a bill dealing with navigation. Between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis the only navigation consists of small pleasure boats, some of the Canada Steamships boats, the Rapids King, the Rapids Prince and that sort of thing; but really the power bill does not touch the question of navigation as a whole.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we as a parliament have no power to part with these privileges. We should not give away the great water powers of this country in the haphazard manner in which we have granted this application. So far as I am concerned the government must take the responsibility for this bill, which has to do with the war effort only in small part. Principally it is a power bill taking advantage of the present state of affairs to grab these water powers forever, in perpetuity, which are the property of the people of this country and which should not be parted with except under proper safeguards.

The purpose of this bill is known in every chartered bank in this country and every banking office in New York. When this application first came before parliament, away back in 1927, I introduced a bill to forestall order in council P.C. 422. which was referred to during the debate on this bill in this house and also in the senate. I proposed to transfer to parliament the right of the governor general in council under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, under which the Minister of Public Works had power to grant applications to develop power out of that river by means of order in council. I proposed a bill to give this parliament power to deal with such matters, and now in the senate amendment to this bill I find that principle was part of the 1931 act, and will require parliament's sanction to a further 30,000 horse-power.

The Senate amendments are:

. . . Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company shall settle, pay and fully provide for the claims of riparians and other persons, including navigation companies, who may sustain any loss or damage by the exercise or in consequence of the exercise, in whole or in part, of the right by this act granted, including the execution of any remedial or control works incidental to such exercise of such right, erected by or for the said Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

I think before we adopt this amendment we should have a meeting with their honours concerning our war policy in regard to power and its control by a power controller. This whole problem goes back to 1922, at which time I also proposed that we should meet with their honours in regard to such a national policy. I believe we should have a joint committee of both houses to go into the question of a national hydro policy for this country in war time, by which the government of the day could generate and develop power on this international river as well as the interprovincial rivers of this country. I believe the government has power now, under the British North America Act and the War Measures Act, to adopt such a federal hydro policy, so that when navigable works are carried on, power may be developed, generated and distributed at cost to the two central industrial provinces, and monopoly may be avoided.

We should be very careful in parting with these water powers, which are the property of the people. Amendments similar to this were proposed a few years ago in connection with the Sifton bill, which sought all the water powers of the Georgian bay and Ottawa valley in Ontario, right up to the Nipigon. and new Ontario. At that time the department took the opposite stand with regard to the privileges and rights of the province of Ontario in the matter of navigation and water power. When this matter was up in 1922 and 1923, when Sir Adam Beck and the Ontario hydro wanted to develop power at the Morrisburg dam, this government took the opposite point of view and said it would effect the lowering of lake levels and the levels of the port of Montreal. According to the Canada Year Book we have a potential development of 42,000,000 horse-power in this country, of which only 7,000,000 horse-power, or less than one-seventh, has been developed. In my opinion this canal is just a blind, a smoke screen behind which they hope to get the bill passed in order to get hold of these water powers during war time, and of course they will be retained in perpetuity, and without adequate safeguards, when peace comes.

Some of this power may be exported. We know there is a tax on the export of power, but once it is exported it is gone forever. Ten years ago the bill I introduced in the house, to give this house full power over permits, was voted down by 85-72; the minister said at that time that under the law, as my bill had failed, they had no power to refuse the first application which was made by this company. At that time they obtained by order in council 422, 53,000 cubic feet per second, and now they are after another 30,000 feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the only matter before the house at the present moment is the amendment adopted by the senate. The hon, gentleman is now referring to the merits of the bill, which have been discussed in this house already. I would ask the hon, member to confine himself to the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: That is quite right, Mr. Speaker, but my suggestion is that we should appoint a committee from this house to meet with a committee from the Senate and go into this question of a national war policy with regard to power. I believe the government should lay down such a policy to protect these water powers in the interests of the people in peace and war alike. During almost ten months of the year we in this country require coal, and now we are parting with our water powers. As the late Theodore Roosevelt said, the people of the continent are faced with a power monopoly. Who own all these power companies to which parliament is handing out privileges? They are owned mostly by Americans in New York. Just look at the returns in the financial annuals and you will see the truth of what I say as to the directors and financial set-up. Now we are handing over an additional 30,000 cubic feet per second, and nearly the full flow of the river, without proper safeguards in the interests of Canada. I can tell you this: If there were a proper power controller for Canada, as in the last war, with power to operate in the provinces where these companies are situated, we would have a proper regulation of power and a redistribution in Quebec. We know how this government at the time of the last war regulated the production of power in Ontario. Under the bill now before us there is very little provision for the regulation of power companies or the protection of Canada by proper safeguards.

For these reasons I urge that instead of adopting the senate amendments we should meet their honours to see about a federal hydro national policy and the appointment of a proper federal power controller who would have jurisdiction over the output during the war years of these privately-owned monopolies who deal with the people's heritage. We remember that at the time of the last war Sir Henry Drayton regulated the activities of power companies. There ought to be some measure of regulation when in reality we are giving to these companies in perpetuity our magnificent heritage. In Quebec a power controller could adjust war matters there.

In conclusion may I point out I believe the time has come when the government will have to take national jurisdiction over the power and develop it at cost for the people. Under the British North America Act and the War Measures Act, we have jurisdiction in connection with the development and generation of power. That power should be distributed at cost to the industrial provinces which are now suffering.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

AEROPLANE ENGINES—DECISION OF MR. FORD WITH RESPECT TO MANUFACTURE FOR BRITISH GOVERNMENT—STATEMENT OF
MR. COLDWELL

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to draw further attention to a matter raised this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). It was my intention to bring this matter up on the motion to go into supply, because I believe it deserves much more consideration than was given to it merely by a question and an answer across the floor of the house before the orders of the day were called.

The newspaper reports regarding the refusal of the head of a corporation, which has a subsidiary in Canada—

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: —controlled in all its policies from the other side of the boundary line, and refusing to assist the British commonwealth in its hour of need, deserve more than passing reference in this House of Commons. I am impelled to make this statement because throughout Europe in recent days treachery to the cause of democracy has not been wholly on the part of a few submerged elements within those countries. It has come frequently from very powerful individuals and from industrial and economic corporations. I am reminded that the gentleman who heads the Ford companies and makes the statement appearing in to-day's press is a gentleman who was decorated by the leader of the German reich, and whose long record is not one that inspires confidence in those of us who believe in democratic institutions.

[Mr. Church.]

Already in our country we have undertaken prosecutions of insignificant and to some extent unknown persons for stupidities committed here and there in beer parlours and elsewhere. True, we have got to stop that kind of thing; but on the other hand it seems to me we have got to take cognizance of the possibility of sabotage, treachery, or treason in high places. Last week we placed on the statute books of our dominion an act giving this country the right to take over any industry we needed for our war effort; and I submit to the government that here is an opportunity to show the people of Canada that we are going to mobilize not only manpower but industry as well.

I said we were prosecuting comparatively unknown people-and I am not complaining, when those prosecutions are justified. But what are we going to do when the controlling influence in a great organization such as the one Henry Ford controls throws down the gauntlet and says, "I will not make the badly needed engines for the British commonwealth, and particularly for Great Britain herself." To my mind the whole record of Henry Ford is the record of one of the type who is bringing upon us the very conditions we fear. He is the type of industrialist who has exploited the working man, who has regimented him; and then, when he has sucked the life-blood out of him, throws him into the gutter. That, I submit, has been the Ford method, throughout the years.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has not Ford paid his working men a pretty good wage?

Mr. COLDWELL: Ford has paid his men what was regarded as a good wage; but those of us who know the history of the Ford workers know this, that the mass production line of the Ford factory has destroyed those men long before the period of their usefulness should have ended. Everyone knows that who knows anything about industry—that it is one of the cruelest industries in the world.

And because Ford, fattening on human life, as he has done, has set the example, other industries, in order to compete with him, have had to follow.

I remember reading several years ago the papal encyclical, quadragesimo anno—I have not it before me, and the reference I make is from memory—and noting therein the condemnation of an industrialism of this type. It is that kind of industrialism which is causing revolutionary undercurrents all over the world. It is that kind of industrialism which has led to the organization of fascist states, regimented states, states where human personality is destroyed, as they have it in Italy and in Germany.

For him-Henry Ford-anything in the nature of collective bargaining has been an Workers who wished to bargain anathema. collectively have been dismissed. It is true that his personal fortune runs into billions of dollars, and that a great deal of that was made in the British commonwealth of nations. I say that because some years ago-I have forgotten the date-Canadians agreed that Henry Ford, through his Canadian company, should have the sole right to manufacture under his patents not only to supply Canada but to supply the British empire. Under a friendly tariff policy in Canada we have allowed him to accumulate hundreds of millions of dollars in Canada. Yet—and I must point this out-when the depression came, and after all those millions, yes, billions of dollars, had been made, what happened to the Ford workers? They were immediately thrown upon the relief rolls of our cities, and our public purse had to maintain them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member permit one question? Is he referring to the Ford Motor Company of Canada or to the Ford Motor Company of the United States? I was referring solely to the Ford Motor Company of the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am referring to the Ford motor company generally—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course there are two.

Mr. COLDWELL: —because I believe the policies of subsidiaries to be found in other countries are controlled by Henry Ford. Thus the policy Ford lays down for the United States corporation is the policy carried out by the subsidiaries all across the world. When the depression came it is known that in Windsor, Walkerville, Ford—or wherever it is the factory is situated—the workers were thrown upon relief. When that happened and discontent arose we found the very kind of thing which has led to the rise of communism and fascism—the establishment of a sort of service and espionage department presided over by those who were prepared to use strongarm methods against the workers.

I recollect that the mayor of Detroit on one occasion said that in the employ of Mr. Ford could be found some of the worst thugs in the city of Detroit. On March 7, I think it was, of 1932, the civic authorities of Detroit gave the hungry working people of the Ford plant permission to make a peaceful parade in that city. When these working people got to the boundary of the city and crossed over into the Ford city of Dearborn, what were they met by? Tear gas bombs, vomit bombs and machine guns. Four men were killed and some fifty were taken to hospital, wounded. No wonder Hitler decorated Mr. Ford!

This is the partial history of a man who is to-day determined to prevent, so far as he is able, his great factory in the United States from helping the cause which we are assisting to the fullest extent. I ask what the government is going to do with this highly placed saboteur, with this man who controls the Ford industry which has a subsidiary in Canada, and controls the policy, let me repeat, of that great Canadian industry. There is no question about that because whatever happens in the United States happens in Canada. Whatever model is produced in the Ford factory in the United States is produced also in Canada. Every change and every condition is dictated by the one dictator in the company. As I said a short time ago, the Canadian Ford worker has no right to bargain collectively. Ford frowns upon it; there are no human rights in his plants. Now Ford says that the British people in their hour of need shall receive no assistance from the great factory which he controls in the United States.

I am asking the government this afternoon to use the powers that this parliament gave it a week ago, and, so far at least as the interest of Henry Ford goes in the industry in Canada, to do what we are doing with lesser fry, those little people who have among them perhaps some subversive elements, and whose halls have recently been placed under the control of the custodian of enemy property. Here is an opportunity for the government to take this industry out of the control of Henry Ford and, so far as his interest is concerned, place it, if you will, for the time being, until we decide what we are going to do with it, under the control of the custodian of enemy property, just as we have done with the property of far less influential people.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Coldwell) and other hon. members would expect me, as represent[Mr. Coldwell.]

ing the constituency in which the Ford Motor Company of Canada happens to be situated, to make a comment on what the hon. gentleman has said.

What he has said about Mr. Henry Ford personally, and particularly with reference to what Mr. Ford has recently done, will be supported by every member of the house, by the vast majority of the citizens of this country, and by the vast majority I am sure of the citizens of the United States. But a distinction should be made, and that distinction was properly made at the outset by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he indicated that he was speaking of the Ford Motor Company of the United States, of which Mr. Henry Ford is the president.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The founder.

Mr. MARTIN: Following that remark by the leader of the opposition, the member for Rosetown-Biggar said that his remarks were applicable in a general way to the Ford motor companies no matter where situated.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. MARTIN: The Ford Motor Company of Canada is a separate legal entity. I do not rise to comment upon the attitude of the industry generally in reference to its treatment of labour, because that is a matter which can more properly be discussed at another time and in another way. But I did feel that it was my duty to rise and to say at once that the generalization which the hon. member has made is a very unfair one. It would apply to the president of the Canadian Ford company, a gentleman whose patriotism and whose citizenship in this country cannot be disputed. Mr. Wallace Campbell has served his country during the war as chairman of the war supply board in a way which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said deserves the highest gratitude of this country. Moreover, Mrs. Campbell, the wife of the president of the Ford company, has been tremendously active in Red Cross work not only during the war but for many years now, and she is to be found even this day travelling far outside her own community in the service of this great organization.

Moreover, the Ford Motor Company of Canada is engaged in the making of war materials to crush Hitler and his gang; so that when the hon. member characterizes the Ford Motor Company of Canada in the way he has done because of the narrowness of Mr. Henry Ford himself, he does a great injustice. I rise to speak not only on behalf of men like Mr. Wallace Campbell and his obvious patriotism, and a good many of his directors who are citizens of Windsor and citizens of Canada, but on behalf also of the vast majority of the workmen employed by the Ford Motor Company of Canada, who I am sure would walk out of that plant if they felt that the general characterization which the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar has made was justified. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member owes an apology or some explanation at least to his fellow citizens who happen to be of the Ford Motor company, either in the executive or in the working end. Surely they cannot be held responsible for the president of a separate legal entity which operates in another country, whose views I am sure are not at all shared in by them, indeed are just as repugnant to them as they are to the hon, gentleman himself.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, perhaps there is little I need say in this matter after what the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has said. Mr. Henry Ford is a citizen of the United States, and the Ford Motor company is a family corporation owned in the United States by Mr. Ford and his immediate family. We believe that Mr. Henry Ford has taken an attitude that is distinctly unfriendly to the British empire and every part of it, and I think we can say that he has been dealt with by the United States government as perhaps the circumstances warranted. He refused to accept the British part of an order for aeroplane motors, and if newspaper reports are correct, that part of the order for United States account has been cancelled by the United States government.

But the Ford Motor Company of Canada is a corporation situated in the Dominion of Canada. It is not a family corporation. It is a corporation of shareholders, and while Mr. Henry Ford probably has a very considerable interest in it, nevertheless the Canadian company is a public corporation owned in considerable part by Canadian citizens. I believe that the government must judge the Ford Motor Company of Canada by its own conduct and not by the conduct of one who is only a shareholder in this company.

As the hon. member for Essex East has said, the president of the Canadian company has shown perhaps as keen a desire to assist in Canada's war effort as any other citizen of this dominion. His corporation since the outbreak of the war has done and is doing very important work for Canada's war effort, in the way of building motor transport and universal carriers. The company has placed itself entirely in the hands of the government as to the terms of the contract which it has had. A contract, providing for a fixed price as low as we could find any basis for asking, was worked out; an overriding provision was inserted that the books of the company would be audited and if the stipulated price produced a profit more than a very low percentage indeed, that price would be scaled down accordingly. In other words, the work of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, its attitude toward the war, and its ability to assist in Canada's war effort, have been, so far as I have been able to observe, beyond criticism.

I may say this, and I say it not particularly about the Ford Motor Company of Canada but about any plant in Canada: if there is the slightest indication that any corporation capable of making war materials is not doing so energetically and in a way which will afford maximum assistance, the government will not hesitate to take over that plant and see that it is operated for government account. powers which we have under the first munitions and supply bill provide definitely for that contingency. We have not used to this extent the powers conferred under the bill, although on a few occasions we have threatened to do so. I suppose it is obvious to all of us that the mere fact of our having those powers avoids to a large extent the necessity of using them.

I regard it as entirely unfair to judge one company by an action of its affiliate or a company with the same name located in another part of the continent. I could mention a motor car company which is doing good work for the allies in the United States, good work for us in Canada, good work for the British government in Great Britain, and also, I assume, for Hitler in a plant owned by the same company in Germany. I do not know how these situations can be avoided. I think that we, as the government of Canada, must look after residents in our own area and ensure that there is no lack of effort on their part so far as Canada's war contribution is concerned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the minister tell us whether Mr. Ford controls fifty per cent or more of the stock in the Canadian company?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I am glad that the hon. member has acquitted me of any motive of this kind in starting this discussion. When I asked the question which I did ask, it was designed not to draw any special statement from the government at this time, but to call attention to what I considered an improper attitude on the part of a great industrialist in the United States, and to accentuate it—that, and that alone. Public opinion in Canada, and I believe in the United States at this time, will deal with Mr. Henry Ford. I think we can leave the matter there.

I was astonished that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) deduced from my question that I had any reference to the Ford Motor Company of Canada. There was nothing in the question which would indicate that, and he must have misconceived the terms of the statement which I made. However, that is now quite clear. I should not like to have it sent out to the country that in asking the question I did, I had any reference whatever to the Ford Motor Company of Canada. I know Mr. Wallace Campbell, and I can say with very honest conviction that I believe he is one of Canada's best citizens—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and further than that, he will aid and assist to the best of his ability the war effort of this country and he will not charge a dollar.

In passing may I say that I wondered why Mr. Campbell went back to his executive office in Windsor, and why he is not still doing a service for the government of Canada. Perhaps the minister will at some time enlighten us and give us the truth. I am not making any charges or any insinuations, but I did wonder why Canada had lost the services of so splendid an executive. It may be that he thought he could do better work for Canada in Windsor than he could in Ottawa.

Mr. HOWE: That is what he said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be the reason, and I am not going to question it if, as the minister has suggested, that is what he said.

I believe that the hon. member who initiated this discussion on the motion to go into supply (Mr. Coldwell) has based his observations on an entirely erroneous conception of the facts. There is no doubt, as any hon. gentleman may discover for himself if he will investigate the matter, that Mr. Henry Ford and his son Edsel have not control of the Ford Motor Company of Canada; the control is in the shareholders of Canada. While those two gentlemen have an interest in the company, it is not, according to my information, a controlling interest. I believe there is a close business relationship between the Canadian and United States companies. That of course is to be expected. I suggest that on reflection, when the hon member reads his remarks in cold print, he will regret some of the statements he has made in so far as they may be pertinent to the Canadian company. I am not defending in any degree the United States company.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committe of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms service.

14. Branch farms and stations, and illustration stations, $1,309,276.

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): I read in the House of Commons debates of yesterday, page 1148, the following declaration of the Minister of Agriculture:

Take the farm at St. Joachim. The expenditure there last year was $6,000. This year we are cutting that down to $5,125, with the intention of closing the farm. At the Cap Rouge farm we spent last year $27,851, and we are spending this year $10,564, with the intention of closing it.

I want to register a strong protest against the decision reached by the government to that effect. Is it due to war expenses?

Mr. GARDINER: It is on account of the fact that we are trying to cut down expenses in the experimental farms branch in order to release money for the further prosecution of the war.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In the estimates for 1939-40 under item 14 the amount is $1,406,427, and in the estimates before us the amount set out for 1939-40 is $1,494,706. What is the explanation?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount for this year is $1,309,276. The amount the hon. member has given is the estimate for last year.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, the estimate for this year is $1,309,276. In this year's estimates the sum of $1,494,706 is set out as the estimate for last year, but in last year's estimates the amount given is $1,406,427. Why the difference?

Mr. GARDINER: Supplementaries were added later in the session.

Mr. PERLEY: The item for travelling expenses, given on page 67 of the estimates, is reduced almost by half. How is it they can reduce travelling expenses to that extent in one year?

Mr. GARDINER: Much of that expense is taken up by officials of the experimental farms branch attending fairs as judges and going to meetings from place to place. This year we are not sending these judges, owing partly to the fact that some of the fairs will not be operating and partly to our decision not to give the service. They will have to find judges nearer.

Mr. PERLEY: I understand the minister is going to start some experiments in the production of sugar beets. Would that come under the supervision of some of the experimental farms? I refer particularly to the proposal to make such experiments in the Qu'Appelle valley.

Mr. GARDINER: The only experiments we are carrying on with sugar beets are those I mentioned last night. They are intended to determine the production and sugar content of beets in different sections of the country, and they are still going on. The suggestion has been made by the Saskatchewan department of agriculture that they intend to carry on experiments in connection with the growth of sugar beets in the Qu'Appelle valley, but that is not under this department.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the cost of operating the farm at Fredericton?

Mr. GARDINER: A year ago it was $52,325, and this year it is $49,545.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the revenue?

Mr. GARDINER: About $9,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Can the minister make a statement with regard to the forestry engineers and assistants? Some $12,000 odd has been spent in wages.

Mr. GARDINER: These are forestry engineers at Indian Head and Saskatoon respectively.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Should they not be under the forestry department? On page 118 of the estimates there is a list of forestry engineers, and under youth training there is an allotment of $448,000 for that work.

Mr. GARDINER: The forestry work done under the Department of Mines and Resources is an entirely different type of work. It has to do with the protection of forests in areas where forests grow naturally. Forestry under the Department of Agriculture consists in the management of nurseries for the production of trees for distribution among farmers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the decision announced by the minister last evening, that the experimental farm at Rosthern will be closed down in spite of the strong opposition voiced not only by the city of Saskatoon but also by the Prince Albert agricultural society and board of trade, I think the committee should know how that experimental farm will be disposed of. Last evening the minister indicated that some plans were being considered, but he did not advise the committee of the nature of these tentative plans, nor did he say whether it is intended by the department to dispose of this farm to private interests. A strong rumour is going round that such disposal is being contemplated. The amount of investment in the farm is something like $119,000, I am informed, and naturally those who will be directly affected by the closing down of the farm wish to be assured that it will not be disposed of to private interests. They wish to know what disposition will be made of it.

The minister says that the main reason why this and other farms are being closed down is to retain the money for war purposes, and with that there can be no disagreement. But it is difficult to understand why, at a time when economy is being practised for reasons of the war, it should have been necessary this year to increase the scientific staff of the central experimental farm at Ottawa to the extent of thirteen extra scientists with salaries of from $2,500 to $3,400 a year each. One would have thought that at a time like this, when money is needed for war purposes, if the experimental farm at Ottawa was able to carry on in the past year with the staff it had, it would not have been necessary to add so many scientists, particularly in view of the minister's statement that experimental station work will be considerably reduced during the present year and expenditures cut down accordingly. Will the minister say why these thirteen extra scientists are being appointed at this time, when reductions should be made, especially when no reason has been given for this increase?

Mr. GARDINER: Last evening I gave the reason for the increases. They are found in the figure that was dealt with last evening; it showed a difference of some $39,000. That amount is simply taken out of one list and put in another. It is found in one set of figures under "wages"; it is found in another under "salaries": The difference between the two is the next figure; I do not have it before me at the moment. But the point raised with regard to the central experimental farm involves part of that reclassification. There are not eleven more persons employed—I think the figure is eleven, an increase from 91 to 102.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister refers to agricultural scientists?

Mr. GARDINER: I am speaking here of the whole classification at the central experimental farm. The numbers are not increased, but there is a reclassification right through the service resulting in that number more, who were employed previously on wages, being placed in the civil service.

The other point relates to the experimental farm at Rosthern. The present intention is to close that farm, as I indicated last night.

There is a sufficient amount in the estimates to carry it through the present season. Before this decision was finally reached, crops had been seeded and activities for this summer started. These activities will be carried on to the end of the season, and the farm will then be closed out as far as its operation as an experimental farm is concerned. I am not in a position at the moment to state what will be done with the farm. The only thing to do is to move the stock from there to other farms as far as it is required at other farms, and to sell at auction what is not required. The natural thing to do with the land would be to sell it by auction. To suggest that there is a value of $119,000 involved merely means that we have built roads here and there throughout the farm in order to enable the public to get over the farm and see the work being carried on. Buildings have been built for experimental purposes, and expenditures have been made in planting the farm in a manner to make it presentable to the visiting public. Many of those expenditures have not produced anything valuable to persons who merely want to buy a section of land to operate as a farm, and therefore we could not expect to obtain from any purchaser anything like the amount of money so expended. But that is not what I had in mind last night when I mentioned that some inquiries have been made. The inquiries made were not by any private person or by any organization of private individuals. As a matter of fact, it was an inquiry from the government of Saskatchewan, and I do not wish at present to comment further on it because it is only in the nature of an inquiry.

Mr. BROOKS: In connection with the encouragement of the production of sugar from sugar beets, is the minister taking into consideration what effect it might have on the trade of the maritime provinces? I refer for instance to the sale of potatoes and fish in Cuba and the West Indies. As the minister knows, in days gone by Cuba was one of our best markets for the sale of potatoes from the maritimes, and the West Indies for the sale of fish. Since we have not been taking so much sugar from Cuba and the West Indies, our trade in potatoes and fish has fallen off very considerably. It seems to me that encouraging the production of sugar from the sugar beet in Canada would have a further detrimental effect upon trade which we might have with that section of the hemisphere. I understand that the West Indies trade treaty comes up for revision some time soon, and it seems to me that this matter should have careful consideration, keeping in mind conditions prevailing in the maritime provinces.

Mr. BLACKMORE: So long as the investigation is conducted with sufficient care, we shall be completely satisfied. The hon member will discover that the development of the beet sugar industry in Canada has absolutely no serious effect on his fish or potato trade.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, it has not developed yet; it is the future to which I refer.

Mr. LEADER: I rise to support the minister in his attempt to cut down the cost of experimental farms in Canada. Last night he declared that he takes full responsibility for this action. I want him to know that I am giving him my whole-hearted support. Since I have been a member of this house I have taken the stand that if money means anything, and we are to retrench, we could very well curtail the expenditures being made on the experimental farms. Therefore in speaking this afternoon I am just being consistent with the attitude I adopted in former years. Have hon, members taken the trouble to look at the expenditures made yearly on our experimental farms? No doubt many have. It is a fair statement that there is an annual deficit in the neighbourhood of $2,000,000 on our experimental farm operations. For last year the auditor general's report shows that the total expenditure was $2,117,002, and the revenue was only $220,303, leaving a deficit of approximately $2,000,000.

Cutting down expenditures by governments is not popular. We heard the hon, member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), objecting to any curtailment of expenditure in their constituencies on experimental farms. This indicates what I mean when I say it is hard to practise retrenchment. Some hon. member may ask, "Are there any experimental farms in your constituency?" I shall have to say no, but there are many splendid farms. But it is not because there are no experimental farms in my constituency that I support the minister at this time. I believe that I am speaking not only for myself but for my constituents in what I say. They know, as I know, as we all know, that the experimental farms have done much useful work in the In pioneer days these experimental farms did useful work in the more or less isolated districts. But I claim that they are not so necessary now, especially when we have so many, some twenty-six or twentyseven, I believe, throughout the dominion, five or six of them in Saskatchewan. As the minister stated last night, much of the work of these experimental farms overlaps. Therefore I think it is an absolutely sound policy to close up some of them. I believe that one farm in each province, or perhaps two in the larger provinces, would be sufficient, so I think the minister has a long way to go to tackle the problem as I would tackle it if I had the opportunity.

Last night mention was made of the work done by Seager Wheeler of Saskatchewan. We all know that this work has been recognized as being of supreme importance, not only in Canada but in the United States as well. I believe the minister also stated last night that the government at one time had entered into an agreement with Seager Wheeler under which they paid him $1,500 per annum to carry on this work. I think it was money well spent. We have a good many Seager Wheelers in Canada, and I remember on a former occasion pointing out that the government might take a little of this money and encourage men of this type to undertake work of this kind. We could cut down our expenditure by hundreds of thousands of dollars if we would adopt this method, and I believe it would have a better effect. I do not know of anything that gives a real farmer more inspiration than to see the work done by another good farmer in his own neighbourhood. This should be encouraged, and it would not cost anything like the amount we are now spending on experimental farms.

It has been said that these farms are of assistance to the live stock industry of this country. I am not going to say they have not had a good effect, but I do not believe the experimental farms have had a wide influence in the development of better live stock in Canada. I do not say they have not had some influence, but I do not think it has amounted to a great deal. There are other agencies of far greater importance that would have a great deal more influence in developing our live stock than the experimental farms, and they would not cost one dollar where we spend perhaps a hundred dollars now.

I am not going to say anything more, but I want to take this opportunity to say that I am in whole-hearted support of the minister's policy of retrenchment in regard to this project.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): A moment ago the minister said the farm at Rosthern would be operated this year. Will the other farms that it is intended to close be operated also?

Mr. GARDINER: All the farms will be operated this year on a basis similar to that on which the Rosthern farm will be operated. That is, a much smaller amount will be spent, with the idea that at the end of the season we will close out the work. It will not be experimental work that will be carried on; it will be simply the work of taking care of the crops and the live stock already there, and disposing of those crops and live stock at the end of the season.

Before taking my seat I should like to answer a question asked with regard to Nappan. Last year the expenditure at Nappan was $49,116, and for this year it will be $46,685.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): And what is the revenue?

Mr. GARDINER: The revenue will be in the neighbourhood of $8,000.

Mr. ROWE: Is the government still operating a farm at Kapuskasing?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the number of branch experimental farms in each province.

Mr. GARDINER: There are farms at Charlottetown and Summerside, Prince Edward Island; at Nappan and Kentville, Nova Scotia; at Fredericton, New Brunswick. There will be four in Quebec after we have closed up the three we propose to close this year. There are two in Ontario, in addition to the central experimental farm which is operated for the benefit of all Canada. In Manitoba there are two; in Saskatchewan there will be four; in Alberta there will be three and in British Columbia, four.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will there be four in Saskatchewan after the one is closed?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. There are now five in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: There are now five, and there will be four after the one is closed.

Mr. ROWE: I do not want to delay the item, but I should like to know what is spent at the Kapuskasing farm?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year we spent $47,225, and for this year the amount estimated is $46,231.

Mr. ROWE: About the same?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: I believe the minister said that one of the experimental farms in Alberta was to be closed. I did not catch the name of that farm.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the illustration station operated at Tranquille along with the Manyberries farm. That illustration station has to do with grasses.

Mr. MARSHALL: It does not affect the Manyberries station?

Mr. GARDINER: No, except that part of the work was carried on at the other station.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much is usually spent at that farm?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year we spent $33,000. We estimate that this year we will spend $24,783. The difference between those two amounts is largely represented by the closing of that illustration station.

Mr. PERLEY: On June 6 the minister answered a question asked by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) with respect to the dismissal of one James Duffin, formerly employed as head herdsman at Melfort experimental farm. Following the appearance of that answer in Hansard, I received a letter from that vicinity stating that it was considered that this man had been unfairly dealt with because, among other things, he had been dismissed with only a few days' notice. It is felt that the answer in Hansard, stating that his services were unsatisfactory, was not a fair one, and more information is desired as to why he was dismissed and also why others were dismissed shortly after, by his successor. I should like to ask the minister who succeeded James Duffin.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand there has been no replacement. I have no personal knowledge of the matter at all; I only know what was stated in the answer at the time it was presented to the house. I understand, however, that this man's services were not satisfactory and that he was offered employment as a labourer. There has been no one appointed to replace him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not want to labour the point, but would the minister give the committee an assurance that if the experimental farm at Rosthern is sold it will be not by private sale but by public auction or tender?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I should give that assurance. If the government undertake to sell the farm I believe they will try to do so to the best advantage. It is just possible that some individual may be prepared to make a private offer which would be better than we could get otherwise. I do not know. That is a matter we would have to consider at the time. I may say we have not any intention at this time of selling it to any particular person or group of individuals. However, I should not like to bind the department to any particular method of sales.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the minister place on record the reduction in the estimate respecting the Swift Current experimental farm?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no decrease in respect of that farm. It was $45,254 last year, and in the present year we estimate $47,952, an increase of $2,698.

Mr. EVANS: Would the minister indicate how many demonstration and illustration stations it is contemplated will be closed?

Mr. GARDINER: To secure that information, I would have to go through a list of 117 items. There are nineteen closing, and they will be spread right across Canada.

Mr. EVANS: Could the minister give the ones for Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: We closed out five in Saskatchewan a year ago, and we are closing out one this year.

Item agreed to.

Production service.

15. Production service administration, $35,785.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does this item refer to the advertising of farm products?

Mr. GARDINER: No; that comes under marketing.

Mr. SENN: Before the item passes, I should like to make a passing reference to a gentleman who was the director of this service from the time it was instituted two or three years ago. Mr. Rothwell, who passed away last fall, was a gentleman highly regarded. He was a capable, efficient and painstaking civil servant. I am sure the country generally and the department in particular have suffered because of his death. When does the minister intend to fill the vacancy? I understand that at the present time a gentleman is occupying the position in an unofficial capacity. However, it has always occurred to me that anyone who is to do his best work, and particularly a civil servant, should have all possible authority connected with his position, and should not be forced to be only an acting official.

Mr. GARDINER: May I add my own words of commendation to those uttered by the hon. member for Haldimand regarding the work performed during many years by Mr. Rothwell? I am not in a position at the moment to say when an appointment will be made to fill the position. As a matter of fact, the work is being efficiently performed by the gentleman who before Mr. Rothwell's death acted as his assistant, a gentleman, who, by the way, is seated at the table in front of me at this moment. The appointment will, however, be given consideration at an early date.

Mr. SENN: Probably this would be the appropriate occasion to bring to the attention of the minister something akin to the matter I mentioned the other day. I refer to information being given out. A short time ago I placed this question on the order paper:

1. Has imported American bacon been used for military camps in Canada during the past three months?

2. If so, in what amount?

3. In what proportion to the total amount of bacon used at such military camps?

The answer to the first question was, yes. The answer to the second was more or less by way of an explanation or, perhaps, an apology. And then this followed:

Until late in May there was not sufficient Canadian pork to supply the export demand of pork and bacon to Great Britain. Therefore large quantities of United States bacon were allowed to enter the country to supplement our domestic requirements, and to relieve the situation in Great Britain.

Then it goes on to say it was felt that it would be unwise under these circumstances to discriminate against the United States product.

I have in my hand a copy of the Bacon Board Bulletin, No. 4, from which I should like to read one or two extracts. Table 3 on page 3 of the report shows the storage of export bacon in Canada at different periods, and it is indicated that on April 5 the total was something more than 32,000,000 pounds. Even if we shipped the total amount of bacon possible to Great Britain, and manufactured none whatever, we would still have had a considerable amount in storage. Therefore I cannot understand why the answer was given in the words I have indicated. I cannot think that United States bacon is being used in our military camps because we had not sufficient bacon in Canada to ship across the seas.

There is a further statement in this same bulletin showing that in the month of April there was a 60 per cent increase in the marketing of hogs in Canada, and I am told that at the present time and for some time past at least 10,000 hogs are being and have been marketed each week in excess of our domestic and foreign requirements. What is the explanation for the evident discrepancy in the two sets of information accorded me?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not just certain which department would supply the answer to which the hon, member referred.

Mr. SENN: It came from the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GARDINER: I presume that is the department from which it would come, because the purchases of supplies for the army are made through it. Usually those purchases are made on bids called for by the Department of National Defence.

In the light of the information available at the time I believe the answer is a correct one. I am not sure whether sales were still being made in April or May to supply the army, but if they were, they were being made on bids asked for by those responsible for army supplies.

The main reason for the answer in the form appearing in the return would be this: In December of last year we made an agreement with the British government under which we were to export to the British market something more than 5,600,000 pounds of bacon a week. At the time the agreement was signed we were exporting more than that amount a week to Great Britain. Great Britain continued to take more than the 5,600,000 pounds. For one or two weeks they took as much as 10,000,000 pounds, and I believe in one week the amount reached about 11,000,000 pounds. It was not known whether or not Great Britain would continue to take that quantity over a longer period of time. We were under the obligation, through the agreement, to deliver to Great Britain 5,600,000 pounds a week right through the summer. During the latter part of December, and in January, February and March we stored bacon in Canada to the extent of about 33,000,000 pounds, with the intention of having that bacon available to supply the British market in the months of June, July and August. The deliveries of hogs by farmers this spring have been much higher than was anticipated. Those deliveries have made it possible up to date to supply the 5,600,000 pounds per week without taking out of storage all the sides which were put in during the winter months. It is known now that we could have stored considerably less during that time, and had we done so it is just possible that more Canadian and less American pork and bacon might have been supplied to the army than was supplied to it during that time.

Mr. SENN: I do not deny the statements made by the minister, but they will hardly satisfy the hog producers that it was necessary to import American bacon, particularly to feed our soldiers.

Mr. GARDINER: Looking back on the picture I would say that that is absolutely correct. It is not a satisfactory explanation looking back, but from the other end it looked to be satisfactory.

Mr. SENN: I should like to continue with that, if I am not out of order, Mr. Chairman. I mentioned the amount in storage on April 5. Here is the next paragraph in the bacon board's report:

The board fully realize that these stocks were assuming dangerous proportions.

This was at the very time that the bacon was being supplied to the Canadian army.

However, with rumours of a March offensive in Europe and a probable change in United Kingdom requirements, a courageous view was justified and the board continued to support the price level of hogs by continuing storage.

That was done, I understand, by deducting 72 cents from every long hundred pounds of bacon sent to Great Britain, and paying the storage which has since been paid by the packers themselves.

Finally March passed with no change in the European situation. New advices from the British ministry and from Canadian representatives overseas were to the effect that we could not expect to ship any quantity over the minimum of 50,000 long hundredweight per week during the life of the contract. Our total storage position was then 27,273,502 pounds.

The next thing that happened, according to this, was that the board immediately stopped paying storage charges on bacon that was being stored in Canada, with the result that prices dropped very materially for Canadian hogs sent out by the farmers and marketed either alive or dressed. It seems to me that a serious mistake was made. The board should have continued paying storage charges and supported prices to the Canadian farmer, or we should have been using some of that Canadian pork to feed our soldiers. The final sentence in the board's statement is this:

On April 10-

That was about a month before the board said "Until late in May there was not sufficient Canadian pork":

On April 10, the board instructed packers to resume storage to their account.

So that storage has been going on again since that time. The board continues:

Hog prices closed on April 11 in close conformity with previous export levels.

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. member to be good enough to postpone this discussion until we come to the marketing item, when Mr. Shaw will be here. All this information comes more properly under marketing than under production. There are explanations that can be given in reply to most of what is now being said, and I would not mind giving the explanations now but for the fact that probably some other members will be raising the same questions on the marketing item and the discussion will then be had all over again.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is this the branch of the department which supervises the production of agricultural commodities required particularly for war purposes? Is it the branch which [Mr. Senn.]

gives directions that there should be increased production in bacon, oats, and other commodities?

Mr. GARDINER: Any attempts that are made to increase agricultural production will come under the direction of the war-time agricultural supply board, made up of the assistant deputy and the directors of the different branches. The director of production is a member of the board, and we can deal more properly with that question when Mr. Shaw, who is chairman of the board, is here. I think it would be better if we discussed under marketing all matters having to do with bacon, and the handling of apples, cheese and other products.

Mr. TUSTIN: An agreement was entered into with the United Kingdom for the production of cheese, and according to the press the United Kingdom has indicated that it is open for a larger quantity than contracted for. If that is so, may I ask what is being done to stimulate the increased production of cheese in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: That is another question which I think could more properly be discussed under the other item, because it comes under the supply board of which Mr. Shaw is chairman. At the moment I would say that Great Britain has made inquiries within the last ten days whether we can supply her with more cheese than was called for by the agreement, and we have notified her that we are in a position to do so. More cheese is being supplied this month than the agreement calls for. The only direct assistance which has been given to encourage the greater production of cheese was that given last year under the Cheese and Cheese Factories Act, which provided for the payment of a bonus of one cent on the higher grades of cheese.

Mr. TUSTIN: I shall be very glad to postpone further remarks until we reach the marketing item.

Mr. SENN: Marketing and production are very closely related; successful marketing, generally speaking, has an immediate effect in increasing production. If we are to postpone our discussion until we reach the marketing item I think we should have some assurance from the minister that he will not at that time restrict the discussion of production generally.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that might very well be allowed, Mr. Chairman. We are concerned not merely with production in peace-time but also with efforts to step up production because of the war, in order to supply the British market and others who are associated with us in the war. That will be done under the direction of the supply board, of which Mr. Shaw is chairman. But the work will actually be done by these staffs, and if you will permit it, Mr. Chairman, I should like the committee to be free to discuss along with the question of marketing the whole question of the necessity for greater production because of the war, because marketing has a special meaning now with reference to making arrangements with the British government for supplying our products.

Mr. SENN: That is what I had in mind. The committee should be enlightened on a number of questions having to do with the organization of the department for war production, the policies contemplated or in effect, the information that is being given to the public to stimulate greater production in certain lines. With the minister's assurance that we can discuss all these matters under marketing, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. ROWE: I agree with the minister's suggestion that much of this discussion on production might be postponed until we reach the marketing item. Nothing is more calculated to discourage necessary production in this country, especially of bacon, than what has happened in the way of importation of United States bacon. However, I will leave that subject until we reach the item of marketing service.

This production service is closely allied with the subject of experimental farms and the educational advantages to be derived from departmental services in general. I agree that the government is justified in reducing expenditures wherever it can, and particularly those relating to fairs and exhibitions. But there is now a greater necessity than ever for the intelligent application of science in the production of agricultural commodities. Hardly anything is more vital to our war effort. We face a shortage of labour, and probably, increased costs of gasoline and all that it takes to produce foodstuffs for the war. While I agree with the reduction of expenditures on many items, I would recommend that this branch of the department be careful about reducing expenditures having to do with scientific methods of production.

The department might be wise to give consideration to a broadcasting service to the farmers of this country for fifteen minutes or half an hour daily. The cost should not be excessive. From time to time we receive pamphlets and blue-books containing excellent articles written by the efficient technical officers of the department. But, I regret to say, too often these publications are not read, and in my opinion such valuable information as they contain could be more effectively distributed through daily or twice-weekly talks, which would have a far-reaching effect in assisting farmers to achieve a high quality of product and economies in production. The talks might deal with such matters as the handling of live stock at certain seasons of the year, namely the late fall, early winter, early spring, late spring, and early summer; the handling of dairy cattle in the fly season, of sheep and lambs in the early spring, and of lambs in the early fall or at the weaning period. We have from time to time an accession of new farmers and their families who have had no agricultural background and who would benefit considerably by a service of this kind.

In the early part of the season many farmers are endeavouring to produce fruit, vegetables, butter, poultry and eggs. A programme of seasonal education by radio broadcasting could be inaugurated with great advantage to the industry generally and at a reasonable cost, which could be financed through some of the reductions which are being made, I may say wisely, in other directions. No doubt there are expenditures which are quite justified in normal times and might be renewed after the war, but which even the minister would not attempt to justify in these difficult days. A service having to do with the science of more economical production of commodities so essential to our war effort should not be reduced; on the contrary it should be supplemented by a broadcasting system of the type I have mentioned. Almost every farmer has a radio, and at a fixed time of day, say the noon hour or at any other period which seems appropriate, daily talks by the heads of the various branches of this department would have far-reaching advantages in encouraging more intelligent methods of production.

Mr. GARDINER: As to the suggestion which has just been made, we have had a radio service since the early part of 1939. This radio effort is centred principally on a half-hour farm broadcast given daily. It was started as a result of arrangements between the department and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The first broadcasts were in Ontario; the service has since been extended to the maritime provinces, the prairie provinces, and throughout Ontario and Quebecthree different sections. It has proved of great value in supplementing press publicity. The latest marketing quotations for different farm products are given, together with talks prepared by the press and publicity section from information supplied by the different branches of the department. Particular stress is laid on the seasonal aspects and timeliness of the information given. I have not had the privilege of reading or hearing all of this information—I know about some of it—but I believe it is along the line which the hon. member has mentioned, namely that when certain things are happening on the farm in a particular season, that is what is talked about on the radio, with the idea of giving assistance to persons who are farming in the different sections.

Mr. ROWE: I have listened to a number of these broadcasts, as no doubt the minister has also; but they have to do chiefly with marketing and market reports. I believe an extension of this service would be well justified by what has been done in this regard, and when other reductions of expenditure are made, it could be carried on economically—more so than by the provision of much of the literature which is being sent out. I suggest that it be encouraged.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Inasmuch as we are dealing with the increase of production, which I consider a vital matter at the present time, I would urge upon the minister the advisability of looking to the increase of our supply of sugar. No one would have imagined a year ago that we would be in anything like the desperate condition in which we feel ourselves to be to-day; most people, looking back, would say, "Who would have thought it?" It is just as possible that we shall be in an unpredictably serious position a year from now. One of the respects in which I think we ought to be looking into the future is the matter of preparing for our sugar supply.

Canada to-day is, relatively speaking, in a precarious position as regards sugar. If I understand the situation aright, we are dependent in large measure for our sugar upon supplies which come across the water. If for any reason we should lose control of the seas for a time we should be in a grave position in the matter of sugar. That danger is altogether avoidable owing to the fact that we in Canada are capable of developing to the point where we can provide our own sugar needs. Consequently, if we should find ourselves suffering a sugar shortage, there would be no small amount of condemnation coming to those individuals who had neglected to look into the future and guard against such mishap. In 1938 Canada consumed 1,050,135,014 pounds of sugar. Of that 907,121,167 pounds were cane and only 143,013,847 were beet. Every single pound of that sugar consumed could have been beet sugar. Consider the advantage that would have meant to the whole of our Canadian economy.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

May I discuss something that has troubled nearly all hon, members. The exchange value of our money depends upon our balance of trade; the more goods we buy from outside the more danger there is of our dollar being at adverse exchange. Since that is so, obviously if we consume cane sugar obtained from outside instead of beet sugar produced within, we are endangering our exchange position, and that at a time when there are many things which perforce we must buy from outside, mainly munitions of one kind or another. And our needs are likely to increase rather than to decrease in that respect as the days go by.

Of course, we could not modify our ways soon enough to bring about the desirable change in a short time, but when we remember that we are probably in for a long war, we can see it certainly would be the part of wisdom to prepare for such a protracted struggle. One of the matters we need to look to is sugar.

But there is something else we hear a great deal about in this house. Inflation has been written on every square inch of the walls of this building as a result of the industrious efforts of past ministers of finance, and our newspapers have simply blazoned it from one end of the country to the other. I wonder how many of those who talk about inflation realize that we can have inflation through scarcity of goods.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his line of thought and discussion is not strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Do I understand that we are discussing the question of an increase in production in Canada?

The CHAIRMAN: But inflation is so remote from production, except along the theories of the hon. gentleman, that I fear I am obliged to ask him to keep a little closer to the item before us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I shall find that easy, because I have just finished talking about inflation. I mentioned inflation merely to point out that it can be caused through a shortage of production. If anything happened to Canada's sugar supply there would be a rise in the price of sugar in Canada and that would start an inflationary movement. The danger is particularly grave inasmuch as we are experiencing a falling off in our foreign markets. Whole countries that have been good customers of ours are being destroyed, and there must be alarm in the hearts of all those who have to do with our trade. Up to the present time we have been depending upon selling certain commodities and buying sugar with the exchange obtained. Obviously, if we lose the ability to sell those commodities, then our ability to purchase sugar will be greatly impaired.

There is another difficulty. There is the danger that we might become a burden to Great Britain in the matter of sugar. If there is one thing that Canada should above all else guard against, it is that she should not become a burden on Great Britain. Great Britain has enough troubles of her own to take care of now. In fact, I do not see why we should not equip ourselves to help the mother country so far as sugar is concerned.

All we need to do to make ourselves selfsufficient in regard to sugar is to establish seventeen more sugar factories of 1,200 tons slicing capacity per day. Alberta alone could support seven such factories in addition to the two which are now operated in the province. It takes about 20,000 acres of irrigated land to support a sugar factory of 1,200 tons slicing capacity. Alberta has 200,000 acres under irrigation. Moreover, there is land which could be made available by the application of water, which would support three more factories. This means that Alberta, roughly, could produce one-half of the sugar which the Canadian people as a whole consume. While we may not consider that important to-day, if we should fall into difficulties in the next nine months I think we would wish that those factories were operating in Alberta.

Ontario is able to produce a great deal of sugar. The county of Lambton alone can support four factories of 1,200 tons slicing capacity, and Essex, Middlesex, Huron, Kent and other counties are all excellent for sugar production. In addition to that, there are great possibilities in Manitoba, which are now beginning to be drawn upon. There are also possibilities in Quebec and in the Okanagan valley in British Columbia, as I understand.

In the light of these facts, surely there is not a member of this house who would not be ashamed of himself, and rightly so, if he discovered that his country had got into the position where it was suffering from a sugar famine and realized that by a slight change in policy all this might have been avoided.

It is not only the matter of sugar supply that is important in this connection. I have already pointed out on several occasions that there is hardly any kind of industry which can be developed that would supply more employment than the beet sugar industry. It may not be generally known that one sugar factory of 1,200 tons slicing capacity will provide work for 10,000 people. Why it is that the government of Canada, realizing the need for employment and the possibilities with regard to employment to be found in the beet sugar industry, have not availed themselves of this outlet, I cannot begin to conceive. It looks like nonsense to me. When we remember that to produce one hundred pounds of beet sugar requires twenty times as much Canadian labour as to produce one hundred pounds of cane sugar, the inadvisability of using cane sugar in preference to beet sugar is patent to all.

How far-reaching this possibility of increased employment is, may be judged by reference to the following figures, which I have from a source which I consider quite authentic. In 1933, production of 45 million pounds of sugar from beets, being about 4.2 per cent of Canadian consumption, required supplies to the following values:

Coal	$ 55,000
Sugar bags	100,000
Lime rock	20,000
Coke	9,000
Soda ash, boxes and other supplies	105 000
Freight	330.000
TICIZILU	000,000

While the factory payroll would be $175,000 and the beet growers themselves would receive $940,000. When we bear in mind that every single item of that is completely produced and spent in Canada, the absurdity of neglecting such a source of employment is obvious.

In addition to these matters, the possibility of developing live stock production on the farms is great. In my own constituency in the year 1937-38 there were 40,000 sheep and 10,000 head of cattle fed on the pulp, beet tops and betalasses, and the hay resulting from the rotation of crops practised in the beet sugar industry. How great is the value of having the beet tops may be judged from this simple fact, that at topping time the beet tops from a yield of twelve tons to the acre are estimated to be equal in value to two tons of alfalfa hay or 1.3 tons of barley. This is the finding from experiments conducted at the agricultural college at Bozeman, Montana.

This is not a matter to be lightly regarded. It all helps to show how valuable to the Canadian economy is the beet sugar industry, quite apart from the question of the supply of sugar. The railroads derive a great benefit from the beet sugar industry. They gain at least twice as much revenue from beet sugar as from cane sugar. The railroads are called upon to haul the beets to the factory, the coal to the factory, the limestone, coke and other supplies to the factory, the beet pulp out of the factory to the feeders, the beet molasses out of the factory and the cattle to market.

We in this country have been considerably worried about our railroads. If they are to have a chance to make adequate earnings, we must build up such conditions as will enable them to do so. Surely a healthy beet sugar industry is one that will aid the railroads by helping them to help themselves.

Some people ask whether the beet sugar industry is economically sound. They ask, is it a going concern or does it have to be subsidized? Let me give a few items to indicate to what extent the beet sugar industry is a sound and going concern. Mr. T. George Wood, president of the Canadian Sugar Factories Limited, which owns the two factories in my riding, reported in March, 1938, that in 1937 there were 19,829 acres in use raising sugar beets; that on that area an average of 11.88 tons per acre of beets was raised, that there were 75,603,700 pounds of sugar produced, or 3,813 pounds per acre. There is not in Canada any place where an acre of land can raise as much human food as in the beet sugar area of my constituency. and I fancy in any other constituency where the beet sugar industry flourishes. Altogether there was $3,040,000 worth of sugar produced. I have not any comparative figures, but I would say that this would probably be one of the major items of income in my constituency. The gross return to the farmers was $155 per acre. Of that, $77.50 went to the manufacturer and $77.50 to the farmer, out of which he had to pay $25 for hand labour and $35 for other expenses, leaving him net $17.50 per acre, which I believe will be recognized as a pretty good return. And if the farmer were in a position to use his own children to do the work, it is estimated that he would gain about $42.50 per acre. It is interesting to find that under the existing set-up the government of Canada took for every acre of beets in my riding $38.13. If anyone can tell me any place in Canada where the government income from an acre of ground is more than that, I shall be interested. They get that from the levy of one cent a pound excise tax which to the raisers of beets is an abomination.

While on this question of whether the beet sugar industry in Canada is economically sound, may I put a few more figures before the committee? The yield per acre in Alberta was as follows:

Y	ear								Alberta	United States
19	938								12.89	11.8
19	937								11.88	11.77
19	936								11.29	11.6

This indicates that Alberta can produce more tons per acre than the United States.
[Mr. Blackmore.]

Yet the United States looks upon the beet sugar industry as a going concern, economically sound. They were slightly ahead of us in 1936. In 1929 Great Britain had a yield of 8.7 tons per acre and in 1930 a yield of 8.8 tons. For some reason or another Great Britain is able to subsidize the beet sugar industry while Canada never thinks of doing so. Canada looks upon it as an object of prey, which is an astonishing situation.

Now what about the sugar content of Alberta's beets? In 1929 it was 18·19, which is very good; in 1930 it was 15·95; in 1931 it was 18·34 and in 1932 it was 17. I have only two figures for Great Britain; one of these is 17·67 and the other 17·74. Alberta beets have had a sugar content superior to that of beets grown anywhere on the north American continent with the exception of California.

When we have such conditions given us by providence, surely we are neglecting our duty if we do not take advantage of those conditions for our own benefit. Some people may ask whether the beet sugar is as good as cane sugar. Just a moment ago I was told that in some parts of Ontario cane sugar is being sold at 15 cents a hundred pounds more than beet sugar. This indicates that there is a sales resistance against beet sugar which is founded upon lack of information. Some may be inclined to doubt what I have said. I do not ask them to accept my words, but I will read some statements they will have a hard time doubting. I have here a statement by Doctor Ralph C. Huston, dean of applied science, Michigan state college, to this effect:

Beet sugar and cane sugar are identical chemically, and when thoroughly purified, they may be used interchangeably.

Then Faith R. Lanman, director of the school of home economics, Ohio state university says:

We believe that pure beet sugar gives the same results as pure cane sugar when used in the making of preserves, jellies and jams.

Ordinarily the propaganda against beet sugar takes some such form as this: Well, your jelly will not jell so readily, and your preserves will not keep so well, or some other such fallacy. Circular No. 33 of the university of California college of agriculture states:

The utter folly of this idea that beet sugar cannot be used for canning purposes is emphasized by the fact that practically all the sugar used in Germany and France for the purpose of canning and preserving is from the beet, and for many years, American refined beet sugar was used without complaint in this country, because the mass of the people were not aware that it was derived from the beet.

As a final bit of evidence let me cite this: Edmonton, Alberta.

We to-day analysed two samples of Alberta sugar and found the sugar content of both to be 99.9 per cent. Please advise me if you wish any special analysis or just the sugar content.

James A. Kelso,

Provincial Analyst.

Those four authorities ought to dispose quite effectively of the rumour, apparently inspired, that in some way beet sugar is inferior to cane sugar. I think it must be apparent that anyone endeavouring to justify the fact that for these many years Canada has neglected the development of her beet sugar industry certainly is taking upon himself an arduous task.

Some will ask what we are going to do about the matter. I believe the minister said something about this last night. He indicated that it might not be possible to sell the beet sugar from the west at any great distance; that is, we would be able to manufacture only the sugar that could be sold in the west. Well. Mr. Chairman, that may be all right under our orthodox ways of doing things, but I judge that if we had a sugar shortage we would very soon find an effective way of getting that sugar from Alberta as far as Prince Edward Island. The big thing would be to have the sugar there. Even under our present ways of doing things we could easily get it there. What would be wrong with refunding 75 cents out of each dollar that we levy upon the beet sugar industry, thereby giving beet sugar a chance to compete successfully with cane sugar? Is there any reason why we should not pay part of the freight rates on beet sugar?

Surely if we want to encourage that industry we can do something for it. When we bear in mind that there are only three countries on the face of the earth that do not do something to definitely help their beet sugar industry, and that those three are such small countries as Java, Peru and Santo Domingo, I think Canada and Canadian statesmen of the past stand condemned. I hesitate to mention Germany: in fact I would not dare do so if I were not referring to a time before Hitler came to power, but between 1870 and 1903 Germany paid total subsidies of $340,000,000 in order to develop her beet sugar industry. If she had not done that she would be utterly helpless before her foe at the present time. Not only did she render herself largely selfsufficient in the matter of sugar; at the same time she increased her yield of cereals from 14 bushels to 34.9 bushels to the acre. In 1937 Great Britain subsidized her beet sugar industry to the extent of £1,217,000, but all during this period Canada has been preying upon her beet sugar industry. The United States guarantees its beet sugar industry 55.59 per cent of the home market. Surely we could do that if we wished to encourage our own industry.

I do not wish to spend more time on this, Mr. Chairman, but there are one or two other things that probably should be said. We could establish quotas against sugar coming in from other countries, so that we would be able to use our productive capacity as rapidly as we could develop it. Then there would be no possibility of the price of our sugar being increased. We would simply reserve the market for our own production, which is common sense. We could modify the freight rate on stock shipped to feed lots, and on pulp, betalasses and so on shipped out. We could modify the freight on beets shipped in as well as on sugar shipped out, and in addition we could investigate the operations of the refineries, both cane and beet sugar, to see if the profits are too great or if there are any unfair restrictions placed upon beet sugar to the advantage of cane sugar. All of this can be done without raising the price at all. But some will say: You would raise the price for Canadians. That is not necessary, at all. The price of sugar in Canada is low, when compared with prices in other countries. I have before me figures based on the 1936 level which indicate that per one hundred pounds of sugar the prices were as follows:

U.S.S.R	)
Italy 14.79
Germany 13.98
Netherlands 11.75
Czechoslovakia 9.80
Turkey 9.1	-
Portugal 8.50
Australia 8.19
Union of South Africa 7.10
New Zealand 7.10
France 7.0
Irish Free State 7.0
United States of America 4.93	77
Canada 4.8	-
Argentina 4.8	1

This set of figures indicates that only one country on the face of the earth gets its sugar more cheaply than does Canada, and the beet sugar was competing successfully in that market. To say, then, that beet sugar cannot be produced economically is to make a statement too rash altogether for anyone to accept. I urge the minister, if he does not mind my doing so, to look into this matter of beet sugar and to develop the beet sugar industry as rapidly as possible.

Last year we were confronted with the statement that Canada foolhardily—and I put in the word "foolhardily" because I mean it, and I should like to write it in red—undertook in 1937 not to increase her sugar production, and that that undertaking was given by international agreement. An undertaking of that kind, one so manifestly unjustifiable, certainly should not bind Canada in these times. Therefore, notwithstanding that commitment of Canada, I urge the minister to go forward and to develop the beet sugar industry in Canada while yet there is time.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Chairman, I have been deeply interested in the observations of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). In view of the minister's statement to the effect that Canada produces about fifteen per cent of her sugar consumption, I believe the suggestions of the hon. member for Lethbridge might well be considered. One of my constituents living near Hudson Bay Junction lived for a number of years in a section of France where large quantities of sugar beets are grown, and while in western Canada he has carried on a series of experiments with seed imported from various countries of Europe. It is his considered opinion that the soil and climatic conditions in northern Saskatchewan would be conducive to the successful production of sugar beets. In view of the changes now being made in our national economy it seems to me the minister might find it worth his while to consider the increased production of this crop.

Could the minister give the committee any information respecting the cost of installing the necessary equipment for the refining of sugar beets? It was said last night that the sugar beet industry is carried on successfully in areas where favourable freight rates could be obtained.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to give exact figures, but from the point of view of capital expenditure the cost is enormous.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A million dollars.

Mr. GARDINER: The Manitoba government voted $600,000 to encourage the production of sugar but that was by way of a guarantee and was not the total cost. I should imagine an expenditure of a million dollars would be required to install a plant of the type mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Plus working capital.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Between a million and a million and a quarter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF ORDER FOR PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN PRIVATE BILLS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were on the order paper last Monday six private bills dealing with incorporations and amending charters. They deal with the proposed Alberta Bank, the Pool Insurance, the Stanstead and Sherbrooke Insurance Company, the Ottawa Electric Company and the Ottawa Gas Company, the Detroit and Windsor Subway Company, and the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company. The promoters of these bills have gone to the expense of advertising and paying the fee required by the House of Commons. Some of them have also hired solicitors who are ready to act as parliamentary agents before our committees when these bills are under consideration. The notices required under our rules have been given in the newspapers and the Canada Gazette. All this will be lost if the bills are not proceeded with during the present session. They are debarred by the order passed in the house on the May 21, 1940, but it would be an easy matter to take them up now, which can be done by the adoption of the following resolution:

That the order of the 21st May, 1940, appointing the order of business of the house for the present session be suspended with regard to such private bills as have already been introduced in the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Does that apply to the divorce proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection at all. I regard the suggestion as a good one; it is one which had occurred to me when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was taking away all the rights relating to private members—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):—at a very early stage of the session. At that time, I believe, not one of these bills had been introduced. Of course the government must have or should have known that there was legislation on the way. I think this is a proper move. The expenditure which has been made should not be lost. Business would suffernot to mention the bills for the relief of certain persons.

BRITISH CHILDREN

ARRANGEMENTS AND FACILITIES FOR EXTENDING
HOSPITALITY OF CANADA FOR DURATION
OF WAR

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Yesterday the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) addressed a question to me with regard to the movement of British children to Canada. I intimated to the house then that I would probably make a statement to-day and I wish to do so now.

In view of the widespread interest in this country in the matter of British and refugee children who may come to Canada, I wish to give to the house, and to the public generally, an outline of what has already been done and our plans for the future, so far as we have been able to formulate them.

At the outset I wish to distinguish between British children and refugee children, or refugees generally. The latter are those who came to Britain following the invasion by Germany of Holland, Belgium and, later, France. On the advice we have received, contrary to the general belief in Canada there are—or at any rate there were up until a week or ten days ago-only about 2,900 Belgians and 150 Dutch refugee children in Great Britain, and of these it was estimated 125 to 150 were unaccompanied by parents. This, of course, does not include those children and adults who had reached Britain prior to, and following, the attack on Poland, from Austria, Germany and Poland itself. It was reported to us last February by our immigration officials in London that at that time these totalled less than ten thousand, approximately ninety per cent born in Germany and Austria, about the same percentage being Jewish, most of whom had been absorbed into the normal life of Great Britain.

The movement which is by far of greatest interest to Canadians is the movement of British people, mainly children, to Canada. This movement is of two kinds.

The first is made up of all those coming on their own and paying their own way. These include a few men, some women and many children who, if they can get a release of their funds in the United Kingdom, can come here and support themselves, and those coming to join relatives or friends in this country who have offered them homes. This movement also includes residential schools moving as a body to locate in Canada, at least for the duration of the war. Every encouragement is being given by the Canadian authorities to this movement, and delays are not allowed to occur through unnecessary investigations which might delay sailings.

We have been advised that, under the present British regulations, no person, male or female, between the ages of sixteen and sixty may leave Great Britain without a permit. In addition to this, some difficulties have arisen owing to the fact that the United Kingdom government restricts the free movement of sterling exchange. Within the last week or ten days we have had quite a number of requests from British-born people resident in Canada, and from others, asking if we cannot do something to help their relatives and friends in the United Kingdom secure permission to transfer sufficient of their own funds to enable them to come to Canada and maintain themselves in this country. While it is recognized that this is a matter wholly for the United Kingdom government to decide, we have urged on our high commissioner in London that he strongly support the effort to have sterling exchange released for the necessary monetary support of those who wish to come to Canada on their own resources.

The other, and larger, movement is the one which, as I have said, arouses the most interest in Canada, namely the movement of British children who can come only if transportation is provided and free homes are offered here. Several weeks ago, after the successful invasion of Belgium, Holland and France and when it appeared likely that Britain itself would shortly be subjected to severe attack, the government here, on its own initiative, offered to assist in bringing to Canada British and refugee children. That offer has been accepted by the British authorities. One of the features of this assisted movement provides for the nomination of children to designated homes in Canada. Under this arrangement parents in Britain who have relatives or friends in Canada may nominate their children to be brought out and placed in these homes.

There will be included in this movement children from five to fifteen years of age inclusive, with possibly a small number under five years, if available for adoption in Canada. In every case, we are advised, the consent of parents or guardians must first be obtained. Ocean transportation arrangements will be made by the United Kingdom government, which will supply ships and pay ocean passage. Some days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned in the house that there would likely be a movement from Britain to Canada of internees and prisoners of war, and it is expected that the British government may decide that these must move before the children.

The dominion government will use its medical examiners and its immigration officers overseas for examination of the children before sailing. It will be necessary to keep careful records so that identity may be preserved and the children thus enabled to be reunited with their parents, either here or at home, after the war is over.

The dominion government will look after the reception of the children at Canadian ocean ports, will provide rail transportation with proper meals en route and will carry them to the provincial distribution centres. Nurses will be placed on each train carrying children and an immigration conductor or conductress will be on each car.

Under arrangements worked out between the dominion government and the provinces, the latter will have the oversight of reception, placement and after-supervision. In doing this they will utilize the services of child welfare and other organizations in the various provinces who have the experience necessary to handle this part of the task. The provinces, and the organizations cooperating with them, are now engaged in receiving offers of homes and examining the suitability of these homes for the reception of the children after their arrival. Following the recognized practice in all the provinces, care will be taken to place children in homes of their own faith, by which I mean non-Roman Catholic children will be placed in non-Roman Catholic homes, Roman Catholic children in Roman Catholic homes and Jewish children in Jewish homes.

Many splendid offers of cooperation have been received from churches, from national and local organizations and from individuals willing and anxious to help in this great work of saving thousands of children from the mother country. There is room for all in this voluntary effort. I should like to emphasize here as strongly as I can the necessity for their being one recognized central authority in each province for placement and supervision, and that such central authority be the provincial department dealing with welfare matters. It would greatly facilitate the work of administration if those desiring to help in any way would first of all get in touch with the appropriate provincial department.

Foreseeing the necessity for close provincial-federal cooperation if this work were to be successfully handled, we invited the provinces to send their welfare experts to a conference which was held in Ottawa on the 3rd and 4th of June. The plan of operation being followed is largely that devised and recommended by this conference. I wish to place on record here our appreciation of the splendid cooperation we are receiving from the provinces.

Immediately following this conference we offered to take ten thousand as an initial movement, whom we felt certain could be placed in private homes; but that did not by any means limit the movement to that number. The task we have undertaken is to place many thousands in good private homes in Canada for the duration of the war. This is a form of war work which is well worth while. It is measured not by money but by service; and for this reason I have no doubt that the response. of those who can offer homes will be widespread. But there are many in Canada who cannot offer a home, single persons and others who have not suitable accommodation. May I suggest to them the possibility of cooperating with some home which has taken a child, and sharing the expense of food and clothing. In this way the burden will be more equally shared and the circle of those who can help enlarged.

Up to the present the British government have not been able to give us any estimate of the number who are likely to come. My own impression is that it may well reach very large dimensions. With this possibility in view I have been conferring to-day with the provincial ministers in charge of welfare work in their provinces, to consider further plans for a greatly extended movement, should this become necessary.

I have not said anything about the expenses involved beyond what is paid by the United Kingdom government and the dominion government in transportation and services. There will necessarily arise expenses beyond this for such items as medical care, hospitalization, or other unforeseen contingencies. The matter of how these will be met has been under consideration, and a decision will likely be reached in a few days. If a private home could be found for every child, where lodging, food, clothing and education could continue to be provided free, the expense to the provinces and to the welfare societies would consist largely of increased staff to look after the welfare of the children. We must, however, expect and plan for difficulties which are bound to arise through the failure of some children to fit into the homes where they are placed, the need for hospitalization, and other costs that are inseparable from handling such a large number.

When the magnitude of the movement can be better determined it may be advisable to make an appeal throughout the dominion for funds to help take care of the expenses that are bound to come. I might add that we are planning to set up a dominion-wide organization in the nature of a supervisory board or committee, and probably a liaison officer or local committee in each province to work in cooperation with the provincial authorities.

The house will agree with me that these proposals constitute a unique adventure. I am sure the Canadian people will understand and sympathize with the difficulties and anxieties of parents in Britain who have to decide on the matter of parting with their children, to be moved thousands of miles away into the care of strangers. This thought I am sure is in the minds of thousands of Canadian mothers and fathers to-day. Nevertheless there will be some difficulties. The warmth of the welcome given in some homes may become cooler; in some cases the child, because of the complete change in environment, may become a problem. Notwithstanding these and other problems which may arise, I am sure we may depend upon the overwhelming and continued support of the Canadian people.

Just a few minutes before I came into the chamber a cable came in from our high commissioner. This was partly in reply to a cable dispatched to him several days ago, dealing with the question when we may expect children and in what numbers, because it is necessary for us to have as much information on that as possible, in order that we may plan a little ahead their distribution and care.

The cable says:

Anticipate 3,000 will arrive approximately middle of July and a further 750 each five days from then up to July 25. Will send details as soon as available.

The details, I assume, would be as to number of boys and girls, religious faith, and similar information. This message would indicate, I take it, that up to July 25 we may receive from 5,000 to 5,500 children.

QUESTION RESPECTING "CALLING CANADA" ADVER-TISEMENT IN NEWSPAPERS

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have had brought to my attention an advertisement which has recently appeared in the Evening Telegram of Toronto and in a number of newspapers across Canada, and which I am advised has been refused by a still greater number of newspapers. This advertisement is purported to be given out by a group calling themselves "Calling Canada". This advertisement is headed "Calling Mr. King" and the text is as follows:

English mothers rush to evacuate children.

Geoffrey Shakespeare, parliamentary secretary for the dominions, told a press conference that Great Britain has given up plans for immediate mass evacuation of children from the British Leles to the dominions Isles to the dominions.

The dangers of transportation and lack of adequate reception facilities were given as reasons.

Hitler's bombers will raid England to-night, to-morrow night and the next night.
The battle of Britain has begun.

The slaughter of children is beginning.

Then follows a picture of a poor child crying. Below the picture is the following:

How's your conscience, Mr. King?

For over a year thousands of Canadian homes have been clamouring for a chance to take the children in, pleading for a plan to meet this

You have been the obstacle.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the government and the house two questions: Is this not a matter far beyond the standards of fair comment or criticism? Does it not call for immediate consideration by the government?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the advertisement to which the hon. member has referred is certainly a dastardly attack upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the facts being false makes the comment still more malicious. I am not prepared to say that it comes under the defence of Canada regulations dealing with subversive literature, though I do not know anything better calculated to create disaffection and to hamper war work in Canada. I shall submit this matter to the law officers, and at the same time ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain) to obtain a report from those in charge of press censorship. I myself believe that "Calling Canada" should be called to some sense of propriety.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything with respect to this particular advertisement as such, but I do feel that inasmuch as some days ago I advised the house that there would necessarily be a delay in connection with evacuated children coming to Canada, on account of the desire of the British government to use transportation facilities for the distribution of alien internees, I ought now, in view of what is set forth in the advertisement, to make it quite clear that in that statement I was quoting from official documents.

This advertisement has appeared since I made the statement in the House of Commons that it would not be possible to have the children come without priority being given to interned aliens. I have in my hand some documents which I shall send later to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). First there is a communication from the High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This communication dated June 5, 1940, states:

Dominion office state that question of evacuation of internees has now, for various reasons, become very urgent. In the circumstances they would be grateful to receive the Canadian government's decision on the point at earliest possible date and in advance of any decisions on refugees and children.

Then subsequently, on June 13 there is a further communication from the High Commissioner for Canada to Great Britain to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as follows:

Ministry of shipping, after considerable discussion, have agreed to the use of troopships for any returning civilian personnel we desire to send thereon, though they state that service regulations here restrict such passages to personnel whose passage is paid for by the government. We can, therefore, use these ships for evacuee children, stranded Canadians, wives and dependants of officials being repatriated at the government's expense and wives and dependants of officers paying their own expenses. Arrangements regarding issue of tickets, assembly of passengers and transportation to ships has had to be made by this office. Understand that Ministry of Shipping may request us also to send internees on ships in question. This might complicate arrangements regarding evacuee children if these were ready for first convoy which will be end of this month or beginning of next. Feel, however, that evacuation schemes will not be completed by then.

These two communications make it perfectly clear that it was the wish of the British government that as between interned aliens and evacuees priority should be given in the order indicated here.

I have another dispatch in my hand which I shall permit the leader of the opposition to read, because it indicates that when, in explaining the situation the other day, I made reference to this order of preference, I did to some extent embarrass the British government in relation to British internees in Germany, in making any reference to German internees coming to Canada before the German government had been advised, through neutral channels, of the fact by the British government. I mention that only to indicate how very much embarrassed one in my position is when, not having one's word accepted with respect to actual facts governing the case, he has to disclose information prematurely or submit to misrepresentations of his position.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I hope my right hon, friend will acquit me of having any desire to misrepresent [Mr. Mackenzie King.]

him. The fact of the matter was that I had received information of a very reliable kind, from Montreal, that passenger ships were arriving on this side half empty. It did seem to me to be a pity that the opportunity should be lost of bringing some of these people over here. I was actuated solely by humanitarian considerations and had no thought of any other question being involved. I certainly had no desire to impugn the honour of the Prime Minister.

MINIMUM WHEAT PRICES

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 31 I desire to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action of the government taken to establish minimum prices for certain grades of cash wheat in store Fort William and Port Arthur, to December 31, 1940.

Mr. SPEAKER: While the hon, member must take the responsibility for making the motion, yet according to our rules he must make a prima facie case that there is that question of urgency, to which objection might be taken by other hon, members. I would ask that the hon, gentleman give the reasons for the urgency of such a motion.

Mr. PERLEY: The action will involve the disposal of one of the largest crops we have ever had in western Canada as well as of the 1940 crop up to the end of the present calendar year. I think that is a matter of urgent importance. It involves the present situation, and a change of policy without notice being given to the public or to this parliament is a matter that should be discussed here and now. The public wants to know the government's policy, especially in view of the announcement which, I am informed, was made yesterday on the Winnipeg grain exchange instead of in this house. Last night I was called by a press man in respect to an inquiry he had received from Wall street as to the action taken by the government on the grain exchange yesterday. It is that matter that I want to discuss.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Resort to the procedure which my hon. friend has adopted is restricted not only to matters of special urgency but to matters which cannot be discussed in any other way. I would refer your honour to paragraph 244 of Beauchesne, under standing order 31:

Motion for adjournment regarding matters for the discussion of which the committee of supply or other appointed business would afford an early opportunity have been ruled to be out of order.

As late as yesterday a question was discussed on the motion to go into supply, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). This matter could well have been discussed on such a motion; it can be discussed at any time before going into supply, or in supply on certain estimates. I do not see that this is one of the matters that can be raised in the house under this very limited rule.

Mr. PERLEY: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) says that this must be a matter that cannot be discussed in any other way. May I remind him that on several occasions since May 16 we have endeavoured to obtain a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) as to when we would have an opportunity to discuss this all-important question. We have been put off by being told that it was under consideration. It has been under consideration for a month or more, yet I understand that yesterday a definite announcement was made which should have been made in this house. Therefore I say we have not had an opportunity of discussing this question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice, and his reference to paragraph 244 of Beauchesne, I submit that next to the war itself the subject of the motion of the hon. member is one of the most urgent matters this house can discuss. The question of the disposition of our wheat carry-over and of this season's crop is of extreme importance, and no early opportunity is available to this house to discuss it, since the order for the day is the budget debate, which may go on for a week or ten days. Furthermore, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has indicated that an opportunity has been sought on several occasions, and we are all aware that this is a fact. The minister has been asked as to the policy of the government with respect to this matter, which we all agree is very serious and important; and the reply has been that it was still under discussion and consideration. Then what happened? Announcement was made in the Winnipeg grain exchange, outside of this house and while this house is in session. This is a very important point which I think should not be overlooked. On more than one occasion this session I have tried to impress upon the Prime Minister and the members of the government that this sort of thing is all wrong and should not happen. This is a matter of urgent public importance, and the Minister of Justice has not indicated that it may be discussed on an early occasion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec-East): It could be discussed this afternoon in the budget debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Theoretically that may be correct; practically it is not possible, as no one knows better than the Minister of Justice. He knows that arrangements were made, to which I agreed, that the budget debate should go on this afternoon, but this matter arose after that arrangement was made. I suggest to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that, small in numbers as we are over here, if they want to get cooperation in their war effort they had better show a little reciprocity in a matter of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. That is not a threat; it is a promise. If I have to I will go so far as to make an appeal to the Prime Minister to let this question be debated this afternoon. I do submit that in the interests of the producers of western Canada, of the people of Canada and, may I say, of the treasury of Canada, the matter ought to be discussed in the house this afternoon. Let the debate go on; it will not take very long. This thing has been smouldering for a month or more and it ought to be debated now. I am told that instructions have gone out to the western country, through a group of grain companies, not to buy any more wheat, and that buying has ceased. I do not know whether that is true, but if it is true it is a mighty important thing to the western producer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) will agree that it is not desirable, if it can be avoided, to create precedents which are likely to prove embarrassing on future occasions. If there were no opportunity for the hon, member for Qu'Appelle to speak to-day on the subject he has brought up as one of urgent public importance, I should go a long way to meet the request of the leader of the opposition, despite the embarrassment it might create later on. But I do point out to him that this afternoon, following the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) who is to be the first to reply to the Minister of Finance in the budget debate, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle might have an opportunity to take up the subject to which he has referred. It would be quite in order for the hon. member to speak then, and it would be quite agreeable to this side of the house to have him follow immediately after, if that is agreeable to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, of course, is a compromise; but unfortunately, as the Prime Minister knows, there are other groups in this house who would have to be consulted. If they will undertake to give way this afternoon I believe that would be quite agreeable, but I am not so sure that they will do so. I do not know that they have been consulted. Certainly this ought to be a matter of great importance to their constituencies, and I appeal to them to adopt the suggestion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was about to rise, when the Prime Minister took the floor, to support the suggestion of the hon, member for Qu'Appelle. In spite of the fact that we are interested in discussing the various aspects of the budget, and are prepared to go ahead with that discussion this afternoon, I am in agreement with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that this is a matter of public importance that ought to be discussed immediately. As far as I am concerned I should be very glad indeed to adopt the suggestion which has been made that the hon, member be allowed to proceed immediately after the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has spoken in the debate on the budget.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All the members of our group come from wheat-growing regions. We are very much interested in this discussion, and we shall gladly fall in line in order to facilitate a discussion of the wheat problem.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then does the hon. member wish to withdraw his motion?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes. Motion withdrawn.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LOBSTER MARKETING-CENTRAL WAREHOUSES Mr. BROOKS:

1. Have central warehouse depots been estab-1. Have central warehouse depots been established for the purchase and sale of canned lobsters under the lobster marketing scheme at Halifax, Nova Scotia, Shediac, New Brunswick, and Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, what is the amount being paid in each centre for (a) warehouses; (b) salaries;

(c) other expenses?

3. What are the names of individuals or companies concerned?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Halifax, National Harbour Board, $58.13 per month; Shediac, Simpson Roberts Co., Ltd., $20.84 per month; Charlottetown, Charlottetown Forum, Ltd., $100 per month. (b) Halifax, W. S. Lee, assistant controller, $300 per month, Florence H. Clancey, stenographer, $60 per month; Shediac, J. A. Kelly, depot manager, $200 per month; Charlottetown, W. H. Tidmarsh, depot manager, $200 per month. Casual assistance and labour as required. (c) Other expenses are largely of unforeseen nature and not readily estimated. 3. Answered by No. 2.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Prairie Airways Limited been given a contract at the airports in Regina and Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, or either of these, by the terms of which said company will train or provide training for pilots for service in the air force?

2. If so, what are the terms respecting remuneration or payment for such training?

3. Have contracts of a similar kind or nature been entered into elsewhere?
4. If so, with whom?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled. I should like to make this observation, with the consent of the house. In connection with this return I am tabling a copy of the standard form of contract entered into between commercial companies or flying clubs and the Department of National Defence for Air. In connection with this contract there are certain syllabi which are marked for official use only, and I would therefore ask hon, members to treat them with some discretion and not broadcast them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Friday the 28th June next, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 2nd July, 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Prime Minister if we shall sit on Friday evening?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we are to adjourn for Saturday, Sunday and Monday, probably hon. members will wish to leave early on Friday. We might therefore adjourn at six o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

APPLE SURPLUS

QUESTION OF FREE DISTRIBUTION TO CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS AND DESTITUTE FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct two question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) regarding the free distribution made last year in his province, and a few others, of a surplus of apples of an estimated value of $87,000.

First, when the decision was arrived at and made known, were any representations made to have a portion of this surplus distributed to the most deserving charitable institutions in the province of Quebec, and particularly to the destitute fishermen of the Magdalen Islands? If the answer is in the affirmative, why has not this distribution been made? Second, is it the department's intention—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROY: —to give a share to the parties I have mentioned out of this year's surplus, of which, according to the minister's statement in the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot hear what the hon, member is saying.

Mr. ROY: —of which, according to the minister's statement in the house on June 6, a large part will be put at the disposal of the refugees in Europe?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member's observations should be taken as notice of question.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, June 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, ever since the tragedy which caused a vacancy in the treasury benches I have been anxious at the first formal opportunity to express my profound sorrow and to offer my sincerest condolences to the family of the late Hon. Norman McLeod Rogers. To the late Hon. Norman McLeod Rogers. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), his associates and all the members of this house I express my sympathy as well as that of the constituency which I have the honour to represent. The late minister's industry and application in the several departments with which he was connected offers a good example to future generations. The knowledge which he gained as professor of political science and history at Queen's university must have been of considerable assistance to the government in carrying out their onerous tasks. His last words to the Prime Minister were, "Very well; I will carry on." Those who heard those words reiterated must have been inspired. It should inspire all and act as a clarion call-"carry on, Canada."

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) will soon take over a most difficult task. I commend the government for its choice of a Minister of National Defence. The minister was a previous incumbent of this office. From his youth up he has been interested in military matters generally. The hon, and gallant member for Prince will, I know, give a good account of himself in the portfolio of defence. He has had legal training; he has been associated with the business life of this country; he has the confidence of Canada. I look forward to his accelerating Canada's war effort and inspiring our people to greater effort. Never in the history of Canada have we been asked to place at the disposal of the government a sum ranging from $600,000,000 to $700,000,000 in the short space of twelve months. We should be able to do it. Given leadership, I think we will be able to do it. I am rather in favour of the principle which was laid down, that we should pay as we go.

I shall endeavour this afternoon to follow the course adopted by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. First, I shall discuss the economical and financial review or, as I like to put it, the financial operations of the dominion for the fiscal year. Second, I shall discuss the budget forecast or estimate of revenues and expenditures for the present year. Third, I shall take up the government accounts, or the balance sheet of the dominion for the year just closed, considering active and non-active assets together with liabilities, both direct and indirect. Fourth, I shall review our trade and commerce. In the budget speech I do not think sufficient emphasis was placed upon this feature of our work. Fifth, I shall deal with the ways and means mentioned in the budget speech for providing the necessary revenue to meet expenditures. Then perhaps I may be permitted to make a few constructive suggestions as to what should have been taken from, as the minister said in his preliminary remarks, or what should be added to the policy of the government as set out in the budget speech.

I feel that our thoughts and actions should have but one end in view, to gear everything to Canada's war effort. That will be the thought back of any observations or criticism which I shall utter in this house. By directing our efforts and actions to the war effort, we as a nation will simply be doing our duty. As I see it, our duty is to do everything possible to stop the ruthless aggressors who have been tearing down the institutions which we love so dearly. Not only are the institutions being destroyed, but the people of France and Britain are in peril as well. What matters our institutions? It is our people who are important. If I can leave but one message this afternoon it will be this: We are more than allies of Britain and France; we are part and parcel of them, bone of their bone, blood of their blood and flesh of their flesh. I shall approach the problem this afternoon from that point of view.

In his preliminary remarks the Minister of Finance made a few references to what had taken place during the last two or three years. Should I refer to these, I want the house and the country to understand that I do so without any recrimination, without any idea of offering destructive criticism, but simply to put the facts upon the record. The minister had something to say about the wishful thinking of our people during the last three years, but he was fair enough to say that there had been a good deal of wishful thinking on the part of the government during the same period. He might have gone further and said that the government knew that we were approaching a world catastrophe. The government should have given leadership to our people and brought them out of that complacency in which they were satisfied to stay so long as their attention was not drawn to the impending tragedy.

It was, I think, Emerson who a hundred years ago said, "He that marches ahead of public opinion marches out into the night." I say that this administration marched behind, lagged behind public opinion, and deserves to be left out in the night. Hon. members who were in the last house will remember that on many occasions our party urged the government to prepare for what was coming. Not only did we urge them to get ready; we offered to cooperate in every possible way. On March 2, 1937, I had the privilege of saying in this chamber:

No one knows better than . . . the Minister of National Defence—

Who at that time was the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie).

—that billions are being spent in the little British isles overseas on armaments. Over a five-year period Great Britain has budgeted for an expenditure of $7,500,000,000. The first white paper brought down provides for an expenditure of $2,000,000,000.

That was three years and four months ago.

What does all this mean? . . . I hope the minister realizes the extraordinary changes which have taken place. . . . Throughout the whole world there is a great rush on the part of all countries to get into a position where they can take care of themselves. The minister must realize we are sitting on a volcano.

This amused the house very much, and I remember that there was considerable heckling. But this statement and similar warnings repeated many times throughout Canada did not move the government from a complacent attitude. To quote further from what I then said:

We are going to have an eruption one of these days and then there may be a world catastrophe.

That catastrophe is upon us; it has been upon us for some little time. Yet even after war was declared there seemed to be, as the Minister of Finance said, a period of quietness and hesitation. Those symptoms affected not only many of our people but obtained in our government, which should have stirred itself a good deal more than it did. When parliament met in special session last September, my party not only gave no opposition but offered the government the utmost degree of cooperation, and by so doing left no excuse for the continued quietness and hesitation of which the minister spoke. The consequences are with us now-busy days and sleepless nights. We may have saved the interest on some money which should have been spent a year ago, and by waiting this long, what equipment we have may now be a trifle more modern. But the result of these delays has been to leave us unprepared in regard to equipment and organization to carry out our war effort. We are much further behind in evaluating and effectuating what is required than if we had got out of that complacent condition two or three years ago, or, certainly, when parliament met at the time that war was declared.

So much for the past. Let us forget the past and face the future. Let us all strive now to do what we can to further Canada's war effort. In this connection I should like to make one or two observations.

Tell our people, tell business, tell industry that from this time forward Canada's policy will be one which will see to it that we are going to defend ourselves, and that we intend to honour all the contracts which we have let and that the contracts will be filled. Whether the war stops or not we shall need this material. We shall need it for our own defence. Tell Canada that we shall have a defence policy which will necessitate having an armed force ready and prepared to defend ourselves. We will modernize our equipment from year to year; we will keep our coast in a continuous state of defence. Let us see if we cannot inspire some confidence in business and private enterprise which is timid lest the war effort may collapse.

I come now to an economic and financial review of the year that is past. The results have been fair. We budgeted for such and so and we reached and in some respects passed our objective. With the pay-as-you-go policy I am entirely in accord. In my opinion it could have been usefully expanded in several directions, and it might yet be extended. I doubt whether we can borrow our way through this war expenditure without freezing up much of our liquid position. I was not entirely in favour of the government's action last November as regards the $200,000,000 two per cent two-year expansion banking arrangement which was made. It was a new departure so far as financial circles were concerned. The government met no opposition in September from our party. We were not sure just how it was intended to raise this money in November. Had we known, we might have advised the minister, for several reasons, to put on a war loan as early as possible.

The first reason, to my mind, is that nothing grips so much the imagination of the people and makes them realize that there is a war on, as a war loan. It seems to stir them; they know they have a job of work to do. The second point which occurred to me was that the government knew, when that shortterm loan was put on, that $92,000,000 out of that $200,000,000 would be used for the repatriation of Canadian securities held in Great Britain. The government must have known also that it would be some years before Canadian securities would be flowing back again to be held in London. On more than one occasion the Prime Minister intimated in this chamber that this would be a long war. Time and again we had evidence that Britain's war effort would tend to exhaust her financially to a serious degree, and that our Canadian securities held in London would not flow back there within two years, and in that period of time would not amount to $200,000,000. The main point I had in mind in that connection, however, was that our people would have known that we were at war. As regards the amount of money raised. we were not courageous enough for we did not ask for enough. In proof of that I mention the fact that the January loan of $375,000,000, our first war loan, at 34 per cent for twelve years, was subscribed to by 178,000 persons in Canada. They poured $200,000,000 in cash into that loan. Those 178,000 subscribers realized in January that there was a war on and had they been given the opportunity in September or in November they would have come to the front in like manner. In the meantime we lost the enthusiasm and that driving force which these people would have engendered in creating public opinion to do everything possible to further our war effort. We lost three precious months.

I suggest that we shall have difficulty in borrowing our way through this war, and therefore I reiterate what I said before. We should do everything we possibly can to pay as we go. It will be impossible, under the United States Neutrality Act and the foreign exchange control regulations, for us to expect much in the way of United States funds; therefore I urge that we conserve as much as we possibly can of our foreign exchange for the purchases which we have to make abroad. In passing I would offer the suggestion with regard to investments held by non-residents of Canada -and I refer mostly to the United States at the present time. Our foreign exchange control board is buying large quantities of United States exchange to pay for such items as rent, mortgage interest, dividends on purely Canadian investments, and we are losing a good many Canadian dollars in securing United States exchange for the purpose of remitting these items. I suggest that the foreign exchange control board should give serious consideration to the question of retaining these balances in Canadian depositories. I have held some strong views for some time with regard to the pegged rate of exchange. Pegging it at ten per cent as we did in September was quite all right at that time, but there should have been an adjustment.

Before discussing this question I should like to read into the record certain figures with regard to the free market exchange as given by the federal reserve bank in New York, obtaining since the outbreak of war. In this connection I would say that the government, by putting on a ten per cent war exchange tax, have gone a long way to meet the situation to which I now refer. In respect of imports they have caught up to the free exchange market I should like to have seen obtain, and they have done so in one jump from ten to twenty per cent, by invoking the war exchange tax of ten per cent. But there are two sides to the picture, because while exchange comes to us on the goods we export, exchange must be given by us for our purchases from abroad. I should like to put on Hansard the exchange rates from month to month since the outbreak of war. At the first of September one hundred Canadian dollars were buying 95.6 United States dollars; October 2, 88.8; November 1, 89.6; December 1, 88.6; February 1, 87.4; March 1, 86.1; April 1, 81.1; May 15, 81.6. These were the exchange rates in the so-called free market, or, as some call it, the black market as published by the federal reserve bank of New York.

In our trade agreement with the United States, provision was made for mutual agreement on wide fluctuations in exchange. In order that the record may be complete I wish to quote article XIII, which made this provision:

If a wide variation should occur in the rate of exchange between the currencies of Canada and the United States of America, and if the government of either country should consider the variation so substantial as to prejudice the industries or commerce of that country, it shall be free to propose negotiations for the modification of this agreement; and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of such proposal, the government making such proposal shall be free to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we had to have the foreign control exchange board in order to curb the panic that might have occurred, involving a collapse of markets. But had free market prevailed Canada, in my opinion, would have been in this fortunate position. We are primary producers of goods which are shipped to the United States to the extent of seventy per cent of our exports. The farmer or live stock man takes a car of cattle to Buffalo from western Ontario. True, he gets a $1.10 in Canadian currency for the United States dollar that he receives, but after his day's work in the stockyards he walks down the streets of Buffalo with Canadian money in his pocket and goes into his hotel or into a restaurant and buys a one dollar dinner for which he must pay $1.22 or $1.25 in Canadian currency. The proceeds from the sale of his cattle he must deposit in his bank when he gets home. They in turn under our law send it to the foreign control exchange board and he gets $1.10 for every United States dollar he has. With seventy per cent of our primary exports going to the United States, consider the happy position our primary producers would be in if they were able to get one hundred and twenty Canadian dollars for every $100 worth of sales they make instead of one hundred and ten dollars as at present.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the gentleman would have used United States money to pay for his dinner, not Canadian money.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Well, I do not think the man I referred to would go to the trouble of buying United States exchange before he went across the border when he was only going for the day.

Mr. RALSTON: He got it for his cattle.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): True, but under the regulations of the foreign exchange control board exports must be paid for in United States funds, which in turn must be surrendered to the board. Any shipper knows that. If you retain any part of your remittance, you are breaking the regulations. That is one of the difficulties experienced by the foreign exchange control board in their attempts to curtail the bootlegging that is going on-and I regard what the Minister of Finance suggests as a bootlegging transaction in foreign exchange. I hope he is not going to encourage us to do that sort of thing, but it is common knowledge that it is going on to-day to the extent of at least $50,000 daily. The greatest problem of the board is to stop that bootleg traffic, and the greater the spread the greater the traffic will be.

Free traders! There used to be some in the Canadian House of Commons when I came here some eighteen years ago. Perhaps I should have sent to the museum and brought one back so that I could address a few remarks to him in regard to the next item running through my mind, namely the war exchange tax. I am in favour of the war exchange tax. Not only will it provide revenue, but it will slow down the imports of luxuries and other unnecessary articles. It will tend to keep in Canada more Canadian dollars. It will tend to make more employment in Canada. The same objective could have been reached on a free market, except of course that the government would not collect the duty wherewith to run the affairs of the country. I purpose later in my remarks to say something more in that regard. Before I leave the matter of imports let me say that with free exchange this tax would have been of great benefit to Canada in making more employment for our people. It would be less tempting to Canadians to buy goods in the United States if they had to put up 120 Canadian dollars for the goods rather than $110 as at present.

I come now to another feature of the budget which I am anxious to commend not only in this house but to all the Canadian people; I refer to the issue of war savings certificates. The sale of these should be encouraged in every possible way. I think the minister is a little optimistic in expecting $50,000,000 from this source in the current year. More energy and enthusiasm will have to be displayed by the volunteer effort which is being put forth in this connection. I hope the press will pay tribute to the voluntary efforts of citizens who are promoting the sale of these certificates. If we apply ourselves with diligence we can raise the $50,000,000 from this source. And we should do it.

I should like to make one or two observations regarding the money receipts from the sale of the certificates. The money finds its way now into the consolidated revenue fund, and thus people are likely to think that it is revenue. But it is a liability, and some day Canada will have to honour its obligation in that regard. What sinking fund arrangements are being made? At the present time the consolidated revenue fund is cluttered up with items such as post office savings, departmental funds, civil service insurance funds, annuity funds, superannuation funds, returned soldiers' insurance funds, moneys received from the sale of school and Indian lands, and so on. Now here is another large item to swell the consolidated revenue fund. I often think we do not realize that some day these liabilities all have to be met, and there is not a sufficient sinking fund on the asset side of the ledger to take care of our obligations on the liability side. The money collected from the sale of war savings certificates should be earmarked as a direct responsibility. We are too prone to get our capital assets into the revenue structure without making provision for the liquidation of the corresponding liabilities.

What applies in this regard applies also with regard to Canadian National Railways financing. They buy freight cars, build stations, lay rails and what not. It all goes into their capital assets, but no fund is set up from year to year to take care of the depreciation of the equipment. Therefore we are fooling ourselves in regard to the earnings of the road. Similarly we are fooling ourselves when we say that our consolidated revenue fund is swelled by so much from the sale of war savings certificates, and that we are that much further ahead. I want to gear all my ideas to the war effort; so that following these constructive criticisms I would say: Let us get the money wherever we can; let us encourage our people in thrift; let us stop wasteful spending and do all we can, by every possible means, to expand our war effort.

I come now to the matter of the physical volume of trade. In August last the index figure stood at 125; in January, responding to the war spending, it reached 139. Since January we have had a recession in commodity prices-and may I interject this warning; look out that we do not have a further recession in commodity prices during the next few months. Our physical volume of business receded to 137. Did this rise indicate an expansion of business as we ordinarily know it in Canada? Not entirely. The major portion of that expansion of physical volume of business was due to the construction industry, which increased 76 per cent-in the six months; and a second reason was the heavy sale of pleasure cars, arising out of the fear on the part of the people that these would be further taxed.

Coming back to the question of construction, the construction of buildings is a capital expense. I do not mind the expenditure of money to stimulate the physical volume of trade, but I should like to see those expenditures made for production purposes. We have hundreds of idle factories in Canada, and I would say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that in making these expenditures, instead of putting up buildings here, there and everywhere he should use the buildings already existing and get them into production, thus using this money for production purposes.

May I interject just here that urgent government business has made it necessary for the Prime Minister and the Minister of Munitions and Supply to retire from the chamber, and I should like to express my appreciation of the kindness of the Prime Minister in sending me a note excusing himself and the other ministers who found it necessary to leave. It was a very gracious act on his part, and I thank him for it.

To return to my point, I think we should put our money into production instead of making capital expenditures, and I hope the minister will take note of this suggestion. Scores of factories and other buildings are available. Let us not put up new, expensive buildings; let us get into production with the space at present unoccupied.

I return to the question of automobiles. Even since war was declared our people have been seeking pleasure to a greater extent than they should have. They motor here and there, all over the country. Of course it helps to keep things normal and to prevent the people from becoming panicky, but at the same time it wastes a good deal of gasoline and money. During the last twenty years I am afraid our Canadian people have not been as provident as they might have been, particularly the younger people. Our people have not been provident; they have been reckless; there has been too much wasteful spending. This has had an effect on the physical volume of trade, but while we were building and driving motor cars certain totalitarian states were building tanks, aeroplanes and other war equipment. While our unemployed were idle their unemployed were building military roads. We see the result to-day in the present unpreparedness.

The other expansion in the physical volume of business was in connection with employment. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance said that 100,000 wage earners had been drawn into employment during the last twelve months. I am glad of that; I am sorry it was not three hundred thousand. Something should be done to bring more and more of these people into employment. The present situation, with 367,000 unemployed employables not earning wages and 171,000 of them drawing relief, is not what should be the case in this country at this time.

In the summary which accompanied the budget address the period of the last twenty-three months was covered. In all kindness I say to the Minister of Finance that if he had gone back to the first item set out on page 40 and made a deduction for the twenty-three month period, he would have found that only 46,000 wage earners were drawn into employment, together with another figure which I am sorry to put on the record. He would have found that while 169,000 unemployed employables were receiving aid twenty-three months ago, to-day 171,000 are receiving aid. In other words, in our war effort and our expansion of the physical volume of business in the last two years we have not taken any people from the category of unemployed employables and put them in the class of wage earners. That is a serious situation, which should engage the attention of the government. We have a mobilization bill now. Some do not like the word "conscription" but the unemployed would like to be conscripted off the relief rolls if we could find work for them. Let our administration give leadership in that regard and let us all do everything possible to see that relief costs are less, that wage earners are put into production and that our physical volume of business expands. This might help us to expand our national income to the $4,500,-000,000 the minister mentioned, which, at our present speed, we are not going to achieve.

On June 21 I wrote the deputy minister of finance and asked for a review of government accounts, 1939-40, and a review of economic and financial conditions for the same period. This always forms part of the budget address. I should like to make a constructive suggestion with regard to the conduct of budget debates. Of course as ordinary members we could go down to the bureau of statistics and gather this information, which was all available for perhaps a month before it was given to the minister. But to my amazement the reply I received from the deputy minister of finance was that this material was not given to me but would be tabled by the minister at the time he delivered his budget speech and would be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons debates. We could have taken a staff and done this work for ourselves, but in my opinion in future budget debates we should have this information a week or two in advance of the budget speech. I make this statement to the Minister of Finance: Had I been asked a week ago to make the speech I am making to-day, and had I had this information I should have been prepared to follow on immediately after the minister, and to permit some of my colleagues to deal with specific items which must receive our attention at this time, and save two days' time

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon, friend must realize, I have been in the position in which he finds himself to-day. I believe the custom has been to do as has been done in the present instance, namely to present the accounts along with the budget speech. The general reason they cannot be presented to the house earlier is that the budget is generally delivered much nearer March 31. However I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend's observations with regard to the present year. I really believe that what has happened is that the compilation did not take place until very recently. I can say to him truthfully that this copy was not put on my desk until the Thursday preceding last Monday.

As the hon. member must know, we have been working at very high pressure. I can say to him that I am sure the government would gladly accept his suggestion if sufficient time elapses between the end of the fiscal year and the presentation of the budget speech.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am glad to accept the minister's explanation. I suggest however it does not excuse him on the point I had made, namely that the minister might have been fairer had he gone back two years, particularly in respect of his observations regarding the number of wage earners put back to work.

All these observations, Mr. Speaker, lead to a consideration of the ways and means for expanding the national income of Canada. How can we secure that extra $700,000,000 of national income which we must have if we are to be in a position to meet our obligations? I have one minor suggestion in that regard, and it is this: We have been told about the formation of a new department of government to be known as the Department of National War Services. I hope when that department gets under way-and we trust it may do so quickly-it will take full advantage of the desire of all our people to be doing something productive, even if it be only tending a vegetable garden after business hours, or working in spare time to produce war supplies; that it will get all our people into some kind of activity so that they may take comfort in the thought that they are doing something on behalf of the war effort. If this is done our production will be increased to the extent of many thousands of dollars, and that increased production will add considerably to our national income.

Spend a billion! The Minister of Finance

Spend a billion! The Minister of Finance says he is going to spend $700,000,000, and then he timidly suggests that perhaps there will be another $180,000,000 or $200,000,000. I say to him: tell the people frankly that you are going to spend a billion dollars. Let them of their own initiative and enterprise, and through their investment in industry, get in on that job of work. If the minister does that, he will tend to inspire confidence and to increase Canada's national income by expanding her physical volume of business.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

A few days ago I listened to an able speech by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in which he dealt with the problem of youth, and with the part they will play in our war effort. He advocated technical training for them, and I had the privilege of suggesting that that training should be given, not only in day classes but in night classes as well. They could be made to feel that they are part and parcel of the task Canada now approaches. I would even go so far as to give badges or buttons to indicate that in their own sphere, by some means or another those people are contributing to the war effort. If some have bought war savings certificates, then let them wear a badge to show it. If others have cultivated garden plots to produce their own requirements, they could be given buttons to indicate what they have done. If boys and girls have been studying to fit themselves for technical training, so that they might be of some use in our future war effort, they could be given buttons to show that they are taking an active part. Let us badge and placard our citizens, so that we may know who are working and who are not, and thus we may inspire others to do more and more work for Canada at this time.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that perhaps our national income would be expanded if we were to ask the municipalities and provinces not to overspend or to spend wastefully. In fact, if I recall his words correctly he intimated that the provinces were already seized with the idea, and were not spending to the extent which obtained in other years. I was interested in that observation, and with that in mind I sent to the library for reports of speeches of provincial treasurers in which figures of provincial expenditures have been set out. My examination has disclosed that most provinces are spending and budgeting for more money than at any other time in their history. For instance, this year Ontario is budgeting for $102,000,000, whereas years ago $50,000,000 was sufficient. There is not sufficient retrenchment in the provinces. The following is from the budget speech of the provincial treasurer of British Columbia:

The appropriations for expenditures in the estimates for the year 1940-41 amount to $29,268,790.90, and exceed those provided for in the main estimates of this year by $563,353.41.

There is no retrenchment of provincial expenditures there. Then, Manitoba:

This province estimates ordinary expenditures will exceed original estimates by $171,382.89.

There is no retrenchment there. Then turning to Saskatchewan:

The expenditure moved up from $19,303,528.68 in 1938 to $21,342,013.33 in 1939.

This year in Saskatchewan they have provided for increases in expenditures for the fiscal year 1940-41, as follows:

Consolidation of the statistics.... $60,000

Well, I do not know whether the statistics needed to be consolidated until the close of the war. The list continues:

Public wor	rks.										$170,000
Highways											250,000
Public He	alth										100,000
Education											60,000

I offer no criticism of the expenditure for public health. In New Brunswick this year's budget provides for expenditures of $10,000,000. I will leave it to some hon. members to correct me if I am wrong in the statement that that is the largest budget New Brunswick has ever had.

I shall not give details respecting the other provinces, in the first place because I am not anxious to do so, and in the second place because I do not wish to stir up discussion in a field which perhaps after all is none of our business. However, in his budget speech the Minister of Finance made a statement which led us to believe that perhaps some kind of arrangement had been made under which provincial and municipal expenditures would be cut drastically.

I now leave that phase of the matter and return to a discussion of the position in which we shall find ourselves if we proceed to freeze more and more of our money in government loans; and in that connection I make the following observation. In peace time, borrow all the money you can at home, but I do not think we should leave ourselves in a more or less frozen position during war time. The Prime Minister knew three years ago that we would be requiring very large sums of money. I can remember speeches in this house in which it was stated that only twelve per cent of our borrowings were payable in New York; eighty per cent were payable in Canada, and probably the balance in London. We have repatriated the London securities by borrowing $200,000,000 by a short-term loan. We would be in a much better position to-day if our borrowings in New York were greater than $469,000,000, the present total. The neutrality act provides that we could have renewed these amounts and taken care of these obligations as they become due. As I say, we would have been in a more liquid position if we had taken time by the forelock a year ago and negotiated loans in that country which has been so anxious for so many years past to lend money to Canada.

I should like to quote paragraph (b) of section 7 of the 1939 neutrality act of the United States. It states that the provision shall not apply to a renewal of the indebtedness of countries or states that are at war.

I come now to the part of the budget speech which has to do with the trade of Canada. Hon. members who support the government know a good deal about trade. During the last two or three occasions on which they have appealed to the people, they have used that as their slogan. I sympathize with their point of view. War strangles trade. This administration, in common with all others, did everything possible to expand our trade in peace time. We were all in favour of that. Now twenty per cent of our economy depends upon our trade; and this can be compared to the five per cent which obtains in the case of the United States, a country which is fast becoming more or less selfsufficient. I do not believe in self-sufficiency in normal times, but conditions are different in times of war. I do not subscribe to the theory embodied in that pat phrase "economic nationalism," but perhaps we must strive more toward that end when we are faced with a war as a result of which our exports are cut off and we are unable to import many of the things we need.

Fortunately for Canada only five per cent of our imports come from Austria, Czechoslovakia. Germany, Norwav. Sweden, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, and other countries in central Europe which are now at war. In 1938 we imported only $31,425,000 worth of goods from these countries. During the same year we exported $66,000,000 worth of goods, which gave us a favourable trade balance of about $35,000,000. But Great Britain had a much greater balance of trade with these countries. Her imports from and exports to these countries were quite extensive. Therefore, it behooves us to do everything possible to supply Great Britain with the things which she normally imports from Europe. But we should remember that Great Britain must have Canadian dollars with which to buy Canadian products. If during these trying times she is to be able to buy from us, we must do everything possible in the way of buying British goods.

The repatriation of $92,000,000 will curtail our trade, inasmuch as Great Britain will not have the interest from those investments in Canada with which to buy our materials. I shall refer to this a little later when I discuss another suggestion which I have in my mind. I close this portion of my remarks by saying: Give to Great Britain every possible Canadian dollar so that John Bull in turn may be able to buy the things which are so sorely needed. This war exchange act is a move in the right direction. Non-empire imports last year increased $170,000,000, mostly from the United States. The provisions of the war exchange tax act, which really constitute a duty, will tend to slow down these tremendous imports.

It is to be hoped that the main part of that slowing down process will be balanced in the form of increased imports from Great Britain. We import iron, steel, machinery, cottons, silk, coal and petroleum from the United States, most of which are necessary. I should like to see these commodities imported instead of many of the luxuries we now bring into the country.

There is one item of import which is of great interest to Canadians at this time, especially in view of the legislation before us. I refer to coal. More and more Canadian coal should be produced in Canada for Canadian consumption. We would thus conserve Canadian dollars rather than have them used to buy foreign exchange for the purchase of United States coal. As far as many of the other items are concerned, we must of necessity have them and the United States is the quickest market from which to secure them.

I come now to the matter of capital expenditures and revenue expenditures. The Minister of Finance told us that during the last four months there had been an increase of fifty per cent in the importations of capital goods from the United States. If those goods were to be consumed in production and not be tied up in capital, then they would tend to extend our physical volume of trade. I hope that soon we will be fitted out with machines of all types so that we will not have to make much more capital expenditures. Much of the machinery which is being bought promiscuously by the Department of Munitions and Supply in the United States could be produced here. The Canada Machinery Corporation and other machinery companies are accustomed to making tools and dies; the doors should be wide open and they should be given every opportunity to put their men to work in making the machinery which is required for the manufacture of munitions and supplies, so that we shall not have to expend more and more of our Canadian dollars on this type of capital equipment.

I know that haste is essential, but at the same time full consideration should be given to our industries which are capable of manufacturing dies, tools and machinery. So long as the United States will accept our gold and our exports we shall probably be able to keep a fair balance, but let me tell you. Mr. Speaker, and this house that the economic penetration of this country by the United States is going forward by leaps and bounds. I have no objection to that, in face of the war, but we should take heed that some day-I pray God it will be soon—we shall have The economic penetration of this country by the United States will by then be considerable.

A year or two ago I criticized very strongly in this chamber the Canada-United States trade agreement. It was my privilege at that time to analyse our trade situation for a period of some twenty years; and for the benefit of new members I might mention that this schedule of seventy pages which I have in my hand represents what we gave the United States, and this smaller document indicates what we received. Item for item we gave $5 for every $2 we received. Beyond that, we gave away a three per cent excise tax. True, that has been equalized through the new war exchange tax, and I compliment the government on their courage in this matter, although I wonder whether we have accomplished what we set out to do, in view of the pegging of exchange at $1.10 when the free market is $1.20. Nevertheless, what was given away two years ago under the provisions of article XII of the Canada-United States trade agreement is now recovered, but that is for the period of the war only; when the war is over that tax will disappear and we shall be back where we were.

A few weeks ago an item on the order paper in the name of the Prime Minister called for a committee of this house to study what shall be done in the matter of reconstruction after the war. In my opinion the greatest problem as far as trade is concerned will arise when the provisions of the present war exchange tax become inoperative at the close of the war. There will be a collapse of trade in Canada if we ever go back to last year's position.

I purpose to put on the record article XII of the Canada-United States trade agreement, so that we may be able to refer conveniently to the clause which makes it possible for us to continue the agreement and at the same time impose a war exchange tax of ten per cent:

XII. 1. Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to prevent the enforcement of such measures as the government of either country may see fit to adopt

(a) relating to the importation or exportation of gold or silver;

(b) relating to the control of the import or export or sale for export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and in exceptional circumstances, all other military supplies;

(c) relating to neutrality or to public security; or—

This is the clause under which, I understand, the war exchange tax becomes operative:

(d) should that country be engaged in hostilities or war. . .

Article XIII reads:

XIII. If a wide variation should occur in the rate of exchange between the currencies of Canada and the United States of America, and if the government of either country should consider the variation so substantial as to prejudice the industries or commerce of that country, it shall be free to propose negotiations, for the modification of this agreement; and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of such proposal, the government making such proposal shall be free to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

We are at war, and perhaps all this does not matter so much now, but at the same time we must take cognizance of the position we are getting ourselves into. We must go further and see whether we cannot get action of some kind from those of the ministry who are charged with the responsibility. I suggest that a definite responsiblity lies with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Trade is vital to us, and I have felt for some time that the conduct of that department has been weak and ineffective. In recent months a number of trade commissioners have been evacuated from Europe. What is being done to utilize their services and abilities and put them to work on the problem of enlarging our export trade? Something should be done. The people should know that these trade commissioners are to be placed in the Americas or other non-belligerent countries to help make up for the loss of trade which has resulted from the present tragedy in Europe.

In this regard I suggest that we should have an imports board, with adequate authority, working in conjunction with the foreign exchange control board. Their duty should be to review the necessity of providing foreign exchange for certain classes of imports, and they should have power to restrict the departure of our Canadian dollars for the purchase of American exchange. In order that the point of my remarks may be made abundantly clear let me recite an actual experience of my own three or four weeks ago. I was in a planing mill in one of our large cities. I happen to know the proprietor very well: he is a conscientious and intelligent Canadian, and much worried about the war situation. I asked him, "Is your mill busy?" He said, "Yes." I asked, "What are you doing?" On a bench almost as large as the table now in front of me, all kinds of blue prints were laid out. I said, "You have got this job, have you?" His reply was, "Yes, I got this job, but am not very proud of the fact that my men are working on this particular job." What they were manufacturing, Mr. Speaker, was the panelling for two beer parlours, one for men and one for women, in a large beverage room which is being rebuilt during this time of war. That was not so bad. But, he said, look at this specification. The specification says that this beer parlour, 80 by 80, and this other, 40 by 80, must be panelled with southern pine imported from the United States and trimmed with hardwood imported from the United States. I have no doubt hon, members see the point I have in mind when I say that an import board should have discretionary powers to restrict the bringing in of pine and hardwood for that particular specification when we have an abundance of Canadian white pine, maple, birch and various hardwoods which would do a good job. I give that to illustrate my meaning when I say that we should have an import board functioning in Canada.

Necessary war supplies should also come first. In other words we should classify all the goods that come into the country and give necessary war supplies the right of way, taking other materials in the order of their importance, so that we shall not have too great an influx of luxuries to the displacement of necessary war materials. And if we had an import board we should also have an export board to help export our surpluses. We cannot possibly consume all the wheat which is grown in Canada, and our pulp and paper, our lumber and non-ferrous metals must find export markets. I say therefore that an export board would have real work to do in trying to find these export markets to absorb our surpluses. But they should be given the power to take all necessary action.

We all remember what happened in the wool industry when war was first declared. Wool was being exported by scores of carloads. The hon, member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) who is in his place, no doubt knows what took place. I have a vivid recollection of someone in a constituency adjoining his calling me up on the long distance telephone to try to get an export licence to ship seven cars of wool to the United States in order to take advantage of that market. He got them out. Many scores of other cars were got out of the country, notwithstanding the fact that we produce only twenty per cent of our requirements and have to buy elsewhere. An export board should have the necessary authority to stop the export of materials of that kind in a time of war. What obtains in that regard obtains in regard to scrap iron, copper, aluminum and other metals used in our war effort. We should always keep in mind the importance of doing everything possible to enable Britain to have sufficient dollars wherewith to buy the products which we must export.

We shall no doubt hear something about wheat to-day. Now I am always loath to start talking about wheat, but I do know that we cannot consume all that we grow. The countries that are overrun in Europe import, annually according to the statistics, anywhere from 100,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat—not from Canada but from the world's markets. If they will not buy that quantity this year and if they do not get it off the world's market, then 100,000,000 or 200,000,000 bushels of wheat will go—where? It will go into competition with the surplus wheat that we are producing. Then what are we going to do about our surplus wheat? An export board could be charged with the responsibility of meeting that difficult situation.

The Americas are cereal producing countries. Australia is a cereal producing country. It will be difficult to find markets in that half of the world, and everything possible must be done to conserve the other markets. I wish to put on the record a quotation from one of the first parliamentarians in Great Britain, made in the British House of Commons, wherein he is reported as follows with regard to exports from Britain—and by that I am thinking of imports into Canada from the mother country, because Britain will lean upon us:

In this war we are fighting with our backs to the wall. Only by exporting and by fighting, and by exporting to enable us to fight and to go on fighting, shall Britain be able to win her way to safety and victory over the powers that threaten not merely the ideals we cherish but our very existence.

That statement was confirmed by Mr. A. M. Wiseman, Britain's senior trade commissioner to Canada, in a recent address in Ottawa in which he said that Britain's fourth arm of defence in modern warfare is her export trade. He pointed out that Britain was spending a large part of her war outlay for foodstuffs and that she must in turn export her own products in order that she may have the dollars wherewith to buy imports from Canada, wheat being an outstanding example.

I come now to revenue and expenditures. We are going to extract more from the Canadian people than ever before. The Canadian people are geared up to the idea of paying more. They are anxious to do all they can and will cheerfully do all they can. I have always said in days gone by that taxation should bear down more heavily on nonproducers than on producers, and I am still of that opinion. But we must remember that those who are privileged to be non-producers, living off private incomes, are among the most patriotic of our people. A week ago last Sunday in the afternoon an elderly lady of some sixty years-I happen to be the executor of her father's estateand she has a nice income-was sitting in my home and she said to me: "I have been to Alaska, to Australia; I have been around the world. I have lived in Muskoka in the summer and I go to Florida for the winter. But there is a war on and I want to do something on behalf of the war effort.

am going to stay in Canada. I can run a sewing machine. Why can I not run a machine or work in some factory, if only for a few hours a day, so that I can do my bit voluntarily during this war?"

People who have large incomes will help, by the payment of income tax, to increase the flow of money into the treasury of Canada. We as a parliament perhaps cannot provide the ways and means, but we can encourage them to use their own initiative to get into productive enterprises of one kind and another. Let us ask our people to declare a holiday on holidays, an armistice on wasteful spending, and submit themselves to extraordinary taxation; I am satisfied that they are anxious to do so.

This income tax levy certainly tells us we are at war. But I think the minister could have gone even further in many directions. I do not know why exemptions with regard to charitable donations and so forth were granted a few years ago. Each budget seems to bring down some new exemption from taxation of someone somewhere. There is a war on. Cancel all exemptions from income tax that were given in the last few years, provided this does not conflict with the present legislation, and I am sure people will be satisfied. In the income tax form which we fill out there are four or five classes of exemptions. I make this suggestion, that when the new forms are printed, provision be made for exemption for the children who are coming from Britain, the 3,000 who were spoken of, followed by 750 more every five days, for a week or two, about 5,000 altogether —not nearly enough. Let us have more of them here, and for those good people who take them into their homes let us give the full exemption that is given for our own children. Do not even put them in the category of "other dependants"; make them part and parcel of us now. And do not put those who are charged with looking after those children in the position of having to make a separate affidavit that they have refugee children in their homes. I received a letter this morning from a constituent. She says that she is taken two guest children into her home, and that her mother is going to look after them; that she earns thirty dollars a week, and will provide for these two children and will pay her full share of taxes of all kinds, but if the government in its wisdom could see its way clear to give her, a maiden lady, an exemption for the two guest children it would be appreciated. Her name is Nellie Dunham.

The national defence tax is quite opportune, and, in the main, satisfactory. It will reach wageearners in the lower brackets. Industry and business will have to pay much of that tax. I make this plea to industry in Canada: for all those employees on your payroll who are receiving less than the cost of living as defined by the Department of Labour at Ottawa, you pay their tax. I make this further suggestion to the minister, that he allow those corporations who feel free to do that to charge that payment in their financial statements as expense against the operation of their business, or that he at least let them have an exemption for that amount.

In that regard I have another communication which points out one of the anomalies. On a return of income of $8,000, the schedule provides for a tax of $1,695, and in addition, if there are no dependants, there will have been deducted by the employer $160, making a total of $1,855. But the taxpayer receives only $7,840 in place of the $8,000 for which he is obliged to file his return. I submit it is hardly fair to be taxed on $100 when only $98 is received.

The excess profits tax received my support in the September session of parliament. Again I support it, but anything that can be done to get excess profits back into production and productive enterprise should be done; any encouragement that can be given those earning excess profits or profits of any kind to put their funds back into enterprises so that we can have expansion of national income would merit consideration by this government and by the people of Canada.

I have often thought that the orientation of taxation as it at present obtains in this country is in the wrong order. It always seemed to me that most of our money should come, as it did in days gone by, from duties imposed on the handicraft of people who are shipping goods to us, but in these strenuous times the situation is different. We now have the sales tax in first place. the sales tax a revenue of $170,000,000 is expected this year. It is not an economic tax. It is true it taxes all our people, but it raises the cost of living in this dominion, whereas a tax taken from goods brought in from other countries comes to us without in the same degree raising the cost of living or cost of production in our own country and at the same time provides more work for our own people. The sales tax does not make for more work. It is true it catches all, from the baby in the cradle to the octogenarian in his casket, and in that way perhaps there is some equality. I quite agree with it this war year, although I do not agree with an eight per cent sales tax in peace time. I would go one step further in that regard: Why not cancel all the exemptions that were given? In 1938 a great list of exemptions from sales tax was inserted in the act, and the same thing occurred in 1936 and 1937. Since the sales tax levy was raised from two per cent to eight per cent, those who received exemptions were put in a preferred position against those trades and industries which did not receive exemptions. The farmers of Canada do not mind paying sales tax on their harness, but the sales tax was taken off harness. They certainly would not object to gopher poison carrying sales tax. The building trades would not object to paying sales tax. In the old days it was said that it was taken off building materials, so that it would not cost so much to build the platforms on which parliamentarians could make their speeches, and there would be more platforms built in Canada because building materials were exempted from sales tax. Remove the sales tax exemptions; let us get another ten or twenty million dollars from that source, and I do not believe the people will object.

In his opening remarks the minister said there would be some who would say the government had not done what it ought to have done and had done what it ought not to have done; that there would be criticism of detail and that we would probably differ with the government as to the proper way of doing things. Well, I never remember a budget coming into this house that did not contain paragraph after paragraph about agriculture and the farmer. The farmer is the forgotten man in this budget. Read it through; look it over, and you will see that what I say is correct. The farmer does not appear anywhere. During fifty years fifty budgets have said that the farmer was the back-bone of the nation. This time he does not appear in the preliminary remarks at all. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) gives the answer. I do not say it, but the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg says the answer is that this is a taxation budget. Therefore, if the farmer is not mentioned in the preliminary economic survey, we will not need to mention him when it comes to the question of raising the money to pay the cost of carrying on this country this year. But the farmer wants to know what the government is doing for agriculture. He will listen with a great deal of interest to the discussion that will go on after I take my seat. He wants to participate in this national defence tax. He would like an opportunity, I am sure, to contribute his bit in a direct way. Why separate him from the rest of the community?

Mr. GARDINER: Do you think he will not get an opportunity?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): He will get it, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says, and this answers the question from [Mr. J. H. Harris.]

another point of view. I suppose that with the estimates, supplementary estimates and further supplementary estimates, in accordance with the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day, we shall witness this session one budget brought down by the Minister of Finance and a supplementary budget brought down by the Minister of Agriculture, so we shall have two chances to discuss the same problem. I hope, when the Minister of Agriculture does bring down his suggestions with regard to finding money with which to prosecute our war effort, they will not be middle-of-the-road suggestions.

Mr. GARDINER: I will deal with that in due course.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The additional taxes on tobacco, which will bring in approximately $15,500,000, will reach some farmers and a great many wageearners. But I should like to have seen consideration given, as was the case in England, to a tax on liquor. Of course there is a very heavy tax on it now, and it may be a question whether that tax has not retarded or reduced consumption, but such a tax would have had at least a psychological effect on our people. It would have appeared fairer. The average working man enjoys his tobacco and perhaps a bottle of beer on Sunday. That is about as far as he gets. With him liquor is a luxury, and he is the man whom we have to keep in the right frame of mind at this time. He may see some liquor at a wedding or a christening, but he rarely touches it at other times. In England Sir John Simon imposed a tax of a shilling a quart. We consume ten million quarts a year in Canada, I am ashamed to say, and a tax of 50 cents on the present consumption would have increased our revenue by another $5,000,000, which would tend to bridge the deficit we are approaching.

The reports of the tariff board which were laid on the table rather balance one another. Just what revenue might be obtained is a little doubtful. But I am opposed to the lowering of the bracket in which tea appears, so that tea at 22½ cents a pound now has to pay the 7½ cent tax rather than the 5 cent tax which it paid previously. Tea is an empire product in connection with which, so far as I know, there was no reference to the tariff board. However, since the government have seen fit to increase the tax on tea, I ask the minister why he did not put into effect the recommendation contained in the tariff board report on application No. 99, which was tabled in this chamber on April 13, 1939. I shall read that recommendation in a moment or two, but a tax of only half the United States tax would bring into the treasury of Canada at least $5,000,000 without in any way disturbing the economic life of Canada but rather helping it in many ways. To-day we are importing some 250 million pounds of vegetable oils yearly, and we are producing about the same amount of creamery butter.

This matter was brought to the attention of the government and the tariff board because of the fact that in August, 1936, the United States introduced an amendment to its revenue act, known as the Bailey amendment, which imposed an excise tax on vegetable oils entering the United States from foreign countries, amounting to 3 cents a pound and, in some instances to 31 cents a pound. The net result was that our surplus animal fat products could not find their way to the Chicago market, which controls that industry as it has controlled it for the last half century. The result was that the market for those commodities in Canada collapsed. At the same time several billions of pounds of vegetable oils were backed up on the world's markets by that enactment. The Canadian market remained free, and imports into Canada jumped from year to year, by leaps and bounds. The 90,000,000 pounds of 1936 has now reached the staggering figure of 250,000,000 pounds a year. The lard industry in Canada is demoralized. Dairy butter production in this country has sunk to half the level which obtained ten years ago. Shortening and vegetable oils are taking the place of lard and butter which were used previously. Butter was in heavy demand in the cake industry, and lard in the biscuit and bread industry. But that butter and lard has been replaced by vegetable oils which enter this country free.

The dairy interests of Canada realized the danger, and as a result the National Dairy Council of Canada of its own volition passed a resolution at Winnipeg stating that something must be done to stop this tremendous influx. Other interests in Canada producing lard and other fats held along similar views. The Hon. Mr. Dunning, the then incumbent of the seat now occupied by the minister, suggested that those interests combine their briefs and make application to the tariff The brief of the National Dairy Council of Canada represented 300,000 dairy farmers, the creameries of Canada, the cheese interests and the live stock producers' organizations, along with that section of the packing house industry which was not interested in the production of vegetable oil shortenings. All the packing houses in Canada, with the exception of the big two, supported the application, and as a result a hearing was arranged in December, 1936. A very strong case was presented by the applicants, and they were met by strong opposition. The late Mr. Justice Sedgewick presided at the hearings. Whereas the application is recited in a small section of the volume, the rebuttal evidence given by the high-priced economists in Canada, who were trying to break down the case of the dairy farmers, filled 90 per cent of the volume of evidence. Four days were consumed in hearing so-called experts and economists who were trying to break down the merits of the application. They failed to break it down, and after many proddings by certain members of this honourable house a finding was brought in and tabled.

I purpose putting that finding on record, because I say that we have here over $5,000,000 in revenue which the minister has not seen fit to pick up. I quote the following as the finding of the tariff board in respect of application 99:

The revised schedules on animal and vegetable oils listed above are suggested on condition that there be imposed excise taxes on vegetable oils used in the manufacture of vegetable shortening, lard compound and soap. These taxes could be imposed by inserting in schedule II to section 80 of the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 179, R.S. 1927.

(4) Vegetable shortening and lard compound: on the vegetable oil content thereof, by weight,

3 cents per pound.

(5) Soaps of all kinds: on the vegetable oil content thereof, by weight, 2 cents per pound.

Taxes in the United States on these commodities ran anywhere from three and onehalf cents to as high as 8 cents per pound, while we were asking only for this moderate tax. The finding continues:

The consumption of vegetable oils in the vegetable shortening industry amounts to approximately 125 million pounds annually. An excise tax of 3 cents per pound on the vegetable oil content of vegetable shortening will yield on the basis of the 1937 consumption figures a revenue of approximately $3,340,000 per year.

The consumption of vegetable oils in soap manufacture amounts to approximately 60 million pounds annually. A tax of 2 cents per pound on the vegetable oil content of soap would yield on the basis of the 1937 consumption figures a revenue of approximately $1,360,000 per year.

That will make a total of $4,700,000, based on imports of 125,000,000 pounds, plus 60,000,000 pounds, or a total of 185,000,000 pounds. But since then the importation has risen to 240,000,000 pounds, with the result that instead of receiving $4,700,000, we might just as well be receiving a sum close to $6,000,000; the treasury of Canada might be receiving that amount each year in respect of this one item alone.

Then, mark carefully this next quotation from the finding of the tariff board:

The imposition of these excise taxes will not prohibit importations of vegetable oil.

I now ask hon. members to mark carefully my next observation in this connection: If our Canadian farmers, whether they produced lard from the hog, tallow from the steer, or dairy butter at the farm, had been put on a parity with the United States farmer, in respect of this taxation, then the government would have been fair to that Canadian farmer. Had that condition obtained, we would have \$10,000,000 coming into our treasury this year-and I defy anybody to refute those figures. Had that been done, the government would have inspired some confidence among our farmers. Instead of lard selling at  $5\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound in tank cars, as it is selling to-day, it would have received the benefit of the tax against its competitor, namely vegetable oils and shortening, and the farmer would have obtained the advantage. Perhaps he would not have had the advantage of the whole three cents a pound, as suggested, but he would have had a good portion of it.

From every hog we would have about 30 pounds of fat at three cents per pound, bringing the extra value to almost $1. On 6,000,000 hogs there would have been $6,000,000 more to place to the credit of the Canadian farmer. The tariff board, an instrument of this administration, made the recommendation to which I have referred. It was tabled a year ago, but no action has been taken. We have missed an opportunity of bringing in $10,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Action was taken on it. Mr. HOMUTH: Reverse action.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): One further observation I should like to make is this: There are about four interests in Canada which control this industry-two packers and two soap makers. They are big and influential interests. The other evening I heard the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) talking about interests. He said that a certain gentleman exercised a sinister influence because he was one of the big interests. That is what he meant. I am not saying that these big interests exercise any sinister influence. Their heads are loyal citizens and they are doing a great work for Canada in these difficult times. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) knew what the true situation was with regard to what the hon, member for Témiscouata said, and he should have risen in his place and stopped the hon, member for Témiscouata from vilifying Mr. Purvis, the former head of Canadian Industries Limited.

Perhaps in some of their workings this great industry has become monopolistic and it may exert influence which is not always beneficial. If influence has been brought to bear upon this administration or upon any of its servants—I refer now to the high commissioner's office in London-in order that there may be accumulating profits from the use of foreign oils rather than our own products, in order that these profits may go on without let and hindrance during the war time, then someone is going to answer for it. As an example of the influence that is brought to bear, I should like to quote from a requisition issued by the Department of Munitions and Supply for beef, bacon, fresh pork, mutton and shorten-The shortening is requisitioned in one pound prints, the most expensive way in which to buy this product. A large percentage of the cost of putting out one pound prints is taken up in the container itself and the cost of advertising. It was specified that it must be manufactured from pure vegetable oil, that lard will not be accepted for shortening.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I have read it so often that it is firmly fixed in my mind. The words "lard will not be acceptable" are underlined in the requisition. Since when were we not able to make pies with the use of lard as shortening? Since when were we not able to fry eggs in bacon fat? Since when were we not able to cook French-fried potatoes with the use of dripping and lard and fats natural to this country? Since when were we not able to make doughnuts by frying them in fat produced in Canada? Whence came the influence to have it specified in that way in this requisition for requirements for our troops?

It is still being done. I can tell this house where some of the influence comes from. This is a high-powered organization. They make a large profit out of this product. It costs them four to five cents a pound and they refine it and sell it for two pounds for a quarter. Because of that large spread they are able to put experts into dietitian's establishments. They even exert some control over what our universities shall teach in the way of dietetics in order that more and more of this product may be used. If a man operates a bake shop and is using Canadian fats of any kind for shortening purposes, they will put an expert in free of charge to show him how to use vegetable oil. If a man is using two per cent lard in making bread, they will put in an expert to show him how to use this vegetable oil. They are efficient and in their efficiency they bring influence to bear. If the war were over, I should like to make some research into certain activities of the Department of Agriculture, in order to find out how influence is brought to bear by these interests which I have mentioned. I am not complaining because they are doing a great service for Canada, but I bring this matter to the attention of the government at this time. I charge the government with the responsibility for not collecting that $10,000,000.

The Canadian people were rather expecting a tax on gasoline and petroleum products. On an average, one and one-half billion gallons of petroleum products are imported into this country each year. A tax of one cent a gallon would have given us another $15,000,000, and the Canadian people would not have objected. There is a federal tax in the United States, and the people in Great Britain pay a very heavy tax. Our people were ready to pay a tax on gasoline. It is true the war exchange tax act imposes a ten per cent tax, but, as I said before, that is simply the spread between pegged and free money.

I should like to summarize my suggestions. A tax of fifty cents a quart on liquor would have brought in another $5,000,000. The implementing of the recommendation of the tariff board in connection with vegetable oils would have brought in another $5,000,000. A tax of a cent a gallon on petroleum products would have meant another $15,000,000. This makes a total of $25,000,000, but I would go even further. I would put the tax on liquor at the highest point at which it could be placed without stopping the revenue. I would get every possible bit of taxation. I believe we could raise that to $10,000,000. Then, in connection with vegetable oil, if our farmers were placed in the same position as United States farmers, another $10,000,000 could be obtained. A tax of two cents a gallon on gasoline would give us $30,000,000. This makes a total of $50,000,000 which could have been extracted from the Canadian people in order to help this war effort. This could have been done without our people being greatly worried or concerned, without their being panic stricken and without making them tend to put their savings in the old sock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, in reference to the summary which I gave showing how we could add during the current year some $50,000,000 to our revenue and avoid the necessity of taking from our people, by way of borrowing and freezing up, a large sum of money, but rather add the extra taxation which would come into the treasury from the cancellation of the sales tax exemptions of the last five years, and also the cancellation of the income tax exemptions, while it is rather difficult to estimate how much more revenue we could get, it would certainly be very considerable. I am satisfied that the grand total would approximate one-third of the deficit for which we have budgeted; it would emphasize the fact that we are at war; and it would be good medicine for the Canadian people.

The next best way to conserve funds in a treasury is to save what we have. Non-war expenditures, the minister says, are being reduced by $77,000,000, over three-fourths of which represents the absence of expenditures on public works. I am in accord with that action, and I believe that a similar course should be taken in the case of personnel. According to the estimates, the civil service numbers, in round figures, thirty thousand; it was the same last year and the year before. But this year, in connection with the war effort, we have added without let or hindrance hundreds of employees in the new service of munitions and supply. By all means put on a staff in that department, and do a job, but let us keep our heads. If we have made a great saving on public works, surely some effective use can be made of the employees, with their experience of many years in the putting up of buildings, and of the plans in their archives, and they are good plans, because most public buildings which have been erected in Canada in the last ten years are a credit to the department. Nevertheless, although they have the plans and specifications, we find that much delay has occurred in drawing new specifications for buildings which are required in connection with the government's war effort. The point I wish to make is that architects, engineers, designers, draftsmen and estimaters connected with the public works department are not engaged in the putting up of new buildings this year. There must be quite a large personnel, therefore, which could have been drafted into the service of the Department of Munitions and Supply, thus saving a considerable amount of money. A day or two ago I put on record certain statistics in regard to personnel. I was amazed to find that in the Department of Public Works, the department which the minister rose to defend last evening, the number of employees has risen from 1,754 last year to 1,771 this year.

I should like to make reference along the same line to other departments of government which seem to be drifting. The ministry has failed to place at the head of the departments I have in mind men with sufficient driving force and initiative. Take, for example, the Post Office Department. Under none of the governments which we have had in the past decade has there been a minister who has given continued adequate direction and driving force to the work of that department. It has drifted along, and one result is that the personnel has increased from 10,800 to 10,900. What I have said of that department applies also to the Department of Transport. It is not fair to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to administer also the Department of Transport. The government has been lax in not placing at the head of the latter department a minister who can give it all his attention. Its importance in these difficult days need not be emphasized. As the hon, member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said a few days ago, in that department or somewhere in the government service there should be a traffic manager to control the work of transport and give right of way to all activities having to do with the furtherance of our war effort.

There will be a vacancy shortly for a Minister of Finance. I hope that a man with some vision and initiative, one who realizes the difficult position we are in, will take charge of that department immediately the present minister vacates it. He has done a splendid job of work as far as he has gone, although, as I intimated in my earlier remarks, in my opinion he has not gone far enough. I hope that the Prime Minister will carry out the pledge he gave to this house two or three nights ago when he said that his administration was a truly national government inasmuch as it represented 180 of the constituencies in Canada. He went further and declared that any constructive suggestion from any part of the house would be given serious consideration by the government, and that in this time of stress and strain this truly national government would give effect to worthwhile suggestions no matter where they might come from. Well, I suggest that the summary of other moneys that could be raised in Canada be given consideration by the government.

I make another suggestion. If it were possible to take a secret ballot of the members of this house, if it were possible for the members to divorce themselves entirely from any influence whatever, for example, from the liquor interests in relation to the liquor tax suggestions that I have made, from the packing industry in relation to the traffic in vegetable oil and the suggestions I have made in that regard, from the gasoline interests of Canada in relation to the suggestions I have made on that subject-if it were possible, I say, for all hon. members in this house to dissociate themselves entirely from these several interests and to take an independent view of, and give a secret ballot on, these questions and on the question of the sales tax exemptions and the exemptions in connection with income tax, then, if my judgment in these summaries did not carry two-thirds of the considered opinion of this honourable assembly, I misjudge the feelings of hon. members during this difficult time.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) moves over to his new position as Minister of National Defence, he will face a difficult task. I presume the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) will have a department entirely his own, and I do not know whether he will be answerable to the Minister of National Defence. Whether he is or not, however, each of these departments should go forward with energy and industry on behalf of Canada. I would ask these two ministers to consider the suggestion made some days ago by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) with regard to a department of economic warfare, with someone charged with the responsibility of looking after economic warfare as far as Canada is concerned. Perhaps, also, as a subdivision of one of these ministries, as in Great Britain, there might be a branch to take care of home defence and of home security. There should be some one to assume full responsibility for that very important feature of our national safety.

In the last ten months we have failed dismally to give the people of Canada some idea of what will be done in that respect. Municipalities and provinces have been harassed and worried about the situation. The freedom with which firearms are sold by retail stores in the large centres of population is something that concerns those charged with municipal administration; and when we find aliens being interned, their premises being searched, as in two of the large cities within the last month, and rifles and rounds of ammunition being found on these premises and confiscated, I say to the Department of Justice that they should draft into legislation immediately some provision for licensing every single individual, whether he be a Canadian or an alien, if he is permitted to have rifles or firearms of any I suggest, further, that the description. department should quietly see to it, when the hunting season arrives and there are tourists in our midst, that it knows who are carrying firearms, and have such persons submit to the law, if such a law is enacted. We must have an active branch of the service to look after our home affairs. If we have such a branch, we shall go a long way towards allaying the feeling of unrest which exists among the people that all is not well.

The new ministry of national service should immediately take in hand the matter of voluntary service. In answer to a question I asked the other day, the statement was made that 15,000 persons or thereabouts had expressed a desire to render voluntary services to Canada. What is being done with this greatpotential factor which would be of real service to the country? It is indexed into 150 major classifications, into some 300 trades, but it seems to be pigeon-holed. There are 550 classes of people who have been indexed, comprising 15,000 of the finest people in Canada, technicians of all kinds, citizens who are well trained in certain lines, and only the odd score of them have been accepted at a dollar a year. This new department should immediately take hold of this nucleus and from it expand Canada's national effort so as to give our people a chance to be of real service. I am of the opinion that the organization of such voluntary service could be entirely selfsustaining.

We have letters coming from all sources asking us to take advantage of the services that are being offered. I read in the Ottawa Journal, under date of June 20, that 700 school teachers had volunteered their services to register men under Canada's proposed mobilization scheme. The chairman of the board of education in Hamilton addressed himself to the board of munitions announcing that they were ready to give their services in any capacity. They do not want to take holidays. I have a letter from a school-teacher who is anxious to work for her country free of charge during her summer holidays. In Britain something is being done in this regard. The entire population, it is suggested in a resolution submitted by thirty or forty British members of parliament to the Prime Minister, should be divided into armed forces and others, the latter being subdivided into producing groups to be kept at regular jobs, and non-producers subject to immediate call to serve in any capacity.

I had the privilege of presenting to this house—and even though I was out of order I managed to get it embalmed on the record of the house—a petition from eleven thousand people who were anxious to do something on behalf of Canada. Since then I have received a copy of a letter addressed to the Hon. Mr. Power, Minister of National Defence, under date of June 12, which reads as follows:

At a meeting of the above association (Toronto auxiliary defence unit No. 1) comprising twenty-eight organizations in the east end of Toronto, it was decided to write you offering our help in any way you might suggest.

The purpose of the association is to stimulate our war effort, and to cooperate with the proper authorities in home defence. Our city is located on lake Ontario and is vulnerable from any effort to cause trouble which might be directed from New York state. Recently at a mass meeting eleven thousand citizens signed a petition that was sent to Ottawa.

If the government are planning any national registration we would be glad to cooperate and to undertake the registration in ward eight.

Included in our association are the members of two posts of the Canadian Legion, and we would ask permission to organize and drill a home defence unit, also that we might be permitted to raise funds through theatre parties etcetera to equip this unit.

Assuring you of our support, and hoping for your cooperation, we are,

Yours truly,
Toronto Auxiliary Defence
Unit No. 1.

On June 13, I received a letter from the Canadian Progress club in Toronto, with three sheets of individual signatures, some seventy-five in number. This came to me out of the blue: I knew nothing of it. It reads:

At a meeting of the Canadian Progress club, Toronto down-town, held to-day, the members unanimously decided to send a joint letter to the Minister of Defence and the members for Toronto and the Yorks, urging that in view of the present emergency everything possible be done forthwith to further Canada's war effort, so that it may be completely worthy of the country's capacity and of the spirit of its citizens.

And this is the important part:

We pledge ourselves individually and as members of the Canadian Progress club, Toronto down-town, to support to the limit of our abilities every call and demand that may be made upon us. We earnestly hope that some definite task may be given to our club, and to each and every one of the undersigned members. As a Canadian service club we stand ready to serve our country to the limit.

That is signed by the president, S. Hume Crawford.

These are substantial citizens, and I will see to it that their request and their signatures get into the hands of the responsible ministers.

Then from the west end of Toronto I got a letter from another Canadian Progress club, along much the same lines. They say:

We have taken the privilege of petitioning the hon. Minister of National Defence and for your information we enclose a copy of our communication to the minister.

They also say:

We pledge ourselves individually and as members of the Canadian Progress club, Toronto West, to support to the limit of our abilities every call and demand that may be made upon us.

I have another suggestion which emanated from a discussion that took place in Toronto over the week-end. We have 245 members of parliament. We draw an indemnity for twelve months' work. We work about twelve weeks, and sometimes think we are underpaid. Parliament will soon be prorogued. We have just come through a dominion election. We know our constituencies. Why can we not take charge of our individual constituencies and relieve the government and the treasury of the cost and burden of the national registration? We have our bureau of statistics, and the chief electoral officer. I hope the bureau of statistics has the necessary cards already printed for the information required. The chief electoral officer could assist in that regard; between him and the bureau of statistics the cards could be prepared, and surely we members of parliament would be glad to step in and take charge of our individual constituencies. It might cost us something. Let us conscript the war chests of the parties in this house and use them to pay the cost.

Mr. GARDINER: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation seems to have one.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): In like manner as income tax is not collected on an overdraft, of course those who have no chest will not be conscripted. But let those war chests be used as some of the funds to pay the cost. Some parties, I am sure, could subscribe a substantial overdraft, and the same parties that have the overdraft are the parties that will do a real job of work if the government asks us to assist in this regard.

I have a letter signed by James Labbett, treasurer of ward eight, central executive council, Toronto, stating:

I thought it would be a good time for the government to save some money by having each M.P. take over his riding and arranging to have the registration taken by his election organization, all work to be done gratis. The members should all have enough good men and women who would be willing to do this without pay. I know that I can get enough from our riding even if we have to man all subdivisions. By doing this the only cost would be the printing of cards, etcetera.

These are a few suggestions. In closing, I should like to summarize some of them. Tell the country that we in future are going to defend Canada. Let business make capital expenditures with confidence; we will continue to maintain, modernize and enlarge our defence system. Present contracts will be honoured, further contracts entered into, coastal defences maintained and modernized. future all young men will receive military training. Equipment and clothing will be purchased continuously. Great Britain will be assisted to the utmost. The cabinet will be strengthened by the appointment of ministers to the Post Office Department, the Department of Transport and the Department of Finance immediately. An economic warfare division will be considered. Home defence and home security will be given immediate attention. A national war service ministry will be set up, and voluntary service registration put to use on behalf of Canada. Let us have a holiday on holidays and the spare time of our citizens be put to work on behalf of Canada. Winning the war is all that matters, all that ever mattered. Organize an "all out" war effort; think and act now for ourselves; give the signal, "full speed ahead." Gear all action to our war effort. Do not depend on the Monroe doctrine; do not expect that we can shelter ourselves forever under the wing of the British navy. And remember that the eagle's nest is rather crowded and that we should not be a cuckoo bird and try to crawl into that nest.

Every true Canadian is anxious to do something. The word "sacrifice," as the Minister of Finance well said, has a much nobler meaning than is given to it in common use. It is the contribution that our soldiers, sailors and airmen are making for us. All Canadians, from whatever race they spring, will not shrink from their fair contribution. New Canadians who came here in the last few generations to find freedom and liberty, together with French-Canadians who were Canadians long before some of the rest of us were, know no other place that would give them the same freedom that Canada gives them, and they will fight for it. Those who have their origin a few generations back in the British isles, will all rise with the others as one man and see that Great Britain and Canada shall not fail, that freedom shall not perish, that democracy shall survive. With reverence and humility I say: Fear God; with loyalty, honour our king; with sincerity serve our country. Canada, carry on. Carry on, Canadians.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon when motions were called I endeavoured, under standing order 31, to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the action taken by the government to establish minimum prices for certain grades of cash wheat in store at Fort William and Port Arthur to December 31 of this year. After a little discussion you ruled that there might be other occasions on which this matter could be discussed. Finally the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) graciously suggested that I might follow the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who has just taken his seat, and that I might say anything I desired to say with respect to this all important question during this budget debate. This puts me to some extent in an unfortunate position, because I had not intended to speak on the budget at this stage. I had expected to have the week-end to prepare something rather different from what I have to say to-night. However, I may have another opportunity to speak, if there should be an amendment moved, which I understand to be quite possible.

I shall now refer briefly to the subject I desired to draw to the attention of the government and of this house this afternoon. About nine o'clock last evening I was in my office in this building when the telephone rang. A member of the press called to ask me if I knew anything about what had taken place on the Winnipeg grain exchange yesterday. He said he had a telegram from a newspaper in Wall street, New York, asking for a 200 word message with regard to the meaning of the action taken yesterday. He came to my room with the telegram, but I knew nothing about the matter and could give him no information. I think he might better have gone to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). However, in the air mail this morning, about an hour after the regular mail was distributed, I received a letter enclosing a copy of a notice that was posted on the bulletin board in the trading room of the Winnipeg grain exchange yesterday morning, as follows:

Winnipeg Grain Exchange

This would indicate that in order to receive  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents over what is termed the fixed price of 70 cents, the farmer will have to hold his wheat for about four months after the new crop comes in. Then the notice goes on:

The minimum prices for other contract grades shall be at the deliverable discounts, which are as follows:

	No. 1 northern
No. 2 northern	. 3
No. 3 northern	. 8
No. 4 wheat	. 10
No. 4 special
No. 1 C.W. garnet	. 12
No. 2 C.W. garnet	. 15

Then it states:

The aforesaid minimum prices shall apply as from June 26, 1940, at 11.30 a.m., and shall remain in force until cancelled or changed by authority of the council.

Also enclosed in this air mail letter was a copy of a broadcast sent out from the exchange at noon yesterday. The letter indicated also that as soon as this notice was posted the members of the exchange telegraphed all their agents in western Canada. The broadcast was as follows:

To all elevator agents in west:

The wheat market is now at "pegged prices" established at request of the federal government, and we are unable to hedge country wheat purchases at present. Therefore, all elevator agents are instructed to cease purchasing wheat, effective immediately, and all open market wheat prices are hereby cancelled.

You can, however, continue to accept wheat for wheat board account up to the five thousand bushel limitation, also for wheat cooperative marketing account, or for storage.

If a customer wishes to make sale of wheat, you must wire the party's name, bushels, grade and position, and if and when sale is made, you will receive confirming wire.

All orders will be handled in rotation.

The broadcast was made on behalf of the Alberta pool elevators, the Manitoba pool elevators, the Saskatchewan pool elevators, the United Grain Growers Limited, and the North-West Line Elevators Association. I am also informed that when the notice was posted in the exchange yesterday morning there was no trading done; there was no buying of wheat, even by the domestic milling companies. I should think the government must be rather worried when they allow such action to be taken without due notice to the public or to this house.

At this point may I ask the question: What will happen to coarse grains? No one knows. But it was stated yesterday in the broadcast that the price of oats, where the freight rate was 21 cents a hundredweight, would be 16½ cents for C.W.; 11 cents for feed oats; 17 cents for C.W. barley; 12 cents for 3 feed barley; rye, 24 cents for C.W., and 17 cents for 4 C.W. Since May 16 many hon, members on this side of the house have on different occasions tried to get a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). We have asked what they proposed to do with respect to making amendments to certain legislation, and the only reply we could get was that they had the matter under consideration.

We are now in the final stages of the session, and we have seen no indication of any kind of any changes, or any action that may be taken by the government with regard to the marketing of the coming crop. The order paper is now practically clear, and yet we have heard nothing from the government.

Yesterday, however, the government policy was announced-not here in the House of Commons, but on the Winnipeg grain exchange. That is not treating members of parliament fairly. We are sent here to consider important matters connected with marketing, and so on, and we have endeavoured to obtain a statement of policy. It was only proper that any change in policy, or any definite policy should have been announced here, so that hon. members would have had an opportunity to discuss it. This may have been the middle course, however, suggested by one of the cabinet ministers, but in my opinion the first statement should have been made right here in the House of Commons.

Wheat production and problems connected with the marketing of wheat should be considered here. This action by the government, without notice to parliament, has created an unprecedented situation in connection with the marketing of wheat. What have we to-day? We have an open market, so to speak. In Winnipeg we have the announcement that they will not buy wheat. Their agents are definitely instructed not to buy any wheat, and that order took effect immediately. Apparently the wheat board is not functioning properly. When the minister replies, I should like him to tell the house who is really in control of the Canadian wheat board. Where did they get their instructions? dictating their policy?

An uncertainty has been created with regard to prices for the new crop. Some hon. members on this side of the house for two or three weeks have been endeavouring to get a statement from the ministry respecting the handling of the new crop. I say that at this time we should have a definite statement of policy from the minister. That statement could have been given in the budget, because on former occasions that has been done.

The hon. member for Danforth has said that the farmer has been forgotten in the budget. On previous occasions he has not been forgotten. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) did deal with some matters pertaining to the cost to the country of carrying the wheat, and I say that when he was making that statement, a definite announcement of policy might have been made. We should have an explanation from the minister telling us whether or not there will be any amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. The Minister of Agriculture promised in February, March and April to the people of western Canada that amendments would be made. I am informed further that an announcement of policy was made recently on the grain exchange to the effect that the minister had promised that during this session an amendment would be introduced which would strike out the clause limiting to 5,000 bushels the amount which could be delivered to the board. That is proof that he had in mind some amendments.

We know that the producers in western Canada have asked for full government control. It is not necessary for me to recite now the numerous resolutions which have been passed by different organizations in western Canada, and particularly the great grain handling organizations, such as the pools in the different provinces. They have asked that the government take over full control of marketing of all grain—not only wheat, but coarse grains, too. Then, within the last few months, and particularly since the war broke out, they have asked that the grain exchange should be closed for the duration of the war. At the same time they have asked for a fair

I agree with the hon, member for Danforth when he says that the farmers are not asking for anything unreasonable when they ask for fair treatment. They have asked for a fair price, particularly at this time when apparently there is only one market and only one buyer. I say they should know what that price is to be. Why should there be any intermediary between the wheat board and the British buyer? I cannot see why, unless it is to keep that organization in business, and to pay them certain service charges which I do not think they earn. I do not believe those charges are earned, especially when we have a board which is getting all the wheat. I believe great savings could be made in respect of those storage charges.

In the session of 1939 I made what I considered were constructive suggestions, by way of amendments to different bills. I paid particular attention to Bill No. 63, which involved an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and fixed the price at 70 cents. On that occasion I suggested a price of 80 cents, and would have gone even further. I made the further suggestion, however, that whether the price was 70 cents or 80 cents, or whatever it might be, there should be added to it each month one cent to encourage the farmer to hold his wheat on his farm. What would that mean? It would mean that much of the storage now being paid to elevator companies would be retained by the farmers who held their wheat on the farm. Of course no one would suggest that they could hold all of it, but if they could hold one-third or one-quarter it would effect a great saving.

On February 9, during the campaign I received a report from the bureau of statistics. I had written asking them respecting the amount of wheat then in storage and being carried by the government, and on February 9 I received a report that the Canadian visible wheat in store at interior and terelevators amounted to 332,000,000 minal bushels. It was stated also that the storage charges amounted to $110,700 a day. On that basis it works out at $3,332,000 a month or about $40,000,000 a year. There may not be that amount of wheat in store for a year, but we know there will be nearly that much. That is three and a half times the amount of the bonus which will be paid to the farmers in crop failure or partial crop failure areas throughout the west.

If the farmer were paid the one cent per month per bushel that the elevator companies are paid, even though he held only one quarter of his wheat in store, it would mean a tremendous advantage to him. The saving to the government would not be very much because they would be paying to the farmer the one cent which they now pay to the elevator companies, but there would be a saving on the 70 cents a bushel invested in the wheat the minute it is delivered to the board or to the elevator company. That is, if the wheat were not delivered until December or January or February, there would be an interest saving for that time on the 70 cents. That saving would be considerable.

I have another complaint to make against the board. They made an agreement with the members of the grain exchange that storage charges would start on the day the wheat was delivered to the elevator in the country, or at least on the following day. These charges start the moment the board in Winnipeg receives the duplicate ticket as issued by the grain company. The storage starts just as soon as that ticket is registered in the office of the board. Those hon, members who are not familiar with the grain business may not know just what is involved in that. Under the Canada Grain Act the farmer is entitled to fifteen days' free storage after his wheat is delivered to the interior elevator. He can allow it to remain free in the elevator for fifteen days, after which time he must give instructions that it be shipped out or agree to pay storage. The time of transit to Winnipeg is seventeen days on the average. I think it runs twelve days from Manitoba, seventeen from Saskatchewan and twenty-two from Alberta, but the average is seventeen days. This means that the wheat is in box cars for seventeen days. Under the Canada Grain Act the farmer is entitled to ten days' free storage at Fort William. Under this agreement storage is actually being paid for the time the grain is in box cars. This is something that was never heard of before under any government or at any time. Fifteen and 17 and 10 amount to 42. At a thirtieth of a cent a day, this mean that the companies receive at least a cent and a third per bushel for what should ordinarily be free storage. When one considers that 330,000,000 bushels are involved, he will see what a nice gift these fellows in Winnipeg have been given. I protest vigorously against that arrangement.

I have another complaint to make with respect to the service charge of four cents a bushel which is allowed the grain men by the board. The first charge by the elevator company is 13 cents a bushel, and then there is the ordinary commission of one cent a bushel. They may be entitled to the  $1\frac{3}{4}$  cents a bushel, but what do they do for the other commission of one cent? About all they do is to hand the wheat over to the board. They should not be allowed more than two cents at the most. This would mean they would receive the  $1\frac{3}{4}$  cents a bushel elevator fee and a trifle more for looking after the papers and delivering them. There is no reason why they should receive any more because they do not even find a purchaser or make a sale.

Mr. CRERAR: That is for the wheat the elevator companies purchase outright for cash.

Mr. PERLEY: That is for the wheat which they take into their elevators and hold for the board. They receive this four cent service charge, which is an absolute misnomer.

Mr. CRERAR: Are they not responsible for weights and grades?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, they are, but the 1½ cent fee covers that. The wheat policy of this government is in a hopeless mess. There has been no real report made since 1936. No one knows just what is the position of the wheat board or just what finally happened with respect to the 1938 crop. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech gave us some indication of what the loss might be, but no report has been made from which one can intelligently discover the exact position of the government and the board with respect to the 1938 and 1939 crops.

An advisory committee should be set up at once. If we had such a committee we would not be faced with the spectacle with which we were faced yesterday. The definite promise was made during the campaign that provision would be made for the appointment of this committee as soon as the house met. I think the minister should tell us who is in control of the wheat board and who are the advisers of the board in Winnipeg. We should be told what members of the cabinet make up the advisory committee, how often it meets with the board and so on.

The farmers of western Canada have never been satisfied with the price of 70 cents a bushel which was set for wheat. I can recall the discussion on Bill No. 63 which took place last year, but I am not going to take the time to refer to it now. All I shall do is to recall to hon, members the protests which were received from all over the west against the setting of the price at 70 cents. We had a resolution submitted by a western committee headed by Mr. Bracken as well as a petition signed by some 600,000 people of western Canada. The farmers want a fixed parity price comparable with the price they must pay for the products of industry. The farmers are willing and anxious to do their part, but they want an equal sacrifice by all. I understand that last September the British government made a suggestion to this government, when they appointed Mr. Rank, that they would be willing to consider a fair price. Possibly the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) will shake his head. He made a trip overseas on behalf of the government to discuss the matter. But before he did so, I understand a definite proposal was made, when Mr. Rank was appointed sole purchaser of wheat and other food cereals for the United Kingdom and France, that if the government would close the Winnipeg grain exchange the allies would consent to a fair price. I make that statement on good authority.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What is the authority?

Mr. PERLEY: My authority is that a note was sent to me in this chamber by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Euler, inviting me to go to his office; I was with him there an hour, and he told me the story, and informed me that his colleagues in the cabinet would not allow him to do what he was asked to do.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When was that? Mr. PERLEY: Now, sir, we discussed the price.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): When was that?

Mr. PERLEY: If the hon, member would just keep his seat for a little while—

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I am not rising. I just asked when this took place.

Mr. PERLEY: This happened about the 9th or 10th of September last, just before we went home.

Mr. ROWE: Page Euler!

Mr. PERLEY: I asked him about the price. I suggested what it might be. He said he could not tell me that. I offered a guess. He, naturally, would not tell me. But he did tell me it was practically agreed that the grain exchange would remain open until the price of wheat reached about a dollar and a quarter.

Those are the circumstances. I say this, that had this government and the wheat board made a reasonable, businesslike suggestion to the British government last September, we would have had a much better price than seventy cents; we would have had nearer a dollar for the duration of the war, and we would not have had the mess we have to-day.

Without going into any long argument on this matter, because I should like to refer to a few other subjects of importance to the west, I contend that we are entitled to a statement from the minister. He should tell us whether there is to be any amendment of the wheat board act. We in the west were given to understand that there would be an amendment, as soon as the house met, making provision for an interim payment.

In this connection I desire to lodge a vigorous protest concerning the method which the government employed in announcing their policy to the end of December 31 of this year. We should have to-day an announcement by the minister as to how the government proposes to handle the 1940 crop. We should know what the price is likely to be. A full report should be tabled with respect to the 1938 crop and the final disposal of it, so that the matter can be discussed upon an appropriate item of the estimates. We should have a full report to date on the 1939 crop, showing exactly, from a financial point of view, where the government stands with respect to the wheat they are carrying, what advances have been made, and so forth. Not since 1936, may I point out, have we had a proper report. There is not an hon, member who knows to-day what the government's policy is. Certainly none of us knows where we stand financially with respect to this whole wheat business. I say that this parliament is entitled to know. It was due to hon, members to have this matter discussed long before now, and to know the reasons for the action which was taken. Will there be any amendment made to existing legislation? We should know that to-night. Will an advisory committee be appointed? Give us an explanation why the action was taken yesterday which was taken.

Under war conditions there should be full government control. If I had the time I could show, by quotations from the evidence presented to the Turgeon commission, that in an emergency or a crisis of this kind no useful purpose is served by the existing organization, or grain exchange. Evidently, to judge by a statement broadcast by the Winnipeg grain exchange yesterday to their agents, they themselves have decided to quit business. What is the government going to do about the matter? I think we should know.

Let me say a word generally with respect to the budget. This is a war-time measure, and I do not know that I have very much criticism to make. As far as the west is concerned, it does not affect the farmer very There is a substantial increase in income tax, but, as we know, that will not affect him. I believe it was the general expectation in the west that there would be some increase in taxation, particularly in the sales tax. We are pleased to see that there is not, but if there had been I believe the farmers are patriotic enough to have taken it graciously, because they are willing to do their part. However, we have no complaint to make with respect to the new taxes. Certain customs changes may affect us to some extent.

The all important matter, and one with which the budget does not deal definitely enough, is the situation of internal trade at the present time. The hon, member for Danforth made the statement that, with the exception of wheat, of which only thirty per cent is consumed at home, at least ninety per cent of our primary products are absorbed by the domestic market. He dealt with the important question of developing industry. I believe that this government should turn its attention to the encouragement of industrial development in the west. If action in a businesslike fashion were taken in that direction, much could be done to relieve unemployment.

Last year, speaking on the budget debate, I made one or two suggestions which at that time were regarded as rather drastic. I proposed that we should start a beneficial circle by increasing the price of primary products in Canada. I would not hesitate to double prices. That would start a beneficial circle in the domestic market. I believe, if you double the price of hides, wool, and other agricultural products, it would mean very little to the cost of a pair of shoes or a suit of clothes, but it would increase the circulation of money in our home markets and relieve unemployment. I went so far as to suggest a domestic price for wheat of $1.20 a bushel. There was evidence—I do not have it under my hand, but I recall that I then produced it—given before a committee of this house by millers and bakers that a variation in the price of wheat from 70 cents to $1.60 a bushel did not make more than half a cent difference in the price of a loaf of bread. Why not have a reasonable domestic price for wheat if it will not affect bread consumers any more than that? That would be something worth while.

I suggested last year, and I am going to suggest again—I believe I had the support of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in this matter—that powers should be given by amendment to the Bank of Canada Act or by some other legislation to enable the government to issue currency against the wheat that they are carrying, because to my mind wheat is almost as good as gold. Wheat does not readily deteriorate, it will keep; and when you eat it, or when you sell it, you can call in your currency. That could be done and it should be done. It would save the interest that the government is paying on the amount it has invested in the wheat.

I suggested a long range marketing policy. I will not go into that now, but I showed that there should be a parity of prices. We have been given definite promises with regard to certain measures that might be brought down this session which would materially affect western Canada. I did not see in the budget nor did I hear any reference to prices of agricultural implements. We know that this government in 1936 and 1937 carried on an investigation, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) boldly rose in his place in this house last year, in the early part of the regular session, and threatened the implement companies if prices did not go down, if they did not do so and so. Well, prices are up and we have not had any action. We should have some action in that regard, however, because the minister must have had something in mind when he made that statement.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers can no longer continue under present conditions. Their income has depreciated to a very considerable extent. We shall continue to have surpluses in primary products for a number of years. The government must not think they can regulate the prices to the farmer for his wheat or cattle or hogs or other primary products on the basis of surpluses that are in the show window, so to speak. That will only mean lower prices. They must take constructive action. As I say, the farmers' income has depreciated considerably.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon, member's time has expired.

Mr. PERLEY: I shall be only a moment longer. I wish to quote certain figures I have been given by the bureau of statistics. I wrote to them the other day saying that I was going to prepare a statement on the budget with respect to farmers' income. I have received from the bureau a statement showing the income of farmers in the three prairie provinces from 1926 up to the present time, taking the year 1926 as one hundred. I will only give Saskatchewan in order to save time. The figures for the following years are: 1927, 90; 1928, 103; 1930, 37; 1933, 21; 1936, 30; 1937, 24; 1939, 30. In other words, the farmer's income in 1939 was only 30 per cent of what it was in 1926. Does any hon. member think that the farmer can continue under such conditions? He cannot carry on when his income to-day is only 30 per cent of what it was in 1926. I do not think anyone will suggest for a moment that it is possible for him to do so.

I am disappointed that the budget was not more definite about certain matters; but now, since my time has expired, I will say this. I may have a chance to discuss this matter further if there is an amendment, as I think there will be, but I regret that this government has not been more definite and has not made a pronouncement with respect to this whole matter which is so important, having to do with the marketing of the western crop. Before now we should have had a statement from them, having regard to the announcement posted yesterday in the exchange.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not intend to go fully into all the points raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), but there are some statements with which I feel bound to deal at this time. The hon, member is altogether under a misapprehension as to the purpose of the announcement made by the wheat board from Winnipeg. It seemed to me he was confused in thinking that the new regulations dealt with the 1940 crop. The continued marketing of last year's crop was what was being dealt with by the board, and this regulation was considered necessary to make it possible for wheat farmers with wheat still on hand to sell it. The board came to this decision and, having done so, telephoned to me to acquaint me with the position as cnairman of the wheat committee of the cabinet. It is a purely temporary matter having nothing to do with the marketing of the 1940 crop, and will be superseded, I expect, by decisions and regulations for dealing with the coming crop.

Mr. PERLEY: Why does it mention December 2 to December 31? That is the notice posted.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am coming to that. The prices mentioned are put there to enable the buyer of wheat to hedge against his purchases of wheat at the present time. On May 18, the wheat board, after consultation with the wheat committee of the cabinet, requested the grain exchange to peg the wheat futures market at the closing prices of Friday May 17, which were: May,  $70\frac{1}{8}$ ; July,  $71\frac{1}{8}$ ; October,  $73\frac{1}{8}$ . This action was taken owing to the fact that on Saturday morning, May 18, the market declined 10 cents a bushel to  $60\frac{1}{8}$  for May wheat. The reason for this decline was as I stated in Hansard, May 20, at page 20.

While several factors have entered into the situation it seems clear that the changed war picture has been a predominant influence in the decline in commodity and securities markets. The fear of lost markets and the general financial unsettlement have created a feeling of uncertainty and resulted in general and drastic liquidation on the part of holders of wheat.

It was clear at the time that if the futures market fixed itself at the pegged price asked, with no buyers, it would be necessary to peg the cash wheat prices in proper relation to the futures, because otherwise the pegging of the futures market would be ineffective. The action of the market, then, from May 18 to June 22 was such that it was unnecessary to peg cash wheat prices. In other words, the futures market did absorb, at prices at or about the peg, any selling or hedges which developed. On June 25 it was clear that owing to the action of the market on June 24 and 25, the elevator companies were not able to hedge on account of the market being at the pegged price asked.

Further action was considered necessary. Consequently, after consultation with the government, the wheat board addressed a letter to the grain exchange under date of June 26 asking them to take the necessary action to peg prices of cash wheat in proper relationship to prices as fixed for the futures in the action taken on May 18. The meaning of such action is that neither futures nor cash wheat can be traded at prices below the fixed minimum prices, and this is mandatory on all members of the grain exchange until further notice. It should be clearly understood that these are minimum prices, and there is no obligation on anyone to make purchases at these prices unless demand materializes. It has the effect, however, of preventing the sale of wheat at prices below the minimum. Any farmer, however, who has less than 5,000 bushels may deliver his wheat to the board and receive 70 cents a bushel basis No. 1 northern Fort William; or any farmer who has over 5,000 bushels may deliver the surplus to the pools set up under the Cooperative Marketing Act, or place orders for the sale of his wheat with any elevator company. This will be sold when and if a demand arises at or about the minimum price.

It should be clearly understood that this is merely a temporary measure in order to stabilize the situation pending a decision as to what method shall be followed in handling the new crop. These minimum prices have been fixed up to December 31 for the reason that at the present time the December future is open for trading. Consequently cash prices must be fixed until the end of December, in order to make the minimum price system effective on forward sales. The fact that this has been done has no bearing on any action that may be taken regarding the new crop.

Further I would say that consideration is being given by the government and the wheat board to the method of handling the new crop. A decision cannot be made at this time, in the opinion of those advising us, on account of a number of factors which will enter into the situation between now and the beginning of the marketing of the new crop, such as the development of the present growing crop, the general war situation and its effect on the probable demand this coming year, plus the effect of growing crops in other parts of the world, particularly the United States. The situation is being carefully watched from day to day, and a decision on the method of marketing the new crop will be made as early as possible.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister tell us who are the advisers of the government whom he just mentioned? Also why is it necessary for the elevator companies to hedge their grain if they are not buying it? It all goes to the government, or on the government account; there is no responsibility.

Mr. GARDINER: What they take is the surplus over 5,000 bushels.

Mr. PERLEY: They take the grain in at the 70-cent price on government account.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No.

Mr. PERLEY: What do they do?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It depends on whether they are taking it for the board or the open market.

Mr. PERLEY: They are taking it all for the government.

Mr. GARDINER: They cannot take anything over 5,000 bushels for the government; this has to do only with over 5,000 bushels.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): When I referred to the advisers of the government I referred to the wheat board.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A discussion of agricultural marketing in general, and marketing of wheat in particular, has been long overdue in this house. We have waited now for some six weeks, hoping to have a statement from the minister and to have the policy of the government outlined, but so far without any great result. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has rendered a service, particularly to western Canada, by raising this matter this afternoon. I am only sorry that the minister did not give a fuller answer, and a fuller insight into what the government's policy is to be.

I need hardly remind hon. members that west of the great lakes wheat is still king, because our climate and topographical features are such that our economic welfare is irretrievably bound up with the growing and marketing of wheat. A favourable wheat marketing policy means reasonable prosperity for western Canada. Lack of such a policy means bankruptcy, not only for some three hundred thousand wheat producers but also for those other thousands of individuals and many organizations whose livelihood is bound up with the prosperity of the prairie farmer. With those facts in mind I want briefly to outline the wheat marketing policy that has been in vogue during the last few years.

In 1935 there was brought down in this house the Canada Wheat Board Act, which in its original draft provided for the sale of all wheat to the wheat board, the farmer to receive an initial guaranteed price and a participation certificate. It was the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) who led the opposition at that time to the compulsory features in that legislation. When that act finally passed this house, it provided that the farmer could deliver his wheat either to the wheat board or to the open market. If he sold his wheat to the wheat board he was to receive an initial payment, which was later set at 87½ cents, and a participation certificate.

In 1936, this government having come to power, an order in council was passed on August 28 which prohibited the farmer from delivering his wheat to the wheat board if the price at Fort William was above 90 cents a bushel. So in that year even if they wished to deliver their wheat to the wheat board, farmers were not permitted to do so while the price was above that figure.

In 1937 the same situation obtained. In 1938, on a falling market, the wheat board was again brought into operation. An initial payment of 80 cents, basis Fort William, was paid and participation certificates issued.

Last year, 1939, the government introduced what it called a new marketing policy, which gave to the wheat producer three alternative courses. He could (1) sell his wheat in the open market; (2) sell his wheat through a cooperative pool or association and receive an advance payment of 60 cents, baisis Fort William, with a government guarantee behind it, or (3) sell his wheat to the wheat board and receive an initial guaranteed payment of 60 cents, and a participation certificate. Under pressure from all parts of western Canada that initial payment was later raised to 70 cents a bushel, and to offset the concession a limit of 5,000 bushels was imposed; in this way the farmer was not allowed to deliver over 5,000 bushels to the wheat board.

Now we come to 1940. With the outbreak of the war members of this group and of other opposition groups asked the government to close the Winnipeg grain exchange, pointing out that Great Britain and France were purchasing their wheat through one agent, and that Australia had nationalized its wheat and flour industry. This government refused to take such a step, and have allowed the question of a wheat marketing policy to drift month after month, until at last, a few weeks ago, when the wheat market was in a state of imminent collapse, they were finally compelled to step in and peg the price at seventy and a fraction cents, basis Fort William. Again the members of opposition groups asked the government to close the speculative market and take delivery of wheat through the wheat board.

At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) promised that a statement would be made, and said that the whole matter was under consideration. Then, a few weeks ago, without the house being taken into the confidence of the government, the public were informed through the press that the Winnipeg grain exchange was to continue until the end of the crop year, July 31. We have been waiting since May 16 for an announcement of policy. The minister has made another statement to-night. Still we have no intimation from the government as to what the wheat marketing policy of the government is to be for this crop year or for the years of the war. My object, therefore, in rising to support the contention of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is to ask the government that during this budget debate the ministers responsible shall make a statement to this house and to the country outlining clearly what their policy is not only with reference to the marketing of wheat but with reference to the marketing of all agricultural products.

On behalf of this group I want to make four requests of the government. First, I want to ask when they propose to set up the advisory committee to the wheat board. The wheat board act provides for that committee. It never should have been fired. In the first place it was abolished by this government because Mr. J. R. Murray, who was chairman of the wheat board, would not work with it. This government had to choose between Mr. Murray and producer representation on the wheat board, and they chose Mr. Murray. As a result the producers have had no representation since 1936; they have had no voice at all in the forming of a marketing policy for wheat. Now we ask the government to appoint that committee. During the election they promised to do so. The newspapers quoted both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce as saying that such a committee would be appointed. That committee should be appointed while this house is sitting, so that hon. members may know its personnel. The members of that committee should be appointed a sufficient time before the marketing of the 1940 crop to enable them to consult with each other and with the wheat board. How can they advise the wheat board unless they are appointed a sufficient time prior to the marketing of the 1940 crop to help formulate a policy?

We should know who will constitute that committee. It is understood that the committee will have producer representation. Does this mean that the organized wheat producers of western Canada are to have a voice in selecting that committee? Are the pools and the farm organizations to be consulted? Producer representation is a farce and a sham unless the organized producers of the west have some voice in selecting the men who are to speak for them on that advisory committee. The government owe it to themselves, to this house and to the farmers of western Canada to name that committee without further delay.

Second, I want to ask the government to tell us during this debate when they propose to bring down legislation to provide for an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop. There has been some argument in this house with regard to statements made by the

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Minister of Agriculture. I am not going to continue that argument. There were newspaper reports to the effect that the minister had made a definite promise that an interim payment would be made.

Mr. GARDINER: No, there were no such reports.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I said there were newspaper reports to that effect.

Mr. GARDINER: The newspaper reports said I promised that I would recommend it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, no. I do not want to get into an argument, but the statement was in the press.

Mr. GARDINER: Read it carefully and you will see.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is from the Star-Phoenix of Thursday, March 21, reporting the minister's address at Wilkie:

Definite promise of amending legislation to provide for a 10 or 12 cent interim payment on the current year's wheat crop was made here Wednesday afternoon by Hon. J. G. Gardiner. The Minister of Agriculture declared that if the King administration was returned to power the present bill would be changed so that a payment might be made as soon as possible.

Mr. GARDINER: What is that from?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is from the Star-Phoenix. I will send it over to the minister. But I did not rise to quarrel over what the minister said or did not say. I want to refer to what the minister said the other night in this house. He said he did not make the remark quoted in the newspaper, and I accept his word. He stated that he said he would recommend to the government an amendment to the act which would permit the making of an interim payment if conditions warranted it.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what I did say.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Very well. Has the minister made that recommendation?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If the minister has made that recommendation, when may we expect the amendment?

Mr. GARDINER: I cannot answer that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If we are not going to get the amendment, it must mean that the government has not accepted the minister's recommendation; and I say to him that as a responsible minister of the crown, in fairness to the people of Saskatchewan he ought to resign from this government in protest.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole of the time has not elapsed as yet, you know.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As the act stands at present no interim payment can be made, since the act provides that all the wheat must be sold and all the money received before a further payment can be made. I hope the government will bring down legislation to permit the making of an interim payment because, as most western members know, many farmers, on account of financial stringency, were not able to put in as large a crop this spring as they have in other years. Every day I receive letters from farmers whose financial position is such that they cannot do their usual summer-fallowing. They have not supplies; they have not repairs to their machinery. If this payment could be made at this time it would help these people do the summer-fallowing they will be unable to do otherwise, and will permit them to keep their land in the shape in which they usually keep it. Therefore I ask the government to make some statement, to tell these people whether they are or are not going to get this payment, rather than keep them in a continual state of suspense.

Third, I want to ask this government what their policy is with reference to the marketing of the 1940 crop. We are only forty days away from cutting in western Canada. The farmers want to know what facilities there will be for the marketing of their crop and what price they will receive for it. Are we going to continue the old three-way method of marketing? Is the 70 cent initial guaranteed price to be what the farmer will receive if he delivers his wheat to the wheat board? Surely the government ought to tell the farmers now, and not continue to say, day after day, that the matter is still under consideration. We have had no hesitation at all in saying where we stand. We have asked that the Winnipeg grain exchange be closed, because we believe that in these times selling through the open market is not the best way to handle the marketing of agricultural products. The speculative market represents the world market, and at the present time the world market is not in a normal condition.

As someone has already said, Great Britain and until a short time ago France had one buying agency in this country. There is nothing to prevent the wheat board representing the government and the farmers of western Canada from dealing directly with that agency. We maintain that selling through these pools and associations set up under the cooperative wheat marketing legislation is no longer practicable or feasible. These pools and associations handled something less than one per cent of the crop last year, and it means only that the farmers enter into competition with one another, to depress their own price.

We therefore ask that this year the Canadian wheat board should take delivery of all the wheat marketed this fall and that it should take delivery of that wheat at a price which shall be commensurate with the cost of production.

I have before me figures prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which help to show what the return has been to the farmer in western Canada for his wheat. These are the average prices received at point of production, per bushel:

	received per bushel
1908 to 1913, inclusive
1914 to 1918 (war years), in clusive	. 1.37
1919 to 1929, inclusive	$. 90\frac{3}{4}$
1908 to 1938, inclusive (but elim nating war years)	84
1908 to 1938, inclusive (but elim nating depression years)	. 1.06
1908 to 1939, inclusive (but elim nating both war years an depression years)	98
1930 to 1938, inclusive (depression years)	56
1938-39 cereal year

The figure for the last crop year, 1939-40, shows that the farmer got 49 cents a bushel at point of production. These figures indicate that the 30-year average wheat price is 90<sup>3</sup> cents a bushel. With costs on the upper trend, the western farmer is facing sure financial loss with the price of his crop at 49 cents a bushel at the farm, as it was last year.

I cannot impress upon the house too forcibly that this is the condition of the western farmer. Almost everything he has to buy has gone up or is going up in price, and the 10 per cent foreign exchange tax imposed by the budget is bound to affect certain kinds of farm implements. He is already paying more for his farm implements than he was paying a few years ago, and by virtue of the 10 per cent tax he is now going to have to pay more. With his costs steadily going up and his income steadily declining, it is absolutely impossible for the wheat producer to carry on unless the government is prepared to fix a price for his wheat which would bear some direct relation to the cost of production. We ask the government at this session without further delay to bring down an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act which will provide for the farmer a reasonable price for the 1940 wheat crop.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

I now come to the fourth and last recommendation, and it is this, that during this session the government should announce its policy with respect to the marketing of products other than wheat. Agriculture cannot continue in war time, any more than in peace time, on an unplanned basis. Whether the government likes it or not, it is going to be forced into the marketing of farm products; in fact, it has been forced already. It has already been compelled to take steps with reference to the marketing of bacon. It has already been compelled to come to the assistance of the apple growers.

Mr. GARDINER: Not compelled; we chose to do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Compelled by circumstances.

Mr. GARDINER: But we chose to do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Compelled to do it, because it helped the people who were growing the apples. Are we going to wait until other industries are bankrupt, or is the government now prepared to outline a broad marketing policy to take care of the handling of agricultural products for the duration of the war.

With that in mind we ask two things: First, that the inoperative clause in the Canadian Wheat Board Act be made operative, or that it shall be invoked so as to permit the wheat board to take delivery of coarse grains.

Second, we ask that with all possible dispatch the government set up boards for the marketing of other agricultural products, and that it pay to the producers parity prices for those products. When I say "parity" prices, I do not mean parity prices to the shipper or to the exporter or to the packing house; I mean parity prices to the man on the farm who produces the goods. That is the only place where a parity price can be of any use.

Someone says: "But that sort of thing will take money, and world markets are dwindling." That is true. It may be necessary, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has suggested, that we shall have to store wheat in this country, and that we may have to make it economically worth while for the farmer to store wheat on his own farm. We may have to build facilities to store wheat in Canada. I would remind hon, members that already outstanding economists are telling us that long before this war is over, parts of the world will be facing starvation. If, when the war is over, we have to choose between having piles of gold stored up, as they have been in the great republic to the south of us, and having great quantities of wheat stored up, I do not think there is any doubt of our decision as to which would be the more useful or the greater economic asset. The day may not be far distant when the gold held by that great republic to the south will be a drug on the market. But any country which faces as we do in the years to come a great period of economic dislocation, and which has huge quantities of a commodity as imperishable as wheat, has a great asset indeed. With its nationalized central bank, Canada can well afford to take delivery of that wheat, to issue currency and credit against it, and to give to our people a reasonable price for the product they are growing.

Before I take my seat I cannot do better than quote a short statement which has been put out by the Alberta wheat pool in a little booklet entitled "The Story of Wheat." At page 40 the whole situation is summed up in a manner much better than I could do it. These are the words:

There is an increasing conviction among farmers and farm leaders that Canadian farm policies are antiquated and that a new governmental outlook is necessary to solve the problem of agriculture. That problem lies in the fact that, while more than three million of the population live on farms, agriculture receives less than 10 per cent of the national income, and its share has rapidly declined during the past ten years. The major problems of the Canadian economy as they revealed themselves in the past decade must be approached through a restoration of agricultural income and a marked expansion in terms of the national income.

Besides the three million Canadians living on farms there are another two million living in rural areas, whose livelihood depends almost directly on agriculture. Thus, when agriculture's existence is imperiled by low prices, five million Canadians suffer jointly. When that number of people lack sufficient buying power to purchase manufactured goods produced in towns and cities, is it any wonder that unemployment has been rife in industrial areas, the normal interchange of goods between town and country becomes impossible and the farm price level breaks down?

Canada's first duty is to find a means of securing a "living wage" to those engaged in the natural industries, of which farming is the foremost, to cultivate and safeguard their buying power in order that they may become a great and growing market for the production of the secondary industries of the nation.

the secondary industries of the nation.

Farmers do not want the wages and living standards of the people in the cities to be cut down. They prefer to see urban populations with plenty of money to spend. But farmers do want their own living standards raised, and that can only be brought about by the maintenance of prices of farm products. A way must be found to raise farm prices to equitable levels balanced against the fixed charges of labour, of services and of industry. The farmer has learned to produce abundantly.

The farmer has learned to produce abundantly. One hundred years ago it took the efforts of 90 per cent of the population, busily employed on farms, to feed and clothe the nation. To-day 25 per cent of that population can easily do the job. The farming population will never be satisfied to have its productivity used as a club to beat down prices to penurious levels. Ways and means must be found to protect the price level of farm products if the nation is to escape persistent depression periods.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity at last to say something about wheat. Like most of the farmers in the west I do not feel quite happy if I cannot say something about that crop. On several occasions since we came here on May 16 I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) what the government intended to do about an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop. When I first made this inquiry I gave as my reason for doing so a statement which had been made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) when speaking at Wilkie on March 21. That was just five days prior to the dominion election. In order that there may be no mistake about this, I should like to quote the report which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin of March 21, 1940. Under the heading, "Liberals will give interim crop advance," it states:

Wilkie, Sask., March 21—Hon. J. G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture, promised amending legislation to provide for a ten or twelve cent interim payment on the current year's wheat crop when he addressed a public meeting here yesterday.

Mr. GARDINER: Read the next sentence.

Mr. FAIR: It reads:

If the Liberal administration was returned to power March 26, dominion election day, present wheat legislation would be changed so that a payment might be made as soon as possible, he said.

It is amusing and confusing that the Minister of Agriculture made no attempt to correct that statement until after March 26.

Mr. GARDINER: That is absolutely incorrect. The Canadian Press rang me up the next morning to ask me if that statement was correct, and I said it was not.

Mr. FAIR: I was watching the papers quite closely because I expected something along this line to happen. I certainly was not disappointed. It is also amusing and confusing to find that this statement was used by several Liberal candidates in Alberta. That story was not contradicted until the election was over.

Mr. GARDINER: It was used by many Social Credit candidates.

Mr. FAIR: Public opinion has demanded that something be done by the government with regard to the wheat policy, so the government have finally caught up with public opinion, just as they did in connection with doing something about our war effort. I am glad to see that this has happened. In order that I may not be accused, as have other hon, members in the past, of asking for something for the wheat growers of western Canada and not including the farmers in other parts of Canada, I want to say that I include the farmers of eastern and central Canada in what I have to say to-night. The farmers in all parts of Canada have been mistreated for the past number of years. They are the easy prey of those who are well organized. Those who are well organized have certainly taken full advantage of their position.

In days gone by we have had some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Blair), and the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), try to tell us something about farming. would say to those gentlemen that a little learning is a dangerous thing, drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring. It reminds me of something I read not many days ago, that old maids know more about raising children than do the mothers of the children. In other words, professional politicians know best how to run other people's businesses. I commend these sayings to these hon, gentlemen. I hope they do not worry too much about farmers' business until they learn just a little more about it. I am now referring to gentlemen farmers, those fellows who raise nothing but their hats. If they want to do something about the matter, let them get out on a farm and obtain actual experience, which they certainly have not to-day. I could refer to other hon, gentlemen, but I do not think it is worth while doing so and I have not the time. All this is just a sample of what has happened in this house, and I think it is about time people awoke to the truth and got down to business.

Ever since coming here in 1936, the group to which I belong has steadily advocated cost of production for the products of the farm. Again I say that this should apply not only to the west but to all of Canada. We know that the farmers of eastern and central Canada should have a living just as the farmers of the west. If Canada is to prosper, our farmers must first be prosperous. Without that, the prosperity of Canada cannot be permanent. As long as the farmer's purchasing power is depleted, he cannot buy. You can go into stores in the west and you will see signs over the cash registers saying, "please do not ask for credit." The people who are producing the wealth of Canada should not have to ask for credit. They should receive enough from their labour to guarantee them a decent standard of living, something which they do not have to-day.

As I say, we have advocated cost of production and a reasonable profit. That is not asking too much. I quoted figures on more than one occasion which indicated that when farmers get an average crop and a fair price, industry generally in Canada is booming. The railroads have more to do than they have when crops and prices are poor. On more than one occasion I gave figures to show that when the farmer was receiving an average price of around $1.30 to $1.40 a bushel for wheat, he bought no less than $82,000,000 worth of farm implements in eastern Canada. In 1932 and 1933, when prices were ruinously low, those purchases were restricted to just over $8,000,000, or ten per cent of what they had been in good times. Because of the conditions under which we have been labouring for a number of years, farmers' implements are almost worn out; and when I heard an hon. member speaking the other day of the government gathering up the junk of western Canada, I thought there would be a very great addition to that junk pile if only the farmers had a decent price for their wheat so that they could buy modern, up-to-date machinery.

For the past crop we have received in my locality up to the present 51 cents a bushel for No. 1 wheat. Those of us who were fortunate enough to harvest No. 1 wheat are getting that, but thousands of farmers out there were not so fortunate, and hon. members can gain some idea, from the price spreads quoted this evening by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), what those other fellows received.

I am not asking that any particular price be paid, but I do contend that the government should figure out the cost of growing wheat—I think they are able to do that just as well as they can estimate the cost of an aeroplane or a battleship—and if they added as little as five per cent profit, although that profit limitation was removed in connection with industry last August by order in council, we farmers will have no complaint whatever. Indeed, I believe we would be well satisfied. We would not be found lacking in patriotism and going on a sit-down strike if we got that much, although the manufacturers of Canada did so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now, let us be fair about that.

Mr. FAIR: I have been "fair" for over forty years. We shall not come within the class of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on the 8th of September, 1939, when we were in the special war session. He had this to say:

I come to profiteering. I believe I have already stated in this house that I know of nothing in the world more contemptible than that any man should seek to profit from the sacrifices which others are making.

Let me observe here that we in the farming industry are making sacrifices and have done so for a number of years. Let this statement apply to those who are profiteering at the expense of the farmer. The Prime Minister continued:

And if the laws and other measures which this government may introduce and seek to enforce are not sufficiently strong to destroy anything in the nature of profiteering, I hope hon. members of this house will bring to our attention, in a way that will also bring it to the attention of this country, what we ought to do to achieve that all-important end. There are some things that are very difficult of accomplishment. Unfortunately human nature has its weak and its bad sides as well as its strong and good sides. Sometimes it is very difficult to cope effectively with the underworld and its methods. But let me say this: I care not who the individual may be, how respectable in his own eyes or in the eyes of others he may appear, or what position he may hold; if in this crisis he seeks to profiteer he belongs to the underworld and should be treated as one of those who menace all that is sacred in the human relations.

I am not deliberately singling out any particular company, but I am going to give just one example; this is taken from the Ottawa Citizen of May 16, 1940:

Net Profit of $9,820,114 for Int. Nickel. The report of the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, and subsidiaries for the three months ended March 31, 1940, issued by Robert C. Stanley, chairman and president, shows a net profit of $9,820,114 after all charges, depreciation, taxes, etc., equivalent after preferred dividend requirements, to 64 cents a share on the 14,584,025 no par shares of common stock outstanding.

This compares with a net profit of $10,262,660 or 67 cents a common share in the preceding quarter, $9,547,300 or 62 cents in the three months ended March 31, 1939, and $10,113,764 or 66 cents in the first quarter of 1938.

I repeat that I am not singling out that company; I happened to have that clipping, and since I had a very short time to prepare my speech this evening, I am citing that as an instance of what is going on in Canada to-day. On the other hand I have given the house some indication of the difficulties which farmers are up against, and I would ask the Prime Minister to take into serious consideration those noble words which he spoke on September 8. Somebody says he forgot them. I hope this will bring them back to his attention.

In this house, for a number of days, in fact for a number of weeks, we have been following very closely the actions of the British government. While we copy their actions in some directions, may I suggest that in the interests of some of the underdogs in this country we should follow them in other lines. I read from the "Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire" for April, 1940, page 253, under the heading, "Doubling the country's production":

The Minister of Agriculture should have a clear objective and should attempt nothing less than doubling the food production of the country. Mr. Lloyd George enumerated six points that should be dealt with:

The farmer must know that if he doubled his production there was an assured market for his produce.

Prices paid must cover the cost of production, which they did not do now.

In connection with that I migh

In connection with that, I might say that the last price I have seen which the British farmer gets for his wheat is $1.31 a bushel.

The state should subsidize all well-thoughtout drainage schemes.

Active steps should be taken by the state to ensure an ample supply of lime and fertilizers.

Cheap capital should be available for all that was necessary to enable the cultivator to bring the soil to the highest pitch of fertility.

Adequate labour should be provided to carry out this programme.

I believe that this government should follow the steps of the British government along that line. They have followed it in other respects, particularly, I believe, in connection with Bill No. 43, section two of which reads as follows:

Subject to the provisions of section 3 hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

We supported that bill in part. We tried to have it changed so that the burden should be distributed more fairly, so that the principle of equality of sacrifice should be put into operation, but we were not able to accomplish that purpose. The bill has been passed, and we find that the farmer is the first upon whom these powers are being practised. As far as I can see, at the present time there is nothing to do but accept the price offered.

We are practically out of markets at the present time, and yet only a couple of days ago a budget was brought down imposing still further taxes on the farming population, if not directly at any rate indirectly. Speaking of the price of wheat, I said I was not referring to any particular price, but I did suggest that the government take the time and trouble to find out the actual cost of production. This can be done. On other occasions we have brought forward arguments, and have proved them, to show that it costs considerably more to grow wheat than is paid at the present time. I can remember the Minister of Agriculture in a discussion at the last regular session, stating that wheat could be grown on certain farms at 30 to 40 cents a bushel. Mr. H. G. L. Strange says:

I have averaged up the price of all the wheat produced for 62 years and I find it comes to $1.14 for No. 2 northern at Winnipeg.

That is the opinion of Mr. Strange, who is at the present time director of the research department of the Searle Grain company. Other figures go to prove the same thing. According to bulletin 159 of the central experimental farm at Ottawa the figure of 95 cents at the farm is given. We must also remember that the farmers of western Canada are paying by way of interest on debts between 25 and 35 cents a bushel for every bushel of wheat grown. Other industries are guaranteed profits, and I do not see any reason why, particularly at this time when wheat is going to be one of the things that will help to win the war, we should be asked to grow wheat at a loss. In the United States they are taking particular care of their farmers. I quote from the Western Producer of March 28, 1940:

At Washington last Friday the United States senate passed the big $923,000,000 farm appropriation bill—$203,000,000 above the budget—estimates, in the face of a warning from Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau that it should not expect the increase to be paid from the treasury's cash balance.

We could enumerate several other subsidies paid by different countries, but I will not go into that. I will give the figures from the Searle index for June 19, 1940. This will give an indication of the purchasing power of the farmer to-day. The index price of the articles the farmer buys, 147 items, now stands at 134; 1913-14 equals 100, which means that these articles cost the farmers in the west at the present time 34 per cent more than they did in 1914 before the great war. The price of wheat, No. 1 northern, as of June 18, basis the open market price, is now 23 per cent lower than it was in 1913-14. This means, therefore, that a bushel of wheat in western Canada now has a purchasing power in relation to the articles farmers buy of 57 per cent in comparison with the purchasing power of 100 which it had before the war. And we are still compelled to pay our debts, to pay everyone his pound of flesh, and to feel happy about it. I wonder how it can be done.

Some people have the idea that western Canada is getting the cream and other parts of Canada none of it. I may have another opportunity to go into this question to show that we are not getting more than other parts of Canada. An hon, member says that we are getting less, and I think we can prove that easily. We can also show that we are paying more. I heard the arguments put forward by the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), and being a little further west than they are, we are in just a little tougher position. We have more freight to pay on the wheat we ship, more freight on our machinery and on other commodities we purchase.

We have heard a good deal in this house from both sides about the desirability of preserving Canadian unity; we are told we must preserve Canadian unity at all costs. But before we can hope to preserve Canadian unity, we must not forget that we cannot do it if one section of the country is trampling another section under its feet. We must have unity on an equal footing.

I would urge the government to make full use of the wheat board act for the sale of wheat and other grains. I would ask them to guarantee farmers, as they have guaranteed industry, the cost of production with a reasonable profit. I would also ask that the representation of the producers be placed back upon the wheat board. It would look rather strange and amusing, and possibly expensive, to other industries, if we had a number of farmers set up as a board to sell the products of any industry in Canada or to sell the labour or other services of any other class in the community. But that is what is happening to us to-day. How many representatives of organized agriculture have we working on the wheat board or in conjunction with it to-day. I do not think we have one. Is that fair? There is an injustice there that should be remedied and remedied at an early date.

We find that the railways are collecting the same freight on our wheat to-day as when wheat was close to $3 a bushel, and the elevator companies are collecting the same charges. The Winnipeg grain exchange is collecting the same commissions. Speaking of commissions, when we had a wheat commission set up not long ago to investigate the marketing and production of wheat, we found we had one hon, gentleman on that body drawing just $200 a day, and in case he could not make a living at that, we found an additional $20 a day set out for living allowance. If deals of this kind were straightened out and equalized and these amounts went where they properly belonged, you would have far better service in Canada.

On different occasions we have asked that the grain exchange at Winnipeg be closed, and again we might follow the example set in Britain. Right after the war started, the exchange was closed there. Why not here? Not many months ago I read in the press that the company headed by the present purchaser of wheat and cereals for the British and French governments had a profit of 19 per cent, and yet we are asked to sell our wheat at very little better than half the cost of production. I do not know whether I should go any further with that. But I have a little piece here which I think applies very aptly to our present Prime Minister. It says:

Man can circle the earth without touching the ground; men can kill other men twenty miles away; man can weigh the stars of heaven; man can drag oil from the bowels of the earth; man can compel an icy waterfall to cook his meals hundreds of miles from the stream; man can print a million newspapers in an hour; man can breed the seeds out of oranges; man can coax a hen to lay 365 eggs in a year; man can persuade dogs to smoke pipes and sea lions to play guitars. Man, in other words, is quite an ingenious and remarkable package of physical and mental machinery.

But, when this astonishing person is confronted with one problem, he retires defeated to his hut. Show him six men without money and six loaves of bread belonging to men who cannot use it but who want money for it, and ask him how the six hungry men can be put in possession of the six surplus loaves and watch him then. It is then that he (the prime minister) attends conferences and appoints committees and holds elections and makes speeches and cries out that a crisis is upon him. He does a score of useless things and then retires to his hut, leaving in the shivering twilight the tableau of the six hungry men and the six unapproachable loaves.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, it has often been said that much of the leadership which we should normally be now receiving was sacrificed or destroyed during the great war. In my opinion we citizens of Canada are most fortunate in having to-day as Minister of Finance a man of character and practical training such as we have in the present incumbent of that office, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Ralston). I was indeed pleased to hear him state in his budget address that he would not strain the word "sacrifice" by applying it other than to those who offer their lives in this great conflict. That was a very fine statement.

In rising to offer a few observations on this question I do so as a representative of an agricultural constituency in western Canada, and while fully realizing that our first and foremost concern at this time is the winning of this war, my remarks at this moment will pertain to matters of an agricultural nature. The people of my constituency have been through difficult times during the past ten years, due to both climatic and economic conditions. They are not quitters, but in every sense of the word are optimists. They are out there to-day as other western agriculturists, with their backs to the wall, but putting up a magnificent fight. They expect justice and fair play from the government. Accorded these, the western farmer can be depended upon to make his full contribution both to the winning of the war, and following that, to the upbuilding and development of this great dominion.

A great deal was said last fall about the agreement entered into between the governments of Canada and Great Britain with regard to the importation of Canadian pork products by Great Britain and the price to be paid. Farmers of this country were encouraged to go into pork production in a big way, and thus use much of their grain as feed. Under date of May 23, 1940, the house was informed that as far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, complete bacon agreement information between the British government and the government of Canada is not available for publication. The fact is that notwithstanding the great surplus of bacon in this country, during the first four months of 1940, there were 27.186.900 pounds of pork imported into Canada from the United States. During 1939 a total of 264,366,943 pounds of vegetable oil was imported into Canada from foreign countries, replacing dairy products, lard, tallow and animal fats, and this vegetable oil was imported duty free. According to an order for return delivered June 21, 1940, United States bacon has been used entirely for the military camps throughout Canada since January 1, and vegetable oil shortening has been furnished to the Canadian army one hundred per cent in place of lard and animal fats, under requisitions of the Department of National Defence. Surely there should be greater cooperation in such matters. This situation is most discouraging to the hog producers of Canada at a time such as this.

I should like now to discuss wheat. I would compliment the hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) for bringing up this matter this afternoon as a matter of urgent importance. As was stated by the hon, member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) this evening, wheat is a most important product to the residents of western Canada, even at this time when its value in dollars and cents is so low. To me it is astounding that we should receive the report from the Winnipeg grain exchange stating that it was under request of this government that the action referred to was taken, and that it should be done in that manner rather than that we as members of the House of Commons should first be informed of this action by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) or by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It seems to me that as members of parliament we have a responsibility, and that information might at least have been given to us, if not discussed with us, instead of being broadcast across this country as was done yesterday.

In discussing wheat we must remember that by far the greatest part of mankind is still engaged in agriculture; further that the income from wheat farming is the greatest single contributor to world agricultural income, and finally that the price of wheat exerts a stronger influence on agricultural prices in general than any other individual agricultural price. We have at present a huge surplus of unsold wheat in Canada. On the 25th of this month it was 279 million bushels. At this date a year ago it was only 106 million bushels. It is a vast carryover that we have in prospect at the end of the coming crop year. At this time I think we should certainly have a statement from the government as to the handling of the 1939 wheat crop and also the policy in regard to the bountiful harvest now in sight for 1940.

In my opinion agriculture is suffering more at this time from what might be termed a lopsided development in this country than anything else. The Sirois commission report stated that from 1896 to 1913 under a vigorous immigration policy by the government of the day, assisted by land companies and railway companies, a tremendous expansion took place on the territories of Canada. Settlement took place without discrimination. The territory settled grew from about ten million acres to some seventy million acres in that period. The production of wheat was increased from approximately 20 million bushels to some 210 million bushels during that period, and of course since that time it has been almost doubled again. Hon. members may recollect that at that time no encouragement was given to industrialists and tradesmen to come to this country and develop industry to any great extent. I need not point out that we probably have greater natural resources undeveloped in this dominion than any other nation in the world. We have great facilities for the development of industries. If in this country there had been a balanced programme of immigration and development, probably we would not now be facing this problem of how to dispose of our wheat. I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Labour Gazette of December, 1937, which points out that the family of the average industrial employee consumes agricultural products to the extent of $409.35 annually. These products are listed as follows:

	Per year
Beef, different grades	.$40 25
Veal . Mutton	$\begin{array}{cccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccccc$
Pork, leg and salt	33 02
Bacon (breakfast) Pure lard	. 16 43
Poultry and dairy products	. 17 00
Eggs, fresh and storage	. 41 65
Butter, dairy and creamery	. 49 55
Milk	. 34 32
Prairie products
Bread	. 57 04
Rolled oats	. 15 34
"Truck" products
Beans	. 6 14 . 8 27
Potatoes	. 16 48
Prunes	. 5 98

I think in this country we should have good reason to expect a population of fifty or sixty million. If we had an additional ten million employees in industry, on the basis of this article their consumption of agricultural products at prevailing prices would amount to over four billion dollars annually, which would more than take care of the agricultural problem we are facing to-day.

Farmers are suffering as a result of events over which they have had no control. Farming is a business of many hazards. During the past twenty years wheat prices on this continent have varied from $3.18 to 33 cents a bushel. Rainfall has varied from practically nothing in some districts to forty inches in other districts during one season. Insect pests have taken a toll amounting to millions of dollars. I often wonder whether Canada as a whole realizes the debt it owes to agriculture, especially during these last few years of depression. Farm production goes on year after year, with little regard to whether or not that production represents a profitable enterprise for the farmer.

Agriculture differs from industry. In 1932, when Canada was in the midst of the worst economic storm of its history, the farms of western Canada produced a wheat crop of 423 million bushels. The production of that large crop at that time and its subsequent handling by our railway systems, its financing from the time it left the farms until it was sold for export, and the economic activity which it generated, constituted a major factor in Canadian business at a time when the country as a whole was in the most critical situation of its history. I believe the contribution of agriculture during those years in maintaining and in many instances increasing its production, was an important factor in preserving our national solvency during that period. It is true that the farmer received little or nothing for his efforts, but he kept this great basic industry functioning at a time when other industries in Canada were faltering.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance stated that the loss arising from the dominion guarantee of a price of 80 cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern at Fort William, for the 1938 crop, had amounted to $52.000,000. He also stated that the net cash deficit of the Canadian National Railways for 1938 amounted to $54,314,000, and in addition the railways received certain subventions from the government. I should like to suggest that there are some 290,000 farmers on the prairies dependent for their livelihood upon agriculture, while 133,500 employees are dependent upon the functioning of our railways for their livelihood. In addition, I should like to remind hon. members that in 1913 the average salary received by railway employees was $648, but in 1937 that average was $1,375, whereas to-day the farmer receives considerably less for his work than he received in 1913. To-night figures were quoted, taking 1926 as the base year, and to-day that index stands at only 30 per cent for the farmer income.

As reported at page 2623 of Hansard for 1939 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that wheat could be produced at a cost of from 30 to 40 cents a bushel. I do not know how in the world those figures could be arrived at by any practical farmer. Moreover, those figures were based on an average of 20 bushels to the acre, which was most unfair. The average wheat yield for all Canada during the last twelve years has been 12.9 bushels an acre. I should like to quote from a cross-section test on the prairies, conducted by Doctor Hopkins of the federal Department of Agriculture in 1932, with regard to the cost of producing wheat. This information was obtained from certain farmers who had kept records, together with the records of the experimental farms, based on an average yield of 18 bushels to the acre:

Quarter section Per bushel 1 man and 5 horses, threshing hired $1.02 Half section 1 man and 7 horses..... 0.795

One section
2 men and 14 horses	0.774
1 man, 15 horse power tractor and 2 horses	0.712
tractor and thresher	0.778
1 man, 15 horse power tractor, combine and truck	0.636
Two sections
4 men, 28 horses, combine 1 man, 20 horse power tractor, com-	0.642
bine and truck	0.554
Three sections
2 men, 20 horse power tractor, combine and truck, land ploughed 2 men, 20 horse power tractor, com-	0.542
bine and truck, land one wayed	0.511
As I said, that survey was conducted	in 193

when the cost of production was considerably less than it is to-day; and, of course, it was based on 18 bushels to the acre. Various other tests have been conducted throughout the country. I should like to refer to the work of Professor Hope, who is in charge of the department of farm management of the university of Saskatchewan. He points out that the average cost, plus interest on debt, throughout the province of Saskatchewan in recent years has been 91 cents a bushel, on the basis of an average yield of 14 bushels to the acre, which is still considerably higher than the average yield throughout Canada. If one takes into account to-day the higher cost of living brought about by the budget, it will advance those figures to considerably more than a dollar a bushel.

Professor Hope stated, as did Doctor Hopkins, in his survey, that the most economic unit to operate on the prairie provinces was a two-section power farm with tractor combine and truck, and that that is the most efficient wheat-producing unit it is possible to set up at this time. But less than one per cent of the farms in the west are as efficiently operated as that unit. I cannot recollect the exact figures, but I know the average farm operated in the west is in the neighbourhood of a half section. As a matter of fact, I think it is a little less than a half section. That is the basis upon which we have to consider the cost of production, so far as the average farmer of western Canada is concerned.

I have before me an article by J. E. Lattimer, professor of agricultural economics at Macdonald college. It deals with crops and wars. He has in this article a chart on which he gives some detail as to the acreage of improved farm land per farm worker in principal countries to date. These are the figures as of October, 1939:

Country											Acres
Canada											76.9
United States.											50
Great Britain.											30.3
Ireland											17
Denmark											14.7
Norway											14.7
Spain											12
Sweden											11.6
Switzerland											11.2
France											10
Poland											5.7
Italy											5.2
Bulgaria											4.2

Then he goes on to point out the values of land in 1914, and in various periods up to the present. Land in 1914 was $38 an acre, on the average, while in 1938 it was $24, which is quite a reduction. On the other hand, farm wages, including value for board, during 1914 stood at $323, while in 1938 it was $405, and at the present time it is increasing at quite a rate.

Then, I have before me an article respecting distribution costs. It is issued by the 20th Century Fund's committee on distribution, and points out that approximately 59 cents of the consumer's dollar goes for the services of distribution, and only 41 cents for the services of production. There is much more detail in this connection, but I shall not weary the house with it at this time.

Mention was made this evening of Major Strange, who has done a good deal of research work for the Searle Grain company of Winnipeg. He has gone back over many centuries in his research work, and is conversant with other matters pertaining to agriculture. During October of last year that grain company, as a result of his findings, suggested that the allied governments at that time should enter into agreement with Great Britain direct, whereby they would pay $1.15 for Canadian wheat, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William. He gave various reasons why that should be done, and stated that while neither France nor Great Britain could possibly decide at that time the amount of wheat they would purchase in Canada, they could easily decide now to pay farmers a reasonable price, which price would appear to be around $1.15 a bushel for No. 1 northern in store, Fort William. He goes on to say:

Because Great Britain will be drawing heavily upon the United States for many raw materials, and because there is a limit to the gold, foreign exchange and American dollars available to Great Britain, she will tend to reduce purchases of wheat from the United States and so will tend, no doubt, to purchase wheat from Canada.

The review says it can be assumed that the allies will be glad to treat wheat on the same basis as any other munition of war, which means they will be glad to pay a proper, [Mr. J. A. Ross.]

decent and reasonable price for it, so that it can be produced in proper volume for the duration of the war.

Then he mentions the cost of living, and states:

Continuing, the review says in part: "In 1913-14, which was in peace-time, wheat was 87½ cents a bushel for No. 1 northern in store Fort William, and was considered by many to be a fair price, and by all certainly not an excessive price. The Searle index reveals that since 1913-14 the cost of all the things that farmers have to buy had increased by 31 per cent by September 1 last. (It has risen sharply since then, and will continue to rise further no doubt as the war proceeds).

Adding 31 per cent to the pre-war price which farmers received at their local elevators, simple calculation shows that an equivalent price to-day would be $1.15 for No. 1 northern in store Fort William for western farmers to be as well off as they were in 1913-14.

That this is a reasonable price is confirmed by the fact that the British government to-day pays for British wheat—of lower quality than Canadian wheat—the equivalent at par of approximately $1.30 a bushel. One dollar and thirty cents a bushel in Great Britain means about $1.13 at Fort William."

Then, I have here another small chart taken from the Commercial Intelligence Journal issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is dated December, 1938, and points out the prices paid for wheat and for a loaf of bread in various countries. Probably we should not refer to Germany to-day, but it happens to be the first country on the list. The prices are as follows:

	Price of wheat p per bushel	er pound
Germany	$2.28	61/2
Italy	2.11	7.8
France	1.64	3.8
Norway	1.62	4.8
Belgium	1.17	3.1
United Kingdom	.65	4

It will be noted that the price of bread in Canada—and this was in the city of Winnipeg—was 7 cents a pound.

Based on the findings of Doctor Hopkins of the federal Department of Agriculture; of Professor Hope, of the department of farm management, Saskatoon university; of Major Strange, of the research department of the Searle Grain company; of Professor J. E. Lattimer, professor of agricultural economics at Macdonald college, and of several practical farmers who have kept detailed records on their own farms for the past twenty years, and also in view of the discussion on the budget at this time, I maintain that the wheat crop for the coming year should be handled through the wheat board on a parity price, along with other products for the prosecution of this war, and at a price of $1.25 for the producer, basis No. 1 northern Fort William.

Some reference was made by hon, members who spoke this evening, the hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and the hon, member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), to the fact that we may yet reach the point where currency might be issued against wheat in storage. I believe that might well be done. It was also pointed out that in future years our storage wheat might be of greater value to us than would be the tremendous amount of gold stored in the vaults of the nation to the south of us. I think that is quite possible.

Turning again to the budget as it was presented, may I observe that I was rather disappointed to find that a liquor tax was not mentioned. It was stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) that ten million quarts of liquor are consumed annually in Canada, and I believe a reasonable tax on that consumption would bring in many millions of dollars to the treasury, and at a time when it is badly needed. To-day certainly liquor is nothing but a luxury. We should also have a small additional tax on gasoline, much of which is used for purposes of luxury. This would bring in considerably more revenue. I think all luxuries should be heavily taxed. Otherwise the budget seems to be quite fair. It probably will bear a little heavily on the small salaried people of this country.

Under the mobilization bill which was passed the other day the government take upon themselves greater dictatorial powers under order in council than have ever been granted to any party government in the world. Notwithstanding that fact, I think the members of this parliament should be taken into their confidence whenever possible. Personally I should like to see parliament assembled at least every ninety days during the conduct of this war. The people of Canada expect at least that from their representatives. It would have a steadying effect upon the people, which I think it is our duty to try to create in a time like this when they are apt to become jittery. With this great power which has been given to the government of the day, I hope they will try to take the elected members of all groups in this house into their confidence as far as possible. We should not go too long without being assembled to look after, not only the conduct and the winning of this war, but the welfare of the people generally.

On motion of Mr. Reid the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF BUDGET, ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I desire to lay on the table the budget of Canadian National Railways and Canadian National Steamships for the year 1940, and to move:

That the annual budget of Canadian National Railways and Canadian National Steamships, tabled herewith, and the annual reports laid on the table of the house on May 17, 1940, be referred to the standing committee on railways and shipping, together with the following items in the estimates:

445, Maritime Freight Rates Act; 446, Maritime Freight Rates Act; 458, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, capital advances; 459, Canadian National Railway Company; 460, Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals.

Motion agreed to.

EUROPEAN WAR

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LOSS OF H.M.C.S. FRASER ON ACTIVE SERVICE NEAR BORDEAUX, FRANCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect to matters having to do with the Department of National Defence I should like to follow the practice of having my colleagues of that department make any announcements that have to be made in connection with that branch of the public service. However, there is one announcement which I feel will touch so deeply the hearts of the public of Canada that on this occasion I might, I think, depart from that rule and myself make the statement which it is necessary to make in the house.

I am greatly distressed to have to announce that, while engaged in the pursuance of hazardous duties off the mouth of the Gironde river near Bordeaux, France, His Majesty's Canadian ship Fraser was lost in a collision. One hundred and fifteen of the gallant crew have been rescued. I regret to have to say that forty-five are either dead or missing. The next of kin have already been informed.

His Majesty's Canadian ship Fraser has been on active service since the commencement of the war. At a few hours' notice she speeded, in company with another vessel of His Majesty's Canadian navy, from Vancouver to the Nova Scotian coast, via the Panama canal. Since then she has seen arduous service both off the coasts of Nova Scotia and in the Caribbean. Recently she has been on duty in European waters with sister ships.

There are four destroyers of the Fraser type in the Royal Canadian navy. Formerly known as H.M.S. Crescent, she was launched on September 29, 1931, and was acquired by Canada in 1937. Her displacement was 1,355 tons, and she was built at the Vickers-Armstrong works, England.

The commanding officer of the Fraser was Commander Wallace B. Creery, R.C.N. I understand the commanding officer's life has been spared.

At the present time, for reasons of naval secrecy, nothing more can be divulged of the operations of His Majesty's Canadian units operating in overseas waters.

I have just this minute received the following communication from the admiralty in London:

Please convey to officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy their lordships' sympathies in loss of H.M.C.S. Fraser.

Their lordships wish to take this opportunity to express their thanks to all ranks and ratings of the Royal Canadian Navy for splendid contribution they are making to the work of his majesty's fleet in common cause.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to add on behalf of all hon, members of this house an expression of sympathy equally deep with the officers and men of the royal Canadian navy in the loss of the ship Fraser, but even more to express the very deep sympathy of this House of Commons to the relatives of the gallant men who have been lost in their country's service in the manner that I have been obliged to describe.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure we all join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the expression of sympathy with the next of kin and loved ones of those who have been lost in this sad event. It is the sort of thing that Canada and Canadians may expect to happen at this time. May it be a challenge to every one of us to support our people at the front, our gallant lads in the navy, in the air and in the army. I am sure that their example and devotion and the sacrifice they make for Canada and the empire will not be forgotten.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I just wish to say very briefly that with the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition the group with which I am associated are in hearty accord. We too extend our deepest sympathy to those who are bereaved.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It hardly needs to be said that our group is in most sincere accord with the sentiments which have already been expressed. It must be impressed upon us all that we are at the beginning of a long, long list which will have to be recorded of those about whom it will later be said, as it was said of the heroes of the past: "Their name liveth for evermore."

BRITISH CHILDREN

COST OF HOSPITALIZATION OF EVACUATED CHILDREN PLACED IN FREDERICTON HOMES TO BE BORNE BY CITY

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to announce to this house that the loyal city of Fredericton, in which I have resided for forty years, which I have served as mayor, and whose citizens have been so good to me in days gone by, has announced through its mayor that it will bear the full expense of hospitalization of all evacuated children who may be placed in Fredericton homes.

I make the announcement in the hope that other cities and municipalities in Canada will follow this example.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I ask my hon. friend when he returns, as I understand he does at the end of the week, to his native city, to extend to the mayor of Fredericton, an expression of our appreciation of the action the city has taken; and also to say that by taking the action it has, the city of Fredericton has set an example which we feel sure will be followed throughout Canada.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS-SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 62 to incorporate Sisters Servants of Mary Immaculate.-Mr. Lapointe (Lotbiniere).

Bill No. 63 for the relief of Margaret Somerville Sickinger.—Mr. Hill.

Bill No. 64 for the relief of Romain Cléophas Moreau.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City).

Bill No. 65 for the relief of Dorothy Florence Donn Martin.—Mr. Graydon.

Bill No. 66 for the relief of Phoebe Doris Edge Pott.—Mr. Graydon.

Bill No. 67 for the relief of Filomena Grego Sauro.-Mr. Bercovitch.

RADIO BROADCASTING

NEWS SERVICES-QUESTION AS TO STATUS OF TRANS-RADIO PERMIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, based upon a press report appearing in to-day's Ottawa Citizen. Is it true that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has lifted the ban on Trans-Radio news which was proposed to become effective from July 1? In view of his earlier statement made on June 6—page 557 of Hansard—will the minister give the house detailed information as to the proof or bona fides furnished by Trans-Radio news officials to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, particularly as to its ownership, and the authenticity of its reports dated from London?

I sent notice of this question to the minister earlier in the day and he has informed me that he has not the information at the moment. Of course it is quite satisfactory to me if he has to postpone his reply.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I can give my hon. friend the information he desires. The board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation met in Ottawa yesterday. Attending the meeting were representatives of the Canadian Press and of the privately-owned broadcasting stations. A general policy was evolved which will mean that within a reasonably short time -the shortest possible time-sponsored news on the air will be a thing of the past. There are details to be worked out; I have asked a man in whom I think all hon. members of this house have a good deal of confidence, Mr. Walter Thompson, to look into all sides of the question on my behalf and to bring in a report, which I think will finalize the matter and evolve a policy more satisfactory to listeners in Canada. Whether in the meantime the present news services will be allowed to function I am not sure. I rather think they will, although I have no definite knowledge. It would perhaps be a mistake, for a matter of two or three weeks, to make any radical change in the existing situation. But I think I can say that within the next month there will be a new policy for news on the air, which I shall announce as soon as I can, and which I think will be recognized by all as an improvement on the present situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the announcement be made in this house?

Mr. HOWE: Sometimes these announcements get out before they reach me, but I assure my hon. friend that as soon as I receive it I will make the announcement in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Any announcement of public policy on behalf of a government-owned institution should be made here first.

Mr. HOWE: I may be scooped by my news service.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RATES PAYABLE BY ENLISTED MEN AND WOMEN TRAVELLING BY TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) if anything is being done to fix special and reasonable rates for enlisted men and women travelling by train. I ask this question because last week-end men travelling from Ottawa to Peterborough on regular vouchers had to pay $5.50. The regular coach fare is $6.90, but there was a special excursion rate of $4.60, and I know that some of the men paid $5.50 and found out about the lower rate later. In other words soldiers had to pay 90 cents more than civilians. I honestly believe something should be done—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to make inquiries. I cannot answer the question offhand.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, June 27, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In my first words this afternoon I should like to join in the regret that all must feel following the announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of the loss of one of our Canadian destroyers, the Fraser. Those of us from British Columbia have taken perhaps more interest than other hon. members in this destroyer, because, if I am not mistaken, this destroyer was first welcomed to Canada at the port of New Westminster, and I believe most of the personnel come from British Columbia. We are inclined to be more conscious of the other branches of the service and to forget at times that great, silent service, the navy. Some of the boys returned at Christmas time on leave, and the stories they told of their work in the north Atlantic were very thrilling indeed. They spent many days at sea; some had their fingers and toes frozen; many times they encountered a temperature of 40 degrees below zero, with a howling gale. So I cannot but grieve this afternoon at the loss of this destroyer.

With other members on the government side I have refrained from making speeches during this session because of the serious war situation in which we find ourselves. I would not make that statement, Mr. Speaker, but for the fact that an impression has been gained in many parts of the country that those of us who do not speak are not doing our duty here as members of parliament. Each of us has been extremely active since coming here, but realizing the war situation, we have refrained from making speeches which otherwise might have been made.

There are one or two matters, however, upon which I should like to dwell this afternoon, but in so doing will endeavour to be brief. In my first words I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) upon his splendid presentation of the war budget. At the same time I want to extend to the minister every good wish in the new position he is to assume very shortly, because we all realize the onerous and heavy responsibilities which fall upon the man holding the important position of Minister of National Defence at this time.

It is not my intention to deal at any great length with the various ramifications of the budget. It was generally well received by the people of Canada; in fact, I think they expected it to go much further than it did, and I believe they were prepared to bear even greater burdens gladly. I should like to make one comment, however, in connection with any future borrowings. The minister pointed out that he expected a total expenditure this year of well over a billion dollars and that the estimated revenue would be something like $750,000,000, leaving an estimated deficit of between $550,000,000 and $600,000,000. At a time like this I do not believe the government should pay any greater interest on loans than the one and a half per cent which is paid by the banks of Canada. As a matter of fact, I believe that thousands of our citizens would gladly lend their money to the government at this time without interest, fully realizing and knowing that if we fail now, nothing else matters. I believe some explanation is due the house-and I hope it will be given before this debate is ended-with regard to the interest paid on some past loans. In May, 1939, we borrowed $95,000,000 at one and a half per cent. Later in the same year we borrowed $200,000,000 at two per cent. In February of this year we raised $250,000,000 at three and a quarter per cent, and I understand that the greater part of that loan was taken up by the financial institutions of the country. Then we have the war savings certificates, on which the rate is three per cent. I am going to urge upon the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be, and upon the government, that in any future borrowings during these trying times we pay no more than allowed by the banks, namely, one and a half per cent.

I am not going into the question of finance generally, although I might very well do so. Sometimes, however, when the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) holds forth with regard to changes in our monetary system which will have to take place, I hear some hon. members laugh, while others call out "funny money." In my opinion the world is changing, and many of us will have to give up our old ideas. To those who laugh so loudly I would direct this question: How many members here could rise in their places and explain the present monetary system?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is the first good Liberal I have heard in this house.

Mr. REID: The other evening the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and some other hon, members were speaking of the increasing cost of government, and something was said about the bureaucracy which exists in Canada at the present time. I do not want to be misinterpreted, in what I am about to say, because I am all for the civil service merit system; but unconsciously we have built up a bureaucracy which has become almost, if not entirely, our master. Why, Mr. Speaker, I could name government departments here in Ottawa with which no minister can interfere. They have been left on their own too long. That is what ruined France; it is, I believe, injuring Great Britain very seriously, and unless we control this evil now I am afraid it may strangle us also.

I am afraid I do not quite agree with the Minister of Finance with regard to the tax on motor cars. Personally I should like to see them banned entirely for the duration of the war and our factories turned over to war work. Be that as it may, however, the minister pointed out that the graduated tax on motor cars was imposed not so much for the purpose of revenue as with the intention of keeping Canadian dollars in this country. I am glad the government is taking that view at last, because I am thinking of the farmers in Canada, particularly in British Columbia, who for many long years have been subjected to the importation of fruits and vegetables for which we are spending millions of dollars yearly, although we grow them in abundance in this country. We have potatoes, turnips, onions, tomatoes and like vegetables in abundance here; and yet, Mr. Speaker, last year we sent across the border to the United States over $4,500,000 for commodities which are grown in abundance by our farmers, commodities for which they can scarcely find a market.

I am an advocate of free trade.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am surprised to hear that.

Mr. REID: But when I see the hold the industrialists have in Canada, and when I see the protection given to them, I believe that in fairness to the farmer the same kind of protection should be given to him. It should be either free trade for all or protection for all.

Mr. BROOKS: You voted for the United States agreement?

Mr. REID: Then, we send half a million Canadian dollars across the line to buy strawberries grown in the United States, and yet no better strawberries are grown anywhere on the north American continent than are grown in British Columbia.

· Mr. SENN: Except in Ontario.

Mr. REID: In 1938, according to the Canada Year Book, we had an adverse balance of well over $13,000,000 in connection with agricultural products. I am reminding the Minister of Finance and the government that if from now on the policy is going to be one of preserving Canadian dollars, then I say, let us go the whole way and give the farmers the protection they need—protection which the industrialists already have. I say that because the farmers are, and for many years have been, placed in an invidious position, because they have to sell on a low priced market and buy in a highly protected market.

Mr. WARD: How can we protect the wheat grower?

Mr. REID: I will deal with that later. When I read in Hansard statistics prepared by economists with regard to price levels, incomes and salaries, and when I hear speeches made and statistics quoted by hon. members in an endeavour to make it appear that the farmers and those on relief are not doing too badly, I am reminded of an historic statement in the British House of Commons by Mr. Baldwin when he said to Mr. Snowden, "First there are lies; second, there are damned lies, and third, there are statistics." My statement may sound harsh, but I will say that one can take statistics and prove practically anything from them. But we cannot improve the lot of the workers or the farmers by any such citation of figures.

I was interested, and I have no doubt most hon. members were interested in the radio address delivered a short time ago by Mr. Bruce Hutchison, correspondent of the Vancouver Sun. In that radio address he pointed out the great change in respect of trade which has come over the north American continent, and made special reference to the new economic scheme suggested by President Roosevelt. To my mind Canada must find new markets, if she is to survive the blow of the loss of her European market. The markets in Europe are lost now, and perhaps will be lost for some time to come, if not for ever. I suggest to hon, members that conditions are changing so fast that we might well forget all past arguments in respect of tariffs. I am doubtful if we can do all that will be necessary to be done, and at the same time allow business to go on in its own usual way. All notions of money and of spending are going fast, if indeed they are not already gone. At this session we have budgeted for well over a billion dollars, and it was only a short time ago that in the short space of an hour and a half the United States government passed votes aggregating four billions of dollars.

Hon. members may be interested in some particulars respecting our trade. I shall not deal extensively with this point; but when one realizes that two countries, the United States and Great Britain, took over 78 per cent of all Canadian exports, that those same two countries furnished 79 per cent of all Canadian imports, and that our exports to the continent of Europe, exclusive of Russia, comprising 190,000,000 people, was just over $32,000,000, and our imports from the same sources were about $24,500,000, we are forced to wonder if we are treating Great Britain fairly. We have not in the past, but I trust that during the war we will improve that situation, so far as trade is concerned. While we sold goods to the value of $423,191,091 to the United States, our imports from that country were valued at $487,279,507. On the other hand, while we sold to Great Britain goods to the value of $409,411,682, our imports were valued at only $145,050,000.

I am sometimes surprised at the attitude of many of our industrialists. Even during the present war some of them have been complaining privately to me that Great Britain has been making engines which could very well be made in Canada. When I am approached like this, I ask them this question: If we sell Great Britain our wheat and many other products, how is she going to pay us for those goods if we do not buy from her? I have mentioned these facts particularly so that I might bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that Europe has been cut off, so far as the factor of markets is concerned, and that with the loss of those markets we had better give serious consideration to the proposal of the President of the United States to set up an economic customs union consisting of the entire Americas.

I wish now to deal briefly with a local matter, namely, the serious situation affecting the fishermen of the Pacific coast. I suppose all hon, members from British Columbia have received telegrams and perhaps telephone calls from fishermen in British Columbia pointing out the serious conditions confronting them in connection with the matter of arriving at a price which will enable them to carry on. They have called attention particularly to the price of sockeye salmon offered by packers or canners.

So that the problem might better be understood, for the benefit of hon. members may I point out that there are five varieties of salmon, and that the highest priced variety is known as the sockeye or red salmon, the market for which is found principally in Great Britain. At the beginning of every fishing season fishermen and packers get together to arrive at prices. This year they have met, but have not arrived at an agreement because the cannerymen are this year offering a price almost 30 per cent less than has been offered in previous years. They are saying, "Well, we do not know what the market will be. Great Britain is not eager to take our sockeye salmon." The result is that they are offering the fishermen in some instances 13 cents to 14 cents less per fish than was offered in 1939. This is serious enough, but when one considers that the cost of nets and gear has gone up 30 per cent in some instances, he will understand the plight of the fishermen. At the moment these men are refusing to go out to the fishing grounds until this matter is settled. The British Columbia members have been negotiating with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in an endeavour to have him take some action, but so far nothing has been done. Our argument to the minister is that precedents have been created, and something can and should be done.

We do not complain when the fishermen in the maritime provinces receive over half a million dollars. We are not against the government guaranteeing the price of apples or the price of pork. We are not adverse to the government guaranteeing the price of wheat to the farmers. But we ask for equal treatment. When the fishermen of British Columbia, numbering nearly 9,000 this year, ask that something be done, they are told that nothing can be done. We are informed that it is a matter for the cabinet to decide. This is the reason why I bring this matter to the attention of the house this afternoon. Time is short because the fishing season opens on June 30. Is the government going to stand by and see between eight and nine thousand families deprived of their living? All this is likely to cause more unrest on the coast.

This food will be required later, if not immediately, at least in the near future. We are being urged to produce more food. I contend that the government should take note of this dispute and at least offer a guaranteed price so that these men can carry on their fishing operations.

One word on the war situation. The response of the people of Canada to our war effort has been simply wonderful. We have a perfect example of the unity that exists between Great Britain and ourselves in the way in which Canadian homes have been offered to British children. Some time ago the leader of the opposition referred to immigration and pointed out the number of people who had come to Canada from the continent of Europe. I was looking over the figures the other day, and it may interest the house to know that in 1871, 92 per cent of the population of Canada were of British and French stock. The last census of 1931 shows a drop in this percentage to 80 per cent. In other words, in 1871 there were in this dominion only some 302,000 persons who had come from the continent of Europe or other countries, whereas in 1931 there were in this country 2,000,000 persons who were not of British or French stock.

It may well be that many of the British children who are sent here will remain. I hope it does not happen, but if Hitler makes an onslaught on the British isles it is possible that many parents might be killed. Even though that does not occur, there will be great benefits to Canada from this closer contact between Great Britain and ourselves, and we need more British stock.

I do not think the loyalty of any one should be judged by whether or not he gives a gift of money, and I shall not attempt to make such a judgment at this time. However, I think some praise should be given to those citizens of Canada, from the poorest to the wealthiest, who have given willingly, and, in some instances, most generously. There are those who have sent their fifty cents and upwards, which reminds me of the parable of the widow's mite. In proportion they gave more than many who gave in abundance. I think the gift of $100,000 to this country by the lieutenant-governor of British Columbia should give a lead to many other wealthy Canadians. In this connection I have nothing to say about the great city of Toronto. The mayor of that city set out to collect a million dollars, and I believe all he was able to get was $18,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is most unfair. No city in Canada is more generous than Toronto.

Mr. REID: I should like now to say something about the splendid work being done by the women of this country. On Thursday morning it was my privilege to attend the Capitol theatre to witness a picture put out by the motion picture bureau of the dominion government. After seeing that picture, one could not help but feel impressed and elated by the work being done by our women folk. The women from one end of Canada to the other are busily engaged in many endeavours and I think worthy note should be taken of what they are doing. They are showing a splendid example to the rest of the country.

I come now to the civilian defence units which have been set up in many parts. It is my opinion that when these units were first started they were not well received by the government. Speaking for at least part of British Columbia, I can say that the people there had two motives in mind when setting up these civilian defence units, particularly in the lower Fraser valley and other parts of the province. The first was a desire to do something about the possible unrest which was evident in certain quarters. It was said here that there was no danger, but those of us who live in British Columbia know what is going on. We have been greatly perturbed over the possibilities of what might happen in the future.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has stated repeatedly that there has been no sabotage in Canada. That has been true so far, but that does not mean that there will not be attempts at sabotage. I think we would do well to utilize these civilian defence units. My opinion is that they should not be left to operate simply as civilian units; they should be tied up in some way with our military operations. Perhaps they could be drafted into the militia units. We should take advantage of this willingness to protect the life and property of our country. I trust the government will take serious note of this and give official recognition to these units.

I do not intend to mention the many vulnerable points of British Columbia because they should not be made public on the floor of the house. But we are greatly perturbed. I trust the Minister of Justice and the government will give consideration to the representations which are being made by the attorney general of British Columbia. I urge upon the government also to have additional naval units placed on the Pacific coast. No one can tell at what moment there may be other nations arrayed against us. We have our groups of nationals in that province in great numbers, and if other countries should turn against us, these with others might create a serious problem indeed.

I ask the government to do a little more for British Columbia. When members speak of the west they often think of it as stopping at the Rocky mountains. We have always to mention British Columbia as a separate province. But it should not be forgotten that we are the gateway to the Pacific. Frankly, those of us from British Columbia would like to see more protection given and much more done to prevent possible sabotage.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as all well know, the situation is serious, but there is no reason for fear, let alone panic. If we gave way to that, we should only be playing into the hands of our ruthless enemy. Hitler's plans are, first, propaganda to create unrest and then fear, and then at a chosen moment to move in ruthlessly on the country he wishes to conquer. I advise hon, members who are interested to read Hermann Rashning's book, "Hitler Speaks," and then hon. members will realize that we must be prepared for any eventuality in Canada. Read of Hitler's plans and what he said in 1934 about what he would do to France, and you will see, Mr. Speaker, that his plans have been carried out exactly as predicted; and then read in this same book of Hitler's scheme with respect to the United States and Canada, and you will realize just why many of us are greatly perturbed over possible fifth column activities in this country. The present conflict springs from a pagan conception of some kind of new social order which is founded on might and cruelty, and which ignores the individual. Hitler has declared that he will obliterate religion from the face of the earth. Our civilization is founded upon the Christian conception of the brotherhood of man, the sacredness of human personality, and the sanctity of contractual relations. It is disgraceful to my mind that men in Canada have given utterance to the thought that they would prefer Hitler to this country.

Let us throw everything we have into the struggle now, and quickly, for we are fighting not only for democracy but for our very lives.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my first word, too, will be one of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) upon his presentation of the budget and the manner in which our national accounts were placed before the House of Commons. It was an exceedingly able piece of work.

I should also like to associate myself with very much of what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has just said.

I disagree with him in his commendation of the ten per cent exchange tax, which affects us in the west in an altogether different manner from that in which it affects the people of British Columbia and of some other parts of Canada. As was anticipated, the new taxation necessitated by the war is heavy, and our country is perhaps unfortunate in that many of the taxes which were instituted during the great war of 1914-18, and in subsequent years, still remained on our statute books when this war broke out. Consequently, in order to raise additional revenue to conduct the present war, new ways and means of raising money had to be devised. Luxury taxes and taxes of that description were imposed previously, and to-day we have had to turn to other forms of taxation which bear heavily upon many classes of our citizens.

I should like to point this out, too, that we frequently make comparisons between Great Britain and Canada to show the effect of certain of our taxes, but we forget that indirect taxation in Canada bears heavily upon our people, particularly upon those with low

I notice it is estimated in the present budget that customs, excise and sales taxes will yield some $415,000,000 out of the $650,000,000 expected to be raised by taxation; and the taxes which I have just mentioned, particularly the sales tax and such a tax as that on sugar, bear heavily upon those with low incomes. May I interject that the new tax on cigarette papers will be a hardship for many of the poorer members of our population who roll their own cigarettes.

We have in the present budget a wide extension of the income tax, to which no real objection can be taken so long as those in the higher brackets bear their fair proportion of that taxation.

But the new national defence tax is in reality a tax on wages, affecting even the most lowly of our wage-earners. In my opinion the exemptions of $600 for a single person and $1,200 for the married are too low, particularly when we remember, as I said before, that we collect heavy indirect taxation from our people. In considering wage taxes, salary taxes and the income tax, the criterion ought to be, it seems to me, not how much do we take but how much do we leave. Even in making a comparison between, we will say, the province of Ontario and Great Britain, we find that the amounts taken leave substantial incomes as the income increases, and the differences between the amounts left in Ontario are relatively more in the higher brackets than they are in Great Britain. I have, as a matter of fact, had worked out the amounts that remain after the income tax is deducted, and I have them before me although I shall not take time to read them this afternoon, but these figures substantiate the statement I have just made.

The increase in the income tax, when we add the national defence tax, is proportionately greater in the lower and lower-middle than in the higher-middle and higher brackets, if I may put it in that way. As I have said, the question is not so much the amount one takes as the amount that is left in order to maintain a reasonable and proper standard of

I am sorry that the government did not explore certain new avenues of taxation which are, I think, available to them. At least two sources of profitable revenue remain untouched by the dominion, and there may be others. In my opinion they ought to have been utilized before a wage tax was considered. I have often spoken of a capital gains tax—the increase in stock values and unearned increment. I remember, of course, that the Sirois report does not consider that to be a fruitful field for exploration, but I think it ought to be explored by our Department of Finance. The second is a dominion succession duty tax. I realize that the provinces have invaded this field of taxation, but there is no reason why we should not apply some form of dominion succession duty tax. The Sirois report in this connection points out that for the period 1926 to 1935 the yield of inheritance tax per capita in our sister dominion of Australia was 1.8 to 3.8 times as large as in Canada, and in New Zealand 2.1 to 5.2 times as large. That will be found at page 120 in volume 2 of the report. Australia is not as rich a country as Canada, and probably wealth there is if anything more evenly distributed than in Canada; and New Zealand, of course, according to a recent book published by the eminent British statistician Mr. Colin Clark, is the wealthiest country per capita in the world, although income is much more evenly distributed there. But it is safe to say that the wealth in both our sister dominions is at least not more unevenly distributed than in Canada; perhaps indeed the very reverse.

If our provincial governments published each year figures of estates passing at death, as the British and Australian and New Zealand governments do, we should be in a position to estimate with some accuracy what the possible yield of a dominion inheritance tax would be, but unfortunately no such figures exist in Canada. It seems safe to say, however, that on the basis of the New Zealand experience a dominion inheritance tax would produce a very large sum of money.

A further source of revenue might be an increased tax on the non-resident holders of Canadian securities. The present rate is five per cent. Why should it not be, let us say, twenty per cent? Again, I do not know how much revenue this would produce but I am confident that the return would be considerable. A further tax might be one on the returns from bonds, taken at the source. It seems to me that there is a discrepancy in our field of taxation at the moment. We are taxing incomes derived from industries and from profits. I am making no adverse criticism of that; in fact, I shall have something to say about it in due course. At the same time we have not explored the method of making the other form of capital investment bear its share of taxation, except of course through the income tax.

Then, too, we might ask our people, as they did in New Zealand, to contribute at this time their money in the form of interest-free loans for war purposes. The hon, member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) spoke of loans at a very low rate of interest. I am in entire agreement with what he said, but I think we might go a step further. The Minister of Finance the other afternoon drew attention to a number of communications which he had received from relatively poor people virtually offering their all in the dominion's hour of need, and I think we have a right to expect that those who have large blocks of money might also be asked and perhaps, as in New Zealand, even compelled at this time to lend at least a portion of their wealth to the state without interest.

One of the most objectionable taxes in the budget, from our point of view, is the new war exchange tax, which was commended highly by one or two previous speakers. Let us not forget that that tax will work not only as a tax but in effect as additional tariff protection on certain classes of goods, and it will be felt by those who have to use certain imported commodities. Nearly all our families on the prairies are bound at certain times of the year to use imported vegetables and fruits, such as citrus fruits for which we can find no substitutes at certain seasons, and this tax will make it more difficult for them to obtain these products because of the increased price. Perhaps the prairie regions will suffer most in this regard, and it will be felt more by our farmers than probably any other group in the community, because they rely to such a large extent upon imported farm machinery of various kinds-imported farm machinery produced in some instances not economically in Canada but which our farmers require for their industry. I suggest to the government at this point that they might reconsider this tax and grant an exemption on farm machinery imported into Canada.

Imports of agricultural implements from the United States in the calendar year 1939 amounted to $20,098,391. On that basis the war exchange tax imposes upon the farming community in a single year an additional $2,000,000 or so in taxation. Of all sections in the community, with the exception of the unemployed, the farmers are probably the least able to stand the extra burden of taxation. In my opinion the same result in the conservation of our exchange might have been brought about by the adoption of a rationing system rather than by the method of taxation. I would urge, too, that in relation to other commodities as well as farm implements we should see to it that our price control board keeps a tight hand on Canadian commodities of the same class or kind produced in Canada. so that no undue advantage will be taken by Canadian manufacturers of this particular tax in the budget, if it is maintained.

Now I come to what we regard as the most serious defect in the budget proposals, namely, the excess profits tax. Let me repeat that if we ask men to lay down their lives and to die, as we have learned this afternoon that young Canadians are doing, then we have a right to ask that Canadian industry shall forego all profits for at least the duration of the war. Under the budget proposals, industries which made large profits in the pre-war years, especially those engaged in war industries—

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the hon. member referring to all excess profits?

Mr. COLDWELL: I will deal with that in a moment. I say, under the budget proposals such industries will pay no excess profits tax. I have a list of companies with their 1939 capital and their returns, a list which I have carefully prepared, with the assistance of an able statistician, from the Financial Post survey of corporate securities. The list contains the names of thirty-three companies, most of them among the more than usually profitable Canadian companies. Their total profits available for dividends in 1939 were $146,191,262. On the basis of their 1939 earnings, only nine of them would have paid any excess profits tax under the old act, and only two would have paid excess profits tax of more than $100,000. The excess profits taxes of the whole lot put together would have taken just 1.5 per cent of their profits; in fact after paying both the increased corporation tax and the excess profits tax these companies would have had left about 79 per cent of their profits. I may add that only seven of the companies would have chosen plan A which has now been discontinued.

Now we come to the new act. Under the new act, on the basis of 1939 earnings these companies taken together would pay, as in the former case, $28,757,156 in corporation income tax and $18,297,760 in excess profits tax. After paying both the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax they would still have available for distribution over two-thirds of their 1939 profits. It will be noted that our available financial reports cover very few mining companies, which are obviously in some cases among the most profitable of our Canadian companies. Unfortunately complete 1939 figures for these companies are not readily available, but it is safe to say that, if they were, the summary which I have given would have been even more startling.

Let me now give some further figures as to these thirty-three companies. The total capital in 1939 as computed under the Excess Profits Tax Act was $860,454,853. The total profits of the thirty-three companies represent a return of almost 17 per cent on this capital. The new excess profits tax applied to the 1939 earnings would leave a return of 11 per cent on the capital so computed. But there is a very wide gap between the lowest return and the highest, as I shall show in a moment. The total corporation income tax and excess profits tax of these thirty-three companies, on the basis proposed in the budget and assuming the 1939 earnings, would be, as I said, about $47,000,000. If we took everything over 5 per cent on the capital the proceeds of the tax would be about $103,000,000. Of course I am not forgetting that this would mean a substantial reduction in the amount we would subsequently collect in personal income taxes. But collection at the source, as we propose to collect the new defence exchange tax, would prevent evasion, and such an excess profits tax would mean a very considerable levelling off in income and doing away to some extent with inequalities. We might take advantage of the present war situation to bring about that desirable end.

I turn now to one or two of the companies for the purpose of indicating the excess profits tax on the new basis laid down in the budget.

Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company's profits amounted in 1939 to $9,339,586. The corporation income tax is $1,867,917. The excess profits tax on the new basis would be $933,959, making a total tax of $2,801,876, leaving $6,537,710, or, on the basis of capital as defined in our act, a profit of 33.6 per cent after the taxes are paid.

Canadian Industries Limited: profits $6,-232,143, corporation income tax $1,246,429, excess profits $623,215. Total $1,869,644, leaving $4,362,499, or a return of 25·2 per cent on the capital as defined in our act.

I give a brief summary of two or three others. International Nickel on the same basis would have remaining a profit of 18·2 per cent on the basis of capital as defined in our act. Aluminium Limited, which because of the peculiar conditions in that industry over the last four years will pay the largest tax of any of these big more or less war industries, would have 11·8 per cent left. Asbestos Corporation would have 16 per cent left.

Of course we consider that such profits ought not to be permitted during the course of the war, and that we should take all profits above a fair return on the capital invested and the risk taken. That would vary in various industries. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked me a few minutes ago if I would take all profits. I believe that these industries can be classified according to risk experienced, and so on, and after having so classified them we would take all profits above the amount which we consider to be a fair return for the risk taken.

Because we feel that the new excess profits tax fails to tax the profits of profitable war industries, I am going to move an amendment to the budget resolution, as follows:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets the failure of the government to impose a one hundred per cent tax on all profits in excess of a fixed return on capital invested.

This carries out the idea which I have endeavoured to place before the house.

I want also to say something about the other obligations that we have undertaken. In addition to financing Canada's own war effort we are undertaking, quite properly may I say, the financing of certain British purchases and operations in Canada. It is estimated that some two and a half billion dollars' worth of Canadian securities are held in Great Britain, and I am told that of these probably not more than one and a half billion dollars' worth are readily realizable. Dividend and interest payments on this sum, at four per cent, would amount to $60,000,000. I am not forgetting that repatriation of these securities would bring about several good results. If the government retained the securities it would extinguish an appreciable part of the dominion debt and the debt of the Canadian National Railways. It would make the dominion the owner of a large amount of certain provincial and municipal bonds, which incidentally might assist in bringing about the adoption of the recommendations contained in the Sirois report. It would make the government the chief owner and creditor of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the owner of large interests in various other British-controlled corporations. It would relieve the Canadian economy of a large annual burden of interest payments abroad.

I do not know how the government proposes to proceed in this regard, but it seems to me that these desirable benefits should be secured for the dominion if at all possible. On the other hand it would have another effect which would be bad. At present Great Britain's ability to buy our wheat and other products is due in large measure to the fact that we export large quantities of goods to her, and in this form she receives interest payments on her investments in this country, because thus she acquires a quantity of Canadian exchange. If she realizes upon these investments during the war and these securities are repatriated to Canada at the end of the war Great Britain will no longer have those funds available with which to buy our Canadian products. As I have indicated, the Canadian economy will be relieved of one burden, but the internal result may not be so happy. As one who lives in western Canada, where we are dependent almost solely on one great export commodity and one great customer, I am fearful of the result. We may have a dislocation of the Canadian economy as severe as the dislocation which resulted in many countries from the introduction of machinery. There may be a disastrous effect upon the economy of Canada, and particularly of western Canada, unless we are able and bold enough to take the necessary steps to meet the situation.

Yesterday I was glad to hear from the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) that the party which he represented was suggesting an import-export board. We have been urging that for years, but the proposal has always been frowned upon. I believe, however, that when this war is over, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said a moment ago, we shall find ourselves faced with an entirely new set of conditions which will require new policies; and I agree with the hon. member that the old idea of the flow of trade and interruption by tariffs will be just about as extinct as the dodo. We shall have to plan intelligently our exports and imports to meet the new conditions with which we shall be faced. Not the least of the difficulties we shall encounter will be that of improving our position in relation to Great Britain if we should lose that market on account of the repatriation of our bonds.

It seems to me therefore, that there is a clear case for immediate consideration of the planning of our social and economic structure so that we may withstand not only the stress of war but also the economic and social dislocations that will follow. Indeed, we may be faced with the problem of a Europe self-contained, though poor, if—as I believe will be the case—we are victorious. I do not think there is any question of that; I scarcely needed to say "if". But if on the other hand—and of course this "if" is bigger—Hitler should succeed even in making a peace that might be advantageous to him, we might find ourselves confronted by a continental economy in Europe and have to consider ways and means of organizing our north American continental economy on this side of the Atlantic ocean.

These are some of the features of the budget that have appealed to us. There are many other matters which we might have discussed at some length. I have tried to deal with just a few of the points that seemed to me to be of major importance at this time: the other matters can be dealt with when we take up the various budget resolutions. Let me repeat, however, that we insist that in all these matters of taxation and collection of revenue there shall be equality of sacrifice. Last week we hesitated to give the government the wide powers which the house finally gave-and which we approved-because we wished first of all an undertaking that before human lives were conscripted some of these great corporations, to which I have referred this afternoon and a list of which I have before me though I did not read it, should be called upon to make at least an equivalent sacrifice. And in our opinion the budget has not ensured this.

These, then, are some of our criticisms. We commend the government for having endeavoured to adopt a pay-as-you-go policy, incidentally to a greater extent than I anticipated. I am glad to see such a large proportion of our war expenditures raised by taxation. I think it only right and proper that this generation should pay for the war which this generation permitted to fall upon the world. But, as I said earlier, if we must borrow money let us borrow it at the lowest possible rate of interest, or let us endeavour to obtain some of the money we need on loan without interest at all.

Yesterday in this house hon. members discussed the pressing problem of the great industry in which my own people are engaged, the wheat industry. Most hon. members refer to conditions in their own constituencies, and before I resume my seat I should like to say that in my opinion as soon as possible—and that ought to be at once—the government ought to tell the producers of that great commodity, upon which such a large portion of this country depends, exactly what the policy is going to be this year in relation to the marketing of wheat. We know perfectly well that there is a tremendous surplus unsold, on hand, in the country. But when the new crop is reaped, in all probability there will be a much larger surplus than we have ever known. That surplus may play an important part in the world when the war ends. Starving Europe, even semi-starving Britain, may be glad of a goodly portion of it. But it is neither just nor fair to expect the men and women who have produced this valuable commodity to carry the load in the meantime. To my mind the government should take over grain from the farmers at a price which will enable them to live. No one is asking for a profit, least of all the western farmer; he is asking for simply enough to enable him to continue on an even keel. Give him that, and he will be satisfied. Give him that, and he will continue to produce the commodity which may be of vital importance to this country and the world in days to come.

I repeat on behalf of the group with which I am associated that we are prepared to assist the country in every possible way to bring to a successful conclusion the great struggle in which we are engaged. But we urge—nay, we demand—that in this struggle no one shall be permitted to amass great wealth; that there shall be equality of sacrifice, and that all profits, at least for the duration of the war, over and above a fixed amount required to give a reasonable and proper return, shall be taken for the prosecution of the war and the benefit of Canada.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the point of view my group takes will result in an exactly opposite attack from that just made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The idea of increasing taxes is the idea of increasing poverty, and not the idea of increasing abundance. We, sir, are in an age of abundance; we are in a land of abundance; we are in a world of abundance; we are in the most glorious age the world has ever seen. All we need is to discover how to use what we have. Therefore nothing will be said by my group about increasing taxation, or about sharing poverty. There is enough and to spare for all, even if we are at war.

Having said that, may I turn to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) and congratulate him sincerely—and he knows I speak sincerely. He took a very difficult job. He has made the best of a very bad job. He had to do his work under the restrictions, regulations and preconceived notions of a system which has made itself a stench and an abomination in the nostrils of the world. So I say he deserves great commendation for the success he has achieved in connection with what he has set out to do.

His budget is an excellent orthodox budget. Having said that for it, I have condemned it as much as I have praised it. This budget is one of scarcity, not of abundance. Therefore it is completely out of place in this age. It is a budget leading towards inflation and to adverse exchange. Hon. members in the group with which I am associated have been repeatedly accused of advocating inflation. On the absolute contrary we are the only group in the house advocating a policy which will prevent inflation, not only for the present but for all time. As I said, this budget will cause inflation. Every item in it will lead towards inflation, and I believe I can successfully prove my statement. It is a bottleneck budget. It is a budget which in this age is one of timidity, despair and defeat; for it puts money first, and regards money as a cause rather than an effect or a result. It looks down, not up.

It lacks vision. As the scripture says: "Where there is no vision the people perish." There must be new vision, even to fight a war.

May I draw the attention of hon. members to a great remark by a man who, I believe, has been one of the greatest to perform in this assembly; I refer to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. Speaking on January 31, 1938, as reported at page 47 of Hansard, the right hon. gentleman said:

I am convinced that there are methods which might be resorted to, even though they might be experiments, that are worthy of the consideration of the Canadian people; and I believe that if the government took a strong lead with respect to these, and commanded, as they would command, the support of men in every part of the house, they would be amazed at the results that would follow.

May I say that those words are as true to-day as they were when they were uttered, and they were prophetically true when they were uttered.

All progress has been due to the discovery and application of new principles and new laws. For example, when it was proposed that Britain should build iron ships, it is reported that men frequently greeted the proposal with such scornful expressions as this: "Iron, forsooth; why not stone, then, for ships?" There is just as much intelligence in that expression as there is in many of the expressions with which the new economics is greeted to-day. They were able to build iron ships because they had learned that if iron is put into a certain shape it will displace more than its weight of water. Immediately that principle was discovered and applied, the whole shipping industry and management completely changed and the world went forward into a new era.

Take aeroplanes. For a long time men did not realize that it was possible to make a body which was heavier than air float in the air by causing it to go so fast that its speed as well as its area created buoyancy. The very minute it was discovered that speed would cause such a body to displace weight; the very minute people discovered successful means of applying speed, they were able to create aeroplanes which were heavier than air and which could float in the air. But for thousands of years they did not know how to apply that principle.

Take the alternating current in electricity. Thomas A. Edison understood electricity as it was manifested in the direct current. According to the principles of the direct current, the greater the power of the current, the larger the wire had to be which carried the current. The result was that a definite limitation was placed upon the power of the current. William Stanley, a reformer who had new ideas in his mind appeared. He had vision. He realized that it would be possible so to manage electricity that a current of increased power could pass through a smaller wire. This he did by passing the current through a transformer to step up the voltage. That principle introduced a new era. Thomas A. Edison condemned William Stanley's idea as impracticable nonsense, but William Stanley was right.

The reformer has always been met with suspicion, scorn, resentment, antagonism and even persecution. Every one of the illustrations I have given proves that. Every political reform has been met with the same kind of reception. Take chartism as an example. One hundred years ago a terrific battle was fought in Great Britain over the reform known as chartism. There were six principles in chartism: First, equal electoral areas; second, universal suffrage; third, payment of members of parliament; fourth, no property qualification; fifth, vote by ballot, and, sixth, annual parliaments. There is not a member in this house who would oppose for a split second any one of those first five reforms. To us they are obviously commonplace, but to the man of a hundred years ago they were so revolutionary that the people who advocated them were treated far worse than are the communists in our country to-day. They were alleged to be more dangerous to society. Let hon. members read the story of chartism; it will prove most revealing. Let us not, then, disregard the reformer or his ideas.

Canada can turn the scales in this war. She is the eldest daughter still dwelling under her mother's roof. Hers is the responsibility to defend the motherland, and hers the ability. She has a marvellous people. May I read one of the last statements made by the late Hon. Mr. Rogers? He said:

The government at Ottawa has been inundated with offers of assistance from individuals and various associations. These have been so numerous that it has not been possible in all cases to send prompt replies.

Not only are Canada's people possessed of the winning spirit, but she has a large population. Just across the border is an elder sister "living on her own," but nevertheless jealously watching the welfare of the motherland. There is a sister within whose borders are over 11,000,000 unemployed, most of whom would be delighted to come to Canada to work in case we needed them. Canada's potential resources as far as people are concerned are almost limitless. Canada's material resources consist of mines, forests, farms, factories, railroads and other means of transportation, which place her among the greatest nations in the world. Canada's financial resources can and should be the result of her people and her material resources. If her people are wellnigh limitless in their potentialities, if her material resources are well-nigh limitless, then her financial resources must of necessity be well-nigh limitless. Before I am finished I shall give the house quotations to show that I am not advocatng anything unorthodox, to prove that such is beginning to be recognized by men like the governor of our Bank of Canada.

May I digress for just a moment to give credit to the governor of the Bank of Canada? I had occasion the first time I spoke in the house this year to make remarks which were in some measure a reflection on that gentleman, but I had no desire whatsoever to disparage him. He had spoken under the restrictions of the present system. He is a progressive, courageous, open-minded, honourable young man of whom we can well be proud. I am going to quote briefly passages from his testimony to support what I have said.

This budget limits Canada's available money to taxation and borrowing. Now taxation has obvious limits. After a government taxes its people beyond a certain point, it encounters the law of diminishing returns. Borrowing, too, has manifest limits both immediately and ultimately. But the limit to the money which we have should be our materials, our capital equipment and our men. Let me read from the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of this house last year:

Q.—so far as war is concerned, to defend the integrity of the nation there will be no difficulty in raising the means of financing whatever those requirements may be.

95826-781

Mr. Towers: The limit of the possibilities depends on men and materials.

Q.—and where you have an abundance of men and materials you have no difficulty, under our present banking system, in putting forth the medium of exchange that is necessary to put the men and materials to work in defence of the realm?

Mr. Towers: That is right.

That statement has tremendous significance for us at this stage of our national life. May I quote from the Bank of Nova Scotia's Monthly Review of October 1939, entitled "Economics of War, No. 1":

Financial outlays are no more than an outward sign of the inner reality. The true measure of a country's ability to prepare for or to wage war is the degree to which it can enlarge and redirect its productive capacity to this end. So long as there are unused resources of labour and capital and so long as peace-time resources may be diverted to war purposes without reducing living standards below a minimum subsistence, it is feasible for a nation to increase its war-time capacity and to find the necessary financial means.

May I quote next from a man who is accepted by most thinkers as at least worthy of attention, Paul Einzig? From his book "Economic Warfare", published in 1940, I quote from pages 80-81:

While it may be open to argument whether in time of peace it is advisable to restrict production in general, in any circumstances, for the sake of preventing a credit inflation, there can be no question about the folly of attempting to hamper production in time of war by means of credit restriction measures.

May I stop there a moment? Credit restriction for primary producers has been in evidence from one coast of Canada even unto the other, and is now. In my constituency there are simply hundreds of farmers who cannot carry on their summer fallow operations because they cannot get credit. And yet these men are engaged in production. And Canada is at war! I quote further:

If the producers have not enough capital, they will have to be assisted by means of an adequate amount of credit, irrespective of the effect of such expansion upon the monetary situation. In any case, the extent to which credit expansion reacts upon the price level is apt to be overrated. In so far as the credit expansion leads to the creation of purchasing power without a corresponding creation of goods, it tends to cause a rise in commodity prices. If, however, the creation of additional purchasing power is either prevented or offset, then there is no reason why credit expansion in itself should lead to a rise in commodity prices.

I think the bearing of what I have said must be clear. There is no limit to the amount of credit expansion or money expansion which is possible to a state like Canada except its men and materials. The government must create, issue and circulate, debtfree, such amounts of currency and credit as Canada's materials, equipment and manpower will justify. In other words, money can be created, issued and circulated to the point at which there becomes a scarcity of goods and services. Up to that point there will be no rise in prices—what we call inflation.
The government must then manage that new money so as to prevent inflation and adverse exchange.

May I quote another passage. I must crave the indulgence of the house for quoting rather extensively. As matters stand, people in my group are looked upon as crackpots so to speak; people think we do not know. That is just the way Edison felt about Stanley; it is how the opponents of the development of steel ships felt; it is exactly the way people felt about chartism, and women's suffrage, as my colleague (Mr. Hansell reminds me. I can remember being called a crackpot and fool when I was in university because I argued in 1912 in favour of women's suffrage. Conditions being as they are. I have to quote the words of men who might be recognized as being wiser than myself. May I quote these words of the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna in a speech to his shareholders on January 30, 1936:

Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers without reference to the central bank's holding of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.

Again, in the same speech:

We learnt that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess, though deflation has still a touch of virtue about it in the minds of many people. Nevertheless it is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused.

May I stop to comment briefly on that passage. Every measure in this budget is designed to decrease the amount of money in the people's hands, and consequently is certain to produce the ill effects which Mr. McKenna here points out.

Further on, Mr. McKenna says:

For money to be truly sound there must be enough of it to finance an ordinarily growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary rise of prices.

With that statement I completely agree.

May I quote again from Mr. Towers, in the banking and commerce committee, words the truth of which I think very few people in Canada have come to realize. And before

Mr. Blackmore.]

I quote those words may I stop just a minute to pay a tribute to the efforts of at least two men who were members of the House of Commons last year. One of them is sitting in his seat, the hon, member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), and the other is the hon, member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). I name these two gentlemen because they are Liberals. There are others in other groups whom I will not name, but these two men were responsible in very large measure for the vast amount of information which was elicited in the banking and commerce committee in clear and simple language so that he who ran might read. I believe that they did a service for the people of Canada the extent of which cannot perhaps be even dreamed of at the present time, and I wish to pay a deserved tribute to them. And now let me quote from the evidence of Mr. Towers:

Q. When a $1,000,000 worth of bonds is presented by the government to the bank, $1,000,000 of new money or the equivalent is created?

Mr. Towers: Yes.

Q. It is a fact that a million dollars of new money is created?

Mr. Towers: That is right.

That will be found at page 238. Again:

Q. Now, as a matter of fact, to-day our gold is purchased by the Bank of Canada with notes which it issues . . . not redeemable in gold . . . in effect using printing press money . . . to purchase gold?

Mr. Towers: That is the practice all over the world. . . .

That will be found at page 283.

These words completely support the most extreme views ever expressed by this group. Now, I ask the house this question: If the money can be created and is created, is there any conceivable reason why the government and the people of Canada should be in debt for that money, or pay interest on it? Is there any imaginable reason why we should be short of money provided we have goods and men?

I recall an experience of the last war, to which I referred in one of my speeches, when Canada created $26,000,000 of new money debt free and used it to defray government expenses. I pointed out that the interest saved on that $26,000,000 since the time of its creation amounts to over $1,000,000—I do not remember just how much. In the United States they used greenbacks debt free during the great civil war. Greenbacks were deliberately discredited by several means. If there was any fall in the price of greenbacks from causes other than manipulation, that fall occurred because the people of the United States at that time did not have sufficient goods. There was a shortage of goods. It is worth knowing that through the greenbacks the people of the United States have been saved eleven billion dollars in interest alone.

I believe I have amply established to anyone who is realistic in his thinking about money that the government can procure, debt free, vast quantities of money the limit of the amount of which is the material and men in the country.

What shall the government do with the money once it is created? That is an extremely important question. To succeed, the money must be managed right. In the first place, the government can lend money at any rate of interest at which it chooses to lend it and for any length of time it chooses to allow. It can lend that money to any primary producer in Canada—farmer, fisherman, any primary producer at all. Our people are suffering acutely because they cannot get loans. In the light of what I have said it is absurd that they should be so suffering. By leaving them without the means of producing, we are sabotaging the country's war effort.

In addition to that, the government can lend money to secondary producers-shoe manufacturers, clothing manufacturers, flour manufacturers, any producers whose product it wishes the country to have or which it thinks the country is likely to need within a reasonable period of time. To do so, all it needs to do is to exercise the power to create currency or credit, the two powers referred to in the two quotations I have just read into Hansard, coming from the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee in the words of the questioner and of Mr. Towers. In the face of these facts, hon. members can imagine what condemnation will be heaped upon the heads of the members in this parliament, and of those constituting this government if anything happens as a result of which irreparable disaster befalls Canada.

Again, the dominion government can lend money for housing, not at the crippling rates now charged, prohibitive rates, but at exceedingly low rates of interest on long and generous terms, enabling the poor man to get money to build his house.

But people will say, "Oh, that will cause inflation." Now, it cannot cause inflation if the money when it is lent can be spent without raising prices. Is there a sufficient amount of lumber throughout the country to build houses in abundance? Is there a sufficient number of mills to replenish supplies of lumber? Are there adequate forests to provide raw materials for the mills? Are there other products and materials needed in the construction of homes for the people? The answer to each of these questions must be unequivocally yes. Then how can the money possibly cause inflation? Then again, the government can use this new money to pay fair prices, first, for all primary products. Last night we engaged in a most profitable discussion on wheat. There are from coast to coast in this country hundreds of thousands of men producing wheat and other thousands who are in charge of matters who see no hope at all with respect to the price of wheat. That absence of hope need not be. The government can create new money and with that pay whatever price for wheat it sees fit. It can pay a fair price for all other commodities, all meats, all animal products, all vegetables and fruits and fish, and every other primary product. The question will be asked: But will not that cause inflation? The answer is: Would it cause inflation if you could sell these products say to Japan and get the money from Japan and spend it? Manifestly not. Well, if you could spend Japanese money in Canada without causing a rise in prices, unquestionably you could spend Canadian money without causing a rise in prices.

Furthermore the government can use such created money to give a lowered price, a discounted price on secondary products. For example if a pair of shoes is at present offered for sale by a retailer in Canada at $5, it having been determined that $5 is a fair price, there is no reason why the Canadian government cannot pay with created money $1 of that $5 and allow the consumer to buy the article at $4, thus greatly increasing the amount of such goods that can be bought, consequently sold, consequently produced. Therefore the prosperity of the country would be increased. To the question, will it cause inflation, we reply, could you spend the money if it were United States money? The answer of course is yes. Why? Because you have plenty of goods and plenty of productive capacity to produce more goods and plenty of resources to support the productive capacity. That is the test of inflation. I shall in a moment read quotations to support what I

Thus the government can make sure that the price level in Canada is just whatever the government chooses it shall be. Hon members in the debate last night on wheat pointed out that the price of goods, 147 articles, that the farmers in western Canada buy has risen until to-day the farmer is paying $1.34 for goods which in 1914 cost him $1. Manifestly there is a situation which must be made right. As we are to-day situated economically in the world, it is impossible for this government to do anything to bring those prices down from $1.34 to $1. But if the government began to use the principle that I am outlining, which is one of the principles of social credit, the government could bring down those prices without injuring anyone.

Then again the government could use the new money to construct water conservation projects and irrigation works, to build roads, to carry on reforestation. I tremble to think of what might happen if Hitler should get past Great Britain and attack the sacred shores of Canada. Whereas in Germany they have great roads laid down adequate for the most speedy transportation of the most deadly weapons of modern warfare, we in Canada scarcely have a trans-Canada highway. How helpless we would be to defend our shores! Is there any reason why we could not build desirable roads? The only question is, have we the material, have we the men? The answer must be yes. Then if we have the materials and the men we surely can have the money; otherwise all these authorities whom I have already quoted are wrong; and common sense is wrong.

Again the government could use created money for training men, training its people. Hon. members tell us we need to have our youth trained; the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has told us that. But about all we do is to wish piously that we knew where to get the money with which to do it. We all recognize that it ought to be done; we all recognize that we are in grave danger, that the existence of this country is threatened when we leave it undone. We say we have not the money, yet we have these declarations of eminent authorities to the effect that the amount of money a country can have depends only on its resources of materials and men. We could train people for military duty. The government could use such money to buy aeroplanes, tanks, armoured cars, munitions of war, anything it chose. During the last war, between 1914 and 1917, the dominion government created $26,000,000 and used it to pay off some debts of the railroads, as I recall. The creation of that $26,000,000 caused no trouble, nor would it to-day.

I come now to another matter which I think should be of interest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I know he must be greatly worried about where we are going to sell our surplus products. People all over the country are worrying about it. That worry would be needless if the government were to exercise this power of creating money which their own governor of the Bank of Canada tells us they possess and implies that they could use! In the first place they could buy and preserve and store our surplus goods. They could buy the surplus wheat in western Canada and build storage facilities and store it therein, and entirely relieve themselves of anxiety with respect to our wheat surplus, at the same time building up a store which may be of tremendous value later on, in the vicissitudes which doubtless await us in the dark days ahead. The government could buy our surplus apples, dry them and store them; could buy our beans and peas and corn and other imperishable products. Conceivably they could even buy such perishable articles as fruits, and can them and store them.

But people say, would not that cause inflation? If Uruguay or the Argentine or Germany or England bought those goods, would we be able to spend the money in Canada? The answer is yes. Then you can spend Canadian money without causing a rise in prices. And inflation is a rise in prices. Again, the government could buy the products of our mines—zinc, copper, aluminum, any other product that it found there was need for, and could trade that for products such as oranges, which are produced outside the country. Even in countries where we cannot now sell wheat and the major products of our farms and industries, we could sell some products which we have. Thus the government could overcome the loss of markets by exercising this power of creating money by applying the principles of social credit.

I come now to another extremely important matter. There is not an hon, member of this house who is not eager to do everything he possibly can to help Britain. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) the other night, as I recall it, suggested that we give Great Britain five million bushels of wheat. Under the system I advocate it would be possible to give Great Britain any quantity of any product that this country can produce, without its costing the people of this country one cent. The pressure upon British exchange, which to-day threatens to strangle her and is gravely impeding her war effort, could be removed by Canada. All that is necessary is that we put more people to work, use more of our resources and produce more of the required goods, using the goods and services as justification for creating the money, then buying the goods and services and giving them to any country we wish. The importance of this principle can scarcely be overestimated. But at present we are helplessly, and I might almost say inanely, wringing our hands and shrugging helpless shoulders and saying: We do not know how we can sell Britain our goods, because we cannot buy British goods. Our ability to buy British goods has nothing whatever to do with our ability to let Britain have our goods, if we face the facts as they are.

There is another thing the government can do which will be extremely important in the winning of this war. At the present time people are suffering most painfully from small relief allowances. Inevitably prices are rising, notwithstanding the vigilant—I almost said noble—efforts of the government to prevent it. But as prices rise, relief allowances are being cut down instead of being increased. Anyone can see that a situation is being created which is going to be painful in the highest degree, a situation which we have no right to allow to exist if there is any way of avoiding it, and I say there is a way. In addition we can supplement wage rates. As prices tend to rise, men are going to become restless with their meagre wages and will threaten to strike and perhaps will strike. There is no reason why the government cannot supplement wage rates, rendering the people better able to buy the goods we can produce so abundantly. The government can increase the pensions it now pays, both in the size of the pension and in the extent of their application. The government can increase other allowances to people throughout the country.

Once again I must deal with the question of whether or not this will cause inflation. What is inflation? It is a rise in price which results from having more money in circulation than there are goods in markets to buy. That is the only cause of inflation about which we need concern ourselves. The truth of what I say has been indicated by some of the quotations I have already given. To-day there is no gold behind the Canadian dollar. Has that made any difference to any one of us? Not the slightest. Then evidently it is not gold that gives our money value. What does? Well, it is largely our need for the money. Inflation results from a shortage of goods. This can be proved by reference to Germany, where the famous inflation took place. It can be proved by reference to any of the unfortunate monetary experiences which the wiseacres of finance trot out to-day in order to scare people. In every instance there was a shortage of goods. The shortage in Germany in 1921, 1922 and 1923, when inflation took place, was simply appalling; and that shortage of goods and services was the cause of the German inflation. I read a passage from Paul Einzig that applies here. Let me read another quotation, this time from page 1531 of Hansard for March 3, 1939. This was a little conversation between myself and the former Minister of Finance, Hon. C. A. Dunning. I made this remark:

The minute you get more money in circulation, let me repeat, than enough to do the work of distributing goods and services which are abroad in a country to be distributed, then you have inflation, and not a minute before.

Mr. Dunning: That is correct.

Now I should like to read from the latest address by Right Hon, Reginald McKenna to his shareholders.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no objection to the hon, gentleman's going on.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you. I was under the impression that I had a little longer. I appreciate the indulgence of hon. members. This quotation, coming as this man's most recent pronouncement to his shareholders, I take to be epoch-making and fraught with the gravest significance to us. These are his words:

Inflation, if it comes, will be due to the growth of consumption, civil and military together, beyond our capacity to produce. The military demand must be satisfied, and in the long run, if no other means can be found to bring the total demand for goods within the limit of production, inflation, with its accompaniment of rising prices, sets in as an automatic check on civilian consumption.

But I have shown that in Canada, because of our tremendous productive power, it is almost impossible to get our consumption beyond our ability to produce. Consequently talk of inflation in Canada is idle in the light of existing realities and in the light of the modern conceptions of men best qualified to understand economic matters. Here is another quotation from the same speech:

But the means of restraint, if not of prevention, are at hand. The government has made a great advance in recent years in the management of monetary conditions.

With full powers at its command and wisely used, it can determine the degree, if any, of inflation that will be permitted.

When we gave the government complete control of everything the other day, I say we gave them complete power to prevent inflation, no matter how much money is in circulation in the country. Now, can Canada stand so much money? I have answered that question. Surely she can. The only question remaining is whether she can stand so much goods. The Searle index, which hon members have heard quoted in this house many times, is made up on the basis of 147 items which have been selected by the Searle Grain company. These are 147 items bought by the farmers in western Canada. The other day I consulted an authority in Ottawa who told me that of those 147 items only eight came from outside this country. The warehouses, stores and factories of Canada are literally bulging with the other 139. While the resources from which to manufacture more such goods are practically limitless. I think hon. members will be startled, as I was, when they learn how many woollen mills we have in Canada. I received this information just recently from the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). I have the list here somewhere. According to these figures we have 214 woollen mills in this country. Who can imagine that we cannot produce all the clothing our people can use? An hon, members says we have only 3,000 sheep. Well, Mr. Speaker, budgets such as this and management of this country such as this government is exercising are preventing the people from increasing the sheep population, and we are thereby running the risk of inflation. We can easily increase our sheep population. Then we have forty-four cotton mills and sixty-five silk and rayon mills.

There are certain remedies against inflation which a government can apply. The first of these is generous production. During these last years the men who have had charge of our education have not led us to think of inflation correctly. If you increase production, you decrease the possibility of inflation, because you lower prices. Anyone can realize that. So, if we want to prevent inflation, let us generously increase our production throughout the land. We can store substantial supplies of commodities such as wheat, beef, pork, beans and other commodities, and every bit of those stores is a guarantee against inflation. We can give price discounts to bring prices down instead of up, thereby decreasing the possibility of inflation. Then, we can ration; other nations have had to do that. If we ration any commodity likely to become scarce, we shall prevent pressure from being applied on that commodity, such as sugar, or any other, the price of which may increase through scarcity.

Taxation, upon which this budget is built, does the following things which lead towards inflation: It limits and discourages production. It limits and discourages consumption. Where consumption falls off, production must fall off, because it cannot sell its product. Taxation raises prices, and directly leads to inflation. This causes labour troubles, as a result of applications for increases in wages. It impairs the vitality of the people. It centralizes purchasing power in fewer hands, so that when the money is spent it is spent for more or less specialized commodities such as cars, radios, fur coats of high quality, and the like, and there is a tendency to raise the prices of those commodities. All of these induce inflation.

Taxation, therefore, tends to adverse exchange; for the higher prices rise, the less possible it is for us to sell our goods to our neighbour, and therefore the less chance we have of having a favourable trade balance. Consequently I maintain that this budget is working directly towards inflation and adverse exchange.

Borrowing, the other principle upon which the budget is based, weakens the confidence of the people, engenders anxiety, defers taxation, destroys the morale of the people, makes the soldiers fight the war and then come home and pay for it. That is one of the most monstrous injustices conceivable.

And now, as I conclude, let me say: There is too much of a tendency for Canada to look down. Let Canada look up. We shall not be poorer at the end of this war. There is no reason why we should be poorer. Our productive power is increasing on every hand; our scientific knowledge is increasing. All we lack is a sound financial system.

We are not going to be broken by this war; let us keep that in mind. In due time we shall change our present system for one which will enable us to produce as we can. We are not going to be broken in this war, I repeat and, under God, we are not going to lose. There is a way out; there must be a way out. The future for Canada is glorious. We can, under God, defend Britain, recover Europe and lead the world to a new understanding which could free that world from the causes of war. It can be done. All we need do is discover the underlying principle upon which the new and glorious order is based.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was of opinion when I first entered the house, an opinion which has been strengthened during the eventful days that have passed, that this is no time for us to indulge either in platitudes or in recriminations about the achievements or the mistakes of the government; nor is it the time for us to play party politics, but it is our duty as Canadians to unite and in our own interests do everything within our power to bring the war in which we are now engaged, and in which we have suffered great reverses, to a victorious conclusion.

It is my opinion, and I believe the opinion of most of us, that it is the duty of the government to cooperate with and to assist in every possible way the government of Great Britain and the government of that part of France which proposes to continue the war until the last gun is fired.

It is the duty of the government also to make plans and preparations to defend this country in the event of its being invaded.

I believe practically all members of the house, irrespective of politics, are in agreement on those two policies, and it is not my intention to discuss them in detail this afternoon.

I would say, however, that in my opinion the plans and preparations to defend Canada should be made and should be carried out with all possible speed. Those plans should be based on the possibility that this country will be invaded within three months' time. I do not say that Canada is going to be invaded in that time; I do not know, nor does any other person know what may happen. But the government should be prepared to meet every eventuality. It should set a time limit for the completion of its preparations, and should gear up industry and mobilize manpower to meet requirements so as to come within that time limit.

The government has been given what amounts practically to dictatorial powers under the mobilization measure passed a short time ago. It is now up to the government to put those powers into operation, so far as it is necessary to do so, in order to defend Canada from invasion. Responsibility for our defence rests with the government. No government in our history has had to shoulder such heavy responsibilities, and the people of the dominion look to it, not without some feelings of uneasiness, for greater effort and for more action. They want to see results. They want to see the preparations for the defence of this country completed before it is too late.

Towards the end of 1916, when the existing machinery of the then British government appeared inadequate to deal with the task ahead of it, and when Serbia was overwhelmed, Lloyd George made his famous "too late" speech. "Too late" he said, "in moving here; too late in arriving there; too late in coming to this decision; too late in starting that enterprise; too late in preparing. In this way the footsteps of the allied forces have been dogged by the mocking spectre of too late. And unless we quicken our movements damnation will fall on the sacred cause for which so much gallant blood has flowed."

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) may well ponder those words. They are not altogether inapplicable to what has happened in Canada in the last few months, since war was declared. Unless we quicken the movement of the machinery of government, damnation and defeat will be our lot.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) has proposed the most drastic taxation for the current year the people of Canada have ever been called upon to bear; taxation which it is estimated will produce a revenue of $760,000,000. The additional taxes will cause a certain amount of hardship in many homes. In my opinion the increased income tax will not bear equally on all Canadians. Those in the lower brackets will have the greatest sacrifice to make. These taxes will result also in a certain amount of unemployment among certain classes of people. Just how much unemployment they will create it is of course impossible to tell. They will result also in a certain reduced purchasing power and in the lowering of our standards of living.

Most of us will have to curtail. Most of us have found it pretty hard as things have been during recent years to pay our household expenses, to educate our children, to meet the interest on the mortgages on our home, to pay excessive municipal taxes on income and real estate and to pay our insurance policies; in short, to keep our heads above water financially.

I do not wish to be understood as complaining or finding serious fault with the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance. We must make these financial sacrifices and other sacrifices which will be much greater. We must make them with good spirit and with the knowledge, as the minister said, that every time we pay our tax we know we are dealing a smashing blow at Hitler.

Money must be raised to carry on the war, and the war must be carried on until Hitler and the evils he represents are eliminated from this earth. Victory at all costs is preferable to defeat, when all will be lost.

If the income tax is found to bear unfairly upon certain classes, that inequality can be corrected when the next war budget is brought down. I think we must face the fact that there will be further war budgets, that there will be higher taxes and that greater sacrifices will have to be made. There will be more government control and more regimentation. We must face the situation. We must realize also that the ideals of a more abundant life with higher standards of living, with more luxuries and with greater ease must be set aside. In their stead we must have new ideals of service, of work, of thrift and of sacrifice; we must face a harder, simpler and a tougher way of life.

I have referred to the importance of this government cooperating in every possible way with the governments of Great Britain and that part of France which proposes to continue [Mr. Hazen.]

to carry on the war. I have referred also to the importance of making immediate plans and preparations to defend this country in case it is invaded. But there is one thing more that this government must do. It must provide efficient leadership in these critical times if the confidence of the people is to be maintained and victory achieved.

The people of this country look to this government for such leadership. They look to it for vigorous and courageous action; they look to it for outspoken and plain speech. It may be all very well in times of peace for a government to say that it is the servant of the people, although I always thought that was only a half truth, but in times of war the government of a country must be the leader of the people in the literal sense of the word. It must take a firm grasp on the situation and it must tell the Canadian people what they are to do and see that its orders and directions are carried out. Most of our people are only too anxious to be told what to do and how they can be of the greatest assistance in bringing this war to a successful conclusion.

In my opinion greater emphasis should be placed upon the glory of war, upon the glory and virtue of courage, upon the glory and virtue of duty, upon the glory and virtue of tenacity and upon the glory and virtue of sacrifice. To all men upon this earth death cometh sooner or later. How can they do better than to face the dangers they are called upon to face in this war in the defence of their families and in the defence of freedom. and in order to conquer brute force, tyranny and enslavement? In my opinion there should be more bands, more martial music, more parades and more flag-flying. Our soldiers should not be allowed to depart in the dark as if they were under a cloud.

In my judgment the time has come when this government should cease to be a party government. In the minds of the people a party government is associated with party politics, with political favouritism and political patronage. The carrying on of a war is not the kind of job that a party government should undertake; it is too big. If confidence is to be maintained, if the utmost effort is to be put forth, we should have a government in which all political parties are represented.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked on the floor of this house that a national government be formed; but a few days ago, in reply to that request, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that a party which had 183 members out of a total membership of 245 might pretty well claim to be a national government in the truest sense of the word. He overlooked the fact that although the elections were held only a few months ago, since then events of the greatest importance have happened. The war situation has completely changed; the map of Europe has been almost completely changed, and we are living in a different and far more perilous time. However much I regret the decision, the decision was his, and the responsibility rests upon his shoulders.

What else did he say at that time? He said that when he took additional gentlemen into his government to strengthen it, "one of the first qualifications which I shall require of them is loyalty to myself, and not a disposition to stab the leader of the party in the breast when he is trying to serve his country to the best of his ability in a time of war". When the Prime Minister said that he did not want to take into his government any gentleman who would stab him in the breast, I know that he was speaking figuratively and that he did not want to be stabbed politically. But when he made that statement, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me that he had uppermost in his mind political considerations, and not those considerations which are of most vital importance to Canada at this time of crisis.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a time for iron sacrifice of body, will and soul, and the people of this country, in the knowledge that we strove for peace and that we fight for the right, are prepared to make these sacrifices, but they look to the government for more energetic leadership and greater results.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL: (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, because of the defeatist propaganda being so ardently spread by the nazis, and respread in the United States, whence it rolls over the border into Canada, it is not my intention to discuss the taxation proposals of the budget, but I will confine my remarks to discussing two propositions to help Canada prosecute the war: (a) a method by which the government can find from thirty to sixty million dollars of new money for use in the production of munitions; and (b) a method of sending back to Germany propaganda in the only language they can understand-war materials, shells, bombs, tanks, guns and munitions made out of good Canadian nickelized steel.

As I cannot proceed with the discussion of either one of these propositions in the few minutes remaining before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m. until Tuesday, July 2.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

GERMAN SHORT-WAVE BROADCASTS TO QUEBEC— INTERNMENT OF ADRIEN ARCAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) based upon an editorial prominently displayed on the front page of the weekly journal Le Jour, in its issue of June 29. Le Jour is edited by Jean Charles Harvey, probably the most widely known of French Canadian journalists and a man who is universally respected. To save time I shall give only the English translation:

Sunday evening the German radio, in a short-wave broadcast directed especially to French Canada, informed Quebec that Hitler offered it full and complete independence. We have only to rebel against Great Britain, and then we shall have our Laurentia. There will be a customs union with nazi Europe; and it was announced that our first gauleiter would be Adrien Arcand.

This is a damning charge against this man, and if we had blood in our veins instead of turnip juice our little fuehrer would not be facing such legal procedure as he is at the moment; he would be up before a military court.

Has he not time and again talked of standing so and so against a wall, when he became dictator? The writer of these lines, for one, has no illusions about the fate that would await him if the suave Adrien succeeded in a blitzkrieg here.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice four questions, of which I have given him notice. First, has he seen the editorial quoted?

Second, has he made inquiries with regard to the alleged broadcast and has he any information to give the house in connection therewith? Third, has he information that Adrien Arcand has made threats to shoot French-Canadian leaders loyal to the British connection if his plans to become fuehrer under the auspices of Hitler succeeded? Fourth, in view of the close connection between Arcand and the Hitler regime, as revealed by this broadcast, does the minister deem the measures taken to place Arcand under restraint to be adequate?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry my hon. friend's notice of these questions came to me only as I was coming to the chamber. I have not read the editorial, nor have I heard of this broadcast. Of course I am going to investigate, but I may say that I have heard of the threats made by the gentleman mentioned, because I was the principal person who was threatened all the time. Perhaps it may suffice to add that the internment of Arcand and the others associated with him does not mean that this is the only penalty they are going to incur. They are interned in order that we may know that they are safely in custody, that they cannot get out on bail or because of any technicality. They are being held to await any further proceedings or prosecutions to which they may be liable under the criminal code or any other statute, and I can assure my hon. friend that the matter is being fully considered at this time.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

ESTABLISHMENT OF BRANCH OFFICES—SUPPLYING OF APPLICATION FORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). British Columbia papers arriving in Ottawa this past week-end, and letters from persons intending to visit the United States, indicate that there is fear of considerable delay in the obtaining of passports. Could the Prime Minister make a statement as to what arrangements are being made to facilitate the issuing of passports, and to obviate undue delays?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, two or three questions have been asked with respect to passports, and I have in my hand answers to most of them, including the one just asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

On June 26 the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) inquired as to what steps [Mr. Bruce.]

might be taken to facilitate the issue of passport visas in south-eastern British Columbia. I am glad to be able to inform the hon. member that the United States authorities have decided to establish a consular representative at Trail, to facilitate the granting of visas to residents of Eastern British Columbia.

The hon, member for Yukon (Mr. Black) asked concerning the issue of passport visas to persons wishing to travel by boat from the Yukon to other parts of Canada. In reply I would say that unfortunately the situation in the Yukon is somewhat different from that prevailing in other parts of Canada. The situation has been brought to the attention of United States authorities. All I can say at the moment is that we hope a ruling may shortly be obtained which will facilitate the moving of passengers from the Yukon to British Columbia.

In reply to the question of the hon, member for Vancouver East, a question which might be extended to apply to other localities, I would say that the problem of opening additional passport offices has been very much under consideration. A branch office was opened at Windsor on June 29 under the charge of the assistant passport officer. There is every desire to meet the convenience of the public, but it will be recalled that the final decision on the part of the United States authorities to impose passport and visa requirements was not communicated to us until a fortnight ago. It is essential, in order to avoid fraud and mistakes, that the work of issuing passports be under the supervision of an experienced staff.

It might be pointed out that with air mail, an application mailed from Vancouver, for example, to-day, will be in the passport office in Ottawa to-morrow. The question of the feasibility and desirability of establishing additional temporary branch offices has been receiving consideration, and I hope shortly to be in a position to announce a definite decision. I am afraid that to-day I cannot go farther than that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would it be convenient to open passport offices in each provincial capital? I suggest that because the work here is going to be tremendously heavy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to discuss that matter with the officials of the passport office.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): There is a situation at the border between New Brunswick and Maine which requires immediate attention. Two thousand persons in the towns of St. Stephen and Milltown, New Brunswick, are clamouring for passports, and there is not even an application form in that part of the country. I had about five hundred application forms sent down by express, but even then it will be some days before those passports are issued. I have made an appeal to the passport officer and to the Prime Minister's office to send a special officer to that point. I realize it is necessary to have an experienced officer, but surely there must be some such person who could be sent down to that point, where, as I have said, two thousand persons are being held up in their daily intercourse with the neighbouring towns of Calais and Milltown, Maine. Action is imperative, and while I do not wish to bother the minister about it I have called the matter to the attention of his department. I hope he will have something done at that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I saw the hon. member's letter, and I know the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs is making every effort to meet the request made therein. Of course questions in connection with the issue of passports are coming to us from every side. They are reaching us from one end of the continent to the other, and it has been very difficult to get the necessary forms and general equipment in readiness as rapidly as we might have wished.

BRITISH CHILDREN

QUESTION RESPECTING "CALLING CANADA" ADVER-

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): In view of his statement to the house on June 27 with regard to "Calling Canada," what if any action has been taken; or does he propose to take action, and if so under what act or regulation? I am sorry I had not an opportunity to give my right hon. friend notice of the question before the house met.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This inquiry comes just after my having received a telegram signed by a lady and two gentlemen, saying:

You said that you were going to investigate "Calling Canada." Here is the number of our room at the Chateau Laurier. Please investigate.

It is not my purpose to investigate those highly estimable ladies and gentlemen. But what I said was that I would submit the advertisement in question to my officers, in order to ascertain whether it comes under some of the regulations respecting the Defence of Canada; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Be careful that you do not make martyrs of them.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I won't.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED USE OF GAS INSTEAD OF COAL IN BUILD-INGS ERECTED IN CALGARY FOR WAR PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I believe might be directed to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). I received a telegram from the vice-president of district 18, United Mine Workers of America. They say government contracts have been let for war buildings in the Calgary area in which the original specifications called for mechanical firemen for coal consumption. The contract required that mechanical firemen be installed. Since then I understand specifications for the contract have been changed, and the order now is to instal machines for gas instead of coal consumption. The United Mine Workers of America are very much concerned, and properly so, because of the effect it will have in the mining areas of Alberta, particularly around Drumheller, if the new installations require gas instead of coal. Will the minister please tell the house what has been done, and whether or not the specifications in this particular have been changed?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The work in question was ordered by the Department of Munitions and Supply on the specifications of the Department of National Defence for Air, in compliance with the usual practice. I have no knowledge as to these particular specifications. In any event it seems to me that as, by either system, local products are being used, little criticism can be made. It then becomes a matter of the judgment of the Department of National Defence for Air as to which is the more efficient installation.

RATES PAYABLE BY ENLISTED MEN AND WOMEN TRAVELLING BY TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): On Friday last the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked if anything is being done "to fix special and reasonable rates for enlisted men and women travelling by train." The reply furnished by the officer of the department is as follows:

Personnel of the Canadian Active Service Force may obtain through their commanding officers special forms which will entitle them to obtain round trip tickets on the railways for the price of a one-way fare. Special week-end rates, when in effect, are available to soldiers as well as civilian travellers, and may be obtained upon application.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

STATEMENT AS TO PRESENT POSITION WITH RESPECT TO RECRUITING

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): About a week ago the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) asked for some information with respect to recruiting in the air force. I have here a statement explaining the procedure with respect to recruiting, and I am prepared either to read it or to ask permission that it be placed on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. POWER: Very well; I shall do so.

I should like to take this opportunity to give a brief account of the present position of recruiting for the Royal Canadian Air Force. As the house knows, the requirements of the Royal Canadian Air Force for recruits can be divided broadly into two classes. First, there are the air crews, that is, those who actually will fly either as pilots, air gunners or observers, and, second, there is the maintenance personnel, both trained and untrained, using the word "maintenance" in its broadest sense as including all those whose duties are necessary to the operation of active service squadrons or training establishments. Both of these groups require training, the extent of which depends upon the qualifications necessary to perform the task to which they will be assigned. The problem of recruiting is, therefore, in large part a training problem and the rate at which recruiting can properly proceed is conditioned by the rate at which the capacity of existing training facilities can be enlarged and extended. It is obvious that recruits ought not to be called up and withdrawn from their civil occupations until we are in a position to train them to perform their duties in accordance with the plans that have been made. It is simply not possible to call them all up at once.

Nevertheless, the house will recall that, in conformity with our determination to accelerate our training effort in every way, we determined some time ago to enlist immediately 5,000 recruits who otherwise would not have been called up until some future date. I am happy to report that these enlistments have been proceeding at the rate of about 1,000 per week—a rate which, under the circumstances, must be regarded as satisfactory. Some idea of the amount of work involved can be gained from the fact that since September 15 last over 115,000 men have requested and obtained information from us relative to enlistment in the Royal Canadian Air Force. This is in addition to a great many informal inquiries of which no record is kept. Of course, not all who receive papers complete them and actually offer their services, but a very large number have done so and over 26,000 have passed the medical examination and been trade tested. Of these over 13,000 officers and men have been already enlisted and, as I have said, the balance are being called up as rapidly as circumstances permit. Of the 13,000 who have not been enlisted, 1,433 have made application to be trained as crew men; 7,962 desire to be trained tradesmen, while 4,000 are unskilled. With respect to the 4,000 who are unskilled, they may at any time join any other force or unit of the expeditionary forces. However, we would like to keep on the strength those men who provide good material for air or ground crews. A reserve of 1,400 is not too large for our requirements of air crew men. As a matter of fact, it is a rather low reserve to have, considering the number of future pilots, gunners and observers who will be needed very shortly for training.

So far as the selection of individual recruits is concerned, this is determined by priority of application except to the extent that there may be a special need for those with special qualifications. In the nature of things some trades are needed in greater numbers than others and thus it often happens that of two candidates volunteering at the same time, one will be called before the other. This is sometimes rather hard for the individual to understand, but the house, I am sure, will realize why it must be so. The procedure on application for enlistment is that every applicant is interviewed personally with a view to ascertaining in a general way whether he posseses the educational and other qualifications necessary. Once this is done, the applicant is assisted in filling out an application form and advised as to how he should obtain certain necessary documents, such as proof of age and education. Arrangements are then made for the applicant to present these documents and be medically examined. Once these requirements are met there is nothing further to be done until we are in a position to take him on our strength for training and he is called up accordingly.

It must be pointed out that by submitting his application and being medically examined, a recruit in no sense commits himself or prevents himself from enlisting in some other branch of the service. Until actually called to report for duty, those who have offered their services are perfectly free to withdraw their applications,—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not want to do that; they want to go into the air force.

Mr. POWER: I quite realize that, but the request of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), was that these men be released. I have just stated that in so far as the unskilled men are concerned, there is no objection on our part to their being released. In so far as the others are concerned, we would prefer to have them wait until we are ready to call them up. But even then we have no strings on them in any way. Until actually called to report for duty, those who have offered their services are perfectly free to withdraw their application, and in all cases in which we think it unlikely their services will be required for some time, our officers try to say so frankly in order to avoid any subsequent misunderstanding or disappointment. Nevertheless, when recruiting is proceeding so rapidly and on such a large scale, individual cases of misunderstanding and disappointment are bound to arise. I should like the house to believe that we are doing everything we can to reduce such incidents to a minimum.

One of the commonest misunderstandings has arisen because of the belief that many of those who served in the Royal Air Force in the last war could simply and easily be trained to serve again. This whole problem of the use that can be made of ex-service pilots and observers is naturally one to which we have given the most careful consideration, and I am happy to be able to say that appropriate employment in the Royal Canadian Air Force has been found for over 250 officers who saw service in the air force during the last war. Nevertheless, I am afraid we must accept the view that so far as actual service in the air is concerned, this war, like the last, is a young man's war. The spirit in many cases is as eager and willing as ever, and is one of which we all must feel proud, but, as is the case with all of us, the intervening years have weakened the flesh. Except for those exservice men who may be described as fully qualified commercial pilots-and the number of those available is, unfortunately, small-I am afraid we must find places for most of them that do not involve the physical and nervous strain incidental to flying highpowered modern aircraft under service conditions. Such places can and will be found for a great many in administrative positions, and for these positions those who served as officers in the air force during the last war are naturally given a preference. Here again it is not possible to take every one at once, but more openings are constantly occurring as our establishments increase in number.

I trust the foregoing information will assist the house to understand that we are trying to carry on recruiting and enlistment for the Royal Canadian Air Force as rapidly as possible and, at the same time, with the maximum of courtesy and consideration for the many individuals whose patriotic desire to help has led them to offer their services. We have recruiting centres in the principal cities throughout the country and, in addition, mobile recruiting units intended to serve those in the more remote areas. The officers in charge of these activities have been most carefully selected with an eye to their special qualifications for the arduous and exacting duties they have to perform. We are keenly aware of the special qualities our young men possess and that fit them peculiarly to serve to advantage in our air forces, and we are determined to do everything in our power to make sure that these special qualities are employed to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is there anything in the regulations to prevent a woman from enlisting in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. POWER: I should think so, yes.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISITER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Friday, June 28, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am greatly indebted to my colleague, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), for having given way to me this afternoon. I know he had, as always, a most distinguished contribution to make to this debate, and I trust that an opportunity will be given him at a later stage in these proceedings to deliver the message which he had for us this afternoon. Again I desire to thank him for his courtesy.

When I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) deliver his annual budget statement on June 24 I confess that I did so with very mixed feelings. I realized then, as I do now, and as I am sure we all do, that this country is really at war. I have from the very beginning of this titanic struggle realized and visualized a war of long duration. I do not claim any superior vision, neither have I any special information, but having read all the relevant material on the subject which I could obtain, and having pondered deeply the whole position, especially since the failure of Munich, I came to the conclusion that this war, like the great war of 1914-18, would be of long duration, and that as a result a long-term point of view with reference to finance was the proper one to take.

In addition I have always held the opinion that Canada, as an integral part of the British empire, as one of the allies and a de jure as well as a de facto belligerent, should mobilize and use her man-power and her material resources in such a way as to give the maximum of effort to the allied cause. In holding this opinion I believe I am in accord with the views of all true loyal British subjects in this dominion, and in that regard I find my views also in accord with those which the minister expressed in his budget statement of the 24th of June.

I am aware, of course, that there are those in this country who do not share these views in their entirety. I am, however, inclined to think that those holding views at variance with my own in this regard have materially altered their own point of view, and this has been brought about by the force and trend of events as they have developed during the past six or seven weeks.

In one respect only do we differ in any substantial degree, and that is with respect to the method of marshalling our man-power for service overseas. Here again the trend of events has intervened and in a degree altered our position. It may well be that because of the cessation of fighting in the continental theatre of war, man-power overseas is not so pressing a problem as at first appeared. But because it may not be so yet, I suggest that our duty to assist with mechanical equipment such as planes, tanks and guns, with munitions and with foodstuffs and material supplies, is all the more pressing. In other words we should be utilizing our every resource to assist the mother country with all those material things of which she is in such dire need at the present critical juncture.

There is, too, the problem of the defence of Canada. On the 21st of June this parliament passed the National Resources Mobilization Act, which in addition to the legislation already on the statute books gives to the government of this country the most dictatorial powers ever conferred by this parliament on any executive, so that there is no longer any excuse on the part of the government for refusal or neglect to do anything and everything humanly possible to defend this country and to bring the maximum of support and assistance to the mother country. Apart from the question of national leadership, the only consideration remaining to round out the whole orbit of defence and assistance lies in the realm of finance.

It is axiomatic to say that the right arm of a nation in time of war is its man-power and the necessary and essential equipment thereof for war purposes,

It follows without doubt that the next most important element in marshalling the fighting strength of the country for any and every purpose is finance. Our problem at this time is to marshal our financial resources in the wisest and best manner possible so as to achieve the maximum of results, and if possible at the same time preserve our corporate existence, so that after the struggle is over and after victory has crowned our efforts we may proceed not only to bind up the wounds of the nation but also to rebuild what may be a shattered structure.

This problem cannot be achieved in one budget, but the government, and especially the Minister of Finance, should have as long a vision as possible and chart out a course for the nation, looking not only to the immediate necessities for the day and hour but also to the time when we shall, if we continue to exist as a nation, have to prepare for the future or after-war period.

I quite agree with the minister that we must pay for the present peril. It will not matter much what becomes of our national wealth if we lose this war, but I do suggest that we do not approach in any defeatist spirit the consideration of the financial problems now confronting us. Rather should we approach their consideration on the theory that we shall win this war, as we must, and I shall discuss the problem in that spirit and with the hope that I may make some contribution of a constructive character. One thing is certain—the Canadian people will not withhold from the government the money necessary to win this war.

There may be differences of opinion, honest differences, as to how the money shall be raised, but I am as certain as I ever was of anything in my whole life that the Canadian people will give of their treasure as gladly and as wholeheartedly as our gallant fellow-citizens gave their lives in the last great struggle and as I believe the present generation are prepared to give theirs for the defence of their loved ones, their homes, their country, this Canada of ours, and the motherland in this struggle.

I was not privileged to be a member of this house in September last when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) at that time delivered his financial proposals, but I read and have re-read his statement with great care. In that speech he indicated that the government proposed:

1. A policy of pay-as-you-go, as far as possible and practicable;

2. A policy of borrowing, preferably on short-term obligations.

3. Inflation was definitely taboo.

Generally speaking, I am in agreement with the principles enunciated. I am perhaps not so pronounced in my views against inflation as I was some years ago. I believe that a reasonably limited amount of inflation will, on a given occasion, help to start the wheels of industry and the interchange of currency. That may sound like heterodoxy to some of my sound-money and more orthodox friends, but the difficulty is to know what is a reasonable limitation. If such a limitation is exceeded, the result may be disastrous. One immediate result of unlimited inflation is a rise in prices. This occurs always before a rise in wages, and as prices increase, wages lag behind. A vicious circle is established and sooner or later deflation, even collapse, may

So that I am not chiding the minister for not having utilized a limited degree of inflation. Its exclusion, however, leaves us, according to the tenets of the minister, only two sources from which we may obtain the necessary funds to carry on our war effort, namely, taxation and borrowing. And these are the two methods which the minister has invoked. Let us examine the government's proposals.

It seems to me that with respect to the taxation proposals the minister has proceeded for the most part, and speaking generally, upon lines which heretofore have been generally accepted and have proved useful for the purpose to be accomplished. There is no new radical departure from accepted principles of taxation, with some certain rather unimportant exceptions. This shows caution, and from that standpoint is to be commended. Generally speaking, it seems to me that our taxation proposals at this time should be based upon two principles: (1) Ability to pay; and (2) equality of sacrifice.

Let us deal first with ability to pay. The minister for the most part has utilized this principle as far as is practicable. His whole hypothesis as to quantum appears to me to be based upon the theory that the national income for the calendar year 1939 approximated $3,800,000,000 and for the fiscal year 1940-41 will approximate $4,500,000,000. I do not know upon what scientific and mathematical data the minister bases his calculation, but I very gravely doubt whether the national income in 1939 approached $3,800,-000,000, and if I am correct in that doubt, then I feel very certain that our national income for 1940-41 will fall far short of $4,500,000,000.

I say this for various reasons. While Canada is in a substantial degree an industrial country, and many of us have been striving for years to increase her industrial activities and thus increase the size of her payroll, yet primarily Canada is an agricultural country, and the sum total of the value of her agricultural products exceeds in sum total the value of her mining, fishing and industrial production. It that be so, and with a very large wheat carryover and a large wheat crop in immediate prospect, and no market in sight beyond the domestic requirements of Canada and those of Britain, it would appear, to me at all events, that any large immediate cash return such as could be justifiably included in the category of national income is rather remote, and a substantial allowance on that account will have to be made from this estimate of $4,500,000,000 of national income.

While this wheat situation is the largest of the marketing problems, it is by no means the only one. What about bacon? I understand that a substantial surplus is being piled up each week and that after October first the surplus will grow to enormous proportions. It has even been suggested to me that the price of hogs will fall as low as five cents. I do not wish to be considered an alarmist, but I do at all events believe in being realistic, and I have been obliged all my life to face facts as they are, not as I would wish them to be. This bacon situation sits very securely on the government's own doorstep. The muchvaunted Canada-United States trade agreement and the operations under it on the part of certain importers are directly responsible for the situation now confronting the Canadian hog producer. He is bound to lose money, and next year unless conditions are remedied he will not produce this commodity.

Then there is the apple crop, the situation in regard to which is well known. Just recently we have been told that we cannot find a market for our canned salmon and our canned lobsters. And what about the New Brunswick potato crop! There is a market for seed potatoes in Cuba, but just at present that market is more or less cornered by the activities of the minister of lands and mines of New Brunswick, who, by some means unknown to me, apparently has obtained control of that market for himself. There is opportunity, however, for the government to do something in regard to this matter in Cuba, in Central America, and in South America, and I urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to get busy at once with respect to this matter.

All these considerations lead me to conclude that the national income will not approach the figure named by the minister, notwithstanding huge government spending on war effort. That, I submit, is not true national income. It is rather the reverse, and I shall have something to say about it later on. My own view is that it will not exceed four billions, and if so the results from the new taxation proposals will not yield as much in new money for the treasury as the minister anticipates, and we shall not be able to implement the pledge of "pay as you go" to the degree indicated.

I should like to point out to the house and the country certain things with respect to the national income and its effect on the standard of living in Canada. Assuming that our national income is $3,800,000,000 and will go to $4,000,000,000 in 1941, and assuming that the total dominion outlay, including both peace and war expenditures, amounts to $1,200,-000,000, provincial and municipal expenditure aggregate about $600,000,000, and we have therefore a great spending programme of $1,800,000,000. Now, on the basis of $4,000,-000,000 national income this is 45 per cent of the total national income being spent for public purposes. This leaves us just $2,200,-000,000 or about $200 per capita for every man, woman and child in Canada with which to buy food, clothing and household goods, to pay rent, medical and similar services and all the other things human beings require. I suggest to the house and the minister that this represents a very low standard of living. It cannot be helped by further soaking the rich, or by any other unorthodox finance. The only way it can be helped is for the government to cut down its ordinary expenditure and by provincial governments and municipalities all determining to take less money from the taxpayers. This must be done. Raising the national income by governmental expenditure will help, but it will be a long time before it seeps through to business and comes back in some degree in the form of taxation. The only fertile field for immediate income is to be found in the provincial arena and in the municipalities. Certainly there must be no increase in the levy by either authority.

As I view it, there are two difficulties in the government's position. One is that the budget is based, as the government's financial policy has been based for some years, on the assumption that the volume of business can be stimulated by government expenditures and that this can be very largely covered by the resulting increased taxation. The other difficulty I have already alluded to, namely, the government has not yet by any means been active in reducing non-war expenditure.

With respect to the government's first difficulty based on its past financial policy, having regard to its own failure to undertake large war expenditures at an earlier date, it now finds itself faced with the necessity of undertaking a programme of this character just prior to bringing down the budget. The result has been that the budget announcement will have a very serious effect on ordinary business before the stimulating effect of war expenditures is felt, but even their accepted theory of public expenditures to "prime the pump" requires that the expenditures should be made first and the resulting increase of possible taxation obtained later. For all effective purposes, the government has undertaken to obtain the taxation first and make the stimulating expenditures later, but I suggest that it will take months for war expenditures to filter down through the business structure, while the heavy taxation announced in the budget has led a great proportion of the population to take immediate steps for reducing expenditures. This is the only opportunity left to this government to do anything at all effective to relieve the situation. It occurs to me that even political expediency should dictate a revision of policy in this respect. Many new thousands of direct taxpayers created by the budget, as well as all those older taxpayers to whom their income tax was not a matter of vital importance, are now thoroughly alive to the fact, long concealed from or ignored by them, that the people pay for governmental expenditures.

Let me reaffirm that the people will not object to paying for the war, but every one of them who sees a single case of an unnecessary employee, or a wasteful expenditure for non-war purposes, or even an expenditure which could be postponed, is certain to feel vigorous resentment. At the moment I have in mind the failure of the government to halt the work on the Montreal terminal. It did halt construction work on certain public buildings, such as new postal stations in Quebec and Toronto, the supreme court building in Ottawa, and others of a similar kind, but the Montreal terminal seems to be sacrosanct. It will cost this country $12,000,000 in war time and it may even run to $15,000,000, money which can ill be afforded at this time. To me its continuation at this time is a shocking thing.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

There are four good features in this budget: 1. Pay as you go, so far as possible.

- 2. Restrictions upon civilian buying, as indicated by the huge taxes on luxury motor cars.

  3. Diversion of dollars away from the United
- 3. Diversion of dollars away from the United States.

4. Avoidance of inflation.

These principles incorporated in the budget indicate, to me at all events, that the minister in these aspects has been soundly advised by the two very able men associated with him. But to say that this budget represents national sacrifice, or that there is equality of sacrifice, I suggest to him is far from the truth. There is not one single new tax which is designed to bear, however lightly, on the entire population. There is nothing comparable to the match tax imposed during the last war—we have returned to that position, of course-or to the sugar tax, which was imposed as a revenue measure but designed to be a national sacrifice paid by everyone in a time of extreme economic warfare. Per contra, there are no nuisance taxes, for which I think we should all be grateful. However, national sacrifice, as I interpret the term, means sacrifice by all the people of the nation according to their respective abilities to make and sustain sacrifices. In fact all the national sacrifice that is made under this budget is concentrated upon a mere handful of the population, not on the whole population, as it should be.

What is the position? According to a chart prepared and published in the "National Revenue Review" for May, 1940, under the caption "Income Tax and Those Who Pay It," there were for the period 1938-39 individual taxpayers totalling 264,804 who paid a total of $46,937,205. I have tabulated the different classes, as follows:

		Number	Total
Income		paying	paid
Under $2,000		119,346	$1,269,724
$ 2,000 to	$ 3,000	63,572	1,324,663
$ 3,000 to	$ 4,000		1,462,000
$ 4,000 to	$ 5,000	15,902	1,296,625
$ 5,000 to	$ 6,000	8,627	1,234,400
$ 6,000 to	$ 7,000	5,563	1,260,057
$ 7,000 to	$ 8,000		1,144,597
$ 8,000 to	$ 9,000		1,107,188
$ 9,000 to	$10,000		1,059,919
$10,000 to	$15,000		4,247,516
$15,000 to	$20,000		3,210,835
$20,000 to	$25,000		2,551,849
$25,000 to	$30,000		2,132,006
$30,000 to	$35,000		2,156,943
$35,000 to	$40,000		1,732,270
$40,000 to	$45,000		1,656,133
$45,000 to	$50,000	. 157	1,662,512

Those in receipt of taxable income of over $50,000 numbered only 457, or ·17 of one per cent of the total number of taxpayers, but contributed $17,289,365, an average of $37,882 each, or 36·17 per cent of the total collected.

On the other hand those in the class under $2,000 represent 45 per cent of the total taxpayers, and they contributed 2.66 per cent of the total amount paid by individuals. I am sorry to have wearied the house with these figures, but I think they ought to be put on record for the purpose of comparison with what these people will pay under this budget. Now under this budget all the sacrificial taxation is being concentrated upon a handful of people in the lower middle bracket. A total of about 22,000 individual taxpayers in the brackets between $6,000 and $50,000 are being asked to contribute next year a total of over $50,000,000 in addition to the sum of $22,254,000 or thereabouts which they are now paying. And this takes no account of their contributions under the national defence tax, which of course will be substantial. Thus these 22,000 odd taxpayers will pay nearly four times what they are now paying. Is there anywhere else in this budget any sacrifice comparable with the tax imposed upon this comparatively small element in our population?

These people will pay; make no mistake about that. They will of course have to adjust themselves to new conditions of life to meet these new burdens laid upon them, while the great mass of the people will be able to pursue their normal manner of living with little or no interruption. These people are not complaining, and I am not complaining on their behalf; I am just pointing out what I believe to be the true position.

I suggest further to the minister that this budget falls hardest upon those already hardest hit by the war. With respect to those who are actually benefiting in their standard of living from the war and war expenditures, the budget makes little demand, except through the corporation tax. I would have wished that the government had placed some imposts which would have had a psychological effect upon our people, making them realize more and more that Canada is at war. That is what I meant when on June 17 and again the next day I asked the Prime Minister to declare a state of national emergency in Canada. A sacrificial tax, which would affect even the humblest in Canada, would have had a tremendous effect in awakening our people. Others realize the necessity for such an awakening. Only two Sundays ago a great ecclesiastical personage in Canada sent out a letter to be read in all the churches under his charge, and it opened with these pregnant words:

At long last Canadians have been awakened to the imminent dangers which threaten our own country no less than Great Britain.

That is the sort of thing I mean.

It is not my specific duty to suggest detailed measures. Rather should I indicate principles which I think should be followed: but I cannot refrain from inquiring why some additional impost was not placed on spirituous liquors. It was done under the last budget in England. If I were consulting my own views and principles alone-and I advance this suggestion with a feeling of temerity-I would do away with the sale and consumption of spirituous liquors for the duration of the war as a purely economic measure. The drink bill of this country is enormous, at least $200,000,000 per annum, if not more. I realize, however, that this may not be feasible, for reasons upon which I shall not

Why was not a tax of say one cent a gallon placed on all gasoline sold in Canada? They have such a federal tax in the United States, and, mark you, that tax was imposed in addition to, not in substitution for, a similar state tax theretofore imposed in every state of the union, and as a peace-time measure. I suggest to the minister that such a tax was fully expected in this country. Why should there not have been a further elimination of exemptions under the sales tax, in order to raise more money? When I was at home over the weekend a wholesale grocer called me up and expressed great surprise that there had not been some further elimination of these exemptions. I asked what he had in mind and he mentioned condensed milk, on which not a cent of sales tax is collected, and of which huge quantities are sold in this country. I know the answer will be that this would come out of the farmers, but I do not believe it would. I believe the consumer would pay it just as he pays the tax in every other instance.

I now desire to refer briefly to the excess profits tax, which I think will prove to be an important revenue producer. I think the minister has acted wisely in eliminating option A as provided for in last year's act. At best that was merely a skeleton act. I made some examination of it for a client last October and in fact came to Ottawa for the purpose of interviewing the authorities and obtaining a clarification of certain points in relation thereto. To my surprise I was informed that study subsequent to the enactment had convinced the officers that the tax was inequitable and indeed unworkable, and I came away with the distinct impression that a wholly new act would be evolved this session. It was a classic example of hasty, ill-digested legislation. In effect the minister admitted this in his statement. He said one main feature which appeared to be undesirable was the right of the taxpayer to choose between two options; that it had been found that many old firms would pay little or no tax while new firms in business since the war, or those operating in a depressed industry, or undergoing rapid expansion, would be subject to unwarranted discrimination. I agree with that analysis of the situation. Therefore, I understand, a new measure is to be submitted. It is agreed that it will be much more drastic. I understand that after I left the house on Friday afternoon my friends to the left moved an amendment expressing want of confidencein the government because this tax had not been made one hundred per cent. I had not intended to deal with that aspect of the matter; no doubt the minister will reply to that. But I should like to point out to the house and to the country that the situation here is not nearly comparable with the situation in the United Kingdom, because in England they have no corporation income tax; and a large sum of money will be paid under this tax, yoked up with the corporation income

While we accept the principle of conscription of wealth in war time, it must be kept in mind that in times of peace excessive income and profit taxes and excessive succession duty on estates may work great injury to the state; that is if we are to maintain the capitalist system. It is no crime to accumulate a moderate degree of wealth. The accumulation of a large amount of wealth in Canada at least is exceptional, and in no sense proves the rule. I venture to suggest that most of us sitting in this house have striven as hard as we could to accumulate capital; and I venture further to say that most of the accumulated capital in this country has been attained by the exercise of the old-fashioned virtue of thrift, a virtue which all too many people have ceased to practise. Do not, then, in peace time penalize too severely those who practise this virtue. In war time it affords a reservoir from which the government may and will under this budget draw huge sums of money for the country's war effort. In peace time thrifty savings must be put back into business, which in turn will employ labour, utilize materials and supplies and employ more of our people. If not invested directly in industry it must be invested in securities. which largely represent industry.

I had not intended to go into the various ramifications of the new measure, but it is an intricate matter and one which I think hon. members should endeavour to understand, as I should like to understand it myself; therefore I think some reference should be made to the details. Like the September act, which has now passed into oblivion, the new act takes a base period as a starting point, and this base period is the average of the net profits before deducting regular income tax—am I right there?—for company years ending in the years 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939. All profits in excess of this four year average are subject to the new excess profits tax.

Taxable income is to be determined under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act. Deduction of the regular rate of corporation income tax, 18 per cent for unconsolidated returns and 20 per cent for consolidated returns, is permitted before calculating the annual tax under the excess profits tax. The amount by which the current year's taxable income, before regular income taxes, exceeds the four year average income tax is subject to excess profits tax at the new rate of 75 cents. I hope I have correctly stated the effect of the proposals.

There is another provision in this new tax bill, however, which in effect makes the minimum corporation income tax rate 30 per cent for unconsolidated returns or 32 per cent for consolidated returns. Under the new income tax act a minimum of 12 per cent is payable, in addition to the regular 18 per cent or 20 per cent rate, in cases where this amount would be larger than the excess profits tax computed at 75 per cent, and the amount by which the year's profits exceed those of the base period. That, of course, is a very heavy impost, as the minister knows better than I do.

No alteration is made in the provision whereby ten per cent of the cost of capital expenditure computed in the year 1940 may be amortized against taxable income over a period of three years, and I congratulate the minister on having left this concession in the law. I note, too, that the excess profits tax will not apply on income received by Canadian companies from subsidiaries or other investments in Canada. This, of course, guards against duplication. I am wondering if it is clear that this provision applies in respect of income received by a Canadian company operating a subsidiary in the United States, or does it only apply to subsidiaries in Canada? I am hopeful that the minister will give some consideration to that point, and make it clear.

I am curious as to the reference to a board of referees, which the minister suggested would be appointed, and for which the resolution provides to assist in carrying out the provisions of the proposed measure "fairly and realistically," as he stated. Just what are to be the real functions of this board? Is it to be a court of appeal? If so, then great care should be exercised in the selection of the personnel. Above all, political consideration must be strictly taboo, and only men of the highest integrity and judicial ability should even be considered. I warn the minister that his selection will be watched with great anxiety, because an arbitrary board could easily make or break any concern coming under its jurisdiction.

Then, in respect to gold mining: The minister made more than a gesture to the gold mining and oil producing industries. It is, of course, wholly desirable that any new ventures should be encouraged, but I would not think it desirable or in the public interest that proven ventures should be given special consideration. I have in mind the type of man who makes a lucky strike, and then because he is being taxed pretty heavily leaves the country. They must, without question, be treated liberally with respect to depletion and depreciation. It is being borne in mind, too, that our gold production is a most important item in our exports and helps mightily to maintain our trade position, and also our exchange position, but it must also be borne in mind that gold as a commodity for sale and export has come into its own to a greater degree than any other Canadian commodity. There is a tremendous unearned increment there, and this industry must, and I have no doubt will, bear its just share of the national burden, especially in war time. The difficulty has been, and I presume now is, to arrive at a wise and just conclusion as to the incidence of the taxes to be imposed. I know some of the difficulties of the past. I know, too, that every ounce of gold taken is just that much exhaustion of our estate, but providence has been reasonably kind to Canada in this regard, and we are indeed fortunate in having this huge reservoir upon which to draw in this hour of peril.

Then, with respect to the national defence tax, in theory this tax is a supplement to the graduated income tax. It will bring in an army of new taxpayers and to that extent it is all to the good, because I have found that any one who has to pay a particular tax for the first time becomes interested in the application of the tax moneys. This new war tax will help to impress upon the new taxpayer that he is in this war. The results from the tax, $20,000,000, for the balance of this fiscal year, and $35,000,000 estimated for 1941, are substantial and will be a welcome addition to our war effort.

While this is all true, yet may I remind the country that this sacrificial taxation is in a degree coming from the same source as that from which the increased income taxes are coming—in this case salaried or the wageearning classes, many of whom will be already found in the lowest income brackets. These will be obliged to pay both taxes. I am not objecting. I now desire to call attention to the situation with respect to the method of collection—at the source. I agree that the minister has taken the most practicable course; any other procedure would have resulted in great expense to the treasury and there would have been some loss. At the same time this has shown that he appreciates the fact that this tax will add another burden to executives and business generally. To offset this he proposes to make provision toward reimbursing employers for expenses so incurred.

So far, so good; but may I be permitted to make a suggestion to the minister. For years I have heard complaints sometimes bitter complaints—that business enterprises have to make altogether too many returns to governmental departments. All this costs time and money and is frequently a source of irritation. Some people, you know, thrive on statistics. Is it not possible that with this new duty cast upon the accounting departments of firms and corporations some attempt can be made to reduce the volume of statistics and returns which they are now obliged to make? I know that statistics are important, but they never fed any one, and we are apt to allow bureaucrats to demand much more than is requisite and necessary. Some amelioration in this regard may be reasonably expected in war time.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I should make some reference to the new war exchange tax. Its primary importance is to conserve exchange. I have no means of judging as to whether it will be a revenue producer or not. I am prepared to accept the minister's estimate of $65,000,000 in the first full year, of which $50,000,000 will be collected in the present fiscal year. It does not apply to empire countries and will be subject to drawback for export, as in the case of customs duties. Cases of hardship will arise because of its imposition. I hope the minister has given full consideration to this aspect, and that he will see, if he has the necessary power, that such injustices as may arise and be properly established are corrected. Here again great care will have to be exercised.

I have in mind persons, firms, or corporations which sell United States made heavy goods, such as caterpillar tractors or other such equipment, of a class or kind not made in Canada, ordered for contractors having contracts with this government for the clearing of airport sites under a firm contract on a laid down duty paid price in the maritime provinces. It is quite clear from the new section 88-A (1) of the Special War Revenue Act, read in conjunction with section 13 of the resolution, that all such goods must pay this extra tax and that it will apply on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after June 25, 1940, and on all goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Now, the case I want to put to the minister is this: What about goods in transit, ordered in good faith, on a firm contract on a duty free basis laid down in Canada prior to the budget? It seems to me that some consideration at least should be given to importers who find themselves in this position. These machines cost a lot of money, they are usually sold at a laid down price at the point where the contractor takes delivery, that is to say, duty paid in Canada. Are these dealers to be penalized?

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon, friend referring to the same class of article?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. I suggest the minister give very serious and sympathetic consideration to their position. But I am bound to say that balancing the disadvantages that may arise against the advantages which will accrue in respect to conservation of exchange, I am of opinion that the tax is justified. In fact, I would have gone somewhat farther.

In order to conserve our exchange position, that is, if it is deemed desirable and in the public interest to preserve the pegged rate at its present position, and having regard to the large adverse balance of trade which is steadly mounting against us in respect to non-empire countries, principally the United States, we must either restrict our imports or impose new imposts as suggested. I would think that consideration might be given to taking even more drastic action looking toward the total exclusion of certain luxury imports, that is if our hands are free to do so. It is one of the things they have had to do in England and we might well follow their example. We could save a lot of exchange if such a course were adopted, and at the same time do no violence to a decent standard of living. I commend this suggestion to the minister. He has, however, elected to adopt a middle course, I assume on the theory of revenue requirements.

But while he has done that, do not imagine that this tax will not operate as an additional protective duty. It is bound to have that effect no matter what the minister may say as to measures which he may take under the war-time prices and trade board. Increased prices will follow because, under the theory of a protective tariff, the consumer in the final analysis pays the duty. All the minister can do is to see that there is no unjustified increase in prices. I commend this matter to the attention of my free trade friends in this house, if there are any left after following this government for five years.

I am in agreement with the principle of taxing high-priced motor cars. With respect to these luxury taxes on automobiles there is a proviso which will be found on page 8 of the ways and means resolutions to the effect that if a new and unused automobile is in the hands of a dealer on June 25 and not delivered to another purchaser, the tax shall be paid by such dealer when such automobile is delivered. This means that any new and unsold car in the hands of a dealer must bear these increased taxes. I suggest that that is neither fair nor equitable, and that the tax contemplated by this proviso should not be imposed. I have no special information, but I feel certain that as the public anticipated this new taxation on automobiles the situation has been discounted largely and that not many new cars were in the hands of dealers when the budget speech was delivered. The loss of revenue which would be sustained if this item were dropped would not be large.

May I remind the minister that years ago when Sir Henry Drayton was minister of finance a similar tax was placed on automobiles left in the hands of dealers when the budget of that time was introduced. The tax collected amounted to several hundred thousand dollars, and after the change of government in 1921 a campaign was carried on here in Ottawa and a lobby established in this house, as vigorous and intense as any I have ever known, with the result that years afterwards the government of the day, then led by the present Prime Minister, succumbed to the importunities of an organization here in Ottawa and rebated the tax with interest. I suggest to the minister that he does not, even in war time, want to get into a similar position. If he does, I have no doubt that no matter what the political stripe of the administration may be, the result will be a repetition of the experience we had years ago when the government of the day succumbed to the importunities of a powerful lobby.

Finally, there is a matter to which I desire to draw the attention of the house and the country; I refer to retrenchment in the ordinary public services of the country as distinguished from war services. I have already expressed the view on more than one occasion during this session that with this country at war the Canadian people will gladly yield all the money the government may require to defend Canada successfully and to aid our mother country. Of that there is no doubt. The measure of their contribution will be the measure of their ability to pay. They will even expect wasteful expenditure—all war is wasteful-but they will frown upon any and every expenditure not absolutely necessary in the ordinary operations of the country. The estimates before the house indicate that the government has made a substantial move in that direction. In the September 1939 budget, total expenditures aggregated approximately $651 million, not including two items of capitalized defence expenditures and further losses of $27 million on wheat. The total expenditures for last year are now estimated at $681 million. I would assume that with the close of the fiscal year now three months past this figure is reasonably correct. This figure is broken down in the minister's statement. It should be noted that due to increased taxation during the year the revenues were $46 million greater, but we had an actual deficit of $118 million and our net debt rose accordingly. This was without reference to war expenditures.

For 1940-41 the estimated expenditure is $448 million as compared with $525 million estimated for the past fiscal year, an apparent reduction of $77 million. But I am afraid that this is not a true picture. The saving is more apparent than real. Because of war activity a certain amount of expenditure, which in peace time would be charged to ordinary expenditures, is now being paid out of war appropriations. In his press interview in May last, when bringing down the estimates for 1940-41, the minister did not even pretend that the entire $77 million would be net saving. This was because of the necessity of switching certain peace-time services and administrative charges to war account, both in personnel and services; but the minister did make it clear that there would be a holiday in ordinary public works. That is to date the most important indication of the government's intention to save something in the ordinary expenditure.

The minister indicated that the expenditures under the main estimates last year amounted roughly to $400 million. Of this $260 million represented what was regarded as absolutely uncontrollable expenditure. By that is meant war pensions, old age pensions, subsidies to the provinces, interest and what I would term statutory obligations. This left only $140 million, out of which savings might be made, and of this amount $80 million was for salaries and wages, leaving $60 million covered by the main estimates which might be subjected to reductions. Then the minister stated in effect that nothing could be saved out of the $80 million reserved for salaries and wages, apart from discharging government employees. I am not recommending wholesale dismissal of salaried government employees. have been dismissals of wage earners and temporary employees, but I would recommend limited reductions in personnel without the public service being imperilled. What I do earnestly recommend, however, is that when vacancies occur by death, resignation and superannuation, such vacancies be not filled unless it is absolutely imperative in the public interest. This can and should be done, and all and sundry should be given notice to govern themselves accordingly. It has been done before. It was done between 1930 and 1935 when literally thousands of positions were left vacant with a resulting saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars. It can be done again, and it should be done again.

Furthermore, the minister should see to it that no new personnel is taken on. The other night I referred to the position of Mr. Brockington, the very talented lawyer who was brought down here recently from Winnipeg under an arrangement by which, as I am informed, he was to become the historian of Canada's war effort. He was to be paid $9,000 annual salary and $12 per day living allowance. Now it would no doubt be a splendid thing to have Canada's war effort recorded from day to day provided it was done impartially, truthfully and accurately. But history is not usually written up from day to day. It is recorded in the immortal pages of time; a true history is never written until time has rendered a true perspective. This expenditure is wholly unnecessary at this time, especially at the expense of a tax-ridden people. I believe that Mr. Brockington's services are not being utilized in any degree for the purpose indicated, and I hear he is most unhappy about it. Be that as it may, I allege that the creation of the position was unnecessary and at this time is a waste of public money. Furthermore, Mr. Brockington's brilliant and talented services are being utilized in writing propaganda purely and solely to bolster up the shattered prestige of this government. I do not say he is the Prime Minister's ghost writer, but his services approach that description, and I do protest against this type of wasteful public expend-

I could refer to instances of the creation of jobs to take care of defeated candidates. I protest against this sort of thing. Let us have an end of it. I mention no names, but the names are well known.

Mr. MARTIN: They are not all Liberals. [Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not help it any. It is the principle I am contending for, and the hon, gentleman should sustain me. In fact, the action of the government in this regard seems to be naked and unashamed. If the government will not stop this sort of thing, a rapidly awakened public opinion will make itself heard.

The minister closed his lengthy remarks by paying a well-deserved tribute to the Canadian people. I have already done so on more than one occasion. I know, as he knows, the stock from which they sprang. Comprising in the main the offspring of two great races, cognizant of the gravity of the occasion, they will rise to the challenge and, like our kindred in Britain, they will give their blood, their treasure, their all; but they will impose this condition, that this government give the highest type of leadership, and if this government will not give the necessary and vital leadership required, then the people of Canada will demand a new government, a really national government.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement. In ordinary peace times this debate would go on perhaps for weeks. But these are not peace times. The Minister of Finance has become, if he has not already taken over the duties of the office, the Minister of National Defence, and I have asked myself this question: Why should the Minister of Finance, who is to become the Minister of National Defence, be compelled to stay in this chamber and listen to a large number of speeches, some of them relevant and some of them irrelevant? And so, Mr. Speaker, to expedite the business of the country, to expedite particularly our war effort, to expedite the minister's plans with respect to the defence of Canada and especially of our Atlantic shore line, I suggest to the house, I suggest to the government and their followers, and I make a special appeal to my friends in the far corner, that we let this budget pass and release the minister to administer his new office of Minister of National Defence. Let the new Minister of Finance, whoever he is to be, or the very competent, shall I say, Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) pilot the financial resolutions through committee and let us get along with the war. I am prepared to help him, but I want to make just one proviso. and that is that when we are in committee on the resolutions hon. members who have prepared speeches and who want to make themselves heard or who want through this medium to talk to their constituents, should be given the opportunity and very wide latitude to make their statements in the committee. I make this offer, I make this appeal in the interests of Canada's war effort, which I am prepared to back up and help support with all the power at my command. Whatever little ability I have I want to place it at the disposal of the government, not to help this government survive as a party government, but to help Canada win this war.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Speaker-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister prepared to make a statement before the hon, member proceeds?

Mr. RALSTON: If the hon, member for St. Antoine-Westmount will permit me, I want to say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and to the house that in regard to opportunity being given for discussion in committee of any matters which ordinarily would be discussed on the budget itself, the government is perfectly satisfied to give the undertaking that such opportunity will be given. It is a matter, of course, for the house to decide, but hon. members may be assured that if it is desired to make their statements on the budget in committee they will not be precluded by the budget itself being disposed of without prolonged debate.

Mr. MacINNIS: We are all involved in this, Mr. Speaker, and you cannot deal with the matter unless we have the opportunity—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the Minister of Finance was making a statement in reply to the question asked by the hon. leader of the opposition with regard to an opportunity being given to hon. members to make their statements in committee. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) now has the floor.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, this is almost the first occasion on which I have had the honour of addressing this house. That it is not the first is due to the fact that my hon, friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked for an explanation of one or two private bills standing in my name. In view of his concluding remarks I am almost discouraged from rising now; nevertheless having steeled myself to do so, I shall proceed notwithstanding what he has said.

I have observed that it is customary for a new member, speaking for the first time, to make some reference to the constituency which he represents, and I propose very briefly to discharge that pleasant duty.

The constituency of St. Antoine-Westmount is one of the larger Montreal constituencies.

Predominantly residential, it includes all the city of Westmount, part of St. Antoine ward, part of the old St. Andrews ward and a little bit of St. George's ward. Such outstanding landmarks as the Forum and Bonaventure station are included within its limits.

The leader of the opposition has mentioned that the increase in the graduated personal income tax bears very heavily on the lower and medium brackets. I think it is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are perhaps as many people in my constituency, who will be directly affected by these increases, as in any other constituency in Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) made his budget speech a week ago to-day. The country has had notice of these increases, and I am glad to say that since that time I have not heard of a single objection to the increases on the part of my constituents. Their attitude is best expressed in the words of one of them, the Minister of Finance himself, when he said that these increased burdens would be loyally accepted and paid as a small price to pay for the preservation of our liberties.

On this question of my constituency, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can give hon. members some idea of the intellectual qualities of its residents when I say that I have five electors who are members of this house, two of them ministers of the crown. I have not compiled any statistics on the senatorial representation, but I think it is fair to say that St. Antoine-Westmount has contributed its fair share, in numbers at any rate, to the public life of Canada.

I propose to-day to discuss some features of the excess profits tax, with particular reference to the criticism of that tax voiced in the house the other day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am sorry that he is not here this afternoon. I spoke to him this morning and he told me he had to attend a meeting of the special committee on the defence of Canada regulations. In the course of his remarks the other day he stated that some corporations were paying no excess profits tax. That, of course, Mr. Speaker, is clearly incorrect, since under the resolution every corporation, whether it makes excess profits or not, will pay a minimum excess profits tax of 12 per cent on its total earnings.

After he had given a considerable number of figures and percentages, with which I propose to deal in a few minutes, the honmember went on to say, as reported at page 1232 of Hansard:

Of course we consider that such profits ought not to be permitted during the course of the war, and that we should take all profits above a fair return on the capital invested and the risk taken. That would vary in various industries. The hon, member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked me a few minutes ago if I would take all profits. I believe that these industries can be classified according to risk experienced, and so on, and after having so classified them we would take all profits above the amount which we consider to be a fair return for the risk taken.

That, Mr. Speaker, is indefinite. Speaking in the debate on the National Resources Mobilization Act on June 18, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of the British excess profits tax. On page 873 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

. . . we have a right to ask that the government at the same time assure these young people that the excess profits tax will be instituted as in Great Britain, and will be one hundred per cent. And we ask that prior to giving our support to this bill.

May I say that, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the proposed excess profits tax, taken in conjunction with the corporation income tax, is more onerous than the tax under the English act. As many hon, members know, and as the leader of the opposition has already indicated, there is no corporation income tax as such in England. There, a corporation deducts tax at the standard rate, but the individual shareholder is entitled to take credit for that deduction in his own return, so that in effect there is no double tax, as there is in Canada, on corporation earnings.

I propose this afternoon to compare briefly the provisions of the two taxing acts, in Great Britain and under the proposed act which is now being discussed.

Under both these acts, as has already been indicated, excess profits are treated as being profits in excess of an average or standard rate. Under the English act, for the purpose of establishing that average rate the taxpayer has one of four options. He can take his earnings for 1935, or he can take his earnings for 1936, or he can take the average of his earnings for 1935 and 1937, or the average of his earnings for 1936 and 1937. That applies of course to companies which have been operating during that period. I may say in passing that similar provisions exist under both acts for a board of referees to establish the standard or average profit for new companies and companies which have been operating under depressed conditions.

Under the Canadian act the taxpayer has no such option. His average or standard profit is established by taking the average profit of the four years 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939, and all companies pay a minimum corporation tax of 18 per cent in the case of a straight return and 20 per cent in the case of a consolidated return, plus a minimum excess profits tax of 12 per cent on all earnings whether they are over and above that average or standard rate or not.

Perhaps I could illustrate that position best by one or two examples. Take a company for instance with earnings in 1940 of $100,000. If that amount is equal to or less than the average or standard earnings of that company for the four preceding years, in Canada, such a company would pay a tax of $30,000, that is to say, 18 per cent income tax and 12 per cent excess profits tax, assuming it did not file its return on a consolidated basis. In England a company making the same profit of $100,000 with an average or standard profit, on one of those options I mentioned, of $100,000, would pay no tax at all.

Take a second case of the same company earning $100,000 in 1940, whose average earnings during the relevant period were $75,000. In that case, under the definition in both the English act and the Canadian act the excess profit would be $25,000. That company in Canada would pay a tax of $33,375. In England it would pay a tax of only $25,000; in other words, 100 per cent of the excess profit of $25,000.

As will be seen, it all depends on where you start paying your tax, and obviously a company which pays no excess profits tax on, say three-fourths of its income, and in the case of England, pays no tax at all, on three-fourths of its income, is better off than a company which pays 18 per cent on all its income and an excess profits tax of 75 per cent on the remaining quarter.

It seems to me that if the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar is satisfied with the provisions of the British act, he should be more than satisfied with the provisions of the proposed Canadian act taken in conjunction with the corporation income tax under the Income War Tax Act.

In his speech last Friday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to a list of thirty-three Canadian companies which, he said, had been prepared by himself and someone to whom he referred as an able statistician. He gave the house a great many figures, percentages, estimates of earnings and so on of these thirty-three companies, including an estimate of what those companies would pay on their 1940 income assuming that that income were the same as it was in 1939. My hon. friend was good enough to furnish me with a copy of the statement to which he referred, and I was able to see how he had arrived at those calculations.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the figures which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar gave to this house on Friday as being the estimated tax which those companies would pay in 1940 based on their 1939 income, were incorrect, and the estimate of the tax which he made is substantially lower than the tax that those companies would pay on the basis referred to. They are incorrect for two reasons. First, that my hon. friend computed his tax on the basis of net earnings available for dividends, which of course was the amount after deducting provision for income tax. Obviously that is wrong, because in the case of a percentage tax you do not deduct the amount of your tax before you calculate how much you have to pay. They were wrong for a second reason, that in the case of twentyeight of the thirty-three companies he computed his minimum excess profits tax at 10 per cent and not 12 per cent as provided under the resolution. I am going to deal briefly with the five specific cases to which the hon. member referred.

With regard to Consolidated Smelters, he estimated his tax on $9,339,586, which was the net amount shown by that company as available for dividends. It had made provision of $2,280,000 for tax, which must be added to that figure of $9,339.586, so that the correct figure should be $11,619,586. If we use that figure, the total corporation income tax plus excess profits tax at the minimum rate amounts to $3,718,267 instead of $2.801,876 as given by my hon. friend, or a difference of $916,391.

The second company with which the hon. member dealt specifically was Canadian Industries Limited. Again by the same process he underestimated the tax by $579,457.

The third was International Nickel, the big one of the five. International Nickel had included in its accounts $7,296,986 for income tax. Figuring again on the same basis, my hon. friend underestimated the tax payable by International Nickel by the amount of $3,071,984.

The fourth was Asbestos Corporation; this is the small one as far as earnings are concerned. Figuring that on the same basis, we find the underestimate is $101,796.

Aluminium Limited is the only one of those which my hon. friend selected which would in all probability be taxed on the higher basis, that is 75 per cent of excess profits. His statement did not enable me to see exactly what four years he used as a basis for his average, but I think they must have been 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939. On that basis he underestimated the amount of tax payable by that company by $878,162.

I did not attempt to calculate the amount of the underestimate with respect to the other twenty-eight companies, but on these five my friend underestimated the tax which would be payable by them by $5,547,590, or in other words an average of something over a million dollars per company. If the same ratio continued with respect to the other twenty-eight, he would have underestimated by about $33,000,000, or pretty close to the amount which the Minister of Finance estimated will be produced by the national defence levy.

It is a considerable time since I had lectures in logic, but as I remember, the soundness of the conclusions reached depends on the soundness of the premises on which those conclusions are based; if the premises are false, the conclusions are false. I suggest that that reasoning might be applied to the conclusions reached by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar with respect to the excess profits tax.

One last point. My hon. friend mentioned that he had not overlooked the fact that these corporation profits, or what was left of them after the deduction of the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax, would be subject to taxation in the hands of the shareholders who received them. I am glad he did not entirely overlook that point, because, as hon. members know, that income, or rather what is left of it, is subject to tax a second time in the hands of the shareholder who receives it, a third time by the different provinces, with the exception of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and a fourth time in the case of a shareholder residing in my own city of Montreal, by that city. And for good measure those same corporation profits are subject to corporation profits tax in many of the provinces with respect to the profits earned in those provinces. In the case of Ontario and Quebec the rate is five per cent.

In the course of his address the other day the Minister of Finance used the word "fantastic" as applied to a possible combination of federal, provincial and municipal taxes on the same income. That seems to me a very apt word. I have little sympathy with the view expressed by hon, members in the other corner that the taxes to be imposed on industry and on corporation earnings under this budget are inadequate.

I have already taken rather more time than I had intended—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had some comments or rather suggestions to make in connection with the administration sections, but in view of what the leader of the opposition said I have no doubt an opportunity will be accorded to put these forward in the committee stage, so I conclude by thanking you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for the patient and courteous attention which has been given to my remarks.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): As a new member of this house I have during these last weeks listened with a great deal of interest, and I may also say patience, to the debates which have taken place. As a new member I have of course very much to learn. As the representative of an agricultural riding where not only the farmers who have been long established but also those who have newly attempted to carve homes for themselves out of the wilderness of the north all find themselves in great distress, it has been my primary duty to attempt to place before this house a fair picture of conditions in my constituency. I have had a great deal of consideration from the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), and he has promised an investigation into the particular conditions which I have outlined. During the weeks since I came here I have learned a great deal, not only in this house. I have visited some of the great cities of the east, and I have come to the conclusion that the problems which face our western farmers are more or less the same problems which face the working people in the cities of the east.

I have watched the legislation introduced in this house. I must confess that when I came here I had hopes that the great crisis facing the nation would force this government to bring in constructive and progressive legislation really in the best interests of, and to the benefit of the people of Canada. The budget debate follows very closely on the heels of the bill to conscript man-power and property. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it proves that bill false. We were led to understand that the bill conscripting man-power and property would conscript the great reserves of wealth within the borders of this country, to be used in the prosecution of the war. Now that the budget has been brought down, we realize that the great masses of the working people of Canada, out of their scanty earnings and low wages, will have to provide the enormous amount of money for our war effort.

I can no longer remain silent and support this government. My hon, friends to my right have opposed some legislation which has been introduced in this house; yet they have constantly affirmed their support of this government. I cannot do that. I do not, I will not support this government. After a careful appraisal of the policy of this government I find that if I am to remain loyal to the people who sent me here, it is impossible for me to support either this budget or the legislation which has been introduced by the government, and I am prepared to tell the people why that is so. I know that anyone who dares to disagree with the policy of the government is accused of being disloyal and an enemy of Canada; but, as time goes on, I become more convinced that in the days to come those who support this government will be judged to be the real enemies of the Canadian people. As I see it, if I remained silent I should be disloyal to those whom I represent.

During this session this government has passed legislation to subjugate the Canadian people and force them into both political and economic bondage. To a large extent we have lost our political liberty through the defence of Canada regulations, and now in the proposed budget we face social and economic disaster. The worst of it is that all this is proposed under the guise of patriotism. As everyone knows, our press is more or less controlled by the same powers that control the great financial institutions. the corporations and the monopolies of this country. The press has led the people tobelieve that this budget calls for national sacrifice. They say it is an emergency budget to save Canada, to save the world, and that it will bring about equality of sacrifice. We are told that we need some $700,000,000 for the war and further sums for other expenses, making a grand total of about a billion and a half dollars. If the conscription bill had been what it purported to be, there would have been no necessity for this increased taxation, which will so greatly harass and burden those in the lower income brackets. There is wealth in this country, sufficient not only for the prosecution of this war to even a greater extent than we are now prosecuting it, but also to rehabilitate our people.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we are facing two great crises. We have a war crisis and we have a domestic crisis. If anyone says that a domestic crisis does not exist, I can only say it is because they do not wish to see it. There are none so blind as those who will not see. When we say that the war crisis is the only crisis which matters, we are absolutely failing the Canadian people. Provision could have been made to meet both these crises if the government had not been the mouthpiece of the great financial interests of this country, as it always has been. Government spokesmen have told the people that the incomes of the wealthy are to be taxed so that they wll help bear the cost of the war. That hides the real truth from the people. It is possible for the great monopolies, the great industrial corporations, to increase their capital by millions of dollars without paying any tax except on a very small portion which they may set aside for certain purposes. They can increase their capital and set aside enormous amounts for reinvestment without ever coming under the taxation laws of this dominion. They have certain surpluses of capital which, under our laws, may be exempt from immediate taxation. That is where any government, working in the true interests of the Canadian people, should have looked for reserves with which to finance not only this war but also a rehabilitation scheme for the people still in distress in this country.

The minister has acknowledged that even with the increased taxation proposed he will not have sufficient money to prosecute the war, and he says that we must meet the rest of our obligations by borrowing. Where will he turn? Of course he will go to these vast reserves of capital which, instead of being loaned to the government, should be conscripted. It amounts to this: During the last great economic crisis these reserves of capital were already in existence, but at that time it was not profitable to lend them for the rehabilitation of our people. In this war crisis to-day, however, it is profitable not to have this great wealth conscripted but rather to loan it to the people of Canada for the prosecution of the war. That is so because the people who loan this money are the same people who will have the advantage of possessing huge sums of money with which to go ahead with new industries for the production of munitions and so on. Now it is profitable for them to show their patriotism and loan their money. But it is not the kind of patriotism that is being demanded of them by means of conscription, as it should be. The working people are asked to give their sons. Our working men will go into the factories. As time goes on they will find that their wages will become more meagre and the real value of their money will be decreased.

The situation to-day is the same as it was in 1914. Then the people thought the greater part of the war burden was to be borne by the wealthy, but in 1918 the people found that they themselves had borne the brunt of the sacrifice, not only through the giving up of their sons but also through the piling up of debt. The farmers of our country will go on with their unremitting toil, and what guarantee have they that in the years to come they will be able to establish for themselves even a decent standard of These things are all part of the living? domestic crisis which we as a responsible body cannot and must not neglect. The Canadian people are going to be told what is their patriotic duty. During the last war we made sixty new millionaires in Canada, and we sacrificed 60,000 men. That meant roughly the lives of a thousand men for every new millionaire created; and during that period the debt of the people increased. In 1914 our per capita debt amounted to $42.64, while at the end of the war period, after we had created sixty new millionaires, the per capita debt had increased to $266.37.

As far as I can see, the same sort of thing will go on during this war. No one can say at the present time how many new millionaires we are going to create, but from the legislation which has been passed by this house already, I feel sure that we shall continue to increase the number of wealthy people in this dominion and add a further burden of debt to the shoulders of the working people during the years to come. That is not what we understood by the conscription bill which has just been passed. It is not the kind of legislation which we, as representatives of the people, should allow to pass through this House of Commons. The borrowing of vast sums of money will create unadulterated inflation at the expense of the Canadian people. The great interests will not suffer enormously through these coming years. Roughly $700,000,000 will be taken out of the purchasing power of the people, and at the same time the shackles of debt will be tied round the Canadian people, like millstones round their necks, to make of them slaves into the future. And children who are not yet born will be among them. Not only will it affect the people who are to-day destitute and barely managing to live, but it will affect hundreds, yes, thousands of the middle-class people who will lose their scanty savings, and be forced down to a degree of poverty unnecessary and unneedful in a country of great wealth such as this.

After all, for what reason are the youth of Canada being conscripted? The government says it is for home service. That is true enough. What are they to protect at home? Besides the homes of their own people it is their duty to protect the great corporations, the banks and the factories—all those organizations which in the past have cared so little for the youth of Canada that during the late crisis they refused to lend their money, let alone have their money conscripted, for the rehabilitation of our people.

The most patriotic procedure for the government to take would be to go to these vast reserves of capital which, if unmolested, will be used for reinvestment, and from this money finance not only the prosecution of this war but a rehabilitation scheme for our people.

I noticed that on Friday last an hon. member of the official opposition—I believe it was the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris)—referred to the position of the Canadian people. In his speech he said:

I am afraid our Canadian people have not been as provident as they might have been, particularly the younger people. In my own home I have four people driving cars, so I think I know what I am talking about. Our people have not been provident; they have been reckless; there has been too much wasteful spending.

The fact that a man has four people driving cars is no indication that he knows what he is talking about. I am sorry to say that in my opinion what the hon, member for Danforth said merely shows, or goes to prove that one-half of the world does not know how the other half lives.

In 1935, roughly 56 per cent of our people were earning less than $1,000 a year. Yes, even with the most careful budgeting, in that year 56 per cent of our people had only sufficient to manage to live, let alone really enough to take care of hospital bills, or matters of that kind. We who are the Canadian people are not in a position to waste our money, for the simple reason that we have scarcely enough to manage to live. I believe the observation of the hon, member for Danforth shows on his part a lack of knowledge respecting the Canadian people. In 1934 two-thirds of our industrial workers, that is about 1,617,000 of them, earned on an average $360 a year. I wonder how there could be any wasteful spending for them. Then, our farmers averaged about $474 in that year, and in some instances that amount had to provide for large families.

I believe that if we fully realized the way in which the majority of Canadian people have had to live in the last few years, we would understand that not only have they been unable to waste money, but they have been unable really to live decently, or to live as people in this day and age, and in a country such as this, should be able to live. Now they are having an added burden placed upon their shoulders. How the people are going to carry that burden in the next few months, or maybe years, I have no idea.

Of course since 1935 we have had greater technical improvements. The volume of industrial output in 1937 was the same as in 1929, but in the latter year we used 1,500,000 fewer men. In 1920 the Canadian railroads employed 185,000 men, whereas in 1937, despite increased transportation, they employed only 125,000 men. Consequently, in addition to those people receiving low incomes, we have to-day people who are unemployed and others on agricultural relief.

I have been interested recently in letters received from my constituency. I learn that out there relief schedules have been cut to a point where families of two persons are receiving aid at the rate of only $4 a month. A short time ago I made inquiries as to the amount it costs to keep a man in an internment camp, and I found that the cost of keeping such a man is practically the same as that for a soldier. In other words, it costs 35 cents a day or about $10.50 a month.

It is peculiar that the government can spend $10.50 a month on each of a group of interned aliens, but that it can afford only $4 a month to provide for two of our own citizens. There is something wrong with a government which permits such things to happen. I am not saying that the men in the internment camps should not be kept decently, but I am saying that the government should take far greater heed of the necessities of our people, and should do more to establish them and give them an opportunity to live decently even in this time of crisis.

I believe it was Mr. Churchill who told the English people that he had nothing to offer them but blood, grief, tears and toil. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that in his budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) promised the Canadian people nothing but misery, despair, destitution and fear. At the same time he did nothing to cause fear in the hearts of the owners of great wealth, or in the hearts of members of corporations, banks and industrial institutions throughout the country.

What are the people being forced to do? First of all, the income tax in the lower brackets is not the only difficulty people with lesser means will have to face. As time goes on, those people earning around $600 or $700 a year will find that their earnings will not go as far as they do to-day, and I believe they will learn that within a few months. Already—and we have government authority for this statement—their cost of living has gone up by about 4 per cent. Gradually we shall find that our great industries will take over more and more of the war industries. They will cease to produce as many goods and services required by the people. That in turn will create a rise in prices, and the result will be that in a few months' time the incomes of our people certainly will not go as far as they do to-day. The 10 per cent increase in the import tax will increase the cost of goods, and will certainly add to the price of food and clothing. I believe that tax will bring in around $65,000,000, a great part of which will come out of the pockets of that 65 per cent of our Canadian people whose incomes are so tremendously low, and who to-day are not getting what they should have. Yet the government expects only about $100,000,000 from the excess profits tax. I say the import duty protects the wealthy and the corporations, and yet those same corporations by law can evade taxation of their capital gains.

During the months of the war it will be possible for them to amass enormous reserves of capital. But of course that capital is something in the nature of a golden calf set up in our country, something we are forbidden to touch. That is a precedent which has been created, one which even in this time of crisis the government is going to continue to protect. Our men must suffer; they must give their lives. Our people must toil unremittingly. They will be forced to accept wages set for them. They will be forced to accept conditions, under the defence of Canada regulations. Yet at the same time the conditions I have described will go on, and our financial system will continue to create greater wealth for the few and greater poverty and misery for the masses. Our men will go to work day after day with that feeling of frustration and hopelessness, and our women in their homes will see the peaked faces of their children. Despite all this, they will have absolutely no way of bettering their condition. That is said to be the sacrifice which is demanded of the people because of war. My conviction is that this sacrifice is not necessary. I contend that we could not only prosecute the war but rehabilitate our people without placing such a tremendous burden upon those who are unable to bear it.

There is one thing that the Canadian people should be told, and told quickly, namely, that we should not accept everything which this government tells us as being the absolute truth. As soon as this session is over, if the opportunity is accorded me, I shall do everything possible to let the people know why I have not been able to support this government in its war measures. In my opinion there is no reason why the people should have to believe these things any longer. I wonder how long it will be before the people really realize the unnecessary burden which the government has put upon them. I cannot think it will be very long. I believe the government realized months ago that during this war crisis the people's wisdom and natural understanding of things would come to their aid and that they would rebel against unjust legislation and the unjust burden of taxation which might be placed upon them. This government had the defence of Canada regulations prepared which are instruments of coercion to be used in the future upon our Canadian people.

To say that this budget is patriotic is in itself untrue. It is not a patriotic budget. It is most unpatriotic and disloyal to the Canadian people. There are many people in this country who supported this government through the last few years in the belief that should a crisis arise, the government would do certain things and take certain measures to alleviate the condition of the people. Yet to-day we find that so little is being done. Already the people are beginning to take matters into their own hands to some extent. I have a letter which was sent to me from the northern part of Saskatchewan. I believe it is a good thing that the people are taking matters into their own hands and writing letters; otherwise we would not get to know about what is happening. This letter states that at a council meeting twenty householders threatened that if they could not get immediate help they would help themselves. They stated that they had nothing at home to eat. This was simply a spontaneous reaction to the condition which faces some of our people.

As I say, I shall do everything possible to support the people, especially the mothers, in their just demands. It has been said that the female of the species is more deadly than the male. That is perfectly true. When Canadian mothers are forced to watch their children become emaciated because they lack those things which children in this country should have, those mothers have a right to raise their voices in protest. I can only hope that the women of this dominion will raise their voices as one united voice and protest against the legislation which has been passed and against the unjust budget which has been imposed upon them.

All expenditures which would be of benefit to the Canadian people have been decreased by this government. There is a decrease of $4,827,273 in the agricultural estimates. We find that old age pensions and pensions for the blind have been decreased by $4.620. We find a decrease of $350,000 in the estimates for youth training and a decrease of $12,170,310 in the estimates for direct relief. There is a decrease of $14,845 in the estimates for child and maternal hygiene, and a decrease of $14,540 in the estimates for publicity and health education. Pensions and national health estimates have been cut by $795,696, while there has been a decrease of $80,000 in the estimates for projects and schemes for veterans' assistance. In the case of public works, which would provide employment for many, there has been a decrease of $17,016,794. Everything which would encourage our people and give them an opportunity to become self-supporting and perhaps be in a position to make a further contribution to this war effort is being cut down by the government.

I cannot find words strong enough to condemn this budget. As I said before, I hope the people of this country, realizing that there is no necessity for this added burden which is being placed upon them, will raise their voices unitedly in protest.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I count it a great honour to be allowed to follow the lone, yet happy and brilliant lady member of this house. I think you will agree with me when I say that there should be more of her kind in this house, provided that increase in numbers would not cause some of us to lose our seats. We each look upon this budget from our own background. We consider it from our own educational point of view and the course that we follow in our everyday life. We heard the farmer refer to the budget as giving him the needed protection he required for his home and loved ones; he saw in it an opportunity for a stable market. The business man looks upon this budget as having a steadying influence; behind the scenes he sees a government which stands for the maintenance of traditions and the payment of just debts. A mother considers this budget in the light of the protection it provides for her home and loved ones. A lawyer looks at it from the point of view of the law; he is thinking of the sacred trust to which he obligated himself before he received his gown. Your Honour knows perfectly well what I mean. The doctor looks at this budget through the eyes of a man hungry for a really healthy nation; he knows that there is disease in the body politic and he hopes to find a way of killing that disease. Those clerical gentlemen who are members of this house, those men who have studied the queen of sciences, look at this budget from another point of view; they want to know upon what foundation it rests. As we gave an attentive hearing to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) when he proclaimed his budget, we realized that it rested upon the foundation of truth.

I want to congratulate the government—I have no doubt the former Minister of National Defence had a hand in it—upon the action they took to increase the pay cheques of our soldiers from $1.10 to $1.30 a day. He entered the trenches during the last war as a private, and I have no doubt he was able to recall the smell of the gas which sent him home a weaker man. No matter who may disagree with me, I contend that the poorest paid men in the British empire are those who risk their lives for $1.30 a day to protect the welfare of their country. Those who served in the last war were able to save very little. When they came home, some of us had to do our best to find them jobs at twenty-five cents an hour. I must say that in many instances I failed to find even a job of that sort. That was one of the things which constrained me to permit my name to be submitted to the electorate of the finest constituency in the Dominion of Canada.

As I listened to the minister introducing his budget, he looked to me a real minister, as he is, but just now I mean a minister in the sense of a clergyman. He stood up in his place in the house and obviously was convinced that he had something to say. He was not ashamed of it. He felt that it was the truth which the vast audience that filled this house and the galleries needed to know. And he delivered his message in such a way that we all realized he was in earnest and spoke with conviction.

As I heard his opening remarks, which we call the introduction, there arose a spirit of expectancy. He rises and tells the house why he stands in his place and delivers his message. Here are his own words: "The Hun is hammering at the gate."

Could we not almost hear the big hammer as the minister's words echoed through the house? We were almost within sound of the Hun with his mechanized warfare, with his record of cruelty and cussedness all along the line, leaving a trail of broken hearts, broken homes and broken souls. The minister certainly introduced his subject in splendid style, and we were all ready to listen.

Then he makes his plea. He asks for money. I know some ministers who hate to ask their people for money, but I have never stood in any pulpit yet and felt ashamed to ask for money for a worthy cause—and no one has a right to be ashamed or to come before the public with an apologetic air when he is asking for money for a worthy cause. I think the minister showed his real sincerity as he asked for money.

Then he went on to present his subject in splendid form, and as he proceeded with arguments that were logical we were convinced that he would get what he was asking for, and that when the collection plates came in they would be loaded. When he was making his plea for a collection he used concrete examples, which are a splendid argument. He told us of one war veteran who gave him the best he had, which was a collection of old coins, and I suppose that war veteran had handled them over and over again, and loved them and talked about them often. Then he told us of another soldier who was a caretaker in an armoury and gave freely twenty dollars a month. Then the minister said:

With such examples to challenge and inspire with such examples to tanhenge and hispire us, I cannot believe that any man in Canada will complain about his burden, or by greed, panic or selfish fear, betray his Canadian citizenship in the hour of Canada's need.

Britain is giving her blood, her treasure,

We too will give our best to help make up this budget.

As the minister sat down, I noticed that very few members were reading newspapers, which would have struck me as an act of sacrilege at such a time. I noticed, too, that very few members were sleeping-and it is a mark of a great preacher to keep his congregation awake.

There are some things which the budget suggests to me, Mr. Speaker. Of course, one sees through the eyes of one's constituents. I can see an opportunity for developing at the head of the lakes a great iron ore industry. It is standing there inviting those who have the ability and the cash to come along and develop it. I think the government should pay a bounty of one or two dollars a ton on iron ore in the same manner that subventions on coal were granted to help Saskatchewan and Alberta. I will also mention now, as there are to be no supplementary estimates, that there is a dire need to keep our harbour open at the head of the lakes. Dredging that should have been done two years ago and last year was not done because the government wanted to cut down expenditures. The channel must be kept open for shipping, and if there are any accidents to ships coming in or going out, the government will be liable to some extent.

At the head of the lakes we have also a splendid shipbuilding yard, with two ships almost ready to launch and another with her keel laid. We have grain elevators, the largest and best filled that one can find anywhere. We have pulp and paper industries, and a great shipping centre. We have there the Canadian Car and Foundry company, which built the first Hurricane fighter that was built in Canada, and it stood the tests all the way through.

The minister in making his budget proposals certainly showed himself to be no respecter of persons because he made everybody pay who was earning anything worth 95826-80 while. We admit that the budget is hard on the bachelors; but this is leap year, Mr. Speaker, and notable bachelors will always be able to find somebody to help them out with their exemption, even if it costs something more.

I can see a sign of the times in this budget because it brings a leveling down. I have no trouble in convincing myself that when this war is fought and won, there will have to be a considerable change in our economic system so that every able-bodied man in Canada will have something worth while to do to earn his bread and keep a cosy corner of his own.

I ask myself, what is the cause of all this war? The lawyer would say, broken laws and broken treaties. The business man would say, hunger for trade. The doctor would say, disease and sickness in the life of the nation. But a minister of the gospel accustomed to call a spade a spade would say that the cause was disobedience of the laws of God and disregard of the brotherhood of man. The old law emphasizes "thou shalt not". "Thou shalt not kill." "Thou shalt not steal." Another commandment is: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Perhaps the cause of the war is that we have been leaving God out of our plans and out of our thinking. We need to examine the fundamentals again, and times like these certainly cause us to think. The other day I was reading the old book of Ezekiel, and I was convinced that when men and women place their trust in God and go out and keep their powder dry, they will win, and win in the right way.

Not long ago our great king, not only the king of Great Britain but the king of Canada, called in all the churches of the commonwealth for a day of prayer, and I do not think since Easter have our churches been as well filled as they were on that day. I wonder how many men and women and how many ministers looked for an answer to their prayers that day. But when the British army was hemmed in at Dunkerque there came the announcement across the seas that it was nothing short of a miracle that the British army got out so well.

When I consider the purpose of our custom of observing the Sabbath day, that is, for worship and rest and the upbuilding of body and mind, and then when I reflect how too frequently that day is spent, I suggest that we need to rethink along another line the matter of Sabbath observance. We in Canada have a habit which has cost us about $180,000,000 this past year. I have yet to hear an hon, member in any quarter of this chamber lift his voice in protest against the wasting of that money. Admittedly I would rather see a man take a drink than have him sit on one side of the fence and act on the other. I know that once I took a little drop of cognac, real brandy. I had a bad throat once and the doctor said, "You should have a good gargle." All the other gargles failed, so I resorted to the cognac and gargled it, and I nearly choked.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the hon, member spit it out?

Mr. McIVOR: The doctor said, "You allowed a little drop of it to trickle down, and that did the trick." In that traffic we spend $180,000,000 a year. Why do hon. members not dare to protest against the drink traffic? I can tell you, Mr. Speaker. We are scared of losing the votes of the supporters of beer parlours. I am scared too, but not into silence.

Let me close upon a more hopeful note, a note of confidence in the morale of our country and the courage of our soldiers. I may be pardoned for reading an extract from a letter which I received from a young lad, an acquaintance of mine who is now in the air force. The men of that force may or may not be better than others, but I know them to be great lads. This is the extract:

The war news looks bad, but it looks as if it is up to the air force and the navy now, and that is where we shine. As long as our leaders stand up and show real common sense I am not a bit afraid of what the air force will do. There is nothing here but the will to fight, and I know that the boys will do their part.

That indicates the character and calibre of our air force; they will give a good account of themselves and chase the Hun and his leader back again ere long into that railway coach.

As I think of these youths, of Canada and its educational institutions, of our citizens who strive for the benefit of mankind, of the welcome extended by the press to news of the churches and reports of all good movements; as I see the Christian home and the old Bible restored to their honoured place, with the Bible used as a guide to life, not for superstitious reading; as I think of our Christian manhood and womanhood more steadfast than before in its trust in God, I cherish the hope of a glorious commonwealth greater than anything this world has ever known, in which God will be first and every good thing will have its rightful place.

At six o'clock the house took recess.
[Mr. McIvor.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to incorporate the Alberta Provincial Bank.

He said: There are several reasons why this house should proceed forthwith to give this bill second reading and refer it to the banking and commerce committee. Among the reasons which might be mentioned are, first, that the premier and cabinet of one of the provinces of this dominion have petitioned that this bill be enacted. This is a most unusual event in the history of Canada. Again, the government at present in power in Alberta is there definitely for the welfare of the common man. It set out with a proposal to give a dividend of $25 a month, however absurd that might seem. It set out also to give a fair price for primary and secondary products. Obviously both these proposals are in the interest of the common man. I feel, then, that I am justified in saying that the government is there primarily in the interest of the common people of the province. Again, that government has managed the affairs of Alberta unusually well. There has been no increase in the provincial debt since the Social Credit government took office. According to the best information I am able to obtain, Alberta is the only province in the dominion in which that is true.

There has been a constant effort on the part of the present Alberta government to be realistic. It has endeavoured first of all to adjust debts so that they might eventually be paid. The principle which it has espoused and so energetically followed has come to be recognized pretty well all over the dominion to-day, namely, that debt should be adjusted to the ability of debtors to pay. The same is accepted as being true of interest. Everyone realizes to-day that it is utterly absurd to hold men to an interest rate of seven or eight per cent when money is being obtained at a rate of three-quarters of one per cent. The Alberta government has consistently striven to reduce the interest rate to a point at which it is possible to pay it, and then it has endeavoured to pay that rate honestly and without fail. It has been unable to meet all its obligations when they came due, with the result that there has been default, but there was no blame to be attached to the Social Credit government for that default. A situation had been built up for years which was completely impossible for them and which would have been impossible for any government of any name that could have been elected in Alberta.

The government since it was elected has given the province sound management. It has saved a good deal of money for the people of Alberta. It has collected taxes well. It has increased the revenue of the province. For example, the oil returns of the province have increased $732,000 a year. The revenue from automobile licences has increased $760,000. The income from petroleum and natural gas rentals and royalties has increased $786,000. Liquor sales have yielded $930,000 more. There have been great savings to taxpayers on the insurance of government cars and government buildings, the total savings in three years being $111,104.74. They have organized a central purchasing board through which all the purchases of the government are made. Through that central purchasing board they hope to be able to save $400,000 a year. Between July 1, 1939, and February, 1940, they saved $260,000. In addition to these considerations, they have paid their interest promptly; they have paid off millions of dollars of the savings certificates which were hanging about their necks like a millstone when the government took office; in a general way they have done a good job of housekeeping in the province, building fine roads, improving the health of the people greatly, encouraging industry, endeavouring to refund the debt of the province, and in every other way that they found available they have managed the province well.

I should like to read a quotation from a letter which I believe will be of interest. The Alberta government from the time they took office tried to refund the debt by every means which was possible to them, but they were unable to have a refund of that debt.

One of the firms with which they were working was the Municipal Bond Company of Los Angeles. Mr. Harold B. Reed, representative of that organization, wrote to Mr. Low, the provincial treasurer, on March 4, 1940, a letter in which appeared these words:

I presume that by this time you and your colleagues are in full swing of the fight to return your government to power and I am convinced that you will make a good account of yourselves. From the situation as I know it, you can be proud of the accomplishments which you have made in the matter of the finances of the province—

I break off there to ask if hon members suppose this man knew what he was talking about. He had access to all the provincial records; he examined with great care the financial position of the province, because he was counting on undertaking, with his associates, the refunding of the Alberta debt of over $160,000,000. It was very likely that he knew what he was talking about; his words, therefore, should carry more than ordinary weight:

—and despite criticisms to the contrary, you have the strength which comes from the knowledge of having done well a difficult job. Even though the debt readjustment may still be a matter of uncompleted business, nevertheless I think it has been conducted in such a manner that it should be relatively easy of final accomplishment once the elections are over and the Rowell report is issued.

Those words carry tremendous weight; they indicate that this man was completely satisfied after his investigation. It may be asked what bearing this has on the passage of this bill. I say it has important bearing, because it indicates the sort of men who are in charge of the affairs of Alberta, who have asked this government to give them a bank with which they can proceed with the rehabilitation of the province according to the principles in which they believe.

Alberta is in a very difficult position: another reason why this matter should be given consideration. It has a heavy debt. It is a province of primary producers, in the main, and therefore subject to serious fluctuations in the prices of primary products. The tariff incidence is particularly heavy on the three central western provinces, and the freight rate is especially onerous to the people of Alberta. As they say, the freight rates "get them going and coming." Their land settle-ment problem is grave, because land settlement was carried on under the direction of the dominion government. As a result, large numbers of people were allowed to settle in areas that were too dry for settlement, that part of the province which falls within the Palliser triangle. There was a great deal of scattering out of the people, giving the province a heavy administrative task with respect to roads and other social services; Alberta has, for example, to care for ninety thousand miles of road. An extremely difficult situation awaits any government in that province.

All the provinces are in trouble now; everyone realizes that. The Rowell commission was appointed to investigate conditions as between the provinces and the dominion, manifestly because the dominion realized that there existed a grievous problem and a grave situation. The dominion itself is in serious trouble. How we are all going to get out of the trouble no one would even dare forecast at the present time. It behooves us, therefore, to give earnest attention to the proposals of any group of thoughtful, careful people in this dominion. For a good many vears Alberta has been eager to be selfsupporting, to relieve the dominion of the burden and to stand on its own feet. Surely any group of people having that attitude ought to be given all the assistance they can safely be given.

The people of Alberta ask for this bank. Can we in reason deny their request? I believe every one in this house at the present time realizes that there must be a change in our economic system. I believe I have heard more men express that idea in this house in the last week or so than in any previous two years since I have been here. What form is this change to take? We cannot agree on it. Many hon, members do not agree with the people of Alberta; yet I do not think any hon. member would be so reckless as to say that he positively knew the people of Alberta to be wrong. They may be right. If they are right, if they have the right solution, then surely hon. members want to know it. If they have not the solution, then I am sure all hon, members wish to give them every opportunity to go forward and prove to them-selves that they have not. Then they will be satisfied, and so will the rest of the people of Canada.

The proposed bank is safe. All the rules and restrictions which apply to the conduct of the ordinary bank will apply to the proposed bank for Alberta. Thus all the guarantees will be there to safeguard the deposits of the people; all the guarantees will be there to safeguard the people of the dominion against inflation and other abuses to which banks might be addicted. The bank is to be publicly owned. The shareholders are to be the people of Alberta, through their government; the directors are the members of the cabinet of that province as it may be constituted at any given moment. Therefore it is an ideal publicly owned bank. It is not to go beyond Alberta in its operations; therefore it is strictly an Alberta bank. Anything that happens to it or because of it will affect the people of Alberta and nobody else, at least

Mr. MARTIN: How will it compare with the Ontario savings scheme?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think it would be better to have that discussion in the committee, where we shall be prepared to answer all questions. I am afraid we would take up

Inflation will be rendered impossible because of the fact that there are abundant goods in Alberta, it being one of the richest provinces

too much time if we carried on that discussion in the dominion. The currency issue possible is strictly limited by the banking laws of Canada, which also strictly limit the credit issue. Some may be afraid that Alberta will borrow from the bank. The province is going without borrowing and is committed to the policy of refraining from increasing the provincial debt. Therefore I think I can safely say that the government of Alberta will not try to borrow from this bank. I repeat that the credit issue is limited, so there can be no possibility of inflation.

Finally, the bank is to exist only until 1944. Surely no serious damage can be done, either to the people of Alberta or to the people of the dominion, in such a short time. Some may feel that probably serious damage could be done; but let us bear in mind that the people of Alberta are alive and alert. They exercise influence on their government, just as do the people in any other province of this dominion. It is a foregone conclusion that they are not going to tolerate any foolish behaviour on the part of their government, no matter what that government may be. Anyone who has been in Alberta will know that, and of course anyone who has not been there will not know it.

Some may object to public funds being used for the $500,000. But let me recall the fact that the present provincial administration in Alberta has saved the province $500,000 over and over again. Therefore there need be no anxiety on the part of anybody in Alberta because of the fact that his money is going to be used for that $500,000.

In Alberta there is a central purchasing agency which, as I said a few moments ago, is saving $400,000 a year. At the rate it was going in February it undoubtedly will do that. That alone will supply the money which is to be used from the public fund. A moment ago I mentioned the great savings effected from liquor management.

Another aspect of the matter worthy of our attention is that the people of Alberta need banking facilities. The number of banks in the western provinces which have closed in the last few years would, I believe, surprise hon. members. Between December 31, 1929, and July 31, 1935, there were ninety-two bank branches closed in Alberta.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Banks or branches?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Bank branches. Manitoba forty-nine were closed, and in Saskatchewan, 160. Between December 31, 1929, and December 31, 1939, there were closed in Alberta 130 branch banks; in Manitoba, seventy-five, and in Saskatchewan 222.

Let us remember that people need banking facilities. If our present chartered banks are unable to give the facilities so vital to the economic welfare of our people, surely some government agency, somewhere, must take steps to deal with that situation. Alberta has taken such steps. In order to provide banking facilities, the Alberta government has established treasury branches which, to a surprising degree, have been successful. They have decreased unemployment and increased business. The Alberta government bank is designed to aid the treasury branches in accomplishing their good work.

There is a further matter bearing on an Alberta bank which I suggest is worthy of the attention of the house. In 1938 the Hon. Charles A. Dunning rose in his place in the house and in the hearing of many hon. members now present offered to give Alberta a bank. Hon. members will find his offer at page 1861 of Hansard for March 30, 1938.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think it would be well for me to take the time of the house to read it; but it is there for anyone to read. In effect he said that if we would follow the rules contained in the banking laws of Canada, we could establish a bank in Alberta, and that he would gladly help to give us a charter. The proposed bank does follow the rules—every one of them.

Another matter of importance is this: The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised he would keep his hands off Alberta. I believe when he made the promise he intended to keep it. This is one instance in which he can give Alberta somewhat of a free rein. The Conservative party, under the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, were favourably disposed towards Alberta. On several occasions that great statesman signified his sympathy for Alberta, and did what he could to assist her. For a long time in Canada the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have advocated a publicly owned bank. Under those circumstances I would expect this bank to commend itself to them.

So that in the discussion of this bill we shall not have to use all the time allotted to the discussion of private bills, may I say in closing that all the details any member may wish to have can be obtained before the banking and commerce committee, to which this bill should be referred. Before that committee we shall have responsible ministers of the crown from Alberta who will be ready to answer any questions any hon. member may wish to ask, and who will be prepared completely to satisfy whosoever may desire to go into that committee. That is the type of committee to which this house sends difficult tasks for careful consideration.

Inasmuch as there are on the order paper other bills awaiting discussion, and as there is not a great deal of time for the consideration of private bills, I shall close my observations by asking that hon. members permit this bill to be turned over to the banking and commerce committee for careful examination and consideration.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the observations of my hon. friend, and I should like immediately to deal with what he has mentioned last, namely, his reference to what was said by my predecessor in office, the Hon. Mr. Dunning. From what Mr. Dunning said on that occasion I shall read two extracts, the first of which is as follows:

I suggest that in all seriousness, and I shall do the best I can to facilitate the formation of such an institution, within the four corners of this Canadian bank act.

The second extract is as follows:

True, they will have to come to this parliament for a charter, and I shall tell them here and now that if the social crediters of Alberta comply with that statute with which all other Canadian chartered banks have had to comply, and with which they must comply to-day, I for one shall be pleased to do all I can to facilitate the passage through this house of a bill granting a charter to a social credit chartered bank.

I am afraid that in the measure before the house the hon. member has not brought himself within the terms of the assurance given at that time by the Hon. Mr. Dunning. It does not come "within the four corners" of the Bank Act, nor does it "comply with that statute." I do not wish to take the time of the house at any length, because I propose to indicate that the government feels that at this time this bill should not have second reading, but it would be prepared to propose, in amendment, that the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce, for consideration and report.

The outstanding feature of the bill—and I may say there are several unusual features in it—is that, entirely at variance with the provisions of the Bank Act, which provides for the election of directors by the shareholders, and the consequent election of a president, it purports in effect to make this parliament the rubber stamp of the premier for the time being of Alberta, in this way, that parliament shall now state, if the measure receives support in the other place, that, "The members of the executive council referred to in section 1 of this act, shall be the directors of the bank." The members of the executive council are of course chosen by the lieutenantgovernor on the advice of the premier.

Section 1 reads:

Those persons who are for the time being members of the executive council of the province of Alberta are incorporated under the name of "The Alberta Provincial Bank" hereinafter called "the bank".

May I point out that this section does not come within the terms of the Bank Act. The Bank Act provides for individuals, whose names are placed before parliament as incorporators and whose responsibilities and banking experience can be ascertained, being incorporated after due examination by the house and by the committee. This bill provides, in effect, that at the will of the premier of Alberta, no matter who that may be, those whom he recommends to the lieutenant-governor as members of his executive council, automatically are to be the incorporators and shareholders of this bank. This is a considerable departure from the provisions of the Bank Act. Without being facetious at all, one might just as well consider the incorporation here and now of the board of trustees of any church or the committee of any club or the officers of any society, who may for the time being happen to be in office, as the incorporators and directors of a bank, and these directors would change automatically whenever the trustees, or committee men or officers change. I am quite satisfied that the house will realize that there is at least grave doubt as to whether that procedure is the procedure called for and contemplated by the provisions of the Bank Act.

It seems to me that that is the outstanding feature of this bill and the one which ought to be considered carefully before the bill is given second reading. It is an anomaly, it is unusual, it is unique in the history of banking legislation to have parliament place its seal of approval upon a body of men as organizers, incorporators and operators of a bank, simply because they happen for the time being to be holding a particular office, no matter how high that office may be. It seems to me that that feature should be enough to indicate to the house why this bill should not be given second reading at this time, but that the subject matter should be carefully examined by the banking and commerce committee.

As hon, members will have noticed, section 7 of the bill indicates quite clearly that this bank is not to be a bank "within the four corners" of the Bank Act, to use Mr. Dunning's words, but is to be a bank in respect of which a great many of the sections of the Bank Act are not to apply. Without dealing at any length with these exceptions, may I just mention one or two. Section 14, from which this bank is to be excepted, prohibits the issue of bank notes until the approval of the treasury board has been obtained. That section is out. Section 15 requires that a certificate shall be procured from the treasury board with regard to the amounts to be paid in with regard to the incorporation and organization of the bank and the list of unpaid liabilities. This section also provides that the treasury board certificate is not to be granted unless the treasury board is satisfied that the requirements of the Bank Act and of the special act of incorporation with regard to the organization and incorporation have been complied with, and that the expenses of incorporation and organization are reasonable. This section also is not to apply.

Section 16 provides that if the treasury board certificate is not granted within one year, all the powers of the bank shall cease. It is provided by this bill that these sections are not to apply to the bank which it is proposed to incorporate. Section 20 of the Bank Act sets out the minimum qualifications of a director. A director must be the sole owner in his own right of shares of the bank on which $3,000 has been paid up, when the paidup capital of the bank is one million dollars or less. He must be the sole owner of shares of the bank on which $4,000 has been paid, when the paid-up capital of the bank is over one million and does not exceed three million dollars. A director must have stock to the value of $5,000, when the paid-up capital stock of the bank exceeds three million dollars. That section is not to apply to the proposed bank. Section 23 of the Bank Act reads:

The directors, as soon as may be after their election, shall proceed to elect, by ballot, from their number a president and one or more vice-presidents.

The directors may also elect by ballot one of their number to be chairman of the board and one to be honorary president.

But that section is not to apply to this bank. Instead of that this bill provides that the lieutenant-governor in council may appoint one of the directors the president and another the vice-president of the board of directors of the bank. He may also fix the quorum of directors for the purpose of a directors' meeting. I do not think I need trouble the house at greater length with regard to the other provisions of the Bank Act which are excluded in their application to this particular bill. I know my hon, friend will not regard me as treating this matter lightly if I do not go exhaustively into the details of the bill now, but I do submit that because of the first feature I have mentioned, namely, the proposal that we shall here and now incorporate whoever happens to be selected from time to time by the premier of Alberta for the lieutenant-governor as his executive council to be the directors of this bank, and that the lieutenant-governor in council is to be given the power to elect the president and other officers of the bank, this matter is one which ought to be considered seriously by the banking and commerce committee.

We are not asking the house at this stage to refuse further consideration in connection with the bill, but rather asking to have the subject matter of the bill discussed before the appropriate committee. May I point out that several rather grave constitutional questions are involved. There is the question whether the dominion parliament can make a banker out of the lieutenant-governor in council of the province. That I submit is a serious question. There is also the question whether parliament can compel the lieutenantgovernor in council to undertake the business of banking, which is what is proposed to be done here. For these and other reasons which I could give. I trust that the hon, member will accept the amendment which I propose to move. I move:

That the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce for consideration and report.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say about the amendment and the motion now before the house. I am not going to oppose the amendment, but I suggest to the minister that his course is not a courageous one. Either there is a need for this bank, or there is no need. There is a principle involved that should receive the consideration of the government and this bill should go through the house or it should not go through. I shall not make any observations at this time as to the contents of the measure beyond saying that if you eliminate the provisions of twenty or twenty-five sections of the Bank Act from this charter, you are not going to have a bank, you are simply going to have a department of the provincial government of Alberta. I think the minister should have discussed the principle involved in this measure rather than have it go to the banking and commerce committee where it may be buried in oblivion and never return to this house. That is likely to be the fate of this bill.

The government, through the minister, should have a policy with respect to applications for bank charters, whether made by the province of Alberta or by any other group of individuals. I well remember when my friend, the late Hon. J. A. Robb, was Minister of Finance and an application was made by a group of gentlemen from my own province for a charter for a bank to be called the Eastern Bank of Canada. The very first consideration which, if I remember correctly, Mr. Robb took into account in connection with that application was the question of the necessity for a new bank in eastern Canada. He questioned very closely, not the bona fides of the applicants, but the necessity for establishing a new banking institution down there having regard to the services that were being performed by the old-established chartered banks in that part of the country. I think he would have refused the application if I had not made a personal appeal to him myself on behalf of the incorporators, who were not particularly friendly to me, by the way, on the ground, first, that they believed there was the necessity for a new chartered bank and, second, that they were quite capable of underwriting the whole initial $500,000, or whatever the initial paid-up capital was to be. On that basis the charter was granted, but it never became effective because unfortunately the chief promoter died quite suddenly and that ended the scheme.

With regard to this bill I have no objection, as I said at the opening of my remarks, to having it referred to the banking and commerce committee, but I warn my hon. friends to the left that it will be the burying place for this bill. We can see requiescat in pace written on it right now—R.I.P.—it will never emerge from that committee, and certainly it never should in its present form. I will say that, and I will content myself with that.

Mr. G. H. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, since I represent an Alberta constituency and feel strongly that it would not be in the interest of Alberta to pass this bill, I think I should set forth some of my reasons for opposing it.

In the first place I challenge the statement of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), the leader of the Social Credit group, that such a bill as this had the approval of the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning.

The object of this bill is to create a bank. The capital stock of the projected bank is to be issued to and vested in the provincial treasurer of Alberta in his official capacity, and shall be held by him and his successors in office on behalf and for the use of the province. The directors are to be those persons who are, for the time being, members of the executive council of Alberta. Therefore the charter is being applied for by the corporate body known as the province of Alberta. It is to be a provincial bank pure and simple. The stock is to be owned by the bank and the directors are to be members of the executive council of the province. Mr. Dunning never offered in this house to assist in the creation of a bank owned and operated by a corporate body known as the province of Alberta. What he did was to offer to assist a group of Social Crediters should they wish to incorporate a bank and comply with the provisions of the Bank Act. Let me read his words, from Hansard of 1938, page 1861:

My suggestion is that inasmuch as the Social Credit movement boasts considerable strength in one province of the dominion, and from that point of view at least, the provincial point of view, is a movement of major dimensions, those who believe——that the banking system can be employed to put into effect the Social Credit theory and that the banking system has unlimited privileges such as have been outlined by my hon. friends, have within the four corners of the Canadian Bank Act the opportunity of their lives. All they have to do is, of themselves—

Mark these words:

Not the province, but the Social Crediters who wish to put their theories into effect.

—to form one of these institutions which we call a Canadian chartered bank. The procedure is all set out in the law. True, they will have to come to this parliament for a charter, and I shall tell them here and now that if the Social Crediters of Alberta—

Not the corporate province of Alberta, but the Social Crediters.

—comply with that statute with which all other Canadian banks have to comply and with which they must comply to-day, I for one shall be pleased to do all I can to facilitate the passage through this house of a bill granting a charter to a Social Credit chartered bank. In that way my hon. friends would have, under their own control, all of the privileges, and it is my duty to point out also that they would have all the responsibilities of a Canadian chartered bank.

Later on he says, at page 1862:

Any group of citizens in Canada may come together for the purposes outlined in the Bank Act of Canada.

Any group of citizens, not a corporation.

I am suggesting to my hon. friends that they are a group of citizens in Canada; that those in Alberta who adhere to their theories are citizens of Canada, and that as citizens of Canada believing in the Social Credit doctrine they can see to it that only those who believe in that doctrine may have any control or say in the chartered bank they may form.

So that it was an offer made not to a corporate body, the province, but to a group of Social Crediters of the province; and I have no doubt that if a group of Social Crediters applied to-day for a bank charter, complied with the provisions of the Bank Act and put up their own money, the application would receive the sympathetic consideration of the house. But to-day these men want to put their hands into the treasury of Alberta and use the money of the province to finance and carry on this institution. Mr. Dunning never offered to assist any such proposition.

Banking differs from other businesses in that bankers handle money for other people on a very large scale. As the money is being handled for others on a very large scale, an additional duty is imposed upon this house when an application comes before it, to see to it that the persons who are to be entrusted with the handling of the money are persons who are qualified and who will probably make a success of banking. In the past successful public enterprises of this type have been organized quite differently. A separate corporation would be set up with a board of directors who were familiar with the business to be transacted by the corporation. The directors would be selected because of their sound business judgment and because they would be likely to make a success of the business to be undertaken. They were usually appointed for fixed periods and were subject to supervision by the government that granted them incorporation. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and other successful corporations were organized in that wav.

But in the proposal before us the experience of ages is cast to the winds. The directors of the proposed bank are to be those persons who are for the time being members of the executive council of Alberta. Even the president is to be chosen from among them. None of them is a banker, and none has had any experience or training in business that would qualify him to be a director or manager of such an institution. There is no provision for continuity of policy or management. The government may change two or three times in the course of a year. If it does, the board of directors of this bank changes two or three times in the course of a year. Each board will have its own ideas as to how a bank should be run. Much experimenting will be done with the depositors' money. Hardearned savings will be frittered away in carrying out foolish experiments. Are we going to be parties to such recklessness? Furthermore, they do not want to apply to this bank section 30 of the Bank Act which provides for the removal of directors for maladministration or other just cause.

Let us examine a little more closely the record of the first directors of this projected bank. Their past record should be of assistance in determining whether they are fit and proper persons to manage such an institution.

To secure election in 1935, Mr. Aberhart, the present premier of the province, promised a dividend of $25 a month to each and every adult in Alberta. He also promised interest-free production loans of $1,500 to each producer. Some of the people were bold enough to inquire of him where he was going to get the money to operate this bank and where he proposed to get the money to make these loans. He told them in all sincerity that he was going to do it with a fountain pen and entries in books which he would keep for this purpose. All he asked was eighteen months time within which, presumably, to train the fountain pen.

After their election the first step towards reaching their goal was to indulge in a covenant-signing crusade. The covenant signers were asked to turn over each year one-half of their crops to the government to help pay for this $25 a month dividend.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Where does the hon. gentleman expect to go when he dies?

An hon. MEMBER: Alberta.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Several signed the covenant, but rumour has it that they first transferred their property to their wives. Then they took good care to see that their wives did not sign. The covenant-signing campaign collapsed after costing the province $10,000. By this time the farmers of Alberta had begun to realize that dividends did not depend on fountain pens and book entries but that they had something to do with the farmers' crops.

Then came a prosperity certificate proposal, a certificate intended to take the place of money, a scheme devised to get credit into the hands of the consumers. They managed to get rid of much of this spurious money among the public. It is to be noted, however, that none of the members of the government had sufficient faith in the scheme to accept any part of their pay in this spurious money; they required when they were paid to be paid in the coin of the realm. After thousands of dollars were spent on prosperity certificates, the scheme was dropped.

The Aberhart government then imported two experts from England: Powell at $12 a day and a bonus of $4,000; the other expert, Byrne, was given a ten-year contract at $6,000 a year. These men conceived it to be their duty to make a frontal attack on the banks. The idea was to control the banks by placing them under the domination of a social credit board, the members of whom knew nothing whatever about banking. They ignored the fact that banks come under federal jurisdiction. The necessary legislation was enacted by the province of Alberta, but it was duly vetoed by the dominion government.

Having failed in their attack on the banks, they opened up a number of treasury branches throughout the province. At last they visioned their utopia where the fountain pen would play its full part. These treasury houses are still being extended from time to time. The more houses they open, the more money they lose. Already they have cost the province more than a million dollars.

Mr. Aberhart and the other members of the executive council have for years been proclaiming that banking is a racket, that credit can be extended indefinitely by making book-keeping entries with a fountain pen, and that the issue of unlimited credit is the key to prosperity. His government have defaulted in $12,000,000 of Alberta bonds and $6,000,000 of provincial savings certificates. They have arbitrarily repudiated one-half of the interest rate payable on Alberta's debts. And these defaults and repudiations were not dictated by necessity; they were done deliberately and gloried in as representing real statesmanship.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) in the course of his remarks complained that many branches of banks throughout Alberta were being closed. Can any one wonder at the banks closing their branches under such circumstances?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Did he notice that far more banks closed in Alberta before the Social Credit government went into power than closed afterwards?

Mr. JAQUES: And what about Saskatchewan?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The interest cut was held illegal by the judicial committee of the privy council, but the government is now defying the courts by hiding behind the immunity which a government enjoys of not being suable without its consent.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT
OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): This afternoon, just before the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) took his seat he made a plea to hon. members in this corner to restrict their discussion of this budget. I would suggest that the leader of the opposition would have been in a better position to make that appeal if he had lived up to it himself and if the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) had already done so. I make that statement because the leader of the opposition and the hon, member for Danforth have monopolized in their discussion of this motion over five hours of the time of the house. Therefore it is hardly being logical or consistent to ask us at this time to limit our contributions to the debate.

In discussing the budget it is necessary to keep in mind that it is a war budget, and that in time of war the major objective becomes that of winning the war and defeating the enemy. All the resources of the nation must be organized to that end. This means that great sacrifices will have to be endured. It therefore behooves the government to see to it that those sacrifices are imposed upon the people in the most equitable way possible. It is absolutely essential that during the war we maintain a high morale among the people in order to build up the will to win. Such a spirit is usually built up over a number of years. It is not usually prevalent among a people that have been ground down by poverty, misery and want, unless it can be shown that that condition exists as a result of the nation being deprived of a fair share of the resources of the earth. In such case of course the people will be willing to fight to change that condition.

But that is not the position of Canada. We have almost unlimited resources. In spite of that we have had a great deal of poverty, misery and unemployment in this country during the past ten years. Can a people who have been in this unhappy plight be enthusiastic about fighting for a continuation of such a condition? Unfortunately that is the only course which has been or is presenting itself to many people since the declaration of war. Despite this handicap, a high morale and a fine esprit de corps would prevail among the Canadian people if there were strong leadership; but unfortunately that has been sorely lacking in Canada during the past six years. If under strong leadership immediate evidence were forthcoming that we were putting forth our maximum effort and at the same time insisting upon the greatest equality of service and sacrifice, I believe that confidence could quickly be restored in this nation. Would anyone in this house be so foolhardy as to suggest that either of these things has been accomplished during the past ten months, or since the declaration of war? Ten months after the declaration of war we still have men in Canada pleading for the opportunity to make some contribution in Industry is fighting to obtain this war. orders. Now by this budget we are given to believe that all this is to be changed. For instance at page 1014 of Hansard we find this statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston):

Financial provision can be made and will be made for whatever it is physically possible for us to produce or to procure in the way of war services, supplies and materials. The limits of our effort are not fiscal; if there are any such limits they are physical, mental and moral—by that I mean the physical limits of our resources and the mental and moral capacity of Canadians to bear burdens and make sacrifices.

I would congratulate the Minister of Finance upon that statement. But it is comical to find that statement appearing in the budget speech. For the past five years we have advocated that principle in this house, and have always been ridiculed for stating, as we have on various occasions, that anything that is physically possible and desirable can be made financially possible. Last year in the banking and commerce committee the governor of the Bank of Canada stated that that was true, and now we find it stated in the budget speech. We have referred to the fact time and again in this house; we have pointed out that it has been physically possible during the past six years to increase greatly the production of this country, to establish a higher standard of living so that people would not have to go on relief. No one would dispute that. The governor of the Bank of Canada agrees that what is physically possible and desirable is financially possible. Therefore the only conclusion we can come to is this. that since it was physically possible to make a higher standard of living available to the people of Canada, and since it was financially possible, the only possible reason the government had for not doing it was that they did not consider it desirable.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has always been fond of expounding fine principles in this house. Unfortunately he has failed miserably in putting them into effect. I am not surprised that the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) stated this afternoon that she did not believe various statements that were made by this government. How could anybody believe that the various policies that they enunciate today will be put into effect, in view of the stand this government has taken time and again in the past? Have the people of Canada forgotten the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1935 that currency and credit would be made available in terms of public need to meet the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people? Would any hon. member dare to say that that promise has been carried out? Have we forgotten the policy propounded by the Prime Minister at the outbreak of the war, and again on May 20, when he made this statement as recorded on page 46 of Hansard:

The unprecedented threat to the allied powers and ourselves must be met at once by immediate action. Production must be accelerated to its limit. Training must be intensified.

Does anyone suggest that that has been carried out during the past ten months? Can it be said that production has been accelerated to the maximum, while we still have thousands of men in Canada pleading for a chance to take part in the country's war effort? During the past five or six years, while Germany has been busily engaged in amassing war materials and thereby reaching a strong war footing, we have been busily engaged in amassing credit and gaining a so-called strong financial position. While Germany said in effect, "To hell with money" and spent itself into a strong warlike machine, we have been busily worshipping at the shrine of money and saving ourselves into a state of insecurity. I say that because wars are not fought with money, they are fought with men and materials. Germany had the materials by September of last year, and we apparently had the credit. But credit is merely faith in our ability to deliver goods and services as, when and where required, and unless goods can be delivered when required, that faith is destroyed. I wonder how long the people of this nation will continue to have faith in a system which for the past five years has wrecked the lives and health of thousands upon thousands of the people of this country, and in the past few months has seen nation after nation destroyed under the iron heel of fascism.

In peace time we have urged that production should be maintained at its maximum, or at least at a level sufficiently high to provide to the people of Canada a decent standard of living. We have repeatedly presented the physical picture, showing that industry was only producing at less than fifty per cent of its capacity. We have pointed out that this dominion has great natural resources barely touched, large reserves of energy and a large surplus of unused labour in the form of the unemployed, and in addition a large favourable balance of payments, a position of which we might well be proud but for the fact that on the other side we had a million or so people on the verge of starvation and destitution. And repeatedly we have asked in this house this question: Why should we not put the unemployed to work in the industries that are working only part time, and thereby produce the goods of which the people are so greatly in need? We always failed to get a reply to that question. Many hon, members have risen in their places and tried to place the blame upon industry. They have stated that industry should have had more confidence: that industry should have expanded and employed the surplus labour. I would point out that you cannot blame industry. If industry was not able to sell its restricted production, how could it possibly have sold its production if it had expanded?

We have stressed the reason for this condition, and it is necessary that we should understand it at this time in discussing the budget. We have contended that this condition is due to the fact that industry is not self-liquidating; that industry, owing to certain practices that are inherent within the system, does not create an effective demand for its own production except in times of abnormal capital goods production, and during the past ten years capital goods production has been sorely lacking. We have stressed the fact that if the Canadian people are going to be put in a position where they can buy the production of the country-and I think the house would agree that the only point in having production is in order that you may have the consumption of it—then we must maintain a certain definite relationship between the production of capital goods and the production of consumption goods. relationship is this: You must have at all times a sufficient volume of capital goods production so that the salaries, wages and dividends paid out in that production will be at least equal to the deficiency of purchasing power which exists as between the total prices of consumer goods and the monetary demand against them. If that equilibrium is not maintained, it will mean there will not be an effective demand against the production of the country. Production will become restricted; unemployment will increase and you will find yourselves in the vicious circle of deflation. We therefore contend that it is necessary for the government to take such steps as may be necessary to maintain that equilibrium by instituting national projects such as road building, reforestation, slum clearance, the elimination of level crossings and so forth.

On the other hand, in time of war we have an entirely different situation. The production of armaments means an increased production of capital goods. In turn, that means an increased demand against consumption goods. So long as we can increase production to satisfy the demand for war purposes and at the same time satisfy the demand for consumption goods, there can be no justification for increased taxation. It is only after the maximum capacity has been reached that it will be necessary to increase taxation. Otherwise excessive taxation is bound to result in an actual retarding of production. If there should be in Canada certain commodities of which there is a scarcity, for instance such commodities as are paid for by foreign exchange, and it should be desirable and necessary to reduce the demand against those commodities, I maintain that the only sound way to do that is by rationing rather than by attempting to reduce the purchasing power of the people by a heavy increase in taxation, because, when you reduce the purchasing power of the people by wholesale taxation, as exemplified in this budget, you are going to retard and so restrict the demand against the commodities of which we have a surplus. In the near future we shall probably have a great deal of trouble in selling our primary products, because we have lost a number of our markets in Europe. What is going to be the result of this budget? It will further increase that problem and further restrict the demand against commodities of which we have actually surpluses in this country at the present time. This is called a war budget. Certainly it is not a patriotic budget, because it is going to retard our productive capacity; it is going to restrict the demand against goods of which we have a surplus, and therefore make it so much harder to expand our production.

During the past five years I have pointed out that our production has been restricted ever since the Liberal party came into power in 1935. I have pointed out how the Minister of Finance, instead of following the policy laid down by the Prime Minister in 1935—that is, that currency and credit would be made available in terms of public need to meet the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people—has been attempting to reduce the expenditure by the government to the amount procurable from the pockets of the Canadian people. The result has been the restriction of production in the face of actual, physical want. Whilst Germany was busily expanding her production to the maximum, the minister's deflationary policy kept thousands of people in Canada idle, although we could have very well utilized the services of those people to build up our defences and increase the production of commodities so that the demand created by the money paid out for the strengthening of our defences would have been satisfied by the goods produced by industry.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that those people in this country, in England and in France, who have been guilty of this financial policy of restriction in the face of the great armament production that was going on in Germany, have been more guilty of treachery to these nations than many people who have been actually paid servants of Hitler. There is no question of it. I think we all realize to-day that Germany has gained her successes not by superiority of man-power but through treachery in various forms among the allies. Not the least of those acts of treachery were those policies imposed upon the allied nations under which it has been impossible to expand our production to the extent to which it should have been expanded. We had idle men; we refused them the right to work, while Germany was making every man work to the maximum in building up the greatest war machine the world has ever known. What was the situation here? We had half a million men unemployed. Am I not justified in calling that the greatest act of sabotage Canada has experienced? Those men who have been responsible for our financial policy during the past six years are the grand saboteurs of this country. The other day the hon, member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) said we should hang people guilty of treachery. I said then, and I say now, that we should make sure we hang the right people.

On the other hand it is interesting to note how Germany, a country that was destitute and without capital in 1932, has been able to build up one of the greatest war machines this world has ever seen.

Mr. MARTIN: And at what expense to the people!

Mr. QUELCH: I am going to deal with that.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not mean financial expense.

Mr. QUELCH: I was in England two years ago, during the crisis of that time, and I met a friend of mine who had just come back from a six weeks' tour of Germany. That was not a Cook's tour; he and his friends took a car and travelled through the country. He said generally speaking they found contentment in Germany. That was in 1938; since then there has been a big change. The standard of living has been reduced very considerably, and I am going to explain why. When I am dealing with the financial policy of Germany, however, I hope no hon. member will think it necessary to rise in his place and ask me if I am advocating fascism or nazism. Our policy is the very essence of nazism. Nazism believes in centralization of power; we believe in the decentralization of power. Nazism believes in the greatest possible regimentation; we believe in the greatest possible freedom. But I would ask this: Just because Germany uses tanks, would it make us nazis if we used tanks also? Just because Germany uses dive bombers, are we nazis if we use them also? When the Prime Minister asks this parliament to grant him dictatorial powers, does that make him a Hitler? Because we have conscription and Germany has conscription, does that make us nazis. Therefore, if Germany has had a sane monetary system in the past few years, I am not advocating nazism, I am sure, if I advocate that we should have adopted a similar financial policy.

I am going to quote from a speech made by Doctor Schacht formerly president of the Reichsbank. This speech was made on November 29, 1938, to the Deutsche Akademie. It was entitled "The Financial Miracle," and from it I quote the following:

The public finances of Germany were in a hopeless state in 1932. Every increase in tax rates only caused a decline in revenues.

And I would especially refer that statement to the Minister of Finance. Doctor Schacht continues:

Those symptoms of economic collapse were of necessity reflected in an unexampled social distress. A shocking proof of this are the statistics of unemployment, which in the winter 1932-33 exceeded the six million mark and which together with the invisible unemployed amounted to about seven million.

That is the condition which existed in Germany in 1932. In the article Doctor Schacht points out that Hitler called him and told him he wanted to put into operation a financial system which would make it possible for Germany to expand her production to the maximum. Then he goes on:

All government assistance was from the very beginning used to bring about a rise in production, first in a so-called work creation programme through credit assistance for reconditioning, repairs and similar things, and afterwards through the great armament programme which was steadily expanded. The extent of this programme and of the autohighway construction which was undertaken soon made it clear that these two tasks alone would be sufficient to overcome the existing unemployment, so that the other work creation measures soon became superfluous.

Naturally this work creation and armament programme could only be set under way by the state and could only be carried out by financing on a large scale. No capital at all was available for this financing. In fact money creation had to be believed along.

creation had to be helped along.

The fact that the newly created money would be covered by newly created goods was not the only point; the type of goods also had to be considered. Simply expressed, the problem was as follows: The credit money, made available for the armament programme, produced a demand for consumption goods, in so far as it was paid out in the form of wages and salaries. However the armament manufacturers deliver military goods which are indeed produced but not consumed. This leads to two conclusions: First, care must be taken that in addition to armament production, a volume of consumption goods is produced which is sufficient for the needs of the population, including all those working for rearmament and, second, the less consumed, the more workers can be allotted to armaments.

The point I bring particularly to the attention of hon. members is that they did not reach maximum production until 1938. Up to 1938 they were expanding their production of war material and consumption goods. Therefore at that time they were able to put forward the maximum war effort, and at the same time maintain a comparatively high standard of living. Then he goes on to say:

Spring 1938 brought a change in our finance policy, because at that time German economy had reached a stage of full employment. As soon as an economy has made use of all available labour and materials, any further credit expansion is not only senseless, but actually harmful. For then newly created money can no longer effect a further increase in goods for the available labour and raw materials; and such a competition must necessarily lead to an increase in prices and wages.

Mr. MARTIN: They ultimately disagreed,

Mr. QUELCH: At least we can judge by results in Germany.

Mr. MARTIN: But Doctor Schacht ultimately disagreed.

Mr. QUELCH: No, I do not think he did. He was placed in a position of even greater importance than the one he held at that time. As a matter of fact, he was promoted because of work well done.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon, member must mean subordinated. It is not correct to say that he was promoted; Doctor Schacht was actually demoted. He was taken out of control.

Mr. QUELCH: He was placed in control of foreign exchange affecting Germany, Italy and Japan. Surely that is an important posi-

If our production were geared up to its maximum capacity, then it would be necessary to increase taxation. But such is not the case to-day. Our production can be greatly expanded, and to-day we are faced with the difficulty of disposing of a great many of our primary products. To expand taxation at this time is bound to mean a restriction in demand against production of primary products. We have lost a number of our markets, and by this form of wholesale taxation, as suggested in the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, we are just adding to the difficulty of making a distribution of our primary products among our people.

Again I say that if there are certain commodities in Canada which are considered to be scarce, which have to be purchased with foreign exchange, then surely the logical thing to do is to ration those commodities so as to make sure of a fair distribution, rather than cut down the income of all people, and thereby reduce the demand against those commodities which can be produced in abundance. Therefore I say it is not a patriotic budget, but rather one which will actually retard production at a time when we should be expanding production to its maximum.

With these thoughts in mind I move the following amendment to the amendment:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"Furthermore this house is of the opinion "Furthermore this house is of the opinion that there should have been no increased tax burden placed upon the consumer until Canada attain maximum production of desired commodities or full employment by issuing through the Bank of Canada, currency and credit in terms of actual public need."

I hope the Prime Minister will not take the same attitude to this amendment as to the one moved a few days ago. This amendment I would point out is different. It refers to taxation and production. May I quote at this time what the Prime Minister said only a few days ago respecting the Bank of Canada:

Those who are voting for this amendment are voting to give the government power to relieve itself of all responsibility of financing Canada's war effort simply by passing an order which will enable it to transfer that whole responsi-bility to the Bank of Canada, an institution which has its home in this city.

And again:

We shall be ridding ourselves of all responsibility for what is required in the way of finance to carry on Canada's war effort, and we shall be turning it over to a single institution which is located on Wellington street not far from these houses of parliament.

How many would agree with that definition of the Bank of Canada? Do we recall the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1935 respecting the need for a Bank of Canada, in order to control currency and credit in terms of public need? To those who remember that statement, what must they think of the definition I have just read? When I heard the Prime Minister's statement the other day I was amazed. As a matter of fact I believe I might say I was thoroughly sickened to think that a prime minister of this country when speaking to the members of the House of Commons could be guilty of such puerile nugacity.

Perhaps hon, members recall what was said last year by the former Minister of Finance about the Bank of Canada. Last year he stated that parliament, through the instruments it had created, now effectively controlled currency and credit, day by day, week by week, month by month; furthermore he stated these instruments were the Bank of Canada and its directors, and that this parliament through the Bank of Canada controlled currency and credit. Yet the Prime Minister states that the Bank of Canada is an institution on Wellington street, and that if we place responsibility of finance in the hands of that institution, we would be evading all responsibility. Yet, I repeat, according to the former Minister of Finance, we control currency and credit through that institution. Undoubtedly we have a definite responsibility for the activities of that institution. Perhaps I might be allowed to quote a few words from a speech made by the Prime Minister on August 2, 1935. He said:

Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. To regain for the nation what has been lost and to secure a properly constituted national central bank, will continue to be a first objective of Liberal effort.

He said it was a conspicuous and sacred responsibility to control currency and credit through the Bank of Canada, and yet to-day he says it is an institution on Wellington street and if that institution finances the war, we would be evading all sense of responsibility. I do not think the Prime Minister is doing credit to himself or to this government when he indulges in equivocations of that kind.

The budget shows that large sums will be needed in addition to the amounts to be secured by taxation. They may be secured in three ways: by borrowing the savings of the people; by borrowing from the chartered banks, which means monetary expansion; or by borrowing from the Bank of Canada, which also means monetary expansion. If we are to borrow the savings of the people, it will simply mean that this government takes the stand that we are responsible for providing a safe investment for the people. Although we have what might be called a smoke screen by which we try to convince the people that they are financing the war through their purchases of savings certificates, we all realize that the greatest proportion of bond issues will be purchased by financial corporations rather than by the savings of individuals. When we finance by borrowing the profits of corporations, it merely means that we are placing a levy for all time against the people of Canada in order that a tribute may be paid to a small class of society.

On the other hand, we have the power which we should exercise of issuing what money we need through the Bank of Canada. That is what the people believed was the purpose of the formation of this bank. The Minister of Finance may suggest that if we finance in that way it will mean increasing the amount of cash in the tills of the chartered banks, thereby making it possible for them to increase their loans and thus bring about That charge was made by the former Minister of Finance. I would stress the fact that it would be an easy matter to amend the Bank Act in order to compel the chartered banks to increase their cash reserve requirements, thereby preventing that expan-

If the minister should contend that the banks could not operate on that basis, that there would not be sufficient profit for them, then I say what I have said before on many occasions: We should nationalize our whole banking system. Personally I am in favour of that. When men who are directors of banks and also directors of industry, have the power to expand their loans up to ten times the amount of their cash, it means that we have given them the power to effect the price level to their own advantage. I do not think that is a satisfactory state of affairs. Credit is a national matter, and it should be controlled absolutely by the people, for the use of the people.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot conform to the wishes of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I feel that I must take up some of the time of the house in an endeavour to place before it my opinion of the budget as well as the opinion of the people whom I represent in this parliament. This budget does not impose many new direct taxes, but the poor of this country must still continue to pay the indirect taxes which were in effect, such as the sales tax, as well as the new import duty of ten per cent which is imposed upon the necessities as well as the luxuries of life. I have not much to add to the position taken by this group on the budget. This has been made clear already by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and others.

It is significant to note that although the income tax exemptions are being placed quite low, the wage-earners and farmers of this dominion still come within those exemptions. This indicates quite clearly how low the income of our people actually is. The income of an average wage-earner in Canada is probably little above the exemption for a single man, namely, $750 a year. According to figures I have seen, the average farm income is even less than that, being about $500. These new exemptions will indicate that many of our people are in receipt of incomes much lower than is required for a minimum decent standard of living. My guess is that these exemptions will cover the majority of our people.

As far as the miners of Nova Scotia are concerned, they have already suffered a serious reduction in their standard of living. Their wages have remained stationary since the outbreak of the war, while, according to information which I have received as recently as yesterday, their standard of living has been reduced by about thirty per cent. I am in receipt of a resolution outlining the views of 5,500 organized miners in that section, and they claim that their cost of living has increased approximately thirty per cent while wages have remained stationary. They have lost that amount of purchasing power which, in the final analysis, is really wages.

The budget also proposes a two per cent income tax against wages. During the depressed days from 1929 to about 1934 the coal company in that particular section, which employs practically all of the gainfully employed men, was in the habit, where a man lived in a company house and purchased his coal from the company, of waiving the rent. During a time when the government of this country and many charitable organizations were providing money for the alleviation of distress caused by unemployment and parttime unemployment, coal and rent bills were piling up against these miners. Work has picked up somewhat since 1934, but these large debts had accumulated and they are now being deducted from the envelopes of the men. I assume from the budget speech that the income tax will be based upon the total earnings of these men and no deductions will be allowed for these back payments. This tax will be assessed against the total wage without allowance being made for the payment of a relief bill, as it were, to the coal company.

It is significant to note that while the income tax is quite steep, a man with an income of from $10,000 to $50,000 still has a handsome income left after all taxes have been paid. However, it is with the corporations of the country that I desire to deal particularly this evening. A few days ago there was an editorial in one of the Ottawa papers to the effect that the big industrialists and financiers had forced France into capitulation. In this great hour of trial, democracy must be made to work so that the morale, faith and determination of our people will remain steadfast in the days that lie ahead. For the common people democracy can be made to work effectively only to the extent that they are given an opportunity to solve their problems cooperatively, only to the extent that monopolies and huge corporations are investigated and controlled by government for the public welfare. If this is done, our own people will be given renewed hope and vigour, and the people now under Hitler's heel will be given a living example of democracy at work.

I have already said once in this house that in my opinion and in the opinion of the people of Nova Scotia, that province is largely in the hands of and dependent on the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. But hon. members do not have to take my word for it. In a brief dated March 10, 1934, H. J. Kelly, Vice-President and General Manager of Dosco, stated:

According to the records of the workmen's compensation board, this company and its subsidiaries pay approximately 40 per cent of the total industrial payroll of the province of Nova Scotia in normal times. It is estimated that at least 100,000 people are directly affected by the operations of this company and indirectly the whole population of Nova Scotia is affected.

In company with all the other workers employed in the Dosco mines, I watched the development of the corporation. It received its charter in 1928. In 1930 it took over the properties of the British Empire Steel Corporation and since then it has acquired various other companies and properties. To-day we find that Dosco owns and controls some twenty-six companies. As a result of purchases and financial reorganizations, this monopoly now controls:

Coal mines in Cape Breton county (north and south of Sydney harbour), in Pictou county and in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia.

Iron ore mines, containing about one-sixth of the world's iron ore, at Bell island, Newfoundland.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Steel plants at Sydney and Trenton, Nova Scotia.

Steel car works at Trenton, Nova Scotia. Shipyards, marine railways, et cetera, at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Steel fabricating plants and fence manufacturing and steel wire plants at Walkerville, Ontario.

Wire and nail manufacturing plant in Toronto, Ontario.

Rolling mills and steel wire plant in Montreal, Quebec.

Coal docks at various St. Lawrence ports.

Coal shipping steamers.

Railways in Cape Breton and Cumberland counties, Nova Scotia, and a switching and junction railway at Walkerville, Ontario.

Wire, nail and galvanizing plants in Saint John, New Brunswick.

The only large steam electric power plant in Canada, at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia.

Timber limits in New Brunswick and Quebec. The total assets of Dosco and its subsidiaries at the end of 1939 appear to have been in the neighbourhood of $80,000,000.

All through the years from 1928 to the present, when mines were closed up and families thrown on relief, when the workers were persuaded to accept cuts in wages and had to be satisfied with part-time work, Dosco and its predecessors kept buying up various companies. Thus in 1928 Dominion Steel Corporation bought the Peck Rolling Mills.

In 1930-32 Dosco bought the Canadian Bridge Company, and its subsidiaries, and Canadian Steel Corporation from the United States Steel Corporation.

In 1937 it bought Graham Nail and Wire Products.

In the same year Dominion Coal bought the Cumberland Railway and Coal company from Dosco for $1,000,000. I am a worker and cannot be expected to understand the mysteries of modern legal and financial manipulations, but the workers would like to know why it was necessary for the coal subsidiary to buy a railway and coal company from the parent company.

In 1939 Dosco bought the Sarnia Fence company.

Why were all these purchases made? Who owned these companies formerly? What was their record of earnings and what were the prices paid? It should be remembered that on the board of directors of Dosco are men like Sir Herbert Holt, Mr. G. H. Montgomery, Senator Webster, Mr. J. H. Gundy and Mr. J. A. Kilpatrick, who have their fingers in many industrial and financial pies in this and other countries. I am not saying that Dosco has at any time done anything improper. I do not know. But I do say that we should have more information on these and other transactions. There should be a thorough investigation of the records and history of this monopoly which, according to its own vice-president, affects directly and indirectly the life of all the people of Nova Scotia.

Hon, members may not know that a royal commission investigated part of the situation in 1926. It found many millions of dollars of watered stock in the companies which later became part of Dosco, although it is only fair to say that the Dosco reorganization seems to have squeezed out most or all of the water in the old companies. The same commission also found that the coal company used to sell its coal to sister companies at fire-sale prices, thus reducing the earnings of the coal company and depressing the wages of the miners. According to the report of the Duncan commission in 1932, this improper practice had also been abandoned by that time. The point, however, is that the knowledge that such things were done at one time gives rise to suspicion that other things may have been done since. It is no use indignantly denying it. It is the government's duty to learn the facts and to act on them.

I should like on this question to quote from the Financial Post of March 30, 1935, a statement made by Colonel G. S. Harrington, at that time premier of Nova Scotia. The Financial Post says:

He said that the new issue of $25 par value preferred stock was "pure, unadulterated water," while the market value of the stock had been manipulated so that large fortunes had been made by "some gentlemen in this prevince." province.

"Some gentlemen have made fortunes out of this. It is extraordinarily unfortunate at this time, when labour wants its share in the earnings, that there should be stock manipulation.

I think Colonel Harrington should be an authority on that question because he has taken a great deal of interest in the coal industry in Nova Scotia ever since I have been employed by this company, and I have considerable respect for his judgment in matters of this kind.

In 1938 a royal commission under Mr. Justice Carroll investigated the Acadia Coal company, a subsidiary of Dosco. I wish to quote a few findings and statements of the report of this commission which appeared in the spring of last year, 1939:

Your commissioners readily admit their inability correctly and accurately to dissect or untangle intricate matters of accounting; but this at least may be said, that from the year 1925 until the end of 1932 the Acadia was in a comfortable position financially, and showed a surplus during those years of from $460,219.42 to $1,076,060. That is shown by schedule "B" which apparently means that the company had a balance at credit during those years which amounted to $583,630.25 at the end of 1932. During that period there was paid as dividends on first and second preferred shares of Acadia the tidy sum of $334,770.41. One of those dividends, amounting to $148,382.25, was paid on December 31, 1928, notwithstanding that the profit shown for that year amounted to only $100,976.28.

Schedule "C" indicates some rather startling facts. In 1925, when the loss of Acadia is shown to be $128,469.66, the Scotia company took from Acadia cash to the amount of $1,921.21. In 1932, when the loss of Acadia is shown to be $180,174.38, the Scotia company obtained from Acadia the sum of $724,895.87 cash; and on the 19th of January, 1933, the day that the receiving order was granted against Scotia, that company received from Acadia the sum of $20,000 cash, and on that day the memorandum shows that the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company owed Acadia Coal Company a total of $1,703,410.81... a total of $1,703,410.81 . .

There was nothing illegal from the point of view of authority in the various matters of borrowing the dividend payments already men-tioned. In fact it cannot be said there was anything illegal in those transactions from any point of view. Legality of action, however, is one thing, and preserving and safeguarding the industry and all that that implies is quite another thing.

It is therefore the considered view of your commissioners that some legislative action should be taken in regard to the powers of holding companies.

None has been taken.

To some people this story may be just another story of accepted financial manipulation. I know that this story affected human lives. The result was that the entire town of Thorburn became a ghost town and a thousand souls became destitute.

Only to-day, from that particular section, I received a letter from a lady. I should like to read part of it, because it has a bearing on the matter of the manipulations referred to in the report of the Carroll commission:

I am writing to you as a last gesture of a number of destitute and starving people.

It would be too long a story to try to tell you half, and it is unbelievable in this dear land of ours, what we have suffered since the government. of ours—what we have suffered since the government took away our employment. Now there is not even desultory road work—and no direct relief—since three weeks, only for sixteen party people. Over 100 got nothing.

Dozens of committees have gone to Halifax and also to Ottawa. No one will come and no one will listen. We have no one to help us, when all we ask for is work and some way to once more earn our living.

That comes from a little mining section which was closed as a consequence of the manipulation which is mentioned in the report. It is seven miles from New Glasgow; it has no railroad and is practically in the wilderness; the houses are tumbling down; there is no lighting system; and people who have given the best years of their life to the development of the industry are in great distress. In my opinion the enterprise was scrapped by high finance.

I say that the federal parliament is directly concerned in this matter. From 1897 to 1939 this parliament granted to the various companies which were later combined in Dosco a total of about $20,000,000 in bounties, subsidies, subventions and the like. In addition to this direct aid, a large portion of the eight and a half million dollars or so paid to the railways in the last ten years to assist in the movement of Canadian coal to central Canada has gone to help Nova Scotia coal. This is an indirect assistance to Dosco, since it widened its markets at public expense. These figures still leave out of account the enormous benefits granted the industry through the tariff, tax exemptions and the like. Thus the ten per cent import duty proposed by the present budget will, in effect, act as a subsidy to the coal industry.

I am not arguing that this assistance should not have been given or should be stopped. I said the other day that the miners of Nova Scotia appreciate this assistance very much. But I do say that it is the duty of this parliament and the government to make sure that the assistance goes to improve the condition of the workers and people of Nova Scotia and that it is not misused for the enrichment of the owners of the industry or wasted through inefficiency. Down to March 31 of this year Dosco had received some $4,407,000 in war orders. Is it not our duty to investigate thoroughly the record of this corporation and its present standing? If the people of Canada are to go on providing public money to assist this enterprise, is it not time they took it over and ran it for the benefit of the workers in it and of the community generally?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I made a ruling the other day with regard to the reading of speeches. The hon, member is apparently confining himself very closely to his manuscript.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I was simply endeavouring to do what I noticed has been done by almost every hon. member who has taken part in the budget debate. The minister himself, when he presented his budget; the leader of the opposition, and practically everyone who has spoken to-day has, and I think correctly, used notes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The other day, when I was making a statement on this subject, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked whether it referred to ministerial statements. I said no, that the practice and the custom of the house had been to allow ministerial statements to be read. The leader of the opposition is in somewhat the same position; he to-day was giving a statement which appeared to be on behalf of the group of which he is the leader. No other hon, member who has spoken to-day has used his papers to the same extent as the hon, member who has just taken his seat. I would ask that he desist from doing so.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am endeavouring to make a statement on behalf of the people I represent, on a very complicated question, and the information I am giving is not my own. I have endeavoured to present it through various documents, such as the Financial Review for 1939, the Financial Post, and different sources of information from which I have selected this material. At this particular time I am following closely the information contained in these documents because I do not want to make any statements which are not in accordance with the facts. But I have not any intention of reading my speech so far as it consists of the comments which I intend to make upon these

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think there would be any objection to the hon. member reading from documents which he wishes to quote, but so far as I have seen, much of that part of his speech which he has been reading has been in the nature of comments on the documents and figures which he has quoted. I would ask the hon. member, when he is quoting, so to state, and then to continue his speech in his own words.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Finally, I want to put on the record what the miners of Nova Scotia have to say about the situation in a brief which their union has prepared and which was presented by the miners to the conciliation board that is sitting at the present time in Pictou county and endeavouring to iron out the situation there. This is what they say:

In determining the amount of wages payable we believe that in the past the human factor has been required to take second place and that profits, dividends, and investment earnings have been given first place, and have been the principal aim and concern of the management. Perhaps that is natural under our economic system, yet we believe that there is need for a change. What is demanded of the workman is his labour, and when he has given that he has cooperated with the owners by giving all that is demanded of him. The workman does not share in the management of the industry, he does not control its policy or direct its destiny, he does not decide what dividends shall be paid, what borrowings shall be made, what expansion or development shall be undertaken; has had no voice in deciding corporate set-up, appointment of managers, or directors, or affiliations with other industries. He gives his labour, others manage the industry. Sometimes an industry fails due to factors over which the management has no effective control and often it fails as a result of bad management. In either case the workman is not responsible for the failure. He has given his labour, he has done what was demanded of him, and having done so, he should be the last to suffer, and he should not be obliged to suffer if his suffering can be avoided by action within the control of the management.

It is said that investors are entitled to a return on their money invested. We cannot agree that that is always so. Often the money invested is surplus money which the owners do not require for the reasonable needs or even luxuries of themselves or their families, they have it to spare and have invested it in order to make more money. Often, too, the money is inherited, money not earned by the investor. We believe that a reasonable living wage for the workman who gives his labour and who needs such a wage in order to get even the minimum requirements of subsistence should take precedence over earnings on such invested capital, and that profits and returns on invested capital should not be regarded as more important than payment of proper wages.

That is the principle which we support. I believe that this is the principle which the people of Canada support. But I know from my own life and from the lives of thousands of other workers in Nova Scotia that the opposite principle has been applied in practice. As a result, the people of my province have no confidence in the corporation which controls them.

We must win this war. To win we must have the whole-hearted cooperation of the workers of this country. They are ready and anxious to give that cooperation. But wealth must be made to pay its share. Monopolies should be investigated and controlled. Otherwise they will make fortunes at the expense of the people.

My endeavour in presenting the case as I have at the present time is to bring to the attention of the government and particularly the Minister of Finance a situation that now exists in Nova Scotia. The Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation is a large corporation that controls the destinies of twenty-six other companies with ramifications throughout eastern Canada. Since I have come here, telegrams, letters and resolutions have been sent to me and, I believe, to other hon. members of parliament, demanding that something should be done in Nova Scotia with respect to an investigation into the management and general financial structure of this corporation. The action now taken by the government for the purpose of probing for a solution is in my opinion misleading and not going to arrive at any permanent solution.

going to arrive at any permanent solution.

At the present time there are four conciliation boards set up in Nova Scotia, bound by certain terms of reference, beyond which they cannot go. I think the terms of reference relate to the ability of the respective subsidiary companies of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation to pay the wages demanded, on the basis of their earnings for the past year or two. While these conciliation boards may serve some purpose and have done so in the past, in my opinion they are not going to serve any purpose, or will serve very little, at the present time. After thirty odd years of experience working for that corporation and its subsidiaries and dealing with them through the medium of unions and so on, I believe that the people of Nova Scotia generally, not only the miners, have completely lost confidence in the word of the people who head that organization, and are sceptical as to what will come from these conciliation boards. What is now required is an exhaustive survey carried on under the jurisdiction of the federal government into the financial structure of that corporation and labour conditions under its management. The boards that have been set up are in my opinion not able to do that because of their terms of reference.

For the past eighteen months the miners all over Nova Scotia have been endeavouring to come to some understanding with the corporation on the question of wages. We have been signing contracts now for a period of thirty years. In this war effort every endeavour should be made by the company with respect to both signing agreements and carrying them out and pushing that industry to its highest capacity, because coal and steel are necessary war commodities. The steel operations are in just the same position as the coal mining. For the last two years the steel company at Sydney and the workers have been at loggerheads; no agreement, no understanding, spasmodic strikes, lack of confidence and general demoralization. The brief presented by the Carroll commission should have a thorough investigation from the federal government, in view of the fact that the federal government is paying relief to people left destitute by virtue of the manipulations as shown by the commission. For the past six or seven years the people of Nova Scotia have been endeavouring to present their case before some responsible body that will try to find a solution for a problem which affects practically all the people of Nova Scotia, because steel and coal are basic industries of that province and ramify into every phase of its economic life.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): The present debate gives members of this house an opportunity to make general observations, and I wish briefly to avail myself of that opportunity. The budget now before this house is such that if anyone did not previously realize what it means for this country to be at war, he must realize it now. Several new and heavy taxes are imposed; other taxes are increased, and yet it appears we must face a large deficit. And apparently the worst is yet to come. But we must carry on and make the best of the situation. Things that could be said or suggested in normal times cannot be expressed now for fear of hurting someone's tender feelings. But only one thing matters, that is to win the war into which we went voluntarily and of our own accord. However, the present war, terrible though it may be, does not mean, even if we were to lose itwhich God forbid-the end of the world. But, I hasten to say, it might mean the loss of some privileges which we cherish very much. Yet, in spite of everything, at the end of hostilities the people in general, and our youth in particular, will expect to live normally and in reasonable comfort. I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that the government is concerned with post-war conditions. That is why in that speech we have the following declaration:

While the present session of parliament will necessarily be mainly concerned with Canada's war effort, and the measures essential to the achievement of ultimate victory, my ministers are of opinion that, despite what to-day is being witnessed of concentrated warfare, it is desirable, as far as may be possible, to plan for the days that will follow the cessation of hostilities.

In consequence we are to have unemployment insurance, in spite of many difficulties and obstacles which had to be met, and I am sure that the whole country, and the industrial workers in particular, will be very glad of it. Also some legislation has already been passed to assist youth training in conformity with the plan originated by the late regretted Minister of National Defence, the Hon. Norman Rogers, while he was Minister of Labour. But I think it is apropos to remark here that our Canadian young people must prepare themselves to earn their living, must equip themselves with special knowledge and particularly with those qualifications which more than ever are needed to enable them to compete with others. Ordinary training and education are no longer sufficient in this age of specialization. The young must study; they must learn; they must specialize in some branch of trade, work or science. In so preparing themselves, they will pave the way to their own success, and no one can do this for them as well as they can. Let our youth have confidence in themselves and cease to think of or count on outside protection or influence. The doors of our technical schools are open to them; day and night courses are available. I need not say that the appalling burden of the war will fall on the shoulders of youth or on the next generation.

I can speak only of the province from which I come, but I am afraid that immediate prospects for the employment of our young people in Quebec are not very bright, since up to the present industry has not come close to absorbing those available for employment. It was hoped that the sacrifices required by the war would be to some extent compensated for by additional industrial activity, but so far very few opportunities have been offered our unemployed. Of course the government is not to blame for this lack of industrial activity, which is a matter of private enterprise and individual initiative; but it is a pity that no practical, appealing and up-to-date plan of colonization has been set up in my province to prevent our farmers' sons from flocking to the cities, where they simply increase the number of men out of work. In Canada, a country that we call agricultural, it is not normal to have only about 40 per cent of the people residing in rural districts while 60 per cent live in the cities. I suggest that a conference of the dominion and the provinces be held without delay in order to devise a real back-to-the-land movement and a plan to keep on the land those already there, and to place more farmers' sons on new land under more favourable conditions.

I am deeply concerned with the youth problem, and I ask that every effort be made by the appropriate authorities to encourage the reopening of plants which in many instances have been closed since 1930. Some industries are working seven days a week but still have parts of their plants closed. I would rather pay these companies for employing people on relief than continue the payment of direct relief to these people. In order to encourage the sons of our farmers to take up new land, I suggest that eastern farmers should receive constant attention, particularly at this time when their production is so essential. Unfortunately the war has closed many of our former markets with the result that the prices of some agricultural products have fallen. This situation is liable to get worse but, as I said in the beginning, we realize now what it means to be at war. No doubt this dislocation of our foreign markets was inevitable, but in my opinion something should be done for our eastern farmers. For instance, there is plenty of feed grain in western Canada being sold at very low prices; yet when that grain is transported to the east our farmers must pay very high prices for it, because of the high cost of transportation. Railway rates on grain sold to eastern farmers by western farmers should be considerably reduced. Since the war began the farmers in the east have been invited to produce more beef and bacon, the prices of which have not been as good as we expected. I repeat that the loss of our foreign markets due to the war has been the cause of the drop in prices of agricultural products.

Our efficient and capable Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) already has done a great deal for the farmers of the east, who are grateful for his efforts to improve their lot. I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) would gladly cooperate with the Minister of Agriculture in reducing railway rates on feed grain from the west. Let the rates cover the cost only. The present rates are almost prohibitive, and in many instances the eastern farmer cannot afford to pay the price demanded for feed grain coming from the west. In view of their past contributions to assist others, I believe the eastern farmers are entitled to the benefit of some little sacrifice on the part of our railways or other groups and classes of our citizens who have profited from those contributions. At present the cost of transporting grain from the west is so high that the retail price of that grain in the east is not at all commensurate with the sales price in the west. Eastern farmers and their organizations should enjoy a lower freight rate at least on feed shipped to them direct.

Before I resume my seat I must touch upon another subject. Last September the sales tax was imposed, as a war measure, on the domestic consumption of electricity. It is not my intention to criticize the tax itself, but rather I would offer a suggestion as to the manner of levying that tax. I submit to the Minister of Finance that the tax is not fair to some taxpayers, inasmuch as certain sections of the country feel that they are being discriminated against. This was a new tax. I am sure the former minister never meant to impose a hardship on anyone or to create an injustice, but in my opinion an injustice has been created. The amount of the tax should be in proportion to the quantity of electricity used. As the law now stands, those who pay the largest tax are not always those who consume the greatest quantity of electricity. I happen to be president of an electric plant in Gaspe, and a little study has made it clear to me that the present tax on electricity is in fact a tax on the electricity bill whereas, to be fair to all, the tax should be on the quantity of electricity consumed.

The point I wish to make is that while electricity is standard in its nature, there is considerable variation as between the prices of electricity in different parts of the country. It happens that in some instances where the rates of electricity are highest, the people can least afford to pay the 8 per cent sales tax. And irrespective of their means and ability to pay the tax, those people who are fortunate enough to profit by hydro-electric plants, or by municipal electric systems, receive advantages which are not enjoyed by the consumers who live in areas served by steam electric plants, by insulated small waterfalls, or more especially by the big power plants which overcharge the consumers.

To illustrate my point I beg leave to quote from the publication Electrical News and Engineering published in Toronto on March 15, 1940. The quotation is as follows:

Based on the most recent report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the per cent of total dominion domestic consumptions for each province is as follows:

Prince Edward Island
	0.1
Nova Scotia	1.6
New Brunswick	1.2
Quebec	13.2
Ontario	58.5
	15.1
Saskatchewan	1.8
Alberta	1.8
British Columbia and Yukon	$6 \cdot 7$

Computing the revenue derived from the existing tax from the statistics showing the average monthly bill and the number of consumers as shown in the same report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the proportion of taxes paid by each province is as follows:

	Per cent
Prince Edward Island	4.0
Nova Scotia	3.9
New Brunswick
Quebec
Ontario
Manitoba
Saskatchewan
Alberta
British Columbia and Yukon	9.6

From the above figures it will be noted that Ontario contributes 45 per cent of the total taxes for a consumption of 58 per cent of the total dominion consumption and Manitoba's share of the taxes is only 7.9 per cent for 15.1 per cent of the total consumption.

It will be noticed that Quebec pay 20.7 per cent of the total tax on electricity, and consumes only 13.2 per cent of the total kilowatt hours of the dominion. I ask the Minister of Finance to devise a plan whereby the tax will either be placed on a kilowatt hour basis or will follow the block principle, namely, a decrease in the tax in proportion to the increase in kilowatt hours consumed. I feel sure at any rate that the Minister of Finance will find a more equitable way of levying the tax on electricity.

Mr. RALSTON: It depends on where one lives. The suggestion made by the hon. member might be complained about, by someone living at some other point, as being inequitable. The view taken depends on where one lives.

Mr. BRUNELLE: That may be.

Mr. RALSTON: If one takes it the other way, namely, to tax on the kilowatt hours, then the gentleman using a large quantity of kilowatt hours will complain that the tax bears inequitably upon him. I mention this because the hon member suggests the tax should be imposed more equitably. Either way it is imposed, some person will feel he has a right to complain.

Mr. BRUNELLE: But if everyone were paying on a basis of consumption of electricity there would be practically no reason for complaint by anyone.

Mr. RALSTON: The other man may say that he would like to pay on the dollar basis, and would believe that that is the equitable ground.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Apparently there are two types of justice.

I have refrained from making any comment on the gravity of the war situation, because I believe up to this time practically everything has been said, and what has not been said is deeply felt in the heart of every Canadian.

Suffice it to say with reference to the mobilization measure which has recently been passed that I have never met a person in my constituency, or anywhere else, who has objected at all to the defence of Canada, or to the means to be taken to defend Canada in Canada. I would not need to say this, had I not in previous sessions disagreed with my friends in connection with war measures. But the situation is no longer the same. On the one hand the law itself restricts the compulsory service to the boundaries of Canada, and on the other hand there is an evident danger of attack in Canada.

In my opinion what has taken place in Europe, and the misfortunes of France justify the recent passing of the mobilization measure providing for the defence of Canada within Canada. Let every Canadian do his duty. I am prepared to do mine. I am at the disposal of the Minister of National Defence whenever and wherever I may be needed or useful—but for home defence only. I am always opposed, and intend to remain opposed to conscription for overseas service. To foresee and to be prudent is the duty of every representative of the people, and the mobilization measure which has recently been passed is one of prudence.

I have absolute faith in the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). He is, if anyone is, a true Canadian. He is a steadfast and judicious administrator. Moderation, tact and sincerity are qualities he has always displayed in good as well as in bad days, and I am proud to say that no one enjoys to a higher degree or deserves more than he does my confidence and that of the people whom I represent.

I therefore without any hesitation support the budget presented by the government.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on the budget, it is my desire to make certain definite observations relative to a question which has not been dealt with to any great degree, namely the question of national health. I anticipate that in what I have to say hon. members, irrespective of party, and particularly hon. members belonging to the medical profession will stand shoulder to shoulder with me.

I should like to concentrate my remarks upon national health, and especially as it applies to children. Therefore, in making no attempt to cover the whole field of national health, I may be in a position to be brief. I hesitate to use the word 'brief', because invariably when it is used someone shouts, "hear, hear." As a rule we hear that from an hon. member who has not time to deal with those matters with which he was sent here to deal.

I believe the presentation of the budget last week brought home to the people of Canada as it could have been brought home in no other way a supreme realization of the fact that we are at war. After all, I do not believe that there is anything in the world which will bring people to a complete realization of their responsibilities more quickly than the application of a tax. I am satisfied that we all realize the gravity of our undertaking. We do not want it thought that we have lost sight of the seriousness of the situation. We must above all else comprehend the responsibilities which are ours.

[Mr. Brunelle.]

Unfortunately I am not satisfied that all hon, members really realize the responsibilities which are theirs.

I should like at this moment to read a short quotation, but before doing so may I say that it is the tendency of many of us to lose sight of the fact that we have more than one battle front. Some of our people, and unfortunately some of the members of this house, think of this war only in terms of what might be taking place in the North sea, in the Mediterranean or along the Maginot line, absolutely overlooking the fact that the greatest front, the front which ultimately is going to be the most important, is right here at home. I should like to read an article which appeared on December 2, 1939, on The Front Page of Toronto Saturday Night and which was reprinted in the Canadian Welfare Summary, December-January issue. It reads:

The psychological task of this war is the task of endurance. This is not a time for the whipping up of temporary enthusiasm by preachments of a kind of hatred which even the Germans can only maintain for six months or a year at a time, and which Anglo-Saxons and French are utterly incapable of making the predominant motive of their acts for an even shorter period. It is vital to remember that the spirit of the country as a whole includes, to a much larger extent than we like to think, the spirit of those who, as a result of many causes but chiefly by their sheer ill-fortune and the hostile conditions of a difficult economic era, are dependent on the civilian health and welfare agencies for a considerable part of the food, clothing and housing which are necessary to keep them in spiritual and physical fitness. We have not only to defeat Germany, we have also to defeat a condition at home which prevents a large part of the population from making its proper contribution to the defeat of Germany or to the achievement of any other national purpose. War is at home as well as in the North sea and on the Maginot line. We cannot afford to lose sight of any part of the front.

After reading that article, I felt that it was my duty to deal with the home front. Being engaged in a conflict as we are, it is essential that our people be strong. strength of a nation, in peace time and more especially in time of war, depends directly upon the health of its people. History has proven beyond all shadow of doubt that when the people of a nation decline to any degree, either mentally or physically, the glory of that nation is short-lived. A statement like that is irrevocable. I think it is high time that we started to take stock with respect to the health of our people. I do not intend to be unduly critical in what I have to say. That is not my purpose. However, if I were to speak without being critical, it is not likely that I would be here in this corner. Perhaps I may be excused if my remarks become quite critical at times. I do intend to be accurate. I do not propose to recite long lists of statistics, because my experience has taught me that no matter how carefully statistics may be tabulated, they are not always as accurate as we should like them to be, especially when they have to do with a survey of our health situation.

A few weeks ago certain hon, members made some observations relative to economic conditions which existed in certain provinces of Canada. I speak particularly of my hon. friends to my immediate right. Apparently they are determined to put their constituents first and their party last if necessary. During the discussion of a bill which it is hoped will bring a certain amount of alleviation to the distressful sufferings of our agricultural and unemployed people, they dealt in a large measure with the question of health, particularly the health of little children in the different constituencies. They painted a picture which was not unduly coloured, a picture which was absolutely correct. If all hon. members would be really honest, they could paint similar pictures of conditions obtaining in every province in Canada. When the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was referring to the hunger and semi-starvation which existed among the little children of his constituency, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson)—unfortunately he is not in his place but I must say what I am going to say-made this statement:

I am distressed to hear him say that children go to bed hungry. Will he state that at any time during the last ten years, since relief was first instituted by the Bennett government, in September, 1930, anybody in Saskatchewan has starved or has been in actual want? I would be disturbed if that were the case. I know it was not the intention of R. B. Bennett and his government that anybody in Canada should be in want, and I cannot for a moment believe that it is the intention of anybody on the other side of the house since 1935 that anyone shall be in actual want.

Then follows this statement upon which I lay particular emphasis:

I can scarcely credit such a thing.

When I heard the leader of the opposition make that statement, the thought came to my mind, are conditions in New Brunswick, from which province he happens to come, in such a satisfactory condition that he is unable to realize that conditions in a constituency as far removed as Saskatchewan are as they were represented as being? So in order to try to find out what the leader of the opposition was really getting at, I made an investigation into conditions in certain parts of New Brunswick, and I quote what I am going to quote for the simple reason that I wish to show the house that the hon, leader of the opposition should have been able to credit what was said by the hon, member for Mackenzie, and furthermore to show the effect that these economic conditions have upon the health of little children. Let me make clear at once that I am not a member of the medical profession but I have spent over one-third of my life in rural areas, dealing with children, and after listening to the hon, member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) the other day, I do not think one has to be a member of the medical profession to comment intelligently on questions of health.

I wish to quote from the report submitted by the Saint John Family Welfare Association after they had made a survey of conditions among two hundred families in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, from which province the hon. leader of the opposition hails. When I speak of Saint John I have no pick on that city. I simply say to all hon. members: Be honest and you will admit that these conditions are not uncommon in all of our cities right across Canada, and if they are common in all of our cities right across Canada, surely you can believe the agricultural representatives when they say that these conditions are true of the rural areas. What I am going to quote may bring tears to the eyes of the most callous politician; I hope it does. I quote from the Saint John Family Welfare Association's report, which appears in the April-May issue, 1939, of the Canadian Welfare Summary, so this was only a very short time ago:

A great many of the families were living in quarters actually unfit for human habitation; there was also overcrowding, suffering from cold, lack of clothing, bedding, cooking utensils and food.

Now for the hon. leader of the opposition: There was plain evidence of slow starvation among many adults and little children in this

I wonder if he believes it now.

[Mr. Shaw.]

—and the ravages of diseases were apparent as attested by their medical and hospital records. Most of these homes were without bed sheets or towels and had less than half enough other bedding.

It would be bad enough if that were all, but that is only the introductory paragraph. It goes on:

Some families had one bed for the family and no mattresses; a large number had exhausted supplies of cooking utensils and in some homes one pot was used for cooking and bottles for drinking, in absence of cups. In the remainder of the cases visited, the majority revealed evidence of considerable hardship, with undernourishment, and the results had affected a number of children. In almost every case visited, the family were existing very much below the minimum standard of decent living and without enough food or clothing.

Even that as a second paragraph would be bad enough, but I have more here:

As many cannot pay rent, the result is very bad for both landlord and tenant. The record of evictions and seizures of furniture is particularly disastrous for little children of these families; other phases of acute distress relating to fuel scarcity, worn-out clothing, etcetera, might be given, but only a summary of major conditions can be shown here.

Most housing conditions are squalid and unsanitary; a terrible lack of clothing, bedding and utensils. A large section of those visited had been evicted from three to six times a year. During the past two years, 50 per cent of these families had moved from three to twelve times.

Of the families interviewed, 155 were in receipt of work relief and a great many were destitute and in desperate need.

I might mention that there were 200 families interviewed:

The majority cannot be classed in much better condition.

Slightly over 50 per cent have suffered from ill health and had hospital treatment during the last two years, having had from one to six members of the family in hospital at different times. According to a recent report by the district medical health officer on conditions, this was due because—

I point this out particularly:

—"undernourishment, insufficient or inadequate food, acute and chronic illnesses, and poor hygienic conditions, have existed so long a time in the community that they are now presenting a most serious economic problem."

I could go on and on and on. But this, Mr. Speaker, proves that the leader of the opposition, knowing conditions in a city in his own province, should have had no difficulty in realizing the truth of statements made by western members with reference to undernourished and starving children. One of the greatest troubles, shall I call it weaknesses, of many members of this house, is that they do not know what conditions are actually like in their own constituencies or provinces. That is true of many, I feel quite satisfied; otherwise we would not have some of the statements which are made in this house. I was more than surprised when the hon, member for Wood Mountain said-and he was making a deliberate attempt to ridicule the members in this part of the house-"I hear people say, 'Oh, it is terrible the way people are suffering, without proper food'." That statement was made on June 21, as reported in Hansard. I wonder if the hon. member, in view of what I have just read as to conditions in Saint John, realizes now that these men were speaking the truth.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, I have been listening to his address with interest and I would not be one to say that such a statement as he is making should be cut off, but perhaps Mr. Speaker would call attention to the fact that it is contrary to the rules to refer to a previous debate in the same session; my hon. friend should refer to these matters at the time of that debate. I am sure my hon. friend can see that it is difficult for us to retrace our steps over a previous debate, and he can see the reason for the rule. It would reopen entirely a previous discussion which had been closed by whatever vote or other disposition was made of the question.

Mr. SHAW: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that in making reference to previous statements I am only doing what hon. members have been doing ever since the 16th of May. I am new so far as the House of Commons is concerned. I have tried to learn by watching and listening, and I believe that I am carrying out a procedure in which most hon. members have indulged. I am dealing at the present time with the national health problem. I hope the minister will not say that his budget has no effect upon the health of the nation.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I endeavoured to be as considerate as I could in calling attention to the rule. I do not think the hon, member has any right to suggest that I am not perfectly happy to listen to him as long as he has the right under the rules to speak with regard to the subject matter, but I suggest that my hon, friend should take my suggestion in the spirit in which it was made. I knew that he was a new member. After I had permitted him without objection or interruption to make his reference to previous debates, I did, considerately I think, call his attention to the rule. It seems to me that my hon. friend might accept that suggestion, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to advise him if that is the rule. Then he may go on as long as he likes with regard to the health problem. We are all interested in it. But surely my hon. friend does not attempt to suggest that what I have stated is not the rule. The fact that somebody else did not follow the rule is not, I think, justification for my hon, friend persisting in its infraction. I do not know of any hon. members who have broken the rule. If I did, I would have felt it my duty to call their attention to the fact if I happened to be leading the house. I think my hon. friend is not taking the suggestion I made in the spirit in which I made it. I do point out that it makes for brevity, accuracy and conciseness in debate if old debates are not reopened, particularly if those who took part in them, and who are now being answered, are not now here.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the remark made by the minister. As he has pointed out, no reference can be made to some debate which has already taken place. I understood the hon. member to quote from a statement then made by another hon. member. That is contrary to the rules, and I would ask the hon. member to refrain from doing it.

Mr. SHAW: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I shall make it a point to confine myself to my topic.

I was endeavouring to point out the intense suffering which our Canadian people have been going through during the past number of years because of their ill fortune and because of certain conditions over which they had absolutely no control. I contend that it is necessary in view of conditions as we know them to be, that our governments, and especially the minister of national health, give every possible consideration to the matter of national health. We have adult suffering and child suffering; and all in all it has a direct tendency to affect the efforts which we are able to put into the present struggle. It appears to me that we have been more concerned to preserve the orthodox system of finance and economics than to conserve or preserve the health of our people. It is bad enough that adults are called upon to suffer, but consider for one moment the effect which avoidable suffering has upon children. know it is charged that many adults are not providing the necessities of life for their children and thus not guaranteeing decent conditions of health, and it is contended that these parents are entirely to blame. But our children outnumber the adults by about four to one, and irrespective of what the adults may be, the children are worthy of every possible consideration, in fact they are the best and most lasting assets we have. Everything depends upon those children. May I quote briefly a statement made by George Newman, formerly general medical officer of health for Great Britain:

The European war has given new emphasis to the importance of the child as a primary national asset. The future and strength of the nation unquestionably depend upon its education and equipment for citizenship. Great and farreaching issues have their origin and some of their inspiration in him. Yet, in a certain narrow sense everything depends upon his physique. If that be sound, we have a rock upon which a nation and a race may be built; if that be impaired, we lack that foundation and build upon the sand. It would be difficult to overestimate the volume of inefficiency, of unfitness and suffering, of unnecessary expenditure, and of industrial unrest and unemployment to which this country consents because of its failure to rear and educate a healthy, virile and well-equipped race of children and young and well-equipped race of children and young people. There is no investment comparable to this, no national economy so fundamental; there is also no waste so irretrievable as that of a nation which is careless of its rising generation. . .

It is my contention that we have been careless of our rising generation.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL VISIT-OFFICIAL FILM

Mr. ROY:

1. Is there an official film covering the visit of their majesties, the king and the queen, in Canada, last summer?

2. Is this film bilingual, or are there two versions of it, one for the English-speaking population, and one for the French-speaking population?

3. If there is a French version, was there a deletion made of the speeches made in French by their majesties, by the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec, the Premier of Quebec, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and other French-Canadian dignitaries?

4. If there is only one version, does it include those speeches made in the French language, and if not, why not?

5. What department of the government was in charge of the preparation and the distribution

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. Two versions, French and English.

3. In the French version there are speeches in French by their majesties and by the premier of Quebec, but it was not found practicable, in a film which had to cover so much ground, to include all the speakers throughout Canada.

4. The speeches in French by their majesties and by the premier of Quebec are retained in the English version.

5. The film was produced by the Canadian government motion picture bureau of the Department of Trade and Commerce and distribution was made under the authority of the national film board.

CANNED SALMON STATISTICS

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the total pack of salmon canned Canada during the years 1937, 1938, and 1939, giving each year separately?

2. What was the value of canned salmon during each of the years 1937 to 1939 inclusive, giving each year separately?

3. What was the value of canned salmon during the years 1937 to 1939 inclusive, giving each year separately, as follows: (a) exported to the United Kingdom, (b) exported to the United States, (c) exported to other countries, (d) for Canadian consumption?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

*BRITISH CHILDREN—ARRANGEMENTS FOR RECEP-TION IN CANADA

Mr. BRUCE:

- 1. What were the limits agreed upon between the British and dominion governments regarding British child evacuees?
- 2. In view of the minister's statement regarding the unreliability of the radio, will he state

- whether his announcement as given over the radio on Saturday last, that Canada would take all the children that England would send, is true or not?
- 3. Has the government extended a definite invitation for (a) a limited number of British children, or (b) a general unlimited invitation to all children the British government cares to send; (c) if neither, what is the nature of the invitation?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not had an opportunity to study this question very carefully, but I think the information requested was given in the statement presented to the house the other day. We might let the question stand until I look into it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY-SNOWSHOES

Mr. ROY:

- 1. Has the Department of Munitions and Supply awarded contracts for the manufacture and purchase of snowshoes?
- 2. If so, to whom have such contracts been awarded?
- 3. For how many, and at what price in each case?
  - 4. Were tenders called for by public notice?
  - 5. If so, when were these tenders received?
- 6. Has the contract been granted to the lowest tenderer in each case?
- 7. If not, in what cases have the contracts not been awarded to the lowest tenderer, and for what reasons?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. No tenders have been called for snowshoes nor contracts awarded.

Mr. ROY:

- 1. Has the Department of Munitions and Supply awarded a contract for snowshoes to Mr. Salim Faber of Loretteville?
  - 2. If so, what is the amount of such contract?
  - 3. Were tenders called for?
- 4. If so, did Mr. Salim Faber submit the lowest tender?
- 5. Is Mr. Salim Faber a manufacturer of snowshoes?
- 6. If so, where was the location of his factory before he signed his contract?
- 7. Has Mr. Faber given guarantees for the due execution of his contract, and, if so, what are such guarantees?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. No tenders have been called for snowshoes nor contracts awarded.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAINWRIGHT NATIONAL PARK—DESTRUCTION OF BUFFALO, MOOSE, ELK AND DEER

Mr. McGREGOR:

- 1. Were any buffalo, moose, elk or deer slaughtered during the past year?
  - 2. If so, how many of each, and where?
- 3. Were any of these animals sold on the hoof or otherwise?
  - 4. If so, to whom, and at what price?
  - 5. What disposal was made of the hides?
  - 6. Were tenders called?
- 7. If so, what are the names of those who tendered and the amount of each tender?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled.

ADVERTISING AND PUBLICITY EXPENDITURES

Mr. JACKMAN:

- 1. What is the amount spent by the various government departments on advertising or publicity during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1940?
- 2. How is the amount divided among departments?
- 3. How much of these various amounts can be properly attributed to ordinary peace time departmental business, and how much to war effort?
- 4. With what advertising firms or agencies has this advertising been placed, and what amounts have been placed with each?

DIRECTORS OF PUBLIC RELATIONS

Mr. JACKMAN:

- 1. How many departments of the government employ directors of public relations or liaison officers or other officers whose duty it is to acquaint other government departments or the public with the work of the government or of particular departments?
  - 2. Who are these officers?
  - 3. What is their respective remuneration?
  - 4. What is the term of their employment?
- 5. What was their previous business association?

FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—SUBVERSIVE ARTICLES

Mr. CHURCH:

- 1. What action has been taken by the government since the session opened to prevent the use of the mails and circulation of certain American and other publications containing subversive articles in war time?
- 2. Will the use of the mails be denied to the Chicago Tribune and Saturday Evening Post and other weekly publications for continued articles detrimental to the cause of Britain and Canada and the prosecution of the war, and prevent their circulation in Canada?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

[Mr. Howe.]

- 3. Has the government purchased any vehicles from the Ford Motor Company of Canada since the outbreak of war, and, if so, how many, and what is the total value thereof?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PUBLIC SERVICE—APPOINTMENT OTHER THAN THROUGH CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. ADAMSON:

For a return showing the names of all newly appointed persons whose remuneration is in excess of $100 per month, appointed to the government service, other than by civil service commission examination or under civil service commission regulation in the period September 1, 1939, to June 21, 1940, together with their salaries, living allowance, if any, and present duties.

YOUTH TRAINING FOR AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION AND REPAIR

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, agreements and other documents, during the years 1939 and to date in 1940, exchanged between the Department of Labour and the government of Nova Scotia, or any department thereof, regarding youth training in technical colleges, public schools, special classes, and/or industrial plants, to provide mechanical training for young men with special application to the manufacturing, reconditioning and repairing of aircraft.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

QUESTION RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). In view of the fact that in the course of the next thirty days harvest operations in the west will be beginning, when is it proposed to appoint the advisory committee for the wheat board?

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Questions along this line have been asked from time to time recently. There is no idea or suggestion of delay in giving to the house information on this and kindred subjects. Various matters in connection with the handling of this year's wheat crop, the crop for the approaching season, are under discussion and are being considered. Information will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will it be brought down before we prorogue?

Mr. CRERAR: Not necessarily.

AMENDMENTS TO ACT—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS ON 1940 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house whether or not amendments dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board Act will be finally considered, and whether payments will be made in time to take care of the harvesting operations in connection with the 1940 crop?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That matter also is under consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCED FARES TO UNITED STATES POINTS AND CONSERVATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I hold in my hand an advertisement which appeared in last night's issue of the Montreal Star, issued under the authority, I assume, of the Canadian National Railways. This purports to advertise special low round-trip fares from Montreal to New York—I suppose to attend the world's fair.

Having regard to the efforts of the administration, as reflected in the budget, to conserve our resources, and especially our exchange, does not the government think that the Canadian National Railways should refuse to foster this kind of appeal to our people—an appeal to go outside our country and spend large sums of money? I say that because very little of the moneys expended on these railway fares will accrue to the national railways. Will the minister use his authority to have this kind of appeal silenced?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The conservation of foreign exchange would seem to be a function of a department of government other than the Canadian National Railways. It will be understood that the Canadian National Railways are in the business of moving passengers and freight, and I presume their policy is to attract freight and passenger movement in both directions. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) will know that in a similar manner excursions are advertised in New York, and from that point groups of passengers travel to Montreal.

As to the question of exchange, it is a matter which is receiving the close attention of the government. Action along that line should be announced by the government, and in the event of such action I am sure the Canadian National Railways will be glad to conform.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I was going to ask the Minister of Transport if any action taken in this connection with regard to the Canadian National Railways would also be taken in respect of other railways.

Mr. HOWE: When a government policy is announced we expect all railways in Canada to conform. Naturally the government does not attempt to manage the Canadian National Railways from Ottawa just because it owns the common stock of that organization. All the railways are treated alike.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that the government has under consideration the very matter about which he has spoken. We are considering the whole matter of foreign exchange used by people going to the United States. I noticed that in his observations yesterday the leader of the opposition was rather strong, I thought, in his insistence that we should facilitate in every way possible the granting of passports to people wishing to enter the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Between border points.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, between border points. But it seemed to me that that was not altogether in conformity with or consistent with the idea of conserving exchange.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My reference to the situation at St. Stephen had to do with the every-day life of the people down there. Some hon. members do not understand the situation at that point. In those two border towns the three fire departments respond to the one fire call. This is an illustration of the extent of the community effort. If it were not for a river and an imaginary international boundary, there would be one town. Hon. members must understand the seriousness of the situation at that point. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill) could give the minister some information on the point.

Mr. POWER: The American cemetery is on the Canadian side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite true.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps the fire departments would account for the 60,000 applications to which my hon. friend referred yesterday?

PUBLIC INFORMATION

PRESS RELEASE DESCRIPTIVE OF CERTAIN MILITARY OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon, R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on June 29 there was released from the office of the director of [Mr. Coldwell.]

public information a press release respecting the use and limitations of parachute troops, tank and dive bombers in team work, and tending to throw more light on German tactics. This is purported to have been prepared by a military correspondent.

My attention was drawn to the matter by a newspaper man. I am not going to read the whole release, because I believe that would be asking too much. But if there is anything our bureau of public information could give out more calculated to frighten the people and to strike terror into their hearts at this time, I do not know what it could be. I am asking the Prime Minister why such information is sent out. Is it necessary to do so? Are such things censored? Will the government see to it that this type of information is more carefully reviewed by someone in authority before it is sent out?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) may I say I should like to read the article first.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I promise to give consideration to the point raised.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROCEDURE IN EXERCISE OF EXECUTIVE CLEMENCY
——CELONA CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) respecting a matter of immediate concern to every decent citizen in Vancouver. My question is based on an item appearing in the Vancouver Sun of June 29. It is as follows:

Joe Celona freed after serving only five years of ten-year sentence.

The item continues:

Joe Celona convicted and sentenced to ten years in the federal penitentiary for implication in the white slave traffic has been released on executive clemency at Ottawa, it was confirmed here to-day.

This man, Celona, prior to 1934 was the openly acknowledged vice lord of Vancouver, dominating the underworld of this city more completely than did Capone in Chicago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is an important matter. I know that when men such as this are released it is done upon the recommendation or the advice of local authorities. For that reason I would ask the Minister of Justice if this man Celona, who debauched and depraved hundreds of girls, and who corrupted the police force and the city administration, was released on the recommendation of Hon. G. S. Wismer, attorney general for the province of British Columbia?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a pretty serious statement.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not know the hon, member was going to ask this question, and of course I cannot carry in my memory details respecting operations of the remission branch. However, I shall look into the files. So far as the procedure is concerned, may I point out that before a ticket of leave is granted we ask the opinion of the judge who convicted the prisoner; we have the report of the gaoler or the warden of the penitentiary, and there are also two or three other reports. I could not give the names of the people who may have written in, because they are highly confidential. We could not get the information we need for the proper carrying out of the business of this branch if we published the confidential reports which we receive.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

ELIGIBILITY FOR SERVICE OF QUALIFIED PILOTS WHO ARE UNITED STATES CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to ascertain whether fully qualified and experienced air pilots who are citizens of the United States would be accepted for service in the Royal Canadian Air Force if such service was offered. I put this question to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power).

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister for National Defence for Air): The answer would be yes, provided they were judged to be fully qualified by the officers of the air force. In other words, they would not be barred because they are United States citizens.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL AND AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouta): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) when I may expect the regulations of the foreign exchange control board, with amendments.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): I shall make inquiry this afternoon and give my hon, friend an answer to-morrow.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

CALLING UP OF CLASSES UNDER THE NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): On June 26 I asked a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which is reported on page 1162 of Hansard. This question reads:

Is it the intention of the government to carry out some scheme of registration under the mobilization act before the first class of men is called up for training under this act? If it is not, will the Prime Minister give the house information as to when the first men are likely to be called up?

The Prime Minister replied that the matter was under consideration and that he could not give any information at that time. In view of the time element and the large number of men affected by the mobilization act, can the Prime Minister give any further information to-day on this important matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can only say to my hon. friend that the question to which he has referred relates to a matter of policy which will be made known to the house as soon as the government is in position to state it. Until the Department of National Defence has made the regulations which it deems essential with respect to the calling up of men it would be premature on my part to attempt to say just when that calling up will take place. The government will announce its policy in due course. That is all I can say.

Mr. WHITE: Could the Prime Minister say at this time whether there will be a registration before the men are called up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can say to my hon, friend that the calling up of men will not necessarily await the registration. As a matter of fact I should perhaps say that it will not await the registration.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks last evening I had occasion to deal particularly with the question of national health. I attempted to stress the fact that it is imperative, especially during war time, that we have a healthy, virile, well-equipped people. I referred also to a statement which had been made by a prominent British authority on health to the effect that the children of a nation constitute a rock upon which a nation might be built. It is also important that we realize that these same children constitute a rock upon which a nation may be rebuilt, a matter of more importance in view of the war situation. I referred also to what I termed the deplorable conditions prevalent in Canada and the attendant physical and mental ills. I would have made reference to other important factors if time had permitted. I could have referred to the fact that it has been reliably estimated that twenty-five per cent of our Canadian people may be classed as indigents. This is not a statement of mine; it appears in a report which was published last year by the national committee for mental hygiene. This reference to twenty-five per cent of our population being indigent should be explained. By indigent we mean that they are either unable to provide the necessary food, clothing, shelter and medical attention, or are able to provide food, clothing and shelter but unable to provide necessary medical attention. This is a tragic situation inasmuch as two-thirds of this twenty-five per cent are children.

It might be noted that in Canada there are each year 20,000 births where the mother is unattended by any skilled person. This may not be entirely due to economic conditions, but I venture to say that it is to a large extent. I would refer the house to the rapid decline in the birthrate in Canada. This was first noticed about 1926, so it cannot be said that this decline was entirely on account of the depression. However, there is sufficient evidence to prove that to a large extent it is due to economic conditions which have existed and to the fear which many people have of the future. Because of this decline in the birthrate it is absolutely necessary that we give the best possible consideration to the conservation of child life. That is the only way in which we can offset a decline in the birth-

It has been said, and rightly so, that if babies are well born and cared for, child mortality becomes almost negligible. As a result of conditions beyond the control of the average person it is unfortunate that a great many babies are not well born and are not well cared for. We should bear that fact [Mr. Mackenzie King.]

in mind. At this point may I pay a tribute to the doctors of Canada. I have lived in a rural community for many years and I know something of the good work performed by the members of the medical profession. Unfortunately Canada has a population of approximately eleven million people spread over an area of about two million square miles, and we have not enough doctors. Furthermore, I believe it is generally agreed that doctors have more or less located in the larger centres of population. There are various reasons for this. There they have the more up-to-date equipment which they have been trained to use and modern hospital facilities. Probably, too, life is more enjoyable in the urban centres, but that is not intended as any reflection on the medical profession.

Nurses have also performed a noble work. I have in mind the district health nurses in some of the provinces. But still we have not enough health nurses to do the work properly. I have also in mind the splendid work that is done by hospitals, and it is tragic to think that instead of extending our hospital facilities, many of our hospitals in the dried-out areas are nearing the point where they will have to close their doors if they do not receive further assistance from the federal government.

I should also like to mention the welfare societies. We all know the marvellous work that has been done by the welfare societies in sending out circulars and information which are extremely valuable to people living in the outlying areas. During the last war many hon, members will remember that many of our doctors joined the forces and many of our nurses also went overseas. Governmental grants to welfare associations were cut down on the ground of economy, and individuals, instead of contributing to the welfare organizations to any appreciable extent, contributed to the Red Cross overseas service. I have nothing against that, of course, but it left our welfare societies in straitened circumstances financially, and we found ourselves without sufficient doctors and nurses. The result was, as the figures show, that during the war years sickness among babies and children increased, and child mortality also increased. Let us not repeat that during this war. It is necessary, of course, that doctors and nurses should go overseas, and I know too, that it is not possible in every instance to give the same grants which these welfare organizations were receiving before.

But I would point out that we have three other doctors who are not going overseas: Doctor Food, Doctor Clothing and Doctor Shelter, and I believe that if we hire or make use of these doctors at this time, our people will be to some extent compensated for the loss of the services of the doctors and nurses who go overseas.

I should like to deal for a moment with refugee children. I noticed in the Ottawa Citizen last night the statement that parents of approximately 52,000 children have made application to the British government to have their children sent to Canada. I do not know whether they will all be brought here or not, but if there are a million who wish to come, I hope we shall bring them all. It was a splendid gesture on the part of the federal government to make it possible for these children to come to this dominion. No one who has read a description of their conditions or seen moving pictures of refugee children in Denmark, Holland, Poland and other countries can have any hesitation in saying that we did the proper thing when we made arrangements to bring refugee children to Canada. But before the government decided to bring these children over here, they must have come to this conclusion: First, we are able to provide clothing for them; second, we are able to provide food for them; third, we are able to provide shelter for them, and fourth, we are able to provide education and medical services. I am not saying that the Canadian government is going to pay for that; perhaps the British government will, but irrespective of who pays, these things must be provided for the refugee children.

If we can provide all these things for the children who are brought here from abroad, why did we not a year or so ago make these very same things available for the thousands of starving children in our own country? I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am very much in favour of bringing the refugee children here; I would bring a million, or ten million, if they wished to come, but at the same time I do say that in the light of the care which we are going to provide for these refugee children, there was small excuse for not providing similar care for our own children who for the past ten years have been fleeing before another type of monster, the economic depression. Our children are a national asset, the best and most lasting asset which we have, and since they are a national asset they are of extreme national concern. Since they are of extreme national concern they should become a national responsibility.

We hear much said about passing the buck. I believe that expression was used on the other side of the house not long ago, but the time has come when we should cease even to consider passing the buck in dealing with our unfortunate children. We know it is the municipalities which are supposed to initiate schemes of relief and health services, but Mr. Speaker, many municipalities in the dried-out areas have nothing with which to start any scheme. Therefore the federal government can make no contributions because the municipality has no money with which to start the scheme. The provinces are struggling valiantly, and I commend to hon. members the public health programme of the Alberta government. But the provinces as a whole cannot cope with this national problem, and it is the absolute duty of the federal government to take over the whole health situation in Canada and give to the unfortunate, and particularly the children, the care which we know we are able to provide.

May I just say this in conclusion? The war is no excuse for reducing governmental expenditures on public health. That is not necessarily my own opinion only. I quote a statement under the name of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) appearing in the April issue of Health, which is the official publication of the Health League of Canada. Before I read it, let me say to the minister that I agree wholeheartedly with what he says here:

The all-embracing measures necessary for the successful conduct of warfare must not be permitted to weaken our efforts in the cause of public and individual health.

On the contrary we must redouble our efforts to ensure the health of the nation.

"Redouble" has only one meaning to me, and I say to the minister that I sincerely trust the government does intend to redouble its efforts in this direction, and that I shall watch the health estimates to see if the minister's policy is carried out.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) will excuse me if I do not follow his very eloquent plea for health. At this moment we all realize that the making of our maximum contribution to the empire at war is the great overshadowing problem of this session. The government is rapidly organizing the industrial, financial and economic resources of this country for war and for more war, and the people are loyally supporting that effort. The daily expanding strength of the land, sea and air forces has proceeded beyond our fondest hopes and expectations. As to the land forces, each day, the minister tells us, between 800 and 1,200 men are enlisting, and the tremendous task has been carried out of providing supplies for these men. In connection with the air force we have a thousand enlistments a week; and, Mr. Speaker, if you go along the highway in one part of this province, as I have done, you will see a large field filled with aeroplanes for training purposes. You can see in the factories engine and aeroplane parts being assembled: one factory alone is turning out two planes a day, and many more will follow. We must remember also the sea force; the navy has been increased in size to nearly 100 vessels. Some of them are in British waters guarding the British isles, those islands which for two hundred years have been the bulwark of freedom and which, for any lover of liberty, are the most precious gems of the ocean.

Plants for the manufacture of articles of war are being built, older plants are being enlarged and reconditioned, and all are concentrating on war material. I hope that this industrial activity will spread so that those in the far west and those in the middle west will have the opportunity of making their contributions and that there will be in this time of great need neither idle men nor idle plants. The west will welcome for many reasons the establishment of plants and factories. They would like to see branch factories in their cities. They can offer much in the way of inducements, such as power and railway transportation and a suitable climate, so that in peace as well as in war there shall be decentralization of industry in the interests of all concerned.

I am convinced that during the last few months a tremendous work has been accomplished in preparing for war; and come what will in the way of weal or woe, the people of this country will be indebted to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of this government for what they have done.

I wish to deal for a few moments with a battle on another front-the battle which fathers and mothers are putting up to improve home conditions. This budget is definitely planned for equality of sacrifice in war; and on the home front, I believe, our aim and ambition should be to give equality of opportunity to the children and to people generally throughout this great country. I am convinced that living conditions throughout Canada are not thoroughly understood. Crop reports, trade returns and observations made from the cities do not give an adequate indication of what is taking place. I am reminded of days long ago when a queen decided to go through her country to visit her subjects, but her courtiers garlanded the path which she trod and took her to the green lanes and shady places, took her to the garden spots and to the flowing streams, so that she never knew that over the hills and far in the valleys her people were in want. I know that it is not the intention of this or of any government that people should suffer for lack of fuel or food or clothing or shelter, and I know that each municipality is responsible for the individuals who reside within its limits or who have strayed over its borders. But I know also that it sometimes happens that people suffer, that it is difficult to locate responsibility, that councils do not encourage relief giving, that relief officers sometimes become callous or make errors of judgment. Therefore I am glad to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) say that this government will do its full part in time of war as well as in time of peace.

A few days ago an hon, gentleman who sits in another place stated that advantage was being taken of the old age pension scheme. I believe that he lacks complete knowledge of the situation, because there is another side to be considered. The old age pension scheme has brought a measure of security and happiness to many of the pioneers of this country. It was put into effect by a Liberal government, and I hope that a Liberal government will be able in the very near future to lower the age and increase the amount, because I am convinced that a great humanitarian service will be done when the benefits of the scheme are enjoyed by larger numbers of deserving men and women.

I will not mention at any length the problem of our wheat crop. Wheat growing is the means of livelihood of a great number of people, and if they have to produce at less than cost they must suffer. I am convinced that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is well aware of this, and will do everything in his power to obtain for us a better price for our wheat in these times of contracting markets and other difficulties.

During the last year a new experiment was attempted in parts of western Canada, with the object of compensating in some measure a man who through no fault of his own lost his crop. The measure by which this was achieved is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It is a splendid piece of legislation, and has been the means of putting money into homes where it was badly needed. But in the first year its administration appears to have been faulty, and some of the regulations seem to have been altogether unsuitable. I know that some farmers got too much, but many others, equally or more deserving, got nothing. I hope that this legislation will be retained. but that changes will be made to render it more generally useful and helpful.

The price of farm implements has been a great problem for the people of the west. It is true that the cost of implements in Canada is a little lower than that of similar implements in the United States, but prices are altogether too high, and some remedy must be found. The difficulty from which the average farmer suffers is that the price of everything he has to buy is on a very high level and the price of what he has to sell is on a low level. The government that can bring those two levels a little closer will rule this country for many a year, because they will restore joy and hope to great numbers of our people.

Mankind has always had to contend with poverty. We have heard our parents and grandparents tell of their trials and troubles in this province. In those days they had to get around their troubles as best they could, but a little better system has gradually come about. Poverty is recognized as a curable evil, and although we have still a long way to go to reach the ideal, some progress has been made. Such things as direct relief, relief works, old age pensions, mothers' allowances by the provinces, farm placement, national forestry, dominion-provincial youth training, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act have all helped to mitigate the hardness of the lot of many of our people. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act in particular has done a great deal of good. By making it possible to produce flowers and gardens it has made homes more homelike and it has caused some easterners to feel that they no longer need their eastern homes because they can have some of these things in the west. It is unfortunate that the estimates for that activity have had to be reduced.

Before closing I should like to discuss one other problem which is of great importance from the economic and social standpoint. It is not a new subject, because the sugar beet is mentioned as one food which the builders of the pyramids used. The Romans introduced it into Gaul, and Napoleon in 1812 and 1813 had 334 sugar factories established. So that all down through the ages it has been a subject of genuine interest in the furthering of human welfare. It has passed the experimental stage in western Canada, particularly in southern Alberta, and the statistics show that that province is better suited than any place in the world for the production of sugar beets.

Mr. MARTIN: Not better than western Ontario.

Mr. GERSHAW: In southern Alberta we have a lot of sunshine. We do not get early frosts and we can produce 11.88 tons per acre with a sugar content of 18.166 per cent. An increased production of sugar beets would very greatly help the situation out there. In the late nineties and the early years of this century a great many people settled in that country thinking they could grow grain. Railways, elevators, homes, churches and schools were constructed and the hopes of the people were high. But each ten-year period brought less and less moisture. The rainfall failed for many years; streams and slews dried up, and in the last ten years the spectre of poverty has stalked through that land so that relief has been necessary on a large scale. Even in times when there was a fair crop the prices were so low that a living could not be obtained and the problem of reclaiming that vast area is therefore definitely a national obligation. It has been found that irrigation is the one vital factor in stabilizing agricultural development there. We need irrigation badly in those districts. Private concerns have spent as much as $35,000,000 to establish irrigation districts and their losses have been tremendous.

If an irrigation scheme is to be successful there must be canning factories, particularly sugar beet factories, because these are the things that make a complete unit, and there is no fear as regards the market for sugar, because 85 per cent of the sugar which we use in Canada is manufactured from imported raw material. Then there is a place for sugar beets in the rotation of crops. Where a field is planted with sugar beets there must be intensive cultivation and, for years, whatever crop is grown on that field will give an abundant yield. Then it is a cash crop. It gives people a little money during the season to improve their home conditions and to carry on their ordinary life. Where a sugar beet factory is located the land is much more valuable, being worth up to $100 an acre, whereas irrigation land can be bought, where there is no factory, at say $20 an acre. Another big factor is the encouragement it gives to the live stock industry. Cattle, lambs and hogs can be finished where the beet tops, molasses and pulp are available for feed. In that great ranching country they lay off a certain number of townships for winter feeding and sometimes the grass fails to grow and they are short of fodder. They can drive the cattle to some place close to the factory and the by-products of the factory will be a great advantage in the fattening of the stock.

Unemployment is public enemy No. 1. Mr. Houson, president of Canada and Dominion Sugar company, says:

I will say this, that the beet sugar industry provides work for a tremendous amount of labour. There is no other industry that I know of that takes care of more labour.

The amount of factory labour required to make a ton of white sugar out of sugar beets, compared to the amount of factory labour required to make a ton of white sugar from cane, is as three to one; and when you include all farm labour in the manufacturing of sugar from beets, it really provides work for about twenty times as many people as the manufacturing of sugar from cane does. You start with the preparation of the land, then you have seeding, weeding, thinning and blocking, harvesting and transportation, so that there is a tremendous amount of labour involved. It also brings work to the railways, the merchants, the machine shops, and helps in the community life of the district in which it is situated.

In 1932 I had the opportunity of moving a resolution in this house to encourage the establishment of more sugar beet factories. The agriculture committee investigated the whole subject and reported as follows:

Your committee therefore recommends that in view of the existing tariff on sugar and in consideration of the substantial payments being made to agriculture and labour by the beet sugar factories at present in operation, the cane sugar refineries should undertake to provide for a gradual increase in factory facilities for the refining of beet sugar in Canada, and that, with the additional advantages in freight rates to points in the middle west, heretofore described, factory facilities should now be steadily increased in western areas where beets are grown, and thereby make it possible to produce from beets a more substantial percentage of the sugar consumption of Canada.

Your committee further recommends, that if no successful attempt be made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacturing of beet sugar, the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish that end.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what we are asking to-day. In Canada we produce the raw material to provide only some fifteen per cent of our sugar, while in 1939 the United States produced 23.2 per cent of the sugar they consumed and even the United Kingdom produced some 20 per cent of their consumption. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is familiar with this problem; he has driven through and flown over these districts, and I should like him to compare the living conditions of the refiners with the living conditions of the people in those areas. We realize that the London sugar agreement is still in operation and that we must keep faith; but there are means, through the adjustment of taxes and freight rates, of giving encouragement to this industry. I wish my voice could reach the housewives of Canada and induce them to use more and more beet sugar, remembering that it gives employment to twenty times as many people as does the use of a similar amount of cane sugar.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the budget recently brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) gives splendid evidence of his patriotism as well as of his sense of responsibility. Clear, rigorously exact and even more courageously frank, it enables us more easily to consider our serious problems and to arrive at sounder decisions. I therefore congratulate and thank most sincerely the minister, of whom it can be said that he has well served his country.

Mr. DUPUIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROY: The huge estimates already voted were sufficient and evident warning that the new budget would provide for numerous and heavy imposts, since it was not deemed advisable to resort more extensively to loans in order to settle our war expenditures.

Coming face to face with reality, one perceives it to be more brutal and impressive than one would have imagined it at long range, and its contact, if not always frightening, cannot but give rise to very serious meditation. Briefly, what is this reality with which we are faced? Here are the facts: Our country's expenditures will amount this year to almost a billion and a half dollars. Perhaps an example might serve to illustrate the crushing weight of this figure. On June 10 last, there arrived in Ottawa two trainloads of gold. The twenty-six cars which made up these trains, each one bearing approximately forty tons of the precious metal, represented only about $800,000,000, that is little more than half our first war budget. That is an illustration of the burden our country is being called upon to bear. Is it capable of doing so?

Let us discard for the moment any attempt at criticism. The gravity and the needs of the hour demand, on the contrary, that we recognize the imperitiveness of these expenditures. Canada has been drawn into a world conflict for the second time within a quarter of a century. Does our country possess to-day the same economic vitality on which the federal treasury could count during the first great war? In their first report for January 1914, Bradstreet's recognized that financial, industrial, commercial and agricultural conditions had never been more prosperous in Canada. However, at this moment of our entering another world war, our financial position is most unstable. As a result of the machine's victory over labour and of the lack of domestic and foreign markets, our agriculture and manufacturing industry have been on the decline for many years. We have been in the throes of an acute economic depression for the last ten years. Our federal, provincial and municipal finances are no longer adequate, and in every branch of public administration there have been accumulating, year after year, deficits and tax increases of all kinds. Lastly, our public debt is now eight times larger than at the outbreak of the last war.

In view of the precariousness of our situation, we have the right to ask ourselves if our economic structure is sufficiently strong to-day to bear a burden which cannot fail to grow heavier with subsequent budgets. One would be, to say the least, foolhardy to assert it. Indeed, did this country not show numerous signs of weakness under a much lighter burden of taxation during the post-war period? Was not this taxation inadequate to prevent the rise of our public debt which climbed, during this period, from 1,200 millions to 3,200 millions, that is an increase of two billion dollars since the end of hostilities in 1918?

It is therefore evident that if we were barely capable the first time, with an economic structure far less burdened than it is at present, to bear a much lighter load, there is urgent need, should we recognize this deficiency, immediately to reinforce and inject more vigour and resistance in our economic front, in order that this budget may not disillusion the treasury and bankrupt the country.

Never in its history has Canada known such anxious times. On a far continent, another world is in the throes of a bloody evolution the result of which none can foresee. Must not our efforts henceforth tend, for this very reason, toward shielding our country from the consequences of this horrible evolution which we have resisted since 1914? We must thus be ready for any sacrifice, the least of which would be the willing recognition of our past mistakes, of our rashness and want of foresight, even though the personal pride of certain political leaders might suffer to some extent in the process.

In order to facilitate a study of the situation and consideration of the means whereby all budget anticipations may be fulfilled, let us narrow the picture down to the limits of the Gaspé peninsula, which offers an aspect very similar to that of the entire dominion. The population of this region is of mixed origin. It is formed first and chiefly of French-Canadians, noted for their laboriousness, their sense of economy and their incomparable hospitality; secondly, of a large group of English Canadian loyalists and Irish Canadians, remarkable for their spirit of enterprise and their perseverance; thirdly, of Canadians originating from Jersey, whose courtesy and politeness are proverbial and, lastly, of French-speaking Canadians of various racial origins. These different racial groups live together in a secular harmony that might serve as an example to the rest of the Canadian people.

The Gaspé region is richly endowed with the same natural resources that are to be found elsewhere in Canada. The agriculture, fisheries, timber wealth, mines, hydro-electric power and oil deposits there, plus a seaport of the first order and beautiful landscapes second to none, can compete on more than equal terms with those to be found anywhere else in the country.

It labours, however, under the same deficiencies that are to be noted elsewhere. Like every other region also, it has more than enough possibilities of development to fill all present and future needs. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, poverty and unemployment conditions are more severe in the Gaspé region, and more particularly on the Magdalen islands, relatively speaking, than in any other part of Canada.

This is due to two main causes:

First, that we have neglected the development of our natural resources. Our lumber industry, the most important of all, has restricted its operations to such an extent that it is responsible for at least three-quarters of our unemployment. Every timber limit between Sainte-Anne-des-Monts and Gaspé is rented but idle, save those controlled by companies operating at Marsouins and Mont-Louis, and the timber limit of Grande-Vallée where operations are rendered most difficult through lack of a wharf.

The federal authorities are in great measure responsible for the lack of development of our forest resources, because of their failure to build deep-water wharves at many places, among which are St. Joachim, Magdalen River, Grand Valley and Clorydorme. At Gaspe itself, three large companies still in possession of the same limits, formerly had an annual payroll of $1,500,000. This amount, increased by the payrolls of related industries, filled the needs of the people of the coast. Nothing has compensated for the disappearance of two of these companies whose very plants have been demolished. As to the International Paper company, they have started cutting wood again, but on such a small scale that it is not worth mentioning.

Our fisheries, also, are suffering to-day from the consequences of our past errors. Though fishing has been poor in recent years, it must be admitted that we have lost to other countries important markets for our fish. It is only since 1936, thanks to the firm measures taken by the National Union government of Quebec, that we have begun to market in Canada a good part of the surplus of our reduced production; but the fact remains that the price is still below what it was before the depression.

The decline of our two principal industries, lumbering and fishing, has naturally had a considerable prejudicial effect on our third industry-agriculture. Although carried on to a fairly important extent in several of our parishes, farming yields very poor results in others where the soil is unsuited to agriculture, particularly in the overcrowded Magdalen islands where the distress of the people is sad to contemplate. If it is proper to bewail the sad lot of the war refugees whom Canada is showing herself ready to assist, how much more should we not show our sympathy for the patient and courageous people of the Magdalen islands whose unfortunate lot is too little appreciated by the authorities of this country.

Our section has another source of wealth which should not be underrated. The marvelous beauty of the country with its jagged outlines, its beaches, its cliffed shores and its reefs whose harsh eloquence evokes the memory of so many shipwrecks and of so much heroism; our mountains covered with a rich vegetation, our animal life, and our rivers abounding with fish. All this picturesque beauty attracts every year thousands of tourists who are a source of considerable revenue for the province and the country.

In a word, Gaspesia, that small-scale picture of the entire Canadian nation, has important and diversified resources; her immense agricultural wealth is still almost untouched; our forests are extensive and only await development. The fishery industry could be further developed and made more remunerative. Our sub-soil contains great mineral deposits as evidenced by reports from geologists like Ells, Mailhiot, Alcock and Dr. Jones. Moreover, Gaspesia has a seaport at the mouth of the St. Lawrence river; from a commercial as well as from a military standpoint, it is the gate to the Atlantic and can be used both in winter and in summer. To be fully equipped, this great sea-port only requires docks.

That brief sketch of Gaspesia's resources naturally brings one to ask himself why so much wealth accumulated there by nature is still awaiting the time when human industry will make it available for the whole country.

On May 25th last, the Edmonton Journal reported the following statement from Mr. W. L. Leeper:

The possession or the lack of oil will be the decisive factor in the present war.

That is true as regard military purposes and the requirements of industry, which must depend on an ever increasing supply of oil and motor-fuel.

Have the federal government given serious and practical attention to the possibilities of Gaspe's oil field? Will they recognize, before it is too late, the urgent necessity of mobilizing a resource that is so essential to victory?

If we had heeded the insistent requests that have been made during a number of years for a railroad across inland Gaspesia, we would have brought about the development of that oil field and of mineral deposits many of which are held by powerful companies like Noranda Mines, Federal Zinz and Lead, National Smelting, of London, British Metal, Mining Corporation and Imperial Oil.

Such development would not only have prevented unemployment in giving rise to prosperous industrial towns, but it would also have provided the federal treasury with considerable revenue and made available for our war effort some essential raw materials.

To all that would be added the invaluable advantage of a well equipped sea-port which, during the present war, would bring us nearer, by two or even three days, to our first line of defence; not to mention the fact that in time of peace, our country would be brought that much closer to her overseas markets.

I will go farther. That almost stubborn neglect in taking advantage of all those assets which were challenging our spirit of enterprise, has brought about, as an inevitable consequence, a migration of farmers toward towns, a condition which has upset the balance in our population and has been one of the main causes of unemployment.

Is it not alarming that our largest city, Montreal, should acknowledge itself unable to meet its financial obligations and powerless to provide the necessities of life for her too large population? Much could also be said about the financial difficulties of most of our towns or cities, overcrowded with unemployed who have abandoned the land because nothing was done to keep them there while it was still time.

Let us acknowledge that our greatest error, which is also the main and permanent cause of our weakness, is that in normal times, while our whole activity was available, we had neither the foresight nor the wish to use the workers of our thinly populated country in the development of our abundant resources.

We did aggravate that first error when the time of reckoning came; we were then forced to admit our lack of preparation.

But what did we do? Did we, as now, mobilize all our resources and call upon the spirit of enterprise and the industriousness of our people with a view to withstanding the effects of the depression? No. We overlooked our resources and only looked upon the poverty that was rampant in this country.

To use more accurate and realistic terms, I would say that we maintained poverty instead of restoring prosperity.

While, on the one hand we abandoned to indigence and public relief an entire generation which, from year to year, has become a prey to those subversive theories which we are now compelled to fight on the battle-field, on the other hand we failed to accumulate and store what our country urgently needs, at the present time, to support the allied effort against the power of enemies who are using reserves accumulated during a number of years.

Our policies have too long been inspired and directed by political considerations, which has led us to compromise with sectional leaders and to the dangerous game of sectional strife.

We have been too complacent in following a doctrine of laisser faire under the mistaken pretext of opposing state intervention, thereby forgetting that foresight should be the first quality of a government.

As a result, the dormant initiative of our people, left without direction or assistance, has remained fruitless. Is it not still more disheartening to see that in spite of the sorry failure of the system used in attempting to end unemployment, the government still consider this latter condition as a permanent evil, since they are promoting an unemployment insurance scheme?

The state is in duty bound to alleviate temporary distress, but, nevertheless, its most important duty is to ensure the welfare of the people by providing permanent work for them.

In view of the means of recovery that are available to us, such an insurance scheme is an insult to the spirit of enterprise of our people and a startling admission of incapacity on the part of the government. Is it also realized that such a contributory insurance will be for a more or less extended period, another tax upon wage earners?

Since we must, on account of the almost complete failure of the methods we have so far followed, make the disquieting acknowledgment that we were unprepared for the enormous demands of this staggering war budget, have we not the duty, in our own interest, to alter the trend of our national economy?

From those obvious errors of the past, we should now draw lessons for the future. Let us broaden the frame of the picture I have drawn of Gaspesia when I outlined her possibilities and needs, and let us include within this enlarged picture the whole extent of our vast country.

There also we notice things which lead us to the conclusion that our economic structure is out of joint.

Ever since the beginning of this twentieth century, all our efforts have been concentrated upon making this a great century for Canada. It seems, however, that when we embarked on that course we neglected to find out whether Canada was sufficiently prepared for the purpose of bringing to a successful issue an undertaking which was to prove of such magnitude and to load us with such onerous obligations.

The immense prairies of western Canada opened such a field for our initiative and adventure that we failed to observe the wise rule that one must cut his coat according to his cloth. The frontier of Canada, which was then barely out of the development stage, did not extend further than the basin of the St. Lawrence and of the great lakes. The settlement of the prairies launched us in a feverish programme of unlimited immigration, in the building of a second transcontinental railway and in the creation of two new provinces. For the realization of this expansion we could count only on the resources of eastern Canada which might have been sufficient if Canada had not been drawn into the world war of 1914.

On the morrow of the armistice, rightly or wrongly, we thought that recovery in this country depended on the renewal of our western colonization policy. But when we resumed that unfinshed task, our means were still more limited than at the beginning of the century. In fact, to the all too heavy load of debt inherited from the war had to be added the debt of the national railways.

The financial collapse of 1929 brought about general depression and added to our difficulties. In the following decade we have been forced, so to speak, to meet emergencies with risky remedies which were no more than palliatives.

Last September, as Canada was struggling hopelessly against increasing difficulties, by means of a vacillating policy of experiments and improvisation, she was once more thrown into another war adventure which will entail an effort of far greater importance than any previously attempted. Though this year's budget is not so explicit on this point, that is what may be gathered from it.

Canada must win the war, even though it be a long one. We know when we voluntarily and freely declared war, but we do not know when we shall be able voluntarily and freely to end it. Of one thing there is no question: we must finance the war and produce all that is necessary to carry it on. To that end, we must shape our effort to conform with our economic development.

Prior to the opening up of western Canada and for more than fifty years, lumber was the dominating factor of our production. From 1900 to 1920 wheat rivalled in importance with lumber, but after the war our water powers, our pulp industry and our mining industry developed to such an extent that wheat and lumber lost their predominance and in certain instances their surpluses became embarrassing.

It is therefore clear that our prosperity and the result of the present war depend for the most part on our mining and oil industries expanding sufficiently to make up for the decline of our other sources of wealth. Here should be emphasized the important and necessary part which eastern Canada must play in the readjustment of our economic life. Indeed, there must be borne in mind the essential and undeniable fact that it is in eastern Canada that are found the most durable and abundant factors of our wealth—gold, nickel, asbestos, copper, oil, and wood pulp.

There you have, Mr. Speaker, on the geographical basis, what should be the two bulwarks of our whole financial structure—the northeastern coast of Quebec which undeniably secretes inestimable and little-known wealth and, to the south, the so sadly neglected Gaspe peninsula.

The St. Lawrence, that great artery which separates them, brings us quite naturally to central Canada and the wealthy mining districts of northwestern Quebec and northern Ontario, with, to the south, a vast industrialized area capable of making proper use of all these raw materials. In this way we do not neglect the physical aspect of the problem and we logically take into account the requirements as well as the advantages of the natural order of things.

We shall inevitably have to recognize that, in order to restore a true and stable prosperity to Canada and to save the west which is incapable of reestablishing itself by its own efforts, it is not only essential but urgent that eastern Canada be placed in a position to produce to its full capacity according to the conditions peculiar to it.

Eastern Canada owes it to itself to help out the west, which it has helped to create. There is therefore no conflict of interests. economic reestablishment of eastern Canada will bring forth a Canadianism which should have for its object and result the conciliation of the interests of both sections which complete each other by their diversity. replaced in its true axis, Canada will more easily solve many of its other problems, such as that of its railways and of a balanced distribution of its population. It is not by making up year after year the deficit of our railway system that we shall solve our railway problem, and the back-to-the-land policy will never produce results unless it is preceded by a policy of bringing prosperity back to the land. In the same way, before thinking of attracting a flow of immigration to Canada, we should seek to ensure the welfare and the rational increase of our own population.

The government who will to-morrow deserve and receive the confidence of the people will be the one who, inspired by a spirit of true Canadianism, will work for the prosperity of Canada according to the interests and the needs of Canada. But, in order that such a policy may not be vitiated by narrow nationalistic and selfish monopolistic tendencies, it should be applied according to the eternal principles of social justice whose triumph we are seeking to ensure by the great sacrifices we are making in the present war.

If it is right and just to recognize that we are the heirs of the great nations of the old continent, it is no less right and just to say that we should not go so far as to follow them in their errors and even to die of their diseases. It is useless to seek theories, systems and doctrines to ensure this rebirth of our economy if we persist in looking only to the material and pagan side which offers us nothing but sophisms and utopias. The true methods are those which Christianity has long taught us. They interfere with nothing but the cupidity of shady finance, the defects of our monetary system and the venality of our public life.

The time has come, after so many warnings, to avert the danger, because there is not only evolution but revolution. We will manage to carry our heavy responsibilities if we set ourselves to our task with courage and resolution. Let us not doubt our strength, our spirit of sacrifice, our patriotism. We will fail only if we lack intelligence and determination.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) has presented us with a budget. This budget contains new impositions of taxes, some of them reaching into the money barrels of the rich, others reaching into the somewhat depleted pockets of the not so rich. The budget further promises to our people a deficit of some $750,000,000, and all of this is to be added to our already huge and hopeless national debt. Finally, there is a possibility that before snow falls, supplementary estimates may be introduced, and an additional revenue may be required over and above the estimates already presented.

I should like to make it clear at this point that the progressive views of the group in this corner are not at all in accord with any form of taxation. We believe in interest-free money created by our national Bank of Canada for the people of Canada. But in order "to make the best of a poor proposition," as the leader of our group so ably put it the other day, I have the following suggestions I should like to suggest at least to make. two new sources of revenue which have evidently been overlooked, and in return I should like to ask for a reconsideration of one of the proposals already included in the budget. In making these suggestions I have borne in mind that taxing unessential or dispensable services is fair, but taxing the fundamental necessities of life or low salaries is unfair.

I suggest first that the government tax large-scale advertising, yes, and tax it heavily Admittedly a moderate amount of advertising is necessary in order to familiarize the public with the products on the market; but this advertising should be strictly informative. You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of our advertising in this country is not strictly of that type. Those who have heard day after day the virtues of Lydia Pinkham's vegetable compound exthose whose wives have listened hour upon hour to nothing but soap programmes; those who have found their doorstep littered with handbills that nobody ever reads, will agree with me that some of these advertisements are nothing but business luxuries, and therefore should be taxed. In Great Britain the government has abolished brand names for many essential commodities. The British people are accordingly able to buy the goods they need. We on the other hand buy brand names, with some goods thrown into the bargain.

Advertising is not appreciably touched by either the income tax or the excess profits tax; therefore it should be taxed directly.

It is a well known fact that large corporations escape the excess profits tax by resorting to excessive advertising. A tax on advertising would assist in curbing this tendency. Let us suppose for a moment that a heavy tax on advertising would tend to reduce the volume of advertising. Then the costs of consumption will be lowered, and the good effects of such a move will be felt everywhere. The amount of money spent on advertising in Canada may be readily quoted and the revenue derivable therefrom estimated. But let it suffice at this time to say that this important source of a possible revenue has been pointed out to the government.

Now I wish to indicate the second possible source of revenue. The interest on Canada's national debt for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1939, is given at $127,995,616.75, the total debt of Canada being $3,710,610,592.87. There is also a good prospect that this debt will increase rapidly and culminatively. Suppose the government with its newly acquired powers over material resources cut all the interest in half. That would mean a saving of about $60,000,000 to the dominion government. And now what about provincial debts, municipal and private debts? The same formula could be applied to all debts, and if the federal government embarked on such a progressive plan I am sure that the provincial social credit government of Alberta would not interfere in any way.

Some may say that a number of small investors have their savings in government bonds. These can and should be exempt. But if the government invokes the sanctity of contract idea and the fact that interest cannot be cut, then I say, levy a tax on excessive savings, which would have the same effect. Call it by any name you like; apply any legal technicalities you like, but excessive savings should not be used as a profitmaking scheme by any plutocrat during this time of national peril. Why should one investing in property or a small business pay a tax while a mortgage company investing in a relatively safe security should be allowed to go practically scot-free?

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) upon having inaugurated interest-free government bonds. That is a really progressive step, and I urge that this method of raising money be exploited to the fullest, not only for the response it will bring from our people but to induce our banks and mortgage and insurance companies to invest in interest-free government bonds. To call buying bonds carrying 3½ per cent interest patriotic is ridiculous. Patriotism surely has a nobler meaning than that.

I am happy also to congratulate the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) on the progressive ideas he expressed in this chamber the other day on the subject of finance.

We must adapt ourselves rapidly to the ever-changing and threatening conditions of our day. Dinosaurs became extinct through their inability to adapt themselves to the changing environment in the earlier geological ages. Only those animals survived which were intelligent and adaptable. Let us not identify ourselves with those archaeological fossils which are now being dug up on the banks of the Red Deer river, but rather let us be among those who are sufficiently intelligent to adapt themselves to the new economics as our evolution demands. Let us be the survivors out of this chaos of war abroad and poverty at home.

The present war has forced upon this government the conscription of the natural resources of this country, and we hope to see a beginning made soon. The progressive element in this house has over a considerable period of time tried to convince the government of the necessity of adopting new ideas. After all, Mr. Speaker, how long will a hen have to sit on a round white object before she realizes it is not an egg but a doorknob? In my opinion orthodox finance is that door-knob, and I am sure I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, who the disappointed hen is. No wonder that in the past the results have been so disappointing.

Translating these suggestions into cash value, I believe that the government could remit some of the national defence revenue tax by exempting it at the same level as the income tax, namely, $750 and $1,500 respectively. After all, this none-exemption hits the poor man most. Our people are willing to share the burden to the limit of their ability to pay, but when there are other unexplored avenues of revenue the government should not take away money which is earmarked for the fundamental necessities of life, namely food, clothing and shelter.

Let me summarize. I suggest that a higher level of exemption be set under the national defence revenue tax, and that in its place the government levy a tax on excessive advertising. I also suggest that the government reduce by fifty per cent the interest rate on debts, be they our national, provincial, municipal or private debts.

To reaffirm the position and the views of the group in this corner, I wish to quote from a book written by one whose name we cherish [Mr. Hlynka.] dearly; I refer to the late John Buchan. In his book entitled "A Prince of the Captivity" he has this to say, at page 308:

As for the press, it does not greatly matter, since the press is not an independent power. But there is a great and potent world which the governments do not control. That is the world of finance, the men who guide the ebb and flow of money. With them rests the decision whether they will make that river a beneficent flood to quicken life, or a dead glacier which freezes wherever it moves, or a torrent of burning lava to submerge and destroy. The men who control that river have the ultimate word. Now most of them mean well, but they do not see far, and they are not very clever; therefore they are at the bidding of any man who is long-sighted and a master of strategy. Such a man has the future of the world—the immediate future of the world—the his hands.

Then on page 309 the writer, referring to the same subject, has this to say:

He is moving money but capriciously, without any wise purpose. I do not think that he cares greatly for wealth, but he is scornfully amassing it—nothing more. He has persuaded finance to trust him in America, in France, to some extent in Britain—and the trust is not misplaced, for he will earn for it big dividends. He provides loans for many lands, but at too high a price, for he exacts in return a control over certain things which in no land should be under foreign control. He has his pound of flesh, and the flesh is taken from vital parts of the body. Therefore his loans do not benefit. They tide over a monetary difficulty, but in the end they cripple recovery—and they may kill it.

And lastly, on page 310 the writer has this to say:

He is at present a dark angel in the world, but could his power be reorientated otherwise he might be an angel of light.

I ask the members of this hon, house to pay tribute to the memory of the author by taking to heart his noble and prophetic words.

In closing may I say that it appears to me, as a new member, that at this particular time the government does not care to have any criticism come its way. To me it is quite an experience to mark the attitude of the government. In perusing some clippings from newspapers I find some timely remarks on the subject of criticism. For instance, in the Ottawa Citizen of May 27, 1940, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is reported to have said in an address at the opening of the Canadian Legion's eighth dominion convention:

If you want to criticize be not afraid to criticize, for we need all the united strength and courage of this nation.

I was pleased to see this view expressed by the minister. In the same newspaper, on April 23, is a dispatch headed "Criticizing Decisions of Statesmen is Duty". The report reads:

Toronto, April 23.—Citizens have a right and a duty to criticize "the difficult decisions of our statesmen," Doctor R. C. Wallace, principal of Queen's university, told 800 members of the Industrial Accident Prevention Associations to-day.

"We can only criticize, however, if we are prepared to assume a personal responsibility as citizens. Otherwise we should keep quiet."

I do not think I need make any apology for quoting from these articles, some of which may have been overlooked by hon. members. I will, however, cite only one other reference which appears in the same newspaper on April 26, 1940. Doctor R. C. Wallace, principal of Queen's university and formerly of Alberta university, addressed a meeting at Ottawa, and the report states:

He spoke of the perils to freedom from within, for which, he said, the people of Canada must ever be on guard. In looking for dangers outside, the dangers within were apt to be overlooked. If this responsibility was disregarded or was only a partial success, it was the fault of the individual. In speaking of persons with minority views, the speaker said they must be courageous enough to express them, and if this were not done, the democratic system would soon give way to a dictatorial rule.

Doctor Wallace asserted that, by and large, the people who stand for election are a "shade" more intelligent than the rest and usually had good judgment and were relatively wise. Opinions of those outside a government were always necessary, he said, and he spoke of the leaders of opposition in federal and provincial governments who strive to find flaws in governmental action and propose changes.

I quote these words in order to impress upon the government the importance of broadmindedness on every occasion, because theirs is the responsibility to-day. In this connection I recollect an interesting poem written by Alfred Noyes in 1914. When the British were fighting the Germans and throwing their searchlights over the sea in search for German submarines, the poet, in a little poem entitled "Searchlights", urged his countrymen:

And "search in thine own soul", they cry; For there, too, lurks thine enemy.

He gave the British people to understand that the real enemy is not always outside; and if there is no enemy in our own hearts, if there is no enemy right among us, among our own people, then there is no external enemy that can ever subdue either this nation or the British empire.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): May I first of all compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) upon his budget. I do not believe there has ever been a time when this nation has faced such dangers as it does to-day, nor has there been a time when such huge taxation has been proposed in any budget, and I am of the opinion that there has never been a budget that has been accepted by our people more gracefully than this one will be. I am only sorry that the people in the country did not have the opportunity I had of hearing the minister present that budget. Those of us who had the privilege could not help being impressed with his sincerity of purpose. There are a great many people throughout Canada who will not agree with him, and I may say at the outset that the member for Kamloops is one of them. It would be impossible, however, for a Minister of Finance or of any other department of government to bring down measures that would meet with the approval of all the people. That cannot be. As I say, with many of the things in the budget I do not agree. In the first place, I do not think that even in a time of war we should interfere with essential services, and when I speak of essential services I mean the social services that exist to-day. Pensions to the blind, old age pensions and so on should not be interfered with. On the contrary, even when we are at war, I suggest that we should reduce the age limit and increase the amount to be paid in the form of old age pensions.

I regret that the Speaker himself is not in the chair, not that I have any objection to you yourself, sir, but the Speaker is from the west and what I shall say now he would probably understand better than you will, coming as you do from the east. At one time in Calgary we had a publication known as the Calgary Eye Opener. The editor, Bob Edwards, once formulated a prayer in which he said: "God grant that we do not lose our sense of proportion." In my opinion there are in this budget a number of places in which we seem to have lost our sense of proportion. There are throughout the budget many instances in which the same provisions are made this year as were made last year, and here I refer to statutory pensions of five, six, seven, eight and sometimes ten thousand dollars. We are told that the country is at war and that we are expected to have equality of service and of sacrifice. If that is to obtain, then I think one of the things we should eliminate, and eliminate at once, is the national defence tax of two per cent on incomes of $600 and $1,200. There should be no taxation on incomes lower than $750 and $1,500. It is a well known fact that these are the minimum amounts that are needed for people in these respective categories to obtain the necessities of life, to say nothing of the luxuries. I do not believe the people of Canada want luxuries to-day, but in the interests of the nation I think they should have the necessities of life, and when you begin taxing below these standards the people cannot provide the necessities.

I have here an editorial taken from the Kamloops Sentinel. The people in my constituency are mostly farmers and workers; there are no people of the wealthy class. There are many who are well to do—in my opinion people with an income in excess of $3,000 a year are well to do—but the incomes of the great majority of the people in my constituency do not exceed $1,500. The editor wrote an interesting editorial which I think ought to be put on Hansard. I quote:

Attention Mr. Ralston.

If the talk coming to the Sentinel's ear represents, as this newspaper believes it does, a cross-section of the public opinion, Colonel the Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of Finance and presently Minister of National Defence for Canada, has seriously underestimated the willingness of the citizenry to pay through the nose for the satisfaction of wiping Hitler and his noisome tribe from the face of the globe. The people of Kamloops, the Sentinel has been told by several, believe that Mr. Ralston's budget, brought down in the House of Commons on Monday, does not tax them severely enough. As ordinary wage-earners they are, of course, a bit pleased that so much of their pay-cheques remains their own, but as opponents of Hitlerism they say the levies imposed do not accurately measure their desire, even anxiety, to be done with the nazi corporal and his lackey, the butcher boy of fascism.

I quote that to show that while I disagree with some of the provisions of the budget, the people whom I have the honour to represent are of the opinion that we should pay more than the Minister of Finance has asked of us. But it is those who make more than $750 and $1,500, single and married respectively, who should bear the burden of the taxation.

One thing I regard as an illustration of false economy affects my own constituency. but I mention it not because it affects that constituency but because it illustrates the point. For a number of years we have had at Tranquille sanatorium a large herd of cattle which provided beef for the institution, the surplus being sold. In connection with that work the dominion government had an experimental range station. In the constituency of Kamloops large numbers of cattle are raised, and the experiments carried on there have been of great assistance to the cattle industry of that region. To give hon. members some idea of the size of some of those stock ranches may I say, Mr. Speaker, that one such ranch in the Nicola valley has 125 miles of fencing. The experimental work carried on there has not only increased the [Mr. O'Neill.] quality of the product, but has also increased the ability of these ranches to maintain stock. Now, however, to save $9,000 a year, principally in wages and salaries, we are going to do away with this station. I believe that the cutting out of essential services of this kind is false economy. This government has spent thousands of dollars to bring this work to its present point, but now the entire experiment is to be scrapped. It was intended to be a tenyear programme; it has been maintained for only six years and now it is to be dropped for the sake of $9,000. I do not believe that sort of economy will pay; I do not think that should be done. In the name of economy we are putting more men out of employment and on the relief rolls. If there is anything other than the war that should be considered at this time surely it is the unemployment we have had in this country for the last ten years. Nothing will undermine the morale of people to the extent that it will be undermined by their being unemployed year after year, with all their hopes frustrated and absolutely nothing in sight but to continue on relief.

As I have said already, there is no doubt that the Minister of Finance is one of the most sincere men in this house. I do not doubt that for a moment, but in my opinion the Minister of Finance, as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and every other member of the cabinet, do not have enough opportunities to get out and rub elbows with the common people, as the ordinary member of parliament does. I understand it is the intention to increase the size of the cabinet. If that is to be done, I think an extra cabinet minister should be provided to take the place of each minister for two weeks at a time so that the ministers may visit their constituencies, travel throughout the country and see for themselves the conditions that exist. They cannot do that while sitting behind a mahogany desk. Why, they do not even have time to read their correspondence. I know that for a fact, and I am not saying this with a desire to be critical at all.

To change the subject for a moment, on June 29 occurred one of the most important events to take place in British Columbia for a long time. I refer to the official opening of the Big Bend highway, the last link in the trans-Canada highway between Fort William and Vancouver. That road opens up about seven hundred miles of the finest mountain and valley scenery to be found anywhere on this continent. For some distance that highway goes over the old Cariboo road built by the Royal Engineers at the time of the gold rush to the Cariboo in the sixties, and portions of the old road are still in use. Any hon, members from the east who have any idea of visiting the west would be well advised to drive over that road, because I do not think comparable scenery can be found anywhere else in North America.

A few moments ago I said that the two per cent national defence tax should be lifted. I do not believe that tax should apply to people earning small salaries. Of course if the Minister of Finance removes one tax he must impose other taxation to take its place, and I have a suggestion to offer. No doubt this suggestion will make me about as popular as a skunk in a hen roost; nevertheless it is my firm conviction that this revenue could be obtained elsewhere. This is my suggestion. I believe any member of this house or any member of the government or of the civil service receiving more than $3,500 should accept a ten per cent reduction on their salary as long as this war continues. That would remove the necessity for imposing taxation on people receiving less than $750 and $1,500 respectively yearly. Personally I am quite prepared to accept a reduction of $100 on every $1,000 I earn. That would take $400 from me, but I am quite prepared to have that $400 taken, in addition to the taxes imposed under this budget.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I believe some changes are due in our tariff and patent laws with regard to radios. Some radio sets which can be bought in the United States for $9 cost about $15 in this country, and I am given to understand that this difference results from our tariff and patent laws. I believe something should be done to relieve the poor people of that burden. Many people cannot afford other kinds of amusement and must depend entirely on their radios. I do not believe those people should have to pay the prices charged for radios in Canada. Consideration also should be given to the removal of the licence fee on battery sets. The poor people in those parts of the country without electricity, who must depend on battery sets, pay enough for their radios without having to pay a licence fee of $2.50, and I think we might very well do away with that extra tax.

Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made this statement:

However, national sacrifice, as I interpret the term, means sacrifice by all the people of the nation according to their respective abilities to make and sustain sacrifices.

Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely in agreement with that, and I believe every member of parliament is included among those who are able to make that sacrifice, and to maintain it. I believe that is in line with the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition if I correctly understand the phraseology.

Later on he says:

A sacrificial tax, which would affect even the humblest in Canada, would have had a tremendous effect in awakening our people. Others realize the necessity for such an awakening.

I am in direct opposition to that. I do not believe that is necessary. If there is one class of people in Canada which does realize what is going on, and which is ready to make the necessary sacrifice, it is the poor people who have made sacrifices for the last ten years. Even with the small degree of protection they have received under our democratic system they are still ready to pay, and they still believe in that system. I do not think we require a tax on those people to awaken them to their responsibilities; they are already awakened.

Concluding his observations yesterday the leader of the opposition made an impassioned appeal to get on with the war. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in agreement with that. But I can recall that since May 16, day after day and week after week we have been bombarded from the other side of the house with speeches dealing with the necessity for a national government. Hon, members opposite went so far as to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should be removed from office. They even went so far as to suggest who should be his successor, and to name a number of other men who should be included in the cabinet. But I would call to your attention, sir, the fact that every one of those named at that time had been repudiated by the people of Canada, and in some instances repudiated by the Conservative party itself. Yet the suggestion was made that those people should be taken into the cabinet.

Any person walking into the House of Commons yesterday and hearing the leader of the opposition, and not having had—I was going to say the privilege, but one can scarcely call it that—the opportunity of sitting here during the past month and listening to what has been going on in the opposition benches, would have had the idea that the only people who really wanted to get on with the war were the members of the opposition.

I do not think that is the fact, at all. When we are speaking of a national government we must consider carefully the point of view. So far as I am concerned I believe the Liberal party as constituted in the house at the present time represents more truly a national party than does any other party in the house. I do not say that with any intention of criticizing any of the smaller groups. Naturally a group of eight men does not have the same opportunity to represent all classes as it would have if it were comprised of one hundred and eighty men. When I speak of a national party I mean a party representing all classes of people throughout the country. We do not have a national party if we have a party representing nothing but labour Neither do we have a national party if we have a party representing nothing but professional men. That could not be a national party. I believe the Liberal party as at present constituted in the house more nearly represents a national party than does any of the others.

Following that argument one is led to the conclusion that those who agree with me must agree when I say that in order to have a national government, all classes must be represented in that government. Whether or not we have that to-day to the desired degree is, of course, a matter of opinion. I leave hon. members to decide for themselves whether in their opinion it is a national government.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have decided.

Mr. POULIOT: Shut up.

Mr. O'NEILL: I believe it was the day before yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made one of the finest speeches to which I have listened during the present session. He spoke particularly with respect to excess profits, and pointed out that in his judgment they should not be permitted. May I say at once that I am in complete agreement with that observation. The very life, the very existence of our country is at stake, and the last thing industry should expect to have to-day is any measure of excess profits.

However, working from the same set of figures used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, yesterday afternoon the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) built up a case in direct opposition to that built up by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will build up another one to-morrow.

Mr. O'NEILL: I shall be here to listen. I do not know which of these highly informed gentlemen is correct. But one thing I do know: Any well directed organization, whether it be governmental, labour, or what have you, must be guided by the will of the majority. At the present time in the House of Commons the majority happens to be in the Liberal [Mr. O'Neill.]

party. And while I do not agree with the Minister of Finance, yet I do say he has the backing of the very large majority of the Liberal party. That being so, and the Liberal party being the largest in the house, naturally I am going to go along with that majority when in the opinion of the minister the taxation he has laid out in respect of excess profits is going to go farther by way of taking excess profits from the manufacturer than the legislation in operation in England to-day. Whether or not that is right, as I said before I do not know. I do not think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is a lawyer. If not, he has possibly missed his calling, because he did build up a very strong case, while the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount built just as strong a case to prove the opposite argument.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the hon. member leaves his eulogy of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, would he be good enough to inform the house as to whether or not he is going to support the amendment offered by that hon. member?

Mr. POULIOT: That is his own business.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I have sat in this house for a number of sessions, and have listened with impatience to many long speeches. But I have not interrupted other hon. members, and I do not think interruptions come with very good grace from the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I apologize.

Mr. O'NEILL: I do not think it is good form for a front bencher in the party opposite to rise and question a back bencher who is attempting to make one of the speeches he makes only once in four or five months. So far as the question asked is concerned, when voting on the amendment I shall vote in the manner I believe to be in the best interests of Canada.

Yesterday, when listening to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, I was reminded of the observations of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who said there were liars, damned liars, and statistics. I believe he was quite right in what he said about statistics. I do not know about the others, but with regard to statistics I would say that he was absolutely right.

Another suggestion I have to make to the Minister of Finance has to do with the interest rate on farm loans. I believe that rate is out of all reason and proportion. It certainly should be lowered. Another matter this government should look into is the profiteering that is going on in rentals. Rents are going up out of all reason. The hon member for New Westminster made an appeal the other evening to the Minister of Finance to reduce the interest rate to  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. I am in agreement with that suggestion as far as it goes, but to my mind it does not go far enough.

I doubt if anyone understands our money system, but if I understand it, I believe that to-day we are not using money, we are using the credit of the country. I believe we have as good a financial system as any other country in the world, but I should like to see it maintained. In my opinion the only way by which it can be maintained is to take the national credit and use it without having to pay a tribute to any private individual. Unless we do that, we cannot hope to continue with this rate of taxation and adding to the public debt to the tune of approximately a billion dollars a year. If this continues there will be a total collapse of our present financial structure. Thousands of people have put all their savings into bonds in order that they may enjoy the interest therefrom in the afternoon and evening of their lives. If we brought about reforms in our monetary system and prevented its total collapse, that would be much better than to continue to go on in the way we have been going.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. O'NEILL: The members from Alberta say "hear, hear". I have a great deal of respect for the members of the social credit party, but I have not joined that party. The other day the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) called attention in an eloquent speech to the many fine things Alberta had done. I do not disagree with what he said, but that province has done some things which are hardly to its credit and which have reacted disastrously against my province, which I consider to be the banner province of the Dominion of Canada. Certain municipalities in British Columbia purchased Alberta bonds in good faith. They used the interest received from those bonds to keep up their schools. When the government of Alberta said arbitrarily that the rate was not to be what they contracted to pay, the revenues of those municipalities were reduced and they had to raise the money in some other way. I am not saying this in criticism of the government of Alberta; I am merely calling attention to it in order to point out that that is what the Dominion of Canada is going to have to do if it keeps on financing the way it has been.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear. Now you are talking.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, you were pot in the chair when I first started to speak. I want to tell you now that I am pleased that you have been appointed Speaker. So far you have been quite fair in your rulings and I believe you will continue to be. I am pleased to note the progress you have made with the other official language. Being acquainted with your pronounced and musical accent, I wondered just how it would sound when you said the prayers in the other official language. You have made wonderful progress. In my humble opinion the two official languages of this country should be made a compulsory study in our schools, both public and private.

Last summer I had the honour and privilege of attending an international labour convention in Geneva, being sent there by our late lamented former Minister of Labour, the Hon. Norman Rogers. Forty-six democratic countries were represented at that conference by 335 delegates. The majority of those delegates could speak another language in addition to their native tongue. About 90 per cent of them were not fluent in English, but they could speak French quite readily. French is one of the two official languages of the League of Nations and the international labour office. Since so many people of this type have a knowledge of French, and since it is one of the official languages of this country, why should it not be made a compulsory study in our schools?

Every member of this House of Commons could use a knowledge of French to great advantage. Many excellent speeches are delivered in French in this house, but those speeches are not available to many of us until they appear in Hansard the next morning. Therefore, quite often they are lost to us entirely. A knowledge of French would prove of great benefit to us. Very few of us who studied Latin in our school days get very much from that language. I agree that the time spent in studying Latin is not lost entirely, but one does not get the advantage from a study of that language that one would from a study of French.

Since attending this conference last year I have wondered what has happened to many of the people I met there. Right across from me sat the representatives of the Polish government. Since that time Poland has been overrun by Germany and Russia. Propaganda has been circulated, whether truthful or not we do not know, to the effect that the better educated people of that country have been done away in some manner or another.

I should like to say a word in connection with labour. Many references have been made to our front line of defence. At this conference were representatives of labour, representatives of employers and governmental representatives. Almost without exception the 335 delegates were of the opinion that organized labour was the first line of defence in a democratic country. At the time when Hitler was aspiring to power, Germany was one of the most highly organized countries in the world. Hitler, in order to bring labour to its knees, enlisted the services of organized capital and industry and completely destroyed labour as such. His next move was to enlist the military for the destruction of capital and industry, and he brought about the complete destruction of industry as an organized effort. Then he had the purge of the army when generals who disagreed with him were shot. Knowing these things, the delegates were of the opinion that organized labour was the first line of defence in any democratic country, and knowing these things, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am out of order to-day when, speaking of a national party and a national government, I suggest that in order to have a truly national government, Labour and the farmers of this dominion must be represented.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make some observations on the budget I should like first to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill), who has just taken his seat. It has been most refreshing to hear a supporter of the present government express opinions which differ so widely from the government policies so far carried out. I was particularly interested in his protest against taxes being levied on single persons with incomes of $600 a year and on married people with $1,200 a year. I think his point was very well taken.

I should like to speak this afternoon chiefly about an industry which has been aptly described by a member of this house as the forgotten industry—agriculture. Perhaps I should not say forgotten because so far as the budget is concerned the farmer will carry his full share of the load of increased taxation. He will find that the cost of living and the cost of operating will drastically increase, without any assurance that he will receive for his product a price which will give him the cost of production.

I was interested also in the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) yesterday afternoon. I [Mr. O'Neill.] was interested in learning that he has in his constituency the largest group in any constituency in Canada who will be affected by the increases in the income taxes. May I also congratulate him upon having in his constituency five hon. members of this house, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) and another cabinet minister. I was delighted to hear that he had not received from his constituents a single criticism of the increase in the income tax. But that is not surprising because the important thing is not how much income tax you pay, but how much, after you have paid your tax, you have left with which to keep the wolf from the door.

I have examined the minister's table at page 1027 of Hansard and have made some calculations with respect to the people living in the province of Saskatchewan. Referring to the column showing the amount of tax paid by married persons with no dependents, I find that with an income of $10,000 in Saskatchewan you will be required to pay dominion income tax, national defence tax and provincial income tax amounting in all to $2,658.25, but you will still have left to spend, on the basis of 300 working days in a year—50 weeks, 6 days to the week—the sum of $24.47 per day. Other incomes work out as follows:

$ 10,000 15,000 20,000 50,000	5,450 88 8,546 00 30,937 15	$ 24 47 31 83 38 18 63 54 *127 77

* Minus.

The hon, member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) asks me who pays the deficit in the case of the last mentioned income. I want to assure him he need lose no sleep worrying about anyone in Saskatchewan because there will be no such individual; he exists only in statistics. In the province of Saskatchewan we have very few people in receipt of large incomes. According to the information I have received, in the whole province of Saskatchewan last year, 1938-39, only four reported receiving incomes of $20,000 or over. I wished to find out whether we had any people in our province receiving incomes of $50,000, but I was told that it was not in the public interest to break down the figures in the larger brackets by provinces, and that it was done just for the whole dominion. In 1938-39 we had four in Saskatchewan with an income of $20,000 or over, and in previous years the figures were as follows:

Year	Number receiving over $20,000 in Saskatchewan	Number in Canada receiving over $50,000	Number of farmers in Saskatchewan paying income tax
1938-39	 4	457	103
1937-38	 7	382	180
1936-37	 5	300	142
1935-36	 3	304	96
1934-35	 5	259	38

I was interested in the statement of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) yesterday that there were 457 people in Canada who had incomes over $50,000, and that they represented 17/100 of one per cent of the total taxpayers, yet they paid $17,289,365 in income tax or 36·17 of the total collected.

As I have said, I wish to confine my remarks chiefly to the problems of agriculture. Speaking on a previous occasion in this house I confined myself for the most part to the constituency which I represent, but this afternoon I should like to speak more about agriculture's place in our whole national economy.

Mr. Lew Hutchinson, chairman of the Alberta wheat pools, speaking before the Bracken conference on markets for western farm products, reminded his hearers that originally the tillers of the soil and keepers of the flocks and herds were The People. He pointed out that the business world we now. know was built up to serve the tillers of the soil and the keepers of the herds, and business has developed by serving those who produce the foodstuffs.

The farmers of Canada have been a generous group of society. They have worked long hours; they have lived simply, and they have provided for their servants in extravagant fashion. When I speak of their servants I have not in mind the dairymaid or the farmer's hired man, who share the hardships of farm life; I have in mind those other servants who live in large cities, who make the farmers' tools, who operate the grain exchanges, who supply the currency and the credit for the farmers. How extravagantly many of those servants have lived! A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of spending a week-end in the city of Montreal. There I saw some of the residential area. Although I am not familiar with the exact boundaries of the constituency of the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), I know that his riding includes Westmount, one of the finest residential districts of Montreal. I have visited other great cities; I have been in London, England: in New York, Chicago, Paris and a score of other cities internationally known, but I have never seen a larger number of beautiful residences in one locality than in the district represented by the hon, member for St. Antoine-Westmount. As I drove through that part of the city I asked my friends, "What have these people done in Canada to entitle them to live amid such surroundings?" I am sure the hon, member will agree with me that to reside in those beautiful residential areas and support the type of life necessary in those communities one would need an income of $50,000 and up. I asked my friend, "What have these people done?" And I believe my conclusion was right when I gathered that people all across Canada have had a share in the building of those homes: people from the Atlantic to the Pacific have poured wealth into that great city in order that a small handful of the Canadian people might be able to enjoy every benefit known to modern society.

I stood in the city of Toronto the other night. I was through the constituency which is represented by the hon. member for Rosedale. It is a beautiful district and contains many attractive homes. As I stood outside the union station and looked at the Royal York hotel, the friend who was with me said, "There is the largest hotel in the British empire." "Where did the money come from to build it?" I asked. Mr. Speaker, I thought of the farmers out in western Canada living on farms bought from the owners of that great hotel; farmers who work from early morning until late at night the whole year round, paying tribute in order that a big corporation might be able to build a hotel such as the Royal York. I submit that in our national economy we have not enabled those who provide the foodstuffs of the nation to live in the manner which is possible for those who have made their tools, who have run their transportation lines, who have operated the grain exchanges and the currency and credit of the country.

I do not wish to refer further to the constituency which I represent, but I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to a book, "The Case for Alberta", which will be found in the parliamentary library and which sets forth the problems of that province. I shall not weary hon. members with a lengthy discussion, but I should like them to consider the section which deals with interest, showing how the high rates paid by the agricultural provinces of the west have placed a heavy burden upon the people. The case is cited of a resident of Edmonton who bought in 1910 a property as a home and assumed a mortgage of $2,500 bearing the very common interest rate of 10 per cent. Although he has paid $5,275 on that loan of $2,500 he still owes $1,300. Scores of cases of that sort could be related, affecting city dwellers and agriculturists. There is a section of this book which points out what unfair freight rates have meant to the producers of Alberta. On page 163 will be found the following tabulation of carload lumber rates from Vancouver to prairie points, and from Mont Laurier, Quebec, to Ontario points of similar distances:

From—To	Miles	Rates in cents per 100 lbs.	Per cent difference (in favour of east)
Vancouver—Calgary	642	50
Mont Laurier—Glencoe	643	27
Difference.		23	85.1
Vancouver—Bassano	720	$52\frac{1}{2}$
Mont Laurier—Windsor	725	30
Difference.		$22\frac{1}{2}$	75.0
Vancouver—Edmonton	765	54
Mont Laurier—Sault Ste. Marie	782	$28\frac{1}{2}$
Difference.		$24\frac{1}{2}$	83.0

Another section discusses the difference in the cost of operating a car in western Canada as compared with parts of the dominion where people are fortunate in having good roads. It is estimated that the cost per mile of driving a car on a concrete road is 4.7 cents; on a road of intermediate type, 5.6 cents; but upon a low type of road, of which all the prairie provinces have a very high percentage, 6.13 cents.

Another section deals with the question of debt. The hon, member for Kamloops mentioned the fact that certain hardships had resulted from the policy of the Alberta government in failing to meet in full their debt obligations. I have never supported the theories advocated by the present government of Alberta, but hon, members should be fair. The government of Alberta had to meet the problem of feeding, clothing and attending to the various needs of their people. They had also to face the question of satisfying debt obligations undertaken in years gone by when the farmers and other people of the province anticipated high prices for what they had to sell. The people of Alberta had to decide whether they were to pay 100 cents on the dollar of their obligations and have their people suffer, or make some change in their payment to those who had loaned them money and see to it that the province maintained the necessary social services. I believe that, as the hon. member has pointed out, the dominion government will be confronted at some time with the same problem and will have to do exactly what the government of Alberta has done. So much for the case of Alberta.

I would recommend also to hon, members a study of Manitoba's case, the text of which will be found in the parliamentary library. It informs us of what has been done in other parts of the empire and other countries of the world with a view of assisting those engaged in agriculture. On page 21 of part VIII will be found a discussion of what Australia has done to benefit her agricultural population. It is pointed out in the report that during the first year of the depression Australia depreciated her pound in terms of the British pound, so that one hundred British pounds would buy one hundred and twenty-five Australian pounds. This meant that the Australian farmer who sold his wheat at Liverpool for £100 British could get in terms of Australian money, not £100 but £125. As a result of the Australian government's exchange policy, the Australian farmer got 25 per cent more for his wheat in Australian money than he would have got if the Australian pound had not been depreciated. Instead of following a similar policy here we followed a policy that had the opposite effect. The dominion government actually allowed the value of Canadian money to rise in terms of the British pound, so that the wheat producers, instead of getting 25 per cent more, actually got, in 1931, 3.4 per cent less; in 1932, 18.3 per cent less and in 1933, 6.2 per cent less. There is a table here indicating the benefits that would have accrued to the Canadian farmer if a policy similar to Australia's had been carried out. For the six-year period the three prairie provinces would have benefited to the extent of $280,700,000, or an annual average amount of $46,800,000. It is pointed out here that while the Canadian wheat producer sold his wheat in Liverpool for British pounds for which he received only 96.6 cents on the dollar in 1931, the Canadian exporters of newsprint, metals, and so on, selling in the United States market, were getting American dollars for which they obtained 1.03 in 1931, 1.13 in 1932 and 1.08 in 1933.

There is given a detailed discussion of what was done in other countries throughout the world. In the United Kingdom the British government set aside over $125,000,000 during the period 1932 to 1936, or an average of $30,000.000 a year. In Australia they carried out a policy that had a definitely beneficial effect on the farmer. They distributed over $60,000,000 during the four-year period, an average of $15,000,000 a year. In the Argentine the policy was definitely beneficial to the farmers. In the United States, throughout the whole depression period, the resources of the federal government were mobilized with a view to assisting the farmer in one form or another. They did not lose sight of the fact that in Canada certain assistance had been given the farmer by the government, but they point out that the assistance given by Canada was given largely as a result of drought rather than with a view to placing agriculture on a sound economic basis. The report makes this statement:

Canada also undertook certain expenditures in connection with drought relief matters. These expenditures, of course, were not associated with those factors which caused the low prices experienced during the depression, but rather with climatic conditions which affected certain areas in western Canada. They were made to relieve distress rather than to put agriculture in the same relative position as other industries.

When these measures for the relief of agriculture, as an industry, as distinguished from those of human relief, are compared with the assistance which other countries have given to their wheat producers during the depression, we can reach no other conclusion than that agriculture is Canada's forgotten industry. On balance we have suffered far more from the tariff and monetary policies pursued by the dominion than we have benefited by all the financial contributions which were made to assist us. Moreover, when these contributions are compared with the disabilities which were created as a result of unfavourable dominion policies, we can reach no other conclusion than that, aside from the relief and rehabilitation plans, the part so far played by the dominion government, in respect to the agricultural depression in western Canada, has been a definitely negative one.

I submit that without any further delay we should recognize that agriculture is to play a very important part in war time as in peace time. It need scarcely be said that the supplying of human food is just as essential for victory as the supplying of bombing planes, submarines and munitions of every kind, and I think it is not unreasonable that those engaged in that great industry should have some assurance that if necessary they will have funds from the dominion government set aside to guarantee their costs.

I recommend that without any further delay legislation be introduced to provide for an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop, because the farmers of western Canada have experienced during the past few months, since marketing wheat, a constantly rising cost of production. Many have had no other source of income than from wheat. In the second place, I suggest that legislation should be introduced to guarantee parity of prices to the farmers in all parts of Canada. I recommend also that we have an advisory committee, with adequate grower representation, and also that we have a board which will see to it that the marketing of coarse grains is carried out in an orderly manner so that those engaged in the production of coarse grains may have at least their cost of production.

It is now six o'clock and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 4, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MONTREAL FINANCIAL SITUATION

Mr. ROY:

- 1. Has the government received representations from the Quebec government and the Montreal municipal authorities relative to the help the government could grant the city of Montreal to facilitate the solution of its financial difficulties?
- 2. If so, by whom, and to whom were such representations made?
- 3. What were such representations, and what was the government's reply?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Yes.

2 and 3. On May 14 a telegram was addressed to the Minister of Finance by Mr. J. M. Savignac, chairman of the executive committee of the city of Montreal, reading as fol-

"May 15 city has to meet maturities of six million dollars. City needs help from superior governments to meet emergency pending publication and enforcing of recommendations of Rowell-Sirois reports. Expecting immediate action on your part with the banks or otherwise in order to prevent default."

On May 14, the Minister of Finance replied to this telegram as follows:

"Acknowledging your telegram May 14, as the matter referred to is one which is and always has been regarded as entirely outside sphere of dominion jurisdiction and administration I am referring your telegram to the honourable provincial treasurer of Quebec."

CHARTERED BANKS-UNCLAIMED DAILY OVERAGES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Do the chartered banks report the amounts of unclaimed daily overages to the department?

2. If so, what amounts have been reported during the last fifteen years?

3. How frequently are these overages disposed of and in what manner?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. If this question relates to tellers' overages, the answer is that there is no requirement in the Bank Act or otherwise that tellers' "overages" and "shortages" should be reported to the Minister of Finance.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

*BRITISH CHILDREN-ARRANGEMENTS FOR RECEP-TION IN CANADA

Mr. BRUCE:

2. In view of the minister's statement regarding the unreliability of the radio, will he state whether his announcement as given over the radio on Saturday last, that Canada would take all the children that England would send, is true or not?

3. Has the government extended a definite invitation for (a) a limited number of British children, or (b) a general unlimited invitation to all children the British government cares to send; (c) if neither, what is the nature of the invitation?

Mr. CRERAR: I have looked at these questions, and also the statement I made on June 27. At the moment I believe there is nothing that can be usefully added to that statement.

[Mr. Roy.]

In regard to the second part of the question I may say that I made no announcement over the radio respecting this matter, on the date mentioned or on any other date. Under the circumstances I believe the question might be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could it stand for a day or two until I have an opportunity to consult with the hon. member?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no objection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certain parts of the minister's statement might bear further examination. I do not say he is wrong, but I should like to go into the matter further.

Question stands.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY-NEW BRUNSWICK CONTRACTS

Mr. HATFIELD:

- 1. Who was appointed by the New Brunswick government to make contacts between manufacturers of war materials and the war purchasing board?
- 2. How many personal interviews did this man have with the board, on what dates, and with what results?
- 3. How many contracts were awarded for the supplying of war materials in the province of New Brunswick since the outbreak of war, September 2, 1939?
- 4. What firms in the said province were awarded such contracts?

Mr. HOWE:

- 1. No knowledge.
- 2. No knowledge.
- 3. 443.
- 4. As follows:

WHEAT SALES TO UNITED KINGDOM AND FRANCE

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How much wheat of the 1939 crop, from the 1st August to date, was sold direct by the Canada wheat board to the representatives of the United Kingdom and France?

2. How much of such wheat was sold through the board's agents or members of the grain exchange, to the representatives of the United Kingdom and France?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

- 1. Cash wheat 3,994,000 bushels, futures 29,620,000 bushels.
- 2. These sales were made direct by the Canadian Wheat Board to the purchasing committee of the British Ministry of Food by direct cable negotiations.

[Mr. Howe.]

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS—WHEAT PRODUCTION

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent):

- 1. How much money did the western farmer receive in the fiscal year 1939-40 under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?
- 2. What was the total cost, including administration, of each of the above acts?
- 3. What was the total cost to the government as the result of the fixed price for wheat on the 1937-38 crop and the 1938-39 crop?
- 4. What material aid and assistance was given to the western farmer in the dried-out areas in 1936-37, 1937-38, and 1938-39?
- 5. Were any moneys paid under the Cooperative Marketing Act during the year ending March 31, 1940, and, if so, how much?
- 6. What was the total amount of wheat produced in the three western provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, in the years 1937-38 and 1938-39?

EUROPEAN WAR.

INQUIRY AS TO DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCES FOR MARRIED COUPLES EXTENDING HOSPITALITY TO REFUGEE CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) a question which is being asked by children's aid and welfare societies all across Canada. If a married couple take a refugee child and the man enlists or is conscripted after a month or so, would that refugee child be classed as a dependent and receive full dependent's allowance?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): This is a question which might be placed upon the order paper. It is addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston), and I shall direct his attention to it. I am sure he will make what disposition of it he desires to make.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If a married couple take a refugee child into their home to look after it for the duration of the war, would they be allowed the full $400 exemption for that child when making out their income tax return?

Mr. CRERAR: The same answer would apply.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

DECLARATION RESPECTING ILLEGAL ORGANIZATION—ORDER IN COUNCIL TABLED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to lay on the table of the house an order in council declaring illegal the organization known as Jehovah's Witnesses.

NATIONAL DEFENCE TAX

DEDUCTIONS AND REMITTANCES BY EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. O'BRIEN (Northumberland, N.B.): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) in connection with the national defence tax which is payable by employers. On page 3, of the ways and means resolutions, section 18, clause 2 reads:

That every employer be required to deduct the tax imposed in respect of earnings of the employee earned or accruing due during and after July, 1940.

This matter is of the utmost importance to employers, and perhaps the minister could explain how it is proposed to administer and control the tax so imposed.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman was good enough to let me know that he intended to ask this question. This is really a matter for my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley), but I know the hon, member is anxious to have the information. It was only a moment or two before the house opened that he spoke to me about the matter, so I took the liberty of calling the commissioner of income tax with regard to it. What is being done by the commissioner of income tax is to have posters placed in banks, post offices and offices of inspectors of income tax all over Canada calling the attention of employers and employees to the provisions of this measure. At the same time forms are being sent out to be lodged in all banks, post offices and offices of inspectors of income tax, which forms are to be completed by the employee. That is, the employee will make a statutory declaration as to his status, whether he is married or single and the number of children he has, in order that the rate of deduction may be ascertained and fixed by the employer. On the back of the form appears a resumé of the important provisions of the legislation in so far as they affect employers and employees. These forms will be readily available to employers all over the country and they are the forms to which reference is made.

The hon. gentleman will understand that in the short time between the bringing down of the budget and July 1, it has been impossible to communicate with all employers. However, I am assured by the office of the commissioner of income tax that if we could see the number of inquiries which are coming in from employers all over Canada with respect to the procedure to be followed, we would be certain there are very few who are not taking notice of the measure and doing their best to ascertain the best method whereby its provisions may be carried out.

In addition, a form is now being prepared which I understand is to be distributed this week. This form is being made as simple as possible and is to be used by employers in making remittances of deductions. Some time is being accorded to employers and employees to adjust themselves to the situation by reason of the fact that the first remittance is required to be made by employers on September 16. That is to say, the remittance to be made on that date will cover deductions made in July and August. I do not think there is anything more I can say at the moment in connection with the matter of procedure.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The deductions are to be made this week?

Mr. RALSTON: Deductions are to be made from wages earned on and after July 1.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): This may be a very simple matter, but it is giving a great deal of trouble. As I understand it, in the case of a seasonal employee the deduction must be made, and should the employee not become taxable, he must apply for a refund.

Mr. RALSTON: That is quite right.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

INQUIRY RESPECTING APPLICATION OF REGULATIONS —ESTABLISHMENT OF BRANCH OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): In the light of the impossible situation that appears to be obtaining in the passport offices at the present time, and the serious inconvenience to people who are being detained here because of inability to obtain passports, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or his government consider deferring the application of these regulations until July 15? This would enable urgent cases to get back to their homes. The government should also open up passport offices at those points where United States consuls are located. The situation is really serious. I know of many cases which are quite urgent, and I am not referring to people who simply want to make a visit. I think the Prime Minister might consider extending the latitude which is now granted to bus drivers and others.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If the matter rested in the hands of the Canadian government it would be a simple matter to arrange everything to meet the wishes of our own people, but these passport requirements are imposed by the United States government and a visa is required by some official of that government. Having regard to the tremendous pressure which has been placed upon the passport offices, the government is doing everything possible to have passports issued just as quickly as applications can be printed and personnel can be got together to distribute and issue the passports themselves. It must be remembered that a passport is an important legal document. It carries with it certain international obligations. It is not a document which should be issued without great care and caution on the part of the issuing government. Otherwise we would soon get into all kinds of difficulties. There is always the danger of fraud and not infrequently in the past it has been necessary to undertake prosecutions in connection with fraudulent passports. The government is opening temporary offices next week at Vancouver, Toronto, St. Stephen and Winnipeg. These offices will be opened on Monday next. I can assure the house that the passport office is doing everything it possibly can to hasten the issuing of passports that are required.

I may say that it is altogether probable that it will become increasingly difficult for persons who wish to travel simply for purposes of pleasure to receive passports for the purpose. That will help somewhat to relieve the pressure for passports at the present time. But in regard to the urgent class of cases of the kind, for example, which my hon. friend has mentioned, there is the strongest reason and the strongest desire to seek to meet the demand as rapidly as possible, and our officials are endeavouring to do that. my hon, friend has in mind any particular cases he would like to bring to my attention I shall make it a point to mention them specially to the passport office, but I hope that too many members will not accept that invitation.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 3, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. [Mr. Lockhart.]

Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, during the few minutes remaining at my disposal I should like to discuss a matter of concern to my constituency and to a large part of western Canada, namely, the Hudson bay route. While the Hudson strait and Hudson bay have never provided that short sea route to Asia which was the dream of many early mariners, these waters do provide a shorter route to Europe from one of the best wheat producing areas in the world. Those of us who looked forward to this shorter route to provide some relief for western Canada have been disappointed that the facilities provided have not been used to a greater extent. I have before me the annual report of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada for the year 1939, and at page 27 I find that for the crop year 1938-39, only 916,913 bushels were cleared through Port Churchill for overseas destination. In the same year we cleared from all our Canadian ports 116,931,215 bushels. But what disturbs me particularly, Mr. Speaker, is that in the very same year we cleared through the port of New York over 7.000,000 bushels, and through the port of Albany over 2,000,000 bushels. We cleared through United States ports in the same year a total of 12,157,315 bushels, or over 10 per cent of the quantity cleared through all Canadian ports.

Those who are familiar with the history of modern transportation will readily understand why there has been opposition to new modes of transportation. When the locomotive was introduced, tavern keepers and owners of turnpike companies were most violent in their opposition to the new method of transport. Farmers were agitated at the prospect of losing markets for horses and markets for hay. Agnes C. Laut in her book "The Romance of the Rails" tells of an eminent divine in the United States who predicted that the use of the modern locomotive would result in many insane asylums being required because people would be driven mad with terror at the sight of locomotives with nothing to draw them rushing across the country.

Mr. Robert R. Livingstone, a transportation mogul of the last century, writing from Albany in 1812 discussed the railroad as a mode of transportation and ridiculed the idea of a train moving along rails at the rate of four miles an hour. But, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the considered opinions of men like Mr. Livingstone, railway transportation has developed by leaps and bounds, and we in western Canada feel that the Hudson bay route might be used more extensively.

I appreciate the reply which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) made on June 14 to a question I had asked about a more extensive use of this route. I appreciate also the return he brought down for me showing the expenditures that have been made on various routes in Canada. One question I asked was:

1. How much was spent by the dominion government for dredging the St. Lawrence river and Montreal harbour, and for operating and administering the St. Lawrence ship channel during the years from 1935 to 1939?

The return showed that from 1935 to 1939 we spent $18,757,321.69 for dredging and $852,332,83 for operation and administration costs. In the same period we spent, under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, to compensate the railways for the difference between the tolls actually collected and the normal tolls, the amount of $13,279,872.09. During the same period we spent on capital construction $326,083.46, and for operating deficit, $1,472,388.40, or a total of $1,798,471.86 on the Hudson Bay Railway. Expenditures on harbours by the dominion government from 1935 to 1939 were as follows:

 Churchill.
 $ 926,942 57

 Montreal.
 7,040,559 36

 Vancouver.
 2,234,297 35

 Halifax.
 4,954,180 04

In conclusion, I hope the government will bear in mind that in western Canada we have large quantities of foodstuffs, pulpwood and minerals which will be of great assistance to the mother country, and I hope very careful consideration will be given to the movement of these commodities through the port of Churchill and, if necessary, to the sending of convoys to this port from time to time.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks on the budget by saying how privileged we are as members of the House of Commons to be presided over by one so well qualified as yourself, by every instinct and attainment, for the office of Speaker. I take some personal pride in being able to claim the Speaker of this house as a personal friend. I know something of his impartiality so far as private affairs are concerned, and the manner in which he has demonstrated that quality since his recent appointment has met, I am sure, with approval and favour in every part of this house.

I wish further to preface this address with a brief reference to the passing of the late Minister of National Defence. I knew the Hon. Mr. Rogers intimately. Although from time to time we on this side of the chamber found it necessary to disagree with his views and policies, it was never possible to question his motives. That, after all, is one of the most effective tributes which can be paid by a member of the opposition to the memory of one who held ministerial office, particularly at a time like this.

May I also in passing make reference to the fact that, since the election on March 26 last, we of the Conservative party have lost by death one of our most valuable members, Doctor A. B. Hyndman, member for Carleton. He was the man with whom I shared my office in this building, and I knew him favourably and well. I want to pay tribute this afternoon to his high qualities of character and mind and to the ability and capacity which the doctor brought to bear not only in his private life but in his capacity as a public man. In the loss of men of this calibre one cannot but feel that the hand of death falls beavily upon those engaged in public life, and that the losses which are thus sustained from time to time are not easily repaired.

Dealing with the budget, it seems to me that, more than any other which has been brought down in my experience, the present budget has widened the incidence of taxation. In other words, the Canadian taxpayer is going to feel the pinch in many directions. The pressure of war-time taxation is reaching further and deeper every hour. Yet there has been little or no complaint on that account. There may be objections as to the distribution of the taxation on the score of inequality, but there are and will be no complaints from the rank and file of Canadian citizens as to the taxation itself, because they are ready and willing to submit to these heavier burdens in order to pay for the freedom and the liberties which we enjoy.

When we speak of the sacrifices which are being made by our citizens under the terms of the new financial arrangements set out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston), may I point out what a very heavy burden is being borne by the working man, by the man who has not reached one of the higher income brackets. Of course he is not complaining, but perhaps the sacrifices he is making are not always realized by his wealthier fellow citizens. To take $10 from the man who has a surplus of only $12 or $13 is a vastly different matter from taking a percentage of their incomes from those who will still have a substantial surplus. Those men and women throughout the dominion who are making the kind of sacrifice to which I have referred are making a contribution second only to that of the men in the armed forces who carry such a heavy responsibility in this I am glad of the opportunity to welcome at this moment the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe), who has just entered the chamber in his military uniform. May I say to him that the warmth of the welcome which he has received this afternoon is not only an indication of the high regard in which he is held personally, but an evidence that in all sections of our country, including parliament itself, men are taking their part in the armed forces of the dominion to stop the ruthless aggressor nations which would smother us out of existence.

One of the things which must be adhered to closely in regard to the budget taxation proposals is the achievement of a real equality of sacrifice. This principle must be something more than mere words. It should have a real and concrete application. In my contacts with men and women who are in the lower income earning brackets, I find that, while they do not mind paying until it hurts, they want to know that it is hurting equally the other people. They have a right to expect some equality of taxation.

May I point out to the Minister of Finance that during the last few years there have been example after example of governmental extravagance which could not be justified by the most ardent partisan. From time to time we have had examples of the commission form of government. I am not going to deal with them in detail this afternoon, but I warn the government to take heed that this kind of extravagance is not transplanted into our war administration. There must be economy all along the line. When the private citizen is being asked to economize to the last cent, it is not too much to ask the government to act on the same principle in the administrative field.

I would point out to the Minister of Finance and to every other man who occupies a public position that when our boys come back from overseas to take up again their positions in private life, every one of them will be entitled to ask the public men who are in authority in this country during the war, "While we were over there, prepared to sacrifice our all, receiving only the prevailing rates of pay, what were you public men doing in Canada? Was there the same equality of sacrifice here which was required of us over there?" I mention that by way of caution and warning to the government, because to-morrow's Canada will not be either to-day's or yesterday's Canada. Let us realize this fully this afternoon. This war is going to call for the steady hand of every loyal Canadian if we are to see to it that Canada is kept in its proper place, a foremost place among the nations of the world, when this war has ended. I am one of those who believe that this can be done, but there rests upon every one of us a heavy responsibility. We must make sure that while the war is in progress, there shall be at least some approach to equality of sacrifice for all. During this war, pleasure and profit, whether on the part of governments or of individuals, must give place to sacrifice and service. All these activities may have their place in times of peace, but at this moment the war is the only thing that counts. Let us see to it that not one working man or woman, and not one member of his majesty's forces shall have reason to point the finger of scorn or criticism at the expenditures which the government is making. That is the best wish I have for the government, and I do hope that it will be realized in every particular.

When the government is cutting down on extravagant expenditures, I suggest to the Minister of Finance that some day he might visit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and see whether all the money they are spending is being spent to the best advantage of the Canadian people in general. I ask for that investigation simply because I am convinced that so far as this branch of the administration is concerned there are some decreases that are long overdue.

We who represent rural ridings are naturally interested in problems of agriculture as well as those which confront us in other directions. We who represent farming communities realize to the full—indeed, we must realize it because the people themselves realize it so well-that, the export market for many of our products having been cut off, the domestic problem facing the farmer is very much emphasized and exaggerated at the present time. I will not go into this problem in detail but I wish to leave a thought with the government, and particularly with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Rightly or wrongly, there is throughout the dominion, among the farmers, particularly among mixed farmers, the feeling that there will have to be some change in the marketing of live stock in the interests of the average farmer. The farmers are dissatisfied, and charge the government with some responsibility in this regard. I leave this thought with the Minister of Agriculture so that he may take it into consideration when he is dealing with important matters of this kind in the routine of his department. The farmer believes that he should have more say in the price he gets for his products and in regard to the methods whereby they are marketed.

Perhaps there is no need for me to bring the matter up again this afternoon, at any rate in any great detail, but I would remind the house that in years gone by we have heard a good deal about the trade agreements with the United States. Why, we used to hear a good deal from men on the government benches—eloquent men too, some of them. Some of them are sitting in front of me now. They were convincing men, because they almost convinced me that the farmer was coming into an era of unparalleled prosperity, that his salvation at last was at hand.

But what has actually happened? not making any unjust criticism of the agreements, but I suggest that although the picture looked rather rosy at the time it was being painted, it was not quite so encouraging when it was unveiled. Take the matter of milk and cream alone, for example. What has been the situation since the agreement went into effect? I see one of our Canadian Jersey breeders looking interested as I mention this matter. Well, I am sure he expected more from the agreements than we have accomplished, because, across the international boundary, from Halifax to Vancouver, we have shipped, in milk and cream, since the lower tariff came into effect, only one 8-gallon can of milk a day. I shall not suggest that the farmer who takes that over should have one of the new passports or should come under the new regulations, but certainly he occupies a unique position in Canadian agricultural economy.

I am not criticizing the trade agreements unduly except to show that, in spite of all these rosy pictures that are sometimes painted as an indication of what governments will do for the farmers, the promises held out to the farmers are not all carried out. More particularly, I would deal with another branch of agriculture which has suffered seriously during the last five years. Those hon, members who have listened from time to time to the debates in this house on fruits and vegetables, and who have inquired into the vexed problem that has arisen in regard to these products, will remember that in the agreements in 1935 there were substantial reductions in the protection given the growers of fruits and vegetables in Canada. Despite the fact that they bore more than their share of the burden of imports during the period from 1935 to the signing of the agreement in 1938, the 1938 agreement further reduced their protection by means which I shall not discuss in detail this afternoon; but the result has been that since 1934, the year before the agreements went into effect, we were importing into Canada $15,500,000 worth of fresh fruits and vegetables, while last year we imported 40 per cent more than in 1934, or $21,500,000 worth. In peace time this was paralyzing to our growers, and there were outcries and complaints throughout the country; but in time of war such a situation becomes even more acute, because while we are bringing into the country $21,-500,000 worth of fresh fruits and vegetables per annum, we are spending huge sums in an endeavour to get our own people to consume our own products. The whole thing fails to make sense to an ordinary layman like myself, let alone an economist who would know so much more about a matter of this kind. Surely, if we want to solve the problem of overproduction and an insufficiency of markets for our fruits and vegetables, the first step is to shut off imports that are coming in through the back-door. If we do that, then we can deal with marketing the products we have. In addition to the situation I have indicated, our export market in Britain was cut off for many of our fresh fruits at the time when the war broke out, and the whole situation is that much more aggravated to-day.

The worst feature of the whole matter is that Canadian fruit and vegetable growers can grow more stuff now than the people of Canada can consume. That has been shown time after time. I make this suggestion to the Minister of Finance, that the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada ought to be given their home market at a time like this. They should not have to stand for this competition from the United States. At the same time we are spending our own money trying to find markets for our surplus production. May I also suggest-and I am not so sure that the same suggestion has not been made many times before-that instead of simply letting the matter stand with a ten per cent tariff on imports into Canada, the Minister of Finance do something real by way of damming the flood of United States fruit and vegetables, not only of a class or kind which are produced in Canada but also the citrus fruits which to some extent at any rate can be regarded as luxuries, and which are supplanting our own fruits such as apples. I am wholeheartedly in favour of control of importations from the United States of fresh fruits and vegetables, coming into our already overcrowded markets.

With regard to the war, I am not satisfied and I do not think the people of Canada are entirely satisfied that we have by any means reached our maximum war effort. I say that advisedly. I realize that perhaps the government do not agree with that, but throughout the dominion people are trying to do something for Canada and there seems to be no channel through which they can work. There are numbers of men wanting to join the army, the air force and other branches of the service or to do something else in regard to the war effort and they can find no opportunity. Take, for example, veterans of the last war who from the beginning of this war have been trying in vain to find an opportunity to serve their country, offering the ability, experience and capacity which only they possess.

Another matter agitating the people of Canada is that they want to know just what the law for the mobilization of our national resources really means. As far as anybody can find out, it is just another law on the statute books; for there has not been any registration made; nothing has been done under the act; no questionnaire has been printed; there has not been, as far as I can gather, any real move made to register our people. Perhaps in earlier days governments could take a few months or a year to get the forms ready and everything in hand, but to-day Hitler walks into France and cleans up the whole nation in less than a month. The world is moving, systems are changing so fast that we cannot afford to let two weeks elapse from the time this bill was passed before the registration is commenced. Something should be done by way of waking up the government to the seriousness of the situation. I was not here, I was ill, when the bill was before the house, but I read what the Prime Minister said. He urged and pleaded that the bill be passed that night. I thought we were going to have an invasion before morning. But that was two weeks ago, and so far none of us has even had a registration form to complete.

While there may be criticism of the men of Canada, I want to pay tribute to the women of the dominion, about whom too little has been said in this house, in regard to their part in the war effort. I notice the hon, member for Neepawa (Mr. Mackenzie), who is a particular friend of the ladies, applauding that from the government benches. While men have been doing much talking about registration, about our war effort, and even about the government, the women have actually been doing their job in every county, town and hamlet in Canada. As early as September last, a voluntary registration of Canadian women was started under the leadership of Miss Margaret P. Hyndman, K.C., of Toronto, one of Canada's leading women barristers, assisted loyally by Senator Fallis and others, and during that time it is amazing what tremendous latent power and resources the women have shown through this registration. I shall always hold it against this government that they contributed nothing by way of money or otherwise to that national effort. Not one five-cent piece was ever given to the women for that registration; they did it voluntarily, and throughout the length and breadth of Canada; it is reason for pride that, although we were not pushing our war effort to the full, the women were doing the best they could under circumstances that were not always easy.

In closing, let me say that I do not like to hear from place to place in this dominion pessimistic talk about our chances of success in this war. Let us from this day on, never utter another pessimistic word in public or in private as far as Canada's and Britain's war effort is concerned. While perhaps the situation does not justify jubilant optimistic hopes at all times, we as Canadian citizens have no right to show the white feather when things are going badly, or seemingly so, for the empire. This is the time when every red-blooded Canadian should stand on his feet and say, "England will not fail, England cannot fail." I am disgusted with men who on the air and in the press are always raising technical questions concerning our war effort. We are in this war to a finish. You cannot have a moderately conducted war; it must be either a fullfashioned fight or no fight at all. And I am for a full-fashioned fight, right down to the last man and the last dollar if necessary in order that we may come out of this struggle victorious. We lacked preparedness for this war; the government has to take the responsibility for that, and so does every one of us, because during recent years public opinion had been so trained that we were peace-loving citizens, and the awkward position of peaceloving people everywhere in the world to-day is only too clear. Because we prepared for peace, we were not prepared for war. But those days are past. To-day public opinion has reversed itself on all those matters.

I would point out that at the end of this week the national youth congress meets at Montreal. In my time in Ontario I have had something to do with youth organizations. I want to make this one suggestion-and it will be a friendly and kindly one-to the national youth congress in Montreal: They cannot do a better service to the Dominion of Canada, in the meetings of their congress, than to stand up from the beginning to the end of those meetings and pledge the full force and power of youth in Canada to the winning of the war. I point that out this afternoon because that youth congress will bring to the city of Montreal, many representative youth organizations. I say to you now, Mr. Speaker, that so far as youth in Canada is concerned, this one truth stands out: There is no more loyal body of persons in any part of the world. That congress would do well to come forward and to proclaim that loyalty. It would do well to offer every possible assistance to Canada and to the empire in our hour of need. My plea is that those young people may forget for the time being some of our domestic problems of youth, and that they may put forth every effort to try to do their part to clean up this mess of war in which we are now engaged, so that in the years to come we may have the freedom and the liberty to deal with the admittedly pressing domestic problems as they arise.

So I say: Let us ban all this pessimism in Canada. Let us bring forward an era of optimistic hope for the future. I say that because we must realize that nothing less than our best, so far as our war effort is concerned, will be sufficient. Let us give that best, as we see it. I should like to see among our people in Canada an inextinguishable flame which would show a great national and united spirit in the land, a spirit similar to that of those who are facing the dangers in England to-day. You men on the government benches, and you men on the opposition benches, as well, can all contribute to that great forward movement in Canada which will show to the world that this dominion is whole-heartedly behind the aims and objectives of the great empire to which we are proud to belong and for which we are proud

I like the spirit of old England. I should like to see that spirit transplanted to Canada. I should like to see it fostered and nourished, so that it may grow. I should like to see more evidence of that spirit which compelled the song writer to compose these four lines, with which I shall close:

There'll always be an England, And England shall be free, If England means as much to you As England means to me.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) will pardon me if I do not follow him in a discussion of the divers questions he has raised. With many of his observations respecting our war effort I entirely agree.

The budget presented to the house a few days ago was presented with all the uncertainty of war. There was none of the old-time glamour which always preceded the budget speech. We had none of the last-minute appeals by powerful organizations asking that this, that or the other thing be changed. We heard nothing about last-minute appeals for changes in our tariff structure. Men and women in every walk of life throughout this broad Dominion of Canada for weeks and months had prepared for important changes in our taxation structure.

In these days when shock follows upon shock so rapidly, it is becoming easier for us to accept the incredible. No longer are we easily surprised. We are becoming what might be described as shock proof. In other times I cannot imagine myself describing as good what was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) in his first and valedictory budget; but I think the country generally agrees that in doing so, he has dealt with an unpleasant but very necessary task in an extremely efficient manner. And we have every reason to hope and to believe that it will be an efficacious manner.

That great Canadian newspaper which often speaks so ably for western Canada—I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press—said editorially after the budget was presented:

Everything must be subordinated to supplying the funds for our war effort. The government's budget is built upon sound lines in that it takes money directly from individuals and corporations that have it in their possession because they have received it; but of course, the system will not function if there are undue demands for purposes not at the moment necessary upon the taxpayer's dollar. Every dollar possible of current issue must be made available for the purposes of the war, and into the same channel the public must pour its surplus capital wealth. And this must be done without repining or any looking backward to happier days.

"For what avails the plough or soil, Or land, or life, if Freedom fail?"

The Western Producer, a Saskatchewan newspaper which often speaks for organized farmers, has this to say:

The Canadian government has taken rapid and drastic legislative action. We feel certain that the people are one hundred per cent behind this course. The farmers of Western Canada for whom this paper endeavours to speak love freedom and abominate all tyranny. As every reader of these words knows they did not and do not now think that conditions in this wealthy country were or are anything like what they should be. Yet ever since the fateful day when war was declared they have through every organization and mouthpiece, which they possess for making their opinions articulate, spoken with one voice. They have placed themselves and their resources at the disposal of the government, and expressed readiness and eagerness to do everything within their power which was demanded of them. They are ready now.

I give these quotations to show how the spirit of western Canada met the challenge of this budget, the spirit with which she will meet future challenges as they arise from time to time.

I find that, despite what the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) said on Tuesday last, I cannot agree with her, even though she may be the only woman in this chamber. I cannot agree with her when she says she is convinced that those who support the government will in the future be adjudged the real enemies of the Canadian people. I believe that this government has done all it possibly can do to carry on under a united people the prosecution of our war activities, and that it has done this to the best of its ability.

The provisions in the budget are hard and heavy; yet they are no more drastic than the circumstances warrant. I believe they fall as evenly as any human can make them. Perhaps they will make it more difficult for the average man to continue his former mode of living, but it must be realized that we shall have to readjust ourselves. We shall have to change certain of our economies and I believe that there will be a certain equality in those who have the ability to pay. There will be many changes in the economic life of most families, but it will not mean the giving up of many necessities or luxuries. Through the years people have grown to think of many luxuries as being necessities think of many luxuries as being necessities. Taxes might have been imposed on many other commodities. A few days before the budget was brought down we heard that a prohibitive tariff might be placed on gasoline. Even if that had been done, I believe the Canadian people would have accepted it. There might have been some discontent, but the tax would have been paid. I use this as an example to show the spirit of the Canadian people to-day. They believe in doing everything within their power to aid the government, no matter what the sacrifice may be. They know the urgency of the need and the urgency of the hour.

No doubt it is difficult to find sources and avenues of taxation. Undoubtedly the easiest method might have been to tax certain income, but we do not know at the present time just what effect such taxation would have. That remains to be seen. A lowering of purchasing power means less business, and less business means lower salaries. There was one thing the Minister of Finance apparently had in mind when he was exploring these different avenues of taxation; I am sure he decided that the war activity would produce the money to sustain the effort. We must continue to find money. We must not think that this is the last sacrifice we shall be called upon to make. Our effort must be accelerated until victory is ours. There is no reason why we should think that we have dug down into our pockets as deeply as we shall have to dig. We have not made all the sacrifices we shall be called upon to make, but I confidently believe that the people of Canada are prepared to make any sacrifice.

Hitler and his hordes claim they are fighting to determine the next thousand years of German history. The British empire to-day stands alone in its fight to make sure that a thousand years of dark ages shall not descend upon the whole world. We are fighting against a pagan philosophy. We are fighting for those countries which are already prostrated beneath the feet of the Teuton conqueror who has overrun them in his desire for world domination. Perhaps not all the German people believe in the doctrines of Hitler and nazism. but we must fight a German people flushed with victory before we shall be able to find that out. We certainly do know that there is some division of opinion among the German-Canadians in our own Dominion of Canada. The German Canadian newspaper Der Nordwesten, published in Winnipeg, contained in its issue of June 19 an editorial on the French negotiations for an armistice. It had this to sav:

The peoples of all races who make up Canada's population stand firmly behind Canada. No one, either by word or deed, should work against this spirit of unity. That is of national importance. Every Canadian who wishes to retain his personal and political freedom should know that this is the time for help.

In the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House of Commons there is a large German population. In that constituency is one of the oldest German language newspapers in western Canada, a newspaper that fought against Hitler and his nazi doctrines long before many people heard of them or questions about them were raised in this house. This newspaper, the St. Peter's Bote, was banned from Germany some six years ago because of its fearlessness in condemning Hitlerism and pointing out that doctrine as a menace to the world. During its long existence in western Canada it has always upheld the principles of democracy. Its distinguished German-Canadian editor has striven day after day to point out to his readers the great freedom which each and every one of them enjoy as British subjects in this Dominion of Canada. That newspaper has endeavoured to imprint upon the minds of its readers the great blessings of British citizenship in the country of their adoption.

For almost a quarter of a century I have lived in that district. I grew from youth to manhood there. I know these people, and I know they are loyal Canadians and loyal subjects of His Majesty the King. There may be some nationalists, some troublemakers, among them, but those people are ostracized by the loyal German-Canadians just as they would be by any other Canadians. These German people came to this country to seek the freedom and opportunities which would be available to them as Canadian citizens. They came just as our forefathers came from the confines of the empire. During the last great war many of these German settlers sent their sons to fight in foreign fields in order that democracy might live. As soon as the present war was declared the sons of these hardy German pioneers in that district went forth to serve the country of their adoption.

In any community there is always a certain number of persons who are ready to criticize the government in connection with its policy on international affairs, but the German-Canadian by and large realizes the value of the liberty and freedom he enjoys under our flag of freedom, the union jack. I know Saskatchewan better than any other province. Who would question the loyalty of a man of the type of the minister of public health of the province, the Hon. J. M. Uhrich? Who would doubt the loyalty of Mr. J. J. Mildenberger, a member of the legislature who enlisted immediately after the war broke out? He was ready to fight for his king and country. I could give a long list of those, many of them bearing historic German names, who have offered their all.

Only a short time ago I received from that district the assurance that they had made a voluntary gift of $10,000 to the government to be used for war purposes. This money was raised in Humboldt and district from people of many racial origins, but all animated with one purpose, namely, that this war should be prosecuted to a successful conclusion in order that Christian civilization might be saved.

In the town of Humboldt, which is one of the principal towns in the constituency of Humboldt, there is situated a religious institution known as St. Elizabeth's hospital. It is the mother house of their various hospitals in Canada, and the offshoot of an old Austrian order which has been in existence for three or four hundred years. Some thirty years ago they came to Canada and pioneered, and they have built up a splendid, modern hospital. They know what the invasion of Austria by Hitler has meant to their time-honoured institution in that country, and they came to me and gave me the assurance and the undertaking that in the defence of the country they have learned to love they will do their bit by looking after any refugee children who may be placed in the district of Humboldt. I would plead, therefore, that in our dealings with these people we use forbearance and the utmost kindness. The lives of many of them are difficult because of their names or because some of their relatives who may be living within the confines of the German nation are under suspicion. Let us not persecute them into opposing us. I have no brief for anyone who has any disloyal tendencies, everybody knows it, but these people are absolutely loyal to Canada and the empire, and I am sure that a little consideration on our part will help them to give greater proof of their loyalty. So long as the Canadian government is under the leadership of Canada's greatest statesman, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I am sure that war hysteria will not lead us into paths of unjustifiable persecution. We do not want, Mr. Speaker, to develop a minority problem in this country.

The hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has injected into this debate a subject which is of great importance to those of us who come from western Canada. So important is it that we cannot call it a side issue. It deals with our basic industry, the marketing of our wheat.

There have been in the last number of years many attempts to formulate a wheat policy which would be of assistance to the western wheat growers. The question was discussed in the house last year from various phases and angles, and now that the country is in the throes of a terrible war, a war which none of us ever dreamed would have the ramifications it has had, necessarily this great question of wheat marketing has been affected by the many rapid changes that have taken place on so many different fronts in continental Europe. Markets that we once held have now been lost, and other markets must be found. During the years that Germany and Italy were trying to develop themselves into self-contained countries in the hope that they would be able to feed themselves in time of war, when they knew that the great wheat-growing areas of western Canada would be isolated from them by the British navy, the wheat producer of our Canadian west was a victim of these war preparations just as much as any other group of people who have suffered from the war.

In the last war western Canada as a wheat producer, was a vital war weapon. In this war we have an overproduction of wheat, and if our wheat fields do not lie idle our people feel at least that they could make a greater economic contribution than is presently demanded of them. I would suggest that the government establish factories for war supplies wherever possible in western Canada. If the people of those western plains are to be kept on the land, some effort must be made to find a market for their produce. Factory towns are needed in western Canada to provide a local market for the farmers. Such industrial centres might well be established at the present time because perhaps the day and hour will come when the great industrial towns near our coast will be in danger, and then it would be a veritable godsend to have established on the prairies munition factories which would be out of range of danger at least for the time being. It might be the decisive factor in supplying the needs of our armies which may then be in the field. The government at this time has an excellent opportunity of putting this to the test by sponsoring and encouraging the establishment of war industries in western Canada.

Another question which has come up from time to time in the last few years, is in connection with the grain exchange. some reason or another the western farmers feel that the grain exchange is responsible for a great deal of their misfortunes. I am not in a position to say whether the grain exchange should be closed or not. That is a matter to be decided by the technical officers of the department who are administering the act. But I would say that if the grain exchange is serving no useful purpose, if it is not needed, it should be closed, and that would silence that opinion which holds that the grain exchange has brought misery upon western agriculture. That view may or may not be true. Someone applauds, but I am not in a position to say whether that is so or not. But if the grain exchange is not serving a useful purpose, would it not be a good thing to close it and so prove for all time that it was not the grain exchange which was responsible for all the misery that has come to western Canada?

I entirely agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in his statement that changes in government policy should be announced in the House of Commons when parliament is in session. An English Prime Minister used to say that the only information he had was what he read in the newspapers. He said it more or less as a joke, but it is past a joke when day after day the policies of the government are announced in Winnipeg or at some other point before they are made known to the House of Commons. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) admitted the other day, in reply to a question by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that announcements sometimes went out before they even reached his office, and he stated that he would give an undertaking that as soon as he received such information he would make it known to the house. We have given the government all the authority that we could possibly give them, and surely they now possess sufficient authority to make the giving out of information to the press prior to the time it reaches this House of Commons an offence which will be dealt with in a stringent service commission was becoming a bureaucracy, and that this bureaucracy was growing up in Ottawa and perhaps in other cities where there were large numbers of civil servants. I have no quarrel with the civil service. I believe in the merit system, but sometimes we see that merit system misused, misused right before the eyes of members of parliament, right within the precincts of this House of Commons, and then one begins to wonder what would happen if he knew all the inner workings of it. I remember, when a committee of this house was inquiring into the service-you, Mr. Speaker, were a member of that committee-how difficult it was to get any information in connection with this closed corporation. But a bureaucracy, as the hon. member for New Westminster said, brought proud France almost to her knees and caused considerable difficulties in Great Britain. The bureaucracy which has grown up in this city of Ottawa is a prize packet of ineffectiveness, and it is all wrapped up in a neat little bundle and tied with red tape. The story is told of a civil servant who lost the key to his desk. He waited two or three days, and finally one of the employees of another department came along and asked him how he lost the key, where he lost it, and a number of other silly questions. Several more days elapsed, and another man came along to estimate how much it would cost to get a new key to open the desk. After about a couple of months a third employee came up to open the desk.

The other day the hon, member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) stated that the civil [Mr. Fleming.]

Perhaps that is just a story. But there is another one which is going the rounds here, concerning certain employees who were doing some work at the Hunter building. They had to punch a time-clock on George street, so it took them half an hour to walk to work; it was half past nine before they arrived at the Hunter building. It was also necessary for them to leave half an hour before noon in order that they would have time to punch the George street clock. When they returned after lunch they would go to George street to punch the clock, and arrive at half past two to begin work. Finally, they would leave the Hunter building half an hour before closing time in order to punch the clock at the closing hour. By this means they lost practically half a day going down to George street to punch the clock; but that was a regulation; someone was responsible to see that the regulation was carried out, so the clock must be punched or some employee would not have any job.

Anyone who thinks that these examples are exaggerated should make an investigation of the rules and regulations. I often wonder that any cabinet minister has a hair on his head, that all his hair has not been pulled out in a fit of exasperation with this bureaucracy of civil servants. Of course I realize that, when a member of parliament becomes a privy councillor, one of the first "pep" talks he gets is to the effect that he must depend at all costs on the civil service, because, as the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has said, if you say anything about any of them they at once jump up in their places and defend the accused civil servant at all costs, whether they know he is right or wrong; if he is a member of this bureaucracy he must be right.

The government had a mandate from the people while this country was at war to carry on the war effort. This mandate was received not when the war first began, but when we were in the midst of it, and when the Prime Minister had told us he shuddered to think what would happen when the teriffic battles then pending were in progress. I believe that the Prime Minister and the members of the government are doing their best to work out the vast and perplexing problems which confront them. I am, and I think the Canadian people should be, deeply grateful to the Prime Minister for his leadership. I believe all Canadians realize his qualities of mind and heart and are grateful for his leadership. He has associated with him some of the best brains of the country to advise the government on the many technical questions which arise in connection with this war.

There has been some discussion at various points with regard to the new mobilization order, and certain newspapers suggested that some of us had gone back upon our election pledges in connection with what they term a conscription bill. Let me read what His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve, Archbishop of Quebec, recently stated:

The righteousness of our cause should lead us to make sacrifices to ensure its triumph. All Christians in the dominion and the millions scattered throughout the empire find in the teachings of Christ the truest and strongest grounds for their loyalty to their earthly sovereign.

The present mobilization of our material resources as represented in the budget may seem to some a considerable sacrifice compared with peace-time standards, but it is a small price indeed compared with the consequences of defeat.

Our freedom has been hard-won. Our ancestors paid for it in blood, tears and sweat, and we are called upon again to pay the price. Are we to be unworthy of that heritage? Are we, in this hour of the nation's history, to betray those who died in order that justice, liberty and honour might live? Are we to betray those who believed and still believe in human dignity and human worth? Shall we allow the world to slip back into the dark night of oblivion because of our failure to see our problems and to see them whole, or our unwillingness to make the sacrifices which our leaders demand of us?

We are facing a new world—an almost unbelievable world. We cannot afford to be complacent or we shall soon be rudely jarred out of that feeling of self-satisfaction. France, after she had signed her "honourable" peace, has in the last few days learned what that has meant. She has been forced to turn over her radio sets. That is a small thing, Mr. Speaker, but it is just the beginning of what Hitler-domination will mean. Let us not carelessly cast away the liberty we possess as though it were something which had not been hard-won. The time has been reached when the almost unbelievable is approaching, when perhaps that little island of Britain, now becoming the greatest fortress in the world, will be invaded. But Drake put the great armada to rout, and I am confident that England will know how to deal with Hitler's new armada of the air. I can think of no more suitable words to quote at a time like this than those of the greatest of poets, Shakespeare, in his play "King John":

Come the three corners of the world in arms, And we shall shock them.

And again:

This England never did, nor never shall, Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror.

May we gladly and proudly do our part that those words may remain true.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) upon his budget speech. He performed a most difficult task with rare ability and with commendable lucidity of statement. Ordinarily these taxation proposals would have been a bitter pill for the public. Their unanimous acceptance is the best possible proof of the resolve of the people of Canada to spare nothing to ensure victory.

A great deal has already been said on the budget. I propose to attempt to look the present situation and its utmost needs in the face, and then to ask whether this budget, the financial programme, the defence programme and the general policies of the government are sufficient for the job in hand, and if not, by what means a greater effort might be more quickly obtained.

We shall all agree with the Minister of Finance that the budget provisions should have as their first objective the raising of money to ensure the maximum war effort. I think we shall all agree that taxes designed to cut down the demand for luxuries in order to swing more men and more machines into the production of munitions would be a good war-time measure. Knowing the Canadian people perhaps as well as the Minister of Finance does, I share his confidence to the utmost that they will shrink from no contribution to ensure the soldiers, the sailors and the airmen of Britain and Canada all the machines and equipment which can be produced or procured. But it is vital to ask if these taxes, if the financial policy of the government, if the political preoccupations of some of its members are such as to permit the defence of Canada and the empire to develop as rapidly and as effectively as it should. That the Canadian people are willing to carry any burdens which tend to ensure the maximum war effort should make the government strive the harder to see that that willingness is not imposed on, that no burden is added until its need is apparent, and that the small wage-earner, the salaried man, be not asked to dissipate in tax demands all his savings as represented by bank deposits and insurance policies as well as savings invested in homes, automobiles, radios, refrigerators, pianos and so forth. He must pay more, as all must pay more; but the whole history of the development of the industrial and economic life of the two great nations inhabiting North America shows that their greatest achievements have been made by enlisting idle capital to back men and their labours and plans.

The Minister of Finance made a partial statement when he said: "Common sense will tell those who think the taxation too drastic what will become of their property or their incomes if Germany and Italy should conquer the British empire". Common sense and practical experience should tell this government that no ordinary man can expect, out of current earnings, to meet a major emergency in his private life and fortune, nor does he try, unless he is very rich, to finance the establishment of a plant or factory out of current income. For the emergency he uses his savings of months or years, borrows on his insurance, his house, his possessions, his securities or his credit, and then adjusts his income to the task of servicing the money which came to his aid from others, or replenishing his savings if he dipped into those. The establishment or expansion of a business in a major way would generally be financed in like manner.

[Mr. Bruce.]

The defence of Canada is both a major matter and a capital problem. A patient might as well try to finance the removal of his appendix while the operation was proceeding as for us to try to pay for this war, as we go, out of current earnings. Certain members suggest that the Bank of Canada finance this war by monetizing the dominion's credit. That would throw us into an orgy of inflation worse than this continent has ever dreamed of, I am afraid.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the other evening I had to call the attention of another hon. member to the fact that he was reading his speech and to ask him to refrain from doing so. I must ask the hon. member to try to conform to the rules in this regard as closely as possible. I would ask him not to read his speech.

Mr. BRUCE: I am following my notes closely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: But the hon. member whom I interrupted the other evening also suggested that, in reading his speech, he was following his notes closely. I would ask the hon. member to refrain as far as possible from reading his speech.

Mr. BRUCE: I will refrain as far as possible, Mr. Speaker, but I am only following the example of many others in this house, including the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: When I made the statement in the house on another occasion in regard to the reading of speeches, I pointed out that ministerial statements were read in order that they should be meticulously accurate, and the same practice and custom have been observed in the case of the leader of the official opposition. But there is a rule against the reading of speeches and all hon members should try to conform thereto. They may refer to their notes, but they should try not to read their speeches.

Mr. BRUCE: I am speaking on the budget, Mr. Speaker, and I am anxious to be as accurate as possible. Therefore I have to stick to my notes fairly closely. However, I shall do the best I can.

Fortunately the remedy which certain hon. gentlemen suggest, where the cure might be worse than the disease, is not necessary. The idle capital, including industrial plants and equipment and skilled workers, which can be enlisted endlessly and diverted into the manufacture of munitions, should be called upon to the limit. We should borrow all the funds which Canadians are not using in worthwhile enterprises, and turn this money to work in the war. That will take care of the emergency more quickly than current funds can do.

We lack the capital equipment for war. The minister himself says that we are paying the price of long years of wishful thinking. He also truly says that the Huns are hammering at the gate. The first war budget in September was a scholarly treatise, on the best financial practice as the government advisers saw it, on how to tax and borrow for war. This was to be a pay-as-you-go-war, as everybody expected, and the most incalculable of earthly occurrences would proceed along ordinary lines and Canada could gently increase this effort as increasing business provided more taxes and more savings to borrow. That is all changed, but I fear that the point of view which is shown in that budget still makes itself evident in this new one. We must create our defence equipment and get it into full working order as quickly as possible. That can be done only by mobilizing savings and the wealth in plants and materials and in the men of Canada.

The minister expects his new taxes will produce $280,000,000 in a full year, and he expects to get $600,000,000 more by borrowing. But if he can procure $280,000,000 additional in taxes, that would service eventually $5,600,000,000 of loans and eventually extinguish them, provided five per cent be set aside each year for interest and sinking fund.

Mr. RALSTON: Extinguish them in how long a period?

Mr. BRUCE: I have not worked out the number of years.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, that is very important. My hon. friend is making the argument that this is not a pay-as-you-go budget. It is not intended as an entirely pay-as-you-go budget, but what we are doing is taxing $278,000,000 eventually, as my hon. friend says, for an expenditure which may be $900,000,000.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister expects an expenditure of about $1,000,000,000 a year. This could be financed by $50,000,000 of taxes on the same basis, and would add in the first year less than one-fifth of the burden. Moreover, it would make as quick a contribution to the war effort, and possibly a quicker one. There would be more private money to expand the war effort and a more hopeful spirit about our ability to do all that is required. So why unnecessarily increase five or six times the burden of the small salaried man? Why penalize the laudable private efforts of citizens to save, invest and insure, to own homes and expand their businesses? Can a nation become richer by such taxation if its people become poorer? What about the postwar period? Borrow until Canadians are fully employed and we are making the maximum effort. That is capital expenditure for the planes, tanks, guns, shells and ships that the government should have started providing Current expenditure on such years ago. capital equipment after the war should be provided by taxes. Any excess now is in the nature of emergency, and calls upon our resources of stored funds. A maximum effort calls for Canadian plants and men to satisfy British needs and our own on the fastest possible ascending scale. It calls upon us to get an immediate understanding on measures for the common defence of this continent.

To the United States it would easily be worth a billion dollars to be sure that Canada can defend itself adequately. It would be worth twenty billion to that country to make sure that the British navy and air force would hold Britain and the seas while this continent turns its peace strength into war strength. Possibly the finance minister might find in such an understanding elements which would reduce his chief worries materially. The need of United States money to finance purchases in that country justifies his exchange differential and his ten per cent addition to the customs duties. It is an emergency duty, and an opportunity for the United States to provide adequate credits for purchases we make to keep Britain fighting the Huns strongly and for our own defence. Why not secure us this help in place of taxes which may lead to a general effort of wage-earners for increased remuneration, thus tending to the inflation which the minister seeks to avoid?

All arrangements made to stop consumer expenditures that keep valuable men from munition work are good, and we applaud them. No financial alchemy would prevent taxes, borrowing and credit expansion from exacting hardships from Canadians if they do their best in war. But the hardest road is being trod by the finance minister. We could all stand the ultimate dose better if it were increased gradually from current income and quickly from funds made available by borrowing.

It is nevertheless deplorable that there were in the minister's speech no indications of a serious curtailment of expenditures in every department unnecessary to the prosecution of the war. In answer to questions directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), I am informed by a return tabled in the house that it is the intention of the government to permit the Canadian National Railways to expend

$3,050,000 during this year on their ill-conceived and ill-fated terminal at Montreal. The history of this famous adventure in the waste of public funds is too well known for me to need to bring it to the attention of the house. The only defence offered for the decision to recommence the work something over a year ago was that since $16,000,000 had already been wasted it was vital to continue the waste. What could be more outrageous, in view of the severity of budget requirements, than the decision to expend $3,050,000 this year on that terminal?

The Minister of Finance recently inaugurated a campaign for war savings certificates, in sums as small as twenty-five cents, among school children and others. The children have been asked to abstain from candy in order to buy these certificates. Workmen's families have been asked to cut down household expenditures in order to buy them. How can the minister possibly justify this campaign for sacrifice even by children, if the proceeds are to be poured into a big ditch in Montreal? Furthermore, this terminal project involves waste of labour and material very urgently needed for the manufacture of munitions of war. A decision to suspend this work at once would save a large sum of money. I am aware that contracts have already been let for some of the work, but government contracts have been cancelled since the war began, and I urge the government to issue instructions at once for the immediate suspension of work on the Montreal terminal, and to advise the officers of the Canadian National Railways that they must use their existing facilities as best they can. It would be nothing less than criminal to allow this expenditure to continue when the country is faced with the great problems of the war.

Yesterday I received from the office of the director of public information a copy of a radio speech made on the night of July 1 by the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain) over the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I agree with the director that this is an important speech and is worthy of comment. The Secretary of State started out by saying:

What day could have been better chosen to speak of national unity than that of the dominion which we celebrate to-day?

Further on he said:

All this shows that the union of the diverse elements which compose our country is a guarantee of general well-being. All this shows also that in the hour of peril unity alone can save a country in danger.

And further on he says:

For a long time we have been able to delude ourselves with a fictitious isolation. I said just now that circumstances are dictating our [Mr. Bruce.] line of conduct. They are of such gravity that they also require us to consider them on a plane quite superior to that to which we have been accustomed. This means that to safeguard our liberties, our language, our economic and social life we must cease every quarrel and every campaign which has not for immediate object the pursuit of the war and our final victory. Only on this condition will we Canadians, a small people with great ideals, survive. I beg of you, my fellow countrymen, to be realists.

Those are noble words which every loyal Canadian will applaud. When reading this speech this morning I could not help wondering if it had been censored by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before it was given, and if he still maintains the attitude which he expressed so forcibly in this house less than two weeks ago. I do not intend now to refer further to what happened on that occasion.

I want to reply to questions that were asked me a little over two weeks ago by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). I was then speaking about subversive elements. The hon. member wants to know, first, if I have personally located and investigated persons whom I believe to be guilty of subversive activity, and reported same to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

The hon. member may think this is a clever lawyer's question, but I have to tell him that I have not played the part of a detective. That is not my profession, nor is it part of my duty as a member of the House of Commons. Those who have investigated, being men responsible as police for the public peace and safety, have done this work and reported names and organizations to me. They have also reported names as long ago as May 16 to the Minister of Justice, and received a reply to the effect that the information would be laid before a committee of parliament.

Question No. 2 is fully answered by the answer to question No. 1.

Then, in question No. 3 the hon. member wants to know if I am aware that public criticism, unsupported by facts, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding their performance of duty, is an attempt to destroy the confidence of the Canadian people in such force. I think I am aware of as much along this line as is the hon. member for Parry Sound. I am further aware, although he does not seem to be, that I have not made criticism of the Royal Canadian Mounted made criticism of the administration of a great public trust by a department of government. And I intend to continue that criticism whenever justified.

Police force, as a force, at all. But I have

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite right.

Mr. BRUCE: I may further inform the hon. member for Parry Sound that when I speak in the House of Commons I always speak on my responsibility as a member, just in the same way as did the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) speak on his responsibility as a minister of the crown when he said that tanks could not be made in Canada.

Mr. ROWE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they are going to make tanks.

Mr. BRUCE: No one can forecast with any degree of certainty the exact nature of the test Britain will shortly face. But whatever it is, we can be confident that she will meet it unflinchingly and without yielding. It may very likely result in shifting the centre of the war effort to the new world-not because Great Britain will yield, but because a beleaguered fortress cannot carry on normal production, and cannot plan for the next year's output to achieve victory. This means that Canada will become the very heart of the empire defence arrangements. In coordination with the United States, and aided by the other dominions we shall have to carry on the fight from here, and become the main British war industry and supply centre.

I wonder if we have yet grasped what this means. It implies an army of probably 500,000 men, or even more, for home defence, as well as for ultimate overseas duties when and where they can be used. It implies a production programme many times as great as anything we have yet envisaged. We must make planes, tanks, guns, shells and armoured cars on a prodigious scale. If there is the disturbance of British production, to which I have just alluded, they may wish to send us shiploads of machinery, and they may also send mechanics to reestablish their aircraft, munitions and equipment industries in Canada. Aerial interruption may soon reduce Great Britain's war effort by fifty per cent. Let us therefore offer Great Britain all our facilities for the reestablishment of those factories here.

I wish to commend the able, efficient and very much overworked Minister of Munitions and Supply for setting up the control board over industries which has just been announced, and the duty of which will be to mobilize Canadian industry as speedily as possible for war services.

I shall now for a few minutes turn to a problem which is agitating the minds of thousands of generous-hearted women and men throughout Canada. It is that of the disposition of countless British children whose lives are in peril from nazi bombers. The response of Canadians, and especially of Canadian womanhood, to the necessities of the situation, is one of the noblest episodes in the history of this country.

The country had to wait until June 27 for a comparatively complete and explicit statement from the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) on what was being done. That explanation was made exactly thirty-one days after my first inquiry as to what the government proposed to do. There is no reason why the problem respecting the internees the British government may desire to transfer to this country should have been mixed up with that of bringing the children to safety in Canadian homes anxious to receive them. Precious time has been lost, and the peril to the children has increased with each passing day. We are now assured that by the end of this month approximately 5,000 British children will have arrived in this country. In view of the fact that there are 7,000,000 children in the British isles who are exposed to imminent danger, surely more attention and energetic action are necessary if they are to be saved. I suggest to the government that an invitation of an unlimited nature be extended to Great Britain to send as many children to us as she wishes and we shall give them hospitality for the period of the war. Surely Canada can undertake the financial responsibility for this great philanthropy now and make the necessary adjustments later on. The halting manner in which the government has approached this question must inevitably lead to a comparison with our sister dominion Australia which has agreed to adopt, that is, to assume full financial responsibility for 15,000 British children. Is it not better to let these children sleep, if necessary, in the open fields of Canada rather than be bombed in their homes in England?

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we in this group regarded your predecessor with respect, and may I say with affection. I have no doubt that we shall come to regard you with the same happy feelings.

Before I commence my remarks on the budget, I should like to repeat the stand which we in this group take toward the war. This was stated last September, and the policy which we advocated then has, with one exception, been adopted by the present government. The conscription of finance has not been put into effect. We Social Crediters believe in individual freedom above all else. We hate dictatorships. I say that because I do not want any remark which I may make interpreted as being anti-British or pro-German or anything of that kind.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) introduced an amendment of which I was the seconder. I oppose this budget because it is deflationary and debt forming. Moreover, it is not a true statement. It still is founded on the fallacy that governments can acquire the money which they need only by taxing the people or by borrowing. That is not true. The greater part of the cost of the last war was financed, and the greater part of the cost of this war will be financed neither by taxation nor by borrowing from the private citizen; it was and will be financed by borrowing from the financial institutions which can create the necessary money by simply writing figures in a book. I should like to quote briefly from a speech recently delivered in the British House of Commons by Mr. Stokes, the member for Ipswich. He said:

The chancellor referred also to the gathering momentum of the national savings scheme. He told us that at the present time the weekly savings amount to £5,000,000. Taken alone, that is a monumental figure, but I cannot help remarking that to me it seems to be much more of a gathering lag, because we are spending at the rate of £42,000,000 a week and are collecting from the small savers only one-eighth of that amount. I do not wish to detract from the national savings scheme under the present system, and I see that it is necessary, but I cannot help thinking that it is a great swindle, if I may so call it, to allow the big moneylenders to get away with the swag behind a sort of veneer of small holders who will kick up a tremendous fuss when the war is over when one tries to deal with these loans, if they are going to be raised, as I suspect, in accordance with established custom.

We shall have the same conditions imposed after this war as were imposed after the last; that is, tremendous taxation will be imposed in order that the interest on the debt may be paid. As the member for Ipswich said, this is largely a swindle. It is a debt created, not by borrowing the savings of the small investor but by the financial interests simply writing figures in a book. We hear a great deal about the value and virtue of thrift. As I said, I am opposed to this budget because it is mainly devoted to deflation and debt. It imposes tremendous taxation which will have the effect of causing unemployment. Thrift has lost its real meaning. Originally it meant the putting of materials to their best possible use, but to-day it simply means the saving of money. One can save money only at the expense of the community. That should be obvious to all. To-day money is a religion; it is the modern idolatry. The banks are the temples and the bankers are the high priests. They have a choir or a chorus of economists whose jobs and emoluments depend upon the amount of flapdoodle which they can put into textbooks and the amount of dust which they can throw into the eyes of the common people.

I remember a certain professor of economics who came to Alberta in the summer of 1935 to point out to that province the dangers of social credit. According to him any money that did not originate in a bank was toy money. It was toy money that produced the German tanks, guns and flying machines, and it was sound money which produced the toothpicks which the French soldiers had to use when they faced those modern weapons. That particular professor was rewarded for his efforts on behalf of the banking and financial interests by being appointed economist of the Rowell commission. I venture to say that any economist, were he to speak the truth, would very soon lose the chair he happens to be occupying in any university. One has to undertake the job of monetary reform to find out how strong the opposition is to any kind of truth when it affects finance and the financial interests.

So it is with the press. I have nothing to say with regard to the newspaper correspondents, but so far as financial knowledge and financial truth are concerned I say that the so-called freedom of the press is nothing but the freedom of the oldest profession on earth, the freedom to prostitute itself to the highest bidder. There are a few honourable exceptions. I might mention the Ottawa Citizen, the Western Producer of Saskatoon, and a paper in my riding called the Wetaskiwin Times. There may be others, but these three I know to be honourable exceptions to the rule.

I should like to follow a little further this idea of thrift, the idea that it is a virtue for the individual to save money, and that the nation can prosper when the majority of its citizens are saving money. I believe that to be a complete delusion. I believe it to be beyond argument that the individual can save money only at the expense of the community. If a man saves money, what is he doing but selling more than he buys? And if he succeeds in doing that, then somebody somewhere must be buying more than he sells; in other words, he must be getting into debt. So it is that the whole object of saving money is to get people into debt.

Let us see some of the consequences of this virtue of thrift. I saw the other day figures with respect to Canadian insurance for the last twenty-five years, and insurance is one of the great means of saving money. Since 1914 nearly six billion dollars' worth of insurance has been dropped. This means that thrifty people in those years have undertaken to pay for six billion dollars' worth of insurance which they have had to drop. The other day I was talking to one of the greatest financial authorities in Canada and I asked him this question: "Why did the French leave off completing the Maginot line just exactly where the Germans broke through in 1914?" He replied that France had a financial crisis and they had to economize; they had to save money, and so the line was not finished. I should like to know what has happened to the money which was saved by that little piece of economy. I asked him: "What would you say would be the value of the bonds and securities of France and Belgium to-day. He said: "Rather less than the paper they are written on."

I remember reading some letters by Rudyard Kipling after the last war. He was thoroughly familiar with France and the French and spoke with the greatest admiration of the French habit of saving, or rather hoarding—saving their money, putting it into bottles and then burying the bottles in the garden. Some of them were known as one-bottle men and others as two—bottle men. I am curious to know what has happened to those savings.

And so with our own country. How many savings were lost during the depression? How many people have lost their homes or their equity, their business, as a result of the depression? The depression, of course, was largely the result of this virtue of thrift. We have come to regard money as wealth and to have the idea that there is only so much of it, and that if we spend so much of it over here, there is none to spend over there. We have come to be so mean, so incredibly mean, that we cannot even afford to raise families; we cannot afford children. We allow our own victims of the depression, those on relief, $4 a month to live on, while interned enemy aliens are granted $10 a month for the same purpose.

A certain acquaintance of mine—he is a barber in Alberta—has violent feelings on the subject of money and social credit. He is very much opposed to social credit, and he generally has a tale of woe to tell me if I happen to be sitting in his chair. It goes something like this: "I have saved my money all my life. I have not a radio. I have not a car; I cannot afford one. I have saved my money, and so if I get sick or if I am unable to work I shall not be a burden on my neighbours." And I say to him: "No, the only difference between you and the others is this: You have been a burden on your neighbours all your life, only you do not happen to know it." For consider, he is getting his living by shaving people. "Well," as I tell him, "that is not a necessity. Suppose all your customers had said, 'I cannot afford to be shaved; I am going to shave myself.' What would you have done?" "Oh," he says, "that is different." Of course it is different; it always is, to the thrifty man.

I know a certain hotel keeper in that part of the country who complains of the same thing. He objects to farmers coming in on Saturday evenings and taking their wives to a movie, or even to a restaurant to have a cup of coffee; he says that is the reason why they are hard up. "Well," I tell him, "you have sold a lot of beer in your time. I have drunk a little myself." "Oh," he says, "that is different." "Yes, of course it is different, because that happens to be the way you make your living. But if everybody became as economical as you say they ought to be, you could shut up shop." Certainly that is true. How can all save themselves into prosperity if one man's income is another man's expenditure?

I should like to go into this matter a little more scientifically, because, as I see it, it is one of the most important questions we have to face. I believe everybody will agree that if money is merely hoarded, is put under the ground, it will cause a shortage of purchasing power. But the result is the same if the money is invested. It does not matter whether it is invested by private individuals or by corporations; the effect is the same. Money exists in two forms-capital and income. It is the property of capital that it can create only costs, and it is the property of income that it, and it alone, can liquidate them. And if we admit, which I am not willing to do, that there is enough income distributed to liquidate the costs which are created, then by the amount to which that income is not used to liquidate those costs, costs are not liquidated and mount up as a debt.

Or we can look at the question in this way. A man saves part of his income and invests it. Very likely he buys his securities—at second hand—from a bank. When the bank bought those securities it created the money to buy them with, and when the bank sells those securities it destroys the money which it gets in exchange. That amount of money is taken out of circulation and is destroyed.

I know, after seven years' experience as a monetary reformer, the sort of opposition which one meets as soon as one advocates monetary reform. I recall that in Alberta prior to the last election there was a hatred towards social credit far exceeding the hatred towards the common enemy. That sentiment persists to this day; the campaign against the present Alberta government has never ceased.

The reason is that, to our opponents, money is a religion or an object of idolatry, and to criticize it is blasphemy.

At the time when, in 1934, Major Douglas was a witness before the committee on banking and commerce I, of course, was not a member of that committee, but judging from the testimony, and after discussing it with those who were there, I have no doubt that Douglas was regarded as a criminal, or the equivalent.

Mr. RALSTON: Major Douglas was regarded as a what? I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. JAQUES: I would say he was regarded as a criminal by some and as a fool by others; either as a knave or a fool. But when a banker was on the stand, it was "Yes, sir" and "No, sir" and "Please, sir" and "Thank you, sir."

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if my hon. friend will find in the evidence of that banking committee a single instance in which it was said, in addressing a banker, "Yes, sir" or "No, sir."

Mr. JAQUES: That may not have been expressed in those words—

Mr. RALSTON: No. The hon. member is drawing on his imagination; that is all.

Mr. JAQUES: —but it was certainly implied, even when bankers had the impudence to stand up before a committee of this House of Commons and deny the fact that they create money. That is the attitude we encounter when we attempt to throw a little light upon this mysterious subject of money and banking.

The money with which to finance this war will not be borrowed from the small lender. It is impossible to finance a war out of taxation and current savings. As the member for Ipswich said, it is not done in Great Britain, where, while £5,000,000 a week is collected from small savings, £45,000,000, or nine times as much, is spent in the same time on the war. I take it that the other £40,000,000 is created in the time-honoured way of a fountain pen and figures in a book, which amount will be saddled on the people after the war as a debt, and they will be taxed to death; just as they were after the last war, to pay interest.

The other evening the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Ross) undertook to criticize the government of Alberta. I am not here to defend that government and I do not intend to attempt to do so. I believe that the people defended and vindicated it on the 21st of March last. In this connection it may be useful to read a short quotation from the report for 1937 of the Bank of Canada. Referring to the Liberal administration in Alberta, which lasted from 1905 to 1922, the report states:

The 1905-22 period was characterized by (1) waste, (2) loose administration and (3) incurrence of debt... which could not be justified even when allowance is made for the optimistic spirit of the times.

I was a resident of the west even before the province of Alberta was formed. I well remember the period between 1905 and 1922, and I think the bank's statement in this connection is fully justified. Certainly the hon. member for Calgary East has no proper grounds for criticizing the present government of Alberta. At least it is trying to bring about better conditions. Where were he and his friends during the great depression from 1930 to 1935 when wheat was selling at twenty cents a bushel, hogs at two cents a pound, cattle could hardly be given away, and millions of people in Canada were looking for work? There was not a sound from them. They were silent. We never heard anything of them until the people got together and formed a government to do the best it could to bring about better conditions; and from that day to this we have had nothing but criticism and an attempt to undermine that government. But that is not to be wondered at because the leaders of the so-called independents, or practically all of them, are counsel for the financial interests. The majority of them are. They are paid to represent the banks, the mortgage companies and the financial interests, and naturally it is those interests which they wish to serve rather than those of the mass of the people. Our opponents in Alberta are even now agitating in the province, creating division, for a return of what they are pleased to call sound government, which of course means government controlled by sound finance. I would point out, not that it should be necessary to do so, the results of that sound finance and sound government in the world to-day. We find them in a ghastly picture.

Objection was made by the hon. member for Calgary East to experts who were brought here from England at the enormous expense of $6,000 a year. I would say that if their advice, or at any rate the advice of those who head this movement—and it is a world movement—had been heeded while there was time, we should not be in the ghastly situation we are in to-day. When Douglas was before the banking and commerce committee he said something to this effect: If you persist in going in the direction in which you are now going you will bring about the greatest disaster that the mind of man can conceive. Events, I think, have proved that his words were correct.

Mr. GOLDING: Tell us what he said for the $500 he got.

Mr. JAQUES: I could not hear the question.

Mr. GOLDING: Would the hon. member tell the house the rest of it, what he told the committee for the $500 which he received?

Mr. JAQUES: Oh, his advice. Well, it was advice which unfortunately was not taken. Had it been taken it would have been cheap at any price.

Mr. GOLDING: Read the evidence.

Mr. JAQUES: I have read that evidence many times, and it only confirms what I have since learned as a member of that committee. It seems to be the main concern of the committee to defend the banks and the financial institutions of the country. It is not mine; I was not sent here to do that.

My objection to this budget is, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, that it is debt creating and deflationary, and for that reason I seconded the amendment which was proposed by my friend the hon. member for Acadia. For these reasons I must oppose the budget unless that amendment is adopted.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the subject of mining taxation, let me say that I am not opposing fair taxation on operations which are in many instances carried out with great profit to those concerned; I speak not against the tax, but against the method of its application. I should like to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) for his realization of this point, particularly with regard to his understanding of the hazardous nature of mining, more especially in connection with the discovery of new mining properties. I should also like to congratulate him upon his realization of the importance of gold as a means of obtaining foreign exchange. He called it hard money. During wars, or other periods of grave unrest, primitive people such as the Turks, the Arabs, and even the Americans, are inclined to look with grave suspicion on extended international paper credits. Gold to-day is the only universally accepted currency; it is the only truly international money. The drastic measures which the government have had to take to restrict the importation of non-essential United States goods, in order to preserve our exchange is a true indication of our dependence on gold. At this time in our history, nothing could do Canada more harm than any tax which would curtail the production of metals and more particularly gold. This is of such vital importance that it cannot bear repetition too often.

The operation of a mine falls into roughly two categories-the physical or actual processing of the ore, and its sale. A ton of ore is of no value to the country until it is drilled, blasted, mucked into cars, hoisted, crushed, milled, filtered, and finally refined. The metallic content then obtained is sold and a profit results. In the case of gold, there is only one purchaser, namely, the government; in the case of base metals, the purchasers are also very much restricted, and are also chiefly governments. Mining differs in this essential point from manufacture, and it is my contention that a system of taxation which is suitable for industry generally must be considerably modified to make it adaptable to mining operations.

In mining, what is known as the winning of the ore is purely an engineering operation, and as I shall show later, the more efficient that operation can become, the greater the volume of metal produced. These essential operations of mining are in no way profit making operations. The only profit which accrues to the mine is after the metal has been sold and the costs of its extraction have been deducted. It is my contention that it is at this point that taxation should be imposed, and such taxation as the mines profits tax, the corporation tax, the dominion income tax, the municipal taxes, as well as certain sales taxes, do not truly fall under this category. They are to a large extent taxes levied on the actual production operations.

An example of this is the application of the sales tax to articles made in the mine shops to replace material worn out in the operation of the mine. I have here a list, and with the consent of the house I shall quote two examples. Twenty-four 5' 6" ore chute bars became worn out owing to the continual passage of rock over them. They had to be repaired, welded and replaced in the mine's own shops. The cost was $18 each, and there was imposed a tax of $30. These bars need constant renewal through wear and tear, just as drill steel needs to be constantly sharpened. Imposing a tax here is definitely an operation tax and raises the cost of extraction of the ore. Another example is seventy-five filter rods for the mill, these cost $18.75 each and were also made in the company's own shops, and on them a tax of $31.25 was levied. I should like to point out also that the major producing mines nave estimated that it actually costs the government more to inspect these shops and obtain this revenue than the net proceeds from these taxes

In order to simplify my argument I shall consider the gold mines in northern Ontario and Quebec. While I have some knowledge of British Columbia, more particularly the high grade mines in the Zeballos district of Vancouver island, I am not familiar enough with them to discuss them in detail. What I have to say now concerns Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec.

It has been found that the value of ore in place tends to vary with reasonably well defined uniformity. It has been worked out with some degree of accuracy that in the Porcupine camp the volume of ore will increase at twice the rate of its diminution in value. In other words, if you have one ton of $12 ore you will have two tons of $11 ore, four tons of $10 ore, and so on. With the consent of the house I should like to put this table on Hansard because it will show this condition somewhat more clearly than I can express it.

Porcupine, Northern Ontario and Quebec Precambrian Shield Not B.C.

Tons	Ore value per ton	Dollar total
1	$12 ==	$ 12
2	11 =	22
4	10 ==	40
8	9 =	72
16	8 ==	128
32	7 ==	224
64	6 ==	384
128	5 ==	640
256	4 =	1,024
511		$2,546

Average of whole stope, $5.02.

Tons

384 = 77% of $5 Grade or lower, volume.

$1,664 = 65% of $5 Grade or lower, value.

In this stope the value runs from $12 to $4. With one ton of $12 ore there will be 128 tons of $5 ore and 256 tons of $4 ore. The average value of the ore in this stope is $5.02 a ton. The total tonnage will be 511 and the total dollar value $2,546. Thus it will be seen that 77 per cent of the volume of this stope will have a value of less than $5, and that 65 per cent of the dollar value will be won from ore having a value of $5 or lower. This situation can also be expressed logarithmically; as known to mathematicians, it is a function of little "e", and also as a simple integral. I mention these alternative solutions merely to show the general trend of the function and to show how closely the mathematical equation follows the physical conditions of the ore in place. This is particularly true of any dilution of what might be called a pregnant solution into a barren one of greatly varying density. I am not going to weary the house further in this matter except to say that when the ore-bearing solutions were forced up into the base or country rock, they were in a molten or even a gaseous state, and therefore were of greatly different density from that of the rock through which they were forced.

I have taken the time of the house to put this rather technical information on the record in order to show that low grade ore, having a value of $3 to $7, is responsible for the great volume of rock which is developed and for the great majority of the dollars produced. Taxation on the operation which tends to increase the over-all cost of production even by a few cents, kills more ore and destroys more dollars than is generally understood.

Canadian mine financing, despite the many criticisms leveled at it, has one strong point in its favour, namely, its simplicity. In the huge majority of cases there is but one method of financing, namely, by no personal liability common stock which is sold directly or indirectly to the public at varying prices, depending upon the outlook for the mine at the time, as well as on other general conditions. In the great majority of cases there is no profit until a dividend is declared and paid on that stock. It is my contention that this is the proper time and place to apply taxation. Many mines in Canada have been ir production for years but have as yet been unable to declare a dividend, although they have been considerable contributors to the treasury.

There is one other unfair and inequitable condition of the excess profits tax, namely its application to mines of extremely low grade ore or where the net profit per ton is meagre. I mention in this connection the Omega mine. The profit at that property is to-day 31 cents a ton. The new taxation is $1.23 per ounce of gold. The average grade is under $7 a ton, it takes five tons of ore to yield one ounce of gold. This means that the over-all cost of operations will be increased by 24 cents a ton, leaving the mine a profit of but 7 cents a ton. As this operation is in debt to the extent of some $400,000, it will readily be seen that it will be unable to continue to pay its way, and will be forced to close. Thus a supply of gold will be lost to Canada in this hour of need. My suggestion to overcome this condition is to exempt from the excess profits tax mines whose profit per ton is 50 cents or less.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Speaker, continuing from where I left off, I realize, of course, that under section 89 of the Income War Tax Act as amended in 1939 new mines are exempted for a period of three years from the time they go into production. While this is a satisfactory method, it is not in my opinion flexible enough. Under this regulation extremely profitable operations such as East Malartic are exempted, while struggling properties such as Naybob and Bankfield are imposed upon. I feel that exemption should be granted not for a period of time but until a profit or a surplus of a definite percentage of the capital outlay has been built up.

Some mines develop extremely rapidly while others, alas, take many, many years. It is my contention that taxes on the operations I have mentioned should be done away with, and that instead a direct dividend tax should be levied. This would have two great advantages. First, it would be extremely simple and cheap to collect, and second, it would show directly to every taxpayer the amount he was paying in taxes.

I have taken as an example a dividend tax of 20 per cent and have compared the revenue which would be produced by this impost with the revenue produced by the present system of taxation. I am fully aware, Mr. Speaker, that by treaty with the United States of America we have agreed with them not to tax dividends at a rate greater than 5 per cent. This, however, is more of an exchange regulation. No one in the house would, I believe, contend that we did not have the right to tax Canadian corporations as we saw fit, nor would we have anything to say as to how people of the United States taxed their companies. In the case I am proposing the dividend tax would be in lieu of income, corporation and excess profits taxes, and would be applied identically to both foreign and Canadian shareholders. The exchange tax is applied only to foreign-owned securities.

In 1939 the producing mines of northern Ontario paid $15,000,000 in dominion income tax, provincial mines profits tax and corporation tax. During the same period they paid $66,000,000 in dividends. On last year's basis, if there had been a 20 per cent dividend tax on mining operations they would have paid $13,200,000. Had the $15,000,000 acquired by taxation been added to the dividends, they would have amounted to $82,000,000. Then, 20 per cent of this would have been $16,400,000, 95826—85\frac{1}{2} or approximately the same as was raised by the indirect method of taxation on the operation itself.

A further advantage of such a tax on dividends would be to encourage the management of every mine to bring about that ideal in business, namely, the greater the production the greater the profit. The total dividends paid by mining operations in 1939 amounted to slightly over $100,000,000.

It is predicted that the production of gold will rise from $184,000,000 to $250,000,000 this year, or an increase of approximately 46 per cent. The corporation tax under the present taxation system remains at 18 per cent, and the excess profits tax is at the minimum rate of 12 per cent, or a direct taxation on the operation, whether or not excess profits are made, of 30 per cent. I am not sure what the minister expects to raise out of this taxation, but let us for the moment assume that owing to the increased price of gold, and owing to the increased production, the dollar value of the gold production will be up 35 per cent. Assuming, therefore, that excess profits and income taxes were removed, and the increased dollar value of the mine had been stepped up 35 per cent, and that these had been added to the dividends, the dividend expectancy, despite the probable over-all increased cost of mining, would be about $140,000,000. A direct 20 per cent tax on these dividends would amount to $28,000,000, or approximately one-half of what the minister expects to raise from the personal income tax, or approximately one-quarter of the total Canadian excess profits tax. Steps would have to be taken to see to it that companies would not build up huge surpluses and not pay them out in dividends; and some regulation would have to be made limiting the size of the surplus to some fraction of the capital expenditure made by the company. If a tax of 30 per cent were imposed, the return would be about $42,000,000, or 75 per cent of the total estimated to be raised on the personal income tax, or 42 per cent of the total estimated by the minister to be raised on the excess profits tax. This 30 per cent is the same rate as he intends to impose at this time. I point this out merely to show that great sums can be raised out of mining, but it has to be done scientifically, and without doing damage to the country or the industry itself.

One other suggestion I have to make to the minister is with regard to prospecting or finding new mines. As he has so well stated, mining requires the risking and often the losing of large sums of money in exploratory and development work, before production commences. In view of the present upset state of the financial market it is almost impossible to get private capital interested in the development of new mines. For years the mining industry has been extremely worried over the lack of new properties being prospected and brought into development. The hazardous nature of prospecting will be better realized when it is estimated that only one out of every six hundred prospects ever develops into a producing mine.

To-day the only people in Canada with the money and knowledge of mine making are those in charge of producing mines. While these mines belong to the people who find and develop them, my contention is that it is their duty to help to develop the other mineral resources of the country. I would suggest, therefore, that a further tax, known as a development tax, be imposed, either to be paid to the government or to be used by the mines in prospecting for and developing of other properties. Mine making is no longer a job for the small prospector or syndicate. It requires immense sums of money and considerable experience and equipment. only people in this business to-day are those in charge of the major producing mines, and I believe it is their duty to develop the country which gave them their all. These suggestions are made with some knowledge of the hazards of the mining industry, from both the producing and taxing points of view. The ideal would be to raise the greatest sum and do the least harm to the industry. It is the industry and the north country, not the individual, that counts.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss one or two matters which have arisen in the debate and also to support the subamendment which amends the amendment already moved. These taken together now read:

This house regrets the failure of the government to impose a one hundred per cent tax on all profits in excess of a fixed return on capital invested.

Furthermore this house is of the opinion that there should have been no increased tax burden placed upon the consumer until Canada attain maximum production of desired commodities or full employment by issuing through the Bank of Canada, currency and credit in terms of actual public need.

I am of the opinion that the subamendment places before the house a clear and additional reason why the government should have explored the fields outlined therein. I have in mind the fact that at the close of the general election of 1935 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that he would issue and use currency and credit in terms of the public need.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I want to deal with one or two matters which were raised by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), who spent most of his time the other day in criticizing what I had said in connection with the excess profits tax. I could not be present at that time because I was otherwise engaged in the committee inquiring into the defence of Canada regulations. As I gathered from reading Hansard, his main criticism was directed against the figures which I had presented in support of the case I was endeavouring to make. I wish to return to that in a few moments. First, however, there are one or two less important criticisms to which I would refer immediately.

The hon, member said that I alleged that some industries would pay no excess profits tax. It must have been obvious from the context of my remarks that I was referring to the excess profits tax as it would be computed under the act of September of last year. Under the present tax, industry will pay a minimum of 12 per cent. Then it was stated by the hon. member that the excess profits tax plus the corporation tax would inflict a heavier tax in Canada than is imposed in Great Britain. In proof of that statement it was said that in Great Britain there is no corporation tax as such. It is not possible for me to compute the taxes paid in Great Britain, nor do I think it is possible for any other hon. member to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not?

Mr. COLDWELL: In Great Britain businesses and corporations are taxed under schedule "D" of the income tax act, and there are four other schedules. I wish to deal more particularly with the criticism of the figures I presented. I did not intend to mislead the house in any way, nor do I think my hon. friend intended to do that. I think in the interests of understanding it would be well if the analysis were carried one step further. It was said that I had computed the excess profits tax on a 10 per cent basis—that is true—when the tax is really 12 per cent—that is true. However, it will be noticed that I computed the corporation income tax at 20 per cent, when it is 18 per cent. In other words, for ease in figuring I computed the tax at 30 per cent-10 and 20 per cent-instead of 18 and 12 per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is it not true that in five cases the hon, member computed the tax at 18 and 12 per cent?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite true. I used the two methods of computation because of the difficulty of breaking down the figures given in the Financial Post survey. I shall deal with them in a moment if I may. As I say, for arithmetical convenience, if I may put it in that way, I used the one basis principally, when perhaps I should have used the two methods as such. However, the collections would be the same: 18 and 12, 30; 20 and 10, 30.

Mr. ABBOTT: Why did the hon, member compute the tax in five cases as 18 and 12 per cent, and in the other twenty-eight cases as 20 and 10 per cent?

Mr. COLDWELL: In those cases where the computation was obvious from the reports presented I used the 30 per cent—12 and 18 per cent.

I come now to the major criticism made by the hon. gentleman, that I computed the taxes on the basis of the net earnings available for dividends, which meant the amount left after provision had been made for payment of taxes. That is quite true. This was done for two reasons, which I shall give in just a moment. May I say that the basis I used actually weakened my case rather than strengthened it. As I mentioned a moment ago, the figures were taken from the Financial Post survey of corporate securities for 1940 and covered earnings for 1939. As I indicated, the returns published in the survey were not made on the same basis by all the companies concerned. Some did not show any allowance for taxes, while others showed an allowance for income tax and others showed a reserve for all taxes generally. It was therefore thought that it was safer, although perhaps not as correct, to use the net profits available for dividends rather than a different figure which would necessarily comprise different elements for different companies.

The hon, member was quite correct in stating that this meant an underestimate of the amount of the taxes to be paid by the corporations, but it is equally true that it meant also an underestimate of the amount made by the corporations and of the amount payable in dividends and of the amount of profit made, expressed in percentages. I am very glad to take the figures suggested by my hon, friend and to analyse the situation from that point of view. I shall place on Hansard both the profits and the taxes on the basis of the profits made by the corporations in question, inclusive of any reserve for taxes shown by them in the returns in the Financial Post survey. The corporation income tax is in every case 18 per cent of this profit and the excess profits tax is 12 per cent, with the exception of Aluminium Limited which, according to its 1939 earnings, as I indicated previously, would pay excess profits tax in accordance with the 75 per cent provision.

What do these revised figures show? They show that the 33 companies to which I referred last Friday had in 1939 total earnings, on the basis suggested by my hon. friend, of $180,530,298, instead of $146,191,262, as I stated on Friday last. That is to say, they had a return on their capital of close to 21 per cent, instead of the 17 per cent which was the result of the figures I used last Friday.

Similarly, the total taxes, both corporation income and excess profits, which will be paid by these 33 companies on the basis of the 1939 earnings would be, roughly, about $10,000,000 more than the amount which I previously gave. However, the result would still be that the corporations would have between them about two-thirds of their profits left, which would represent about a 14 per cent return on their capital, instead of the 11 per cent which resulted from my figures of last Friday.

Thus I think it is clear that the case which I tried to make last Friday is strengthened, and not weakened, by the adjustments which my hon. friend suggested to me. If I may emphasize it, the adjusted figures show that the 33 companies had a profit representing a return of 21 per cent on their combined capital and that after paying the corporation income tax and the new excess profits tax they would still have left profits amounting to a return of 14 per cent on their capital, or respectively 4 and 3 per cent higher than on the figures which I myself gave a week ago.

The same result emerges in the case of the 5 corporations which I gave as illustrations last Friday. The profits of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, according to the revised figure, would be $11,619,586; the corporation income tax on this figure at 18 per cent would be $2,091,525, and the excess profits tax at 12 per cent would be $1,394,350, making a total, for the two taxes, of $3,485,875. This would still leave the corporation with a profit balance of $8,133,711. This amounts to a return on their capital of 41.8 per cent, instead of the 33.6 per cent which I mentioned last Friday.

Now I come to Canadian Industries Limited. The revised profits would be \$7,653,443; corporation income tax, \$1,377,620; excess profits tax, \$918,413, making a total of taxes amounting to \$2,296,033. This would leave the corporation a balance of profit of \$5,357,410, or a return on capital of  $30 \cdot 7$  per cent, instead of the  $25 \cdot 2$  per cent which I indicated a week ago.

Let me summarize the results of the other three companies, to put the matter on an exact basis with the figures which I gave a week ago. International Nickel on the same basis would have remaining a profit of 23.8

per cent on the basis of capital as defined in our act, instead of the 18·2 per cent given in my first speech. Aluminium Limited would have a balance of profit equal to 16·5 per cent of their capital, instead of 11·8 per cent; and Asbestos Corporation would, on the same basis, have remaining a profit of 20·4 per cent, instead of the 16 per cent which I gave on Friday.

The figures I used on Friday were intended as illustrations, as were those of the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount last Tuesday. After all, the important question is not the amount of taxes paid, but the amount and rate of profits left. That I tried to indicate very clearly at the time.

May I add that although the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount brought forward some criticisms apparently intended to destroy my case, I submit that in reality, rather than weakening it, he has given me an opportunity of strengthening it, and I want to express my appreciation of the opportunity of giving these revised figures to-night.

Another fact has come to my attention. In our sister dominion of New Zealand last week the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Walter Nash, said in his budget speech that later he would submit to parliament proposals empowering transfer to the state of the whole of any excess profit made during the war. In my opinion that is the correct attitude for this house to take.

In conclusion, I have just one more thing to say, and this falls into line with the subamendment rather than with the amendment. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) last week suggested that we issue loans at very low rates of interest. I agreed with that, and I suggested then that we might even go one step further and seek for the duration of the war, from those who have large accumulations of wealth, loans with no interest return whatsoever. The Hon. Walter Nash, in the same budget speech to which I have just referred, announced in the New Zealand house last week the introduction of a national savings scheme for the benefit of small investors and of three-year interest-free loans for larger investments. I would draw particular attention to this. The New Zealand government also proposed to empower itself to compel, if necessary, the wealthy to subscribe appropriate amounts of war loan. In other words, where there are large accumulations of wealth, the government of our sister dominion proposes that the government shall have power to compel, if necessary, the lending of a portion of that wealth without interest, for three years, the estimated duration of the war.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

It seems to me that, at a time when our people are being called upon to bear tremendous burdens, and our young men to make tremendous sacrifices, the vast accumulations of wealth which we find in the names of corporations and of individuals ought to be placed at the disposal of the state, either voluntarily or by compulsion, for the purpose of this war effort.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are hoping that the amendment and the subamendment will carry, and we intend to support the subamendment as well as the amendment.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the amendment to the amendment. We are faced to-day with one of the most critical conditions of all times, and everything should be done that can possibly be done to further our war effort. We hear a great deal of talk, not only in this house but through the press, that this is the time to tighten our belts, and that everyone should economize to the utmost. It seems to me that if members of parliament are to go about the country making such statements, hon. members themselves and men in high authority in the dominion should be the very first to practise what they preach. I well recall that a few years ago the Prime Minister of the day, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, made use of this expression, "tightening our belts." Down through the years since then it has often been repeated, and the other day I noticed that the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, also announced that this is the time when everybody should tighten their belts. Incidentally, Mr. Towers receives a salary of $30,000. And he talks about tightening his belt.

An hon. MEMBER: Some belt!

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Excuse me -tightening "our" belts, not "his" belt. Of course he got a reduction of salary from the previous year; it was cut down from $35,000 to $30,000; so he is going to have to economize a little; he will have to get along with a bare subsistence on $30,000. I noticed, however, in the paper which reported his advice to the people of Canada to tighten their belts, that he has spent $30,000 for a new house. Surely there are some limits to the gullibility of the Canadian people. As I said the other day in this house, one of the most desirable or rather essential things is that our people shall become united at this time. But it is hardly sensible to expect more cooperation from those who will suffer from increased taxation as a result of this budget, when they read that the governor of the Bank of Canada receives $30,000 a year, that he expects them to tighten their belts, and that at the same time he is spending $30,000 for a new home.

I shall not criticize at length the increased taxation as it affects incomes in the higher brackets, but I wish to say something about its application to those receiving small incomes. We see that individuals whose income is as low as $600 a year are to pay increased taxes. That is an extremely small income to stand any further reduction. Nor can I imagine how a man with a family and a salary of only $1,200 can provide them with a home, fuel, clothing and all those articles whose prices will be increased, and contribute additional taxes as well.

Observing that this budget was brought down by a man who, if he is not to be called a financier, is well versed in finance and may be termed an expert, I could not help looking up a clipping which appeared in the Edmonton Journal on April 14, 1938, and in which it is stated that the government of the day had spent $1,123,967 on royal commissions. I shall not detain the house with any remarks on the extravagances of governments in the past; maybe we should not go back that far. But in this clipping there are two items which I wish to read to the house. The commission on the textile industry was headed by Mr. Justice Turgeon, who is a leading Canadian citizen and, I am sure, a very clever man; he must be, he is a judge.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The commission on the textile industry which was headed by Mr. Justice Turgeon cost $173,231. J. C. McRuer, K.C., of Toronto, got $31,456, and Elie Beauregard, K.C.—"hear, hear" again, I suppose—got $37,142 as joint counsel. But this is the point I want you, Mr. Speaker, to notice particularly. Judge Turgeon was paid $14,256 in living expenses. So it cost the learned judge $14,256 for living expenses while he was commissioner.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that for himself alone?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I suppose so, because he had to economize. I do not know what it would have been if he had included an allowance for his family. I am sure he did not pad his allowance; one would not expect that from a judge. But compare that living allowance with the minimum of $600 for a single man and $1,200 for a married man under the taxation proposals of this budget. If that is considered a decent living allowance by the financial expert who drew up the budget, then it is an absolutely criminal offence to allow that judge to be given $14,256 for his living allowance. There is simply no common sense in it; there is no justice in it. Let me go further. May I say in passing that Judge Turgeon had $35 a day for living expenses. That was his living allowance compared with the single man's living allowance of $1.66; and one we shall tax while we have forgotten all about taxing the other.

The next one is the commission on wheat marketing, also headed by Judge Turgeon in the same period during which he conducted the other investigation. This inquiry cost $114,237. Colonel J. L. Ralston, Montreal—I believe it is the same financial expert who drew up the budget—received $200 a day and $20 a day living expenses. He must be good. Mr. Turgeon received $12,100 in living allowances, making a total of about $26,300 in living allowances for that period.

The point is that Colonel Ralston was allowed $20 a day living expenses and Judge Turgeon $35 a day, and I am sure that they were honest when they put in their living expense accounts. Well, if they were honest when they put in their living expense accounts and it cost the one $20 a day and the other $35 a day, then it is a great injustice to expect another of their fellow citizens to live on $1.60 or $2 as the case may be—and he has dependents. Then, to add insult on top of that, we are going to tax it out of him.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, can you expect the people of Canada to be united when they see such things going on? It is a regular racket; it cannot be termed anything else in view of the evidence I have put before the house. I think that in all fairness to the country this budget should be changed in this one instance at least and that the exemption should be raised from $600 up to $1,000 for single men and proportionately higher for the married men.

If we were telling the people to tighten their belts because we were doing the same thing, the situation would be different. It would be different if we said to them: You must tighten your belts because we are short of supplies. There would be sense in that. There would be sense in saying to them: We must economize because we have not enough wheat to give you; we must economize because we have not enough meat to give you; we must economize because our farmers and other primary producers cannot possibly raise the stuff you require. But what utter nonsense it is to talk as we do with conditions as they are. Why, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) himself, when speaking on the wheat bill last year, advocated that the people reduce the wheat acreage and cut down the amount of production. Why? We are doing everything now to see to it that the primary producer shall cut down his production at the very time when we need greater production. On the contrary we should be assisting our primary producers. We should be giving themat least cost of production so that the people of Canada would not be required to lower their standard of living at this time. We should be putting forth every effort to produce as much as we can. Goodness knows we shall need it in the near future.

It is all very well to talk about increased taxation and tightening our belts if this is necessary. As the hon, member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said, if we are short of any goods in the country the proper thing to do is to ration them if we wish to save foreign exchange. But seeing that this government intends, according to the Minister of Finance, to finance this war exactly as the last war was financed, I was forced to look up some of the figures in connection with the last war, and I find, from a return tabled in the House of Commons a year ago, that before the war started in 1914—that is, according to the return giving the figures for the fiscal year 1913-14 we had a national debt of $335,996,850, or just about one-third of a billion dollars. I am speaking of the net national debt because I shall refer to it in the course of my speech, and for the sake of convenience I shall say roughly about one-third of a billion. In that year we paid $12,893,505 in interest. In other words, out of every $100 of taxes we paid $7.90 in interest on that debt. That is not a tremendous debt-about a third of a billion dollars.

But what happened after the war? In the fiscal year 1919-20 our debt had risen from about one-third of a billion dollars to $2,248,-868,624, an increase of approximately two billion dollars; and in that year our interest had jumped from $12,000,000 in 1913-14 to $107,527,089—from $12,000,000 to $107,000,000 in interest alone. The amount of interest we paid in 1920 was almost equal to what our deficit will be this year; and in the same year we paid, out of every $100 of taxes, $30.80 in interest charges. That is a tremendous increase, from $7.90 to $30.80 interest for every $100 of taxes paid. Yet we are going to finance this war in exactly the same way. I have not much confidence in our ability to prepare effectively for war if we are to carry on under such a tremendous handicap.

Let us continue the analysis and find out what our debt is doing. In 1931 we had a [Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

net debt of $2,261,611,936, and there was an increase that year of $83,847,977. For the succeeding years the figures are as follows:

Year	Net debt	Increase
1932	$2,375,846,172	$114,234,235
1933	2,596,480,826	220,634,653
1934		133,497,314
1935	2,846,110,958	116,132,817
1936	3,006,100,517	159,989,558
1937		77,851,685
1938		17,715,368
1939	3,152,559,313	50,891,744

Every solitary year an increase of millions of dollars of debt, the total increase since 1931 being $974,795,355, or a yearly average increase of $108,310,595. And those were in a period of peace.

The debt charges alone for the fiscal year 1938-39 amounted to $113,147,062, or $309,992 a day. According to the statement of the Minister of Finance at page 1018 of Hansard we are going to have this year a deficit of $118,000,000, and the net debt as at March 31, 1940, was about $3,270,980,000. The gross liabilities at that date are estimated at $4,028,573,000.

How are we going to be able to carry on in this country in time of war and do our share of rearming and supplying the British empire with the commodities they require if we are going to keep on under a limited monetary system? It is safe to say that at the end of this war, if it lasts as long as the last war did, and our debt increase continues in proportion to the increase this year, our national debt will be over ten billion dollars, and the carrying charges alone will be half a million dollars a day. Is it any wonder that the people of Canada are asking, why have we not all our machine shops working? Why is it that we have thousands of men hanging round the country unemployed, anxious to work but unable to find any work to do? Even to-day the situation is exactly the same. In England even the women and children are at work, whereas here we have able-bodied men only too anxious to do their share for the empire but they are not permitted to do it because we have not the money. This lack of efficiency I fear is going to have disastrous results for Canada, unless we change our methods.

It seems, according to the Minister of Finance, that the only source of money is taxation or borrowing. To borrow is only a delayed form of taxation. There is a limit to the possibilities of taxation. As taxes increase, the standard of living of the people is continually lowered; the nation's preparedness for war is continually lowered, and you continually disunite the people of this country. The people of Canada should begin to look about them and see what happened in other countries, and profit from that experience. We know what happened to Holland, to Belgium, to Norway; every one of those countries was defeated for just one reason they were not prepared. What happened to France? That great power was smashed by the German machine because she was not prepared. At the beginning of this war we were told that France was ready, that Great Britain was ready, that Canada was ready. After the defeat of every one of those countries which I mentioned a moment ago, the excuse was made that they were not properly prepared. But are we prepared? Or are we heading for exactly the same thing?

Why did France not complete the Maginot line right round to the English channel? It was clearly explained in the press the other day that it was because the financial system broke down and she did not have the money. Why did she not have the money? Because the financiers would extract the very last drop of lifeblood from the people in order to get their pound of flesh. France had the material; she had the men to complete that line, but the financial interests sacrificed their country for their pound of flesh. We should begin to take stock of ourselves, and see if we are not in exactly the same position France was in. Surely there are other ways of getting money besides taxation and borrowing. I want to show hon. members, if I can, that some people in Canada are beginning to awaken. They are becoming alive to the issue that the state should create credit, so as more effectively to carry on our war effort.

I wish to read to the house a reprint from the Ottawa Citizen of June 26. This is reprinted from the Western Producer, a Saskatoon publication, and is entitled "Money's part in Defeat or Victory." It is as follows:

Canada remains chained to comparative inaction, or certainly far behind the limits of her full capacity by the bogey of money and costs. There she will remain so long as she holds fast to the position which the government has taken that we must pay as we go, that our war effort must be strictly limited to the amount of taxes which can be collected, supplemented by restricted borrowing. These supplemented by restricted borrowing. These shackles that tie us down must be broken. The fact must be established that the only limit to our war effort is our resources and our man-power. The machinery of production must be freed from the blighting control of finance. The watchword must be full steam ahead in The watchword must be full steam ahead in field, factory and workshop, with orders to the Department of Finance, in collaboration with the Bank of Canada, to supply all the money needed. Let there be no doubt about it, this must be done sooner or later, or Canada will be defeated and become a conquered country. country.

That was printed in a paper which has a wide circulation, and expresses the opinion of a great many people.

I shall read another extract which sets out the opinion of people from a country outside Canada. I refer to Dorothy Thompson's statement in the New York Herald-Tribune of June 24. This is the statement of a United States woman who visited Europe, and who has given her reasons why Germany has been so successful. She states:

Hitler is winning the war because he has been fighting it with an industrial and engineering economy, while the democracies have been fight-economy, while the democracies have been lighting it with a money, or financial economy, and fighting it stingily. We are now following Britain and France in our defence programme.

The Germans did not vote themselves four billion money units for defence. They voted—had voted for them—thirty thousand airplanes, so and so many guns, so and so many thousand tons of reserves of oil and raw materials. The German economy is an economy. materials. The German economy is an economy of things and men; the allied economy is an economy of symbols: money. The German economy recognizes that all wealth is in goods, particularly in capital goods, and that these are not created by money, which is only a medium of exchange, but by the application of labour to materials of labour to materials.

The allies had money, but failed to produce goods. The Germans had no money, but did produce them.

That is further evidence of what can be done if one has the will to do it, and the only limit to war preparedness is material and men. Surely in Canada we have an unlimited amount of these. But some of us will sit back complacently and say to ourselves, "Oh, we do not need to fear; we are three thousand miles away from Germany." But let me read a warning by Major-General L. R. LaFleche. This article, which is headed "LaFleche warns Canada to be Prepared", is as follows:

Major-General L. R. LaFleche issued an earnest call to-day for the conversion of Canada into a strongly fortified bulwark against nazi domination of the world which he sees as one domination of the world which he sees as one of Hitler's goals.

Just back from France where he served as Canadian military attache and saw at first hand Germany's lightning subjugation of that country, he said in an interview with the Canadian Press that the dominion should look to her arms and the defence of her great coast-line without delay.

without delay.

"Inaction and indecision should not be tolerated," General LaFleche declared. "To-morrow may be too late.'

Yes, Major-General LaFleche declared, "Tomorrow may be too late." And so I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we should become more alive to this fact, and that we can never do our maximum until we have the issuance of currency and credit in terms of public need. As was said in the English House of Commons by Mr. P. C. Loftus, a member of the Conservative party:

If there has to be a certain expansion of credit money, created credit, I cannot see why the state itself should not create that credit free of interest.

That is what hon, members in this corner of the house have been advocating for the last five or six years, and I am pleased to say that our efforts are having some effect on some of the people. I well recall the excellent speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). That speech is to be found at page 1225 of Hansard. I shall not take time to read it, but in effect he said that the time had come when some of this nonsensical foolishness of bon, members on the government side of the house should change to a little seriousness and some deeper consideration, because the time was at hand when our monetary system should be changed.

I have before me a letter from another Liberal—and if hon, members wish, they may read his statement. I am sure no hon, member would contradict these gentlemen, because they are Liberals. The letter to which I refer is from Cecil R. Bull, M.L.A. for Okanagan in the legislature of British Columbia. May I say in passing that this gentleman is a Liberal, the other hon. member of whom I spoke a moment ago is a Liberal, and the member in the British House of Commons is a Conservative; so it would appear that truth is beginning to have its effect on Liberals and Conservatives. In view of the fact that the two Liberals I mentioned, namely, the hon, member for New Westminster and the member in the legislature of British Columbia, are from that province, it would seem that the only Liberals in Canada who are-should I say?—a little progressive and who seem to be a little more learned than the rest of them, seem to come from British Columbia. But of course they have obtained that feeling from the west.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is strong out there.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Bull has this to say about finance:

Orthodox financiers and economists will tell you that there is no solution, that there always were unemployed and there always will be, or words to that effect. In point of fact they admit they are licked.

And then later on:

Before I outline the course that must be followed, I would like to cite some of the fallacies many people believe in:

- 1. There are people who believe the present economic state of affairs can continue. I say they are blind.
- 2. There are people who say if men look for work they can find it. I say this is not an answer and it is not true, and further it is a shallow, hypocritical remark.
- 3. There are people who say lots of men do not want to work. I say that is an equally cruel and trifling remark as the previous one.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

4. There are people who do not know there is a problem; who live in a world apart ignoring this vital and tragic issue that will bring such a bitter reckoning to us and our children if it is not tackled.

And he has this to say about finance:

The government must amend the Bank of Canada regulations to permit the bank to loan money on long-term contracts to the dominion, provincial and municipal government: These loans to be paid over a specified period without interest.

As existing government bonds mature they must be paid off by the bank: That is to say, there must be no refunding with interest-bearing bonds. This does not mean that the people would be relieved of any further responsibility regarding our government debts, but rather that it would be converted from an interest to a non-interest-bearing obligation.

That shows progressiveness. It shows that there are at least two Liberals in this country—the only two I know of—who are keeping up with the times. Their minds are open enough to convince them of truth. That is what we in Alberta have been asking for. That is why the Alberta government have been appealing to this house for a provincially owned bank. They realize that the principle of public ownership must be carried into the control of our finance.

We should have public ownership and control over the issuance of debt-free and interest-free money, especially in a time of war when we so greatly need more money. We need more than we can ever hope to get from taxation, more than we can ever hope to get by borrowing, more than we can ever hope to get, no matter how deeply we grind down the poor people in order to get more taxes. We cannot get enough in that way and it unnecessarily destroys the morale of the people.

I should like to refer to the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of May 16, 1939. At that time the hon member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was addressing the committee, and he made reference to a statement which had been made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I quote from page 625 of the proceedings as follows:

I am free to admit that I would rather have held the opinion that this should be a privately-owned institution publicly controlled, before I read the bill as it is and heard the discussion and knew all the functions that are going to be those of this public institution. Under the circumstances, the central bank being what it is going to be, I think I should be derelict in my duty if I did not support the principle of public ownership.

There is a statement by the Minister of Justice showing that he is absolutely in favour of the principle of public ownership and the issuance of currency and credit in terms of public need. We certainly have a great public need to-day. Reference is made on page 626 of the same proceedings to a statement which had been made by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston). I quote:

Dealing with those functions, Mr. Ralston said: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister and whoever drafted this legislation, and, with all due deference, some of the commissioners who made the suggestions which appear as a schedule, have for a moment forgotten that after all this is a state function, that the control of credit and currency is the biggest and most important public utility in the economic activities of the Dominion of Canada. I am not one who necessarily champions public ownership at all times and in all places, but I say there are certain things which should be under public ownership, or public control and certainly the very first and most important of those is the institution which controls, which guides and which directs the whole economic life of the dominion.

Those are brave words, but it may take a great deal of courage to put them into action. We have a so-called publicly owned bank and we have as Minister of Finance the hon. gentleman who made that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I shall have finished in just a moment. We have a minister in charge—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall permit the hon. gentleman to complete his sentence.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We have now sitting on the treasury benches as Minister of Finance the hon. gentleman who uttered those words which I have just quoted from the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee. I hope he will give consideration to the statement he made as reported in those proceedings. I hope he will take into consideration the tremendous peril this country is in and see that every effort is put forward. If money is needed, he should see that it is issued by the Bank of Canada as interest-free money. We shall then not have piling up on our shoulders a debt which our children will have to bear after us. Every effort should be made to see that a maximum war effort be put forth. I hope and trust that he will see fit to raise the exemption from $600 to $1,000, with a corresponding increase for married men. Now is the time to act; let us not wait until to-morrow when it may be too late.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate very briefly in order to discuss the Montreal terminal situation which was referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). His statement was, I think, that the government had stopped work on the supreme court building, on the Toronto postal building and on the postal building at Quebec, and therefore it was a disgraceful state of affairs that they should continue with the Montreal terminal project.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Shocking" is the word I used.

Mr. HOWE: I do not want to misquote the hon. gentleman—shocking situation. It seems to me that that remark shows a complete lack of conception of what is involved in the Montreal terminal problem. This is not a project to replace an existing building with a new and better building; far from it. To understand the problem I would recall that when the Canadian National was organized in 1919 it took over five existing railways. Those railways were separately operated enterprises, and the process of consolidating them into one coordinated system has been proceeding ever since. I am happy to say that to-day we have a well coordinated railway except on the island of Montreal.

In 1919 the island of Montreal was served by two railways which are now components of the Canadian National Railways: one, the Grand Trunk and the other, the Canadian Northern. Each of those railways had a main terminal in the city of Montreal, and each had a secondary terminal which was operated separately from the main terminal. No change has occurred in that situation from that date to this, although a start was made on correcting the situation in the years from 1927 to 1931. There are in Montreal four separate railway terminals operated by the Canadian National Railways. First, there is the Bonaventure terminal serving the lines coming into Montreal from the east and the main line to the west. Second, there is the Moreau street terminal which serves the lines to Quebec and the north shore of the lower St. Lawrence. Third, there is the tunnel terminal on Lagauchetière street serving the Laurentian district and the district north of Montreal. Then there is the McGill street terminal which serves the territory from Montreal to Granby; the railway formerly using this terminal was known as the Montreal and Southern Counties railway. There is no connection whatever among these four terminals. Each terminal must have its own coach yard because it is impossible to operate a passenger terminal without one. Each terminal must have a freight yard. These freight yards have become tremendously congested under present day conditions and are quite inadequate to handle efficiently the volume of traffic being passed through them.

With the increased business which came in 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928, culminating in the highest traffic year of 1929, the need of improved terminal facilities in Montreal became so great that the railway undertook a tremendous project to solve this problem. It undertook to unify the four separate railways serving the island of Montreal into one terminal and to provide proper passenger accommodation. At that time the project was a $53,000,000 one. However, it was necessary to stop work because of a falling off in traffic and the difficult monetary situation which existed in 1931, at which time some $16,800,000 had been spent on the project.

The following years were low traffic years, but within the last eighteen months there have been definite indications of an increasing rise in traffic and growing indications that the terminal situation in Montreal must again be reviewed. The consequence was that in planning the budget for the year 1939, after a thorough reconsideration of the whole terminal project by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, it was decided to carry on the terminal project in a decidedly modified form. Accordingly a project was worked out which would involve a further expenditure of some $12,500,000, and the board decided, and the government concurred, that an investment of that type would be money well spent and would provide an adequate return in improved operating facilities.

The work of completing the Montreal terminal project was undertaken in that year. There was considerable unemployment at the time and the government was making provision for projects to relieve unemployment. In 1939 the government joined with the directors of the railway in providing the cost of direct labour used on the project, and as between the railway appropriation and the government labour contribution some $4,500,000 expended on the project in that year. Commitments, in addition to the amount I have mentioned, were made which carried over into this year; for a project of that kind is a continuing thing and commitments have to be made considerably in advance of the year in which the expenditures will take place.

At the outbreak of the war the situation was seriously reviewed. First, a study was made to see by how much the $12,500,000 contemplated expenditure, on top of the $16,800,000 expenditure which had been made in earlier years, could be reduced and still bring about the desired result. I am not going to give the exact figures of that reduction because I have not reviewed the situation lately, but my recollection is that the figure was reduced by about $2,000,000, which it was felt could be cut out and still preserve the essential features of the terminal project. The matter was seriously considered by the directors of the railway. It was made known to them that the government would not be in a position to make further grants towards labour costs on account of unemployment, because unemployment was not expected to be a factor throughout the year 1940 and in subsequent war years. The directors reviewed again the economics of the problem and the increasing difficulty of railway operation in that area owing to the lack of adequate terminal facilities, and their decision as indicated to the government was that they had no doubt whatever that the terminal project should be carried out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When was that?

Mr. HOWE: When was the position reviewed? Last October or November, and provision was made for the project in the budget for 1940-41, which was submitted to the government in January of this year.

Suppose we had followed the judgment of the hon. leader of the opposition and had suspended work on the terminal. The position would then have been that to an inoperative and unproductive investment of $16,800,000 would have been added another $4,500,000 of actually expended, plus possibly $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 of commitments which would have had to be liquidated. We would have had invested some $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 in a project estimated to cost in toto some $27,000,000, and yet for the lack of the last $4,000,000 we would have had no terminal facilities on the island of Montreal. I think that will hardly commend itself to hon. members as a wise decision to be made offhand, without a careful study of what is involved in this project and of the results of discontinuing the project at the stage it is in to-day.

It is the intention of the government to complete the project in accordance with the latest plans which have been projected by the railway directors, which call for a minimum of expenditure to achieve the operating results. It is expected that the trackage features of the development will be placed in operation in the spring of next year and all the work contemplated in the plan is expected to be completed by autumn of next year.

Traffic is growing by leaps and bounds. To-day gross earnings, which is a reasonable measure of traffic, exceed those of a year ago by some 35 per cent, representing a tremendous increase in traffic. The railway to date has handled the increased traffic without any congestion whatever. I think that few of us realize how fortunate the country is that throughout the depression years all the railways of Canada were able to maintain their property in efficient operating condition so that they were prepared to handle the situation as we find it to-day and as we foresee it in the days to come as long as the war lasts. It has not been handled without testing the railways very considerably.

The line between Moncton and Truro was the bottle-neck of the Canadian National Railways in the last war. At that time some 400 cars a day were moved over that length of line. During last winter we maintained an average of over 700 cars a day moving over that line, and we expect during the coming winter to increase that movement considerably. We have accomplished that by enlarging sidings, and by improved operation due to heavier locomotives and better rolling stock. We do fear a serious bottle-neck in the island of Montreal, and every effort is being made to complete the terminal developments so that a bottle-neck on the island will not occur before the new improvements can be placed in operation.

It is true that, so far as passenger facilities are concerned, we shall have a new passenger station instead of the old Bonaventure station. It is essential that the old Bonaventure station and the area serving it be used for freight facilities. That is one of the objectives of the entire terminal plan. The new terminal will be a simple building, as simple as can be built without requiring to be rebuilt as future requirements are placed upon it. It will be an adequate station to serve the passenger business of Montreal, and it will be built in a vastly superior passenger location compared with the present terminal.

I have said this simply because in the newspapers and in this house there has seemed to be a complete misconception of why the Montreal terminal is being built. It is not on a par with the supreme court building. We have a supreme court building; it has been functioning for many years, and we are merely building a better one. It is not the same as a post office. A post office is a place for the handling of mail. If a new post office cannot be built, additional facilities can be rented and the service continued. But when we have a railway terminal situation such as we have on the island of Montreal, we must either correct the situation or allow ourselves to be bottle-necked if the freight traffic increases beyond a point that those facilities can meet. That is the situation.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the minister anything to say about our war effort?

Mr. HOWE: Not a thing at this time.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) began his budget speech with the statement that the budget this year was being delivered at the most critical hour in history. He said:

For the first time in a thousand years the world has been made to realize that a new "Dark Ages" may not be the figment of a wild imagination. . . All the things we hold dear—the democratic way of life, the Christian ideal, these age-old tenets of human relationships, fair dealing, justice and brotherhood—are threatened with destruction by those who would shut the gates of mercy on mankind.

These are stirring words and fine sentiments, but I think they should be examined carefully as to what exactly they mean when applied to the social relationships prevailing in this country to-day. I do not want to minimize the critical nature of the situation or the ruthlessness of the gangsters who rule Germany and Italy to-day. I have tried more than once in this house in days gone by to draw attention to the danger of "building up" those gangsters. I did not have much success.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Stalin?

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, we shall deal with Stalin at the proper time. Even to suggest that the system under which we in Canada live has much of those fine attributes referred to by the Minister of Finance is, in my opinion, sheer poppycock.

The hon, member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), when speaking yesterday, referred to the number of fine residences in that part of Montreal represented by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott). I was looking towards my hon, friend from that riding while the hon. member for Mackenzie was speaking, and when he mentioned the affluence of St. Antoine-Westmount the hon. member for that constituency seemed pleased. But, as the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out, there is another side to the picture. All the Montreal constituencies do not contain such fine houses. Montreal has its wealth and splendour; it has also its poverty and squalor; and, strange as it may seem, I have always observed, and I think anyone else who attentively observes will find, that in any city the greater the wealth, the greater the poverty. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members, how do those fine attributes to which the minister referredfair dealing, justice, brotherhood and the Christian ideal—apply in the relationships which exist and which under the circumstances must exist between those who live on the slopes of Mount Royal and those who live in the hovels of the mean and narrow streets of other districts in Montreal? The contrast between the two conditions of life demonstrates quite definitely that there is very little fair dealing, very little justice, and no brotherhood whatever, but a great deal of injustice and class dominance. It is time that people in high places should stop associating the present social order with the Christian ideal which, if the term means anything, refers to the doctrines and teachings of Christ, the founder of Christianity. He did not stand for the conditions which we find to-day.

Mr. Vernon Bartlett, a member of the British parliament and a commentator of note on foreign affairs, in a recent article which appeared in the London News Chronicle and which was reproduced in some Canadian papers, said that the sudden collapse of the war in France could be accounted for by the fact that the older generals and politicians in that country are less afraid of Hitler than they are of social change. I believe there is plenty of evidence to prove that the same is true of some so-called statesmen and politicians closer to us than France. This budget in fact indicates that this government is very much afraid of social change and that it is totally oblivious to what is taking place to-day—not only changes of the borders and governments of countries, but alterations of the whole world order. One would hardly think that those who drafted the present budget understood what is happening in the world to-day and what must be done if we are not only to defeat Hitler but to prevent totalitarianism in this country after we have defeated Hitler.

Perhaps it is impossible to carry on, without borrowing, production on the scale which is necessary to meet the requirements of this war, but certainly it is not necessary to borrow on the scale indicated in this budget.

There are two matters in particular to which I wish to refer, although briefly: first, the excess profits tax; second, the national defence tax.

It is not necessary for me to say very much about the excess profits tax. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has adequately dealt with that subject, and nothing that I could say could add very much to what has already been said in that regard. But I fear that hon. members do not quite realize even the psychological implications of leaving this tax at anything less than 100 per cent. The tax is now 75 per cent on excess profits in the taxable year over those of the four-year pre-war base period. This means that corporations will be allowed to keep 25 per cent of the profits made in excess of profits made in the peace-time period of the last four years. This is indeed a strange procedure at a time when the government insists that every one must make sacrifices. But no sacrifice is made by one who is allowed to keep any amount of excess profits that accrue from war conditions. All profits in excess of normal can be said to be made because of war conditions. It is indeed the very reverse of sacrifice; it is making profits out of the sacrifice of others. The least therefore that this government can do, even if only for psychological reasons, or political reasons if you like, is to take 100 per cent of the profits made in excess of those made in the four-year period mentioned in the budget. No one should be allowed to make profits out of the blood and tears of the Canadian people. In any event, this group repudiates the doctrine, both in war and in peace times, that any individual or group of individuals has the right to exploit the natural resources of the country and the people of the country for private gain. We are therefore, as a matter of principle, opposed to the exemption of excess profits, to any extent, and we are opposed to any exemptions particularly in this time of national distress.

I come now to the national defence tax, the tax on low incomes. It is not only a most obnoxious tax but it is also an uneconomical tax. Single persons earning $600 a year and married persons earning $1,200 a year do not live; they merely exist. Any deductions from their incomes will simply mean that some government authority will have to assume larger burdens in social services. In a recent interview or address, I am not quite sure which, reported in the press, the Hon. George M. Weir, provincial secretary and minister of education of British Columbia—I believe he is also minister of health—said that 50 per cent of the population of that province were unable to pay for essential medical services. In other words, to the extent that they received medical attention, they received it from the state. What is true in this regard in British Columbia is true, I am sure, in every part of Canada. These are the people who will be hardest hit by this tax, and it is not justice, it is not fair dealing to ask them to make further sacrifices. They have never done anything but sacrifice-sacrifice in order that a few might live in wealth and luxury.

The national defence tax should certainly not apply to single persons with incomes of less than $750 a year and married persons with incomes of less than $1,500 a year. Let us break up this $600 and see what it means. Six hundred dollars a year amounts to $11.50 a week, or about $46 a month. I insist-I was going to say suggest, but I insist-that this is a measly income when compared with $20 and $35 a day living allowances paid certain people or salaries of $30,000 a year paid certain others. It cannot be repeated too often that the sacrifice one makes cannot be computed in the amount one gives but must be computed in what one has left to live on after the tax has been paid.

In considering this budget and particularly because it is a war-time budget, I think it would be instructive if members would read the speech made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) when presenting the budget at the special war session last September. I am going to quote briefly from that speech to show that, despite the warnings of the minister, despite what he said on that occasion, we are adopting precisely the same policy followed by the government in the last war—that is, the policy of enriching the few at the expense of the many and making future generations pay for the war. What happened in the last war? This is how the Minister of National Revenue put it; I am quoting from Hansard at page 139 of September 12, 1939:

Prior to 1914 the dominion government had relied for its revenues almost exclusively on customs duties and a few excise duties. It had no system of general taxation or established machinery for directly taxing the net incomes, profits and wealth of individuals. The sudden introduction of such taxation measures on the scale required would have been too drastic to be either economically or politically practicable. Her own financial programme and perhaps more importantly the influence on world prices of the inflationary financing of many other countries resulted in a drastic expansion of bank credit, a rapid rise in prices and a redistribution of the national income. Prices and the cost of living rose more rapidly than wages and interest on old debts. Industrial profits and property incomes increased while the real income of wage-earners and individuals receiving interest payments at fixed rates declined, or rose less rapidly.

It was this reduction in the real income of one section of the community and the creation of large surpluses in the hands of other sections willing to lend to the government that in considerable part at least made possible Canada's remarkable record in mobilizing public savings through the various war and victory loan programmes. The decline in the relative standard of living suffered by certain groups, the rapid increase in savings and the post-ponement of needed capital facilities made possible the enormous volume of war loans and represented the sacrifice necessary for the conduct of the war.

In other words, what worked to the disadvantage of certain classes in the community worked to the advantage of certain other classes. A few got rich because of conditions created by the war; they loaned their money to the government for war purposes, and for the past twenty-five years the interest on these loans has been the first charge on the revenue of this country. Then he went on:

Indeed it is perhaps not too much to say that some of the roots of the present war are to be found in the world-wide unsound financing of the last war and the great economic dislocations and continuing burdens of which it was in part the cause. It is to be hoped that in the present war the world may be able to avoid a repetition of that experience.

If this budget is any criterion of what the Canadian people may hope for, I am afraid we are not going to avoid similar disasters to those arising from the last war. Indeed we are allowing huge profits to be made to-day. We are borrowing these profits at good rates of interest, and we will continue for the next twenty-five years as we have done in the past twenty-five years paying interest to the people who have increased their wealth because of the war.

Again in the same speech, at page 136 of Hansard, the Minister of National Revenue, after referring to the difference between conditions in Canada at that time, that is September last, as compared with those in 1914-18, said:

What has happened is, of course, a strong tribute to the vastly improved position which we enjoy to-day. True, we start with a much higher public debt, but in most other respects our economy is infinitely stronger. We are no longer dependent on vast imports of foreign capital on which the old pre-war boom was based. During and since the war Canadian savings have increased enormously and we have built up a vast and efficient mechanism for the mobilization of these savings. The strength of our banking system has always been recognized, but the changes which we have made in monetary and banking legislation during the last few years have greatly improved its efficiency and flexibility and its ability to promote the public welfare in war time as well as in peace time.

There is no doubt whatsoever of the enormous increase in savings during and since the first great war. And, strange as it may seem, savings have increased during the last ten years, despite the fact that Canada has been going through the greatest depression in its history. Each year the chartered banks of Canada file with the Minister of Finance a statement of the amount of money on deposit in current and savings accounts. I have the statement filed on October 31, 1939. The total amount is indeed enormous. But an analysis of the statement shows the same state of affairs as was shown by the analysis of income tax returns which has already been placed on Hansard by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). It shows in fact an enormous concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. If we take the savings accounts only, that is deposits payable after notice, on October 31 last, there were 4,161,897 depositors with total deposits amounting to $1,709,156,774. But 3,828,291 of these, that is all accounts of less than $1,000, represented an average of only $119 each, or not enough to pay for a respectable funeral. Deposits between $1,000 and $5,000 numbered some 290,000, with a total of over $588,000,000, or an average of $2,027 per depositor. Of accounts of $5,000 to $25,000 there were 40,000, representing a total of about $348,860,000, and these again show a big increase in the average per depositor, namely $8,721. There were 2,757 accounts with deposits from $25,000 to $100,000, with an aggregate of $123,329,760, or an average of $44,708 each. Of deposits in excess of $100,000 there were 626, with over $190,000,000 aggregate deposits, giving each depositor on an average $303,770. It seems to me that instead of taking a few cents out of the pittances of wage-earners who may have been on relief during the past four years or part of that time, this government could well go where the money is and take some of it. It would be better for the government and better for the country, and I am sure better for those who have so much that they do not know what to do with it.

What has happened in the realm of finance as shown by the income taxes and also by the return I have just read, has taken place in the whole economy of the country. As a matter of fact, big business has this country by the throat, and never was there a government in Canada more tender towards big business than the present one. Despite the sad story of the exploitation of primary producers, of labour and of consumers related by every royal commission set up in Canada in the last six or seven years; despite the proof of monopolistic control of industry which has been indicated by investigations under the Combines Investigation Act, this government insists not only upon doing nothing but upon increasing the power and the influence of big business in the affairs of the country.

The latest commission to refer to this monopolistic control is the Sirois commission. Surely the findings of that commission should be of sufficient importance to merit the attention of the government. The price spreads committee referred to this matter, and every other committee which has investigated different industries has referred to it. At page 148 of book 1 of the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations I find this:

Business organization has everywhere become increasingly monopolistic. In Canada industry, commerce and finance are highly centralized and in many branches a few enterprises dominate the field. Under such conditions the maintenance of prices is possible in the face of declining demands. The monopolistic producers may consider that they are better off by selling less at higher prices than by selling more at lower prices. Consequently the burden tends to fall upon the workers who lose their jobs through the reduction in output, and on the exporters whose costs are thus held rigid while their prices on world markets are sharply reduced.

I would ask the government to take notice of what is happening to-day. It should take notice that the commission points out that our monopolistic producers do not consider the general public when they are considering the raising or lowering of prices. The commission shows that our monopolies may conclude that they can best improve their own position by selling less at higher prices than by selling more at lower prices. But while the monopolists are better off, the whole mass of consumers are worse off. Before there can be any sense to this urge to win the war and to defeat Hitler, there must be some programme setting out what we are going to do in Canada after we have defeated Hitler. The urge to defeat Hitler in itself is not enough.

I wish now to say a few words respecting the subamendment moved by the group to my left. The amendment to the amendment is as follows:

Furthermore this house is of the opinion that there should have been no increased tax burden placed upon the consumer until Canada attain maximum production of desired commodities or full employment by issuing through the Bank of Canada, currency and credit in terms of actual public need.

I do not hold with my hon, friends to my left who say that all we have to do to increase production, to distribute goods or to make everyone perfectly happy and content, with the whole supply of wealth to draw on, is to issue money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Nor do we.

Mr. MacINNIS: As a matter of fact, I think if the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) who spoke to-night really took note of the quotations to which he referred, he would be sitting with the group to which I belong, because those quotations prove our position.

I was about to point out, however, that I am not going to quarrel with hon. members to my

It was stated to-night by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that we are going to support this subamendment, and I see no reason in the world why we should not support it. I see no reason in the world why we should complain of poverty and distress while we have abundant natural resources, while we have abundant machinery and while there is idle man-power in the country. I do not see any logic in that sort of thing. The way to produce wealth-and the only way in which wealth can be produced—is to apply labour to natural resources. But as was abundantly proved in the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) delivered in the house on May 22, what stands between labour and natural resources, and the production of wealth, is the private ownership of the means of production. Let me read what the minister said as it is recorded at page 128 of Hansard:

One of our chief difficulties has been to obtain the latest British designs for mechanical equipment used by our troops in common operations. British industry has not been too willing to part with these designs, many of which represent years of study and development by private manufacturing firms.

That is the cause of many of the difficulties in Europe to-day. Private interests would not release the things necessary to carry on the production of the country, in order to meet the menace of Hitler. That is what stood between the people of Europe and the means to defend themselves. It was not because they did not have the money to do it. They could not get it done because they could not get access to the machinery to effect production, because these private interests held certain rights with which they would not part until they got their meed of profit.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They would sell their goods to them.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; they would not sell their goods unless they were given something of value in exchange, and to the extent the government gives value, they create a debt. I do not care how you do it, every seller of goods accepts a promise to pay. It does not matter who issues the promise, it creates a debt somewhere. In order that the country may have the full use of productive forces, the country will have to take them over.

I noticed the hon, member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) adroitly and, I believe, quite properly used the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on August 2, 1935, in Saskatoon respecting the necessity of issuing currency and credit in terms of public need. I am sure hon, members across the way will be very glad to support this amendment, along with us!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But he did not mean it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, I would not say that in regard to the Prime Minister. I do not know that I would say it even of some other hon members who might make a similar statement, because of course I must have regard to the rulings of His Honour the Speaker.

What this government lack most is a social vision. They do not look to the future. The world that they are looking at, the world that they think and live in, is the world that existed when they were young fellows about thirty years ago. As I look round this chamber at the faces of hon. members I see that most of them, not all of course, are about my age.

An hon. MEMBER: Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon, friend is young and handsome like I was thirty years ago. Most of us started out in life as young men about thirty years ago. We are not yet old, but we are living in a totally different world. As I look across the floor of this chamber I see many men who during the period mentioned had left the old country to come to this great Canada of ours. Along with thousands of other young men, I left eastern Canada as a youth to go to the last great west. But there is no great west to-day. You cannot leave the maritimes and hope to make your fortune in British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Possibly you would not have made it thirty years ago, but at least there was hope, but you certainly cannot do it to-day.

We are living in an altogether different world. We must adapt ourselves to the needs of the present world. As I say, the greatest handicap of this government is that they have no social vision. They cannot look ahead. I am sorry to say that the proposals made the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) were no more far-seeing than those contained in the budget. To advocate a cent sales tax on gasoline, the curtailment of ordinary expenditures, the placing of a sales tax on canned milk is not the kind of statesmanship we need for the present emergency.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a war on.

Mr. MacINNIS: But there are still 300,000 men who are unemployed in this country. Until you put those men to work producing wealth you should not talk of taxing the children's milk, of taxing gasoline or of taxing anything else. Put these men to work producing real wealth. That is what is necessary. There is also a war on in Great Britain, but despite that fact they have started to improve social services since the new cabinet was formed. I see in the press where soldiers' war pensions have been increased.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to advise the hon, gentleman that his time is up.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to read this quotation from the New Statesman and Nation, London.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe I have the unanimous consent of the house. The statement is quite short and it shows what the new government is doing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Do I understand that the house is agreeable?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: The statement reads:

Single old-age pensioners living alone and without other resources will receive 19s. 6d. a week and in addition rent and winter fuel allowances which will be fixed in relation to local conditions by the assistance board advisory committees. A pensioner couple living alone will receive 32s. a week plus similar allowances. The new scales are based on proposals of the assistance board prepared before the change of government, but one or two minor instances of "scaling-up" show that the labour ministers did something to improve a measure whose basic principle was so opposed to their philosophy. As a temporary alleviation of war-time hardship it is to be commended.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this parliament assembled just seven weeks ago to-day. After that short period we find ourselves in a new world, in a world which few of our Canadian people even dared contemplate. Holland, Belgium and France are gone. Italy has swooped down on helpless France. Great Britain, our motherland, is at bay, and how grand she is when facing such tragic conditions as she faces to-day! What an inspiration and what a challenge there is to every man, woman and child in the British commonwealth! The United States, our great neighbour, is alarmed and is rushing defence preparations. Canada is facing a very real threat of invasion.

We are in a new world, I repeat, a far more dangerous world than we ever knew before. Our empire is in jeopardy; our homes are in jeopardy, and it is essential that we in this parliament and the Canadian people have a clear vision of just what is at stake. I suggest that the issue is this: Are we to be free men or are we to be slaves? The situation is as serious as that, and our best defences are a fighting spirit and a grim resolve to see it through to the bitter end.

That is the background against which the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people view this budget. Is it any wonder that they are ready to accept it, heavy as it is? I think this is so also because of the great confidence they have in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston). That has helped the Canadian people considerably when faced with this budget.

In my opinion, however, there are two features of the budget which are quite wrong. I should like to point these out in a spirit of helpfulness to the government. In the first place, the money paid to our fighting forces and to the dependants of our fighting forces is not clearly exempted from the new taxation. It should be. I ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) to correct me if I am wrong in any of my statements. I should like to quote section 18, subsection 8, paragraph (c) of the proposed Income War Tax Act resolution. This section deals with the new national defence tax and reads:

(c) members of the Canadian naval, military and air forces shall be exempt from tax while such members are on active service beyond Canada—

That would cover a man overseas.

—or are on active service in Canada and—

Here is the qualification:

—whose duties are of such a character as are required normally to be performed afloat or in aircraft, but only to the extent of their service pay and allowances.

As I interpret that provision, it means that the men serving in our military forces in Canada, who after all constitute the great bulk of the men who have enlisted, will be subject to this national defence tax. I believe the same condition exists with regard to the ordinary income tax. These men must pay an income tax on their pay and on the allowances to their dependants. I repeat that they and their dependants should not be taxed in that way. They are making a much greater sacrifice for Canada in far more difficult ways.

The second point on which I criticize the budget is the excess profits tax provisions. I think these provisions underestimate the loyalty and the will to serve of our business leaders in Canada. I am convinced that all they ask is a reasonable profit, and provision for that should be made for them; then all excess—not 75 per cent merely—over a reasonable profit should go to the nation. Such a provision in the budget would have done more than anything else could possibly have done to make our people realize that there would be some equality of sacrifice in facing this war. But, instead, the government have compromised. They take only 75 per cent of the excess profits. Presumably that is based on the theory that to get the full cooperation of Canadian business men even at this time when our very national life is endangered, one must dangle before their noses the carrot of 25 per cent of excess profits.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that all that the majority of these business men ask is a reasonable profit, and not excess profits. Reasonable profit could easily be determined. There are, for example, in the budget resolutions provisions under which it is possible to arrive at what is called a standard of profits, and the same principle could be used in deciding on a reasonable profit. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of National Revenue that they follow the example of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) whose department in many instances now set a reasonable figure for contracts. They decide what is a reasonable price to pay, and the contract is awarded at that price. I think we must remember that Canada faces an emergency, that our national safety is endangered. The government have stressed that time and again this session, and at no time more strongly than when they introduced the mobilization of resources bill, Bill No. 43. Why, the very first paragraph of the recital of that bill contains these words:

Whereas by reason of developments since the outbreak of the present war a special emergency has arisen and the national safety of Canada has become endangered—

That is the position; there is no disputing it, and I suggest that the government reconsider the excess profits tax provisions of the budget.

It should also be pointed out again to the Minister of Finance and to the government, and with the greatest emphasis possible, that this budget means great sacrifices for the Canadian people. It may mean suffering for many Canadian people. It certainly means greater sacrifices than any other budget in the history of Canada. But, despite that fact, the Canadian people will pay. Witness their response to the war loan in January last and how they rose to the occasion then. Witness their response to the sale of war savings certificates at the present time. They will make sacrifices, and do it gladly, if they believe they are getting value for their money and if they believe they are getting action for their sacrifices.

By value for their money I mean that there shall be no waste, and I mean further that there shall be no favouritism, political or otherwise, in the spending of this money. I have never made a practice in this house of hurling charges of patronage and things of that kind. I think the ministers and the government are dead against it, certainly at this time. But there are underlings across the country in every riding who are seeing to it that supporters of the government get jobs first. I do not think the ministers will deny that. Perhaps they are helpless to eliminate this entirely, but I appeal to them again, for the sake of the unity of Canada in our war effort, to make another attack on these heelers and stop that sort of thingstop political patronage in connection with our war effort.

An hon, MEMBER: The shoe is on the other foot.

Mr. GREEN: That may be in some instances. Our people are no more perfect than your people, but it is a thing which in war time should be stamped out completely. I am not in favour of it in peace time either.

Action for their sacrifices means bold and aggressive leadership by the government, and in connection with my appeal for bold and aggressive leadership by the government I have certain suggestions to make, first concerning cooperation with Great Britain. I make this group of suggestions first because I think they are of prime importance at this moment.

It must surely be clear to every Canadian to-day that apart from sentiment, which after all is very, very important-and I do not wish to minimize it at all—we can best achieve victory by helping Great Britain beat Hitler right now. That is the best way we can achieve victory. I suggest that the government should send to Great Britain without delay all available troops. Weeks ago, the very first week this parliament met, the Prime Minister announced a speeding-up of our war effort. He said that the second Canadian division would be sent overseas without delay. But we have heard nothing yet of the arrival of the second Canadian division in Great Britain. At the moment he made that announcement the division had not been recruited up to strength. But this is one thing we must do-get all available troops to Britain without delay.

Second, may I urge, and urge most strongly, that we shelter in Canada for the duration of the war not only all the children Great Britain wishes to send here but any other of her people whom she wishes to send, women, the aged and the disabled. That is surely necessary not only to save the lives of these kinsfolk of ours, but to help in the defence of Great Britain, which means to help in the defeat of Hitler. Great Britain to-day is an island fortress. Make no mistake about that. Great Britain is apt to become the battle ground at any minute. She is an island fortress in which food is of the greatest importance. There may be a scarcity of food there, and then it will come down to a question of how many people have to be fed. We should take into this country just as quickly as possible every man, woman and child Britain wishes to send here. Think of the way in which the fighting forces in France were impeded by the women and children, the disabled and the aged; think of all the confusion that resulted from their presence on the roads. We do not want that to happen in Great Britain. I urge upon the government to put nothing whatever in the way of the British government because time in this matter is of vital importance.

I suggest also that to help Great Britain we permit, nay, that we invite Great Britain to transfer to Canada any business which for war reasons she wishes to have transferred here. We should not put any barriers in her way in that regard, and finally, we should leave no stone unturned to become an arsenal and food reservoir not only for our own nation but for Great Britain as well.

Then I have certain suggestions to make concerning the fighting forces in Canada. One of the hon, members who preceded me this evening read from the press interview given by Major-General LaFlèche in London on June 28. I will repeat only a few words. He said:

The dominion should look to her arms and the defence of her great coast-line without delay. Inaction and indecision should not be tolerated. To-morrow may be too late.

Every man in Canada of fighting age who can be spared from industry and from the production of primary products should be trained for the defence of this dominion, for everyone may be required. I think that fact should be made clear to the Canadian people. The government should at least inform the country of the approximate number that will be needed. This would enable many of the men who will be required to serve to arrange their affairs and make preparations beforehand. We may need one million men in our fighting forces in Canada; I repeat, one million men. In the last war we enlisted 628,462 from a population in 1918 of 8,148,000 souls. Last year we had a population of 11,315,000, and an equivalent number of men in the fighting forces in this war would be 872,686. But the danger to Canada to-day is far greater than it was in the last war.

[Mr. Green.]

I suggest also to the government that they make use of every reasonably fit ex-service man who volunteers for service. The government have provided for the recruiting of a few thousand only; they should use every fit man who volunteers. These men are men of proven courage, men of experience in warfare; best of all, they are men whose loyalty is beyond question, who can be relied on in any emergency. They are the finest reserves that we could have. They can be used to replace younger class A men, for example on coast defence. By this means many young men could be released for active service.

Mention of these large numbers—and I do so, not to frighten the house or the country, but because we in Canada must start facing facts; had we done so months ago, we would have been a great deal better off to-day than we are-brings up the question, who are the men to command all these troops? I cannot for the life of me understand why the government have not already chosen commanders and staffs for the third and fourth divisions, and sent these men over to England to find out the latest methods of warfare. Why do we delay so long? We had the same trouble with the second division; although parts of it were recruited last fall, no commanding officer or staffs were appointed until two or three months ago. It is an absurd way to make preparations to take our part in the war. It might even be wise for the government to recall certain men from our forces in Great Britain to lead our new troops.

In connection with our forces at home, I suggest that national defence headquarters here in Ottawa greatly needs strengthening. I regret to have to say it, yet I believe every hon. member is of the same opinion. It appears to me that there is unnecessary delay and red tape at headquarters. Perhaps that is only to be expected. In peace time these people went along smoothly; they were not required to face great problems, and they were not given much support either by parliament or by any government. Now national defence headquarters has to conduct and supervise one of the biggest enterprises in the country, an effort of such vital importance that perhaps the very survival of this nation will depend upon whether or not our defence is efficient. It calls for the ablest and most active men in the country. This is no time to be blindly following seniority. I suggest to the government that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) takes over the department of defence he review all the staffs, both here and at other centres, and if he finds reorganization is needed he carry it through without any qualms at all.

I think he should consider bringing men back from England to fill key positions here, and he might also transfer men from the districts and from the non-permanent active militia. So much by way of suggestion to the government in connection with our war effort.

In addition, I have two suggestions to make concerning our civilian population. I make them because I believe that they will serve to raise the morale and the spirit of the Canadian people.

In the first place there are many Canadians on relief who are able and willing to work but cannot find employment. They are known as the employable unemployed. According to the Labour Gazette for June of this year, there were 166,000 men and women in this class in April. After Canada had been at war for eight months, after we had recruited nearly 100,000 men, after we had drawn into employment a greater number of men than ever before in our history—as is indicated in the issue of the Labour Gazette which I have cited—there were 166,000 employable Canadians and their dependants on relief. Nothing does more to lower the spirit of the people than this state of things. It must not be permitted to continue. Clearly in this crisis it is the duty of the government to see to it that the nation is so organized that every one willing to work can do so. We are in a new world; we are facing new conditions; our people are entitled to no less than the assurance of employment, and nothing will do more than employment to build up their morale.

The government should take over full responsibility for all employable unemployed. Let us face this question at last. Such a course has been recommended to us time after time. It was recommended by the Purvis commission. It was recommended again by the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, known as the Rowell-Sirois commission. There is, at page 24 of their book of recommendations, a most clear-cut finding on this question. They say:

The experience of the past decade is conclusive evidence that unemployment relief should be a dominion function. By unemployment relief we mean relief or aid for unemployed employables as distinct from unemployables.

If the government will do that and do it now, such action will focus attention on the need of placing these men and women. It will mean that they are so much more likely to get jobs. The government can get detailed information with regard to these individuals. The government have a far greater measure of control over industry and over the producers of primary products than they have ever had before, so that they are in a position to emphasize the fact that all Canadians must have a chance to work. Industry and primary production must be organized on that basis. Also the government can set up a national employment service. That has been recommended by both commissions I have mentioned, and it should be set up without further delay, stressing the placing of these peoplenot stressing registration but stressing the actual finding of jobs. And the government could very well appoint honorary advisory committees across Canada to help in the finding of jobs for these people. I do not think we make half enough use of honorary advisory committees in meeting the problems facing the country.

This brings me to my second suggestion with regard to our civilian population. The government should go much further, because after all theirs is the responsibility, in harnessing the enthusiasm of the people. We have hardly begun to do so. We have a great untapped reservoir of useful service in Canada to-day. That was very well illustrated in a telegram sent to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) by the Vancouver board of trade, copies of which were received by other members from British Columbia or at any rate from Vancouver. Under date of May 23 of this year, it states:

Members of the Vancouver Board of Trade wish to point out to the government the fact that thousands of citizens of this community expect the government to encourage and organize those who wish to serve their country. We respectfully urge that the government give a lead to those people which will dispel—

And these are significant words.

—the growing feeling that their services cannot be used in any capacity and are not wanted.

Let the government bring in at once a bill providing for the proposed department of national war services so that suggestions may be given them in the house, and let them make the main job of that new department the putting of volunteers to work in Canada. For example, we have splendid work done by the women across the country. I dare say every member of this house fought his election to the tune of knitting needles. I did in my riding and I imagine the same is true of other parts of Canada.

Then we have the unfit young men, transients, who were rejected from the army. Surely there is no reason why they should not be organized into works battalions to do many of the things necessary to be done. Then there are our scientists and engineers. Long before the war the government got a list of all engineers in Canada, and yet every week I get a letter from one or another of the engineers at the coast saying, in effect, "We registered months ago and want to do something to help in the war effort, and yet we cannot get anywhere. No one seems to need us and we might as well be in China for all the use we are to Canada." Then there are our youths, who are too young to serve. Surely they could be given physical training courses throughout Canada, something that would help them greatly.

Finally, I have a few suggestions to make concerning parliament, and I offer them with a good deal of diffidence. Incidentally, I should like the support of every private member on these suggestions, regardless of the party to which he belongs. I suggest that the government should make far more use of parliament. There has been a tendency this session to hold back discussion of estimates having to do with the war-for example, national defence estimates, external affairs estimates, pensions estimates—none of them considered yet, but all of them estimates on which we could have made useful suggestions to the government. Then there has been a tendency to reduce the hours of sitting. Each Friday, without much ado, this house adjourns at six o'clock. Every other year we sat on Friday nights and a great deal of useful work was accomplished. Perhaps it was because a good many eastern members had gone home for the week-end. I do not think the present practice is right under war conditions. It is not setting a proper example to the Canadian people. And then there has been a tendency to reduce the number of questions referred to committees. This house has been sitting for seven weeks, but at present only two committees are sitting and the only committee that has done any real work is the committee on the defence of Canada regulations. I know because I am on that committee.

It is all hard to understand. There are so many ways in which private members could help. The people of Canada are looking to this parliament for leadership as never before, and members of parliament feel their responsibility deeply. Every private member came here determined to do a job for Canada and we are not getting much opportunity to do it. The government should go out of their way to provide opportunities for the discussion of questions concerning the war. They would get many valuable suggestions, and those suggestions should not be limited, as they are at the present time, to members of the different opposition parties. It is a tragedy that the custom is such in this parliament that private members of the government party are supposed to keep still when estimates are under consideration. There are in this parliament many bright young men on the Liberal side who could be of great help at this time, and yet they are forced to sit as quiet as a lot of clams because a private member supporting the government is not supposed to take part in the discussion of estimates.

suggest that the government should appoint committees designed to undertake the consideration of many questions. It is not too late. For example, a military committee might be appointed. In 1939 the government promised that a committee would be set up to go into military affairs, to survey the military situation across Canada. The Minister of Pensions and National Health is in his seat to-night. As Minister of National Defence he made that promise in the session of 1939. The Prime Minister did the same, and promised it again this session; yet nothing has been done. Private members are just as much in the dark as anyone in Canada on these questions simply because there is no committee work of that type. There should be committees, perhaps, to survey other services—the air force, the naval service, a committee to advise on the functions of the national war service department, a committee on external affairs, and so forth.

Parliamentary government in Canada is at stake, and now is the time that parliament should be showing leadership. The government must give private members an opportunity if parliament is to show leadership. We are in a new world and there should be a new spirit in parliament. There was such a spirit in the war session, last fall, but there has been very little since, either in the session in January or in this session. The old days of party sham-battles and playing the party game in and out of the house are gone forever. They are just as much out of date as the bow and arrow. I sometimes wonder whether that is realized by any party in the house, and I include my own party, the Conservative party. in the statement. The Canadian people need something better in their parliament at this war time.

I thank the house for the patient hearing given me. All these suggestions are meant to be helpful, and I trust they will be accepted by the government in that spirit. In conclusion, may I repeat that our best defence in this crisis is a fighting spirit and a grim resolve. Canada is a strong young nation, not yet fully realizing its own strength. Our job in this parliament is to see that the efforts of that young nation are directed into channels where they will be most effective in bringing about victory. Let us drop half measures; let us go all out to win, and let us remember and take comfort from the fact that our people are a people of courage and of vision, and that our cause is just and is the cause of humanity.

On motion of Mr. Maybank the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, July 5, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the name of Mr. Emmerson be substituted for that of Mr. Hill on the standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

That the name of Mr. Jackman be substituted for that of Mr. Diefenbaker on the standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

EUROPEAN WAR

STATEMENT AS TO RECENT ACTION BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO PREVENT FRENCH FLEET FROM FALLING INTO ENEMY HANDS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, although the ultimate situation remains obscure, and the present relations between the government of the United Kingdom and the French government at Bordeaux have not yet been clarified, I feel that I should say a few words at this time. Members of the house will have appreciated the feelings of Mr. Churchill when they read his speech delivered in the British house yesterday. Nothing could have brought home more clearly the tragic irony and agony of war, than the grim obligation placed upon the British navy to prevent the French fleet from falling into the hands of Germany and Italy.

Nothing can be gained by a recital of the events which led up to the seizures, the sinkings, and the conflict between ancient allies and friends. The proposals made by the British emissary to the French admiral at Oran would seem at this time and distance to have contained within them an honourable and bloodless solution. Fate decreed otherwise. No one can blame the French admiral and his gallant sailors for loyal obedience to their government, however precarious its powers, however shackled its decisions. Equally, no fair-minded men knowing the attitudes and minds of the German and Italian dictators and their record of promises made, and promises broken, could expect the government of the United Kingdom to imperil the security of the British isles and the dominions by allowing the French fleet to pass into the control of the enemy. Wednesday's action cannot be regarded as directed against France. Rather was it action against ships that already, for all practical purposes, were German and Italian instruments of war.

I am sure that it is the prayer of the people of Canada who owe so much to the memory of France, that the French people will recognize that if the Bordeaux government acted under the compulsion of the conqueror, the British navy acted equally under the compulsion of its great responsibility for the preservation of the liberties of the world. In no country has the calamity of France received more understanding sympathy than in Canada. The plight of the French people and the destitution that has overtaken its millions of refugees have filled us with profound sorrow. It is our faith that although the might of a ruthless machine has for a time, but we believe for a time only, overwhelmed the power of France, nothing can vanquish the soul of that great nation.

Whatever may have happened, or whatever may come to pass, Canadians of all races and classes know in their hearts that there is only one thing that matters to-day in the world of free men; that is the ultimate triumph of the cause of freedom for which Britain and France alike took up arms, and the certain defeat of the evil powers that threaten to enslave the world.

FINGERPRINTING FOR IDENTIFICATION PURPOSES OF REFUGEE CHILDREN SENT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) whether his department has set up the necessary machinery and staff to fingerprint all refugee children for identification purposes so that a record may be kept at all times of these children, and also to avoid any chance of the parents getting the wrong children back after the war is won by the British empire.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The necessary steps are being taken to handle this rather difficult matter in as satisfactory a way as possible.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

CALLING UP OF CLASSES UNDER THE NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) some questions which are based upon a report which appeared yesterday in the French language newspaper Le Droit with reference to the mobilization of man-power under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I shall read just one paragraph of the translation:

The following classes of the Canadian army may be mobilized next Monday:

(a) Young men from twenty to twenty-seven years of age.

(b) Married men between the same ages.

That is what the Prime Minister may have said yesterday—and we learned it from a reliable source—at a Liberal caucus, after Mr. Arthur Slaght, Liberal member for Parry Sound, had made a virulent speech in favour of total conscription to enable Canada to do her full part for the defence of England against German invasion. The leader of the government is said to have reassured the members against the likelihood of a nazi attack against Canada in saying that the United States would never tolerate the invasion by a foreign power of any foot of territory of the two Americas.

I do not quite understand the reason for all the laughter, Mr. Speaker.

These are my questions: (1) Has the government determined to call up the two classes mentioned? (2) If so, has the order in council been passed? (3) If so, when will it be laid on the table? (4) Is the Liberal caucus the appropriate place to make such an announcement? (5) If the report is untrue, when will the first steps of mobilization be taken?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I see the questions? If I had them before me I could answer them one by one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall hand them to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Question 1: Has the government determined to call up the two classes mentioned? The answer is no. Question 2: If so, has the order in [Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

council been passed? The answer is no. Question 3: If so, when will it be laid on the table? I suppose the answer is, God only knows.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is probably true from what I hear. God only knows when you will take action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish to ask some other questions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister is treating this as a joke.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that I am amazed at my hon. friend having read the article which he did because he knows that the proceedings of a caucus are completely secret and are never disclosed to the public. The article which he has read is a fabrication from end to end, and, as I followed it, there is not a scintilla of accuracy in a single line of it. I would think that my hon. friend would have so regarded it the moment he read it.

Question 4: Is the Liberal caucus the appropriate place to make such an announcement? My hon, friend knows very well caucuses are not the place where any announcement of government policy is made. He assumes in his question that an announcement has been made. I state that there was no announcement of any kind. Question 5: If the report is untrue, when will the first steps of mobilization be taken? The answer to that I gave to an hon, gentleman opposite a day or two ago. They will be taken by the Department of National Defence when the department is ready to make its announcement.

I hope that my hon, friend the leader of the opposition will not think that I was trying to treat this matter in any light way. I was simply giving it the kind of treatment which I think it merits.

ARTICLE IN LE DROIT-PRIVILEGE, MR. SLAGHT

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, rising to a question of privilege, may I say that the statement which the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has quoted, in so far as it refers to me is literally and absolutely a falsehood. May I suggest to the hon, gentleman that the next time his friend who persuaded him to place before this house such a ridiculous and preposterous statement, tries to put his ear to the keyhole of a caucus and then carries tales to hon, gentlemen opposite, he ought to be arrested and thrown out of the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Thanks for the lecture.

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): That will hold you for a while.

THE MINISTRY

SWEARING IN OF HON. J. L. RALSTON AS MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE—LENGTH OF BUDGET DEBATE—CABINET CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say, having relation to the very grave situation as it is in the world to-day, that the government had rather hoped that at least a part of the debate on the motion which has been before the house throughout this week to go into committee of ways and means on the budget might have been curtailed. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston), as the house knows, has undertaken to assume the duties of Minister of National Defence. Out of courtesy he has remained in the house throughout the week listening to the various speeches that were made in order that, if it were thought necessary, he might reply to certain matters at the conclusion of the debate. Throughout the whole week not only has my hon. colleague been following the debate as I have mentioned but he has also been giving every other hour that he has had free to the work of the Department of National Defence. He has not spared himself for weeks and months past with reference not only to financial matters but also with reference to matters relating to the Department of National Defence. This week he has been giving all the time that he has had outside of this house to very pressing defence matters in cooperation with the Acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power).

I was hoping that this afternoon it might be possible for us to have a division on the motion and the amendments, but I understand that the whips have a list of several speakers and that it may not be possible to have a division to-day. In these circumstances I should like to say to the house that if we have not reached a division before six o'clock this evening, I would wish the Minister of Finance to take over without further delay the portfolio of National Defence. I have already asked His Excellency the Governor General if he will receive the Minister of Finance and myself in order that Colonel Ralston may be sworn in as Minister of National Defence and devote his time from now on to the all important work that has to be carried on in that department. If there is anything in the discussions which have arisen or may further arise on the motion to which the Minister of Finance might wish to make a reply at a later stage, I hope the house will permit him to do so when we are in committee at some moment that will be convenient to himself. But I wish to impress on the house that the problems respecting defence demand the immediate and urgent attention of the minister who is to command that department in cooperation with the Minister of National Defence for Air, and I therefore hope that his services in this house as Minister of Finance, with respect to ways and means, may be dispensed with from six o'clock on to-day.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have every sympathy with the position to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. I had it in mind last Tuesday when at the conclusion of my remarks I made what for me was perhaps a rather strong appeal along the very lines which the Prime Minister has just indicated. If hon. gentlemen will refer to page 1256 of Hansard, the second column, they will observe what I am referring to. I shall read, not it all, but only this part:

And so, Mr. Speaker, to expedite the business of the country, to expedite particularly our war effort, to expedite the minister's plans with respect to the defence of Canada and especially of our Atlantic shore line, I suggest to the house, I suggest to the government and their followers, and I make a special appeal to my friends in the far corner, that we let this budget pass and release the minister to administer his new office of Minister of National Defence. Let the new Minister of Finance, whoever he is to be—

And then I went on to refer to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) piloting the financial resolutions through committee, and I made an offer to help. I was prepared then, Mr. Speaker, to see this budget pass that afternoon. I went to see the Minister of Finance before I came into the chamber. I suppose I should tell the whole story; there is nothing secret about it. The Minister of Finance, I believe, was quite relieved, and quite agreeable to the suggestion, but, as I think he was in honour and duty bound, he said he would have to consult his leader. He did so. Nothing occurred. The debate went on; and we did not put up, as far as I can recall, a single speaker that day. Nothing more was said to me. I concluded therefore that the suggestion had been rejected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And I think I had a right to draw that conclusion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the suggestion was not accepted—I will put it in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I am sure there has been a very serious misunderstanding if that is the view which he has had. When my

hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) asked me about the matter, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) had mentioned in connection with the shortening of the debate that he would make his speech immediately, and the point I understood to be the one raised was, whether it would be quite proper for the leader of the opposition to make his speech immediately, having in view exactly what he has suggested, namely that it would serve to shorten the debate if he as leader of the opposition had spoken. I said certainly, by all means; and my hon. friend made his speech. My hon. friend made the suggestion, and I gladly accepted it. May I say that in rising to speak I had intended to draw attention to what my hon, friend said last Tuesday and to express a word of appreciation that he had seen the necessity of the Minister of Finance getting quickly over to the Department of National Defence and had sought to accommodate the government in that way. What my hon. friend has said just now as to our not having appreciated to the full his willingness to cooperate comes as a complete surprise to

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose I am very stupid and very dense. Apparently I am at times, and it is hinted that I was, early in the afternoon, although I am not yet convinced. But certainly I never understood that the government accepted my proposal, and I do not recall that the Prime Minister said to me what he says he did. If he says he did, I accept his statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was said here, when all three were together.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I went over to ask if a decision had been reached. The Minister of Finance said that he did not have his glasses and could not read the note I had sent him previously. My hon. friend said something about a reconstruction of the cabinet, and I said, "That does not have to dovetail into this." Let us get the whole story. I went back to my seat expecting that there would be some response from the government. So far as I know I never got any.

I agree entirely with the principle involved. I think it is a crime that the hon, gentleman should have to sit glued to that seat and listen to some of the speeches, at all events, which have been delivered. I should like to point out, as I am reminded, that a Liberal member immediately followed me, and the debate, I assumed, was to go on.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say a word?

Mr. POWER: Where are the hon, gentleman's glasses?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

An hon. MEMBER: What are we doing now but killing time?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): My hon, friend did come over to me and ask if a decision had been made. I spoke to my leader at the time, and I said it was all right. I was astonished when my hon. friend at the conclusion of his speech asked me if I had any statement to make. I promptly rose in my place and made the statement that so far as the government was concerned we were quite prepared to give full opportunity for the discussion of any question which might arise on the resolution to go into committee of ways and means, if hon. members saw fit to confine themselves in connection with the debate. With regard to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) who spoke immediately after my hon. friend, I myself went over to see one of his friends on the other side of the house to ask him if he would go on, because he was very anxious to do so. I saw that there was no intention, on the part at least of that particular friend of my hon, friend, not to go on with the debate, but that he did not want to go on that day. The result was that the hon, member for St. Antoine-Westmount continued the debate. But I did expect that sooner or later, and probably sooner than later, the debate would end, with the assurance I had given. It has dragged on. I do not think it was anybody's fault, but I do not want my hon, friend to say that there was no response to his suggestion, because the response was made not only by me privately but, as Hansard will show, on the floor of the house.

May I add that I appreciate very much indeed what my hon. friend has said, and I appreciated the suggestion he made at the time. I would be perfectly willing to stay here, as it is my duty to do, but the time has come when my leader has been good enough to intimate, and perhaps the house will agree, that it is more important for me to be elsewhere. That is why the procedure which my leader has indicated will be adopted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I guess we had our wires crossed.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should like to draw attention to the fact that since my hon. friend made that statement there have been twenty-one speeches. Of that number, seven were delivered by hon. members supporting the government. Yesterday, of eleven speakers, two were on this side of the house; and the day before yesterday, of six speakers, two were on this side of the house.

Mr. ROWE: That does not add much to the subject.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It shows who killed the time.

Mr. ROWE: It shows that on the first day the government put on the speakers.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say as far as this group is concerned that we have no knowledge of any attempted understanding between the government and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). May I add that on the address in reply to the speech from the throne we did not, because of the request of the government, take the accepted right to debate matters in connection with our own constituencies; but in spite of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had said that on the war appropriations bill almost anything might be discussed, when the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) rose to discuss some matters in connection with his constituency, he was stopped. When the emergency mobilization bill a short time ago was under discussion we were given to understand that it was vitally necessary that that bill should be passed immediately. The Prime Minister told us he only wished he had the power that night to do certain things. But so far as I know no orders in council have yet been tabled under that particular measure. "One", someone says. This is the only opportunity remaining for hon. members to bring before parliament constructive ideas and grievances from their constituencies, and it seems to me that that right should not be taken away from the private member.

As far as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) is concerned, we all agree that he should be attending to the Department of National Defence. But may I say this, that there is no earthly reason why the change should not have been made and the gentleman to be designated the new Minister of Finance should not have been appointed and followed these debates. Indeed, I think that when the budget resolutions are before the house the minister who will have to administer this department should be seated in the chair of the Minister of Finance.

I think the government is making a mistake in attempting to restrict the latitude allowed private members to bring forward matters they wish to discuss. Private members have few opportunities to introduce such matters. After all, private members' days have been taken away, and the opportunity for introducing private bills has virtually disappeared or, at any rate, has been greatly curtailed. On behalf of a number of private members I wish to protest against these rights being taken away even under war conditions. As far as we are concerned, as we said at the outset we are anxious and willing to facilitate the business of the country and to cooperate in bringing the present war to a successful conclusion, but that does not mean that we are committed to support all that the government suggests or to remain silent in our seats when we have something which we feel ought to be said. Therefore I suggest to the Prime Minister that the proper procedure would be to name the new Minister of Finance and relieve the present minister, thus allowing us to get down to the business of the country in a proper manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That, may I say to my hon. friend, is what I have always intended to do and it will be done at the end of this week; but what I wish to make clear is this, and it was made clear at the outset. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) wished, if the occasion seemed to require it, to make a reply on the debate on the main motion to go into committee of ways and means. It was always understood that as soon as that reply had been made my hon. colleague would give up the portfolio of Finance and take over the Department of National Defence and that other changes would follow. I intimated that later I would have something to say about other changes in the government and I have been waiting until the Minister of Finance takes over the Department of National Defence to announce those changes. May I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), when he says that I mumbled something about the reconstruction of the government-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I use the word mumble? I am sorry if I did. I do not think I said mumbled; I said, "mentioned something".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mentioned. then. What I mentioned was exactly in accord with what I am saying at the moment. I said that while it would oblige us if the debate were shortened in the manner in which my hon. friend has suggested, I was not ready at that particular moment to make the statement with respect to the reconstruction of the cabinet—I might have used that phrase in relation to cabinet matters-which I promised would be made at the time the minister would be going to the Department of National Defence. I am ready to make that statement when the minister is transferred. That statement will have now to be made on Monday. The present Minister of Finance will be sworn in this evening as Minister of National Defence and on Monday I will announce who his successor is to be, and make such other statements as to cabinet matters as it may be appropriate to make at the time.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ralston (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Quelch.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): After the remarks just made I am in this position. One generally collects together a few notes for the purpose of making a speech, but I do not need any notes at all at the present time. They can be thrown away. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) started this fifteen or twenty minute interlude by suggesting that too many speeches were being made. Indeed, I felt from the tone of his voice that he was almost going to use the word "drivel", but he did not do so. I may be wrong about that, but I got the impression that that was his feeling.

One hon, gentleman commented on the rights of private members under circumstances such as those in which we find ourselves to-day. The house knows what my views are on that question. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and others have indicated their keen desire for a vote on this question this afternoon so as to get it out of the way in order to get on with something else. The opportunity for placing on the record such facts as I desire to put on Hansard will come at another time. It was not my intention at any time to speak at great length in the house if I could possibly avoid doing so. This afternoon, however, I had thought there were certain facts that ought to be made a matter of record in this chamber. But in view of what has been said; in view of the fact that I thoroughly agree with every bit of it, especially with that part dealing with the need for getting on with the business of parliament and getting this particular question out of the way, and in view of the fact that an opportunity will still be given me to place before the house those facts of which I desire to apprize it, I am not going to proceed any further with my remarks on this occasion. I shall, however, appeal to others to refrain from making further speeches on the motion so that we may pass it immediately. With these observations I resume my seat.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): It is not my desire to delay the house unduly, nor am I going to take any responsibility for the discussion that has gone on in this debate. We are private members, as the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group has said, and as such we have certain responsibilities. I am not sure that the responsibilities of private members at a time like this are not just as great as the responsibilities of cabinet ministers. We at least go home every week-end and come in contact with our electors, meeting people in different walks of life and getting some idea of their reaction to our war effort, so that we obtain a knowledge which cabinet ministers do not get. As one Liberal member said yesterday in this house, speaking to cabinet ministers, it would be a good thing if they could get away from behind their mahogany desks and go and meet the people, because they would then have a much better idea of what the people thought of the government's activities.

There are some phases of this war effort with which I wish to deal. I think they are important. In fact, I regard them as so important that in my opinion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) should have been in the Department of National Defence as full-fledged minister of that department so that he could have dealt with these matters before. If the government's war effort had been organized as it ought to be, there would be no necessity to-day for such a reorganization of the Department of National Defence.

Before dealing with this very important question I might make some reference to some of the new members of the house, particularly the younger members who have come in. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), who seconded the motion for the adoption of the speech from the throne, came here as a new member with a keen sense of his responsibility. He made a speech in which there was no political bias, no partisanship, but he spoke just as all of us feel in this house, pointing out that we had a big job to do and that it had to be done without any vestige of politics in it.

The hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe), who moved the adoption of the address, the son of the Minister of Justice, made a stirring plea for a closer union of the English and French-speaking people. I think everyone in Canada echoes that plea. If he and young men in other provinces would go out and preach, without any political rancour, that tolerance which is so necessary, it would do much for the upbuilding of a better understanding in this country. One unfortunate feature is that whenever we talked about national unity before, it was always coupled in some way with a political campaign. Now is the time when we ought to be developing that national unity as we never developed it before. It is up to the young French-Canadians, and the young men of English, Irish and Scottish birth in the various houses of parliament in this country, to go out and preach that tolerance.

The hon, member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has come here and speaks as a voice of labour. He has told us of some difficulties he has had in fighting the battles of labour. Finally his people thought enough of him to send him here to the highest parliament in the land. There may be some hon. members who look upon him, or some of his ideas, as radical. Sometimes I wonder, because many things that we thought quite radical twenty years ago are now regarded as quite conservative. At least he has the opportunity and the ability to place his ideas before this house.

In our own group we have a young man, the hon, member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has taken an active part in the politics of his own province and who has come here with a keen sense of his responsibility. In all the speeches he has made in this house he has sought to do something worth while for his people, realizing that the solution of their problems is necessary for the general welfare of Canada. I refer to these four men particularly as illustrating the varied and widespread interests represented in this house, and the responsibilities that rest upon us as members of parliament in trying to find the solution of these problems.

Then we have a large number of new members in this house, in all parts, who saw service in the last war. I believe that the government could well take advantage of the knowledge which they gained in the hard way in the last war, and use that knowledge in the furtherance of our war effort. I have seen a number of new parliaments convened, and I do not know when we ever had a parliament convened with new members who were more seized with their responsibilities than the new members who entered this parliament.

I want now to deal briefly with the budget and our war effort. Day after day since this session opened we have been getting more and more information which proves only too clearly how inadequate our war effort was. people were lulled into a sense of security during the election campaign by being told what was done; afterwards we found out that most of what we were told was done was simply contemplated. We find in the last two or three weeks an effort to upheave industry completely so as to get these things done that we ought to have been doing for many months before. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance has not yet taken over the Department of National Defence. He has a tremendous job on his hands; he has a great deal of house cleaning and reorganization to do, and I am sorry he is not in that department doing it now. When he was designated as Minister of National Defence there was a general feeling of satisfaction throughout this country. The people believed that they were going to have in that department a man who would do something, but two weeks have gone by and while he has been taking some part, the work that should be done has not yet been done. One of the first things that I suggest he should do is to cut away a lot of the red tape from our war department.

When a nation is at war there are two departments of government that are of the greatest importance, aside from those that deal with economic and internal problems. Those two departments are the Department of National Defence, dealing with the service men, and the Department of Munitions and Supply. To my mind those departments should be distinct. The Department of National Defence dealing with the service should be composed of men who have one duty to perform, namely the training of men for the army, the air force, the naval service and any other services in connection with our war effort. The Department of Munitions and Supply should have full control over the requisitioning and purchasing of all supplies needed. The service department should only requisition. At present we have mixed authority, such mixed authority that at times it has caused weeks and weeks of delay in the getting out of supplies, because in the Department of National Defence we have men who draw up the specifications, set out all the details with regard to what they want, and the Department of Munitions and Supply orders accordingly. In so many instances the specifications were not drawn by men who know the best way to get production in industry but were drawn, for example, by the British war office. These specifications were not adaptable to Canadian business. I know many instances of articles being ordered of a type not even made here or in the United States. They were typically English articles. Weeks went by, and finally it was found out that it was impossible to procure that type of article here. Then they had to decide that the article made in Canada or the United States would do and the specifications had to be revamped.

Now I believe, and I think industry in this country believes, that it has not been taken into the confidence of the government as it should have been. Instead of the department saying to industry, we want something of this type; what is the best way to produce it? they said to industry, this is what we want. In many instances industry could not produce it according to that particular type. I know of one instance when the question arose whether a round or a flat shoe-lace should be used for a lacing job on a certain article required by the Department of National Defence. Production was held up for five weeks, until the department decided that a flat shoe-lace would do the job, because there was no such thing as a round-shoe lace made anywhere on this continent.

That will give the house some idea of how delays have been brought about in the Department of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply. As I say, many of our orders have been based entirely on English standards. Anyone who has been English standards. Anyone who has been associated with industry in Canada knows that the English are not very quick to change their methods of manufacturing. After the trade treaty of 1932 was put into effect, a great many people in this country tried to turn trade to English companies, but the English manufacturers said, "this is what we make. It is good enough for us; it ought to do you." Canadian industry said, "No; this is what we want," and it was often only with very great difficulty that we were able to get English industries to change their systems to make products suitable for the Canadian trade.

I should like to give an instance that will show exactly what the Department of Munitions and Supply has been up against. Throughout this session, as in other sessions, certain hon. members have continuously gibed at industry in this country. During this session a number of hon. members have made the statement that industry went on a sitdown strike. I want to say that never in thehistory of Canada has a government received greater cooperation from an industry than this government has had from the textile industry of this dominion. In February of last year, months before the war began, the textile industry said to the government, "There is going to be difficulty in changing over our industry for war purposes. Give us a lead; give us some idea as to what you may need. Let us talk over these matters and begin to organize our industry now." Their plea was without effect; nothing was done. Then in September war broke out and immediately supplies were required for the army. At that time the munitions board was just being created, and there was no authority in any department to give firm orders for anything required from the textile industry. We went to work on the promise that eventually the firm orders would come through, and material worth hundreds of thousands of dollars was processed in the textile mills of this country without orders from the government, which did not come through until the end of October. At the end of that time the price was set, and that price was subject to a downward revision when the government accountants went into the textile mills. The government has kept a very close check on the profits being made by the textile mills, and those mills are quite willing that this should be done.

Again, Mr. Speaker, immediately on the outbreak of war in September I went to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) and pleaded with him to place an embargo on wool, because the drastic government specifications, based entirely on English specifications, called for the use of cross-bred wools in the manufacture of cloth in Canada, wools that we did not produce here. However, we did have, in the hands of dealers throughout the country, several million pounds of other wool which we had to have for military purposes. Several times during the special session I pleaded with the minister to place an embargo on the export of that wool, but he would not do so. He said he did not think it was in the interests of the trade to do so, and it was not done. As a result, there was exported two and a quarter million pounds of wool, of which we were very badly in need, and the loss of which held up the production of military cloth in some of the mills for several months. At that time I, together with many other hon, members and many business men throughout the country, wrote the government offering my services, stating what I had done, in what business I was engaged and also that it would cost the government nothing. Of course it was impressed on us then, as it has been impressed upon us many times since, that this was a Liberal war, being carried on by the Liberal party, and apparently our suggestions carried no weight.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Would he mention anyone who expressed that view to him, anyone in authority whom he asked for an opportunity to serve and who told him it was a Liberal war?

Mr. HOMUTH: Before I have finished my speech I will convince the Minister of Finance that it is still a Liberal war.

Mr. RALSTON: I am just asking my hon. friend a plain question. He said he was told that this was a Liberal war and that it was being carried on by the Liberal party.

Mr. HOMUTH: I did not. What I said was that I realized then that it was a Liberal war.

Mr. RALSTON: No; that is not what was said.

Mr. HOMUTH: If I said I was told, then I withdraw the word "told"; nevertheless, as I shall prove conclusively, it still is a Liberal war.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is making that statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: And I shall prove it.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, our association continued to function in an endeavour to help the government. Last October we made certain representations to the wool administrator. There was the question of the manufacture of blankets. The specifications said that grey blankets must be supplied. What did it matter to the soldier whether the blanket was grey, brown or blue, as long as it was warm? But it was impossible to convince the men at the Department of National Defence that the specifications should be changed. The material they wanted was not available in this country; the other was, and its use would have meant a substantial saving to the department. Five or six months went by; finally they decided to change their specifications. Last week another large order for blankets, specifying the type we had suggested last October, was given to the mills. This order will require some 1,400,000 pounds of wool, at a saving to the government of some 8 cents a pound, which means a saving, on that order alone, of about $112,000.

These are some of the things in the Department of National Defence which I say to the Minister of Finance must be changed. I believe that all the work of setting up specifications, calling for tenders and buying should be done by the Department of Munitions and Supply. That is one example of the way in which money could be saved.

The minister has continually stressed that we must save United States funds; for that matter, that we must save Canadian funds also, and we must buy very, very carefully. If those in charge would go to industry and say, "This is the type of article we want. How can it be best produced at the lowest possible cost?" industry would be only too glad to cooperate, but industry has not had that opportunity to cooperate. So I suggest to the minister that we should no longer follow the old road that we followed in peace time. In those days it was all right to call for tenders and take months to decide what action should be taken. It is no good in time of war. This road that we follow in connection with governmental purchases is too full of departmental stop lights. We should be able to take the shortest road to reach our goal, but we have not been doing that in our war effort. We have not been organizing industry in this country as it ought to be organized.

I had thought that the new minister, working in cooperation with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, would give us a complete new set-up of our war effort. I think that is necessary if we expect to get anywhere. Furthermore, I think this government ought to set up a munitions board which would have full power to award contracts. Then it would not be necessary to have all these matters passed through departmental channels. The other day I referred to the fact that a number of factories had bid on the making of a certain type of shell, but only one was geared up sufficiently and it received the order. The others could not compete in price because it is necessary to include the cost of tooling in the price bid for a first order. If we had a munitions board it would have the power to say that more could be paid on the initial order. It does not cost any more to tool up for 10,000 than it does for 50,000 or 100,000 or 1,000,000 shells. We would then have twenty-five or thirty industries equipped to go ahead and turn out these shells. We are certainly going to need them.

I am not saying this in any spirit of recrimination. I am saying it because industry itself feels that it is not getting an opportunity to do what it would like to do in connection with our war effort. The minister questioned me as to my statement that this was a Liberal war. Let me say to the Minister of Finance that with regard to contracts which are being awarded from one end of Canada to the other patronage is just as rampant to-day as it has been in peace time. If a man wants to get a job on some of these works he must go to the Liberal organizer or the boss of the Liberal party in that particular riding to get a card. That is a man who puts men to work. Before you can get a job on many of these undertakings, that is what you must do.

An hon. MEMBER: All of them.

Mr. HOMUTH: If that is not a sign that this is still a Liberal war, what more proof does the minister want? That is exactly what is going on in this country to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend makes that statement and I have no doubt he has the particulars. If he will give them to me, I shall be only too glad to have them looked into at once.

Mr. HOMUTH: The matter has been taken up.

Mr. RALSTON: It has to do with my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); it is not mine. However, sitting here on behalf of the government, I want to say distinctly that I should like to have any information of that kind my hon. friend may have. There may be some instances like that. I do not know, but I want to tell him that contractors are being told that only one thing goes in connection with these contracts, namely, speed and efficiency. That is what they are told, no matter who they are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How long is it since that rule was in effect?

Mr. RALSTON: So far as I know, it has been in effect right along.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can tell my hon. friend it has not.

Mr. RALSTON: I am telling my hon, friend what I know.

Mr. HOMUTH: Right across this country, in order to get a job on certain works a man must go to the local political boss.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking my hon. friend to give me instances and I shall look into them at once.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them have been given already.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend is stating the case in a general way.

Mr. REID: That is not the case in British Columbia.

Mr. HOMUTH: I would not accept a denial such as that.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not a denial; I am simply asking for proof of what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was not referring to the Minister of Finance. The fact of the matter is that this must be taking place with the knowledge at least of some of the local members.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend has it down now to the local members.

Mr. McIVOR: That is not true in Fort William.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HOMUTH: The whole trouble is that every time one mentions a matter of this kind and suggests that something should be done, one minister says that that comes under so-and-so's department, while another will say that it comes under another department.

Mr. RALSTON: I said that that was a matter for my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, but that I as a member of the government would welcome any information my hon. friend could give me on that point. I did not attempt to put it off on any other minister; I asked my hon. friend to give me the information.

Mr. HOMUTH: Nevertheless I think other ministers of the cabinet ought to give publicity to the fact that no contractor who has obtained a contract from this government has to listen to the local political boss.

Mr. RALSTON: I would refer my hon. friend to a statement which was issued by our late colleague, the former Minister of National Defence, the Hon. Mr. Rogers. He said in the most emphatic words that personal or political representations of any kind would not be tolerated. That was the word he used. That statement was issued from Halifax to Vancouver.

Mr. HOMUTH: I received a copy of it, and I thought, when the minister took over the department, that the government would live up to that promise, but they have not done so.

Mr. RALSTON: I am still waiting for the evidence.

Mr. HOMUTH: The fact of the matter is that this is serious.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly it is serious.

Mr. HOMUTH: Letters are coming to members protesting against this sort of thing. It has been brought to the attention of the government at different times and nothing has been done. It is still going on.

Mr. RALSTON: What is going on?

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me say this to the minister. A man cannot help feeling that, after all, it is the Liberal party which is carrying on the war, and that it is the Liberal party and Liberal workers that are going to get any profits out of local labour in the various constituencies. This sort of thing is going on and I want to bring it to the attention of the house. It has not been stopped. The late minister made a statement, and as a result of that I think hon. members generally kept from interfering with the department or making appeals on behalf of any one. I have approached the department only to draw its attention to the fact that certain industries in my district could make this, that or the other article and to ask if they would be given an opportunity to tender when those articles were needed. I never once approached the department on behalf of anyone, nor did I attempt to use my influence. I think that was generally the feeling of hon, members. Word should go out from this government that the sort of thing to which I have referred will not be tolerated. Every manufacturer should be told that he himself can hire whatever help he needs. Some are not able to hire their own men; they are advised locally whom they should hire. This creates a most unfair situation.

Mr. RALSTON: I am still waiting for the particulars.

Mr. HOMUTH: The minister will get them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can give a case. When the Department of National Defence wanted to rent some office space in Fredericton they were told that they must see the Liberal people, who told them to go to a certain gentleman whose name I shall not mention but who is a strong Liberal.

Mr. RALSTON: Was he an officer of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a man in the depot there.

Mr. RALSTON: A civilian in the Department of National Defence?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, he was a soldier. I can give the minister the name of the party to whom he applied and from whom he rented the space. He was told to go there and to go nowhere else.

Mr. RALSTON: I think Liberals generally have the idea that Liberals are pretty well disqualified.

Mr. ROWE: They are under a misapprehension.

Mr. HOMUTH: This is developing into a free-for-all, and my time is nearly up.

There are one or two other matters I should like to mention to the Minister of Finance in connection with the saving of money. We have heard a great deal said about the men who have recently been given high salaried positions in the civil service. I do not know whether these positions are necessary or whether these men are so much better qualified to do the work than somebody else would be at a lower salary, but I say to the minister that it is so easy to waste money on our civil service, and I am afraid that we are building up in this city a top-heavy civil service. It is far easier to acquire civil servants than to dispose of them, as we all know, and I am just wondering whether many of these so-called dollar a year men—I give them every credit for offering their services—are really the practical men that we ought to have doing certain things, men with a practical knowledge of industry.

Reference has also been made to Mr. Brockington. I do not know what he does or what his responsibility is, but if it is simply a matter of writing and keeping records I would suggest that surely some outstanding newspaper man might be engaged to do that work, and not necessarily a lawyer. My opinion is that we have too many lawyers running things in this country. I do not say that unkindly; I simply mean that we have not enough practical men. If Mr. Brockington's position is an absolutely necessary one to fill and he is the only man who can do the work, very well; but he gets $9,000 a year plus his per diem allowance. Now, a married man earning $1,400 a year has to pay a national defence tax of $28 a year, and if he has three children he pays only $4 a year. Therefore, it would take 2,240 of them to pay Mr. Brockington's salary out of their contributions by way of the national defence tax, and you do not have to bring into the civil service a great many men at the tremendous salary of $9,000 a year before you will have wiped out that whole classification of $4 taxpayers in this country. These are the things we must watch and guard against because, as I say, it is so easy to get a topheavy civil service, and if we do not take care the whole thing will crumble and cripple our war effort. Surely if we did away with much of the red tape that exists in the various departments to-day, we could get along with a great many fewer civil servants than we have at the present time.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, apparently we are just as much unprepared for peace as we were for war. It is too late to wait until after the war is over to start to prepare for peace, and I make this suggestion. We have the Sirois report, a very important one. I have read some of the commission's recommendations and I can see in them a solution of many of our difficulties. I do not know why the government should not start in right now-not a week from now or a month from now or a year from now-to plan to take care of the problems that are going to arise at the end of the war. Perhaps a committee of this house might be appointed to go into the findings of the Sirois report and see in what way their recommendations could be fitted into the economic life of Canada. We must do it some time, and while of course the war is the most important matter before us at the moment, almost equally important is the task of preparing for the period when the war is over so that there will not be a collapse of our economic system. If we carry out that task, and if the government will put into this war all the energy which the people expect them to put and will support them in putting into it, there is no doubt what the end will be. But we have a big job ahead, and the private member of this house has a tremendous responsibility. I suggest to the private members of the Liberal party that they go home week-ends and get the opinion of their people on the government's war effort and what they think should be done. In that way they will obtain a clearer impression of public opinion than the ministers themselves, and it is up to the private members of the Liberal party to see to it that every effort that is necessary is put forth in our war effort by the ministers who represent them on the treasury benches.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): It is not my intention to take up very much time, but in view of some statements that have been made in this debate with regard to the position of this group in this house I wish to repeat what our leader said this afternoon, that we have simply maintained our right to offer constructive criticism to the administration by offering amendments for the consideration of the house. We have attempted to place before parliament and the people of Canada what we consider better alternatives to the government's policy, alternatives which we believe will make possible a more effective prosecution of the war and the establishment of a better order of society hereafter. It is in that spirit that we have offered amendments to the budget.

A perusal of the budget will bring home to everyone a realization of the tremendous burden it is going to place on our economy. We must also realize that it is the natural consequence of the present industrial, economic and political organization of our country.

I find from the "Canada Year Book" that the per capita interest on our national debt was, in 1914, $1.64; in 1918, $5.87, and in 1938, $11.79. I wonder what it is going to be in 1942.

I also find from the Sirois report that about 33 per cent of our national revenue is used to pay the ordinary charges on our debt structure. We must keep constantly in mind that we have not yet paid for the last war. How long can such a condition of affairs continue? However, these are post-war problems.

It is evident to everyone that the present organization of society is doomed, and I believe this budget is one of the knells that mark its passing. It is also evident that we are undergoing tremendously rapid changes. Society, in rapidly increasing tempo, is undergoing a terrific change. The rapidity of that change is well exemplified by what has happened in Europe since parliament opened. We were united with France, and France is now out of the war. Great Britain, with Canada, stands to-day almost without an ally, but we, as the Canadian people, need have no fear what the ultimate outcome will be or as to what the Canadian people will do. The greatest concern of this parliament should be to see to it that the democratic rights of a free people weather the tempest of to-day and what may be immediately ahead of us. Another imperative duty of parliament is to see to it that we rid ourselves of the whole spirit of a profiteering world and establish instead an order of society in which there shall be no place for any institution or organization which has not the interests of humanity as the basis of its being. Our people are naturally peace-loving, loyal and patriotic; and they are industrious wherever the opportunity for industry exists, particularly so if there is a reasonable prospect that they will enjoy the fruits of their labours.

When I first came to this house I looked forward to hearing talks by some of the great reformers on the government side of whom I had heard. I remembered the addresses they had given in favour of social reform and changes in monetary policy. I recalled the views they had advanced when they first came into this chamber. They remained here for days to carry on the fight against reaction; they gave evidence before commissions; but suddenly, after about a year in parliament, they became mute, and they have maintained a most eloquent silence ever since.

In criticism of this budget I should like to make two observations. It has gone further in what I consider to be the right direction than any budget we have ever had. It has touched more deeply the pockets of those who are taking excessive profits, but the fact, evidenced by the figures which were given yesterday, is that it falls far short of what might well have been done. My greatest criticism is that it fails to protect those who are labouring in the lower income brackets. It will necessarily involve an increase in the cost of living for the many people who are on relief, for the many who at this time are hardly able to maintain themselves at even a low standard of living.

The kind of thing which I have in mind is illustrated in a letter I received to-day from

Yorkton. The writer reports that it is already clear that drought conditions in that area will reduce his crop to only forty per cent of normal. He tells me that implement companies are now repossessing implements, and adds that farmers are so short of cash that they are unable to meet the government's request for a greater war effort. Here are people struggling to do the best they can in the face of the difficulties which confront them, without hope of any return on their capital, with scarcely any expectation of receiving any of the fruits of their labour; and yet their only regret is that they cannot subscribe more funds to Canada's war effort.

To every Canadian who is willing to work there should be made available an opportunity to work. We of this group attach great importance to achieving security for those who are willing to work. When that opportunity does not exist, how can we hope to build up a great nation?

I know that western Canada was looking to this budget for some ray of hope. I fear it has found none. The only thing our people are told is that the cost of operating their farms will go up from ten to maybe twenty per cent. They hoped that some minimum price would be set for their principal commodity. Nothing of the kind has happened. They hoped that there might be an announcement of an interim payment for the wheat they delivered last year. There is no hope for them along that line. They have been looking for some assurance that agricultural assistance would be continuous and properly and adequately distributed. Again, there is no hope in that direction. I do not know what the policy of this government is with regard to agriculture, but if it is their intention to let agriculture in western Canada go, in heaven's name and in the name of common decency and humanity let them tell the people now and help them to get out. Fiddling away with relief and compelling these people to struggle along like slaves in the southern cotton fields does not make them a great people. To keep them under the lash of relief is an insult to God, to man and to the British flag.

I urge these four proposals upon the government.

First, restore the wheat board act of 1935 in its original effective form, so that it will act, as it was originally intended, as a buffer between the chaotic state of the European market and costs of production in the west.

Second, maintain some form of farm assistance legislation to take care of needy people in the event of a further calamity.

Third, let the government use the powers granted to it by the War Measures Acts. Virtually these are now the constitution of 95826-874

Canada, and through those powers let the people be told that there will be no further foreclosures, and that implement companies will be no longer allowed to take from these people the machinery of production without which they face nothing but the direst need.

Fourth, may I suggest that as a nation we are dependent upon world markets for our supply of wool for clothing; yet we have in the west this industry which under proper leadership could be usefully developed and protected. When I looked up the statistics I found that about six per cent of the farmers of Saskatchewan have sheep on their farms. More would be raised if the enterprise were profitable. Why cannot we build up in Canada a wool industry? Large areas of the west are better suited to the raising of sheep than the production of wheat. There would be found a source of seasonal income: the sale of wool in the spring would be a lifesaver to many of our people. There would be a source from which they would obtain wool for clothing to protect them properly from the rigours of the climate. Why should that industry not be protected? If it were, this would save Canada, in relief costs alone, millions of dollars.

There is another matter which seems to me to be of vital importance, and it constitutes one of the reasons for which I rose at this time, because no other opportunity will be available to make this plea. It is my contention that the greatest natural resource, in this country of great natural resources, is the ability and the brains of its youth. Unfortunately, like our other resources, they are largely wasted. The lack of compulsory education for large numbers of the people marks Canada as a benighted nation.

A rapidly changing world requires rapid changes in the reorganization of our society. Technical education has become essential in an economy which has changed from manufacture by hand to manufacture by machine, and I urge upon this government, even at this time of crisis, that they earmark, say onetenth of one per cent of the money receivable under this budget to establish throughout Canada a system of federal scholarships. In this respect Canada is away behind the rest of the world. In New Zealand, I believe 70 per cent of the students in the universities are there because they got government assistance in the form of scholarships. I know of no other great country in the world which falls so far behind in this field as does Canada. This is a federal responsibility, a national responsibility. It is the development of the brains and ability of our youth that we need. In the way of technical training, I suggest that supplies of interest-free money should be made available to every district in Canada where it is needed, to set up and equip technical schools to train our youth. Many of them may not be particularly well adapted to academic training, but they could undergo technical training. What a difference it would have made to our war effort if we had had technically trained men and women! Canada is far behind, and I hope that some day soon the government will take this matter into consideration. The people of Canada want it and they will support it.

There is another group of people who have been forgotten. If you want to take up the cause of humanity you can find cause in any province, but one class who are forgotten are the fishermen both in the maritimes and in British Columbia, as I understand from some hon. members who spoke the other day. About 40,000 fishermen make their living out of this industry in the maritimes. The Sirois report, at page 51 of appendix 3, states that there is a lack of statistical information, and decennial figures on this industry. I notice, however, from table IIIC in that book that in 1926 the income from the fishing industry in Nova Scotia was 6.83 millions; in 1932 it had fallen to 2.02 millions, and in 1936 it had barely recovered to 3.66 millions.

An hon. MEMBER: What was it last year?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The figures are not given in the Sirois report and I have not been able to obtain them, but I do know from other reports of investigations made, by the St. Francis Xavier institute, that many fishermen have an annual income of only from $200 to $600 per family. They have their gear in the water and often storms carry away 40 per cent of their equipment. This budget means an increase in the cost of such equipment. What sort of standard of living will those people have? How does it compare with the standard of those fortunate shareholders in the thirty-three companies we heard of yesterday, who, as a whole, will enjoy a return of about 14 per cent on the capital invested? Surely in such times as these it is our duty to make it possible for these people to have a decent standard of living. Poverty and want should be unknown in Canada. You cannot develop a great people in slums and amidst poverty. That is where subversive activities and crime begin. People are inherently good.

Someone the other day told us about cooperation, and the relationship between industry and humanity. I have often wanted to read such a book. A few more months here and I shall be able to write one, a book [Mr. Castleden.] about what industry does to humanity. It seems to me that humanity is forgotten. Read the price spreads commission's report and you will find someone saying, "Well, our factory was not built to the glory of God."

What we need more than anything else is planned internal economy. Now is the time to get together and study what is likely to happen after this war is over. We may not be sure of many things but of one thing we can be certain, and that is that the world will never be the same. The whole set-up, the whole organization of society throughout the world, the whole method of production will change. In the chaos resulting from the disorganization Canada can make a tremendous contribution in aid of humanity. Already we find famine, disease and death, the by-products of war, stalking Europe. We can say with certainty that millions of people who are living there will suffer a terrible death from famine. That must follow naturally the chaos that now exists in Europe. Why cannot Canada accept responsibility as one of the humane nations of the world? We should be preparing vast stores of products of field, forest and sea. These industries should be organized. There should not be a farm in Canada not producing to the utmost capacity, not one factory that is not working day and night.

The responsibility that rests on the shoulders of the Canadian people to-day is greater than any of us realize at this time, and, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are sick of the inertia shown in Ottawa. In one of the cities in my constituency the young men drill twice a week in their civilian clothes, taking physical exercise in order to get into condition so that, if and when things are organized, they will be ready to don the uniform and play their part in protecting democracy. The Canadian people are begging to be allowed to play their part.

Let us hear no more talk of scarcity in Canada. There should be no such thing. What is stopping us? I do not know of anything other than the present organization of society and of industry-interlocking directorates holding financial companies and corporations which maintain their control over the industrial life of the country, over its natural resources, over the production and distribution of goods; and until that is broken there will be poverty in Canada. Canada is faced with a tremendous responsibility as well as with the greatest opportunity that ever presented itself to a democratic people, and the fate of Canada if not of the British empire rests upon the shoulders of the present administration.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): At least I can claim some credit for trying to assist in having this debate curtailed by yielding last Tuesday to my leader who, I thought, made an excellent and earnest suggestion with a view to winding up the debate. It is not my intention to speak for more than a few minutes, seeing that the desire is to have the vote taken before six o'clock.

In my remarks on Friday last I intimated at the outset that I did not intend in any way to discuss the financial proposals of the budget, nor do I intend to do so now. I did say, however, that I should like to offer two proposals to the government. One of these I shall elaborate at greater length than I did on Friday night. In my judgment the time has come for the government to establish a national iron policy so that an ample supply of iron will be produced in Canada for the manufacture of steel munitions, planes, tanks, guns, bombs, shells and steel for ships. I felt that if the government did undertake such a policy, in the working of it out some new-found money would find its way into the treasury. That I will explain as I go along.

As far as taxes are concerned, the people of Canada will gladly pay any taxes that are required. They will grit their teeth and pull in their belts to the sixth notch, one for each of the nazi columns and one for good measure. But they do want action; the country wants the government to get on with the war. One might ask whether Isaiah the prophet foresaw these late times when he wrote the seventeenth verse in his fifty-fourth chapter, that "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper." I hope that I shall not be deemed sacrilegious if I paraphrase and modernize that, by saying that to-day there is only one nation in this world that is ready to shed and is at present shedding its blood and giving its treasure for what Isaiah meant when he wrote those words, namely, that no weapon that is formed against God's church could prosper. I say that no weapon that is formed to-day against the British empire will defeat it. I would say that still more firmly if I felt that this country was in a position-and it can soon get into a position-to produce the iron requirements that will later be wrought into steel to overwhelm Germany with planes and tanks, bombs and shells, and guns and ships. If we do our part in getting this country into shape so that it can produce the necessary iron to make these munitions—and that is the only matter I am going to speak about-then we certainly shall win the war, that is if we back up the efforts of our men, with the spirit in the heroic words that the Right Hon. Winston Churchill spoke recently to encourage us:

Let us therefore brace ourselves to our duty, and so bear ourselves that if the British commonwealth and empire last for a thousand years men will still say, This was their finest hour.

With that spirit in our men, no weapon that is formed against the British empire shall prosper.

We have in our country all of the major natural resources, metallic and non-metallic, sufficient to swamp Germany all along the line in any avenue in which we have to fight. We have nickel, more than any nation in the world, more than all the nations of the world put together, and nickel is essential to toughen and harden steel. We have asbestos for lining the compartments of the tanks in which the soldiers are housed. We have lead, mica, zinc, copper, all of which are required for munitions and electrical equipment; we have iron, we have gold the basis of money; we have coal and electricity, and the oil required to propel tanks and planes. All these we have in abundance. All we have to do is to put them together to make the munitions required to win the war.

I said that we have the world's supply of nickel. In 1938 we produced 1,100,000 tons, while all the rest of the world combined produced only 115,000 tons. I hope that from now to the end of this war the government will prevent the export of nickel to any potential enemy as well as any enemy. Without nickel they cannot make steel that will stand up. We control practically all the nickel in the world, and I hope that after the war no potential enemy will ever receive a pound of Canadian nickel. It is tragic to think of Germany receiving the nickel they did receive from this country during the past few years, without which they could not have built a tank that would stand anything.

We also have most of the world's supply of asbestos. Two important natural resources that we have not are rubber and bauxite, but we obtain them from other British dominions that have a large supply. I believe the British empire controls the world's supply of rubber; and of bauxite, the basis of alumina from which aluminum is made, the British empire controls about half the world's supply.

I think I ought to say a word as to what we did in processing these materials. In 1938 we manufactured the following quantities: Nickel, 1,100,000 tons; asbestos, 400,000 tons; and the rest of the world, only 200,000 tons. Of lead, from which bullets are made, we manufactured 300,000 tons. Of mica we manufactured only 1,000 tons, but mica being a very light substance, 1,000 tons is a vast quantity. We manufactured 200,000 tons of zinc, a very important war metal, and 300,000 tons of copper, without which modern war could not be fought. Of gold we produced 4,500,000 fine ounces; of coal, 15,000,000 tons, and that should be doubled. I shall not take time now to elaborate a national coal policy, but we should have such a policy; if we had Canada would not be importing 15,000,000 tons of coal while producing only 15,000,000 fons at home. We develop 8,000,000 horsepower of electricity and could produce many millions more. I believe we have in this country undeveloped not less than 50,000,000 horse-power. We produced 7,000,000 barrels of oil, and I often ask myself why some effort is not made to pipe the oil from Alberta to the Pacific. They have any amount of oil in Alberta, and are not producing it because they lack a market.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me say at that point that what we are endeavouring to do is to find out what the productive capacity of the Alberta oil fields is and whether the deposits would justify the building of such a pipe line. It is a matter that has had intense study for a year, not just something under consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear the minister say that, and I hope, when the studies are completed, an effort will be made to produce more oil in Alberta and get it to the water where it can be transported in ships.

Of rubber we manufactured in Canada last year some forty thousand tons, most of which came from other parts of the British empire.

In this review of what we have produced in Canada I deliberately left out iron, because I am one of those who are sorry that this country is not developing its vast iron resources. Some of those iron resources I know require to be either sintered or roasted to make the ore suitable for smelting, but we have not less than a billion tons in sight in this country, yet in 1938 Canada did not produce one ton. Every ton used in the country was imported. How can we win this war without iron to make the steel for ships, bombs, shells and so forth. It was, I believe, in 1937 I made a special trip to Germany to study there many of their activities under their department of industry, one of which was their iron policy, and I firmly believe that this country also should have a department of industry, but time will not permit me to elaborate on that. I found them importing ten million tons of iron a year. They had some nineteen thousand men engaged under the department of industry in exploring and [Mr. MacNicol.]

recovering all the iron possible from refuse dumps, old and supposedly defunct mines, and other sources of iron in Germany, laying up a supply against the time that they foresaw, namely the present war, when they anticipated that their sources of supply in Norway and Spain might be cut off. If the United States prevented the export of iron ore to this dominion; if the transportation of iron ore from Newfoundland was interfered with, we would have no way of prosecuting the war. So I maintain that this country should initiate a national policy of iron production as promptly as possible.

Before going to Germany I made a thorough survey of all the mines in Canada that might be used for the production of iron. Perhaps some hon. members will remember that in 1937 or 1938 I suggested that something be done to encourage the production of iron ore in northern Ontario. At that time I urged, as I urge again, that a bonus be given on each ton of merchantable iron produced from our ore. At that time this government refused to have any part of that idea, but to its credit the Ontario government accepted the challenge and passed legislation providing a bonus of $1 a ton, which was later increased to $2 a ton, for merchantable iron produced in Ontario. I maintain that we could establish a national policy of iron production in Canada that would be a revenue producer instead of costing the country anything.

I am happy to say that the Ontario government has had splendid results from its initial efforts to create such a policy in this province. I was glad to hear recently that the New Helen mines in the Algoma district which were opened in 1939 are now producing 1,500 tons of iron a day which, after sintering and smelting, amounts to 750 tons of finished, merchantable iron a day. But we must increase that very greatly. I can see no reason why this government, if it made a real effort to provide the necessary iron required by the country to make munitions, could not within a short time increase the production of iron ore in Canada to 10,000,000 tons a year. What would that cost? Ten million tons a year delivered at the blast furnaces at Sault Ste. Marie, Port Colborne or Hamilton, at $5 a ton, would be worth $50,000,000; but when turned into steel it would be worth $300,000,000. In other words, by the development of 10,000,000 tons of raw iron ore finished into steel, we would add to the national wealth of this country not less than $250,000,000 a year.

The Ontario government has granted a bonus of $2 a ton. If that bonus were increased to $3 a ton, and each government shared half, it would cost each government

$1.50 a ton; it would give such an incentive to the New Helen mines in Algoma that instead of producing 1,500 tons of ore a day, they might produce 10,000 tons a day. It would also bring to production the Moose Mountain iron mines as well as the Steep Rock mines, which latter I believe are located in the constituency of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I am told that the iron ore produced at Steep Rock is the same quality of hematite iron produced in Minnesota from the Mesaba range. The iron produced at the New Helen mines, after sintering, possesses 53.4 per cent of iron and 3 per cent of manganese, a very good grade of iron. That is the sort of thing we require in this country.

Such a policy as I have suggested might also result in the construction of three more blast furnaces, which would be all to the good. If one furnace were built on the St. Lawrence river between Kingston and Cornwall, it could use Nova Scotia coal. If a blast furnace were built in Toronto, it could use Nova Scotia coal also. I believe the blast furnace at Ojibway, near Windsor, which is not now in operation, would have to use coal from the nearby western states, but in a national policy of iron production I can see jobs for not less than 50,000 men and an annual increase of $250,000,000 in the national wealth of this dominion.

That, Mr. Speaker, is worth while going after. If this government would split a bonus of $3 a ton of merchantable iron with the Ontario government, it would mean that the provincial government would save fifty cents a ton on its present bonus while this government would be out only $1.50 which, on 10,000,000 tons of ore reduced to 5,000,000 tons of merchantable iron, would amount to only $7,500,000. But by the production of 5,000,000 tons of iron made into steel the government would obtain $65,000,000 in taxes, which would mean about $57,500,000 in new money for the treasury.

I see I am near the end of the period of time I intended to speak, so I shall conclude by again appealing to the government to establish a national iron policy for Canada with the objective of producing sufficient iron in this country to be turned into steel with which to manufacture clouds of planes, thousands of tanks, thousands of guns and millions of shells and bombs. With that quantity of material we can force Germany into submission. I believe it was the Prophet Daniel who said:

. . . iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things. . . .

So let the government bring in a national iron policy, which will provide a great many new jobs, bring new money to the treasury, add to the national wealth, and assist the British empire in subduing Hitler.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, no group in this house is more anxious to deal expeditiously with the legislation brought before us than the group with which I am associated. Personaly, however, I fail to see any reason for haste at this time. As my leader said on a previous occasion, at that time, as is the situation at present, the government possessed all the power it needed to do anything that might be thought desirable. It has authority to raise almost $1,-500,000,000; it has authority to deal with industry and with almost every other aspect of our national life. Consequently I fail to see any real reason for haste. However, I do not intend to occupy very much of the time of the house this afternoon.

I should like to say a few words on the subject of ways and means of raising money with which to finance Canada's war effort as well as to meet domestic problems. In war time the word we hear used most frequently is undoubtedly the word "sacrifice". I believe that what the people of Canada have accepted at the hands of the government which has been charged with the responsibility of carrying on the affairs of this country for the last ten years is proof positive that the Canadian people are willing to bear almost any burden and accept almost any sacrifice. Members of the house, particularly members of the Liberal and Conservative parties, have stated repeatedly that the people of Canada are glad and willing to bear the added tax burdens which have been imposed by this budget. I quite agree with that in so far as the tax burdens are essential and necessary. There are no people more willing and ready to make necessary sacrifices than the Canadian people. But I am persuaded that most if not all of the sacrifices which the Canadian public are called upon to make by this budget are absolutely unnecessary.

There are two reasons why the people are accepting these tax burdens without saying a great deal about them. In the first place I believe that they have been misled into the belief that these taxes are a necessary evil. Through the process of time we have educated our people to believe a host of things with regard to money, taxation and debt which are positively false and untrue. I feel sure that if the people were aware of the true facts in connection with money, debt and taxation, they would not acquiesce as readily as they seem to do. Furthermore, the people are silent over these impositions because they fear that if they express any resentment they will be charged with being pro-nazi or anti-British. Consequently, most of them say nothing with regard to these increased tax burdens.

As I have stated, I am quite prepared, and I am sure all are quite prepared, to support any legislation which calls for necessary sacrifices, but I cannot be persuaded that the sacrifices asked of our people, particularly the small wage-earners, are essential at this time. If the people at home could be persuaded that the eating of three square meals a day would deny the soldiers at the front what they required, then there would be no complaint against making a sacrifice along those lines. If our continued consumption of normal amounts of food, clothing and other materials meant that our soldiers would have to go without or would be denied in some way, then I know everyone would submit to a lower standard of living. But most people know that is not the case. Time and again members of this house, particularly of the Conservative party, have risen in their places and bemoaned the fact that we have no market for our fruits, our vegetables, our dairy products, et cetera. It surely must be apparent to all that we have the physical materials sufficient to take care, not only of our soldiers and all those on active service, but of all our people at home. If we were actually short of food, clothing, shelter and other materials, then there would be a reason for asking the people to curtail their needs still more. But statistics and simple observation indicate that even in war time the people of Canada should have a decent standard of living.

A high standard of living is possible in this country even though we are involved in a war. No one will deny that we have sufficient to provide a high standard of living for all our citizens and still take care of our war requirements. We still have idle labour and idle resources. So long as those two conditions obtain, according to my conception of logic and common sense there is no reason for poverty or distress or reduced incomes in Canada. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) indicated, the only limit to carrying on our war effort and taking care of our domestic requirements is the amount of materials which exist in this country. So long as we have sufficient there is absolutely no reason why a high standard of living should not be maintained for all.

I see absolutely no reason for taxation for purposes of revenue. That may sound fantastic, but that is my belief. For years we have been taught to believe certain falsehoods with regard to taxation, money and debt. I see no [Mr. Kuhl.]

reason why a government which has the authority and the right to create the medium of exchange should have to levy taxation for purposes of revenue. The people of Canada do their share when they provide the energy, when they ply their hands to the development and processing of raw materials and to the production of primary products. Those who work in our banking institutions have done the necessary work in connection with our financial system when they complete the required bookkeeping and other services. Physically there at all times is a complete balance in our economic system. The only function of a government in connection with money should be to issue what the people require. At the present time that is not being done. Our government does not control our money system. It is not exercising the authority it possesses.

The government should be not only the creator and issuer of coins and paper, but the creator and issuer of all money. At the present time private individuals are permitted to manufacture and issue over ninety per cent of our medium of exchange. They are permitted to issue this according to their own policy. I consider that a capital crime. That right should be exercised by the government and by the government alone, and it should be exercised in accordance with the needs of the people. The Minister of Finance has stated that the only limits which apply are physical, mental and moral. I agree with that. If that is true, then why should there be any debt in Canada? The people collectively provide all the energy necessary to produce and process the materials required for food, clothing and shelter. The people who work in our banking institutions do all the clerking and bookkeeping necessary. All the physical costs are provided at all times as our system is conducted. Why, then, should there be any debt after this work has been performed, because everything has been paid for? The only cost involved in any kind of enterprise is physical materials and human energy, and if that is provided, the bills are paid for. Therefore, why should there be any debt in Canada. I see absolutely no reason for it: it is purely fictitious. That applies to financing the war as well.

We have frequently heard it stated that the last war is not yet paid for. I contend that the last war has been paid for. It was paid for in shot and shell, in human life and in misery and suffering. Canada's part in the last war was paid for on the day that peace was concluded. All the costs were then met, and consequently there should not be any left over now. What do we owe after we have provided all the real costs? The same thing holds true of our present war effort. Why should there be any debt in the conduct of Canada's part in this war after all the physical requirements have been met? The only reason is that the government is not exercising its most sacred prerogative of creating and issuing the medium of exchange. It has allowed and is still allowing private individuals to exercise the most sacred prerogative which the government can exercise, and consequently the government must borrow from private individuals and place upon the people a perpetual debt equivalent to the principal and compounded interest.

A great deal of fear and alarm has been expressed at times in this house over fifth column activities. I would not for a moment minimize the possible danger from fifth column activities. There is no crime more base or wicked than treachery against the country of one's birth or adoption. But I feel that this budget will be far more disastrous in its consequences to the people of Canada than any so-called fifth column activities. budget will reach into every home and every pocket-book in the dominion. The saboteur might dislocate a power plant or some other vital point, but his crimes are localized, while this budget will affect every income and every pocket-book in Canada. In my opinion, fifth column activities had been at work in this country long before the war broke out, and as has been already suggested from this corner, when it comes to dealing with saboteurs we ought to deal with the really great saboteurs of this nation's war effort as well as of its peace-time effort.

In conclusion, may I summarize my reasons for opposing this budget. I oppose it because it demands of the common people of Canada absolutely unnecessary and unjustifiable sacrifices.

It will reduce unnecessarily the already too low standard of living of the masses of the people to still lower levels.

It will aggravate rather than improve the already serious problems of farmer producers. It will decrease rather than increase the home market for our own products.

It will demoralize and weaken our people at a time when their health should be improved and their vitality and vigour be increased.

It will fasten the shackles of debt and interest still more securely upon the people of to-day as well as upon the unborn generations of to-morrow.

It will tighten still more the stranglehold which the financial oligarchy already has upon our nation, and the inevitable consequence will be the complete destruction of democracy in Canada and the establishment of a complete financial dictatorship.

Finally, the sum total of all these consequences is that this budget will make Canada more vulnerable to an attack from the enemy than any other action that has been taken in this country.

Those are my candid opinions with respect to this budget, and consequently I would term it a national suicide budget. That is a very strong term but I really believe it fits the case. It is the type of budget which has brought France to the place where she is to-day, and therefore I can think of no term that more adequately describes this budget.

As a last word I would ask why it is that the government continues to pursue policies such as are involved in this budget which are obviously suicidal. I have asked myself that question many times. When it is so obvious that conditions could hardly be more terrible, why is it that the government continues to pursue such suicidal policies? The only answer I can find is that they choose to take their orders from St. James street or Wall street or Threadneedle street or whatever it is, rather than from the people of Canada. In 1935 the Liberal party was given a mandate to restore to parliament its most sacred prerogative and exercise it in the interest of the people, that of creating and issuing the medium of exchange in accordance with the needs of the people. I contend that that trust has been and is still being betrayed to-day. Canada will never make her most effective contribution to the empire's war effort, nor will she ever be able to defend herself to the maximum until the principle of the amendment which my group has moved is adopted, and that principle is:

This house is of the opinion that there should have been no increased tax burden placed upon the consumer until Canada attained maximum production of desired commodities or full employment by issuing, through the Bank of Canada, currency and credit in terms of actual public need.

Mr. W. R. AYLESWORTH (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in the budget debate, I would remind the house that the city of Kingston is the county town of the county of Frontenac, which comprises part of the riding of Frontenac-Addington, which I have the honour to represent in this house.

The city of Kingston at the present time is not represented in this parliament as the result of the sudden and tragic death of the Hon. Norman McLeod Rogers. Some three weeks ago the people of Kingston and the county of Frontenac, irrespective of their political colour, attended a memorial service held in the memorial hall at the city buildings, and paid their respects and tribute to the late Minister of National Defence. The government was represented at the service by the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who read a letter from the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) paying his tribute to his late colleague and friend.

The people of Frontenac-Addington have had the war brought home to them more closely than most rural ridings because Kingston is a military centre. Being at home over the week-ends, particularly since the budget was brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston), I have had an opportunity of speaking with many of my constituents and also with some of the citizens of Kingston whose confidence I enjoy. I feel that I do not overstate the fact when I say, if I might be allowed to speak on behalf of the people of Kingston as well as for my own constituents, that any increase in taxation will be paid cheerfully by the people of Kingston and Frontenac-Addington as their contribution to Canada's effort in buying war materials, equipping her soldiers and giving the best we can to protect those who have enlisted with the Canadian active service force in order to do their share in the protection of Canada and the motherland. All Canadians must face a very difficult task. During the past three years we have not put forth enough energy and action toward getting Canada into a position to defend herself, should the need arise; nor have we been able to do as much as we should have done for Great Britain and France. Our first line of defence was Great Britain and France; now it is Great Britain alone.

The unexpected and disastrous capitulation of France to a force so overwhelming that courage and bravery could not resist, makes us face a reality that challenges us to do our best. As I said, it makes us face a reality, one part of which is that Great Britain looks, and will continue to look, to Canada, to make available not only the food supplies for her army but also those for her civilian population, which demand is greater by far than the resources of Great Britain.

In peace time the lifeblood of Great Britain has been trade. In war time, export of goods from Great Britain is her fourth arm of defence. Great Britain must have money from the sale of her manufactured products, so that she can buy foodstuffs to feed herself, because she cannot possibly produce enough foodstuffs for her own requirements. Each of us must do his utmost to serve Canada and Great Britain in this war effort.

The biggest problem facing the country to-day is the problem of winning the war. True, that is the problem, but we have been told for years that an army marches on its stomach. Therefore, the problem of producing food is as important as the problem of producing soldiers. Without the farms we cannot have the soldiers, and a government which neglects the farmers in times of peace and war is a government which is betraying the people it has been elected to govern. I maintain that this government has neglected Canada by its actions towards the Canadian farmer and live stock interests. There is nothing in the budget which is of any help to the farmer; the live stock industry is ignored. Farmers and live stock producers of Canada are the most valued assets that this country has and their welfare has been totally neglected by this government. fact that the British empire trade agreements have been changed is well known; that this has been a distinct loss to the Canadian farmer cannot be denied. The home market which is worth only $32,000,000 to the wheat farmer is worth $273,000,000 to the Canadian dairyman and live stock producer, and this home market was neglected by the trade agreements of this government.

Last year 26,608,040 pounds of dressed pork were imported into Canada from the United States. So far this year we find that 28,500,000 pounds have been imported. The most important fact in this connection is that Canada is facing a critical situation in her hog industry. It is going to be difficult indeed to find a market for our surplus production of pork products. Including the bacon already stored-under instructions from the bacon board—the nearest estimate I can get is that between now and October 31, Canada will have a surplus of 60,000 hogs per week. In other words, between now and October 31 we must find a market not now in sight for an additional 10,000 hogs per week. Only two possible markets exist. One is England. When Denmark was invaded we took it for granted that England would at once require all the bacon Canada could ship. But the English Ministry of Food has stated that they do not require more than 50,000 hogs weekly. This statement has been repeated even since the invasion of Belgium and Holland. The most serious phase of this repeated statement is that, beginning with November, we shall have a surplus, not of 50,000 hogs weekly, but of nearly 100,000 hogs weekly. At this rate, by the end of the year we shall have a surplus of over 220,000 hogs in cold storage, with no market in sight. I submit that these figures should receive careful consideration by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). The government must take the responsibility for any surplus in the hog market, keeping in mind the imports from the United States and the fact that ever since this government came into power members of parliament have urged the farmers to raise more and more hogs. The farmers have raised more hogs, and now they find that they are not getting back the cost of production.

I have here a letter which was sent out by the department and circulated throughout Canada, I presume to all the retail merchants. But I understand that the government is anxious to get through with this bill to-night, so I shall not read that communication at the present time.

The cost of feed for hogs has been higher than the price received for them. There is no profit in raising hogs at the present time. This applies more particularly to eastern Ontario. Then, I ask, what is going to happen if the price drops? When hogs sell at eight cents a pound in normal times the farmer has great difficulty in earning a dollar. These are abnormal times and the producers of hogs are being asked to pay more and more taxes. Everything the hog producer buys to maintain his home and provide for his family will cost him more money; even the food cost for the hog is higher by twenty to thirty per cent than it was before the war. The duty of the government, now that they have encouraged the farmer to get into hog production, is to do everything possible to maintain a reasonable price.

The government has been negligent in this regard. Heavy imports of pork from the United States, on a very low price basis during the last year, is now destroying our market. I shall give the price of hogs for the last three years, during which time the U.-S. agreement was in effect:

								Per hundredweigh
August	10.	1937.	 					. $10.50
August
August	10.	1939.						. 8.25

To-day hogs are selling at $7.75 to $8 per hundred-weight.

In 1939 we imported 26,608,040 pounds of pork. I estimate that up to the end of June, 1940, we shall import 28,550,000 pounds of pork. This is double the importation of last year and the government has been slow to do anything. At the present rate, as I said before, Canada will have in cold storage at the end of this year products from 220,000 hogs. While this surplus is piling up and while we are contributing funds to Canada's war effort, I am amazed, Mr. Speaker, to find that we have been, in spite of the abovementioned figures, using money to buy pork from the United States to feed our soldiers.

Surely the Canadian market should be ours and ours alone. I say to the government, you urged us to get into the hog industry, and now I ask the government, what are you going to do:

1. To find a market for our surplus production?

2. To maintain a price that will pay the cost of production?

3. To secure for us the English market previously held by Denmark?

4. To stop the importation of cheap middlewest United States undesirable pork? 5. To reduce the heavy stock of pork products now in cold storage?

I submit that the hog raising industry is as important to the people of Canada, particularly of eastern Ontario, as is the wheat growing industry, and I would urgently request the government to take what steps are necessary to set a fair price for pork products, so that the farmer raising hogs may at least get back his costs.

I trust that in bringing the matter of hog raising and pork production to the attention of the house—it is not necessary to bring it to the attention of the country, for the reason that the farmers already realize the situation it will be considered, not as destructive but as constructive criticism, in that an understood difficulty which must be faced often may be solved when an unexpected problem creates confusion, distress and, under present circumstances, possibly disaster.

I now come to another phase of agriculture -milk and cream, vegetable oil, garden products.

We are told that the lowest tariff would result in the great United States market being open for our milk and cream. We were happy about that; surely, we thought, 130,-000,000 people will buy a great deal of milk and cream. What has been the result? An average of one 8-gallon can of milk a day shipped over, and in May of this year there were four gallons of cream exported, enough for a few family breakfasts.

With regard to vegetable oil, the government allows as much vegetable oil to come into Canada as our total products of milk and cream. We import yearly over 200 million pounds of vegetable oil at five cents and six cents a pound and it replaces our butter and lard. We produce over 200 million pounds of butter a year and could produce much more if there was a market for it. The same thing applies to lard-and through that the hog raising industry suffers.

The vegetable grower also has had to take heavy losses, owing to the lowered tariff and the shorter seasonal preference; every man in the market garden business and the fruit farmer have had to take losses. Canada's importations in one month this year totalled $1,500,000, an increase of $500,000 over the same month of the preeding year. At the present time, with splendid crops throughout Canada, and especially Ontario, the amount of United States produce offered the public is tremendous. Surely, in time of war, when the question of exchange is also involved, some restriction on these imports would be in order. It does seem strange that we can spend $41,000,000 for imported fruits and vegetables at a time when Canadian growers have lost their export market and are called upon to face many other difficulties as a result, of the war, and they feel, and rightly so, that they should have an opportunity of selling their produce on the home market without the competition of imported produce, especially at this time of the year, and when the nation's reserves must be conserved. However, since this is a $180,000,000 industry, I feel that this government should give it every consideration. So, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture to solve this critical problem.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): This is about the sixth budget to which I have spoken in my parliamentary experience, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that my speech will be the shortest of any I have given on these budgets. I recall the budget of 1935. It was known as a sound-money budget. We had many problems facing us in those days-problems of unemployment, problems of relief, problems of mental distress; and I recall that the Minister of Finance of that day rose in his place and said that he was going to finance the affairs of the country with sound money and common sense. He thought that sound money and common sense would solve the problems of the day. This is now the sixth budget to which I have listened and it is also a sound money budget.

I told the Minister of Finance in 1935, after he had presented his budget, that if he were to tackle the problem of distribution from the point of view of the new economic order, that if he stood in his place and declared the old order had at last passed away and that through a new economic order he would deliver the 12,000,000 people of Canada from the grim monster of fear and insecurity and bring them to the highest standard of living which our great productive capacity could afford-that if he would do this he would go down in history as one of the greatest emancipationists of our modern age of economic slavery. What happened? That minister had to retire on account of ill health. There is no doubt in my mind that the arduous duties and responsibilities connected with such an office were partly responsible for his break-down, and in this connection I would say that the present financial system is so ruthless that it would kill its own ministers of finance. Of course, that was five years ago. Finance ministers come and finance ministers go, and now we have another. His 1940 budget is another sound money budget. He, too, has problems to face, not only problems of unemployment and relief but the problem of the great war, and the present budget is going to finance the war just as the previous great war was financed, by means of taxation and borrowings.

Some weeks ago I received, as all members did, a release from the director of public information. There is no date on it. I do not remember when it came, and in fact there is nothing on it that indicates from whence it came. It is printed in red, in large type. There is no indication where the office is or who it comes from, but here is a little paragraph I wish to read:

The Minister of Finance has received a piece of white blotting paper with a $1 bill. On the blotting paper little Peter Wale of Portsmouth, Ontario, had written these appealing words: "I am Peter. I am five years old. I am sending you my dollar to help win the war."

As I read that, it seemed to me that little Peter Wale's name should be recorded somewhere in history, so perhaps the best thing we can do is to put his name on Hansard. This was a noble deed for little Peter. Of course he is only five years old, so we do not expect him to understand much about the money system. Perhaps he has a big brother who is helping to fight the Germans. Perhaps his father is a war veteran. At any rate it was a noble thing for a little boy like that to give his dollar to help win the war.

Now this is part of the government's financial policy. I do not know what the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) will be chiefly celebrated for in history, but I think we shall be remembered in history as a nation with such great potentialities of production and such short-sightedness that when we had to fight the greatest war of all time we had to take the baby's candy money to do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: Of course we can expect that sort of response to such a statement, but, sir, it is true.

I wish to refer to just one other matter. The Minister of Finance in introducing his budget made a clever speech. I quote one striking statement, found at page 1011 of Hansard:

For the first time in a thousand years the world has been made to realize that a new "Dark Ages" may not be the figment of a wild imagination.

In 1934 Major Douglas, who perhaps is recognized as the founder of the movement that we represent, came to Canada. He appeared before the agriculture committee of the then government of Alberta, and I believe that same year he appeared before the banking and commerce committee of this house. On his return to England a banquet was given in his honour, at which banquet he made a speech in which he used these words:

If the present system is not changed by say 1940 civilization will go down into a state only comparable to that of the Dark Ages.

Is it not significant that in Canada's war budget speech of 1940 the Minister of Finance should unknowingly tell the nation that Major Douglas' words were on the verge of becoming a fact? The tragedy is that immediately following such a salutary statement the Minister of Finance presented a so-called "sound money" budget.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I assure hon. members I am not going to talk very long; in fact, five minutes will be more than sufficient for what I want to say. A question arose this afternoon between the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) with regard to patronage in our war effort. I want to give a very clear case, not to embarrass the government or make trouble for any of the ministers; in fact, I acquit the ministers themselves and the government of any attempt in that direction.

Mr. RALSTON: It will not embarrass the government in the slightest. I ask for it.

Mr. SENN: There are at present four airports being erected in the county I have the honour to represent. The contractors are different firms, and I am going to refer to only one airport at this time. At the time of the election, lists were prepared, as I am given to understand, of men who were promised jobs when these airports were under construction. In that way I suppose inducement was offered to voters to vote in a particular way. I visited Ottawa shortly afterwards and telephoned a certain official in the air division, and he told me that when labour lists were being prepared it was intended that they should be prepared by the local employment agency of the provincial administration, which was perfectly satisfactory to me. However, that has not been done in this particular case. As a matter of fact, the local president of the Liberal association is the man who from time to time issues recommendations and slips of recommendation for men to be employed at this particular airport.

Mr. POWER: Which airport is it?

Mr. SENN: The airport at Dunnville, Ontario. I took it on myself two or three weeks ago to go to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and state the case to him, and he promised me at that time that he would do what he could to see that this condition was done away with. I have no doubt that he did, but I am sorry to say that it is still going on, and that no man can get a job on that airport, as I am given to understand—

Mr. POWER: May I ask if that is under contract?

Mr. SENN: It is under contract to the Dufferin Construction company, I understand. This contractor told men that have gone there time after time that he employs men only on the recommendation of a certain individual in the town of Dunnville. I have in my hand a photostat copy of one of the recommendation slips that are given from time to time. I mention this merely at the request of the minister to show what is going on there. I have had repeated protests from prominent citizens in that district in regard to this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): One of your friends got a recommendation.

Mr. SENN: Yes, but he came from outside the county.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): A friend, just the same.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not alter the principle.

Mr. SENN: He came from outside the county and was recommended by someone outside the county, and as far as I know he is the only man who could be said to be a friend of mine that is employed there. However, I just want to make that final statement.

Mr. POWER: I should like to get all the details and to know who the contractor is.

Mr. SENN: The Dufferin Construction company is the contractor. This situation is creating a great deal of dissatisfaction in that district, and I think is hindering recruiting. I do not want to see patronage enter into this in any respect whatever. As far as I am concerned, I have never recommended a man to any position at any of these airports, and I hope the minister will see that the situation to which I have referred is ended.

Mr. HOWE: If I may interject a remark, I would just say that that contractor, together with every other contractor, has been notified in writing that speed and efficiency are the only matters in which the government is interested; and that he has a free hand to hire whom he will.

THE MINISTRY

CABINET CHANGES—REVIEW OF THE WAR ORGANIZATION OF THE GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house is expecting from me to-day a statement with [Mr. Marshall.]

respect to matters pertaining to the cabinet. I have thought that the occasion would be opportune to review the war organization of the government as a whole, inasmuch as it is impossible, in considering matters of advice to the ministry, to separate from its relation to the cabinet itself, which has to do with the formulation of policy and seeing to its due execution, that part of the administration which has to do with executive and advisory work. I hope, therefore, that the house will bear with me if the statement which I have to make is somewhat lengthy. It is lengthy for the reason that I have sought to include in it the names of outstanding persons who have been appointed to the public service in connection with Canada's war effort. I thought it desirable that hon, members should see not only how comprehensive is the list but also how representative in character it is of all shades of political and other opinion and of the business interests in the country.

On different occasions, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has drawn attention to ways and means of increasing the effectiveness of Canada's war effort.

This is an aim which is shared by all hon. members of parliament. By none will constructive suggestions calculated to contribute to its fulfilment be welcomed more cordially than by my colleagues and myself.

The particular ways and means to this end which, at one time or another, were suggested by the leader of the opposition have been the enlisting of the services of "the best men":—

- (a) In executive and administrative posts, particularly in those branches of government which have to do with the prosecution of Canada's war effort;
- (b) In an advisory capacity, where not possible to have their services enlisted either in whole or in part in executive or administrative posts;
  - (c) In the government itself;

By "the best men" is meant, I think I may assume, persons whose services or advice are available, and who, all circumstances considered, appear best suited for the positions it is necessary or desirable to fill.

It has also been urged by the leader of the opposition that the work of the cabinet should be so arranged as to free as largely as possible from other duties Ministers of the crown who preside over those departments of government which are primarily concerned with war activities, in order that the time and attention of these ministers may be given as exclusively as possible to a consideration of war policies and their effective prosecution.

A review of what, in fact, has actually been accomplished will make clear that it is precisely along these lines that from the very outset the government has been proceeding. We have not sought to do everything at once, thereby involving unwarrantable expenditure, and having, as the war has progressed, to undo much that should never have been done; or, what is worst of all, by premature action, creating problems and situations more difficult of solution than those we have been called upon to meet. Rather have we sought to anticipate, as far in advance as was possible, the problems which were certain or likely to arise in the progress of the war, and to prepare in advance, as far as possible, for the meeting of each new situation as it might arise, taking, when the right moment came, the additional measures required to deal effectively with it. These additional measures to meet new situations as they have arisen, have involved bringing continuously into the service of the state and to the aid of the ministry, in an executive, administrative or advisory capacity, available persons of outstanding ability and experience. It is along these lines that we shall continue to seek to meet each new situation as it is born of the exigencies and demands of the war.

In speaking on these matters, the leader of the opposition called attention to the following statement which I made in the course of the general elections held at the beginning of this year:

With the war and its problems growing in intensity and magnitude, I shall seek, if we are returned to power, to bring to the aid of the ministry, in an advisory capacity, a still larger number of men of outstanding ability and experience whose services in one way or another might be made available to the state, and add strength to the administration of our policies. How best their services might be consolidated and used whether (a) in an immediate association with the war cabinet, or (b) with a member of the cabinet, intimately associated with its war activities, is something that I would like to consider with my colleagues before the next parliament reassembles.

It will be noticed that this undertaking had relation to a course of procedure which had already been adopted, and with which the public were wholly familiar. It was, for example, everywhere known that in organizing the war supply board, the government had been fortunate in securing as the chairman of that organization, Mr. Wallace Campbell, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, who not only was called on occasion into conference with the war committee of the cabinet, but who, in addition to performing the duties of chief executive officer of the war supply board, served throughout in an advisory capacity to the minister responsible for its administration. Mr. Campbell, at the time of his appointment as chairman of the board, was selected as "the best man" available at that particular time for that particular post. The selection was made regardless altogether of party political affiliations.

How extensively, since its return to office, the government has carried out the pledge given by myself in the course of the elections, will be apparent from the appointments, since made, of men of outstanding ability and experience to executive and administrative posts immediately connected with Canada's war effort. Of every person so appointed, it may be said that directly or indirectly he has acted not less in an advisory capacity to the minister of the department concerned, than as an executive or person in a key position performing some important function in the prosecution of Canada's war effort. By advisory opinion thus obtained from exceptionally well informed and highly specialized sources, the ministry itself has been continuously guided in the shaping, development and execution of its war policies.

How effectively the administration has been strengthened by enlisting the services of the particular persons appointed will be apparent from their names, from their previous associations, and from their known qualifications for the executive and key positions now held by them in the departments concerned with war activities.

Appointments have been made by the assignment to tasks, for which they possess special qualifications, of officials from the permanent civil service, and by recruitment from financial, industrial, professional, technical and other fields of activity, of outstanding persons who, because of their training, associations and experience, were regarded as likely to be most familiar with the nature of the new administrative problems which had to be met.

Let me now briefly review the appointments made since the commencement of the war. The list does not purport to include all appointments made, but it is, I believe, sufficiently representative to make clear the government's determination to bring into the service of the state in an executive, administrative or advisory capacity regardless altogether of party political affiliations, the best available men to assist the ministry in the effective prosecution of the war effort of our country.

Auxiliary Services

Early in October, 1939, a directorate of auxiliary services was set up in the Department of National Defence to coordinate and facilitate the work of the various agencies promoting the welfare of the men in the service.

Brigadier W. W. Foster, president of the Canadian Legion, was called upon to serve as director. The work of the auxiliary services has increased with the growth of our armed forces and more and more representatives of the voluntary organizations have come to work in active cooperation with service officials in the conduct of this work.

Besides the organization at headquarters in Canada and in each of the military districts an overseas organization has been established at Canadian military headquarters which includes representatives of the four principal voluntary organizations: The Canadian Legion, Y.M.C.A., Salvation Army and Knights of Columbus. Each of these bodies also has representatives working with the first division. The government has undertaken to provide the pay and expenses of a portion of these overseas workers.

Department of National Defence for Air

It will be recalled that very shortly after the general elections a third acting deputy minister was appointed to the Department of National Defence. This appointment had relation particularly to the air forces and the development of the British commonwealth air training plan. The government was fortunate in securing for this most important post the services of Mr. James S. Duncan, vice-president and general manager of Massey Harris Limited, Toronto, one of the best known and ablest industrial executives in Canada. Mr. Duncan's appointment was made on April the 11th.

On May the 22nd, parliament authorized the establishment of a separate Ministry of National Defence for Air and, on the day following, the Hon. C. G. Power was sworn in as minister of the new department.

Since that date, the administrative staff of the Department of National Defence for Air has been further strengthened by the following appointments:

Name	Present position in Department	Business, professional or other affiliation at time of appointment.
Terence Sheard	Executive assistant to the deputy minister.	Assistant General Manager of the National Trust Company, Toronto.
J. L. Apedaile	Inspector of accounts, civil flying schools.	Partner of Cole, Apedaile & Company, Chartered Accountants, Montreal.
S. D. Armour	Contracts officer, civil flying schools.	Banker, Georgeville, Que.
J. W. G. Clark	Director of public relations.	Director of Cockfield, Brown Company, Advertising Agency, Toronto.
I. N. Smith	Assistant director of public relations.	Assistant General Manager and Secretary-Treasurer, Ottawa Journal.
W. J. Macdonald	records branch.	Senior Partner Millar, Mac- Donald & Co., Chartered Accountants, Winnipeg.
G. M. Black	Assistant to head of statistical and records branch.	-Comptroller, Western Brewer- ies Co., Winnipeg.
H. G. Norman	Special assistant to deputy minister.	Partner of Price, Waterhouse & Co., Chartered Accountants, Montreal.
H. G. Colebrook	Executive assistant in charge of engineering and supply.	Director and general merchan- dising manager of Robert Simpson Co., Toronto.

I shall refer a little later on to the genesis and evolution of the Department of Munitions and Supply from a purchasing board, associated before the war, with the Department of Finance and later, at the commencement of the war, as a war supply board under the supervision of the Minister of Transport, to the present full-fledged Department of Munitions and Supply. For the moment, it is sufficient for me to recall that the department itself was duly established on April the 9th, at which date the existing organization of the war supply board was absorbed into the new Department of Munitions and Supply. In no branch of the public service has need for rapid expansion and the enlistment of services of able executives and persons possessed of special knowledge been greater than in that concerned with the production of munitions and other war supplies. The services of a large proportion of those at present in these positions have been enlisted since the new department took over the work of the war supply

The administrative staff of the Department of Munitions and Supply is, like other departments, presided over by a deputy minister.

There is, as well, an executive committee of seven members. This committee might be compared to a small cabinet concerned exclusively with war supply. It meets from day to day; considers and decides upon matters of policy with respect to production of munitions and other war supplies as well as upon the best methods of carrying out policies already determined.

The department is divided into a purchasing branch, a construction branch and a number of production branches for aircraft, shipbuilding, munitions and gauges and chemicals and explosives.

For the mobilization of supplies of raw materials controllers of metals, timber, oil and steel have been appointed. These controllers act not only individually but collectively constitute a war industries control board within the department.

On the administrative side the deputy minister is assisted by the comptroller and secretary and the officials of his branch.

A branch of the department is also being organized for economic research and planning required in order to maintain a constant and uninterrupted development of ever-increasing quantities of the materials of war.

The department has a labour liaison officer and liaison officers in New York and London.

Beyond the department itself, several non-profit making private organizations, fully owned by the government, have been set up to carry on special phases of the work. Speaking in the house on June the 14th, the Minister of Munitions and Supply explained the purpose of these companies as follows:

It has been found utterly impossible to assemble in Ottawa a sufficient staff to handle all the multiplicity of undertakings that the department has in hand at the present time. The act provides that certain government owned and controlled companies shall be established and headed by business men chosen by the government who will be able to carry on certain operations as companies rather than as part of a departmental staff.

Each of these companies is being or will be administered by a board of directors, chosen from outstanding business men and industrialists.

At the present time within the Department of Munitions and Supply there are, besides those who are connected with these government owned companies, some 65 persons serving in key positions or as departmental heads, of which number ten are outstanding permanent civil servants.

A list of departmental heads and key men in the Department of Munitions and Supply was placed on Hansard by the minister, on June the 20th. The names of the persons whose services have been classified in relation to their present position and prewar occupation are as follows:

	E. A. Wilson	<ul> <li>President and General Manager of Ingersoll Machine and Tool Co. Ltd., and Vice-President and Gen. Manager Morrow</li> </ul>

Screw & Nail Co., Ingersoll.

It will be observed that the lists of persons I have quoted contain the names of many whose names, from one source or another, have been mentioned as those of individuals whose presence in the cabinet might be expected to add to the effectiveness of Canada's war effort. I submit that in the positions in which the services of the persons cited have been enlisted their opportunity to be of service to the state and effectively to aid the ministry (all circumstances considered) is relatively greater than it might be expected to be were they members of the ministry itself

Department of Finance

The appointments I have mentioned thus far have been in the departments immediately concerned with military defence. In the administration of the departments and agencies concerned with matters of economic defence and internal security, the government has likewise enlisted the services of equally representative groups of outstanding and specially qualified persons. For instance: In the Department of Finance, the executive staff has been strengthened by the appointment of Professor W. A. Mackintosh, head of the Department of Political and Economic Science of Queen's university, as special assistant to the minister. But much more than in the work of the department itself, the services and counsel of business and professional men have been sought in connection with the organization and direction of campaigns for nationally offered war loans and the sale of war savings certificates, and in the vital and highly specialized work of the foreign exchange control board.

War Loan and War Savings Campaigns

To direct the campaign for the first publicly offered war loan, a national war loan committee was set up under the chairmanship of the Minister of Finance. Serving on it were five former ministers of finance:

Sir Thomas White, Sir Henry Drayton, Honourable C. A. Dunning, Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, and Honourable E. N. Rhodes.

In addition were the provincial treasurers of all nine provinces. In order to give the committee as broadly representative a character as possible some 225 prominent people in all the provinces of Canada were added to the membership.

To direct the more purely technical aspect of the campaign, a national subscription committee of men connected with the securities business was set up under the chairmanship of Honourable C. A. Dunning.

In the campaign for the sale of war savings certificates the government has similarly availed itself of the services of prominent business and professional men.

A national war savings committee was set up of which Mr. W. H. Somerville, general manager of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada, and Mr. de Gaspe Beaubien, a consulting engineer of Montreal, and a director of several industrial companies, were appointed as joint chairmen. Provincial chairmen were selected as follows:

British Columbia-Christopher Spencer, Vancouver.

Alberta—John Burns, Calgary.
Saskatchewan—W. G. Yule, Regina.
Manitoba—E. J. Tarr, K.C., Winnipeg.
Ontario—R. V. LeSueur, Toronto.
Quebec—Napoleon Charest, Montreal.
New Brunswick—George E. Barbour, Saint

John. Nova Scotia—W. K. McKean, Halifax. Prince Edward Island—Edmund T. Higgs, Charlottetown.

Foreign Exchange Control Board

Early in September, a foreign exchange control board was set up consisting of senior members of the public service and officers of the Bank of Canada. The purpose of the board has been that of setting up a complete system of exchange control, thus to conserve our financial resources and supplies of foreign exchange, and to prevent the dissipation of our capital into speculative or other unessential uses abroad. Working in close association with the Bank of Canada, the board has achieved its purposes with complete efficiency. Its task has been growing ever greater and more complex. To assist the nucleus of officials from the Bank of Canada, the board has secured the services of an ever increasing number of highly trained men from the fields of business and finance. I may make brief mention of some of these.

In addition to 20 employees of the Bank of Canada whose services have been lent to the board on a full time basis, the chartered banks have provided the services of 20 officials including Mr. F. R. MacLean of the Dominion bank, Mr. G. Catherwood of the Royal bank, and Mr. E. C. Winrow of the bank of Montreal. Some 30 chartered accountants have been lent to the board by their employers on a full time basis, and an additional 15 to do investigational part time work in the commercial section in the summer months.

Five experienced securities dealers assist in the work of the securities section. Apart from the head of the general section, eight other lawyers are engaged in its work.

The following is a representative list of the executives who have come to assist in the direction of the work of the board:

Name C. K. Highmoor	Present position on board Chief of foreign exchange A section.
A. McD. McBain	Public relations officer.
M. W. Mackenzie	Chief of commercial section. I
D. R. A. Walker	Chief of securities section.
W. D. Matthews	Chief of general section.
A. M. Campbell	Advisor on matters affecting insurance.
Douglas Dewar	Head of Vancouver office.
André Gervais	Chief of commercial section, C Montreal branch.

Former position

Assistant superintendent, Foreign dept. of Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Manager of Foreign Relations Dept., Bank of Nova Scotia.

Partner in McDonald, Currie, etc., Chartered Accountants, Montreal.

Associated with Wood, Gundy and Co. Ltd., Investment Dealers, Toronto.

Barrister, with Wills, Bickle and Gayley, Toronto.

Associate Actuary, Sun Life Assurance Co.

A Canadian who was formerly senior partner in Peat, Marwick and Mitchel, Chartered Accountants, New York.

Chartered Accountant, with Roland Levesque et Cie., Montreal.

War-time Prices and Trade Board

Upon the outbreak of war, immediate concern was shown by the government to prevent the disastrous rise in prices which so seriously dislocated the Canadian economy in the last war. On September 3rd, the government established the war-time prices and trade board, and invested it with extensive powers to prevent hoarding, profiteering and undue rise in prices of necessities. The board itself is composed entirely of outstanding permanent officials under the chairmanship of Mr. Hector McKinnon, who is also chairman of the tariff board.

The complete list of the officials and administrators appointed from outside the public service is as follows:

K. W. Taylor	Secretary.
Hubert Kemp	Economic adviser.
J. M. MacDonald	Economic adviser.
H. D. Anger	Solicitor of board.
David C. Dick	Wool administrator.
Harry Brown	A 1
W. P. Walker	Administrator.
H. J. Hobbins	Administrator.
J. McGregor Stewart, K.C	Coal Administrator.

Department of Agriculture

An agricultural supplies board has been set up within the Department of Agriculture to help meet the extraordinary problems for our agricultural economy created by the war. Other wartime bodies within the depart-

Other wartime bodies within the department are the bacon board, which was set up to implement and direct Canadian fulfilment of the important bacon agreement with the United Kingdom, and a dairy products board which was created to supervise the whole question of the production and marketing of dairy products. There is also an advisory committee to the bacon board but this, unlike the two just mentioned, possesses no executive powers.

To assist these boards in the conduct of their duties, the government has enlisted the services of specially qualified persons from outside the permanent service. The Department of Agriculture has obtained the full-time services of Professor S. R. N. Hodgins of Macdonald College, Montreal, as secretary of the agricultural supplies board, of Mr. D. J. Perry, transportation officer of Canada Packers, Montreal, as transportation specialist for the bacon board, of Mr. C. J. Servais, packing house accountant of Toronto as accountant of the bacon board and of Mr. W. E. Bosnell, the plant superintendent of Canada Packers, Toronto, as technical adviser.

The part-time services of the following persons have also been enlisted by the department:

Name	Present position in department	Former position
Hon. J. G. Taggart	Chairman, bacon board	Minister of Agriculture, Saskat- chewan.
S. W. Todd		Packers.
L. C. McOuat		U.F.A.
		Chief, Live Stock Branch, Department of Agriculture, Quebec.
		President of Lovell & Christmas (Canada) Ltd., exporters of dairy products, Montreal.
J. F. Desmarais	Member, dairy board	President of Co-opératives fédérées, Quebec, Montreal.

Department of the Secretary of State

Several of the war-time boards and agencies under the department of the Secretary of State are administered by a well known person from outside the government service. Dr. H. M. Tory, retired former president of the National Research Council has been serving as director of the technical section of the voluntary service registration bureau. The services of Brigadier General E. deB. Panet, chief of the department of investigation of the Canadian Pacific Railway have been secured as director of internment operations.

To organize the public information office the government first secured the services of Mr. Walter S. Thompson, director of public relations for the Canadian National Railways. Upon Mr. Thompson's retirement, because of the impairment of his health, he was succeeded by Mr. G. H. Lash as director, and Mr. Claude Melancon, as associate director, both of whom had been associated with Mr. Thompson in the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. W. Gordon Gunn, barrister, Winnipeg, is serving as the administrator of the War Charities Act. Mr. T. W. Laidlaw, the dean of Manitoba Law School, and Mr. V. C. MacDonald, dean of the Dalhousie Law School, are both giving their services during their summer absence from their schools in connection with special work under the custodian of enemy property.

Departments of Trade and Commerce and Transport

In the Department of Trade and Commerce Mr. A. W. L. MacCallum has been appointed director of shipping, serving as executive officer of the Canadian shipping board. Mr. MacCallum formerly was manager of the Shipping Federation of Canada, Inc., of Montreal.

A similar outstanding appointment has been made in the Department of Transport of Mr. T. C. Lockwood as transport controller. The transport controller has supervision over the whole question of priority of movement with regard to war needs. Mr. Lockwood was formerly general freight traffic manager of the Cunard White Star Line, Montreal.

I have referred thus far to enlisting in the government service, in executive and administrative positions, the best available persons from the business and professional world. I come now to the suggested means of increasing the effectiveness of Canada's war effort by enlisting the services of the best available persons in an advisory capacity where not possible to have their services enlisted either in whole or in part in executive or administrative posts.

In considering specific problems the government has not hesitated to seek the advice and cooperation of existing organizations and bodies known to be conversant with phases of the work concerned. In addition, a number of advisory boards and committees have been specially organized to aid ministers and war agencies by advice based upon practical experience. In each of these advisory bodies an effort has been made to secure as representative a group as possible of duly qualified persons. I may mention, briefly, a few of these—some specially created to meet the war situation, others organized bodies already established.

As an example of the advice and cooperation of existing Canadian bodies sought in connection with the solution of specific problems arising out of war-time administration, I might mention the conferences between officials of the dominion government, representatives of the various provincial governments, and the officers of qualified voluntary organizations, with respect to the questions of the immigration of refugees and the movement of evacuated children to Canada from the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Special mention should be made in this connection of the helpful cooperation of the officers of the Canadian Welfare Committee and of the Canadian National Committee on Refugees.

In the work done so far by officials of the Department of Pensions and National Health upon air raid precautions, the collaboration of the provincial authorities in the coastal provinces has been obtained and, as well, the full cooperation and advice of the St. John Ambulance Brigade and Association. The department, in its health activities related to the war effort, has also secured the cooperation of all public health forces of the dominion, acting through the Dominion Council on Health. This council is made up of the chief health officers of all the provinces.

Department of Labour

The government has recognized from the outset the importance of meriting and obtaining the whole-hearted cooperation of labour in the development of Canada's war effort. It has recently given concrete expression to this recognition by the declaration of certain principles for the regulation of labour conditions now embodied in an order in council.

Recently there has been created a national labour supply council. The purpose of this council is to bring to the minister of the department advice from qualified representatives of labour and of industry upon all matters touching the supply of labour for war industries.

The chairman of the National Labour Supply Council is Mr. A. J. Hills, chief of personnel of the Canadian National Railways. The secretary is Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, a former member of this House of Commons and for some time past a permanent official of the Department of Labour. The council itself is composed of five representatives of labour and five of industrial employers, with an alternate for each.

The membership is as follows:

Representatives of labour:

Representative

E. J. Tallon, Ottawa, secretary-treasurer of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

J. W. Bruce, General organizer for Canada for the United Association of Journeymen, Plumbers, Gas Fitters and Steamfitters Helpers.

James Somerville, Canadian general vicepresident International Association of Machinists.

A. R. Mosher, Ottawa, president of the All-Canadian Congress of Labour.

Alfred Charpentier, Montreal, president of the Confederation of Catholic Workers of Canada.

Alternate

A. D'Aoust, Canadian vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers. Fred Molineaux, Canadian general organizer, International Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paper Hangers of America.

Tom Moore, Ottawa, president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada.

C. R. Millard, director of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee.

Maurice Doran, Montreal, vice-president of the Confederation.

Representatives of employers:

Mining industry

Alternate

Representative H. Stovel, incoming president Ontario Mining Association and general manager, Dome Mines Ltd., South Porcupine.

N. A. Bryce, past president, Ontario Mining Association, president, Macassa Mines, Kirkland Lake, Ontario.

Canadian Chamber of Commerce

Allan M. Mitchell, Robert Mitchell Co. Ltd., D. P. Cruickshank, president, Steel Equipment Company, Ottawa, Ontario.

Canadian Manufacturers' Association

W. C. Coulter, past president, C.M.A.; president Coulter Copper & Brass Co., Toronto, Ontario.

W. H. McIntyre, vice-president, Ottawa Car & Aircraft Co., Ottawa, Ont.

N. Moisan, president, Standard Paper Box Co., Montreal, Quebec.

Louis Armstrong, Consolidated Paper Corporation, Montreal, Quebec.

Canadian Construction Association

J. M. Pigott, Pigott Construction Co., Hamil-Albert Deschamps, general contractor, Montreal, Quebec. ton, Ontario.

Associated with the work of the Department of Transport are two advisory boards set up to recommend as to compensation for owners of vessels which have been requisitioned; one board for the Pacific coast and one for the Great Lakes, St. Lawrence River and Atlantic coast.

Chairman for the Pacific coast region is Honourable Justice Dennis Murphy of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

Chairman for the Great Lakes, St. Lawrence River and Atlantic coast region is Honourable Justice M. B. Archibald of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

Department of Agriculture

In the Department of Agriculture an advisory committee to the bacon board has been set up to bring to the operations of the board the benefit of the advice of a group of men representative of producers and of the packing industry. This advisory committee is without a chairman of its own and holds its meetings in conjunction with those of the bacon board itself.

Its members are:

W. J. Reid—Formerly associated with the P.E.I. Department of Agriculture. H. Wilson—Well-known hog producer in western Ontario.

John Harrold—Hog producer of Alberta. Joseph Bisson—Connected with the cooperative marketing of livestock in the province of Quebec.

K. N. M. Morrison—General manager of First Co-operative Packers of Ontario, Limited. F. H. Downing—Manager of Canadian Live-stock Co-operative (Western) Limited. John Burns—President of Burns Packing Company of Calgary.

J. H. Tapley—General manager of Swift & Company, Toronto.

Department of Fisheries

Two committees have been formed to be associated with the Department of Fisheries in an advisory capacity.

A war-time fisheries advisory board has been appointed to consider the whole question of the marketing of Canadian fish. Its personnel has been chosen to give representation to men with practical experience in both our Atlantic and Pacific fisheries.

Chairman: J. J. Cowie-Official of the department. A. H. Brittain—Past president of Canadian Fisheries Association, Montreal.

Louis T. Blais—President, Louis T. Blais, Louis T. Blais—President, Louis T. Blais, Ltd., and president, St. Lawrence Sea Products Company, Quebec.
H. G. Connor—President, Maritime National Fish Limited, Halifax, N.S.
W. H. Smith—President, Lunenburg Sea Products, Lunenburg, N.S.
T. R. Clouston—General Sea Foods Ltd.,

Halifax.

A. Neil McLean-President, Connors Bros. Limited, Black's Harbor, N.B.
Col. J. W. Nicholls—Canadian Fish and Cold Storage Company, Prince Rupert, B.C.
A. L. Hager—President, Canadian Fishing

Company, Limited, Vancouver.

Major Hugh A. Green—Coastal Fisheries,
Ltd., Montreal, and director of fish supplies for Canadian army during the first Great War.

W. George Akins—Publicity agent, Toronto.

F. W. Wallace—Editor of Canadian Fisher-an, and supervisor of fish division of the man. Canada Food Board during the first Great War.

Advisory Committee to the Lobster Controller

The dissolution of markets has necessitated the appointment of a controller who will have supervision over the entire field of production and marketing of canned lobster. In the initial stages, Dr. D. B. Finn, deputy minister of the Department of Fisheries, is serving as controller; but to assist him an advisory committee of men immediately concerned with this problem has been appointed. The committee, chosen to give representation both to the fishermen and to the lobster canning industry, consists of Messrs.:

G. S. Lee of Halifax.
Bert McInerney of Halifax.
W. H. Tidmarch of Charlottetown.
Emile Paturel of Shediac.

War-time Cooperation with the Provinces

I should not like to conclude this portion of the review of the services given in an advisory and practical manner by existing organizations, associations and individuals without making special mention of what might be spoken of as war-time cooperation extended on the part of the provinces of Canada.

I have already indicated wherein the federal government received the closest cooperation from the provincial governments in the first national war loan campaign. As mentioned, the provincial treasurers of all the provinces served on the national war loan committee.

Also, as just mentioned, the closest cooperation has been received from the welfare departments of the provincial governments in working out arrangements for the reception in Canada of refugees and evacuated children, and as mentioned, the Department of Pensions and National Health is cooperating with the provinces in the provision of air raid precautions.

The Department of Munitions and Supply is receiving valuable assistance and cooperation from provincial departments of natural resources, mines, lands and forests, etc., in the task of mobilizing our resources of raw materials to meet war-time needs.

As in peace time, close cooperation is maintained between the federal departments and the provincial authorities in the departments of agriculture and fisheries.

In the field of health and welfare, war-time conditions have made more essential than ever the closest cooperation between federal and provincial authorities.

In peace time, the primary responsibility for public order and the administration of justice rests with the provinces. It has been recognized, however, that in time of war, a share of this responsibility must necessarily be assumed by the federal government. This has not relieved the provinces of their constitutional function but it has served to emphasize the need for the closest cooperation between the provincial police and law enforcement agencies, on the one hand, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of Justice on the other.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In these and other ways, the federal administration has been materially aided by the governments of the several provinces in the successful prosecution of Canada's war effort.

I come now to means of increasing the efficiency of the cabinet, other than those of enlisting the services of the best available persons in executive and administrative positions or in an advisory relationship to individual ministers. In other words, I come to the cabinet itself, and here I wish to speak first of the plan of war organization within the cabinet and later of cabinet responsibility and personnel.

Canada's war effort has been, from the first, and will continue to be organized and directed by the cabinet. From the outset, the work of the cabinet has been so organized as to permit of immediate and effective direction of the various activities, and at the same time to ensure their complete coordination. For the most effective conduct of that effort, the cabinet itself has been organized into appropriate committees, each charged with responsibilities in specific spheres of activity.

WAR ORGANIZATION

Cabinet Committees and Related Agencies

Prior to the war, there had been established a committee of the cabinet especially appointed to consider matters of defence.

When the war broke out, and it became necessary to view the problems of war in relation one to the other, and as a whole, in order the better to coordinate the work of the government, to prevent duplication of effort, and to promote efficiency, special committees of the cabinet were formed in relation to the several problems of major concern.

As a supervisory body in a position to view the war effort as a whole, an emergency council was appointed with an immediate relationship to the work of the several governmental committees. At the outset, this emergency council was composed of senior members of the cabinet. Amongst other duties, it took over those of the defence committee established prior to the war. As occasion has since required, its personnel has been altered or increased to include the ministers whose departments are especially concerned with the war effort. In an early reorganization, its name was changed. It has since been designated and is now known as the war committee of the cabinet. The ministers at present composing the war committee are the following:

The war committee of the cabinet gives continuous consideration to, and recommends decisions by the cabinet upon, major questions of war policy and defence.

Related to the war committee are special committees especially charged with the consideration and supervision of specific problems. They are composed of the ministers primarily concerned with related phases of war effort. The committee also assist in the coordination of activities in which more than one department is involved. Of these special committees, six are concerned with problems related to Economic Defence: War Finance and Supply, Food Production and Marketing, Wheat, Fuel and Power, Shipping and Transportation, Price Control and Labour.

In addition there are special committees which deal also with matters of:

Internal security: Legislation;

Public information:

Demobilization and reestablishment.

Related directly to the work of the cabinet committees are the activities of the boards and agencies to which I have already referred. Certain statutory bodies already existing prior to the war, and as a result of the war charged with special responsibility, have also been related directly to the functions of the special cabinet committees which I have just described.

In order to further the effective coordination of the economic and financial policy in war time, to facilitate the work of the cabinet committees in the consideration of specific problems, and to assist in avoiding duplication of effort by departments and agencies, an advisory committee on economic policy, composed of members of the public service, has been established. This committee acts in an advisory capacity to the cabinet itself.

I have in my hand a diagram which discloses at a glance the relationship to the cabinet of the war time and statutory bodies and boards to which I have referred. It also designates, by the departments over which they preside, the ministerial personnel of the several committees. With the permission of the house. I will ask that the diagram be inserted in Hansard.

May I at the same time suggest that it members who may wish to glance at this review if Hansard were permitted to print

There is, thus, at the present time, an extensive and complete organization as between the different departments of the government whereby the duties and burdens of ministers are widely distributed and shared. Also, through the war committee of the cabinet, the most immediate and special attention is given to the general problems of the

I have shown how, under the war organization of the cabinet, the burdens and duties of individual ministers have been lightened by the sharing of duties between ministers themselves and by the consideration and coordination of war activities by inter-related committees representative of different phases of war effort. It has been urged, as already mentioned, that the efficiency of the government might further be enhanced by the work of the cabinet being so arranged, and responsibilities of ministers so divided, as to free as largely as possible from other duties and responsibilities, the ministers of the crown who are concerned with those departments of government which have primarily to do with war activities, in order that their time and attention may be given as exclusively as possible to the consideration and effective execution of war policies.

As a corollary, it has also been urged that matters pertaining to war policy and the direction of the war effort should, as largely as possible, be entrusted to a war committee of the cabinet, the members of which would be free to give most, if not the whole of their time, to matters pertaining to the war, leaving to other members of the government, the administration of the departments concerned with matters of state which, in time of peace, are of great importance, but which, in time of war, are relatively less important.

From what I have already said with respect to the war committee of the cabinet, it will be seen that it has been precisely along these lines that the government has been proceeding. The need for the expansion of administrative personnel was more urgent at the outbreak of war than the need for the expansion of the cabinet. The need, however, of creating new ministries to meet wartime demands and of assigning to their administration, ministers whose time could be exclusively devoted to the supervision and encouragement of their affairs has become only too obvious. Existing ministries have accordingly been enlarged. New ministries have been established, and yet further ministries concerned exclusively with wartime activities are about to be created. To offset this expansion of wartime services. the activities of peacetime services have been materially curtailed. Their administration has been placed as completely as possible under members of the government other than those primarily concerned with war activities. Where circumstances warrant it, a single minister has been given the responsibility of administering the affairs of more than one department.

Department of National Defence

The natural place of beginning the expansion of war services was with the Department of National Defence.

The Department of National Defence was the nucleus of the war administration. Until July, 1939, the department was entrusted not only with the organization of the defence forces but also with the problem of supply. The progressive increases in our defence expenditures from 1936 made it necessary to develop additional machinery for coping with the problem of supply. As a result the defence purchasing board was set up on July 14, 1939. When war came, we had already provided the beginnings of an organization to meet the supply problem.

The actual outbreak made necessary immediate administrative expansion in four directions. The fighting forces had to be increased in numbers, they had to be provided with vast quantities of war supplies and the necessary funds had to be obtained to finance this expansion. Finally provision had to be made for internal security and economic stability on the home front.

The mobilization and recruitment of the fighting forces threw added burdens on the administrative staff of the Department of National Defence. Two acting deputy ministers, both veterans, and both prominent industrialists with wide administrative experience were immediately added to the staff. One was entrusted with the militia services, the other with the naval and air services.

Department of Munitions and Supply

At the outbreak of war, the work of the defence purchasing board was transferred to a war supply board. At the special session of parliament, the government took steps to provide for a Department of Munitions and Supply under a separate minister of the crown. That department has since come into being and grown to vast proportions. It has been under a minister who, until to-day, had also been administering the affairs of the Department of Transport. The maintenance for a time of the association between the two departments made possible a needed rearrangement of some of their activities and the effecting of economies which would not otherwise have been possible.

The former Minister of Transport who also for some time past has been the Minister of Munitions and Supply will hereafter give his entire time to the work of the latter department. There has been transferred to the Department of Munitions and Supply, as being closely related to war activities, the branches of the Department of Transport concerned with the Trans-Canada Airways, civil aviation, and national radio broadcasting. The new Department of Munitions and Supply is the first new ministry which has been created since the outbreak of war.

Department of National Defence for Air.

The second new ministry is well known. It is the Department of National Defence for Air. Before the separate department was created, the Department of National Defence had been strengthened by the addition of an Acting Deputy Minister for Air to relieve the burden of the two Acting Deputy Ministers already mentioned.

The magnitude and importance of the commonwealth air training plan is well known. The development of this plan, in addition to the developments which were immediately related to our own air forces, made necessary the creation of a separate portfolio for Air. The wisdom of the course followed in creating the new Ministry of National Defence for Air has, I think, been fully demonstrated.

Department of National Defence for Naval Services

With the changed conditions in Europe, the increased importance of the navy, not only in the defence of our own coasts and harbours, but in cooperation with the naval forces of the United Kingdom and other parts of the British empire has become generally appreciated. As is now pretty generally known, the port of Halifax has, since the beginning of war, become a naval base second only in importance to the most important bases in the British Isles. In these circumstances, the government has deemed it advisable to add to the existing defence departments that of a separate Department of National Defence for Naval Services. A bill to establish the new ministry will be introduced immediately. What therefore, was originally a single Department of National Defence will hereafter be three departments, each presided over by a separate minister of the crown, all however, cooperating in closest relationship with each other.

Department of National War Services.

I informed the house some days ago that the government had decided to establish a Department of National War Services. I indicated at that time that the purposes of the new department would include the coordination of the activities of voluntary war organizations and services, but what was even more important, that it would be entrusted with the duty of mobilizing and guiding the activities of thousands of our citizens who are seeking practical and useful outlets for their enthusiasm and patriotism, and who are already banded together in patriotic organizations, veterans organizations, women's organizations, and a host of other groups who are eager to serve.

The minister charged with the responsibility for the new department will be expected immediately to establish a nationwide organization for voluntary service to be assisted by local committees in all parts of the country.

With developments in Europe, problems such as those of refugees, evacuated children, interned aliens and interned enemy prisoners have assumed proportions which require for their solution more and more in the way of cooperative effort on the part of Canada. Problems of internal security have arisen which have demanded increased governmental action and voluntary cooperation. The government has required additional powers for the mobilization of human and material resources. These powers in turn necessitate a nation-wide registration which will permit of the most effective use being made of individual personal services and material resources.

The functions of the new department are not limited to the coordination and development of voluntary services. The direction and supervision of the national registration will be among the duties of the new ministry. In this connection, I should like to repeat that the government intends to make the fullest use, through the new department, of the register of women already prepared by the national committee for the voluntary registration of Canadian women. I might add that a good part of the preliminary work of organization in connection with the national registration has already been completed by a special inter-departmental committee, under the chairmanship of the Dominion Statistician, which committee was established immediately after the announcement of the government's intention to undertake the registration of manpower.

The powers of the new department will also include the co-ordination of existing governmental information and publicity services connected with the war, in order to insure that Canadians generally may be more completely informed of all aspects of our war effort, with a view to enlisting the maximum understanding and support of the great cause in which we are engaged. Speaking generally, the new department will have the function, as I have already said, of helping Canadians to help Canada in the effective prosecution of the national effort.

The all but complete cessation of new public works, other than those necessitated by the war, has led to a marked decrease of the work of the Department of Public Works.

With the transfer to the Department of Munitions and Supply of those branches of the Department of Transport concerned with airways, civil aviation, and radio broadcasting, the services of the Department of Transport will be also considerably reduced. It is proposed, therefore, to entrust to one minister instead of two, the administration of the Department of Public Works and the administration of the Department of Transport.

It will be observed that the undertaking to bring to the aid of the ministry a still larger number of men of outstanding ability and experience was not an undertaking specifically with reference to the cabinet, though it did not exclude changes or enlargement of the ministry itself.

It is perhaps not sufficiently realized that the functions of cabinet ministers, though very responsible, are necessarily limited. They must determine policy, make final decisions and accept responsibility, each individually for his own department, and all collectively for the administration generally.

The actual work of administration is, however, carried on by the officials in the public service. I have already shown that in making the extensive additions to the administrative service which have been required by wartime needs, the government has adopted the single criterion of ability. No political, partisan or personal considerations have diverted us from getting the most suitable man available for the particular job required to be done.

The filling of cabinet posts is a more complicated task that the filling of administrative posts. Ability to direct the work of the government departments concerned is, of course, an important requisite. It is, however, far from being the only one. A cabinet minister must also be prepared to assume his full share of responsibility for all acts of government, and for explaining the policies of the government to parliament and to the country. He must, of course, be a member of parliament. If he is not in parliament when he is called to the cabinet he must find a constituency and be elected in it. Above all he must have a capacity to work in immediate association with other ministers in the cabinet in the formulation of policy. Nothing would paralyze government more quickly than divided counsels or dissension within the ministry.

That does not mean that narrow party considerations or, as some impatient critics are too eager to suggest, the dictates of "party politics" or of personal whim, govern the choice of ministers, particularly in war time. But it does mean that different qualities are required for effective work as a cabinet minister from those required in an administrative or executive post. It is a common experience to find that a business man is willing to make very great personal sacrifice in order to serve his country in an administrative capacity, but is exceedingly reluctant to enter the cabinet because a ministerial post involves election to parliament, public speaking and other activities for which he feels he has neither aptitude nor training.

Furthermore, the acceptance of a cabinet post involves a more complete severance of business and professional ties than is necessary in undertaking temporary administrative or advisory appointments. There is no business of any magnitude or importance in this country to which the war has not brought particular problems of its own. Highly placed executives may be spared by such concerns either in an executive or advisory capacity, for whole or part-time, without the risks attendant upon a complete severance of business relations such as would be involved in their entering the ministry.

If I ever had any doubt on this score, it has been removed by some of the steps I have recently taken in seeking to increase confidence in the disinterested motives of the ministry by bringing into the cabinet one or more persons whose inclusion would, I felt, have demonstrated the readiness of the government to meet, if that were possible, the wishes of members of political parties to have the basis of representation in the cabinet widened by the inclusion in the cabinet of persons known to command their confidence. It is an open secret that I have directly and indirectly offered to take into the ministry outstanding persons, none of whom are at present in public life, but whose presence in the ministry would, I believe, have made wholly apparent the readiness of my colleagues and myself to associate with ourselves in the work of the ministry persons whose appointment could in no sense be regarded as made from any party political motive, but only on the ground of the outstanding qualities the persons appointed were known to possess. Were I at liberty to give their names, I am sure that honourable members in all parts of the house would consider them among persons highly qualified to inspire confidence in the non-partisan character of the government's war effort.

I have found that those I approached felt that such special services as they could render could be given more effectively, either in administrative posts or in an advisory capacity or by their continuing to occupy an eminent and independent position in the community. The prevalence of this attitude was not the least of the reasons which led me to abandon the attempt to add to the cabinet from outside the ranks of those without previous experience of public life.

It is sometimes forgotten that the intimacy and prominence of the associations enjoyed with large enterprises are not infrequently a barrier rather than a passport to membership in a cabinet. The same consideration does not so generally apply where the services to be rendered are not concerned with the determining of policy but with its execution.

I have come to the conclusion that, for the present at least, the most effective use can be made of the services of men without previous experience of public life by bringing them into association with the ministry in an administrative or advisory capacity rather than by their inclusion in the ministry itself.

Advisory Committee to the Cabinet Considered

From like motives, I have also given consideration to the appointment of an advisory committee to the war committee of the cabinet which would include a limited number of persons chosen because of their prominence in representative fields of activity. To this proposal there are a number of objections, which, everything considered, appear to me to rob such a step of the advantages it might at first sight appear to possess.

In the first place, no matter what the political affiliations of members of such an advisory committee might be, the mere fact that they had been appointed by the government and had not sought or obtained any mark of public confidence from any section of the electorate, would tend to lessen their representative capacity in the eyes of the public.

They themselves might naturally feel that their power was not equal to the responsibility which they might be held to be assuming. Indeed, the objection on this score has been raised on the part of more than one with whom I have discussed the proposal.

The need for such a committee is itself more apparent than real, once it is realized that it is always possible for the government to obtain the benefit of the advice of those best qualified to counsel in particular matters, apart altogether from any membership in an advisory body.

Business men and professional men of wide experience and high standing can always be consulted and are in fact continually being consulted by the government whether they are members of an administrative branch of government or not.

Associate Members of War Committee

Realizing the importance of increasing public confidence through bringing to the aid of the ministry all points of view and opinions, I have considered yet another means by which this end might possibly be attained. I have thought of inviting leading members of the opposition to become associate members of the war committee of the cabinet, to share its deliberations and to assist in the formation of its proposals to the cabinet. Regardless of what course may be adopted, the government itself must, in the last analysis, take the responsibility for whatever is done or left undone. That responsibility cannot be escaped or evaded. It is difficult even to share it. It would not be my idea, in case members of the opposition became associate members of the war committee of the cabinet, for the government by that means to seek in any way to evade full and final responsibility for Canada's war effort.

But the presence in an advisory and associate capacity of members of the opposition would have a number of advantages. While their addition to the war cabinet would leave unimpaired the requirements of responsible government, it would mean that the government's policies were being shaped and made effective not only under the open gaze of members of the opposition, but with the assistance of their counsel, experience and advice. It would mean that in all major matters of defence, internal security, international cooperation, the leading members of the opposition, chosen to act in association with members of the war cabinet, would be fully informed.

At the present time, one of the great difficulties of government lies in the fact that many matters of which the government has knowledge, many steps which the government takes, many actions which the government plans, are, in the very nature of things, highly confidential, and must remain so for varying periods of time. This obstacle would, in part at least, be overcome by the proposed associate membership of opposition leaders in the war committee of the cabinet, where, to its members, their experience, advice and point of view would certainly be of value. I believe that such a step would be of real assistance to the government in the discharge of its great responsibilities. I am therefore prepared to invite the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who shares his desk, and was a former Minister of National Defence, to become associate members of the war committee of the cabinet. Were the invitation accepted, it would be my wish that they should be present at all meetings of the war committee and take part in all its proceedings. I am prepared, also, if this invitation is accepted by my hon. friends opposite, and if it is agreeable to other political groups in the house, to consider the extension of the invitation also to their leaders.

If the house and the gentlemen whom I have invited look upon the proposal with favour, it would mean that the country would have the benefit of their wisdom, advice and experience, the government would retain the responsibility for the direction of Canada's war effort, with which it has been charged. It would also be understood that members of the various opposition groups in this house would continue to be free to criticize the administration as they think fit, and to vote and act with complete independence.

Conferences with the Opposition

If the hon, gentlemen opposite should feel that they were unable to accept the invitation I have just extended, believing that thereby they would be accepting a share of responsibility without being accorded an equivalent share of power, I am prepared to make yet another proposal, the acceptance of which, I should hope, would not occasion the slightest embarrassment and which I feel would be essentially helpful at this time.

As I have already said, much of the action of the government and even more of the information on which its actions are based must, for military reasons, remain secret.

This consideration hampers the government in the discussion of its policies and action in parliament and before the people.

We recognize that it is an even more serious embarrassment to those in opposition in war time. Their lack of knowledge makes effective criticism difficult; it has also a tendency to breed misgivings which need not exist if the facts could be made available.

I believe that this situation could be remedied at least in part while parliament is in session by regular weekly conferences between the war committee and the members of the opposition and by similar conferences held at intervals when parliament is not in session.

At such conferences the government will be prepared to disclose, in confidence, full and detailed information both as to its actions and the considerations on which those actions are based. The effectiveness of the opposition, far from being impaired, will be greatly increased by the knowledge gained by their leaders by such conferences. Members of the opposition, as regards their rights of criticism, will have, as they have now, only the limits imposed by their personal sense of responsibility as citizens and members of parliament. From the standpoint of the public interest conferences of this kind would certainly have the merit of increasing confidence in Canada's war effort and thereby help to prevent the development of uneasiness which provides such a fertile ground for subtle enemy propaganda aimed at destroying the unity of that effort.

Let me now conclude with a word in reference to cabinet reconstruction. The acceptance, on Friday last, by Colonel J. L. Ralston of the portfolio of national defence was followed by Colonel Ralston's resignation as Minister of Finance. I am pleased to announce that the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who, until to-day, was filling the office of Minister of National Revenue, has been appointed as Colonel Ralston's successor as Minister of Finance.

As hon, members are well aware, Mr. Ilsley, during recent years, whenever occasion required, has been the acting Minister of Finance. During the period of the illness of the former Minister of Finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning, and during Mr. Dunning's absence abroad, Mr. Ilsley ably presided over the affairs of the finance department. He is wholly familiar with its several activities; his ability as administrator in the years that he has been a member of the present cabinet has gained for him an enviable reputation in all parts of Canada. It is not a surprise, therefore, that public opinion generally, as reflected through the medium of the press, seemed to take it for granted, when it became known that Colonel Ralston had agreed to leave the Department of Finance for that of national defence, that Mr. Ilsley would be the logical successor.

Mr. Ilsley was sworn to his new office at noon to-day. In order that he may give his undivided attention, at this time of war, to the work of the Department of Finance, Mr. Ilsley has resigned as Minister of National Revenue.

Hon. members are aware that, in addition to his duties as Minister of Transport, the Hon. C. D. Howe has, since April 9, been at the head of the new Department of Munitions and Supply. Mr. Howe has to-day given up the portfolio of the Minister of Transport in order that, from now on, he may devote his entire time to the work of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I have referred to the contraction in the work of the Department of Public Works occasioned by the government's policy to restrict as largely as possible, during the period of the war, the construction of public works. I have also referred to the transfer of certain services from the Department of Transport to the Department of Munitions and Supply. As the services of each of these departments has been somewhat curtailed, it has been felt that the administration of both departments could be entrusted to the one minister. Accordingly Hon. P. J. A. Cardin, who is Minister of Public Works, has to-day been appointed Minister of Transport.

I am pleased to be able to announce that my colleague the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, the present Minister of Agriculture, has agreed, once the act creating the new Department of National War Services has been passed, to undertake the organization of that new and important department of government. I need not say anything of Mr. Gardiner's special qualifications for such a task. His long experience in public life, his exceptional organizing ablities, his power as administrator so effectively disclosed in the years of his premiership of the province of Saskatchewan, and as a federal minister, are all guarantees that the purpose of the new department will be promoted with zeal, energy and skill, and the department made one of the most effective instruments in a nation-wide furtherance of the war effort of our country.

Mr. Gardiner will become, when he assumes the office of Minister of National War Services, a member of the war committee of the cabinet. That his undivided energies and time may be given to the work of the new department, he will shortly vacate his present position as Minister of Agriculture.

I am particularly pleased to be able to announce that I have obtained from the Premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. Angus Macdonald, the promise of his willingness to resign the premiership of the province of Nova Scotia, a position which he has held with such honour and distinction alike to his native province and to himself, and to accept. immediately upon the establishment of the new department, the portfolio of Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. In thus responding to my request to assist my colleagues and myself in the prosecution of Canada's war effort, Mr. Macdonald is giving to our country another example of devotion to public duty, and of a willingness to serve, which in the public mind are already associated with his name. In addition to bringing to his new post his proven administrative ability, Mr. Macdonald has had an experience of military affairs gained as an officer in the last war. Such experience as will come with him to the council table will serve to strengthen not only his own, but all branches of the defence services.

It will be recalled that when Mr. Power accepted the portfolio of Minister of National Defence for Air, in order that he might give his entire time to the work of the Department of Defence, he resigned the position of Postmaster General, the affairs of which department have since been administered, as acting minister, by Mr. Ilsley. It is felt that the vacancy created in the office of Postmaster General by Mr. Power's resignation should now be filled.

I need not say to honourable members of the house and particularly to those who are numbered among my own supporters, that I have had few more difficult tasks than that of deciding to which of their number I should entrust the administration of the Post Office Department, and the administration of the Department of National Revenue.

The resignation, at the time of his appointment to the Senate, of the Hon, W. D. Euler as Minister of Trade and Commerce—a portfolio subsequently filled by the appointment to that position of the Hon. J. A. MacKinnon, as a Minister from Alberta-and the tragic death of the Hon. Norman Rogers, have deprived the province of Ontario of half of its representation in the government. would, I am sure, be generally expected that, in the filling of existing vacancies, this representation of Ontario in the federal cabinet should be restored. At all events, my colleagues and I have so viewed the matter. That, however, has been the least of the difficulties. A much more perplexing problem has been that of making a choice from among the many honourable members from the province of Ontario who possess qualifications and claims for cabinet recognition. I have felt that, at this time of war, the citizens of Canada generally and in particular those of the province of Ontario would, other things being equal, welcome the appointment of members of this house who had seen active service in the last war, and who, on these as well as on other grounds, might be expected to bring valuable experience to the ministry in this most critical of all times.

Recommendations have accordingly been made to His Excellency the Governor General to-day, which his excellency has been pleased to approve, of the appointment of Colonel William Pate Mulock, of the city of Toronto, member for York North, as Postmaster General, and Colonel Colin Gibson, of the city of Hamilton, member for Hamilton West, as Minister of National Revenue.

I have given the house in considerable detail particulars of the manner in which the administrative functions of government have been extended and improved by attaching to the public service a large number of outstanding Canadians from all fields of industrial, financial and other endeavour. Each and every one has been chosen because it was considered that he was best able to advance the war effort of this country by specialized knowledge, and service based upon specialized education and experience.

I have offered to gentlemen opposite, in the only manner I have felt consistent with responsible government, an opportunity to share in our deliberations. By that invitation I have asked them also to give to the government the benefit of their wisdom and their experience. I have not asked them to share in our ultimate responsibilities because that would not be fair either to them or to the electors of this country.

I hope that my honourable friends will find themselves able to accept one or other of the proposals I have made. Whatever may be their decision I believe that I can at least make this claim on behalf of my colleagues and myself. We have not flinched from our primary and ultimate responsibility. We have not trimmed our sails to the breezes of popular favour or disfavour. While we have recognized our responsibility for policy, we have sought to obtain the best advice available in the country to assist us in its formation and pronouncement.

I leave this recital of facts with confidence to this house and the people of Canada. It tells its own story. It is the brief record of a government which, at a time of great peril in the affairs of the world, has done everything in its power to meet its responsibilities, to strengthen its administration, to mobilize the brain-power and resources of this country—in short, to do its plain duty, fully, honourably and fearlessly.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): We have listened this afternoon with the very closest attention to the extraordinary efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to bolster up in the minds of the people of Canada the shattered fortunes of his government. There are one or two personal matters to which I should like to allude at the very beginning. Towards the end of his speech the Prime Minister advocated the inclusion of certain gentlemen, myself and my colleague the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who sits to my left, and possibly the leaders of other parties in this house, in a consultative capacity, as I understood it, in a war committee of the cabinet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Associate members.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Associate members. I may say to the house and the country that a week ago on Friday the Prime Minister, in the course of a private conversation, made some such suggestion to me. At that time I was just about to leave for my home and the matter was not more than touched upon. I had time only, with his permission, to intimate the subject matter of the proposal to my colleague, and there the matter has rested ever since, because I have been waiting for the Prime Minister to clarify the position if he wished to proceed with it. But until this afternoon I had heard nothing from him. I am just a little bit surprised that without any notice to me or to my colleague, the Prime Minister has publicly referred to the matter, which I consider to be of very great importance. I can only say to him at this time that such an offer as he suggested a week ago Friday, and more specifically stated, if I gathered aright what he said, this afternoon, is not one that I at least would lightly refuse at this critical time in Canada's history. Neither is it one that I think I ought to accept without the gravest reflection, because ever since I came to Ottawa to attend this session of parliament I have been seized with the gravity of the situation in Canada as affecting our war effort, particularly our effort to aid our mother country and to aid in the defence of Canada. I have never refused on any occasion, so far as I can recall, to cooperate with the government in the furtherance of their war effort, and I do not intend to begin now.

The house and the country will of course not expect me to deal at any considerable length with all the topics that the Prime Minister has referred to this afternoon. As I intimated at the opening, his statement strikes me as a valiant attempt on his part to stem the tide of adverse public opinion in the country against his government. Let there be no mistake about it; the fortunes of this government are badly shattered. Public opinion at the moment is running strongly against this government, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that public opinion in Canada has been looking for something far more than he has offered this afternoon. The statement he made, comprising upwards of 40 pages, was filled up with a recital of the various boards and administrative committees that the government has set up since the war opened, or at least since active participation in the war began. Hundreds of names have been put upon the record. They are the names of devoted Canadian citizens, many of them known to me personally, many of them well qualified to assist the government in this war effort. These men are acting and will act in an effort to aid this government to carry out Canada's duty in the premises as we know them. There is no doubt about their desire to assist, and with respect to many of them there is no doubt about their ability to do so. But that is not what the country has been looking for. I venture to assert that two-thirds of the Prime Minister's speech is just padding and nothing more. The only thing he omitted was to name the messengers and stenographers and office boys—and the new Minister of Agriculture.

However, let that be as it may. The Prime Minister did at the latter part of his speech refer to another important matter, and I am going to deal with it in a moment. But on the way let me tell the Prime Minister and the house what my reaction is to his statement. It is suggested by the English translation of a phrase from Horace's Ars Poetica: "The mountains are in labour, and a ridiculous mouse has been born."

That is my first reaction to the general scheme of things that the Prime Minister has suggested. As he has said, it is no secret that for weeks, at least since the middle of Junc, the Prime Minister has been endeavouring to bring into his cabinet men of national calibre and of the Conservative faith. I have known of these efforts, and I say to him and to the country that never at any time, by word or deed or letter or anything else, have I tried to put any obstacle in the way of his bringing these men in. So far as I can recall I communicated directly with only one of them, and he was not a Conservative. I merely asked him if he was going in, and he intimated that he had been invited but that he was not going in, and he gave his reasons. Some of these men are men of national prominence; some are not so prominent. But they would not go in because the Prime Minister made it impossible for them to go in.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister made it impossible. When? On the evening of Thursday, June 20 last, when I was referring to the question of national service, the strengthening of the cabinet and the establishing of a national government. The Prime Minister made a speech in reply which I think upon mature reflection he will regret the rest of his life. It is comparable in my opinion to the "five-cent" speech which he made just prior to the 1930 election, and which had such a damaging effect upon his fortunes when he went to the country that year. The statement which the Prime Minister made on the occasion to which I refer meant only one thing, namely that despite the fact that Canada is at war, despite the emergency now confronting this country, the Prime Minister is still thinking in terms of party power, his own personal position and the stability of his personal leadership.

On that occasion to my utter surprise the right hon, gentleman laid down two conditions which he said would govern future cabinet reorganization and leadership—and I may interject that to-day he has shown himself true to that statement. He said, referring to myself:

I hope he will not ask me as the leader of the administration to accept as a colleague any of those in the front benches before me who have said that they thought I was quite unqualified to be the leader of a government at the present time.

Of course that was said in a moment of personal pique. The second declaration of principle was this—and I want to direct particular attention to it, because it is a statement of a new principle in constitutional government in Canada. He said:

When I take into the administration additional gentlemen in order to strengthen it, one of the first qualifications which I shall require of them, as of anyone else, is loyalty to myself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; hon. gentlemen may applaud that statement of principle, but I suggest to them that that is not the true principle upon which the safety of the state should be based at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my honfriend suggest that a prime minister should take into his cabinet someone who is known to be personally disloyal to him?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the Prime Minister will just possess himself in patience and hear my argument I am sure in his heart he will agree with it.

—and not a disposition to stab the leader of the party in his breast when he is trying to serve his country to the best of his ability at a time of war.

That is a statement which I think the Prime Minister will regret—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, never.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and which his biographer, when the time comes to write that monumental work, will have a great deal of difficulty in explaining. In my humble opinion in making that statement the Prime Minister immediately made any union government, any government including members of other parties or any national government, impossible under him.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite but it will not be satisfactory to the people of Canada. May I suggest to the house and to the country that under similar circumstances Mr. Neville Chamberlain never would have invited Mr. Winston Churchill into his government; and if that principle had prevailed when Mr. Chamberlain resigned and Mr. Churchill became Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, certainly he never would have invited Mr. Attlee and the leaders of the labour party in England to become members of his government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that they never would have gone in, if they had not believed they could be loyal to the leader of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the right hon. gentleman will just possess himself in patience and hear me out I think I may be able to lay down what I believe to be the correct principle that should guide him, but which evidently has not guided him. I suggest to the Prime Minister, to the house and to the people of Canada—because I hope I am speaking to the great mass of the public of Canada to-day—that the proper course for any prime minister to pursue in seeking to strengthen his cabinet is to invite into it the men who are best able to serve their country.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what he has done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be so, but you will allow me to have my views about it. I do not want to say anything harsh about anybody but I suggest as the first consideration that he should invite into the cabinet the men best able to serve the state. Once they have joined the ministry the usual rule of cabinet solidarity must prevail. Ministers thus brought in would have full opportunity at the council table to work out policies in conjunction with other members of the government; and, mark you, they must abide by the decision of the cabinet, of course after proper consideration and reflection. They are bound to the cabinet, not to the Prime Minister. That is the thesis I want to lay down to-day, that their duty and service is to the country, not to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Prime Minister not a member of the cabinet?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my right hon. friend will just possess himself in patience no doubt there will be other opportunities for him to reply. Just at the moment I have the floor, and I intend to keep it.

I suggest that if gentlemen brought into the cabinet refuse to follow that course of action and are not loyal to the principle of cabinet solidarity, which means loyalty to the Prime Minister, then they must depart. If you want an example in history let us go back to 1901 or 1902, when Mr. Tarte was forced to resign from the government because, forsooth, he went out and preached a policy of protection in the absence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I could think of other instances in which that same principle and rule prevailed.

So much for the one part of this thesis. The second condition imposed by my right hon. friend, which I have quoted, that of personal loyalty to himself and to his own personal leadership, came to me at least, as I think it must have come to all students of parliamentary government in Canada, as a severe shock. It can be interpreted only as meaning that the Prime Minister is placing his own political safety above the safety of the state.

Some hon, MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my interpretation of the Prime Minister's position; you may have your own interpretation, but I have stated my view in parliamentary language as I have the right to do. The right hon. gentleman's statement further assumes that men would join his government in order to lead a palace revolution, without any intention of being loyal to the government of which they were to become members. No gentleman would undertake to do a thing like that. No one who was even suspect would be invited to join a government under those circumstances, so I suggest that is merely a figment of the Prime Minister's imagination. This declaration further means, if it means anything, that any person entering the cabinet under the Prime Minister not only must pledge himself to support the right hon. gentleman personally and to support the political party of which he is the leader, but he must do so regardless of the character of the war leadership given by the Prime Minister. That is what this country wants above everything else, and you cannot give it by a mere shuffling of the cards such as we got to-day. It is my opinion, and I think the mature opinion of all students of public affairs in Canada, that these two statements can have no other effect but to advance materially the date of the Prime Minister's retirement.

I have but little more to say, Mr. Speaker. I had not intended to discuss the names that have been brought forward, but perhaps I should make some reference to them. I have termed the Prime Minister's action a reshuffling of the deck, but I am glad to say there is one notable exception. I believe the premier of Nova Scotia is a cultured gentleman, belonging to that class in the community which for a long time the Prime Minister has been wont to cultivate, the college professor. I have no quarrel at all with that class. If I were beginning de novo to form a government I am not at all sure that I would include one of these gentlemen in my cabinet, but Mr. Macdonald, whom I know very slightly indeed, has proved himself to be a gentleman, as I have said, and he will be a welcome addition to this chamber. He has had no experience in connection with naval affairs, but I have no doubt he will master that subject thoroughly. One thing I can tell the house and the country, as one maritimer speaking of another, is that he will make a splendid appeal to the patriotism of people of Canada. I am sure no one will ever question the solid Celtic character of the premier of Nova Scotia at any time. I do not know that I could pay him a finer compliment. We must wait and see what his performance will

With respect to the other changes in the government I think I should mention the transfer of the Minister of Agriculture to the portfolio of war services. If I am correctly informed, during the election campaign or at some time anterior to the summoning of this session of parliament, the hon. gentleman laid down the principle of a middle of the road contribution in connection with our war effort.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, without referring to me by name the leader of the opposition made a similar reference during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That reference is not in accordance with the facts. Anyone who knows me knows that I am not a half-way man on anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then may I put it in this way, that if the Minister of Agriculture made that declaration with regard to a half-way policy, as reported in the press, I hope the trend of events and the force of circumstances—

Mr. GOLDING: Don't forget-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member from the brushwood country please keep quiet for a little while? I hope the Minister of Agriculture, in his new portfolio, will forget that he ever said that, if he did say it—and if he says he did not say it, of course I accept his word. I hope that as a minister of war services we shall have from him all the energy of which I believe he is capable in aiding and assisting Canada in her war effort. I shall be glad to help him whenever possible.

Mr. BROOKS: Directed in the proper channels.

Mr. GOLDING: Don't forget that he had four brothers put out of action in the last war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish the hon. member from the brushwood country would keep quiet.

I have not very much more to say, because I could not begin to cover all the topics to which the Prime Minister has referred this afternoon. But in my opinion in failing to bring in any new blood of a real national character, aside from the one notable exception to which I have alluded, the Prime Minister has demonstrated the mistake which he made during the late election campaign. If I read his speeches rightly he then announced that the cabinet held all the available talent, and that any suggestion that better brains could be found elsewhere was ridiculous. That is the effect of the Prime Minister's campaign speeches. Of course it was a great exaggeration.

An hon. MEMBER: It worked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the justification offered by hon. members opposite. Nothing succeeds like success, whether it is based upon principle or not. Well, I disagree entirely with that point of view.

Unfortunately when faced with the greatest opportunity ever given a Canadian statesman the Prime Minister has permitted, in my judgment, too close a devotion to a narrow party spirit to lead him to neglect my wellintentioned suggestions for the creation of a truly national government, and in effect has announced to-day that he will continue to place loyalty to a party name in too prominent a place in his decision. That is the effect of to-day's announcement. Whether or not it has been brought about by force majeure I do not know. I believe he did make an attempt to bring gentlemen in from outside, and failed to do so. He failed for the reasons I have indicated. They felt that if they came into this government they would have to take the classification of Liberals, and they were not going to do that in a time of national peril for Canada. Why should they?

It is with the greatest regret that I have learned of the Prime Minister's unalterable determination to continue a partisan government. Neither my colleagues nor myself have any personal ambitions to share the responsibilities, or, shall I say, the temptations of power at this time. We might possibly have accepted a call to duty from the Prime Minister. At least we would have given it our most serious consideration—although in my own case I would have had to give it the most careful consideration—on account of personal, not public reasons. But I want to make it clear to the house that my suggestion for a national government assumed a wider basis even than the inclusion of the Conservative party, which still commands the support of nearly half the people in Canada. Perhaps to-day, nearly four months after the election, it commands an even greater proportion of the support of the people of Canada.

The Prime Minister, however, has made his decision. We shall accept it with regret, and we shall continue a course of cooperation with the government, tempered by constructive criticism, and urging the Prime Minister to speed up the war activities of Canada. I am now offering a renewed pledge of willingness to cooperate for the national good.

Not only will the Prime Minister's decision to continue party politics not affect our readiness to cooperate in expediting war measures, but when, as will soon be the case, the Prime Minister finds himself forced by the pressure of public opinion, and probably by the advice of the saner members of his own party, to admit his failure at cabinet repairing, and undertakes a real cabinet rebuilding, then we shall be, as we are now, ready to assist him to undo his present mistake.

One further word, and I shall have finished. What this country needs, what it has needed since we declared war, and what it has needed increasingly since war was declared, is leadership—leadership of the highest character; leadership which has not been in evidence since September; leadership which cannot be given under the party system; leadership which for the safety of the state may and undoubtedly will shatter party organization and be disregardful of party shibboleths: leadership which will be national and in the highest degree constructive. Nothing short of that will do, in my humble opinion. It cannot be given by the Prime Minister under the party system, when even the safety of the state may be sacrificed to party expediency.

Well, supported as he is by a huge majority in the chamber-

An hon. MEMBER: And in the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I deny that. If the hon. member does not believe me, just let him read his own party press, at times. That is the best answer I can give him. This leadership will come, I am sure. The trend of tragic events may force it sooner than we think. Only a government representative of all the people should lead this nation in war time.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking for us also!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the Prime Minister will not do these things, then the voice of the nation will demand another prime minister who will disregard party and his own personal prestige and save this country from disaster. I calmly await the verdict of time and events.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STIRLING: A question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: There is nothing before the house. This is not a free-for-all for members. Is there anything before the house? If there is nothing I will ask the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) to sit down. I have raised a point of order. Will you please tell him to sit down, and then decide if there is anything before the house?

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon, member has said, there is nothing before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a question of privilege on the part of the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. SPEAKER: A statement was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and, as is the custom, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Hanson) was permitted the right to reply. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has been referred to by name, and I think he now has a right to speak. I will point out however that I do not propose that this should be a free subject of discussion from all parts of the house. I noticed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) rose to speak, and I should think he would be entitled to do so; on the other hand I do not believe all hon. members would have that right.

Mr. STIRLING: It was for that very reason, Mr. Speaker, that I rose to speak to a question of privilege. I had not had time to make the observation before the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) rose.

Under circumstances which appear to me most extraordinary the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made allusions to me. He had made no reference to me before. It is true, as my leader remarked, that on the eve of his leaving Ottawa for a few days something of the sort was mentioned; but never did it occur to me for a minute that I should find myself in the position of receiving what is virtually an invitation from the government to become some sort of partial colleague of it under these circumstances. At the moment I have not before me the words which the Prime Minister used, and it would be extremely unwise for me to go any further into the matter to-day. I must read what the Prime Minister said, and further I must look to the right hon. gentleman to give a full and ample explanation of just what it is he has in mind in laying an invitation of this kind before my leader and myself. If he will be good enough to elaborate his suggestion we shall then be able to give it the consideration it merits.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. It was the very first intimation I had received of his suggestions—the alternatives of associate membership in the war committee of the cabinet, or regular weekly conferences to bring about a better understanding of Canada's war effort. The invitation to this group contained in the Prime Minister's statement was, as I understood it, conditional upon acceptance of the same invitation by the hon, leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). Therefore my answer must in some degree depend upon their decision, but also, and more important, upon the decision of the members who are associated with me here. We are essentially a democratic organization, and any course of action which might be taken by myself either as acting leader of the group or by our leader should he be able to return to the house, would depend upon the decision of the membership of our organization here. But there are one or two things I should like to say now.

We believe that to bring the war to a successful conclusion will involve more than we are doing at present. I should like to see the people of Canada enthusiastically behind a determined effort to defeat fascism in every form in our own country and throughout the world.

Mr. MARTIN: They are; there is no question about that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yesterday I listened to interesting and important speeches over the radio. One of them was from Great Britain. I listened to a rebroadcast of Mr. J. B. Priestley's address from England last night over our Canadian system. In his speech he confessed that one of the chief difficulties that face the British people at the present time in marshalling the great national effort that will be required to bring victory, is that the Chamberlain government had not sufficiently informed the people of Great Britain of their intentions when this war ends-not as to the making of peace, but in giving the people of Great Britain improved conditions for which they might fight enthusiastically.

Mr. Watson Thompson, of the university of Alberta, speaking earlier in the day, expressed much the same thought with respect to our own Dominion of Canada. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, any committee assisting the government in the conduct of the war in an advisory capacity ought to consider also ways and means of placing before our people the manner in which we may expect to see the grave defects in our economic structure remedied when this war ends. And that should begin at once.

I listened with attention to the long list of distinguished persons to whom the Prime Minister referred as members of various war boards and committees. As I listened I thought of the new act to mobilize industry and man-power for our war effort, and I thought there was danger that the question before us might be, not that of the government mobilizing industry, but that of industry controlling the government when the war ends. I did not hear the names of many men on the committees representing the workers' point of view, and I heard fewer representing the farmers' viewpoint. Even on the bacon board I noticed several names connected with Canada Packers and other packing organizations. I want to impress upon the Prime Minister, and I am not saying this in any spirit of carping criticism, that in my opinion the winning of the war will require the combined effort of all our people; the only way in which we can get that combined effort is to give our people confidence in the kind of leadership that we are getting behind all these boards and committees, and we must see to it that the consumer, the working man and the farmer, are adequately and properly represented. As I listened I thought that the war boards and committees savoured too much of big business to satisfy the masses of the Canadian people.

One other thing. I agree with the Prime Minister that steps should be taken to the end that in all parts of this house we may be better informed on our war effort, on our defences, and as to the grave situations that may confront us in the future. The Prime Minister, as we have said before, will find this group critical, as we have always been, of the leadership that was given up to the outbreak of the war and until recently. We were glad to see the change of government in Great Britain because we felt that the Conservative member who rose in the House of Commons and said to Mr. Chamberlain, "In God's name, go", was speaking for a large number of English-speaking people throughout the world.

An hon. MEMBER: It was Lloyd George who said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it was Right Hon. L. S. Amery. I would say to the Prime Minister this afternoon that we must marshal our people in a great effort, and in order to do that our people must be properly informed. Little incidents sometimes weaken confidence. Yesterday afternoon I listened to the glorious music over the Columbia chain, and in the middle the concert was interrupted with the announcement "Flash! A bulletin from the navy department at Washington." Canadian radio connections were immediately cut and a few bars of unrelated music intervened. In a few moments the Canadian announcer said, "We will now resume the programme which was interrupted". The flash I knew was simply that the American destroyer which had been reported torpedoed earlier was safe. But that kind of thing makes our people feel that they are being kept in the dark, just as France was kept in the dark with the results that we have seen in the last few weeks.

I assure the Prime Minister that when we know the decision of the leader of the opposition and the member for Yale the group with which I am associated will consider his invitation very carefully and give the decision which we consider to be in the best interests of the country at this time.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the offer which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made should be, and must be, one of great importance to the country. In the light of that fact it is somewhat surprising that we have not heard anything about it before. To me it comes like a bolt from the blue.

The proposal requires careful consideration. From the words of the Prime Minister I gather that there is no certainty as to the significance of the offer. It is impossible for me to form anything like an accurate picture of its implications or of what responsibility or opportunity for service is involved should we accept. We shall have to know something with regard to the details before I will be in a position to make any statement whatsoever. It has been a guiding motto of mine for a good many years that I neither seek nor shirk responsibility. I think I will repeat that now: I neither seek nor shirk responsibility. I am sure that that is true of our group. Our one guiding thought is our country's welfare; to that end we will gladly do anything to cooperate with the Prime Minister. But I prefer to leave the matter open so that we can learn more from the Prime Minister as to just what his proposal involves.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I might say just a word or two in reply to hon. gentlemen who have spoken.

First of all, with respect to the invitation which I have extended to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), to his colleague (Mr. Stirling), and, in a conditional manner, to the leaders of the other groups; let me say that I am obliged to each of them in turn for having made perfectly clear that there was no discussion of this important matter with any of them until the offer was openly made in the presence of all hon. members of this house this afternoon. I did mention to the leader of the opposition, as he has said, about a week ago, that I had in mind making the proposal which I made to-day. I thought that was a courtesy due to him, that he would wish to be turning the matter over in his mind; but more than that I did not think it was advisable for me to say to him until opportunity came to make the exact proposal in unmistakable language in the presence of all hon, members of this House of Commons. That was my reason for not having had a further conference with him.

Hon. members know that conferences conducted privately often give rise to different interpretations and meanings. Had I sought to confer in detail with my hon, friend as to just what was proposed, he might have received one impression, I might have had another. I was careful, therefore, to put in the statement which I have given to the house exactly what the proposal was, and what it would and would not involve in the way of either responsibility or lack of responsibility on the part of others and responsibility or lack of responsibility on the part of myself. That course was taken deliberately, and I think it was the right course. As I say, it was not from any discourtesy that I did not discuss the matter further with my hon, friend the leader of the opposition or say a word to my hon. friend the member for Yale about his name being included. As I have made quite clear, it is included because he is an immediate associate of my hon. friend the hon. leader of the opposition, is an ex-Minister of National Defence and, like his leader, a member of the privy council, and I felt that it would be generally recognized as appropriate to include his name in making the proposal I did.

Now may I say to my hon, friends of the other groups that, in extending the invitation in the way I did, I also deliberately made their inclusion conditional upon the leader of the opposition accepting the invitation. I did so for this reason, that, unless the leader of the opposition were a member of the war committee of the cabinet, I doubt very much whether the purpose which it is primarily intended to serve by the association of opposition members with the war committee would be met. I believe my hon, friends will be the first to see that in taking that course I was saving them some embarrassment as well as saving embarrassment to the official opposition and to the government.

I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to say a word about the relations of a government and an opposition. I do think that, under our parliamentary system-and we are realizing it more than ever in these times when very heavy responsibilities rest upon the ministry—a government has to take responsibility, and assume that those who are not with us are against us. Broadly speaking, the only manner in which to carry on parliamentary discussion is on the assumption that there is a government and an opposition, not more than one government and not two or three or half a dozen oppositions. My conception of the British parliamentary system of government is that the official opposition is the body which is looked to for the expression of the opposing view held by hon, members who sit on the side opposite the administration. That does not preclude others from taking, if they so desire, an attitude of opposition, but also they are free to take if they so desire an attitude of support and equally of cooperation. It does, however, become almost essential that in matters of responsibility, negotiations where they relate to opposite sides of the house must first be between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. May I add a further reasonparliament itself has recognized the leader of the opposition as an officer of the House of Commons. He is a salaried official of the house, he has been given by act of parliament a special status, and he is thereby entitled to recognition which others, no matter how large or how small their particular groups may be, are not accorded.

I did not except that even my hon friend the leader of the opposition, despite the intimation I gave him some days ago, would attempt to make any final answer to-day to the invitation which I extended to him. I felt that he would wish to give the matter very careful consideration and to confer with members of his own party. I made the statement to-day so that it would be before him and all hon. members on the pages of Hansard to-morrow: and at such time as hon, gentlemen may find it convenient to do so I shall be glad to receive from them whatever reply they desire to make. Indeed I should be very glad—I imagine the house would rather expect itif the reply were made on the floor of parliament in the presence of all hon. members, just as the offer itself has been made. If there is any lack of understanding as to its implications, all can be made perfectly clear in the discussion in this chamber.

I can assure hon, members that in this, as in every other act which I have performed in the office I now hold, since this parliament met, I have had but one motive, and that is to do what in the circumstances seemed best with a view to effecting as far as possible cooperative effort by all parties to further to the utmost of our ability Canada's prosecution of the war.

As to the references, in what I said here the other evening, to the question of loyalty to myself, may I make it perfectly clear, as I think any person reading Hansard will see, that such references were not to myself personally, but to myself in the official position of Prime Minister of Canada; that I was then alluding to any one who might be holding the office of prime minister and what would be expected of and toward him in that capacity. I should like, now, at all events, to make that perfectly clear. Looking at the pages of Hansard I find that on the evening I made the reference which has been quoted there are other passages in which I refer to myself and to the very question of loyalty which I have always believed was an important relationship to observe in all public affairs. I find I made this statement:

As Prime Minister I propose to exercise to the full the authority given to me to select men in whom not only I have confidence but who I believe will serve to increase the confidence in the administration existing throughout the country; and I shall not be influenced in the making of that choice by other than my sense of profound duty in this grave situation.

I there prefaced the sentence with the observation that I was speaking as Prime Minister; and I was speaking not only for myself but for anyone else who might occupy my present office at any particular time. Anyone with the slightest experience of government will appreciate how impossible the situation would be if any Prime Minister, no matter who he might be, were to take into the cabinet men who had no confidence in his leadership and were not prepared to give him their full loyalty. My hon. friend has given his statement of the kind of relationship which he thinks should govern in these matters. I will give him mine. I do not think the two are far apart. No Prime Minister with a proper sense of his constitutional responsibilities would think of demanding of his colleagues an unconditional pledge of personal loyalty to himself in all circumstances. Every minister has a right, indeed a duty, to withdraw his confidence from the Prime Minister if he believes his loyalty to the Prime Minister conflicts with his duty to his country; but he has no right to remain in the cabinet once he has lost confidence in the Prime Minister. It is his clear duty to resign immediately. The very foundation of responsible government is mutual confidence within the cabinet. Every minister must be loyal to his colleagues, and all must be loyal to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister himself has the same obligation of loyalty to his colleagues. These, I know, are accepted constitutional principles, and I stress them only because there has been a tendency to interpret words, which I used in my official capacity as Prime Minister, in a narrow personal sense which they were never intended to have. I am sure that anyone who had not confidence in a political leader would be guilty of personal disloyalty to himself if he entered a cabinet with that conviction. It could hardly be imagined that loyalty to others would be expected of one who was disloyal to one's own self. I cannot see how, in pointing out that loyalty lies at the essence of relationships of the character that belong to a cabinet, I have done other than express what, particularly in a time of war, is a most important principle to observe.

May I put this to my hon. friend so that there may be no misunderstanding. The antithesis of loyalty is disloyalty. Instead of saying I would expect personal loyalty to the Prime Minister, I might have expressed it the other way—I might have said I would not think that any member would be justified either in accepting office in a government or in remaining in a government, if he himself was disloyal to, or believed he could not be loyal to, the head of the administration. That is the extent of the meaning of the words I used the other night.

Now as to what was said with respect to changes in the administration, I am sorry that my hon, friend has not appreciated what has been accomplished more than he has, but I would point this out to him. It is now scarcely four months since the present administration received its verdict from the people of Canada. There was no concealment during the months of the general election of the personnel of the cabinet, or of its policies, or of the fact that we were in the midst of a great war and that it was certain, the moment the elections were over, or very shortly thereafter, that there would be an intensification of the war in the European scene. All that was carefully and fully presented to the people. Everything that could possibly be said against the administration by its opponents was said; all that could possibly have been urged on behalf of the men best fitted to carry on the government was put forward; the public heard every argument pro and con with respect to this administration. They returned the administration by an overwhelming majority, thereby placing upon the shoulders of its members a great responsibility and, particularly upon the shoulders of its leader, the Prime Minister, a great trust. That trust I am proud to have had bestowed and I propose to uphold it, and to uphold it in terms of representative and responsible government.

TREACHERY ACT

PROVISION OF PENALTIES FOR GIVING ASSISTANCE TO THE ENEMY

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 73, respecting treachery.

He said: This bill embodies the recommendations of the committee whose report has been submitted to the house. A draft of the bill is printed in the votes and proceedings of July 2. It relates to treason and other offences during the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is exactly the same bill?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it considered urgent, or shall we take it up after the budget resolutions?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not considered the question, but we might deal with it when it is printed and distributed, if my hon. friend agrees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have a one-track mind and I can do only one thing at a time. I was ready to go on with the budget resolutions and I should like to have a little more time to study the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL MINISTERS AND DEPUTY MINISTERS FOR MILITARY, NAVAL AND AIR SERVICES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and other members of the house whether they would be agreeable to my having permission to introduce the resolution on which is based the bill to be introduced to amend the Department of National Defence Act so as to allow of the establishment of a department of naval services. The resolution could be put [Mr. Blackmore.]

through its stages to-day and the bill introduced so that it might be before hon, members for discussion to-morrow. It has no controversial features. The bill is necessary to make provision for the establishment of a new portfolio of defence for naval services.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think that would be quite all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce an act to provide for the appointment of additional Ministers of National Defence as, an Associate Minister of National Defence, a Minister of National Defence, a Minister of National Defence for Air, each at the same salary as the Minister of National Defence, to deal with matters relating to national defence, to the naval service and to the air service, respectively, and also for the appointment of additional deputy ministers for the military, naval and air services, respectively.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the Prime Minister whether there will also be a bill setting up the ministry of services?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: That is yet to come?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: May I point out that we have spent two and a half hours in what could have been done in five minutes. There was a lengthy announcement, a virulent answer, and then some serene speeches from the hon. member for Yale and other hon. gentlemen, leaders of groups. I find that the leader of the opposition is treated like a spoiled child. I remember the time when the present Prime Minister was leader of the opposition and he was bullied by Mr. Bennett every time he wanted to make an observation. Are we now to be ruled by the leader of the opposition? I understand the war has made some progress on the wrong side—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that what he is saying is not relevant to the resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your observation, but I point out that I am discussing the importance of increasing the cabinet, and therefore my observations are strictly in order. I have not the least objection to the selection of those who were named by the Prime Minister two hours ago; I congratulate them most sincerely. I believe they are very good men, and I had an opportunity to congratulate personally three new nominees, who are most capable. But what I say is that I disapprove entirely the tactics employed by the leader of the opposition to increase the cabinet. Continuing on that argument I am just as strong as Samson when he had in his hand—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The jaw-bone of an ass.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. Therefore, sir, having the most formidable weapon that one could think of, I think I may continue my argument without being interrupted, and I hope, sir, that you will call to order anyone who dares to interrupt me when I am in order like that.

The leader of the opposition has suggested an increase in the cabinet, and now that we have it, he is not satisfied with it. He wants more people, he wants another motion, he is not satisfied with that motion—and I call your attention, sir, to the fact that this is strictly in order—he wants another one, and when we shall have another one, if we do not select Arthur Meighen or Herbert Bruce or some of those Tories over there he will always scream, he will never be satisfied. That is my point.

There is another thing that I regret-

Mr. ADAMSON: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon, member has a great deal to learn before calling me to order. If he will confine himself to reading his newspaper, although he will not learn the rules, he will learn the news at least.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think the hon, member was out of order in mentioning another hon, member by name.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I shall call him Koko, the Lord High Executioner in the Mikado, and the hon. gentleman himself can be Pooh-bah, Lord High Everything-Else, according to Gilbert and Sullivan. Now, Mr. Chairman, you see how difficult it is to try to reason with people who are so jumpy as the hon. member for York West. We are here to discuss a most serious question, and leaving aside all the names of those who would be or who are ministers in petto, as it is said of those who have high ambitions, I must tell the government that I am not very fond of the idea of taking the leader of the opposition into confidence. There are 182

Liberal members in this house, and those Liberal members are the buffers or shockabsorbers of the government. When something is unsatisfactory to the people we are the ones who are told that. The conferences between this one and that one may be of importance, but the people of my constituency, and the people of my province at large do not, I know, hear of that without the greatest fear. We do not want anything to be done behind the curtain, we want open talk. If the Prime Minister has to speak to the leader of the opposition he has only to use the language that I used to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett when he was Prime Minister. I did not speak to him in private, I spoke to him across the floor of the house. Why should the Prime Minister have more confidence in the leader of the opposition than in any one of his supporters?

I would also point out that there is such thing as ministerial responsibility. The Prime Minister is the leader of the government. He expects his ministers to be loyal to him; that is the rule, if a minister is not loyal to the Prime Minister, then he has only one thing to do, namely, to resign. If the ministers cannot share common views or have an average common view, then it is "Good-bye sir"; he goes away. I have sworn allegiance to His Majesty the King, and I keep my oath, but that does not mean that I am to abdicate my mind, my principles, my views, for flattery in the name of loyalty. I pay compliments sometimes, but I cannot be a flatterer, I despise flattery. If some gentlemen are anxious to receive flattery from anybody, they will never get it from me. Moreover, sir, I do not see why one asks for loyalty. Loyalty is something that is so natural that it need not be mentioned. That a man is loyal means that he is an honest citizen, a loyal citizen. But to become the slave of any man or of any power one must abdicate his own personality and cease to be a free citizen. And if there is any place where freedom of speech should prevail to the utmost it is right here in the House of Commons of Canada. Moreover, a supporter of this government is a free man who has deliberately decided to support it, as those who oppose the government are equally free to entertain those views which they believe to be in the best interests of the country. I am not a school boy to be lectured by anyone. Furthermore I believe I am one of the last remaining Liberals of the old tradition in this House of Commons.

What is Liberalism? It is all that is highest in a man. It is his freedom—freedom of mind, freedom of speech and freedom of action.

What is the next principle of Liberalism? It is decentralization. What is the third principle? It is that the government shall control big business and not be controlled by it. That is the point. We are here at immense sacrifice, Mr. Chairman, and if I did not spend the week-ends in the delightful province of Quebec and the county of Témiscouata, where I live, I never would have the courage to sit here week after week. But I get inspiration from the people I have the pleasure of meeting and from the beautiful scenery I see when I visit my constituency. That is why I have always been free here, and no man impresses me except by his merit. In this country it seems natural that the position should make the man, not that the man should make the position. We see that everywhere. In these departments there will be outsiders who will have to be brought here, proving once more that the civil service may be all right for routine but that when an emergency arises it becomes necessary to call in others. But, sir, I wonder if there will be a halo of sanctity round so many dirty heads as we see sometimes. It is not for me to castigate those who are ready to come here, but no one will convince me that all those who serve at a dollar a year have made a vow of poverty and are ready to wear the garb of a friar and to go begging round the villages in their bare feet. I do not believe it.

I want the government and the Prime Minister, whom I have supported for sixteen long years, to listen to and appreciate what I have done for the party as a free lance. I asked the Liberal members not to fight Mr. Houde of Montreal during the municipal election in 1930. The Prime Minister knows this; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) does not know it, but there is another minister from the province of Quebec who is familiar with the situation. I took the responsibility of seeing Mr. Houde and telling him not to be against this government, after he had been elected by 42,000 votes. And although he was the leader of the Conservative party in Quebec he did not even preside at the meeting held in Montreal by Mr. Bennett during the campaign of 1930. Later, when Mr. Bennett was leader of the opposition, Mr. Manion rose to deliver a surprise attack between two votes on the budget; and who came to his support when he was told by his leader and by the whips to sit down? It was the member for Témiscouata, who tried to vindicate the honour of his party. The only member who told me he would have done the same thing was Malcolm McLean, formerly the member for Melfort, who is now rendering the country valuable service in another capacity. Whenever there was a difficulty I tried to help, not for glory or for award but because I wanted my party to be respected; and also because I expected my party to do something for my people. And the Prime Minister did something for them when he helped in the passing of legislation concerning minimum wage workers employed by the dominion government, and in other ways.

I have had very happy associations with my chief, the Prime Minister, and with the Minister of Justice, who is a dear friend of mine. I have had happy associations with all the other ministers of the crown, including those who will be sworn in to-day. But I want the government to realize that the members who support them make immense sacrifices and deserve consideration. We are not jealous of those who have been selected to-day; they are able men and we congratulate them warmly. But we believe that when a particularly important policy is to be considered, those who support the parties should be consulted and should have an opportunity to express the views of their electors. Otherwise how can we return home without having impossible explanations to make? Those who support us during the elections have a right to express their views to us, and we should have an opportunity of conveying those views to the government, because they are the views of good Liberals as well as of Conservatives who have good judgment.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I shall ask the government to be cautious in the selection of those who will be their advisers. A Tory not in the government might hold a strategic position which would enable him to give most dangerous advice. The ministers should be warned about those people, and they should take great care not to be wrongfully influenced by the Tories who are so numerous now in the administrative services of the government. They are bold, exceedingly bold; they are arrogant, exceedingly arrogant; they are ignorant, exceedingly ignorant; they are most pernicious and dangerous. This is why we should not make saints out of them. We should consider each man according to his own merit. It will not do the government any harm to take at least half as much advice from their supporters as from the leader of the opposition, that good looking gentleman who looks so serious at the present time. I know he is kind-hearted: I know he is not a bad fellow, but unfortunately I cannot agree with what he has to say. Someone said Mr. Bennett was the successor to Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree on the legitimate stage. I hope that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition will not try to copy the old stager in his performance, but that he will be natural. If he is natural he will understand that it is not his duty to make absurd suggestions to the government; and he is too clever not to realize fully that his suggestions are absurd. He should simply observe the policy of the government and then do what as yet he has not done—offer constructive criticism. In doing that, he may not satisfy some of the drummers and the rank and file behind him—

Mr. MacNICOL: You are only the rank and file yourself.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has noticed that I was speaking of him.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking of you.

Mr. POULIOT: The leader of the opposition ought not to attach so much importance to the drummers he has in the back stage there, and should think only of the importance of his functions. He represents in the country those who do not believe in the government. Therefore he must be cautious in getting right information, even from leaks, and see that the information is good. He must control it, and then-well, make useful suggestions. I know he can do that. What I regret is that since the beginning of the session he has not done it. I am expecting him to do that, and I hope I shall not be disappointed. I would hope that in the future, and until the end of the session, my hon. friend who is now smiling, thank God, will see to it that he is worthy of the confidence the party has placed in him, and that he will make a good showing and as leader of the opposition give a good performance, always keeping within his duties, and always acting according to the best old British traditions.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 74, to amend the Department of National Defence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

*FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—SUBVERSIVE ARTICLES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will a more efficient press censorship be established at once in the public interest with regard to subversive publications by refusing them the right to the mails and distribution in Canada?

2. Will all papers in relation to this matter be tabled for the information of the house?

3. Has the attention of the government been called to the banning of 500 such publications by the government of Australia on account of the war and other considerations of empire importance?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, I think the question in its present form is not regular. The first question seeks to obtain information as to the policy of the government. The policy of the government will be made known as the occasion may arise. I may say, however, that the matter is receiving the careful attention of the government.

As regards the second question, if the hon. member will make a motion for the production of certain documents, I will see that they are brought down. I would draw his attention to the votes and proceedings of Wednesday last, July 3, which shows that information was brought down in reply to a similar question.

The answer to the third question is: No; no information.

Mr. CHURCH: Australia has banned 500 such publications.

PAYMENTS ON GRAIN IN STORAGE

Mr. PERLEY:

What amount of money has been paid by the Canadian government on grain in storage of the 1938 and 1939 crops, respectively in (a) interior country elevators and mills; (b) interior terminal elevators; (c) in terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur; and (d) all eastern terminal elevators?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Storage—Western Division	1938 Crop	1939 Crop
(a) Interior country elevators and mills (storage proportion of carrying charges)	$5,070,386.41	$7,464,572.16
(b) Interior terminal elevators (1938 crop estimated)	246,074.70	503,359.20
(c) Terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur	601,242.12	1,465,117.96
(d) Eastern terminal elevators	238,126.99	28,861.07

*BRITISH CHILDREN—ARRANGEMENTS FOR RECEP-

Mr. BRUCE:

- 1. What were the limits agreed upon between the British and dominion governments regarding British child evacuees?
- 2. In view of the Minister's statement regarding the unreliability of the radio, will he state whether his announcement as given over the radio on Saturday last, that Canada would take all the children that England would send, is true or not?
- 3. Has the government extended a definite invitation for (a) a limited number of British children, or (b) a general unlimited invitation to all children the British government cares to send; (c) if neither, what is the nature of the invitation?

Mr. CRERAR: I have spoken to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who asked the other day that this question stand, and he agrees now that it should be dropped.

Question dropped.

SASKATCHEWAN PENITENTIARY—COSTS PER INMATE

Mrs. NIELSEN:

How much does it cost for each person in penitentiary and/or in gaol, in Saskatchewan, per month, for the following, (a) food; (b) clothing; (c) housing, and (d) medical care?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

Saskatchewan Penitentiary:

- (a) $6.77.
- (b) $1.26.
- (c) No accurate figure can be given. Maintenance costs of cell blocks not kept separate.

Note: Not in possession of information with respect to costs in provincial gaols.

CONCENTRATION CAMP—COSTS PER PERSON DETAINED

Mrs. NIELSEN:

For each person detained in a concentration camp, how much does it cost, per month, to provide, (a) food; (b) clothing; (c) housing, and (d) medical care?

Mr. CASGRAIN: In accordance with the international convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, signed at Geneva on the 27th of July, 1929, the food ration of prisoners of war shall be equal, in quantity and quality, to that of the depot troops.

Owing to the varying number of prisoners passing through the camps, it is impossible to work out the cost per month for each prisoner.

[Mr McKinnon.]

MEAT EXPORTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

What was the value of meat exported by Canada during the years 1938, 1939, and 1940, (a) to the United States; (b) to the United Kingdom?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Canadian exports of meats to the United States and United Kingdom during the years ended March 31st, 1938 to 1940:

Fiscal year ende March 31st.	ed United States	United Kingdom
1938	$3,271,705	$36,159,469
1939	905,954	33,010,329
1940	926,427	42,691,934

*CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. HANSELL:

Is it the intention of the government to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act so as to "provide that the time spent on active service by members of the civil service of Canada, who saw service in the great war of 1914-18, may be counted for the purpose of superannuation"?

Mr. ILSLEY: This question, Mr. Speaker, also relates to government policy, and it has never, so far as I know, been the practice of governments to answer questions of this kind. Government policy is made known as and when the occasion arises.

Question dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEFENCE OF CIVILIAN POPULATION

Mr. CHURCH:

What steps are being taken for the defence of the civilian population in our cities and towns in Canada from air raids and foreign attacks?

On division.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have counted the number of divorce bills on the order paper; there are thirty of them. Hon. members are told to be quiet, not to put any obstacle in the way of the progress of business; yet here we are with this putrid legislation, which comes to us in bulk and of which we should be ashamed. I have spoken along this line during several sessions, as those who were here at previous parliaments will remember. I do not understand why we should encourage this kind of legislation, just to give a chance to the lawyers on each side of the case to earn $500 apiece.

Mr. Speaker, if you glance at the evidence, the pestilential evidence which comes from the senate, you will observe that it is always the same thing-keyhole business, investigators, people who are paid so much by other people to look through a keyhole and find a man in the room with a woman, some clothes on a chair; a bottle of scotch, half full, on the table, and two glasses. Then the hon. gentlemen in the other place make a favourable report on the divorce petition. I suggest that, if we are to have conscription in this land, all the men who are parties to these divorce proceedings should be conscripted first along with the honorary lieutenant-colonels, and that all the women concerned should be put in canteens to make soup for the soldiers, and be generally useful in some way.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What do you mean-boil them down?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know why we waste so much time on legislation which is a disgrace to our statute books. If we look at the volumes of Canadian statutes we can count any number of divorce petitions for the relief of Mr. So-and-So and for the relief of Mrs. So-and-So. Who knows that that man is a gentleman? Who knows that that woman deserves any consideration from the legislators of this country? It is shameful. I think we should all be ashamed of ourselves, taking part in such legislation, and I denounce it in the strongest language. We are making fools of ourselves in passing this legislation, because we are simply giving an opportunity to parasites to come to this house and make money at the expense of our honour. Moreover, the reports of the committee of the senate are stupid and in nine cases out of ten no judge would grant a divorce on the insignificant evidence that is given before the senate. What are the questions asked? Has there been any consent? Has there been any collusion between the parties? The interested party says, no. They can perjure themselves; it is evident that they perjure themselves, and it is taken for granted. Hon. gentlemen on the other side swallow it as they would a mouthful of water and their conscience is clear. It is shameful, sir. You are an honest citizen; we are all honest citizens, and we cannot do otherwise than disapprove such legislation. It is a curse, a waste of time. I am sorry my vocabulary is not richer because I would employ stronger language. We ask for a vote against these bills. They are all rotten legislation and we should vote against them. Get rid of this legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand there is no defence to any of these divorce bills, and I am suggesting that the house pass them en bloc on division, as requested. The numbers have already been read by the assistant clerk. It is moved by Mr. McIlraith, seconded by Mr. Roebuck, that the bills be read a second time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried on division.

Bill No. 32, to incorporate Pool Insurance.— Mr. McNiven, (Regina City).

Bill No. 33, to incorporate the Stanstead and Sherbrooke Insurance Company.—Mr. Gingues, Bill No. 34, respecting the Ottawa Electric Company and the Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 44, respecting the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company.—Mr. Abbott. Bill No. 50, respecting a certain wharf of Saguenay Terminals Limited.—Mr. Dubuc.

Bill No. 62, to incorporate Sisters Servants of Mary Immaculate.—Mr. Lapointe (Lotbiniere).

DETROIT AND WINDSOR SUBWAY COMPANY

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 35, respecting the Detroit and Windsor Subway Company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before this bill is read a second time, will the sponsor give some explanation of its purpose. I have not read the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, which I think should be referred to the appropriate standing committee, where its promoters wish to have an opportunity of explaining its provisions, is to declare the true value of the shares of no-par value. When the company received its charter the value of the shares was declared, I believe, at around ten cents each. Latterly the directors valued the shares at something like $12.

There has recently been passed in the state of Michigan an act, No. 101 I think, the provisions of which render taxable the shares in accordance with the value declared by the directors. This, it seems, would be inequitable, because the true value of the shares does not begin to approach the value declared by the board of directors. I believe the matter should be referred to the committee on banking and commerce so that its sponsors can give reasons for the course which they propose to take.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the hon. member concludes his remarks, may I ask if the declaration of $3 a share as opposed to $12 will affect the taxation which this company will pay to the Canadian government?

Mr. MARTIN: I did not hear the question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the reduction of the fictitious value of $12 a share to what the hon, member says is the true value, namely $3, affect in any way the taxation which this company shall pay to the treasury of Canada or to any municipality?

Mr. MARTIN: I am glad the hon, gentleman asked that question. It will in no way affect Canada. It simply affects the revenue of another country.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Before this bill is read the second time we ought to hear from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) what is the policy of the government regarding it. This bill was introduced and passed by the senate on June 13. I may say that I had no notice that these bills were coming up to-night. I wished to speak on the principle of the Ottawa Electric company bill, but it has been referred to the appropriate committee.

We should not be parting with these franchises in the manner we are doing, without any proper reports from heads of departments. The Detroit and Windsor Subway company got its authority in 1926-27; the explanatory notes give particulars as to the capital stock and the issue of shares. I should like to know from the Minister of Transport what is the policy of the Canadian National Railways with regard to this charter, because a committee was appointed, without any notice being given to the house through the order paper, to deal with the national railways; the motion was put through, the committee is meeting, and these committees have a way of whitewashing certain matters.

This bill was introduced in the senate—a procedure which I have never known of before in regard to franchises of this description. We must be very careful. We are parting with the great public franchises of this countrylight, power and transportation. The hydro electric system of Ontario, than which there is no better in the world, had a system of railways; and this Detroit and Windsor Subway company is in conjunction with the Detroit and Canada Tunnel corporation, a Michigan corporation, owning and operating a vehicular tunnel under the Detroit river between the cities of Windsor, Ontario, and Detroit, Michigan. The notes go on to say that all the shares of the subway company are owned by the tunnel corporation. Now they come to this parliament and ask for the amendment proposed. The committee will accept the bill subject to revision, and in my opinion, if this house adopts the principle of the bill it should be reported on and we should hear from the Minister of Transport what is the policy of the Canadian National Railways regarding this tunnel. Before we accept the principle of the bill we should have a further detailed explanation. This is an international charter; no doubt parliament has control, but some of the charters which have been passed cannot by the widest stretch of the imagination be said to be works for the general advantage of Canada. Has the manage-ment of the Canadian National Railways been consulted? What do they say about handing over a charter like this?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) I may say that the solicitor of the Department of Transport examined the bill and reported to me that it was exactly what its sponsor has stated, and nothing more, namely, is a bill to write down the shares of the company to their true value. The Canadian National Railways are not interested in this bill in any way. Their system does not touch that company's system. I recommend that the suggestion of the sponsor should be followed and that the bill be referred to a committee of the house where it can receive the fullest possible study and where anyone who has a valid objection to it can present his case.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blackmore for the second reading of Bill No. 26, to incorporate the Alberta Provincial Bank, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. GEORGE H. ROSS (Calgary East): A few days ago the leader of the social credit group in this house rose in his place and condemned interest as being ungodly and unjust. I wish to point out that, according to the social credit philosophy, interest is ungodly and unjust only when it is payable by social crediters. When it is payable to social crediters it is most godly and most just. At least the social credit government always exact their pound of flesh when it comes to collecting interest.

I might illustrate that by a single instance. The city of Calgary had bought a number of province of Alberta bonds and were holding them in their sinking fund. On the other hand the province were holding some city of Calgary bonds. When it came to collecting the interest the province insisted that the city of Calgary pay in full the interest on their bonds. On the other hand the province of Alberta, as I explained when this bill was up before, repudiated half the interest on their bonds and paid only fifty cents on the dollar on the interest due. As far as the balance is concerned they are hiding behind the provision that a province cannot be sued without its consent; they would not consent. If interest is such a vile thing as social crediters make it out to be, I should like to know from the social crediters whether they propose that this bank shall collect interest from its customers when it goes into the banking business.

Mr. Aberhart and his associates now wish to start a bank. Why they who so vehemently denounce interest should want to start a bank is a question. I feel strongly that politicians who label banking as a racket, who say that credit should be extended indefinitely by the use of a fountain pen and book entries, and count the repudiation of honest debts a noble achievement, are not fit persons to be trusted to carry on banking business in Canada.

Certain sections of the Bank Act are designed to protect customers of banks by requiring that sufficient money be raised by those proposing to incorporate a bank to give some assurance of their being able to carry on business with a fair chance of success. According to this bill those sections are not to apply to this bank. So, if we grant this charter, we are creating a bank which can go into the banking business and receive deposits from its customers without having one dollar of assets of its own. The only asset of any kind that it will have will be the liability which the law imposes upon the directors in the event of the bank becoming insolvent. Should we grant a charter to people to carry on such an institu-

If the charter is granted, one of the first questions that will present itself will be, shall this bank be the banker of the province of Alberta? At once a conflict of interest arises. The members of the executive council of the province of Alberta will be the directors of this bank. As directors of this bank they should try to carry on a sound banking business and guard the interests of the bank. As members of the government of the province they should do all they can to guard the interests of the province. I suggest that there is not one member of this house, outside the social credit group, who will say that this bank should be the banker of the province. There is a direct conflict of interest. Men cannot serve two masters. Section 75, subsection 3, of the Bank Act prohibits directors from occupying conflicting dual positions.

Some eighteen years ago the United Farmers of Alberta government in Alberta appointed a royal commission under the able chairmanship of Professor D. A. McGibbon to investigate the question whether or not the province of Alberta should go into the banking business. After a thorough survey that commission came to the conclusion that the province should not go into any such venture.

What right has a province to go into the banking business? Under the British North America Act the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to banking. No doubt this parliament can delegate its authority to someone else to carry on a banking business, but has the province of Alberta the right to accept the power to carry on banking business? It is very doubtful. And if this parliament authorizes the province to carry on something which it is beyond the power of the province to carry on, and authorizes them to raise money for that purpose, we are assisting them to carry on an illegal enterprise. We must be careful in that respect.

If we grant this charter, the bank must inevitably fail. A few of the principal reasons are deserving of consideration. No prudent man, knowing the record of Mr. Aberhart and his associates, would entrust his savings to a bank directed by them. No person would be justified in doing his banking business with a bank managed by a political group wholly inexperienced in banking and as reckless in experimenting with public money as these people have shown themselves to be. Prudent men will deposit their savings in the chartered banks, which honour their obligations. Consequently this bank could not hope to receive large deposits.

Again, before the social credit government came into power in Alberta, Alberta was a borrowing province. It borrowed almost twice as much as the banks there received in deposits. It relied on the existing chartered banks for funds. The sums lent at any one time in Alberta were almost double the amounts received there on deposit. The banks drew on their deposit reserves from other provinces to meet the credit requirements of Alberta. Because of our branch banking system Alberta has been the beneficiary of outside credits from the earliest days. As pointed out by the leader of the social credit group, the Alberta bank must necessarily be only a local bank. It will have to rely on deposits in Alberta, and it cannot hope to get from such deposits sufficient money to meet its legitimate credit needs. Not having the deposits, it will not be able to lend; and not being able to lend, it cannot make sufficient money to pay operating expenses and interest on its funds.

There is a third reason why this bank must be an utter failure. To pay operating expenses and make a profit this bank will have to lend money. That will not be difficult to do; all the social credit supporters will be looking to the bank for loans. Credit is not likely to be distributed on a business basis by any government anxious for votes at the next election. If we may judge the social credit government by its record, this would operate as a purely political bank, lending money freely wherever the most votes could be secured. Loans so made would never be recovered, and the loss to the bank would be enormous. Insolvency and collapse inevitably must be the fate of a bank so managed.

What does the province of Alberta stand to lose by the collapse of this proposed bank? In the first place it will lose the $500,000 subscribed by the treasury of the province in order to begin operations. In the second place it will stand to lose another $500,000, under the double liability provision contained in the Bank Act with regard to shareholders of banks. In addition, the depositors will stand to lose all the money deposited by them. Surely such a bank has no future and no hope but failure. This is the last of a series of attempts to mislead the public. It harmonizes with the covenant-signing crusade, the prosperity certificates, the treasury branches and the other ridiculous proposals of a bankrupt government. I call upon this house to take the necessary steps to avoid any further squandering of the money of the province of Alberta by defeating this ridiculous and hopeless measure.

Amendment (Mr. Ralston) agreed to on division, and bill referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROCEDURE IN EXERCISE OF EXECUTIVE CLEMENCY
—CELONA CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): On Wednesday last the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) asked a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) concerning the release on ticket of leave from the New Westminster penitentiary of one Joe Celona of Vancouver. At that time I understood the minister to say that he would look into the case and give a reply later. I should like to ask when the house may expect that reply. There is considerable urgency about this matter, because grave concern is being shown by the people of Vancouver, this man Celona being a notorious white slaver.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This man applied a year ago, or some one applied on his behalf, for a ticket of leave, and the reply was that in offences of this kind it was customary for the prisoner to serve at least half his term before any consideration could be given the application. That is the usual length of time they have to serve.

Mr. GREEN: Even in a white slave case?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In serious cases, they must serve that length of time before consideration can be given. When the application was renewed the usual practice was followed. Reports were asked from various people, and of seven reports received six were rather favourable to the ticket of leave being issued. Apparently these people thought the ends of justice would be served by the application being granted. This was done in the usual course, but since the question has been raised in this house I have received from British Columbia representations to which as yet I have not been able to give full consideration. However, I have communicated with some of those who were asked for reports in the case, and I am awaiting their replies. In a day or two I may be able to give to this matter the possible reconsideration that may be needed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the man out?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but he cannot escape.

EUROPEAN WAR

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF INSURANCE SCHEME FOR SOLDIERS ON OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:
