—"and would have been English in deed, English in sentiment, just as much as those who have gone to the other side of the line, no matter what country they come from, whether from Austria, from Italy, from Germany, or any other country in Europe, who have now become assimilated and form part of the American people, not merely in name, but in truth and in fact."

Well, Mr. Speaker, the kindness of the hon. gentleman surpasses anything I could have imagined. He is so good; he is so kind; he would have wished to choke us, not by any harsh means, not by any aggravating measures, but only by a choking process. That is all. The hon. gentleman must know that the French Canadians have contributed, and do contribute, largely, and within their means, and according to their numbers, to the prosperity of this country. They do it in their own way. They do not do it in English; they do it in French. I wonder if an act done in French is not as good as if it were done in English. I wonder if the hon. gentleman, when he gives something to charity, or puts some money on the plate on Sunday, for the poor, does not as good an act as my hon. friend, on the other side, who speaks French. The hon. gentleman may be sure that the day will come, when he speaks French, when he will see that I am right. I am convinced that he is learning French now. He is now against us because he does not know French, because he does not understand the acts of our people; he does not know what literature we have; he cannot read it, he cannot appreciate it, he cannot understand it, and, therefore, we must forgive him a great deal on account of that ignorance, a word which I do not use in any bad sense, but in reference to his ignorance of that language. The hon. gentleman says that, if such a policy had been pursued as he indicates, it would have made the French Canadians speak English. That is what he wants to do now, but this we will not allow him to do, to adopt a principle that may be used afterwards from one end of the Confederacy to the other. That will not be allowed. I am sure the large majority of this House do not intend to break this Confederation into two or three parts. They do not intend to destroy this country. This hon. gentleman speaks of uniting the country; he says he wants a united people all speaking the same language; and yet he is doing his best to divide this country, to divide us as to races, to put the French and Catholics on one side, and the Protestants on the other side. He will not succeed in that attempt. I know a great many Protestants who will not agree to that, and I know many Catholics who will not allow it. If we intend to prosper in this country, and to see our institutions succeed, we must be united, and we must not be quarrelling as we have been for the last few days, and must not divide our people by races. The hon. gentleman thinks that by his Bill he is destroying us. He will see, before many days or many hours are over, that his little scheme has the contrary effect, that it is uniting us on both sides of the House against him, that it is uniting us as one man. And what good will that do? Is that what the hon. gentleman wants? He never thought of it. He thought we would be divided in politics. There is no politics in this. It is a question of race and nationality. It is a question of self-preservation, and if he thinks that we are to allow the hon. gentlemen on the other side, who have the same sentiments, the same aspirations and the same blood as we have, to be choked, he will find himself mistaken. We will go together to preserve our autonomy, our language, our institutions—everything which is sacred to a nation. Our forefathers have been buried in the Province of Quebec. There are the very grounds where we go and pray for their souls, as good Catholics, and does he think that we will abandon that country, that he is going to chase us away without a struggle? We would be untrue to our blood. The hon. gentleman wants us to abandon our language, he wants us to change our names as well, because our names cannot remain as they are. My name, Langevin, is a French name. I do not know how he would call me in English. But he may be sure that we will not repudiate our names, we will not repudiate our blood, we will not repudiate our ancestors. We do not want the hon. gentleman to despise us. We would deserve to be despised, we would be unworthy of our blood, if we allowed him to do so. Mr. Speaker, I wish to mention another point, but I will do so briefly, because my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) has alluded to it in a very eloquent way, and in French, this afternoon. French is not his own tongue, but he wished to show that he, of another race, he, an Irishman, had the same feelings that we had, and that he would not allow us to be trampled upon, as the hon. gentleman wishes. The hon. member from North Simcoe quoted The Month, as follows:—

“While freely admitting that the French Canadian is behind his English speaking neighbor, not only in farming, but in commerce, trade”

What did the writer in The Month know about that? He never saw it.—

“trade, and all kindred branches, we must not take for granted everything that this same English speaking neighbor says of him. One of the most striking and curious things in the social life of Lower Canada is the latent hate which the French and English speaking races have for each other. It is a sad thing to say, but truth requires that it should be said, that English speaking people, no matter whether they are English, Irish or Scotch, have rarely a good word for their French neighbors; and it is still sadder and more unaccountable that of all of those English speaking people, the Irish are those between whom and the French there seems to be the least rapport, and the greatest enmity.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is not a word of truth in that. This is as false as a place that I will not name.

Mr. BERGERON. That is where Mc. will go.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have lived all my life in the Province of Quebec, except, of course, during the time that I have lived in Ottawa, and enjoyed the confidence the majority of this House and the people have had in me and in my colleagues. I know that the two races—when I say the two races, I mean not only the Irish, but the Scotch and the English in the Province of Quebec, as well as the French—agree very well; they live alongside each other, and the hatred that is mentioned in this magazine, and that the hon. member for North Simcoe brings up here as evidence of a necessity of changing our language, does not at all exist—far from it. The hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre gave some examples, and I will give some more. When Irish immigrants were coming into this country, and when a ship fever broke out among them, and they were detained at the quarantine station at Grosse Isle, and the living cargoes of these ships were landed, what did the clergy of the Province of Quebec do? We saw that Cardinal Taschereau, then only a priest, went to their assistance. He had no business to go, because he was then at the Seminary at Quebec, but he offered his services, and a number of others along with him, to rescue these poor Irishmen. A number of Sisters of Charity, also speaking French, went to Grosse Isle to attend to the wants of these poor, sick people, and a number of them lost their lives while caring for these poor Irishmen, women and children. And when these men and women, the fathers and mothers of poor orphans, were gone, what became of these children? Were they left there on the island to die? No. French Canadian families adopted them, they were well taken care of, and they became French Canadians. The hon. gentleman calls that absorption of race. I wish we could see more of such an absorption of races, not only among the French, but among the other races. I believe if a thing of this kind occurred in Ontario, and that French Canadians were the sufferers, I am sure that their orphans would be well taken care of and adopted into English-speaking families. So much to show the hatred of the races. We adopted their children when they were orphans; we came to their rescue when they were suffering. More than that, when our people suffer, when French Canadian families are in want, and there are any Irish families in the neighborhood, the hearts of the Irish people beat with sympathy for our people, and the Irishman and his wife come to the relief of the French Canadian families. That is the hatred that exists in the Province of Quebec. I hope that before this debate is through we will hear a few words from the members of the Province of Quebec who speak the English language, and who are Protestants. I hope that they will come out and express their opinions and say how we treat them, and how we treat the English, Irish and the Scotch in our Province. Let them come out. I do not know how many of them will speak, or whether any of them will do so, but I hope they will speak in order to repel that assertion of the hon. member for Simcoe. The hon. gentleman, at the end of his long speech, asked:

“Now, are we going to perpetuate this system of things? Are we going to permit it to grow into what might be called a vested right: so that by-and-bye a French Canadian can urge, and with some degree of truth: ‘I have left my own home in the Province of Quebec and have gone and settled in the North-West Territories relying on the faith of an Act of Parliament, by which it was said I should be allowed to have my language.’”

Vested rights by law! As if a man had not a right to speak his own language. Who gave the hon. gentleman a better right to speak English than a French Canadian to speak French? The French were here long before the ancestors of the hon. gentleman. They all spoke French, and they increased largely in numbers. I suppose it was the design of Providence that it should be so, and they have multiplied to such an extent that the hon. gentleman is frightened, and they continue to speak French, and will continue to do so for a long time to come. The hon. gentleman makes his speeches in English, but he does not want to allow another member to speak in French. Why does he not try to prevent the German from speaking German, and see how that will be received. The hon. gentleman said this :

"I will only say, in conclusion, that while I have thought it right at this early stage to make a statement of the reasons which have actuated the course I am taking, I desire here, as I have done elsewhere, to disclaim any feeling of hostility of any kind against the French Canadian race or the representatives in this House. I desire to say that I have no such feelings.

"Mr. BERGERON. Thank you.

"Mr. McCARTHY. My only desire is to promote the welfare of us all, and I think our truest interest will be found in trying to create and build up in this country one race with one national life, and with a language common to us all."

How can he create one race, how can he make of the French race, to which I belong, an English race? These are only words which sound well ; but, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to say it, there is no truth in them. They are verily only catch-words. I hope the hon. gentleman will not succeed in his motion. I hope there will be sufficient justice in this House to prevent such an event, and that hon. members will be far-seeing enough to discern that this measure is only calculated to divide this country, to create disunion, and that if it is persisted in, events may occur which may cause this House to regret its action for many years. We have created this Confederation ; we have prospered under it. We may have disagreed as to the methods of raising money—that is a matter of opinion ; nevertheless we have prospered under this Constitution. We have large prospects. We have become an united people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Up to the time of Confederation we did not even know the leading men of other Provinces, and they hardly knew more than two or three men from our Province. We had no intercourse with them ; there were barriers between them and us. All these have disappeared. Now, men in Halifax call themselves Canadians as do the men in British Columbia. I went to British Columbia when they were just getting the political machine into operation. They were uncertain as to the future, and did not know what was coming. I went there for the purpose of assuring them ; I went there for the purpose of knowing the people in the country. I succeeded to this extent, that they accepted the new Government with pleasure ; they knew there must be something good in it for them when they became a member of this great Confederation. I hope we will show that good feeling among ourselves, that union and harmony which will induce our neighbors in Newfoundland to unite their fortunes with ours. I hope the time will come when they will do so, and then this great Confederation will comprise all British soil from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But in order to accomplish this result we must not tyrannise over one race or another. Let our neighbors speak the language they think proper. We are all subjects of the Queen, and we are equally loyal whether we speak one language or another. We do not want to change our relations, but we desire to maintain British institutions. Our constitution is modelled on the constitution of Great Britain. We have the same Queen, the same flag, the same aspirations. Why, then, should we make a large portion of our population unhappy, and create dissensions in our midst? I apologise to the House for occupying so much time, but I feel keenly on this matter, and I thought, under the circumstances, I should express my opinion, and having said so much I resume my seat.

Mr. LAVERGNE. This question is of so much interest to the French Canadian people that I feel it to be my duty to take part in this debate. I do not wish to occupy much of the time of the House, but I feel I would not be doing my duty if I gave a silent vote on this matter. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in introducing this Bill, gave a history of the establishment of the French language in this country. He quoted from old documents, and went as far back as the time of the cession of this country to England. He might have completed his history by saying that this language, which he seeks to wipe out, was established here two centuries before the time of the cession. This language was the language of the country in the 16th century. The hon. gentleman, in speaking of the Treaty of Paris of 1763, told the House that this treaty did not contain any provision which guaranteed us the use of our language. But he has told us that since the cession, we have practically enjoyed the use of that language, and that finally, in 1844, the right to its use was embodied in our legislation. What was the conclusion at which the hon. gentleman arrived on these facts? His conclusion was, that we were not entitled to use it. I must say I was rather surprised knowing the hon. gentleman's ability, to find him arrive at such a conclusion from such premises. I draw an entirely different conclusion from them. If we have enjoyed those rights for a century, if they have been embodied in our legislation since 1844, I think we have a perfect title. I know the hon. gentleman does not profess a great deal of love for us. He admits that being bound by the treaty we should enjoy the rights which were guaranteed to us by Great Britain and no more. Very likely if the hon. gentleman had been employed to assist in making the treaty, he would not have granted the rights we obtained. He would rather have favored deportation, and our fate would have been the one allotted to the Acadians. Fortunately for us the hon. gentleman came too late into this world. The British Crown thought it their bounden duty to deal fairly with us and treat us generously, and it was part of their policy to give us the rights to which we were fully entitled, for they well knew that if they wished to form a nation here, the people must be allowed to use their own language. In fact, Sir, although the French people were not very numerous and were scattered over the country it was impossible to govern them without allowing them their own language. It is very sure that if these rights had been refused to them, the Union Jack which now floats on the Citadel of Quebec would have been removed not very long after the cession and the Stars and Stripes would have replaced it. I say, Sir, that although the hon. gentleman, Mr. McCarthy, said it was a big mistake on their part to grant those privileges, yet I maintain that from a British standpoint it was an act of wisdom that the British should have done what they did. We have enjoyed these rights for over a century, we have grown to be a people of over a million living in this country, and our existence is very evident, although it may not please the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I may say that I feel quite at home in this country; I believe that I am entitled to feel at home in this country, and I will add to this assertion a French phrase which no Englishman can disclaim: Honi soit qui mal y pense. The hon. gentleman in order to show the disadvantage of the dual language has quoted to us part of the report of Lord Durham or of Mr. Buller as we may choose. It has already been read by the hon. the Minister of Public Works and I will not cite it, but it was quoted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), to show that there was a struggle between the two races at that time. I say, Sir, that it is not a fair argument, and that it does not give a fair idea of the actual situation in this country. But if we go back to this time, what do we see that the French people were fighting for? They were fighting for their love of British institutions. They were fighting to obtain their rights, and as a result of that fight, they finally succeeded in obtaining responsible Government. It was no wonder that Lord Durham found the people a little excited at that time, but the quotation does not represent the situation of the country either then or at the present time. To show the inconvenience of the dual language, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), has cited certain extracts from the newspapers or magazines. I may say that I believe the hon. gentleman in his researches for the truth, was sincere, but I also say, that if he had the intention of misleading this House, he could not have sought information from better sources to attain this object. One of his quotations was the following, which I will read with your permission:—

“ We are Englishmen speaking the French language,” said the late Sir George Cartier, the colleague and close personal friend of Sir John A. Macdonald. Before this he was the undisputed leader of the French Canadian element in Canada; three years later he was unmercifully beaten at the polls for Montreal East by an obscure young lawyer by the name of Jetté. The crushing defeat was the French Canadian way of punishing Sir George for his ultra-loyal speech and the misrepresentation it embodied. Not that French Canadians are not well affected to the Empire as things go; only it must be understood they are well affected as French Canadians.”

I say, Sir, that this extract, as well as the other which has been cited by the hon. gentleman, is a tissue of falsehoods. We all know very well—and it does not take a very long memory to recall the facts of the election between Sir George Cartier and the Hon. Mr. Jetté. I may say, by the way, that Mr. Jetté was not an obscure lawyer and this is one of the first falsehoods in the quotations. Mr. Jetté was one of the leading barristers of the Province of Quebec and very shortly after he was made a judge of the Superior Court and he has added honor to the bench in the administration of justice. This, however, only shows the sources from which the hon. gentleman has taken his information. The defeat of Sir George Cartier cannot in any way be assigned to the reasons which are mentioned in that article. Gentlemen from Montreal know exactly the cause of that defeat, and if I recollect well the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway had something to do with it, and Sir George Cartier had, besides, perhaps, a little quarrel with some high dignitaries of the church, which helped to bring about that result. His defeat was in no way connected with the reasons which are given by that writer. Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman made the following quotation from the Mouth :

“ While freely admitting that the French Canadian is behind his English-speaking neighbor, not only in farming, but in commerce, trade and all kindred branches, we must not take for granted everything that this same English-speaking neighbor says of him. One of the most striking and curious things in the social life of Lower Canada is the latent hate which the French and English-speaking races have for each other. It is a sad thing to say, but truth requires that it should be said, that English-speaking people, no matter whether they are English, Irish or Scotch, have rarely a good word for their French neighbors; and it is still sadder and more unaccountable that of all those English-speaking people, the Irish are those between whom and the French there seems to be the least rapprochement and the greatest enmity.”

This was written in 1885, and although I am not an old man, I can give evidence upon this point, and I can, from my own knowledge, declare that this statement is a complete falsehood; I live in Arthabaska, surrounded by the Counties of Megantic, Drummond and Richmond, where there is a mixed population, and which counties are fair sample of the condition of things existing in counties inhabited by people of different races. I speak from experience, when I say that there are no better friends than the English and the French in my section of the country. I know as a practicing lawyer that when there are discussions or quarrels, they are not between English-speaking and French-speaking people, but between English among themselves and French among themselves; and that statement will be corroborated by every member who resides in those sections of the country. It will be corroborated by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope), and the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Ives); in fact, Sir, by all the members who represent what are called English counties, in which there is a mixed population. This was given as an argument to show the great inconvenience of the dual languages, and when we come to examine the facts, we find that they turn the hon. gentleman's argument against himself. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the Hon. Mr. Mercier, and he has told us that he represented the opinions and feelings of his countrymen. I presume, Sir, that is not altogether admitted by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. However, I say that the hon. gentleman could not find any argument there; what he brought as an argument would, in that instance, turn against him also. Mr. Mercier did not receive a very strong support in the English counties in the general election of 1886; but since that time the Protestant and English minority in the Province have manifested their approval of the course of Mr. Mercier on more than one occasion; and if Mr. Mercier, under provocation, has not always measured his words, in his legislation he has given entire satisfaction to the English minority. I go further, and I say that he has given them their full share of the patronage and favors, and I am glad he has done so, and I think that in every Province the minority should be treated in a particularly considerate manner. Now, when Mr. Mercier came before the people in 1886 what was the result in the County of Megantic, for instance? He was in Opposition at that time, and the candidate opposing his policy, Mr. Johnson, was returned by a majority of 280. The election was annulled, and another election took place, when Mr. Mercier put another candidate in the field, and that majority of 280 against him was turned into a minority of about 150. Take the County of Ottawa, which may surely be considered an English county. Mr. Cormier, in the general election, was returned by a fair majority, but the election was annulled, and in the election that followed Mr. Mercier's candidate was returned by a majority of 1,200. In Brome, the Hon. Mr. Lynch, in the general election, was returned by a majority of about 300. Mr. Lynch was appointed a judge, and an election was held last fall. Mr. Mercier put into the field a candidate who had many disadvantages. He was not a resident of the county while his opponent was; he had also the disadvantage that, although a prohibitionist, he had against him the Dominion Alliance, who chose to support the other candidate, in which, I may say by the way, I think they acted very unfairly. What was the result of that election? Notwithstanding those disadvantages, the majority of 300 against Mr. Mercier was reduced to 116. I will take a still more recent election to show that the policy of Mr. Mercier has been supported by the English minority of the Province of Quebec—the election in Quebec West. Mr. Murphy was elected in the general election of 1886 by a majority of 5, and this winter he came before the people once more, when he was returned by a majority of nearly 200; and if we consult the returns we shall find that in the three English polling sub-divisions he polled a very much larger majority than he had done in 1886. Now, Sir, that is the expression of the sentiment of the English minority in the Province of Quebec, and it is no argument to say that Mr. Mercier has been aggressive towards the English people; but we have a right to deduce from these facts the conclusion that once more the argument of the hon. member turns against himself. Now, Sir, I will not enter into a discussion of the arguments based on phrenology or on the formation of the French skull or the Saxon skull; I think the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) did entire justice to that part of the subject. I must say that I regret very much that this question has come before the House, for two reasons: As was said by the hon. member from the North-West, who spoke yesterday, this measure should not have come from the quarter from which it has come. It comes before us under bad auspices. We know, Sir, what are the aims of the hon. gentleman who has brought it forward, and if I may judge from the facts and the arguments brought before us, I do not think he ever expected to carry the legislation he is presenting to this Parliament. We know that he has been more cautious in his expressions in this House than he has been elsewhere, but we have a right to go beyond this House. The speech which he has made in this House is very different from what he said in this city before the Equal Rights Association. Let me read a few lines from that speech. In the beginning he says:

“I have to thank you most cordially for approving of my course in Parliament, on the question of the Jesuits' Estates Act, and still more for your endorsement, if I may consider you have endorsed it, of the policy I am now promoting, and which I shall continue to promote, viz., the abolition of the dual language system and of Separate Schools in Manitoba and the North-West Territories.”

I will read another short extract from that speech:

“We have no hostility to Quebec; their good is our good. They are being extirpated from the land—are being driven away in hundreds of thousands by the iniquitous tithe law imposed by the Act of 1774—consecrated by the Act of 1867. What does history teach us? It is a poor farming country in Quebec or possibly it is farmed by a poor class of farmers. The people are already overburdened, and they are fleeing by hundreds of thousands from these burdens. I saw a statement the other day that two hundred heads of families in Rimouski have disappeared across the borders within a few months. Is it to be wondered at? Do you think that people will continue for centuries to be tied down by tithe, fabrique assessments, &c., when there is a land of freedom for them across the border? If it is an object to us to keep our people here, I want to see the French Canadians kept here so long as their interests are not antagonistic to the rest of the Dominion, and this can only be obtained by doing away with laws of this kind.”

And the hon. gentleman obtained loud cheers at this moment. If this is meant for provocation, it does not reach us, we would simply despise it; but if it is meant as an argument in favor of the legislation the hon. gentleman is calling for now it is very unskilful. It has been pretended that the use of the French language in the North-West Territories practically is of no consequence; but if it is of no importance, I should say, why do they not leave it alone? I should say that it would die out of itself through not being used; and later on, if the proportion of French in the population of the Territories goes on decreasing, and the French language is practically of no use, it might then be the time to ask for legislation; there would then be no protest from any quarter against it, and these disagreeable discussions and fictions would be avoided. We are now asked to pass this legislation. I am convinced now, after hearing the hon. gentleman's speech on that question, that to do so is perfectly impossible. It might, and I do not say that it will not, ultimately result in becoming a question of provincial rights or a question of autonomy; but I say for the present, although I am not quite ready to view the question as my hon. friend for Berthier does, although I am not quite ready to say that I am going to support his amendment, this question is now premature, and for this reason I shall certainly oppose the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have heard so many criticisms on the Bill and the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that I confess I feel some reluctance in rising to discuss or criticise the speech which that hon. gentleman addressed to the House. I may say at the outset that the preamble to the Bill and the speech which was delivered in its support are of far greater consequence than the Bill itself. I regret the speech of the hon. member in introducing the Bill which we are now called upon to consider. That speech points, not simply to the disuse of the French language in the North-West Territories, but to its total disuse throughout the Dominion for social and literary as well as for official purposes. The hon. gentleman declared that we can only become politically united in one State by having but one language. The Bill of the hon. member, though but of little practical importance, is accompanied by a speech that the House cannot at all ignore. The hon. gentleman has evinced the most bitter hostility to all his fellow-countrymen who speak the French language, and who are of French origin. He, it seemed to me, in that speech, was far more anxious to wound the susceptibilities of his friends and fellow-countrymen who speak the French language than he was to secure a more permanent union of the various Provinces that are united in one Federal State. The hon. gentleman said, in addressing himself not only to the French members in this House, but to the French people throughout the country: You are a conquered race; you have no right to aspire to equality, and at best you are but Gibeonites in the midst of Israel. The hon. gentleman quoted the observations which I made some thirteen years ago on this particular clause which he proposes to strike out from the North-West Territories Act, and I supposed the hon. gentleman had quoted those observations with approval. I said then that the question was one that the Government thought it was better should be left to the Council that was about to be established. Why? Because we thought then that it was not necessary that we should decide in advance of actual settlement whether there should be two languages or one used. We did not think it was wise to propose the use of both French and English in those Territories until we were quite sure that there would be both French and English colonists found there. When that Bill went to the Senate an hon. Senator, representing, I think, the Province of Manitoba, proposed this particular amendment, and I will say now that if that amendment served to conciliate any section of the half-breed population, if it prevented those people from being misled by mischievous persons, then it was a prudent provision, and it has proved infinitely cheaper than gunpowder and police. I say that at this day, after that clause has been thirteen years upon the statute book, it is not possible for our French countrymen to complain that any impediment has been put in their way in emigrating to or in settling in the North-West Territory; and if to-day there are but few French people colonising the North-West Territories, it is not because they have been put in an inferior position by the legislation on the statute book. Thirteen years have gone by since that provision first became a part of the law. During that period racial jealousies have been kept dormant. There has been little expense to the country in consequence, and the statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works this evening shows that the cost of public printing in both English and French in the North-West Territories has been something less than the cost of maintaining three policemen during the same period of time, and the cost of furnishing those who speak the French language with official documents in their own tongue has been less than the maintenance of a single policeman. I venture to say that, so far as any burden upon the public treasury is concerned, this House cannot for a moment attach any serious importance to the question the hon. gentleman has raised. There has been no murmuring of Grecians against Hebrews, there has been no complaint that there has been partiality shown or wrong done or negligence exhibited towards any portion of the population. The sources of discontent in this particular were cut off, at the very beginning, and what we proposed at the start might now perhaps be carried out without fear of injustice and without any serious objection. In fact, I have heard no objection stated, unless it be in the speech which the hon. gentleman who moved this Bill addressed to the House. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

McCarthy) spoke as if it were an offence against British institutions that any of Her Majesty's subjects should speak French. He assumed that the speaking of French was at variance with allegiance to the British Crown. He reminded the French Canadians that this is a British colony, that they are a conquered race, and cannot therefore stand on a footing of equality with Her Majesty's subjects who speak the English language. That it was an unwarrantable presumption on their part to aspire to the rights of freemen, unless they were willing to lay aside their mother tongue. He said the use of the French language was not guaranteed by the Treaty of Paris, that it was not mentioned in the Act of 1774, or in the Constitutional Act of 1791; that, in fact, there was no authority to use the French language in Canada until the year 1848, and that the calamity which was then inflicted upon the country was repeated in the Confederation Act of 1867, and care must now be taken that the evil then introduced should not be further extended. It seemed to me that the hon. gentleman forgot that we have no Act of Parliament authorising us to stand upon our feet instead of upon our heads, and yet the great majority of the people of this country have the ill-manners to do so without the authority of an Act of Parliament, and they manage to get along with a considerable degree of comfort. I would like to know what constitutional rule the hon. gentleman has in view when he comes to the conclusion that French could not be lawfully spoken in a Colonial Legislature without the express permission of an Act of the Imperial Parliament. Why, Mr. Speaker, the great majority of Her Majesty's subjects do not speak English—they cannot speak English. A law requiring them to speak English would doom them to silence. When a Legislative Assembly was granted to the people of Lower Canada, it was granted to people who spoke only French. The vast majority of those who were elected to the Local Legislature to represent those people knew only French. French was the only means of communication between the representatives and the represented, and it would have been a mockery on the part of the Crown to have issued letters patent authorising some one on its behalf to call a Legislative Assembly and to doom that Assembly to silence after it was called together, because no member might have been capable of speaking the English tongue. It is clear that that Assembly did not understand that any such permission from the Imperial authorities was necessary to authorise the use of the French language. It was the only language they knew. The people of the Province spoke French at home; they heard French spoken at church; they used the French language in the market; and I do not know why the rule of convenience should be abrogated in the Legislature or by the Government, when it is followed in every other sphere of life. I might remind the hon. gentleman, that the most influential oration that any man ever made, on the most splendid theme which could inspire oratory, was delivered to Jews and Greeks, Parthians and Medes, Elamites and dwellers in Mesopotamia, and they all managed to hear him in their own tongue. There was no violation of the principle of nationality; but, although it was then proposed to establish a common brotherhood between men of altogether different races, it was never suggested that they should undo the mischief which had been done in the reign of Peleg. To secure the desired union they were to bring men together on a common platform although the relation proposed was much closer than that of common citizens of the same State. The hon. gentleman assumes that, when Canada became a British Province, its people lost the right to use the only language they knew, because its use was not guaranteed to them by the articles of capitulation or the treaty of peace. He assumed that it was an unwarrantable presumption for the people of Canada, without such authority, to use that language. Well, I have always understood, that the subjects of Her Majesty are sworn to bear true and faithful allegiance to Her Majesty, but I have never heard that they were sworn to speak the English language. I do not know, if we were put to the test, how many of us who can speak no other language would be able to pass the ordeal, if we were put on trial for an improper use of the Queen's English. There is no constitutional rule of which I am aware making the use of English an indispensable accompaniment of Parliamentary Government or of allegiance to the British Crown. A man may be a British subject put on trial for treason and convicted without knowing a word of English. He may talk Italian in Malta, French in the Province of Quebec, Dutch at the Cape, Hindoo at Calcutta, and Chinese at Hong-Kong, without in any degree sacrificing his rights or lessening his obligations as a British subject. The law does not extend his responsibilities beyond his powers. The hon. gentleman himself had no voice in saying who his parents should be, or in determining the place or time of his birth or the language of his childhood and education. All these matters were determined for him by the supreme authority of Providence, and this is his vindication in regard to his nationality and the use of the language which he employs. There are upon the Royal Arms certain mottoes, and it happens that they are all in French. One of them means in English "God and my right." That traces the rights of men to their original source. That source, high above every human authority to the contrary, is the one to which every free man traces his right to resist wrong and oppression. It is from that source that the French Canadian derives his right to speak the language of his fathers, and any law which attempts to deprive him of those high rights which belong to him, in the manner in which the hon. gentleman proposes to wipe out and obliterate the use of the French language, would be a law doing violence to those very objects for the maintenance of which a Government exists. The hon. gentleman speaks of the conquest of Canada as something which made the French Canadians less than ordinary British subjects. He spoke as if they were Helots among Spartan freemen. He says practically to them: How dare you talk about your rights? Do you not know that you are a conquered race? This matter is very important because the notion has gone abroad that, in consequence of Canada having been a conquered country, the same right does not exist to use the French language in the Province of Quebec that exists to use English in the Province of Ontario. There can be no difference in that respect. The views with regard to conquest and the rights acquired by conquest that have been sedulously propagated of late are altogether erroneous. It is true, as Lord Mansfield has said, in a very important judgment, that you may put your enemy to the sword and confiscate his property as an act of war and during war. This in theory was the law. This may be theoretically the law still, although Turkey, sixty years ago, in making war upon Greece, acted upon practices that fell far short of this absolute rule, and humanity, it was held, justified the interference of the great powers of Europe. Now, what may be done as an act of war and during war is a wholly different thing from what may be done after the war is consummated. If the country surrenders, if articles of capitulation are signed, those parties who were enemies and aliens before, at once become subjects, and their persons and property is entitled to protection at the hands of the new sovereign. The person and the property of the new subjects do not stand in any different position from the property and the person of those who were subjects by birth. The Sovereign succeeds to public property. The ancient law continues until he expressly changes it. For as long as the conqueror fails to create a legislative assembly he has a right of government, subordinate, of course, to his right as an integral part of Parliament. But if the sovereign chooses, by letters patent, to authorise the calling of a legislative assembly, the moment those letters patent are signed, and before that legislative assembly is called, he has exhausted his power. The subjects of the country he has acquired by conquest then have the right of representation, and after the right of representation is given, they stand in no different position from the subjects of the same sovereign in a colony formed by occupation and settlement of those from the parent country. And when that assembly is established, without any Act of Parliament, without any expressed power being given by the Imperial authorities to do so, its members may speak English or French, Dutch or Italian, just as the assembly itself sees proper. It is for that assembly to determine what shall be the language employed. In this regard the Crown has no power except as a part of that assembly or as a part of the Imperial Parliament. Thus, in the Ionian Islands, English, Greek and Italian were in use as long as the islands were under the British protection. The Island of Corfu is largely settled by Italians; other islands were mainly peopled by Greeks. English merchants were found in all of them and when a Government was given them, all three languages were used, and they were used because it was convenient. The public authorities, did not feel that it was necessary, to deny to these people, the rights or practices which were felt to be necessary to every section of the community. Unless, then, for the purpose of giving offence, the hon. member's reference to the French of Canada being a conquered race is wholly without relevancy. Language, under our constitutional system, in legislation, in the courts, and in the administration of Government, is regarded as a vehicle of thought, as an instrument for conveying intelligence. It is used as a means to an end, and it is never regarded as a symbol of sovereignty, or of subjection. That is true in every colony where representative Government has been established. I would like to know what the hon. member for Simcoe hopes to gain by insulting two-fifths of the population of this country. Is it to the advantage of this country that one race should be arrayed against another? Can it promote the well-being of the country in any sense, that Frenchmen should find it impossible to live with those speaking English? Will it be easier for this House to follow the only rational common sense rule in this matter, the rule of convenience, if once the passions of the population are excited, and men are disqualified thereby, to reason? Does he think Frenchmen will remain unmoved by his insults? If the hon. gentleman insists upon treating the French population of this country as the Jews were formerly treated, he must expect that they will act as the Jews are said to have acted. And then what Shakespeare has put in the mouth of Shylock might be used by the French Canadians in this country. The French Canadians may say:

"I will take this course, for if it will feed nothing else, it will feed my revenge.

"He has scorned my nation, thwarted my bargains, cooled my friends, heated my enemies, and what is his reason?

"I am a French Canadian. Hath not a French Canadian eyes? Hath not a French Canadian hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as an English-speaking Canadian is? If you prick him will he not bleed? If you tickle him will he not laugh? If you poison him will he not die? If you wrong him shall he not have revenge? The villiany you teach him he will execute, and it shall go hard, but he will better the instruction."

Such, to my mind, is the state of feeling which the hon. gentleman, by his speech, and by the preamble to his Bill, is doing his best to awaken. Lord Macaulay said on one occasion, that whenever he had mastered a new language he always felt as if he had acquired a new sense. The hon. gentleman proposes to act towards the French population of this country in much the same way that the brother of Robert, Duke of Normandy, acted towards him. He proposes to put out their eyes. He says: Forget your mother tongue, forget the orators and statesmen, the novelists and historians, the poets and philosophers of France. and then you will begin to qualify yourselves for becoming good British subjects. If you understand the language, in which they spoke or wrote, if you appreciate its beauties, if you admire its expression or its wisdom, or its elasticity, then it is impossible that you can be a loyal subject, it is impossible that you can be devoted to the maintenance of the federal union. That is the position that the hon. gentleman has taken. I cannot help asking myself: Does the hon. gentleman understand the character and bearings of the demands that he is making on behalf of the State? Does he know that he is demanding of the French Canadians sacrifices that are dearer than life itself? Does he not know that he is asking for the destruction of one of the most important rights for the existence of which governments are maintained? The state is not an end, the state is the means to an end. Part of the duties of a state is to protect life, liberty and intellectual freedom, not less than the general public welfare. It has not right to undertake to destroy the mental vision of one section of a population with the design of creating it anew. It is no part of the duty of the state to destroy the capacity for studying one field of literature, nor to attempt to create the capacity for studying another field of literature.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

There may be forces at work in a state—social and intellectual—which operate to create one nation out of two or more older ones. History, however, is plain that when these changes are brought about and a new order of things is created out of old conditions, there are many forces and factors which work in the direction of resisting and transforming old nationalities into new ones, but these forces operate slowly. The circumstances under which they operate are wholly different from anything we have in modern civilised society, and that result was not to absorb one race by another, and to perpetuate one of two races, or one of three, but to form a new race, a new nationality, out of the materials which these old races furnished. It can be shown that the factor of the hon. gentleman is the very weakest of all the influences or forces that might be employed for the purpose of accomplishing the end which he has in view. Look at the condition of things in this country. You have three great sources from which intellectual life is drawn, the United Kingdom, the United States and France. Our English speaking population receive their inspiration largely from the literature of the mother country and of the adjoining republic. Our French fellow-countrymen rely more largely upon French sources of culture, literature and information. The time may come when one of these sources of inspiration may be dried up; I will not undertake to speculate upon it, or to say that such will be the case; but this I do say, that no Legislature in the British Empire has any right to undertake such a task on behalf of any portion of the population. If such a state of things does come about, it certainly will come about from a condition of things wholly different from that which the hon. gentleman proposes to establish. It will arise from causes very different from those which the hon. member asks us to put in operation. The proposition of the hon. gentleman to convert all the people of this country into English by simply terminating the official use of French in the first instance and its use for every other purpose hereafter, reminds me of an incident related in one of Captain Marryat's novels. I remember the case of old Mr. Simple who invented a machine for the reformation of character.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was old Mr. Easy.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Forty years have elapsed since I read the book. The old gentleman invented a machine which acted upon the principle of suction and pressure. It was applied to the heads of reprobates and was designed to make them men of exemplary lives. He was a great believer in phrenology, and by the application of the machine to conscientiousness, veneration and benevolence, applying the principle of suction, he drew out those organs to their proper dimensions, and then by applying pressure to bibativeness, destructiveness and other carnal propensities, he pressed them down and diminished their size to such an extent that he made every person to whom he applied his machine a perfectly model character. So complete was this machine in his estimation that he hoped practically to put an end to the controversy about the relative merits of faith and works. The hon. gentleman proposes something like that in his Bill. The process is equally summary and simple, by which he hopes to make a single race into a single state. The speech of the hon. gentleman, shows how very general and sweeping is the revolution he proposes to accomplish, and yet there can be no doubt whatever about the very humble beginning of this new policy that is suggested in the Bill which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House. Where a people are without education, literature or history, the experiment of doing away with a language might be made with more success, and I tell the hon. gentleman he had better begin his experiment with the aborigines of this country, rather than with our French population. He will have no literature to contend against, and, if the hon. gentleman's view is correct, he should make it a crime to publish a book, newspaper, or periodical, in, say, the Algonquin language. The hon. gentleman might insist that all the Indian children should learn English instead of Cree or Ojibbeway or some other Indian tongue. He might make it a crime to give them instruction in any language except English. But if the hon. gentleman is going to succeed even with the Indian population he would require to make it a criminal offence for a missionary to undertake to learn the Indian language with a view to speaking it. He ought to insist on his speaking English and nothing else to the Indians. What does the hon. gentleman propose? If he applies the same principle to the Indian population as he proposes to apply to the French population, he will have missionaries, traders and schoolmasters speaking to Indians only English. And by that process he would expect to make Indians Englishmen. I think the hon. gentleman might discover some impediment in the way. I know no reason why the schoolmaster and missionary should be allowed to talk Algonquin and state officials should be denied that privilege. I do not know why men should learn their duty to their Creator in Algonquin and be compelled to learn their duty to the State only in the English. It would indeed be a mockery to pretend you were going to convert the Indian into an Englishman by providing that the magistrate who tries him for some petty crime shall conduct the proceedings in English. It seems to me that if the hon. gentleman is to succeed he must adopt a policy more thorough than that marked out in his Bill. I do not know, but I am inclined to think, that the hon. gentleman will scarcely be able to get all his ordinary supporters to sustain him in adopting such a policy as I have indicated, and yet it is not an unreasonable one, if the experiment is to be tried at all with any hope of success. If the hon. gentleman cannot succeed where there is no history, no press, no literature, no philosophy, daily read and studied to be overcome, how can he hope to succeed when these subjects fill the minds of old and young, delighting the one and affording solace to the other? The hon. gentleman says that language makes the nation. I do not agree with him. The hon. gentleman confuses cause and effect. The same forces which operate through a long period of years, which serve to change people of different races or tribes into one nation, also serve to modify their language in the same way. The two things have a common origin and are operated upon by the common cause, so that which makes a new nation also, at the same time, makes a new language. I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman supposes that he could bring about the fusion of the English and French in Canada, looking at the number of each and the comparative vitality of the language of each, without producing a language very different from either. I do not know if the hon. gentleman undertakes to prove that two millions of French and three millions of English could make one people with one language, the English, at the end. I am perfectly satisfied it would be neither English nor French, though it might be a blending of both. The hon. gentleman has but to look at the Latin races of Europe to see what the effect of fusion is. If such could be accomplished the language would be a wider departure from English than the modern Italian is from its Latin parent. There is a principle known in mechanics illustrated by the parallelogram of forces. You have various forces acting upon a body at the same moment of time from different directions. It obeys them all, but it does not take the direction from any one of them, the direction taken is the combined action all of those forces acting upon it; and, if you undertake to bring about fusion of races, you will simply apply that law to a condition of things in the intellectual and mental world. You have a new condition of things if you succeed, and it is one wholly different from that which existed in the one case or the other. There is an illustration of this in Ivanhoe by Sir Walter Scott. Sir Walter tells us of the influence of Norman and Saxon upon each other, and how out of their fusion modern English came forth. He shows that certain Norman words take the place of certain Saxon words and the reverse; and how the names of animals used for the purposes of food repeat the history of the early relation of the two races. They are in the care of the Saxon when they are in the field and receive Saxon names. When they are slaughtered and brought to market and find a Norman consumer they have Norman names. And so the pig becomes pork, the ox becomes beef, the calf veal, and the sheep mutton, and these words repeat the history of the relation of these two races quite as well as the ordinary history of these races. The hon. gentleman forgets that it was a whale and not a cod that swallowed Jonah, and so if he will insist upon three millions of people in this country, swallowing two I am afraid that the individual who attempts that feat would be a different looking personage afterwards from what he was before. Now the inadequacy of the means that are employed, and that the hon. gentleman's Bill suggests, becomes perfectly obvious. The official use of a language is limited and that official use cannot secure that unity of races which the hon. gentleman seeks and without which he says there cannot be political cohesion. The business of the modern state is so restricted that the official use or disuse of a language can have no appreciable effect upon its general vitality. Suppose the hon. gentleman were entrusted with the power to do what he thinks ought to be done, suppose he goes into a French settlement for the purpose of administering justice; he sends a judge who knows only English, he is among a people who speak and know only French; the causes are heard, witnesses are called who know only French, lawyers are employed who know only English, if a jury is summoned it must be a jury who would know only French; how is the hon. gentleman going to carry on the administration of justice? Is he going to employ any number of interpreters? If the hon. gentleman were to adopt such a policy I may say the people would not have a very great deal of confidence in the administration of justice. It would be made very cumbersome, much more costly, much more distrusted. Then these people amongst whom he establishes this English institution, this official use of the language, go to church on Sunday and hear a sermon in French, they read newspapers that are printed in French, they read French authors, Lafontaine's fables, Béranger's poems, Lamartine's history or St. Simon's memoirs, Victor Hugo or Prevost-Paradol; all these and hundred others are daily read and studied. I would like to know what chance there is for success when those mighty dead are encamped around the people for their protection and for the perpetuation of their language as the Angels of the Lord are encamped around those who fear Him. It is true that there have been many tribes scattered throughout Europe of one race, settling within the territories of other tribes and absorbed by them. It is said the Ostrogoths and the Lombards became Italians, the Franks and Burgundians became French; certain Slavs and Wends who settled in Prussia became Germans, but in every case the absorption of these made the race by whom they were absorbed different in language from what it was before. But these tribes were without a history and without a literature. They had no past unceasingly influencing the present, and projecting itself into the future. They were subject to new environing influences. They were cut off from their kindred and entered upon the heritage of a new world of thought and feeling, of hopes and desires, as completely as if the world in which their primitive character had been formed no longer existed. M. Bluntchli in writing on this subject says, with reference to the action of the Roman Government in undertaking to denationalise tribes within the provinces of the Empire:

"Language is the most peculiar possession of a people. It is the strongest bond which unites its members and the chief means by which it reveals its character. For these reasons, a state cannot deny to a nationality its language nor prohibit its literature. It is, on the contrary, the duty of the state to give free play to a language, and to promote it, and the general interests of civilisation are not injured thereby. The suppression of the native languages of the provincials by the Roman authorities, was a fearful abuse of the power of the Government."

And in reference to that abuse, the hon. gentleman asks us, perhaps not in his Bill, but certainly by the preamble of his Bill, and by the speech by which it was supported—to do the same thing. The same writer says, with reference to the English Government in the last century in India:

"The English Government made one of the most serious mistakes, when in 1773, it wished to force the forms of English law and judicial procedure in Bengal on the Hindoos, who were unprepared for it."

From that policy the Imperial Government has long since withdrawn. It has for years regarded language as a mere instrument of the state and not a badge of either sovereignty or humiliation. There can be no doubt which is the wiser, the more magnanimous course to adopt. There can be no doubt whatever which policy will most largely contribute to the contentment of the people. The ties of family are stronger than the ties of nationality, the ties of nationality are, for the most part, stronger than the ties of state. This is a condition of things that is ordained by Providence. The hon. gentleman (Mr.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

McCarthy) may complain of it, but he cannot alter it, and it is as true in this country as it is true in Switzerland, Austria or Russia. Let me invite the House to two or three sentences from Bluntchli and also from Niebhur. Bluntchli says:

"If the moral or intellectual life of a people is attacked by the power of the state, its members are driven to the most determined resistance. Men can have no juster cause for resistance to tyranny than the defence of nationality. Legality may suffer in the struggle, but law is not injured."

And Niebhur has not hesitated to maintain:

"Common nationality has higher claims than political relations which unite the different nations of one state."

The speech of the hon. gentleman had but little relevancy to his Bill. He quoted authorities to show that by one language the people were made one nation. I am not going to contest the soundness of the doctrines he read from Freeman and from Müller. There is a very ancient authority, however, which says that at one time the people were of one language and one speech, not in a very advanced condition of society, that they deliberately abused their advantage, that the unity of the race was broken, and that language was diversified by Divine interference. The race was broken up into classes, and they were scattered over the world, and sent to school. The currents of that division have flown into a great many channels, and men have gained more advantages from the division, than they have endured misfortunes. The limitless capabilities of the human intellect have been shown; through many vicissitudes, the race has, in each class, learned much, and all have been advanced to a higher elevation, to a purer atmosphere, and a wider field of vision. Those differences in language and nationality have frequently prevented combinations which, if accomplished, could only have resulted in working folly and mischief. The hon. member wants a united Empire; he insists that the whole British Empire should be united in one confederation. Well, if the doctrine he has laid down, with regard to Canada, is sound, it is equally sound when applied to the whole Empire; and so we must have three hundred millions of people speaking the same language. I am inclined to think, if it were a question to be determined by a majority, that the Hindoos would have their way, and instead of all of us abandoning French and learning English, we should have to give up both French and English, and learn Hindoo. We have, according to this view, not simply to undertake to establish English at the foot of the Rockies, but a common language at the foot of the Himalayas as well. The hon. gentleman insists on a unity and cohesion which is denied by Providence to modern states. Ancient governments were united; ancient governments counted men as nothing; the individual had no rights as against the state; but in every modern state there is an element of clay as well as of iron; there is an element of dissolution as well as of strength, and that element is the individuality of men. You recognise the individual as having rights distinct, and separate, from the state; you recognise his right, when those rights are encroached upon, to stand up in their defence, and you put in jeopardy the existence of the state itself for the purpose of maintaining them; and without respecting those rights the state itself cannot endure. Why should we unite for the purpose of maintaining a government unless it is going to serve some purpose that will contribute to our progress, material, intellectual or moral, or in some way promote our happiness? If we unite for the purpose of government, it is in order that we may, through the agency and instrumentality of government, accomplish something for ourselves. Now, does the Bill give effect in any way to the doctrine which the hon. gentleman says is necessary for the establishment of a united state? The hon. gentleman says that unity is vital. Unity is well nigh vital to the existence of a nationality, but all experience shows that unity is not absolutely necessary to the maintenance of a state. The hon. gentleman, by his policy, proposes to confine his efforts at reform to remote regions where few men dwell, and he allows the barrier which he says threatens the permanence of the state to exist here at the capital. Let us go far away from the seat of war, in order to conquer. Could there be greater infatuation? The hon. gentleman, when he was speaking, heard cries of "écoutez," on this side of the House, and he thought this a word of reasonable import, a word that endangered the unity of the state. If hon. gentlemen on that side and on this had said "hear, hear," we should have been in no danger; the permanency of the union would have been in no way threatened; but to say "écoutez" was a very different thing, and calls for the serious consideration of every member of the House. Now, the hon. gentleman has quoted paragraphs from Freeman and Müller, but those quotations do not sustain the argument of the hon. gentleman. His contention is not theirs. The hon. gentleman confounds nation with state. Professor Freeman and Professor Müller do not do so. They could not say what the hon. gentleman says without being contradicted by the condition of things existing in almost every country in Europe. The Gypsies are a nation; the Jews are a nation; the Poles are a nation, but neither Gypsies, Jews nor Poles are a state. The United Kingdom is composed of English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh; there is one state, but there are four nationalities. England has an immense predominance in wealth, numbers in literary and legal force over Wales; the Union has existed for eight hundred years, and there is no probability of Wales being absorbed as a part of the English nation and losing its national identity, Welshmen are still Welshmen and not Englishmen; they are still two nationalities in one state, not less united politically because they are still two nations. The political bonds between Ireland and England are exactly or very nearly the same as those between Wales and England. Ireland perhaps is not so well united as Wales, but the line of cleavage is not between those who speak Erse and those who speak English. Mr. Parnell reckons a much larger number of English-speaking Irishmen among his followers than those who only speak Erse. The truth is that the line of cleavage is through the English-speaking population, and it is due to other causes than difference in language. The Crofter and the Cockney, though not able to understand each other, may nevertheless entirely agree in political sentiment. The hon. gentleman quotes this sentence from Max Müller:

"A common language is a common bond of intellectual brotherhood, far stronger than any supposed or real community of blood. Common blood without a common language leaves us perfect strangers. A common language, even without common blood, makes the whole world feel akin."

Now, I do not question that, as Professor Müller uses the expression; but I altogether dissent from the use the hon. gentleman has made of it. Professor Müller is considering man as a social being, not as a member of that highly official organisation known as a Federal State. Why, Sir, the English people and the people of the United States speak the same language. Are they politically united? Are they drawn together, or have they, for the past century, been drawn together in the way the hon. gentleman has spoken? Are England and the United States more inclined to unite politically than England and Wales, than England and the Highlands of Scotland? The hon. member cannot answer without destroying his argument. We in Ontario speak English, and so do the people of New York and the people of Virginia; but is the hon. gentleman more inclined to a union on the banks of the Potomac than on the banks of the Ottawa? If the hon. gentleman's argument has any value, the hon. gentleman himself would prefer a union with the United States to a union with the people of the Province of Quebec. Switzerland has, as several hon. gentlemen have stated during this debate, three nationalities—the German, the French, and the Italian, who are all loyal to the republic. Many centuries ago these different nationalities found their way through the glens and valleys of the Alps, and if race and language were the strongest considerations they would have formed parts of Italy, France and Germany. But for four centuries they have been a united country. The French population of Switzerland have not been less loyal to that government because they have on the western border a people speaking the same language; the Italian population of the south have not been less loyal to that country because they have on the southern border a people speaking the same language and of the same race. If you had to apply the hon. gentleman's doctrine to Switzerland, how long, I ask, would that union last? Suppose the German population were to insist that the union has no value because the people do not all speak the one language? I would like to know whether the French, sooner than be denationalised, would not seek a union with France and the Italian population a union with Italy? There can be no doubt whatever of what would be the result in this respect. The hon. gentleman read from Professor Freeman the statement:

"As in the teeth of community of language there may be what, for all political purposes, are separate nations, so without community of language there may be an artificial nationality, a nationality which may be good for all political purposes, and which may engender a common national policy."

That is precisely what we have here. Such, too, is the position of Austria, of Switzerland, and of the United Kingdom. The hon. gentleman will see that in the very quotation which he makes from Professor Freeman the fact is stated—and it would be impossible that he could say otherwise—that it is possible for people of different nationalities to combine together and to form one state. It is true that where there is but one language there is less friction than where there are several. It is true that there may be less danger of division and of certain forms of party strife where all the people are of one nationality than where they are of several. But that is not the question which is presented for our solution. The question is not whether Sweden is in a better position politically than Switzerland, whether Italy is in a better position than Austria. We may all admit that a state whose people are all of one nationality has less difficulty in Government than where they are of different nationalities; but the question is, having different nationalities, whether it is a wise thing to undertake to enter upon a policy of changing their nationality and of remodelling many nationalities into one? Suppose Austria, which is composed of many nationalities, which has Poles, and Czechs, Hungarians, Bosnians, Tyrolese, Dalmatians and Germans—suppose Austria were to undertake to convert all these different nationalities into Germans, I would like to know how long the Austrian Empire would be likely to endure? In my opinion it would not last a year. There can be no doubt whatever that the result would be the very reverse of establishing a united population. Instead of having an empire federated together of different nationalities, you would have that empire broken into fragments and several independent states springing out of its remains. Governments are dear to men in proportion as they preserve to them what they most dearly prize, and a man must be so environed that he must feel that he has laid his nationality aside before it case become to him a matter of indifference. There have been periods in the history of Europe when other grounds of union were sought than those of nationality, when religion was made the basis of political unity and when every man, who in faith, differed from the established religion, was held to be an alien and treated as such, and was denied the ordinary rights of a subject or a citizen. Now, that is true in Mahomedan countries to-day. James I and Charles I regarded unity of religion as necessary to the existence of a state, just as the hon. member for North Simcoe regards language, and they tried to mould the people of England into their way of thinking. They were resolved to treat those who dissented from the state religion as aliens and foreigners having no claims to the rights and privileges of subjects. Did this policy crush out dissent? Did it secure that unity of opinion deemed essential to the unity of the State? Not at all. The result was that the prisons and the fleets were filled with some of the most exemplary, industrious and intelligent portion of the population; hundreds were driven to Holland and thousands to the wilds of North America. The Kingdoms was rent by civil war, the king was executed, and a new order of things established. There are claims on men stronger than the claims of the state. There are rights which the state has no right to invade, and which, if it attempts to invade, it is a man's right to defend. It is not often that a man comes to the point in his relation to the State where the roads part, but when he does, if he is a man of high character, he takes a counsel of conscience and his self-respect and obeys his Maker rather than the law which would degrade him. In the hours of trial he finds a higher law written upon his heart, obedience to which makes him the more a man, and the cause of justice and freedom are promoted by his triumphs if he succeeds, by his misfortunes, if he fails. What the hon. gentleman proposes to-day to do away with here is permitted elsewhere. What the hon. gentleman thinks is a bad thing here, English ministers and statesmen of all parties have for many of years taught was necessary elsewhere. I need but refer to a few instances. At the Cape Colony there are two races: the Dutch and the English. Both languages are used in the legislature as both are used here. In the courts, the law provides that the superior court judges may permit the use of both languages and that the judges and magistrates of inferior courts must, that the barristers and attorneys have the right to use both languages; and it also provides that if one-third of the electors in any judicial district ask for the conduct of the judicial business of the district in both languages, their request must be granted. Then, if you look at the Island of Mauritius, that island was without a representative government of any sort until 1885. The Governor then was authorised by letters patent to provide for the election of a council. The voters' list was prepared and the Governor, in sending home to the Colonial Secretary a copy of that list, tells him that 3,300 on the list are Roman Catholics, 450 Protestants, 295 Hindoos and Mahometans, and 15 Chinamen. The Colonial at Secretary that time, our present Governor General, when he received that report from Governor Hennessey, wrote him a despatch which contains this paragraph. He asks:

“Whether the notices regarding the registration of voters were published in any language besides English and French? If not I should fear that many of the Indian population, who are entitled to be registered, may have been altogether unacquainted with their privileges.”

Showing that the Colonial Office not only encouraged publication in English and French, but also suggested the propriety of publishing in all the languages spoken by those who would be entitled to vote, and the Governor replying to that in a despatch written some two or three months later, said that the notices with regard to the voters' lists had been published not only in English and French, but in Tamul-Urdu and Chinese. So that the House will see that no party in the United Kingdom takes the view of the hon. member for Simcoe. Public men have long ago recognised that differences of language are not incompatible with the Union of the State and that any attempt to fuse different races by such heroic measures as the hon. member for Simcoe advocates would have the very opposites effect. The rule of convenience is the rule which governs. It is held that every man who is a British subject, and entitled to be a voter is entitled to know in the only language he understands what his rights are. That is a question of convenience and it is treated in every instance as a question of convenience. The English language is not regarded as the mark of a British subject par excellence. A foreign tongue is not regarded as a mark of inferiority, but as an instrument of communication which the Government have a right to use when they can best promote their relations with the people by using that language, whether it be Dutch, German or French, or any other tongue. The hon. gentleman always forgets how very slowly a language dies. If you have a large settlement where marriages may take place, where public worship may be carried on, a century may go by without absorption taking place. A few years ago, I visited a German settlement north of the city of Philadelphia, a German settlement which had been established over a hundred years ago. Those people have learned English in the schools, they talk English, you do not distinguish them from the rest of the population, but in their own intercourse they still speak German. A fragment from that settlement came into the county of Waterloo, I think more than sixty years ago, and I believe they still speak German. It is therefore a mistake to suppose that a language dies readily because it is not officially used. The fact is that the official use of a language makes very little impression upon its vitality. The interference of the state in the direction of repression and discouragement will make no difference. If you have a poor population coming amongst you, and they are compelled to go into families where they have to speak English, in time they may abandon their own language and speak yours, but it is a very different thing when you have a colony of a number of people speaking their own language in that place. The 19th article of the constitution of the Austrian Empire provides that :

“All tribes in the state have equal rights, and each has an inviolable right to maintain its nationality and language.”

It is clear from that that the Austrian Empire is not organised politically on the unitary principle advocated by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. membr for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Even in the despotic government of Russia, there is no attempt to denationalise the various populations in the great majority of instances, except for political offences. The people of Finland, who were for 500 years under the government of Sweden, where Swedish was the official language, when that became a Russian province after the Treaty of Tilsit, not more than one in ten spoke Swedish, have not been interfered with in the use of the Finnish language by the Government of Russia. Justice is administered and the government is carried on in that language. There is no attempt to impose the Russian language upon that people. The education of the people and the schools and all their affairs are carried on in their own language. The Russian Government has fostered the national tendencies, and Finland is loyal to Russia, because Russia has encouraged her to be Finnish, and has not insisted upon her becoming Russian. She has been weaned from any desire to reunite with Sweden, by giving full play to her national instincts and her national aspirations. In regard to this a modern Russian author, Tikhomirov, says :

“It is difficult to picture two social types so unlike as Russia and Finland. Finland is an honest hardworking citizen, whose life is lucrative, based on reason, but always monotonous and sometimes sad. Russia is a reckless student, sometimes drunk, sometimes starving, capable of every folly, but capable also of sublime things, and always more concerned with great problems of humanity, than with paying his landlady. These two characters so wide asunder harmonise the better the less Russians and Finlanders meddle with one another's affairs; this is in fact the modus vivendi of the two peoples. We may lay it down that as long as Russia does not prevent Finland from living according to her own taste, that country will remain her faithful ally. In the Crimean war Finland fought bravely for Russia; in the last war against Turkey the Finlanders fought valiantly for Russia upon the far off plains of Bulgaria.”

The satisfactory result that this Russian writer represents as having been accomplished in Finland by which its loyalty has been secured to the Russian Government, has been attained by means the very opposite to those which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) proposes to apply to the French population in Canada, for I have not been discussing so much the particular provision of the hon. gentleman's Bill, as the matter of his speech and the preamble to his Bill. There is one instance in modern Europe where the views of the hon. gentleman have been applied; I refer to the case of the United Netherlands between 1816 and 1830. It is well known that, after the fall of Napoleon and his exile to Elba, the members of the Congress of Vienna came to the conclusion that it was desirable to establish a somewhat strong state on the north-eastern borders of France, and they consequently made a provision to unite Belgium and Holland. At that time Holland had a population of 2,280,000, and Belgium a population of 3,380,000. They were given equal representation, and provision was made for a government in most respects was satisfactory to the population of each country. When Napoleon escaped from Elba, it was thought desirable in the emergency to confer special powers upon the king, but he continued to exercise those powers for many years after the emergency had passed. During the period in which he exercised that power, the king forbade the use of the French language. Half the population knew nothing else. The king insisted that justice should be administered in all the courts in Dutch, and the result was that all the judges in the Belgian section were compelled to resign, and nearly all the lawyers had to abandon their profession. The king also provided that no one should be licensed to teach in a public school unless he could speak Dutch, and consequently half the teachers in his kingdom had to resign. Private schools were then established in the Belgian section of the kingdom, and then the king issued a new decree forbidding private schools to be established without the king's license and so they were shut up. Then the king thought it necessary not only that the people should speak one language in order to have united government, but that they should have only one faith, and so German and Protestant professors were appointed in Roman Catholic colleges which had been established for the education of Roman Catholic students. The King of the Netherlands had, at all events, the courage of his convictions. He did not try to enforce these provisions in a far off corner of the country where there were few Belgians, but he made these regulations in a country where there were 400 Belgians to the square mile. The result was to establish two geographical parties. One-half of his kingdom was arrayed against the other half; and in one-half 60,000 men were soon under arms fighting for the rights which the king had disregarded. The result was that two states were established where there was one before. The English Government which was at first anxious for this union, exhibited an equal anxiety for its abolition, because if Belgium had not received the active support of England, it would assuredly have become a Province of France. The condition of affairs which existed there is well shown in the life of Lord Palmerston by Sir Henry Bulwer, who was the British Minister at the time. He says :

“The language of society, language of the bar, the language of the great portion of the people of all ranks, was French; but this did not signify. It was in vain that a lawyer had consumed the best years of his life in the study of his profession. He was to teach himself a new tongue, or the capital of his labors was to be wrested from him. Some quitted the bar, others, induced by long habit, still continued at it, but prepared themselves to see the honors, the applause and the practice they had been accustomed to receive, transferred to others who had been so fortunate as to be born on the north side of the Mordyke. The loss of these persons was not merely that of an honorable livelihood; it is necessary to penetrate our own minds with a sense of those high feelings of pride and ambition which animate men who have reached the head of their profession, in order to appreciate the extent of that injustice, which this foolish and tyrannical ordinance inflicted."

Now, the hon. gentleman proposes a half century later to try the same experiment in a British colony. I do not believe, if his experiment could be carried out, that it would be a whit more successful than the experiment of the Dutch King in the United Kingdom of the Netherlands. I may say that the revocation of 1848 made a great change in the treatment of nationalities. They then came to the front. States were based on dynastic and class interests and paid no regard to race in fixing territorial boundaries. But since 1848, no attempt has been made to mould different races into one except in Austria, and she fell into line after disasters of Sadowa. About thirteen years ago this clause of the Bill which the hon. gentleman proposes to repeal, was introduced for the first time. The opinion I then expressed, I think, is an opinion that ought to have some force to-day. Of course, it is only a question of time with regard to the matter, because it is one about which the people of the North-West Territories must legislate when they become a Province. The present assembly of the North-West is not a constituent assembly, it is simply a legislative assembly. It has no power to alter the constitution under which it carries on the limited amount of legislation that it may at present accomplish. But I could not help observing that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), instead of referring to the members from that territory in this House to ascertain the opinion of the country upon this subject, refers to the opinion of a Legislative Assembly in the North-West Territories who have no power to deal with the question at all. Now I think that in many of these things the people must be assumed to be qualified to exercise the powers of self-government. They may go astray. I do not always approve what has been done in this House. I do not often agree with the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, but I do not on that account deny the right of the people of this country to self-government. My own opinion is that if we regard this question as a matter of convenience, there ought to be no great difficulty in dealing with it. We are seeking to settle that country, we are seeking to secure immigration into that country. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches occasionally issue pamphlets printed in Scandinavian, in German, in French, for circulation upon the continent of Europe to invite people to settle there. The hon. member for Muskoka and the hon. member for Simcoe vote an appropriation for the purpose of bearing the expense of printing, translating and publishing these pamphlets. I would like to know whether those hon. gentlemen say that you have a right to publish a pamphlet in Scandinavian and send it to the other side of the Atlantic for those people to read to induce them to come here, but that you have no right whatever to give them anything Scandinavian to read after they arrive in this country. Now, let me suppose that to-day there are 20,000 Norwegians coming out and forming a settlement in the

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

North-West Territories. You have provided municipal institutions there. They elect a council. If they do, they must select some of their own people, or they must go outside and invite somebody to come in and represent them. How are they going to carry on their business when they do not know a word of English? Are they going to meet and keep quiet, or are they going to speak privately to some one who understands English and have their words translated into English, and published when none of them understand a word of it? It is perfectly obvious that if you have a diffused population, if you have English and others mingled together, that the one readily absorbs the other. You may provide that there shall not be a continuous settlement of people of any nationality other than those who speak English, if you think that is the proper course to adopt. If there is a French population in the North-West diffused through the English speaking population, and they are in the minority, it is impossible but that they will learn to understand each other. If you have several thousand people from the Province of Quebec speaking French and knowing nothing else, forming distinct colonies or settlements, it would be a matter of convenience to translate your public documents, and for your public proceedings in that locality to be conducted in French, and I do not believe that you delay the general use of the English language by one hour by adopting that policy. I do not see how you can, for it is the private and unofficial use that determines the general use of the language. Now, the hon. gentleman knows that he has not taken even the first step towards the unity of the population of the North-West from a linguistic point of view, by simply providing for the official use of the English. The hon. gentleman, if he does anything, must go further, and he must prohibit the introduction of French books, and the circulation of French newspapers, the use in the schools public and private, he must prohibit the use in the pulpit, he must prohibit the use everywhere, of the French language, or his interference is an ineffective and an impertinent interference. If the hon. gentleman is not prepared for that, then he had better leave the laws of society—those forces of which I have spoken—which, after all govern these things, to operate freely in the way in which they operate most effectively. In my opinion, the question of the use of a language, or of more than one language, in a territory, depends entirely upon whether you have a mixed population or whether you have settlements separate and distinct from each other, and it seems to me that you have in the North-West Territories, no expression of opinion upon that question which would warrant legislation such as the hon. member for North Simcoe proposes. I think the question should be determined on the lines and according to the principles which I have mentioned. Now, Sir, I may say this: The hon. gentleman has delivered several speeches on this subject outside the House, and one in it. It seems to me that his labors have produced conflict of race, and I may go further and say, conflict of religion as well. It is possible that a section of the population sympathises with the hon. gentleman in the object with which he has set out; it is possible to break up the union, to repel immigration, to delay settlement. It is possible to make here geographical parties and so prevent the people of this country from acting in political union; but, unless the hon. gentleman goes so far as to regulate the domestic use, the use in business, the use on the public platform, the use in the pulpit, the use in the press of the language, it seems to me that he has not taken the first step to carry out that policy which he marked out in his speech and in the preamble to the Bill he submitted to this House; unless he is prepared to undertake this formidable responsibility and carries it to a victorious conclusion, he will not have hastened the general use of English by a single hour. The hon. member and they who support him have made their new departure for the more perfect union of our people, filled with envy, hatred and bitterness towards two-fifths of the population.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is twelve o'clock, and the hon. gentleman for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has just risen to speak. I am quite sure he will make a speech of considerable length, and it will most likely be replied to, and as there is not the slightest chance of our having a division to-night, I will agree at once to the suggestion that the debate be adjourned. I will also suggest that it be made the first Order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the hon. gentleman had better name Monday, because there are a great many members to speak yet.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the debate be made the first Order of the day for to-morrow.

I will simply say, in reply to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that if a great many members are going to speak we shall require Friday and Monday, too.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 14th February, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have had an informal communication across the floor with the hon. leader of the Opposition, and we find that a great many members on both sides of the House want to leave town to-night. With the consent of the House, the debate which is set down as the first Order of the Day, will be proceeded with, but there will be no division taken to-night, and at ten o'clock, if the House will permit, we will go into Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. It is understood that there will be no vote to-night, and that the debate will not be concluded, but will be resumed on Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LINCOLN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As arranged yesterday, I will now place in your hands, Mr. Speaker, a motion which was not formally introduced then. I may mention that I have received a package of papers from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), which he has requested me to include, and therefore I add to my motion: "together with certain other letters furnished by the hon. member for Lincoln and appended hereto." My motion is:

"That whereas certain letters and documents reading as follows:—

"WINNIPEG, 15th December, 1881.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT,—Would like to see you very soon about something I have discovered in the West, and want you to tell me what I am to do to get hold of same. When will you go to Ottawa? I think I see something good.

"Yours truly,
"J. ADAMS."

"St. CATHARINES, 22nd December, 1881.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I duly received your letter of the fifteenth, and have to say in reply that I cannot tell you what time I will go to Ottawa. If I can be of any aid to you, I shall be pleased. Hope you are doing well. Has the boom yet subsided? I hear St. Catharines men are a little mad in speculation.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"St. CATHARINES, 11th January, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I know nothing about the prospects of getting limits, nor do I know what are the rules of the Department about applying. If you send me particulars of what you want, I will see the Department, or send to my agents at Ottawa and enquire.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"WINNIPEG, 18th January, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT,—I think I have got a good thing up here, and am told by a lumber agent that if I only apply to the Government I can get hold of it. Now, I do not know how to apply and want you to help me, as I know you can if you like. Perhaps you can better yourself by helping me, as I will pay you well for all you do for me. Can I get up a company up here for limits? I can get good men to help me. I have made a good deal of money here and hope to make more.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"25th January, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I am delighted to hear you are making money. Nothing would please me better than to see you here again with a fortune. As regards the matter you spoke about, I shall be pleased to assist you and the company in any way I can, and of course I would be glad to better myself in any way which is fair and honorable. It seems to me you ought to organise the company with good men, as you suggest, and then apply to the Government. I expect to be in Ottawa in two weeks, when I can perhaps do you service. Keep me posted as to what you want.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"10th February, 1882.

"DEAR ADAMS.—I cannot make out from the memo. sent me where the timber limit is or the boundaries of the same. I have made enquiries in the Department, and they tell me it is necessary to state as nearly as possible the boundaries in the application within which you wish to select fifty square miles (you cannot have any more), but they will not permit you to wander all over the country. I think they will let you select a limit out of a defined area of 400 square miles. I am afraid you are going into a very uncertain speculation, and better make more enquiries.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"OTTAWA, 19th February, 1882.

"DEAR ADAMS.—After talking over the matter with you yesterday I put in your application, but I am afraid you will have to be more definite in your description. They tell me in the office there is no timber within the area fixed by you. I will try to have application allowed as soon as possible.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"20th March, 1882.

"DEAR ADAMS.—Your application has been granted, but the Minister tells me that he thinks it will be worthless to you, as the limit is a great many hundred miles from any railway, and there is not likely to be any for years. They tell me you will have to take the timber 1,300 miles by water to Winnipeg and there compete with lumber from the disputed territory. This is your own business, and you must be contented with the right to select within an area of 400 square miles. The Government won't let you play Cook & Sutherland upon it.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"25th March, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT.—Why can you not get a bigger piece to select from, as I do not know anything about the country? It will cost a large amount for the survey. Don't you think you can take a share in it or get up a company in St. Catharines? I will be liberal to them.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"27th March, 1882.

"DEAR ADAMS.—I cannot see any use in telling you a dozen times about the extent of territory that you can select from. You have now more than is usually granted. I am getting full instructions ready for the surveyor, and you can send him just as soon as I get the order. I would not invest any money in any such speculation, nor can I advise any of my friends to put money in a place of which I know nothing.

"Yours truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"THE AGREEMENT.

"Memorandum of agreement made this third day of April, A.D. 1882:

"Between
"John Adams, of the City of Winnipeg,
"Of the first part,
"And
"Nannie Maria Rykert, of the City of St. Catharines,
"Of the second part.

"Whereas the above named John Adams has, through the intervention of John Charles Rykert, obtained certain limits in the North-West Territories, at or near the Cypress Hills, and has, in consideration of the services of the said Rykert, voluntarily given him, agreed, to and with the said party hereto of the second part, to give to her one-half of the proceeds of the said limits, after deducting all expenses connected therewith;

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"Witnesseth that the said party of the first part, in consideration of the sum of one dollar to him in hand, paid by the party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and in further consideration of the premises, hath agreed, and by these presents doth agree, to assign and transfer to the said party of the second part one-half interest in the limits applied for and to be granted by the Government at or near the Cypress Hills, in the North-West Territory, and to pay over and account to her for one-half of all the net proceeds of the sale of all timber thereon, or for the purchase money derived therefrom, after deducting all expenses and charges in connection therewith.

"Witness the hands and seals of the parties hereto the day and year above written.

"(Signed) JOHN ADAMS.

"(Witness) J. C. RYKERT."

"IF HE COULD ONLY SEE M'CARTHY.

"8th April, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS.—I was engaged nearly all yesterday running back and forward to the Department in connection with the limit. The clerks were driven to death with some colonisation matter, and could not complete the matter. I have an appointment for Monday at 11 o'clock, when I hope to get the copy of the notes and full instructions for the surveyor. I see that the application of Laidlaw was put in on January 12, '82, before yours? you will see. I got hold of the paper and examined for myself, so that there is no humbugging. They sent a surveyor named Lynch out there to examine the whole country. I hope you will be able to select a good lot from the large country you have to choose from. We have twenty miles by twenty, which is equal to 400 square miles. You had better not let a moment slip, but have all ready, as I expect to give full instructions by Tuesday at the latest. If I could only see McCarthy we would have no difficulty at all. I hope to see him early in the week. Let me hear about the coal in the Souris district, also enquire about the timber limit in the East.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"8th April, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT.—What keeps the instructions back? Can't you hurry them up? I am sorry you did not get 800 square miles to pick from. I think the delay will make it very costly to get the survey made. I think I can get up a company in Winnipeg to pay $40,000 or $50,000. Then you can apply for another for me.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"10th April, 1882.

(Re Limit.)

"MY DEAR ADAMS.—After calling at the office eight or ten times I got the enclosed copy of Order in Council. It will be pushed through very likely to-morrow if the Government is not too lazy. You will see they give us 400 square miles to choose from. If this is not satisfactory I do not know what is. Get your surveyor ready, and I will have his instructions in a few days. They give us six months.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT.

"If you can get $40,000 let it go, and we will get another. Try McCarthy. Perhaps he will buy."

"11th April, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS.—I, to-day, saw McCarthy, and he was terribly surprised to hear that I had got the limit, as he was refused point-blank. He is willing to join with us in the survey, and I go to Hamilton to get Laidlaw to say where he wants the limit. He has written me he will do almost anything if I will assist him in getting his. I will write you from home on Thursday. The Order in Council went before the Government to-day, and it is likely it will pass at once. Instructions will then be given to the surveyor. We are awfully lucky, as the Deputy told me that no other man could have forced them to yield.

"J. C. RYKERT."

"16th April, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT.—What is keeping back the order for the surveyor? I am getting very uneasy. Just as soon as this is settled, I can get up a company for $30,000 or $40,000, or put in the whole for $70,000 cash. If I succeed I want to go for something else which I have on hand.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"St. CATHARINES, 16th April, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—You will see by the enclosed letter that my letter to Gardiner was taken out of the post office by the wrong man. I am expecting the instructions by to-day's mail. What keeps them, I cannot tell. The order was passed several days ago. Laidlaw is to meet me in Hamilton to-morrow. He has not yet got his order, and is now of the opinion that I have more INFLUENCE THAN MCCARTHY, who told me he was refused by the Government. I hope you have really made a good strike, after all the trouble and annoyance. I expect to write you on my return to Ottawa.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT.

"Have you engaged any surveyor?"

"21st April, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—Until I returned here to-day, I thought instructions had been sent to you, as they were promised some days ago. The Order in Council has been finally passed, and this although every effort was made to induce the Government to alter their minds. It now only remains to have the survey, and of this you will have to be the best judge. Laidlaw expects to get his, now that you have succeeded; and yesterday offered to pay one-half of the expenses, and will see you as early as possible as to this. He was very anxious to know how much I was to get, and I told him that it was very little, if anything. He says the limit is a splendid one, and thinks that his is worth $50,000 at the lowest. He thinks you and he can join together and put into a company. McCarthy wrote me that your limit is not worth a cent. This is poor encouragement; but Laidlaw, who has had the Cypress Hills explored, says they are good. Will write fully to-morrow.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"24th April, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I have daily gone to the office for instructions and copy of Order in Council. I now enclose order, which you will see gives you the right over 400 miles. This is the largest privilege ever given to select from, and none has ever passed in the same speedy manner. I enclose memorandum of one of the clerks, showing he will prepare instructions in a day or two. I will keep at him daily. Get ready to leave at once. Laidlaw offered to bet me $1,000 I could not get the order passed for you, as he had been refused in January and again in February. You ought to get up company, if possible, and sell half for, say, $35,000, or the whole for $70,000. If this is done, I will go for something else.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"10th May, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—Laidlaw only got his order passed this week, and he had to get me to help him; so you see who had the influence with the Government after all. You must tell the surveyor to examine the whole limit, and after picking out the best for us let him pick out another, so that I can put in another application if there is enough timber. He might also examine the limit south and see what there is there. If he can pick out two he ought to get the true description of it. I think the best way is to go by Fort Benton. Let me hear from you.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"Received telegraph that C. P. R. cutting timber in the limit.

Answer.

"To JOHN ADAMS.
"Notify manager of company not to trespass on your land.

"J. C. RYKERT."

"2nd July, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT,—I sent you word to-day that the C. P. R. was cutting my timber, and after getting answer, notified the company. They have cut a good deal of the timber, and I think they will have to pay for it. Muckle thinks I can get the C. P. R. to purchase at $60,000 or $70,000. I am trying to get them to bite at it, anyway. Can they not get the balance of the timber in the 400 miles? I will tell them to see you at Ottawa. I would like to work the limit if the C. P. R. will not buy. It will pay better than all the cash we can get.

21

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"WINNIPEG, 18th July, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT,—Mercer is back from the limit, and he will write you fully to-day. It is a great limit, and I am now satisfied the limit is well worth $150,000 to the C. P. R., and they must have the timber, as there is none nearer than Winnipeg, but they are a hard people to satisfy about the value, unless Muckle will tell them all about it. I will try to get him to feel the men in the office here. I will go to Ottawa as soon as you are ready.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"St. CATHARINES, 24th July, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I am in receipt of your favor, and am pleased to learn that the limit has panned out all right, as I was in great dread it would be a failure. I am in a certain sense glad that Laidlaw has failed, as he acted so infernal mean about it. I think if you can get $80,000 you better sell immediately, or less than that. If as good as you say, the C. P. R. can give us at least $60,000 and expenses. You better see them at once, and if they will bite at all tell them I will assist them in getting all the timber within the twenty square miles. It is important to realise the cash when we can look out for more. Have you stopped them from cutting? This is necessary. I see by the papers that the C. P. R. is cutting timber at the Cypress Hills. I do not think it will pay to work. The cash is very much better. I would not delay at all in seeing the company. Perhaps Muckle can urge them to buy.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"25th July, 1882.

"DEAR MR. RYKERT,—Surveyor preparing his report, and it will be sent to you immediately. Hope I can sell to the C. P. R. and get rid of the limit, as I would rather have the cash and then I could get up a company for another limit.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"St. CATHARINES, 1st August, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I duly received your letter to-day and hasten to reply to the same. It will be necessary, I think, that I should see the report before it goes in. You had better get the surveyor to send his report addressed to the Minister, under cover to me, and I will examine same before taking to Ottawa. It will also be necessary to send the instructions which I forwarded to you, so that I can see that they are fully complied with. It seems to me that he ought not to be paid in full until you ascertain that his report is all O.K. I hope he has done as directed. It may be necessary for me to correct them, and, therefore, I think they better be sent to me first under cover. If all right, I will send them on. I still am of the opinion that you better sell out bodily and get the cash, if they will pay you $75,000 or $80,000. We would then be in a position to go in for something larger, if possible. What are trees worth in the ground standing? What, also, are telegraph poles worth? That notice in the paper is pretty well got up. I guess I can see who wrote it or dictated it. Can you not get some railway man in whom you have confidence to go to Van Horne and tell him the railway company ought to purchase, and that the limit is well worth $150,000. Some such a game as this might take well.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"There is no necessity for you coming to Ottawa at all. I can get it all done without you. All they do is to mail a lease, as usually done. No use in wasting money travelling."

Letter referred to in August 8th Globe :

"3rd August, 1882.

"DEAR RYKERT,—I am so anxious about this affair that I will leave for Ottawa next week, and will meet you in Toronto on my way. I have got a regular bonanza. Don't let them beat me out of it after all my hard work and expense in paying thousands for survey. I was talking to McCauley about getting up a company, but Peter has not much faith in it. I think I can sell for $80,000 or $90,000 cash, or I might get up a company at double that amount and take half as stock.

"Yours truly,
"JOHN ADAMS."

"St. CATHARINES, 8th August, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I duly received your letter yesterday. It is utterly useless for you to come here at an expense to get the matter closed up. Just as soon as I get the surveyor's report I will proceed to Ottawa and get the license as early as possible. It will likely take some time. I really hope you have the bonanza you expect you have. It will be satisfactory to know after my hard fight with the Government that I did get what you anticipated. I would not go through the same difficulty again for twice the amount. I never spent such six weeks before as I did while endeavoring to force the Department to do justice. The fact of their having refused McCarthy before had a great deal to do with the delay and refusal. Poor Laidlaw. I am pleased he did not get the start of this child. He thought he was very smart and had all the influence of the country at his back. I think another time they will recognise the fact that J. C. R. is not very easily defeated at anything. If you can get \$80,000 you had better sell, or if you can get up a company for say \$140,000, or even less, you reserving $\frac{1}{3}$ or $\frac{1}{4}$ of the stock, it might be better. This would enable you to have a considerable lot of money, and still have an interest in the result. It seems to me that while the matter is hot it would be well to do something in this way in Winnipeg. I shall wait very anxiously for the surveyor's report, so that I can get the matter satisfactorily closed up. The people here are delighted to know that you have got a good thing. What does McCarthy think of it now? He wrote me that there was nothing in it last winter.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"Tel. as to Field Notes referred to in Globe, Aug. 19:

"August 18, 1882.

"TO JOHN ADAMS.

"Field notes arrived. The oath of surveyor not sworn to. Get him to draw up and swear to another, which I will attach to report. Answer.

"(Sgd.) J. C. RYKERT."

"Laidlaw interfered with granting Order in Council.

"St. CATHARINES, 19th August, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I duly received the report of the surveyor last night, but unfortunately the oath was not signed by him, and I at once telegraphed you to get him to mail me another oath duly signed and sworn to before a commissioner or magistrate, with his signature. I can attach it to the report. I have been terribly disappointed at this mistake, as I intended leaving here to-day for Ottawa. This will delay me at least another week. I see by the report that there are 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles of timber instead of 50 miles. If this is all timber, as it appears to be, you will have a grand future. Would it not be well to make an effort to get up a company, putting in the land at \$150,000. We might take stock to the amount of one-third. How would it do to give Wolf, say, \$5,000 to get up a company, or whatever you can agree upon. I read Laidlaw's letter. He thinks you are mistaken as to the limit he applied for having no timber. Now that it is well known that you have a grand limit, I think there will be no difficulty in getting up a large company. I want Mrs. R.'s half to bring her in \$50,000 if possible. I hope you got telegraph and that you have sent me the oath. It is important that the magistrate or commissioner should sign his name as well as the surveyor.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"J. C. R. Tel. to Adams:

"Aug. 28, 1882.

"TO JOHN ADAMS,—Laidlaw trying to upset arrangement. Decision end of next week.

"(Sgd.) J. C. R."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

"St. CATHARINES, 14th September, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I wanted to see you this morning but you are always so impatient it is hard to keep you in one spot. On Saturday next I hope to have the Order passed in Council. Bowell has promised me he will do all he can to put it through. It may take all the week. I will be in Toronto to-morrow, and expect to leave by train for Kingston to-morrow night. Saturday morning I will telegraph you where and when to meet me. I want to see you. I feel quite confident we are all right.

"Yours,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"St. CATHARINES, 6th October, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I am waiting very patiently, expecting every day to hear from you in reference to the limit. I hope you will soon be able to organise a company at the figure we mentioned, viz. $250,000. If, however, you can get $200,000 in cash I would be inclined to let it go, and then go in for something still better. I hope we can realize a hundred thousand each. We deserve something for the trouble we have gone to and the amount of flesh we have lost, thinking over it. It is really a wonder that I succeeded for you at all, when we consider all the opposition we had. I will leave here on receipt of telegram, if you think I can do any good. I have written Calvin Brown, of Minneapolis, to try and get up a company. He is a pretty good hand for that. Would it not be well to enquire at some of the Yankee cities, what you can get a portable saw-mill and machinery for? It might be important to have it ready to take over the C.P.R. this fall when they have built another 100 miles, as I suppose they will do this fall. It is likely they will be within fifty miles of the limit before the winter. Telegraph me if anything likely to come out of it.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"St. CATHARINES, 28th November, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—It is clearly understood that Hunter was to have all over $175,000. If he is not satisfied we cannot help that—a bargain is a bargain. I thought Mercer would reach the place by Friday last as he can go all the way to Swift Current by cars. I hope I shall hear from you this week by telegraph, and that they have closed up the matter. I cannot do any business, as I am so much annoyed about this and so anxious. I cannot be away from here on the 11th, 12th and 13th of December, as I have Court at that time.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"St. CATHARINES, 12th December, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I have been very much put out by this additional time given to the parties to purchase, and am fearful the delay will very much prejudice us in the event of their falling to carry out the agreement. I can get up a company which will run the whole affair, advance all the money we want for the working, and take one-third of the profits. This is as good as we could expect, as everybody want one-half to run it. I can get good men on whom we can rely. Did you agree to give thirty days from the time they accept to pay the money? If so, this will put us into January. I have lost all my fall Courts through this. I had two Courts this week, and being afraid that I might be required any day, I let all the business go, which will hurt my office very much. This will not be of much account, however, if we can close up this matter. Don't let them beat you down away. If any person has to come down, Hunter must, and not us. The securities ought to be so that they can be easily handled and not all in one lump, as we will have to give Hunter his. Don't take me up until you know I am required.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"St. CATHARINES, 25th December, 1882.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—What is the reason that some person writes the full particulars of our business to some parties here? Mercer or some member of the family has written all the facts to Seymour, and he is telling them all about the city. This is very injudicious, and contrary to what I asked you to do. It is of the utmost importance to keep the sale out of the papers, or we may be injured at Ottawa. Already they are threatening the Government to bring the matter before the House, and, if they do it, will perhaps hurt us very much. If Sir John knows the facts, he may prevent the transfer being recognised. Now let me again urge you to see that this is kept quiet. Why does Mercer want to tell all the Seymour family? You might as well publish it in the Globe at once, as they tell all they know on the streets. Let me know as early as possible the day Sands will go up, so that I can be prepared.

"It is important also to pay the next year's rent on the 1st of January.

"Wishing you all a Merry Christmas.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"WINNIPEG, MAN., 16th January, 1883.

"Received from John Adams thirty-five thousand dollars in cash by drafts on the Bank of Montreal, and four notes of Louis Sands for thirty-nine thousand two hundred dollars, payable in one and two years. All payable to the order of Mrs. N. M. Rykert and in full of the moneys payable to her under agreement.

"J. C. RYKERT.
"Her Attorney."

"MANISTEE, MICH., 22nd January, 1883.

"Hon. J. C. RYKERT,
"St. Catharines, Ont.

"DEAR SIR,—I have been informed by parties from Cypress Hill region, and also by papers, that the Canadian Pacific R. R. Co. have, and are now cutting and hauling timber, ties, &c., from the Cypress Hill limit.

"Will you please make the necessary enquiries, and if true that they have been cutting, &c. please inform me how to proceed in order to arrive at settlement with them, for which information, &c., I will settle with you in due time. I have written the superintendent of said company at Winnipeg, but he may take no notice of it.

"Respectfully,
"LOUIS SANDS,
"Per MAGRAN."

"ST. CATHARINES, 27th January, 1883.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I could not until to-day ascertain why they delayed in sending me the renewed license. By to-day's Globe I see that the C.P.R. claim the limit is within the twenty-four-mile belt, and that they are entitled to the alternate sections. I see by the map that they are at least thirty miles away. I have not yet heard from the Government, but expect to hear to-night. It will be very important to get a surveyor to go there immediately and ascertain exactly where they run their line. You have the description of the limit or, if not, McArthur has it. Let the surveyor go at once and measure exactly from the centre of the railway to the limit. He can find the township corner and tell exactly. It will be a terrible thing if we are to lose half of the limit. Keep this perfectly quiet, or Sands will be scared to death. If the C.P.R. are entitled to the alternate sections, we must buy them out. Can't lose one minute in sending a surveyor. It will not take him but a few days to measure and show where the C.P.R. runs. Perhaps this map in our railway office will show this.

"I have not slept a minute for the last week, being anxious about the renewal. Surveyor ought to go there for $8 or $10 per day. It is very important for me to show them this at Ottawa as early as possible.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"ST. CATHARINES, 28th January.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I wrote you yesterday to get the distance between the limit and the railway surveyed or measured, in order that we might know whether or not the limit is within the railway belt; that is, within twenty-four miles from the railway. I have heard from Gouin, of Ottawa, that the C. P. R. have claimed it is, and that they are entitled to every alternate section, just as the Globe states. If this is so, we are in a bad fix, as Mr. Sands will claim that he has been defrauded, of course. You sold in good faith and relied upon the Government renewing the license. I have to go to Ottawa to-morrow night to fight the matter out, which I do not like. I mean to have all the hardest part of it to do. I have Bowell working for me. And if we succeed in beating the railway, we will have to pay the amount we agreed to pay, as you recollect, when we two were at the Queen's Hotel. I have not slept any for a week on account of this. We must keep perfectly quiet. I telegraphed you to-day to go to the C. P. R. office and examine their map or plan of the line. That will show where they run. If they go, as their printed map shows, between 12 and 13 townships, then they are over 24 miles away, as we are in 7 and part of 8. If they run through the north part of township 12, we are still all right. I think the limit does not quite run up to the boundary; that is, the timber. I am engaging all I can to assist me at Ottawa, and we will have to pay them well for it, as we cannot afford to lose this. The limit is worth at least $200,000, even if the C. P. R. get a piece of it. I will telegraph you from Ottawa; and, if necessary, you will have to send a surveyor to measure exactly where they run and the exact distance from the limit. Under any circumstances, I think they are 24 miles from the timber. It may be they may take a small strip. At any rate we must know at once. Don't send out till I telegraph from Ottawa.

"Yours, &c.,
"J. C. R."

"12th February, 1883.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I have not yet succeeded in doing anything, but I am pulling wires in every direction. John A.'s son from Winnipeg, McCawthra's partner, is here, and I intend employing him to go for his father. I think if you had young Tupper here, and paid him pretty well, he would help us materially. The C. P. R. has a great hold on the Government, and we must counteract this in some way. I am completely sick of it, as it is something I had no right to expect, and which I should not be called upon to undertake. If it costs all we spoke of, we better do it than let it go. I expect to be in Toronto on Friday morning, as I will likely leave here Thursday. Call at the Queen's on Friday, at nine o'clock, as it is likely I will arrive during the previous night.

"Very truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"OTTAWA, 5th March, 1883.

"DEAR ADAMS,—I have not yet succeeded in getting anything done in the limit matter. I have brought Macdonald and Tupper from Winnipeg, and hope they will be able to induce their fathers to act properly in the matter. I am almost discouraged at the delay. Sands is writing me daily about it. He knows all about it. Some persons sent him the papers containing the statements. Will make any effort this week, and must do something if we have to let a note apiece go.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

9th March, 1883.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I find difficulties surrounding us in every way in reference to the limit, and I find that the C.P. R. have certain Ministers working for them. I am afraid it will cost us each six or seven thousand dollars to get this made all right. I have five or six at work for me, and have agreed to pay them well if they succeed. Muckle was here and told me the limit was all within the belt.

"I am afraid they will do their very utmost to defeat me. I want to be satisfied that you are sure I am doing what is right, and also that you will back me out in all that I do in the way of payment. Of course if you do not want me to fight the thing through let me know, and I will drop it right away. Even if we lost the amount I have mentioned, we had better do so than lose all, as we surely will, if we let these rascals have their own way. I think they have Muckle here for that very purpose.

"Very truly,
"J. C. RYKERT."

"28th March, 1883.

"MY DEAR ADAMS,—I am having a hard time with the limit matter. It will cost us each at least $5,500 to get this through. I have laid my ropes, so that I expect to have it settled in a few days. I have a dozen at work for us. You must be prepared to pay the amount of your share at any time, as it will have to be all cash. When this is settled we must get rid of all the notes and have an end of it. It has completely used me up. The excitement and strain is too much for me. I had Tupper and Macdonald brought from Winnipeg, and they have been working hard for me.

"Faithfully,
"J. C. RYKERT."

" MONTREAL, 28th April, 1883.

" TO J. C. RYKERT:
" Van Horne will do nothing; is taking timber off whole limit. Determined to have it, right or wrong.

" D. BERGIN."

" MANISTEE, MICH., 4th May, 1883.

" HON. J. C. RYKERT, Ottawa, Can. :

" DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 30th ult. and 2nd inst. are both received, and contents carefully noted. I have telegraphed you to-day that I wanted the whole of the Cypress Hill limit and would write you. Consequently I will endeavor to explain my views and ideas in this matter. When I went to Winnipeg last winter, and paid out $200,000 in cash and notes for the purchase of the Cypress Hill, and paid a large fee for legal advice, I little thought I would have to go through this siege of anxiety and trouble, not knowing the law and rules regulating those land limits in your country. I relied entirely upon the legal and friendly advice given me at Winnipeg, and, having paid all that the Cypress limit is worth, I feel somewhat as if your Government ought to protect me in this matter. Under the present circumstances, it looks to me as if I had paid my money, etc., to parties for land upon which they had no rights or titles, but, on the other hand, if they had a right and title to said limit, they certainly had right to the whole. Hence my claim for the whole of said limit. I have no fear of any fights with the C. P. R. Company and I do not think it would be to their advantage to injure themselves by injuring me. They certainly must be business men. But I propose to be candid and fair in this matter, and as I wish to have no litigation, I will entertain any of the two following propositions:—

" (1) If the amount of money and notes paid for said limit, viz., $200,000, is returned to me, I will assign my claim and title to said Cypress limit to the Railroad Company or any one else.

" (2) If all my notes given—$100,000—are cancelled and returned to me, I will be satisfied to take half, or even sections of the limit for the amount paid in cash. On any other conditions it would be impossible for me to get back the full price, viz.: $200,000 as per contract. Had I known or expected any trouble in this land matter, I should not have ordered my mill machineries, engine, boilers and logging apparatus, all of which will be ready to ship to Manitoba in ten or twelve days, and will be of considerable loss to me if I am not allowed to operate as first anticipated. You write and telegraph that you wish that I should look up and measure some other limits in Moose Mountain or west in the Territory. You must remember that it will require at least a couple of months for a surveyor to look up and measure a part of the limits mentioned, and, besides, what security would I have to invest again a large amount of money in looking up any other limits, if the Railway Company have a right, or can at any time work their way into any limit which they fancy may be of some benefit to them. Hence I trust that you will continue to uphold and defend my rights and titles to the whole of the Cypress limit, and that you will soon be able to obtain for me the necessary license.

" Respectfully,
" LOUIS SANDS,
" Per MAGRAN."

" STADACONA HALL, OTTAWA, 6th June, 1883.

" MY DEAR RYKERT,—I have yours of the 5th inst. Tupper said he would see George Stephen about your matter. Stephen writes me to-day that he has seen Tupper, but does not speak of your business. He (Stephen) is to be here on Saturday and will dine with me. I will then talk your affairs over with him, and afterwards write or telegraph you.

" Yours faithfully,
" (Signed) JOHN A. MACDONALD.

" J. C. RYKERT, Esq., M.P.,

" TORONTO, 2nd July, 1883.

" DEAR MERCER,—I waited over until this time (3 p.m.) in the hope of seeing you. I saw Sir John, and have, I think, made satisfactory arrangements for the license, which will satisfy Sands. The arrangement is to purchase the right of the C. P. R., and then take a patent direct to Sands for his half and license for the other. Ultimately Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

you will get patent for the whole. Negotiations are going on with Stephen and Sir John, and they expect to close them in a few days. You must manage to let me have the $5,000 before you go, or, failing this, I will take note maturing January next, and pay your $5,000. I prefer you negotiating the same yourself.

" I will leave here this afternoon at 3.55, and will expect to see you in St. Catharines to-morrow morning. It is likely I will have to go again to Ottawa Tuesday or Wednesday.

" I am quite pleased with the result of my work here. It has been a hard go. Not another soul could do what I have done in this, for the C. P. R. is powerful. Laidlaw and McCarthy are also doing their very best. Of course, I will not use any money unless I succeed here, that you can rely upon.

" Tell me when you will meet me.

" You must not fail to have ready the means or its equivalent.

" Faithfully,
" J. C. RYKERT."

" ST. CATHARINES, 5th July, 1883.

" By telegraph from Ottawa, Ont.

" TO J. C. RYKERT, M. P.—Stephen demurs to the price. I write from Rivière du Loup.

" JOHN A. MACDONALD."

" HOUSE OF COMMONS, 23rd Jan., 1884.

" DEAR MERCER,—I wrote you yesterday at the Hotel Baltimore as requested. I mentioned the fact that Sands had been to see me, and tried very hard to have the notes renewed. I told him they were in the hands of the bank, and he finally agreed to pay them, which he did five days before they were due.

" I fully satisfied him as to the whole matter, otherwise I am afraid he would have repudiated. So you will find that you have been paid the notes. This is really a grand thing for us. There is the devil to pay in the House about the whole affair, and it is really too bad that I am compelled to bear all the brunt of it.

" I hope you are enjoying yourself. Why not come on here and let me show Mrs. Mercer the Lions of Ottawa. I shall be in St. Catharines on Saturday, 2nd Feb.

" Faithfully,
" J. C. RYKERT."

" HOUSE OF COMMONS, 20th Feb., 1884.

" MY DEAR MERCER,—I have got the syndicate matter all satisfactorily arranged for the company. I have written Sands to-day. I knew I could fetch them to time.

" I wrote you to St. Catharines, as I did not get your address until to-day.

" Very truly,
" J. C. RYKERT."

" ST. CATHARINES, ONT., 19th Jan., 1885.

" MY DEAR MERCER,—I got word to-day that Sands would pay the notes at maturity. That is to-day. I have not heard from there to-day, but expect telegraph to-night. I am certain they will be paid. The bank discounted them of Mrs. R., but I have not yet enquired if they have heard anything.

" Very truly,
" J. C. RYKERT."

" SANDS' LETTERS.

" February 21st, '83.—I trust you will be able to protect my interest in the land transaction, for which services I will be happy to pay on demand.

" April 10th, '83.—Should any one interfere with my limit, I shall telegraph you to advise how to proceed.

" May 4th, '83.—I trust you will continue to uphold and defend my right and title to the whole limit at Cypress Hills, and that you will soon be able to obtain for me the necessary limit.

" June 5th, '83.—Hence I trust and am in hopes still that you will succeed in getting me a license for the whole limit, in which event I will have lost nothing. If, however, you fail to induce your Government to do this act of justice, you will undoubtedly get me a license for the even sections as soon as possible.

" September 23rd, '83.—Trusting you will look after my interest and not let any opportunity slip that may tend to increase my claim or strengthen our side of the case.

"February 18th, '84.—If, however, it is now a settled fact that I cannot get the whole limit purchased from Adams and the syndicate will allow me to locate a certain number of sections, not exceeding eight in all, and which they claim, as soon as the snow and weather will permit in the spring, I will have them looked up, and will pay their price, viz., $3.00, allowing Government price, $2.28.

" LOUIS SANDS' AFFIDAVIT.

"It may be as well to add to this interesting correspondence the affidavit made by Louis Sands, in February, 1887:—

"State of Michigan, }
County of Manistee. } [L.S.]

"Louis Sands, of the City of Manistee, lumberman, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That on or about the 16th day of December, 1882, he was induced by the representations of P. B. Hunter, a broker of Winnipeg, to pay ten thousand dollars for the refusal of the Cypress Hills timber limit at the price of two hundred thousand dollars, if the said limit should on examination turn out as represented and contain one hundred million feet of good lumber.

"He then procured the services of Henry S. Hudell, a land surveyor, who resided in the city of Manistee, and in whose integrity he had until that time the utmost confidence, and he sent the said Henry S. Hudell up to the North-West to locate the said limit and report thereon.

"The said Henry S. Hudell proceeded to the North-West for the purpose aforesaid, and reported that the limit was as represented, and contained one hundred million feet of good pine lumber; and that he has been informed and verily believes that the said Hudell was bribed to make such a report.

"That on the receipt of the said report, he, the said Louis Sands, proceeded to Winnipeg and completed the said purchase, and at the time of the completion of the said purchase there were present Messrs. Rykert, Adams and Hunter, and I then and there paid for the said limit ninety thousand dollars in cash and one hundred thousand dollars in notes payable in one and two years from the date thereof, with interest at eight per cent., besides the ten thousand dollars cash previously paid.

"Forty-nine thousand one hundred dollars of said notes were made to John Adams, and by him endorsed without recourse to N. M. Rykert and in her name discounted at the Bank of Montreal in Winnipeg, twenty thousand dollars were given to R. B. Hunter and by him discounted, and the balance, thirty thousand nine hundred dollars, were retained or disposed of by the said John Adams.

"Upon the completion of the said purchase, he purchased a saw mill, and at once transported it, with equipments, to the said limit, at a cost of forty thousand dollars; and upon the arrival of said mill he discovered, for the first time, that the said limit was not at all as represented; that instead of there being one hundred million feet of good lumber, there was not timber enough to make twenty million feet of lumber, and that the said timber was small stuff, and would cost more to manufacture than it can be sold for in that part of the country.

"After purchasing the said limit he found that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was entitled to every odd section of the said limit, which comprised one-half of the whole limit; he then was compelled to pay an additional sum of four thousand six hundred and eighty dollars to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company before he could do anything thereon.

"That the license for said timber limit was in the names of Joseph Benjamin McArthur, and John Charles Rykert, and by them assigned to him, the said Louis Sands, on the 21st day of December, 1884.

"13th February, 1890.

"J. W. INGRAM, Esq.—Referring to the correspondence published in the Globe of Saturday last, I beg to say I am more surprised than yourself at its publication. The suit was settled agreeable to my clients, and one of the terms of the agreement was that the correspondence should be given up and no use made of the copies, and this, speaking for myself and to the best of my belief for my clients, has been faithfully adhered to. If the correspondence had been given publication by me or my clients, it would certainly be a gross breach of faith and a violation of the signed agreement entered into.

were published in the Globe newspaper under date of 8th February instant, containing divers statements affecting certain members of this House, and it is expedient that the House should have an opportunity of examining the same, it be ordered, that the said letters above recited be printed in the Votes and Proceedings for the use of members, together with certain other letters furnished by the hon. member for Lincoln and included therein.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope the notice will be inserted in the Orders of the Day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there can be no objection on the part of any hon. gentleman that the Clerk of the House will be directed to arrange these in due sequence and chronological order.

Mr. BOWELL. Might I ask, are there additional papers put in?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot say. I just received a package a few minutes ago from the hon. member for Lincoln, who is absent from the House on important business. As far as I can judge, from glancing over them, they are much the same as he read yesterday. Whatever they may be I think we ought to allow them to be appended.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have given instructions to get the Order in Council copied for the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to alter my motion by adding the words "included therein" instead of "appended thereto."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LOBSTER FACTORIES IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I am anxious to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a return to an Order of the House made on the 8th February last year, and which was only received a few days ago. I do not see any reason why this return has been delayed so long, for I believe I had the right, and the House had the right, and the whole country had the right, to know the answer given to the Order of the House by this return long ago. I may say, however, that it looks as if any consideration, even the smallest, is good enough for Prince Edward Island. That, however, is not the greatest complaint I have to make.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact, that he is debating a matter not before the House. The hon. gentleman can ask for an explanation, but he must not go beyond that. He cannot delay the proceedings of the House by raising a debate on a matter not before it.

Mr. PERRY. I contend that the return does not contain the information sought for, and I wish to call the attention of the Minister to that fact. The notice of motion asked for the number of lobster-packing factories around the coast of Prince Edward Island, but the Minister does not give that; he merely gives the names and the number of those who were fined, and those who paid those fines and those who did not. I say the answer in the return is not complete. As there seems to be a desire in the House to not allow me to fully go into this matter, I will take another course, and I will see the reason why the return has not been given as asked for.

Mr. TUPPER. I do not think there is any occasion for the hon. gentleman to take any other course at all. There is no disinclination on the part of myself to withhold the information he now asks, for I have not looked lately at the motion with reference to the information that was desired, but my recollection of the matter, both in connection with the discussion and conversation with the hon. gentleman, was that his motion was confined entirely to the information I brought down. That is to say, the names of the persons fined, and those who had paid, and those who had not paid the fines. It is a very easy thing to give the hon. gentleman the information he now seeks, and a supplementary return, if necessary, will be brought down.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of the Bill (No. 10) to further amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter fifty, respecting the North-West Territories; the motion of Mr. Davin in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Beausoleil in amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker: I realise, Sir, that the question under discussion is one likely to provoke angry feelings and race prejudices, and I shall endeavor to make the remarks that I have to make to-day in a conciliatory spirit. I shall of course feel bound to state my convictions, but I shall endeavor to do so courteously, and without, at all events, giving needless offence. I shall not agree with many of my fellow members of the House—with the majority of them probably—but, I shall ask of them that toleration that I accord to them in the discussion of this matter. It is, Sir, a disquietening question, and necessarily so. It is to be regretted that it is disquieting, but it cannot be helped. We might purchase quiet by the avoidance of the question entirely. We might purchase quiet by allowing matters to go on in the course they have been going without any protest or without any attempt on the part of those who believe that danger is ahead to avert that danger. I do not consider, Sir, that that course is necessary or advisable. We are certainly capable of discussing this question in this high court of the nation, in a spirit of fairness stating our convictions; and after having heard the arguments that are to be presented on both sides, the House will decide the question as the majority of its members deem proper.

The speakers who have addressed the House on this subject in the earlier part of this debate have, as a rule, taken the ground that a community of language in a country is not essential; many of them, indeed, I infer from their remarks, entertain the opinion that it is not even desirable. We have had the example of states in ancient times, cited here in a sense which would lead one to suppose that the speakers thought the example of those states worthy to be copied by us. We have had allusion made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to the fact that of the federal unions now existing in the world two of them do not possess community of language; and I think, Sir, if we regard the history, the present position and the progress of those three federal unions, we shall find a very striking argument in favor of the doctrine I have advanced, that a community of language is desirable; for certainly neither the federal union of the cantons of Switzerland, nor that of the Provinces of Canada, bears any comparison with the federal union of the United States in point of development, population and power. The hon. member for Assiniboia treated us the other night to an exceedingly witty speech; I do not know that I can say that the spirit of the speech was quite in keeping with the magnitude and importance of the question he had under discussion. In the course of his speech he said that if you wished to make the French language permanent, you had but to attempt to restrict it. I do not know that the experience of the world would bear that assertion out. I do not know that the French language has been made permanent in the United States. Louisiana soon after was admitted into the American Union, the French language was not sanctioned as an official language; and the result of that prohibition or restriction, if the hon. member prefers the latter term, has not been to make the language permanent, but, on the contrary, to thoroughly diffuse and assimilate with the American element the French population near the mouth of the Mississippi; and I do not believe that any fair or proper attempt to secure the dominance of the English tongue in this country will have the result of making the French language predominant or increasing its use in the country.

My hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) gave us a very nice essay on ancient history. He went back to the days of Queen Esther, and told us how King Ahasuerus sent his letters in 127 different languages to 127 different provinces. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had gone a little further back, which he might very properly have done, to the time of the Tower of Babel, he would have found a time when one language was in use; in the 11th chapter of the Book of Genesis, he would have read :

“And the Lord said, behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do; and nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do.”

“Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language that they may not understand one another's speech.”

Evidently the Almighty recognised the power of a community of language, and frustrated the attempts that were being made by the people of that day : he scattered them over the face of the earth, and brought in more than a dual language among the peoples of the world. The hon. member for North York tells us that Greece had a community of language, and yet that out of that community rival states with their animosities and bickerings arose, and there was no such thing as a national feeling in Greece. The great trouble with Greece was that it wanted commercial union, and the day of commercial union had not yet come. If the Greeks had adopted that policy, the bickerings and animosities which existed among those states speaking the same language would gradually have disappeared. In Rome, the hon. gentleman tells us, there were the Greek, the Latin, and numerous other tongues ; they had no community of language in that great empire. Necessarily they had not. The Roman Empire was composed of conquered states ; it had spread from the city on the Tiber, until it had covered nearly the whole of the known world ; but does the hon. gentleman propose to tell us that the debates of the Roman senate, the Roman code, or the Roman statutes, were reproduced in all the languages spoken in that great empire ? I think not. I think there was nothing in the Roman Empire corresponding to the condition of things we have in Canada to-day. Latin was used in the proceedings of the Senate and was I venture to assert, the official language of the Roman Empire. Then the hon. gentleman came down to the days of modern history, and he gave us a long list of the nations having more than one language. He tells us that Spain, Italy, Sweden, the Netherlands, Russia, Austria, Turkey—

Mr. MULOCK. No ; I said nothing of Turkey.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, we will drop Turkey. Does the hon. gentleman propose to hold those nations up for us to copy ? Shall we copy the institutions of Spain, Russia or Austria ?

Mr. MULOCK. And Great Britain.

Mr. CHARLTON. We will come to Great Britain in a moment. Does the hon gentleman tell us that all the languages used in those countries were the official languages of their diets and assemblies, and that the laws were published in all those languages ? I think not ; and if they were, we do not want a model from them. Then, I come to England, as the hon. gentleman proposes. He tells us that in Great Britain we have not only English, but the Gaelic, the Welsh, the Irish, and the French in the Channel Islands. Well, are the debates in the Chamber at Westminster conducted in Gaelic, Irish, Welsh and French ? Are the resolutions put from the Chair of the House of Commons in all those languages ? Are those official languages ? By no means. English is the official language. The hon. gentleman tells us that the decrees of the English Parliament are read, I think he said from a high hill on the Isle of Man in the Manx language.

Well, if he wishes us to adopt that plan, there could be no objection I imagine, and we should then have all the decrees of this House read from the highest peak in the North-West, in French, in Icelandic, in Cree, in all the hundred and twenty-seven languages, more or less, that are spoken in that territory ; we need not quarrel with the hon. gentleman in regard to that. The hon. gentleman tells us that there is no need of resorting to repression. Well, Sir, we do not propose to resort to repression ; he is begging the question ; we do not propose to interfere with any rights that exist in Canada by virtue of the provisions of the British North America Act—not one of them ; but we do not want to extend certain features of our institutions to virgin soil ; we do not want to extend the confusion that necessarily exists from the use of two languages. While we do not want to interfere with a single vested right, which exists in this Confederation, by virtue of the Confederation Act of 1867, we deny that these are vested rights in the North-West Territories, a territory which has been acquired since Confederation, and we are not bound to have implanted in that soil the condition of things which we do not propose to interfere with, but the existence of which we lament in the older portions of the Dominion.

We next heard from our friend whose riding is Rouville (Mr. Gigault), a gentleman to whom I always listen with the greatest pleasure, a gentleman who is a logical speaker, and who represents his views temperately and forcibly. He accused my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with being governed by American rather than by British precedent and example. No doubt the hon. gentleman from Simcoe thought that American example might be as good to follow as the examples of some of the Continental States of Europe ; and I do not know but that we might in many cases, with profit to ourselves, have paid more attention than we have to American example. For instance, if we had taken pains to examine American precedents with regard to the Franchise law ; if we had seized ourselves of the fact that the American Constitutional Convention of 1787, after full consideration of the question, had decided to have no national franchise but State franchises, and that this decision was carried into effect and had been in operation for a hundred years with the greatest success and to the greatest satisfaction of the people, we might have avoided the legislative bungle which is now upon our Statute-book—the Dominion Franchise Act—and have satisfied the public more thoroughly than we have succeeded in doing. We might, if we had copied American example more closely, have taken the position earlier in the day on Provincial rights which has since been taken ; and I do not know that the fact of being influenced to any extent by American example should be cast as a slur upon any public man in this House in discussing any public question. The hon. gentleman then will perhaps pardon me if, in dealing with this question of community of language, I refer him to American example bearing directly upon this question—the example to which I referred incidentally a few moments ago of the treatment of the language question in the vast territory of Louisiana, which was acquired by the American Government in 1803. Here was an old French colony with a large French population, containing no Anglo-Saxon element of any consequence. It was necessary for the Government of the United States to give to the French citizens of Louisiana institutions and laws, and they made it a fundamental principle to be carried into effect at the earliest practicable moment, that the English language should be used through the territory as an official language, that the Legislature of Louisiana in its records of proceedings should use that tongue, and that the laws of Louisiana should be published in that tongue. Upon that basis the State of Louisiana was organised as speedily as possible, and upon that basis the French citizens of Louisiana became American citizens; and in course of time they have become so thoroughly assimilated that they are to-day American citizens in every sense of the word. Many eminent men come from this French element in Louisiana, such as General Beauregard, Pierre Soule, and scores of others, who figure in American history and have acquired prominence in American politics and literature. Any one going through New Orleans, as I did a short time ago, will see that there is one quarter of the city called the French quarter and another the English quarter. The old quarter which was occupied by the French is still called the French quarter, but you hear the English language everywhere, and you cannot discover any marked indication that you are among a people of foreign descent, so thoroughly Americanised have they become. That has been done in Louisiana, and the condition of things which exists there to-day is more desirable, certainly, to the American people than if they had a Quebec planted at the mouth of the Mississippi, just as we have one planted at the mouth of the St. Lawrence. Suppose the French language were extended over that vast territory comprising Louisiana and that great land west of the Mississippi, now comprising ten states and two territories, would that be a desirable state of things? Was not the wisdom of the American people shown in deciding that the French language should not be an official language either in the State of Louisiana as it exists at present or in any part of that vast territory west of the Mississippi extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the British line? Was not wisdom shown in excluding the French as an official language from that vast territory? Beyond question it was; and American example in that respect is an example we would do wisely to follow in dealing with the same question here.

There are other instances besides the one I have alluded to in the history of America. There is the example of the treatment of the Spaniards in Florida when that country was acquired by the Americans. The use of the vernacular language of the people was denied to them as an official language; the laws were not published in that language; the proceedings of the courts were not held in that language, but it was imperative that English should be used; and the consequence was that the Spanish population of Florida became speedily thoroughly assimilated with the Saxon population of the rest of the United States. We have another example. The United States, as a result of the war with Mexico, became possessed of the territory of California, which had a considerable Spanish population. Again the United States denied to that population the use of the Spanish tongue, as an official one, and made English the official language of the Legislature and the Courts. As a consequence these people have been swallowed up by that great assimilating maelstrom, and now, in a second generation, you can scarcely detect a trace of the Spanish nationality in the population of California. The Spanish element have become thoroughly assimilated with the American element, and thoroughly Americanised, and that has been accomplished by virtue of this rule, which the American Government invariably enforces when incorporating foreign elements into its body politic. We have another case—that of Texas. Texas was conquered and wrested from Mexico by a movement of adventurers from the South and South-West, and an independent nationality was erected there after a fierce struggle, characterised by such events as that of San Antonio, where the Alamo, defended by one hundred and ninety-two men, was captured by 7,000 Mexican troops after 1,600 of the assaulting force were killed, and not a soul left in the garrison. The bravery of the garrison is commemorated by the inscription on the monument in the square of San Antonio: "Thermopylae sent its messengers of defeat; the Alamo sent none." The courageous spirit of these defenders resulted in wresting Texas from the control of Mexico, and they made English the official language; and Texas is to-day one of the most prosperous and thoroughly American of all the American States, and you can scarcely find a trace of the existence of a foreign element in the population of that country.

Then my hon. friend instances the case of Cape Colony, and points to the fact that the Dutch language is an official language in that colony. Well, the circumstances of Cape Colony are quite similar to our own. The Dutch were the original settlers of the country. It was conquered by England, and it was wise probably to give to the Holland element of Cape Colony the use of their language. But Cape Colony is extending its bounds; English influence has crossed the Kahlari Desert to the north, and, following Livingston's pathway in his early explorations, has reached the Zambesi. England has taken possession of Lake Nyassa, a lake larger than Lake Erie, has shut out Portugal from that region, is pushing her possessions on further north to Lake Bangweola, and has already acquired a vast empire in South Africa, with immense possibilities and resources, an empire that may be the home of scores of millions of people in the future—a salubrious, fertile region containing hundreds of thousands of square miles. Does my hon. friend suppose the Dutch tongue will be extended to that region and become the official language in the new Provinces to be erected in that vast country, the basin of the Zambesi? I am sure such will not be the case.

Then the hon. gentleman alleged that my hon. friend from North Simcoe said in his speech that the French shall not read French literature. I do not understand the hon. gentleman to have said any such thing. I do not understand that he proposes to debar Frenchmen from the use of their literature or their tongue wherever they live. The Bill under the consideration of the House merely provides for the discontinuance of the French language as an official language in the North-West Territories. It says nothing about the right of the French people to read their language, or use it as they do to-day. It says nothing about the right of a Frenchman to use his language in this House, or throughout this Dominion. Wherever his rights exist under the Constitutional Act, he can preserve and cherish his language; he may refuse to allow his children to learn any other language if he chooses to do so. The hon. gentleman objects, also, to the preamble of this Bill. I think last year, my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, in the debate on the Jesuits' Estates Bill, said that the preamble had very little to do with the Bill, that the character of the measure was best shown by the provisions of the Bill itself. However, I see nothing objectionable in this preamble, which reads as follows :—

“Whereas it is expedient in the interest of the national comity of the Dominion that there should be a community of language amongst the people of Canada, and that the enactment in the North-West Territories Act allowing the use of the French should be expunged therefrom: Therefore Her Majesty, &c.”

That simply asserts that, in the interests of this Dominion, it would be well if we could have a community of language. I believe that statement, and I will support the Bill upon that assertion. The Bill itself asserts that the French language should not be used in the North-West as an official language. I believe that, and I shall vote that it shall not be used there. Those who think otherwise can vote the other way. Each of us is entitled to his own opinion, and probably each may entertain their opinion honestly. Then, the hon. gentleman says that the French Canadians want only fair play and justice. I should be ashamed to take the position that I intended to deny fair play and justice to the French Canadians; on the contrary, they should have the fullest justice and the utmost limit of fair play; but this is an English colony, we live under British laws and institutions, and there is a vast country in the North-West where all the institutions are plastic and unformed, and, because there are a few hundred or a few thousand children of French traders and French half-breeds in that territory, it is not necessary for the future welfare of this country that the dual language should be preserved there as official, with all the evils which we believe would flow from it to the general interests of the country. The North-West is likely to become the seat of power in this Dominion; it is likely to have the great majority of the people of this Dominion; it is likely to become the most productive part of the Dominion, and therefore it is of the utmost importance, at this time, that this change should be made, when it can be done without any great trouble. When that country is young and in a formative state, we should put it on the right track. The North-West ought not to be saddled with such a provision as the use of two official languages. I believe, in the interests of this country, that it should not be, and I shall so vote. My sense of duty impels me to do so. Then the hon. gentleman says, that Parliament is the proper place in which to deal with this. I thoroughly agree with him in that. The North-West Territories, have not yet Provincial institutions. This clause 110 emanated from us. With this Parliament rests the exclusive jurisdiction up to this moment, and, if this Parliament has taken a step which is not in the interest of the country, or has done any wrong, let us undo that wrong and retrace the step. I shall vote to retrace the step and undo the wrong. The hon. gentleman will vote that this provision shall not be repealed. He has a perfect right to do so, and so have all his fellow-countrymen, but I shall vote that it be repealed, because I think it is not in the interest of the country.

Then we come to our friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson), who tells us there were French in the North-West before there were English. So there were, and so there were in Ontario, and they had stations in Detroit before there were any English there at all, and they had other stations in Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin, and yet the French language has not been retained in those places. The English have acquired rights there by possession or purchase, and I believe that we may follow their example in the case of the Canadian North-West.

I come next to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. I am bound to say that I considered that speech last night a bitter one. The hon. gentleman possesses tact and diplomatic ability, but last night he did not succeed in concealing the bitterness of his feeling on this topic, a feeling amounting almost to a sense of hatred of those who were opposed to him. He paraded before the House—as, of course, he had a right to do so—his devotion to his Church and his loyalty to French Canadian institutions. He is undoubtedly loyal to them. Referring to the French settlers of the North-West, he asked “when have these men spoken treason?” I have not accused them of speaking treason but it is not long since they were in rebellion; and whether they were more in fault for that than my hon. friend and his colleagues, I am not now to say; but as to their loyalty to this country and its institutions, I doubt if they are entitled to any degree of consideration on that score. As to this question of loyalty and of the use of treasonable expressions, I must be permitted, I think, to refer to some of the circumstances which are indicative of the feeling amongst our French fellow-citizens, and I do this with a feeling of reluctance. I did not propose to do so; and, perhaps, it is not necessary to do so; but, I think, the Minister of Public Works challenged this reference by the allusion which he made in the course of his speech last night. In the city of Quebec, not many months ago, there was a great public demonstration on the occasion of the unveiling of a couple of statues, and speeches were then made by French Canadians of eminence, who may be supposed to give utterance to the feeling in French Canada, which, I think, possess a great deal of significance. I think there may be some here now who were present on that occasion. I have understood that the Tri-color was there displayed abundantly, and that the Union Jack was not so abundantly displayed; that the outward appearances would not impress any one with the idea that it was a British Province. I find that I have here a couple of extracts from the speech of the Premier of that Province, in the course of which he said:

“He was ready to declare that the Government of which he was the head was ready to disappear if that would be the means of uniting the French Canadian people for the triumph of their sacred cause. (Great applause.) For the sake of their nationality, for the sake of their religion, they must be united. Religion and nationality formed a harmonious union in their midst. The strength of the French Canadian people lay in the union of the people with the clergy.”

A little later on, the hon. gentleman used the following language :—

"By coupling the name of the Jesuit hero, Brébeuf, with the immortal Jacques Cartier, they said to their insulters: 'It is useless to imagine that we will ever cease to be French and Catholic. This monument declares that after a century of separation from our ancient mother, we are still French. (Applause.) More than that, we will remain French and Catholic.' (Great and long continued cheering.) He said this, not as a provocation, but as a reply. But once more he would say that to render this reply effective they must cease their fratricidal strife and be united. That was his word of advice to them on this great occasion. Let them cherish it and act accordingly, and all the actions of the fanatics of Ontario would come to naught. (Long continued applause.)"

An hon. member of this House, Colonel Amyot of the 9th Battalion, in response to the toast of the Militia, said, among other things:

"That they did not know the moment the French Canadian Militia would be called upon to guard their interest and their laws."

A statement that was received with great applause. Now, a little later on, we had a celebration at Montreal, and we had the ex-mayor of that city using the following language in a speech made by him:—

"French Canadians were the sons of these colonisers"—

He had been referring to the early colonial history of Canada, and the valor of the French Canadians in resisting the Iroquois and the English:

"French Canadians were the sons of these colonisers and fighters, and if they were not so good at firing guns as their forefathers, they would not be found wanting, if occasion required it, and the Iroquois and savages of to-day would be treated in a similar manner to those of former days."

Well, Sir, if I am to be compared to an Indian, I would rather be compared to a Iroquois than to a Digger Indian; but I think this language is not calculated to promote harmony and good feeling, and I think the language was not called for. There was nothing in the events connected with the agitation in the House last Session, and the agitation that followed that affair in the country, that called for any such manifestation of feeling in French Canada. A portion of the people of this country took the view that a law had been passed that ought to have been disallowed; they took the view that the prerogative of the Crown had been insulted and infringed upon; they took the view that sectarian grants had been made and that money devoted to a special purpose had been unconstitutionally diverted from that purpose and used for another. There was amply room for differences of opinion on this point; but it was not a subject that warranted the exhibition of the kind of feeling that is evinced by the extracts I read a moment ago.

Mr. GIROUARD. Will the hon. gentleman tell me the name of the paper from which he has been quoting?

Mr. CHARLTON. The name of the paper is the Toronto Mail. It is the only paper, so far as I am aware, throughout Ontario, that had a reporter there to report the proceedings, or from which we can obtain any information with regard to the matter whatever. Now, the hon. Minister of Public Works, in his speech last night, dwelling upon the matter of the loyalty of the French Canadians, reminded us that it was owing to that spirit of loyalty that French Canada did not embark in the revolution with the thirteen colonies and become a part of the American Confederation. Well, I have great doubts, Sir, whether it was loyalty to British institutions, or whether it was the fear on the part of the French Catholic Church that union with these thirteen Puritan colonies would be detrimental to her interests as a church; and I have very serious doubts whether it was unmixed loyalty that actuated the people of that Province in the choice they made in regard to that matter.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Keep those doubts to yourself.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have my doubts, and I have a perfect liberty to express them here to-day, and I think it is susceptible of demonstration that the choice in relation to that matter arose from the fear, on the part of that church, that acting in consonance with the thirteen colonies, would not redound to her interests in Canada. Of course, this is an opinion, and I suppose I have the liberty of expressing my opinions here with regard to this matter if I do it temperately and courteously, and I trust I have not exceeded the limits of courtesy in the way in which I have made the statement. Then the hon. gentleman asks: Is your birth better than ours, is your blood better than ours? Well, Sir, who had claimed that our birth or our blood was better than that of our French Canadian fellow-citizens? It is not a question as to which is the leading race, as to which has the best lineage, as to which has the best blood. We do not say to our French Canadian friends that we are better in any respect than they are, but in the position we take we are actuated by a desire to serve the interests of this whole country, and that with five millions of people in this country, the true interests of each one are the true interests of all; and if in our opinion a special line of policy is likely to be more conducive to the interests of Canada than another, we have a perfect right to advocate that line of policy; and the hon. gentleman had no right to make the taunt that he did, and to strive to raise, as he did strive to raise, in his speech, feelings of animosity and bitterness. Then he went on to say that persecution and fanaticism would not stand. Well, that is true, at least I believe and hope it is true. I do not believe that persecution or fanaticism ever benefited a cause yet, and I hope that the time will come when evangelists can hold religious services in the city of Hull without interruption, and when the Salvation Army can parade the streets of Quebec with the same facility and ease that they can the streets of Ottawa. I hope that persecution and fanaticism in that respect will not stand in the Province of Quebec; and if the time should ever come when some French Luther wants to nail ninety-five theses, more or less, to the door of any church in Canada, attacking tithes, fabrique assessments, canon law, and medieval institutions of any kind—I hope the time will come when any person, whether a clergyman or otherwise, will be at liberty to nail his placard to the door of the church and maintain that position, with free speech, and every right that pertains to free speech in Canada. Now, Sir, with regard to toleration, all that we want in this Dominion, all that we ask in this Equal Rights movement, is equal rights in religion, the right to worship God, the right to proclaim our belief, the right to carry on the usages of our religion in any part of this Dominion without molestation. That is all we claim. We have no desire to abridge the rights possessed by any man in this Dominion, whatever may be his faith, and we only protest when a desire to abridge our rights is manifested by some other man against us. We have taken a position, of course, against sectarian grants; we take a position against union between Church and State, and any undue favors shown by the State to one church at the expense of another. If this is not sound ground, then I am much mistaken; if the position that we have taken on this matter is not unassailable, then I am laboring under a grievous error. I suppose, Mr. Speaker,—although the charge is not made directly against me; it was against my hon. friend from North Simcoe, and is likely to be made against me—I suppose that I shall be accused of fanaticism. Well, Sir, there may be some ground for it. My maternal ancestors were some of them Covenanters and were subjected to bitter persecution by the bloody Claverhouse. I can remember, as a boy, my own father being mobbed in the State of New York, because he was an abolitionist. And I rather fancy that fanaticism is constitutional with me; it may be, I will not deny it. But if it is fanaticism to stand up for what I believe to be in the best interests of this Dominion, if it is fanaticism to attempt to stem the tide that sets very strongly against me in this matter, to venture to take a position which alienates friends and embitters the hostility of foes, then I am a fanatic. But I stand up to-day to assert my belief that the use of the French language in the North-West as a dual language is unnecessary, that the use of the French language as an official language in the North-West should be prohibited, that it may easily be done, that no shock or agitation will result from doing it, and that it will be an act of supreme folly, when the matter is brought to our attention, to refuse to do it. The hon. gentleman said there are 1,500,000 French in Canada, and they are not to be driven from this country. Who asks to drive them from Canada? Who proposes to drive them from it? Who proposes to deprive them of any rights they possess to-day? They are welcome in Canada. We are glad to have them as citizens of this country, and we welcome them to share everything with us, and in any action we take to have in view the interests of the French as well as the Saxon inhabitants of this country. Then the hon. gentleman makes the plea of inherent rights to the use of the language in the North-West, because there are a few thousand French Canadians, more or less, in this country. The argument would apply to every portion of the Dominion where French Canadians are found. If there is an inherent right to the use of the French language wherever there are French Canadians, that right will apply to Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; and if that argument is sound, you must not only retain the use of the dual language in the North-West, but also extend its use over the entire Dominion. Then the hon. gentleman tells us: "Oh, well, the expense is small, it is an exceedingly little thing to make such a row about." He said the cost up to this time had only been $400 a year, and he added, "I will pay that amount out of my own pocket rather than have any trouble." Sir, it is not a matter of expense; that does not enter into the calculation. It is a matter of the future well-being of the North-

Mr. CHARLTON.

West; it is a matter involving the whole welfare of the future inhabitants of that great country, which may in fifty years have millions of inhabitants, instead of a few thousands; it is a question of laying the foundation on which the institutions of that country will rest, the moulding of the plastic elements which are to form the bed-rock of the future. It is not a question of a paltry few hundred dollars, which may have been spent hitherto in the cost of maintaining this system of a dual language in this country. Then the hon. gentleman told us, and he did so in a manner which amounted almost to a menace, that the French are united, the French in this House are united, they will stand by their rights, they will vote as one man, for there is no politics in this question. Well, the hon. gentleman felt, perhaps, as he has often felt before when he has had the entire French element at his back, that he was master of the situation—very likely he felt so. That is one of the troubles which exists in political matters, and a combination of that kind on race lines has often controlled most important legislation here. I cannot retort upon the hon. gentleman by telling him that the English are united, because they are not. They do not unite readily upon a matter of this kind. There are differences of opinion; they cannot be readily united for the purpose of maintaining race privileges and interests. There is too much magnanimity among them; they feel it would be an act of tyranny to unite on this matter, as the hon. gentleman claims the French of the country have done. But if that feeling is to govern the conduct of the French members of this House, if they are to unite together on race lines, in the manner which the hon. gentleman told us they have done on this occasion, the natural result may possibly be that it will lead to a union of the same kind of the other element; and this is certainly to be deprecated. Then he said: Why not treat the French as brothers and friends. Well, surely, why not? We have nothing, we seek nothing that we will not share with the French equally. What are our aspirations? Look at our annexations. We have acquired the North-West, we have acquired British Columbia, we have acquired Prince Edward Island, and we wish as soon as we can to acquire Newfoundland. We are determined to possess one-half of this continent. We have built a system of canals, not for our present wants only, but to meet the requirements of the future, and we have perfected a waterway from the ocean to the heart of the Continent. We have burdened ourselves with an enormous debt for the purpose of building a railway from ocean to ocean. We are making vast grants and subsidies for the purpose of extending the railway system of the Dominion. We are carefully and laboriously perfecting a code of laws which we believe have no equal in Christendom. We have in this Dominion one of the grandest educational systems that exists in the world. We have liberty; we aim to become a great nation. These are our aspirations, and there is not one of those blessings, privileges, immunities, that we do not propose to share equally and fully with every citizen of the Dominion whether Saxon or French. Yes, we are prepared to treat them as brothers, and we simply ask from them the same feeling and treatment towards us as we are freely prepared to extend to them. They are our brothers. We feel that to be the case. The latchstring we have always hanging out and the warmest welcome is always ready. We do not wish to have animosities, bickerings and prejudices existing; but we want to make this an English nation, we wish to have English institutions from ocean to ocean, we wish the North-West with its future 30 or 40 million to be a Saxon North-West. We are honest in this wish, and we desire that every individual in this country should share the blessing that would be secured by this consummation. If we could only have on the part of the Minister of Public Works that degree of self-denial which would enable him to make British citizenship something more than a second or a third-rate consideration, if he could only make it prominent and superior to his devotion to French institutions, it would be a great thing for him, a fine thing for his race and a fine thing for this Dominion, and the same may be said of all who entertain the opinions he entertains.

I come next to the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne). I am bound to say that the spirit and the attitude of the French members of this House upon this question, and upon all questions for that matter, is above all praise. I say this truly; I say this fully. They have shown—there may be an exception or two, for there is an exception to every rule—fornearance and a desire to treat this question fairly; they have not evinced bitterness, they have not evinced bigotry, they have not evinced prejudice in an undue degree, and this is especially true with respect to the French Canadian Liberals of this House. The hon. gentleman to whose remarks I am referring, spoke last night in defence of Canadian rights, the rights that are guaranteed the French race under the constitution. I can agree with him. There is not a right guaranteed to the race under the constitution which I wish to see impaired; there is not a right the integrity of which I wish to see impaired in the slightest degree. This is not a question of the preservation of rights existing; it is a question as to the formation of new institutions and a polity that will be adopted with respect to the vast unoccupied territories of this Dominion.

Then we come to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman treated us to a very learned dissertation, to a speech which, of its character, is perhaps the finest I ever listened to in this House. It was a most admirable contribution, and it was listened to, beyond doubt, with the greatest degree of pleasure by the hon. members of the House. I am afraid, however, it will be above the comprehension of the average elector and may not be read with effect by the millions in the country. I was struck with one point in the hon. gentleman's speech which I thought evinced a want of tact. He said that three millions people could not swallow two millions, that it was not a cod that swallowed Jonah but a whale. Now, the comparison of the French race in this country to Jonah was, I think, on the part of the hon. gentleman, somewhat unkind. We are not proposing to swallow this Jonah; we do not expect to undertake any such impossible task as to swallow two millions people—not by any means, but we do expect to get the institutions of the North-West fixed up in a right shape and we have no doubt in the world that we will succeed in that.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. LANDRY. You don't want to swallow it, but you want to throw it overboard.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, nor that either. We expect to allow our French Canadian friends to enjoy whatever privileges they ever have enjoyed, and we do not question their right to enjoy one of these privileges. If we can secure the gradual assimilation of the races, if we can secure gradual homogeneity, we will be glad, and if we cannot we will be sorry. The question of the two languages in the North-West is the question we have in hand to-day. We propose if possible to have that North-West an English country. I have not time this afternoon to attempt to follow the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in the various positions he has taken. However, he gave us an account of the attempt in the Netherlands to have community of language there, and said it was a failure. Well, we are not making that attempt in Canada, and it is not a parallel case, nor has it any bearing on the matter under discussion. We do not propose to make any attempt to force the English language upon the Canadians of Quebec, and therefore the comparison was far-fetched and entirely inapplicable. We merely propose that in a new country, where there are comparatively no inhabitants at all, that the English language shall be used as the official language in place of two languages. That is all there is about the question, from our standpoint. The hon. gentleman also said—and I cannot see what bearing it has on the case at all—that we had better commence with the aborigines by prohibiting the translation of books into their languages and by prohibiting the missionaries from learning their languages or from preaching the Gospel to them in their native tongue. It may be that this had a bearing on the case, but I cannot see it. There is no proposal to make the aboriginal languages in the North-West official languages, nor is such a thing dreamed of; there is no proposal to prohibit a man of the Cree or Sioux or Blackfoot tribes speaking in his native tongue, nor no proposal to prohibit the translation of the Bible into those tongues. Why the hon. gentleman should have brought up that argument I am unable to see.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sorry for that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sorry; my obtuseness is to be lamented.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Everybody else in the House saw it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have no doubt my hon. friend's perception is very keen.

Mr. DAVIN. I saw it clearly.

Mr. CHARLTON. I repeat, Sir, that I cannot see what this matter may have to do with the question before us, because there is no proposal to make the Cree or any other Indian language official. The proposal before the House is to make the English language official, but it does not prohibit any man from reading, speaking or transacting business in any other language in the world, the Chinese or otherwise. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) whose keen vision enables him to see a black rod in the dark may also enable him to see the bearing this has on the subject. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) proceeded to say that as there were several thousand French Canadians in the North-West Territories it was necessary and more convenient to have the two languages; in fact he went so far as to say that because there were a few thousand French in the North-West it was a matter of absolute necessity to have the two languages. I wonder how they get along in Massachusetts without two official languages, where there are 75,000 French Canadians, or in New Hampshire where there are said to be about 40,000? It seems they get along quite conveniently with the English language there, and it seems that the French go there out of choice, and keep on going there and staying there, without feeling any hardship placed on them for the lack of their own language in these States. If the French can go to Massachusetts, Maine, Vermont and other New England States, why the same class of people cannot go to the North-West if there is no French language there, is more than I can understand. We are told further that we have no specific information or expressed request from the North-West for this change. We have all the information we want. We are dealing with this question on the basis of our own duty towards the North-West. We took it upon ourselves some years ago—it was done by the Senate—to insert a clause with reference to the use of the French language in the North-West, and when that Bill came back from the Senate to the House, the member of the Government responsible for the Bill, the Minister of the Interior at that time, assumed the responsibility for that clause in not insisting that it should be expunged from the Bill. No doubt this clause did not attract the attention it ought to have done then, and I do not suppose that the hon. the ex-Minister of Interior gave the matter any particular consideration. He was somewhat annoyed at the insertion of the clause, but as it was late in the Session he permitted it to pass. We have this matter now brought before the House, and we begin to realise that it is a question of some importance. The question is, shall we undo a certain piece of mischief that we did unwittingly a few years ago? I do not care what the North-West will think of this matter. I do not care a farthing whether we have specific information or expressed requests, or not; the question for me is, is it a provision that this House of Commons, as the original source of authority charged with the management of the affairs of the North-West, is entitled to insert in that Bill, in the interest of the North-West and of the country at large? If it is, let it stand there. If it is not, I maintain that, without any reference to expressed requests, or without consulting the wishes of the North-West, it is the duty of this Parliament to remove it. Then, the hon. gentleman says, let the people of the North-West legislate upon this when they become a Province. I say so, too, and I say further: let them be placed in a perfectly untrammelled position to do with the question as they think proper. And when the North-West in due time obtains Provincial Government, let them proceed de novo and determine whether they are to have French an official language or not. We will thus wash our hands of the question.

That is perhaps all I have time to say this afternoon in reference to the position taken by the learned and hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Sir, the discussion on this question has taken a wide range. It has covered the whole of the colonial history of the country, and I will ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I refer to some of the more interesting features with regard to this struggle which is taking place on this continent for supremacy between the French and the English races. We have had colonial establishments in America for three hundred years. Three of the nations of Europe laid their plans for the foundations of empire here—Spain, France and England. Spain colonised Mexico and South America, but all her colonial possessions have dropped from her grasp except Cuba and some insignificant possessions in the West Indies. France colonised Canada, and the history of French enterprise, French courage, French genius, and French daring in connection with the exploration of the vast interior regions of America reads like a romance. We have in the careers of La Salle, Joliette, Marquette, Hennepin, Tonty, and Duquesne, a story of adventure which, I repeat, reads more like a romance than the veritable records of history. I have often thought, Mr. Speaker, when crossing over the prairies of Illinois, how magnificent was the conception of La Salle as to the foundation of an empire in that region; I have thought of his discovery of Illinois, of his voyage down the Mississippi to its mouth, of his knowledge of the vast resources of that great country, of the enterprise which led to the planting of military posts at Detroit, Mackinaw, and other favorable points in the west and north-west. The French of that day were singularly adventurous. The young Frenchmen preferred leaving his home on the St. Lawrence and going to the wilds of the west, taking a dusky bride of the forest rather than one of the marriageable daughters of his own people. In this spirit the French penetrated the far interior of the continent, and surrounded the thirteen colonies with a cordon of posts, and, in their magnificent conception, took possession of some of the finest portions of this continent. On the other hand, we had the thirteen colonies planted by the English, a more slow-going, methodical people, without that dash and spirit of adventure which characterised the French; but these Englishmen sat down and began the founding of states, the building up of institutions and the formation of constitutions; and the result of their labor in due time was embodied in the American Republic, with such men as Washington, Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, and other great fathers of the American Confederacy, standing sponsors of the work. But before this consummation had reached a close, the possessions of France in the north had passed away from her. In 1759, on the Plains of Abraham, the French power gave place to the English flag, and that event was one having a more important bearing on the destiny of this continent than any other event in the history of America. That event led unquestionably to the American Revolution. But for the conquest of Canada, the thirteen colonies would not have thought of revolting at the time they did. The capitulation of Quebec in 1759, and the French cession of Canada in 1762, were followed by the ceding of Louisiana to the United States in 1803. The great Napoleon, convinced that he would be unable to hold that possession or to prevent it falling into the hands of England, ceded it to the United States for the sum of $15,000,000, and with this cession the last vestige of French possession and French power in America passed away. Now the Anglo-Saxon was placed in the ascendancy; it was the decree of fate that this should be the case; and what does he proceed to do? Why he sets to work to carry into effect with all possible haste his purposes. He intends that this whole continent shall have freedom and free institutions; he intends that it shall have religious tolerance; he intends that the history of the race on this continent shall be marked by the most wonderful material development of this or any other age; he intends to build up a great power on this continent; and he has done it. Already the second power in the world is the Republic to the south of us; the greatest of Britain's colonies is the one in which we live; and the power of these two countries is increasing in a ratio which almost dazzles the imagination. The Anglo-Saxon may be somewhat aggressive, but his purpose is nevertheless a beneficent one, and he intends—it is his fixed determination—that assimilation and homogeneity shall be the characteristics of every part of the land over which he bears sway. That is his fixed intention, and whether he can accomplish it or not, I am unable to say; but that he expects to occupy this continent, from the Arctic Ocean to the Isthmus of Panama, there is no doubt. My hon. friend asks, what he will do with Mexico? He will do with Mexico just what he did with the French in Louisiana and the Spaniards in California. He will say to them: Here are the institutions and the rights of citizens—take them; you are welcome to them; become American citizens, and there is no right belonging to an American citizen that will be denied you; and he will assimilate them all. He will not take them in all at once, as the whale swallowed Jonah, but he will take them little by little, and will ultimately assimilate the whole mass. In the working out of this problem, he will find our French friends, genial, tractable, industrious, naturally law-abiding. I cannot tell how potent will be the influences that will be brought to bear on them, or how rapid the assimilation will be; but I do not believe that the position of isolation which the French race occupy now they will see fit to occupy forever. On the contrary, I believe they will ultimately see it to their interest to join this great tide, to share this great prosperity, to become a portion of this Anglo-Saxon race which occupies this continent—to submit, in fact, to the decree of fate. They may not do it in this or in the next generation, and we must leave natural causes and forces to work their natural fruit; we cannot bring about the change by violent measures; we cannot do it either by this measure or by any subsequent one we may introduce. It is a matter in regard to which our French friends must be left to exercise their free choice. So long as they wish to remain as they are, they must be free to do so. In the evolution of affairs, when they see that some change will be beneficial to them, it is for them to choose it or not; they will act according to their own wishes, and be governed by their own free choice, be the result what it may. That the French race in Canada is capable of reaching the highest stage of intelligence and development goes without saying. That they will play an important part in the history of this continent is certain, but they never will fulfil the destiny which ought to be theirs while they remain in a position of isolation, without community of interest or community of feeling with the kindred races upon this continent.

Now, I repeat what I have said several times, as I wish to make this point clear, that we have no intention to meddle with vested rights. It would not be prudent to do so. My hon. friend says, the use of the French as an official language in the North-West is a vested right. I say it is not. It is not guaranteed by the Act of British North America, but it is a right which exists by means of the surreptitious interpolation of a clause in the statute. That matter we are considering now, and it is competent for us to repeal that statute. We are not dealing with the constitution of this country at all. It is not necessary to conceal what the sympathies of the English-speaking people of this country are. While we do not propose to meddle with vested rights or to make ourselves officious or offensive in any sense to our French Canadian citizens, we do not deny that we consider medievalism a little behind the age. We do not deny that we would like to see the French race rid themselves of it, not, as in France, in the flames and smoke of revolution, but by peaceful legislation. We do not deny that we would like to see them rid of their system of tithes, fabrique assessments and the other antiquated abuses under which they labor, but while they have our sympathy and while we bid them God-speed in any effort they may make to unburden themselves of this system, we do not propose to initiate any movement to that end. I shall feel sorry if the spirit of backwardness continues, and shall feel glad that something else should take its place. I feel free to make this statement, because it is my conviction that the condition of things in Quebec can be improved, and that the true Liberal, the true Reformer, will grapple with that condition of things.

The question may be asked: Why not take the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)? It may be said the North-West Territories are sure to remove the dual language, and that the result I aim at will then be reached any way. Why not, then, take the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia, and shift from our own shoulders the responsibility of dealing directly with this question? Well, I answer that I prefer, as the more manly and honest course, that we should undo the thing we have done. It is my belief that it is incumbent upon this House either to affirm that the principle embodied in the 110th clause is right or that it is wrong. We do not want to shift the responsibility to other shoulders. If the inhabitants of the North-West want the dual language, they can have it after they get this power. It will be competent for them then to adopt it, but let us leave them perfectly untrammelled in this matter. Let us declare whether it is our opinion that the 110th clause of the North-West Act is a proper or an improper clause. Let those who believe it is a proper clause, vote for its retention, and let those who believe it is not, vote for its repeal. I am free to say that I would not vote to grant a dual language to the North-West under any circumstances. I do not believe it is our business to do so. I repeat if they want it they can have it when they have Provincial institutions; but it is not our business to saddle it upon them. We have no business to make any enactment of that kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are not saddling it.

Mr. CHARLTON. We did saddle it, and we should unsaddle it. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says that he believes in Provincial rights in this matter. Well, there is something rather curious in connection with the backdown of the Government upon this question of Provincial rights. It rather provokes my surprise. I can remember when the Rivers and Streams Bill was disallowed again and again; I can remember when the railway legislation of Manitoba was disallowed, and when the Government asserted—and they told the truth—that they had unquestionably an unlimited power in the matter of disallowance. There can be no question, it is a matter in the discretion of the Government, which is responsible only to the people for the proper exercise of that power, and yet the Government have become the advocate of Provincial rights. They have had a new revelation on this matter; they have had a new light as to their duty; they do not feel warranted now in meddling with Provincial rights at all since the Jesuit Estates' Bill; and the hon. member for Cardwell has no doubt whatever that in this difficulty Provincial rights should govern. I think the position of the Government is scarcely a creditable one; its abandonment of their position with regard to their right to exercise the veto power in the case of Provincial legislation does not reflect credit on them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot veto this clause.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, but we can repeal it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would not be the exercise of the veto power.

Mr. CHARLTON. But I am making some remarks on the position taken by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who believes this question should be referred to the Provincial Government of the North-West Territories, when organised, for the settlement of this question, because it is a matter pertinent to Provincial rights, and I say it is a matter which pertains to us. The authority emanates from us, the clause was adopted by us, the clause should be rescinded when invested with Provincial authority and powers by us, and then the Provinces of the North-West will be placed in the position to exercise Provincial rights, and say whether they will have this thing or not. Reference was made by some speaker, in the early part of the debate, to the petitions sent in by the North-West Council, and the insinuation was made that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had bought the Council. I do not remember who made this charge. I do not think the hon. member for North Simcoe has the funds to buy that Council, and I would not deem it a very creditable thing on the part of any hon. member to cast that imputation upon him. Another assertion made was that his speech has captured it. That is an assertion more flattering to the hon. gentleman than the other, and I have no doubt his speech had very much weight and influence in the North-West; but the fact is the public is alive to the importance of this question, and that the sentiments of the North-West and Manitoba are against the retention of this dual language. That was shown by the repudiation of the French language in Manitoba the other day by a vote of twenty-seven to six; and by a larger proportion than twenty-seven to six, the people of Manitoba and the North-West will sweep this language away whenever they are given this opportunity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Leave it to them.

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly we will. We will sweep it away here, and leave it to them to deal with it there. We may adopt the politician's expedient of shifting the responsibility from our shoulders and dodging out of this thing, but I do not think that would be very honorable or creditable to this House. I appreciate fully the feelings of hon. members who will vote for the retention of the dual language clause. I appreciate the feeling of the French members of this House who believe in the extension of their language over the North-West. They act according to their convictions, and I shall respect their action if they vote accordingly; but I cannot agree with them, and will therefore vote the other way. I hope that the French members will forgive, if they deem it necessary to forgive, that feeling which they cannot endorse, but which English-speaking members of this House entertain—a feeling of pride in the history of the British Empire; that feeling which causes them to take pleasure in contemplating the result of the battle upon the Plains of Abraham; that feeling which leads them to rejoice in the results of the Battles of the Nile and Trafalgar, and in the results of the Battle of Waterloo; that feeling which makes them view with pride the progress of the British Empire, and inspire in them the belief that British institutions are the best calculated to conduce to the prosperity and welfare of mankind. I hope, Sir, they will forgive our purpose, our avowed purpose, to make this a Saxon state. The avowed purpose of the Anglo-Saxon is to make the Anglo-Saxon race the greatest race on the earth, and the hope of the Anglo-Saxon is that the day will come, and come before many decades have elapsed, when the English language will be the common means of intercommunication between all the races of the world, and the English race will be the dominant race of the world, so that the Anglo-Saxon will fulfil the destiny which God has evidently designed he shall fulfil in this world.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to trouble you with very many observations in regard to the speech we have just listened to, or, indeed, to address you at any great length at all. I may say at once, that if any one of the propositions now before the Chair had been thoroughly and entirely satisfactory to my mind, as to the mode in which this question should be dealt with, I should have contented myself with giving a silent vote. It does not happen that either of those propositions commends itself entirely to my mind, and I shall briefly state why that is so, and how, in my poor judgment, this matter should be disposed of. Referring to what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, his distinguished position for a great many years in this Parliament has led—I do not say at all unjustifiably—to his not infrequently, when announcing his own views on public questions, speaking in the plural. Not infrequently has he followed in the past the course which he pursued to-day, of speaking both positively and affirmatively, and positively and negatively, in regard to the views and assertions, and policies and aspirations of others with whom he was for the time acting; but I am wholly unable to accept the declaration which the hon. member has made to-day in the plural at all. I accept it as far as he is himself concerned. As far as he himself professes that these are his views, his intentions, his opinions and his aspirations, I accept his statement fully and unfeignedly. But, when the hon. gentleman spoke of "we," of what "we" were intending, what "we" were proposing, what "we" were aiming at, and what "we" were not aiming at, and what "we" were not intending; when he spoke of what the English speaking people of this country intended and insisted upon, and so forth, then I say the hon. gentleman took up a position which, in face of what has been going on in this country for some months past, in face of the declarations of the hon. member who is primarily responsible for this agitation—the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—in face of the language of this Bill itself, in face of all these things with which we have to deal, I cannot accept. If I could accept it, the question would receive an easy and rapid solution from me. I do not intend to enter into a criticism of the criticisms of the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). One or two words will suffice for that. The hon. gentleman said, but I hope and think he must have misread his history, that the decrees of ancient Rome, were published in all those portions of the world over which she had authority, only in the tongue of Rome herself. I think history shows us that nothing so inhuman and barbarous as that was done, even in what may be called inhuman and barbarous times. Turning to a more modern example, which he justifiably quotes, an example which is to be regarded by us with the highest attention, interest and respect, he refers to the neighboring Republic, to what has been aimed at and accomplished in that great community, in whose well-being the whole modern world has so deep an interest, of whose constitution the right hon. gentleman opposite has not seldom spoken in terms of deserved admiration as to the great work which was achieved by the men who framed that constitution. Speaking of that example, the hon. member for North Norfolk was unfortunate enough to quote, as an instance of a state where the French language had been stamped out and the great principle which he proclaimed, had been realised in the very initiation of its connection with the nation of which it forms a part, the State of Louisiana. Why, Sir, is not the hon. gentleman aware that, by the original constitution of the State of Louisiana, the French as well as the English language was permitted to be used in the debates of that State, and that that continued until the State of Louisiana by a subsequent determination of its own, under circumstances when the question had ceased to be a grievance, determined—as I believe, though I have no information upon this point—that it should be blotted out. The fact, however, is this, as stated in a book of authority, the "Cyclopædia of Political Science:"

"The diversity of interests of the French and American citizens, however, formed the more usual dividing line of politics in the State. The former were at least a strong minority, and a singular evidence of its strength was a provision in the Constitution which allowed members of the Legislature to debate either in French or in English."

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the statutes were printed in French?

Mr. BLAKE. I was not discussing whether the use of the French language was complete in all the technical details. What in the world has the publication of the statutes or the proceedings in the French language to do with the matter? What is involved in that except a paltry $500 a year for the printing of certain things in the two languages? What is the harm if the people who have to obey the laws are enabled to read them printed in the language which they understand? That is a small question; the great question is included in the power of freely debating in the Legislature in the tongues of the peoples of whom the State is composed. All I care to know in regard to that is that the constitution gave the people of French origin the right to speak in their mother tongue in their own State Legislature. The hon. gentleman has said that this question is a very narrow one, and, as he puts it, it is a comparatively narrow one. He has spoken of the impropriety of what he calls dodging responsibility. He has told us of the want of manliness that would be involved in our placing upon other shoulders the responsibility which we ought to take ourselves, and I confess that I have considerable sympathy with that view. As far as our present information goes, the general principle upon which this question should be dealt with, and I am quite prepared now to state the time when I think it should be dealt with; but I thought a large part of the hon. gentleman's speech was but a poor commentary on the declaration as to dodging responsibility which he made and to which I have just referred, when he iterated and reiterated the statement that "we" have no intention of interfering with vested rights, that "we" have no intention of interfering with the rights of any minority which are secured under the British North America Act, that "we" have no desire to touch any privilege properly reserved, that "we" do not intend to touch it, and that "we" are not touching it now. It appeared to me that these statements were evasive of responsibility, were not merely inconsistent with the Bill which the hon. gentleman is supporting—including the preamble—but were fatally inconsistent with the attitude of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and with the general character of the agitation of which this Bill is merely the first fruits. A little later, the hon. gentleman declared that "we," the Anglo-Saxons of this continent—once again taking the plural pronoun, which the hon. gentleman used first when speaking of those with whom he was acting, then when speaking of the English-speaking people of this country, and finally when speaking of the Anglo-Saxon race from the Pole to the Isthmus—he declared their stern determination, by what means might be open to them, to make this country from the North Pole to the Isthmus an Anglo-Saxon community, and to create a homogeneity of race. Well, it is only a question of means and methods, times and circumstances, opportunities and occasions, by which this result is to be achieved; and the hon. gentleman will find, as I shall proceed to point out presently, that his leader does not propose to relegate the consideration of this question to other generations, to those natural and gradual and insensible operations which furnish the only possible solution of such great questions as he has imported into the debate; but that it is other and more rapid, direct and stringent—I will say more violent methods, that are really proposed to us in this regard. Now, Sir, as I have said, there are underlying questions here, much broader questions than the simple questions dealt with by the enacting clause. And these underlying questions are historically old, no doubt, but they are old with reference to our own policy too; they were raised before the last general election, they were raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe himself in large part, they were raised by a newspaper which was, at that time, the most powerful supporter in the Province of Ontario of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they have since been persisted in, and have since been enlarged. This group of questions are fundamental questions. They embrace topics of creed as well as of race, and the Jesuit affair to which the hon. member referred, was not the cause, was not the origin. It was obviously, it has since been confessed to have been, a mere incident, a mere occasion, taken advantage of as a fit and opportune occasion to bring up one phase, and in various aspects, more than one phase, of this group; a good occasion to bring all up in a manner which would attract the favorable consideration of those to whom they who brought them up sought to address themselves. Now, Sir, I intend to refrain, as far as possible, from discussing this question in any party aspect whatever. It needs to be discussed in its party aspect, it must receive such a discussion at some time, but I do not think this time is the fitting time. I say I hope as far as possible to avoid any question of party in the course of this discussion. I am as anxious as the hon. gentleman is anxious, to say nothing, so far as truth will allow, except conciliatory words, and to deal with this matter in a manner becoming a public man; in such a way that, if my feeble words have any effect at all, they may tend to prevent the calamitous results of which the hon. gentleman this afternoon was complaining, though he, and those who act with him, from the best motives, I have no doubt, have been the prime cause of the realisation of these results to the extent to which they have been up to this time realized. I say, Sir, that if you could deal simply with the enacting clause in this Bill it would be a matter of minor consequence; if you could dissociate that clause from its preamble, from its surroundings, from its past and from its future. But you cannot dissociate it, either from its preamble or from its surroundings or from its past, and still less from its future. These difficulties are in part indicated by the preamble which, as you must expound it upon any fair principle of exposition, I maintain declares for action and principles of action which all good Canadians must disavow instead of assenting to. It is a far-reaching principle. It goes—and the hon. member for North Simcoe, whose legislative and professional ability we know—intended that it should go, wrote it in order that it should go, far beyond the intent of the enacting clause; and those who agree to that preamble, who give to it to-day their voices and their votes, must set their minds and their political forces to the accomplishment of the ends which we find there embedded. Doubtless our constitutional act may be amended, doubtless the well-understood wishes of the Canadian people can accomplish the amendment of the constitution. The machinery may be cumbersome, and it may be that occasionally, as has happened in the past, upon inadequate representations, changes of no great consequence, but changes still, may be made; and it may be again that very strong representations may, for a time at least, be ineffectual in producing amendment. But in relation to any question the well understood wishes of the Canadian people, in time and place, after due consideration, thoroughly ascertained and forcibly presented must produce an amendment of the constitution; and into the agitations which are necessary in order to execute this preamble, as indicated by the hon. gentleman's own speech, we should be, it is intended that we should be, plunged if we agree to it. Now, what does it say? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), thought that it was a very innocent thing. There was not much in it. He laid a great deal of stress upon the preamble of some other Bill which was passed in some other Legislature, and he thought that preamble was good cause for disallowance here. But now he says that the preamble of this Bill, which is given as the basis of our decision, the cause itself upon which we are called upon to vote, is of very little consequence. It is true, it is the reason for the enactment, it is the moving cause which is given to us, but it is not of much consequence, and is not of much harm.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I cited the words of the Minister of Justice, not my own words.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, well, I know. I do not care much for that mere throwing of verbal bombshells from one side to the another. We have got to do with the reason of the Bill. The hon. gentleman cited words which I thought he adopted. He agrees with me now that the preamble is of consequence, and that by it we understand what the Bill means. He says that he is prepared to agree with the preamble, and to vote for it. The preamble says:

"Whereas it is expedient, in the interest of the national comity in the Dominion, that there should be community of language among the people of Canada, and that the enactment in the North-West Territories Act allowing the use of the French language should be—"

Repealed? Oh, no.

"should be expunged therefrom: Therefore,"

And it proceeds to enact. Here, then, is the meaning in this preamble, of that community of language, which it is expedient should prevail among the whole people of Canada. The second paragraph of the preamble tells us that the community of language which is declared to be expedient amongst the whole people of Canada, is that community and harmony which prevails, according to the well known fable, between the lion and the lamb; the English is to swallow up the French and the French is to die, that the English may live and flourish upon it. That is the community which is to exist, the community of language which is expedient; the enactment allowing the use of French is to be expunged; therefore, it is the English language alone that is to be used. Now, Sir, when I read this preamble I confess myself to have been a little puzzled by the word "comity," whose use—

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it is a mistake. I think in truth the word was "unity."

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I am very glad to hear it, because I was about to say that I did not perceive that the word "comity" had any reasonable application to this matter at all. We know what the meaning of that word is, and if ever an improper word could be chosen for the hon. gentleman's Bill, it certainly was the word "comity." But he now tells us, as I presumed, that what he intended by the phrase, was unity, and, therefore, it is in the interests of the national unity of the Dominion, that this result is to take place. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to the advancement of our national unity, we must agree, if we adopt this preamble, that it is expedient, that we should take all possible steps which are open to us to procure by legal and constitutional means the disallowance of the use of the French language where now it is allowed. That is clear, that is plain, that is obvious, that is logical. Was ever such a lame and impotent conclusion deduced from such important premises, if this question is to cease with this little enacting clause with reference to the North-West Territories? If that which it is expedient for the unity of the Canadian Dominion to abrogate is to be suffered to go on in this chamber, is to be suffered to go on in Canada, is to be suffered to go on in the important Province of Quebec, while our national unity is to be preserved, forsooth, by dealing with a few thousands who now inhabit the North-West Territories? No. These gentlemen represent a very grave condition of affairs. That is not their intention. We all know it is not the intention; it has been admitted not to be the intention at all; we cannot stop here; that would indeed be much cry and little wool. Nor does the hon. gentleman so pretend. In the speech with which he moved the first reading of this Bill he entered into a number of considerations which would have been but remotely relevant to the simple clause of the Bill itself. True he pointed out plainly enough, what was perfectly obvious, that he was not at the moment proposing to do more than deal with the North-West Territories question. But, so far from making that further announcement, which he could not have honestly made, but which was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to-day, he said simply this. After speaking of the past and the present, he said:

"I have endeavored at all events to make good my statements, that both from within and from without the general opinion prevails that this question has come to the point where it is likely to cause further differences, as it has already caused differences in the Dominion."

Then the hon. gentleman said:

"Come back now, Sir, to the North-West Territories. I am not attempting here, and hon. gentlemen know that at all events in this form of motion, I could not attempt in any way to interfere with any rights under the British North America Act which are guaranteed to the French Canadians of the Province of Quebec and to the French Canadians in this Parliament. I am treating, Sir, of what this Parliament is competent to deal with. I am treating of the question of the dual language of the North-West Territories."

It is a perfectly correct statement that this is all the legislation proposed by this clause; but the proposition to which we are asked to assent, as the ground work of the legislation proposed, obliges us to proceed by all lawful ways and means to secure, in the interests of the national unity of the Dominion, the application of that principle in those other places where certainly the contrary principle now prevails, is potent and effectual for good or for evil according to the diversities of opinions on this subject, potent and effectual to an infinitely greater extent than its application can be either now or for 50 years to come in the North-West Territories of Canada. But I say we are not confined to the hon. gentleman's preamble nor to his speech here. We find in a recent speech delivered in this city to what is called the Equal Rights Association statements which deal with this question, and which deal with it in a manner showing that he at all events does not shrink from the application of the motto which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), cited last night, the motto "Thorough." The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), said we are not talking of interfering or proposing to interfere with the use of the French language, with reading, writing or speaking it. Nothing of that kind, he said, is talked or thought of; it is simply this question of using it in the North-West Legislature, and, as the hon. gentleman repeated, this dreadful grievance of the statutes and ordinances being printed in the French language. But that is not the view of the hon. member for Simcoe. I find these statements in a speech delivered by him as late as 12th December last, within a few yards of this building. He said that Lord Durham had held first, and above all things, that the French language must be stamped out. And the hon. gentleman gave his own personal opinion that without a shadow of doubt Lord Durham was right. It is not, therefore, a question of an occasional French speech in Parliament which bores the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), or of their being troubled by the fact that copies of the Debates and of the statutes are printed in French, in a tongue with which they are not as familiar as with their mother tongue; but the language must be stamped out, says the hon. member for North Simcoe. The hon. gentleman proceeded:

"Is there a shadow of doubt that between these two races, of all races in the world, if they are ever to be united, it must be by obliteration of one of these languages and by the teaching in one of these tongues."

I should judge, I hope I am not mistaken, that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), does not mean that the English language should be obliterated; if so, it must be the French language. Then, the hon. member for North Simcoe drew upon his experience as a parliamentarian, and declared he had observed that more French was now spoken in the House than formerly, an observation, I must confess, entirely at variance with my experience, which is somewhat longer in this House than that of the hon. gentleman. I quite admit that the course which the hon. gentleman and others have pursued, will very naturally lead to a larger quantity of French speaking in this House than has prevailed hitherto, but I do say there is nothing more marked, than the change which has taken place since I first entered Parliament, with respect to this question of French speaking. Then, the hon. member for North Simcoe proceeded to point out that our constitution is amendable in regard to the use of the French language in Quebec and in Canada, and he gave the precedents which showed the truth of that statement, that the constitution is amendable. And what did he go on to say ! He went on to say that the precedents in that sense are very useful and may be acted on in the year 1890 or '91 in this connection. What ! Are we going to relegate this matter to some distant age to be disposed of finally by the action of the French Canadians ; when the leader (Mr. McCarthy) tells us that in 1890 or '91 the precedents which prove the possibility of altering the British North America Act, so as to obliterate the use of the French language are useful and may become available forthwith ? Then the hon. gentleman stated that we ought not to remain in this position forever, and there should be sufficient patriotism in the Dominion to produce the change foreshadowed. Nor was his speech confined to the question of language, it touched creed as well ; for I find him asking the people whom he was addressing, and through them the people of the whole Dominion, to give him power to eliminate those parts of the constitution which were inimical to the public weal ; and he followed that statement by the question—indicating the parts of the constitution which he regarded as inimical to the public weal, and which he proposed that the people of the country should give him power to eliminate—

“ Are we to have Separate Schools in Upper Canada, the assessments in Lower Canada, dual language in the Dominion Parliament, and dual languages in Quebec, the North-West and Manitoba ? ”

And he again called for power to obliterate what he called those obnoxious clauses. I, therefore, expected that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would not adopt the line which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has adopted. I expected that, while he would perhaps leave rather in the background those other questions, he would say nothing which was inconsistent with his preceding utterances, nothing which would be likely to limit the effect of the preamble to which he asked the assent of the House ; nothing which would interfere with or check the triumphant march of his friends in pursuit of the great purpose which had been before developed, and which was further and fully developed in advance of the meeting of Parliament by the speech to which I have referred. This Bill, then, is only the opening of the campaign ; and it lays down in itself, so far as the question of language is concerned, which is all it deals with, lines quite broad enough for the contemplated movement ; and, I repeat, that its past and its present and its surroundings are all important elements ; they indicate its future ; and they entirely overshadow the little enacting clause. For those who, like the hon. gentlemen, have spoken in that sense in this House, who believe that these things are essentially in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, there is, and I am not in the slightest degree complaining of it, there is for them but one course to pursue, the course of agitation. It is their right, nay more, it is their bounden duty, if their conscientious convictions be, and I am far from saying they are not so, that the condition of things in this whole Dominion, is such that its future prosperity and progress will be served and advanced by such an agitation as is necessary for the attainment of such results as are indicated, to enter upon and pursue that path of agitation. We may as well settle what it is that we are called upon to meet ; what that condition of things is with which it is proposed that we should deal. I say that that honesty of conviction which I freely accord to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), (and which I am bound to accord to him as to any public man), involves, as a necessary consequence, that he should prosecute the agitation upon the lines he laid down on the 12th of December last and at other times, as the line of policy essential to this Dominion. If it were otherwise, I can conceive no language strong enough for the denunciation of his conduct in the utterance of these sentiments. Now, Sir, for those of us who believe—I speak for myself only—but for myself and for any other person who happens to believe that in our existing conditions the objects aimed at are, by the means proposed, absolutely impossible of attainment ; for those who believe that the agitation does, as to the Province of Quebec, not merely not present any element whatever of success, but destroys the least prospect of reform from that source from which alone the reforms which these hon. gentlemen desire can be looked for, namely, from within, from the spontaneous action of the people themselves ? for those who believe that it not merely does not improve, but that it tends to imperil the conditions of certain minorities of race and certain minorities in creed in different parts of the Dominion ; that it excuses, if it does not absolutely justify, the combinations of populations on lines of race and creed which the hon. gentleman so earnestly deprecated this afternoon ; for those who believe that it tends to produce and to intensify the greatest political evils which it is possible to conceive for Canada, and that it imperils the best hopes which remain to Canada ; for me, Sir, who believe all these things, and for any others who may believe with me, there remains only the course of firm and uncompromising opposition from the start, to the course of the hon. gentleman. “ Obsta principiis. ” I decline to permit the thin end of the wedge to be inserted ; not with the guile which I might not unjustly attribute to the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk, nor yet with the hammer of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who has told us plainly the strokes he intends to give to that wedge and the vigor with which he intends with it to rift and cleave this Dominion. Now, Sir, I profess to be, and I hope I am a Reformer. I have never concealed my opinion ; I have always at those times and places, and under those circumstances in which I thought I might do good by it, announced the opinion that there are many things to be reformed in the different Provinces of this Dominion, and many things to be reformed in the Dominion as a whole. There are many things I should desire to see reformed in the Province of Quebec as well as in other Provinces. But I know full well,—such little knowledge of history as I have acquired, such knowledge of human nature as fifty-six years have given me, have taught me that impertinent interference ; still more that threats of coercive interference, and agitations to withdraw acquired and provincial rights are the very surest means to destroy the slightest vestige of hope of reform. They give to the resisting party incalculable advantages. They enlist the sentiment of nationality, the sentiment of provincial autonomy, the feeling of outraged dignity and of insulted authority in opposition to the intruders. And under cover of these defences, resistance is easy and its success is certain; while where the opportunity occurs aggressive action is but too likely to ensue. That is the condition of things, Sir, which I believe will be accomplished by the efforts that are now being made. I regard the prospect of reforms which I myself should desire to see accomplished in the Province of Quebec, as removed—I will not say to an incalculable but to a very long distance—by this agitation even so far as it has gone. I regard that prospect as absolutely vanished, should this agitation receive the support and countenance to any considerable extent of this House and of the people of the Dominion at large. No, Sir, the fullest and the frankest recognition of the provincial and covenanted rights; the evidence which we shall give within the domain of our power in the various Provinces of Canada, of a generous and liberal consideration for those minorities which are under our control; combined with a sympathetic interest in the welfare of our neighbors give titles—just titles—to friendly suggestions to helpful advice, to legitimate influence. Nor have I despaired in the past; nor when this cloud passes away shall I despair in the future for the recognition of those titles. At any rate I am on the side of those who shall stand by those minorities who are, as I have pointed out, threatened and proposed to be coerced (by constitutional means I admit, but it is not the less threat and coercion, however constitutionally you may do it) by the policy the hon. member for North Simcoe has foreshadowed. I am on their side; and I believe that any other attitude is impotent for good, and powerful for evil to the state.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of Bill Mr. BLAKE.

(No. 10) respecting the North-West Territories and the amendments of Messrs. Davin and Beau-soleil thereto.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, we have heard something to-day—of what I fear we shall hear more of in Canada for some time—of a union of race and a union of creed. This question is not unfamiliar to my ears. In days long gone by I found myself, as my predecessor in the leadership of the Liberal party found himself, as my successor in that leadership, I dare say, may find himself, confronted with attempts to unite and consolidate in the ranks of one party those of one nationality, and to consolidate in the ranks of one party those of one creed. This question is not new in Canada. Those attempts I met by no private bargain or intrigue; I met them by frank statements in this House and on public platforms of my views on the questions of race and creed, and of the rights and interests of minorities; I met them by an effort to convince those most particularly concerned that there were no real grounds for those attempts—attempts which I deprecated then, as I deprecate them now, as public calamities—and by the assurance that my fellow countrymen of all creeds and all races might differ and agree, according to their opinions on political topics, with absolute confidence as to the safety of the rights peculiar to themselves on questions of race and creed. That assurance, I believe I could well give; that assurance I hope this debate will enable us in Canada still to give; but largely on the issues of this debate does the question of that assurance turn. Sir, at all times and in all countries minorities are inclined to be susceptible, jealous, apprehensive, exacting—such is the condition of human nature. Those who are in minorities feel it; and those who happen to be in majorities, though they may complain of it, ought to understand it too. Minorities are apt to believe that they must unite in order to protect themselves against aggression; and such union amongst themselves, and such consequent isolation from their fellow-countrymen, is, wherever it occurs, and just in proportion to the extent of its occurrence, a serious danger to the state. But this is oftentimes excusable, and sometimes even justifiable; and in the face of such attacks as those to which I referred this afternoon, I am not able in any strong language to condemn, although I do not intend to applaud, and although I still most earnestly deprecate, any such attempt at union. I am speaking this day mainly in the hope to avert, if by any feeble effort of mine I can avert, the continued existence of those apprehensions which might be a justification, or at any rate an excuse, for such union. Sir, in times of gloom and depression as to the future of my country—perhaps I am not an optimist, perhaps I have taken and may take now in many aspects a view too gloomy as to the condition and prospects of Canada, but in times in which I have felt gloom and depression as to the prospects and future of my country, as to its progress in several of the respects which are essential to the making of a nation, I have had in these latter years the consolation of believing that, in whatever other respects we might be stationary, perhaps, even, I am ashamed to say, retrograde, in the respect at any rate of tolerance and regard to the rights and privileges and susceptibilities of minorities, we were moving on—slowly, steadily moving on—to a higher plane.

And that consolation was, to my mind, a very great one. But although I did so believe, as I shall still venture to entertain that hope, I knew well that all this time there were great masses of prejudice and suspicion, of ancient hates and misconceptions, and bitter memories of former conflicts, lying ready to the hand of the incendiary, easy to be kindled, difficult to be extinguished; and that the proportions of the conflagration which they might excite were impossible to be calculated in advance. Sir, we have but just heard of an event we must all deeply deplore. The great institution, the crown and glory, I may be permitted to say, of the educational institutions of our country, is at this moment in flames; and we know not how small a spark may have kindled the great fire which is consuming that ornament to the whole community of Canada, the University of Toronto. That ornament, a great material ornament, and a still greater exhibition of the triumphs of the principles of toleration and of our advance in higher education, a university where we have gathered together the youth of all denominations, Protestant and Catholic, under the sanction even of the Catholic Church—a State institution on non-sectarian principles, where all were gathered together as fellow-subjects to acquire the highest training that the land afforded is now, so far as its material fabric goes, a ruin tottering to the ground. But great through the calamity, the material fabric may be replaced. Just as by that great calamity we may observe how small a spark may kindle a great fire, so let us take warning in this larger sphere, in the still greater matter upon which we are now engaged; and let those who are seeking to set the heather afire upon this question be careful before they proceed to precipitate a moral ruin which may be irreparable. Let them remember that it is utterly impossible to calculate the results of the issues and the passions they are raising. Sir, I knew not merely that there were questions of prejudice and of misconception, of passion and of bigotry, of ancient hate and ancient difficulties; but I knew more. I am not of those who take the optimistic view that in all respects our path is easier and smoother because of our peculiar conditions in Canada; I am not of those who believe that our path is made plainer and straighter by the circumstances of different nationalities and of different creeds. I have recognised the fact that our situation, such as it is, presents problems of very considerable difficulty—perhaps problems of very considerable danger—and that we might have, if Providence had so ordered our lot that we were a homogeneous people, all of one race, one tongue, and one creed, an easier path, a plainer road in which to travel. I have recognised those difficulties with which we may have to grapple some day; though I hope, if we are to succeed, at some other time and in some different spirit and on some other lines than are proposed to-day. I knew that those real difficulties added great force and strength to the baser elements which form the greater part, after all, of the troubles with which we were and are encompassed; I knew the risk and the loss which was to be encountered in the Province which I may call an English and Protestant Province—the province of Ontario—by acting for those whom we served on the path on which we were then travelling; and we encountered it deliberately at that time. Nor shall we, I hope shrink from it today. The right will triumph in the end. There is an old proverb in the language which my hon. friend would proscribe: "Tout casse, tout lasse, tout passe;" and even this storm, this agitation, though its proportions may be as great as my hon. friend expects and perhaps justly expects, will pass away; with serious consequences may be to those who are engaged in the contest, but it will pass away in the end; and what is right and true will in the end prevail, though some of us may fall in the struggle. On what conditions, circumstanced as we are, can we live and thrive and grow in Canada? Certainly not on the lines which are being laid down by those engaged in this agitation. I would ask them to put themselves in the French Canadian's place. You may selfishly wish that he had agreed to be suppressed; you may have a profound conviction of the incomparable superiority of your tongue, your laws, your creed; you may earnestly desire for all men the inestimable boons of British birth, of English speech, of Protestant religion. But still, after all, cannot you put yourself in his place? And can you not, must you not, admire the courage, the fidelity, and the determination with which, at great odds, he fought in all fields—in the legislature, before the people, and in even sterner fields than these—for what to him was as dear as what you call your birthright is to you? Fought, aye, and conquered too! Cannot you recognise that his was after all a victory for humanity? And that if, as the case is, it has imposed greater difficulties and more arduous efforts and toils on those who are engaged in making a nation of Canada, it yet, by that very circumstance, gave the chance for more exalted triumphs, gave an opening for the exhibition of still higher and deeper and broader feelings of justice and liberality and tolerance than are permitted to a wholly homogeneous people? Can you not at least see—if that much you cannot see—that he has in fact conquered? Do you seriously hope to prevail to-day in a conflict in which, under infinitely greater disadvantages, he obtained the victory long ago? Surely if it were a conquest in which he was in the wrong, you have the right to struggle still; but his victory after all was for equal rights—rights equal with your own. That is all he asked; that is all he got. But you say: No; his language must be obliterated; it is inimical to the Constitution that it should continue; you must teach him your tongue; he must forget his own; he must not have what he regards—and, from his point of view, rightly regards—as equal rights with you, the Anglo-Saxon, of whom the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) spoke so proudly this afternoon as destined by fate to swallow him up. Sir, I regard this larger question to which I have referred, and it is the real question we have to consider, as a settled question; and even were my views as to the settlement different from what they are, I would not consent, as a public man, to an attempt to reopen a controversy, long since closed, on grounds which do not give to my eye the least prospect of success, but which ensure ultimate defeat to the assailants, and meanwhile limitless disaster to the state. I say: No; a thousand times, no! Whether you differ or agree as to what might have been best for the country, in the situation of the country as it stands, I say: No, a thousand times, no; to the least effort or proposal to reopen that settled controversy; and I maintain that it is the duty of those who truly regard the progress and the prosperity of Canada, who hope to see it advance in its path towards nationality, to defend the rights of the minorities in this regard, as by law and by convention and by national settlement established. I intend for my part to defend them just as warmly as if I were one of themselves; and I should regard myself as dishonored and disgraced if I were now to yield to the forces which press me to any other course. It is not difficult to drive most of us, perhaps—it is certainly not difficult to drive the humble individual who addresses you from his place in this Parliament; but I hope it is impossible to drive me, as long as I occupy that place, from the path of duty and of honor, which I believe to be the path which I have chalked out in the words I have now spoken. To this Bill, under these circumstances, I should record an unhesitating negative, if that were the question presented immediately to the House. I do not desire to enlarge upon the lessons of history, of which we have heard much in this debate; but I wish to call your attention to two very recent formal, and to my mind, solemn expressions of opinion, expressions of British opinion, of the opinions of the English Government upon questions closely allied to this. You remember the long and complicated and difficult controversy with reference to Schleswig-Holstein. In 1860, the English Government proposed to Denmark to allow Schleswig, one of the duchies, independently to decide upon the language to be used where the Danish people prevailed, where the Germans prevailed, and where the races were mixed. That was the character of the dispatch, that the community itself should decide, and that regard should be had to the various languages of the populations, thus giving a plain indication at that comparatively recent date, of the view of the British Government, under the Secretariat for foreign affairs of Lord John Russell, in regard to that question. Again in 1862 and 1863, unhappy, broken-down, disintegrated and enslaved Poland, regarded by the great powers as no longer possessing the capacities for an independent state, but as a people under the thrall of Russia, had broken out once again into insurrection, under the pressure of some fresh severities of its Russian masters; and three of the great powers of Europe agreed together to remonstrate with Russia as to its course towards the Poles—I can hardly say towards Poland, but towards the Poles. Who were they? Great Britain, France and Austria. They remonstrated with Russia. Russia asked them to formulate the points upon which they suggested her lines of policy towards Poland should proceed. Those three powers formulated, by conjoint action, six points, and one of the six points on which they recommended to Russia action towards Poland, circumscribed as Poland was, and so late as the year 1863, was the use of the Polish language in the public offices and in the law courts. That was the advice given by Great Britain, France and Austria to Russia, interfering with its course towards its own subjects, who had been handed over to it by a proceeding which no one can read without condemning, but handed over and having become, so to speak, its property long before. And, at that late date, the recommendation was that the step taken should be reversed, that the abrogation of the right to use their own language should be withdrawn, and that the Poles should have the right to use their own language in the courts and the public offices. I do not deny, as I have already said, our difficulties in this country. I repeat that those difficulties are serious; and I hope that those of us who now act on the lines which I have been suggesting will be recognised as having earned in proper time and proper place, the right to be listened to with favorable ears in case we do tender proper advice as to what we believe, in the true interests of minorities, and in the true interest of Canada, should be done in regard to these difficult and delicate questions. I hope also that our attitude may not be mistaken by either friend or foe, either by those we serve or those we oppose, by the minorities in whose cause we are prepared to stand up or by the majorities whom many of us represent, as being that of an unworthy truckling to either race or creed. I should like to ask what have the majority of the representatives of Ontario constituencies to gain by adopting the course which I have chalked out for myself? Let others speak for themselves. I know that the only gain I can have for myself is risk and loss. Nothing but that. We shall then claim our right to speak firmly and frankly on all fit occasions and on all burning questions, and we shall ask the consideration which we are now granting. Having said so much, I ask how should this Bill, brought forward in the frame which it has assumed, with the preamble by which it is prefaced, with the speech in which it was introduced, with the speeches by which out of doors it was heralded, having regard to the movement of which I have said it is the first fruits—how should this Bill be met? I am prepared to meet such a Bill, so introduced, so framed, so prefaced, with an uncompromising negative. But it has seemed to be the temper of the House to meet it with some substantive declaration. I shall not object to that; but for myself I am not fully satisfied with either of the declarations which have been proposed. I am of opinion that, if we do formulate a declaration, it should contain a distinct and unequivocal repudiation of the principle of the preamble of this Bill, and should vindicate the ground on which we stand, as to the question raised by the enacting clause. In these respects and also because I am not prepared for myself to affirm all the language contained in the second amendment,—for example the statement that the enactment would put in doubt the stability of our institutions—I think that amendment is not wholly applicable to the situation; nor do I think the first amendment is what we require either. I think there is apart from the suggestions of policy, no present grievance of any account. The money question is absolutely nothing. The amount is trifling, and this Parliament pays it; and the hon. gentleman who proposes the Bill (Mr. McCarthy) has cheerfully voted for and supported the payment of hundreds of thousands of dollars—I might say millions—of expenditure much less defensible than the $400 or $500 a year which are expended to convey to the French people of the North-West, few as they may be, a knowledge of the ordinances of the country in which they live. Now, Sir, what is the condition of our country with respect to the North-West? We have spent many scores of millions mainly in connection with the North-West. Our crying need there to-day is, and will for a long time be, settlement, the influx of hardy and frugal cultivators of the soil. The Province of Ontario is being bled to-day partly to meet that demand. Her farms have fallen in price; and that fall, very notably in the eastern section of the Province, is partly due to the altered conditions of supply and demand, partly also due, no doubt, to unfavorable seasons, partly due to low prices, due to a combination of circumstances, in which however, the North-West is a large factor. I say that fall would have been very much more marked than it is to-day, if it had not been for that influx of French Canadian settlers into the east, which this agitation seems almost designed to prevent, which certainly is regarded as no unmixed blessing by those who are engaged in the agitation, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned. For my own part, I take ground altogether different from those gentlemen on that subject; I heartily welcome our French fellow-countrymen who prefer Ontario to the States. I hope they will continue to prefer it; I hope that they will come in, just as many of them as have come in, and buy our farms from those who want to sell them, and who will not complain, however much other people may create grievances in another Province, if they get a better price than they otherwise might by reason of altered conditions in the law of supply and demand. I say that while Ontario is being bled at this moment and in this way, the Province of Quebec is being bled too, not so much by migration to the North-West; but she is being bled mainly to the entire loss of Canada, and to the profit of the neighboring Republic. I think the most important object to which we can practically address ourselves, is the diversion of that emigration to the States to migration to the North-West Territories. I do not hope myself for any substantial measure of success whatever from projects of repatriation. I believe that the French Canadian whom you let go to the States, and who settles there, you have practically lost forever. There may be cases of return, but, speaking in the large, such, I regret to say, is my belief of the result. Nor can I say that I entertain any very high or sanguine hopes, judging by experience, of Quebec migration on a large scale to the North-West. But still there is in that respect a hope, there ought to be a hope. If it is the case that we are unable to persuade our own people from the Province of Quebec, agriculturists, to move to those fertile plains of which my hon. friend from North Norfolk gave such a glowing description, if it is the case that we are unable to persuade them to move there, and that they still prefer the Eastern or the Western States to Canada, then how can we hope for any great immigration from abroad? I say that we ought to address ourselves to that problem to which I have referred, in an earnest, an active, an energetic manner. But I conceive that the temper and spirit displayed in this Parliament and displayed in the North-West itself in this matter, may be very important factors as to the success of any such effort. I decline to abandon the hope of considerable immigration. I believe that if the people of the North-West Territories will consider of the matter, if those few thousands of souls who are scattered, specks hardly discernible, through that vast territory, will but realise the fact that industrious, hardy, frugal, economical, cultivators of the soil are leaving old Canada, not for new Canada, but for the States, they will hold out their arms, they will welcome warmly those whom we might induce to go out there. Are you going to induce them to do so by such proposals as this? I am for trying out the experiment; I am for continuing every inducement, the sentimental inducement if you please, as well as other inducements, until that experiment is fully and fairly tried out. In face of this agitation to which I have, all through what I have said, alluded, as the main and important, the overshadowing feature of this discussion, I should regard the immediate adoption of a proposal to expunge such little use of the French tongue as is now provided for, as fatal to whatever prospect there may be of an increasing or of a continuing French migration to the North-West. I say that the future will indicate to us the solution of this question, and that it should be reserved until the future speaks and gives us that indication. I agree with something that has been said by the hon. member for North Norfolk as to the people of the North-West. They are, so far as their rights, their constitutional rights are concerned, in a transition condition. They have not asked, they feel themselves that they are not yet in a position to claim the full measure of provincial rights. It would be entirely premature so to deal with these enormous areas of fertile territory in the present conditions of settlement and of occupation, and to turn them into Provinces. All sides are agreed on that. The people of the locality, but also the people of Canada, are deeply interested in the policy to be pursued in the North-West. Canada has, in truth, if you consider the enormous areas that she has to settle, the enormous expenditure she has made and is making—she has, in truth, the main interest, an interest far surpassing that of the few people who are now there. But fortunately for old Canada, and fortunately for those people, it is a common interest. There is not the slightest divergence of interest. There may be differences of opinion as to what are the best means of advancing that interest, but the interests are one and the same; the prosperity of the North-West is the one interest of both; and the proper step to take in order to advance that prosperity is the question submitted to both; and upon that question the Parliament of Canada, in the present condition of the North-West and of the people of that country, must speak; I will not say with a despotic voice, I will not at all say with a voice regardless of the opinion of the Territories, but still at this moment, having the responsibility, with a decisive and potential voice. Now, under these circumstances, I say, we should meet the question when it comes. The hon. gentleman has suggested that we have heard the opinion of the North-West. I should have great, though not absolutely decisive regard to that expression deliberately and constitutionally reached, but I deny that we have yet heard it. The North-West Assembly had no commission or authority from this Parliament, its creators, to deal with this question at all; and the electors to that assembly had not before them, when the assembly was elected, any proposition upon this subject. So, neither was there an authority in the body, nor was there a mandate from the constituency. It may be, it is quite possible, that even upon a full and calm consideration, after the interval of time which is to elapse between now and the next appeal to the people, it may be that there may be a very strong expression of opinion there, as to what is for their interests; but in the meantime it is not to be entirely forgotten that the condition is only this, that the Parliament of Canada votes out of Canadian resources a trifling sum annually for the payment of the printing in the two languages of their ordinances; and that if they choose to elect a Frenchman to the assembly, that Frenchman has what, I am afraid, would be a very barren privilege, the right of expressing his sentiments in that assembly, in what, to the majority of them, I am afraid, would be something like an unknown tongue. There is the condition of things. No particular grievance, therefore, now exists, and the condition upon which you are to deal with the question is to be settled, as I have said, in the future. If, when you have tried the experiment, if when you have used all fair exertions, if when you have given all fair inducements, you still find that country is, even to the extent to which it now is proportionately, an English country, why the question will settle itself. If, what I would rejoice to see in the face of all that has been said in my Province and elsewhere, there should be a large immigration of Frenchmen to the North-West, and that settlement should be mixed, the condition might be practically the same. If that settlement were, what I would not prefer myself, isolated, it might create a condition of things demanding different treatment. Let us deal with it when the condition arises and as the condition exists; and when we do deal with it, let us deal with it, not associated with the efforts which have been made, the apprehensions which have been raised, the hostilities which have been excited by the proceedings of which this Bill is the first outcome, but entirely dissociated from all these, having meantime finally and altogether settled, as far as the opinion of the Parliament of Canada can settle, the other questions, the greater questions, the more important questions in regard to which this Bill seems to be but a sort of pilot balloon. Sir, I have endeavored to set forth in the draft of an amendment such a form of words as, without at all being wedded to that precise form, seems to me to indicate the most appropriate solution of this question, and, if the opportunity is offered to me in the course of this discussion, by any process, I shall take leave to submit that proposition to the chamber; and in order that hon. members may know what the proposition which I at all events would very respectfully submit for their consideration, I shall now, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, read it:

"This House cannot, having regard to the long continued use of the French language in old Canada, and to the covenants on that subject embodied in the British North America Act, agree to the declaration contained in the said Bill as the basis thereof, that it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language amongst the people of Canada.

"That, on the contrary, this House declares its inviolable adherence to the covenants in respect to the use of the French language in Quebec and Canada, and its determination to resist any attempt to impair those covenants.

"That as to such use of the French language in the North-West Territories, as is now provided by law, it is in the best interests of Canada at large and of the Territories in particular that inducements should be held out to the emigrating inhabitants of each of the Provinces to settle in the Territories, whose greatest want is population.

"That the expunging of the provisions allowing the use of the French language in the Territories is not required to remedy any practical grievance at this time, and would, under existing circumstances, lessen the chances of a French Canadian immigration.

"That it is expedient to leave those provisions undisturbed, and to defer any decision as to the ultimate solution of the question until time shall have further developed the conditions of North-West settlement."

On these lines, or on lines like these, I would invite this House to act; to these considerations, however feebly set forth, I would invite the earnest and dispassionate attention of my fellow-countrymen. This I feel is for Canada a turning point. I see but dimly; I may not see aright; but, if I at all discern the signs of the times, until Canadians on such lines agree, there will be for Canada neither progress, prosperity, nor peace.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, although the hon. gentleman has disapproved very strongly of the use of the plural pronoun, I will venture to make use of it in addressing him for a moment and in saying that we on this side of the House are delighted to see the hon. gentleman in his place once more and able so vigorously to take part in the discussions in this chamber. I will not for one moment dream of attempting to follow the hon. gentleman through the brilliant periods of the carefully prepared oration which he has delivered to this House. I would not dream of doing so in any case, besides I would leave the matter naturally to the hon. gentleman beside me (Mr. McCarthy). But, Sir, I will say that while the hon. gentleman was addressing us and while I admired those glowing periods in which he advocated a broad-minded and liberal policy in Canada, I could not help asking myself if it was possible the hon. gentleman was not aware that his own conduct was largely responsible for the agitation and for the fear in the Province of Ontario which had given rise to this agitation which he condemns. I could not help asking myself whether the hon. gentleman was not aware that the course which he had pursued in reference to the Riel agitation had warned the people of Ontario of the danger in which they stood and had led them to believe, rightly or wrongly, that the power of French Canada was so great that even Edward Blake had succumbed to its influence, had gone back on all the record of his past life, had forgotten his pledge, yet warm from his lips that he would not attempt to build up a political party on the scaffold of Regina, had forgotten the blood of his own fellow-countrymen on the plains of the North-West, and had joined hands with the Parti National. That party which without his support would have withered and died almost in the hour in which it was born, that party which is responsible to-day for all the trouble that is upon us at this moment. I could not help also asking myself if the hon. gentleman who had addressed us in such eloquent terms had also forgotten, or was it possible that the hon. gentleman who told us that this preamble of the Bill was the all-important part of the Bill, was the same gentleman who voted last Parliament that the preamble of a Bill had nothing whatever to do with it, or was it due to his approval of that preamble that he so voted. I do not wish to press this matter further, but I will say that these considerations presented themselves to my mind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL. I am about to proceed. I do not wish to press that particular part of the matter any further, but I was going to turn to another matter. I hope I have not in any way annoyed hon. gentlemen opposite. I think I have the right to express my views as well as any of these hon. gentlemen. If we have not even the right of free discussion I do now know what Canada is coming to. I have been much struck during the course of this debate with one or two of its features. One of them is that there seems to be a very strong reluctance, I do not say on the part of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, but on the part of most of the hon. gentlemen who have opposed this Bill, to meet this issue squarely, and to say whether or not they desired to maintain a dual language in the North-West Territories, in the teeth of the almost unanimous wish of the representatives of the people there. Another feature of this debate which has struck me is this, that hon. gentlemen or some of those who have spoken at least, desire not so much to discuss this Bill as it is, or to discuss the provisions of the Bill, or whether or not the dual language should be maintained officially in the North-West, but rather to discuss some other question as to whether our French Canadian friends are to have the right to speak their own language at all in the North-West and throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. There is another feature of this debate which has impressed me a good deal, and that is, that there is a tendency, in some quarters, to impute narrow-mindedness and a want of liberality to those who think that to impose the dual language by statutory enactment upon the people of those vast regions, which we call the North-West, would not be to the benefit of Canada. The speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) struck me as somewhat of an illustration of the first two of these features of this debate. The hon. gentleman, if he will allow me to say so, made us a most able and a most interesting address; but I listened to that speech for considerably over an hour without being able to discover whether the hon. gentleman was or was not in favor of continuing the dual language officially in the North-West. The hon. gentleman certainly pitched into my hon. friend beside me (Mr. McCarthy) most unmercifully, as did several other gentlemen, and unless my hon. friend from Simcoe has the hide of a rhinoceros, or half a dozen of them, he must, by this time, one would think, be pretty sore. The hon. member for Bothwell told us that if one language only was to be the language of Canada, that could not be the English language, but that it must be a sort of hybrid between the English and the French. I thought when he made that statement that he was not complimentary to my friend, the Minister of Public Works, who had just been addressing us in very forcible English indeed. I thought he had not been complimentary to my hon. friend, the leader of his own party, whose charming English will, I venture to say, live in the literature of Canada. The hon. gentleman naturally overlooks these facts, because they are facts. He has also overlooked the fact that although Highlanders of Scotland speak the English language they speak pure English; he overlooked the fact that although almost all the rising generation of Wales speak English, they do not speak a hybrid between Welsh and English. He also overlooked the fact that although the people in the counties of Ireland, where there has been an admixture of race, speak English, that that English is not a mixture of Erse and English, but is pure English. The hon. gentleman overlooked these facts; but I do not suppose we need be much surprised at that, for we all know that when my hon. friend gets on what I may call a burst of pure theoretical, political, philosophy, such ordinary common place things as mere matters of notorious fact are altogether beneath his notice.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is depending on his imagination now.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman is simply stating facts which my hon. friend from Bothwell never can appreciate. I may say further that I thought the hon. gentleman paid rather a left-handed compliment to our French Canadian friends, when out of all the characters portrayed by Shakespeare he selected as the mouth-piece of the French Canadians on this occasion the rapacious, the extortionate, and the relentless Shylock. My hon. friend gave us a very interesting discourse upon the law of forces. He handled the subject admirably, and he told us that if a number of forces were acting upon a given body at a given time, that body would be impelled in the direction of the resultant of these forces. I see my hon. friend nods his head and agrees to that statement. He told us that that law applied to mental as well as to physical force, and he was happy enough to illustrate the fact himself, because he showed us that the forces then acting on his own mind impelled him to make a perfect circle round the subject under discussion and carefully to avoid touching it at all. In reference to the third feature of this discussion, namely, the tendency to impute illiberality to those who think that the dual official language should not be maintained in the North-West Territories. For my own part, I wish to state that I shall express my conscientious convictions on this question regardless of any such imputations. While in many things I do not agree with my hon. friend beside me (Mr. McCarthy) yet I agree with the proposition he lays down, when he says that a country inhabited by one homogeneous people, speaking one language, is stronger and more stable than the same country would be if it were inhabited by an equal population composed of the original races which together went to make up that homogeneous people; each one of them speaking its own separate language, maintaining its own laws and customs and preserving its own individuality. I venture to say that there are few people who will controvert that assertion. Let us take the Austrian Empire for example. What is the notorious cause of the weakness of the Austrian Empire? It is the fact that there is no distinctive nationality in Austria; it is the fact that Austria consists of a conglomeration, or rather I should say of a bundle of distinct peoples, each of them preserving their own nationality, their own manners and customs; and as Professor Freeman says held together only by the fact that certain marriages, and wars, and treaties, and so forth, have given them a common sovereign.

I have been astonished to hear the example of Austria held up as one which could be placed in opposition to the view of the hon. member for North Simcoe. What does M. Louis Leger say in his late work with regard to Austria, a work of which Prof. Freeman, in his preface, expresses the highest admiration? He says:

"These conflicting elements have not been welded together by time, as for example: Have the Celts, the Gallo-Romans, the Franks, and the Iberians in Modern France? They have each preserved their language and their traditions; they live side by side without mingling. The life of an organic body consists in the equilibrium of the simple elements of which it is composed. If this equilibrium is destroyed, the body dies. In like fashion the life of the Austro-Hungarian State depends upon the unstable equilibrium of the various races which make up the empire."

Then, take the case of England. It is notorious that the Celts in the west did not fuse with the rest of the population of the island, and during several centuries that circumstance was a source of weakness, and embarrassment, and a clog upon England. If the Celts, and Anglo-Saxons, and Normans had not mingled in England and formed one race, but lived as separate races in England to-day, does anyone suppose that England would occupy the place among the nations of the world which she does occupy? Take the case of Scotland. Is it not notorious that the Highlanders of Scotland did not amalgamate with the Lowlanders, and is it not a fact that that was a source of weakness to that country? Sir Walter Scott, who knew the nature of Scotchmen as well as any man who ever lived, perfectly expresses the feelings of the Highlanders of Scotland when he puts into the mouth of a typical chieftain the words with which we are all familiar:

"The stranger came with iron hand,
And from our fathers reft the land."

And then, after giving a magnificent picture of the barren fastnesses into which they were driven, he goes on:

"Pent in this fortress of the North,
Thinkst thou we will not sally forth
To spoil the spoilers as we may,
And from the robber rend the prey?
Ay, by my soul! while on yon plain
The Saxon rears one shock of grain,
While of ten thousand herds there strays
But one along yon river maze,
The Gael of plain and river heir Shall with strong hand redeem his share."

Sir, it is notorious, as I say, that those words represent the sentiment of the Highlanders of Scotland, as maintained for very many generations, and that it is only within comparatively recent days that that unfortunate feeling of distrust and dislike between these races has died away; and I venture to say that anyone who knows the circumstances of that country is prepared to endorse what I say when I assert that nothing has more contributed to that better and happier condition of things which now exists than the more general use of the English language in the Highlands of Scotland. Take the case of France. Will anyone say that if France to-day were not inhabited by the great and homogeneous people that she has, but were inhabited by the Celts and Gallo—Romans, Iberians, Franks and Norsemen—each preserving their own institutions, usages and individuality, and speaking their own language, she could be the great and powerful and stable nation she is to-day? And so I believe that here in Canada, if our races were amalgamated, we should be stronger than we are at the present moment. We all know that our French Canadian friends have many qualities characteristic of their race, great and good qualities, which are not characteristic of the race to which we belong; and I think we may say, on the other hand, that we have good qualities characteristic of our race which are not so highly developed in theirs; and I think we may fairly conclude that if there were a blending of the races, that blending would be beneficial to both; but in any case it cannot be doubted that it would add to the solidarity of the Dominion. Then, I think, there can be no question of the correctness of the assertion of my hon. friend, that this perpetuation of different languages has a tendency to keep races apart and to preserve and maintain race distinctions; and the other proposition, the reverse of that—though I cannot go so far as some of the quotations which my hon. friend read taken by themselves would seem to go—appears to me to be perfectly correct also, that the use of one language is a wonderful solvent of race distinctions. It further seems to me to be self-evident, that the enforcing by statutory enactment, so far as statutory enactment can enforce it, the use of distinct languages has a tendency to perpetuate a plurality of languages, and to prevent the advance throughout the population of any one of those languages which has a natural tendency to become dominant. Now, Sir, all these propositions I believe to be true and unassailable; but I hope no hon. gentleman in this House, whether he be amongst my French Canadian friends or amongst my English-speaking friends, will for one moment suppose that because I hold these propositions to be true, I also believe that the dual language should not have been permitted in Canada. I entertain no such opinion, Mr. Speaker. In dealing practically with this question, we have not to consider principles in the abstract, but facts as they are. A well known writer, speaking of the great Edmund Burke, said:

"All abstract speculation and theorising on the principles of government, without special reference to the particular circumstances of the country and the people to be governed, Mr. Burke held, from the beginning to the end of his life, in undisguised contempt."

And I venture to think that it would be well if that rooted conviction of the greatest political thinker Britain ever produced, was also the rooted conviction of some of our theoretical political philosophers of the nineteenth century. It no more follows that because we think it would be to the advantage of Canada that we should have one homogeneous race here, that because we think that our races would more speedily become homogeneous if one language only were used, we would be justified in attempting, even if we had the power, to stamp out one of these languages, than it follows that one of these races would be justified in exterminating the other. I would ask if there is any man in this Chamber who would say that when Canada passed under the aegis of liberty-loving England, the use of their mother tongue should have been denied to the gallant defenders of their soil. Is there any man who will say that on the day when Montcalm fell on the Plains of Abraham there should have passed away forever from his compatriots the right to the freest and fullest use of that tongue which they had learned at their mother's knee, which is interwoven with the very threads of life, which is inseparably connected with every joy and sorrow, with every emotion, with every thought, from infancy to the grave? I venture to say that no one will say so, and I venture to say that any such treatment of the vanquished would have been un-English and unjust, would have been tyrannical and cruel. I will go further and say that it seems to me it would have been only a little less oppressive to have precluded our French Canadian friends, who were the overwhelming majority in their own Province, from the freest use of their own language in their courts of law and in the Legislative Assembly of their Province. In treating of this matter, we must not be so much impressed by considerations of abstract principles as by facts as they exist and by the lessons of history, and while it would have been well for England if the Celts of the west had amalgamated with the rest of the population as the Celts in Cornwall and Devonshire did, and while it would have been well for Scotland if the Celts in the North had amalgamated with the Saxons in the plains as the Celts in England have done, still we must remember that notwithstanding the fact that they did not amalgamate and have not amalgamated up to this day, England has grown to be great and prosperous as no country of a like area has ever grown before; and Queen Victoria to-day has not throughout her broad Empire more devoted and loyal subjects than are to be found in Wales. And while it is true that it would have added to the strength of Scotland if the Celts of the Highlands had joined hand in hand with their brethren on the plains, yet, notwithstanding the fact that they did not do so, Scotland for many a long century preserved her independence and held her own; and when at length the kingdoms were merged into one, that result came about, not as a consideration of abstract principles alone would have led us to believe it would have come about, by the conquest of the weaker country by the stronger, but it came about by the fact that the far weaker country gave a king to her great and powerful southern neighbor from her own royal House of Stuart; and to-day when any British general wishes to get a body of picked men for any service of special difficulty and danger, these very plaided warriors of the North, who were so often led by men like the typical Rhoderick Dhu against the Saxon, are amongst the most highly prized of all those most famous regiments whose splendid deeds of valor, and prowess, have shed a lustre on the British arms. Therefore, I say, that although we have two races living side by side here in Canada, I for one am not doubtful of the result. Let no man fear for the future of Canada. Mighty and glorious that future must be, notwithstanding that there may be perhaps a poor pitiful handful of traitors within, and that there are certainly swarms of jealous rivals without. For my part I wish we had no race distinctions, I wish we were all one united homogeneous people, I wish the terms French Canadian and British Canadian were only to be found in the pages of history, and that from the North to the South and from ocean to ocean, the simple word Canadian were the one and only term that could appropriately be applied to the citizen of this broad Dominion. But, Sir, such a result as that, if it is to be brought about at all, can only come about by the flux of time and by the cultivation of feelings of mutual respect, mutual forbearance, and mutual good-will. I wish to say this, however, that the forbearance must not be all on one side. We must remember that part of the trouble is this, that in the Province of Ontario, and, I believe, in other parts of Canada to-day, the impression is that the forbearance has been pretty much all on one side. For my part I will say here in my place in Parliament what I said to my own constituents on the 12th July last, that the man who would for party purposes or for paltry personal motives endeavor to sow the seeds of dissension between our French Canadian friends and the British-speaking people of Canada is unworthy to represent any constituency in this Dominion, and that he might more properly, in the well known words of the poet Hood:—

“Sit for hell and represent the devil.”

Sir, we have our race distinctions, and it is our duty to make the best of them. Unfortunately the extraordinary movement which was inaugurated some time ago in the Province of Quebec, and which was promoted so largely by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and which culminated in the formation of a party whose raison d'être is only that it is the French as against the English party, has rendered the making the best of our race distinctions very much more difficult than it otherwise would have been. That is a proposition which perhaps may be taken exception to. But when the people of the Province of Ontario see the Premier of the Province of Quebec ostentatiously put himself at the head of this anti-British party in the Province of Quebec, they, I think, naturally come to the conclusion—whether it is right or not is another question—that this anti-British party represents the sentiments of the people of the Province of Quebec and that the sentiment of the people of the Province of Quebec is hostile to British interests. I do not myself believe that that is a fair view of the situation, because we know—those of us who are in this House know—or many of us believe—I may say we know that the Parti National does not represent united Quebec at all events. We know that our French Canadian friends sitting on this side of this House are opposed to the Parti National, and I believe—my hon. friend will contradict me if I am wrong—that the organ of the party of which he is the distinguished leader, La Patrie, denounces the Parti National. If, then, we have our friends on this side opposed to the Parti National and those hon. gentlemen opposite who represent the great Liberal Party of the Province, also opposed to it, I think the sentiment of the Province of Quebec cannot fairly be taken to be hostile to British interests, but the existence of that Parti National produces that impression in Ontario. I was very much pleased to hear the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who occupies such a prominent position in that party—if I may be allowed to allude in passing to a previous debate—aver from his place in this House in the most solemn terms, in the most distinct and emphatic terms, that he and those acting with him were not actuated by any anti-British feeling whatever; that he and his compatriots recognised to the fullest extent the beneficence—that was the word he used—the beneficence of British rule in Canada. And I was glad to hear him aver that, without any reservation, they admitted that they were treated with fair play, with justice and with generosity. I was delighted when I heard the hon. member make that speech, and I was so moved by it that I was almost inclined to cross the floor of the House and renew to him my supplication that he would allow his name to be enrolled as a member of the Imperial Federation League; but I thought I would wait till the conclusion of the debate, when I was satisfied, from what my hon. friend said, that I would capture the whole Parti National en bloc. But I warn my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, who is not here at present, but I warn him through the members of the Cabinet who are here, that when that day arrives and I get the silver-tongued member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) to become a member of the Federation League, my right hon. friend will have to keep a sharp eye on me lest I fall a victim to the magic of my hon. friend opposite. As I have said we must try to make the best of our race differences. The hon. gentleman said he had the fullest confidence in British fair play, British justice and British generosity, and I say he and his compatriots may have the fullest confidence in British fair play, justice and generosity. The British people in Canada and in the Mother Country are as ready to mete out fair play, justice and generosity to-day as they have been in the past, and they will be in the future as they are to-day. That is my conviction. Because for my part, I will never believe that our French Canadian friends can be prevailed upon either by agitator or demagogue so far to do violence to the generous and chivalrous impulses which are so characteristic of their race, as to endeavor to convert those privileges which have been so lavishly conferred upon them into a weapon to wound the hand that bestowed the boon. Therefore, I do not believe that any attempt will ever be made to interfere with those privileges. It is right that they should look with jealousy at any attempt to interfere with the constitutional privileges which have been conferred upon them, but, for my part—it may be my blindness—I cannot see how the proposal which is now before us will interfere with them. I am not speaking of the preamble of the Bill, I am speaking of the Bill itself. I take the position which was taken by the 188 last session, and I assume that the preamble is not an essential part of the Bill. I say the question with which we are now face to face is not one of interfering with the constitutional privileges of our French Canadian friends. It is rather a question whether we should continue to interfere with the natural privileges of the British people in the North-West Territories, who have, by the voice of their Legislative Assembly, asked us to relieve them of a burden which this House has imposed upon them. When they had no Legislative Assembly, this House, with the strong hand and in the exercise of its right, no doubt, if not of its wisdom, decreed that there should be dual language in the North-West Territories. At that time we had at least this excuse for what we did, that we had no authoritative information that what we did would be distasteful to the majority of the people there. Now we have the fact that the Legislative Assembly, which we felt bound to call into existence, has, by a practically unanimous vote, asked us to relieve them of the burden which we cast upon them. They say that they regard this as a burden, they say that they do not require dual language in the North-West Territories, they say that they regard it as burdensome and vexatious, and they ask us to remove the incubus which we have cast upon them. I do not see for my part how we can refuse to accede to their request. It is perfectly useless, to my mind, to place against the almost unanimous vote of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West petitions such as have been presented to this House, more especially when we know that the opinion expressed by the Legislative Assembly is endorsed by every organ of public opinion in the North-West. Perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), who edits the Regina Leader, and who, I see, is not in his place, has not endorsed it. Well, I listened to my hon. friend reading a long article from the Regina Leader the other day, and the Leader did not venture to controvert in any way the statement that this was the opinion of the people there. It is quite true that if there were a large French population in the North-West Territories, the precedents which have been adduced by the hon. member for West Durham, might have some force. What were they? One was that it had been recommended by the British Parliament that the people of certain countries in Europe should be left to decide for themselves whether they should have a dual language, or a plurality of languages, or what language they should have as their official language. Well, the people of the North-West have told us their wishes; and if he does not give effect to their expressed opinion upon this subject, he is going back upon this precedent which he has brought before the House. And what was the other? It was with reference to Poland, and the question was whether the Poles should be allowed fuller use of their own language in their own country. What in the world has that got to do with this question? If the North-West was a French settlement, if there was an overwhelming majority of our French Canadian friends in the North-West, these two precedents which have been brought forward by the hon. gentleman would have some bearing. But I venture to say—and I hope that he will not think me impertinent in saying so; I suppose, insignificant as I am, I have a right to my opinion on the question—but in my opinion, at least, his precedents have no bearing upon the question at all, but are rather an argument in favor of the contention that the people of the North-West ought to decide this question, and that the opinion of the people of the North-West ought to be taken as conclusive on this question. Now, if there were a large number of our French Canadian friends in that country, even though they were not in a majority, I think it might be reasonable that we should stay our hands. But I want to ask, is there not some limit to this? Suppose there was only one French Canadian in the North-West, and a hundred thousand British people; should we be called upon to establish a dual language in the North-West Territories, or to maintain it there? Well, then, it is a question of degree. The question is, whether there is such a population of our French Canadian friends there as to require the use of this official dual language, such a population as would make it worth our while to go right in the teeth of the almost unanimously expressed wish of the representatives of the people. It is strange Liberal doctrine, at all events, I think. Now, Sir, if the people of the North-West were seeking to inflict any hardship upon our French Canadian friends the case would be different. But they are not asking anything of the kind. They are simply asking us not to impose upon them this dual official language, and when we remember that every single member of that Legislative Assembly is an English-speaking person, and that the French language is to him a foreign tongue, it seems to me that the request is a very reasonable one. Mr. Speaker, I would be most unwilling in any way to do violence to the sentiments of my French Canadian friends; I would be as unwilling to do so as I am sure they would be unwilling to do violence to my sentiments. I would even be willing to go some length in deference to their prejudices, as I believe they would be willing to go some length to meet my prejudices. But though I am prepared to go a long way for peace and friendship, even for the attainment of such objects as these, I am not prepared to go as far as to betray the people of my own flesh and blood; I am not prepared to go so far as to say that I will ignore the voice of the Legislature which we ourselves have felt it our duty to establish there. I would consider that I was doing them a gross injustice, and I shall endeavor, for my part, to mete out to them the same measure of justice that I would hope to have meted out to myself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think I would have attempted to address the House upon this question, had it not been for the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McNeill). I think it was a very inopportune time for the hon. member to make the attack he did on my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), just after the able, patriotic and broad-minded speech that he had made, showing that he was able to rise above party and express in a patriotic manner the views he held. I regret that the hon. gentleman should have taken this opportunity to make such a wild charge against the character of my hon. friend from West Durham, although he requires no defence at my hand, either in this House or in the country. Sir, the position that my hon. friend took upon the Reil question only entitled him, I think, to still greater credit before this House and the people of Canada. To my mind he had everything to lose from a political point of view, and nothing to gain, from the position he took on that question; and although I did not vote with him, although he was my leader, whom I respected and admired then as I do at the present time, I exercised my humble judgment according to the best of my ability, nor did that hon. gentleman ever complain of the position that I took at that time. I think, Sir, that it is to be regretted that this question has come before the House at all, considering the course the discussion has taken. The discussion has taken a wide range, and many matters have been referred to that are likely to raise bad feeling throughout the country, not only between people of different nationalities, but between those professing different religious creeds; and this has been attributed to the speeches made by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on other occasions outside of the House, as well as to the remarks he made on the introduction of this Bill. I must also say, Mr. Speaker, that I think that the heated and passionate address of the Minister of Public Works last night is very much to be regretted. I do not think that hon. Minister was at all justified in making the remarks he did on this particular question. Had the hon. Minister any ground for the attack he made upon the people of the Province of Ontario that they were intolerant towards their fellow-countrymen in Quebec, and the French-speaking people of this country? The hon. gentleman must have forgotten that at the present time in this House the most ultra-British and ultra-Protestant representatives in the chamber have chosen for their leader a French-speaking Catholic who, by his conduct in this House, and by his great ability, has endeared himself not only to the members on this side, who are proud of him as their leader, but I may say to every member on the other side of the House as well; a gentleman whose patriotism is well known, who has on several occasions taken a broad-minded and liberal view of questions, in opposition to what we know to be the sentiments, easily aroused, of his race in the Province of Quebec, which he represents here. That being the case, I think it is to be regretted that the Minister of Public Works should have made the passionate appeal he did and have attacked the people of Ontario, and have appealed to his French Canadian friends irrespective of party to stand by him on the present occasion. In my humble opinion he did not consider that the constitutional rights of the people of Quebec were being attacked at the present time, or that there was any danger whatever to him or to his party or his nationality or the creed of the people whom he represents. It is only fair, after the attack made by the hon. member who has taken his seat, giving as his reason why this agitation has been carried on throughout Ontario, that I should thus express my opinion. In my humble judgment, I may say to my French Canadian friends on both sides of the House, that I do not think there is any particular danger to their constitutional rights or their civil or religious liberties. If I were to express my true feelings on this matter I would say that, judging by the articles in the press which support the Dominion Government, judging by the resolutions passed at party meetings throughout Ontario, there is no particular fault found with the action of this House or with this Government, for the newspapers and the party with whom the hon. Minister works in harmony do not find fault with the leader of the Government and hold him and his colleagues responsible for this agitation, but all the blame is cast upon Mr. Mowat and the Ontario Government. Does not the Minister of Public Works know that the only charge brought forward in Ontario against the Government of that Province and the only charge brought by the Conservative party, with whom he works so well, is that Mr. Mowat is allowing French to be taught in the public schools in some parts of Ontario, and that he has been truckling to the Catholic Church? These are the charges made, and I am sure when the elections take place a few months hence that will be the last we will hear about this, which appears to be at present a very important and serious question, so far as many of the Conservatives in Ontario are concerned. No doubt my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works will find time, instead of offering, as he told us, prayers on sacred ground in Quebec for the souls of his forefathers, to send missionaries to stir up the French Canadians to vote against the Mowat Government, as he has done in the past. I am informed that only a few months ago he sent one of his missionaries to assist a in bye-election and to endeavor to stir up the feelings of the French and Irish Catholics against that Government. I have as much right, and a great deal more right, to offer this as a cause of the agitation in Ontario, as had the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House to lay an unjustifiable charge against the hon. gentleman for West Durham (Mr. Blake). If those charges had not been made I would not have addressed the House on this question. Although I admire very much, and I am sure every member of this House and every true Canadian must admire the broad and patriotic speech of the member for West Durham, of whom I am a great admirer and follower, I cannot agree with him on the main question before the House at the present time. I believe, and it is my honest judgment, although I may be wrong, that, as in the North-West Territory there are so few French-speaking people, and still fewer, if the information I have received is correct, who read French, it would be better not to have a dual language in that country at the present time. While I differ from the hon. gentleman, I am sure he will give me credit for honesty of judgment in dealing with this subject. While not committing myself to vote for the Bill before the House I candidly express my view on this question and I believe also the view of my constituents. I may say to the Minister of Public Works, who has just entered the Chamber, that I do not think he was justified in making the attack he did upon us. It is not within my recollection that in the Province of Ontario any Catholic or any number of Catholics have been treated with intolerance or their worship interfered with in any respect whatever, with the one or two exceptions which are so frequently referred to, and in those cases there was no interference with worship. It is true that in Toronto, where feeling runs high, when there were large demonstrations on one, two or three occasions, rows have been stirred up and little conflicts have taken place; but at no place, and certainly not in the riding which I represent, where there is a very large Protestant majority, have the hon. gentleman's co-religionists failed to enjoy the greatest possible liberty to worship God in any way they pleased, and in my riding they have been assisted, as every Catholic throughout that section will bear witness, very materially by their Protestant neighbors. I repeat that the insinuations made in the speech of the Minister of Public Works were very unjustifiable, and his appeal to his fellow Canadians, irrespective of party, to stand by him on this occasion, was simply an attempt to pull wool over their eyes, for he knew that if there was any agitation in Ontario, if there was any intolerance in regard to this question, it was owing to the action of his own political friends for whom he had not a word of condemnation, although they are the party which is opposing the action of the Liberal Government in allowing French to be taught in the schools, and indeed the hon. gentleman seemed to be perfectly satisfied to receive the support of those who were carrying on this agitation in Ontario.

Miscellaneous Expenses—Senate..... $58,438

Mr. FOSTER. This is a decrease of over $2,000.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). How is this decrease of $2,200 ?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, don't find fault with a decrease.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). There must be something about it to require some explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the result of a general course of economy.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I understood that last Session there was to be some investigation to see if the expenses could not be cut down. Are we to understand that this is the result of the operations of the enquiry last year ?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a forerunner of the result.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). Well, we would like to see some afterrunners too.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before these items pass, I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance and of the House, to what I consider has been a gross misuse of the vote of this House in this connection last year. In the Auditor General's Report for 1888-1889 I find that this House, after consideration and consultation, voted a sum of $5,338 for the stationery of the Senate. That amounted to about the same per capita as was voted for our stationery here. I find, however, that these gentlemen of the Senate instead of spending the sum we voted spent $12,412.88. This is a matter which requires a good deal of explanation. It is perfectly useless for us to attempt to limit the expenditure, if we vote four or five thousand dollars for a particular department or branch of the Legislature, and if they spend ten or twelve thousand dollars. When I take up the details of that expenditure I find that they are not such as would commend them to our serious judgment. Among the items I find 99 thermometers, from which I would suppose that each gentleman in the Senate requires a thermometer to test the temperature of the chamber for himself.

Mr. FOSTER. To keep him warm.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No ; it would not even keep him warm. Then I find among the items several barometers, 12 tourists' cases at $127 (I suppose some of them intended to make a journey in the summer), 22 writing cases, stationery cabinets, writing desks, deed boxes, despatch boxes, pocket diaries, letter cases, and a lot of other things which at first sight do not appear to be at all necessary. The principle which I wish to call attention to is the disregard paid to the control which this Chamber should exercise on the expenditure of public money. When we vote $5,800 and they spend $12,000 it is a flagrant disregard of the wishes of this Chamber, which is supposed to control the expenditure of the public money. I think the Minister should give some explanation of this extraordinary expenditure above the vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. While the Minister is looking for this information, I would call his attention to an item of $100.50 for a gown for the Speaker of the Senate. I would like to know why this House should be called upon to contribute $100.50 for one gown for the Speaker of the Senate. It must be a very costly one, when we find that the gown of the Speaker of this House only cost $60.

Mr. FOSTER. It must be of very much finer material.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think this is any matter to joke about, nor do I think that the people of this country at the present moment, considering our debt and financial embarrassment, are ready to give their assent to extravagance of this kind. It may be that the Speaker of the Senate has to be provided with a gown, but I think discretion should direct him not to resort to such extravagance. I do not consider it is in keeping with the dignity of a man who occupies the high position of the Speaker of the Senate, and who is irresponsible to the people, that he should act so extravagantly with the public money.

Mr. FOSTER. Unfortunately there is no representative of the Senate here. I could not by any manner of means divine what questions would be asked. All that I can do with reference to these matters is when the attention of the House has been called to them, make a note and bring down an explanation to the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I move that the item stand, and that the Speaker of the Senate appear before the Committee to give information.

Mr. BOWELL. You cannot do that. How are you going to get him into the House ?

Mr. LISTER. At all events there should be some person in this House able to give us the information. It is a monstrous thing that the Senate, irresponsible as it is to the people of this country, should exceed the appropriation made by Parliament. I find here amongst other items 432 pocket pencils. These are gold pencils, I should think, and probably each Senator takes one for himself and three or four for his friends. Then, again, we have 372 pocket knives for about 70 Senators. I may say, in connection with this item of stationery, that this year the members of this House have received a very inferior lot of stationery, much inferior to what has been given for several years before. I for one believe that the giving of these boxes of stationery should be entirely abolished. Every gentleman who attends this House and the Senate gets all the writing paper he wishes for at the Stationery Office up stairs; the boxes of stationery are taken home, and in three or four Sessions he has enough for his children and his grandchildren. If the collection were confined to stationery, there might be some excuse for it; but all sorts of articles are given, particularly to the members of the Senate. I understand that they receive dressing cases—which are entirely unnecessary and uncalled for. If the Government think there should be a provision for stationery for the members, it would be better to vote $25 or $30 additional to their sessional allowance; but the Senators have no right to overdraw the appropriation of this House for that purpose. We control the purse strings, and they have no right to spend a dollar more than we allow them. If they do, they should return it.

Mr. FOSTER. If hon. gentlemen will point out just what items they wish to have explanations upon, I shall be glad to get the explanations. These items are a recapitulation of the articles which go into the stationery boxes, and you will find a similar recapitulation of the articles that go into the stationery boxes of this House.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see a charge for six deed boxes; what are they for?

Mr. FOSTER. I dare say they are to put documents in. Other documents than deeds might be put into deed boxes.

Mr. LISTER. There is evidently favoritism in this matter. I know some Senators who say that they have not received some of the things mentioned in this list. I see a charge for brief bags, and four Senators must have got writing desks, to the exclusion of the other 76; and various articles are charged for in insufficient numbers to go round the Senate, so that a few Senators must have been favored at the expense of the others.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not quite fair in his criticism. These items are for stationery used not only by the Senators themselves, but also by the officers of the Senate.

Mr. LISTER. Last year the total amount spent by the Senators for stationery was $12,412, while we voted them only $5,988, so that they spent more than 100 per cent. in excess of the amount voted by this House. This $12,000 is really worth more than all the services the senators have rendered since 1867.

Mr. FISHER. The Finance Minister is no doubt right in saying that some of these articles are required by officers of the Senate, but I cannot conceive of any one connected with the Senate who has a right to order a brief bag, for instance, which is a part of the equipment of a legal gentleman. There would be some reasonable excuse if such articles were necessary for their public duties, and not for their private or professional use. The remarks of my hon. friend are important, from the fact that the Senators have expended more than double the amount voted; and I care not what the items are, no Department of the Government has a right to ask for a grant to be thus unblushingly overstepped. The same amount is asked this year, while we have no sort of guarantee that double as much will not be again spent; and, apparently if these things are necessary, it is very evident that instead of their asking for the same amount as was voted last year, the hon. Finance Minister ought to ask for double as much, because the Senate spent double last year. If this expenditure is not justifiable, and evidently in the Finance Minister's opinion it is not, because he does not propose to give them as much money as they spent, then we ought to know why they have increased the expenditure?

Mr. FOSTER. I will make enquiries about the item of stationery. It must be remembered that these are simply the details, while the general vote has not been very much over-expended. Some of the details can be exactly known, because they are salaries, and some cannot, because they are different from year to year; and it may be, and I think it very reasonable to suppose that it is, that some of the items that appear here are for articles that are in the nature of stock, which may run out from year to year, and which may be provided anew in a particular year, when the whole amount is consequently greater than would be normally used in an ordinary year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Apart from this item, there are several points on which we should like information from the Senators. Now, in the first place, I understand there are about seventy-five or eighty Senators altogether. I see that there are 420 blotting pads at $254; 1,992 lead pencils at $110; 432 pocket pencils at $300; 438 boxes of pens at $373; 4,356 pen holders at $126; 372 pocket knives at $541; 312 pairs of scissors at $314—over a dollar a pair; 268 pocket knives at $99; 144 desk knives at $34; 6 deed boxes at $31; 96 pocket diaries at $120; 120 letter cases at $132; 240 pocket memos. at $68; 120 wallets at $160; 135 card cases at $79; 720 pieces ribbon at $398; 138 baskets at $93; 8 hones—I do not know what those are, unless they are razor strops; it is a wonder they do not charge us for razors. If we pass over all those items, next year they will probably bring in at the tail of the bill a charge for barbers to shave them every morning, and possibly for grinding-stones to grind their razors. These charges are unreasonable, and we would not be discharging our duty if we were to allow an item of this kind to pass without bringing before the House and the country the extravagance of men who are removed beyond the reach of the people or the Government. Some distinct understanding should be come to by which each Senator would get a prescribed amount of stationery—a knife if necessary, a pair of scissors, but nothing more. The idea of having 320 pairs of scissors at $360 for 78 Senators is absurd. We have the right to criticise severely this scandalous expenditure connected with the Senate, and we should not allow this item to pass before getting some explanation. What becomes of all this stuff? The Senators must be loaded down every time they go away from here. It is a disgrace that they should take the property of the people in this style and carry it away.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Without criticising the items, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to a fact which appears rather singular, namely, that the stationery for the Senate, composed of 70 to 80 members, should cost $12,400, while the stationery for the House of Commons, composed of 215 members, does not cost so much. That is something that requires explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. That has been the case for a long series of years. That is due not so much to the great amount, as to the fact that the Senators are more careful in the selection of their stationery than the House of Commons.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Should that be allowed?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a pretty difficult matter to exercise control over. They have there their own Committee on Contingencies, and have a good deal to do in the management of their own affairs, and it is scarcely fair that my hon. friend, who has criticised so extensively these several items, should make the assertion that these hon. gentlemen carry away stationery in their pockets. I do not think these remarks were called for, and they were certainly not respectful to the other branch of this House.

Mr. McMULLEN. What do they do with it? We have a right to know what becomes of all this stuff.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will not consent to pass this item until I follow out to their ultimate destination all the articles, I am afraid the item will have to stand a long time.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman should get from the Senate an account of what becomes of all this stuff. We have put a lot of questions to the hon. gentleman, but he is not able to answer. I contend that the item should stand over, and that the hon. gentleman should ask the Senate to furnish him with the necessary information.

Mr. FISHER. I am sure the Senators themselves would be willing to take such steps as are necessary to give the Finance Minister all the information asked for. It stands to reason that the Senators themselves cannot possibly have carried off or used all the articles enumerated in the Auditor's Report. My own conclusion is that there must be great carelessness in the management of the Stationery Department, or very deliberate misapplication of the articles charged. I do not wish to make any charges against any of the officials, but it is in the interests, not only of the Senators themselves, but in the interests of the officials of the Senate, that a complete answer should be given to the questions put. It is absurd to suppose that the Senators, and officials who have access to these articles, could possibly have used them, and the only conclusion we can come to is that these articles were abstracted from the Stationery Department of the Senate and applied to purposes to which they ought not to be applied at the country's expense. It is, therefore, I believe, the duty of the Minister of Finance, as defending the reputation of the Senate, to give a complete answer to these questions, and I do not think it would be showing proper respect to the Senate to allow this item to pass until such explanation has been given.

Mr. FOSTER. Let it stand. I will give a detailed account of it.

House of Commons—Salaries as per Clerk's Estimate..... $70,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I should like to ask what number of sessional clerks are now employed. I find that an amount of $10,102 is paid for sessional clerks. It was understood a year ago, or it came out in debate, that there were so many sessional clerks employed that there were sufficient almost to give one to every hon. member on the other side of the House to attend to his correspondence. Is that practice still continued?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not continued.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is responsible for the distribution of the rooms in connection with the House of Commons? Is it Mr. Speaker, or does it rest with some of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman locate his question, if I may use that term? Does he mean the distribution which takes place previous to the sitting of the House or during the time the House is in session?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While the House is sitting, who arranges who shall have the rooms which belong to the House of Commons? Is it the Treasury Department, or the Speaker, or the Minister of Public Works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Prior to the meeting of Parliament the distribution is arranged by myself. Of course, that is always subject to the action of the House of Commons, or of Mr. Speaker, or of the Committee of Internal Economy; but previous to the sitting of the House the rooms are prepared, and if any change has been suggested during the recess or during the previous Session, the change is made in accordance with the wish which has been expressed. When Parliament meets, the distribution of rooms is, to a very great extent, under the control of the House of Commons, and it is the same in the Senate.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Would the hon. gentleman inform the House how many rooms have been given to gentlemen on his own side of the House, and how many to members from this side of the House. There is a general complaint—I do not know whether it is justified or not—that almost every hon. member on that side of the House, or a very large number have had rooms assigned for their private use where they can meet together, whereas for the members on this side I believe only two rooms have been assigned—one for the leader of the Opposition, and one for the use of Mr. Mackenzie and Sir Richard Cartwright. That is hardly in proportion to the representation of parties in this House, and is hardly dealing out fair play to hon. members on both sides. We know, unfortunately, that there are more members on that side than on this, and we must expect, for the time being, that they will have more rooms than are given to the smaller number who are in the Opposition; but we have our rights, and we might expect that the Minister of Public Works, or the Speaker, would see that those rights are not neglected.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not aware that, except the large room next to the chamber which has been given to the Conservative members, who are in large numbers, any changes have been made in the rooms from what they were last Session.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is not the question. I want to know how many there are allotted, or were allotted last Session?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not know, because this was not fixed by my Department, and members of the House of Commons took the rooms as they thought proper. Some members are in committee rooms and others are in other rooms; but, if I were to be called upon to state under oath which rooms or how many are used by one side or the other I could not state the number. During the Session of Parliament, members of both sides have used rooms which were not absolutely required by clerks of the House, or have been using committee rooms when they were not required for meetings of committees, but I cannot say how many are used on one side or the other. I am sure they have not been allotted by my Department.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works has always such thorough control of his Department, and is always so ready to give a full, if not always a satisfactory, explanation when he is required, that I am surprised that he is not able to give the information which I asked for. Perhaps he will take the means to discover and to inform the committee what the disposition of these rooms is. I know there is considerable complaint made on this side of the House, and, although there may be no change from last year, that is no satisfaction to us, and no proof that the distribution last year was right.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There has been no assignment of rooms to any members of the House. The only room which has been assigned to the members on this side of the House is the large room to which I have referred, because they had no room before in which they could meet. They had only a little room, No. 8, where no meeting could be held. The other room allotted to hon. members opposite last year was No. 6, and that was renewed this year and those are the only two rooms that I am aware of that have been allotted to members. Any other rooms which are occupied by members on one side or the other, have been taken possession of by members of the House during the Session, but there has been no allotment by my Department. This is the first time I have heard of any complaint in regard to this matter; but, if any complaint had been made to me, I would have answered as I have, that during the Session these rooms are in the possession of the House of Commons and the members of the House of Commons, and that they occupy such rooms as they think best to occupy, provided they do not interfere with the work of the clerks or the sitting of the committees.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Then I understand from the hon. gentleman that these rooms which are occupied by members on his side, are open to any members of this House if they choose to use them. The members on this side of the House have a right to use the room equally with those gentlemen who are in possession.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman remembers that he was in the Government at that time, and the Ministers occupied rooms. The rooms that we occupied last year have continued to be occupied this year. Besides the rooms occupied by the members of the Government, there is one that the late Premier (Mr. Mackenzie) used; I think it was No. 9. But that being required for the press room, another was allotted to him, so that he might enjoy the privacy of a room, having held the high position of Premier. Besides that, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) had a room three or four years ago. It was given to him when the changes took place, and I had great pleasure in offering it to him, because it was understood that he should have a room where he could receive his friends and consult with them. Besides these, I do not know of any room that is occupied by any members on one side or the other. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is perfectly right in saying there are some, but they have not been allotted by my Department or by myself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there is about a dozen rooms that, by common habit of the House, are assigned for the use of members. Although it is quite fair and proper for hon. gentlemen opposite, who are in a majority, to have a majority of the rooms, I think a due proportion should be observed, and that in proportion to the members on this side, rooms should be assigned, just as we do in forming our committees. The hon. gentleman has given, I think, a proportion of three to two, something like that, on all the committees. Of course, we know that the Ministers must have rooms—I do not exactly know how many the Ministers have.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Five or six. In some rooms there are three or four persons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In our time, I think, the only one of us who had a room was my hon. friend, Mr. Mackenzie. I had a special room myself when Minister, but the reason for that was that we found it convenient to transact our business in our offices. But as a matter of fact, the Minister will find, if he makes enquiry, that the thing is pretty much as my hon. friend has stated, that about a dozen rooms are practically taken possession of by members of the House; and that a very much more than a proportionate share, so far, has fallen to the lot of the majority. Now, we recognise their right to a majority of the rooms, but only a proportionate majority. If the Minister of Public Works will make enquiries into the matter he can very easily satisfy the wishes of my hon. friend. By the courtesy of my old friend, Mr. Mackenzie, I have nothing to complain of, because he very kindly puts his room at my disposal, so that personally I have no interest in the matter. But I know that the fact is as I have stated, as regards the practical working out of it. I am not accusing the hon. Minister of having set them aside, but I am stating the facts. All we ask is that Mr. Speaker, if he chooses to assume this somewhat onerous task, will see that our friends do get a proportionate number of the rooms.

Mr. WRIGHT. The difficulties in this matter are considerable. Quite a portion of my political life has been spent in a little room that we had down stairs, inhabited by myself and by five or six gentlemen of the Opposition. But the Ministers, casting their eyes upon this little pleasant room, as the late lamented Ahab on Naboth's vineyard, drove us out and took possession according to the good old plan, that "they may take who have the power, and they may keep who can," and then we had to take possession of a pleasant little room at the far end of the corridor. There I find we occupy a nameless position. When I was out west I remember seeing certain little caves inhabited by gophers and rattlesnakes, and that kind of thing. Well, we are about the strangest congregation you can find anywhere. My hon. friend, the brilliant party of the left-centre, occupies that room, and then we have the millionaires, we have the Canadian Pacific Railway, and very many other important institutions. I think four or five gentlemen belong to the Opposition. At any rate, when I am there I am about the only representative of the Ministerial party. But I may say that our relations have been very friendly, and I hope the Minister will not drive us to extremity, because I think we desire very much to hold on to our room. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he wants a position with us, if he wants a "sit," as they term it, in our little room, he is quite welcome.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the first important question we have to consider is, who has charge of the allocation of the rooms in this building. I understand that the Minister of Public Works repudiates responsibility. He says the building is under his control when Parliament is not in Session, but when Parliament is in Session it is under control of Mr. Speaker. That, I understand, is what the Minister of Public Works has informed us. Well, if that be the case, I think Mr. Speaker should hold the balance with something like an even hand, and that the members of the Opposition should have the fair proportion of these rooms. I do not know how many rooms are occupied by the Ministers, but I know that in our time there was no room at all held by anyone, except it might be by the First Minister, and he only while it was not required for other purposes. I suppose the first consideration in the use of rooms in this House is to see that the officers of the House should have proper accommodation. I do not know what Mr. Speaker has to say on this subject, whether there are a sufficient number of rooms or not assigned to the officers of the House for the discharge of the duties that pertain to them. Of course, I do not recognise the right of the Government, or of Mr. Speaker, to appoint all their friends in the Dominion, to bring them here and crowd us out altogether. I expect that the number of officers employed in the House will be a reasonable number, and that reasonable accommodation should be afforded them in the first instance. Those rooms that remain, after that, should be divided between the two sides of the House, something in proportion to our numbers. If the Ministers find that they are obliged to furnish some accommodation to their friends within the limit they have subscribed for themselves, I think they must submit to the inconvenience, and they should give us our share, because we have a great deal to do in the conduct of public business; if we do not have any other very serious duties to perform, we have to watch what has been proposed to us, and what is being done by the Government, and in that case we would be better prepared to attend to our duties than if we were compelled to come in here and attend to them at our desks. It seems to me that Mr. Speaker, or whoever has charge of this, and I assume that it is Mr. Speaker, for it ought to belong to him as the chief officer of the House during the session of Parliament, because the Government are as much interested in the Senate chamber as they are in this building, and so far as that matter is concerned the Speaker should have the same control over the rooms at his disposal in this part of the building as the Speaker of the Senate has in the other; and if that be the case, we see no reason why Mr. Speaker should not properly discharge his duties.

Mr. McMULLEN. Two weeks before Parliament met, I wrote to the Speaker of the House requesting him to allow myself, Dr. Landerkin and Dr. McDonald to occupy a room. Last year I found very great difficulty in conducting correspondence on account of the coldness of the chamber during certain hours of the day. It was also impossible to carry on correspondence in room No. 6. I received no reply to my letter. On reaching here I immediately called on Mr. Speaker, and asked him if he could accommodate me. He stated he would do the best he could, and since then I have no word. I made my application in a courteous way. I received no reply; I got no room. If several members joined together in occupying a room the accommodation should be afforded them, as it might be done if the rooms were fairly distributed. Members on one side of the House should not obtain all the accommodation, and leave the others either to work in this chamber or in a crowded room where men are smoking or chatting, or work in his room at his hotel. There should be some change made in regard to this matter.

Mr. HESSON. I am about as hard and as faithful a worker in this House as the hon. gentleman, but although I have been here twelve years, I have not yet obtained a room. The hon. gentleman can utilise the room occupied by his political friends, and if that is not satisfactory he can work at his desk. It is impossible that 200 members can be provided with all the accommodation that they desire. It must be remembered that we come here to perform a public duty and must expect to submit to a little inconvenience. I do not think all the complaints should emanate from the Opposition side of the House, for there are scores of members on this side who occupy a similar position. I thank the Minister of Public Works for having provided an additional room this Session. When hon. gentlemen opposite come into power no doubt we will have to take very small corners in the building.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman chooses to be content without suitable accommodation, he has no right to dictate to me as to my action. The hon. gentleman has no right to find fault with me. I applied in the proper way at the proper time, and I have not received the accommodation asked. I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the new room that has been provided for their use. We, however, ask that we should receive a little consideration at the hands of the Minister of Public Works and the Speaker of the House. We desire some little convenience to enable us to do our business comfortably, and it is impossible to sit in this chamber when the House is not in session, and it is also impossible to conduct correspondence in No. 6, where smoking and chatting are indulged in.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member appears to be under the impression that he has not been treated with that courtesy to which every member is entitled from the Speaker of the House. I hope he does not believe there has been any intention to be discourteous to him. As to the rooms in question, I am glad to-night to hear from the highest authority in the matter, that the Speaker is responsible for the distribution of the rooms during the Session. That right has been disputed, and as I was afraid of being squeezed between that higher authority and members of Parliament, I gave up the task in despair, and I have had nothing to do with the distribution of the rooms. This year I have received no application, except that from the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), which was made by letter, and one since the meeting of Parliament, and I told him I had no rooms at my disposal, but I would do what I could; at the same time I told him distinctly the difficulty in which I was placed: first, that I had no rooms to distribute; and, second, that, if I had, I was not aware that I had the power to dispose of them. I distinctly remember that this question came up some time ago, and we were obliged to consult the Revised Statutes of Canada to ascertain in whom the authority rested, as to the control and distribution of these rooms. I think the question was submitted to the Commissioners of Internal Economy of the House; and as no satisfactory solution of the question was arrived at, it remained in the same position as before. But I am unwilling to shirk any responsibility, and if the Speaker has control of those rooms and the distribution of them, I am willing to accept the responsibility, and give to hon. members the accommodation placed at my disposal. But I may say that just now I am aware of not more than two rooms that could be placed at the disposal of members. The occupation of one has been accounted for by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright), and no one will hold that that distribution has been unjust, for the Ministerial party is represented by one member, the Independent party by one, and the Opposition by six members. The only other room available is No. 34, which is, I think, the British Columbia room. Those gentlemen from the far west, having that enterprise and spirit which distinguishes those who come from the western slope, have taken possession of it without asking anyone. I was only aware of it yesterday, when I was paid the compliment of being invited there. I am not aware of any other rooms that are available, except rooms occupied by committees, and while members might work there, they would be liable to be obliged to leave during the sittings of the committees. As to the rooms occupied by the Ministers, they are in a portion of the building where the jurisdiction is difficult to determine, namely, between the Senate and House of Commons. I have nothing to do with them. They have been assigned outside of the Session, and, lying as they do between the two buildings, I would not venture to claim any jurisdiction over them. I may say that we have not sufficient accommodation in this House, even for the employés to do their work. Very often we have heard of plans being in course of preparation for the enlargement of the House, or for additional accommodation. In my humble opinion it would be high time that we should make up our mind to have that increased accommodation, which, I believe, would be for the benefit of the country as well as for the members of this House. From the experience I have now had I think it would be well to begin to think of it and, if possible, to prepare plans to get that additional accommodation needed. I for one am perfectly of the same opinion as others that there is not enough comfort for the members of the House, and I think it would be only fair that the country should bear the expense of giving to their representatives a place where they would not be exposed to catch rheumatism and other diseases. It is not within my province, as I am a neutral power, but as it is a question which concerns both sides of the House I venture in all humility to give my opinion on the matter. I think the few thousand dollars that might be spent towards that end would not be lost to the country, but would, on the contrary, be a great gain.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). His honor the Speaker has observed that we have not sufficient room for the employés of the House, and I would suggest that instead of increasing the accommodation we had better decrease the number of employés.

Mr. WRIGHT. This matter was thoroughly discussed some years ago, and the Minister of Public Works will remember that he then gave it full consideration, and led us to believe that long before this we would have this ample accommodation which his honor the Speaker suggested as necessary for the members of this House. If the hon. Minister will look over the plans, he will find, I think, that it was proposed we should have a gymnasium, a bowling alley, and various means of enjoying ourselves.

An hon. MEMBER. And a racquet court.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think we did not go so far as a racquet court, nor were we to have any hockey on Sunday. At all events we were to have pleasant surroundings in which the health of the members would be promoted, and in which they could attend to their duties with more comfort.

Contingencies—House of Commons. . . $21,250

Mr. CAMPBELL. While I believe that the remarks made by hon. gentlemen in reference to the expenditure for contingencies in the Senate were right and proper, and that a great deal of that expenditure was necessary, yet at the same time I believe that it would not be well for us to pass silently over the amount asked for contingencies for the House of Commons. The question was asked, and I do not think it was properly answered, what had become of the enormous number of knives purchased for the Senate; but I find that for the House of Commons we have been dealing largely in pocket knives, too. There were no less than 839 knives purchased by the Government for the House of Commons last year, at a cost of $1,153, and 720 pairs of scissors. I am only a young member of course, but I cannot see for the life of me what has become of all these knives. I think the same practice must have been going on here, as was attributed to the Senators, when it was said that some of them must be getting five or six knives. If any such work as this is going on it should be stopped.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member must have been asleep; we have heard that over and over again.

Mr. LISTER. That was in reference to the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the hon. member for East Grey chooses to pass over this without saying anything about it, I do not think this side of the House should. There was an appropriation of $100.50 for a gown for the Speaker of the Senate, but I find that the Speaker of the House of Commons received $60 for a gown, which, of course, was not quite so much as the Speaker of the Senate received, but then no doubt he does not require such an expensive gown. I find we are a little extravagant in other ways too. Last year $75 was charged for attendance at Speaker's dinners. That is not right; but this year I find that $102 is asked for the same purpose. If the Speaker wants to give dinners, and there must be some one to attend at the dinners, he ought to provide them himself and pay them out of his large salary. I am finding fault with the items, but I wish to call attention to the fact that we must see that our own hands are clean.

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

before we criticise too severely the expenditure of the other chamber. The expenditure in all these items is altogether too large, and I agree with the member for Lambton that it would be a good plan to wipe out these items altogether. I always understood that when we gave an officer of this House a salary, it was right and proper for him to provide for his own expenditure, and if he chooses to give dinners he should pay for them. I hardly think it is fair to tax the people of this country for these matters. Those who attend those dinners, if they think the Speaker cannot afford to pay for them, let them put their hands in their pocket and give a little themselves. I must condemn the system, as I do not think it is a proper thing to bring these items before the House. If they want dinners let them pay for them.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice here a charge of $250 for a mahogany glass. Where was that put?

Mr. SPEAKER. It was put in the Speaker's reception room. With the exception of what was got last year, the furniture in that room has been in use since Parliament sat in Toronto; it was moved down to Quebec, and from Quebec it was brought here; and I suppose that room, to which everyone is welcome and is received, including strangers visiting Ottawa who come to the Speaker's rooms, ought to be at least as well furnished as a first-class house, though it is not so. As it is now, many men have rooms which are better furnished than that room. I thought, therefore, that nobody would grumble against this addition to its furniture, and I may say that the only thing I regret is that all the members do not come there more often.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not know where the article was; I just saw the item, and I made the enquiry. I have nothing to say against the furnishing of the Speaker's apartments; but in all these matters we should try to cultivate economy.

Mr. LOVITT. I see a charge of $200 for the Speaker's travelling expenses. What about that?

Mr. SPEAKER. As to that, I may say, from my knowledge of the past, that it has been considered for many years a perquisite of the Speaker to have the use of a carriage for travelling or visits which are considered to come within the duties of his office; and last year, not being afraid of the members of Parliament, I had an account for about $200. I cut it in two, to make it as small as possible; but I thought it due to my successor that I should not cut off this perquisite altogether. If the House decides, however, that there is to be in future no such perquisite for the office, I am of course willing to give it up; but I suppose it is only right that future Speakers should be granted the same privilege that our predecessors always enjoyed.

Mr. LISTER. I suppose nobody can take exception to an allowance to the Speaker for cab hire, seeing that the members of the Government have the same thing; but there is a charge here which must be a mistake, a charge for attendance on the Speaker's dinners. On the principle of charging for the attendance, the Speaker would have a right to charge for the food supplied to his guests.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the remark of the hon. gentleman is quite fair. It is understood that the Speaker is to have rooms, and servants to attend on those rooms, and those servants are required to come on special occasions when large dinners are given. They are the ordinary servants whom I found there when I assumed the office. If I had found no servants there, I would not have looked for any, but would have brought my own. But I think it only fair that those things which have been done in the past should continue. Those servants are only for the service of the apartments, not for the service of my own family, because, with the exception of Madame Ouimet, my family are at home, and I suppose they do not want anything from the Government for their living expenses. If my hon. friend thinks that this charge should not continue to be made as in the past, and that the Speaker's perquisites should be diminished in the public interest, I am willing to submit; but I would not consider myself justified in cutting down the attributes of the position which I have enjoyed for the last three years, and which may be enjoyed by my successors.

Mr. LISTER. So far as these items are concerned, after the Speaker's explanations, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. LOVITT. I see another charge of $56.82 for cab hire. That is not cut in two.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not charged to the Speaker. That is the general expenditure for cab hire for the officers of the House. When a messenger is sent a great distance for the dispatch of the business of the House, he is sometimes allowed a cab on the authority of either the clerk or the chief messenger. For instance, very often, at four or five o'clock in the morning, some corrections have to be made to the report of the proceedings; when the last proofs are revised, sometimes they have to be sent back in a hurry. In these and similar instances a cab is a necessity, and I suppose the clerk and the officers of the House have not been very extravagant in that respect.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not see any provision for a revision of the voters' list. Is there to be no revision this year?

Mr. FOSTER. That does not necessarily follow. Other estimates are to be brought down. When they come down you will find that out.

Salaries of Officers of the Library . . . $16,265

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cause of the decrease?

Mr. FOSTER. A re-arrangement of the officers of the library.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that one of the officers, Mr. Griffin, has been allowed $500 travelling expenses last year. What was that for?

Mr. FOSTER. He went to Washington and to the old country, to London and Paris, to visit the libraries in those places, to examine into their methods of cataloguing and working in order to make some improvements in our system here.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I met Mr. Griffin in London, and I must say that he was busily engaged looking into the libraries, and has probably obtained information as to their working which he can use to advantage here.

Mr. DAVIN. There cannot be the least doubt that the librarian going over to London and searching in the book-stalls, and visiting the libraries there, would be able to save, by the knowledge he would receive of the facilities for getting books, more than the amount of money to the Government his trip would cost. Our library here is small and imperfect, and in order to be complete requires many more books, and I do not know of any way in which the $500 could have been spent more profitably.

Mr. McMULLEN. I might make a remark with reference to the reading-room. It is constantly filled by strangers who read the newspapers, and thus prevent members from looking at them. The other evening I went in and found no less than ten people in the room busily reading, not one of whom was a member, and I could not get a sight of a paper I wanted until I applied to one of the men in charge, when he took it out of the hands of the man who was reading it and gave it to me. Members of Parliament should not be prevented reading the files by people from Ottawa or elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIN. The only way that inconvenience could be avoided, would be to get rid of the rule which allows members to introduce friends, and rigidly exclude all who are not members. Under the rule, it is difficult for a member to refuse the applications of people who ask the right of access to the reading-room.

Mr. FOSTER. If that is to be the rule, members of Parliament will have to forego their right of introducing outsiders to the reading room. Then there are the ubiquitous members of the fourth estate, whom I suppose it is impossible to keep out of the reading-room.

Mr. DAVIN. There is a compromise which I might suggest. During the sittings of the House it might be made a rigid rule that none but members of the House, or members of the press, should have access to the reading-room, but in the mornings the rule might not be so rigid. Of course, as the Minister of Finance suggests, the members of the press are licensed libertines, and we cannot do anything with them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps an arrangement might be made by which we might give a card to a visitor, which would entitle him to go to a Department and read some of the numerous newspapers there. It is possible that they might not find the best literature of the country in any Department, but still they would have reading matter before them.

Mr. ELLIS. There is an objection to the suggestion of the member for Assiniboia. People come here on delegations from different parts of the country. Delegates might be here from Toronto, who would desire to see the Toronto papers. Delegates might come from Regina who would want to see the Regina Leader, and these would naturally desire to have access to the reading-room.

Mr. MASSON. I think the compromise suggested by the hon. gentleman is worse than his original proposition. It is when the House is in Session that the friends of members might desire to be in the gallery, and it is at other times they desire to be in the reading-room.

Printing, printing paper and book-binding $75,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is this in connection with the Printing Bureau?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It is reported that the operations of the Printing Bureau have not been as satisfactory as the Government anticipated, and that work which it was expected the bureau would be able to perform has been distributed to various newspapers in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. The item for the Printing Bureau will come up elsewhere, and this matter can be then better discussed. This vote is only for printing the documents of the House.

Outlays towards the establishment and maintenance of Experimental Farms $75,000

Mr. McMULLEN. This appears to be a very large expenditure. Last year about $120,000 was expended on that farm, and I think the income was about $2,500. I think the Minister of Agriculture should give some detailed statement as to the expenditure which was made last year, and should give us some information as to the amount he expects to save during the coming year. We cannot afford to continue this enormous outlay on the Experimental Farm. It is evident that it will be a losing game, and, while it is desirable to make it successful, now that the experiment has been entered into, we must hope that it will not be made a political sink in which a great amount of money will be lost.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I observe that a vote of $70,000 was taken last year, and that there has been $90,000 spent.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman is in error. It was in the previous year that $90,000 was spent, and that was the vote for that year. The vote of last year of $70,000 has not been exceeded.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I find that $12,762 was spent for labor, and I should like to know how much of that was spent for regular annual expenditure, and how much on permanent improvements. If we are to have an experimental farm, we should have an exact account every year, showing the regular annual expenditure and the amount paid on permanent improvements; but we have never had that. Up to the present year, I find that $39,000 have been spent on labor alone. We ought to have a statement showing the expenditure under those two heads.

Mr. CARLING. We have only had possession of the farm for two or three years, as my hon. friend knows, and a large amount of money has been expended in draining, and fencing, and levelling, and getting the whole farm into a good condition. I believe that the whole expenditure annually on all the farms will not be more than $55,000 or $56,000, and that means the farm here and the other four farms—one in the Maritime Provinces, one in Manitoba, one at Indian Head and one in British Columbia. I am convinced that the whole expenditure for keeping up these farms will be less than $60,000 a year. We cannot tell what the receipts will be. Of course, this is an experimental farm, and we are distributing seeds to all parts of the country. I think my hon. friend is aware that the distribution has been made in his county to anyone who applied for it. We have had a large expenditure in printing the bulletins, which are issued by the director of the farm. I understand from the director that we have distributed the grain raised on the farm to between three and four thousand farmers, and I think we have now between thirteen and fourteen thousand farmers to whom we are regularly sending bulletins. We will be glad if any hon. members will give us the names of prominent farmers in their counties, and they will be supplied regularly with these bulletins, and the seed will be sent to them in small quantities, either of wheat, barley or oats, free. These are sent free in small quantities of three pounds. We have now reports from all parts of the Dominion, as to the result of the test made in seed wheat and oats and barley. I am glad to say that samples of Ladoga wheat was sent last year and the winter of 1888, to the Peace River district, and the parties that it was sent to have pronounced it one of the finest samples of spring wheat they have received this year, weighing 64 pounds to the bushel. We find that the farmers all over the Dominion are taking great interest in these varieties of seed grains, and we have applications and correspondence every day in regard to them. We get reports from nearly every one to whom they have been sent. The very greatest care is taken as to the expenditure. There is no waste of money. Of course, in a large farm like the central farm, and the other farms, it takes money to put them into proper condition, but this year will finish all the work on these farms, on capital expenditure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Does the Minister not think that we are discussing this item prematurely without the report from his Department?

Mr. CARLING. I should be very glad if the report could have been here, but it is not the fault of the Department. The report is ready and is in the hands of the printer. But the annual report from the Department of Agriculture is for the calendar and not the financial year. It is made up to the first of January last, and will, perhaps, be distributed in the course of two or three weeks. The expenditure, however, for the last financial year, is to be found in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has never been the practice to pass this vote so early in the Session, until the report of the Department is published. It must appear to the Committee utterly absurd for us to pass the Estimates under these circumstances, when it is impossible to make any intelligent criticisms. We must have the reports of the Department, otherwise we do not know what the Department has been doing.

Mr. CARLING. Every item of expenditure is in the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Every item for the expenditure for the year 1889?

Mr. CARLING. Up to July last.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the report of the Department, and the report of those who have charge of the stock farm, and the evidence which the hon. gentleman behind me just asked for as to the working of the farm, what amount has been expended on capital, what the returns have been, and what is the result of the experiment itself—all these things do not appear to this committee. I would ask the Finance Minister if he thinks it is fair or right that we should be asked to vote items of this kind without any data? It has not been done heretofore. I do not take any part myself in discussions upon the Experimental Farm, because it is a subject that I do not know much about, but I remember that interesting speeches were delivered last year by hon. gentlemen on the subject of the Experimental Farm, and the data upon which those speeches were based were gathered from the report of the Department. That data we have not got this year.

Mr. HESSON. I think every gentleman in the House who represents an agricultural constituency, feels a responsibility in relation to this farm. Not only should the expenditure be investigated, but the results ought to be considered. There is not a gentleman in the House who has not some knowledge of the efforts that are being made to disseminate the information, and the advantages that were expected from the Experimental Farm. We do not expect a revenue from the farm, at least sufficiently great to pay all the expense; but we do believe, indirectly, that it is doing a most important work. To-day I received a communication from my own constituency, asking in what way they can possibly get the samples they have seen referred to in the press; asking in what way they can get the two-rowed barley that the Experimental Farm proposes to furnish, and asking for information generally. I presume that all the members of this House representing rural constituencies, probably have the very same class of questions put to themselves. I believe that knowledge is being disseminated among the farmers, and that some experiments are going on at the farm which will be advantageous to the country. Now, to ask the Department to give results which would prove that it was desirable to continue the expense in the direction they have begun, would be to ask too much, because we never expected that the farm would be directly remunerative and return dollar for dollar.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). We do not want that.

Mr. HESSON. I can understand that hon. gentlemen will be honest enough to believe that the Department is trying to do the very best they can. The Department may not be in a position to get out the report for various reasons. It is probable that they have not full returns from the three or four thousand farmers who have been making experiments with grain that has been sent out. The report will be very valuable if it shows results from all those districts where the grain has been tested. One thing is clear. It would not be wise to cause the Department to fail in its purpose because of a lack of confidence in this House, when they are doing the very best that can be done. I think that every hon. gentleman who takes enough interest in the matter to visit the farm, will see that they are not trying to make a profit directly from the farm itself, so much as to disseminate knowledge and information throughout the country. I purpose to put something in the hands of the Government director of the farm, with reference to the distribution of barley that they propose to make. I wish they would go more extensively into it. The experiment, so far as I have been able to see, has been a great success, and I am sure that the farmers of this country are very glad to find that they are able to produce a barley suitable to the British market. Every year discloses the fact that we are less able to obtain a remunerative price for the barley our farmers grow, and any movement in the direction indicated will more than repay any expenditure. I am only sorry the Government are not going far enough in the direction of securing sufficient seed to supply our farmers, and make it worthy of the attention of the dealers in barley to handle that particular variety altogether. I believe the experiments, judging from bulletin No. 6, have been of a very satisfactory character, and sufficient seed barley of this character should be placed in the hands of our intelligent farmers and not mix it with our four or six-rowed barley, which has been found for the last three years very unremunerative.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Minister will observe that we are not now giving attention to matters connected with the model farm, for it would be quite impossible to understand the working of the farm without the facts and details in the annual report. I think, therefore, when the annual report comes down we will have to go over a great many matters a second time. I observe an item: museum, and office for director, $15,231. The Committee will naturally expect a detailed statement of what the museum is, what it is contemplated to be done to justify such a large expenditure. The farm is intended to demonstrate to the agriculturists of this country what can be cultivated profitably in an ordinary way. I observe an item: greenhouses, $5,666, and a large amount also for a conservatory. Surely we do not require greenhouses and conservatories to demonstrate the benefit of an experimental farm, because while it is admitted that you can produce anything in a greenhouse and conservatory, the fact that certain flowers and fruits are raised there, is no proof to the ordinary farmer of the country that those flowers or fruits are suitable to the country at large. I presume the report will show the object had in view when this expenditure was incurred; therefore, I do not agree with my hon. friend who has taken exception to the items being proceeded with until the report of the Department has been brought down.

Mr. CARLING. The items passed through the Committee last year a month before the annual report was brought down.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Very improperly.

Mr. CARLING. So we are not asking anything that was not done last year. All the items of expenditure appear in the Auditor General's Report. The annual report of all the departments of the central farm, and the different farms, has been in the hands of the printers for some time, but weeks or months may elapse before we obtain it. It must be remembered, moreover, that this is not the final passage of the item.

Mr. SCARTH. I would like to say in regard to the Experimental Farm, not only the central one but those in Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia, that they are felt to be of very great assistance to the farmers there. They are appreciated throughout the whole of the North-West, and I am satisfied our farmers are going to learn from those Experimental Farms a great deal that, without them, they would not learn. But there is one point I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister, and it is this: that, so far as I understand the matter, the bulletins, which constitute one of the most important parts of the work, are only printed in two languages, in the dual language, and that is felt to be a very great drawback. In Manitoba we have many Mennonites and Icelanders, who cannot read English or French; and I have no doubt in Assiniboia, which is represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), where they have Swedes, Hungarians, Bohemians and Icelanders, they feel very greatly at a loss in this respect. In British Columbia they have Chinese, and I understand they are going into farming. At all events, I can speak for Manitoba, and I can say that the Mennonites and Icelanders form a large number of our population. It has been stated that the British Colonial Secretary has complained that in India certain Acts that were passed had not been printed in Hindoo and other languages. It is certainly important that in Manitoba, where we have Russians, Swedes, Icelanders and others, we should obtain the bulletins printed in more than in the dual language. I rise simply to draw the Minister's attention to that point.

Mr. McMULLEN. In regard to the remarks of the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) I may say they are altogether aside from the question. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), that the item should not be proceeded with until the annual report is distributed, and this is a fair request. The report of the Auditor General gives simply items of expenditure for seeds and other articles, but contains nothing as to whether those seeds have been successfully cultivated or not, and we have not the manager's report as to the success of the experiments. In all fairness the Committee should not be called upon to consider these items, and if at a later period the Minister finds he will be unable to present his report in time this Session, the House can then consider the propriety of passing these items in its absence.

Mr. CARLING. The expenditure in the Auditor General's Report is from the 1st July, 1888, to the 1st July, 1889. The report for the last six months of 1888 up to January, 1889, is in the hands of hon. members, so that there would be only six months of the expenditure in the report to come down.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) We had that report last year.

Mr. CARLING. Excuse me, we did not have that report last year until the item was approved.

Mr. SCARTH. I wish again to ask the hon. Minister in how many languages he is going to publish these bulletins, and whether this injustice is to be continued to my constituents in Manitoba?

Mr. WATSON. If the hon. gentleman is going to adopt these foreign languages, I would point out that we have the Cree and the Sioux which are not foreign to the North-West. We have the Indians who are making considerable progress in farming, and no doubt they are as much interested in these matters as the Chinese in British Columbia. I think the hon. Minister might publish them in the Cree and Sioux languages as well.

Mr. SCARTH. I have not the least objection to that, but we have to consider that the Cree and the Sioux Indians have instructors paid by the Government, who can translate for them the bulletins issued by the Minister of Agriculture, but the Mennonites have no instructor. They are well educated, but they do not speak English, and unless you intend to obliterate their language, you should have these bulletins published in the Mennonite tongue.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we acceded to all the demands of the North-West, we will sink the Ship of State before we get through. If we have to print all the bulletins issued by the model farm in the languages of all the people who may come to this country, the new Printing Bureau would not be equal to the task. I draw the Minister's attention to the fact, what while we have a report before us, yet we have nothing to show whether the experiments have been successful or not. The Minister's report will doubtless contain some reference to the seeds bought last year, and the success so far of the experiments. The hon. gentleman has got his manager beside him, and he can easily say whether this will be contained in this report or not.

Mr. BOWELL. I would suggest that the Committee might allow the item to pass (as there is very great uncertainty as to when the report of the Minister of Agriculture will be laid on the Table) with the distinct understanding that all the privileges granted for discussing items of this kind will be extended to members of the House when the items come up for concurrence. By that time the report will, in all probability, be before the House. I quite agree with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) that, before the House is asked to pass a large item like this, the members should be placed in full possession of all that has been done on the farm, and the result of the experiments likely to follow from its establishment. I make the suggestion, hoping it will be adopted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We remember a year or two ago, when Sir Charles Tupper was Finance Minister, that item after item was left for concurrence, and that we had only three hours for discussion in concurrence.

Mr. McMULLEN. They went through like sheaves through a threshing machine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask information on this item for $2,800 for law expenses. What trouble have we been in?

Mr. CARLING. We have no law expenses this year. This amount is for lawyers' fees and witnesses, and the expenses of arbitration when we bought the farm. The farm was bought from a number of proprietors, and as they wanted to try to get as much as they could, we submitted the matter to arbitration. This is a sum paid on that account last year.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The remarks made by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) shows that we cannot go on with these items without having the report. That hon. gentleman announced that some $90,000 had been expended and that an appropriation of some $70,000 had been made.

Mr. CARLING. I explained that we were within the vote of last year. It was $90,000 that was expended during the previous year.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The estimate given for 1887 was $90,000, for 1888 $70,000, and for last year $70,000. I have taken these from the public documents. Now, there is $90,000 in the Auditor General's Report as having been spent on the different farms under a vote of $70,000. It was in 1887 that the $90,000 was given.

Mr. SCARTH. I think the question which I asked of the Minister some time ago is more important than the points raised by the hon. gentleman. If you are going to issue bulletins with the intention of farmers understanding them, they should be issued in languages which all the farmers in the country can understand. A very large number of our farmers do not speak neither English nor French, and what you publish is Greek to them. It will cost very little more to give the Mennonite population the information which you give to other farmers. I ask if the Department going to appoint instructors to teach the Mennonites, Swedes and Icelanders, or whether you will publish the bulletins in these languages? So long as you do not do so you are not doing justice to the Mennonites of Manitoba.

Mr. CARLING. Up to this time all departmental documents have been printed in English and French, but it has now been brought to my notice that we have Danes, Scandinavians and Icelanders, who have all of course come here to settle, and the subject is worthy of consideration. I can only say to my hon. friend that I will enquire into it, and if possible meet his wishes.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I must bring the Committee back to the matter to which I directed the attention of the Minister of Finance a few moments ago, because I think it involves an important principle. It is well known that two or three years ago a new system was introduced of asking the House to go into Committee of Supply before the Minister of Finance made his Budget statement. I think the understanding then was that statutory amounts, and amounts fairly open to debate and criticism on the information then before the House, should be considered; but one of the most important functions of the House of Commons is criticism of the expenditure of the Government, and that criticism can only be intelligent when the House has before it the information on which it can form a judgment. When we are asked to pass items for the Agriculture Department, or the Customs Department, before the reports of those Departments are brought down, it is manifest that no intelligent criticism can be made upon them, and the members of the House are only poking in the dark.

Mr. CARLING. Read the report.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman suggests that before I address the House I might read this report. I may not read a report that I am not specially interested in, but there are some reports that I do read, and there are some gentlemen who read this report, and evidently, from their speeches, read it very carefully. If this new system of passing items before we have the reports is introduced, the House of Commons will be abdicating one of its most important functions. Our financial leader is here, and I would like to hear his views on this subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think there can be any possible doubt about the point raised by my hon. friend. As a matter of course, all these items are expected to be considered after the reports of the several Ministers have been brought down. The reason of the case is obvious —you cannot discuss items, especially those of magnitude or importance, until you hear from the Minister in charge. The only course to pursue is to take up those items belonging to Departments of which the reports have been brought down.

Mr. CARLING. We have the report in full to the 1st of January, 1889, and the report for 1889 is now in the hands of the printer, but it may be a month before it can be laid before the House. After that, if there are any items which hon. gentlemen wish to discuss, I will pledge myself, and I think I can also pledge the Government, that every opportunity will be given to discuss them on concurrence.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Let it stand until we can find out when the report is likely to be ready.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not at all dispute that the hon. Minister intends that the discussion should be full, but we have had such an experience of the utter impossibility of having these items discussed on concurrence, that members do not care to reserve their remarks to that time. Last Session, to the best of my recollection, the entire three or four hundred items contained in the Estimates, were put through the House in eight or ten hours.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt that the general contention of my hon. friend is quite right—that, as far as possible, all the reports of the Departments should be down before their estimates are passed. However, it may happen, and there are sometimes causes that make it almost unavoidable, that the business of the House would be very much delayed if we adopted the rule that we must have the report before we can pass the items. I think we should act on the suggestion made by my hon. friend opposite, that we should let the item stand until we can see whether the report will be down within a reasonable time, and if it should be found that it will be very late, I suppose the House would consent to pass the votes without it.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12:20 a.m. (Saturday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 17th February, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Alberta Colonisation Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 84) to amend the Act to incorporate the Victoria and Sault Ste. Marie Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

THE FISHERIES ACT.

Mr. TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 85) to amend "The Fisheries Act," chapter 95 of the Revised Statutes. He said: The object of the Bill is to extend the provisions of the present Act in relation to the powers of fishery officers with reference to the distribution of the bounties. The fishery officers are now only justices of the peace, ex-officio in connection with the Fisheries Act, and the first clause of this Bill gives them power to act as justices in connection with any Act relating to fisheries. The other clause of the Bill is in reference to the confiscation of appliances used in illegal fishing, and the last section is to increase the penalties in connection with the illegal catching of lobsters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LINCOLN.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the attention of the House to the motion made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in reference to certain correspondence published in the Globe a short time since, and contained in letters signed by an hon. member of this House. I think it is only fair to that hon. gentleman, as it is very important to those whose names have been mentioned in connection with this matter, that all of the documents which have been made public, together with the explanations which have been made in this House, should be entered in the Journals in the same manner as the letters which were published in the Globe newspaper. My object in making this motion is simply this—that while the charges, which were implied rather than stated in those letters, appear in the Journals, nothing follows them in the way of denial on the part of those gentlemen whose names are mentioned in connection with them, nor does the explanation given by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), and published in one of the city journals, appear therein. I, therefore, desire to move a resolution similar to that moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as follows:—

That whereas certain letters and documents, reading as follows (these are attached), were published in the Citizen newspaper, under date of the 11th of February instant, in explanation of certain letters published in the Globe newspaper, under date of the 8th of February instant, respecting the granting of a certain lease to cut timber to one John Adams, and it is expedient that the House should have an opportunity of examining the same, it is ordered that the said letters and documents above recited be printed in the Votes and Proceedings for the use of members, together with the statement made by the hon. member for Lincoln in the House of Commons on the 13th day of February instant, and the remarks made thereon by certain members of the House of Commons, as reported and printed in the Official Debates of the House of Commons on the 13th of February instant.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure everybody in this House will desire that everything connected with the matter brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from South Oxford should have publicity, so that the members should have the fullest possible information in order to arrive at a proper conclusion; but I am not quite sure that letters written at a subsequent date, in explanation of the charges referred to, should be printed in our proceedings. I am not quite sure that the proposition of my hon. friend is not liable to objection; but, as the matter is a delicate one, and as the House has not had an opportunity yet to see the new matter, I think my hon. friend would, perhaps, agree to defer his motion until to-morrow.

Mr. BOWELL. I have certainly no objection to accede to the request made by the hon. leader of the Opposition; but I tell him frankly that I am anxious that this very disagreeable correspondence, as I may term it, and the statement connected therewith, should be printed in consecutive order in the Journals of this House, so that persons hereafter reading the letters in the Journals should have also before them the explanations made by the hon. member for Lincoln, whatever they are worth, together with the statements made by myself and the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAURIER. I think there can be no objection whatever to the explanations made by the hon. Minister of Customs and the hon. Prime Minister going on the Journals of the House, but I am not quite sure that the letters recently written by the hon. member for Lincoln, which are referred to in the motion, should also go on the Journals.

Mr. BLAKE. Divide the motion, and move now for the statements made in this House, and let the other part stand.

Mr. BOWELL. That would not accomplish my object. I desire to have the denial made by the hon. member for Lincoln, in the letter published in the Citizen, also, put upon our records. I am proposing this in self-defence, and I think it would be scarcely fair, even if not strictly in accordance with parliamentary usage, to deny that to gentlemen whose honor has been impugned in that correspondence. If the hon. leader of the Opposition desires to have a postponement of the motion, I have no objection to let it remain until to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After the statement of my hon. friend, that he desires to have the whole thing printed in one return, so that everybody can read it from beginning to end, I hope my hon. friend opposite will not object.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think there is any reason for me to recede from the position I have taken. I am sure that everybody would agree that the statements made by the hon. Minister of Customs, and the hon. Prime Minister the other day, should go at once on the Journals; but it is the letters published in the Citizen to which I take exception. I do not say that I shall persist in my objection, but we have not yet read those letters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, let it stand until to-morrow.

Mr. BOWELL. I will withdraw the motion, with the understanding that it will be made to-morrow.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) respecting the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Goderich and Canadian Pacific Junction Railway Company, and to change the name of the Company to "The Goderich and Wingham Railway Company."—(Mr. Porter.)

Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.—(Mr. Barron.)

Bill (No. 22) to amend the Act to incorporate the Belleville and Lake Nipissing Railway Company.—(Mr. Corby.)

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Sault Ste. Marie and Hudson's Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 28) to incorporate the Ottawa, Morrisburgh and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Hickey.)

BEHRING'S SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to detain the House for a moment, before the Orders of the Day are called. I notice that in the Queen's Speech delivered at the opening of Parliament, on the 11th instant, no reference is made to the Behring Sea difficulty, which is a matter of very great importance to us. It is also stated that the United States Government are making provision for more efficient police regulations with respect to seizures in that sea; and in view of our action some time ago, and the expression of our unbounded confidence in the Queen and loyalty to her, we naturally look to England for a little protection in this matter. I would ask the Premier if he has any information to give to the House on this subject?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only information I can give the hon. gentleman is that negotiations have commenced—that the British Ambassador and the Secretary of State for the United States are now discussing the preliminaries for negotiations on this subject.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of Bill (No. 10) to further amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 50, respecting the North-West Territories; the motion of Mr. Davin in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Beausoleil in amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LAURIER. If I, for one, could accept the declaration often made by the mover of this Bill, not only while introducing it, but on several occasions before, protesting that to the course which he had adopted for himself, and of which this is only the preliminary step, he was impelled by no other motive than a desire, a lofty desire, of securing the future of this country from dissension, and of ensuring peace and harmony by removing all causes of contention, I would be sorry that the hon. gentleman, harboring in his heart aims so high, should have endeavored to accomplish them by means so selfish, and so ungenerous, as those which underlie the measure which he has brought before the House. When, however, the hon. gentleman, in order to find a motive for the measure to which he called the attention of the House, invokes considerations of such far-reaching prudence, he is simply deluding himself. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, may persuade himself, but he will with difficulty convince those to whom he has been addressing himself, that his ultimate object in this matter is simply to secure the future peace and harmony of this country, while his present action must tend to endanger the peace and harmony which happily prevail. I can find nothing in this Bill, I must say, but the old, old spirit of domination and intolerance which, in this land, and in other lands, has always characterised the course of pure, unadulterated Toryism. This measure, taken by itself, disconnected from the motives which inspired it, would not be of very great importance—we are all agreed upon that—but it is of the greatest importance for this reason, that it constitutes a declaration of war by the hon. gentleman and those with whom he is acting, against the French race. It is a declaration of war, I say, against the French race of this country, of which the hon. gentleman, in this House, spoke in no disrespectful terms, but of which, in other places in the Province of Ontario, he spoke—I am sorry that he is not now in his place to hear me—the hon. gentleman spoke in terms which he would not dare to repeat on the floor of this House; the hon. gentleman spoke of the French race in terms of opprobrium, which, I say again, he would not dare to repeat in this House, in presence of French Canadians, who, by law, are on a plane of equality with him in this House. He would not dare to apply here to my fellow-countrymen of French origin, the terms and epithets which he applied to them on former occasions in the Province of Ontario. He would not dare to say here what he said elsewhere; he would not dare call that race here as he did elsewhere—a “bastard nationality.” I have here his language, which he used not later than the 12th July last, at Stayner, Ont., where he said:

“In Barrie, last election, I pointed out, in a few simple words, that the great danger which overshadowed Canada was the French national cry, this bastard nationality, not a nationality which will take us in as we will take them in, but a nationality which begins and ends with the French race—which begins and ends with those who profess the Roman Catholic faith, and which now threatens the dismemberment of Canada.”

A “bastard nationality,” a “danger to Canada!” Why, Sir, the days are not five years distant when this “bastard nationality,” to use the choice words of the hon. gentleman, was unanimous in their support of the Conservative party to which the hon. gentleman, then as now, belonged; the days are not five years distant when the hon. gentleman might have counted on his fingers the members of that race in this House who did not belong to the Conservative party. And yet in those days, and as long as that race gave his party nearly the whole weight of their influence, we never heard of any danger to Canada from this French national cry. In those days the sensitiveness of the hon. gentleman, now so easily alarmed, did not seem to be in the least concerned. Nay, more, my fellow-countrymen of French origin, on the same side of the House to which he belongs, could appeal, and did appeal, to all the prejudices of my own race; but that was a legitimate warfare, because the national cry was made to do service in behalf of the Conservative party, to give them office, and to procure for them the direct and indirect profits of office. The speech delivered the other night by my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, and to which, I must say, legitimate objection was taken by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), was simply, in condensed form, the food which, for the last twenty-five years, has been served up every day by the Conservative ministerial press of the Province of Quebec. Yet in those days not one word was ever heard as to any danger to Canada from this national cry. But matters are altered to-day. To-day the French Canadians are no longer a unit in their support of the Conservative party; and what was commendable, or at least unobjectionable, in those days, has now become a danger to Canada. A danger to Canada, Sir! I venture to say, judging of the future by the past, that if the French Canadians were again to unite and give the whole weight of their influence to the party to which the hon. gentleman still belongs, not one word more would we hear about this danger to Canada from the French national cry; because, though the hon. gentleman affects now to be a free lance, still he belongs to the party commanded by the Prime Minister. He may not be a very disciplined soldier, he may be carrying on a guerilla warfare, according to his methods, but after all, he is working for the benefit of the Conservative party. He has told us himself on more than one occasion. Not fifteen days ago he said so in Collingwood, and he said so on the 12th July last, at Stayner. It is well known that it was on the 12th July last at Stayner, amongst his own constituents, that the hon. gentleman started on the war path. He then stated that he was furnishing his own weapons, and that when Parliament again met he was going to give assault to the French. His ardor was such that he deprecated the unfortunate condition of things which, under the Constitution, did not permit him to attack them wherever his ardor would impel him, but under the Constitution, he says he could attack the French language in the North-West Territories, and attack he would as soon as the occasion offered. But at the same time the hon. gentleman, addressing his constituents—all of them, probably, good Tories—was careful to tell them that he was still a Conservative, that he would remain a Conservative, and that a Conservative he hoped to die; and I have no doubt that that is true, because I do not think the hon. gentleman has the slightest particle of Liberalism in his composition. After this, some candid souls have asked if the hon. gentleman was in sympathy with the Prime Minister, or if he was starting a new movement of his own. A most useless question, for, whatever may be the aim of the hon. gentleman, it is quite certain that he means no harm to the Conservative party, still less to the leader of the party. Upon that occasion he spoke of his attachment to the party, and to the leader of the party, in terms of gushing effusiveness which, I must say, the hon. gentleman is not accustomed to use. I might quote several expressions of his, but here is one which is characteristic of the whole tenor of his speech:

“I will treat my old chieftain with all tenderness, for I am still a member of the party. I cannot be read out, although I do not know what is in store for me.”

The hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) is not here, but, if he were, I would tell him that he can keep his soul in peace. He need not fret or worry over what is in store for him, for I know the right hon. gentleman's astuteness too well—not to mention his nobler qualities—not to be aware that, if the hon. gentleman brings recruits to the party, he will be forgiven; and it is for recruits to the party that he is looking now. I regret that the hon. gentleman is not here, as I would rather speak in his presence than in his absence, but, in all sincerity, I say that I believe he is looking for recruits for the Conservative party, while, of course, not forgetting himself. The Conservative party have been in power for a long time; they have been in power nearly continuously for thirty years, and it is a matter of history that, during that time, they have been kept in power almost entirely by the French Catholic support of the Province of Quebec. That is a support upon which they can no longer rely, because the people of Quebec are now divided in their political allegiance; but it must be manifest to everybody that an English Protestant united Ontario would be just as effective for party purposes, and this seems to be the task which the hon. gentleman has set before him to accomplish. It is always an easy and a cheap task to arouse and inflame prejudices. Give me a meeting or assembly of men, whether it be small or large, and in that meeting I will find passions and prejudices, noble in themselves, but which can be easily excited into dangerous passions and prejudices. The hon. gentleman is now endeavoring to arouse prejudices which old quarrels, religious fervor, and pride of race, may have left in the breasts of his fellow-countrymen of English origin. He tells them that if the country is to be kept British all Canadians of British origin must unite; at the same time he states that he is a Conservative, that he will remain a Conservative, that he will not be separated from his leader. If the appeals which he has been making were to be successful, to whom would they profit and whom would they affect? They certainly would not affect the Conservatives, because the hon. gentleman states that he is still in allegiance with them, and that they belong to the same party. If they would affect anybody, they would affect the Liberals of Ontario, who, fearing perhaps for British connection, might be induced to follow the hon. gentleman into the Conservative party, for which he could frame a policy and of which then he would be dictator. Well, if this movement of the hon. gentleman were to be terminated here, if it were attempted merely to do service as a party device and to end there, it might not be viewed with much alarm. If this measure of the hon. gentleman were not to be followed by any other, if it were to remain as it appears here, a measure for the proscription of the French language confined to the North-West Territories alone, where the French population is small, I say at once that I would be inclined to say: Let the measure pass and let us return to those measures of practical usefulness which demand our attention. But this is not the last movement of the hon. gentleman. This is only a preliminary skirmish, soon to be followed by a general onslaught upon the whole French race in Canada. I have before me the words of the hon. gentleman, and he has more than once told us that his object is a hand-to-hand conflict with the French race of Canada. If he did not say so in so many words, there is no mistaking his meaning that his ultimate object is the annihilation of the French race as an individual people in this Dominion. In his speech at Stayner, he unfolded his whole mind, and, addressing himself to the English section of the people of the Dominion, he said:

“There is a great work cut out for us to do. Let us begin with that which seems most possible of accomplishment. Let us deal with the dual languages in the North-West. In the Local House let us deal with the teaching of French in the schools. When these two matters are settled, we will have accomplished something, and we may be able to do something better in future.”

These words are quite significant. This Bill, the introduction of this measure, is simply a preliminary step, and when that is accomplished it is to be followed by something better. And what is that something better which is to follow? The hon. gentleman has not left us in doubt as to that. Here are his words:

"We must buckle on our armor. * * * This is a British country, and the sooner we take up our French Canadians and make them British, the less trouble will we leave for posterity, for sooner or later must this matter be settled."

Nothing can be plainer than this language. The French Canadians are to be deprived of their language, not only in the North-West Territories, but wherever their language exists. They must be deprived of everything which constitutes their distinct individuality in this Dominion, and this must be done by legislation now; but, if not done now by legislation, in future it will be done by force and violence—by bullets and bayonets. The expression is not mine, but that of the hon. gentleman himself. It has been repeated, not once or twice, but several times in different parts of the Dominion. So this is the policy upon which the hon. gentleman is endeavoring to form a new party, or to re-organise an old party. This is the policy the hon. gentleman offers to his fellow-countrymen of English origin. I denounce this policy as anti-Canadian; I denounce it as anti-British; I denounce it as being at variance with all the traditions of British Government in this country; I denounce it as fatal to the hope we at one time entertained, and which I, for one, am not disposed to give up, of forming a nation on this Continent; I denounce it as a crime, the consequences of which are simply shocking to contemplate. The hon. gentleman may mean nothing more than a mere party device, but he is opening the flood-gates to passions which, once aroused, perhaps no human power may be able to restrain. He is appealing to national and religious passions, the most inflexible of all passions, and—whatever may be his motive, whatever his end, whatever his purpose—his movement cannot be characterised by any other language than that of a national crime. I do not know what are the motives which are actuating the hon. gentleman; I do not know them fully. I look only at the consequences. But, whatever may be the hon. gentleman's motives, he has more than once felt impelled to repudiate the statement that he is actuated by hatred of the French race. If he were here, I would tell him that I accept his statement absolutely and entirely. Hatred is so base a sentiment that I would not impute it to him, but, if he is not actuated by hatred, it is evident that he has a very strange misconception of the character of French Canadians, and must have a very low estimate of their moral standard. In the speech to which I have already alluded, the hon. gentleman did not hesitate to go considerably out of his way, in order to refer to the agitation which, a few years ago, passed over the Province of Quebec, consequent upon the rebellion in the North-West and the execution of the chief participant in the same. He did not hesitate then to attribute the storm of indignation which, at that time, convulsed a highly emotional race to the lowest sentiments which can actuate the human heart, and those expressions were, to a certain extent, reproduced in the House, the other day, by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), in the attempt he made to attack my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) for the courageous stand which he took upon that question. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did not hesitate to say, that, if the people of Quebec took the stand they did at that time, it was from a most dishonest motive; that it was simply an attempt to stand between a criminal and justice, because the so-called criminal happened to be one of their own race.

"Those who have done me the honor to pay close attention to my political career, will remember that in the County of Haldimand two or three years ago I raised the warning note. I pointed out that the Province of Quebec had been worked up to madness against the Dominion authorities for daring to execute justice upon a Frenchman."

"For daring to execute justice upon a Frenchman." I repeat this sentiment in his own words. Well, I have simply this to say, that whoever declares that the position taken by the people of Quebec upon this question was not an honest one is guilty of slander, and makes a statement the truth of which he cannot prove. The hon. gentleman has not, however, the odium of having invented that charge. It has been a stock phrase of the Conservative ministerial press of Ontario for the last three or four years. So long as it was simply confined to some obscure scribblers it might be passed in silence, but when the hon. gentleman did not hesitate to give it the countenance of his name and reputation, and when, moreover, such sentiments are re-echoed in this House, I cannot allow the charge to pass unrebuked. I will meet the hon. gentlemen on his own grounds. I will not dispute his expression that the people of Quebec were driven to madness on this question, but as to the motives attributed by him I will state that the people of Quebec believe in their conscience, whether right or wrong, that the execution "of that Frenchman" (to use the words of the hon. gentleman) was an unjustifiable homicide. The hon. gentleman will not forget that twenty-three of his colleagues; twenty-three of those who supported that Administration like himself—most of them who, like himself, will not be read out of the party, but who will remain Conservatives—telegraphed to the Prime Minister that the execution would be a crime. This is not all; there is more than that. The hon. gentleman will not forget that the press of the civilised world decided upon that occasion that "mercy should rule and not severity." The opinion of the press of the whole world; the London Lancet, the Christian World, the London Daily News, the London Echo, the Pall-Mall Gazette in England, the National, the Journal des Debats and the Le Télégraphe in France, the Harper's Weekly, the Times, the World, the Commercial Advertiser of New York, and scores of other journals in the United States, gave it as their opinion that mercy should have been the rule upon that occasion. I tell the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me that if those great organs of public opinion came to the conclusion that mercy should have been the rule upon that occasion, how dare he now contest the honesty of the people of Quebec who came to the same conclusion? If those who were without the conflict, if those who looked from a calmer sphere came to this conclusion, is it to be wondered at that the people of Quebec came to the same conclusion, though it may be regretted that they expressed their opinion in such violent language. I say more. There is no one man of English origin, if he be true to the standard of that proud race which never tolerated injustice, and never submitted to tyranny, who, looking at the long tale of woe and misery which resulted in the rebellion in the North-West, but must feel his heart indignant—not against the poor wretches who, goaded to madness and driven to despair by years of careless indifference, at last risked life and limb and freedom, risked the loss of everything dear to man, to get justice, and then alone obtained it—but against those who by their own supineness had brought about such a crime on the fair name of the country. There is more than that. If the history of that rebellion were told, it would unfold to the world a tragedy darker than Hamlet. There was a race of men on the border between savage and civilised life; advanced enough to understand the value of property, but not advanced enough to defend their property against those unfeeling speculators who everywhere precede civilisation. Among the whole race then in Canada there was not one who had received the smallest rudiment of education; but they had heard there was one of their number who had been more favored than they in this respect, and he was then an exile. If he were brought back to the Territories, might he not procure for them the act of simple justice which they themselves could not obtain? To him they appealed; but, misfortune greater than all their misfortune! the man to whom they thus appealed to be the eye to see for them, the mind to guide them, the arm to protect them, had been touched by the hand of God, and was the most helpless of them all. In the face of such facts, the judgment of my fellow-countrymen can be impugned, but their honesty cannot be assailed. It is a vile imputation to attack their honesty of purpose; and if I have thus alluded to these facts, it is not with a view of recrimination, it is not with a view of perpetuating the bitterness of these sad days. But since we are threatened with a war of races, since my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) is going to appeal to the people of Ontario to unite together, I want at least fair play in the contest. I cannot allow that such a statement as this made at Stayner, should go unrebuked, and I must do my share in the attempt to re-establish perverted truth. I cannot allow the fair name of my countrymen to be assailed by false statements, and that the expression should go abroad uncontradicted that the people of Quebec will follow no law but the law of their own selfishness. Since the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) has taken this attitude, since he has tried to introduce this new policy, which outlines the course he has taken recently, we might have hoped that he were impelled by motives of a higher and nobler consideration. I am not ignorant of the fact that, among the men who have adopted the same views as the hon. gentleman, there are many who have come to the conclusion which the hon. gentleman has given expression to, from the conviction that the existence of two separate nationalities in Canada is not compatible with the existence of the Dominion. This objection thus presented is one which I will not reject. On the contrary, I say this is a question which must engross the serious attention of all those who have at heart the future of the country, for no one can close his eyes to the fact that the existence of two distinct nationalities must produce sometimes, as it has produced already, causes of angry friction and, therefore, of danger. But, Sir, we must deal with facts as they are, and deal with them as we find them. Here are two different races geographically united under the same political allegiance, but separated by numerous ethnical features. With those conflicting elements, it is the object of the hon. gentleman apparently—it is my own object certainly, and it is the object of us all, I believe—to try to form a nation. This is the problem we have to solve; how shall we proceed to solve it? The hon. gentleman has given us his method, the Tory method, and he has once more demonstrated that Tory methods never proceed from the nobler, higher instincts of the human heart and the human intellect, but always from the dread, the diffidence, and the distrust which everywhere has made the Tory party, wherever it has had sway, suspicious and cruel. The hon. gentleman, looking around this broad Dominion, sees a population of one and a-half million inhabitants, nearly one-third of our whole population, who are of French origin, attached to their language, their laws, their institutions, and their religion—attached to everything which characterises their separate individuality. If the hon. gentleman had stated that this was a cause of possible friction, and that we should endeavor to find some means of alleviating that friction, I would agree with him; but the hon. gentleman did not take that view. On the contrary, he coldly asserts that the existence of two separate races here is not compatible with the existence of the Dominion, and, therefore, one must disappear; and I have quoted his words in which he appeals to his friends of English origin to buckle on their armor, and see to it that we have only one nationality on this continent. Sir, if this policy were to prevail, what would be the result? What is it the hon. gentleman has in view? It is simply this: that the French Canadians should feel the yoke on their shoulders, that they should be deprived by legislation, or by force if necessary, of everything which has been granted to them hitherto. If this doctrine were to prevail, on what foundation would this Confederation rest? The hon. gentleman, I am sure, would himself admit that pride of race, attachment to the memory of one's nation and ancestors, are noble sentiments; and yet the hon. gentleman coldly proposes that one and a-half million of Canadians—in order, as he says, that they should become good Canadians—should renounce their origin and the traditions of their race. He proposes that the humiliation of one whole race in this country should be the foundation of this Dominion. Woe to the party which can adopt such degrading doctrines as this. Who does not see that the humiliation of one race would be a far greater danger to Confederation than any we have ever yet known? I endorse the words spoken a short time ago by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), that we want to build up a nation on this continent; and we want to establish such a state of things that every citizen of this country, whatever his origin may be, whether he is English or French, shall feel in his heart a supreme pride to call himself a Canadian. But I would ask the hon. gentleman—I could not appeal perhaps to his heart, though I might to his logical mind—does he believe that to subject one whole section of our population to the humiliation of renouncing its origin, of turning its back upon its history, would make them proud of the country? Who does not perceive that if you should force one section to hate the institutions under which they live, those institutions cannot live? Sir, the humiliation of one race, one class, one creed, or one man is not the foundation on which this Confederation can rest. There is but one foundation for it, that is, to give the fullest scope and the fullest sway to all those sentiments which could not be torn from the heart without causing a loss of pride. The hon. gentleman seems to think that all Canadians should be cast in the same mould. He is proud of his race, and he has every reason to be proud of it; but, Sir, it does not follow that we should all be English-speaking Canadians, that we should all be merged in the Anglo-Saxon element. Certainly no one can respect or admire more than I do the Anglo-Saxon race; I have never disguised my sentiments on that point; but we of French origin are satisfied to be what we are, and we claim no more. I claim this for the race in which I was born, that though it is not perhaps endowed with the same qualities as the Anglo-Saxon race, it is endowed with qualities as great; I claim for it that it is endowed with qualities unsurpassed in some respects; I claim for it that there is not to-day under the sun a more moral, more honest or more intellectual race; and if the hon. gentleman came to Lower Canada, it would be my pride to take him to one of those ancient parishes on the St. Lawrence or one of its tributaries, and show him a people to whom, prejudiced as he is, he could not but apply the words which the poet applied to those who at one time inhabited the Basin of Minas and the meadows of Grandpré:

"Men whose lives glided on like rivers that water
the woodland,
Darkened by shadows of earth, but reflecting an image of Heaven."

Sir, I claim no more than this is fairly due to my countrymen, and I say let the two races stand together, each with its own characteristics; they will be all the more speedily united in the same aspirations towards a common object—British in allegiance and Canadian in sentiment. But, Sir, if you attempt to rend from one whatever is dear and sacred to it, instead of having peace and harmony, you will have ever increasing discord. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other day told us that it was in the interest of the French Canadians to become a part of the Anglo-Saxon race; and proceeding to relate the achievements of that great race, both in war and peace, he almost asked permission from and apologised to the French Canadians for feeling proud of the British feats of arms on the Plains of Abraham, in the Bay of Trafalgar, on the field of Waterloo. Sir, my hon. friend needed not to apologise; his sentiments are quite natural to those who have the same blood as he has in his veins, and they cannot be offensive to anyone; but I, who belong to the race which was defeated in those battles, claim no permission to say that I lay no claim to that stoical heroism, if heroism it be, which can contemplate without a pang, even retrospectively, the defeat of one's own race, though my judgment is clear that in two, at least, of those battles—that on the Plains of Abraham and that on the field of Waterloo—the victory of England was a victory of liberty. I have, more than once in this House, told my fellow-countrymen of the Province of Quebec, that the day which had severed Canada from France had not been an evil day for the descendants of France, because they had found under the British Crown greater liberty than they could have hoped for under the French régime, and after all liberty is the greatest boon of life. But, Sir, while I say that, I do not disguise to my fellow-countrymen of English origin, who will, I hope, understand me, that even at this day, holding the opinions which I hold, whenever I take up our history, as I follow the long, the persistent, the implacable duel between England and France for the possession of this continent; as I trace, page by page, the fatal climax, dim at first, but gradually taking shape and becoming inevitable; as I follow the brave army of Montcalm retreating before superior forces, retreating, even after victory, retreating into a circle made every day narrower and narrower; as I come to the last page and the last struggle where that truly great man, the gallant Montcalm, found death with his first defeat, I do not disguise from my fellow-countrymen of English origin that my heart is clenched and that my French blood runs colder in my veins. Talk to me not of your purely utilitarian theories! men are not mere automatons! It is not by trampling on the tenderest sentiments of the soul that you will ever accomplish your end if such an end you have in view. And yet it is in the name of British allegiance, it is with the apparent object of securing the future of this country, that this new policy is introduced—this so-called British policy which is at total variance with the policy ever followed by the British authorities on this continent. This country had but a few years before passed under the régime of the English Crown, when the great conflict arose between England and her colonies to the south, which ended in the separation of those colonies from the mother land. England at once realised that, if she was to retain a foothold upon this continent, it was necessary for her to win the affections of her new subjects, since she had lost the allegiance of those of her own kith and kin; and that unless she made just concessions she could not hope to do so. In a just and generous spirit she made the concessions necessary to gain this object. To her new subjects she gave their laws, their language, and their religion, although at the time that very religion was subjected to many disabilities in England. Does not the hon. gentleman who moved this Bill know, as everybody must know, that these timely concessions saved this colony to England? Does he not know that if the new subjects of England had joined the armies which Congress sent over to force Canadians into the movement of insurrection, the result would have been for Canada what it has been for the rebellious colonies—total separation. And the hon. gentleman might have known that, though the Marquis de Lafayette and the Count d'Estaing sent their emissaries to wave the old colors of France before the eyes of the old subjects of France, the latter still remained true and fought under the British flag around the walls of Quebec with the same courage which they had displayed against that flag but sixteen years before. Supposing the hon. gentleman had been living then and had had a voice in the council of the King, what advice would he have given? Would he have said: Do not allow these men to talk their own language; do not give them any privileges? If he had, and if his advice had been taken, this country would not be British as it is to-day. I have stated, and I repeat the statement, that the French Canadians having claimed and received from England the privileges of British subjects, it would be the blackest ingratitude on their part if, to-day, they were to reject the obligations which British citizenship entails; but I also say to the hon. gentleman that it would be ungrateful, unmanly, and ungenerous to repeal at this moment, or to attempt to take from the French Canadians, the concessions made to them to win their affections and to secure their support in the day of England's danger. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated, a few evenings ago, that he had his doubts as to whether the loyalty of French Canadians upon that occasion had been altogether unmixed; he had his doubts as to whether, instead of being loyal, they did not only look to their language, their laws, their institutions and their church. I do not understand the doubts of the hon. gentleman. I do not doubt at all. I am quite sure these were the motives which impelled my countrymen to be loyal. They had to choose between the action of the British Crown and that of the Philadelphia Congress. The British Crown had just granted them the Act of 1774, which secured to them everything they held dear—their language, their laws and their religion—and they had to choose between that and the Act of the Philadelphia Congress, which will always remain a blot on a noble page of American history. The hon. gentleman shows that in the proclamation which the Congress of Philadelphia issued to the English people that very concession was declared to be one of the grievances of which the colonies had to complain. These were the motives that induced my countrymen to take the stand they did. Does the hon. gentleman find fault with them for being guided by motives? Do not men generally act on motives? As Mr. Lincoln said, in 1862, in the darkest period of the war: Negroes themselves will act upon motives. I would like to know what objection my hon. friend has to that? What are his views of loyalty? Does loyalty consist only in kissing the smiting hand? Is it meritorious when submissive and slavish? No; loyalty is meritorious when it proceeds from favors granted and from justice done. And this has been the invariable tradition of the race to which my hon. friend has the honor to belong, and of which he is justly proud. But there were before to-day men whose memory was short and whose sense of gratitude was limited. In the first Parliament, which sat in 1791 under the Constitution then granted, there were men like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who wished to have the use of the French language abolished in the legislative hall. Their attempts were frustrated, chiefly by the efforts of one man, who, upon that subject, could speak with authority. That man was Joseph Papineau, the illustrious father of a still more illustrious son; and his whole life was the repudiation of the theory advanced here in the last four days. He was an example of the fact that a man can speak in the language of his ancestors, and still remain a true subject of the Crown of England. At the time when Arnold and Montgomery were invading Canada, despatches had been brought from Lord Howe, who commanded the British forces in the insurgent colonies, to Sir Guy Carleton, who commanded the English forces in Canada. The despatches reached Montreal. Sir Guy Carleton had been forced to retreat to Quebec before Montgomery's army, and was busily preparing that city against the invaders. The despatches could not be carried further than Montreal, except at the cost of great perils and hardships; but two young men undertook to carry them through. Joseph Papineau, then a young man, twenty-five years of age, was one of the two who volunteered for this service. The country was in the hands of the enemy; it was unsettled, and there were great rivers to be crossed, without bridges, and it was in the fall of the year. Mr. Papineau and his friend tramped the whole distance. They reached Quebec and delivered their despatches. Then, what did they do? They enlisted as volunteers and served in the defence of Quebec, until the enemy was repulsed from Canadian soil. Some few years afterwards, in 1791, Mr. Papineau had been elected member for Montreal, and when the attempt was made to banish the French language from the walls of the legislature of Quebec, Mr. Papineau could speak with some authority, and he asked:

"Is it simply because Canada forms part of the British Empire that Canadians, who speak not the language in use on the banks of the Thames, are to be deprived of their natural rights?"

Mr. Papineau's recent services, his fidelity to the cause in danger, were such as to convince the English members of the Legislature that his arguments were reasonable and generous; and I submit that his words should find an echo, even at this distant day, within the walls of this chamber. The hon. gentleman told us that, at a later date, Lord Durham, in his famous report, advised the suppression of the French language in the legislative halls of Canada. It is perfectly true, and his views were incorporated in the Imperial Act of 1840, but five years had not elapsed before the Canadian Legislature unanimously decided, all shades of opinion united, to petition the Imperial Parliament to remove the obnoxious clause, and it was so removed. The union of Upper and Lower Canada had just been consummated, and it was soon perceived, under the guidance of that master mind, Mr. Baldwin, that if the union was to be for the good of the whole people, every section of the people had to be protected in what was held dear by every one of them. This Act of the Legislature has, however, been criticised by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He found nothing in it great, generous or statesman like. On the contrary, he characterised it as a weak concession from politicians in order to capture French votes. I would not do justice to the hon. gentleman if I did not here quote his words. This is what he said:

"The Parliament of 1840 did all it could to repair the injury of 1774; but, gentlemen, it was not very long before our politicians undid it all."

Mark the supreme contempt in these words, "our politicians!" The hon. gentleman was on tender ground when he spoke of "politicians," he was at one time a politician, though he informed his audience that he was no longer of that class.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A statesman.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman was too modest to say that, but he left it to be inferred, that the great statesmen of the present day should endeavor to undo the great wrong inflicted on this country, from such base motives, by such puny politicians as Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Lafontaine, Sir Allen MacNab and Mr. Morin. The hon. gentleman was proud, he said, to fortify his views with the views of Lord Durham, and he was proud to refer to Lord Durham as a Liberal of the Liberals. It is true that Lord Durham was a Liberal, but I will show that, while he was a friend of liberty, and was one of the most advanced statesmen of his day, he did not know the force of free institutions, and that, however large the range of his mind, he was not such a keen-sighted statesman, nor even true Liberal, as was our own Robert Baldwin. My hon. friend the other day recalled the famous words of Lord Durham, wherein, in graphic language, he depicted the state of Lower Canada in the summer of 1838. He had expected, he said, to find here a conflict between a Government and a people, but he had found two peoples warring in the bosom of the same state; he had found a struggle, not of principles, but of races. The language is perfectly true. It cannot be doubted at this day, that the movement which culminated in the rebellion of 1837-38 in Lower Canada, when it assumed that acute form, had degenerated into a war of races. My hon. friend did not tell us the cause which had brought about that war of races, but Lord Durham told us, and my hon. friend might have quoted his language. The cause was the contest between the Legislative Assembly and an irresponsible Government. For almost fifty years the Legislative Assembly passed laws which were deemed essential, absolutely essential, for the welfare of the country, and even for the very existence of the Legislative Assembly itself, as a body; and as often as those laws were passed, so often were they trampled upon by an irresponsible Government. The Assembly was altogether French; the Executive was almost entirely English, and its members were recruited by the Colonial Office among its creatures. As may be expected in any such case, the whole French population took part with the Assembly, and nearly the whole of the English population took part with the Executive. Very few, probably, thought much as to who was in the right or as to who was in the wrong; but, if you desire to know who was in the main right in that dispute, I cannot do better than to call in the testimony of Lord Durham himself, as it is couched in his report. And this is what he said:

"From the commencement, therefore, to the end of the disputes which marked the whole parliamentary history of Lower Canada, I look on the conduct of the Assembly as a constant warfare with the Executive, for the purpose of obtaining the powers inherent in a representative body by the very nature of representative government."

Thus you have the admission that, if there was a rebellion, it was forced upon the French Canadians of that day by the action of the Executive Government, which had refused to give to the Legislative Assembly the powers inherent to a legislative body. Yet, in face of that opinion, Lord Durham said that the loyalty of the French Canadians could not be trusted, and that henceforth Lower Canada would have to be governed by an English population, and the method he suggested was the union of the two Canadas, with a provision that the English population should have in the House a large majority in numbers. The reason he gives for coming to that conclusion is given in very pithy terms. Here it is:

"Never again will the present generation of French Canadians yield a loyal submission to a British Government."

I have already stated that Lord Durham did not know the full force of free representative institutions, and that our own Baldwin was a greater statesman in that respect than Lord Durham. Lord Durham had not imagined, he had not thought, that, if the French Canadians were given all their privileges, they would at once become loyal subjects, that they would not have to be governed by the strong hand of an English majority, that division would not take place on the line of races but on the broader lines which impel men to move onwards or to cling to the past. Mr. Baldwin understood that, and he was the first to suggest that the French Canadians should have their language restored, and should be treated as the equals of their fellow-citizens of English origin. That was true statesmanship and that view was unanimously adopted by the Legislature; and I ask, in face of subsequent facts, who is the greater statesman, Lord Durham or Mr. Baldwin? Lord Durham stated that the then living generation of French Canadians would never yield submission to an English Government. At that very time, there was a young man who was an exile from his native country, because he had been a few months before a rebel in arms, and the British Government had set a price upon his head. There is no doubt that, if he had been captured, he would have met the fate of those who, on the scaffold, paid the penalty of having loved their country not wisely but too well. Under the policy introduced in 1845, this young man became a member of Parliament and leader of the Conservative party, and he died a baronet of the realm. Sir, this took place in face of the words Lord Durham wrote in 1838, when he said that never again would that generation of French Canadians yield a loyal submission to the British Government. Now, my hon. friend from Simcoe asks us to go back upon this policy. Are we to be told at this day, or is it to be believed by any one at this day, that the policy introduced by Mr. Baldwin has not made Canada what it is? Is there a man living in this land, especially if he is of the Liberal party, who would at this day go back upon the policy inaugurated by their leader forty years ago? Sir, there is not a man in this country to-day who must not feel proud of the wise and statesman-like policy which was introduced upon that occasion. I am not ignorant of, nor will I minimise, the danger which arises to Canada from the fact that we have here a duality of language and a duality of race. But the fact exists, and ostracism of any kind, instead of removing the danger, would simply intensify it, by forcing a section of our population to hate the institutions under which they live—intensify it, because it would bring a section of our population into conflict with the majority, which would thus abuse the brute power of numbers. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman must feel that the policy which he is now championing is weak and inferior. Any policy which appeals to a class, to a creed, to a race, or which does not appeal to the better instincts to be found in all classes, in all creeds, and in all races, is stamped with the stamp of inferiority. The French Canadian who appeals to his fellow-countrymen to stand by themselves, aloof from the rest of this continent; the English Canadian who, like my hon. friend, appeals to his fellow-countrymen on grounds affecting them alone, may, perhaps, win the applause of those whom they may be addressing, but impartial history will pronounce their work as vicious in conception as it is mischievous and wicked in its tendency. We are here a nation, or we want to be a nation, composed of the most heterogeneous elements—Protestants and Catholics, English, French, German, Irish, Scotch, every one, let it be remembered, with his traditions, with his prejudices. In each of these conflicting antagonistic elements, however, there is a common spot of patriotism, and the only true policy is that which reaches that common patriotism and makes it vibrate in all, towards a common end and common aspirations. I may be asked: What, then, is to be the future of Canada? The future of Canada is this: that it must be British. I do not share the dreams or the delusions of those few of my fellow-countrymen of French origin, who talk to us of forming a French nation on the banks of the St. Lawrence; and I would say to my hon. friend from Simcoe, if he were here, that these dreams ought not to disturb his sleep. Those who share these delusions are very few; they might be counted upon the fingers of one hand, and I never knew but one newspaper which ever gave them utterance. Yet, while I say that this country is bound to be British, it does not follow at all that there must be but one language—the English language—to be spoken in this country. I claim that I am as loyal as the hon. gentleman to the institutions of this country, and I am the son of a French mother, and I declare that I cling to the language which I learned at her knee as I cling to the life which she gave me. And upon this ground I appeal to every man of British origin, to every man of that race in which the domestic affections are so strong; and I know that in the heart of every one the answer will be, that, situated as we are, they would do as we do. But the hon. gentleman will revert to the cold, dry arguments that, after all, a duality of race will produce friction, and that friction will produce danger. But where is the remedy? I tell the hon. gentleman that the remedy is not in ostracism, not in harsh methods nor in cruel methods. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill)—who, like many other good men, preaches better than he practices—gave us the other day the true remedy. The true remedy, he said, is mutual forbearance and respect. I altogether agree with my hon. friend from North Bruce. But he complained in his speech that the forbearance should not be all on one side. Sir, is it all on one side? What he complains of is a few expressions, I admit very imprudent, that have fallen from the lips of some men in the heat of the debate. Well, I am pretty sure that when those expressions are sifted and explained they readily fall away. The newspapers of Ontario, during the past year, have been full of citations of the words of my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), pronounced at the St. Jean Baptiste celebration last year; and when he took occasion, a few days ago, to explain those words, he explained them so thoroughly that my hon. friend from North Bruce immediately wanted to make him a member of the Imperial Federation League. If all the other expressions were so sifted I do not despair that my hon. friend from North

Mr. LAURIER.

Bruce would try to make Mr. Mercier himself a member of the Imperial Federation League. This is what he claims his fellow-countrymen and my fellow-countrymen of English origin have to bear. Well, I tell him that the French Canadians have also something to bear. I will tell him what we have to bear. What we object to is the meddling interference of certain men in Ontario in our domestic politics; what I object to is the whining pity bestowed by some over-zealous and over-good men in Ontario upon the poor, down-trodden, prostrate French Canadians. Only the other day my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) complained that the Province of Quebec was making no progress, and he instanced the fact that in that Province we still have the tithing system, and he said if there was in Quebec a true Liberal party, they would grapple with such an evil as that. There is in Quebec a Liberal party, not without fault, I admit, but a party which has fought as noble a battle as was ever fought by any party in any land. But before I tell him why the Liberal party in Quebec do not grapple with the tithing system, let me remind him that there is in England a Liberal party of which any man ought to be proud, a party led to-day by one of the greatest men that England has ever produced, or that any land has ever produced—Mr. Gladstone. Does my hon. friend also know that there is a tithing system in England just as there is a tithing system in Lower Canada—no, not just the same, because the tithing system in England is far more oppressive and unjust than the system in Lower Canada. The tithing system in Lower Canada only affects Roman Catholics and no one else, but in England the tithing system affects every man, whether he is a member of the Church of England or of another. And yet never to this day did the Liberal party grapple with that system or attempt to bring the English people to abolish that system. Why? Because the great majority of the English people would not part with it. And for the very same reason the Liberal party has never grappled with that system here, because the people of Quebec are satisfied with it. My hon. friend has read somewhere that the people are oppressed under the tithing system, that they are compelled to abandon their lands because the oppression is such that they cannot pay the tithes. The truth is the people of Quebec to-day give double the amount to the Church voluntarily than they give by law. I declare, in the name of the Liberal party of Quebec, of which I am an humble member, that so long as the conscience of Quebec is satisfied with the system, never will the Liberal party attack that system. I will say this to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that if we could make a compact between the English and the French, each to mind his own business and not meddle with the business of the other, we would get along tolerably well, not only tolerably well, but perfectly well. Yet the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) perhaps may say: If you are to bring the two races together, simply by relying upon moral influence and persuasion, the union may be far away. There is force in the objection, because there are in Quebec, as there are in Ontario, extreme men who will not be amenable either to reason or generous considerations. The extreme men of Quebec talk to-day of forming a French nation on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and the extremists of Ontario talk of driving away the French with bayonets. When the very large body of the nation, composed of the two races, come closer together and know each other better, I have no doubt that friction of races here will be as rare as it is in Switzerland after hundreds of years of political union. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) if he were here, would say, perhaps: Is this system ever to remain? Is there never to be a day when we shall have here nothing but the English language? I would tell my hon. friend that I do not trouble myself with such considerations as to a dim and distant future. The only thing which troubles me at this moment is, to keep peace and harmony in this land, and not have peace and harmony endangered under the vain pretence of securing the future against feuds and contentions. I have great pleasure in telling the hon. gentleman—and I am sorry he is not present—that, in my judgment, the English language is to-day and must be for several generations, perhaps for several centuries, the commanding language of the world. So long as the centre of civilisation was on the basin of the Mediterranean, three languages in succession held sway: the Greek, the Latin and the French. At the end of the seventeenth century the French language was undoubtedly the dominating language of civilisation. It is still the language of diplomacy, the vehicle of communication for international exchange in the higher productions of the human mind, but it is no longer the language of the many. That position now belongs to the English language. That revolution has been accomplished by the wonderful development of the Anglo-Saxon race during the eighteenth and in the nineteenth centuries. That race have carried their language with them in their emigration around the world, and now it is the language of more than 100,000,000 of people scattered over Europe, Africa, America, Asia, and the islands and continents of the Pacific Ocean. Sir, the very fact that the English language is to-day the dominating language of this continent of America, makes it imperative on French Canadians, although they will retain their language, to learn and speak English. Nothing was more appropriate, more wise than the words that fell a few days ago from the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard). The French Canadian father who to-day does not give an English education to his son does not do justice to his child, because he compels him to stand back in the hard struggle for life. I would say more. It is imperative for us French Canadians to learn English, but—I have no right to give advice to any other man—if I were to give any advice to my Anglo-Canadian friends, it would be that they would do well to learn French too. The English are a proud race; but the Romans were a proud race also; and after they had conquered the world, a Roman acknowledged that the education of his son was not complete unless he was as familiar with Greek letters as he was with Latin letters. Perhaps, however, my hon. friend for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would not admit such an example for himself or the people of this country, because the object of my hon. friend is not simply to remove the use of the French language in the North-West Territories and from every legislative hall in Canada, but his object is to prevent the teaching of French in the schools of Ontario. There are to-day, in the back townships and new concessions in Ontario, schools where a few French settlers are attempting to impart some knowledge to their children in the language of their ancestors. The eagle eye of my hon. friend has caught sight of that fact. The eye of the eagle can withstand the sun, but the eye of my hon. friend cannot withstand that little light. He spoke a few days ago in this city, the Capital of Canada, at a meeting which adopted the following resolution:—

“And this meeting avails itself of this opportunity of expressing the opinion that in our own Province the use of the French language as the language of instruction in the public schools should be abolished and for ever prohibited, and that no undecided measure for obtaining this end will be satisfactory to the people of Ontario.”

The hon. gentleman spoke to that resolution and endorsed every word of it. This is what he said:

“At the same time, as a citizen of Ontario—of the Dominion, I heartily endorse the sentiment which the meeting has given utterance to—that we ought, and ought at once and for all time, to put an end to the teaching of our children, either French, Canadian or English, in any other language than the language of the country in which we live.”

Is this really the measure of my hon. friend? We always knew him to be a restrictionist, but not to that extent, I am sure; we always knew him to be a restrictionist in trade, but he is a restrictionist even in knowledge. If the hon. gentleman, on that occasion, had said that the people of Ontario would insist that English should be taught in all their schools, I would raise both my hands in favor of it. But that is not enough; not only must English be taught, but he objects to any other language being taught in Ontario schools. Can it be that an hon. gentleman possessing the attainments, power and ability of my hon. friend should stoop to things so low? It is a thing low, and vile, and contemptible, to say that the people of Ontario, whatever be their creed or their origin, shall not have the right to teach a second language to their children if they choose. Men are not usually wantonly cruel; men do not, as a rule, purposely degrade their lives, and what is the reason, I want to know, which impels my hon. friend to use such language as that? Sir, the reason is, that Tories of the stamp of my hon. friend never can bring themselves up to the point of trusting the better instincts of the human heart; they never can divest themselves of the base notion that, if they treat their opponents with generosity or with justice, their opponents will abuse the privilege. They can never divest themselves of the base notion that, if the French Canadians are to be allowed their language and their characteristics as a race, they will turn traitors as a race. They want to make this country British in the same manner they have tried to make Ireland British. For the last seven hundred years, English statesmen have attempted to make Ireland British, not by justice, not by generosity, not by appealing to the better instincts of the generous hearts of that people, but by every form of violence and cruelty. They have proscribed her religion, they have killed her agriculture, they have destroyed her commerce, they have done everything to degrade the land and the people. And with what result? With the result of making Ireland a thorn in the side of England, with the result of filling the heart of the people of Ireland with bitterness against England. Sir, Mr. Gladstone has done more in five years to make Ireland British than English statesmen have done for seven hundred years before.

Will I show you the different results which can be wrought upon the feelings of a sensitive people by generous treatment? Let me quote a speech delivered by Mr. John Dillon, M. P. for Tipperary, last year. The occasion was a demonstration in favor of Mr. Dillon on his being released from jail, where he had served a term under the odious Coercion law. Now, I cite this speech because it may be a lesson to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and those who agree with him in this House. Mr. Dillon said :

"But it is impossible for me to be blind to the facts that are forced upon my notice as regard the mighty change which have come over the minds of the masses of the people of England, and remembering this, I think it is not wise to be impatient, because the liberty of Ireland is not to be accomplished in a day. I can see no cause for impatience, but cause rather for hope and even exultation. Coming now, as I do, from what was meant to be a degradation and an insult to me, and as I hope an honorable man, I can find in my heart not the slightest trace of bitterness against the people of England. I recollect the day when the power and when the name of Englishmen were hateful to my heart. It may be that I have been demoralised by the countless acts of kindness I have received at the hands of Englishmen; but the feeling has now changed, and I cannot find it in my heart to regret that it is fast passing away."

Those last words, I am sure, will fill with unbounded joy the friends of Ireland and the friends of England as well. But with what terrible meaning are not these words prefaced? It is known that Mr. Dillon is a man of noble and unstained character. No harsh words would be expected to cross the lips of such a man, yet he tells us there was a time when the very name of England was hateful to him. How terrible these words are? They are the expression of the bitterness accumulated through centuries and centuries of persecutions in succeeding generations of Irishmen. But, Sir, mark the change. Less than five years of a generous attempt by a great party to do justice to Ireland, to give her the liberty and justice to which she is entitled, has worked wonders and changed the disposition of the Irish people. These five years of generous attempts to do justice to Ireland have erased the sentiment of bitterness and replaced it by sentiments of affection to the land whose very name was hateful to Ireland only a few years ago. What a triumph this is for the cause of Ireland? What a triumph this is for those who, in this House, told the English people that if they were to treat the Irish people generously, they would have the same result in Ireland as in this country? What an evidence also this is that the only manner, after all, in which you can attach a people to their allegiance is to treat them with fairness and generosity; and what a rebuke it is to all those (my hon. friend from North Simcoe included) who believe that the only manner in which to make a people loyal is to trample under foot everything which they hold dear and sacred. Sir, I have just pronounced the name of Home Rule. Home Rule with us is local autonomy, and I hope that this principle of local autonomy will some day afford us some solution of the difficulty we have now to deal with. What is objectionable in this Bill is not, as has been often stated, the object of the Bill itself, (which is, after all, with some exceptions, a local question), but the tendency of the Bill and the principles which underlie it, for we know that this is only a preliminary step that is to be followed by many others. We are, to-day, in the fourth day of this debate, and I have to make the reproach that the Government have not yet told us what their policy is on the question. The Government, of late, do not discharge the duty they owe to this House. They can advise us on matters of details and matters of procedure, but when it comes to a question of principle they refuse to discharge the duties for which they are responsible to the House. We had a speech the other day from the hon. the Minister of Public Works. He simply told us he was against the Bill, but he affirmed no principle which we might apply to the situation. We have three propositions before us: the Bill itself, the amendment of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and the amendment of my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil). I am free to speak of them, but in what I say I declare that I express my own personal opinion. I do not speak here as the leader of a party—I express my own opinion, and nothing more. As to the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I have to say that, in my opinion, it is premature. It is endeavoring to give to the people of the Territories upon one question, plenary power, while they are still in a form of tutelage. We are not prepared to give to the people of the North-West full local autonomy. We cannot expect that a population which in 1885 numbered only something like 30,000 souls—the population of a small town, scattered over immense territories, out of which several empires can be carved—can be entrusted with the full power of responsible government. The amendment of my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) is, perhaps, more consistent with our true position. The amendment affirms the proposition that the present state of things ought to be permanent. With this, however, I cannot agree, and although I am prepared to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend from Berthier, I cannot do so without taking exception to his statements. It is impossible to admit, for instance, that the institutions of the North-West are permanent. On the contrary, they are exceptionally temporary; they deal with a state of things which is exceptional in itself; they were devised at a time when there was no population, and they must be modified from time to time as the necessities of the case require. But at this moment to say they are permanent, is a thing in which I cannot agree, except so far as they must be permanent in every particular, so long as we are not ready to give these people a more extended form of local authority. My hon. friend also says in this amendment, that since we passed this law and gave this incipient constitution to the North-West Territories, nothing has occurred to change our views. I cannot agree with that. Everything has occurred since that time, not to change our views, but to set us thinking about what we should do at a future time, not very far off, in regard to those Territories. What has occurred is this: a population has gone into those Territories; they have been given a Legislature; and that Legislature has demanded certain measures—not only on the question of language, but on that of the schools, and on the system of Government. Bearing these facts in mind, it seems to me that the proper time to deal with this question will be when we are prepared to give the Territories, perhaps not absolute, but a more extended form of local self-government; and when that time comes, we must be prepared to deal with this question upon the broad principle of this Constitution, which has been devised for the safety of the majority and the protection of the minority, and in the light of the condition of things which may exist at that time in the Territories. But till then I believe it is better to defer the consideration of this question. There is this remarkable feature in the Bill we have before us: it is not founded on an expression of the will of the people of the Territories; it is founded simply on alleged principles applicable to the whole Dominion. This is what I object to in this Bill, and—though it is my own individual opinion only—I submit to all parties in this House, French or English, Liberals or Conservatives, that the best thing for us to do is to defer the consideration of this question to a future time when we shall be prepared to deal with all the questions now affecting the North-West Territories. In the meantime, however, we ought to remember this—French, English, Liberals, Conservatives—that no race in this country has absolute rights, only the rights which do not invade the rights of any other race. We ought to remember that the expression of race feelings and race sentiments should be well restrained to a point, beyond which, if pressed, though still kept within legitimate limits, they might hurt the feelings and sentiments of other races. But when the time comes for dealing with this question, I hope we shall all be prepared, without party differences, to deal with it on the broad principles that apply to this Constitution; that we shall not, French or English, hesitate to apply true principles under the fear that evil consequences may flow from them, because we must remember that true principles are only an emanation of Divine truth, and that there is above us an eternal Providence whose infinite wisdom knows better than man what is best for man, and who, even when all seems lost, still guides everything for the greatest good.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I go a great way with my hon. friend in his remarks concerning the principle of this Bill. I sympathise with his very natural feelings of indignation at much of the language that has been used in support of this measure now before the House. I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is à propos de rien. Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a constitution now under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having equal rights of every kind—of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country; there is no conquered race in this country; we are all British subjects, and those who are not English are none the less British subjects on that account. But while I say so much, Mr. Speaker, I must regret that my hon. friend, perhaps yielding to the necessity of his position as a party leader, should have commenced his speech with some party attacks against the Tories. My hon. friend felt constrained, I suppose, to make those allusions which, in the circumstances of the case, I think were not altogether generous or altogether politic. The hon. gentleman spoke of the spirit of this Bill being that of Toryism, utter Toryism, oppressive Toryism. Why, Sir, if he looks at the history of England in modern days, I think he will find that most of the liberal measures passed there have been passed, if not by Tories, by Conservatives. I think also, if he will look at the history of Canada, he will find at all events, that liberality towards the French Canadian race was pretty much confined to the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman had to admit that while this Bill was, as he affirmed, an evidence of utter Toryism, the exclusion of the French language, the injury done to the French people, the insult offered to them, came from a Radical, the Earl of Durham. To be sure, my hon. friend said that Lord Durham was a Radical who did not understand all about liberty. That is quite evident; and so great a Radical was he that in order to get rid of him the English Government sent him to this country to show us his liberalism by attempting to deprive half the people of their right to use their own language. Ay, Mr. Speaker, and he succeeded in carrying out that effort; he succeeded in excluding the French language, and the measure was carried by a Liberal Government in England. That was in 1840. The first Government formed in Canada under that measure in 1841 was a confused Government, where Liberals, and Tories, and officials were mixed up together. But, Sir, in 1844, when there was a stand-up fight between Conservatives and Liberals, when the Conservatives rallied around Lord Metcalfe, and carried a majority; when the Parliament met in Montreal in that year, with a Conservative majority, the whole of the French Canadian race, with the exception, I think, of four, were in opposition to the Government. I was then elected for the first time, and I sat in that Parliament as a Tory, a supporter of Lord Metcalfe. In that Parliament the French Canadians were powerless; and yet, Mr. Speaker, what did that House do? Let me read to you a resolution that was passed, not by a Liberal or Radical Government, not by a Parliament having sympathy with the French Canadians exactly, but by a Conservative Parliament elected, as was then alleged, in opposition to the interests of the Province of Lower Canada; and yet passed, from a mere sense of justice, and without one single dissenting voice. Yes, from a mere sense of justice, the resolution was passed and the address was passed without one dissenting voice. I, as a member of the young Tory party, was proud then to have the opportunity of pronouncing on that question. The yeas and nays were not taken because we were unanimous, but I was proud of having had a part, as a member of a great party, in the resolve to relieve our French Canadian friends from the oppressive action of the Liberal Government in England, at the instigation of the Radical Earl Durham. What said that address? I shall not read the whole address which went home to Her Majesty, and of which the chief clause was repealed, but it went on to say:

"We do not question that the best intentions and designs influenced the minds of those who enacted the provision which declared: That all writs, proclamations, instruments for summoning and calling together the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada, and for proroguing and dissolving the same, and all writs of summons and election, and all writs and public instruments whatever relating to the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, or either of them, and all returns to such writs and instruments, and all journals and entries, and written or printed proceedings of what nature soever of the said Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, and of each of them respectively, and all written or printed proceedings and reports of Committees of the said Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, respectively, shall be in the English language only."

That was the measure of justice offered to the French Canadians by a Liberal Parliament in England and a Radical Governor General and High Commissioner sent out by a Liberal Government. And what did the Tory Legislative Assembly of Canada say?

"That in the very first session of the Legislature, under that Act, it was indispensable to translate into French every public record and document. That the debates were not and could not, unless a portion of the representatives of the people were silenced, be carried out without its use; that in the courts and judicial proceedings it was found equally necessary as before the Union, and for every other practical purpose, it is as much used as it ever has been. That the only distinction which exists, then, is, that the French is not permitted to be the legal language of Parliamentary record, a distinction of little value, perhaps, in itself—one which cannot produce any beneficial results on the feelings or the habits of the people using it, while it gives rise to a feeling among them injurious to the best peace and tranquility of the Province, namely, that this limited proscription of their language conveys, however designedly, an imputation of an unfavorable distinction towards themselves.

"That desirous that the hearts of all men in this Province may be joined in unity, in their attachment to and support of Your Majesty's person and Government, we humbly pray Your Majesty to endeavor to remove this cause of discontent, and to recommend to the Imperial Parliament the repeal of that portion of the law which has given rise to it; assuring Your Majesty that such a course will be hailed by Your Majesty's loyal Canadian people as an additional mark of Your Majesty's solicitude for their welfare."

There is an instance of the oppressive Toryism which my hon. friend lamented. But my hon. friend ought to have looked at the history of old Canada after that period. My hon. friend says truly that a Conservative Government was kept in for years by the support of the Conservatives of Lower Canada. And why was that so? Because from the Conservative party the Lower Canadians got full and ample justice. What party was it that relieved the habitants of Lower Canada, the gens de couleur of Lower Canada, from the oppression of the seigniorial tenure? What was it that made them free men instead of being victims of antiquated feudalism? The seigniorial tenure oppressed them, and the people rose against it; and it was a Conservative Government, of which I had the honor to be a member, that relieved them of that burden. You might remember, Sir, that when the Hon. George Brown brought his immense force and ability and unsurpassed energy to lead the Reform party of old Upper Canada, his whole aim was oppression to the French. Every speech he made, every article that he wrote in the Globe, every resolution almost which he moved, was a denunciation of the French law, the French language, and the Catholic religion; and because we, the Conservatives, opposed him with all our might and all our vigor, we were in a minority in our Province. Again and again have the best and the strongest of our Conservatives been defeated at the polls simply because we would not do injustice to our French follow-countrymen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Again and again have we been put in a minority because we declined to join in that crusade against the French Canadians, against the Catholic religion, and against French institutions. Again and again have I been misrepresented and called the slave of popery, and told that I had sold myself to the French of Lower Canada and was sacrificing my own race, my own religion, and my own people because, without a moment of hesitation, without swerving for an instant, I and those who followed me—for even when I was not the nominal leader, I greatly directed the course of the Conservative party—declined, from no personal motive or desire of popularity, the popular cry was raised against the French Canadians in Upper Canada then as it is in Ontario, to-day—to do an injustice to our French Canadian fellow-citizens; and it was not a fair taunt of the hon. gentleman to tell us that we owed our position to the support of the Conservatives of Lower Canada. Does the hon. gentleman not remember when the agitation was raised in Upper Canada on a very specious cry—the question of representation by population—that the population being equal in Upper Canada should have as many members as Lower Canada, which it had not at the time of the Union, because at that time Lower Canada had a larger population than Upper Canada—does the hon. gentleman not remember that the Conservative party opposed that cry, specious and popular as it was? And why did we oppose it? Because the avowed object was to crush and oppress our French Canadian subjects. The reason why I oppose the Bill of my hon. friend to-day is the same—because that Bill, a small Bill; I might almost call it an insignificant Bill in its enacting clause—is based on the purpose of doing away with the French language, of discarding the French language, at all events, and depriving the French Canadian people of the solace of the language they learned at the feet of their mothers. Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is one act of oppression more than another which would come home to a man's breast, it is that he should be deprived of the consolation of hearing and speaking and reading the language that his mother taught him. It is cruel. It is seething the kid in its mother's milk. The greatest, perhaps, of all the objections to this measure, is that it is a futile measure. It will not succeed. It cannot succeed. As my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said the other day, and as the hon. member from the West Riding of Durham (Mr. Blake) repeated, in order to carry out an oppressive measure we must have a Russian Government or we must have a Strafford here; we must put down the language with a strong hand; we must exclude it from the schools; we must exclude it from official life; no man in Canada who spoke French must be allowed to take office; the Frenchman must be made a Pariah, and his language must be made a mark of scorn; that is the only way to carry out the principle or the object of my hon. friend the Minister for North Simcoe.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Did I call my hon. friend the Minister from North Simcoe? That is giving him more than equal rights. But my hon. friend has commenced at the wrong end. He should attack the language where it is; he should not attack it where it is not. He should have gone down to the Province of Quebec, and, by peaceable means—he says by peaceable means, though I heard some remarks about bayonets from my hon. friend opposite—and, by his skill and his eloquence, and by other means which, no doubt, he has presented to his own mind and will give to us by-and-bye, he should have shown the people there that it is for their good, that it is for the good of the party, and for the unity and good of the country, and should have convinced them that it was necessary for them to give up their language. His present proposal is like the sting of a gnat—a sort of irritation which can be of no use, and could not carry out the avowed object of my hon. friend. There is scarcely any French spoken in the North-West. There are a few French Canadians there, and a scattered population of French half-breeds, and the whole effect of this Bill would be to deprive these poor people of reading or knowing the laws to which they are subject. I say the hon. gentleman commenced at the wrong end. If the butcher goes to kill an ox, he goes to strike him on the head, and does not cut a little piece off the tail, which, after all, is the only effect of the measure of my hon. friend. But he is such an able man that one wonders—I wonder, with my limited apprehension—what he would accomplish by this measure.

Mr. MITCHELL. He got loaded up the wrong way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It cannot be from any desire to save the $400 which my hon. friend is ready to pay. It cannot be for the purpose of spreading the English language more than it is spread there. It cannot have the effect of inducing the half-breeds who are hunting over the plains to change their language from French to English. Unless it be that my hon. friend has a dislike to the language—and I am not aware that he knows much about it—or has a dislike to the people who use the language, I cannot understand why he has pressed this Bill. It is on record that an English sailor, returning from France, was asked what kind of people the French were. "Oh," said the sailor with an expletive, "they are a bad lot." "What is the matter with them?" "Oh," he said, "they call a hat a chapeau; why the deuce could they not call it a hat at once, and be hanged to them?" And that is very much the spirit of my hon. friend. I did not intend to speak on this matter at all after having heard the exhaustive speeches which have been made on the other side, and I must say, with the little exception of the slight touch of partisanship in the speech of my hon. friend who spoke last (Mr. Laurier), the speeches of the gentlemen who have honored the House have been of such a kind that I agree with almost everything they say.

Mr. MITCHELL. Except the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The member for North Norfolk is not on that side.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is here beside me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is an Ishmaelite. He has placed himself under the wing of the hon. the leader of the Fourth party.

Mr. MITCHELL. Don't misrepresent me—it is the Third party.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, he sits in very suspicious juxtaposition to the leader of that party. The objections to be taken to the resolution now before the House, moved by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), have been already given by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). Without entering into the general discussion of the resolution, it is in my mind sufficiently condemnatory of it to call upon the House to reject it, that, if it means anything, it means the continuation of the present state of things must be perpetual. It says that any alteration will cause a distrust, a suspicion, a doubt of the stability of our laws. If that is any reason against giving to the Legislature in the North-West now the power to deal with this matter, the same reason will exist twenty years hence, and it would keep the question permanently a source of disquiet and agitation and discomfort, not only in the North-West, but in Ontario and other Provinces, amongst all those who take a warm interest in this matter. I think also the resolution of which we had some information from the hon. member from the West Riding (Mr. Blake) is liable to almost a similar objection. It leaves the case undecided, and while these two resolutions have that effect, we must remember that this is a subject of great agitation in different parts of the Dominion. Lower Canada is agitated on account of this attack on their language; the North-West will be agitated if it is supposed that they are deprived of the right of judging on this subject; and we must take great care, Mr. Speaker, that while we are calming the agitation and soothing the agitated feelings of the people of Quebec, we are not arousing the feelings of the freemen of the North-West by passing a resolution which postpones for an indefinite time, it may be for a long period, a question in which we can see, from the resolution they have adopted, that they are greatly interested. I think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the true solution of this question, a solution that will quiet the feelings of the East and that will be satisfactory to the people who roam over the plains of the North-West, will be the resolution in principle of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in which he says: Let the representatives of the people up there judge for themselves, after having had a commission from the people to deal with the subject. I think if that were adopted it would satisfy the North-West, and the amende honorable that was made in this House by that resolution would quiet the insulted feelings of the people of the Province of Quebec, and we would have peace, through the benign influence of this resolution of my hon. friend from Assiniboia. I would ask my hon. friend opposite, my hon. friend from the West Riding of Durham (Mr. Blake), to take this matter into his consideration, and see whether there cannot be adopted very much of his resolution, with which I am most heartily in accord, and, in addition, to enquire whether, after the people had an opportunity of considering the question, after the next general election, and after they have read the discussion in this House, and after they have seen the general opinion of Parliament the great inquest of the nation, it would not be right and fair to trust to the representatives of the people in our far west to choose for themselves? They will act for their own country, for their own section, and their action will be only temporary. That country is infinitely too large to be one Province; it is too large, in my opinion, to be four Provinces, and this is a matter for the future, and, therefore, a resolution of this kind, giving them the power to deal with the subject, after being commissioned by the people, will be quite safe. After the population comes in there, if there is a large German population—and I should be very glad to see it—who shall take possession of a large section of that area, why not give them the right to use the German language? They would insist upon it whenever their numbers were sufficient. If the French Canadian settlement, which was commenced under rather unfavorable auspices at Edmonton, should increase and grow so that they would become a French Canadian Province, they would insist upon having their own language. This is a measure of peace and a measure for only a time. Under all the circumstances, the fact that they are not yet a Province, is of very little consequence. Whether they are called a Province or a Territory, they have rights as British subjects. Whether the people occupy a Territory or occupy a Province, if they want to use the French language, they should be allowed to use it; and if they want to use the English language, they should be allowed to use it, and it should be left to themselves. If there should be anything else attached to a measure of this kind when transmitted from the North-West, if there is anything further than a mere statement respecting the language, if any improper legislation attached to this, there is a remedy. All that this House and that this Government has to do is to check any improper legislation exceeding their powers, as, for instance, constituting themselves a constituent Assembly instead of a Legislative body, as they are now. These are my sentiments, very crudely expressed, and I must ask my hon. friends opposite to weigh this question carefully to see whether some joint measure of peace should not be adopted, and then the whole question, in my opinion, would be ended forever.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask the privilege of the House for one moment with reference to the remarks of the First Minister which were addressed to me personally before the recess. I wish to say that I have given the consideration which was due to everything the hon. gentleman has said, and that while my own judgment remains that the proper solution of this question is embodied in the suggestion which I submitted for the consideration of the House, I believe that the best interests of Canada are to be served by, if possible, a harmonious settlement of the question. For my part, I should not desire to adhere to any individual opinion, or to the terms of my suggestion, if there could be devised any reasonable modification of those terms which might meet the assent of the leading men of both sides and of both races within this chamber, and I have some hope that such a result may be reached before this debate is ended. I think it my duty to have made that statement to the House, because the great disaster which has happened to the University of which I am Chancellor, obliges me to leave to-night in connection with its interests; therefore, my own proposition

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

I must leave in the hands of the House at large. I know not whether it may be adopted or whether some modification of it may be adopted, but I do hope that the debate will be conducted and closed in the spirit which characterised the right hon. gentleman's closing remarks.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before going on with the debate, I wish to remark that I have seen an important statement in an evening paper, to which, I think, the attention of the House should be called. It is headed: "It hovered over us. The close shave we had of a war with the United States." The item reads thus:

"CINCINNATI, Ohio, Feb. 17.—In a speech at the dedication of the First Regiment Armory, Saturday night, Governor Foraker said he was asked by telegraph by the War Department in 1887, when the Canadian fishery situation was strained, how many armed men he could rush to the Canadian border in case of a sudden emergency. He said similar messages were sent to Governors of other States."

It is a very important statement, and I would like to know whether the Government have received any information of the truth of the statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; the Government did not receive at that time, and have not received at any time since, any intimation of anything of the kind at all approaching or in any way connected with it. I believe it is altogether a canard.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure of it.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed debate on proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy, &c. &c.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am sure that every hon. member has been delighted to hear from the lips of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the declaration just made that he desires that the present difficulty should be amicably settled, and I feel confident that in this House there is enough patriotism, enough religious and political toleration, and enough statesmanship to enable us to arrive at a solution which will be acceptable to all. Indeed, Sir, it has been to me, I may say, a source of grief to witness the acrimonious spirit in which this debate has been conducted, and to see old feuds, old enmities and religious animosities excited, which I am sure every one in this House must have felt had better have lain forever dormant until they had died their natural death. At the same time I do not see why the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) should have excited so much alarm. I speak of the Bill itself, for when I look at the preamble I must confess I cannot fathom it. It is the preamble which in its nature may tend, and has tended, to excite the strongest animosity and the strongest distrust on the part of our French members, and many have seen in it an attempt on the part of my hon. friend to deprive them of their political and religious liberties throughout the Dominion. I am sure, from the intercourse I have enjoyed for some years with the hon. gentleman, that such purposes are not in his heart. It may be that this preamble is a kind of indication of what was lurking in his mind, and of that condition he would desire to see established throughout the length and breadth of the land—one language; but, at the same time, it is not in his heart, nor is it his intention, to adopt any legislation, or other such means, to endeavor to bring about such a result, as he must be conscious that such a mode of action would be utterly futile. I must express my sympathy with those French members who have been alarmed on the present occasion. I have spent a good part of my life in France, and my boyhood and early manhood are associated with the pleasures of that country, and I have seized every opportunity I have had since manhood to renew my acquaintance with France; and, therefore, I enter on a discussion of such a subject as this with no sympathy for any fanatics, but with a desire to arrive at some result which may be satisfactory to all parties, and which may be for the ultimate benefit of our common country. I regret that religious animosities should have been excited, for I can never forget that over three hundred years ago, it was the Catholic Lord Howard of Effingham who led the fleet of England against the Spanish Armada, and that he did so after having kissed the hand of the English Queen, whom he knew had been declared by the Sovereign Pontiff to be illegitimate, to be a heretic, and to have been excommunicated. I cannot help thinking that during the whole of this debate we have been moving on too high a plane, and have been led away by the preamble of the Bill, to which most of the efforts of opponents of the Bill have been directed. I might take the ground, following the decision of last year arrived at by the authorities on constitutional law, on both sides of this House, that the preamble has nothing to do with the Bill, that we must consider the Bill itself; that was the doctrine proclaimed last year, and it is one which may be applied on the present occasion. But, apart from the preamble, when you look at the Bill, what is it? It is a Bill founded simply on the petition of a number of gentlemen in the North-West Territories, called the Legislative Council. Those gentlemen, rightly or wrongly, wisely or unwisely, have been entrusted with the management of the affairs of the North-West Territories. They have the confidence, so far as we know, of the electors of these Territories, they are as duly qualified to vote as are the electors of Ontario or of Quebec, and they are there on the spot, and in a full House almost unanimously they have asked to be relieved of a disability which was imposed upon them, and which they never requested or expected would have been laid upon them. They tell us that circumstances have so changed that the system which has been in operation in the Territories is no longer satisfactory and that it is unwise to continue such a disability, and they beg to be relieved of it. I have examined the returns of the last census in 1885, and I find in the North-West Territories the whole population by nationalities was 48,362 souls, of whom there were savage Indians 20,170, leaving a population of 28,192; and of that number the French population amounted to 1,520; or only 5½ per cent. of the population of 28,000, or 3⅛ per cent. of the whole population.

MR. LARIVIÈRE. It is true that the French Canadian population is 1,500, but there is a large French half-breed population which the hon. gentleman forgets.

MR. COCKBURN. I will take up that point immediately. I am kindly reminded by my hon. friend, that there is another population in the North-West Territories, a half-breed French population. I am aware of the fact that that population numbers 3,387, but I understand on reliable authority that this is not a French-speaking population, but a population which speaks the Cree language, and I do not think I am entitled to rank them with the 1,520 French in the Territories. At all events, I cannot put them on the same footing. I will go further, and say, that since that census was taken I have no doubt in my own mind, and my conviction is strengthened by authentic information, that the increase of the English-speaking population and the German-speaking population and other nationalities has been so great, that, instead of the French population being 5 per cent. it is now probably less. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke to us the other day of this being an attempt on the part of 3,000,000 people to swallow 2,000,000. There is no such attempt. He said this reminded him of the fact that it was a whale and not a cod that swallowed Jonah. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman, that if he is going to reverse the decision of the majority for 5 per cent. of the population, he is asking Jonah to swallow the whale. With respect to the population in the Province of Quebec, with which a comparison has been made, I find that there is a total population of 1,350,000, the French population numbering upwards of 1,000,000, the English-speaking numbering 268,000, or 19 per cent. of the population. I do not think we have a right to institute such comparisons, and I only mention them as they have been already made, because those rights of the people of the Province of Quebec, the rights of the minority in Quebec and of the minority in Ontario, and in every other Province in the Dominion, will, I trust, for ever remain undisturbed; and I will be no party, directly or indirectly, to do anything which, in my humble judgment, would amount to an attempt to break up one of the most sacred contracts into which any two people have ever entered. I mention this matter fully in order that my position may be clearly understood. The position of the North-West Territories has been presented to us as resembling very much the position occupied by Switzerland. We have been pointed to Switzerland as a guiding star for us. Even the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was so careful as to give all the exports and imports of that country, and he showed us how it was purely an agricultural country, and how it was particularly blessed in having a treble language. The analogy was a forced one; in fact, I know of no two countries so utterly dissimilar in every respect as the North-West Territories and Switzerland.

MR. DAVIN. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman, because I know he does not wish to misinterpret my remarks in proceeding with his lucid argument. I did not compare Switzerland to the North-West Territories. I said there was an analogy between Canada and Switzerland, although Canada stretches across an entire continent and Switzerland is in the heart of Europe.

MR. COCKBURN. I thank the hon. gentleman for the information. The argument was, however, made, and made several times. I desire to draw attention to the fact that each of those Territories is only slightly less than the area of the whole of the United Kingdom, 121,000 square miles, while the whole area of Switzerland is only some 15,964 square miles, of which 34 per cent. is over four thousand feet above the level of the sea. There are some 4,521 square miles unproductive, and six per cent. of the whole country is covered with snow fields and glaciers. I do not think you can compare a country like that with what I might call the immense ocean land territory we have in the North-West. I have trudged through the whole of Switzerland, again and again, with my knapsack on my back; and, speaking generally, you could take the whole of it and duck it in Lake Superior, sink it to the bottom there, and were it not for its high mountains like Mount Rosa and others you would never know that it was at the bottom of the lake. I consider Switzerland in almost every respect dissimilar to Canada. In its whole history Switzerland is entirely different from Canada. In Switzerland we are not dealing with a virgin country as we are in Canada with the North-West, which was until lately the habitat of the wild beast and the home of the buffalo. We are not dealing with a country without a history; a country spread out before us waiting for emigrants to possess it. In Switzerland we have a country which, in one form or another, has had some form of Government for six hundred years. Switzerland saw the beginning of its Confederation in the year 1291, when Uri, Schwyz and Unterwalden united to check the encroachments of the House of Hapsburg. In 1332, Luzern joined; in 1351, Zurich joined; in 1353, Glarus and Zug and Berne city joined; in 1481, Freiburg city and Solothurn joined; in 1501, Basle and Schaffhausen joined; in 1513, Appenzell joined: and these 13 cantons remained the Confederation of Switzerland. In 1798, two centuries and a-half or more after this, the Helvetic Republic, under the protection of the French Directory, was established. When you look at this country which has been held out as a model to ours, what do you find? You find that its growth was from prehistoric times, unaccompanied by serious disturbing influences. Our growth in the North-West, and throughout the whole of this country, is very different. It has been made up of individual elements brought from all countries, amalgamated together from their own desire to satisfy their economic wants, whereas in Switzerland they were brought together by the external hostile influences around them. There were Austria, Italy, France and Germany crowding them altogether; we find, as soon as they were freed from this external pressure upon them, there was internecine warfare. This country held up to our admiration is a country which had no settled form of government until 1848, when the new constitution as adopted by a majority of cantons, though material changes in the form of necessary extension of the constitutional law were made in 1865, and finally in 1874. In the year 1832, we find that seven of the twenty-two cantons formed themselves together in a Liberal Sonderbund. We find in 1846 the Catholic cantons united in a separate Diet, and a separate Legislature and Senate, so to speak, a revival of the league of Sarnen. So strong is the feeling of a want of union among them that you find in 1832 a civil and religious war; and in 1846 these Catholic cantons raised 50,000 men while the Federation on its side raised some 100,000 men and overcame those opposed to it. We find that in the twenty-two cantons in Switzerland, the official language is that spoken by the majority. The rule they have laid down for themselves is that the majority should decide what the official language should be in each canton. It is not a question of whether five or ten per cent. of the population should speak one language, and be correspondingly represented, but in every case it is decided that the official language shall be the language of the majority in the cantons. Now, in considering those cantons, we must never confound them with our Provinces, although constitutionally they possess greater rights than the Provinces themselves. In fact, they accepted the doctrine of extreme state rights as it existed before the great civil war in the United States. I have pointed to Switzerland as adopting the official language of the majority, and I should like to see the same thing carried out in our North-West Territories. Louisiana has also been brought forward. I find an Act of Congress on the 20th February, 1811, with reference to the incorporation of Louisiana, to the effect that they shall be allowed to come into the Union on condition that all its laws, all its records, and all its legislative proceedings were to be preserved in the English language. Austria-Hungary has also been referred to. In that country we have a population of 41,000,000. Of this we have 8,000,000 Germans, 6,000,000 Magyar, 7,000,000 Czechs, 3,000,000 Roumanians, 3,000,000 Poles, 3,000,000 Serbs and Croatsians, and 1,500,000 Turks, and other peoples speaking various tongues. There are 21 legislative assemblies and executive councils, and all of these transact their affairs in the distinct languages of the majority. If we look to Switzerland or to Austria-Hungary we shall find that the ruling there is the rule of the majority. Such a rule I would like to see introduced into this Dominion without any reference to religion or to the status of the language, and I am sure there would, in such a case, be very few found in this House who would contest the accuracy of such a proposition. The debate has proceeded as if the proposal were made to obliterate altogether the French language. We have been told that we shall have all to learn English; that the French language will be unknown in our country; that we shall have all our papers printed in English, and all our proceedings and private business conducted in English. I consider such argument a travesty on the question now before us. The question before us is simply and in reality the petition of the North-West Assembly. This Assembly, in the words of their petition, say:

"That whereas, by section one hundred and ten of 'The North-West Territories Act,' it is enacted that either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Legislative Assembly of the Territories and in the proceedings before the courts; and both these languages shall be used in the records and journals of the Assembly, and all ordinances made under this Act shall be printed in both these languages.

"And whereas this Assembly is of the opinion that the sentiment of the people of the North-West Territories is against the continuance of the section recited, on the grounds that the needs of the Territories do not demand the official recognition of a dual language in the North-West or the expenditure necessitated by the same.

"And whereas this Assembly is also of the opinion that sound public policy demands the discontinuance of two official languages in the North-West:

"Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray."

We have here the declaration, calmly and deliberately expressed, of those men who are entrusted with the management of the affairs of the North-West Territories, and they ask us simply to rescind the resolution or law passed by this House binding them to the use of two languages in their courts and in the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly. Why, Sir, I understand that in the whole North-West Council there is not a single member to be found who speaks the French language; and why, in the name of common sense, should we refuse to grant to these men a simple request of this kind? They are the directors and managers of those Territories; they are the men most conversant with all its wants; and they come and tell us that it is a trouble to them to be compelled to use that language, that they wish to be free from it, that it is not wanted, that it is against the sentiment of the people, and that no sound public policy demands its continuance. We have, unfortunately, in the preamble of this Bill, a totally different question raised; but I trust that the House will divest itself of the feeling that has been aroused by this preamble, and will consider solely and exclusively the request made by this board of gentlemen to this House and will grant it. We have had various countries pointed out to us, among them Schleswig-Holstein, in which the policy of Great Britain was to give to the various sections of the population the use of their languages—to the Danes, the Danish language, and to the Germans, theirs; and we were told that the Russians in 1862 were advised by England and other countries on the continent of Europe to grant to the Poles the right to speak their own language. I quite agree with these recommendations; but surely it is not contended that the Poles for whom this petition was made, consisted of only 5 or 10 per cent. of the population of Poland, or that the Danes and Germans for whom a similar request was made numbered only 10 per cent. of the total population? Why, the arguments brought forward in reference to other countries have only tended to confirm and strengthen, in my mind, the right of those people in the Legislative Assembly of the North-West to be granted what they ask. Before I take my seat, I should like to read, with reference to Switzerland, one or two paragraphs from the Federal Government of Switzerland by Mr. Moses, published last year, in which he says:

"The conglomerate character of the Swiss population, composed of representatives of the German, French and Italian peoples, has made it difficult to bring all parts to co-operate towards a common national end. The fact that these representatives of different peoples have continued in separate groups, each within its own territory, and speaking its own language, has made the growth of a national sentiment slower than it might have been had all been thrown together into a common society and compelled in the course of time to use a common language. At present German is spoken in fourteen cantons and parts of others; while Italian is confined to the canton of Ticino and a part of Graubunden. To state the relations between these groups in another way, there are 1,352 German communes, 945 French and 291 Italian. Besides these there are 118 communes in Graubunden where the Romansch language is used. Only German, French and Italian, however, are regarded as official languages, and in these three all the federal laws"—

Not the cantonal or provincial laws—

—"are published, and they may all be used in the transaction of federal business, whether in the assemblies, in the council, or in the courts; moreover, all must be represented in the Federal Council. The Romansch language, on the other hand, is not an official language, and is seldom employed in the affairs of the Federal Government. Not only as it regards their language, but in a general way, also as it regards their manners and customs, have the several cantons maintained their individuality.

"While in Switzerland the representatives of the German, French and Italian peoples have preserved their peculiar characteristics, to a certain extent, by remaining territorially separated, in the United States there has been a mingling of peoples on the same territory, and there is already manifest a tendency to mould those of English, Scotch, Irish, German and Scandinavian stock into a new national product."

Well, Sir, I entertain those views with reference to the request of the North-West Assembly; but while I recognise its wisdom, I am not blind to the objections raised in this House or to the susceptibilities of our French kindred. I am, therefore, prepared to accept the proposal which has been made with reference to finding some means of dealing with this question, after showing every desire to conciliate those susceptibilities, by leaving the whole question to be determined by the electors themselves in the North-West Territories, and I can only hope that the brief delay in its settlement will not give occasion for idle strifes. In view of the fact that we desire to give our French friends, and all the electors, an opportunity to be fully represented after the matter has been fully discussed, and in view of the fact that our friends in the North-West will have before them the debates which have taken place in this House on the question, I think the wisest policy is to accept the suggestion thrown out by the hon. gentleman, and to join all our hands together, and see if we cannot settle this difficulty, which I regret has ever arisen, but which, I hope, will soon be finally solved.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to make a few and only a few observations on this important question. I think the subject from almost every standpoint has been dealt with ably, logically, and generally reasonably; but I consider it to be the duty of every public man, in cases of national emergency, when the national life is at stake, to, as far as possible, use conciliatory language, to allay the suspicions of some, and the excitement of others, and to have regard to the feelings of those classes, those religions and those nationalities which are always in opposition to each other. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) made use of much more eloquent language in a similar line the other night, and I thought it was to be regretted that that hon. gentleman, with his great ability, had not successfully carried out the principles which he was then endeavoring to inculcate throughout his previous history. I can only say that from my first entrance into political life to the present time, I have at various times recognised that he has been one of the very important factors in creating a strong feeling in the Province of Ontario against our French fellow-subjects in the Province of Quebec. I know that it was the case in 1871 and 1872, and I thought, when the hon. gentleman was addressing us so elegantly the other night, it was a great pity he had not adopted the same moderation when speaking in our local Legislative Assembly in Toronto, and referring to the murder of "Brother Scott," and when among the English-speaking people the feeling was almost at fever height, and the excitement so great that men could scarcely restrain themselves, and there was a strong hostility engendered against our French fellow-citizens, so much so that reason did not always hold her sway, and that very often excitement of sentiment and national prejudice took the place of reason. I think that those gentleman who have dealt with this question have dealt with it very ably. They brought into service many very important lessons of history, and if we wish to learn anything with reference to national life there is no source from which we can glean greater knowledge. From history we can learn the causes of the rise, the growth, the progress and the decay of nations; from it we can learn those principles which tend to make nations great, powerful, and long-lived; and if the lessons of history teach anything, they teach us one important truth, that community of language is not essential to national unity, because some of the greatest nations have been cited in which national unity, to all intents and purposes, either for political or social life, exists without community of language, which the hon. member for North Simcoe professes to say is necessary for the well-being of a nation. If Switzerland has now endured for over seven hundred years and stands as an emblem of greatness in national life, as a federation of states based upon somewhat the same principles as our Confederation, and yet has three different languages recognised as state languages, does she not teach us the very important lesson that it is not essential to have community of language in order to have a great state? The hon. member for Bothwell laid down some very important rules to guide us in our choice among the resolutions proposed or to be proposed for the solution of this question. He said that the rule upon which the English authorities followed, in reference to what language or languages should be the official language of any new state or country when it was organised, was the rule of convenience. Well, we should apply the rule of convenience to this case, and if the hon. gentleman's logic went to prove anything, it went to prove that the solution of the present difficulty is the one proposed by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because it cannot be inconvenient to that country to have but one language, seeing that there is not one member in the North-West Council who speaks French. If the rule of convenience should be the rule to guide us, when we have the unanimous voice of the North-West Council asking that only one language be official, surely there can be no injustice in granting their petition; and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) ought to support the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) if he has the strength of his convictions. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) intimated to this House the nature of the resolution that he would have proposed had he the opportunity; but I do think that with all his great eloquence and ability, his proposition fell far short of meeting the requirements of the mass of the people. What was his proposition? It was this: We will postpone the day of settlement in that country until, if I may so term it, vested rights grow up in reference to the French language there; until the question may be much more difficult to settle than it is now. He proposes that we should shunt off the responsibility from our shoulders to-day and relegate it to the future, and in the meantime, allow to be kept up a very dangerous agitation, that may ultimately result in the destruction of the state. I do not think it was statesmanlike on the part of that hon. gentleman to make that proposition. It is much more practical to solve the difficulty by giving the power into the hands of the people themselves, and thus do no injustice to our French fellow-citizens. Moreover, the hon. gentleman and his supporters have invariably held that the duty of the Federal Parliament was, as far as possible, to give power into the hands of the people to settle these provincial or territorial questions themselves. In harmony with that theory, he has always argued, during the last ten or twelve years, in which I have had the honor of a seat in this House, that in matters affecting provincial rights, the Provinces should be left to deal with them alone. Why not put that theory into practice on this occasion? To do so would be a much better solution of the difficulty than the hon. gentleman proposes. I can see practically no difference between the motion of the hon. gentleman and that proposed by an hon. French member (Mr. Beausoleil) a few evenings before. They are both in the same direction, and are attended with the difficulty that they postpone the settlement of this vexed and difficult question to the future, and merely tide over the present. One hon. member said that the reason we ought not to touch this question at present, and allow the French language to be spoken in that country, was because the Act has been so long in existence. For thirteen years it has been on the Statute-book, and previous to that time he said the French language was also spoken there; and if for no other reason, the right of priority would compel us to decide that the French language should be the language spoken in that country. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) answered that argument ably, when he said if it was the right of priority which should determine the question, the Cree language ought to be made the official language instead of the French, because the Cree was spoken in those Territories by the aborigines long before there was any English spoken there. Another hon. gentleman said that a large number of the French who were there almost compelled us to do justice to them by retaining this clause in the Act; but in Ontario to-day we have ten times the number of French Canadians that there are in the North-West, and no one contends that in the Legislative Hall of Ontario it would be wise or needful in the interests of that Province that the two languages should be official. If the reasoning of the hon. member for Bothwell were correct, that because French Canadians were there, and the right to use the dual language was given them a few years ago, we should continue it to them now, with much greater force should the French Canadians of Ontario ask us to make the dual language official in that Province. A great many strictures have been passed upon the hon. member for North Simcoe for having brought this question before the House. Stripping the question of all its surroundings, I do not think that the motion he has proposed or the amendment to that clause of the law, is in itself very extraordinary; but, unfortunately, when we came to consider the proposition, we found that in the preamble to his Bill the hon. gentleman fell into the mistake of imitating the Bill passed by Mr. Mercier in Quebec, and mixed up in the other questions, with the one at issue, that are not relevant to it. But, if we strike out all that irrelevant matter, the preamble is not so objectionable, and I do not think we would be doing great injustice if we accepted the Bill as so amended. It is most unfortunate, that at this time, when there is a disturbing element abroad in the land, men with perhaps more enthusiasm than judgment, are creating a great deal of excitement both in Quebec and Ontario, and in the North-West Territories; and in view of this fact we should deal with this question very carefully, and extend as generously as we can all the concessions we can reasonably extend to our French compatriots. But, while doing that, we would be doing an injustice to ourselves if we were to allow any encroachments that, in our honest convictions, we believed would be contrary to the interests of the state or of our national life. I believe there is a disposition on the part of eminent men on both sides of this chamber, to, as far as possible, come together in a great emergency, and support the state rather than support their national sentiment. I think it is wise and well that they should do so, and we would fall far short of our duty if we were unable to join with them, in this important crisis of our history, in trying to stamp out anything which partook rather of sentiment than of statesmanship, of race rather than of national rights. We should stand by one another, and endeavor to reconcile those conflicting elements we so often find in this country of ours. I am far from believing that we have not a bright future before us. I do not believe that, because we may speak the French or the German or the Gaelic language, that is anything against the glorious future in store for our state; but we must endeavor to reconcile those conflicting elements and to bring together the people who are in a manner under our charge, and who are looking to us for advice in important times like this. I think we would meet the duty which devolves upon us by accepting the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because, in that way we would be doing no great injustice to anyone; we would be following the lines of provincial rights; we would be giving into the hands of the people the right of saying what they should have now and what they should have in the future. At the same time, we would do our duty to the state; we would ally for the time one of those exciting questions which are becoming more and more annoying every day, and we would be doing our duty as members of this great country, which must in time become one of the most important in the history of the world.

Mr. WRIGHT. As a member who, for twenty-five years, has represented in this House a county in the Province of Quebec, a county in which a large majority are French Canadians, and as a Quebec member, I cannot allow this debate to pass without saying a few words. Sir, I regret exceedingly that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) should have brought this matter under the notice of the House. It appears to me to be one of the most disturbing questions which could have been brought under our consideration. Providence has placed us here in this magnificent northern home land of ours, men of divers races and creeds and languages, but I think animated by a common patriotic purpose, to develop our resources to the utmost, to live in peace and harmony together in the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges. I think, take it for all in all, we have the best and freest country that ever the sun shone on.

I think we have every material element of wealth within our midst, that we have a hardy, a bold, an energetic and a kindly population, and that we have the best country that can be found in the world. We have a form of government which is free to the fullest extent, and every man has the absolute right of freedom of conscience and worship. All that is wanted to build up this national edifice is a little common sense—a little sense of justice, a little of that spirit of compromise, which is of the very essence of the British system, and then the work may be said to be accomplished. I must confess that I have been very much astonished at the course which has been taken by the hon. member who introduced this Bill, and his friends who advocate Imperial Federation. They profess to endeavor to bring about the union of the British Empire; they profess to unite instead of dividing us, but what does this course of action mean? Instead of peace and harmony, they bring us the faggot and the sword; instead of that spirit of compromise, which, as I said, is of the essence of the British system, and gives it its magnificent power throughout the world, they bring us dissension and disorder. To my mind, their course—I regret to say it, for personally I have the greatest respect for those hon. gentlemen—leads me, though I cannot believe that they are animated by treasonable purposes, to think that they are not animated by patriotic purposes, and I regret exceedingly that they have chosen to adopt this course, which cannot but be disastrous to the interests of our common country. But I believe in the common sense of the great body of the people, and while, if certain fanatics in the Province of Quebec, and certain fanatics in the Province of Ontario had their way, the result would be most disastrous, still I have faith in the patriotism of the great body of that people, and I believe that when this storm has swept over us, the result will be beneficial and not disastrous. To my mind, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has received at the hands of the three gentlemen who attacked his position with such singular force and power a summary and condign punishment. It appeared to me that his punishment was almost too great for him to bear. He bore it, however, with a bravery and a stoicism which was worthy of every admiration. Not the Jesuit Brébeuf at the stake, tortured to death by savages, not Rowland Taylor in the fires of Smithfield, passed the ordeal more gallantly than did the hon. gentleman. Sir, in a great story told by a great master of French literature, he gives us a description of the torture. In the "Notre Dame" of Victor Hugo, he gives us a graphic account of the death of the Gitana Esmeralda who was executed by the cruel code of a barbarous age. He tells us how her limbs were dislocated, her arms and legs were broken, and how then she was pressed to death dying with the name of her lover and her Saviour on her lips. When the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who was the first executioner, proceeded to perform this dreadful task, when he proceeded to inflict that punishment, the result could not be doubtful. When Eos or the Dawn comes in contact with Chaos or the Dark, no one can doubt what the result will be. In the great book of Sir Walter Scott, when Wilfrid of Ivanhoe charges down upon the Templar, who can doubt the result? And so, when the eagle from the west swooped from his eyrie upon the serpent of Simcoe—I use the term only in a parliamentary sense—who could doubt what the result must be? Sir, he destroyed him with dithyrambics. His punishment was something almost too dreadful for him to bear. Mr. Davin poured out upon him all the vials of wrath of the English language. He pointed out the extraordinary temerity of a lawyer, and a nisi prius lawyer at that, engaging in this attempt. Why, it was the very apotheosis of six-and-eight-pence. In the older civilisation, if the firm of Quirk, Gammon & Snap had attempted to work a revolution, they would have been driven out of every European country. This is the man who is attempting to destroy a magnificent language and literature and to divert the course of an empire. Sir, he pointed out too, indirectly, that all the great traitors were not lawyers. He detested every deserter from his party. Someone had said that a gentleman never changed either his religion or his politics. He could not go so far, but he could not forget that, at the famous “Siege of Corinth,” the “First to fire the shot and wield the blade, was Alp the Adrian renegade.” He was in religion a Low Church radical; but in almost all other matters he was inclined to be High. Some concessions must be made to the sentiments of a democratic country like this. A sot must be occasionally thrown to the Cerberus. It was difficult to maintain the distinctions of caste. In “Guy Livingston,” the old Irish Colonel was unwilling even to die with an attorney; in this country it is still more difficult to live with them. They had an unpleasant fashion of interfering with the private affairs of a gentleman—which, to say the least, was inconvenient. Lucifer, Catiline, Iscariot, the Constable of Bourbon, Benedict Arnold and their congeners might have been indiscreet; but, however, they had never been indentured. In the older civilisations, in order to float a company, you must have the name of a lord in the prospectus. It was one of the prerogatives of those who charged with the conqueror at Senlac. There was a great English statesman, who in his career had not been cut short, by circumstances over which he had no control, would have solved this difficult problem. He understood the peculiar genius of the Anglo-Saxon race; he combined the practical with the poetical; the sensualistic with the idealistic philosophy. When John Locke will have been forgotten, when “Paradise Lost” will have paled before the lustre of Eos, or the Dawn, when Shakespeare will have been relegated to obscurity then the name of the lamented John Cade will be held in veneration and honor, as one who loved his fellowmen and understood the genius of his people; the object of his life was to increase the pleasures of his people, by adding to the size of the drinking pots, by increasing their number of hoops thereon, and to complete their happiness by hanging all the lawyers. If that system had been carried out, if that project had been realised, what a start would have been made in the direction of the millennial period! Then, Sir, the Vice-Chancellor took up the parable. It was said of Lord Bacon that he wrote of exhaustive science, like a Lord Chancellor; it may be said of the Vice-Chancellor that he attacked the hon. member for Simcoe, with singular force and power. He went back to past ages; he made an exhaustive review of the Egyptian, Assyrian and ancient civilisations. Then the hon. member for Bothwell deluged him with authorities, the result was the complete discomfiture of the unhappy gentleman. The hon. member for West Assiniboia destroyed him as the Parthian horse destroyed the legions of Crassus. The member for York charged him as the Greek phalanx did the Persians at Arbela. While, like the Roman legion, the hon. member for Bothwell, destroyed his opponent. And so the doom was accomplished and peni forte et dure was inflicted upon the unhappy member for Simcoe. I regret, for one, and I am sure this House will regret, that such a course has been taken by an hon. gentleman for whom we all have so high an esteem. For my part I have been twenty-five years in this House, and, in my capacity as a soldier in the ranks, have done my best to build up this nation, and to keep together the various elements of our system of Confederation. Our difficulties have been very great, but now, after the edifice has been completed, after this splendid structure has been erected, I, for one, do not wish to live to see it destroyed, and if this motion of the hon. gentleman had carried, I state my honest conviction to this House when I say that I believe it would be followed by disastrous results. If we were, by this insidious attempt, to succeed in destroying the French language in the North-West, and then carry the policy still farther, as is the evident intention, to the Province of which I have the honor to be an inhabitant, I believe that the system of Confederation would be destroyed. Sir, contact has brought us into sympathy. We have constructed a magnificent system of railways, we have become acquainted with the Maritime Provinces and the North-West, and we have spanned this land from ocean to ocean, and from sea to sea. The people of this Dominion like each other. For my part, I have always had a profound and supreme admiration for the toilers of the sea in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I have always liked the people of British Columbia. I have even admired the splendid people of Ontario. We have always held them in our heart of hearts. And so with the men that come from that grand prairie Province, the wheat-field of the world, we hold them in special regard on account of their ability, their energy, their enterprise, and I do not wish to see the separation of those Provinces which send us such men. But, Sir, with all that, there is one place which I hold still dearer, it is my native Province, the Province of Quebec. Sir, that Province contains divers races. We have there the Englishman, the Irishman, the Scotchman, coming from bold and hardy races, who are able to hold their own against all comers. We have also the French Canadian people, and I who know them well, who was born in their midst, who have lived among them have learned to respect their zeal for their ancient faith, their kindly courtesy, and the chivalrous gallantry which they inherit from their Norman and Breton ancestors. I, for one, would be the first to protest against any interference with, or any outrage upon, the rights and privileges of my native Province. Sir, I do not believe that this House or this country would tolerate any such a thing. If we could eliminate the French language, would we do so? I ask every member of this House to answer this question honestly in his own mind. If we could eliminate the French Canadians, whom we know so well for their kindly courtesy, for their generous hearts, for their marked ability, as we have seen those qualities exemplified in this House, would we do so? Would we strike out such an element as this from our population? I do not believe that there is a man throughout the Dominion who would say so. Sir, there can be no doubt that the hon. member for Simcoe has, with strange power, aroused a singular fanaticism in this land. Last summer I visited one of the greatest counties in the Province of Ontario, one of the greatest in the Dominion, a county of which any Province might well be proud. Sir, it was a land of which it might almost be said that it was literally flowing with milk and honey, with creameries and with cheese factories. It was a land of extraordinary fertility, a land of which any man might well boast. The pastures were covered with herds of the choicest cattle; forests alternated with cultivated fields; the sluggish rivers flowed with smooth serenity through rich meadows and fields of waving corn. Its people were bold and brave and manly, whose ancestors had held their country against the invaders; and the sons looked as though they would hold that land as bravely as their fathers had won it. A little graveyard was pointed out to me where the victors and vanquished slept quietly together awaiting the judgment day:

"These in the robings of glory;
Those in the gloom of defeat,
Both with the battle blood gory,
In the dusk of eternity meet;
Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day,
Under the laurel—the blue,
Under the willow—the grey."

It was literally an agricultural paradise, but the trail of the hon. member for Simcoe was over it all. A great anti-Jesuit meeting had been held. There the 188 were denounced in the fiercest terms. I remember reading in the local newspapers that one reverend gentleman had called us, I think, a "complicated comminuted community of cowardly cannibals." That was the term applied to the 188. On the other hand, the noble 13, gentlemen of whom we have always been very proud, were held up in the highest honor and esteem. When I went there the storm had passed over, and I only remained to receive its ground swell. As I have said, the county was a most magnificent one, and the people were a generous and brave people. But there was a gloom upon their countenances which struck me with surprise, considering that they had such a beautiful country, that their crops were splendid, that they had every element of material prosperity. They said to me: "What do you think of these Jesuits who have taken possession of the land? You come from the land of Loyola, you come from the land of these Jesuits, you come from this priest-ridden Province of Quebec." I said: "Yes; but it does appear to me that there are other Provinces which are priest-ridden as well as Quebec." "Well," they said, "what is going to become of those poor, miserable, oppressed Protestants of that Province?" I said: "Yes; we may be oppressed, but as you can see, they do not starve me, at any rate." "With regard to the English inhabitants of that Province, those poor slaves who are hunted by Mercier and his congeners, what about them?" I said: "I think they bear their punishment very patiently, at any rate they get on very well with all their neighbors." Then they said: "What of the priesthood?" I said: "So far as the priests of the Province of Quebec are concerned, not alone the Catholic priests, but the Presbyterian clergy, the Methodist clergy, and the clergymen of all the denominations, they live in peace and harmony together, they like each other." I said: Father Brown of Chelsea told me the men who first came to assist him when his church was burning were the Orangemen of the district. I saw myself at the funeral of an excellent lady, the wife of the Presbyterian clergyman, the Catholic priest among the friends in the sad procession. Everywhere the same kindly feeling prevailed, and I said that among the priests of my district, some six or seven, there are not finer gentlemen, not better servants of Christ, or better servants of the Man who in the olden times gave us His laws under the palm trees of Judea, than the very Catholic priests of whom I have spoken. I said that if some of these men were animated by the feelings which appeared to animate a few of the clergymen of Ontario, we would have had a very sad time indeed; but they preached the gospel of peace, love, law and order. Under these circumstances, I said, we got on exceedingly well. But, they said: You have a lot of nuns. Yes, I said, we have, and most excellent and worthy ladies they are, ladies who by their truly Christian charity are calculated to convince one of the reality of the Christian religion. The Rev. Mr. Carson said that when some of his family were dying from diphtheria, that those who first came to his assistance were Catholic nuns, and I said in my own region they attend Protestant and Catholic alike. I said I felt it to be my duty to state this to you, because great misapprehension has arisen with respect to the feelings which prevail among those who reside in the Province of Quebec. When I was seated by the bedside of the dying Father Delliages, he said to me: Every night my dreams carry me back to dear old France, but my heart is with the people of the Gatineau region. So it is with most of the clergy in our midst. They get on admirably with the Protestant clergy there. The Methodist goes about most energetically to promote the interests of the Master; so does the Presbyterian clergyman; and so does the English clergyman, unless, unhappily, he is too poor to have a horse, and he then walks as did the Apostles of old. Then they proceeded to put me through a course of cross-questioning. They said: Tell us of the night; tell us of the future; what party will it be which will sweep away those rotten old parties, as the leaves are swept away by the autumn blast? I ventured to say a word on behalf of my friend of the Left Centre. I said: Here was an opportunity for the Left Centre, who is a chief of singular energy and intelligence, but without a party; and here is a splendid party, but without a head: still should the two join together, great results may be anticipated. I told them of his heroic struggles in favor of the Widow Murphy and her cow. I told them that in Sir Peter they had one who was always foremost in works of goodwill; I told them of his marvellous energy, ability and perseverance; I told them of his heroic struggles in favor of the helpless and the poor; I told them that when the widow's wail and the cry of orphan children came from the woods of New Brunswick, that he performed one of the most generous and gallant acts on record; I told them that he was always foremost in works of good-will; I told them that to be poor and helpless and miserable was to commend them to his generous nature, and that if he were not ennobled by Downing Street, he was ennobled by right of an earlier creation and the imposition of a mightier Hand. What then they said of the superb old sorcerer who sits securely throned on a thousand wiles in his city of Ottawa? I told them that the "old sorcerer," as they called him, had apparently taken a new lease of life. He was sorcerer, magician and necromancer all in one—like Aaron's rod, his wand had swallowed up those of all the other magicians;—like Prospero, he had waved his wand, and a nation had sprung into existence;—by his magic power he had bound our Dominion together with a network of iron, and strewed it with cities, "like shells along the seashore";—he had clothed the dry bones with flesh, and breathed life into the northern part of this continent. Will the magician's wand be broken, his spells reversed, and this gorgeous edifice of Confederation disappear? Will the sorcerer say:

"Our revels now are ended. These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air;
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit shall dissolve,
And like this unsubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a wreck behind?"

But that magician has laid the stones faithfully and well, and the edifice will not fade away. But they said, he was gone over to the scarlet woman who sits on the seven hills. I ventured to say that I was not aware of the state of the hon. gentleman's spiritual harem at the present time,

"Not age could change, nor custom stale,
His infinite variety."

I thought I knew that at an early period he was captured by Madame Calvin; then that he had certain coqueries with Madame Wesley; then he had a liaison with a certain beautiful Baptist lady; but I said, perhaps, inasmuch as he had an infinite versatility, the Italian beauty, the scarlet lady, had at last won his heart. But, I said, it is well known that he has had the best of everything in this world, and, if I am not mistaken, he will get the best in the next. They said, what about the members of the Cabinet? I said they were most admirable gentlemen, who were selected, as I have often said, not only on account of their singular ability and merits, but also because they represented certain historical events. I ventured to say that the Minister of Customs represents, or did represent, the battle of the Boyne; the Minister of Inland Revenue was supposed to represent the broken treaty of Limerick; the Minister of Finance represented the crystal globules of cold water; while the Minister of Agriculture represented that amber beverage which was dear to our Scandinavian forefathers. And, as regards the old Chieftain himself, we who deal so much in futures, who hold him in our heart of hearts, do not take for him the opprobrious term conferred by the savages, of "Old To-morrow," but, looking to the future, we call him the "Sweet By-and-Bye." Those people were very much agitated by the course adopted by my hon. friend for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. WRIGHT.

Then they said: "Is there any chance of the Left Centre joining the present administration?" I replied: "I notice certain little passage of sweetness and light confitures and compliments, and one can never tell what the result might be. We, who are lookers-on in Venice, sometimes thought that it was quite possible that the Third Party might take his place in the ranks of the present government, and we remember that passage in "Marmion":

"Let the wild falcon take her fling, She'll stoop when she has tired her wing,"

And, perhaps, when the hour comes, when the cry goes forth, "the Philistines are upon thee Samson," when the morning breaks, he will be found fighting in the ranks of the Chieftain, as of yore. At all events, I know that so far as the leader of the Government is concerned his feeling is always in favor of one who is given to a little judicious bolting. My hon. friend to my left will bear testimony to that, and the horse which bolts, as the House will recollect, is always treated with a little more attention than the steady old hack that never kicks over the traces; and I am aware of the kindly feelings which always animate the right hon. Premier towards the leader of the Left Centre. Not to parody, but to speak with certain reverence I may, refer to a hymn which appears to be singularly appropriate, and which always impresses me with its strange power and pathos:

"There were ninety and nine that safely lay, in the shelter of the fold,
But one was out on the hills away, far off from the gates of gold.
Away on the mountain bleak and bare,
Away from the tender chieftain's care."

I left that pleasant country with a feeling that, take it for all in all, the difficulty was not insurmountable. They said to me: If the old parties are swept away, what of the new party which will be formed? I replied: I do not see what they can do unless the anti-Jesuits muster their battalions and move down on Quebec. Before they had reached Montreal they would be met by you, Mr. Speaker, and the gallant 65th. I can fancy what the feelings of the old guard would be when they met on the plains before the great commercial city of the Dominion. I can fancy the scene which was enacted on the plain. Colonel O'Brien—I beg pardon for using his name—would bow pleasantly to Mr. Speaker, and would say: "Gentlemen of the French guard, fire first," and the Speaker would say: "Gentlemen of the English guard, you fire first;" and then the soldiers would look upon each other, and realising they were brothers, march together to the city of Montreal, universally rejoicing and feeling they might have other enemies at some future time to fight against rather than amongst themselves. I beg pardon of the House, Sir, for treating a serious subject with such apparent irreverence. I sit opposite my hon. friend from Simcoe and I notice the equanimity with which he bears his punishment, and I have no doubt that when the time comes he will hit back with all that strength and power of which we all know he is capable. I would, however, ask that hon. gentleman and those who are with him on this question—some of whom I have ranked as my dearest friends in this House and in the country—to consider their course. We cannot afford to have our Confederation destroyed, and the people of Canada will not permit a few fanatical men in Quebec or Ontario to bring about so undesirable a result. Somebody has stated that the French and the English dislike each other. I deny it. The two races on the contrary like each other, and I know that in my part of the country, we would not part with our French compatriots, even if we could. We all recollect what happened a few years ago, when a great rebellion took place in the North-West. We remember when feeling ran high throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. Was there any division between the French, English and Irish then? No; not one soldier faltered. Every Canadian, whether English, Irish or French, was ready to go forward to put down the rebellion and to protect the laws. Some histories tell us that at the battle of Marathon a light ran along the Grecian spears when the Greeks saw the enemy, and that at the battle of Salamis a light shone on the masts of the Grecian ships. So it was with the patriotic sentiments which animated our people then. A friend of mine, Major Joshua Wright, who travelled with the 65th Battalion, told me that braver soldiers and more patriotic men could not be found in the world. They vindicated the honor and glory of their country, and so it was with the people of every race throughout that awful time. And is there no word to be said for these few unhappy men, these hunters of the plains, who animated by their native gallantry and believing they were injured, deceived as they were by an ignorant man who preyed upon their feelings, went down into these rifle pits and faced death as calmly and as bravely as ever men did? Is there not one word for these hunters who were swept away by the bullet and the resistless charge of the Canadian volunteers? Sir, we have the elements of a great country. We have noble, generous and patriotic feelings animating the great body of our people, and there is no need for discontent. At any rate one can see by the votes which have been given in this House what the consensus of opinion of the great majority of the people of Canada is. They are determined that our Confederation shall be built up and shall not be destroyed. Sir, we have one thing on which we must rely. We must hold our faith towards each other. For one, I cannot consent, under any circumstances, to any step towards the destruction of that magnificent French language and literature. I believe that with me the great body of the people of Canada share that sentiment. We have one way of building up that country and one only way; it is the grand old English system of justice, fair play and equal rights; and, Sir, the angels of light which will build up our country and make us a great nation will be "justice, fair play, love, truth and faith in each other."

Mr. LANDRY. I join with a great deal of pleasure in the general expression which has been given this evening to the sentiment that there is great satisfaction in finding that the leaders on both sides of the House believe they can arrive at a settlement of this vexed and difficult question. In the meantime I desire the indulgence of the House for a short time to express what I, as an humble member of this House, believe to be the true position on this question. Before proceeding to do so I will call the attention of hon. members of this House to an assertion made the other afternoon by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he was urging to this House how well it would be for this Dominion to follow the example of the United States and their mode of dealing with the languages of the people in the different territories they acquire. He told us that in the colonisation of Louisiana the United States of America had simply held out to that country to come with them and partake of the institutions of the United States as they existed, and that they would make no concessions to them as to their language. He told us the same applied to Florida, Texas, and I believe Mexico. I have looked at the constitution of Louisiana and what do I find? If the hon. gentleman is as incorrect in all his other assertions as he is in reference to Louisiana then I say that no credence can be attached to his statements, for I think that he did not take the trouble of looking up the facts before he made the statement to this House. I find that in the Revised Statutes of Louisiana down to 1856 a constitutional provision of the General Assembly, section 101, says:

"The Secretary of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be conversant with the French and English tongues, and members may address either House in the French or English language."

Now, if I read aright the constitution of our Dominion, they went farther in Louisiana, in relation to the French language, than we do in the Dominion; for not only do they give the privilege of using the two languages in Parliament, but they require that the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives should be conversant with both languages. Article 129 of the same constitution says:

"The constitution and the laws of the State shall be promulgated in the English and French languages."

And that continues down to 1856. I repeat that if the hon. gentleman is as incorrect in the other statements he made as he is with reference to Louisiana, he did not take the trouble to inform himself. We were told to-day, Sir, by some gentleman who addressed this House, that the true principle is to leave this question to the North-West Territories or to the Council. As an humble member of this House I am willing to make some sacrifice of my opinion in order to join the majority of this House for the purpose of securing peace and prosperity and establishing our unity on a solid basis, but I cannot conceal the fact that my opinion is in an entirely different direction from theirs. I believe we ought, in this Parliament, to retain the power invested in us and deal with this difficult question of education and languages. We have done so in regard to the other Provinces, and why should we not do so in the North-West Territories? The principles laid down by the constitution and laws of this Dominion since 1867 all point in the direction in which I speak, namely, that these difficult, delicate, disquieting questions the Parliament of Canada has retained the power to deal with. I do not believe it would be right to leave the Council of the North-West Territories a question so difficult of solution. If a majority of this Parliament believe that it is not in the interests of the North-West Territories to have the use of both languages, then I say that this Parliament ought to take the responsibility of saying so, and giving those Territories such laws as they think are favorable to the development and welfare of that country. The legislation of this Parliament has not left that question to be dealt with by the other Provinces when there has been any legislation on it at all. We find that section 133 of the British North America Act of 1867 reads thus :

“ Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec, and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.”

Now, Sir, if it was important to establish by this Act that the two languages should be used in the Province of Quebec, as well as in the courts of Canada, in the interest of the people of those Provinces, it is just as important that the Parliament of Canada to-day should decide the question for the North-West Territories. If it were left to the people of the North-West Territories to decide whether it would be in their interest or not to use both languages, what would be the result? The result would be that all the excitement consequent on the decision of a question of this kind would be transferred to the people of those Territories.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDRY. And a gentlemen with the ability of my hon. friend might go into the country there and make the speeches he is capable of making on one side, and a gentleman with the ability perhaps of the leader of the Government of the Province of Quebec might go and make speeches on the other side, and we should have in all probability a war of races among the people themselves in their attempts to settle this very disquieting question. The spirit of our laws has not been to leave such question to the settlement of the people either in the Province of Ontario or in the Province of Quebec. It has been to settle them in this Parliament. Then, why leave this question to the people of the North-West Territories? Let us suppose that their decision would be that they do not want the dual languages; then we should be bound to enact laws here in pursuance of that decision, and to carry out the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls, and if the time came, as it must come, when the North-West Territories will be divided into Provinces, should we not be bound by that decision, in framing the constitution of those Provinces, whether there were three or four or ten—because the territory is very large—to give to each one of those Provinces a constitution such as decided upon by the present population of the North-West? My impression is that we should be bound to act by the decision the people of the North-West should give on this question to-day, in framing the constitutions of all those future Provinces. If it were then thought in the interest of one Province that it should have the use of the dual languages, and in the interest of another Province that it should not, depending entirely on the number of French people who might be there, I do not think that is the proper course to follow now to leave that decision to the people of the North-West Territories. I say that the right policy is to retain in the hands of this Parliament the power of dealing with this question. When the Provinces come to be formed, we should look to the conditions then existing, to the number of people there, and give them a constitution in accordance with those conditions and the desire and best interests of the people. The British North America Act not only takes the subject of legislation with regard to languages out of the hands of this Parliament, but also a subject which is of perhaps as much, if not greater importance, namely, the subject of education. We find that section 93 provides :

“ In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :—

“ Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the Province at the Union :

“ All the powers, privileges and duties at the Union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the Separate Schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be and the same are hereby extended to the Dissident Schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.”

Now, Sir, there was another question considered by the Fathers of Confederation as one of great difficulty, on which the people might divide with a great deal of animosity and feeling, and they took it entirely out of the power of the Provinces and placed it, not even in the hands of this Parliament—because this Act cannot be disturbed by a vote of this House. If it was considered so important with regard to these Provinces, why is it not of equal importance with regard to the North-West Territories? So jealous were the Fathers of Confederation of the rights of the minorities in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec that they went even a great deal further than I have yet pointed out. We find in section 80 of the same Act, this provision :

“ The Legislative Assembly of Quebec shall be composed of 65 members, to be elected to represent the 65 electoral divisions or districts of Lower Canada in this Act referred to, subject to alteration thereof by the Legislature of Quebec: Provided, that it shall not be lawful to present to the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, for assent any Bill for altering the limits of any of the electoral divisions or districts mentioned in the second schedule to this Act, unless the second and third readings of such Bill have been passed in the Legislative Assembly with the concurrence of the majority of the members representing all those electoral divisions or districts, and the assent shall not be given to such Bill, unless an address has been presented by the Legislative Assembly to the Lieutenant Governor stating that it has been so passed.”

So jealous were the framers of this Act of the rights of the minority, that in the case of some twelve counties in the Province of Quebec which were considered Protestant counties, it was not left even in the hands of the Legislature of that Province to alter the limits of these counties at any time thereafter. And yet to-day it is said that we must relegate to the people of the North-West Territories the authority to legislate upon this question which is similar in fact to the question dealt with so judiciously in the British North America Act. At that time and previous to Confederation there were in what were then called Upper and Lower Canada questions similar to the one now being discussed, and these questions were debated with, perhaps, even greater animosity than is the present one, and the differences of opinion they excited had a great deal to do with bringing about Confederation; and I will take this opportunity of referring to the questions then at issue, not so much for the purpose of recalling the discussions thereon, as for the purpose of illustrating the position I take, that the questions which are raised to-day are similar to those which created excitement then, and should be dealt with in the same manner. In 1851, and while the two Canadas were united, I find in the Toronto Globe of the 17th July of that year, the following language:—

“The Reform party are in power now—they have been so for four years. * * * These four years have been palmy days of priestcraft.”

The sectarian grants which should have been swept away, have been increased. * * * When the present party came into power, the common school system was free from sectarian elements—but they introduced the wedge which threatens to destroy the whole fabric.”

In 1853, two years afterwards, the same agitation was going on, and we find this language used in that same newspapers which was then one of the most, if not the most, influential newspaper then published in Ontario. The article is dated 6th September, 1853, and contains the following language:—

“When we have freed our schools from Popish control, when Protestants are eligible to office, and when the people are no longer taxed for the support of the Roman Catholic Church * * * it will then be time to cry out, should we go further and touch upon the just rights of Romanists, but not till then.”

In the same year we find in the Globe, the following remarks:—

“The Quebec Journal says ‘that Mr. Brown gave notice on the last day of the session, that he would on the first day of the next session introduce a Bill to abolish tithes and compulsory taxes for ecclesiastical purposes in this Province. It is a bold step, but it is made necessary by the circumstances of the time. It is desirable that as soon as possible, an issue may be raised upon which to try the great question of Catholic and Protestant, and we could not have a better test than this of Lower Canadian tithes.’”

I call attention to this state of things to show that the arguments then used were on a par and almost the same as those now used by the promoter of this Bill and by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). One could almost imagine, in listening to the speeches of these hon. gentlemen, that time had retraced its course, and we were back again in the old days when the Hon. George Brown led the Liberal party and the Toronto Globe trotted out the Protestant horse. To remedy the state of affairs which then existed and the intensity of which is shown by the Globe, Confederation was brought about, and these vexed questions were settled by the British North America Act, in the way I have pointed out. As I again repeat it, it was necessary then to put those vexed questions out of the arena of both local and Dominion politics, and it was considered that by the British North America Act they were laid at rest forever. To-day, however, a revival of the same discussions will bring about the same results that were brought about then. I would ask who received credit at the hands of the people of this country? Was it those who were engaged in the discussion of this question on the lines laid down by the Toronto Globe, or those who resisted the prejudices that were sought to be excited by the party whose views that organ represented? Those who received credit at the hands of the people were not those who raised the issues such as are being raised to-day by the hon. member for North Simcoe and the hon. member for North Norfolk, but they were those who resisted the prejudices and the appeals to passion which were then being exploited. Among those who were thus rewarded was the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. We find him in those times of great disquiet and most violent and bitter discussions always resisting the party of prejudice; we find him, from 1851 down to Confederation, in the councils of his country, a member of the executive council when not a leader of his Government. We have found since Confederation down to the present time that he has been at the head of affairs for seventeen or eighteen years out of the twenty-three which have elapsed since then. This shows that the sound common sense of the people gave credit to him and the others who resisted these appeals to public passion and these appeals of the majority to crush the minority—appeals made on grounds similar to those taken to-day by the promoter of this Bill; and I venture to predict that, perhaps not for six months or a year—because these strong and loud appeals which are being made by gentlemen of the ability of those who are promoting the measure, to the prejudices of the people, must run a certain course—but I say in the long run those who will resist that wave of fanaticism and the appeals made to prejudice, are the ones who will represent the great body of the electorate just as those who resisted similar appeals in the past have represented them from 1851 down to the present time. I was sorry to hear the leader of the Opposition, in the beginning of his beautiful address this afternoon, try to make political capital out of this question, but history shows that the party who resisted these prejudices in the past and the party which resists them now is after all the Conservative party. To-day, however, different from the past, we must give credit to some members of the Liberal party who have joined with us in opposing this fanatical crusade; but the fact remains unchanged, that, in the past, it was the Conservatives who resisted these influences to a much larger extent than did the Liberal party. From Confederation down to the present, there has been relative peace in this country. And why? Because these disquieting questions were set at rest by the British North America Act, but unfortunately they were not settled, in so far as the North-West Territories are concerned, and, therefore, it is that they are being brought to the front again, and the attack is made on the only vulnerable and assailable part which is left. But I will call the attention of the House to this fact, that the British North America Act of 1871 provides that while we are at liberty to make laws and constitution for the North-West Territories, yet when once those laws are made by this Parliament, those laws have the same force as the British North America Act itself. I will read the section. Section 6 of the British North America Act, chapter 28, reads as follows:—

“Except as provided by the third section of this Act, it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last mentioned Act of the said Parliament in so far as it relates to the Province of Manitoba, or of any other Act hereafter establishing new Provinces in the said Dominion, subject always to the right of the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provision of any law respecting the qualification of electors and members of the Legislative Assembly and to make laws respecting elections in the said Province.”

This is the point I wish to make—that this Parliament has the power to make laws and a constitution for the North-West Territories and to divide the North-West Territories into Provinces. Down to this time it has not been thought advisable to divide the North-West Territories into Provinces, perhaps because the population has not been sufficiently numerous, but the time will come, and it may not be far distant, when this Parliament will be called upon to exercise that power. This Parliament can wait, and it will be time enough, when it is asked to make a constitution and laws for the different Provinces which may be established there, to consider the circumstances of the Territories and the Provinces to be established, and to see then whether it is advisable that the two languages should be preserved, or to provide that only one language shall be used. At present, I ask what great harm is the dual language doing to the North-West Territories? Let all hon. gentlemen who have taken the other side of this question or have listened to the speeches of the promoter of the Bill, and the other hon. gentlemen made both in and outside of this House, let all those who may have felt excited because it was held out to them that a great wrong and injustice was being done to their fellow countrymen in this matter, consider this question. The other day my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said he was willing to go a long distance to meet the views of his French fellow-citizens, but he was not willing to sacrifice his own flesh and blood. What sacrifice of his own flesh and blood is he asked to make? I ask this House and the people of this country, who have studied this question and who may be somewhat excited in regard to it, what sacrifice of the hon. gentleman's flesh and blood is made by leaving the constitution of the North-West Territories such as it is, until this Parliament is called upon to divide those Territories into Provinces and make a constitution for each Province? It simply leaves them in those Territories the liberty, if they desire, to use the two languages. They are not forced to use the French language. The English speaking people there are not obliged by law to learn that language, or to use it in the Legislature or to study it. They may use the English language if they will. There is no compulsion. Then, what great harm is it to them? And, further, they are not even called upon to pay for the translation of the public documents into the French language. Then, where are they injured, where are their rights and privileges interfered with, because the law says that those who desire to do so may use the French language in the North-West Council, or that their public records shall be printed in both languages? Does that do any harm to them, or take away from them any right? If this matter is looked at calmly and in a proper spirit, it will be seen that this provision does no harm to anyone, takes away no privilege, imposes no hardship, and does not make the English speaking population do what they do not wish to do. If it should have the effect of diffusing more knowledge amongst some part of the population of the North-West Territories, would it not be of some benefit to them to have these documents printed in the French language. I repeat—and this is a point which I strongly feel—that this time is inopportune; that this discussion should not have been raised either in the country or in the House on the question, because the time has not arrived when Parliament is called upon to frame a constitution for the North-West Territories or for any Provinces which may be created there. If the leaders on both sides were to come together and adopt some common basis of amendment or motion which, although, perhaps, it might not be in entire accord with my views, would restore peace and accord in the Dominion, I do not say that I would not vote for such an amendment, even at the sacrifice of my views, but at present my views are that we should not interfere at all in the matter, and that we should not do so until the time is opportune, and we are called upon to legislate for those Provinces. For a few moments, I desire to reply to some of the assumptions which are to be deduced from the speeches of the hon. gentlemen from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). These hon. gentlemen are kind enough to say that they entertain no hatred to the French people of this Dominion, they are kind enough to say that they have even a great liking for the French people of this Dominion, they are kind enough to say that they wish them no harm; but I ask any unprejudiced man who has followed the speeches which have been made in this House, or who has read the speeches which have been made on the public hustings in the Province of Ontario, and one in the North-West, if he can arrive at any other conclusion than that these hon. gentlemen declare that at present the French people of this Dominion are not desirable subjects in this country? It may be said that is a strained conclusion on my part. I do not think it is. If it is necessary, in their opinion, to have the French population—I will not say annihilated—but gradually made other than they are to-day, that must be their opinion. If they are desirable subjects, why should they not be left as they are, and why should any attempt be made either by legislation or by speeches to change them from what they are? They are blamed by these hon. gentlemen because they cannot be delighted by the same literature which delights these hon. gentlemen, because they are not delighted by the same pages of history which delighted these hon. gentlemen, because they are not moved by the same noble aspirations which move these hon. gentlemen in their actions. No other deduction can be drawn from that than the deduction which I have stated. If you take the facts as they exist, what do you find? We, the French people of this Dominion, are accused by these hon. gentlemen—not by the majority of the English speaking people, but I believe by a small minority, as I am sure it would be found if it were tested, but by a sufficiently large number to create disquietude and some amount of excitement—of combining together as a nationality or people in order to obtain that which we have no right to obtain. That has been advanced upon the public hustings, and, in effect, on the floor of this House. The records show an entirely different state of things. These hon. gentlemen have not brought forward any proof in this House or in the country to justify that statement. I would ask on what particular question, since 1867, have the French people united on a matter of this kind? They have not united in any vote in this House or in any election in this Dominion. Look at the last general elections for the Dominion. There are some 45,000 French people in Nova Scotia, and there is not one representative of that nationality from that Province in this House. Is that any evidence of their uniting in order to get influence and power to use it to the detriment of the English speaking people of this country? In Prince Edward Island, the population is not so large as in Nova Scotia. I think the population is about 109,000 or 110,000, and there are about 10,000 or 11,000 French there. It is true that they send a worthy representative of that nationality here, but have you found him advocating anything but what he believed to be in the true interests of the people of this Dominion any more than you have found his English speaking colleagues? In New Brunswick, there are 56,000 French people, but, where they could send three representatives of that nationality to represent three counties there, what do you find? Your humble servant is the only representative of the French race from the Province of New Brunswick. Does that show that the promoter of the Bill (Mr. McCarthy) and his friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) were right in trying to impress upon the people of Ontario that the object of the French people of this Dominion is to dominate and to combine together in order to get a dominant influence and use it to the detriment of English speaking people and to their own advantage? I say, when you look at the three Maritime Provinces in the elections I have mentioned, we do not see any such desire to form a combination; they have not acted in the spirit which is attributed to them. Then let us go a little further and look at the Province of Quebec in the last election, and what do we see? The facts show us that, instead of combining, the people divided. In that large Province, so exclusively French, if I may say so—although there are a large number of English speaking people—if the French Canadians had been actuated by the motives attributed to them by the hon. gentlemen, we would not have seen the result which actually took place. If my memory serves me well, I think that 26 French speaking members were returned from that Province to support the Opposition in this House, and 25 were returned to support the Government. Does that look as if there was no division among the French people? Does that look as if there was unanimity of feeling of a hostile character against the English people? Does that look as if they were isolating themselves from the rest of the community, and working in harmony for the purpose of obtaining things prejudicial to the English people and advantageous to themselves? The facts do not show that they were actuated by any such spirit; on the contrary, they were divided nearly half and half between the two great parties of this Dominion, and, Sir, have you observed in their votes in this House that feeling which is spoken of? I say you cannot point to a single vote upon the records of this House since 1867 that supports the assertion made by my hon. friend. If there ever was a question upon which the people of the Province of Quebec and the French speaking people of this Dominion could be united by national feelings, and, if you will, national prejudices, it was the Riel question, that came up in 1886. And what was the result of that vote? Speaking from memory again, I think there were twenty-four French members voting one way, and twenty-seven voting the other way. Does that show that there was a combination of the French people for any purpose hostile to the rest of the Dominion? Sir, you will appeal in vain to the records of any of the elections held in the Dominion of Canada since 1867, to find any proof whatever of the assertions made by my hon. friend who is promoting this Bill in this House, and who tried to promote the excitement that has been raised during the last year in the Province of Ontario and in the other Provinces. It is true, the assertions are made, but no evidence is brought forward to prove them. These hon. gentlemen not only accuse us of combining in this House, but in their speeches they assert that we are endeavoring to combine the French people of the country together. I say those gentlemen do not study the effects of their speech, they do not consider the influence of the appeals that they make to their own people. They say it is wrong to have these combinations, it is wrong for the people of one race to combine against another, but if they would carefully study the effect of their own speeches, they will see that they are infinitely more calculated to bring together a certain portion of the people belonging to the majority in Canada in opposition to the French people. We need not go very far to find an example of this kind of appeal. I will quote from a speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, I think, on the 12th July last, in which, speaking to Orangemen, he said among other things:

“Set the mark of your mission as an order at a higher point than to keep a particular set of men in office, and when Mr. Bowell and Sir Hector Langevin lie down together, study the situation and be wary, for the net result will not be set down to the credit of the Orange Order.”

Sir, here is a strong appeal to the people to combine together in opposition to the French, because he takes the trouble to point out that the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Public Works, if they have sufficient community of feeling, and sufficient community of interest in this Dominion to work together politically for the interest of our common country, it is a fact which he asks the people to be aware, he tells them that it means evil to them, it means ill to the English people of this Dominion; it is a danger when French Canadians unite in the Government with English speaking Canadians. What other deductions can be drawn from his language? What other evil can he mean when he points to the fact of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Public Works being in the same Cabinet? He goes on to say:

“The issue is important, our foe is sleepless, resolute and unscrupulous.”

Now, what does that mean? If we were to use such language to an assembly of French Canadians and tell them “the issue is important, our foe,” the English speaking people, “is resolute and unscrupulous,” would we not be accused of using language of an inflammatory character, and of trying to arouse the prejudices of our compatriots; would we not be accused of trying to rally together the people of our nationality for the purpose of resisting the people of another nationality? We would be so accused, I think, and very rightly. And if these gentlemen say that, do we go too far, if we accuse them of having similar motives, if we say that by their language they are trying to form a combination of the English speaking people against the French speaking people? Let me say that I do not, myself, approve of everything that I have read as having been said in the Province of Quebec by gentlemen calling themselves Nationalists; I do not myself approve of everything I have seen in some newspapers I have read in that Province, upon the subject of French nationality, when they go so far as to intimate a desire to see upon the banks of the St. Lawrence French nationality, as contradistinguished from a British nationality. I do not approve of that; but I would point out to these hon. gentlemen who are promoting this Bill, and to the hon. member for North Norfolk who sympathises with them, that there is this difference between their speeches and the speeches of those public men I have referred to in the Province of Quebec. Those men who have spoken thus in the Province of Quebec, and those hon. gentlemen who have spoken on that subject in this House, have made these speeches, so far as I have read them, only in self defence. The purport of their speeches have been this: If the English people attack us we are prepared to resist them; if these people attack our nationality we are prepared to resist them; if these people attack our language we are prepared to resist them; if these people attack our school system we are prepared to resist them; if they attack our religion we are prepared to resist them. But they have never gone so far as to say: We must go to Ontario and pluck from the English speaking people the rights and privileges which they enjoy. Their speeches have always, so far as I have seen, been in answer to attacks made upon them by those gentlemen speaking in the Province of Ontario. But the speeches of these gentlemen promoting this Bill have not been on the defensive. The hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends, on the contrary, have spoken in an aggressive tone, as aggressive as the preamble of the Bill of my hon. friend is aggressive. It is not necessary that I should quote from the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen, for they are fresh in the memory of the House. It is only necessary, in order to emphasise my view, that I should read from the preamble of the Bill, which is as follows:—

Is this not an attack upon those rights which have been secured to the French people of the Province of Quebec, primarily by treaty, and also by the Act of Confederation, and secured in such a way that not even the legislation of this House can interfere with them? When such an attack is made, and when it is embodied in violent speeches, it is not unnatural that the French members from Quebec should, in reply, say that if an attempt is made to interfere with the French language in the North-West Territories, we will resist it to the utmost of our power. There is not so much fault to be found with the attitude taken by the people there, irrespective of the points to which I have alluded. Some hon. gentlemen did not appear to wish to go so far, and they stated they had no intention of interfering with vested rights. That is not the attitude taken by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who introduced the Bill. He intends to interfere with vested rights; he intends to secure this entering wedge, and follow it up by attacking the Separate School system and the use of the French language in Quebec, if we have to attach any credence to the speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman outside this House and within its walls. Other members, however, say they do not intend to go so far. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will not go so far, but where the French are weak, as in the North-West Territories, he intends to attack them there, and to accomplish the purpose he has in view. But he should remember that an injustice to one is a menace to all. If it is an injustice to 10 or 50 people, it is a menace to any number. Holding those views, I consider it is not expedient to-day to pronounce an opinion upon this question, and I hold that this is an inopportune time to bring it forward, and I am prepared, if no better resolution is submitted, to vote for the sub-amendment before the House, and vote squarely against the Bill. I do not think I am prepared to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because it is not, to my view, the proper one. We should not revert to the people the power to deal with this subject, but we should keep it in our own hands, and when the proper times comes for legislation, we should, speaking for the whole Dominion, say what we believe to be right for the North-West and for the great Provinces to be established there, and we should consider the circumstances, the population, the different nationalities there, and we should legislate in the best interests of all. Believing that to be the proper policy, I am not disposed to vote either for the Bill or for the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). At this hour of the evening and in view of the great length of the discussion, I will speak very briefly and follow the most excellent example of moderation and of courtesy shown to-day by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and most prominently by the leader of the Opposition. I have waited for four days in the hope that some English-speaking representative of the Provinces by the sea, older in parliamentary experience than I am, who could have spoken with more authority regarding the feeling of the eastern Provinces, would rise and take part in this debate. If such an hon. member addressed this House I would gladly resume my seat in silence. But, perhaps, in the course of remarks occupying a few moments, I may be able to contribute some points to this discussion which will enable us to arrive at a mutual understanding. The questions before the House are two: one, which seems to me to be relevant and a comparatively narrow question; the other, which seems to be irrelevant, is one which has taken a very broad range. In the very few remarks I offer, I will sharply distinguish between these two questions; one of which grows out of the enacting clause of the Bill of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the other which grows out of the inconsequential and ill-constructed preamble of the Bill. The first is with respect to the simple and narrow question as to whether, all things considered, in this year of our Lord 1890, it is wise in this Parliament to strike out section 110 of the North-West Territories Act, which was inserted in that Act thirteen years ago. I do not propose to review the reasons given by those who are opposed to the policy of expunging this section. I understood the hon. leader of the Opposition to say that the Bill, coupled with such a preamble, and heralded with such a speech as was delivered by the introducer of the Bill in this House, and still more by speeches outside this House, was one they could not approve; but if that simple Bill had been introduced, without the preamble, in a moderate speech by a member from the North-West, he would not have regarded it as one that was very objectionable. It is said that those who favor the preamble of the Bill are endorsing the action of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but those who endorse only the Bill itself occupy a different position. It has been said, and it was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia West (Mr. Davin), that it was unjust to the people of the western Provinces to strike out section 110. I come from a Province where, as the member for Kent (Mr. Landry) has said, there are a considerable number of French-speaking people. We come from a Province which has not the dual language, from a Province where we live on terms of good-will with each other; and no better evidence of the good-will of the English and French-speaking people in that Province can be furnished, than the fact that a great party in that Province, mainly an English-speaking party, some years ago, chose as their leader the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), whom we all respected and knew to be a capable administrator, and he held for some time a very important portfolio in the Government of that Province. The argument of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that the continuation of section 110 would have the effect of attracting emigrants from the New England States and leading to emigration westward seems to me to be not well founded on fact. Thirteen years ago this House passed section 110 as a bid for emigrants for the North-West; but that section has not had the effect of drawing emigrants there, and any French Canadians who have emigrated have gone to the factories and farms of the New England States. Many of my French Canadian friends have said to me since this discussion began: Be reasonable and endeavor to understand the present situation; suppose a hundred years ago the French had obtained possession of the northern part of the continent, and you and yours were in the minority, how would you feel about this question? I said: I would hope that the French Government would deal as generously as the English have been disposed to deal with the French people in the Provinces; but I would say frankly that in the matter of carving out new Provinces, however much I might desire the English language to be retained, I must accept the facts of history and could not hope for the perpetuation of my own language as an official language. I have only this to say in favor of repealing section 110, and it is this: that I agree with every argument made in its favor. I thought a powerful argument was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in the earlier part of his speech, in which he appeared to devote close attention to the precise question before the House; and I concur in the opinion that it is desirable, other things being equal, without breaking faith, to have but one language, that Government is easier and that friction is less among a people in a country which has a homogeneous people. This remark is made by one whose duty all his life has been to study history, and I venture to say there is not in Europe a single example of a nation, with two rival races jealously preserving their own nationality, and nearly equal in strength, whose power is at all commensurate with her resources and population as compared with a homogeneous nation. I will not follow that out in detail, because it has been discussed fully by gentlemen on both sides of the House. In Switzerland, where there are three languages, the people live in good-will; but the force that holds Switzerland together is the iron band of pressure from the outside. If we had on the north and west of us, as we have on the south of us, jealous nations whom we felt were quite willing to eat us up at an hour's notice, I think we would have better feelings of brotherly love than we have now. The case of Austro-Hungary was different from that of Switzerland, but I have not time to enter at any great length into the question of why Austro-Hungary, since that great duel on the field of Sadowa, has not an influence consistent with her large population, her fertile soil, and her great resources. Germany on the north, with far less population, is, beyond all question, the more powerful nation; that is, the nation with a comparatively homogeneous race is stronger than the other, although nominally the smaller. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) made a very pertinent argument in the case of England, when he pointed out that when England was occupied by two rival races, the Saxons and the Normans, she made very little progress; but when these nations were fused together she went forward by leaps and bounds. The most pertinent of all the arguments advanced, to my thinking, is the argument based on facts with which we are all acquainted. We know something of the course of events in the great Republic to the south. Her success is something phenomenal in the history of nations; and what is the policy which that great, progressive and sensible people have pursued in this matter of founding a new colony? Have they not stood by the one language? Have they not stood by the public schools? Have they not stood by the common law of England, those just and clement laws, those institutions of government which guarantee personal liberty? Have they not held those out to the foreign nations, saying: "Come and share these laws with us, enjoy this liberty with us." And have not their most enlightened men, ever since they planted this policy in the land, discovered that these laws were a mighty force of assimilation and tended to make a people compact? To secure this homogeneity, it seems to me that, in this new commonwealth, it will be unwise to allure immigrants from France, from Denmark, from Germany, from Sweden, and from other foreign countries, by the hope that when they come into this Dominion, in our courts of justice, in our Legislatures, they will be entitled to the free use of their own language. I think, if we do so, we are holding out to them an illusive hope. I think it better to say to the Danes, Germans, Prussians, French and others who come here: we welcome you all; there are our fertile lands, occupy them; and there are our mighty English laws guarding your lives and property. There are schools in which your children may be taught; there are representative institutions of Government. If you wish, you can have equal rights with all of us; and then we may hope that in one or two generations the great difficulty of governing these western Provinces will be removed, and they will be united into one. In my judgment, there is no single force within the range of Government—I am not speaking of the almost unlimited force of religion, which is beyond the range of Government in our happy country—there is no force so subtle, so insidious, so powerful to effect this unity of races as the force of language. It is like the primary forces of nature. It makes a people like each other who did not like each other before. I agree with so many French members that it is a pity we cannot all speak the French language. If we could I am sure we would like them better, and they would like us better, and if I were a younger man and could learn as fast as I could in my earlier days, I would learn to speak that beautiful language as I long ago learned to read it.

Mr. LANDRY. And then you would pass a law to prevent yourself using it.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). Far from it. I will deal with that remark of my hon. friend later on. I do not wish to recall past memories. I do not wish to speak of the events of 1877, but I do feel, in all soberness, that he who threw the apple of discord was not the hon. member singled out for condemnation by my friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It was that man who inserted in the Upper House, late in the Session of 1877, that ill-fated section of the North-West Territories Act, which provided for the official use of the two languages. It was he who planted the baleful cypress tree by the cradles of those young commonwealths between the Red River and the Rocky Mountains. A few words more and I have done. I will refer now to the somewhat irrelevant and larger question as to whether we should not consider that this Act is only a wedge by which its promoters commence to break up the institutions of the French Canadians, and that after they have succeeded in this, they are to go on and petition the Imperial Parliament to strike out section 133 of the British North America Act which guarantees the French language in this chamber, that they will go further and agitate for the repeal of the civil law in Quebec, and possibly endeavor to strike out that portion of the Act of Confederation which guarantees the freedom of the Roman Catholic religion in the Province of Quebec. Coming from the Lower Provinces as I do, and without any authority to speak for any but myself and the county which I represent, as one who has been in the habit of meeting the public men of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and studying the opinions of the press in that country, I desire to say, that, so far as I know, the one million people of the Lower Provinces sending forty-three members to this House are an absolute unit in believing that when we came into the Confederation there were agreements between the two Canadas and the Lower Provinces which should not be broken. The understanding was that our people were called in to keep the peace between those people on the St. Lawrence. We knew that a treaty in substance had been made. We knew that treaty has been crystallised and made lawful and binding upon us by the Parliament at Westminster. We know that that treaty guaranteed the perfect freedom of the Catholic religion in Quebec, the use of the French language, the perpetuity of the civil law of Rome included, and I desire to say that the people down there, who are mostly English, love the truth and keep their faith. Long ago our old King Alfred was called the "truth teller," and we English people boast that we are truth tellers and boast that we keep our faith. It is a quality we are proud of. We are not faith breakers; we are faith keepers; and I think the one million people in the Provinces by the sea are one man in saying that it is our bounden duty, in good faith and honor, absolutely to preserve inviolate those provisions of the treaty, those guarantees of the constitution, which have been referred to by my hon. friend. That is the answer I give him when he asks me if I wish to strike out the French language. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its patience in indulging me thus far. As I sit down my attention has been called by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) to a constitutional point which, I think, might be very well stated at this juncture, namely, that whatever we desire to do in the North-West Territories in regard to the schools or the Assembly or the printing of papers or judicial proceedings, we have no power under the constitution to deal with the use of the French language in the courts; for section 133 of the British North America Act reads as follows:—

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person, or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec."

And if we turn to section 101, which gives to this Parliament the power to establish Canadian courts, we find that it reads as follows:—

"The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organisation of a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada."

Reading these two sections together, I think they are conclusive that the courts of the North-West Territories are courts of Canada, and whatever we wish to do we cannot touch them. Let me sit down by saying that it makes a young member proud of his country, and proud of his Parliament, and proud of the French race, to observe the dignity and order which have been maintained throughout this debate; and if the hon. member who leads the Opposition will forgive me for saying so, and not think it improper, I should like to express the delight I have, as a peace lover, to see the increased dignity of debate and the elevated tone of discussion in this chamber during the four years that I have been here, for which I think the unflinching urbanity of the hon. gentleman himself is largely to be credited.

Mr. DESSAINT. (Translation.) As a French Canadian, Mr. Speaker, representing a county most essentially French, I think that it is my duty, under the circumstances, to raise my voice in protest against the resolution which this House is asked to adopt. The North-West Territories were definitely organised by statute in 1877. The repeal of section 110 of chapter 50 of Revised Statutes of Canada is asked for, by which section it is enacted that:

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Council or Legislative Assembly of the Territories and in the proceedings before the courts; and both those languages shall be used in the records and journals of the said Council or Assembly; and all ordinances made under this Act shall be printed in both those languages."

The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) proposes by his Bill, now before the House, to repeal section 110 of "The North-West Territories Act." I will ask at once what can be the object which the hon. member has, and must necessarily have, in presenting such a resolution? If the Act which is now before the House, has but one particular object, namely, to have justice done to the people of the North-West Territories, I ask what is his mission, what is his mandate to thus take the part of these people? If there are any persons in the North-West Territories who find themselves injured, let them make their voices heard in this House through their authorised representatives. The object of the hon. member seems clear enough in the preamble of the Bill:

"Whereas it is expedient in the interest of the national comity of the Dominion that there should be community of language among the people of Canada, and that the enactment in 'The North-West Territories Act' allowing the use of the French language should be expunged therefrom: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

"1. Section one hundred and ten of the Act of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled 'An Act respecting the North-West Territories,' is hereby repealed."

After reading this preamble, it is easily ascertainable that it is not merely to redress the grievances in the North-West that the hon. member has brought in this Bill. It has quite another object. It is not a piece of partial and local legislation which he undertakes to carry out, but general legislation attacking everything which is French Canadian in Canada. If the hon. member has local legislation in view, I ask what is his commission, what is his mission? I do not see that he has any, and I consider that he is meddling in what does not concern him, that he is meddling in the business of other people. It is said that many American citizens have made fortunes in minding their own business. This is the line of conduct which should be adopted by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). When the North-West Territories Act was passed in 1877, it will be remembered that the section which is sought to be repealed was adopted first by the Senate; this section was then submitted to the House of Commons. The Government of Mr. Mackenzie was then in power. The hon. member for North Simcoe was then in the House, and he consented with the others,—he had not then the mission which he has to-day,—he consented, as did the other members, to the adoption of this section, which passed unanimously. Later on, in 1880, this North-West Territories Act again came before the House, and this section is found imbedded in the Revised Statutes, and never did the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) think it proper to complain of it. Last year, he set out on the war path, and he was seen careering over Ontario and the North-West Territories. He thought himself charged with a special mission to regenerate the population, and to rub out from the map of Canada all that belonged to the French Canadians. I would not wish to insult the hon. member by comparing him to the celebrated knight who roamed over Spain and the other European countries in order to fight windmills. I certainly would not desire to compare him to this renowned knight of the sorrowful figure, who, in his moments of sanguinary instinct, disembowelled armies of sheep; because the comparison would not be fair. The illustrious Don Quixote fought from pure gallantry, and he sought always to protect the feeble and the oppressed, whilst the hon. member for North Simcoe seeks to persecute them. This is the difference I make between the two personages. Now, Mr. Speaker, the intention shown by the hon. member is not only, as all the world is perfectly convinced, to abolish the French language in the North-West. If this were a Bill of limited effect which we are discussing at the present moment, one might perhaps consider for a moment the seasonableness of such a measure; but the Bill extends much farther. The aim of the hon. member—he has not concealed it in his speech, and all those who have followed him have preached the same doctrine,—is the destruction of the French language not only in the North-West Territories, but throughout the Dominion of Canada. Further he would like to abolish the separate schools; he would equally like, if it were possible, to abolish the Roman Catholic religion, which has been attacked in a furious manner for some time past. I think that the movement which has now been set going throughout the country is far from being a patriotic one, but I am certain that those who intend such a persecution will not succeed in their efforts. History gives lessons which must not be disregarded; lessons which we should make use of, and which we will certainly put into practice. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has told us that by the Act of Capitulation of Quebec and by the Act of Cession of 1763 the use of the French language was not guaranteed. If the Catholic religion has been preserved to us, if a guarantee for all our privileges has been given to us, if we possess to-day the French civil law, the Code Napoléon, which is the admiration of the whole world, a system of law which goes back as far as the Coutume de Paris and the old coutumes of France, we owe these to the guarantees given by the Treaty of Paris, and to our privileges granted by the Treaty of Capitulation. Well, when we have the right of exercising our religion as we understand it; when we have preserved for ourselves the coutumes, the laws in force in the country, by capitulation, are they going now to tell us that we have not the right of speaking our language? When they allowed us the use of our language before the courts, because they could not do otherwise, is this not a formal guarantee that we should have the enjoyment, along with our civil rights, of this beautiful French language, of which we are proud for more than one reason? The attempt made by the hon. member for Simcoe will not succeed, and I trust that he will not return again to the charge. At the time of the cession of Canada—as he has himself stated,—the population of Canada, which was entirely French at the time, was about 65,000 souls. A great number quitted the country to return to France, notably the nobles and officers, and the educated persons generally. They deserted the new country and we remained there in small numbers under the shield and guardianship of the priests, who were at that epoch the only people of education. Well, since 1763, until Confederation in 1867, and even up to the present time as is now proved, they have tried by every means in their power to prevent the French Canadians from speaking their language and practising their religion. This people which originally reckoned only 65,000 souls resisted the storm and presented a bold front to all attacks. It has preserved its privileges, its language, its religion, and its rights. How can it be imagined to-day, Mr. Speaker, that with a population of one million and one-half of French Canadians, settled in the Province of Quebec and the other Provinces of Canada, and about one million in the United States, how can it be imagined, I say, that the hon. member for Simcoe and the companions who support him, can hope to be able to destroy the French race, and take away from it the right of using its language, when there exists to defend it a population of more than one million living in the Dominion of Canada? The persecutions which have with intent been carried on against the French Canadians have not been confined to the Province of Quebec, but before the cession of 1763, the English who at that time peopled the thirteen colonies which later on made up the United States, already carried on before the war for independence had been declared, a bloody war upon everything that was French, and they attacked the Acadians, who then dwelt in Nova Scotia. In order to show the dishonesty with which they acted towards these Frenchmen, it will be sufficient for me to cite an extract from a work by Mr. Jacques de Baudoucourt, at page 309 :

“The Acadians asked to be exempted from carrying arms against France in case of war (for it must always be remembered that war had not been declared). This mark of attachment was never forgiven and served as a pretext for the carrying out of a measure the most brutal among all that history has recorded. The English fleets surrounded Acadia and the most profound secrecy was maintained in order that no one might escape. The officers and the Protestant clergy had already exhausted, against the unfortunate Acadians, all their insults and annoyances. The supreme iniquity was about to be consummated. To take seven or eight thousand men by force was impracticable, recourse was had to a ruse. A general proclamation from Moncton, invited all the men under the severest penalties, above the age of ten years, to assemble in the church of their respective villages, in order there to listen to the orders of the Government. The day fixed was Friday the 5th day of September. In order to give an idea of what took place in the other Acadian villages, let us recount what passed in the village of Grand Pré, where 483 men, 337 women and 1,107 children were grouped. When they were shut up in the church, the approaches to which were guarded by the Bostonais, Col. Winslow having taken his place in the middle of the meeting, made this announcement, one worthy of Nero and Caligula : ‘You are gathered together here in order that I may make you acquainted with the final resolve of His Majesty, respecting the French population of this Province. Your lands, your cattle, and your provisions of all kinds, are confiscated for the benefit of the Crown, and as for yourselves you will be transported from the country. You owe to the goodness of His Majesty the right which I am going to allow you, namely, that of carrying off all your money and household stuff, provided always, that it will not encumber the vessels in which you are going to embark. From this moment I declare you to be prisoners of the King.’

“And the unhappy Acadians without arms, were escorted in six ranks, at the bayonet’s point, from the church to the ship where the men were to embark; they passed along groaning with grief in the midst of their wives and children, who were on their knees and calling down the blessings of heaven on the poor exiles from whom they were going to be separated. The Americans were pitiless, and took no pains to unite families; they had not even prepared a place for the reception of the exiles, the colonies were not forewarned. On the same day and hour all the other villages were treated in the same manner, and the seven thousand captured Acadians were embarked for an unknown destination.”

The greater part of these poor wretches were deceived in this manner and despoiled of their goods; this act of cruelty will be a shameful blot on the history of British North America. These poor Acadians were embarked forcibly on board the vessels. They were scattered along the coasts of the United States; and they were deprived of all, in order to prevent their return to their country where they possessed fertile and well cultivated lands and a fair amount of property. In spite of this persecution, Mr. Speaker, the Canadians so loved their soil; they so loved their country, that it ended in their repatriating themselves, and at the present day this population of 7,000, which had thus been scattered to the four winds, has come together again and numbers at least 110,000 Acadians, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. All this proves that there are certain feelings which cannot be driven out of the heart of man. The Canadians may be expelled from the country, but no one can succeed in stifling their national sentiment. I shall not enter upon all the historical incidents which followed this gloomy period, between 1760 and 1837. I shall only remark that the Government, every time the occasion presented itself, being then hostile, took all the means possible to deprive the French Canadian nation of their privileges. They tried to prevent our speaking the language peculiar to it. Our fellow-countrymen had not the right to speak officially the French language in the Legislative Assemblies, nor even in the courts: they robbed them of their just rights. They had judges who understood not a word of French, and who were third-class men. They endeavored by this means to prevent their having access to the courts,—and our countrymen chose the oldest men among them to adjust their differences; it was certainly the best way to bear up as they have done. The hon. First Minister has spoken to us about a memorable epoch; he spoke to us about the year 1844, the year in which he entered public life for the first time. He told us that if the French Canadians were protected in that year it was by a Tory Government. I think that the hon. the First Minister makes a mistake in this connection, for the Government of the day was not wholly Tory; and the measure to which he alluded, that is to say the restoration of the French language in Canada, was not proposed by a Tory, but by the Hon. Mr. Papineau, who certainly was not a Tory, but a Reformer and an advanced Liberal. This measure was a protest against the Union Act of 1840; for it is known that in this Union Act a section had been interpolated by which the French language was completely forbidden in the legislative debates. In 1845 the Hon. Mr. Papineau, moved a resolution and based a Bill upon this resolution, re-establishing the use of the French language in the Legislative Chamber. This resolution was unanimously adopted by the members present. Consequently the Conservative party of to-day, or the Tory party, cannot claim to have given us the benefit of such a measure. But if the hon. the First Minister had gone a little further and had come down to 1849, he would, perhaps have been able to have made us see what were the intentions of the Tories of that day. We can remember that, in 1849, the Tory newspapers declared war to the death on everything in the shape of a French Canadian. We can recollect that at that time it was a Liberal Government which asked the House to vote a sum of money as an indemnity to those French Canadians who had suffered losses in the rebellion of 1837. The proposal of the Government was warmly debated, and the hon. the First Minister of the present moment, who was then in the House, was one of those who made the most revolutionary speeches that can be found in the history of our country. The press also discussed the question. It is necessary, said the Tory organs, that the French race should disappear from Canada. The hon. the First Minister was a Tory then, as he is now, and he was at the head of those who waged war upon the French Canadian race. We remember the disorders which were caused by this law. The Governor was insulted; stones and rotten eggs were thrown at him. An organised body laid siege to the Parliament House; threw in a shower of stones even into the Council Chamber; they drove out the members; they broke the desks and chairs; they carried off the mace; one of their leaders seated in the Speaker's chair proclaimed in the name of the people the dissolution of the Parliament. At the same time the building became the prey of the flames, as did the house of the Hon. Mr. Lafontaine. And who were at the head of this revolutionary movement? They were the Tories of the day, and I venture to say the political ancestors of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). And who, setting aside Mr. Lafontaine, took up the defence of the French Canadians? It was a man whose name will live in the history of our country. It was the father of the Hon. Mr. Blake, who, in a most eloquent speech, demanded, as a good patriot, as a philosopher, their rights for the French Canadians. We have discovered in this House, within the last few days, that the son of this great patriot has followed the traditions of his father, and has adopted the same line of conduct by praising the French Canadians. He has placed himself above the considerations of party; he has taken the side of the persecuted, and the French Canadians will owe him an eternal acknowledgment, as they preserve a precious remembrance of his illustrious father. I am perfectly convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) does not hope to obtain the result which he has in view, when proposing the measure which is now offered for our consideration. He knows that it is impossible to secure the abolition of the French language in the North West, and still less in the Province of Quebec; and I tell him frankly that he is dashing his head against stone walls by endeavoring to secure the adoption of this measure. Before abolishing the French language, and taking from us the privileges which we enjoy, he will find, if need be, thousands upon thousands of breasts presented as a defence for the liberties which we enjoy. Mr. Speaker, recriminations are indulged in against the hon. the First Minister of the Province of Quebec. I do not know why they are continually attacking a man who is not in this House to defend himself; it would appear that there is a mad rage against him; it would appear that he has excited the prejudices and the hatred of certain persons in the House. I am not commissioned to take up the defence of Mr. Mercier; but when they accuse him of fanaticism; when they state that the Government of Quebec desires to ostracise the English minority in that Province, I say that a statement is made which is not true. Let us examine the facts as they really are: There are in the Province of Quebec ten members speaking the English language out of sixty-five who form the total membership of the Legislature. There are in the Ministry two English Protestant Ministers. Consequently these two English Ministers represent one-third of the membership. If Mr. Mercier had only granted to the Protestant minority the number of Ministers to which they were entitled with regard to the population and the body of representatives, he would have given them but one Protestant Minister. Now, let any one cite one single act,—I do not refer to a word spoken in a patriotic speech where one may go beyond the usual bounds of prudence,—let them cite one case where Mr. Mercier has not done justice to the Protestant minority, then I will admit that he has made himself blameworthy. Again, lately, during the session now in progress, he has shown his justice towards the Protestant minority. Mr. Hall presented a Bill to the Legislature asking for a privilege favoring the Protestant minority, in the matter of the admission to the study of law of the bearers of University degrees. The Hon. Mr. Mercier was the first to impress upon his followers his own personal ideas, and he in this way made the Bill of Mr. Hall to pass in triumph. This is what the Sherbrooke Gazette says on the subject:

"We are quite aware that we are going to give the Sherbrooke Examiner an opportunity of delivering himself once more of his stupid jests, but we must render justice to Mr. Mercier for the statesmanlike act he has done in taking up the defence of the rights of the English Universities, in causing their diplomas of B.A. to be accepted as evidence that the bearer of the degree has received a sufficiently liberal education to enable him to commence the study of the law. Prejudice—blind irrational prejudice—is so spread over Quebec and possesses the Legislature to such a degree, that the chief of such a party as the National Party must have a large portion of moral courage to rise above the narrow and paltry ideas of the party, and render justice to the minority."

This is what Mr. Mercier has done in the case before us. His support, his pleading and his eloquence have assured the passing of Mr. Hall's Bill, and his efforts ought to be acknowledged to his face.

"Honor to whom honor is due. Mr. Mercier deserves the gratitude of all true believers in equal rights."

This is what an English newspaper said, quite recently, on the position taken by the Hon. Mr. Mercier towards the Protestant minority. This is not all: during the past few days a question of privilege was raised before this House by making allusion to certain disorders which have taken place in Hull. One hon. member allowed himself to make a furious tirade, not only against Mr. Mercier, but against French Canadians in general; he took advantage of the occasion to hurl upon the French Canadians an insult which I will not repeat, but which we have felt keenly and which has wounded us in our most private feelings. He went so far as to recall the sad remembrances of the battle on the Plains of Abraham and the battle of Waterloo. He went so far as to tell us that the time would come when great Salvation Armies would march through the streets of Quebec. Why provoke in this manner the French Canadians, who only ask to live like brothers, hand in hand with their fellow-citizens of whatever race or origin? This brand of discord is hurled in order to create a programme, in order to pick up at the next elections a certain number of fanatics. I have nothing to say about the Salvation Army nor the battle of the Plains of Abraham. If the history of our fellow-citizens of English origin has some dates of honor and victory, I can say that we French Canadians have some glorious pages in the history of our country. If we have suffered losses, if we have experienced checks, we can in any case march with head erect; we can look behind with pride and be proud of our ancestors. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not generous; I say that it is despicable to make illusions like that to the ancestors of a nation which has a glorious past. Occasion has been found to speak of the Salvation Army. I ask what has the Salvation Army to do with this case? I frankly admit that I have no very great admiration for this army, which may have a cause for its existence from its own point of view; but is, in my opinion, only a gathering of parasites, which I find simply ridiculous. I might say more, but as there may be found among those people some well-intentioned individuals, I wish to give them the benefit of the doubt. Nevertheless, there is one thing very certain, which is, that the Salvation Army, like many other fanatical religious organisations, has no justification for its existence, and I say that the law does not permit scandalous and noisy processions in the streets. We live in a free country; I respect all religious denominations, and we desire that our religion should be respected; but the liberty of creed in a country does not authorise license. This is what the first section of the Act respecting recatories says on the subject:—

“The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, so as the same be not made an excuse for acts of licentiousness, or a justification of practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the Province, are by the constitution and laws of this Province allowed to all Her Majesty’s subjects within the same.”

Well, all creeds have free access to this country; all religions are respected; but this must not give an opening for license which may disturb the public peace. Will they say that the noisy demonstrations, of which we were witness on the streets of Quebec, are not of a kind to break the public peace? I say: yes, they are; and, further, I find in these processions a provocation which should be avoided by all legal methods. To show the goodwill of the Hon. Mr. Mercier, who is always working in the interest of peace and harmony in our country, I shall cite the answer which he made to the Hon. Mr. Taillon in reference to the troubles which have occurred lately in Hull. This is what he said:

“At the opening of the Session the Hon. Mr. Taillon drew the attention of the Government to the regrettable disorders which took place recently in Hull, and asked whether it was their intention to take steps to put an end to them.

“The Hon. Mr. Mercier said the question of the leader of the Opposition was in every way an opportune one, and in reply he would inform the House that the Government had determined to maintain peace and order, and to protect those who desired to speak, no matter on what subject, provided that while so doing they did not violate the laws of the country.”

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Mr. Mercier has in this instance only done his duty, and I trust that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the other members who have spoken in the same strain as he has, will be satisfied with the attitude which he, Mr. Mercier, has taken on this occasion. Well, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the French language, they tell us that in this country it is impossible—if we wish to be a homogeneous people, a true nationality,—that it is impossible that there should exist different languages. The learned researches of several of my colleagues have shown that the thing not only is not impossible, but that it is found to be practical and advantageous in several countries, notably in the United States, in the Island of Jersey, in Switzerland, and in several other countries. I will venture to remark to the hon. member for Simcoe that, if he expects by this means to make the English language spoken by all British subjects his breath will be a long time out of his body before this end is reached; because Canada is not the only country where another language is spoken: there are other British possessions where English is not spoken at all—thus, the East or English Indies, where the people speak different languages and have different customs. I should like to think that the hon. member for Simcoe does not entertain the hope that England can impose her language upon all the peoples who make up her empire:

“The races which compose the population of India are as diverse as the climates,” says Larousse, “the tribes, which are distinct as to language, creeds, and by their social organisation, are innumerable.”

I do not know whether the hon. member for Simcoe wishes to carry on his crusade in favor of the English language into these regions. Let us see now what goes on in the Island of Jersey. It has been stated here that the French language was spoken there. It has been an English possession for many ages. The population is 56,078, of which 2,000 are Frenchmen. Notwithstanding, what do we see? We see the French language there is held in high esteem; that it is spoken by the well-to-do people, and that it is the official language of the country. This does not prevent the inhabitants of Jersey from proving in many instances their deep attachment for their new nationality, that of Great Britain. One can recollect that several years ago, France being at war with England, the people of Jersey took up arms against their old mother country, and fought for the Crown of England. This did not prevent them from preserving their customs, their privileges and their language up to the present time. This shows that one can be a patriot and a good British subject though speaking a foreign tongue. Let us look again at the Island of Ste. Lucie. It is a small island, exclusively, I think, or in great part peopled by French. Nevertheless for a great number of years the only language spoken in this island has been the French one; it is the official language. Several years back, when the Hon. Judge Armstrong was Governor of this island, which possessed French laws, they adopted the greater portion of the Code of Lower Canada. This does not prevent their being loyal subjects of Her Majesty, and if need be they would take up arms to defend the British Crown. I will not recall the glorious deeds of arms in which the French Canadians took part. These facts have already been mentioned in the course of this debate, and it is sufficient to recall them to show the loyalty of the French Canadians under all circumstances and in all places. Now, in order to prove the qualities of the French language, which has been so violently attacked, and which it is desired to see disappear, I will venture to quote a page written by Mr. Oscar Dunn, who, I think, is of British origin. This is what he says:

“The French language is a diamond of inestimable value; it is a work of gold worked on for centuries, of a beauty like to none other. All the world admires her; she charms every body: although she reveals her secrets to but few, one must love her, love her much, and court her assiduously and long; she only yields to him who knows how to conquer by persevering labor and unshaken constancy; but what a treasure does she reveal to her favorites. Her exquisite delicacy ravishes the understanding; she is all love and all gaiety; full of nobility and enthusiasm; accessible to the sciences as to fancy; to all elevated ideas as to all worthy sentiments; she understands your heart and assists your wit. If you once gain possession of her, nothing will persuade you ever to give her up. You will keep her as your very best treasure.⁷

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has allowed himself, in the course of his remarks, to allude to the antipathy existing between the French Canadians and the Irish. He has received in this House the most solemn denial of this statement that he could obtain. We have seen the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) rising and speaking in French, in the name of the Irish of the Province of Quebec, bearing witness, in this way, to the sympathies which his fellow-countrymen have for us. This is the most ample vindication which we could adduce as to this matter. This sympathy, Mr. Speaker, exists not only between the Irish and the French Canadians; it exists and will exist in spite of the obstacles raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) between the French Canadians and the thinking Englishmen. We have had evidence of this in this House. They wish to respect our institutions, our laws, our customs and our religion. On the other hand, we return the reverence which they pay us, and we respect likewise their institutions and their religion, their language and their character. We are capable of living in peace in this country. We have but one only object—to form a stronger Dominion, a great nation. But to reach this end it is not necessary to cast a brand of discord among us, as has done the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). We wish to live in peace, we desire harmony, we desire to be calm and unexcited. But I affirm that the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe is an act of tyranny, which will show, if it is sanctioned, that they are not so patriotic as they would wish us to believe. Before closing, Mr. Speaker, let me be allowed to say that we look upon the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with calmness and tranquility. We are strong in our rights, and we fear nothing, even if this Bill were a declaration of war. We are strong in our rights and we are proud, at the same time, of our ancestors, whose memory we know how to make respected. I shall say no more. I am convinced that the Bill which is now before you for consideration will obtain the fate it deserves, and I am certain that all true patriots in this House will join hand to hand in order to give a lesson to the author of this Bill.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That Government business shall take precedence on every Thursday, on and after Thursday next, the 20th instant, during the present Session, after Questions put by Members.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press his motion. I think we have not yet reached a period of the Session when the Government should take another day. We have not yet discussed one of the numerous public Bills set down on the Order paper, and if Thursday is taken away, the only time when those Bills can come up will be Wednesday evening. It is not likely that we could dispose of them, having so short a time, and besides, to-morrow is Ash Wednesday. I would, therefore, suggest that the hon. gentleman should not press this motion to-day, but should reserve it until we have discussed some of these public Bills.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I meant this to take effect after Thursday next.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman might renew his motion next Monday, but I think it is altogether premature for the Government to make the motion now.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Government have, for a number of Sessions, compelled me to take the very objection which the leader of the Opposition has now taken. I am glad to see that he is resisting this motion. There is great difficulty in getting any private legislation done, when the Government come in and practically take all the time of the House for their own business. I have always protested against this, and I renew the protest, and endorse the statement of the leader of the Opposition, with the full support of the party I represent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will allow the motion to stand over until Friday, when the First Minister will be here.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LINCOLN.

Mr. BOWELL. I propose now to make the motion which I brought under the notice of the House yesterday in reference to the further correspondence of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and the statements made in this House by him and other members, the First Minister and myself being among the number. The objection was taken yesterday that it was inadvisable or improper to place upon the records letters which were written subsequently to those which had been published in the Toronto Globe. It must be remembered by the House that these letters were not public property until they were published in the newspaper, and this House was not made cognisant of the fact until the motion was made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and passed, and placed upon the records of Parliament. My desire is that the explanation made by the hon. member for Lincoln, and published with certain letters in the Citizen newspaper on the 11th of the month, together with speeches to which I have referred, should follow as consecutively as possible the other letters now on record. I, therefore, move :

That whereas certain letters and documents, reading as follows :

(Daily Citizen, Tuesday, 11th February, 1890.)

“MR. RYKERT AND THE GLOBE.

“A VINDICATION IN REPLY TO GROSS MISSTATEMENTS.—THE CYPRESS HILLS TIMBER LIMITS.

“Editor of THE CITIZEN.

“The garbled statements put before its readers by the Globe newspaper, if allowed to go without any explanation on my part, might very reasonably lead to the conclusion that I had unduly used my influence with the Government, in the first place, to procure a timber license for Mr. Adams, and afterwards to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway to press its claim to the alternate sections contained in that license. It must have struck even the most prejudiced person that many letters were not published to which my letters were answers, and which, if published, would have fully explained the whole matter. By a reference to the letters it will be seen that the whole fight was between Mr. Sands and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that I was acting in his behalf, and did all that lay in my power to prevent an injustice being done to him. I am not at all surprised at the publication of this private and confidential correspondence, because I was threatened with the same during my election in 1887, unless I paid $5,000 for it, an offer which I indignantly refused, at the same time telling the party that he was welcome to publish everything in connection with the Cypress Hills limit, and that nothing that could be said or done would redound to my discredit. As the Globe has seen fit, with its customary notion of fair play, to publish such letters as it thought would reflect discredit upon myself, I would crave your indulgence by asking you to publish a portion of a letter which I addressed to the electors of Lincoln in February, 1887, in answer to the malicious attack made upon me by my opponents, that I had violated the Independence of Parliament Act. It is as follows:—

“As I understand the law, a member of Parliament cannot be charged with a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act unless he does something in violation of it. He cannot be said to be guilty of a breach of trust as a representative of the people unless he violates some law which reposes that trust in him. Now, let me explain to you what the law which particularly affects timber limits was at the time the application for the Cypress Hills limit was made, and I may at the same time be permitted to state who made that law.

“Section 50 of 35 Victoria, chapter 23, declared that :—
“The right of cutting timber on such limits shall be put up at a bonus per square mile, varying according to the situation and value of the limit, and sold to the highest bidder by competition, either by tender or at public auction.”

“This was the law when the Macdonald Government left office, but it was speedily amended after Mackenzie came into power, no doubt to enable him to satisfy many of his followers who had M. P. attached to their names, and nobly did he respond to their impetuous demands, as the public records show. By section 11 of 37 Victoria, chapter 19, the law was amended by adding the following proviso to section 51 of the Act of 1872 :

“Provided further, that in cases where application may be made for limits on which to cut timber in unsurveyed territory, the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior, authorise the same to be leased for such bonus as may be deemed fair and reasonable, such leases to be subject, nevertheless, to the foregoing conditions in this section, except as to that part of sub-section 1 which provides for the erection of mills, which provision, in respect to unsurveyed territories, may, if considered expedient by the Minister of the Interior, be dispensed with.”

“Under the Act of 1872, timber licenses had to be sold by public competition to the highest bidder. This wise provision was done away with by Mr. Mackenzie, as you will see, and, as a result of it, any person could have a license by applying to the Government for an Order in Council, without being subjected to public competition and the payment of, perhaps, a large bonus. Within a very brief period after Mr. Mackenzie changed the law, Orders in Council were passed by him, granting 605 square miles, or 387,200 acres, to friends of that Government, and for which they only paid $6,160. Among the grantees of the licenses were many Grit M.P.'s. The law remained the same ever since that time, except that the Conservative Government changed the licenses from twenty-one years to one year. Now, under the law as it existed at the time, Mr. Mackenzie passed Orders in Council for his friends to the extent of 605 square miles. It was doubtful if any member of Parliament could take the benefit of the same, or be interested in any contract with the Government, with colonisation and other companies, but this doubt was removed by Mr. Mackenzie in 1878, after a number of Grit M.P.'s had violated the Independence of Parliament Act, by an Act passed, chap. 5, 41 Vict. The law, as I have pointed out, does not prevent a member of Parliament applying for a timber license, and therefore if I had applied for the Cypress Hills limit myself, it was quite open and legal for me to do so. You will recollect that Mr. H. H. Cook, M.P., in 1878, applied for a license while the House was actually in session and it was promised to him, but no Order in Council was passed until 7th October, 1878, three weeks after Mr. Mackenzie was defeated, and the day before he resigned. This Order in Council was for 200 square miles in sections of twenty miles each wherever he might select them, including the very Cypress Hills limit. With this, no fault was found by any Reformer, but when a Conservative happened to apply for a similar favor for his friends, it is a breach of trust and a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act.”

“Now, what are the facts? In 1881 Mr. John Adams asked me to apply for a limit in the North-West Territory, and 700 miles from Winnipeg or any railway. I told Mr. Adams he was crazy, and advised him not to go into it, more especially as he told me he had to pay one Muckle ($5,000) for the information. I showed him that he would have to take the lumber 1,300 miles by river to Winnipeg, and then compete with the lumber from the disputed territory. He wanted me to go halves with him and advance part of the money, but I declined to invest money on any such hazardous enterprise.

“He then proposed that I should go into the venture with him, and look to the same for any expenses I might incur in assisting him in getting up a company, or in working the limit. This I also declined. I told him I would make his application for him, which I did on the 18th day of February, 1882. Mr. Adams then stated to me that he would make Mrs. Rykert a present of one-half of what he made out of the limit, after deducting all expenses, which fact he communicated to her, and after the limit was sold he honestly carried out his promise. An Order in Council was passed granting Mr. Adams the right to select a limit in the Cypress Hills. Before Mr. Adams left for home he agreed to pay me $100 per day for every day I might be engaged in business in connection with this limit, either in Winnipeg or the North-West. Mr. Adams at once organised a surveying party at a very heavy cost, and had the limit surveyed as the law required, and the license was finally issued to him in September, 1882, for 37½ square miles. Can you say that I did anything wrong in making the application for Mr. Adams when the law was open to anybody to apply? Is there a tittle of evidence that I in any way took advantage of my position as a member of Parliament in applying for a license, or in any way committed a breach of trust? If the law allowed Mr. Adams to apply individually, or through me, for this limit, and he in all respects complied with its provisions, then it made no difference whether he made $100 or $200,000. But my opponents say Mr. Adams ought to have paid a bonus for so valuable a limit. They chose to forget the fact that when he applied for this limit no person would have undertaken to comply with the terms of the law, viz., erect a mill in six months, and pay heavy dues on a limit which at that time was far remote from any settlement, and not within reach of any railroad. At the time this limit was granted to Mr. Adams the Canadian Pacific Railway was compelled by law to go by the Yellowhead Pass—a point distant 600 miles from the limit. In May, 1882, the company applied to Parliament for leave to change their route, if necessary; and subsequently located it, passing within 30 miles of the Cypress Hills. Had it not been for this sudden change, the limit to-day would have been utterly valueless. Why do they not complain that Mr. Cook, M.P., was granted a limit of 200 square miles, scattered in sections all over the North-West, and was allowed three years to comply with any of the conditions required by law? Mr. Adams was compelled to erect his mill in six months, and pay annually $250, besides being obliged to perform other very onerous conditions. Would any of these purists have complained if Mr. Cook had made $200,000, or even a million of dollars? They did not complain when their friend Macaulay received a license without paying a bonus, and sold the same immediately for $300,000.

"Now as to the second charge. If my opponents do not abandon the first charge and claim that the limit was worth all that Mr. Sands paid for it, then that gentleman could have no ground for complaint; and, on the other hand, if the limit turned out to be worthless, then the country has lost nothing. Upon either one or the other horn of the dilemma must my slanderers stand. It will be admitted that I could not waylay the agent of Mr. Sands unless I was in that country, nor could I be a party to any conspiracy to defraud Mr. Sands unless I knew that he was about to become, or was in fact the purchaser, and intended to send his explorer to examine the limit. That I was not in Winnipeg at the time is best proven by the following correspondence, which shows clearly that not only was I in St. Catharines, but that I could not possibly have waylaid Mr. Sands' agent:

"LETTER FROM JOHN ADAMS TO J. C. RYKERT.

"MY DEAR MR. RYKERT.—No word from Mercer yet. Met several parties that saw him near the limit. I saw a party to-day that came from there, and left Mercer there. I know this party well; he said it was a splendid limit, and that Mercer was stopping some parties from cutting. The party offered me $150,000; I cannot do anything till after the 12th. I hope Mercer will be back in a day or two. Will telegraph you if I hear anything. Saw P. McCarthy to-day; he thought if I got $75,000 I ought to be satisfied, and give Mr. Rykert $50,000. I told him M. Rykert had nothing to do with it. I hope Hunter will succeed in getting up a company.

"WINNIPEG, 6th December, 1882.

"J. C. RYKERT, M.P.:

"MY DEAR SIR.—I returned from the limit on Monday, and I think we made good time. The explorer did not go all over the limit; he did not think it necessary, but he saw enough to justify him in recommending the purchase of it. He has telegraphed to his employer to come at once, and I believe that as soon as he comes the thing will be settled."

"LETTER JOHN ADAMS TO J. C. RYKERT.

"WINNIPEG, 11th December, 1882.

"MY DEAR RYKERT.—In dealing with Mr. Sands I took Mr. McCarthy's advice; the next thing to do was to go to our banker, and he telegraphed to Manistee, Mich., which you will find enclosed. Now Mr. Sands would not give Zimmerman a quarter in it for nothing, and said if Mr. Zimmerman put up the money on or before the 20th he would take his deposit money back. I don't think there is any danger. You advised me to take $150,000; now I got $175,000, and he binds himself not to cut more than 10,000,000 in first and second year. What about the transfer? Will it have to go to Ottawa? Sands has every confidence in me.

"(Signed) JOHN ADAMS."

"TELEGRAM ADAMS TO RYKERT.

"WINNIPEG, 9th January, 1883.

"To J. C. RYKERT:

"Come to Winnipeg; room at Queen's.

"(Signed) JOHN ADAMS."

"This correspondence ought to satisfy any unprejudiced mind that I had nothing to do with either Mr. Sands or his explorer. I never saw Mr. Sands until the 16th of January, 1883, when the agreement was finally executed, and the license, which up to that time was in Adams' name, was transferred to Mr. McCarthy and myself as trustees respectively for Mr. Sands and Mr. Adams. If any further proof of this is required, I have the answer of Mr. Sands in a letter written by him on 7th February, 1887. I asked him certain questions to which he replied:

"Question—Did you ever know or see me before you negotiated the purchase of the limit?"

"Answer—No.

"Question—Was not the agreement entered into between Mr. Adams and yourself before my arrival in Winnipeg in January, 1883?"

"Answer—No; the agreement was entered into between myself and R. H. Hunter, the agent, and a member of the pool.

"What evidence has Mr. Pattison presented of any conspiracy? There is no pretence whatever that I was in Winnipeg when Mr. Sands first entered into negotiations for the purchase of the limit, and is there a shadow of a pretext for ever saying that I saw this explorer whom Mr. Sands sent to examine the limits? Any unprejudiced man must admit that the second charge was and is a base slander, and ought never to have been made by any person pretending to possess any of the instincts of a gentleman.

"As to the third charge—that Mr. Sands never knew that the Canadian Pacific Railway claimed any portion of the limit, I have this to say: That Mr. Sands was the first to communicate to me the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway claimed every alternate section on the limit, in a letter written by him to me a short time after the purchase of the limit, and urged me very strongly to get the matter settled. I made enquiries at once at the Department at Ottawa, and ascertained that the company, through their agent, Mr. Hamton, had entered a protest against renewing the license for the section which it claimed came within their charter. I then made further enquiries, and found that the company had deflected or changed its line so as to bring the same within the 24-mile belt, and consequently entitle it to claim every alternate section. I made every possible remonstrance to the Government against permitting the Canadian Pacific Railway to claim any portion of the limit, which had been granted in unsurveyed territory, long before the company had power to change its line, but without avail. The company persisted in its claim, and Mr. Sands had to yield. I afterwards met Mr. Sands in Toronto, when he requested me to make every effort to get the company to withdraw any claim they pretended to have, and failing in that to negotiate with the company for a sale of the land for a sum per acre to be agreed upon, not exceeding $3.00 or $3.50 per acre. I was engaged the greater part of the year between St. Catharines, Ottawa and Montreal, endeavoring to have Mr. Sands' rights to the whole limit recognised, and, not succeeding in that, I finally induced the company to sell to Mr. Sands for $2.25 per acre. The following correspondence will show how the Canadian Pacific Railway claimed the odd sections, and that Mr. Sands knew of their claims.

“ J. C. RYKERT, M.P.: “ MONTREAL, 18th Feb., 1884.

“ DEAR MR. RYKERT,—I have your letter of the 16th. I have to-day instructed Mr. Tavish fully of the basis of settlement of the Cypress Hills limit matter, and have told him that you will communicate with him direct when you are ready to make a selection, and close the thing up.

“ (Signed) C. DRINKWATER,
“ Secretary C.P.R.”

“ The following was the agreement referred to in the letter:

“ Five thousand acres within limit, 8 sections, whether covered by timber or not, no less than a full section to be selected; $2.25 per acre to be paid by purchaser, and all claims, whether for timber taken or damages to the limit by the company, to be abandoned. Selection of land to be made within three months and communicated to the company.

“ (Signed) C. D.”

“ A copy of this agreement was sent to Mr. Sands.

“ The following telegrams were received by me from Sands:—

“ 16th February, 1884.

“ To J. C. RYKERT:

“ Green timber covers about six thousand acres; dead timber covers about the same, but scattered over the limit.

“ (Signed) L. SANDS.”

“ 25th June, 1883.

“ To J. C. RYKERT:

“ Cannot decide yet. My men are now looking the sections. I expect their report every day.

“ (Signed) LOUIS SANDS.”

“ The following letter was received by me:—

“ MANISTEE, MICH., 7th July, 1884.

“ MR. J. C. RYKERT:

“ DEAR SIR,—The following odd sections in the following towns and ranges in the Cypress Hills are those that my man has selected, are to be bought of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, namely (here he enumerates them). I have never heard what were the terms of payment. The terms must be made easy.

“ (Signed) L. SANDS.”

“ It appears by Mr. Sands' letter to me of the 1st of August, 1883, that he suspected there had been deception practised upon him as to the quantity of timber on the limit, for in a letter of that date he says:

“ In my opinion my man Udell has been paid money by Mr. Adams, or some one else, to report to me a larger amount of timber than there was on the ground, as there is no more than 16,200,000 by my own and another expert's evidence, and Udell and Adams' estimate calls for 100 more.

“ If his man Udell was bribed by Mr. Adams, or some one else, and he knew it, in August, 1882, why did he not expose the transaction then? If he had any suspicion that I had anything to do with this, why did he employ me to fight the Canadian Pacific Railway, and afterwards ask me to negotiate with them for the sections as stated above? If I were blamed by Mr. Sands, why did he write to me on 23rd September, 1883, and use this language in that letter:

“ Let me hear from you if anything turns up. Also if you can receive for me permission to locate a new limit, as you spoke about. I and my family are well, and my business fairly prosperous and good here. Hoping you may have the same blessing.

“ I remain, yours very respectfully,

“ (Signed) L. SANDS.”

“ Surely this was rather familiar language from a man to a person who had robbed him! Why did he, as late as 7th July, 1884, as before shown, write me to select the railway sections for him? The statement is absurd on the very face of it, and no man knows it better than Mr. Pattison that the charge is utterly false and without any color of foundation. Mr. Pattison says that I assisted in robbing this innocent, wealthy Dutchman out of $240,100. Well, let us see what is his position to-day. He purchased limits with his eyes wide open, after having sent his own confidential agent to examine the same.' He considered the limits worth the money as late as 5th June, 1883, for on that day he wrote to me as follows:

“ I trust, and I am in hopes still, that you will succeed in getting a license for the whole limit, in which case I will have lost nothing in the transaction.

“ Later on he had the misfortune to have a fire in the limits destroy a large quantity of valuable timber, as stated by him in a letter to me dated 28th September, 1883. At the time he purchased and for a considerable time thereafter lumber ranged from $40 to $50 per thousand, and then tumbled down to half that figure. Besides this, for various reasons, as you well know, settlers did not go into that territory as rapidly as was expected, and therefore the sales of lumber were not as anticipated by Mr. Sands. I have no doubt that Mr. Sands has been disappointed in his venture, but it is idle for anybody to say that the limit was not a very valuable one, and worth all he paid for it. Every report of the limit from every quarter, together with the detailed reports of the surveyors, all corroborate this. If Mr. Pattison had no evidence other than that which he ultimately produced in the Opera House upon which to base his charges, it must be evident that the only motive he could have had was to wilfully and maliciously slander me, for the sole and only purpose of injuring me in your estimation as a public man. He did not up to that time, nor has he since dared to challenge any of my public acts as your representative for the last twenty-eight years, for he knows well that you had passed judgment upon them favorably on nine different occasions, but he hopes that the charges so suddenly made, and of so aggravated a nature, could not be met by me before the day of polling.

“ But there are certain statements made in the published letters, which anyone will see are answers to letters written to me which require explanation, and which will be better understood by a brief statement of certain facts. Some time after the license was applied for it was discovered that Mr. Laidlaw had made application to select a limit out of an area of 800 square miles which overlapped that of Mr. Adams. At the request of the Deputy Minister an arrangement was subsequently arrived at between Mr. Adams and Mr. Laidlaw. Before the survey was completed, in the month of June, 1882, it was discovered by Adams that the C. P. R., through their timber agent, Mr. Muckle, who was interested in the Adams limit, was cutting timber off the limit for the Medicine Hat bridge. Mr. Adams informed me the C. P. R. wanted the limit, and suggested a sale to them, and I advised him to sell at the price he named in his letter to me, and to explain to the company that the limit was well worth the amount, as it was, in fact; and in answer to his enquiry about another limit, told him he could put in another application. Mr. Adams, in his letters and in conversation, repeatedly told me he had other and better limits in view which he would apply for if he could sell the Cypress Hills limit, and it was that to which I referred several times in my letters to him. When the survey was completed and license issued Mr. Adams telegraphed me to go to Winnipeg and stop the C. P. R. destroying the limit. I accordingly went to Winnipeg, and Mr. Adams having given me a statement of his claim for damages, which had been furnished to him by the C. P. R.'s agent, Muckle, I saw the directors of the road, who then and there agreed to pay the claim, if on enquiry it was found that they had cut the timber, and at the same time offered to take all the ties Mr. Adams could deliver at a fair price. Up to this time no claim was made by the company to the alternate sections. When I discovered that a claim was made I at once represented the matter to the Government and insisted upon the license being renewed. I also called upon Mr. McArthur to send his partners, Messrs. Tupper and Macdonald, to Ottawa, as they were the solicitors for Mr. Sands and had passed his title, to explain the matter fully to the Minister of Railways and the Premier, and urge that good faith should be kept with Mr. Adams in respect to his license. I appealed also to other members of the Government to see that justice was done, and I am quite certain that, so far as they could consistently do so, urged the C.P.R. to abandon its claim on the limit. Finding that the C.P.R. would not abandon its claim, I then, with the approval of Mr. Sands and Mr. Adams, appealed to different members of the Government to ask the company to sell such sections as might be found to contain any timber, and after much negotiation the very satisfactory agreement referred to in my letter above was arrived at. I wish to say most distinctly that no offer or inducement was ever made, directly or indirectly, to any member of the Government, either to procure the license originally, or afterwards to induce the C.P.R. to yield its claim. A number of persons, referred to in one of my letters published in the Globe, had volunteered to get the claim of the C.P.R. released, among them Mr. Muckle and Mr. Kirby, and under the arrangement made with Mr. Adams at the Queen's Hotel, I was authorised to negotiate with them, but neither the solicitors for Mr. Sands in Winnipeg, nor any persons in any way connected with the Government, at any time received or demanded from me, or were promised, any compensation for services rendered by them in seeing that justice was done Mr. Adams. I would not have taken the trouble to make any explanation of the matter, knowing that after a full examination of all the facts, the electors of Lincoln expressed their confidence in my integrity by increasing my majority to 500! were it not that the Globe has, by the publication of part of the correspondence (which was of a purely confidential character), attempted to cast a reflection upon the conduct of the Government in connection with this license.

"I am prepared to have, and desire the most searching enquiry into the whole case, and am satisfied that nothing can be shown which will reflect discredit upon the Government or myself.

"Yours truly,

"J. C. RYKERT.

"PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

"Mr. RYKERT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a personal explanation in regard to certain matters which have appeared in the public press during the last few days. In the Globe of last Saturday there appeared a large number of letters purporting to be written by myself in regard to a timber limit in the North-West Territories. And in the Globe of Tuesday last a reference is made to this correspondence, and the charge is also made that I, as a member of this House, have been guilty of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and that I have used my position as a member of Parliament for my own personal and private gain. It is also alleged that connected with that transaction are certain Ministers of the Crown, who, it is alleged, took an active part in respect to this matter. So far as I myself am concerned, I care not what the public press may say about me. I have been in Parliament a great many years, and the result of all attacks has been that I am here a member of this House, and I have occupied the position as representative of my own constituency for upwards of a quarter of a century. This whole correspondence was published during the last election; it was talked about throughout the country, and as a result, my majority was increased from the normal one of about 100 to about 500. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that so far as my constituents were concerned they took no stock whatever in this correspondence or in matters published throughout my constituency in regard to this matter. I would not, Sir, upon this occasion, take any objection to what has been said were it not that something has been said reflecting on members of the Government. I am able to defend myself on any public platform in this country, and I am prepared to do so on all occasions, but when it is said that Ministers of the Crown are connected with me in a matter which is alleged to be not of a proper character, it is my duty at the very outset to satisfy this House that they have nothing whatever to do with it. I entirely exonerate the Government from anything improper. It must have struck hon. gentlemen on reading this correspondence, that there is something very peculiar about it. In the first place, it is a private and confidential correspondence. It also appears that those letters were written in answer to other letters addressed to myself, and that some of the letters which have been suppressed are of a very important character. It must also have suggested itself to persons reading it that all this correspondence took place after these limits in the North-West Territories were granted to Mr. Adams, and that this has nothing whatever to do with my position as a member of Parliament. I propose to-day to supply to the House and the country some letters which have not been published, which will go a long way to explain the reason why some of the correspondence was written by myself, and also give several explanations regarding that correspondence, without which it might appear somewhat strange. Let me say, in the first place, as regards my being guilty of a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and as having prostituted my position as a member of Parliament, that, according to the law of the land, a law placed upon the Statute-book by the late Government, the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, that any person had the right to make application to the Government for a timber limit in the North-West Territories without tenders being asked, the old law had been repealed by the late Government, that any person could apply to the Government for the purpose of obtaining a limit in the North-West Territories. It is well known that this was taken advantage of, but I will not enter upon this question on this occasion. But in accordance with the law as it then stood, and the law is on the Statute-book, any company, composed of members of Parliament or other persons, had a perfect right to go to the Government and ask for a timber limit in the North-West Territories. I will state the facts briefly. On behalf of Mr. John Adams I was applied to get a timber limit in the North-West Territories. The correspondence leading up to that has not been published, and I propose to supply that, although I will not trouble the House with reading the letters in full, but I will place them in the hands of the official reporters of the House. I submit them in order to set myself right before the country and the House, and also to explain several observations made in the letters which have been published in the Globe. Mr. Adams, knowing that he had a perfect right to apply for a timber limit, wrote to me on 15th December, 1882, asking me to procure for him a limit in the North-West Territories, and asking me what proceeding he should adopt in order that he could get that limit. I replied, on 22nd December, that I received his letter, that I did not know when I would go to Ottawa, and if I could be any aid to him when I got there I would be pleased to assist him. I asked him in reference to different matters up there which will appear in the correspondence. On 18th January Mr. Adams wrote to me. He said:

"I think I have a good thing up here, and I am told by a timber agent that if I only apply to the Government I can get hold of it. Now, I do not know how to apply, and want you to help me, as I know you can if you like. Perhaps you can better yourself by helping me, as I will pay you well for all you do for me. Can I get up a company up here and apply for limits? I can get good men to help me. I have made a good deal of money up here and hope to make more."

"On 11th January I wrote to him:

"I know nothing of the prospects of getting limits, nor do I know what are the rules of the Department about applying. If you send me particulars of what you want, I will see the Department or send to my agent at Ottawa and enquire."

"Then, on the 25th January, I wrote again:

"I am delighted to hear you are making money. Nothing would please me better than to see you here again with a fortune. As regards the matter you speak of, I shall be pleased to assist you and the company in any way I can, and, of course, I would be glad to better myself in any way which is fair and honorable. It seems to me you ought to organise a company with good men, as you suggest, and then apply to the Government. I expect to be in Ottawa in two weeks, when I can perhaps do you service. Keep me posted as to what you want."

"I may state here that when the application was sent to me there was no location defined, and knowing that the Government would not allow a person to roam all over the North-West Territories, I asked that some specific description be given, in order that the Department would know what territory would be looked over by Mr. Adams to get the limit. On 10th February, 1882, I wrote to Mr. Adams:

"I cannot make out from the memo. sent me where the timber limit is, or the boundaries of the same. I have made enquiries in the Department, and they tell me it is necessary to state, as nearly as possible, the boundaries in the application, within which you wish to select fifty square miles—you cannot have any more,—but they will not permit you to wander all over the country. Think they will let you select the limit out of a defined area of 400 miles. I am afraid you are going into a very uncertain speculation, and better make more enquiries."

"Again, on 19th February, I wrote as follows:—

"After talking the matter over with you yesterday, I put in your application, but I am afraid you will have to be more definite in your description. They tell me in the office there is no timber within the area fixed by you. I will try to have application allowed soon as possible.

"On 20th March I wrote him again:
"Your application has been granted, but the Minister tells me that he thinks it will be worthless to you, as the limit is a good many hundred miles from any railway, and there is not likely to be any for years. They tell me you will have to take timber 1,300 miles by water to Winnipeg, and then compete with the disputed territory. This is your own business, and you must be contented with the right to select within an area of 400 square miles. The Government will not let you play Cook and Sutherland upon it."

"On the 25th of March Mr. Adams wrote to me:
"Why cannot you get a bigger piece to select from, as I do not know anything about the territory? It will cost a large amount for the survey. Don't you think you can take a share in it or get up a company in St. Catharines? I will be liberal to them."

"On 27th March I wrote:
"I cannot see any use in telling you a dozen times about the extent of territory that you can select from. You have now more than is usually granted. I am getting full instructions ready for the surveyor, and you can send him just as soon as I get the order. I would not invest any money in any such speculation, nor can I advise any of my friends to put money in a place of which I know nothing."

"On 8th April he writes:
"What keeps the instructions back; can't you hurry them up? I am sorry you did not get 800 square miles to pick from. I think the delay will make it very costly to have the survey made. I think I can get up a company in Winnipeg to pay $30,000 or $50,000; then you can apply for another for me."

"This, Mr. Speaker, you will see, will explain all the observations made in the letter which is published under my own hand on 8th April. I used the same expressions as Mr. Adams made in his letter to me. On 10th April reference is made to the same transaction, and on 11th April the Globe also refers to the same. On 16th April Mr. Adams says:

"What is keeping back the order for the surveyor? I am getting very uneasy. Just as soon as this is settled I can get up a company for $30,000 or $40,000, or put in the whole for $70,000 cash. If I succeed I wish to go for something else I have on hand."

"After the order was sent up to Mr. Adams, and he sent a survey party to look over the timber and to locate his limits, word came to Ottawa that the Canadian Pacific Railway were cutting down this timber, and I told him to notify the manager of the company not to trespass further on this limit. On 2nd July I received a letter from Mr. Adams as follows:—

"I send you word to-day that the Canadian Pacific Railway was cutting my timber; and after getting answer, notified the company. They have cut a good deal of the timber; and I think they will have to pay for it. Muckle thinks I can get the Canadian Pacific Railway to purchase at $60,000 or $70,000, and I am trying to get them to bite at it, anyway."

"This expression is explained in one of my letters. The letter continues:

"Can they not get the balance of the timber in the 400 miles? I will tell them to see you in Ottawa. I would like to work the limit if the Canadian Pacific Railway will not buy. It will pay better than all the cash we can get."

"What appears in my letter of the 24th is already explained. Adams writes to me from Winnipeg on 18th July:

"Mercer is back from the limit, and he will write you fully to-day. It is a great limit; and I am now satisfied the limit is well worth $150,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they must have the timber, as there is none nearer than Winnipeg. But they are a hard people to satisfy about the value, unless Muckle will tell them all about it. I will try to get them to feel the men in the office here. I will go to Ottawa as soon as you are ready."

"The letter of 25th July says that the surveyor has arrived and was preparing the documents to send down to Ottawa. On 3rd August, after the papers were sent Mr. Adams, he writes:

"I am so anxious about the affair that I will leave for Ottawa next week, and will meet you in Toronto on my way. I have got a regular bonanza. Don't let them beat me out of it after all my hard work and expense in paying thousands for surveys. I was talking to McCarthy about getting up a company; but Peter has not much faith in it. That is Mr. McCarthy of Winnipeg). I think I can sell for $80,000 or $90,000 cash, or I might get up a company and double that amount and take half in stock.

"Then I telegraphed to him that the field notes had arrived, but that the oath of the surveyor had not been attached to it, and he ought to have a new application sworn to. Later on an application was made to have this license issued, but in consequence of some opposition made to it in the Department which is not necessary for me to refer to, it was delayed for some length of time. I mention that fact, because, in one of the letters of 14th September it is stated that Mr. Bowell was helping. Now, the facts are briefly this, in explanation of what the hon. the Minister of Customs did. The application was sent here for a license, and the Minister being away at Rivière du Loup, I was compelled to ask some person in the Government to assist to have that put through as early as possible. I applied to Mr. Bowell and asked him if he would watch it, and when the opportunity arrived to speak of it. In no way did I ask his influence, for, on the contrary, the whole matter had gone beyond the range of influence altogether. The matter had passed out of the hands of the Department, and it was only necessary to have an order issued for the final issuing of the license. Therefore, I simply asked the Minister of Customs if he would look after the matter and see that the thing was satisfactorily arranged for me. That is all the correspondence which leads up to this matter. All the other correspondence referred to has reference entirely to what took place after the license had been issued, and after the Government had refused to renew the license, in consequence of the application made by the Canadian Pacific Railway for the alternate sections. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me here state to the House that when this application was made for this timber license there was no railway within 400 or 500 miles of it. At that time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were expected to carry their line up to the Yellowhead Pass. During the Session of Parliament after this license was granted the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made application to this Parliament to change their location, and the result was that the location of the railway came within twenty or thirty miles of this limit, so that it was by pure accident that it became valuable. You will see by the correspondence that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company set to work cutting down timber on the limit, in consequence of Mr. Muckle, their timber agent, who was interested in this very limit with Mr. Adams, having induced them to cut down the timber in order to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to buy it. I make that statement, because it was referred to in the correspondence. But when I applied to Mr. Van Horne in Montreal, at the instance of Mr. Adams, who telegraphed instructing me to go there, Mr. Van Horne stated to me that if the timber was cut down he would make it good. Up to that time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made no claim; but in January, 1883, after the limit was sold, then for the first time it was discovered that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made up their mind to secure the limit if at all possible. They claimed the alternate sections. It then became my duty, as representing Mr. Adams, to see the sale of the property carried out. Mr. Sands, who had secured the limit, insisted that I should see that the transaction was completed. I came to the Government, went before the Department, and asked them to renew the license. They said that it could not be done, because the Canadian Pacific Railway claimed the property. I urged as strongly as I could that it was the duty of the Government, having given the license long before the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had located their line, to see that the licensee was protected. I was urged to do so by Mr. Sands, whose correspondence I have here, and who insisted on it being done by myself.

"He said, on 21st February, 1880:

"I trust you will be able to protect my interest in this land transaction, for which services I will be happy to pay on demand."

"On 10th April, 1883, he wrote:

"Should anyone interfere with my limit, I shall telegraph you to advise how to proceed."

"Again, on 4th May, 1883, he wrote:

"I trust you will continue to uphold and defend my rights and title to the whole limit on Cypress Hills, and that you will soon be able to obtain for me the necessary limit."

"On 5th June, 1883, he wrote:

"Hence, I trust, and am in hopes still that you will succeed in getting me a license for the whole limit, in which event I will have lost nothing. If, however, you fail to induce your Government to do this act of justice, you will undoubtedly get me a license for the even-sections as soon as possible."

"On 23rd September, 1883, he wrote:

"Trusting you will look after my interests and not let any opportunity slip that may tend to increase my claim or strengthen our side of the case.

"In consequence of this, I urged very strongly on the Government that it was their duty to protect this licensee, and not allow the railway company to go into the unsurveyed territory and take that property. I fortified myself with an opinion from a distinguished member of the firm of Blake, Kerr, Lash & Cassels, of Toronto, which confirmed my own opinion that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had no right, in consequence of the deflection of their line, to take away the license given to another party in the unsurveyed territory. The title was passed by the firm of McArthur & Tupper, of Washington, a firm composed of Mr. McArthur, Mr. Dexter, Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Tupper. The moment it was found that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were endeavoring to take this timber limit, or to destroy it, I telegraphed to Mr. Sands to send Mr. McArthur to Ottawa, in order to show what they had done, and in order to have the matter set right. That is the reference I made to Mr. Tupper and Mr. Macdonald coming here. Those young gentlemen came here and did their duty; in the matter and asked nothing for their services, and got nothing for them. They did what they were bound to do, according to the law, as the solicitors of Mr. Sands. I wish to refer here to one of the letters, a portion of which is printed as follows:—

"I have to go to Ottawa to-morrow night to fight the matter out, which I do not like. I mean to have all the harder part of it to do. I have Bowell working for me, and if we succeed in beating the railway, we will have to pay the amount we agreed to pay, as you recollect, when we two were at the Queen's Hotel."

"This letter is not printed properly; there should be a full stop after 'Bowell working for me.' I put the matter before the Government, and they thought that it was fair that the license should be renewed if at all possible, but they thought that the agreement made between Mr. Adams and myself at the Queen's Hotel in Toronto should be carried out, that if any person would cause the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to abandon their claim, they should be paid for it. There were several persons in this city—Mr. Muckle, Mr. Kirby and others—who offered their services, and claimed that they could have this difficulty removed by the payment of $5,000 or $6,000 each. After consideration, it was decided that it was better to buy out the Canadian Pacific Railway claim and pay these gentlemen the money they asked, but no member of the Government, directly or indirectly, ever insinuated that any money was to be paid for their services, or anything of the kind. It was the duty of the Government to see that the license was properly and satisfactorily carried out. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no use of my enlarging much longer on this question. I have explained the correspondence leading to this transaction. The limit was applied for when any person could apply for it, and what took place took place in consequence of the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who finally sold out their rights to Mr. Sands for $2.25 per acre, after working the limit for upwards of a year. So, that you will see, so far as I was personally concerned, all I did was done in my capacity as Mr. Sand's solicitor and entirely in his behalf. In my position as a member of Parliament I acted in good faith, and in obtaining that license I did what any other member of Parliament had a right to do. I had no faith myself in the enterprise, not knowing where the property was and not thinking it worth anything, and the whole thing was carried out by me in good faith, and did not affect my position as member of Parliament. Of course, I am not responsible for the publication of this correspondence, which I had hoped we had heard the end of after the trouble we had in the county of Lincoln, and after all this correspondence had been hawked about the country, and after the attempts that were made to induce me to buy it, which I refused to do. I will read to the House a telegram which I receive to-day, voluntarily, from Mr. Patterson, of St. Catharines, who was my opponent in the last election, a gentleman who is distinguished in that city, and who acted as the solicitor for Mr. Adams in the suit between that gentleman and me, which suit, I may say, was settled amicably in court. The correspondence had nothing whatever to do with that settlement, but it was in consequence simply of a suggestion coming from Mr. Samuel Blake, who acted for one party, and Mr. Osler, who acted for the other, and it was agreed that the correspondence should be destroyed, and Mr. Patterson telegraphed me to-day, referring to the correspondence published in the Globe of Saturday last, as follows:—

"I beg to say I am more surprised than yourself at the publication of this correspondence. The suit was settled agreeably to my client, and one of the terms of the agreement was that the correspondence should be copied and no use made of the copies, and this, speaking for myself and to the best of my belief, for my clients, has been faithfully adhered to. If the correspondence has been given publication by me or my client, it must certainly be a gross breach of faith and in violation of the signed agreement entered into."

"I hold the original agreement signed by the counsel for the parties in which the whole matter was discussed. Now it has been dragged to the light of day, and I care not for myself personally, so long as I entirely exonerate the Government from any blame in the matter. I am prepared to defend myself, and have done so successfully in the county of Lincoln, where I was returned by a majority of five hundred at the last elections."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the right hon. the First Minister brought down, as he said he would, copies of the Orders in Council referred to in this agreement."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman asked me for it, and I consented to bring down the papers, but I did not know he wanted them for this discussion."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman will leave it on the Table, that will do."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to make a motion, I do not propose to go into a discussion, and lose time by so doing, but merely beg to move:—

"That whereas certain matters and documents reading as follows:—

"I presume the House will permit me to consider these as read."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand from the right hon. the First Minister that the House will consider them as read."

"— certain matters and documents reading as follows:— * * * as published in the Globe newspaper of 8th February, containing divers statements affecting certain members of this House, and if it is expedient that the House should have an opportunity of examining the same, it is ordered, that the said letters above cited be printed in the Votes and Proceedings for the use of members."

"The House is now in possession of the hon. member for Lincoln's explanations. I desire that the House should have the other documents which piece out the documents the hon. gentleman has referred to; and when the House is fully seized of them, we will be in a position to deal with this matter. I should be very glad, therefore, if the House will permit me, to include in that motion:—

"And any other papers or correspondence that the hon. member for Lincoln desires to have included."

"My wish being that the House should be seized of everything."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have asked the hon. gentleman, as it is a matter which affects him so considerably, if he requires a notice, and he only brings the condition, which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is willing to grant, that besides the papers that hon. gentleman has moved for, the hon. member for Lincoln will be at liberty to put in the Votes and Proceedings any other papers in connection with the matter."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose all the hon. gentleman's papers are dated?"

"Mr. RYKERT. They are all in regular order. I have never put anything irregular before the House."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would make it more convenient for the use of hon. gentlemen if the letters the hon. gentleman wishes to interpolate were placed in order, as some of them are letters in reply to those contained in the document I have handed in."

"Mr. RYKERT. I have a hundred more, if the hon. gentleman would like to have them."

"Mr. SPEAKER. As this motion must go into the Votes and Proceedings, what papers are required should be described."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for Lincoln will put in within twenty-four hours all the papers, and we will have the whole story."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection in the world to that."

"Mr. SPEAKER. The correspondence should be defined, so that we may know what papers are to be printed in the Votes and Proceedings."

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest that, in order that the hon. member for Lincoln may put in all his papers, the hon. member will postpone his motion until to-morrow, and all the papers can be put in to-morrow."

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection to that. It is perfectly fair that the hon. member for Lincoln should put his side of the question as fully as he pleases.

"Motion withdrawn.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member for Lincoln, I suppose, will send me within a reasonable time a list of the papers he wants inserted, so that I can add them to this motion, as suggested by the First Minister.

"Mr. RYKERT. I will hand them to Hansard, but will not copy them for the hon. gentleman.

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not require the hon. gentleman to copy them. No doubt the Hansard will copy them, and he can get them back from Hansard. All I want is to be enabled to make this motion in the form suggested by the First Minister.

"Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand the hon. member for Lincoln to say that he has handed in to Hansard all the papers he proposes to include. If that be the case, is there any object in delaying the motion, or does the hon. gentleman wish to hand the papers to the hon. member for South Oxford, so that they may be included?

"Mr. RYKERT. I propose that they shall go to Hansard at once, and they can be got back from Hansard and handed to the hon. gentleman.

"Mr. BOWELL. Before this question is closed, I desire to say one or two words in connection with the use of my name in this correspondence. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman of the conversation he had with me while the right hon. the First Minister, who, I think, was then Minister of the Interior, was absent at Rivière du Loup, is substantially correct; but I think he might have added that he had represented to me that the Canadian Pacific Railway had diverted their line some distance to the south in order to enable them to take possession of this timber limit for which he had obtained a license. If my recollection serves me right, I replied that in such case I thought his interests ought to be protected, and that I should bring the matter before my colleagues at the earliest possible moment. If that be a crime, I am sure it is one I have committed a great many times since I have been a member of the Government. There is scarcely a member of the House who has had any business with the Customs Department—and they are not a few—to whom I have not given precisely the same answer. To that portion of the correspondence I have no objection, but when I find the letter of 20th January couched in language of this kind, I think it must either be a misprint, or that the hon. gentleman was singularly unfortunate in selecting language to convey his ideas of what he was doing in Ottawa in connection with the extension of the lease or the re-issue of the lease to him. I find in the letter of 28th January the following language:—

"I have to go to Ottawa to-morrow night to fight the matter out, which I do not like. I mean to have all the hardest part of it to do. I have Bowell working for me. And if we succeed in beating the railway, we will have to pay the amount we agreed to pay, as you recollect, when we two were at the Queen's Hotel. I have not slept any for a week on account of this. We must keep perfectly quiet."

"A little further on he says:

"I am engaging all I can to assist me at Ottawa, and we will have to pay 'hem well for it, as we cannot afford to lose this."

"This language has to be taken in connection with the language of 12th February, in which he says, writing to Mr. Adams:

"I have not yet succeeded in doing anything, but I am pulling wires in every direction. John A.'s son from Winnipeg, McArthur's partner, is here, and I intend employing him to go for his father. I think if you had young Tupper here, and paid him pretty well, he would help us materially. The Canadian Pacific Railway has a great hold on the Government, and we must counteract this in some way."

"I may say, to avoid any charge of misquotation, that I am omitting certain portions of these letters. He goes on:

"I am completely sick of it, as it is something I had no right to expect, and which I should not be called upon to undertake. If it costs all we spoke of, we had better do it than let it go."

"In another letter, dated 5th March, 1883, he says: "I have not yet succeeded in getting anything done in the limit matter. I have brought Macdonald and Tupper from Winnipeg, and hope they will be able to induce their fathers to act properly in the matter."

"Mr. RYKERT. It should be 'promptly.'

"Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is evident that what the hon. gentleman intended was that what was done promptly was done properly.

Mr. BOWELL.

"Mr. BOWELL. I think, if the dates are looked at, the hon. gentleman will find that it was not done promptly. The writer goes on:

"I am almost discouraged at the delay. Sands is writing me daily about it. He knows all about it. Some persons sent him the papers containing the statements. Will make any effort this week, and must do something, if we have to let a note apiece go"—

"Whatever that may mean. Then, on the 8th March he writes:

"I find difficulties surrounding us in every way in reference to the limit, and I find that the Canadian Pacific Railway have certain Ministers working for them. I am afraid it will cost us each six or seven thousand dollars to get this made all right. I have five or six at work for me, and have agreed to pay them well if they succeed. Muckle was here and told me the limit was all within the belt. I am afraid they will do their very utmost to defeat me. I want to be satisfied that you are sure I am doing what is right, and also that you will back me out in all that I do in the way of payment."

"On the 28th March, 1883, I find the following:—

"I am having a hard time with the limit matter. It will cost us each at least $5,500 to get this through. I have laid my ropes so that I expect to have it settled in a few days. I have a dozen at work for us. You must be prepared to pay the amount of your share at any time, as it will have to be all cash. I had Tupper and Macdonald brought from Winnipeg, and they have been working hard for me."

"In regard to this correspondence, I have simply to say, that while I admit the interview to which the hon. gentleman refers—and every Minister has to grant an interview to any and every gentleman who has business with the Department—I cannot reconcile the language in the subsequent letters which I have read with the explanation which the hon. gentleman has made. If the statements in those letters mean anything, they mean that the Canadian Pacific Railway had six members of the Government working for them, in order to deprive the hon. gentleman of a right which he had obtained for his client in these limits; that the balance of the members of the Cabinet were working for him, and that, if they succeed in obtaining what he wanted, they were to be well paid. The hon. gentleman denies that. I cannot possibly imagine that he intended to convey that meaning, but I repeat what I have already said, that, either he has been singularly unfortunate in the use of the English language to convey his meaning and his ideas, or he meant to convey to the men for whom he was working that he had purchased the balance of the Cabinet for the insignificant sum of $5,500. I should be glad to hear from the hon. gentleman before this discussion closes an explanation of this point. I do not think it is necessary for any member of the Cabinet to make a distinct and positive, or even an indirect, denial of the statements made in those letters, if my interpretation of the language used is correct; but I again repeat, and with a good deal of emphasis, that I can put no other construction upon that language. I hope to hear from the hon. gentleman that he did not intend to convey that construction. If he did, I desire to give it, in the most emphatic language, the most positive denial.

An hon. MEMBER. A lie.

"Mr. BOWELL. I might in such a case, as suggested by an hon. gentleman opposite, designate it by stronger language. In justice to Mr. Hugh John Macdonald and Mr. Tupper, I am bound to read a telegram from the former gentleman. In these letters it is stated that Messrs. Macdonald and Tupper were brought to Ottawa in order to operate upon, or compel, or induce their fathers to do what the hon. gentleman thought was right. In the last letter I read he says:

"I had Tupper and Macdonald brought from Winnipeg, and they have been working hard for me."

On the 11th February, Mr. Macdonald telegraphs as follows:—

"Our firm acted as solicitors for purchasers of Rykert limit and charged ordinary fees. Neither Stewart—

"That is Mr. Tupper—

"—nor I had any interest in the limit or acted for or received any money from Rykert, and never went to Ottawa about the matter. Am writing,

"HUGH J. MACDONALD."
"It is only justice to those gentlemen that I should read this to the House, in reply to the statement that they were brought here to operate upon their parents in this matter. That is a question which I leave to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) to settle with Messrs. Macdonald and Tupper. I deem it justice to myself and to this firm to have made the statement, and having done so, I leave the matter with the House to form their own opinion as to the character of this correspondence, and those who are assailed in it.

"Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman certainly could not have understood my explanations with reference to the payments of moneys. I distinctly stated that it was agreed at the Queen's Hotel, in Toronto, that certain moneys should be paid to parties who had volunteered their services to get the Canadian Pacific Railway claim removed. One of those gentlemen said he could get it removed for $5,000, another said he could get it removed for $3,000, and they made certain propositions. I stated distinctly that no member of the Government, either directly or indirectly, ever took anything or asked for anything. I put that as strong as I could. As regards the telegram received, all I can say is this: that I wrote to Mr. McArthur, the senior member of the firm, asking him to send those gentlemen to Ottawa. Mr. Sands also saw Mr. McArthur, other persons saw them, Mr. Abbott saw them also, asking him to send those gentlemen down to explain the matter and see what the position was. I saw these gentlemen in Ottawa and spoke in reference to that matter. I urged them to see what the facts were. That is as clear as noonday. I am quite satisfied that these gentlemen, when they come here, will recollect distinctly the conversation, for I asked them to go and see what could be done. Sir Charles Tupper distinctly stated to me that the line having been deflected by the railway company they were bound to protect the licensee. He said he would take the bull by the horns and see that the matter was properly attended to, if at all possible.

"Mr. McCARTHY. I find that my name is mentioned in this correspondence, and certainly, under other circumstances, I should not have thought it of sufficient importance to bring it before the House; but as the matter is now mentioned here upon the floor of the House, I think it well to state what my connection with the transaction was. In the month of January, 1882, at the request of two constituents of mine, of the name of Shortreed & Laidlaw, a lumbering firm, I forwarded to the Minister an application for a certain limit which they described, and of which, I think, they sent a plan. In response to that I received a reply that the limit would not be sold at that time, which reply I communicated to my constituents, Messrs. Shortreed & Laidlaw. I have not any recollection, though at this time I would not say it was impossible, that I ever interfered in the matter further until the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), as is stated in this letter, told me that the Government had arranged, or the Department had arranged, that this limit should be sold, but that as Messrs. Shortreed & Laidlaw's application was first, some arrangement would have to be made with them. A brother of Mr. Laidlaw, Mr. William Laidlaw, was acting, as I have learned, as solicitor for the firm of Messrs. Shortreed & Laidlaw. I communicated with him, and from that time out the arrangement was made by Mr. William Laidlaw and the hon. member for Lincoln. The arrangement was, as I remember it, that the limit that had been applied for by Messrs. Shortreed & Laidlaw should be granted to them if it turned out that the timber was upon that part; and if there was any timber to be found there, at their joint expense a surveyor should be sent up; and if timber was not upon the portion for which they applied, then the limit was to go to the gentleman for whom the member for Lincoln was acting. I heard nothing more of the matter until some time, I think late in August, when I was again appealed to by these gentlemen, who said that they had learned that something was being done which they did not think was fair or right by their claim. They begged of me to come down to Ottawa and see about it. I put them off; I said it was useless to go, the Ministers were away; but I promised to write, and I did write to the Department, claiming that nothing should be done until I had an opportunity of coming to the Capital. When I came here afterwards, in the month of September, I found the limit was granted to the applicant, Mr. Adams, for whom the member for Lincoln was acting. I reported that to my constituents, or, rather, to their solicitor, Mr. William Laidlaw, and my connection in the matter practically then ceased. They were very much dissatisfied. I need not go into that now, because I had no connection with that. They were very much dissatisfied indeed, and I think they appealed subsequently to the Department with reference to it; but, practically, from that time out I had nothing more to do with it. I had no interest, direct or indirect, with Messrs. Shortreed & Laidlaw; my whole concern was in forwarding the application of my constituents, this lumbering firm that I have spoken of.

"Mr. MITCHELL. I think, before we depart from this very interesting subject, it is desirable to say something more about it. I feel it to be due to the Minister of Customs to say that, whatever other people may think of his conduct in this matter, his explanation entirely removes any doubt that might have existed in the minds of any person in relation to that correspondence. I am sure that there is no person in this House who read that correspondence but will pronounce it an infamous correspondence, so far as it relates to the Minister of Customs. Therefore I think the House should feel that he has given a full and ample explanation, and has quite removed from himself and his reputation any suspicion that he ever received any money, or acted in any way improperly. There are other members of the Cabinet here who were in that Cabinet at that time. I must say that having been myself a member of a Cabinet for a long time, and having sat with some of those gentlemen, particularly my right hon. friend, I feel sure that not one of those gentlemen ever received, or would receive, any such means to promote an object such as referred to in that correspondence. I think it is due to those hon. gentlemen themselves, it is due to their position, it is due to the honor and the credit of Canada, that they should severally disavow, as the Minister of Customs has done, any connection with that transaction, and repudiate the idea that men occupying the high position of advisers of Her Majesty would sully their position, or tamper with their reputation and character, by being guilty of anything such as imputed in that correspondence. I do not believe that one of them would do it, and I should be happy to hear a statement of that kind from them.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not the slightest objection to make such a statement. I thought that I had done so the other day, when the matter was first brought up. In the beginning of this transaction I was Minister of the Interior, but before it was all finished, I think, Sir David Macpherson was Minister of the Interior. I am sure neither myself nor my successor in anyway received any consideration of any kind, pecuniary or otherwise, for any of the transactions concerning this license. I almost think that the House would not even require this statement from me. The hon. member himself (Mr. Rykert) disavows any such intention, although I quite agree with the Minister of Customs that the language is singularly unfortunate—it is singularly unfortunate. As regards the solicitors who were employed by Mr. Adams, I think they were my son and the son of Sir Charles Tupper. Those are both young men, fighting their way as solicitors. I cannot speak about the wealth of my son's partner, but as far as my son is concerned, he had to fight his own battle. I gave him his education, and that is all. He is fighting his own way, and I believe he is doing it honestly and uprightly. Whatever may be his faults, I am quite sure that want of honor or honesty is not one of them. There is a remarkable discrepancy between a statement in the telegram that the Minister of Customs has read from my son and the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln. He says that these two gentlemen were here; this telegram says they were not here. The letter which will be here, I suppose, this week, will most likely throw some light upon this discrepancy. As for myself, I can throw no light upon it, because I do not remember the presence of either of these two gentlemen. I dare say that most probably they have written—at least Mr. McArthur, who was then their partner, was looking after this matter; and whether he carried on the correspondence on behalf of the clients of those two gentlemen, I cannot say. The correspondence in the Department will, however, show who carried on the correspondence on behalf of Mr. Sands, who bought from Mr. Adams. It will be shown whether Mr. McArthur or Mr. Tupper, or the firm as a whole, carried on the correspondence. I will lay this correspondence before the House.

"Copy of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 17th April, 1882.

"On a Memorandum, dated 10th April, 1882, from the Minister of the Interior, recommending that Mr. John Adams be granted a yearly license to cut timber on a berth of fifty square miles, to be surveyed within six months, at his expense, and within the following described locality, namely: Commencing at a point which is distant five miles, measured due west, from a post which is planted between Sections twenty-five and thirty-six, in Township seven, Range one, west of the Fourth Principal Meridian, in the North-West Territories, thence due north twenty miles; thence due west twenty miles; thence due south twenty miles; thence due east to place of beginning.

"That the lease be on the terms and under the conditions as to survey of berth, erection of mills and payment of dues that are provided by the Regulations established by Order in Council of the 11th of November, 1881.

"The Committee submit the above recommendation for Your Excellency's approval.

"Certified,

"(Sgd.) JOHN J. MCGEE,
"Asst. Clerk, P. C.

"The Honorable

"The Minister of the Interior."

"CERTIFIED COPY of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by His Honor the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the 19th September, 1882.

"On a Report, dated 16th September, 1882, from the Minister of the Interior, representing that, with reference to an Order in Council dated 17th April last, granting a timber license to Mr. John Adams, the required survey has now been made, and the returns thereof examined and approved by the Dominion Lands Office within the prescribed period.

"The Minister accordingly recommends that a yearly license, under the Regulations approved by the Governor in Council, 11th November, 1881, be granted to the said John Adams for a timber berth containing thirty-seven and a half square miles, more or less, shown on a plan dated 15th August, 1882, herewith attached, made by Dominion Land Surveyor J. W. Vaughan, and duly filed in the Dominion Lands Office of the Department of the Interior.

"The Committee advises that the license be granted to Mr. John Adams, as recommended.

"CERTIFIED COPY of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 3rd of March, 1884.

"On a memorandum, dated 28th February, 1884, from the Minister of the Interior, submitting that, by an Order in Council dated 17th April, 1882, authority was granted to the Minister of the Interior to issue to Mr. John Adams, lumberman, of Winnipeg, a yearly license to cut timber on the terms and conditions provided by the Regulations, and that on the 19th September following, the limit in the meantime having been surveyed, another Order in Council was passed, granting to Mr. Adams a yearly license to cut timber on a berth of 37½ square miles, more or less, as shown on a plan attached to the said last-mentioned Order in Council.

"The Minister observes that in the month of January, 1883, it was discovered that the land covered by the license came within the Canadian Pacific Railway Belt, and that, therefore, the odd-numbered sections fell to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

"The Minister represents that on a renewal of the license being applied for, Mr. Adams' solicitor was informed that such renewal could be granted only for the even-numbered sections, these being all that belonged to the Dominion, and that the representatives of Mr. Adams (he being deceased) now apply for a license for the even-numbered sections only in the tract covered by the license originally granted to Mr. Adams. The licensees have paid the rent and incurred a large expenditure in fulfilling the conditions of the license.

"The Minister recommends that he be authorised to grant to the representatives of the late Mr. Adams a yearly license to cut timber on the even-numbered sections and fractions of even-numbered sections within the tract applied for, as shown upon the plan hereto attached, and colored pink, upon the usual terms and conditions.

"The Committee advise that a license be granted accordingly.

"Clerk Privy Council.

"The Minister of the Interior."

were published in the Citizen newspaper under date of 11th February instant, in explanation of certain letters published in the Globe newspaper under date of the 8th February instant, respecting the granting of a certain lease to cut timber to one John Adams, and it is expedient that the House should have an opportunity of examining the same, it is ordered, that the said letters and documents above recited be printed in the Votes and Proceedings for the use of members, together with the statement made by the hon. member for Lincoln in the House of Commons on the 13th day of February instant, and the remarks made thereon by certain members of the House of Commons as reported and printed in the official report of the debates of the House of Commons on the 13th February instant, and including copies of Orders in Council laid on the Table on the 17th instant.

Mr. LAURIER. I fully appreciate the motives, and I am sure everybody in this House appreciates the motives, which led the hon. gentleman to endeavor to lay before this House and to put upon the Journals all the information which he gave on a former occasion. To this there cannot be the slightest objection. But the hon. gentleman also couples with this, a desire to insert on the Journals of this House a certain newspaper article, a letter written by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), in the Citizen. I am not quite sure that it would be proper to put upon the Journals of this House such a communication as that, a simple newspaper article, but as the newspaper article is intermingled with certain letters which were exchanged at one time between the member for Lincoln and different parties, and which are, in substance, part of the charge and part of the information which is already before this House, I think, on the whole, we might allow the whole matter to be printed. I am not sure, however, that it should be considered a precedent, but as the object of the House is that all the information connected with this matter should be laid before the members, I would, for my part, agree to the motion of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to raise any objections to anything being put on the Journals which tend to seize the House clearly of all the facts; but it does appear to me that it is a dangerous precedent to take any letters of this kind—published after the member has had the opportunity of stating every material fact that he thought necessary to bring before the House. I will just call the attention of the First Minister to one point: You are about to publish here a communication from the hon. member for Lincoln which appeared in the Citizen. If my memory serves me—it is some days since I read that—the hon. member for Lincoln made some reflections, or something which may be construed as reflections, on another member of this House now present. Suppose that hon. member chooses to publish another letter, and asks it to go on the Journals. It strikes me we might find our Journals inconveniently loaded, and of this kind of thing there might be no end. I am not going to oppose the motion, but I desire to call the attention of the House, and, in particular, of the First Minister, who has had a long experience, to what appears to me to be certain obvious inconveniences that may flow from this particular precedent. I do not exactly see, primâ facie, that they could be very well avoided, if my hon. friend to whom I alluded should see fit to demand that his further explanation be put on record.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that it is without precedent ; I think it will be found in England that newspaper articles have been made a portion of the Journals on particular occasions. However, there is no fear of this being made a precedent, I hope. The House has got control of its own Journals, and can always prevent anything being inserted upon them that it would be inexpedient to have there. We have got control of the Journals, and the precedent on a former occasion of a newspaper article being made part of the Journals would be of very little importance. But I would point out to the hon. gentleman that, I think my hon. friend asks that this letter should be interpreted as a portion of the whole of these proceedings, not on account of the member for Lincoln, but on account of the fact that his name has been improperly used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I say, I do not propose to interfere ; but it appeared to me that it was quite sufficient to place on the Journals what had already been agreed to. However, I will raise no further objection, but I will make this suggestion : The First Minister has been good enough to lay on the Table of the House three copies of reports of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council ; it would be a convenience to have those printed and add them to the hon. gentleman's motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would move to add :

Copies of the Order in Council having reference to this timber limit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does appear to me that this is rather an unusual proceeding, to publish, along with the other papers, the letter which the hon. member for Lincoln addressed to a newspaper in defence of the course which he had taken. Now, that does not necessarily form any part of the proceedings. The letters which were embraced in that communication, and which I understand were then given to the public for the first time, were included in the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford. The member for Lincoln rose in his place in this House and made a full explanation ; he gave an explanation which altogether superseded any explanation or defence which he may have made to the newspaper. Then I understood that the hon. Minister of Customs entered into a discussion of the use of his name by the member for Lincoln, not speaking on account of anything that appeared in that communication to the Citizen newspaper, but on account of the way in which his name was used in the correspondence that had taken place at a very much earlier period, that is, the correspondence relating to this particular transaction. It does seem to me that the House has all the information necessary before it, and upon which the Minister of Customs may base any action which he may choose to take, without publishing in the Journals of the House the communication which the member for Lincoln addressed to the newspaper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope my hon. friend will not press his objection. My hon. friend beside me thinks it is important that it should appear in the Votes and Proceedings. I think, however, if it is a precedent it is a bad one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not pressing the matter ; I am just calling attention to what seems to me to be the obvious view of the case.

Mr. COOK. I object to this motion because the statement made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) is false, and I object to a false statement going into the records of this House. The hon. member has made a statement, and in that statement he has declared a falsehood, and I am prepared to prove the falsehood that is declared in that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. COOK. The member is not in his seat, and I therefore object to the statement going upon the records of this House.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE MODUS VIVENDI.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to point out to the First Minister that the time will soon be at hand when our people interested in the fisheries along the coast will be making their preparations, and they will be very glad to know, if the hon. gentleman is in a position to inform the House, whether any negotiations have been undertaken or are in progress looking to the restoration of the modus vivendi for the approaching season. Of course, I only desire such information as the hon. gentleman may be prepared to give, and I shall be glad to know if he can communicate to the House any probabilities regarding that question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will say, in answer to my hon. friend, that the whole of the questions which are considered to be open between Canada and the United States are now the subject of communication between Her Majesty's Minister and the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Blaine—the whole of them ; but the question that more especially now engages the attention of the negotiating parties is the Behring Sea question. The whole of the questions connected with the fisheries, as well as the Behring Sea question, are, however, the subject of discussion. As regards the modus vivendi, I would ask the hon. gentleman not to press that question just now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to state what I have heard about this matter, and I have heard it with deep regret. I have been informed since I spoke yesterday that the subject is being dealt with directly by the American Minister at the Court of St. James' and the Foreign Office in London, and that, practically, the matter is settled, and settled to the disadvantage of Canada. It is reported that, practically, the American contention has been conceded, and I am informed, and I believe correctly informed, that almost a settlement has been arrived at, and, so far as we know, this has been done without Canada having had anything to say about it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say to my hon. friend that his information is altogether inaccurate; that the matter has been relegated by Her Majesty's Government to be treated at Washington, and at Washington exclusively. Now we are really at the threshold of these discussions and negotiations.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear that the question is not settled, as I supposed it was.

ALLEGED CAPTURE OF A WHITE GIRL BY INDIANS.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior whether his Department has any information as to the white girl held captive by the Blackfeet Indians? An hon. member laughs. This is a matter which may be of small importance to him, but there are people who will consider it a matter of very great importance. I call the attention of the Minister to an article in the MacLeod Gazette, which reads as follows:—

"Last week the Gazette referred to the fact that a white girl was a captive among the Blackfeet Indians. We mentioned the age of the girl as being about five or six years. We have since learned that she is quite nine years old. Some doubt has been expressed in several quarters as to the truth of the story told in the Gazette last week. There is not the slightest doubt that it is true in every particular. Winnipeg Jack, whose captive the girl is, is an Indian. He can speak English, and since Lord Stanley's visit to the reserve he has been made an interpreter. The story, as told by the Indians, is that the child was captured in a raid made by the Indians on the other side of the line, in which her father, an American officer, was killed. Now that the Government are aware of the facts, for if they are not they should be, it will be their sacred duty to take immediate and prompt action to rescue this girl, even if it brings every Indian in the North-West Territories about their ears. There is no time to be lost. The girl is said to be nine years old, and if she is to be saved from the horrible fate that is surely in store for her, should she remain where she is, there must be no delay, but prompt action. There should be no parleying."

I think this may be information which is not in the possession of the Government, and now that it is made public, prompt action should be taken by the head of the Department in regard to this matter. I feel it to be my duty to ask the hon. gentleman whether his Department has any information in regard to it, and, if it has not, I desire to bring it to his attention?

Mr. DEWDNEY. If the hon. gentleman had given me notice that he proposed to make this enquiry to-day, I would have brought the papers in connection with the subject. It was during last summer that the matter was first brought to the attention of the Government. An enquiry was made, and we hold the correspondence in the Department, which correspondence I shall be happy to bring down, or show to the hon. gentleman if he should be inclined to see it. Upon enquiry made, and from information obtained from the Indians on the reserve where the white child is supposed to be, it appears that the child is the daughter of the woman with whom she is now living. When the matter was brought to my attention, I remembered that I had seen the child myself, and while she appears to have white blood in her veins, it never struck me that she was a white child. The woman has another child, about three years of age, who is as light in color as the girl who is supposed to be the daughter of the American officer. I do not believe she is a white child, but we are making full enquiries, and we propose to follow them up in order to ascertain whether the assertion I have heard made is correct or not. I think it is not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of Bill (No. 10) to further amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 50, respecting the North-West Territories; the motion of Mr. Davin in amendment thereto, and the motion of Mr. Beausoleil in amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the sentiment will be re-echoed by many of us, when I say that it was not without a deep feeling of anxiety that I heard the beginning of this debate. I am still surer to respond to the feelings of all in expressing the sincere hope that, after all, it will be for the better that the debate had taken place, as it will dispel every suspicion and prevent any misunderstanding; and in that respect I cannot refrain from thanking the hon. gentlemen opposite, for their moderation, their sincerity and their patriotic stand, in discussing this delicate, this dangerous question. Let us hope that the debate will continue in the same spirit. The sensation-mongers who expected to see the parliamentary arena transformed into a regular battle-field will be disappointed, but the good name of the Canadian representatives, the good credit of the country will gain in value all that our detractors will lose in their expectations. It was thought, nay, it was predicted, that the inflammable materials which enter into the composition of all societies would be set on fire, and that our fine Dominion would soon be all in a blaze; let us hope—and it looks so, fortunately—let us hope that those inflammable elements, suspicion, prejudice and rivalry, will all be consumed and nothing will be left but the fine, solid, sterling gold frame of our young Confederation, more solid and brighter than ever, inviting the admiration of the world as it invites the covetous eye of our powerful neighbor. Were it not for that hope, were it not for the happy turn that the discussion has taken, I would say that it is with a sense of deep regret that I have seen the Bill placed before the House by the hon. member for North Simcoe. I thought, and I had hoped the day had gone by when we would be called upon to discuss questions conducive to no public good, irritating in their nature and unjust in their object. It was to be expected that in the latter end of the nineteenth century, ideas which savor of what are considered by many as dark ages, would not be advocated in a British Canadian Parliament, advocated by one of the most eminent members of a profession where forbearance, liberality and good fellowship are so universally practised. The hon. member for Simcoe has argued very strongly against the propriety of enacting the right to dual language in the North-West from the fact that, at the time of the cession of Canada, no such clause was inserted in the Articles of Capitulation, in the Treaty of Paris, in the Quebec Act of 1774, and in the Act of 1791. Discouragingly blind in the perception of historical facts, in the appreciation of significant events, the hon. member has not seen that the law of nations secured that right to a people who had against them the fate of war, but who were not conquered, in the strict sense of the word, since the last regular engagement of that war, the battle at Ste. Foye; was a brilliant victory for the French; and if the hon. member had only taken some of the first official documents under the military regime which followed the Cession, he would have found that the British generals, still smarting under the irritation of a long and obstinate struggle, were more generous to their foes of yesterday than is my hon. friend for the inoffensive descendants of the discoverers and first settlers of the Hudson's Bay and Rupert's Land. It is a fact worthy of consideration, a fact which should not be overlooked, that, acting according to his instructions, or applying simply the general laws which govern the relations between the conquerors and the vanquished, General Murray, the first Governor of Quebec, used the French language in all his dealings with the King's new subjects. I hold in my hand his proclamation, dated 1764, which enacts in what manner his future proclamations shall be published, and it is in French. General Carleton, afterwards Lord Dorchester, issued a proclamation in 1770, before the "Quebec Act," in which he states that proclamations shall be made in English and in French. All the ordinances of the Quebec Gazette, which is made up chiefly of official documents, are printed in English and in French, from the date of its first issue in 1764. Have I not reason to wonder, Mr. Speaker, that over one century ago we can find such liberal ideas prevailing, in comparison with those of self-styled high-toned and high-minded gentlemen of this enlightened age? Taking at a glance a general view of the policy of the British Government in this country, I am glad to say that I find that it has always been most intelligent, most liberal, except for some period when the home Government was inspired by the misrepresentations of some of their friends in Canada. I regret also that the hon. member should have thought fit to bring in this Bill—which, according to the plan of campaign expounded in the press and in the public meetings of the Equal Righters, is the first practical step in the hostile movement directed against a people whose loyalty to the Crown and British institutions is above suspicion. I say that this is the first step, because we all know that what is asked for in this Bill is only a small portion of what is desired. Judging from the utterances of the hon. member, outside of Parliament, we must expect blows to be directed at the Catholic minority of Ontario, of Manitoba, of the North-West Territories; it is hoped for that the day will soon come when the Catholics and the French, if they wish to have schools of their own, will have to support them and also the public schools of those portions of the country. This Bill, therefore, is the initial step in a direction leading to all sorts of strife, is the first step in the reversal of a generous policy which all classes of the population of Canada have approved of for upwards of fifty years. This enlightened policy has given us prosperity, good feeling among the different races, good fellowship among public men. We have been taught to esteem each other, in working together for the common good of the country, sinking down all race and creed prejudices, agreeing to disagree on several subjects, but all agreeing to push the country forward in the path of material prosperity. We are asked to-day, to reverse that policy, to go back to the days of strife, of bitter feeling, out of which no good can come. It behooves all men that value the peace and prosperity of the country, to stamp out this dangerous agitation, to discourage it at the outset and let well alone. Many right-meaning men do not see the ultimate result of this first move, because if they understood it I am sure it would receive condemnation at their hands. The legislation which we are asked to place in our statutes, not only savors of persecution, but is also retrograde. I take it for granted that the quality of British citizenship is not incompatible with a foreign origin, that a British subject may be of French origin and a Roman Catholic. If you admit of this double proposition, which I claim to be a fair and just one, which I have never heard contested, I do not see how any one can countenance the Bill now before this House. If you admit my proposition, if we of the Province of Quebec are British subjects enjoying all the privileges and rights which this quality confers, I cannot understand how the member for North Simcoe can ask the House to accept his Bill, in the light of what has been done in the Province of Quebec to satisfy the claims, the just claims of the Protestant minority. This extraordinary war, declared on the minority of the western part of the country cannot be looked upon otherwise than as cruel and uncalled-for by every inhabitant of the Province of Quebec. The different sections of the population have managed to work in harmony, presenting the pleasing spectacle of a people divided by nationalities and religion, but united for all other purposes. Does the promoter of the Bill now before the House know how the minority there have been treated? Does he know that when Confederation took place, it was agreed between the leaders of Quebec that the limits of twelve counties of Quebec Province, in which the English element predominated at that time, would never be changed without the consent of the representatives of those counties? Does the hon. gentleman ignore that the Protestant minority have practically a Council of public instruction of their own, which has complete control of educational matters? Does he know that in the smallest municipalities of the Province of Quebec this control exists? Surely he must be aware that every request of the minority in Quebec has always been granted by the majority? A few years ago it was suggested that a separate gaol be set apart for the Protestants, and this suggestion was acted upon and has now become a fact. Later on it was likewise suggested that a special lunatic asylum should be constructed for Protestant patients, and the scheme is now being carried out. The Protestants of Quebec are satisfied; but, strange to say, they are taken to task by men like the promoter of the coercive legislation now proposed to this House, and are blamed for their being satisfied. People have been speaking of the power of the Catholic Church. Power from whom? My English Protestant friends, I suppose, do not pretend that the Roman Catholic Church extends its power over them; what, then, their grievances are, I am at a loss to know. But I would read here the opinion of a man who has been living all his lifetime in the Province of Quebec, of a man whose literary merit is only equalled by the keen perception of an unprejudiced and thoroughly informed observer as set forth in an article published in one of the periodicals of Toronto, which must have attracted considerable public attention. It is an article written by Mr. S. E. Dawson, of Montreal, and I will quote a few sentences from it just to show what is the true feeling of the Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec in regard to those pretended grievances :

"The English Protestant minority in the Province of Quebec ought to be very unhappy, if for no other reason, because so many estimable people in the sister Provinces and in the United States seem to be distressed on their account. It is not pleasant to be the object of so much solicitude. Besides, it is too late. The doctrine of 'States' rights' has been so persistently maintained by the other Provinces, especially by New Brunswick and Ontario, that it is impossible to deny to the French in Quebec those powers which the English majorities in the other Provinces have successfully asserted. What assistance, then, the other Provinces can afford to the minority of Quebec does not clearly appear, even if that minority shared generally in the gloomy apprehensions felt elsewhere on their account.

"The English minority ought also to be unhappy because of the civil and religious disadvantages which it would appear from outside sources that they are obliged to endure. And, then, if perchance any one of the minority faintly suggests that he cannot perceive anything unusually hard in his lot—anything beyond what falls to minorities elsewhere—he is chidden by 'superior persons' for not realising his abject condition. So that he becomes discouraged because he is not unhappy enough to please his neighbors.

"For, after all, in real deed, the most of us who have long resided in this Province do not find it in the least disagreeable. Unless the Anglo-Saxon mind is at an early age familiarised with other races and religions, it is apt to form fixed ideas. And so it often happens that the French Roman Catholic, as imagined by our outside friends, is different from the person we come in daily contact with. An Englishman may dwell a life-time in peace in the heart of French Canada. Nobody will leave tracts at his door or give them to his children. He may be on excellent terms, and even exchange hospitalities, with the curé; but if that reverend gentleman should feel any doubts about his host's future state, he will never be disagreeable enough to express them."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is, unfortunately, the position of affairs in the Province of Quebec since the beginning of this agitation. Nobody knows where the evil is. The evil does not exist; but our Protestant friends in the Province of Quebec, who have not complained, are taken to task and are lectured because they do not understand that they are unhappy, even if they do not see it or feel it. Mr. Speaker, what is the principle, or rather the negation of principle, at the bottom of the Bill presented by my hon. friend from Simcoe? It is coercion in a matter where coercion cannot exist. Coercion has been tried in several countries in matters of language and religion, and everywhere it has been tried the result has been contrary not only to expectations, but in a large measure contrary to the wish of those who have employed such means. Now, it is a very sad thing to see how the lessons of history are lost for our Equal Rights people, and how much, by neglecting this part of their education, they are drifting into a channel of narrow ideas. During the early part of the British regime in Canada, compulsion and coercion was tried with a view of welding together the different elements of population, so as to form a homogeneous nation, and it was always found that this coercion had a result quite contrary to what was expected. The most enlightened of our governors have declared time and again that the only way to strengthen British rule in Canada was to conciliate the King's new subjects. Such was the opinion of General Murray, of Lord Dorchester, of Sir J. Prevost, and of many others, including and foremost amongst them, Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Lord Elgin. The Equal Righters, who are also, most of them, Imperial Federationists, think differently; but I may tell them that if their aim is to perpetuate British institutions in America by sowing the seed of dissatisfaction, they are wide of the mark. There is one consideration which naturally springs from what I have just said. It is this: That they appear to have lost sight of the broad policy inaugurated by the English Government years ago, but they should not overlook the fact that if they can boast to-day of the title of British citizens, which they profess to value so much, they owe it to the ancestors of the very people they seem to hate and despise. What would have become of the British rule in the wars of Independence and of 1812, if French Canada,—instead, I do not say of fighting, but of being loyal,—had simply remained neutral. None but stone-blind men would say that this Canada of ours would still be a British country. It is a matter of history that the Governors of Canada in olden times would arrive here imbued with prejudices against the "Canadians," and that, after studying the country, these prejudices would make way for sounder notions leading to a change of policy. Immediately after the conquest, General Murray wrote to the Home Government in praise of the King's new subjects. Lieutenant-General Carleton, who, during the war of Independence, was saved from falling into the hands of American soldiers in his flight from Montreal to Quebec by a Canadian officer—General Carleton was a fast friend of the people he was expected by some newly-landed emigrant to crush out of existence. I could lengthen this list until your patience would be exhausted; but I must turn to things of the day, and say, that I am amazed to see men, very few I hope, brought up in contact with us, having for years professed the greatest friendship, accepted the hand extended to them, suddenly turn around on the Government to persecute and hound down the men they were so friendly to some months ago. I am amazed to find men of the day, aspiring to be the leaders of the people, reversing the policy inaugurated by men whose position placed them above the passions of the moment. When I see that the first Governors under the British rule, before the Quebec Act of 1874, and even during the military rule, condescended to publish the laws and the ordinances in French, I have a right to express my surprise that this meagre measure of justice appears in the eyes of certain gentlemen to be too large for the French population of the western Territories. French was used, more than a century ago, to bring the ordinances before the people, and that, after a terrible war, when vanquished and conquerors were face to face; and now, after a union of over one century, this simple act of justice, of international courtesy, which costs the country the enormous sum of five hundred dollars a year, is considered out of place and too generous. If you expect to make a great country with such ideas you are sadly mistaken. Sir Henry Summer Maine and Sir Alfred Lyell have claimed as one of the brightest titles of Great Britain to the admiration of the civilised world that, following the example of Rome, which left the conquered people their customs and institutions, England, in its acquisitions of territory, granted to the Crown's new subjects their former laws and customs. If we look at the British Empire we find it carrying into effect this generous principle of international law. The Equal Righters seem to think that the use of the French language is a monstrous privilege, something unheard of in other countries. They would not have to travel out of the British Empire to find out that we are not a privileged class, and that in many British colonies several other languages are spoken besides the idiom of Shakespeare. In the Windward Islands they will find the French laws and the French language accepted and used. In Mauritius French is spoken in the Legislative Council, and last year a proposition was made to introduce it in the law courts, and no one opposed it. I may here quote a remark which was made in that Assembly, and which will receive its application in the North-West, if the Equal Righters have their own way. One of the speakers in the Mauritius Assembly said that a man coming out of court had remarked: "I have been accused and condemned, and I do not know what for." Coming back to the British colonies I find also that French was introduced in the Seychelles Islands. Let us come nearer England. The Education Commission of 1886-7-8, in their final report, say, in regard to the demands from Wales, that the Welsh language should be used in the schools of Wales:

"It is felt that they should be allowed to take up Welsh as a specific subject recognised in the code; to adopt an optional scheme for English as a class subject suitable to the special needs of Welsh districts, such scheme being founded on the principle of substituting a graduated system of translation from Welsh to English for the present requirements in English grammar; to teach Welsh along with English as a class subject; and to include Welsh among the languages in which candidates for Queen's scholarships and for certificates of merit may be examined."

With reference to Scotland, the same Commissioners say:

"In districts where Gaelic is spoken the intelligence of the children examined under any paragraph of this article may be tested by requiring them to explain in Gaelic the meaning of any passages read or recited."

In India, according to the Progress Report, India, 1882-3, the native laws and language are recognised as follows:—

"1. Law.—The natives of India, Hindu, Mohammedan or other, are amenable, so far as regards succession, inheritance, marriage, caste, or religious usages, each class to their own law, except when modified by express enactment." (Progress Rep. (India) 1882-3, p. 40.)

"2. Language in the Courts.—In the Punjab, Urdu and Hindustani are the official languages of the courts. (Progress Rep., 1882-3, p. 322.)

"In the native minor courts the native languages are spoken.

"3. Schools.—In the Government schools of the Punjab, Urdu and Hindustani are the languages in which the instruction is given.

"4. Literature.—In 1886 the register of publications for British India showed 8,877 books and magazines published within the year; of these more than nine-tenths were in vernacular languages."

In Heligoland education is compulsory. The children, mostly of Frisian origin and speaking their own language, are taught English and German in addition to the English. In Malta Italian is the official language of courts and documents. In the Cape of Good Hope, in the Session of 1888, it was resolved that the notices of motion and orders of the day and all bills submitted to the Council be printed in the Dutch as well as the English language, and this resolution was carried by twelve to seven, and the Finance Committee asked to have a sum of money placed in the Estimates for this purpose, which was done. And in 1884 an Act was passed under which judges may, and other judicial officers shall, allow the use of either the Dutch or the English language in courts of justice, and divisional councils of a certain number of voters could ask to have summonses and notices issued in Dutch. I shall have occasion to put before the House, in a moment, the opinion of a gentleman who visited Canada not long ago, one of the most prominent men of England, and a well-known writer, who drew a comparison then between the Cape of Good Hope and Canada, which he concluded by saying that the people of these two colonies are the last and best specimens of British conservatism which still exists, and that these colonies were kept true to England by the generous and liberal treatment which they received at the hands of the Imperial Government. I refer to Sir Charles Dilke. The debate on this subject has considerably widened. My hon. friend who proposed this measure, and those who support it, felt themselves compelled to seek other reasons beyond the practical question to which they would like to reduce it; and in their search for reasons they went to foreign countries. But in their search they were equally unfortunate. For what do we find? Take Austro-Hungary, we find that Louis Leger, in his history of Austro-Hungary, says:

"The Universities of Vienna, Gratz Innsbruck and Gernovic teach in German. The Chekh Universities teach in Cheokh. The Cracow University teaches in Polish. The Universities of Livov in Polish and Ruthenian. The Universities of Buda-Pesth and Rolosovar teach in Magyar. The University of Zagreb teaches in Croatian.

"The University of Prague, which was first Latin and then German, has recently been divided into two universities, one teaching in German, the other in Chekh, the Hungarian tongue."

Article 19 of the Fundamental Law promulgated in 1867 under the authority of Count Beust, is as follows:—

"All the races of the Empire are on a footing of equality and each one of the nations generally has a right that the inviolability of its nationality and its language shall be secured. The equality of all languages used in the Empire for the purposes of administration for schools, and for public life, is recognised by the State."

Vaubery, in his History of Austria, says:

"In 1859 a most important concession was made by the Imperial Government to the spirit of nationality. By a ministerial order, the language used in the higher schools was, for the future, to be regulated according to the circumstances of nationality, the predominance of German being thereby abolished. In the same year was issued what was known as the Protestant Patent, which granted to the communes the free administration of their own educational and religious matters."

These examples show that the countries which have been wisely guided by the necessities of the different nationalities comprising them are those whose vitality is the most pronounced. If, in order to make a nation great, its people should speak but the one language, could it not be argued that there should be in the whole world but one language in order to make it perfect. If there is to be assimilation, let there be assimilation all over the world; let there be but one language all over the world. If that is necessary for one nation, it is equally necessary for the whole world. That is the view held by Socialists. They say there should be no differences, no classes, that every citizen in the world should be treated as his neighbor is, and that Christian fraternity should be put in practice, in politics and in the administration of the material and moral affairs of the people. They hold that all men should be equal in rank, in privileges, in right, and in every possible way. This is communism, radicalism and demagogism. (I must say that in its logical consequences the Bill we discuss has that tendency.) The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has argued against the propriety of allowing the French language to be used in the North-West, on the ground that at the time of the cession of Canada no such law was inserted in the articles of capitulation, that it was not inserted in the Treaty of 1763, and that it was not in the Quebec Act of 1774, or in the Act giving constitutional government to Canada in 1791. I say that is no argument. If it was not then enacted, the reason is this: there was a tacit understanding that the right of the people to their language should be respected. But my hon. friend has gone further, and has said: Oh, in a new country, where people are beginning to colonise and settle, it is wrong in principle and it is a wrong policy to permit differences of language. But there is no difference between the two cases. In the one case, you find the people in a conquered country attached to their own language, and you all allow them to speak it; in the other case, you are asking people to come from all parts of the world to settle in your country; is it not a wise policy to assure them that when they arrive here, they will find the laws of the country promulgated at least in a language they can understand. This has been the wise policy followed in England. It is true, however, the Equal Righters in this country have had ancestors in England. The Solicitor General in England, in the debate on the Act of 1774, speaks of a Canadian Grand Jury who some years before had returned an indictment against all the Roman Catholics of the country. But Sir, I repeat, it here: the British statesmen have framed a generous and liberal policy for the early government of this country, a policy which has saved this colony for England instead of sending it over to the "Stars and Stripes," or of creating a sort of Ireland here in America. In presence of the noble conduct of these statesmen I say that the policy to foster religious strife or race animosities, whether coming from a Quebec "Nationalist" or a Toronto "Equal Righter" is the greatest enemy of British rule in Canada. More than one hundred years ago, when the English Parliament was meting out its first measure of justice to the French Canadians, in 1774, an English statesman, defending the Quebec Act, said that no address or eloquence:

"Will succeed in inducing a polished assembly of men to adopt the barbarous principle that the moment a conquest is obtained, it consists with humanity, it consists with wisdom, it consists with common honesty to take away all the laws of the conquered country, and more especially that portion of the laws which regulated the proceedings of the inhabitants in civil matters. Speaking of the rights of conquest, Grotius has these words: Cum omne imperium victis erigitur relinquere illis possunt circa res privatas et publicas, eum leges, usque mores et magistratus. Since all authority is snatched from the conquered, leave to them their own laws, their own customs and magistrates which are of advantage regarding private and public matters."

These are the moderated ideas of conquest. Such has been the practice of nations between one another. Is it not extraordinary that, after one hundred years, that celebrated debate can be quoted in a Canadian Assembly in a most appropriate manner. Prejudices from past ages still linger in this Mr. CHAPLEAU.

free land of America, but I hope that the vast majority of the citizens of Canada will stamp them out, will prefer peace and prosperity to religious and race strife, will leave to time the settlement of passing difficulties. I confess that the fate of the French language is in your hands; you can crush it out of official life, but I am sure that if the people of Canada rise, through their representatives, in their power and strength, it will be to assert, after the British Parliament, that right stands in their estimation far above might. How differently inspired was Lord Dufferin when he had occasion to mention the French Canadian race and its language. Speaking, at the time of his administration in Canada, at the Canadian Club in London, in 1875, that distinguished Governor General said:

"I may be permitted to remark on the extraordinary ability and intelligence with which the French portion of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada join with their British fellow-countrymen in working and developing the constitutional privileges with which (thanks to the initiative they were the first to take) their country has been endowed. Our French fellow-countrymen are, in fact, more parliamentary than the English themselves, and in the various fortunes of the colony, there have never been wanting French statesmen of eminence to claim an equal share with their British colleagues in shaping the history of the Dominion. Whatever may be the case elsewhere, in Canada, at all events, the French race has learned the golden rule and the necessity of arriving at practical results by the occasional sacrifice of logical symmetry and to the settlement of disputes, in the spirit of a generous compromise. The spectacle of two peoples, formed from nationalities so diverse, putting forth all their strength, in generous rivalry of each other, to prove their loyalty to their Queen and to the Government, and laboring with concerted action and in perfect harmony for the weal of their common country, will remain one of the most remarkable and pleasing facts in the history of the world, while also it will testify to the political wisdom and the magnanimous sentiments which pervade all the members of the great Canadian family."

And in Montreal in 1872, at the inauguration of the Queen's statue, on Victoria Square, Lord Dufferin, speaking of the minority in this Dominion, said:

"Brave and noble race, which was the first to afford Europe the means of bringing civilisation to the Continent of America, race valorous and hardy, whose pioneers, in the interior of this continent, gave scope to the industry of Europe to take root not only on the banks of the St. Lawrence, but also in the fertile valleys of the Ohio and of the Mississippi."

I could continue these quotations, but I will not take up the time of the House further by reading them. Sir, I ask myself, what credit, what glory does the hon. gentleman think he will get in erasing from the pages of the Statute three inoffensive lines which, when erased, will not add an iota to the power, the success, the supremacy of his race in the North-West, whilst, as he well knows, it will be considered as an unprovoked insult, as an attempt at oppression by those against whom his action is directed. No, Sir, the great legislators of the world—and my hon. and learned friend is well gifted enough to justify his ambition to be one of them—the great legislators of the world have not gained their fame by such narrow legislation. They have added to the code of humanity enactments in the sense of protection for the weak, of peaceful progress, of enlarged civilisation—in a word, they have added to the true "unity and comity" of nations.

"A wise prince," says Burke, "should study the genius of the nation he is called to rule; he must not contradict them in their customs nor take away their privileges, but he must act according to the circumstances in which he finds the existing Government. It is less by terror than by love and confidence, says Montesquieu, that men are governed, and if absolute perfection in matter of Government is a myth, it is a fact that the best is the Government which adapts itself most closely to the climate, to the character, the usages, the habits, the prejudices even of the country."

The indisputable evidence of past history has long demonstrated the truth of those old but wise aphorisms. An hon. member—I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)—has quoted the example of Rome, but, if we go back to ancient history, what do we see? We see two great powers—according to the books of the colleges, which I suppose every one of you has read and translated—two great nations warring one against the other for the supremacy of the world—Carthage and Rome. If we look at the policy of those two great cities which founded two great nations, we find that the ruin of Carthage was brought about in great measure by the hostility which it developed to the nations it had subdued by its armies. In Sicily, where important Greek settlements had fallen into its power, a regular persecution was organised against the language, the customs, the opinions of the conquered. It succeeded in making of them irreconcilable enemies who rose against it at the hour of danger. Rome, on the contrary, courted the sympathies of the Greeks whom she had conquered. She encouraged the study of their language; she preserved their laws, respected their customs, their religion, their schools. The result of the two policies is written in history. Carthage was destroyed, when everything seemed to promise her success and domination. Rome gave to her citizens the freedom of the world and to her name an everlasting glory. What Carthage did, the Normans attempted in England after the conquest. There again the persecution saw the victims victorious in the long struggle, and England was founded, to continue the traditions, the success and the glory of the Roman Empire. If the proud and magic "Civis Sum Romanus" has had a rival in the talismanic "I am a British subject," it is due, in a great measure, to the liberal and generous policy of England, more than to the fear of her military power. The founder of the German Empire, Frederick the Great, understood the advantages which the conservative principles of the Catholic religion could give him in the Catholic provinces which he had subdued. He protected his new subjects in spite of the narrow-minded advisers who predicted that the court of Vienna would be served, in its intrigues, by the protection given to the Catholics of Silesia. The great emperor took no heed of those short-sighted counsels. In one of his letters I read these memorable words: "Emperor Joseph continues his work of secularisation without interruption. Here everybody remains as he was. I respect the rights of possession, upon which society is founded." And his Catholic provinces of Silesia remained faithful to him. Examples of the same kind are to be found in the history of all the great nations of Europe, where union began under the warm and beneficial influence of generosity and forbearance, leaving to the action of time the work of blending together nationalities and languages in the direction of perfect homogeneity. The great masters in political science, the founders of vast and permanent empires, were above the prejudices of class, creed or race. Their wisdom enacted the great Jus Gentium, which is so, as Montesquieu observes, that "victory leaves to the conquered nations, besides life, those great things, liberty, laws, property, and religion always, when one is not blind, voluntarily." I might quote again, if I did not fear to weary the patience of the House, the same authority that I quoted a moment ago, to confirm my assertion, that Great Britain acted wisely in granting those liberties and privileges to Canada, and that Canadians merited such a liberal treatment at the hands of the mother country. Lord Dufferin, in his reception at Windsor, Ontario, on the 19th August, 1874, spoke as follows:—

"But it is not merely on this ground that we are under obligation to the French Canadian race. It must not be forgotten that it is to its loftiness of spirit, to its love of liberty, and to its just appreciation of the civil rights contained in germ in the constitution originally granted by England to Canada, that we owe the development of this parliamentary autonomy of which the nation is so justly proud; and I can assure you that, in the eyes of an Englishman, there are few things more delightful to observe than the dignity, the moderation, and the political capability, with which the French statesmen of Canada aid their English colleagues in applying and in putting into active operation these grand principles of law and of constitutional practice, which are the foundation of the free government of this country."

After such high tributes given to our nationality I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, and I was shocked when I heard the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) using the following language:—

"As to the loyalty of the Canadian bishops in refusing the offer of the Americans to join in the insurrection against England, I have my doubts about it; I am disposed to believe that they then obeyed the dictations of their own interests, to the interests of their church, more than to the true impulse of patriotism and loyalty."

The member for Norfolk will allow me to tell him he must have read in very strange books the history of our country, or he must have drunk at empoisoned sources his inspirations, with regard to the great factors of our nationality, to have been guilty of such a cruel anachronism. Why, Mr. Speaker, leaving the largest possible margin for the shortcomings, nay, the faults of a part of our clergy—and I am ready to admit that such a margin can be made use of—I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that no more admirable and uninterrupted succession and tradition of loyalty and devotion to the British Crown can be traced than to the history of the Roman Catholic Episcopacy of Lower Canada. I say, hoping that my words are not unparliamentary, that no more undeserved, no more unwarranted slander was ever written than the page of our Hansard where those unfortunate utterances of the hon. member for Norfolk are recorded. Disloyal and selfish, the bishops of Quebec! Who refused and repudiated the tempting offers, not of the Americans alone, but of the French generals whom the Catholic King of France had sent to assist the thirteen colonies in their rebellion against England? Was he disloyal, Mr. Speaker, the eminent Metropolitan of Quebec, who ordered a Thanksgiving day to be observed, a solemn Te Deum to be sung in honor of the victory of Trafalgar, won by Nelson over the French forces, and who, in his pastoral letter, speaking of the reverse of the French arms, said this:

"What calamities would have happened to us if they (the Frenchmen) had seized His Majesty's possessions abroad, ruined his commerce, shut the gates to his wealth, and so diminished the means to check their rapacity and their spirit of domination."

Was he disloyal when he ordered his priests to teach their parishioners gratitude and fidelity to the Crown. Was he disloyal and selfish the noble priest who preached the sermon on the Thanksgiving Day appointed by the bishop, and who chose for his text the significant words "Dextera tua Domine percussit inimicum." "It is thy hand, O Lord, that struck the enemy." Adding these words :

"Does it not seem to you a cruel thing to call 'an enemy' a country to which this colony owes its origin, a nation which was so long united to us by the strong ties of race, of friendship, of language, of religion; a country that has given us fathers, protectors, pastors, models of all virtues, beloved sovereigns, whose wise and moderate government made us happy, whilst they deserved our affection and gratitude."

Who, after mentioning the generosity of the King, of England adds :

"What return must you give for so many favors? A deep feeling of thankfulness towards Great Britain, a sincere desire to remain under that protection, a full conviction that our interests are dependent of the mother country, and that our happiness is interwoven with that of the Empire."

Are these the words of disloyal men? And can a man in his senses find an excuse for saying that those loyal appeals were not sincere? That noble priest, Mr. Speaker, became, very soon after, a prelate of our church, Bishop Plessis, one of the most eloquent, one of the most illustrious, one of the most loyal bishops of the Province of Quebec, who fought for the rights and liberties of his countrymen, and who was afterwards favored with the friendship of the first statesman in England, and who received from the British Crown an acknowledgment of the services that he had rendered, both to his fellow-countrymen and to the British Empire. Wrongly informed by the books he read, the hon. member for North Simcoe said that the insurrection in 1837 was a war of races and not the result of misgovernment. I am at a loss to know in what book the hon. gentleman has read the history of Canada. First, he forgets that the insurrection was not limited to Lower Canada, that Upper Canada had its share of it; then, that several prominent Englishmen of the Province of Quebec took part in the Rebellion. Does he not know also that the principles upon which the constitutional battle was fought from 1791 to 1837 were those for which the English had been fighting for more than a century—in fact, for the articles of the Magna Charta—for the pure, prompt and impartial administration of justice, for the control by the people of the expenditure of public money, for the redress of abuses and shocking favoritism from the personal and tyrannical chief of the Executive. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and his friends—for, after all, we must take them together, because they have a plan of campaign, they have entered upon an agitation which has been carried throughout the country—these gentlemen submit three reasons in support of the Bill now before the House. These are: First, that the North-West has been rapidly filled by Anglo-Saxon immigration, and that the number of people speaking the French language is so small in the Territories that the expenditure involved in the use of a second language in official proceedings is a waste of money. Second, a dual language is a source of contention and division, and should never be allowed in the framing of the constitution of a new country. Third, the use of the French language was not allowed to the first inhabitants of the country after it fell into British hands; that it has always been a source of division and discord in this country, that it is inconsistent with true British loyalty; and that the sooner it disappears the better. I have endeavored to give answers to the two last reasons. But let us face squarely the argument with regard to the Territories themselves. What is the reason given for objecting to the dual language in the North-West Territories? The hon. gentleman has said that the Act amending the first North-West Territories Act was passed at a time when there were no people in the Territories to assent or consent to it. But the hon. gentleman should remember that there was a population there at that time; and they were people who, with their ancestors, had occupied the country for nearly a century. The North Saskatchewan, Lac à la Fourche, Prince Albert, Edmonton and Battleford were settled. The Territories had a population in 1877, although it was not a teeming population. And why was it that the French language was allowed to those people? It was because at that time the great majority of the people of those Territories was French. Time has passed, and the country has been conquered peacefully by another race. Do hon. gentlemen imagine that we French Canadians of another Province find fault with that result? No; I speak here the sentiments of my fellow-countrymen when I say that the greater the Anglo-Saxon immigration is into those Territories the better for the Territories and for the country at large. They have put their money and their energies into that country. They have shown themselves good settlers, and they are now a large majority in these Territories. I am not sorry of it. I speak of it without any feeling or without any prejudice. As I have stated on many occasions, I have invited English to be spoken in my home, and the peace of that home has not been disturbed by the difference of language in our prayers to the Almighty. I do not envy my neighbor because he succeeds in the path of life, with another language, another creed than mine. The sun shines for all, and I leave him his right as I want him to leave me mine. We find from the census returns, which no one will controvert, that the French and French half-breed population in the Territories is in the proportion of 13 per cent.—that is to say, that one-seventh, or a little more, of the population, is French, as to the language, in the North-West Territories. Now, in the Province of Quebec about one-sixth of the population is English, but nobody has ever dreamed of denying them the use of their language. My hon. friend may say you could not take from them the use of their language, because the constitution of the Province of Quebec would prevent you; nor could you do it, in view of the importance of the Anglo-Saxon race, their industry, their energy and the capital they have in the Province of Quebec. I will admit all that, but I say, and I speak for my countrymen when I say so, that, leaving those reasons aside, and considering only the paramount right of minorities, if a measure were proposed in the Province of Quebec to abolish the use of the English language, I would be the first to denounce it and I am sure the immense majority of my fellow-countrymen would do the same. My conservative instincts would prevent me from endorsing a proposition, which would be, in my estimation, unfair, unjust, demagogic in its tendencies as is the measure advocated by my hon. friend.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a question of order. An expression was used by the hon. Minister, for which my hon. friend on my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) was ruled out of order on a former occasion. I do not know if it is proper that it should be allowed to be used on one side of the House and not on the other.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am ready to withdraw it for the hon. gentleman, although I must say I was not thinking of him at the time.

Mr. McCARTHY. He was addressing it with regard to me, and I prefer that the word should not be withdrawn.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I was referring to the member for North Simcoe when the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) called me to order, and I was calling this measure of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) a revolutionary measure, a demagogic measure and I do not think the expression unparliamentary. I say, that if such a measure were proposed in the Province of Quebec, even though the English race occupied only the same position with regard to the French as the French do with regard to the English in the North-West Territories, I would say "no" to such a proposition. I would declare that no offensive predominance should be given to the majority in a country where both races should be united. I ask myself what is the object to be gained by the measure proposed by my hon. friend? Is it to make the members of the Legislature of the North-West speak English? That cannot be the object, because they all speak English now, and I understand there is not a single elected man who is French. Is it his object to prevent the votes and deliberations of the North-West Assembly being printed in French? That cannot be, for I believe they are, in fact, only printed in the English language now, for the obvious reason that the members are all English.

Mr. DAVIN. They never have been printed in French.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend tells me, as a matter of fact, they never have been printed in French, and there is, therefore, no reason to make a law that they shall not be printed in that language. In the Privy Council at Ottawa our proceedings are all in English, and there is no necessity for having them printed in French, not by law, but for the mere convenience of the case, and nobody complains. So it would be in the North-West Assembly. But, as regards the promulgation of the laws, I appeal to the hon. member for Simcoe if it is not necessary that a large portion of that population, who understands only the French language, are entitled to know what laws they should obey and to have them printed in their own language? The French Canadians can lay claim to the title of being the first settlers of that country, and there is some value in that title. That title has been acknowledged to the Indians, even by the American Government, at a time when their policy towards the Indians was—I will not say barbarous—but most severe, and in the North-West the first settlers were French, and the Hudson Bay Company respected their language and their customs. Why should we not treat them as well as they were treated when there was no regular government in those Territories? I say that if the measure of my hon. friend became law, a large portion of the population would be without knowledge of the laws they are supposed to obey. And as the Legislature has in its hands the whole of the municipal government of the country, the injustice would be more cruel. If he had only said: it is useless that the Legislature of the North-West should have French in their proceedings, the answer would be the sentimental one that they have, as an important minority composed of the first settlers of the land, a right to speak French in that Legislature. But against that I would have said: Wait for the sub-division of the country, when there will likely be three or four French-speaking members elected to that body; then we would not have to pass Draconian laws here to prevent them having French, because they would have it. The English-speaking people of the North-West would be as courteous to them as the French-speaking majority in the Province of Quebec have been to the English-speaking minority in that Province; and we know very well that if there were French members in the North-West Council it would be allowed to them to speak French. There will soon be a very large German immigration into that country—and I hope there will be, the Germans make very good settlers—and suppose three or four members elected for the Legislature were German; if they wanted to speak German, they would have a right to do so. Sir, if you do not respect the covenants which have been entered into between the two important races in the Dominion, to the extent of permitting the laws of the land to be published in the language of the minority, you are committing a cruel injustice, and retarding the progress of the country. Why, Sir, we spend thousands of dollars every year to publish pamphlets for distribution in France, Switzerland, Alsace-Lorraine and elsewhere—for what purpose? To bring French immigration to Canada, to say to those people that when they arrive here they will find the ordinances of the country and many of those ordinances refer mainly to local interests and objects—and its laws printed in their own language. To deprive them of this privilege would be a gross injustice. But my hon. friend knew this very well; he knew that if he could prevent the promulgation and publication of the laws and ordinances of the North-West in French, he would prevent French immigration into that country. He knew it, and he did it with that object in view; he had the courage to acknowledge it. I am sorry to say that the Equal Righters who are acting with the hon. member for North Simcoe are to blame if a war of races is the result of their agitation; but I hope I am not mistaken in believing that many hon. gentlemen, whose names have been connected with those of the hon. member for North Simcoe and the hon. member for North Norfolk, do not carry their feelings to that extent. I know that amongst them there are men who do not wish anything of that kind to happen. It is very easy to set fire to this very inflammable piece of timber, a race agitation, and take that agitation as a means to achieve success; but I must say that if there is a glow for the ambition of a public man, it should not be a glow coming from the fires of prejudice and passion which he himself has kindled. The hon. gentleman has taken charge of a measure which the people of the North-West would have confided to any of the members representing them here if a real grievance had existed. Who has moved him to introduce this Bill? Has he done it of his own motion or had he a mandate for doing it? He went up to the North-West on a mission, and he has accomplished it; but I hope and believe that he will accomplish nothing by his measure. This question should have been settled quietly among the people of the North-West as a local question, to be determined between them and the Federal Government, from whom the legislative power of the territories emanates. But the promoters of this measure do not think of making it a local question. Leave the question to the people to settle, and you may be sure that probably in two years hence there will be nothing left of the little fire which has been raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Has not the North-West disinterested members enough in this House to take charge of such a measure? Is it not an insult to them that a member from an eastern Province should take upon himself to put it forward and advocate it? It shall not pass here, because on every side of the House people are alarmed, if not disgusted, by the way in which it has been taken up and agitated. We might very well agree among ourselves to leave to the North-West Legislature the settlement of this question. We would say to them: You have not been elected in the North-West to settle that question; it relates to one of the organic articles of the constitution of those Territories, which only the Parliament of Canada has a right to change; but we will be a paternal Parliament to you, and we will say to you, consult the people, and let the people of the North-West say whether there is any use of your speaking French when you sit around the table of the Legislature. The elections would come, and after those elections they may come back and say: If we are to have a useful representation in that assembly, if we are to have a population in those Territories, who will live harmoniously with their neighbors, we must not repeat the mistake of hurting the feelings of those with whom we are in partnership for the building up of this country. I say that to try to prevent those people publishing their laws in the language of the population, either in the French language or the English, would be an atrocity, a cruel measure, and a measure which would not induce immigrants or settlers to go into that country. There is one thing which I feel bound to say to correct a wrong impression, unjust to the hon. gentleman. My hon. friend from North Simcoe has been taken to task as being a Tory. I do not attach much importance to that little digression of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition. That is an eye-catching color which he puts in his political paintings when before an election audience; the "Tory" is always brought into the back ground so as to bring out in greater contrast the great display of the Liberal principles which it is the hon. gentleman's wont to picture to his hearers. But in the subject under discussion there should be no question of party politics. The right hon. the leader of the Government answered my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), by showing that the Tories have been at times the best protectors of our French Canadian nationality in this country. But in calling this Bill a Tory measure, my hon. friend wanted to make out that it was an arbitrary, a retrograde measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was inflammatory.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No, it was that "or-a-tory" of my hon. friend that brought it out. My hon. friend wished to give a political meaning to this discussion. It has none, and I think it is but just to those who, on other occasions, have voted with the hon. member for North Simcoe, to say that the hon. gentleman himself had the courage—and it is not courage he wants—to say that on this occasion he had separated himself entirely from the Conservative party. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, calls all the Conservatives Tories; and I know that whatever denial we may give to the expression, he is bound to call us Tories. If he enjoys in calling us by that name, let him be happy. The hon. member for North Simcoe has in this question completely disassociated himself from his party; he has declared that on this question he is not in harmony with his party, but he declared, and had a right to do so, that upon other questions he would follow those whom he had always followed, and would continue to vote as a conservative on such matters as, for instance, the National Policy. It would not be right to close the Conservative party against the hon. member for North Simcoe and those who hold his views. This Bill which he has introduced has nothing to do with that party; it is a Bill of his own, and I hope, before the debate is over, he will see that it is greatly restricted in his following. The hon. member for West Durham argued that the Federal Government should keep, in a certain measure at least, a portion of the power over the Territories. True, we have granted to the Territories a constitution; we have given them legislative power to some extent; but as we still have the administration of the Territories in our hands and to protect those whom we are inviting to come and settle there, this Government should keep a certain control over these Territories. We are bound to do that, as we are bound to give to the French population a free and easy access to the judicial tribunals we have established there. I do not believe that there are many in this House disposed to say that they are at heart in favor of the measure proposed. Its preamble is a provocation and a just cause of irritation to a large section of our people, and the principle of the Bill and its practical effect, if carried into a conclusion, would work injustice and bad feeling in the old Provinces as well as in the North-West Territories. There are amongst those who support the measure of the hon. member for North Simcoe men who, if they do not call themselves Equal Rights advocates, are Imperial Federalists. Many of them pose as the advocates of what they deem to be the grand and the loyal policy of Imperial Federation. Let me ask them how they expect to help on their cause by this unfair, unseemly, this persecuting agitation. The British Empire is composed of a greater variety of nations and creeds than was the Roman Empire. Do the Imperial Federalists think they are going to help.

on their scheme by prosecuting a minority, even in such a remote territory as the North-West? We are not in the same condition of things in which we were some years ago. Modern science has given new wings to political thought; every incident that occurs in Canada, of any importance, is known to-morrow as far as Cape Colony and in the remote regions of India; and I appeal to Imperial Federalists, who might be tempted to support the Bill before the House, not to injure their own cause, and to remember that all men interested and responsible for the future of the Queen's dominion will condemn them for entering into an agitation which would tend to destroy the loyalty of a portion of Her Majesty's subjects. These gentlemen pose as the representatives of Ontario and pretend to speak the voice of Ontario in protest against the use of the French language in Canada. I venture to tell them that they do not represent Ontario in this matter, that they do not speak the voice of Ontario in this agitation. The true voice of Ontario may still be heard in the echoes of that splendid demonstration made in December, 1884, in Toronto, in honor of Sir John A. Macdonald. It was my good fortune to be present at that grand and imposing reunion of the forces of the great Conservative party. I shall never forget the ovation given to the Old Chief when he entered the hall where five thousand voices acclaimed him with enthusiastic cheers. I shall never forget the warm, the cordial reception given to my hon. friends the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Militia, and to myself. It was my first visit to Toronto and the impression I received, an impression which will never be effaced from my memory, was that the bond of friendship, nay, the bond of affection, that linked together the two great races of this Confederation, would resist any attack which interest, jealousy or prejudice might direct against it. It was, it is true, a political demonstration, but it had a great character beyond that, which proved that different races, and different creeds, and different nationalities, might unite and work together in the best manner for the progress of our common country. This was the voice of Ontario, and I think it would be the voice of Ontario still. I say to the supporters, if there are any in Ontario, of the measure of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that I believe the voice of Ontario would be still the same if the right hon. the leader of the House would appeal, on the same generous principles, to the same fair-minded population of Ontario to-day. Sir, I protest against that agitation, I protest against that plan of campaign as suggested in the speeches of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and indicated here and outside by the speeches of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I do not quote their expressions here. They are too ugly for me to quote them or, at all events, they are too provoking. It is not for us here to talk about opening a free road through the St. Lawrence for the Anglo-Saxon to pass to the conquest of the world. If that course is to be persisted in, Sir, I cannot qualify it in any other words, that if it is a political game it is a dangerous mistake, and if it is a determined and premeditated movement to be earnestly carried on, it is a criminal attack against the "peace, order and good government of the country." Sir, I hope that the hon. gentlemen will pause before venturing any further in the dark and dangerous path they have entered into. They will look in the past and around them, and they will see written on the walls the fate which awaits them. All public men who have tried to build up a political platform of such materials as prejudices and fanaticism have found out that the beams and rafters of their building did not long resist the action of time and the pressure of common sense; they went down with the wreck, helpless and crippled, giving to the world a cruel lesson as to the inevitable fate of those who would attempt to imitate their example. Sir, I appeal to the higher instincts, to the nobler feelings of those who sincerely wish the consolidation of these British possessions, and whom the chances of politics do not affect. I ask them to think calmly of all this. They must know how dangerous are the elements which are brought into contact in the agitation which is carried on. They may be in earnest in believing that the strong currents thus put in motion will produce great and good results. Let them not forget that in dealing with these questions of race, nationality and religion they are dealing with the great electric currents of national life. Guide and govern these currents wisely, and you may draw from their united influences power and light and all the beneficent effects of the natural forces with which Providence has provided you. Misguide and misgovern them—use them with ignorance, recklessness, or malice,—and you may draw down on your heads unknown and uncounted disasters, ruin to individuals, confusion to communities, and disaster to the State. Sir, I agree with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I am not ready to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), although I am in accord with the principles of it, but I cannot find too strong language to express my repudiation of the principles, the form, the surroundings of the measure submitted. The Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe is opposed to his own political record, principles and career. He supported with intelligence and vigor the policy of unity of action and harmony of thought of the different races which form this Dominion, irrespective of creed or language. He was present when the Acts giving a constitution to the North-West Territories were initiated, revised and passed, and he gave his acquiescence to that legislation. The Bill is opposed to the policy that has prevailed in Canada, of protecting the rights of minorities in the schools, in the Legislatures, in the Senate. It is opposed to the law of the land, which was approved by two Administrations and three Parliaments. It is opposed to the spirit of British legislation, which, in the case of Manitoba, provided a perpetual guarantee to the minority in regard to schools and language, and, in the case of any new Province hereafter created in the Territories, provided a guarantee of stability to the constitution given to it at the time of its creation. It is opposed to the general policy of the modern British Empire, which, in India, in Manitoba, in Cape Colony, respects the right of the people of different origin to have the legal and legislative use of their own language. It is opposed to the plainest facts of science, which prove that race is stronger than language, as may be seen in the case of the Irish and the Scotch, the German-speaking Russians, the French, German and Italian-speaking Swiss, the Jews, the Spanish-speaking Mexicans, the German-speaking Alsacians. It is opposed to the true spirit of loyalty to the Crown, because no man, who is truly loyal to the Crown, would endeavor to stir up strife among the Queen's subjects by attempting to repeal, for the avowed purpose of persecution and extinction, laws which have had the sanction of the Crown in one form or another ever since the Cession of Canada. I wish to make one more remark as to the political record of the hon. member for North Simcoe. Let me refer to that great demonstration in Toronto, which showed so well the fraternity of the two races, and I wish that fraternity was more widely practised. I think that the public men of each Province ought to visit the other Provinces, and try to develop that good feeling which is so easily developed when we are better acquainted with one another. In that great demonstration in Toronto what do we find? An address was presented to Sir John A. Macdonald by the Liberal Conservative party of Ontario. My hon. friend from Simcoe knows something of that address. On that occasion the chairman, was appointed on the motion of Mr. Dalton McCarthy, and when the meeting was organised the chairman read an elaborate, an eloquent address to Sir John Macdonald, two or three paragraphs of which I will read to this House, with as full an assurance of their being accepted here as they were accepted there:

"The happy results of British rule in North America begun when the policy of Pitt was accomplished by the valor of Wolfe, would have been imperfect, if not frustrated, but for the cordial relations which you have for nearly half a century maintained, in spite of unjust and unpatriotic criticism, with the great men who have been the chiefs of the loyal Canadians of Quebec; and on this occasion we would mingle with our felicitations to yourself a tribute of grateful remembrance of Cartier, whose statue rises in another city to bear witness to his public deeds and to keep his memory green. * * * In a Confederation in which the people are divided by a very earnest and sincere difference of opinion in race, religion and political sentiment, unity of action and harmony of thought have been maintained with striking success by the wisdom, tact and true liberality with which you have made alike the Cabinet, the Provincial Executives, the Bench, the Bar, and the Public Service, bear witness to your forethought and care for the interests of races, creeds and opinions, as part of the forces by which nations are governed, and by the wise conduct of which they grow strong, united and prosperous."

No better inspired, no better worded sentiments of true patriotism were ever recorded, and the hon. member for North Simcoe will derive more glory for the part he took in that demonstration than he will in the unchristian crusade he is now leading.

After Recess.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Before this House rose at six o'clock I had been showing that it would be an injustice to the population of the North-West Territories, who were the first settlers there, and who, surely, deserve our consideration, if we were to deprive them of the privilege of having the laws published in a language that they understand. What has been the cause of the large influx of Anglo-Saxon settlers into the North-West? It is the millions of money that the old Provinces have voted to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. We all agreed to that; we all applauded the enterprise and the energy of those who built that road. What, again, has brought that immigration into the Territory? It was the great, the richly subsidised colonisation societies which brought thousands of immigrants from Great Britain to take possession of the soil, and the railway companies who acquired large tracts of land as railway subsidies and have invested their capital there. All these newcomers were characterised by that spirit of enterprise which belongs to the English immigrants, and which leads them to take possession of the world wherever the world and its resources presents itself to them. We welcome those desirable immigrants, we help them in the full measure of a dutiful Government. But must we, for all that, despise and forget the first settlers of those remote regions, those who revealed to us the treasure we had there? Sir, will not my hon. friend from North Simcoe give to these old settlers of the North-West, at least, time to learn English? It has taken me a long time to learn to speak it, badly as I do. I think he ought to give them, at least, a few years to learn how to read the laws which will be enacted in those Territories. But there is something more. These people who live there, who are the owners of the soil, have disputes amongst themselves. The law must be obeyed, must be administered, and is he going to deny them the right of having justice administered to them in a language which they understand? He does deny them of that right; we must not be unjust as he wants us to be. I think that if this House comes to the conclusion that a certain measure of liberty to settle that question of language ought to be given to the Legislature of the North-West, we must in justice reserve to the old settlers, to that population which is now in the minority, the right to speak their language, to be heard in their language, as witnesses, jurors, and pleaders before the courts. I desire, in closing my remarks, to quote some observations from a powerful writer and a keen observer, who has visited this country, Sir Charles Dilke. How does he speak of the population, of whom the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) spoke, I will not say with contempt, but with suspicion as to their loyalty and with fear as to the future of the country so far as they were concerned. Sir Charles Dilke referred to one of the most prominent statesmen who represented the French Canadians, Sir George Cartier. Speaking of Sir George Cartier, who was very often accused by his opponents in politics, of being too much of a Britisher in Canada, Sir Charles said this:

"Sir George Cartier, the Conservative statesman who led the French Canadians at the time of Confederation, had himself as a young man taken part in Papineau's rebellion, but there was never a stronger supporter of a United Empire than my host at Ottawa in the year of the passing of the Bill."

Drawing a comparison between the French in Lower Canada and the South African Dutch, the author said:

"In both cases we found the alien people in the land had dispossessed the mother country of the province. In each case they have clung to their language and institutions, and in each country the language of the non-English Calvinists may now be made use of in the legislature. Both races are filled with intense Conservatism, and the French of Canada and the Dutch of South Africa are now in fact the only surviving true Conservatives living under free institutions."

This may not please the leader of the Opposition, but it could not but please an old Tory, like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Speaking of the loyalty of the French Canadians at the time of the American Revolution, Sir Charles Dilke said :

"Curiously enough, the only moments at which we were ever popular in Lower Canada, until we gave her free institutions, were the moments when the Americans were trying to expel us."

These few lines must be significant to those who believe that because we speak a foreign language we cannot be loyal to the Crown and true supporters of the British nation. I will not say, true as it may be, that Canada would have been American except for the assistance given by the French Canadians at the time of the American Rebellion, but as a loyal Britisher, I would say, with Sir Charles Dilke: we have been able to preserve our supremacy in North America with the approval and assistance of the French Canadians, and "curiously enough the only moment at which we were ever popular in Lower Canada, until we gave her free institutions, were the moments when the Americans were trying to expel us." Mr. Speaker, I claim for our people, as I read it in the opuscles of a late friend, Oscar Dunn, that "the first man who spoke of responsible government in this country was a French Canadian, Pierre Bedard, and the one who contributed the most to establish it was another French Canadian, Lafontaine. Our nationality had the honor to furnish the statesman who introduced British liberties into this country. It was the only revenge we drew from our conquerors." I do not speak here as a French Canadian; I speak as a Canadian. The hon. member for North Simcoe has said, that, in order to judge of the nationality of a man, you must ascertain the language he speaks; that a German subject speaking another language can hardly be a full German; that a man who speaks French as his mother tongue, even if he knew and could speak English, cannot be really and truly a British subject. But we claim to be Canadians, and although we may speak in French or English we are really not English or French, but we are truly Canadians, and we intend to remain such. I heartily endorse the sentiments of that eloquent and fervent apostle of Canadian nationality, Principal Grant, when, speaking before St. Andrew's Society, in Montreal, he said :

"The Scotch are but one nationality in Canada, and not the first. That place belongs to the French Canadians; a sacred obligation is imposed upon the Canadian race as upon ours. We ought to be, the one more than Scotch, and the other more than French, we ought to be Canadians. There can be but one Canadian nation, and all the races which have chosen the sky of Canada as their own ought to contribute to the building up and the consolidating of this nation. Every other dream is but a folly and every effort to realise it is but treason. And against treason all Canadians must unite, to combat and chastise it."

Sir, if the hon. gentleman intends to carry out his purpose, interpreted as it must be by the preamble of this Bill and by the speech which accompanied its first reading, if the hon. gentleman wants to go to the end of his programme, if he really intends to do as he has stated in this House and outside this House he intends to do, I can only tell him this, that if he wants to destroy and efface the French language from the Dominion of Canada he should begin higher up and remove its use from the highest order of chivalry in England; he should efface it from the arms of England; if he thinks in speaking French we are disloyal to our beloved Sovereign, Her Majesty the Queen, he must have forgotten the words "Honni soit qui mal y pense." If he wants to destroy French I answer him, in company with all my fellow-countrymen and all true British subjects in this Dominion: Sir, you shall not touch that language; you cannot efface it. We keep it with our religion, as a gift we owe to Divine Providence and to the kind liberality of Our beloved Sovereign. And whenever it is attempted to deprive us of that sacred deposit, we shall not despair as long as we read on the Royal Arms of England: "Dieu et mon Droit."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would say to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that I interfere with him with very considerable reluctance, but it is necessary for me for certain reasons to speak to-night. I will speak briefly, but, as he must of necessity speak at very considerable length, I hope, therefore, that he will not consider that I am treating him with discourtesy. I will take care that it does not interfere with his prerogative in any respect.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we all must agree that this debate, even so far as it has already gone, has been one of a very remarkable character. It is a debate which is calculated to shed considerable light on divers dark places in our political firmament. It has at any rate one notable feature. The present debate, coupled with a debate which took place on another subject, within this chamber about a year ago, constitutes a very important new departure on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite—a very important new departure, indeed. It is perfectly wonderful to see the zeal which is now expressed by so many of these hon. gentlemen for provincial rights, and to remember that these same hon. gentlemen—not even the hon. member for North Simcoe excepted—only a little more than thirteen months ago, certainly within a period of two years, did not see their way to stand side by side with us in defending the clearest and best established rights of his and my native Province. We find now that the sacredness of provincial rights is clearly held by a great majority in this House, we find that it is becoming a fundamental article of faith, and by none more (although his conversion was very late in the day) than by the venerable and pious Premier, may I say, who gave such excellent advice to us last year, as well as on the present occasion, on the subject of provincial rights. I am an old enough member of Parliament to remember when the First Minister of this Dominion had very little faith indeed in Confederation; when he began by doubting and disbelieving the possibility of a federal union, and when in point of fact, as I remember and as the record shows, he only accepted the situation when he saw that it was his last chance of safety from political shipwreck. From that time, although I will not say that he has plotted steadily and persistently to undermine this same Confederation, I will say that for twenty years, to all outward seeming, at any rate, the policy of that right hon. gentleman has been to belittle, in every possible way, the rights of the several Provinces, of which to-day he has blossomed out so strong and stout a champion. In the case of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), we can all remember that last year that hon. gentleman was not apparently disposed to pay any very great respect to the provincial rights of one of the oldest and most important Provinces of this Dominion, although now he is suddenly smitten with the most extraordinary regard for the declarations—not of a Provincial Assembly in the proper sense of the term—but of the representative council of a fledgling territory of this Dominion. For my part, I much suspect the fervent zeal which new born converts evince on these occasions. I may say to this House, without respect to parties, that while we are here bound by every obligation to see that the rights of the Provinces are maintained, it may be as well for us to recollect that we are also here as Dominion representatives, and that the Dominion of Canada has its rights in this and other matters as well as the Provinces. This debate, as I have said, is one of a remarkable character, but I must add that I, for one, think that every true friend of Canada must regret that this subject has been forced upon us at this time. I say that no good has come of this Bill; I say that no good can come of it, and I am sorry to have to add that, in my judgment, speaking without prejudice or malice, I cannot but believe that no good was intended to come out of the proposal which we are now discussing. Whatever may be the motives which have caused the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) to assume the grave responsibility of throwing on the floor of this House what he well knew must be an apple of discord, calculated to set friend against friend, race against race, and religion against religion, I admit that this question having been raised, and the judgment of this House having been challenged, we are, in my opinion, bound to pass upon the question. Of all the faults and of all the follies which this House could commit in dealing with this question the worst, in my opinion, would be to leave it as a festering and ever-open sore. We are asked to decide on this question, and we should decide. In that I agree with the hon. gentleman and some of his friends. This House is called upon to pass judgment, and this House should pass such judgment as will set this question finally at rest, if such a thing can be. At all events, it should be set at rest so far as this branch of it is concerned. I believe that by this motion and by the agitation which has taken place throughout the length and breadth of the chief Provinces of Canada on the issues raised by the hon. gentleman and his friends, very considerable harm has been done. I do not think we can wholly undo that harm by anything we may accomplish here, at best I believe that all it is possible for us to do is to minimise the mischief which reckless hands have wrought. I will venture to suggest, before I sit down, certain considerations which occur to me as best calculated to bring about that end. I shall now consider in rotation the several propositions at present before the House. First of all, I must take the Bill which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) asks shall be read for the second time. I am sorry to have to say that I cannot but regret the language of the preamble of that Bill as being decidedly offensive, as being calculated to do grave harm in this community and as being calculated as I have said to set members of this House of different creeds and nationalities at issue to no good purpose. More than that, Sir, I take objection in the strongest possible manner with the preceding lines of this preamble:

"Whereas it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language among the people of Canada, and that the enactment in 'The North-West Territories Act' allowing the use of the French language should be expunged therefrom."

Sir, that preamble is in no way necessary to the Bill, it should never have been there, and was intended to affront and offend my friends of the French nationality; and small blame to them if they felt affronted and offended when asked to consider a Bill introduced by a preamble like that. But I have a more important objection to make to that preamble: I say that on the plainest grounds of common sense and common prudence, the assertion contained in it that the best way to produce unity among us is to do what is known to be affronting to one-third or one-fourth of the people of this Dominion is entirely false and incorrect. That is not the way to produce national unity among Canadians; it is not the way to build up a nation here. The way to make Canadians proud of their country is to say, clearly and distinctly, to every race in Canada, that they may expect fair play and honest dealings at the hands of their fellow-countrymen, whether they are English, French, Scotch, Irish, Canadian or any other nationality. Looking at this matter, Sir, as a practical man, as one who hopes to end his life in Canada, I say that the hon. gentleman, be his motives or intentions what they may, is attempting a downright impossibility, if he hopes by legislative enactment to wipe away the French language and to induce a million or a million and a-quarter of our people to abandon their mother tongue, solemnly guaranteed to them by treaty and in every possible way that a government or a nation can guarantee, that it shall be left undisturbed in their native Province or in the Dominion of Canada. I say it is absurd. It might have come to pass—though I do not know but the hon. gentleman and his friends have now rendered it impossible—not to-day or to-morrow, but in the course of a generation or two, that mutual convenience in communicating and dealing with each other in the prevailing tongue of North America might have induced the people of Quebec to adopt that language, as has been done in Ireland, where, in many places, a number of years ago, the bulk of the population spoke Irish and Irish alone, but where now the English tongue has practically superseded the Irish language. But I tell the hon. member for North Simcoe and other hon. gentlemen who think with him that there is no case in history, and I cannot conceive of a case, where such result has been brought about by legislative enactment. Persecute a religion, a race, or a language, and you enlist every worthy, manly and self-respecting sentiment in the minds of the men who profess that religion, belong to that race, or speak that language in maintaining it against all odds; and I do not think so meanly of my French fellow-countrymen as to wish or believe that they will be dragooned out of rights which have been solemnly guaranteed to them. Sir, I do not know what visions of victory or what aspirations may float through the minds of the hon. member for Simcoe and his followers. Peradventure, as has been suggested, it has entered into the mind of the hon. member to play the part of an Ontario Parnell, and to return to this House with twenty or thirty stout Protestant Home Rulers like the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), to hold the balance of power and to dictate terms—I was going to say to his adversary, but as I suppose I should say, his beloved chieftain who sits opposite to me.

An hon. MEMBER. Who said so?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why, the hon. member for Simcoe himself, and he ought to know. But if, as I have said, the language of the preamble of this unfortunate Act was needlessly affronting and offensive to gentlemen of French nationality, what must I say of the speech in which, without provocation, in cold blood, the hon. member for Simcoe thought fit to introduce it? Sir, I regretted exceedingly to hear that speech, and most of all for this reason: I knew—my parliamentary experience taught me, as the parliamentary experience of any hon. gentleman who has sat for a few sessions in this House would teach him—that one such mischievous and injudicious speech was sure to be the parent of others equally mischievous and injudicious, which would go far to widen the breach and render the task of moderate and reasonable men in composing our differences more difficult than ever; and I am sorry to say that one member of the Government at least—I mean the hon. Minister of Public Works—was betrayed into following the evil example of the hon. member for Simcoe, and into delivering a speech which the hon. member for Simcoe must have listened to with delight, but which I am sure no considerate man on either side of the House could have regarded as other than injudicious and ill-timed. I am very sorry that an old parliamentary veteran like the hon. Minister of Public Works should have deliberately played the game of the hon. member for Simcoe, as he most undoubtedly did, when he delivered that speech, which will prove an arsenal from which the hon. member for Simcoe and those associated with him could saw barbed and poisoned arrows to disturb the sentiments and feelings of a great number of worthy people throughout this community. Sir, I wish I could confine my regret in that respect entirely to the hon. Minister of Public Works. I would have thought that the trap laid by the hon. member for Simcoe was perfectly transparent. I would have thought that any hon. member in this House who listened to his speech, who read his preamble, who considered what his whole course has been, must have seen that the object that hon. gentleman was driving at, the thing he wanted to bring about, was, if possible, to array in a solid mass, if that were possible, the members of the French nationality on the one side, and the members of the English nationality on the other side; or, what is worse still, to array the members of one religious persuasion on one side, and the members of other religious persuasions on the other side. I regret exceedingly that a gentleman for whom I entertain such high regard as I do for the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) should have walked deliberately into such a trap, and should have brought forward a resolution which looks—though I acquit the hon. gentleman of any such intention—as if it were designed to play into the hands of the hon. member for Simcoe. I am very sorry for it. I admit that there were extenuating circumstances in the case of the hon. member for Berthier. I am sometimes myself accused, most unjustly, of having hasty blood in my veins, and I dare say I would have felt angry at the language used by the hon. member for Simcoe; but however angry I might have felt, I do not think I would have walked into the trap he set and supplied him with material for future mischievous operations. Now, as far as I am concerned, my own course in this matter is clear enough. Last year—and I ask my French compatriots to recollect the circumstance—last year, in common with the great mass of the Liberal party and the Conservative party in the Province of Ontario, I and they voted upon a certain question in a way which offended the prejudices of many of our constituents. I laid down then, as I am disposed to lay down to-night, the principle that in affairs of this kind, as in all affairs which properly belong to them, the Provincial Legislatures should have the sole right to legislate. The principle which I applied in favor of the Province of Quebec last year I am disposed to apply on the present occasion in favor of the North-West Territories. I ask now the same rights for our fellow-countrymen of the North-West Territories that I asked for our fellow-countrymen in the Province of Quebec last year. I am prepared to recognise their right, but I require that that right be properly asserted and clearly stated, and that I should be well assured, when I interfere in a matter of this kind, that I, in my place, and as far as I can, am giving assent to the deliberately expressed opinion and conviction of the people of those Territories. It may be asked why will I not acknowledge that the North-West Council, as at present constituted, do really represent the views and the wishes of the people of those territories? I am bound to recall to the attention of hon. members this plain fact. No doubt, to a certain extent, these gentlemen may be said to represent the people of the North-West Territories, although they are not their only representatives; but they have not all the powers, and they were not elected to discharge all the duties of a Provincial Parliament or Assembly. I say, without any desire to belittle their important functions, that they are somewhat of a hybrid between a municipal council and a Provincial Parliament, and I cannot admit that they are entitled to speak with perfect authority on a question which was notoriously not before the people when the North-West Council were elected. More than that: I have another reason why I decline to accept what may, for ought I know, have been a hasty resolution passed by the North-West Council. So far as I am advised, there is every reason to believe that it was in no way the spontaneous declaration of the Council of the North-West, but was a suggestion from outside. Probably the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) knows best whence it came. It did not deal, in an yproper sense of the term, with a real substantial grievance under which those people groaned, and in voicing which the Council merely voiced the true sentiments of their constituents. I am quite prepared, on proper opportunity being given me, to advocate provincial rights to the fullest extent; I am quite prepared to lay down the principle that the people of the North-West, when this matter has been fairly submitted to them, when they have passed upon it—if in two or three years hence they continue in the same mind—should be sustained by this Parliament; but beyond that I must decline to go. I admit that it was best for all parties that a decision should be come to on this subject; it will serve no good purpose that I can see to allow this matter to be kept open for debate and to continue to be made a cause of agitation between the conflicting races. I cannot however quite agree with the doctrine laid down by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) that a sort of vested right has been established by the mere fact of the concession which was made some ten or twelve years ago. I am prepared, as fully as any man, to maintain treaty rights formerly granted to our French brethren in the Province of Quebec, but I think that in all reason we ought to stop there. If the French settlers should become numerous in any Province of this Dominion, either near us or in the far West, and if they persuaded the Legislature, or the Legislature saw fit, for mutual convenience, for good fellowship or courtesy, to decree that the French language should be used in such Province, so let it be. No one on this side, I believe, would raise his voice or give his vote to prevent that extension of privileges; but, I say, in all conscience, that ought to be enough. I have no possible ground or pretence to dictate to my friends from Ontario what they should do in this matter. It is a matter in which they must judge for themselves, and no doubt they will be able to do that. But if they will allow me to make a suggestion to them, it will be this: I think they ought to oppose to the uttermost the passage of the Act introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Mc Carthy)—and on these grounds: that the Act itself is mischievous, the language is offensive, and it deals with no real substantial grievance. Why, I am told that the whole cost of the evil which the hon. member for North Simcoe designs to remedy amounted in thirteen years to something like $20,000, about one-tenth or about one-twentieth of the cost which the blundering attempt to usurp the property and the rights of the Province of Ontario, made partly under the hon. gentleman's auspices, has already cost this country. Looking at this matter from a practical point of view, I think after the hon. gentleman's exhibition, after the speech he made, which showed his animus, which showed his design to make mischief, my hon. friends from Ontario need have no fear that any but a few bigots will condemn them for refusing to vote against this Bill. I may tell them they have lost those bigots' votes already. While that is true, it is equally true—and my hon. friends will pardon me for reminding them of it—that, besides the bigots who would dare to join so wicked an agitation for it is wicked (to stir up an anti-French crusade, considering the circumstances under which the hon. gentleman desires to initiate it) besides those there are, I must confess, men known to all of you, moderate and reasonable men, who, while they are well content to accept the grounds on which we voted last year, who, while they admit we did right, and, in fact, had no option but to vote as we did, would hold us to a strict account if we should now go back on our own record, and having a year ago voted to defend the rights of the Province of Quebec should now appear unwilling, on proper terms and conditions, to maintain the rights of our fellow-countrymen in the North-West. To my friends of the French nationality I speak with great diffidence; I admit that I think their anger very natural, I sympathise with their feelings, and I do not think they had any right to be addressed as they were on the floor of this House. But is that a reason—and I speak now, not merely to my political friends on this side, but to my French compatriots on the other side—that they should deliberately allow themselves to be goaded and driven into playing the game of the hon. member for North Simcoe? I repeat there can be no possible step they will take that would serve the ends of that hon. gentleman better than if they would display here, what I would regret to see displayed, the spectacle of a solid French minority voting against a solid English majority. It would be a grave political mistake which would injure themselves, and—I was going to say for once in my life, but I think I have had occasion to do it once or twice before—I am disposed to agree in substance with the advice tendered to the House by the hon. the leader of this Government. I am bound to admit—and I make him a present of the fact—that, if he had not spoken as he did, and cut me out, I would probably have made a similar suggestion myself, and my hon. friends beside me know right well what my feelings have been on this subject since it was broached. What I would advise—speaking entirely from a non-party point—my French friends to do would be to drop this motion of my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), or, if it cannot be dropped, not to vote for it, but to consent to an amendment on the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. That is to say, disclaiming, as we ought to disclaim, all intention or desire to interfere with the rights guaranteed to our French friends in Quebec, and in the Dominion, and we should disclaim that, and should disavow all complicity or agreement with the anti-French crusade which the hon. gentleman has been preaching; but, at the same time, and on the same ground as we defended the rights of Quebec last year, we must now feel it our duty to record our conviction that, when this matter has been put fairly and clearly before the people of the North-West, they in the last resort, must be the judges of it. I believe that nine-tenths or nineteen-twentieths of this House, if they were free on both sides to vote as they think, would accept the suggestion I have made, and which was made before by the right hon. the First Minister, and I hope they will not allow themselves to be bulldozed into acting contrary to their convictions by a few fanatics in the House or outside of it. One word more, because, as I said, I am anxious not to delay the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. McCarthy). I believe myself that, if time is given, if two years are allowed to elapse, if the right is conceded which the people of the North-West demand to regulate their own affairs, it is extremely probable that those people would be content with the knowledge that they had that right conceded, and would not force that right to its extreme conclusion. For myself, I would be glad if they could see their way to do that until such time as we saw whether or not there was going to be such a large immigration into that country as might affect the decision of this difficult and vexed question.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it is not unreasonable that, at this hour, I should claim the indulgence of the House. The debate has lasted over five days, or nearly so, and during that time I have been subjected to as much abuse certainly as the rules of Parliament permit, and perhaps a little more than the rules would warrant. I look at my friends who are opposite to me and I find no sympathetic glances, and I have no reason to expect them. I look to the band of Nationalists who think I am assailing their race and nationality and language, and I do not find any and I do not expect any. And even when I look amongst those on this side who were once my friends and allies, I find, perhaps, more hostile glances than I do elsewhere. I am standing here alone, or almost alone, doing what I believe to be my duty, and, notwithstanding the sneers, and the taunts, and the insinuations that have been made, I propose to do my duty to the end, if I stand alone, or almost alone, on the floor of this House in the vote which is shortly to be taken. The hon. gentleman who has last spoken (Sir Richard Cartwright) has made no disguise of his feelings or his principles. He speaks not from the principle of statesmanship but from a purely partisan or party point of view. He argues with his friends behind him and his friends before him on that ground, and he appeals to them not to fall into the trap which I am accused of having laid and which some of those friends, he thinks, have already fallen into, but to reject the Bill which I have had the honor to introduce. He makes this appeal without one word of argument upon the merits of the Bill, without a word as to whether it is right or wrong in the interests of the people of the North-West, for whom we are here to judge and to legislate upon this question, but simply with a view to the effect it may have on the votes of the people whom he thinks he leads from the Province of Ontario. He warns them as to the results. He knows well enough that they have gone away from him never to return, but he tells them that they will have lost all if they support such a measure as this and had better return to their allegiance. I looked for better things from that hon. gentleman, but have looked in vain. His speech was a purely partisan speech, without one redeeming feature, without one thing to raise it above the level of the mere party machine. I welcome his statement even from a party point of view if from no other, because it leaves that hon. gentleman without a shred of reputation as a statesman, which he once pretended to be. But I have to address myself not only to the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have to speak of the attack which has been made upon the measure from other sources, and to endeavor to clear up, if I can, the accusations which have been made. The hon. members who have supported me are small in number, though they are as true as steel. They have been overborne in this debate by the power of numbers—not of argument; and I will endeavor to show that, amid the tissue of misrepresentation which has been poured out upon our devoted heads, hon. members will find that there has been no warrant for any part of it. I am accused of having got up this agitation, of having originated it not only on matters of race, but on matters of religion, and I am accused of doing that for selfish purposes and ends. I would like to know what end I had to serve in severing myself from the gentleman I have hitherto supported, and from those hon. gentlemen behind me, who, I have reason to believe, would not have been unwilling to see me advanced in the ranks of my party. What could have led me to take this course as it has been untruly represented to the House, and through the House to the country? My whole course in regard to this matter did not originate last July in my address to my constituents. But on the floor of this chamber, in the presence of hon. members who hear me now, I stated that I had discovered—as, I am ashamed to say, I discovered for the first time—that the dual language clause was in the North-West Act. We then talked it over, and I appeal to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) if we did not call him across the floor and ask him how it was, as our attention had been called to the subject by a speech having been delivered by a Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, for the first time, in French, in the preceding session. That is what aroused our attention to this fact, and, if I am not misinformed, that is what first drew attention to the fact in the North-West—that a French Governor who was sent up there to govern what was practically an English speaking people—true, Sir, to the policy of his race, true to the object which my hon. friends from Quebec have had in view from the very first day that this country was ceded to Great Britain, namely, to perpetuate their race; and they know full well, if other hon. members choose to disregard it, that the perpetuation of that race can only be by the perpetuation of their language—I say, knowing that the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West delivered there his speech in French and English, and imported into that Territory a secretary, in order that the laws might be translated into French and published in that language. This, Sir, it was, if I am not grossly misinformed, which raised the indignation of the members of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West so much that they threatened, if that occurred again, they would withdraw in a body. Well, Sir, whether that be so or not, so far as I am concerned it was as I have stated. I consulted some of the hon. gentlemen who are sitting about me and we agreed—some of these hon. gentlemen have been true to their pledges, but the voices of some others have been stifled because they feared to hurt their party—we then and there pledged ourselves that we would, at the earliest opportunity, bring to the notice of this House the iniquitous legislation which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had fathered, which he pretended he had acquiesced in reluctantly, but, as it now appears, he had deliberately connived at its introduction into the Act of the North-West Territories in the year 1878. That was the beginning of it, and I notified my leader at an early day that I would take this course. I had nothing to do with the agitation in connection with it. The agitation which has been spoken of with regard to the Equal Rights Association got no strength from my connection with it. I had never even attended the convention which assembled at Toronto; all I had to do with it was to send a telegram of regret that I was unable to attend, being otherwise engaged in professional duties, and that I sympathised with the motives and the objects which had brought together the great band of people from all parts of Ontario to take such measures that for the future, at all events, their voice should be heard on the floor of this Parliament. When it became my duty to visit my constituents, as I did upon the 12th July—the first time, I may state, that I ever addressed a body of my constituents on that day, or made any political utterance on the 12th July—I then announced publicly, that I would take the earliest opportunity of asking this Parliament to undo what, according to the records—I will not use the word “surreptitiously”—but what, according to the records, had been stolen through in the dying hours of the Session of 1878, under the charge of the hon. member for Bothwell. Was that an agitation of which any man need be ashamed? Was that pandering to the already aroused passions? What followed? It is said that I have undertaken to act for the people of the North-West Territories; that no mission has been given me so to act for them, and that I am an intruder. Sir, when it became known that I purposed to take my holidays in the North-West, I was invited to address meetings throughout the Province of Manitoba. I had to decline to do so, except at one place, which, ultimately, was fixed for me, at Portage la Prairie.

Mr. WATSON. A Conservative centre.

Mr. McCARTHY. When I got to Portage la Prairie, and was on my way up to the North-West, it was not that I was seeking to intrude myself upon the domain of the North-West, but my difficulty was to deny myself to those who desired that I should address them and in the end I merely addressed one meeting, and that was at Calgary. I refused to make addresses in British Columbia, only to find on the next morning that the newspapers abused me for passing them by. I refused to address a meeting at Winnipeg, only to find that I was subject to castigation for passing by the important centre of that Province. The hon. member says I spoke at a Conservative centre. He knows pretty well, I think, he will be honest enough to admit, that the choice of place for holding the meeting, which happened to be at Portage la Prairie, was not my choice; but when I stated, as I did state, that I would only deliver one address in the North-West, and those who invited me fixed on Portage la Prairie as the place of the meeting, and I had no choice in the matter, one way or the other. I know the charge was made that it was chosen, because it was in a constituency represented by the hon. member who has just made the interruption, but I think that hon. member will do me the justice to say that, at all events, that charge was not founded so far as I am concerned. The charge has also been made that I was playing the game of the First Minister, that I was a mere tool in his hands, that I was going through this country without being sincere in my pledges, that in what I stated I was carrying on an agitation in collusion with him. Sir, I do not think that charge was even worthy of contradiction, as it ought to be denounced, but it is a charge which I now take the opportunity, in the presence of the First Minister, to say, as every hon. member on the floor of this House must realise, was certainly wanting in a tittle of foundation. I did what I thought was honorable and fair by this hon. gentleman whom I have hitherto followed. I have been careful to hold no intercourse with my former leader, my still leader in all questions affecting the general policy of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; I am not ashamed to announce this fact. There is no reason why I should cross the floor of this House, for there is, in my judgment, on that side an inability and an unwillingness to grapple with the questions which are looming up, and which call for settlement, and I find a bigotry still more profound upon the other side, a still greater truckling to that which, as every man from the Province of Ontario knows, I propose to devote the rest of my political life to denounce, and, if possible, to overturn. Therefore, why should I cross the floor of the House and follow the banner of hon. gentlemen opposite? I took an opportunity long ago of stating exactly where I stood; I spoke in the Opera House in this city—I do not know whether the First Minister took the trouble of reading it, but it was there for him to read—I stated then exactly where I stood. I stated that when these questions came up, if my party differed from the view which ought to be taken, I must stand alone, and I must follow these questions to their end. On other questions I stated there, as I have stated elsewhere, that as I was elected a supporter of the general policy of the Government, I was still a supporter of, and still a believer in that policy. If my connection with the party that I have hitherto supported is an injury to that party, as I think perhaps it is, if the gentlemen who sit behind me do not want me here, I am willing to go here or there, I care not where. I think I can find a seat in this House, and I can still voice the opinions of my own constituency, and a large proportion of the people of Ontario, whether I am turned out of this party or not, and whether I am accepted in that party or not. Such has been my course, and I am not ashamed of it. I denounce that man as a traitor to his country, I care not who he may be, who endeavors to arouse political passions and race passions by misrepresenting my views; he is the man who is doing the wrong, he is the man who is endeavoring in this Parliament and in this country to set race against race and religion against religion, because if my views are fairly looked at, if my statements are fairly examined, if my speeches are fairly read, I think no taint of bitterness will be found, because no taint of bitterness exists, towards my French Canadian fellow-citizens.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but he must know that I have a perfect right to the opinion which I entertain, that the best interests of this country are to be subserved by a unity of language, that the future of this great Dominion, with which this Parliament is charged, will be best worked out by the people of this country coming together and speaking the language of the majority, the tongue that ultimately must be spoken on all this continent of North America. And, if I am right in that, I do no injustice to my Canadian fellow-subjects; I do only what is my right and my duty, if among those hon. gentlemen and their constituents I endeavor to propagate my views and to support those views by arguments. I frankly admit, I do not deny it, that to many of these hon. gentlemen these are unpalatable views; but is that any good reason why, if I do think, and there are many who think with me, I should hesitate upon the floor of Parliament in temperate language, and my language was temperate, to express these views.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. My language, I re-assert, was temperate, and I will refer to it to support these views. My language was temperate wherever I spoke, and it was more especially temperate on the floor of Parliament, as an hon. gentleman's language ought to be temperate here. No such words escaped my lips as those which the Secretary of State used towards me here to-day; no language of that kind has ever escaped my lips in this debate, and I trust, notwithstanding the provocation of the Minister of Public Works, notwithstanding the provocation I received from the Secretary of State, who denounced me in language not fit for this Assembly, I trust no word will escape my lips which will resemble those used in the course they have pursued towards me. My arguments may tend to a certain conclusion, but my tone was temperate, and I venture to say that my argument was fairly drawn. Now, what was it? I ventured, in the first place, to give a short account of the history of this legislation. I ventured, in the second place, to demonstrate, what I am glad to know I did succeed in demonstrating beyond the region of contradiction, that the French language was not, according to any treaty rights, to be given, if you choose to call it so, to be made a part of the system in the North-West Territory. For that purpose it was necessary that I should trace the history of the cession. I was sorry I introduced even the word conquest, if it was offensive to any hon. gentleman, and I am quite willing to put the fact in any words, although most men will admit that the words make very little difference when the history is known to us all. I said, tracing that history step by step from the cession of 1763 to the passage of the British North America Act in 1867, that no word was to be found in all that history to show why that Act was passed, for which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is responsible, which was represented in that day to the House, but which I am sorry to say was not fairly or correctly represented to the House at that time, by the hon. gentleman, as a piece of legislation warranted upon a ground of that kind. My next argument, and I think it was a not unreasonable one, was this.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman was himself a member of the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not at all unaware of that fact. What I repeat is, that the matter was misrepresented to this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In what way?

Mr. McCARTHY. By the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I deny it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will tell the hon. gentleman in what way. That legislation was introduced into the Senate upon the suggestion of Mr. Girard, the Senator for Manitoba, but it was placed there by the member of the Government leading the Senate, Hon. Mr. Scott.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not believe it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have better information than the hon. gentleman, and, therefore, I shall not withdraw my statement. I speak by the book; I speak on the authority of a gentleman who was present; I speak in a way I can prove. I can prove that Senator Girard merely asked that some provision should be made by which the French half-breeds would have the right to speak in their own language in the courts; and the matter was taken into consideration by Hon. Mr. Scott.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is not the only thing that was asked.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct according to my information, and it is probably quite as good as that possessed by the Secretary of State.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have sat for five days in this House listening to this debate. I have been abused by almost every hon. gentleman who has spoken, but I have made no interruption. It is strange that if with ten to one against me they cannot give me even free speech.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. You stated as a fact that which was not correct.

Mr. McCARTHY. Whether correct or not, the hon. gentleman knows the rules of debate. Sir, I am speaking by the book of what I know from information on the very highest authority. The leader of the Senate then stated that during the recess he would consult his colleagues, and after recess he came down and put the clause, which is now clause 110, into the hands of Mr. Girard, who moved it, and it was carried in the Senate. If that be so—and we had no clear explanation about it, although I threw out the challenge in my opening remarks—then the responsibility for this trouble rests not upon my shoulders but upon the shoulders of the hon. member for Bothwell and his friends in the Government at that time. Those are the men who are responsible for the trouble, and it became my duty to bring it forward. I do not say I have not failed in my duty heretofore; I failed in my duty probably in not being present when that was done, but I do not suppose that a young member, for I was then only in my second year of my parliamentary life, would have ventured to interpose at that stage of the Session. That I have failed in my duty since I do not pretend to deny, but when I did ascertain the facts I would have been wanting in my duty, feeling and believing as I do feel and believe with respect to this matter, if I had not brought it to the attention of the country in the first place, and, in the second place, to the attention of this House. With respect to other matters on which I desire to speak before I deal with the question itself: It is true I addressed a meeting in Montreal; it is true I addressed a meeting in this city of Ottawa, but those who know the facts must know that those meetings which I have had the honor to address were not of my seeking. I have a list of places and a bundle of papers which would satisfy hon. gentlemen that I, at all events, was not seeking to force myself upon the public, but my attendance was demanded by the great city of Montreal and by the city of Ottawa, and it was only in answer to repeated calls that I went to those different cities. So much with respect to what has been said in regard to this agitation. If hon. gentlemen will deal with the matter fairly, they will see that there was no other course open to me, feeling as I feel, and realising my responsibility as a member of this House, but to take the action I have pursued. But exception has been taken to some of my language. I had the misfortune to miss the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I have not yet had time, having only received Hansard this evening, to peruse his speech throughout; but I am told the hon. gentleman assailed my speech on the ground that I had used harsh expressions with regard to his nationality. If the hon. gentleman understood my remarks were with respect to his nationality and his race, then I do not wonder at the hon. gentleman's indignation. If the hon. gentleman supposes that I was capable of speaking of any people of this Dominion, or any section of the people of this Dominion in these terms, he was perfectly within his duty in calling attention to the language and denouncing it in the most vigorous terms. But that was not the meaning of my words, and I think my hon. friend, a master as he is of our own tongue, perfectly well realised that was not the meaning. I spoke of the national cry and the national party that he among others has been establishing and fomenting in one of the Provinces of this Dominion, and I denounced that nationality, or rather that pretending nationality as a bastard nationality. I again denounce it here on the floor of Parliament as such. I say that the legitimate nationality, and there is but one, is the nationality common to us all, the nationality that spreads from ocean to ocean and embraces all races and peoples within this great Dominion. I say that if any one in any portion or corner of this Dominion gathers a party together, whether English, Irish, Scotch or French, and endeavors to rise a cry on the nationality of that particular race, there is no word that describes it other than the word that I used, and to which the hon. gentleman called attention. Although the hon. gentleman thought I dare not, I have no hesitation of repeating that statement on the floor of this House, and there is no hon. member understanding the sense in which I stated it before, and in which I repeat it now, who can deny that the expression used was applicable.

Mr. LAURIER. The expression was unfortunate.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman may say so, but I do not know how else he could put it. In justice to him I will say that he quoted my words fairly, or otherwise I would have quoted them myself. There is but one nationality that I, at all events, am willing to recognise in this country. I do not speak of our loyalty to the Throne; I do not speak of our allegiance to the mother country; I speak of that higher nationality of Canadians to Canada. I speak not of one nationality, not of one race, but of all Canada and all Canadians joined together as we should be joined and proud to acknowledge our allegiance. I regret that so much time has been taken up by a somewhat personal explanation, but, perhaps, if I was to do the subject justice with which I propose to deal, it was necessary that I should clear away from the discussion those extraneous matters which those opposed to me have thought well to introduce. We perfectly well understand the arts of the politician. We do not always spread it so exactly or plainly to the public as the innocent member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); we do not always exactly announce that we are giving party instructions when we speak on the floor of Parliament as that hon. gentleman has thought fit to do, but it has been perfectly plain and perfectly clear to the vision of the most uninitiated among us that the object here has been not to discuss this matter on its merits, not to deal with this question, as it ought to be dealt with, as to whether it should or not become law, but by abusing the plaintiff's attorney—the unfortunate promoter of the Bill—and by raising clouds of race prejudices and religious prejudices as well, to have this Bill rejected because of matters which ought not to have been mentioned in connection with it. What is the proposition we are dealing with here? It is a simple one. It is said that it is the entering of the thin end of the wedge; it is said that I have commenced a crusade, and that this is the first thing I have attempted and that my success in this will mean success later on in other matters. Even if that were so, and if the continuance of the present condition of things is an injury to the people of the North-West—if this is calculated to do that great portion of our Dominion an injustice, are the people of the North-West to suffer under this grievance because of the unfortunate language—if it be unfortunate—because of the unfortunate terms—if they be unfortunate—in which the Bill was presented to the House of Commons. I do not think the practical people of this country will accept any such excuse. I will just add as a rider to the advice of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright): “Do not I beseech you hon. members who sit behind him allow yourselves to be carried away with such ill advice as that.” This Bill and this only must be dealt with on its merits. It is not for the speech of the member who introduced it you are going to vote, it is not for his speech in the Opera House at Ottawa you are going to vote, but you must vote “yea” or “nay” upon the Bill itself which is now before you. If that Bill is one which in the interests of our common country should be passed, I do not think that excuses such as are presented here will save hon. gentlemen from the just indignation of their constituents. Again, there has been a very great misrepresentation of what I stated in my speech. My argument upon the question of language is to be found in these words:

“Now I venture to think I have to advance some explanation of the proposition which I am dealing with—that is, that language is of great importance, that it is of vital consequence to the nation, that the language spoken by its people should be common to them all, and that they should not at all events be encouraged and trained in speaking different languages.”

Is there anything revolutionary in that? Is this the language of the incendiary? Is there anything here that ought not to have been uttered on the floor of Parliament. You can look throughout the speech and you will find nothing more radical than that. I gave my reasons and I cited what my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was good enough to sneer at as my "authorities." We are not all, like the hon. member for Assiniboia, versed in literature, history, philology, ethnology and in all the other subjects he is so well acquainted with, nor is the country so learned as that hon. gentleman; and I thought in justice to my position that I should quote my authorities. This subject is a comparatively new one to most of us, and I do not repent of it in the slightest degree that in the introduction of this Bill I stated my reasons and gave my authorities, which have been open to the criticisms of hon. members who did me the honor to listen to my address or who read my observations. After all the impassioned language we have heard, after all the abuse that has been heaped upon my devoted head, I ask: Do not those words of mine stand unrefuted and incapable of refutation? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock)—the loyal embryo knight from that constituency—have first set up a man of straw and then attacked him. The hon. member for Bothwell contended that I had not gone far enough—that I ought to have struck at the language here in this chamber and in the Province of Quebec—that I ought to have prevented its use in the pulpit, on the platform, in the schools, and so on. Why, Sir, we have nothing to do with these matters; we have no call to meddle with them; but I am glad to be able to inform the hon. gentleman that the North-West Legislative Assembly are themselves dealing with this matter of the schools, which is, perhaps, the most important of all. They, discovering as they did lately, just as we have discovered lately, what was going on in the so-called Separate schools in the French settlements, have already, in advance of the Province of Ontario, put an end to that, and the teaching is now in the English tongue. What I have sought for here is that which is in our power. We have this enormous territory yet to be peopled by millions, and do we want to have repeated there the spectacle which is presented on the floor of this House, or the spectacle, still more deplorable from a patriotic point of view, which is depicted in the Legislative Chamber of the Province of Quebec? Do you want that, Sir? It would be better that we all spoke French than that half of us should speak French and half of us English.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," and he is quite right. I do not pretend to know the glories of the French language, but I do know enough from what I have been told to believe that it is a beautiful tongue. But that is not the question we are dealing with. We know that the French language is not and never can be the language of British North America and we ought to realise—more especially ought the French Canadians of this country to realise—that their true interest, as our true interest, is at as early a day as possible to have but the one language spoken in this country. Well, of course, I do not expect, and it would be hardly reasonable to expect, that those hon. gentlemen who agree with me that we should all be better speaking French will go the other step with me and agree that we should be all the better speaking English, though the hon. leader of the Opposition I am told—for I had not the honor of hearing him—rather leaned to that view. Now, I am not going to follow the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in their excursions into Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Cape Colony, Mauritius, and other places which have been brought to our notice. I have stated before, and I repeat, that these cases are not the rule, but the exception; and while I quite admit that the Province of Quebec is also an exceptional case, the legislation proposed here has no reference to that Province; it has no reference even to this Parliament; it is with regard to the great territories of the North-West, which have always belonged to the Crown of England, which never belonged to the French in any sense, notwithstanding the statement of the bishop which is in our Votes and Proceedings. History tells us that north of the Height of Land and from there to the Pacific Ocean the Frenchman, although he went there, went there as a trespasser, and was expelled as a trespasser. I see a smile on the face of the philosopher from Bothwell, who endeavored to prove that the French territory extended as far as the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So it did.

Mr. McCARTHY. But that was settled by the boundary decision. Those who represented the Province of Ontario in that dispute, before the Privy Council, put forward that pretension, and the hon. gentleman sat there with his wig on his head ready to argue, if he were only allowed, in favor of it, but it was better argued by his seniors. But the Privy Council rejected his contention, and the boundary was placed where we now have it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all; it was on the ground of acquiescence that they decided.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is, of course, wiser than the rest of us. As the Privy Council gave no reason for their judgment, but simply reported to Her Majesty where the boundary was, I do not know where he got that information.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). During the argument.

Mr. McCARTHY. There was not one word during the argument, which I took part in, which would lead to that conclusion. At all events, the observation of a judge during an argument is not a decision.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The observation of Lord Selborne—

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. gentleman will keep his soul in patience we shall get on more easily with this debate. That being so, on what pretense, I want to know, did that hon. gentleman's Government introduce this clause into the North-West Territories Act? I am not now discussing the Province of Manitoba; but with regard to the North-West Territories, is there a shadow of reason for this provision? If so, it has not yet been given to show why the dual language should be imposed on the people of the North-West Territories. If there be no answer, as no answer there can be, then I want to know what is the duty of this Parliament? Is the duty of this Parliament to leave it there? In that respect I understand that the politician of the party, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) differs from the hon. member for West Durham, and he is wise to differ with him and withdraw himself from his protection. The proposition of the hon. member for West Durham, the most monstrous ever submitted to any assembly, is to keep the language as an encouragement to the French to emigrate to the North-West, and to settle this question, by-and-bye, after they get there. If they go in masses, says the hon. member, I shall much regret it; but if they do go there in masses—and we perfectly well know that they do not go in any other way—then, he said, something will have to be done. If I might appeal to the reason of the House without prejudice, I would say, let us look at the position of the North-West to-day. We are told, and the census confirms it, that in 1885 there were but 1,500 French Canadians in the North-West. If you add the number of the half-breeds of French descent, the number will still be less than 5,000. I have got the exact figures here. We know that at the time to which I refer, there were in the three districts 23,285 English-speaking people; I am leaving the Indians out of consideration. The ratio is therefore 83 to 17 per cent., and if our records are correct that disproportion has been vastly increased, and it is not too much to say that there are not to-day in the North-West one-tenth of the people who speak the French language to the nine-tenths who speak the English language. And moreover, when we look at the record we find that these French are scattered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then they are not in the mass?

Mr. McCARTHY. "Then they are not in the mass" is the very erudite observation made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). They are here, there and everywhere, in small bands and surrounded by a large population of English-speaking people. That being so, can there be any better time for settling this question than the present? Should there be an immigration in the North-West, in the near future, of the French Canadians, should they go in there induced by the speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), or should this House be insane enough to adopt the proposed resolution of that hon. gentleman, I do not know, in common justice, how it would be possible to say, by-and-bye, to those who had immigrated upon the faith of such resolution, that this dual language should be done away with. Therefore, this is the time to deal with the question, and I venture to say that this is the place. The hon. member for South Oxford threw another insinuation, and it certainly would be more satisfactory, if instead of insinuating, he would make his statements so clear that they could be understood. He said that the North-West Council had been moved to present the petition I spoke of by some outside influence, about which he indicated I knew something. What did the hon. gentleman mean? Has the hon. gentleman ever been in the North-West? Has he ever seen the members of the Council or of the Assembly? Does he know the character of the men there? My whole connection with the North-West Assembly commenced with stopping over at Calgary and then passing on; and I had only one communication with one of the members of that Council after this matter was dealt with by the Council, and that was with reference to the form in which the petition ought to be presented to this House. But to suppose that the North-West Council, composed of 22 members, representing three districts, which are in a much less degree represented in this House, were not competent to deal with this question; to suppose that their opinion is to have no weight with us, but it is to be set at naught; to suppose that the great doctrine of provincial rights in the case of the North-West Council is not to have even the support of hon. gentlemen opposite, is a very extraordinary conclusion to arrive at. Now, what is the position? The North-West Council, by a petition which is practically unanimous—carried by 20 to 2—and which has been laid on the Table, asks for the passage of a measure such as the one I have introduced. Hearing that petitions were being presented here from certain settlements, there was at once—and without the slightest communication, so far as I know, with any member of this House; without any communication at all events with me—a burst of indignation at what appeared to these men to be the imposition which was being practised upon this House. The petitions which the hon. members presented, and which aroused this indignation, were couched as follows:—

"The petition of the undersigned humbly expose that at a public meeting of the ratepayers of Lethbridge, District of Alberta, N. W. T., held this second day of January, A. D. 1890, they have been respectively appointed chairman and secretary, and that the following resolution has been unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, the French language is, under the constitution and the laws, one of the two official languages of the Dominion; and

"Whereas, under the 'North-West Territories Act' the French is, equally with the English, an official language, the suppression of its use, as such, in the North-West Territories, would be a flagrant injustice towards the settlers of French origin, who were the pioneers of this country, and towards those of the same race, who, upon the faith of the constitution and existing laws, came and established themselves in the North-West, and have contributed, with other citizens of other nationalities, to the development of the resources of the country;

"Be it resolved:
"That a petition containing the resolution that has just been passed be signed by the chairman and the secretary of this meeting, and be addressed to the House of Commons, asking that no law be passed affecting the rights of the population with regard to the official use of the French language, as guaranteed by the constitution and the 'North-West Territories Act.'"

No sooner did the news reach the North-West than petitions such as this were being circulated; than an indignation meeting was called at Lethbridge. What was the result of that meeting? I have a telegram which was sent to me, and which reads as follows:—

"At a meeting of the Board of Trade of Lethbridge, thirty-five members present, the following resolution was passed:—

"Moved by J. D. Higginbotham, seconded by C. C. McCaul, that whereas it appears from reports in the public press that a petition purporting to be from the ratepayers of Lethbridge, against the proposal to abolish the dual language system, has been presented to Parliament, this Board of Trade emphatically protest against such petition being accepted as the views of the ratepayers or inhabitants of Lethbridge, because no such public meeting was ever held in Lethbridge, and the said petition was secretly prepared and forwarded, and the ratepayers of Lethbridge never had any opportunity of voting thereon, and that a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to Mr. Dalton McCarthy, and a copy forwarded by mail to the public press. Please let D. W. Davis, M.P., have copy of this telegram.

"W. A. GALLIHER,
"Secretary Board of Trade."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. And the Privy Council has a communication which shows what the meeting was and the number of people present, and which exposes the falsity of that telegram.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman did not think fit to lay it upon the Table.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is before the Privy Council, and the names can be given and the papers produced at any time my hon. friend wants them.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think any statement of that kind would convince me, and I will tell the hon. gentleman the reason why. I have a letter from a gentleman, who has given me the liberty to read it—a gentleman well known to the right hon. the First Minister, and who is as incapable of telling an untruth as is the hon. the Provincial Secretary himself.

"February 5th, 1890.

"DEAR MR. McCARTHY,—The Empire publishes certain resolutions in regard to the dual language question, purporting to have been passed at a public meeting of ratepayers at Lethbridge. The 'public meeting' must have been very privately called, as none of the ratepayers to the public school ever heard of it. It was in fact a meeting of the Roman Catholic supporters of the separate school, a very small minority—and they were very careful not to let the general public get any inkling of their proceedings.

"You can rely on it that the general feeling of Lethbridge and this district, is entirely in favor of your motion.

"Yours faithfully,
C. C. McCAUL.

"You are at liberty to make any use of this letter that you see fit."

That is not the only communication I got. I got a letter from Banff from a gentleman perfectly well known to the right hon. the First Minister, Mr. Frederick J. Boswell:

"MY DEAR McCARTHY,—I noticed in the Toronto Globe the announcement that Davis, M. P. for Alberta, has presented to the House of Commons from Banff, Anthracite Canmore, &c., a resolution asking the Parliament not to do away with the French language in the Territories;" that the said resolutions were passed at public meeting held in the above named places; I can most positively assure you that no such meetings were held either at Banff, Anthracite or Canmore, the only meetings that have been held were two, in reference to the regulations and leases in the townsite of Banff.

"I think it right to let you know this, as I am with you in re your dual language Bill and am at work getting a petition signed by all inhabitants of this place backing you up. Dr. Brett, our member of the Legislative Assembly, is strongly in your favor, and you may depend that if it is referred to the Assembly he will do his utmost to carry it.

"I think it very unjust of Davis to misrepresent us.

"Wishing you and your Bill every success.

"I remain,
Yours very sincerely,
FRED J. BOSWELL."

I have also a telegram, which I believe was also sent to the hon. member who represents Alberta in this House (Mr. Davis), in these words:

"At a mass meeting in Calgary to-night, Mayor Lafferty, chairman, the following resolutions passed by 250 to 7:—

"No. 1. That the use of a dual language in official proceedings in the North-West Territories is unnecessary, expensive and calculated to prevent the complete union of the several nationalities who reside in the Territories, and that to bring about a united Canadian people in this part of the Dominion, the English language alone should be legalised in the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly, the courts, and all other official bodies.

"No. 2. That this meeting heartily endorses the action of the Legislative Assembly at Regina, in reference to the dual language, and requests that the petition presented to the Dominion Government in pursuance of such action be granted.

"No. 3. That a copy of the above resolutions be forwarded to D. W. Davis, M.P.; D'Alton McCarthy, M.P., the Hon. James Loughheed, and the Dominion Parliament, and that D. W. Davis, M.P., be requested to forward in every way the movement for the abolition of French as an official language in the Territories."

Now, let us see where we stand in regard to this question, considered as a local one. The members of the North-West Council were elected two years ago, if my memory serves me, since the members of this House who sit for that district were elected. They are twenty-two in number. They are spread, of course, and come much more in contact with the people of their respective territories than do the members who sit here, whose districts are so much larger. They have unanimously, or with practical unanimity, petitioned this House to abolish this clause in the North-West Territories Act. On the motion being made here, and the matter being brought before Parliament, and it appearing that certain cut-and-dried petitions were presented here from certain places in that Territory, the people there at once set about getting up counter-petitions which I have had the honor to present to the House. They are not petitions purporting to be signed by the chairmen and secretaries of public meetings, which may conceal the fact that no such meetings were held, but they are signed by the leading men in the places from which they come. For instance, in Calgary, the petition was signed by the mayor at the head, by two ex-mayors and over 500 others; and, in another place, the petition is signed by a French Catholic gentleman, who, I think must be the gentleman who grows coffee, to whom the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred to the other night, though of that I am not quite sure. Then we have a public meeting at which a vote of 250 to 7 was recorded in favor of this change; and yet we are told that we do not know what the feelings of the people of the North-West are in regard to this question, and that we ought to give them time for consideration, and to allow the members of the Assembly there another opportunity of appealing to their constituents. There are many other questions which come before this House with which, if that argument is to prevail, we would find it difficult to deal at all. But I do not conceal the fact that I do not look upon this matter as a local question. When I addressed the people of Calgary, and they were good enough to say that they understood I was to take a part in the movement to abolish the separate school system and the dual language in the North-West, I said, as to the dual language I shall move in Parliament, whether you petition or not; I look upon that question as a matter of national importance, as a matter affecting the whole Dominion, as a matter which is proper to be dealt with in Parliament and not by a Local Legislature. I found at the same time, in the organ of the hon. gentleman which is published in the city of Toronto, a statement that if the people in the North-West signified their desire to abolish the use of that language officially, effect would be given to their wish. When the Assembly met, almost their earliest act—and I think not their least important act—was to adopt this petition, which placed on two grounds their desire to abolish the use of that language: one, that it was not required in the interest of the country; and the other, that it was contrary to sound public policy that two languages should prevail. Follow that up by the petitions I have had the honor to present, and by the report which I have read from my place in Parliament, and then, if the House is not seized of the opinions of the North-West in regard to this matter, I fail to see how we will ever be able to obtain the views of that people on the subject. Do not let us exaggerate, I have no desire at all to exaggerate the importance of this question of language. I admit as freely as it can be admitted that there are cases—and the case of Switzerland is one—where, under peculiar circumstances, people speaking different languages, those languages being officially there three instead of two, have enjoyed a certain amount of prosperity, or very great prosperity if you like. But do hon. gentlemen see any analogy between Switzerland and Canada? The cantons of Switzerland came together as independent bodies under bargains and terms and conditions to which every one of them had to agree, and that possesses nothing of an analogy to the case of our own North-West. But, if we look at the history of the Swiss Confederation, what do we find? I hardly expected from the historian of the House, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that so much stress would be laid upon the case of Switzerland. Let us look at this case of Switzerland for a few moments, while I give a short statement of its history. It is quite true that Switzerland is composed of 22 cantons, it is quite true that there are three official languages there, it is equally true that there is a fourth language which is not recognised. But the history of the Swiss constitution may briefly be summarised thus: Between 1291 and 1874, the confederation has passed through no less than seven phases, of which, since 1798, there have been four—one in 1798, one in 1803, another in 1815, another 1848, and a revision in 1874. Is that the evidence of a stable constitution? Is that the kind of constitution that the hon. member would like to have fastened upon the people of his beloved North-West? Just let us see:

“The third phase lasted till 1798”—

I am reading from the best work, I believe, on the subject, the work of Sir F. O. Adams——“without modification, and was marked by internal discord, religious wars, and revolts of peasants.”

That is the first beautiful picture we have of the Confederation of Switzerland. This phase lasted from 1815 to 1848:

“Then came an epoch of agitation and of discord.

“The Confederation suffered from a fundamental vice, i. e., the powerlessness of the central authority. The Cantons had become too independent, and gave to their deputies instructions differing widely from each other.”

Now, here is what we find happening in 1847:

“On the 4th November, 1847, after the deputies of the Sonderbund had left the Diet, this league was declared to be dissolved, and hostilities broke out between the two contending parties. A short and decisive campaign of twenty-five days ensued: Freiburg was taken by the Federal troops under General Dufour, later Luzern opened its gates, the small cantons and the Valais capitulated, and the strife came to an end.”

Now, let me give you a comment upon this from a paper which, perhaps, will not command the attention of the members of this House, the Edinburgh Review, which, so late, as the month of January last, spoke of the Swiss Executive in these words:

“It (the Swiss Executive) guides the policy of a state eternally menaced by foreign complications; it preserves harmony throughout a confederacy made up of twenty-two cantons, each jealous of one another and sympathising only in common jealousy of the Federal power.”

Mr. McCARTHY.

I do not think that any of us would like to plant in the virgin soil of the North-West, a constitution such as the Swiss constitution, with the results which have attended its use, and, therefore, the illustration is very far fetched. Take another illustration which we have had, take Cape Colony; I dare say some hon. gentleman know more about Cape Colony than I do, possibly some members of this House may have visited it; but is it not a fact that the Dutch Boers, as they are called, have rebelled and have left the English colony and have formed an independent republic on its borders? Have not, within recent times, the British arms suffered a defeat at their hands, and to-day is there not very great trouble between the Dutch who remain in the English colony? Certainly, it is the last example I would expect to be given by any persons, cognisant with the facts in support of a duality of language in any country. But need we go so far afield? Let me give one more instance, wearisome as these instances may be. I cannot forbear quoting to the House the striking example of Bohemia. Bohemia, we all know, is inhabited by two nationalities, the Germans, and the Zechs, speaking each their language. We know an attempt was made, not long ago, to put down one of these languages, and how has a settlement been arrived at? What has been the only possible solution? Under the influence of the Emperor Francis Joseph, who is beloved by his subjects, and who has great influence among them, they have resolved to settle the difficulty in this extraordinary fashion: the Diet is informally divided into two Curie, one German and the other Zech, which sit and debate together, although each possesses the full power of a separate and co-ordinate House. That is the only solution for a duality of language which could be found in Bohemia, and it was found necessary to resort to that in order to prevent these people from flying at one another's throats, it was found necessary to resort to that to prevent the Germans from deserting to Bismark. Now, what is the position here?—because, it is useless for us to go further than our own country. If this language is not designedly perpetuated with the view of keeping up the French nationality—which the hon. leader of the Opposition has been the only French Canadian on the floor of Parliament to denounce, or to say that he does not sympathise with it.

Mr. LAURIER. What?

Mr. McCARTHY. A French nationality.

Mr. LAURIER. What did you say?

Mr. McCARTHY. I say you denounced it; I say that the leader of the Opposition is the only gentleman of that nationality who denounced it.

Mr. LAURIER. Denounce what, my nationality?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, not your nationality; but the formation of a French nation upon this continent.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. I ask, what is the ultimate result of the system that is being pursued in regard to the French language throughout this Dominion? Is there any other result, except the one which is pointed out to us in newspapers in the Province of Quebec? Is that not the logical outcome of the views which were enunciated so freely by La Vérité which I read to this House when I had the honor to introduce this Bill? I know no other. But I deny the right of any gentleman in this House to repudiate the language of the mountebank, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) calls him, the "mountebank Premier" of the Province of Quebec. The language is not mine. I differ from Mr. Mercier as much as it is possible to differ from any public man, but yet I have too great a respect for my French Canadian fellow-subjects to speak of their First Minister in the language which was used by the champion of their cause on the floor of this Parliament; for I recognise in him, whatever his other faults may be, one of the greatest men which his nationality has produced in Canada. We know that although it may suit the purposes of the leader of the Opposition to say that he does not sympathise with these aspirations, his words are not uttered in the Province of Quebec. We know that the hon. gentleman is going hand in hand with the Premier of the Province of Quebec in all his local contests, in all his endeavors to fasten what he calls the Nationalist Party upon that Province, and in which, up to this time, he has been successful. We know, Sir, that the hon. gentleman was present at a great public meeting at which the Premier of Quebec announced the aspirations of the French Canadian people to be the formation of a great French nationality, not under the glorious Union Jack, of which we hear so much in this House from some hon. gentlemen who do not say so much about it in the Province of Quebec, but under the Tricolor, and he advised the members of both parties to join under the Tricolor of France, the flag of France, not that they wished to unite with France; I quite agree that is not their aspiration; the Republic of France does not suit the French Canadians of that view in the Province of Quebec; but that they did announce that their nationality was typified by the French flag, the Tricolor of France. That that language was uttered at a great meeting of their fellow-countrymen, that that language was uttered by the Premier of Quebec in the presence of the leader of the Opposition in this House, without demur, without contradiction, without remonstrance, and without reproach, goes without saying.

Mr. LAURIER. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him? On the occasion to which he alludes I spoke after Mr. Mercier, and I spoke afterwards in Toronto, quoting word for word the language I had used in Quebec.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and yet my statement remains uncontradicted. The hon. gentleman did speak in honeyed words, first of his love for his own nationality, and secondly of his love for the other nationalities of the Dominion. What I am complaining of is this: if that was not the view of the hon. gentleman, then and there, before the thousands who were assembled, before the great body of his fellow-countrymen, was the time for prompt repudiation and not here. But no repudiation came. Is it possible under these conditions for us to stand still? Have we no other evidence of the aspirations of the hon. gentleman's party, because he is reaping the benefit of that party, that party which is his strength in the Province of Quebec? It is only a few days ago, certainly only a few weeks ago, since the hon. gentleman wrote an open letter calling upon his people, notwithstanding the rebellion of the old Liberal Party of which he was at one time a member, when they rebelled against this new proposed national cry of the Premier of the Province of Quebec; the hon. gentleman instead of joining with his own confrères, wrote to the constituency or a prominent member in it, urging their support to the new party formed by the Premier of Quebec.

Mr. LAURIER. Against the Tories.

Mr. McCARTHY. He had been a Tory or a Bleu, and he became a convert to the Nationalist cry and went over to the Nationalist Party against the remonstrances of the old Liberal Party of the Province. The hon. gentleman thought fit to interpose and interfere. Is that all? When the hon. gentleman joined in the agitation with respect to Riel, I wonder did he ever think that he would be denouncing a member of this House for incendiarism? I wonder did he ever think he would be denouncing a brother member for raising a cry and appealing to the passions of the people? Does the hon. gentleman remember his course upon that occasion? Sir, does he remember that when Riel, after a fair trial, after being ably defended and impartially tried, was justly executed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh.

Mr. McCARTHY. Justly executed—yes. At a meeting in Montreal, led by the lieutenant of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) who sits here for western Ontario—influenced by purely patriotic considerations for the good of the country—this extraordinary language was used by the present leader of the Opposition at that excited time, when a statesman would have naturally used a language tending to quiet and subdue the disturbed passions of the multitude. And what were the words?

"If he (Laurier) had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan when the rebellion broke out, he would have taken up arms against the Government."

He further said:

"It must be well understood by all that this was not a war of races, but rather a vindication of the rights of one race that claimed for the French that which is granted to all other nationalities. The crime of Regina would still be avenged, not only by the French, but by all other races. They were asking for no favor, but they only wanted common justice pure and simple. They were as jealous of the liberties of others as of their own; and if injustice was done one class, injustice might be done to others."

He further said:

"They cannot bring Riel back to life, but by patriotically uniting together they can drive from power the wretches who had so pitilessly put him to death."

"Sir John had not had the courage of dealing leniently by a man who represented a cause which he had not treated fairly and justly."

"This was a free country and not even the Government had the right of committing judicial murder."

This was the language of the hon. gentleman, who has had the hardihood to speak of my moderate terms as being calculated to arouse angry passions, race difficulties and troubles. Does the hon. gentleman repent of those words? No. His benches are filled by his fellow-countrymen by reason of those words, and although some of them sit there to-day not following or supporting him, it is simply by reason of the accident that he did not secure a majority. The hon. gentleman profits by that language, and he has no reason to regret it. We recognize that by means of this cry the then Government of the Province of Quebec, the best Government the Province has had since Confederation was ejected from office. Why? Because they declined to vote censure upon the Administration at Ottawa. Mr. Mercier, taking advantage of the excited feeling of the Province, gathered together the Nationalist Party, nationalist in the narrow sense to which I have referred, and, joining hands with the hon. gentleman here, brought about a result which deprived this House of many supporters from the French Province for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and brought strength to hon. gentlemen opposite. People might not consider the words of politicians of such serious moment, but we cannot disregard what we see going on before our eyes. The other day a young lady, Miss Maybee, was sent down to the Post Office Department in Quebec. She had the misfortune to speak English and to come from Ontario; and will it be believed, and yet we know it perfectly well to be the case, that those supporting the hon. gentleman opposite at once denounced the Government and the Postmaster General for making the appointment.

Mr. LAURIER. And the Ministerial papers, too.

Mr. MCCARTHY. I am astounded at it. I did not think that matters had gone to that length; I have not seen the references, and I will be delighted if the hon. gentleman will furnish them to me. So it now happens, if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, and he would not make a statement if it was not correct, that both French parties in Quebec object to an English speaking lady.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The hon. gentleman admits it. I repeat that they object to an English lady being sent down there. I have the words in some of the newspapers if the hon. gentleman wishes them. The howl was raised, and it was successful. I am sorry to say. I am sorry to know that the old politeness of the French race seems to have departed, for I thought a young lady would have been favorably received; but objection was made by L'Electeur and another paper. Here are the words:

"L'Événement joins us in protesting against the nomination of Miss Maybee to the Post Office Inspector's Office. The rumor going round, according to what l'Événement says, is that we are going to give employment in the Civil Service at Quebec to a lady of Ontario. As the occupation of this lady would simply be to run a typewriter in the post office, we don't see why we should go so far to get a typewriter that we could find so easily at home.

"It is not in our knowledge, and it is not in the knowledge of any person, that they would think for a moment of bringing a French Canadian girl from Quebec or Montreal to occupy a position of any kind of employment in Ontario. Are we supposed to be more generous, more agreeable, than our neighbors, especially when we have persons who are qualified to do the work in question?"

I can assure the hon. gentleman that if a young lady is sent to Ontario or Toronto she will not be denounced in the public press, but she will be received with kindness, courtesy and consideration. Another article follows, which I need not trouble the House by reading. That is another result of these race troubles and race difficulties. But it is not the most serious in my humble judgment that we have to deal with. I find in a French publication of recent date, M. Tardivel, under the heading "Anglicism—Behold the Enemy," writes:

Mr. MCCARTHY.

"Reflecting a little upon the situation I saw a great danger for the future of the French Canadian race. Language is the soul of a nation. If the Basques have been able so long to preserve intact their ancient institutions amidst the revolutions and the wars which have convulsed France and Spain; if the Bretons and the Welsh have remained distinct from the races which surround them, they have their language to thank for it. If Ireland struggles in vain to regain her independence, it is because she no longer speaks the language of her old kings. Do you wish to cause a people to disappear? Destroy its language. It is because they comprehend this truth that Russia shows herself so inexorable towards the Polish language, and that Germany seeks to proscribe the French language of Alsace-Lorraine. It is then important for a people, especially a conquered people, to preserve its language."

The same writer again says:

"I stop here. I make no claim to have exhausted the subject, far from it. I have simply desired to utter this note of alarm; 'Fight the anglicification of the French language,' and at the same time to give some proofs that this enemy is really to be feared. Let others with more authority than I possess continue the combat; and if one day those who love the French language decide to make a grand assault, all along the line, be assured that I shall not fail to respond to the appeal."

Mr. LAURIER. What paper is that from?

Mr. MCCARTHY. It is not a paper at all.

Mr. GIROUARD. Surely we are entitled to know what the hon. gentleman is reading from.

Mr. Fiset. May I ask the hon. gentleman from what journal he is reading? I do not understand that he has told us from what paper he is quoting.

Mr. MCCARTHY. It is a pamphlet by Tardivel. Then another writer, Mr. Manseau, in a book published in 1881, writes:

"The dictionary gives the technical definition of Anglicism. Here follows, in our opinion, a definition from the heart. It is a spot of blood that shows us through what place the claws of the British lion have passed, and these claws (who is there that knows it not) torture and flag our language until they kill it."

I will not trouble the House with more extracts of this description, but I will draw the attention of my hon. friends on both sides to the instruction given in the French schools, and if there is then an hon. member who thinks that children so taught or instructed with regard to this history of our country can grow up as British citizens, or British subjects, or as loyal except to their own French Canadian nationality, or that anything can be expected from them except the language of La Vérité and the language of the Premier of the Province of Quebec; then I think that hon. gentlemen will be incapable of reasoning. In this history I find the following:

"1774. England, fearful of losing Canada, in view of the menacing attitude of the United States, made haste to grant a new constitution more favorable to the Catholics."

Mr. AMYOT. Hear, hear.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." There is not a shadow of doubt that this is the teachings in the schools. Every concession that has been obtained is always pictured to the people of the Province of Quebec as having been wrung from tyrants and despots and not granted by the free-will of the people.

Mr. AMYOT. You are a tyrant to us.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MCCARTHY. I quote also another selection from one of these histories:

"The material forces of New France had to succumb in the end, but the providential forces still do their work in the colony, which is probably destined to play on this continent the part which old France has played on the Continent of Europe."

I think I have read of similar language in La Vérité. If this is the teaching of the schools, if these are the writings of the different writers, if this is the language of the Premier of the Province, if these are the utterances at the great public meetings held in that Province (and no man is bold enough to assert a single word of dissent to them) what possible outcome can there be except the natural outcome which is here announced on the floor of Parliament. If my ears did not deceive me I think I heard the Minister of Public Works speak of the autonomy of his race, and state that his nation would live in spite of all that might be done against it. We must remember that this has been a British colony for over a century and a quarter, and that within a very short period after the cession—I was nearly using the unfortunate word conquest—a distinguished French traveller passing through here was able to announce that the French Canadians were better treated under the English than they were under their own Kings. We must remember that from that time to this they have enjoyed a liberty which they could not possibly have enjoyed under the Crown of France yet; notwithstanding this, they are endeavoring to perpetuate this race and nation cry mainly by their language, which is the soul of the nation, as this writer says. If the language was permitted to die out, as it would naturally do, all this ambition, which must end in delusion, which can never end in anything but delusion and which can never lead to any accomplished fact, would soon disappear. We have no jealousy of the Germans, we have no jealousy of any other nationality, because we know that while they speak in their own tongue, and for years after they come here are not able to speak any other tongue, yet they do not propose to divide the people of this country by their race cries and race feelings. Now these are the problems we have to deal with. There is no use our going to Switzerland or to Austro-Hungary for examples. We have to deal with the question we have here at home; and the practical question is, whether, under these circumstances, we should permit this kind of thing to go on. Whatever I might do bye-and-by, no man is responsible for my acts. The gentlemen who vote with me now, and the gentlemen who disagree with me, are not responsible for what I may do bye-and-by. I may state—as these hon. gentlemen who have done me the honor of following my utterances with so much care know well—that I have never pretended to believe or to say that it was possible to deal with the dual language in the Province of Quebec. I realise that that is beyond the hope of being dealt with by any possible legislation. I realise that that has been allowed to grow into such monstrous proportions that we can never hope to cope with it, except by natural ways and by natural causes which possibly may work a cure. Not in our day, but within perhaps a time that one can imagine, it may work out its own cure. I look forward to the assimilation that is going on by reason of the travelling backwards and forwards between the French Canadians of Quebec and the Eastern States of the Union. Do what you will, the people do go and will go to the Eastern States. Do what you will, they will more or less imbibe the language of that great country and disseminate it amongst those whom they have left behind. From this side we are taking care that the Province of Ontario will maintain its character as an English speaking Province. This process is going on, I have great hope, and it is a hope which does no injustice to my French Canadian fellow citizens, that bye-and-by the difficulty even in the Province of Quebec may vanish. So that I have never had the ambition, I have never dreamed of interfering. I do not say, Sir, that the time may not come when it will be proper to move—though in that I do not find much sympathy in this House—to do away with the dual language in this Chamber. The time has not come yet, that is quite certain. What we are dealing with now is this question in the North-West, and do not let us mix up questions that have nothing at all to do with it. One hon. gentleman said I had introduced even a religious cry. Why, Sir, is freedom of speech so gone in this country that I cannot express my dissent from the system of separate schools which exists in my own Province without being told that I am raising a religious cry? Is that a question of religion? Is not that a question of great state policy as to how our children shall be educated? And I do hope that before very long the delegation from the Province of Ontario will call on this House for its aid to blot out the Separate School clause from the British North America Act, which limits and fetters the people of that Province. That clause was carried by a majority of French Canadians, and was imposed upon the people of Ontario against their will; and I am sorry to differ from my hon. leader on that question. He tells us—and I never feel more humiliated than when I hear him speak on that subject—that he participated in imposing that Separate School system upon us. But is it possible that the free people of Ontario are not to be placed in the same position as the people by the sea on both sides of them, in the Maritime Provinces and in British Columbia? If they could not ask this Parliament to aid in freeing them from the restrictions imposed upon them I would despair of the freedom of this country. But that has nothing to do with this question. All these are aside from it, and will be properly dealt with when they come up and not before. What we are dealing with now is the question whether this Bill for the repeal of the dual language in the North-West should or should not become law; that and that only is the question before us. I am sorry, Sir, that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has been compelled by the unfortunate event to which he alluded to absent himself from this discussion. It is not pleasant to speak of an hon. gentleman behind his back, for I cannot quite accept the theory put forward by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook), that that gives one a better privilege to abuse a man; but, perhaps, I may be allowed to say a few words about that hon. gentleman's proposition. You will remember, Sir, that he read us a lecture: he told us how we were not to disturb the harmony that at present existed; how we were to be careful of raising race cries; how he recognised that there was a mass of ignorance, prejudice and bigotry which only required the hand of an incendiary to inflame it, and he rather intimated that the hand of the incendiary had already been laid to that mass; and then he wound up with a fervent appeal that we should never interfere with the covenant, as he called it, made at the time of Confederation. I felt that if that hon. gentleman had not already surrendered to French influences of the Province of Quebec he made his capitulation the other night. But his most extraordinary statement was that we were not informed of the opinion of the people of the North-West, that their representatives had no mandate from them to take up and deal with this question. Did that hon. gentleman remember that when in the Province of Ontario he agitated the country from end to end with regard to the murder of poor Thomas Scott, he sat in the Legislature of Ontario, where he had no mandate to deal with that question? Did the hon. gentleman remember that on one occasion he himself brought into this House a resolution which was offensive to a great many of us with regard to the Irish question, in order that he might secure the Irish section of our population and draw them to his standard, although he had no mandate, and although this House had no authority to speak with regard to Imperial concerns? Did that hon. gentleman remember that on another occasion he voted for, if he did not move, a resolution on the subject of the disestablishment of the Irish Church? And yet he undertook to assert that the Legislature of the North-West had no right to petition this Parliament. We had a right to pass offensive resolutions and send them home to England, notwithstanding the rebuff we met with from the Imperial authorities; but the hon. gentleman ventured to assert that the representatives of the North-West had no right to petition or to express their wishes that this clause should be stricken out of the North-West Territories Act. I will say no more in the absence of that hon. gentleman. I now desire, before closing, to say a word or two on the merits of the various motions before the Chair. The amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) has received but little favor from any of the English-speaking members. It is one, I think, impossible of acceptance. It announces that if we repeal a clause in the North-West Act, put in under the extraordinary circumstances to which reference has been made, and allowed to remain because attention has not been drawn to it, we shall be shaking the stability of our institutions and destroying the peace and progress of the North-West. The mere recital of that resolution carries its condemnation with it. The other amendment with which we have to deal, and which seems to find a good deal of favor, is the amendment of my hon. friend the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin); and before I deal with that I have somewhat of an apology to make to that hon. gentleman and to this House. I am accused of interfering with the prerogatives of the members from the North-West. Surely, said the hon. Minister of Public Works, echoed by the hon. Secretary of State, there were members in this House representing the North-West whose duty it was to bring this question to the attention of this chamber, and there was rather an insinuation thrown out by the hon. member for Assiniboia himself in his very opening words that my action was an intrusion on his domain; and, if you will pardon me saying so, the bitterness—but that is too strong a word, for he could not be bitter if he tried, but the appearance of bitterness—which characterised his observation I thought had its origin somewhat in pique, that anyone except that hon. gentleman himself should venture to deal with questions affecting the people of the North-West. He and he alone is the guardian of their interests, the only member who has a right to speak on their behalf, and any one else who attempts to do so must expect to meet with the castigation administered to me in the opening of this debate.

Mr. DAVIN. I said you had a right.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; but the very observation rather suggested an apology from me. This is my excuse, and the only excuse I give—I am reading from the Qu'Appelle Progress of 7th February inst. :—

“Dalton McCarthy introduced into the Dominion Parliament his Bill to abolish the official use of the French language in the North-West. He delivered a very temperate and dispassionate speech, full of facts and arguments.”

That is not the way my feeble efforts were characterised in this House; but that seems to be the opinion of the outside world, at all events.

“The second reading is to take place on Wednesday next, when it is expected there will be a big fight. We are informed on good authority that all the North-West representatives will vote against it. If they do so, their constituents should call upon them to resign forthwith. We are also informed that Mr. N. F. Davin will speak against it. West Assiniboia is about the best mis-represented constituency in the North-West. This country is almost unanimous in favor of Mr. McCarthy's Bill, but its representatives all belong to the party machine and must represent the machine in preference to the country.”

That, Mr. Speaker, is my apology for venturing to introduce this point to the notice of the House. Now, with regard to the amendment of that hon. gentleman: what is it? My motion is that the Bill be read the second time. Great fault is found with the preamble. The preamble is worse than the enacting clause; the enacting clause is harmless and the preamble is something fearful. Well, to the laymen of the House, perhaps, explanations are necessary about the preamble. To the lawyers of the House an explanation is not called for. It is quite certain, as every lawyer in this House knows, that the preamble neither adds to nor takes from the effect of the enacting clause. The preamble, in this case, I quite admit, was unnecessary. While I do not at all withdraw from the sentiment contained in that preamble, yet as an effective piece of legislation I am free to admit the Bill would be perfectly as good without as with the preamble. Now, if the hon. gentlemen in this House are sincere, and I am bound to believe in their sincerity; if they desire that this dual clause should be expunged or repealed—the hon. member for West Durham thought “expunge” was a very improper word to use; one has to be very careful of his language and must not use words, no matter how plain they may be, except with the greatest care—well, I will call it repeal, or anything you will. But, I say, if hon. gentlemen are sincere in their desire to repeal this clause, the way to do that is to pass the Bill to the second reading, and those who are opposed to the preamble can then have it struck out. The preamble of a private Bill is the all-essential portion; if the preamble be not carried, the Bill does not pass. The preamble of a public Bill is wholly unessential; its only possible use can be to make an ambiguous portion of the enacting clause plain, if ambiguity there be; and I say here that while I do not withdraw from that preamble, while I think the statement in it is perfectly true, namely :

Who will say nay to that? It may not be absolutely essential; that is not the proposition. I say, it is expedient, and every gentleman who has spoken on this question has admitted its expediency. Even the hon. member for West Durham said that if we were all of one race and one nationality, speaking one tongue, the task before us would be simpler and easier, and, therefore, the proposition before us is not incorrect and unfounded. But to any hon. gentleman who objects to it, all I can say is, when the Bill goes to Committee, should it pass the second reading, let him object to the preamble, and I shall be the first to withdraw it. I want the body of the Bill, and do not care for the preamble, and if there be a member of this House who desires the Bill and objects to the preamble, there shall be no opposition, as far as I am concerned, to this preamble being obliterated, or expunged, to use any term you please. I will say more. I did not in the least dream that the words should be taken up in an offensive sense, and I can only most heartily express my regret that any of my French Canadian friends should be offended by this clause in the Bill, or that I should have hurt the sentiments of French speaking members of this House, or the French Canadians throughout the country—for such was far from my intention. But what was the proposition of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)? It was that the Bill be not now read a second time. That is, he does not want the dual language expunged, nor does he want to give the power to the North-West Territories to expunge it.

Mr. DAVIN. I do.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then the hon. gentleman has not taken the proper course. If he wanted that, his proper course was to let the Bill be read a second time, and to move into Committee that clause I be struck out and the words of his amendment inserted in its stead :

“That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved,—That it is expedient that the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories be authorised to deal with the subject-matter of this Bill by Ordinance or enactment after the next general election for the said Territories.”

But the effect of the hon. gentleman's amendment is to kill the Bill. Make no mistake about it. If the Bill is not read a second time, there it stops. Then what takes place? Hon. gentlemen say they want to repeal the dual language clause, but they want to do that with as much gentleness and consideration for the feelings and susceptibilities of the French-speaking people as possible. Then, the way to do that is to pass the Bill, rejecting the preamble, and inserting the clause of the hon. member for West Assiniboia as the substantial part of the Bill. But if you say that the Bill do not pass, but that it be resolved, &c., and make that resolution as long as you please, what follows? Who is to move? The Government cannot move, for they are at sixes and sevens on this subject. There is the resolution. I certainly would not move it, as I do not approve of it. The hon. member for Assiniboia would not move it, because he would offend the powers that be.

Mr. DAVIN. I would move it if necessary.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman doubt the necessity?

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I think the hon. gentleman would have to move, and instead of being the admired of all his surroundings, he will occupy the position I do. He will be belated and berated, and will fall from the highest stage or pinnacle of greatness which he has occupied for the last few days. Do not now rush in where angels fear to tread; and I do not think the hon. gentleman will make any such mistake. Why, let us not deal with this subject in a simple way. Punish me if you will; expel me if you please; because I venture to put in this preamble, and to speak at the Opera House, and because I ventured to claim that the English language should rule in this country, but pass the Bill. The way to pass the Bill is to go to a second reading and then to expunge what is in the preamble. Do not pass the Bill, if it suits your pleasure, but vote the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier. That is honest and straightforward, and that, at all events, we can understand. We can understand the views and the policy of the hon. gentlemen who are absolutely opposed to any change. But hon. gentlemen who wish to get rid of this question by a side issue, who try to do and not to do it, will not, although they may deceive this country. That they may depend upon. I listened to the argument of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), and I listened to the argument of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault), and no more straightforward or honorable statement of the case was given on that side of the House. It contrasted greatly with the statement from the Treasury benches of its compatriots from Quebec; it was arguments, not abuse. It was a reason for us to pause in our course, and was not simply denunciation of those who differ from the views which those hon. gentlemen both take. But I say their view is the correct view. It is this Parliament, and it is this Parliament alone, which has the power to deal with this question. It is this Parliament which put that clause in, uninvited. It is this Parliament which has the authority to take that clause out. Why should we abnegate our duties or our functions on the ground of expediency or to get rid of a temporary difficulty? Will we, in the interest of our country, be doing a service? Will we not be keeping open that running sore of which the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) spoke? We put the trouble on the people of the North-West, but, although we should denude ourselves of our authority and endeavor to get rid of this question for the moment, it will remain a burning question in old Canada and in the new Provinces, more especially, if you postpone the decision of this question until after the next general elections. I am commissioned to read the opinion of a senator who once occupied a seat in this House, and whose voice is now unable to be heard here.

Mr. DAVIN. Name.

Mr. McCARTHY. Senator Perley. His observations ought to have weight. Writing to me on the 12th February, he says :

“MY DEAR SIR,—Stand firm for your resolution re dual language in the North-West Territories. The North-West is with you. I get letters by every mail strongly urging me to help you in this matter. Davin's amendment if carried might lead to serious results in some of the constituencies, only paralleled by the Hull affair of last night. Particularity might this be the case in those constituencies where it was stated by Mr. Bits, member of the Legislative Assembly, that so few of the people could read in any language and their prejudices so easily excited. I contend it is wrong to submit a question of such a character to the vote of the people. Discussion and electioneering talk on such an issue would tend to disturb the harmony and good-feeling that is fast being obtained between the people of different nationalities and creeds in the North-West Territories. I write this advisedly and with the full knowledge of the responsibility of a representative of the people in the North-West Territories from end to end.

"Yours, &c.,
"W. D. PERLEY."

Is not that reasonable? Is it reasonable, when we have this matter before us now—a matter which has excited, we are told, a great deal of feeling in this chamber, a matter which has excited a good deal of feeling out of doors, having opinions formed one way or the other about it, having a means of knowledge denied to the representatives of the North-West Territories, we, who have this great duty thrown upon us here, should refuse to discharge it and ask the unfortunate people of the North-West to have this bone of contention thrown upon them. That may be right from a party point of view; I venture to say it is not right from a statesman's point of view. This Bill may be wrong, it may be that the Bill ought to be rejected, but there can be no justification for sending it to the people of the North-West to be dealt with. I deny that I have gone back upon any views that I have advocated in regard to provincial rights. If the people of the North-West did not wish to have this measure passed, we might postpone it at the present time, but the people have shown that they are in favor of it, and every newspaper in the North-West—excepting always the Regina Leader—has spoken in favor of the abolition of the dual language. I cannot look upon the Regina Leader as an authoritative representative of public opinion in the North-West. We know that the Regina Leader occupies a peculiar position in regard to the existing state of affairs in the North-West. I am told—I may be wrong—I do not connect it with any hon. member of this House, but I am told that it was owing to the fact that the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West insisted upon giving to the Regina Leader the printing of that Government at a higher rate than it could be done for elsewhere, that the deadlock was brought about in the North-West Council, that the Lieutenant Governor's advisers refused to agree to that, and then resigned. Of course, the longer the dual language is preserved, the better it is for the publisher of the Regina Leader, and, therefore, I do not think that the Regina Leader is to be quoted as an authority on this question. Putting the Regina Leader aside, we have the unanimous opinion of the press of the North-West, as we have the opinion of the people of the North-West, that they do not want the dual language. Why should we pause? Why should we hesitate? I have done. I have endeavored to make my case as plain as I possibly can. I have endeavored to show why this question should be dealt with at the earliest possible moment. I have endeavored to show that it ought to be dealt with here. I have endeavored to show that, if this resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for West

Mr. McCARTHY.

Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is passed, that is the end of the Bill, but the end is not accomplished. I have stated that I am prepared, if any hon. gentleman objects to the recital in this Bill, that it shall be stricken out, and every hon. gentleman in this House knows that, when the Bill reaches committee, it can then be debated whether it is for us here or for the North-West to deal with this question; but, if the amendment of the hon. gentleman is carried, it is a way to do this little Bill to death, instead of its becoming the law of the land, which is the desire of the people in the North-West who have taken an interest in this matter, and I am sure is the desire of the great majority of the people of the country. The sooner this question is set at rest, the better. It is a question which is calculated to disturb us on a question of race cleavage. That alone should be a reason for dealing with the matter now. Does the House suppose that, if the Bill is defeated, whether upon the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) or upon the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), that would in any way end the question? Can any one imagine that, if I stand alone with my seconder in voting for this Bill, the same difficulties and troubles which certain hon. gentlemen profess to lament will not be brought up again? Is it not in the interest of the harmony and the good-will of the people of different nationalities that we should deal with this question here, this question which is now before us, and do they not suppose that we can deal with it in such a manner as to be as satisfactory to the people as if it were dealt with by the Council of the North-West? For myself, I may say that my political extinction has been prophesied by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. If that be my fate, in doing what I consider to be my duty, I shall cheerfully submit to it. I am acting simply according to my convictions, and not only as one hon. gentleman has suggested, because of the debate of the Jesuits' Estates Act. I wonder that that hon. gentleman should not have had better judgment than to introduce that question into this debate. I have nothing to be ashamed of, I have nothing to lament in regard to the vote which I gave on the Jesuits' Estates Act. I did not prosecute any agitation on that subject afterwards, because I realised that the vote of this House in regard to it was conclusive; but it is not conducive to harmony in the party to which I did belong and to which, to a certain extent, I still belong, that an hon. gentleman should taunt me for the fiasco which he says was the end of that matter. I have been taunted with the statement that I objected to the preamble of the Jesuits' Estates Act, and yet I was making nothing of the preamble to this Bill. There again the two matters are wholly and absolutely separate. In the Jesuits' Estates Act we had to take the Bill as it was, we had no power of amendment. It came to this House and it had either to be vetoed as it was, or allowed to go into operation as it was; whereas a Bill introduced into this House has to undergo the gauntlet of the first, second and third readings, of a consideration in committee, to be amended and improved to suit the opinions of the majority of the House. Therefore, there is nothing in common between the two cases. But, as I said before, those who voted with me on that question had nothing to regret, and I can only say that if a similar occasion arose again, I should not hesitate to repeat my vote.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to trouble the House for a few minutes, while I make one or two remarks; called for, I think, by the speech of my hon. and learned friend.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. DAVIN. I have not spoken on this amendment. Now, Sir, the hon. and learned gentleman read to us the authority of Senator Perley.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken already on this question, and I ask the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can speak upon the amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad my hon. friend from North Norfolk, whom I have met on other fields, is so anxious to observe the rules of the House and the decencies of debate. The hon. and learned gentleman, for he is entitled to be called the hon. and learned gentleman, has read to us a letter from Senator Perley. The hon. Senator has been a member of this Parliament; I have known him a long time; some of you have known him, and I need not say that I recognise him, as you do, as a great authority, this "guide, philosopher and friend" of the hon. and learned member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He appears in a character eminently suitable to himself, to his own views of what his duty to the public is, and I think he is eminently suitable as a guide to the hon. member from Simcoe. Sir, Senator Perley and the hon. member for Simcoe; the hon. member for Simcoe and Senator Perley. You will remember the line of Pope:

"And dunce the second follows dunce the first."

Now, I did not know the cause of the conversion of my hon. and learned friend from Simcoe. I had read a speech delivered by the hon. and learned member at Collingwood; I have it before me; it is reported in the Empire, and in this speech he declares to the people of Collingwood that he did not want this Parliament to deal with this question, but he wanted the people of the North-West to deal with it, the very thing that he denounces to-night. I will read to you his words:

"I want it understood that our great North-West Territories shall be left free to deal with certain matters which will affect them for all time to come."

He is speaking of the dual language.

Mr. MCCARTHY. Will the hon. member pardon me? I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly not. Here is the paper.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The paper is perfectly correct, so far as it goes. My reference was to the question of separate schools in the North-West. I had already spoken about the dual language and my action in this House, and I was inviting the confidence of my constituents. I was then referring to the question of separate schools, which I understand they petitioned should not be dealt with here, but should be remitted to them to be dealt with. That is what I alluded to in the language my hon. friend is now reading.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, separate schools are a matter that can be left to the North-West, but the dual language cannot be left to the North-West; so I suppose he thinks the dual language is a matter of more importance than the separate schools. Now, I want to point out the want of logic of my hon. friend. He comes here and tells us that we ought to pass his Bill. Why? Because he has heard from the North-West. Why has he heard from the North-West? Because an assembly has been elected on an extended suffrage, and that assembly has passed a resolution in a given direction. Why is that resolution of the least validity? Simply because these people represent the people of the North-West, and yet, forsooth, he tells us that the proposal to go to the source of power, to the source of authority, is a proposal that we ought not to entertain. He is just as illogical as the hon. and learned gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his remarks the other night. I was delighted, of course, to hear his voice again in this House. I know very well of what importance it is to this House, and of what importance it is to the country at large, that we should have his great experience, his legal knowledge and his great parliamentary power; but when I heard a man who is president of a university, talk what—I say it without the least offence—was fallacious trash, I was perfectly amazed. Let me point out to you what the hon. and learned gentleman said. He said that he could not listen to the representation that was made—I am now making a point for the hon. and learned gentleman for Simcoe—that no message whatever had come from the people of the North-West. Why? Because this assembly had not got any authority from its creator to deal with this question. By dealing with this question he must mean to legislate on it; so he says that we cannot receive any representation from them because they had no power to legislate on it; but if they had any power to legislate on it, they would not require to make any representation at all. The point was taken up very properly by my hon. and learned friend that it was only three short years before that we heard the hon. and learned member for West Durham propose in this House a resolution with regard to Home Rule of which we were not in any wise seized; yet he asked us to pass a resolution, and showed that he thought our representation ought to have some effect, or might have some effect, on an assembly so closely connected with us as the assembly in the North-West. Now, I want to refer to a personal matter. I saw a criticism—I do not know whether it was correct or not—on a few remarks that I happened to make in reply to the speech of the hon. and learned member for Simcoe; and the critic said—I do not know whether that is correct or not, but I hope it was correct—he said that the weapons I used against the hon. and learned gentleman were the weapons of a gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman comes here with an innuendo that is absolutely false, for which there is not a tittle of foundation. He has listened—I do not know where, I am sure—probably in the vestibule of an hotel, to the gospel of some gobe mouche, and he comes here and makes a statement about a matter which has no truth whatever in it. Now he says that a paper called the Leader never advocated the abolition of the dual language. Why, I read the other night how the hon. and learned gentleman made a statement that that paper never referred to it. I then read an article rom that paper advocating the doing away with it, but without bitterness; it deprecated bitterness, it deprecated language that was calculated to inflame passions, and said, let us go and discuss this question calmly and practically. I may tell the hon. and learned member, who threw out the sneer, that it was a very good thing for newspapers, and the more French published the better, that most of the ordinances which were printed in French were not printed in the North-West, and that the company which publishes the Leader had no advantage from most of them. A few were printed there, but the great bulk were printed somewhere else. So the hon. and learned member, who occupies a high position in his profession, a profession to which gentlemen of the highest honor have been proud to belong, comes here and at the close of his speech throws out a sneer without the slightest foundation, and it was a vulgar sneer, even if there had been any foundation for it. I do not intend to make any reply to the hon. gentleman's speech, and I merely rose in regard to these matters to which I have alluded, but I want to point out that in the speech to which we have listened the hon. gentleman has not touched the case I made against him; he has not touched a single point of it and it remains there unshaken. I showed that the hon. and learned gentleman had cited authorities that proved the very reverse of that which he said those authorities would prove, and I also showed that he came before the House and laid down two propositions that were utterly false. Switzerland has been referred to by one hon. gentleman after another. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to have seen the point of my reference to Switzerland. My sole object was to show that the two propositions which the hon. and learned gentleman was disseminating throughout the country were without any foundation, namely, that a single language necessarily made a nation, and that with diversity of languages you could not have a nation; for, of course, if these two propositions were true, then we never could have a nation here in Canada. I showed those propositions were untrue. I showed that his authorities instead of supporting his case proved the contrary, and the statements I made in that little speech remain unshaken, and the hon. gentleman has not attempted to reply to them. The only thing he did in the way of attempting to reply to my speech was to descend to sneers without foundation, to innuendoes that in an Assembly far inferior to this would be held to be unworthy, and he fell back on a flippant reference what was without any cogency whatever. The hon. and learned gentleman told us, and I heard it with some astonishment, that he had no desire to create bitterness, that he had no ill-feeling to the French race. This reminds me of what Thackeray said of an Englishman: that if an Englishman sees a stranger come into the country he looks at him as who should say: "Damn you, who are you?" Yet that Englishman might no doubt feel an universal benevolence. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) talks here as if he felt universal benevolence towards every citizen of this country, whether he talks French or not; but you have to observe the general tenor of his conduct and of this agitation, and the face may be Jacob's but the hands are the hands of Esau. The statement made in that letter of Senator

Mr. DAVIN.

Perley, that there would be a disturbance in case this question were referred to the constituencies, is absolutely without the least foundation. There will be no disturbance whatever. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), if he is here, will tell you that the reference can be made without the least disturbance. Everything will go on as quietly as possible, and once the question has been referred to the people, and they have elected a new House, you can then feel you have given it to a tribunal to deal with that has authority from the real source of power.

Maedonald (Sir John),

Amendment to amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Inverness has not voted.

Mr. CAMERON. I have paired with the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman). I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. COOK. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) has not voted.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I was recorded as having been paired by the whip. I would have voted for the amendment.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON and Mr. MITCHELL rose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will give way to the Minister, because he has always treated me in a pretty decent sort of way.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very much obliged to the hon. member for Northumberland, and I will endeavor to return the courtesy by making my observations so short as to leave ample opportunity for him to speak before the House is wearied of the debate to-night. Notwithstanding the great attention the House has given to this question, the fact that its discussion has occupied five days, and that we have already reached midnight of the day preceding a statutory holiday, are reasons why, apart from the courtesy extended to me by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), I should detain the House for only a short while in offering the proposition which I am about to make in reference to the question under consideration. Before stating the view which I wish to present to the House as the decision which ought to be arrived at on this question, I may be permitted to make some observations with regard to certain arguments which have been put forward in defence of the preamble of this Bill. Some members have stated in the course of this debate that a different doctrine was laid down last Session in reference to another measure, from that which has been pronounced by those who have declared that the preamble of the Bill now before us is offensive to the good taste of the House and menaces the permanency of institutions established by law. They have stated that that doctrine is inconsistent with the doctrine laid down last Session, which my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), by mistake, asserted to be a statement that the preamble was no part of the Act and had nothing to do with it. No statement of that kind, as a general proposition, was put before the House last Session. When I had the honor to address the House in regard to the Bill, then under discussion, I was speaking on a set of facts which were then before the House. I was speaking not of preambles in general, but of the preamble to a statute which was under our consideration; I was calling the attention of the House to the fact that the part of that preamble to which most exception had been taken was merely the recital of a correspondence which had taken place, and had no immediate connection with the enacting part of the Bill. More than that, when we come to consider the position in which we are now placed with regard to the preamble of the present Bill with the position which the House occupied last Session, voting yea or nay, on a motion to disallow the Act of another Legislature, because there was something in the recital offensive to the good taste of the House, there is this fundamental difference that, in voting for this Bill, we are not merely criticising the action of another Legislature, we are not criticising a preamble which might or might not have influenced the adoption of a statute in another Parliament, but we are now called on to vote, yea or nay, on this preamble which has been offered to us by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I submit, therefore, that the comments made by some members, in regard to our action of last Session are not founded on reasons which apply to the present case, and that the objection taken to this preamble is not inconsistent with the observations made last Session by myself, or by any other person, who then took the view I had the honor to express. In hurrying forward so as to detain the House only for as short a time as possible let me call attention to a subject from which attention has somewhat wandered in the course of this heated debate. Let me ask the calm consideration of the House to the very few points which are involved in the section of the North-West Territories Act which it is proposed to repeal. Section 110 provides, in relation to four subjects. First of all as to the debates of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, and the provision in respect of these debates is that either the French or English language may be used. In the second place the provision relates to the records and Journals in that Assembly, and it is that the French and English languages must both be used in the records and Journals. We have first of all the provision that the use of either of the two languages is optional as regards the debates and compulsory as regards the printing and recording in the Journals of that Assembly. But we have in the next branch of this subject two other questions, both of which were touched upon by the Secretary of State this afternoon, and both of which, in my humble opinion—and I shall ask the opinion of the House upon it—are of far greater importance, as regards this question of language than the mere question of what language shall be used in the debates of the Assembly or the records or Journals of that body. As my hon. friend the Secretary of State says, it is a matter of little consequence what rule is applied as to the mode in which the debates shall be conducted in the Assembly. If the population in the North-West Territories of French origin and French speech is sufficiently numerous to send to that body intelligent and active men, capable of taking part in the proceedings of that body they will assert their rights to speak their own language, which will be recognised, at least in courtesy, as it is recognised in every other Province of Canada where it is claimed upon the ground that a representative should speak in the tongue which suits him best. I have seen that right conceded frequently in the legislature of my own Province where there is no legislative guarantee on the subject, and the man who would object to an Acadian in Nova Scotia speaking his own tongue in the Legislature of his own Province would be laughed to scorn, as unworthy to sit in that Assembly. We can safely leave that subject to the Assembly, which I am sure, will be guided by as patriotic a feeling as actuates the other legislative bodies in Canada. I shall ask the House, in the proposition I am about to make, to give to the Assembly, in due time, the power to regulate its own debates, and to say in what manner, in what tongue, or in what mode its records and its Journals may be published from time to time. There are two subjects which remain and which, as I have already mentioned, stand upon a somewhat different footing. When we undertake to say that we shall expunge from the Statute-book a provision that justice shall be administered, or may be administered, in either of the two languages used in the North-West Territories, we are touching a subject far more important than the mere language of debate, and the mere language of the publication of the Journals of a legislative body. These, Sir, are our courts; these are the courts of the Dominion of Canada. In respect of the Provinces, power is given to the Provincial Legislatures, by the British North America Act, to establish the courts, and to regulate their organisation, their maintenance, and the extent of their jurisdiction. That power which rests on them, as regards the Provincial courts, rests directly on this Parliament as regards the courts of the North-West Territories. We have imposed upon us the duty, not only of creating those courts, but of breathing into them the breath of life by giving them the jurisdiction they exercise and the procedure by which that jurisdiction is to be carried on. Nay, more, it is our duty, just as it is the duty of a Provincial Assembly, to see that they are properly equipped to exercise their jurisdiction, in every detail, whether relating to mere procedure or to substantive enactment, so as to carry justice to every section of the people, in their homes in the wide territories where we have established them; and the proposal that this Parliament should on such short notice, without enquiry—for it is only within twelve months that we have heard of this agitation, or that the hon. member for North Simcoe discovered that such a provision existed on the Statute-book—expunge the provision that either language may be used in the courts of the country, seems to me to carry with it consequences more alarming than this House is prepared to risk. It is not mere fancy, but I am repeating what has been said to me, that in some distant sections of that country, if that provision be obliterated, we may have the misfortune of seeing men brought to the bar of justice in our own courts, tried before our own judges, convicted, condemned and sentenced in a language not one word of which they understand, and unable to offer a plea for justice or for mercy. Surely, Sir, it is unreasonable to say, in respect of property or civil rights, that the administration of justice must be carried on in one language only, or that we shall permit ourselves to say hastily that it shall be expunged from the Statute-book, and that the courts of the country shall be left without any provision at all for the case of people who cannot understand the English language, if that should be the language prescribed. If that would be the case with respect to new comers, aware that they were going to a country where English law and language alone prevail, the case is made ten times stronger when applied, as my hon. friend the Secretary of State said this evening, to those who were the first settlers in the country; and where the new comers, who have established the new laws and the new language, should surely be willing to incur the obligation of permitting the old inhabitants of the country to use, for a time at least, their own language in their own defense and in the assertion of their rights before our courts of justice. The remaining subject which is touched upon in this provision is the printing of the ordinances of the North-West Assembly in both languages. This is a matter on which we are not required to hear the Legislative Assembly; it is a duty which we have ourselves to discharge. True, the enactment makes necessary the printing in both languages; but it is a duty which this House has charged itself with from year to year. The ordinances have been printed in both languages not merely because section 110 of the North-West Territories Act so provides, but more especially because at our table the money has been voted at every session since that Act was passed, and probably long before, for that purpose. That matter may safely be left in the hands of this Parliament, where it has always been dealt with down to this moment; and if this Parliament should think fit from year to year to order that the ordinances of the North-West Territories should be printed in any language in which it should be necessary to print them, in order to make them fully known to the people of the North-West Territories who are to be affected by them, I should like to ask what interests in this country would be injured thereby, or why any legislator or any person in the North-West Territories should say that it is distasteful to him that any of the ordinances should be printed in any but his own tongue? Therefore, Sir, in regard to that question, as well as in regard to the use of the language in the courts, I shall ask this House to come to the decision that these two provisions of the Act should be maintained; but with respect to the records, the Journals, and the debates of the North-West Assembly, we may yield them the deference and the confidence of permitting them to regulate their own affairs to the fullest extent. As to the time when this shall be done, I propose that it shall be done after the next election to the Assembly of the North-West Territories, and for the obvious reason that until then there can be nobody in the Territories capable of representing to this Parliament the sentiments and wishes of the people of those Territories in a constitutional manner, and nobody in the Territories, as the hon. member for West Durham said, having the mandate of the people to deal with that subject. It is well known, Sir, that the constitution of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West is limited in many other particulars as well as in that; and in that particular, to say nothing of the others, the members of the Legislative Assembly were quite aware when they held their elections and passed the resolution which has been to some extent made the basis of this measure, that they were holding an election for a legislative body bound by the provisions of section 110 of the North-West Territories Act; and it will be fair that the electors of that territory should have an opportunity of instructing the representatives who will go to the future assembly as to their wishes in this regard. I cannot imagine any weaker reason against ascertaining in that way what the wishes of the people of the Territories are, than the letter which was read to influence the judgment of the House on this question to-night. I cannot imagine it being gravely asserted to this Legislature in one breath that the French people of the North-West Territories are numerically so insignificant that it is not worth while to use the French language in the Territories at all, and that its abolition is a matter of absolute certainty, and in the next breath that the French there are so strong and feel so keenly on this question that there will be bloodshed if they should be allowed to go to the polls upon it. I cannot understand how it can be urged that in a free country, or in a territory to which we have given the right of self-government to any extent, we shall have a legislative assembly there, give a free and liberal franchise to the people, and then say to them, we are afraid we cannot trust you to go to the polls, and, therefore, we must govern you without hearing your voice on your own affairs. By all means let the constitutional rights of the people be respected; let the people speak through their representatives; let them vote, and let us see that the votes shall be counted, in order that we may ascertain which of the many conflicting statements made to this chamber as to the comparative numbers of the population of the Territories is the safer one to adopt. I have always been under the impression that we had equal rights in this country, but I should begin to doubt it if we were to say, with regard to any section of the country: we are afraid there will be riots if you go to the polls, and we will close the polls against you and legislate for you against your will. Therefore, I will propose to the House the amendment I am about to read. I shall make but one other observation, which I had forgotten to make in its proper place, as regards the preamble, because it is touched upon in the amendment I am about to move. The mover of the Bill cannot fail to admit that, while it is true the preamble may be eliminated from the Bill, in proposing the second reading he puts the preamble forward as the basis of the Bill, and the reason which is assigned on the face of the Bill as the reason why this House should pass it is that community of language is necessary to the unity of a country.

Mr. McCARTHY. Expedient—not necessary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The amendment which I propose is as follows, and it is seconded by the hon. Secretary of State:—

That all the words after "resolved" be expunged and the following substituted:—

"That this House, having regard to the long continued use of the French language in old Canada, and to the covenants on that subject embodied in the British North America Act, cannot agree to the declaration contained in the said Bill as the basis thereof, namely, that it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language amongst the people of Canada. That, on the contrary, this House declares its adherence to the said covenants, and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same. That, at the same time, this House deems it expedient and proper, and not inconsistent with those covenants, that the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories should receive from the Parliament of Canada power to regulate, after the next general elections of the Assembly, the proceedings of the Assembly and the manner of recording and publishing such proceedings."

I need not hardly say to the House before closing—and it is the only other remark I have to make—that a portion of that resolution is taken from the one which was suggested by the hon. member for West Durham in his speech the other evening. The opinions he expressed with regard to the avowal this House ought to make, with regard to its adherence to those covenants and its future action upon questions of this kind, in so far as they touch the constitution of the country as established by the British North America Act I endorse almost entirely.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. the Minister of Justice said, before he moved his amendment, that the whole North-West should have fair representation in the Legislative Assembly before that question was dealt with by that assembly. I should like to ask him does the Government contemplate a re-distribution of seats in the North-West Assembly? because otherwise the population of the North-West will not have the fair representation they are entitled to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is a matter which will have to be dealt with by Parliament, as the subject-matter of this resolution will be should it be adopted. The Government will consider that subject before bringing down a Bill.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I understand there will be a re-distribution of seats for the North-West Territories, and the French population will be given a representation before this question has to be dealt with.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will understand that if it is shown to the Government that there is not a fair representation in the present system of distribution this Parliament will beyond doubt remedy the evil.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the motion for the adjournment of the debate withdrawn?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the question is put, I should like to express my deep regret that I was away from the House when the motion of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) was voted upon. I do not like to sail under false colors, and if I had been here I should have voted for that motion. I was told that no vote would be taken to-night. I do not wish at all to blame the persons from whom I got that information, but I thought no vote would be taken to-night. Of course, it was my duty to be here, to be in my seat, but if I had been here, without going into any discussion of the question which has been occupying the attention of the House for several days, I say I should have voted for the motion of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think the request I have made is an unreasonable one. This is a very important subject, and I think it should not be hurried on at this late hour of the night.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no seconder to the motion for adjournment.

Mr. COOK. I second the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Call in the members.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, under the circumstances, and seeing the perseverance of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), we must come down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must make my acknowledgments for the courtesy of the right hon. gentleman in having gracefully come down.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that this question be made the first Order of the day on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.35 a. m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 20th February, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

STATIONERY AND CONTINGENCIES OF SENATE.

Mr. RYKERT moved:

That a Message be sent to the Senate, requesting that their Honors will be pleased to grant leave to the officers in charge of the Stationery and Contingencies of the Senate, to attend before the Select Standing Committee of this House on Public Accounts, at their next meeting, to give information respecting the distribution of such stationery and the expenditure for contingencies, as set out on pages D-17 and 18 of the Report of the Auditor General on Appropriation Accounts for the year ended 30th June, 1889;—and to bring with them all records relating to such items.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 92) respecting the Napanee, Tamworth and Quebec Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Ontario Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Bell.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Sault Ste. Marie and Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 94) to incorporate the Thousand Islands Bridge and Railway Company.—(Mr. Bell.)

DRILL HALL IN MONTREAL.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) (Translation) asked, Whether the Minister of Militia has given instructions to repair the recently damaged heating apparatus in the Montreal drill hall? If not, is it his intention to do so?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

(Translation.) In answer to my hon. friend, I must say that I have given instructions to repair the heating apparatus in the Montreal drill hall.

FLOODS IN LAPRAIRIE.

Mr. DOYON (Translation) asked, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government that each year, and often twice each year, the village and the parish of Laprairie are inundated by the rising of the waters of the St. Lawrence, and suffer considerable damage? Whether it is the intention of the Government to take measures for the construction of works which may be judged necessary for the prevention of the destruction caused by these inundations?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It is within the knowledge of the Government that floods happen in Laprairie, and the Government is now considering the matter.

HARBOR OF MONTREAL.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) for Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (Translation) asked, Whether the plans adopted by the city of Montreal for the improvement of the harbor of Montreal were submitted to the Government before their adoption, or since? Have they received the approval and the sanction of the Government? Does the Government propose to contribute towards the construction of the projected works during the coming season? And, if so, to what extent? Does the Government intend to lay before the House the correspondence and the documents respecting the said project and its execution?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The plans adopted by the council of the city of Montreal and the Board of Harbour Commissioners of Montreal were submitted to the Government before their adoption; they have not received the approval or the sanction of the Government. The Government is now considering the matter. As to whether the Government intend to contribute towards the carrying out of the proposed works during the coming season, I am not in a position to answer that question. The Government does not intend to lay before the House the correspondence and documents respecting the said scheme and its carrying out until the whole matter has been considered and the Government has reached a decision for or against, or any decision.

EXPORT DUTY ON LOGS.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What amount of export duty has been received for logs exported during the calendar year ending 31st July, 1889, from Ontario? What amount on logs exported from Quebec? and what amount on logs exported from New Brunswick?

Mr. BOWELL. The amount of duty collected on logs during the year ending the 31st December, 1889, was as follows:—From Ontario, $56,737.18; from Quebec, $16,043.79; from New Brunswick, $1,017.55; making a total of $73,798.52.

DAM AT VALLEYFIELD.

Mr. BERGERON. The question I intend to put is not the same in the French paper as it is in the English paper. I will read it from the latter, which should have been the same in the French version. I beg to ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to allow the public to use the dam connecting the mainland with Grand Ile, at Valleyfield, as sanctioned by custom since the first existence of the said dam, which is the only highway available for traffic; and in view, also, of the intention to build an iron bridge thereon, which expense would not be justifiable unless the Government would promise that such use would be continued?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There does not appear to be any objection to allow the dam connecting the mainland with Grand Ile at Valleyfield to be used as a roadway, if the municipality binds itself that such use would be continued.

WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Government has yet received a report from Mr. Wood, who has been investigating certain matters connected with the Welland Canal? If it has been received, will it be at once laid before the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A report has been received from Mr. Wood in reference to the Welland Canal, and, if it is moved for, it will be brought down.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow this to go as a motion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to that. Put in the motion.

NORTH-WEST REGISTRY OFFICES.

Mr. DAVIN asked, What have been the receipts from the North-West Territories Registry Offices during 1889? and what have been the expenses during the same period?

Mr. DEWDNEY. The receipts from the Registration Offices of the North-West Territories during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1889, amounted to $8,179.41. The expenses for the same period were $14,367.08.

LOBSTER FISHING REGULATIONS.

Mr. KIRK asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to revise the regulations so as to permit fishing for and canning lobsters in the autumn of this year on the southern and eastern coast of Nova Scotia?

Mr. TUPPER. It is not the intention.

NOVA SCOTIA SUPREME COURT.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) asked, Whether any appointment has been made to the Bench of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Mr. Justice Smith? If not, when will such appointment be made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No such appointment has been made, but it will be made at an early day.

MAHONE BAY, N.S., LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. EISENHAUER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to replace the lighthouse at Mahone Bay, in the County of Lunenburg, which was destroyed by fire?

Mr. TUPPER. It is not the intention of the Government to replace the lighthouse that was destroyed in 1887 by fire, it being considered that a floating house sufficiently answers the requirements of the place.

MEMBERS OF THE IMPERIAL FEDERATION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency) asked, Whether the Government are aware that a number of their employés are members of the Branch of the Imperial Federation Association at Ottawa? If so, is it their intention to allow them to take part in that political movement?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have no official information that their employés, or any of them, are members of the Branch of the Imperial Federation Association at Ottawa; but if they are, I do not think that they are doing any harm to anybody.

HELMETS FOR THE MILITIA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to furnish helmets to the non-commissioned officers and men of the Active Canadian Militia?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The subject-matter of this question is now under the consideration of the Government.

BEHRING'S SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a reply given by the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government a few days ago, to the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), when he stated that the matter of the Behring Sea fishery negotiations was then under consideration at Washington. On a subsequent occasion, in reply to an enquiry of my own respecting the modus vivendi, the hon. gentleman stated that both the Behring Sea fishery question and the question of the fisheries generally, were under consideration at Washington between the British Minister and the United States Government. Now, this is a question in which the people of the Dominion naturally feel a very great interest, and, therefore, I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether, in view of the negotiations which he has announced are proceeding at Washington, it is the purpose of the Government to have a representative of Canada at Washington to look after Canadian interests, as on previous occasions? I think the people of Canada would naturally expect, in a matter of so much interest to this country, that the views of the Government and the people of Canada should be represented there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give due notice of his question.

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 50, respecting the North-West Territories; the motion of Mr. Davin in amendment thereto, and the motion of

Sir John Thompson in amendment to the amendment

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel that on an occasion like this even an old Politician like myself might rise with a good deal of hesitation to address this House, and through this House, the country, upon, perhaps, one of the most important questions we have had before us since 1867. It is no ordinary matter that has been brought before our attention in this country, in which the population is composed of various races, and especially of two leading races, the French and the English, comprising, also, a population of different religious convictions, and having various interests in respect to education and language, and in respect to other matters which many large sections of the population consider of the most vital importance. Under these circumstances, it is natural that a member getting up to address this House should feel under considerable reserve and restraint in the expression of his opinions. Sir, I have felt that during the course of this debate a good deal of unnecessarily strong language has been used, and I will take this opportunity of saying in the beginning—as my remarks will not be long on this occasion—that I think a good deal of unnecessary severity has been shown in regard both to the motives and the language of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I do not sympathise with those who find fault with that hon. gentleman, if he has acted on his convictions, in taking the course he has done; and while I dissent from the Bill which he has introduced, and shall vote against it if an opportunity is offered, I am not one of those who would blame that hon. gentleman for taking the course that his convictions impel him to pursue; I am not one of those who would find fault with his having the courage of his convictions and bringing this matter before the House. Sir, if there is one thing that recommends the conduct of a statesman to myself it is when he has the courage of his convictions, no matter whether it results in his unpopularity, no matter whether it results, as has been the case with that hon. gentleman, in his having had to sit under the most scathing denunciations and the most brilliant sarcasm, such as have been directed against the hon. gentleman from both sides of the House for the five days that this debate has lasted. I must say that I admire the courage and pluck which he displayed, and I admire the ability which he showed in fighting the matter out to the bitter end. I entirely dissent from the spirit and intention of this Bill, and, while I agree with those who believe that its introduction at the present time is calculated to do harm in the country and raise strife, I can find no fault with the hon. gentleman—if he believes, as he has stated to this House he does believe, that this course should be adopted and this Bill introduced—in regard to the course he has followed, for it was his duty to bring the matter before Parliament in order that the question might be discussed and decided. Some of the hon. members of this House have a peculiar responsibility in regard to this matter; I refer to those who took part in forming the Constitution of the country. The right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald), and the hon. gentleman who sits at his left (Sir Hector Langevin), with myself and one or two others not now in this House, met with considerable difficulty many years ago, in dealing with the questions of language and schools. One of the great difficulties we experienced in London, when we were preparing the Constitution of this Dominion to submit to the British Parliament for its approval and enactment—and the right hon. leader of the Government will agree that I do not exaggerate the facts when I say that these questions almost broke up the conference—and those difficulties arose out of these questions of language and schools. We felt the importance of conciliation and concession, the importance of conceding to the minority certain rights which they should enjoy, and the difficulty connected with this subject very nearly, as I have stated, broke up the conference in London. I realised then, that the people of Canada were composed mainly of two races, and, I admit, that I was not so liberal-minded then as now, and did not realise the difficulties as strongly as I do to-day. With respect to the amendment submitted by the Minister of Justice, I have come to the conclusion, that, while I do not entirely concur with it, I am prepared to adopt a similar course to that which I followed in 1867 in England—to accept it as probably the best solution presented of the question under consideration. I have, myself, given this matter some little consideration, and several days ago I prepared a resolution which I thought would meet the wishes of the House. I may state, that I should prefer this resolution to be adopted rather than that of the Minister of Justice, but I do not see any chance of this being done, and, therefore, I am prepared to give my approval to the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice, not as affording a perfect solution, but as one affording a temporary solution of these difficulties which now stare us in the face in this Canada of ours. If the amendment of the hon. Minister should fail, and I should have an opportunity to submit my resolution to the House, I will do so. It is in the following terms:—

That all after the word "Resolved" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

That at present it is inexpedient to further amend the Act relating to the North-West Territories, but the question should be left until Parliament is prepared to grant to the said Territories a full measure of Provincial Government such as is enjoyed by the existing Provinces of the Dominion.

I do not suppose I will obtain an opportunity to present my motion, for I believe there is sufficient good sense in this House and sufficient desire to promote harmony and community of feeling throughout this country, to induce hon. members to accept, as a compromise, the amendment moved by the Minister of Justice. What I am prepared to do is, to throw the responsibility of dealing with this matter on the Administration. They have chosen that amendment, after five days discussion, as a means of solving this difficulty, and upon them I would place the responsibility. I would have preferred not to vote for this amendment, if I could see any other way out of the difficulty, but I do not; and therefore I am prepared to accept it, not as a perfect measure, but as a solution—and it is a temporary solution only—of the difficulty that presents itself. Some views have been expressed during this debate with which I am not in accord. The question of schools has come up. It has been contended by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that a community of language should prevail throughout the Dominion. I quite agree with my hon. friend that, if it were possible to have a community of language from one end of the country to the other, it is most desirable; but it is impossible. Not only in the North-West and in the Province of Quebec, do racial difficulties exist. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, there is a large French Canadian and Acadian population, a population which I regret to say is not in as affluent circumstances as many of the Anglo-Saxon people there, a population which has not had the same facilities for educating their children and themselves as are possessed by many of us in the more advanced and older communities. If the hon. gentleman's community of language were to be applied in those schools, the result would be, first, teachers could not be found to educate the pupils in English; and second, the scholars themselves would be unable to understand anything except French. The effect would be that the poor children would remain ignorant and would have to go without an education. For that reason, I do not believe the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), would work satisfactorily throughout the country. Again, the hon. gentleman has referred to alleged difficulties which would arise respecting Provincial rights. I fail to perceive that any difficulty would occur regarding Provincial rights in the North-West Territories. That country will receive its charter from this Parliament. It will come in on an entirely different footing from the original Provinces of the Dominion. They came in as independent Provinces with laws and rights recognised by the British North America Act, which were in existence at that time, and which were to remain in existence until altered. The North-West Territories, however, were purchased by the Dominion, and when they receive their Provincial constitution the Canadian Parliament will decide the terms upon which it will be given. No question of Provincial rights can come into this issue. When this Parliament creates a Province or a number of Provinces in the North-West, Parliament will define and particularise in the constitution of those Provinces the powers they will exercise. I differ with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to what rights can be accorded to those Provinces, the hon. member for Bothwell taking the ground that we cannot give less or more extensive powers to the new Provinces we create than are possessed by the old Provinces under the British North America Act. With all due deference to the hon. gentleman's view, I do not agree with it; but I admit that it is a question open to discussion. But I will say this, that if the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who introduced the Bill now under discussion, had allowed the matter to remain in abeyance for ten years and had not introduced this Bill, the question would have settled itself. Either the French population in the country, which is now admittedly very small, would have increased sufficiently to have enabled them to have demanded the exercise and use of their language, or if the Anglo-Saxon population or a foreign population had increased, the French population there never would have demanded it, and the consequence is that the language would have been eliminated by the operation of time and by the natural course of events.

That is the view I take of this part of the question. While I quite recognise the power of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and his right to bring this question before Parliament, I regret that he should have raised it at this time, because I believe that if he had not raised it, not five years—certainly not more than ten years—would have elapsed before, by the natural operation of events, the question would have settled itself. Now, Sir, after the very elaborate speeches which have been made on this question, and almost every branch of the question having been exhausted by the different very able speakers, I think it will be unnecessary for me to take up the time of the House longer. What I rose to do, was not to make a speech, but to give utterance to the views which I entertain on the matter, in order to justify the vote I gave the other day, and to explain the vote which I will give on the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice. I would say that I have lived among the French people for very many years and I can vouch that they are, as an almost universal rule, good citizens, living peaceably amongst themselves and in friendship with the people of other races, and most friendly in their relations with their English-speaking fellow countrymen. Where they are in power, as they are in the Province of Quebec by a large majority, they deal with the English-speaking people with a liberality which does credit to them. In that Province the Protestants have their separate schools and their separate eleemosynary and benevolent institutions, such as insane asylums, which receive Government aid in proportion to that given to the French and Catholic institutions. The English minority has all these privileges freely accorded by a Legislature in which there is only a fragment of English-speaking representatives. If where the English-speaking people have the power, as they have in the North-West Territories and in this Parliament, we deal less liberally with the French minority than they do with the English minority, what kind of position will we place ourselves in? One thing is certain: that in the interest of peace and harmony in this country, and in a mixed community such as ours, there must be compromise. If there are not concessions on both sides, it can only end in the disruption of the Dominion, and the breaking up of what, when we laid its foundation, we believed would be a great nation. I again repeat that while voting for the amendment of the Minister of Justice, although I do not entirely approve of it, I throw the responsibility for the measure on the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After the remarks which I made on a previous occasion during this debate, and the suggestion which I then offered across the floor to hon. gentlemen opposite, I think it right that I should at once address this House on the resolution presented by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I should have then moved this resolution myself, but it was late at night and I was fatigued, and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has moved it at my special request. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), in the calm and wise speech he has delivered just now, has made the statement that he threw the responsibility for action on this question upon the Government. Mr. Speaker, the Government accepts that responsibility.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government think that the resolution moved by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is a measure of peace, and a means of getting over this unfortunate feeling of irritation which has grown up between the two great races that make the strength and power of Canada. This resolution is for the purpose of getting rid of the temporary feeling—because it will only be temporary—which threatens for the moment to disturb the quiet of Canada, and thereby to hurt its prestige and its credit and to hamper its development. This resolution of the Minister of Justice is, as I have said, a measure of peace, and I implore and urge all my hon. friends on both sides of the House who look with anxiety for the future peace of Canada to accept it as such. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in his speech, and in the resolution which he suggested, stated that the time had not arrived for the solution of this question and that it ought to be postponed. In my short reply I stated that while I accepted the greater part of his resolution, yet I thought that while the first portion of it would quiet the irritated feelings of the people in the eastern part of Canada, the postponement of this question for an unspecified time would, perhaps, arouse feelings of irritation in the western portion of this Dominion. I suggested across the floor that for the sake of peace we ought, after the people of the North-West had an opportunity of expressing their opinion, throw the responsibility upon them. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), casting aside all partisan desire of triumph, accepted—although, perhaps, against his own opinion—the proposition that I then made. If we examine and compare the resolution which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has moved with the suggested motion of my hon. friend for West Durham (Mr. Blake) it will be seen that the first portion of it is in his exact language, a little condensed, and it concludes with the proposition which I made and which that hon. gentleman accepted. It was a compromise, and in a question of this kind involving racial feelings, and prejudices, and arousing a sense of pride of race and nationality, such a course is wise and patriotic. I hold that this resolution is one which meets the case, and I implore the House that it may be accepted. Some of my hon. friends think that the power to deal with this subject should be at once given to the Assembly of the North-West Territories. Now there are great political considerations against that course, and, looking to the future, I think it would be a mistake. As my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) says, the present Legislature of the North-West Territories had no commission from the people to pronounce upon this subject of the two languages; they had no means of knowing what the opinion of the people was upon that point, and therefore, they did not speak with the authority of representatives in regard to the wishes and opinions of the people of the North-West. Those who look at history will see that the great and grave errors committed in France at the time when the people arose against the despotism of the Bourbons, and from which most of the evils following the revolution of 1798 arose, were due to the fact that the representatives of the people who were elected for the purpose of reform under the laws of that day resolved themselves again and again into constituent assemblies, assuming for themselves the power of altering the constitution under which they were elected, instead of trying to effect reforms under the constitution as it existed, and with the powers which had been conferred upon them by the people. Now, there is no power conferred upon the Legislative Assembly of the North-West to alter their constitution. The members of that body are all, I believe, respectable men; they are all men having the interest of the North-West at heart; but not one of them had ever before sat in a Legislative Assembly or knew the limits of their powers. If you look at their various ordinances, you will find that they attack ever limit conferred upon them by the Act of 1888. They assumed that having been once elected they could do as they pleased; and in some of the resolutions passed at that time, they have asserted rights and powers which we do not exercise or venture to exercise in this Assembly. Therefore, it is of the very greatest importance that we should draw a distinction between a constituent assembly and a Legislative Assembly. The North-West Assembly is a Legislative Assembly with certain powers conferred upon it by the Act which brought it into being; but it has no right to represent the people on questions which were not before the people at the time it was elected as a Legislative Assembly with limited powers. It is of the very greatest importance that we should observe that distinction, and, therefore, I quite agree with all those hon. gentlemen on both sides who have said that any action taken in this matter should be deferred until the people of the North-West have an opportunity of saying to their representatives what they want. There is a difference of opinion on that point. Some hon. gentlemen who have come from that part of the country say that they believe that after the next general election the abolition of the dual language will not be pressed. I do not know how that may be; but we can afford to wait until the people of the North-West have seen and read the discussions which have taken place in this House, and have seen in the press of Canada how much this question has excited the attention of the people of the Dominion; they will then go to the polls fully charged with this question, having made up their minds what they will instruct their representatives to carry out. Then, Sir, not before, ought we to act upon the representations of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West. Now, Sir, an objection will be taken, I have no doubt, to the fact that this resolution of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice does not allude at all to the printing of the ordinances of the North-West. Sir, it ought not in any way to allude to that, or to bring that subject into the consideration of this question; and why? Because the printing of the ordinances of the North-West Assembly is no matter of concern to that assembly. It has no more authority with respect to the printing of those ordinances than this House of Commons of Canada has with respect to the printing of the statutes which we, in conjunction with the Senate, pass. The resolution which my hon. friend proposes says:

“That at the same time this House deems it expedient and proper, and not inconsistent with those covenants, that the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories should receive from the Parliament of Canada power to regulate, after the next general election of the Assembly, the proceedings of the Assembly, and the manner of recording and publishing such proceedings."

That gives them the whole control, the sole regulation of every proceeding and every paper with which they have anything to do, from the time they meet until the time they present the Bills which they have passed to the Governor for his sanction. The Journals, the Votes and Proceedings, the motions and resolutions, the Bills, the first, second and third readings, can, under the resolution of my hon. friend, be limited, if they so choose to limit them, to the English language. This resolution, if passed, gives them the whole authority to decide whether those things shall be printed in English, in French, in both English and French, in German, or in any other language. But, Sir, as here, so there; from the moment the Bills are passed, and presented to the Governor for his sanction, from that moment all their authority over them ceases. Here we pass Bills, we send them to the Senate, and then, so far as we are concerned, our power is ended. We know we could have them, if it were not for the clause in the British North America Act, printed in any language we like; but after they are sent up to the Senate and the Senate passes them, they are then handed over to the representative of the Sovereign, and from that moment they cease to be the property of the Legislature, and become the laws of the land, to be published by the Governor. Our statutes, when they are published, are published not by virtue of the authority of this House or both Houses together; they are published by the representative of the Sovereign, who, after having given his sanction to them, publishes them under constitutional rule. So in the North-West. We will suppose that under the authority given by this resolution the Acts of the North-West Assembly are presented to the Lieutenant-Governor in English, and in English alone; he gives his assent, and then, and not before, do they become ordinances, and the moment they become ordinances, it is the Crown that publishes them, and the Legislative body, which initiated the legislation, has nothing more to do with it. The consequence is that, so far as that Legislature is concerned, it can carry out its wishes by printing its measures in one or in both languages. Let them adopt their ordinances under the present system, and the Lieutenant-Governor, being a Dominion officer, will see that they are published certainly in the language in which they are presented. The Assembly, however, will have nothing to say as to whether they may not, by instructions from the Government here or the Dominion Parliament, be published in half-a-dozen languages. This resolution, Sir, is a measure of peace. This House will, by a large majority, I believe, reject the measure, presented as it has been, the harsh measure of my hon. friend from North Simcoe. Then, if this resolution be adopted, the matter will stand over for the opinion of the people of the North-West. If they declare that all the proceedings of their Legislature are to be in English, so let it be, and so it will be if this House adopt this resolution. But, after they have exercised their full right of limiting their documents, their resolutions, their Bills, their Journals, and their Votes and Proceedings, to the one tongue, it will be left to the Lieutenant-Governor to order, under instruction from the Dominion Government—and that Dominion Government acting under instructions from the representatives of the people here—them to be printed in any other language as well as in English. Should, however, this House choose to say that any portion of the people of the North-West are to be deprived of the means of reading their laws in their own language, they will have to submit; but, in the meantime, we will have conferred full power and authority on the North-West Council to act on this unfortunate question just as they please, after having received an amended warrant from the people. Now, I must again say that it is of the very greatest importance that we should bury this question as soon as possible. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake) said, that a small spark may kindle a great conflagration, and we will be wilfully, on a question of sentiment—on a question of feeling, which does not deserve to be dignified by the name of sentiment—hazarding the future of the country, arousing the feelings of race against race, which I hoped had been forever buried in 1867, and ruining the credit of Canada in foreign countries. Aye, and in the mother country too. For, what credit can we, financially or otherwise, hope to obtain if it is known in England, if it is known especially on the Stock Exchange—the most fearful and timorous of all bodies—that the two races which inhabit Canada are drawn up against each other, on matters of sentiment, feeling and prejudice, which are more important and less easy to be soothed than mere material questions. It will stop the development of this country. It will prevent its future progress, and if this country should fall from the proud position it now holds in the eyes of the world, it will be because by our own insensate conduct we have destroyed our credit, destroyed our prestige, and ruined our future. In the few remarks I made the other night I intended to have called the intention of my hon. friends from the Province of Ontario to what was the action of the Province of Upper Canada in 1793, but I was tired, and held it over for another opportunity. I will call attention to it now, to show what was the feeling of the people of Upper Canada a century ago. By a very unwise measure, although introduced by a very great man, Mr. Pitt, in 1790, the old Province of Quebec was divided into two—Upper and Lower Canada. It was thought that matters would be simplified by keeping the French in one corner of this vast country, and the English in another, and they divided the Province of Quebec into two provinces. From that unwise measure came most of our troubles. The Legislature met in 1791 at Newark, afterwards Niagara, and was composed of Englishmen. They were severed from the French, but they had a colony of French on the western frontier of the Province of Canada, what is now the County of Essex. These Frenchmen were few in number, but their rights were protected at the second meeting of the Legislature of Upper Canada. The Province was a small one and poor, and could not afford even to print the proceedings of its Legislature; but its people regarded the feelings of their fellow-countrymen. Let me read the resolution, which is still in manuscript. The original volume will be found in our Library. This is the order of June 3, 1793:

"Ordered, that such acts as have already passed, or may hereafter pass the Legislature of this Province, be translated into the French language for the benefit of the inhabitants of the western district of this Province and other French settlers who may come to reside within this Province, and that A. Macdonald, Esq., of this House, member for Glengarry, be likewise employed as a French translator for this or other purposes."

Are we, one hundred years later, going to be less liberal to our French Canadian fellow-subjects than the few Englishmen, United Empire Loyalists, who settled Ontario? No, Sir. This resolution would cast shame on men who tried to deprive our French friends in the Province of Ontario of the privilege given them a hundred years ago by a body of men altogether speaking the English language. There may have been among them one member from that western district, of French origin—perhaps Monsieur Baby, who for years was the sole representative in the Province of Upper Canada of that portion of the French race who were living in Upper Canada. Are we going to be less liberal? Forbid it, Mr. Speaker. In the name of humanity, in the name of civilisation, in the name of the progress of this great country, I appeal to all our friends in this House, without reference to party, to forget what may be an inconvenience when they go back to their constituents on both sides, to forget that for a moment, and to merge everything in the great desire to make Canada, French and English, one people, without any hostile feeling, without any difference of opinion, further than that which arises from the different literatures and the different strains of mind that run always in different races, and which sever the Scotchman and the Irishman from the Englishman as much as it severs the Frenchman from the Englishman. Let us forget this cry, and we shall have our reward in seeing this unfortunate fire, which has been kindled from so small a spark, extinguished for ever, and we shall go on, as we have been going on since 1867, as one people, with one object, looking to one future, and expecting to lay the foundation of one great country.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is a fortunate thing that this debate has taken so wide a range. If there is one thing more than another which should make a man feel proud of being a member of this Assembly, it is to have listened to a great debate like this. The questions which are before us for discussion are those which underlie our national existence, and upon the peaceful settlement of these questions depends our hope for the future of Canada. The speakers in this debate have, for the most part, been equal to the occasion, and they have displayed the courage to grapple with the real issues, they have shown a breadth of statesmanship to look at the lesson which history has taught us, and I do not think I am going too far in saying that they have dealt with the whole subject with an eloquence which could be found in few deliberative assemblies in the world. I think it is well that this debate has taken so wide a range for another reason. It has gone to the country. Day after day the opinions of the wisest statesmen of Canada, the most experienced of our public men, have been sent abroad by the press to educate the people on this subject before it shall have got into the hands of the uninformed and irresponsible platform orators who might use it to inflame the passions of race and of creed. Why has this debate, commencing from so very small a Bill, and so very small a matter on its face, taken so wide a range as it has? There are several reasons for it. One is to be found in that unfortunate preamble. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has told us that he was surprised to find that the preamble was the occasion of so great an explosion of alarm and wrath in this House. I dare say he was surprised, because he says so, but it seems to me that he is making the same excuse as the boy made, in whose hands the fire-arm exploded, when he said that he did not know it was loaded. But the hon. gentleman not simply knew that that preamble was loaded, but he loaded it himself, and, therefore, he has no such excuse to make. The next reason that I find for the wide range of this debate was the speech by which it was introduced in this House by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). My judgment might be wrong, if I only depended on it to tell me that the hon. gentleman's introductory speech was sufficient to cause this widely extended debate. I do not depend upon my judgment alone, but upon that of an experienced parliamentary hand, the leader of the House and the leader of the Government. It is not the custom of the leader of the Government to introduce an unpleasant subject into this House when he can avoid it, but I can show that the speech of the First Minister, made a few minutes after the introductory speech of the hon. gentleman, was ample ground for the range the debate has taken. On that occasion, referring to the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe on the first reading of the Bill, the First Minister said:

"The line of argument my hon. friend has taken raises questions of such a nature, his whole line of argument is of such a kind, as to involve most serious and grave questions—so grave that I think we must take full time to consider what his arguments are, what they tend to, in what direction they lead, and what consequences may follow if the measure is persisted in."

I will say no more in reference to the hon. gentleman's speech in this House after that quotation, but, when a public man of the prominence of the hon. member for North Simcoe brings forward a measure in this House, it is impossible for any of us or for the country not to have regard to the discussions which the hon. gentleman has taken part in before the people of the country, at a recent date. If we had had no preamble to this Bill, but the simple terms of the Bill itself, if we had had no speech from the hon. gentleman in introducing it of such a character as the First Minister has described, we still had a cause for alarm. Our French friends in this House and in the country had cause for alarm when they had read—as I fancy all the members of this House had read—the speech which the hon. gentleman delivered almost under the shadow of this building, in Ottawa, on the 12th December, 1889. I am not going back to any 12th July speeches of the hon. gentleman. On that exciting occasion, I suppose, he ought to be allowed a little latitude, but I was glad to find that my leader on this side of the House compelled the hon. gentleman to withdraw or to explain away some of the language he used in one of those 12th July speeches made before the assembled brethren. However, we will not go into that. Let us see what the hon. gentleman promised the people of Ottawa he would do in the way of legislation; let us see what he stated our grievances were. In this speech, he quoted with approval the report of Lord Durham in reference to the French language. Now, whether this report was written by Lord Durham himself, or by Mr. Charles Buller, or by Mr. Turton, whose reputation was very unsavory in his own country, or by Mr. Gibbon Wakefield, who was also in the entourage of Lord Durham, and whose reputation was even more unsavory than that of Mr. Turton, it is certain that this report was never accepted by the French people as a policy which was likely to reconcile the different people of this land. However, my hon. friend thinks that he will disinter Lord Durham's report and make it do service again in this country. Again we read in his December speech :

"Lord Durham realised that so long as the use of the French language was permitted, so long as they were permitted to be educated in their schools in the French language, to be instructed in the literature of France, instead of the literature of England, they would remain French in feeling."

Then he says :

"Is there any shadow of doubt that Lord Durham was right?"

The hon. member goes on, and says in the next sentence :

"There must be the obliteration of one of these languages."

Now, this was not applied to the North-West, this was not applied to Manitoba, it was applied to what Lord Durham applied it to, the Province of Quebec, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman, in that public place, advocated—and I am sure he is not the man to shirk responsibility on the floor of this House for what he advocates outside; at any rate, we do not expect it of him—he advocated the obliteration of one of these languages, and I do not think he meant the English language. Again, he says in that speech, speaking about the material progress of the country :

"While we were advancing at this sufficiently rapid pace of prosperity, we were forgetting the one thing needful to the consolidation of the Dominion; but all this time we were forgetting that this great trouble—"

That is to say, the use of the French language.

"—which was an enormous difficulty in 1837—"

That was certainly not in the North-West Territories, that was in the old Province of Quebec.

"—had quadrupled itself in 1867, and that we were leaving for our children to settle that, respecting which I used the expression, you will remember—I did not say in our generation—but I said that in the next generation the bayonet would do it, if we did not settle it by the ballot in this."

Now, Mr. Speaker, he has laid out for us a programme for the next generation, which, I hope, we will never see carried out. I am sure that I do not want to see any of my children in the next generation have to shoulder their muskets in a war of races in Canada; but that is the programme, unless—what, Mr. Speaker? Unless we settle it by the ballot in this. What does he mean by the ballot in this? Does he not mean by legislation, by the votes of the people acting upon the legislators in this Parliament; and does he not mean by the act of this, or of a future Parliament, under the direction of the ballot? That is what he promises, that is what he threatens in that speech—legislation or war. No wonder our French friends were a little alarmed at it. Then he says :

"This trouble was already lifting up its hideous head while we were fighting over matters of comparative unimportance,"

"Lifting up its hideous head." The beautiful French language is described in that way. Why, Mr. Speaker, when the occupant of that chair, every alternate day in this Chamber, before the doors are opened, lifts up his voice in the French language, in supplication to the God of both the French and the English, I suppose the hon. member for Simcoe feels that this language is then lifting up its "hideous head." He goes on and says that the Legislature of 1844

"Undid the good work which Lord Durham's wisdom had given us in the year 1840 or 1841."

But, Sir, he goes beyond that. He does not postpone this thing for the next generation, he does not even postpone it till there is another general election, when the ballot can be brought into force; but he proposes to do it in this very Parliament, if the words of the English language mean anything. What does he say?

"I will point out to you that this may be a very useful precedent—"

That is, the action of the Legislature at Kingston in 1844, when they introduced the French language unanimously again :

"That if, in 1844 or 1845 the Parliament of United Canada petition for the repeal of a clause of the Union Act, I do not know whether in 1890 or 1891, if the necessity arises, the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, cannot petition for an amendment to the British North America Act also."

Therefore, he promises that even in this Parliament, in the year 1890 or 1891, an Address may be presented to the Crown in England asking the Imperial Parliament to alter the British North America Act. Now, remember that course is not necessary, in order to affect the language in the North-West; it is only necessary to attack, what he thinks so terrible, the French language in Quebec, and the French language in this House, and, perhaps, the French language in Manitoba. He knows perfectly well that if he has the courage of his convictions he can put a notice on the paper to-day for an address from this House to the Queen, asking her to introduce legislation to amend the Imperial Act in this particular. Sir, when this solemn threat was read, no wonder the members of Parliament felt alarmed. Why this speech of 12th December last, which I hold in my hand, was sent to me, unless as a member of Parliament, I cannot say. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman sent copies to all his fellow members, in order to give them full notice of what he was doing; but if he did not, some of his friends did, who were anxious that the whole Parliament and country should know what the hon. member for Simcoe was so ostentatiously proposing to do. His programme is a large one, larger, he admits, even than the programme of the Equal Rights Association which he was addressing, because he says this :

"Are We to have Separate Schools in Upper Canada, tith assessments in Lower Canada, dual language in the Dominion Parliament, and dual languages in Quebec, the North-West and Manitoba?"

His programme is an extensive one. No wonder the French speaking people thought that this was but the entering of the small end of a very large wedge, to be driven home by the hammer of the eloquence of the hon.

member for North Simcoe. Now, however, a change has certainly come over the hon. gentleman; and I congratulate him upon it. His first speech in this House was not quite as brave as the speech he had delivered in the opera house here; and his last speech in the House was not nearly so aggressive as the first one he delivered here. He has been convinced by something during the course of this debate. I do not know whether it was his opponents who convinced him, or his own friends; I think he must have heard enough from his own friends and supporters to convince him that whatever they might think or say about the merits of this question of language in the North-West, they had no sympathy whatever with the larger crusade which the hon. gentleman pointed out to them on former occasions. Now, I listened to most of the debate, and I looked over the Hansard, and I find that, on this subject, the hon. member from West Toronto (Mr. Denison), who seconded the introduction of this Bill, does not hold out much encouragement to his leader. For he says he is talking of the case of Switzerland, the hon. gentleman says:

"I am not referring to Quebec; it is out of the question to speak of Quebec."

Then another, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) also fired a hot shot at that unfortunate preamble; and he went still further, and disclaimed any idea of interfering with the French language in the Province of Quebec or in the Dominion. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who spoke, as he said, for one million of his fellow-subjects down by the sea, advocated the substance of the hon. gentleman's Bill, the one clause which it contains; but he also took occasion to say that the people in the Maritime Provinces, the million of people for whom he spoke, were truth-loving and treaty-keeping people, and they would never be a party to breaking a treaty under which the French language was established in Quebec and the Dominion. Another of the hon. gentleman's followers, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), also repudiated the preamble—and he not only repudiated the preamble, but he poured a torrent of his turgid invective upon the head of his hon. friend, and denounced any clause abolishing the French language as "unjust, un-English, tyrannical and cruel." The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who also sympathises with the one clause of the Bill, spoke as follows with respect to the treaty rights of the French:

"We do not propose—"

I do not know who the "we" means; it certainly does not include the hon. member for Simcoe,—

"—to interfere with any rights that exist in Canada by the virtue of the provisions of the British North America Act; not with one of them."

Then, the hon. gentleman said further:

"There is not a right guaranteed to the race under the constitution which I wish to see impaired; there is not a right the integrity of which I wish to see impaired in the slightest degree."

Yet, the programme of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), was—I do not think it is so now—but a short time ago it was, to do what the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) says, is "out of the question;" what the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said would be "tyrannical and cruel, un-English and unjust," and to destroy rights which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says he does not wish to impair in the slightest degree. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) now says he will strike out the preamble. That is all very well, if the Bill ever reaches the House in Committee; but it is too late now to back down in that fashion, and it is a rare sight to see in this Parliament or in the courts of Ontario one of the brilliant leaders of the bar, which the hon. gentleman is, back down from any position he has boldly taken; yet the hon. gentleman backs down and says he is willing to withdraw the preamble of this Bill. It is too late to say that now; he should have thought of that before; he has sown the whirlwind and must reap the storm. I am glad to have heard so much from the other side of the House in favor of Provincial rights. It is proverbial that fresh converts are always a little over-zealous, and I think we have seen a display in this debate of a good deal of zeal a little misdirected on that subject. The question, of course, I know is a new one to those hon. gentlemen, and we can scarcely expect that they should understand it very well. They appear to have forgotten that there are two kinds of Provincial rights. There are the rights of the majority of the Legislature in the Province to pass such laws as come within the scope of the British North America Act. Those are the Provincial rights of the majority. But there are rights, also, belonging to the minority, guaranteed by the British North America Act, which are just as sacred as the rights of the majorities to govern themselves. Such rights would prevent the French majority in Quebec from taking away Protestant schools from the minority, for example. That is a question of the Provincial rights of the minority, which hon. gentlemen opposite, who are now advocating Provincial rights, have forgotten in their definition of that term. I think when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) better understands this country and its citizens, he will know that Confederation, as was pointed out by the First Minister and by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), is a compromise. Confederation is a compromise in itself, and without Confederation what is Canada, where is it, or where would it be? Canada, therefore, is a compromise, and I believe if Confederation were broken up into its original fragments on a financial question, for example, it is just possible that the scattered members of the old Confederacy might remain in some sense connected with Great Britain and in some sense united to one another; but if this Confederation were torn to pieces by a war of races, there would be no hope of any harmony among its scattered members, there would be no hope of continuing the connection, which so many people desire, with Britain; and there would be no chance, which I feel to be an even more important thing, to build up a great Canadian nation. The hon. gentleman repudiates the idea of being an annexationist. He says, and I do not deny he thinks so too, that he is not working for annexation; but I tell him that if his speeches were not answered on this floor, if his sentiments were not repudiated by the great majority of this House, if this Bill were not voted down, he would make tens of thousands of annexationists in the Province of Quebec. If the hon. gentleman will read the history of Canada, even for the last thirty years, he will learn that this very point, which is the object of his attack, formed one of the compromises agreed upon, in which the rights of the minorities were established. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will not acknowledge the authority of the late George Brown on that question, but I think that name will be acknowledged as a high authority in the Province of Ontario, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will acknowledge it too. What did George Brown say on that point during the Confederation debates? He put the matter in a nutshell:

"The framers of this scheme had immense special difficulties to overcome. We had the prejudices of race and language and religion to deal with. To assert, then, that our scheme is without fault would be folly. It was necessarily the work of concession."

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) expresses the hope that in some mysterious way or other our French Canadian citizens will become Anglo-Saxon. Now, I do not know whether he means Anglo-Saxons of America or Anglo-Saxons of England. A great many attempts have been used, by promises and threats, and even by force, to make the French Canadians Yankees, but they have all failed, and I do not think that by legislation my hon. friend can hope to make the French Canadians English either. What is, I think, more important to us, is, that by proper and fair treatment we can keep the French people of this country true and loyal Canadians, loyal to the only form of Government which we have in Canada, the Government of Canada by Canadians, under the name of the Sovereign Lady, around whose throne the free people of England also govern themselves. There is no country under the sun in which fanaticism in politics or bigotry in religion is more dangerous than in Canada. Our materials are most inflammable, and it is not only culpable, but it is indeed a political crime for any public man to set the spark to that inflammable material. We must frown down fanaticism, whether it be shown on the floor of this House or on the streets of Hull, for if it be allowed to take its course, this country would not only be an impossible one to govern, but an unfit one to live in. In view of the present position of affairs, in view of the feeling which has been aroused in this House—necessarily aroused, as I have shown—and in view of the fact that there was no real pressing grievance to be remedied by this legislation, that there was no outcry from the North-West, that there was no unnecessary tax put upon the people of the North-West for printing the proceedings in French; this question could have well been left in abeyance. I will not say that the whole thing originated with my hon. friend, for he says it did not, but I know that if the hon. gentleman did not cause the petition to be sent from the North-West Council, it was, at all events, not sent until after he visited the North-West Territories. I think the origin of the trouble may be very naturally traced to the same source as the origin of the trouble we are now dealing with in this House. The grievance in the North-West Territories was a small one, an infinitesimal one, and I think it might have been borne with a little longer rather than that bitter feelings should have been aroused. I think we could have waited until the question of a new Constitution for the North-West came up in its natural course before this Parliament by a proposition for creating one or more Provinces in the North-West. If this delay were allowed, I do not see that either the people of the North-West or the Canadian Constitution would have suffered. I believe that there is no necessity for this Bill at present, and holding this view, had I been within sound of the division bell the other evening, I should have voted for the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil).

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes; I would unquestionably have so voted. I would have moved the six months' hoist, or anything else which would have postponed this Bill, not altogether because of the character of the Bill itself, but because of its preamble and surroundings, and chiefly of the speeches made by the hon. gentleman, and because the question would settle itself at no distant day. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," and appears to be surprised that I should make that announcement, but I again repeat that I am sorry I was not here to vote for that amendment. In taking this course, I cannot be accused of trying to gain French votes in my constituency, because, so far as I know, these is not one French Canadian in it. The fine constituency which I represent is largely English and Protestant, but at the same time it is largely liberal, and I shall be very much disappointed if the broad and liberal sentiments which I am trying to express here, will not meet with the approval of the liberal English-speaking Protestants of my riding, which is in the heart of the great Province of Ontario. I do not hope to catch votes, nor am I afraid of losing votes by the course which I take. While I may not have any claim or right to do so, I will venture to make an appeal to my French fellow members in this House. I do hope that they will receive a proposition of a conciliatory character, such as that contained in the amendment of the Minister of Justice, without alarm. Although they may not like everything that is in that proposition, they have no ground for alarm, in my opinion, when they hear the sentiments expressed towards them by the majority on both sides of this House. I shall also take the liberty of counselling them not to ask for anything unreasonable, or for anything which will give their enemies an excuse for open and continued hostility towards them.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). At this stage of the debate, and after the many lucid and able arguments that have been advanced on both sides, I cannot hope to add anything to the information of the House, or to interest it on this question to any degree. Nor, Sir, would I have ventured to have said a word were it not that I do not wish to record a silent vote upon the question now before the House. In the debate that has taken place during the last five or six days, I have been struck with the great unanimity with which hon. members who opposed the proposition of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) have opposed, not the Bill itself, but the preamble with which that Bill has been introduced. It has been stated by many hon. gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, that the Bill itself was an innocent measure, but that its preamble is one calculated to excite the feelings of the community, and, therefore, that the Bill ought on that account to be opposed. I have also been struck with the fact that the hon. gentlemen who have opposed the proposition of my hon. friend for North Simcoe, have criticised, not so much the speeches which he has delivered on the floor of Parliament in reference to this measure, as the speeches he has delivered outside of this House. I may say, Sir, frankly, that with many of the aspirations of my hon. friend for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) I have no sympathy whatever. There were many things said by that hon. gentleman during the recess which, perhaps, might as well have been left unsaid, and with which I do not at all concur; but I think every hon. member in this House must admit that the hon. member for North Simcoe has presented his case on the floor of this Parliament with a degree of moderation that ought to commend itself to the House, and which is in marked contrast to many of the speeches that have been delivered in opposition to his measure. Sir, the few words I have to say on this question—and they will be very few indeed—will have particular reference to the proposition now before the Chair, namely, the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Justice. I have just stated that the greatest objection offered to this Bill refers to the preamble; that was one of the objections urged by the Minister of Justice in the speech he delivered here the other night. Well, Sir, we had before us last year the consideration of a Bill, the preamble of which was obnoxious to a very large portion of the people of this country—a preamble calculated to arouse the prejudices, if I may so express it, of a very large number of people, of whom I myself was one. I listened to the hon. Minister of Justice on that occasion taking the ground that the preamble of a Bill was no essential part of the Bill at all. During the recess following the last Session of Parliament, many of us were called to account by our constituents for the position we had taken on the question I have just referred to; and I undertook to justify the position I took on that question because I believed that the Government were right and did what they ought to do in the interest of the country. In doing so, I took the ground that the hon. Minister of Justice had taken, that the preamble formed no essential part of the Bill, and ought not to be considered in reference thereto. But we find the hon. Minister of Justice now laying down a new principle and taking the opposite view; he says he has a very strong objection to this Bill because of its preamble. Well, Sir, the hon. member for North Simcoe has stated distinctly that if this Bill passes a second reading, he has no objection to changing the preamble—that the House can amend it in any direction they please, or they can strike it out if they please. The whole question presented to this House, divested of all sentiment, and of all appeals to the Province of Quebec or to any other section of the country, is whether it is desirable that that particular clause of the North-West Territories Act should be continued on the Statute-book or not. I have no sympathy with those hon. gentlemen who say that the hon. member for North Simcoe ought not to have moved in this matter, but that it ought to have been left to the members representing North-West constituencies. If the hon. member for North

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew).

Simcoe believed, as he evidently does believe, that this clause of the North-West Territories Act should be expunged from the Statute-book, it was his bounden duty to bring the question before Parliament, whether he represented a constituency in Ontario, in the North-West Territories, or in any other portion of the Dominion. Now, let me say that with the first part of the proposition submitted by the hon. Minister of Justice I concur to a very great extent:

“That this House, having regard to the long continued use of the French language in old Canada, and to the covenants on that subject embodied in the British North America Act, cannot agree to the declaration contained in the said Bill as the basis thereof, that it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language amongst the people of Canada. That, on the contrary, this House declares its adherence to the said covenants and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same.”

Why should we make that declaration, Mr. Speaker? We are not called on to deal with that question at the present time. My hon. friend from North Simcoe, with all his ardor in the direction he is moving, declared in the speech he made the other night, that it was not his intention to interfere in the slightest degree with the rights conferred on the minorities in the different Provinces by the Act of Confederation. The recognition of those rights is, to a very great extent, the basis of Confederation; it was because of the concession of them to the minorities in the different Provinces that Confederation was made a possibility; and, therefore, I would be one of the last to interfere with them in the slightest degree, whether in the Province of Quebec, the Province of Ontario, or any other Province in this Dominion. But I take it that we are not called upon, on the present occasion, to deal with that question at all. No proposition has been submitted to this House to interfere in the slightest degree with the rights of the minorities conferred upon them by the Act of Confederation, and, therefore, in my judgment at any rate, the recital in this resolution is entirely unnecessary. Then, I come to the other part of the question. The hon. Minister of Justice has laid down the proposition here that certain matters should be left to the final decision of the North-West Legislature, after the next general election. Well, Sir, if he had enlarged the scope of his proposition I do not say I would not agree with him; but he has confined it to two points. The first, refers to the use of the French language in the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories; but, in the speech he delivered here the other night, the hon. Minister stated, that if a number of French gentlemen were elected to represent portions of the North-West Territories in the Legislature, they would be permitted to use their language on the floor of that Legislature, as a matter of courtesy if not as a matter of right, so that it seems to me that the concession proposed to be made by this resolution is no concession at all. The second point refers to the printing of the proceedings of the North-West Legislature in the French language. Why, Sir, we have the authority of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who ought to know, perhaps, better than any other man in Canada—almost as well even as the Regina Leader itself—what is the practice in that section of the country; and he stated as a fact that the proceedings of the North-West Legislature were not printed in the French language at all. So that it seems to me the proposition submitted to the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will confer on the North-West Legislature practically no benefit whatever; and, therefore, while they have been asking this House for bread, we shall, if we pass this resolution, be giving them a stone. What does the hon. Minister say with regard to the use of the French language in the courts? He says that it would be a manifest injustice to the people of that country if they were precluded from using the French language in the courts. What argument did the hon. Minister use in respect to that contention—leaving aside altogether the constitutional argument, with which I do not propose to deal, but to speak of the injustice which he declared would be perpetrated upon the 1,500 French people and upon the 3,000 odd French half-breeds, a large proportion of whom, it has been stated in this debate, are incapable of speaking the French language at all, and only understand their mother tongue, the Indian? I say there would be no greater injustice in not allowing them to have the use of French in their courts than there is in not allowing the use of the French or the German language in the courts of the Province of Ontario, where there are over 200,000 Germans, and upwards of 100,000 French people. Can it be argued for a moment that any greater injustice will be perpetrated on the people of the North-West Territories by preventing the use of the French language in the records and proceedings before the courts, than is perpetrated upon the French or Germans in the Province of Ontario by not using the languages of these people in that Province? I have yet to learn that any miscarriage of justice has occurred, or that there has been any complaint of any miscarriage of justice because of the non-use of the French or of any other foreign language in the courts in that Province. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument of the Minister of Justice in that respect has very little force. I would have been pleased, I frankly admit, because I have the greatest respect for the opinion of my leader, if I could have agreed to the proposition which the Minister of Justice proposed to this House; but holding the views I do on this question, and believing, as I do, that the opinion of the people of the North-West Territories, as shown by their petitions to this Parliament, ought to have some force and effect, I find myself incapable of voting for that resolution.

After Recess.

Mr. BARRON. When, before recess, I had the pleasure of hearing my hon. friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) rise in his seat and say that he, an old parliamentarian, an old member of this House, rose to speak on this serious and important question with a good deal of diffidence, I confess to having then experienced some feeling of regret that I, a young member, had made up my mind to speak on this burning question; but I hope the hon. members of this House will see that, in rising to speak, notwithstanding my youth, I do so solely under a keen sense of duty to my constituents, who expect me in this matter to give my decided views one way or the other. I do not think any hon. member of this House feels more conscious than I, of the great necessity we are under to say nothing to-night, or hereafter during this debate, which may in any way continue the ill-feeling that, perhaps, has been engendered during this debate. I am conscious of this necessity, not only out of respect for the high official position which you, Sir, so worthily occupy, not only out of respect for our own individual selves, and not only out of respect for the French members from the Province of Quebec, representing a great and free electorate, but because, Sir, I know full well that a harsh or hasty word spoken to-night, however true its text may be, is more calculated to repel than to induce a calm and dispassionate judgment; and so I hope, when I shall have resumed my seat, that I shall be able, on looking back over what I have said, to conclude that I have spoken calmly and dispassionately, although already words have been spoken which have grated somewhat harshly on the ears of hon. gentlemen who may think as I do, and who may vote as I intend to vote on this important question. But if I do give offence to any creed or to any person, I hope hon. gentlemen will see it is because I am now in the years of enthusiasm, because I believe in the assertion of free speech and free thought, knowing, as I do, that in past history these two elements have led to the highest kind of legislation—legislation tending to peace on earth and goodwill towards men. I have said that words have been spoken during this debate which fell unpleasantly on the ears of hon. gentlemen in this House. Need I say to whose language I refer? Need I say that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, more than any hon. gentleman in this House, has, during this debate, made use of language calculated to do serious harm throughout the country at large. I say, Sir, that his language was most fanatical, most inflammatory, and not justified at all by that of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); but, assuming for a moment, which I do not now admit, that the hon. member for North Simcoe did say what, perhaps, in his calmer judgment, he would not have said, two wrongs do not make a right; and, therefore, the hon. the Minister of Public Works ought not to have used the language he did, and, coming from a gentleman in his exalted position, it was most dangerous to the peace and the welfare of the community at large. Bad enough would that language have been had it come from an ordinary member; bad enough would it have been had it come from a member of the Government, sitting behind the hon. gentleman, but, infinitely mischievous was it coming from the Minister of Public Works, who is second in command to the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. The hon. the Minister of Public Works spoke of the loyalty of the French Canadians. I admit, and I rejoice in the fact, that there are no more loyal men in the community than the French Canadians, but I do not propose to admit, as worthy of our admiration—if I may be allowed to speak for a moment in their behalf—the example set us by the hon. the Minister of Public Works in the gentleman to whom he referred, for British Canadians cannot see much loyalty to admire or respect in a gentleman, who one moment rejoined in the tricolor of France, and the next gave three cheers for the British Crown. The loyalty I admire is that of such a man as Montcalm, who fought to the bitter end. The loyalty I admire is that of the French Canadians, who, when tempted by the Americans, refused to yield to temptation and remained loyal to the British Crown. Then, I cannot but recall the remarks made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) when he undertook to criticise the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). He devoted half an hour to abuse and vituperation against the hon. member for West Durham—against the very gentleman whom the right hon. the First Minister asked to come to his assistance in this serious and important matter. What must have been the feelings of the hon. member for East Grey when, after abusing that hon. gentleman, he heard, a day or two later, his leader ask him to come to his assistance, in order to bridge over this difficulty? When I heard the hon. member for East Grey presuming to criticise the course of the hon. member for West Durham, and when I saw the dignified, stately form of the hon. member for West Durham, and contrasted his bearing with that of the hon. member for East Grey, I could not help thinking of the cartoon in which a sinned cat was depicted as hissing and spitting at a great Bengal tiger. But, much as I respect and admire the hon. member for West Durham, exalted as is his ability, I regret to have to say that, in some particulars, I cannot follow him in the speech he addressed to this House a few nights ago. It is not my fault, but my misfortune, and no one regrets it more than I, that the constituency which I have the honor to represent did not send a gentleman of greater ability and of more astute mind to follow the hon. member for West Durham in the vote he proposes to give, and in the language he addressed to this House. But I shall refer to his remarks a few minutes later, when I come to that portion of my speech. For the present I wish to refer to the remarks addressed to this House last night by the hon. the Minister of Justice. It is with pride and pleasure that I see that hon. gentleman rise to address this House. It is with delight that I look forward to a literary treat when I see he intends to speak; and it was with pleasure that I saw him rise to move, as he did move, the amendment which is now before the House. But I confess to a feeling of great disappointment when he sat down; I confess that my idol was struck to the ground, because we found that the Minister of Justice had actually swallowed himself; that he, who within one year since declared that the preamble to an Act was of no moment, now declared that it was of the greatest possible importance. In the debate on the Jesuits' Estates Act, he said:

"Now, let me again, before I leave the subject of the Act, call the attention of the House to the fact that all the argument which has been made with regard to the necessity for disallowance is based on objections to the preamble of the Act. In the history of disallowance in this country, in the history of the disallowance of our own statutes in the mother country—and we know that scores of them were disallowed—the records will be searched in vain to find one which was disallowed because the preamble was not agreeable to anybody. I do not pretend to dispute the statement of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that the preamble is a part of the Act. So is the title a part of the Act, and so are the head-notes of sections; but has anyone ever heard of a Government being asked to disallow an Act because they did not like the wording of the title or of the head-notes. The preamble is understood to be a part of the Act for the purpose of interpreting the Act, but there is nothing in this Act for which interpretation is needed, and I distinguish, in referring to this, the most trivial and technical objection which could be taken to a statute, between those parts of the preamble which assert that certain correspondence has passed, such as this between the Premier and the Cardinal at Rome, and those preambles which recite certain agreements which the statute validates."

Then, further on, he says:

"I assert, without fear of contradiction among people who will consider this matter in a calm and businesslike way, that that part of the preamble which is the only part relevant to the purposes of the Act itself, is utterly harmless, entirely businesslike, free from the slightest suspicion of derogating from any right of Her Majesty, and from the slightest suspicion of infringement of the constitution."

These were the words spoken a short year ago by the hon. the Minister of the Justice, when it appeared to be his purpose to minimise the importance of a preamble to an Act. But it will be in the recollection of hon. members that, on that occasion, the preamble was made, by a special enacting clause, part and parcel of the Act itself; and, therefore, it was that some hon. gentlemen opposed, as I did, the Act, because the preamble which was made a part of it was most offensive. What lawyer in this House will assume that the preamble is of any importance so long as the Act itself is clear and beyond doubt? First, however, let me draw attention to the fact that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), having heard the objections made to the preamble, said at once, in effect, I do not consider it offensive, but, if any hon. gentleman does so, I will consent to have it struck out in Committee. The Minister of Justice, the other night, did not take a particle of notice of the concession or offer made by the hon. member for North Simcoe. It appeared to me that he refused to take notice of that offer or to comment upon it. It appeared to me that he was anxious that this apparently offensive preamble should continue in the Bill, so that he might have some argument and grievance on which to build an argument in this House. I say that there was nothing in the preamble to this Act. I mean by that, that no matter how offensive it might be—and I am not going to argue that just now—this House has no right to consider the preamble so long as the enacting clause is beyond any doubt, and I think there are very few lawyers in this House who will deny the truth of that proposition. I will not venture, young as I am, to address a legal argument to this House coming from myself, and I prefer to read authorities proving my contentions. I shall read from Maxwell on Statutes, an authority which, I think, will be acknowledged as sufficient. On page 56, Maxwell says:

"But the preamble cannot either restrict or extend the enacting part when the language of the latter is plain, and not open to doubt either as to its meaning or its scope."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. BARRON: The hon. member for Bothwell interrupts me by saying "hear, hear"—meaning, I suppose, that the language of the enacting clause is not plain. The hon. gentleman can read English and so can I, and neither he nor anyone else can contend that the enacting clause of this Bill is not so plain that any child can understand it. What is the Bill? Simply that the 110th section of the North-West Territories Act shall be repealed, so there can be no ambiguity about the enacting clause, and therefore the preamble is a matter of no possible moment. The authority I have quoted goes on to say:

"It is not unusual to find that the enacting part is not exactly co-extensive with the preamble. In many Acts of Parliament, although a particular mischief is recited, the legislative provisions extend beyond it. The preamble is often no more than the recital of some of the inconveniences, and does not exclude any others for which a remedy is given by the statute. The evil recited is but the motive for legislation; the remedy may both consistently and wisely be extended beyond the cure of that evil; and if on a review of the whole Act a wider intention than that expressed in the preamble appears to be the real one, effect is to be given to it, notwithstanding the less extensive import of the preamble."

But it may be said that in this case the preamble is more extensive than the enacting clause, and, if I stop there, it would be said that I had not answered the question as to the importance of the preamble. But, on page 62, I find:

"Where the preamble is found more extensive than the enacting part, it is equally inefficacious to control the effect of the latter, when otherwise free from doubt." Then on page 64, this work proceeds:

"It has been sometimes said that the preamble may extend but cannot restrain the enacting part of a statute. But it would seem difficult to support this proposition.  In a word, then, it is to be taken as a fundamental principle, standing, as it were, at the threshold of the whole subject of interpretation, that the intention of the Legislature is invariably to be accepted and carried into effect, whatever may be the opinion of the judicial interpreter of its wisdom or justice. If the language admits of no doubt or secondary meaning, it is simply to be obeyed, without more ado. If it admits of more than one construction, the true meaning is to be sought, not on the wide sea of surmise and speculation, but 'from such conjectures as are drawn from the words alone or something contained in them;' that is, from the context viewed by such light as its history may throw upon it, and construed with the help of certain general principles, and under the influence of certain presumptions as to what the Legislature does or does not generally intend."

Great as my respect is for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), great as is my admiration for the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), much as I respect and admire the hon. the Minister of Justice, I prefer to take the views of Maxwell as to the meaning of the preamble to an Act. Let me give the House an instance where the preamble to an Act proved entirely inefficacious. There was a statute under which the question was raised as to the legality of the Orange Association in England, in or about the year 1832. The preamble to the Act recited that it was "directed against secret or oath-bound societies," and the argument was made that by reason of that statute, 29 George III, and by reason of that preamble, the Orange society was illegal. But it was found that the enacting clause did not go to the extent of the preamble, and the opinion was given by such gentlemen as Sergeant Lewis, Sir Wm. Howe, Sir Robert Gifford, Mr. Gurney, Mr. Gasalee and Mr. Adolphus, men, some of whom afterwards adorned the bench, and reached high positions in the service of their country; all of them gave the opinion that by reason of the enacting clause not going to the extent of the preamble, therefore the society itself was not illegal. Now, the hon. Minister of Justice proposes an amendment, and I must say that it struck me that that amendment was as inconsistent and as incongruous as the far-famed autumn leaves of Vallambrosa; but after all, what does it amount to? It admits the principle of the hon. member for North Simcoe as advanced by his Bill; it admits that the time may come when dual language must be abolished in the North-West; it says in effect that we will not do to-day what we shall do to-morrow; therefore I say that when the Minister of Justice brings in his amendment proposing to do this a few days, months or years hence—perhaps not by this House, but to give others the power to do it—why, Sir, he practically gives away the case to the member from North Simcoe. What is that amendment?

"That all the words after 'Resolved' be expunged, and the following substituted:

"That this House, having regard for the long continued use of the French language in old Canada and to the covenants on that subject embodied in the British North America Act, cannot agree to the declarations contained in the said Bill as a basis thereof, namely, that it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be unity of language amongst the people of Canada. That, on the contrary, this House declares its adhesion to the said covenants and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same."

Now, it seems to me that the hon. member for North Simcoe has never disputed these premises. So far as I am concerned, I here declare that if the member for North Simcoe attempted in any way to interfere with the rights of our fellow-countrymen in the Province of Quebec, so far as the use of the French language is concerned, I would resist that attempt to the utmost. But we have heard it here declared by the member for North Simcoe, time and time again, both in his speech in introducing this Bill and in his speech the other night, that that was not his intention, and, therefore, it seems to me that we may agree with these premises. The amendment of the Minister of Justice then goes on:

Sir, I was prepared to take the objection that that amendment did not go far enough, that it did not include the ordinances, it did not include the statutes, it did not include the proceedings in the courts; but this objection, on my part, was anticipated by the First Minister when he spoke to-night, and explained that it was no matter, that the reason they were not included in this amendment was that the ordinances were published by this Parliament, or were under the control of this Parliament, and, therefore, this amendment went far enough. I confess that that answer of the First Minister is a complete answer to the objection I would have raised to this amendment not including the ordinances and the statutes. But the Bill of the hon. member for Simcoe may be passed, and still the ordinances and statutes will be published in both languages. Why? Because, what the Bill of the member for North Simcoe proposes is simply to repeal the 110th section of the North-West Territories Act, which has nothing whatever to do with the publication of the ordinances and the statutes which, as the First Minister stated this afternoon, were under the control of this Parliament, and therefore would be published in both languages. Now, if the Bill of the member from North Simcoe were to become law the statutes and the ordinances relating to the North-West Territories would still be published in both languages for the reason I have stated. Now, I stated in the opening of my remarks that I would be compelled to refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and in doing so let me state that no one has any idea of the reluctance with which I do so, because I have such an unbounded respect and high admiration for that hon. gentleman, and I am always ready and willing, so far as I can, to bend my will to the will of the hon. member for West Durham, so long as my conscience and my better judgment allow me to do so. But upon this occasion I am unable to do so, and I want to refer to one or two matters upon which he has spoken, and upon which, to my mind, he appeared to me to take up a wrong position. He said that the North-West Council had no right to speak upon this important matter, and he used this language :

"The North-West Assembly had no permission or authority from this Parliament, its creators, to deal with this question at all, and the electors to that Assembly had not before them, when the Assembly was elected, any proposition upon that subject. So, neither was there an authority in the body, nor was there the provision in the constitution."

Now, Mr. Speaker, there can be no possible doubt of the truth of that proposition, nobody ever denied it ; but at the same time, to say that the North-West Territories had no right to speak out upon this matter, is setting forth a proposition which cannot possibly be accepted. Why, Sir, if it is correct that the North-West Council had no right to speak out upon the subject-matter of this Bill, then how much more are we stultifying ourselves in this House in the action we have taken, when, during my short period in Parliament, we have already spoken out upon matters relating to the entire Empire, more especially the subject of Home Rule. Sir, if the hon. member is right in his contention, then we never had the right to do that ; still we did it, and if we did that, with still greater reason may the representatives of the North-West Assembly speak out upon that question which peculiarly affects themselves. But in addition to the fact that the North-West Council have, by the resolution forwarded to the member for North Simcoe and placed upon the Table of this House, spoken out in very strong and plain language upon this subject, we have also other means of information whereby we know that it is the almost unanimous wish of the people of the North-West Territories to abolish the dual language. The hon. member from North Simcoe read, I believe, some telegrams the other night which were questioned by the hurried interruption of the Secretary of State. He read one, I believe, signed by a gentleman named McCaul. I happen to have the pleasure of knowing that gentleman, and I am quite confident, from my knowledge of him, he being a son of the late Dr. McCaul, President of the University of Toronto, that he is utterly incapable of sending such a telegram as was read by the member from North Simcoe, unless the statements contained in it were accurate in every particular. Let me read from the Calgary Herald, February 7, in regard to the dual language in the North-West :

"Here is a system which none of us ever asked for, which was imposed upon the North-West without its pre-knowledge or consent ; a system which we have no need of, which we most decidedly object to as useless and costly ; and the opportunity being offered of assisting a movement to rid the North-West of the system, our duty is plain."

Mr. BARRON.

Then I have a quotation from the Calgary Herald of 13th February, sent by a gentleman whose position ought not to be disputed, because he is one of the Queen's Counsel lately appointed by the Minister of Justice himself. I refer to Mr. James Bruce Smith, of Calgary. He has sent me the Calgary Herald of the 13th February, containing certain resolutions passed at a public meeting at Calgary on the evening before, which I shall read to the House :

"Resolved, That the use of a dual language in official proceedings in the North-West Territories is unnecessary, expensive, and calculated to prevent the complete union of the several nationalities who reside in the Territories, and that to bring about a united Canadian people in this part of the Dominion, the English language alone should be legalised for use in the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly, the courts, and all other official bodies.

"Resolved, That this meeting heartily endorses the action of the Legislative Assembly at Regina, in reference to the dual language, and requests that the petition presented to the Dominion Government in pursuance of such action be granted.

"Resolved, That a copy of the above resolutions be forwarded to D. W. Davis, M.P., Dalton McCarthy, M.P., the Hon. James A. Lougheed, and the Dominion Government, and that D. W. Davis, M.P., be requested to forward in every way the movement for the abolition of French as an official language in the Territories."

I may, perhaps, be allowed by way of interjection, to read a statement prepared by Mr. Cayley, a gentleman well known to the First Minister, who, speaking of the cost of publishing the ordinances, resolutions, proceedings, and so forth, in the French language, says :

"The estimated population of the Territories is 100,000, of whom French and Half-breeds form one-fifth. The cost of French printing in 1883 was $350 ; in 1887 it had risen to $1,000 for printing and $1,000 for translation. The latter cost $3,000 for three years. Of 500 copies of the Territorial ordinances printed, 126 were distributed ; the balance lay on the shelves at Regina, and a large proportion of the 126 went to persons (official and others) who could speak English."

So I think we have sufficiently heard from the North-West Territories as to their views regarding this important matter. But I have heard it said that there have been counter-petitions presented by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), petitions purporting to be very numerous signed, asking for the retention of the dual language. I do not doubt that if any one takes the trouble to examine these petitions he will be very much impressed with some of them. There is a great similarity of writing between the signatures to those petitions, and I think we all know that about the easiest thing in the world is to get up a petition. I recollect perfectly well that petitions were sent here very numerous signed against the Franchise Act, that iniquitous measure to which the First Minister is so strongly pledged, and upon an examination of the petitions it appeared that among the names of those asking for the repeal of the Franchise Act was the name of the First Minister himself. The celebrated Chartist petitions contained the signatures of Her Majesty the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell. We find also that upon an investigation into the question of petitions addressed to the House of Commons in England, it was found that numerous signed petitions contained only two or three different forms of handwriting. I read somewhere that a petition was addressed to ex-President Cleveland, when he was Sheriff in the State of New York, purporting to have been signed by the friends and relatives of the ex-President himself, asking Mr. Cleveland as Sheriff that instead of hanging a criminal he would hang himself. So, I think, we see that very little importance is to be attached to any petitions, no matter how they are prepared, but especially petitions coming from the North-West Territories, containing prayers against the wishes of the representatives of the people there. I think all hon. members must have been greatly impressed with the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I certainly was so impressed. I read it with a great deal of pleasure and care, because, as a literary effort, it could hardly be excelled; but I think that his whole speech from the beginning to the end was based on a wrong assumption. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman started with wrong premises entirely on which he built his argument; that his contention from the beginning to the end of his speech was that it was the intention of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to entirely eradicate the French language.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So he says.

Mr. BARRON. And upon these premises the hon. gentleman built his argument. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, so the hon. member for North Simcoe says. If he says so, I have not heard it; and if he says so now, I will take my seat and not support his Bill, because I say it would be criminal, indeed, to endeavor to shut the mouths entirely of the French people, and eradicate the French language. What did the hon. member for Bothwell say?

"The hon. gentleman proposes to act towards the French population of this country in much the same way that the brother of Robert, Duke of Normandy, acted towards him. He proposes to put out their eyes. He says: 'Forget your mother tongue, forget the orators and statesmen, the novelists and historians, the poets and philosophers of France, and then you will begin to qualify yourselves for becoming good British subjects. If you understand the language, if you appreciate its beauties, if you admire its expression or its wisdom, or its elasticity, then it is impossible that you can be a loyal subject, it is impossible that you can be devoted to the maintenance of the Federal union.' This is the position that the hon. gentleman has taken."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. BARRON. The hon. member for Bothwell says "hear, hear." All I can say is this, that I do not understand that to be the position of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); but, on the contrary, if language means anything, if the English language can be comprehended, I understood him to say the direct opposite—that he has no desire to eradicate the French language or destroy it, but that, simply for purposes of convenience, he desires that in the North-West Territories, as his Bill says, section 110 of the North-West Territories Act, providing that the proceedings be printed in both languages, should be repealed.

An hon. MEMBER. Ask him.

Mr. BARRON. We have asked him; we have his speech.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) not argue that there could be no such thing as national unity without one language, and did he not quote Freeman and Max Müller for the purpose of establishing that proposition?

Mr. McCARTHY. I disclaim having argued any such ridiculous proposition. I argued that community of language tended to unity, not that it was necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That it was necessary.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. BARRON. But the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says it is the same thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say it was the same thing. I stated he said so.

Mr. BARRON. Well, he argues, as I understand, that the proposition of the member for North Simcoe is the same thing almost as if he proposed to reject the French language entirely. That contention reminds me of a story in a little book called "Alice in Wonderland," which all hon. gentlemen who may be happy enough to have families, no doubt, have read. Little Alice was seated at the head of the table, and there were present a hatter, a March hare, and a dormouse. An argument announced by little Alice did not seem quite to suit the hatter, and so the hatter said: "You might just as well say, little Alice, that because 'I see what I eat,' that it is the same thing as 'I eat what I see;'" and the March hare also rejoined: "You might just as well say that because 'I like what I get,' it is the same thing as that 'I get what I like;'" and the dormouse said: "Because, little Alice, I breathe when I sleep, you might say it is the same thing as that I sleep when I breathe;" and the hatter, summing up the propositions, said that little Alice must expect such inconsistent propositions as these, if she was to stand by the argument she advanced a few moments ago. I think if the hatter in the story were in this House he would have addressed the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) regarding his argument in much the same way as he admonished little Alice on the particular occasion I have spoken of. It is impossible for me, not being a historian, to follow the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in his historical crusades throughout the universe. He travelled up and down longitudes and back and forward over latitudes to find authorities to show that it is in the interests of the unity of the Empire and of the country that dual language should be retained. The hon. member introduced us to the Jews, to the Gentiles, and to the Greeks; he then took us among the Parthians, the Medes, the Alamites; then he brought us to dwell in Mesopotamia and Judea, and back again to the reign of Ahasuerus; then he asked us to travel with him mentally among the Italians of Malta, and then jumped across the Atlantic to take us among the French of Quebec. Then he introduced us among the Dutch of the Cape, took us to Calcutta among the Hindoos, and then among the Chinese of Hong Kong. He talked of the Helots of Sparta, and travelled in and out among the Ionian Islands. He took us back to the Roman Empire, and then with one stupendous bound brought us among the Algonquin tribes of the North-West. All this for the purpose of showing us that dual language is not harmful, but that it is, in fact, rather desirable to have a variety of languages, and thereby the unity of the Empire is perpetuated and secured. But, Sir, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), from the Alpha to the Omega of his speech, never said one word about that great example shown us by the country to the south of us—I refer to the United States. Although the hon. gentleman referred to almost every country of the universe, he never once said a solitary word about the example shown us by the United States. There is not a doubt that in that great country their stupendous advance in civilisation and their immense advance in national strength and power, have been to a very great extent secured by the fact that they have one common school system, and one language from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf of Mexico to the boundaries which separate them from Canada. I do not propose to follow the different members of this House who have given us the examples of Germany, Poland, Finland, Russia and other countries. I prefer to take the statement of the hon. gentleman from Albert (Mr. Weldon), a gentleman whom this House recognises as a great student of history and as one more able to speak on this important matter than gentlemen who within the last three or four months have refreshed their memories and secured new information with the object of addressing the House on this question. The member for Albert says :

“ I concur in the opinion that it is desirable, other things being equal, without breaking faith, that government is easier and that friction is less among a people in a country which has a homogeneous people. This remark is made by one whose duty all his life has been to study history, and I venture to say there is not in Europe a single example of a nation with two rival races jealously preserving their own nationality, and nearly equal in strength which is at all commensurate with her resources and population as compared with a homogeneous nation.”

I listened to the remark of the hon. the Premier himself when he replied to the leader of the Opposition—a leader for whom we all have more than ordinary respect and towards whom we entertain feelings akin to love and affection. This makes it all the harder for me to speak on this occasion, for I know that in saying what I do say and in feeling as I do feel, I am not in accord with the views of the Liberal leader ; but, on the contrary, I am doing that, and I am saying that, and I shall vote that way which is contrary to his wishes, and perhaps shall hurt his feelings in a way I would not like. I think that the hon. the leader of the Opposition was right when he said that at all times in the history of Canada the rights of the minority were disregarded by the Conservative party. We have only to go back to the times of the “ Family Compact.” We have only to go back to the seigniorial tenures—the abolition of which the right hon. gentleman took credit for the Conservative party, to prove this. Why, Sir, everything in the way of reform which has been done by the Conservative party (if my reading of history is correct) has been brought about by the bayonet of argument addressed by the Reform party to the Conservative party of this country. The Conservatives have been forced time and time again to do that which they say now they did willingly, but which they only did willingly because it was done for the purpose of preserving themselves in power. We find now that the Conservative party in this House are actually, partially acceding to the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). If the hon. the First Minister regards the rights of the minority, why did he not support the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) ? No ; on the contrary, to please a certain portion of the community, he goes against that which he has spoken for this afternoon, and brings in a clear amendment in favor of abolishing the dual language. The only difference between the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice and the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe is that the hon. Minister refuses to do to-day that which the hon. member for North Simcoe wants done to-day, but he says he will do it to-morrow, which after all, becomes, except in point of time, practically the same thing. The hon. Minister appeals to this House, not to be possessed of animus, not to create racial or creed animosity. We know that the right hon. First Minister is the general-in-chief of Mr. Meredith, who is carrying on a crusade against Mr. Mowat in respect to Separate Schools and the alleged use of French in the schools in Ontario ; and if the right hon. gentleman is consistent, after the language he used this afternoon, he will write to Mr. Meredith and tell him to stop this crusade ; and not only so, but he will support Mr. Mowat in his efforts to do what is right and just to the French minority in that Province.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Follow the example of the Opposition here.

Mr. BARRON. Yes ; he has had to appeal to the hon. leader of the Opposition here, and to the hon. member for West Durham, and they, being possessed of patriotic feeling, desire to help the Premier in this great difficulty ; but the right hon. the Prime Minister cannot be consistent so long as he assists and upholds Mr. Meredith in Ontario in his present crusade, and addresses the House as he did this afternoon. I was surprised, Sir, to hear the right hon. gentleman stigmatise the resolution of the hon. member for North Simcoe as the sting of a gnat. I do not know whether he meant that the resolution itself was a gnat, or that the hon. member for North Simcoe was a gnat ; if he referred to the hon. member, he made a very unhappy reference. Let me tell the House, what the gnat really is—I suppose he meant the common gnat, because that is the animal that does the stinging :

“ The usual special representative of the family is the common gnat, whose blood-sucking propensities have rendered it too well known. It pierces the skin with the needle-like lancets of its rostrum, which are barbed at the tips, and gradually inserts the whole of these organs, at the same time liquifying the blood by some fluid secretion, which apparently adds to the subsequent irritation.”

And the hon. First Minister spoke of the irritation caused by the sting of the gnat. But here is the peculiar part of it. If the hon. member for North Simcoe is a common gnat, he must be a female gnat, because it is only the female gnat that inserts this irritating fluid which is spoken of :

“ The female alone attacks man, and in default of her favorite food will feed on the honey of flowers.”

But there is danger in calling my hon. friend from North Simcoe a gnat, because the gnat has a very numerous family and it increases very rapidly, and if there are very many of them produced, it will be a very serious matter for the Government :

“ One little gnat will produce millions of its kind in a single summer. So short a time is occupied by the entire series of metamorphoses that many generations are perfected in a single season. Their spontaneity and ease in their evolutions is such that they will fly untouched in a shower of rain.”

But here is some little comfort for the hon. First Minister. I think it is the poet Spencer who states that when gnats collect numerous around steeples firemen have been called out, only to discover that the alarm was not for a real fire, but only for the appearance of smoke; so that I may offer this consolation to the First Minister, that, perhaps, all the efforts of the hon. member for North Simcoe will only end in smoke.

Mr. LISTER. You should have left that part out.

Mr. BARRON. I do not say that, but I want to give the First Minister some little comfort under the circumstances. Now, I want to refer to a point made by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), for whom, as a constitutional lawyer, we must have the greatest possible respect, and I refer to it more particularly because the point was also raised by the hon. Minister of Justice. The hon. member in his speech said:

"As I sit down my attention has been called by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) to a constitutional point which, I think, might be very well stated at this juncture, namely, that whatever we desire to do in the North-West Territories in regard to the schools or the Assembly or the printing of papers or judicial proceedings, we have no power under the constitution to deal with the use of the French language in the courts; for section 133 of the British North America Act reads as follows:—

"Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person, or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this Act."

The hon. Minister of Justice advanced the argument that the Bill would not be effectual in destroying the use of the French language in the courts of the North-West Territories, because those courts were courts of Canada established under this Act. I deny that proposition. I say the courts in the North-West Territories are simply local courts. It is true, they were created by the Parliament of Canada; but they are not the courts to which this section refers. It refers to the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court in the city of Ottawa; but, you might as well say that the different courts in the Province of Ontario were courts of Canada under this section, as to claim that the courts of the North-West Territories are courts of Canada established under this Act. Now, Sir, I desire to thank the House for the patient hearing they have given me speaking on this question, which has been discussed for four or five days, and which must be more or less threshed out at all points. But I may be permitted in closing to read from a little work on the Upper Houses published by the late Senator Trudel in 1880, an extract which I think justifies me in coming to the conclusion that it would be well indeed, in the North-West Territories, not to perpetuate the social, the religious, and the national feelings which Mr. Trudel says must be perpetuated in the Province of Quebec. What I am about to read is my own translation, and, therefore, I read it subject to correction. At page 6 Senator Trudel says:

"And if the Federal idea prevailed, it was owing to the Province of Quebec, which at no price would have accepted 'Legislative Union.'"

"In the case of Quebec, there was a host of social, religious and national distinct interests, which she could not dream, for an instant, of entrusting to a majority of race, creeds, and customs essentially different from those of the greater part of her population, however well disposed this majority might be towards us."

"That she would not have desired, on any consideration, to accept such a union, our Province has evidenced by contending, with all the energy of men fighting to the death, against representation based on population."

"The Federal system might have been organised by concentrating, under the general Government, all matters of pre-eminent importance, or of superior social and economic interest, leaving to the control of the Local Legislatures matters of inferior moment, in such a way as to leave them only large municipal councils."

"But then Quebec would have refused to enter the Union, because this federation would have been equivalent, so far as she was concerned, to a Legislative Union, and then, good-bye to Confederation!"

"Because it was not in matters of lower importance, and of merely municipal interest, that our Province wished to have under its sole control. What Quebec desired, was to see placed under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature, and consequently under its exclusive protection, all its interests the most dear in a social, religious and national point of view, that is to say, the greater portion of interests of importance, which it is of consequence that a people should preserve inviolate."

The sentiments and the views expressed in that article I think are such we ought not to desire to perpetuate in the North-West Territories; and I—therefore, say, in conclusion, that I am glad to be able to support the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe, believing that if there is anything offensive in it, it will be amended in Committee, so as to make it satisfactory to the keenest sensibilities of any hon. gentleman in this House.

Mr. COOK. Some days ago, when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), was making an arrangement with the right hon. the First Minister to set apart a day for the discussion of this question, I stated that I would not be able to be present on account of an engagement which I had, and would, therefore, be prevented, if the question then came to a vote, giving expression to my opinions before this House; and I took occasion to state, in view of this possibility, that I intended to vote against the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe. Fortunately, however, I was present last night to give my first vote on this question. I may add that as the hon. member for North Simcoe was engaged in a matter pertaining to his profession in which I happened to be on the side opposite to him, and which was postponed by arrangement, he is here, I may say, at my will. But the hon. gentleman stated, when I declared my intention of voting against his Bill, that I had made up my mind to vote without hearing the discussion. Well, the hon. gentleman forgot that he had made a speech in this House, and several speeches in the country, foreshadowing his measure, and he forgot also that I had read the Bill and the preamble, and was, therefore, in a position to come to a decision. The Bill of itself, without the preamble, was sufficient ground for me, without hearing any further discussion—without hearing any of the speeches made—to determine to vote against the Bill; because I am opposed to the extermination of the French language in any part of the Dominion. I must confess that I was somewhat surprised when I first heard of the hon. gentleman's intention to move in this direction. This discussion has taken a very wide range. It has travelled from one end of the world almost to the other, and references have been made during it to questions affecting many other countries, somewhat similarly situated to ours. I do not propose, even if I deemed myself sufficiently versed in historical knowledge to do so, to follow hon. gentlemen who have so ably discussed this question from a historical point of view, but shall confine myself more particularly to our own country and to the antecedents of my hon. friend from North Simcoe. I have said that I was considerably surprised to see my hon. friend moving in this direction; for I well remember the time when he was bowing the knee to the French people of his constituency, and professed to be as true and loyal a supporter of theirs as any man in this House or out of it. I well remember the time when that hon. gentleman, instead of being in line with this crusade against race and religion, which has been mapped out by the Mail newspaper, and is supported by a few of his friends throughout the country, took the opposite course; for I well remember when that hon. gentleman, one Saturday night in his constituency, when he found he could not reach Toronto the next day, Sunday, engaged a special train to go to that city, and arrived there in the morning, in order to interview Archbishop Lynch on Sunday, to obtain His Grace's support in that county. I well remember then how loyal the hon. gentleman was to a paternal ancestor of his of a more remote date than his immediate paternal ancestor, who supported a different religion from the one the hon. member for North Simcoe does, or the one his father did. The hon. gentleman was then holding out his hand to a certain class; or it might be said that he was bowing the knee to Rome, and at the same time, on the other hand, bowing the knee to Ulster. In each case he was true to his blood. In the one he was true to his paternal ancestor of a more remote date, and in the other to his father. Therefore he could, with some show of fairness, say that he was true to both of his paternal ancestors. I do not know how far the hon. gentleman went himself in both directions; but I know that in the contests in which I had the honor of being his opponent in North Simcoe, my hon. friend did receive the support of a large number of the Roman Catholics and of the French people in that riding. But the gerrymander has removed a certain portion of these people from his riding, and he is not now quite so dependent on them as he was on that occasion.

An hon. MEMBER. Not so dependent.

Mr. COOK. Not so dependent. I believe they were all gerrymandered out. I have no doubt hon. members will recollect the Act that was passed by the First Minister, by which he placed my hon. friend in a safe Tory constituency, but I warn my hon. friend from North Simcoe to look out for his political hide at the next election. Formerly he had the support, as I have said, of the French, the Catholics and the Orangemen, and so well did he carry on this warfare, and so ingeniously did he proceed, that he had a member of his family leading the singing in a Roman Catholic church at mass every Sunday. Then we have the hon. gentleman's exemplification of the way in which he did things. You all remember the way in which he acted in reference to the dismissal of Mr. Letellier from the Lieutenant Governorship of the Province of Quebec. At that time the hon. gentleman's heart was still "true to Poll." He stood by his friends, he stood by the Ultramontanes, and assisted to dislodge the Lieutenant Governor of that Province. Now, what is the meaning of this crusade? There are a great many opinions given by a great many different people. Some say that the hon. gentleman is in league with the First Minister. Some say it is a Tory dodge, that he is appealing to the Ontario portion of the electors and that some other parties are appealing to the Quebec portion of the electors of this Dominion so as to prepare a jumble for the next election. I do not pretend to say which opinion is the correct one. It is stated that a certain newspaper would like to have some assistance from places in high quarters, the newspaper which, within a few years, has been feeding pretty liberally at the Tory crib, since the hon. gentlemen have been in power, even since they have pretended to abandon it, the Mail newspaper, and have built up the Empire, in order to show that they had the two organs. Now, they have the two organs. The hon. the leader of the Government is backed up by the Empire; the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has the Mail at his back; and it is said that the Mail demands that a new party should be formed to force matters upon the attention of the Government; that is, that they should have the balance of power in this House. We know what use would be made of it by some gentlemen in this House. I am sure my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Barron) would not be a party to that, though he criticised very freely the speeches of some of the members in this House. They were principally on the Liberal side, because he did not find anything in the speeches on the other side worth criticising, and he wanted to make a speech. Then there is another theory. The Mail newspaper had an agent at Washington not long since, and it appears that he was giving some extraordinary views and statements to the Congressional Commission who were sitting there at that time. This gentleman, who is the editor of the Mail newspaper, declared that there was a strong annexation feeling in this country, and even went so far as to say that it would be found in this House. When the loyal motion of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) was voted upon and unanimously adopted here, I think that Commission would come to the conclusion that the statements of that man were fallacious. I must say that I would have preferred if that loyal resolution had contained a clause showing that we were to be more loyal to Canada. I think some hon. gentlemen need a little training on the score of loyalty to Canada. I think a little advice on that subject would not hurt the leader of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like to have the advice.

Mr. COOK. I think the right hon. gentleman who supported that resolution, would do better to show a little more of that loyalty to his own country which he expressed in his speech. I regret exceedingly that I have to refer to one matter which I dislike very much to refer to. I have to refer to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), a gentleman who, I admit, stands high in this country, a man of great intellectual ability, a man who made a very strong and well reasoned speech from his point of view. It was not such an inflammatory speech as that made by my hon. friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in introducing his Bill. That was a speech which was intended to set the people by the ears, to set the Protestant element against the Roman Catholic element, to throw a torch into the magazine, a speech which showed that the man who wanted to get his Bill through the House had no other object than that. I cannot believe that any man of common sense—and we know that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has a great deal of common sense—would have introduced the Bill in the way in which he did introduce it without such a motive. But my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) referred to the French Half-breeds and held them responsible for the rebellion. I remember when that hon. gentleman stood up in this House, and made a charge against the Government in that respect, and exonerated the Half-breeds from the charge of bringing about the rebellion. The hon. gentleman should not attempt to remove so important a matter from the shoulders of a Government who are distinctly responsible for that, and to place it on the shoulders of the Half-breeds who had been suffering for seven long years without obtaining redress.

Mr. CHARLTON. I referred to the Half-breeds of the North-West as having been in rebellion, and I said the question to be settled was whether they were more to be blamed or the hon. gentlemen who sat upon the Treasury benches.

Mr. COOK. I read the hon. gentleman's speech, and thought I was correct, but of course I accept his statement. I regret also to have to refer to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. I have been supporting the cause which he supports. I believe it is the proper and just course to take in this House; but I am afraid that, notwithstanding the usual calmness of the hon. gentleman, he was too inflammatory on that occasion. It was not the words so much as the manner, and the manner was very bad. The hon. gentleman should be a little more cautious, and if he had only read carefully and pondered over the speech made by the Governor General at Quebec, when he received the committee of Equal Righters there, and told them to be tolerant and go home and be good boys and not to do it again—if he had only used a little tolerance in his language, I think it would have been better for his cause in this House. I am very sorry to say that I believe that it was the means of diverting from the cause he has at heart some members on both sides of this House—although I will not say so, because, probably, I am not entitled to say much on that point. Sir, I would just refer, while we are upon this French question, to the fact that a great many members in this House and people throughout the country who read the Mail newspaper, speak of the French in very slighting terms—I will not say the members of this House, but I know that many people in this country speak of the French in such terms. Now, I have been associated with the French more or less all my life, and it is not necessary for me to vindicate their habits and course of life, or anything of that sort, or their motives. But there is one thing that we owe to the French people of this country, and it is a debt of gratitude, after passing the loyal resolution to Her Majesty that we had the privilege of doing here a short time ago. If it had not been for the United Empire loyalists, of which I am a lineal descendant, and the French people, we would not have any Canada to-day, we would have been annexed to the United States, and we would not have had the privilege of passing that loyal resolution. Sir, nothing good can come from the attacks upon the French, nothing but bad blood, rebellion and civil war. As the Premier said to-night, supposing anything of that sort should arise, where would we be? Why, Sir, we would be nowhere; we would be nowhere as Canadians, as a British dependency; we would be in the hands and in the arms of the United States in a very short time.

Mr. COOK. The very hon. gentlemen who are now screaming out at the top of their voices, the very men who claim to be patriots in this country to-day, are the men who would drive Canada to annexation. I do not say they would do it intentionally, but they would do it in ignorance of the facts of the case. We do not want a repetition in this country of the difficulties that have beset Ireland for the last few centuries; we do not want any of their fire-brands in this country, we do not want any of those agitators coming over here to ruin our country. The Secretary of State has passed an Act to prohibit the Chinese; perhaps he had better include gentlemen of this class, gentlemen who are agitators; but my hon. friend, when he was imported, was so small that we could not have told whether he was an agitator or not. Now, Sir, it has been said that the Premier of this country is very desirous that the Local Government of Ontario should not be sustained. It has been stated that "Mowat must go." That is an old saying, an old by-word, but as yet he has not gone. Now, some people are wicked enough to say that even Mr. Meredith is included in this controversy. We know he made a speech on this very line in the city of London; but, if he takes that ground, I will guarantee that he will not be successful at the next general election. Sir, it has been stated by some of our friends—and I differ with the greater number of my friends in that respect—that we, as a party, are provincial rights men. We go for provincial rights, but, Sir, I draw the line at this race question; most of my friends do not. I say that if this House passes that Bill, and difficulties arise in the North-West, the minority in Lower Canada may be in jeopardy some time, and not very far off, because we know the intention of the hon. gentleman. However he may disclaim his intention to the House, we know from his organs, and from his speeches all along the line, that unless his words belie his meaning, he proposes to exterminate the French language throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. Now, suppose that provincial rights were extended to cover this question of race. In Lower Canada the English language might be expunged, and what would be the result? The result would be that the English people of Ontario would not submit to that, and civil war would be sure to take place, and the result would be disastrous. Why, Sir, this is a wicked thing, when you come to look at it. When you come to look at it in all its phases, when you see that the hon. gentleman intends to set race against race, and religion against religion, and when all men will have hold of each other's throats, you see that it is a wicked thing. Now, I do not like the motion of the Minister of Justice, because this question is only to be left until the next election in the North-West, and then a decision is to be given, and I believe hon. gentlemen know pretty well what that decision is going to be. They want to put off the evil day, and I believe that it would have been better to have met the thing boldly and moved the six months' hoist, and so do away with the matter altogether. I believe that is the best way to put down these fanatics. I was somewhat amused at the hon. leader of the Government this afternoon. He was a very bold man this afternoon, he was very courageous, and he held the sword over his head and defied those gentlemen who are opposing him in reference to this matter. But he was quite mild the other day. When he made his two speeches before, they were just as tame and mild as a sucking dove's speech. But the hon. gentleman was quite bold to-day, for, after making arrangements, by which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would help him through the difficulty, he gets up in his place and he declares here: "We will stand or fall by this, we are going to make this question"—well, he did not say a Government question, but he meant that. His speech reminded me very much of an Irishman that came to this country when it was first being settled. One day there came a bear into the house while the Irishman and his wife were there. He ran up stairs and cried out "Biddy, kill the bear." So Biddy killed the bear, and he came down very courageous, and when the neighbors came in he says: "Look what Biddy and I did: we killed the bear." Now, the Irishman had a good deal more—I will not say honor, but he had a good deal more generosity; for, although he took credit to himself, he gave Biddy a share of the credit. But the hon. gentleman took all the credit to himself; he did not even give my hon. friends on this side of the House any share of it whatever, and I hope before this debate is through the hon. gentleman will announce, so it may go to the country, that he did not do this thing all alone. I am a great admirer of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and always have been so. I know he is a great lawyer and an astute politician; it is claimed that he is a man of undoubted pluck and determination. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said the hon. member for North Simcoe was full of pluck and determination, and although he had been castigated by almost all the members of the House, he had never yielded. The hon. member has not shown so much pluck in the past as the member for Northumberland imagines. If we refer to the past we find that on one occasion he introduced into this House a Bill to prevent people being injured on railways. He was not successful, and he did not introduce it the next year. Determination is shown by a man keeping introducing the same measure year after year, if it is a good one until he succeeds. Next, the hon. gentleman introduced a Bill for the appointment of a railway commission. He was sat upon by the Premier, and he finally withdrew it. Then he had some litigation for a gentleman in the matter of patents, and he thought it would be a good thing to regulate the Patent Office. He introduced a Bill for that purpose, but the late Minister of Railways sat on him, and that was the last of the Bill. I do not know how often the hon. gentleman has been sat upon in this House.

Mr. Cook.

It is also said by people outside that the hon. gentleman endeavored, in his legal profession, to make people believe that he ran the late Minister of Justice, and that he had a great deal of influence with him; but since the present Minister came into office his influence has vanished, and that is one of the reasons why he is not now in happy accord with the Government. It has been stated by the Minister of Public Works—I have great confidence in the Minister of Public Works, although he sometimes gets a little excited; I have great confidence in his integrity, and I do not believe he would wilfully make an untruthful statement to the House; the hon. gentleman stated that all the French printing for the North-West Territories had cost only $400 a year, and he was so magnanimous as to say that if any one objected to the amount, he would put his hand into his pocket and pay it every year. That was a generous proposition from the hon. Minister, and no doubt he is sincere and will do it. Let me refer, for a moment, to the St. Catharines Milling Company. They obtained, from this Government, a license to cut timber in a territory where they had no right, and the result was they had considerable litigation, and the Government stood sponsors to the company for their costs. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was selected solicitor for the company, and he received a total sum of $33,500 for legal expenses. The hon. gentleman is afraid that this country will be ruined because of the enormous expenditure going on; but I will give the hon. gentleman this assurance, that at the rate the hon. Minister of Public Works stated as the cost, the French printing in the North-West could be maintained for 84 years for the costs in that suit. The hon. gentleman wants to do something as a patriot, and I have no doubt he is sincere in his wish. I was a little impressed, however, with the story, which is going round, that there is collusion between the hon. the First Minister and the hon. gentleman, because the hon. the First Minister never said an unkind word to him, or even had a look of scorn; in fact, he was as pleasant with the hon. gentleman as if they were both sailing in the same boat. It looked very much as if the report was true; still, one may be deceived by the very fact that hon. gentlemen opposite look so pleasantly confident, especially when they have got into a tight place. I have known some of the antecedents of the hon. member for North Simcoe. We had four contests in North Simcoe, and probably we would have had another, except for the fact that the hon. the First Minister gerrymandered the constituency. I am very sorry he did so, because I would have liked to have beaten the hon. gentleman just once more. In almost every address made to the electors by the hon. gentleman during the time I was an opposing candidate he always strongly advocated the cause of temperance. Although he was a great temperance advocate, almost the first thing he did on coming into this House was to introduce an intemperate Bill, which he had no right to introduce, and which cost the country a quarter of a million of dollars. In order to be able to estimate the value of an hon. gentleman's promises and pledges you must know the man, and judge what he will do by his past conduct. Some people also say that the hon. gentleman has not been received as kindly in court as formerly. It is also well known that in those four contests large sums were expended, and the hon. gentleman thought he should be reimbursed in some way. He was once president of the Pacific Junction Railway, but he abandoned that position and is president no longer. He received only $3,000 a year salary; but it is stated that three or four gentlemen friends of his divided somewhere in the neighborhood of $700,000 or $800,000 between them. That should satisfy almost any individual, particularly one who, like the hon. gentleman, is in favor of economy. The hon. gentleman has stated that there is a parti national in Quebec, led by Mr. Mercier, and he is supported by the leader of the Opposition in this House. But what is the hon. gentleman himself endeavoring to do? He is trying to raise a parti national in Ontario. Is that not the true object of the hon. gentleman? We desire a great national party in Canada, but the hon. gentleman is not going to obtain it in that way. We all desire to have a great national party in this country and one great Canadian nation, and I hope the time will come when we will untie the apron strings and go out on our own account, but at present it is best to maintain our present relations. The hon. gentleman is not going to work in the right way. As he wishes to be leader of a great national party, he should not collect around him a small circle of Protestants of Ontario and a few Conservatives and endeavor to draw them away from his leader. That is not the correct course, and the hon. gentleman should be actuated by higher motives in such matters. He should endeavor to earn a reputation as a great constitutional lawyer and legislator. His name should be handed down to posterity, but I am afraid he is sailing in a boat that will carry him down there degraded. Much has been said about the different creeds in this country, about Protestants, Orangemen and Roman Catholics. But I say this, that in Quebec the English speaking people are one-tenth of the entire population, and yet they have ten English speaking members in their House. I think that is a very liberal provision on the part of the French Canadian people towards the minority. In Ontario, where we have a large Protestant majority, one-sixth of the population are Roman Catholics, and yet there are only six Roman Catholics in the Ontario Legislature. It appears to me that there is a good deal more liberality among the Roman Catholic Frenchmen of Lower Canada than there is among the Protestant English speaking population in Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. COOK. That is my view of the matter, and I am glad to know that the hon. leader of the Government endorses what I say, because when I have got such a distinguished backer as he is I need not be afraid of any man who may oppose me in my constituency. If that right hon. gentleman would only support me in Simcoe next election I will guarantee that I will double my majority, but I suppose I can hardly hope for that. I see the right hon. gentleman rubs the palm of his hands as if he intimated something about money. Well, I will tell the right hon. gentleman a little secret. There is a Tory living in East Simcoe who told a certain gentleman that he knew of $20,000 which came to that constituency, and he was pretty certain it came from Ottawa. There was in addition $5,000 given by the Dodge lumber firm and $1,500 raised by local subscriptions, so that his friends had $26,500 against me in the last election. The right hon. gentleman knows so well how these things are done that he cannot afford to impute motives to others. Of course we will say openly and fairly that when we meet a man of that sort we do not intend to give him many advantages over us. If he endeavors to fight us with such weapons we are ready to meet him with the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. COOK. I don't wish to be understood as using this in the plural, and, therefore, I must not say "we." At all events I trust that there will be sufficient patriotism among the members of this House, to squelch these attempts of the member for North Simcoe for all time to come.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Mr. Speaker, whilst I strongly object to the Bill which is now before the House, yet, like most of the gentlemen who have already addressed you, I have still stronger objections to its preamble. Although the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in the second speech he delivered in this debate, has told us that he would assent to have that preamble set aside if it did not suit the House, and in order as he said not to offend the susceptibility of the French members, yet the fact remains that the Bill would be voted, on account of the principle laid down in the preamble, and invoked by the hon. member and propounded in his speeches. It has been already said, and correctly said, by several hon. gentlemen, that if you couple the preamble of that Bill with the speeches the hon. gentleman has delivered in this House, and outside of this House, you are forcibly led to the conclusion that this Bill must be regarded as only the first step in a crusade against the French Canadian race. Any man who reads that preamble, and the speeches of the hon. gentleman in connection with the Bill, can come to no other conclusion than that the hon. member does not intend to confine his present course to the North-West Territories. By the enacting clause of this Bill he proposes to suppress the French language in these Territories, but by the spirit he has evinced, and by the speeches he has delivered, he gives notice, as I understand it, that it is his intention to continue the same warfare against the French language wherever it is spoken in this Dominion. In his second speech in this House, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) complains that he has been misunderstood, that his speeches have not been fairly read, and that his intentions have been misinterpreted. The hon. gentleman, however, has repudiated nothing of what he had previously said, and told us that whilst he admitted that the time might come when the French language should be suppressed in the Parliament of Canada, yet he would not interfere with vested rights which are guaranteed to the people of Quebec by the British North America Act. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten so soon the bearing of the speech which he pronounced in introducing this Bill? Has he forgotten the meaning of the speeches he has delivered on this question outside this House, and notably his speech at Stayner, in which he is reported to have said:

"That the present generation would have to settle this question by the ballot-box, or, otherwise, that the next generation would settle it at the point of the bayonet."

Did not this language mean that if the French Canadians succeeded during the present generation in preventing by the ballot-box their language from being suppressed in Canada, the admirers of the hon. gentleman in the next generation, if they fulfil their duties, would have to take up arms to subdue, to drive into the sea, or to exterminate these odious French Canadians? Let the hon. member and his principal follower in the House, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), succeed in their present attempt to suppress the French language in the Territories, and I venture to say that before long you will see them, assuming the presumptuous attitude of conquerors inflated by victory, incite an agitation in the country for the suppression of the French language in the Parliament of Canada, and at the same time preparing their arms to carry the war into the Province of Quebec, for the purpose of abolishing the French language in the Legislature of that Province, in its courts of law, in its schools, and wherever it is taught or spoken in Canada. Sir, during last summer, in a speech which I addressed to a number of my constituents, I uttered a few words which I will take the liberty of repeating here as an answer to the threats against the French Canadians, contained in the speeches of the hon. member for North Simcoe. After having given some explanations with regard to the Jesuit question, which had been debated in this House last Session, I referred to the threats uttered by the hon. member for North Simcoe in his Stayner speech, and also to newspaper articles containing the most violent, abusive, injurious, offensive, provoking and threatening language against my French Canadian countrymen; and I told them: My friends, notwithstanding those threats, I strongly believe that we have nothing to fear from that quarter. The enjoyment of our rights and our peculiar institutions is guaranteed to us by the constitution of this country, and by what I consider to be a greater power—the good sense and love of liberty and fair play of the vast majority of our English speaking fellow-countrymen. They will never permit the peace of this country to be disturbed and its prosperity jeopardised by any fanatical action. But, I added, after all, we do not know what may happen in the life of a people, and history teaches us that sometimes damogues have succeeded by appeals to passion and popular prejudice in throwing their country into revolutionary convulsion and causing a great deal of evil. If such should be our misfortune, if this country should be thrown into a civil war, we should be placed in the cruel alternative, either of submitting cowardly to the annihilation of our race, and all the institutions that are dear to our hearts, or of standing up like men in their defence; we should have to appeal to our courage and to the protection of the British flag. But if chance should turn against us, if the British flag should be found to be powerless to offer us adequate protection, then, my friends, there would be no other alternative offered to us than to turn our eyes towards the stars and stripes, which would, I believe, offer to us full protection against the rage of our enemies. Sir, for having uttered these words I was denounced by part of the public press of this country as an annexationist; but I hold that there is nothing in the language I used to justify the charge. An annexationist I am not, although I am one of those who believe that this country is not destined to remain forever in the clothes of childhood. Sir, I do not hesitate to say that it would be my pride to see my country taking rank among the nations of the globe. But the annexationists, those who push towards annexation, are to be found among those turbulent men who, being never satisfied with the actual state of the country, would not hesitate, for the satisfaction of a mere prejudice, to throw their country into a civil war, which could end in nothing less than the breaking down of Confederation and the dismemberment of this country. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Simcoe finds fault with the French Canadians because they endeavor to perpetuate their language and their literature, while he says they should understand that the best interests of the country require that they should abandon their own language and speak the English language. Sir, does he suppose that the French Canadians, just to suit his fancy, will become renegades to their language, to their literature and to their peculiar institutions? Indeed, Sir, they cultivate their own language, but at the same time they do their best to acquire a knowledge of the English language, knowing, as they do, that any man to-day, who wants to do some business, must know that language; and you have a good evidence of this fact in this Chamber, where the French representatives speak the English language tolerably well. No young man in the Province of Quebec considers that his education is sufficiently complete until he can speak, read and write the English language. But the hon. member considers that the French language in this country is a danger to the state, and that so long as the French Canadians are allowed to cultivate their language they cannot be assimilated to the Anglo-Saxon element of our community. On this point the hon. gentleman has been well answered by several hon. members who mentioned different countries where two or three official languages exist, and which, notwithstanding that fact, are inhabited by a homogeneous people living together in a perfect political union. But the hon. gentleman seemed to cherish particularly the policy suggested by Lord Durham in his celebrated report on the cause of the troubles in 1837. It is said in that report that the cause of those troubles was not misgovernment, but a feeling of hostility existing between the two races; and Lord Durham suggested as a remedy that the French language should be suppressed as an official language in Lower Canada. How long did that policy last? The right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government informed the House the other night that it lasted but during the short period of three or four years, and that it was set aside at the request or the prayer of those who were most interested in the question, the Parliament of Canada, under the Union, in which there were as many English as French members. Now, supposing such a policy were adopted to-day, how long do you think, Sir, it would last? No one could tell, but every one can see the disastrous consequences which would follow its adoption. Sir, the policy suggested by Lord Durham proved to be an unsound policy, and the wisdom of his advice was as disputable as the accuracy of some of the facts related in his report. To say that the cause of the trouble in 1837 was an existing feeling of hostility between the two races is a misconception of the case. If such had been the cause of the troubles then, would we have seen among the leaders of the popular movement which then took place such good Englishmen as Wilfred Nelson, Robert Nelson, O'Callaghan, D. S. Brown, and others? No; the real cause of the trouble was well stated by the hon. the Minister of Public Works and by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. The Governor General surrounded by a clique of evil advisers—office holders—attempted to dictate to the Legislative Assembly in that Province. He went so far as to spend the public money without the assent of that Assembly, and in that unconstitutional course he was supported by the then Legislative Council, whose members, on account of their unpatriotic conduct, were branded by the appellation, which then became so popular, of "vieillards malfaisants," which may be translated by the term "mischievous old men." The report of Lord Durham, it is well known, was never considered in Lower Canada as an impartial document with regard to the French Canadians. The hon. member for North Simcoe has made an assertion from which I entirely dissent. He has said that the French Canadians are not a sympathetic people, that they are exclusive in their affections, that they do not sympathise with their English-speaking countrymen; and, in support of that proposition, he has quoted, from I do not know what obscure authority, an extract stating that the Irish Catholic and the French Canadian, although they profess the same religious faith—a circumstance which ought to create a bond of union and of mutual sympathy between them—are the bitterest enemies? If there was a time when a feeling of hostility existed between these two elements of our people it was when they were first brought face to face, and before they knew each other. But those days have long since gone by, and from the moment that those people began to know each other better, and to appreciate each other better, they have lived on terms of the best friendship, and, wherever they are seen living today in the same settlements, at least in the Province of Quebec, their relations are of the most cordial character. It is well known that their sons and daughters frequently intermarry. But, while I am on this point, let me indulge for a moment in reminiscences of the past, by referring to a solemn period of our history, when the French Canadians displayed towards their Irish brethren the feelings of the most devoted sympathy and benevolence. Men of my age, and older than I, in this House, can well remember that during the summer of 1847 we had an Irish immigration into the Province of Quebec. These immigrants were landed on our shores in the most destitute condition, the one-half of them suffering from that very contagious disease, typhoid fever. When they were landed in our harbors, a feeling of stupefaction overcame the sympathies of our people for a moment. What were they to do? Were they to send back to the ocean that importation of death into their midst? Did not the supreme law of self-preservation seem to demand that? But suddenly the voice of those men who for nearly nineteen centuries have been repeating the words of the Gospel and preaching the divine teachings of charity was heard. Those immigrants are our brethren, exclaimed the French Canadian pastors; they must be received and they must be assisted. Immediately people of all classes rushed to the assistance of the poor destitute immigrants, and many of them were themselves stricken down by the dire contagion. Priests, Sisters of Charity, physicians, the mayor of a great city, and a number of other people fell victims to their devotedness, but the poor immigrants received the assistance which their destitute condition demanded. A large number were preserved to life, and those who died received in their last moments all the consolation that can be given by Christian benevolence. And those numerous children who, by the deaths of their parents, became orphans, what became of them? They were adopted by our citizens, who raised them as the members of their own families. It has been my good fortune to be acquainted with some of them, who, thanks to the education given them by their protectors, occupy to-day distinguished positions in our social life. Ah, the French Canadians are a sympathetic people, endowed with generous hearts and instincts, and magnanimous qualities. I regret the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) does not know them, for if he did know them as they are he would change his present attitude towards them, as he would soon find his own heart kindle with feelings of the warmest admiration for that noble people. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in the two speeches he has delivered in this House since the beginning of the debate has referred each time to Mr. Mercier, and he seems to look upon Mr. Mercier as the founder in the near future of a French Canadian nation on the shores of the St. Lawrence. In order to justify his apprehensions in this regard he reports a few words which were stated to have fallen from the lips of Mr. Mercier in a speech which he pronounced at a banquet in the city of Quebec on the celebration of St. John's Day, the 24th June last. Mr. Mercier is reported to have appealed on that occasion to his countrymen, to have endeavored to induce them to give up the old party flags of rouge and bleu and to rally under the tricolor, which would lead this country to the brilliant destiny which it would reach in the future, or some words to that effect. To draw from these words an inference that Mr. Mercier intends that an independent French Canadian nation can be founded in the Province of Quebec is to give to these words a greater significance and a greater importance than they have. No serious man in the Province of Quebec would think of the realisation of such an idea, which he would consider as nothing but Utopian; and Mr. Mercier himself is too intelligent and too clever a man to have meant in pronouncing those words that a nation could be established in the Province of Quebec independent of the other Provinces of this Dominion, and independent of England. But we know that all men, on the occasion of the celebration of great festivals, are apt, more or less, in the course of a speech delivered at a dinner in answer to toasts, to give expression to some sentiment with no other purpose than to provoke applause, and I do not believe that the words which flowed from the lips of Mr. Mercier on that occasion have any other importance. The hon. member has spoken of the National party, and, in his second speech, looking at the French members sitting on this side of the House, whom he called the band of Nationalists, he stated that he did not expect and did not want any sympathy from them. Well, that is a matter of mere personal inclination, and surely no man would be guilty of such folly as to expect from his fellow men more sympathy than he feels disposed to grant in return, and thereby inspire. But the hon. member seemed to think that this National party has been formed in opposition to the English speaking population of the Dominion. There is nothing of the kind. It is well known that Mr. Mercier, when in Opposition, led the Liberal party in the Quebec Legislature, and that, a short time before the elections of 1886, he made an alliance with a certain portion of the old Conservatives, who had repudiated their former leaders; but, as these gentlemen would not call themselves Liberals, they took the name of National Conservatives. Since Mr. Mercier has taken possession of power, as he had one wing of his party composed of Liberals and another wing composed of those who called themselves National Conservatives, they agreed to call the party in Quebec the National party. But that has no other significance or bearing. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) must not think that the old Liberal party in the Province of Quebec is dead. Our leader, our illustrious leader in this House, still calls himself a Liberal. I see my colleagues sitting around me, representing the Province of Quebec, who still call themselves Liberals. I see my old friend from the county of Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), who has been in Parliament for about twenty-five years, who has been a Minister of the Crown, and who still continues to call himself a Liberal and not a Nationalist. Here is my venerable friend the member for St. Johns (Mr. Bourassa), who has passed thirty-six years in Parliament. What does he call himself? A Liberal. He was born a Liberal, he has lived a Liberal, and, depend upon it, he will die a Liberal. Your humble servant, after twenty-two years passed in this House, still continues, and intends to continue in the future, to call himself a Liberal. The old Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, as represented in this House, still exists, and you may be sure that it will not disappear from the sphere of action. Before I sit down I want to refer to a regret expressed by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in his first speech on this question. He said he regretted, or it was to be regretted, that England, after the cession, had adopted so liberal a policy towards the French Canadians; and, if another policy had been adopted, we would not have in this country the evils which he thought were created by the existence of two official languages. On this question he was well answered by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who told him that if a different policy had been adopted this country would not have long remained a British colony. Sir, the liberal policy of England on that occasion conquered the hearts of the French Canadians, and in her days of trial they stood by her and remained faithful to their allegiance. Less than twenty years afterwards they resisted the seducing appeals of the American patriots and of General La Fayette to join in the great revolutionary movement for liberty and independence. In 1812 the same temptation was again held out to them, and again they resisted those allurements; they did more, they gallantly shed their blood on battle-fields for the honor of the British flag, and they clung to England with more than filial affection. Now, Sir, I ask, after these great deeds, what more could be done, what remains to be accomplished by French Canadians, to prove their loyalty, when I find that it is still suspected by such men as my hon. friend from North Norfolk? Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion, that, notwithstanding this passing storm, I do not despair of the future of my country. I have faith, I have confidence in the good sense, in the practical common sense, of the great majority of my English speaking fellow-countrymen. I have no doubt that when an opportunity is given they will rally together to defeat the nefarious designs of those who do not hesitate to swing the torch of discord in this country. Sir, since the different Provinces of this country have been brought into a federal union we have accomplished great things, upon which we look with a just feeling of pride. We will continue to work together, English Canadians as well as French Canadians, to promote the prosperity of our country, the welfare of our countrymen, endeavoring to deserve, at the same time, by our considerate action, the moderation of our views, and, if I may say so, the wisdom of our conduct, the blessings and gratitude of future generations.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I should not have attempted to rise at this late period of the debate did I not feel that, on account of my long experience in the Territories, and occupying, as I did, two of the most responsible positions in those Territories for some years, I might speak with some authority in reference to some portions of the matter which is now before this honorable House. As you are aware, I went to the North-West Territories in 1879 as Indian Commissioner. During that year I travelled through the length and breadth of the land, for the purpose of visiting the Indians who were under my special charge. When I arrived in the North-West Territories the Hon. Mr. Laird was then Governor of that country. At that time the North-West Council was composed of the stipendiary magistrates of the Territories, with one or two unofficial members who were appointed by the Governor. The meetings of Council in those days were held in the Government House at Battleford; the proceedings were of a very limited character. The Council sat for a few weeks, passed a few short ordinances, and then adjourned. For two or three years this continued, and year after year, as opportunity offered, the Government had the ordinances printed in French. In 1881, when I became Lieutenant Governor of that Province, the headquarters of the Government were removed to Regina. When I took charge of the administration of affairs the Council which met me was composed of the gentlemen I have just mentioned. Settlers were coming into the country, which was settling up from one end to the other, and although up to that time the population had been principally French, or people of French extraction, when I took charge the majority was already English, and I was able, almost at once, in accordance with the power which I had under the North-West Territory Act, to form electoral districts and to bring representative members into that Council. Up to 1885 the ordinances passed by the North-West Council had been printed by myself, and also by my predecessor, in French and English. But, as you know, the moneys voted for the North-West government were voted in a lump sum, and as the country settled up it was necessary that public works should be constructed, and it was found necessary to use all the available money we could possibly get on the public works. Up to 1885, although the ordinances had been printed in French, there were virtually very few applications made to me or to my officers for copies of the French ordinances. In that or the subsequent year, on account of the demand made upon me for moneys for public works, I neglected to have those ordinances printed in French, but in 1887, when I found a demand was being made for those ordinances, and finding that I had not the money with which to have them printed, I came down to this honorable House and asked for a vote for the purpose of having them printed in French. This House voted the sum of $3,000 for that purpose. Let me here call the attention of the House to a remark which was made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron), where he stated that he was informed by Mr. Cayley, one of the members of the North-West Council, which is now the North-West Assembly, that while in 1883, I think he said, the cost of printing the North-West ordinances was only some $300, in 1887 it cost $1,000 for printing in French and $1,000 for translation. Well, Sir, Mr. Cayley was a member of my Council before it became a Legislative Assembly, and he ought to have known that the reason of the large expenditure of 1887 was that the money was voted in this House to print the ordinances which I neglected to have printed in 1885 and in 1886. I had in my hands a day or two ago a statement of the cost of printing those ordinances, and it corresponded with the statement made by the Minister of Public Works that since 1881 the average expense was $400 or $500 a year.

Mr. McCARTHY. Could the hon. gentleman give the figures for the different years?

Mr. DEWDNEY. I have not that statement now with me. If I had it here, I could show the hon. member for North Simcoe that the large expenditure for translation and printing of the French ordinances from 1887 to 1889 was on account of my neglecting to publish them in 1884-85. Not only did I publish the ordinances of those two years and those of the year in which the sum was voted, but I also thought it advisable to have the Journals of the House, which had never before been published in French, published from the first year of Mr. Laird's appointment as Lieutenant Governor up to the time I left the Territories. I believe they will prove interesting in the future, in the same way as the old Journals of Ontario and Quebec are interesting to me whenever I look over them. So when I left the Territories the whole of the ordinances up to that time were printed in French, and also the Journals of the House. I think I may claim to be able to speak with authority with respect to the sentiments of the people of that country in respect to this matter. During the ten years I lived in the North-West Territories I never, on one single occasion that I recollect, heard any objection to the printing of the ordinances in French, except an occasional remark that it would be as well if we spent the money on public works instead of on printing French ordinances, as the demand for those ordinances was very small. These observations were made at the time when farmers coming in from the north and south of the railway were often obliged to unload part of their loads, and go back for the part so left, before they could reach the railway. Every one, however, knows the difficulties experienced in a new country; but those were the only remarks I heard mentioned in regard to the printing of the French ordinances. I have also, since the gentlemen who constitute the present Legislative Assembly were returned, run an election myself. I have also travelled through the country, and as late as last year I travelled through it from one end to the other. I followed in the wake of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I must say that from one end to the other there was no indication of any excitement on this question. Perhaps the House will permit me to give my opinion with respect to the population in the North-West to-day. One-third of the people in the Territories comprise Ontario farmers and Ontario settlers; the balance is made up of English or old country settlers, French, German and other nationalities. I think very likely among the Ontario settlers there may be some who fought this battle over before in their younger days, and have strong feelings on the subject; but I do not believe that feeling exists to any great extent among that class. The old country settlers rank next in number to those from Ontario, and I believe not seventy-five per cent. of them ever heard of the British North America Act, or of the Manitoba Act, and the bulk of them do not know of the clause in the North-West Territories Act providing that the ordinances and proceedings shall be printed in the two languages. But I can understand that interested parties, those who within the last few weeks have taken a great interest in this question and are engaged in getting up the petitions to send down to this House stating their views should go to those ignorant people, ignorant so far as this matter is concerned, and obtain their signatures to petitions asking that money should not be wasted on the printing of French ordinances, but should be spent on useful work in other directions. But, I believe, if I know what British fair play is and how Englishmen feel on such matters, that these same men, if they had heard the speech of my hon. colleague on Tuesday night, would say: "This is a small matter; let the French have the records printed in their own language." With regard to the other nationalities, I may say there are a large number of Germans. On my visit last summer to Whitewood I was invited to meet a lot of settlers who had established themselves 16 miles north of that place. Many came out to meet me, and I found in two townships, Nos. 18 and 19 on Ranges 1, 2 and 3, the people were representatives of nine nationalities—Bohemians, Norwegians, Danes, Slavonians, Polish, Swedes, French and English. My opinion is that when we invite foreigners to come to our country we should endeavor to allow them, whether English, French, Germans or other nationalities, to have the laws under which they live printed in their own language, especially the school ordinances and laws of that character. I should like to say a word or two in regard to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I can echo the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr.

Mitchell) in regard to that hon. gentleman. I believe he has taken up the work which he has now on hand from purely conscientious motives. I believe myself that he has done so on his own responsibility, and I, for one, think, as the hon. member for North Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) thought, that any man who occupies the position he did when he took this stand is a man of whom his country should be proud. I do not agree with everything that hon. gentleman has said, I do not agree with the Bill he has introduced, but I believe he has taken this course from purely conscientious motives. If that hon. gentleman had the same ground to go over again I believe he would very likely have introduced his Bill without this preamble, which appears to have been unfortunate, and not in sympathy with the opinions of the majority of the members of this House. I believe also that if he had again to make the speech which he delivered in introducing this Bill he would be more moderate in his tone. But I do not believe that the hon. gentleman, as he stated himself, intended to hurt the feelings of any member of this House. I do think that the hon. gentleman spoke rather intemperately in his first speech, but no one can complain of the manner in which he responded to the venomous attacks made on him during the last five days of this debate. There are one or two remarks in the speech of the hon. member to which I would like to refer. He stated that the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories in opening the session of the Legislative Assembly the year before last, made a mistake in that he read his speech in French, which had never been done before. If any one can give a reason why that speech was not previously read in French I am in a position to do it. As Lieutenant Governor I opened the Assembly for the seven years previous to that, and I can give him the reason why I did not read the speech in French. Unfortunately I was not able to read the French language sufficiently well to warrant me in doing so. If I had undertaken that task I have no doubt that my audience would not know whether I was speaking in Blackfoot, Cree, or French, and I thought it better to leave it alone. In my opinion where the Lieutenant Governor made a mistake was, when last year he met his council and did not read his speech in French. The reason given by the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) for this was that it had been reported that if the Lieutenant Governor attempted to read his speech in French members of the Assembly would have left the building. If I had been Lieutenant Governor at that time I would have read that speech in French if I had to read it to my clerk and to empty chairs. It was his duty to do so and a man should never neglect that. I know every one of the representatives of the North-West Assembly personally, and I can hardly believe there could be any foundation for that report. If the Lieutenant Governor had read his speech I do not believe there would have been any excitement, and if any members of the House left their seats for that reason they would not be fit to represent the people who sent them to the Legislature. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) also spoke of the Lieutenant Governor getting a translator to translate the ordinances which he states created some dissatisfaction. When I was Lieutenant Governor the clerk of my council was a French lawyer and he was able to do the translating himself, but when the present Government took office this gentleman was transferred to the Indian Department, and the present clerk, not being a very good French scholar, is unable to do the translation. Any gentleman who knows anything of the translation of French in connection with legal work knows that a man must have a legal mind and legal experience before he can make a fair translation of such documents. Therefore the Governor had to take up some man to do the translation for him. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) when he addressed the House the other evening referred to the spark which is liable to break out into a great blaze. The hon. gentleman might have gone a little further in his comparison. If he had lived in a wooden, mossy country as I have, he would have seen that on many occasions when it was thought the fire was out a small spark still remained working gradually and surely under the surface and when fanned by a slight breeze breaks out again and creates a conflagration greater than the original one. What I want to see done in the present instance is some measure taken by this House which will extinguish the spark forever. I believe that the amendment proposed by my hon. colleague the Minister of Justice will effect that object and will be satisfactory to the people of the North-West. I am quite certain that what the people up there require is peace and prosperity. If they can raise their 25 bushels of wheat, their 70 bushels of oats and their 300 or 400 bushels of potatoes to the acre, they will be contented and happy. If this House can settle the question in the manner proposed by my hon. colleague I believe it will be satisfactory to the people of the North-West.

Mr. MASSON. At this late hour in the evening, and at this late stage of the debate, I would not take up the time of the House in speaking on this subject were it not that I consider it a question of very great importance, and were it not also for the fact that it has taken such a very wide and varied range. I consider it important, as a subject likely to affect the peace and the prosperity, yea, even the existence of this Dominion. It is true that the Act before the House is a very brief one, but it is also one that has a very wide scope. Especially is this Bill important when we consider it in connection with the preamble by which it is prefaced, and interpret that preamble by the speeches, made not only in this House but in different parts of the country during recess, by the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill. He says that the preamble does not mean what some hon. gentlemen say it does—a declaration that the French language should be obliterated, and that we should have only one language throughout the whole Dominion, in this House, and in all the Provinces of this Dominion; but if it does not mean that, I would ask, what does it mean? If it does not mean that, is it ambiguous? If it is ambiguous, read it in the light of the speeches made by the hon. gentleman during the recess, and we can find no ambiguity about it. The hon. gentleman in one of his speeches stated in emphatic words that he would not rest until the French language was stamped out. He admitted that he had a great work in hand, but he said: "Let us begin with that which seems most possible of accomplishment—let us deal with the dual languages in the North-West." With that declaration from the hon. gentleman, it is impossible for any person to put but one interpretation on the clause in the preamble regarding unity of language, namely, that it is expedient and his desire that it should be so, not only in the Territories of the North-West, but in the Dominion of Canada and in all the Provinces thereof. We might ask, if that is not the meaning of the preamble, why was it placed there? It has been whispered in the corridors that the hon. gentleman has stated that it was only introduced for the purpose of filling out the Bill and making it a little larger, as it looked too small without it. But I can hardly think that was the hon. gentleman's intention. If he wanted to extend the Bill and make it larger, he had many facts which he could have used in the preamble for the purpose. He could have stated that the North-West Territories Act had passed the House without the clause in question in it, and without any request to place it there; he might have stated that that clause was placed in the Bill by the Senate, and that when the Bill came back from the Senate, the Minister of the Interior, who had charge of the Bill, expressed regret that it was there; he might have quoted from the Hansard of that time the whole speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior; if he wished still further to swell his preamble, he might have placed in it the resolution of the North-West Council and the petition founded on that resolution. These would have been matters of fact, and fair material to put in the preamble. They would have had the effect of strengthening the hon. gentleman's hands and of assisting him in passing his Bill, instead of the effect which the preamble he has placed there is likely to have, namely, that of preventing its passing. The hon. gentleman says he is willing to abandon the preamble, after he has made a speech saying that he would not abandon the cause until he had attained his object. He said he would abandon it, after having made a speech introducing his Bill based entirely on that preamble. It is too late, however, for him now to say that he will abandon it. He says he will abandon it, not now, but after the Bill passes its second reading. He wishes the House to put itself in the false position of passing the preamble, which he said would amount to nothing, although I think it is generally admitted that passing the measure is endorsing its principle. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Barron) referred to the expressions used by the hon. Minister of Justice in the debate on the Jesuit Estates Act last Session, in which he contended the hon. Minister had held an entirely different view with regard to the importance of a preamble. The views of the hon. member for North Simcoe and the hon. member for North Victoria were certainly very different last Session from what they are this Session. They then laid great stress on the preamble, while they make little of it to-day; but it is impossible for those hon. gentlemen to suppose that this House will not take account of the great difference in the two cases. It may be very interesting to place on record the legal argument of the hon. member for North Victoria, that in a decision on the interpretation of a statute, the preamble has no weight or effect; but it is equally true that a preamble is often referred to in explanation of a statute. But I can see, and I think every hon. gentleman in this House can see, a very great distinction between those two cases. In the one case the Government were asked to disallow a Bill because it had an offensive preamble, and the answer to that was that the Administration, in reviewing the Bill, had to consider its meaning and its consequences, and not statements contained in the preamble. In this case we are asked to enact a Bill containing a preamble, and in enacting that Bill we are enacting the principles set forth in that preamble. The preamble of that Bill is as much a resolution of this House as the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice or any other resolution formally put before us. Therefore, when this House is asked to pass that Bill to a second reading, we are asked to vote for the resolution contained in the preamble. That is an entirely different thing from the Administration dealing with a Bill which had been passed by a Local Legislature. I am not going to follow that part of the discussion any further, because I wish to be brief, and I am willing to admit at the outset what I think is admitted by a majority of this House, that it would have been better if the clause in question had not been inserted in the North-West Territories Act; but it was inserted, and a gift, a privilege, a right was given to the people of the North-West Territories by that enactment. Now, a gift once given, I hold, cannot be ruthlessly taken away; a gift once given remains in the donee until he chooses to relinquish it; and, therefore, those people, being granted this privilege, whether rightly or wrongly, wisely or unwisely, should be allowed to retain it until they voluntarily abandon it. Now, it has been said by some that this Parliament, having given the power, has certainly the right to take it away. That can only be done by treating the Parliament as paternal to the North-West Territories, and in that view I suppose, they would say that a father might take from his child the gift he had given him. He might give his child a toy, and then, when he found that child making too much noise with it, he might take it away from him. That right may be granted, but the gift, even such a one as that, is never taken back without a pang; and I do not think it would be wise, even if lawful, for us to take back a privilege of that kind which has been given. There are certain distinctions though which must be drawn. There may be things which should be taken back, and there may be things that we ought properly not to have given. The people in this case have been granted a privilege, and these people, I submit, should be consulted before this privilege is taken away. It is said, however, that they have already expressed themselves on this subject. Well, I think the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) are conclusive on that point. I think that every legal mind must agree that his reasoning in that case was perfectly correct, that these members, not having been elected to deal with this subject, are not, as regards it, the constitutional mouthpiece of the people of the North-West. When they were elected there was no such cry before the people, and no such question at issue. They had received no such instruction whatever from the people on that subject, and, therefore, it cannot be contended that theirs was a proper representation of the people. But one hon. gentleman says it would be dangerous to refer a question of this kind to the people, that it would be dangerous to go among them and freely discuss whether they should abandon the printing of their Journals and their debates in French; yet, in the same breath, that hon. gentleman has told us he was willing to refer to them the question of separate schools. He holds that it would be quite safe to discuss before the people the question of taking away their separate schools, but that it would be dangerous to go among them and discuss a question as simple as this. It is argued by some that this is a question affecting the rights of minorities, and that, therefore, this House should deal with it. Well, I think that a very great distinction lies as to what are the rights of minorities and what are not. Minorities have rights, it is true, but they must be limited, because if they are to be co-extensive with the majority, then the minorities would in all cases rule. The rights of a minority must be those important rights which belong to civilised people and are recognised by the laws of nations. They are the rights relating to civil and religious liberties, and the protection of life, liberty and property. These are matters in which the rights of a minority should be protected, and which this Parliament should keep under control. It is in accord with that principle that the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Justice proposes that this Parliament should continue to maintain power over the printing of the ordinances and over the courts of the country. But as to the other question of what language the debates should be conducted, the Journals of the House printed in, that is a question of pure expense and convenience which should be left, as the amendment proposes, to the people of the North-West Territories for decision so soon as they shall be heard from. I do not think that either the hon. member for North Simcoe or the hon. member for South Victoria, who are both lawyers, would object to a court of which the judge was either French or acquainted with the French, the jury French, and only acquainted with the French language, or some of them only acquainted with it, and the prisoner and witnesses only acquainted with that tongue, having its proceedings conducted in French. It would be highly inconvenient, and, perhaps, effect a miscarriage of justice if they were not. Therefore, I do not believe that any of the hon. gentlemen who support the measure of the hon. member for North Simcoe, looking at the question in that light, would say that there should be no French used in the courts in the North-West. Why, Sir, you might have all the parties from the judge to the prisoner, the jurymen, the witnesses and the prosecutor, acquainted only with French, or a portion of them not conversant with any other language. How could such a court be conducted solely in the English tongue? Could the prisoner in that case be sure that he was getting justice, since he could understand nothing that was being said? Could the evidence be thoroughly sifted and the witnesses thoroughly cross-examined, if the lawyers did not understand the language the witnesses spoke? The hon. member for North Victoria spoke of ordinances and statutes of the North-West Council. I understand there are no statutes, properly so called, in the North-West Territories, and I must suppose he referred to the statutes of Canada.

Mr. MASSON.

Would any hon. gentleman contend that our statutes, which are circulated among our people for the purpose of educating the people as to what the law is, should be placed in the hands of magistrates and officers throughout the country printed only in the English language, which to many of them is an unknown tongue? How could these magistrates, how could the people learn them if published only in a language they did not understand? As to this question of the rights of the minority, I would say that in these matters, such as appertain to a court, where a man's life and property may be brought in question, it is right that this House should retain its protectorate, and in the other matters, such as the internal economy of the council it is only just that the council should deal with them just as soon as the people are consulted in the matter. But the hon. member for North Victoria said that this amendment amounted to a put off, that it was a promise to do to-morrow what we would not do to-day, and that when that to-morrow came it would not be carried out, or he insinuated as much by saying we knew what would be done. If I interpret the language of the resolution rightly, it implies nothing of the kind. It says in plain language that this House admits it to be expedient and proper, and not inconsistent with the covenants, that the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories should receive from the Parliament of Canada—not to-morrow, but now—the power to regulate,—to regulate when?—after the next general elections of the North-West Assembly, the proceedings of the Assembly and the manner of recording and publishing such proceedings. But the declaration is that they should not have that right after the next general elections, but now. I believe the objection taken by the hon. member for North Victoria is perfectly met by the language of the amendment. But the hon. member for North Simcoe claims for his measure that it is one which will promote national greatness. He says that the nation should be greater, and that he does not see how a nation could become great in which there were several official languages. He said that he had not stated that a nation could not be great under those circumstances, but that a nation would become greater and more united if all the people spoke the one language. It does not follow, and the hon. gentleman admitted to-day that it did not follow, that a nation might not become united and loyal to their constitution and government because they used more than one language, and history does not assist him in setting forth that a nation would become greater if it spoke only one language. We have only to cast a rapid glance back on the nations of the past to find that they attained greatness where they spoke many languages, and that they attained their highest point of greatness while speaking many languages. It never happened that any great nation has lasted long enough to be reduced to one language only. Therefore history virtually rebuts the proposition that a nation may not become greater while speaking more than one language, because those nations of the past became great while speaking many languages, and it was only when, in some cases, in their greatness, they exerted paternal treatment of the conquered or annexed countries, these very forces became a weakness to the state and caused them to crumble and fall away. We are told by the hon. the leader of the Opposition that there were those in the Province of Quebec who had a dream of establishing a French nationality on the banks of the St. Lawrence, but the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) informed the House—as is well-known—that in the Province of Ontario there are those who have a dream of a greater nation, a nation speaking the Anglo-Saxon tongue, not confined to the banks of the St. Lawrence or to any one country, but extending over the whole world. Such is no doubt the dream of many in the Province of Ontario, and elsewhere, that there may be a nation with a community of language extending from pole to pole. Such dreams may be indulged in without doing any particular harm to anybody. They may please the dreamer without hurting his neighbors. Such questions, however, I think are not for us to discuss here. Such questions should be left to Him who moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform, and who, for His own wise purposes, has created different nations and given us different languages and taught us different creeds. In His hands I think we can leave the future which is certainly so far away, but for the present, let us each and all do what we can to maintain the patriotic sentiment of our people and to establish unity among the different classes of this Dominion, the different races and the different creeds, to establish peace, harmony and good fellowship; let us become a nation great, glorious and united—united not only by interest but by love; and then, Mr. Speaker, as long as the old St. Lawrence rolls his course unto the sea, so long shall Canada remain great, glorious and free.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Had the resolution submitted by the Minister of Justice and introduced, as I understand, as the expression of the Government's views on this question, proposed what I considered to be a fair, and just, and final settlement of this question, it would have received my support and it would have received that support in silence; but, inasmuch as that resolution does not, in my opinion, offer to this House a fairly just and final settlement, I feel myself obliged to state in a few words wherein I differ from it, and the course I deem it proper to pursue. We have had a very lengthened debate and I am sure, after five days' debating, it is not to be expected or desired that any hon. gentleman should make a long speech. We have had the question viewed from an historical aspect, and from I do not know how many other aspects, but to my mind the importance of the question has not been minimised by the manner in which it has been treated on both sides of the House. At first it did not appear to be a matter of such wonderful importance, but it has been magnified by the press outside, and by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, until now, no doubt, it has assumed a position of national importance. I must frankly say that the House need not be ashamed of the debate. It has been maintained, on both sides of the House, at a higher standard than any debate I have listened to for many years in this Parliament. As to the historical aspect of this question, I will make only one remark. We have had learned gentlemen referring us to precedents in Europe in days gone by, and even in the present—to precedents in Austro-Hungary, in Switzerland, in Italy, in Spain, and in I do not know how many other countries. No doubt there are lessons to be derived from each and all of these countries, but I think it must have struck many hon. members of this House that there is very little application of the case of an old country such as Switzerland, made up of different nationalities, inheriting traditions of centuries—traditions of hatred, traditions of loyalty, traditions of language and traditions of religion—to a great lone land such as we have here unpeopled, and for which we have to legislate. It seems to me therefore that, although you may deduce certain lessons from the historical references that have been made to these countries, we are starting out as it were on a new plane altogether, and must determine this question which is before us on practical data which we can gather for ourselves from the circumstances and condition of the North-West Territories. We had from the hon. and learned gentleman who sits beside me—Mr. Mills (Bothwell)—the other night a speech replete with information, a speech in which he argued the question in a very calm and logical manner, enforced with a world and a wealth of illustration which was remarkable, a speech which was very concise and lucid, and which, I think, maintained the hon. gentleman in the high position which he has in this House as one of its most profound thinkers and most able debaters. But what was the conclusion which he drew? I think the conclusion was based on common sense, and it was that whether we should or should not have in this country one language or two or three languages was simply a matter of convenience. That was the practical conclusion which he drew, and I think it is a very fair and just conclusion. If that is admitted, the next question is, who is to determine the question of convenience? That is the stage which we have now reached. Is it to be the Parliament of Canada, composed of men from the Maritime Provinces, from the Province of Quebec and from British Columbia, more than half of whom, I venture to say, have never set foot in the North-West Territories at all, who know nothing of the wants and desires of the people there, or is it to be the people of the North-West themselves? I think any practical man would give an answer to that question in a very short time. The answer which I give to that question is the one which leads me to the conclusion to which I have come, and which I will support with my vote. In the first place, we have before us the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), which has been so much discussed. But I will say this frankly and fully, that divorced from its preamble, disassociated from the speeches of its introducer, both in this House and outside the House, disassociated, if you can disassociate it, from the crusade which he is charged with carrying on, that Bill would offer a solution of the question not very unfair. But it has two defects in my mind, and they are fatal defects. One is that no man, in my humble opinion, who has followed the course of events in this country for the past five or six months, who knows the promises and the pledges that that hon. gentleman gave to the public, who knows the circumstances under which he gave those promises and pledges, and who witnessed the introduction of that Bill, and heard the speech with which it was introduced—no man, I say, can disassociate the enacting part of that Bill from its preamble or from the interpretation of that preamble which was given in the speech with which it was introduced. The Bill and the preamble must stand or fall together; and it is all nonsense for the hon. gentleman to come into this Chamber after five days of debate have taken place, after passions of creed and passions of race have been aroused, not only in this House but through the country, by his Bill and by his speech—for him to come into the House now and say: "I find I have made a mistake, and I am willing to withdraw the preamble if you will allow the Bill to go into the Committee and carry it." I venture to say that style of action will not commend itself to the common sense of the House. The hon. gentleman attempted to make the House believe that the meaning of that preamble had been magnified, that the preamble did not mean that which a man of common sense would imply from its language. Well, Sir, I can put but one meaning upon it, and that is the meaning which, if I did not derive it from the Bill, I would certainly derive from the preamble when read in the light of the speech with which the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill. What does the preamble say?

"Whereas it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language among the people of Canada."

Well, Sir, does the hon. gentleman think this House is a debating club? Are we to put in our Bills mere abstract propositions? The hon. gentleman is too old a parliamentarian not to know that when a proposition of that kind is placed in the preamble of a Bill it is placed there for the purpose of taking legislative action upon it, and when he places it there he places it as the key to the enacting part which is to follow; and to say that he asks Parliament to carry a mere abstract proposition on which legislation is not to be based, is merely to turn this House into a debating club. But, Sir, that was not the object of the hon. gentleman. His speech was plain, and although the closing speech which he delivered to this House has been commended so much, those who followed the hon. gentleman clearly could see that he pledged himself that the crusade which he had taken up, which was now beginning, was to take up the rest of his political life. He is now upon the threshold of the work which he is engaged in, and he is not going to stop by repealing section 110 of the Revised Statutes of Canada relating to the North-West Territories, but he is going to carry out that principle which he has enunciated in the preamble of his Bill, and, therefore, those who vote for his Bill to-night, who prefer that solution of the question, cannot divorce the preamble from it, and they cannot vote for the Bill divorced from the preamble and the speech made by the hon. gentleman who introduced it. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman talked as if in this House—and that language is re-echoed in very many parts of this country to the discredit of those who use it—he talks as if, in this House, hon. gentlemen are divided by race and creed distinctions; indeed, one would suppose that in the House of Commons of Canada, to listen to some hon. gentlemen here, and to listen to their organs in the public press, this House is divided by a broad line, French gentlemen on one side trying to carry out their opinions, and the English-speaking members being on the other endeavoring to enforce their opinions. Sir, I believe, in relation to this question of languages, that the social forces, the commercial forces, and the political forces which are at work in this Dominion, are slowly but surely—and none the less surely because slowly—working out to one end, so far as language is concerned, to make the English language in the future, the vehicle of communication in Parliament and outside Parliament. It is not by legislative enactments, it is not by preambles declaratory of intentions such as are expressed here, but by the impulse of natural forces, by necessity and convenience, that this great result will be achieved. What did we hear in the House the other day? We heard from the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard) a confession, which was re-echoed from this side of the House, that every French gentleman in the country—such are the forces at work in this community—is convinced that he would not be doing justice to his children if he brought them up in ignorance of the English language and English literature. The fact is, as he told us, that the French boys of the present age are being educated in both languages, so that when they grow up they will be able to take their place, not only in the parliamentary arena, but in the commercial circles of the great commercial centres. Is there discord between races and creeds in this House? What sight do we behold in this Parliament to-night? We see one of the historical parties of Canada led by whom? Led by a French gentleman who was elected as leader of the great Liberal party—because he was a French Canadian? No; but because his ability and his experience, his tact and his urbanity, fitted him for that high position; and I will venture the assertion that the choice made by that party two or three years ago has been more than justified by the experience we have had of his leadership in the House. Sir, I will venture to say, although he is a French Canadian, that he enjoys the confidence of his followers to as large an extent as his distinguished predecessors did. We have every confidence in him, we know his breadth of view, we know that he is not animated by racial or creed antipathies, but that he desires to build up a nation in this country upon broad and generous grounds. Sir, I venture this further remark that, after two or three years' experience of his leadership, he not only enjoys the thorough confidence of those who follow him, but he has earned, and has deservedly earned, the respect of his political opponents. Well, we heard that hon. gentleman charged here the other night by the hon. member who introduced the Bill—and I know why he charged it, he charged it from the basest of motives—that that hon. gentleman was a party to certain treasonable language which was used down on the banks of the St. Lawrence, or language alleged to be treasonable, by the Premier of Quebec; and he charged that the leader of the Liberal party had sanctioned by his presence and by his silence, the use of that language. Sir, that was ignorance on the part of the hon. member, and it was unjust, also, because he knew, he could not help but know, that the hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party had not only taken occasion at the very time to rebuke the language, or to dissent from the language, or from some of the extreme expressions which were made use of on that occasion; but, afterwards, in the great city of Toronto, before an English speaking audience, he had read his disclaimer from the paper which printed it at the time, and had then declared himself as true and as thoroughly a British Canadian as any man in Canada. Sir, I have this further to say, and I hope before this debate is closed that it will be proved conclusively that the language which it is alleged Mr. Mercier used on that occasion, has been foully and falsely misrepresented. I was shown to-night by an hon. gentleman who sits near me a correct transcript of that language, and I do not think it is right that an hon. gentleman holding the high position of Premier of one of the greater Provinces, should be held up to public scorn and contumely for having used language which he never used, and for having preached treason which he never preached, but when as a matter of fact the sentiments he uttered were not stronger than those embodied in the preamble of the resolution which the leader of the Government asks this House to endorse. The language which Mr. Mercier used on that occasion was as follows:—

“Whilst protesting our respect and our friendship, too, for the representatives of other races and other creeds, whilst declaring ourselves ever ready to grant to them their rights everywhere and at all times, on all occasions and in everything; whilst offering to divide with them as between brethren the immense territory and the enormous wealth which Providence has laid before us; whilst willing to live with them in perfect harmony under the shadow of the flag of England and the sceptre of a Queen loved of all, we solemnly declare that never shall we renounce the rights guaranteed to us by treaties, by laws and by the constitution.

“Treaties, law and constitution secure to us the right of remaining Catholic and French, and Catholic and French we will remain.

“Let us proclaim it ahigh and aloud, so that among our opponents there be no false hopes, so that in our own ranks there be no weakness; the persecution of the first years of English domination succeeded not in crushing our fathers; no more shall the persecutions, which now threatens, succeed in crushing us, their descendants.

“We are now two millions and a half of French Canadians in America, proud of the past, strong in the present and confident of the future; we scorn and laugh at the threats of our enemies.”

I see nothing in that language to condemn, there is no treason in it; there is nothing about building up a French nationality on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. RYKERT. What is the date of the speech?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is Mr. Mercier's speech, delivered before St. Jean Baptiste Society on 24th of June.

Mr. AMYOT. 24th of May, I was there.

Mr. McNEILL. Where did the hon. gentleman get that report?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am told it was not an extempore but a carefully written speech, and one which was read from the manuscript. It is a copy from the manuscript I have read, and the hon. gentleman who sits behind me was present on the occasion, and so far as his memory serves those were the words used.

Mr. AMYOT. I was there myself, and it was the same speech.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Let me pass from that point. None of the resolutions and amendments proposed commend themselves to my judgment so much as that submitted by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It is short, and while it might perhaps be improved and made a little more definite in some of its phrases, it proceeds upon the correct lines. It proposes that this whole question should be relegated to the people of the North-West Territories, that they, at the next general election, should instruct their representatives how they should vote and act, and that the representatives of the people after being instructed by the people at the polls should decide for themselves what languages should be used in the House, in debate, in the votes and proceedings, in the ordinances and in the courts. That resolution proceeds upon broad, liberal lines. It commends itself to my mind, because it shows faith in the people, a desire to leave that which concerns those people, more immediately than our people, to the people of the North-West themselves, to the people who are the best judges. What do the people of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick know of this matter? I have never set my foot in the North-West, and I am not as competent as are gentlemen living there, to judge as to whether one, two, or three languages should be used. It is a question which they should determine; to them it should be relegated, and I never found yet, if you put full and ample trust in the people, that the people will fail you. The Liberal party have proclaimed time and again their belief in Provincial rights. But it is said there are no Provincial rights mixed up in this matter because there are no Provinces. That is a mere quibble. The basis underlying Provincial rights is the same whether the people belong to a Territory or belong to a Province. What is that basis? It is, that upon all matters of purely local concern the people more immediately affected should determine how the matters should be decided. It is the same principle either applied to a Province with full political rights or to the North-West Territories with partial political rights; the underlying principle is the same in both cases. It is said that the people have spoken, and that the North-West Council has already told this House what is the opinion of the people of the North-West. But that argument has been sufficiently answered. The North-West representatives were not elected to do more than legislate within the bounds of the constitution under which they were elected; they were not elected to change that constitution or to express to this Parliament the voice of the people with respect to any such change. The question never came before the people at the last election, and if I am correctly informed, not two, three or four, but six or seven representatives, when the question came before them, expressed a desire that the question should be relegated to the people, and that they should receive instructions from their constituents. This Dominion has had enough of forcing a change of constitution on Provinces by the action of the Legislature, irrespective of the people. It was done in Nova Scotia and you have an open sore there to this day. You have had a partially discontented Province, and why? Simply because the people, when their constitution was proposed to be taken away, had not an opportunity of declaring whether they wished that course to be followed or not. We should not try to repeat that experiment, even on a small scale. I desire to follow on the lines of the Liberal party, laid down here years and years ago; in all local matters to refer the questions to the people more immediately interested. I have never found that solution of the difficulty to fail; it has always proved equal to the occasion. Provinces have been driven almost to revolt; there has been discontent in Ontario and in Quebec; but when you apply the principle of Provincial rights, when you allow the people to deal with their own local affairs as they please, the question is settled always in the way the people desire it to be settled. So it should be in the North-West Territories. They have an equal right to speak with the people of the older Provinces, and I, for one, will not be a party to taking away that right, which, if my own Province was interested, I would expect to have given to it. I believe if we apply the principles of provincial rights we are treading upon safe ground, upon ground we have travelled before, upon a well tried and beaten path which has always led us out of difficulties; but, if you abandon that, and take up some other ground and say that Parliament should deal with this subject, whether competent or not, or whether it possesses the requisite information or not, you are entering a sea of difficulties, from which I, at least, see no safe haven. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who made an able and brilliant speech the other night, did not deal in many historical arguments, but he gave us two from modern history: the one with respect to the question of the use of the dual languages in Schleswig-Holstein, and the other with respect to their use in Poland, and he asked us to pay great respect to the recommendations of the English statesmen in those two cases. I have no doubt that any recommendation by English statesmen, experienced in matters of this kind, would carry great weight. Upon what lines did they go? Just on the lines that we are asking you shall go now: to leave it to the people to decide how many languages they shall have, or if they shall have but one. That was the proposition which the English Secretary of State made in his despatch with reference to the Schleswig-Holstein question and that was the same proposition which the great powers of Europe made with reference to the settlement of the language question in Poland. Therefore, if these great English precedents are to have any weight, if hon. gentlemen opposite, some of whom I have in my eye now who pay very great respect to the opinions and recommendations of English statesmen, will pay weight to these opinions I have referred to, they will vote for the resolution of the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and leave this matter to the people, who are best qualified to judge of it themselves. I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Justice. I am opposed to that amendment, as I stated in my opening remarks, upon the ground that it is a half-and-half measure, for it gives with one hand what it withholds with the other. By it you declare that you have a half belief in the right of the people to decide this question, but that you have not full confidence in them. It seems to me to be a hesitating, half-hearted Tory proposition. You say: "We will give them the power to determine whether their proceedings and speeches shall be in one or two languages, but, oh, we cannot trust the people to decide as to whether their ordinances shall be published in one or two languages." That is all nonsense. Why withdraw from the people of the Territories the right to determine whether one, two or three languages shall be used? It may be that the Germans will go to those Territories in sufficient numbers to justify the Legislature of that country in determining that the ordinances shall be published in German. Should any objection be offered? Certainly not. I object to this amendment, because it leaves this question which has given rise to so much trouble, so much heartburning and so much turmoil in the same position as it is now, namely, on the Table of this House. If this amendment of the Minister of Justice is adopted the question will come up next year. You will have the same debate, and you will have more bitterness imported into it than now. We have had on this occasion the restraining influence which comes from the fact that the great leaders occupying the front benches on both sides of the House have united to give us wise counsel, to commend us to be prudent, to be cautious, to refrain from exciting language, and to remember that underlying this question there are others which may result in the disruption of the whole Dominion. The debate, so far, has been conducted with an abstinence from exciting language which is certainly commendable, but if you keep this question open, what guarantee have you that this commendable abstinence from violent language is going to be repeated next year? The hon. member for North Simcoe will doubtless bring up this question again next year, for he would be inconsistent in his course if he did not do so.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will move next year that the right which was given to the people of the North-West with reference to their votes and proceedings, shall also be extended to their ordinances, and on what ground could you withhold it? I, for one, can see no logical or just reason for going half way in this matter. If we are going to trust the people let us trust them fully, and let us show them that we have confidence in them. The hon. Premier cited an instance from Ontario nearly one hundred years old, to show that the people of Ontario, United Empire Loyalists as they were, were not unworthy then to be trusted with the disposition of a matter similar to the one now before us. Did these people a hundred years ago act harshly or tyrannically? No. The First Minister showed that they acted in a broad and generous spirit, and that they published their ordinances and their debates in the languages which were understood by the two races of the people. Are their descendants to-day, who have gone to the North-West, less broad or less generous than their forefathers were a hundred years ago? Not at all, Sir. The precedent which the hon. gentleman has cited is directly against this half-hearted resolution, and if it is good for anything it is good to prove that the people of the North-West are as qualified to-day—nay, if we judge from the spread of education; if we can judge from the increase of toleration which has been going on among the people of North America for the last hundred years—they are more qualified to deal with this question in a broad, generous and free spirit than were their forefathers. I see nothing but procrastination, delay and danger, in this amendment of the Minister of Justice, and I oppose it upon the ground that I do not believe it will give satisfaction to the people more immediately interested, or will work effectively or justly if carried into law.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Montmorency.) (Translation). I do not desire to detain the House very long, Mr. Speaker; nor have I the pretention that I have anything very new in the shape of argument to offer upon the important question which concerns us at the present moment. Nevertheless, the speeches delivered by the member for North Simcoe contain assertions so unjust, so destitute of foundation, that I wish to arraign some of them. What is the object of the Bill of the member for Simcoe? Is it the interest of the public which urges him on? Is it really a sincere desire to consolidate the Canadian nationality in the Dominion? I answer emphatically, no. His sole object is to continue to excite the various races which inhabit this country, the one against the other; his sole end is to enflame religious prejudice, and to build for himself a small political party on the ruins which he shall have made, to the injury of political peace and religious tolerance in Canada. His Bill, I say, is an outrageous provocation to the French of this country. Last year, it was the Catholic sensibility which the member for North Simcoe wished to wound with the Jesuit question; this time it is the French nationality which he attacks, wounding in this way the two strongest and most sensitive feelings which exist in any nation proud and courageous. For months and months the member for North Simcoe and the press at his command have not ceased to insult and vilify us. Have you seen any agitation in the Province of Quebec? No. Have you seen any tumultuous meetings gathered together in order to protest again these insults? No. Have you seen brought into this House any petitions asking for the rejection of this Bill? None whatever. Why so? It is because, in spite of what they think in certain quarters, we understand constitutional rule. We have remained calm,—confiding in the justice of this House; and this justice will be meted out to us. In a few moments this anti-French Bill of the member for North Simcoe will be crushed by the same humiliating majority which crushed out his motion against the Jesuits. In face of this display of narrow fanaticism, I ask whether we of French origin have done anything to justify it? I think not. Our history is there, to show on the contrary our spirit of tolerance, our spirit of friendliness. I asked a moment ago: Have we provoked our fellow citizens of English origin? No. I shall quote to this House an eloquent witness to our spirit of tolerance,—and this evidence has fallen from the lips of a qualified man, from the lips of an English Conservative who played a no mean part in this country and who died a baronet in England; I mean Sir John Rose. What did this politician say, during the debates on Confederation? I shall allow him to speak for himself:

“It is a very grave and anxious question for us to consider—especially the minorities in Lower Canada—how far our mutual rights and interests are respected and guarded, the one in the General and the other in the Local Legislature. With reference to this subject, I think that I, and those with whom I have acted—the English-speaking members from Lower Canada—may in some degree congratulate ourselves at having brought about a state of feeling between the two races in this section of the Province which has produced some good effect. There has been ever since the time of the union, I am happy to say—and every body knows it who has any experience in Lower Canada—a cordial understanding and friendly feeling between the two nationalities, which has produced the happiest results. Belonging to different races and professing a different faith, we live near each other; we do not trench upon the rights of each other; we have not had those party and religious differences which two races, speaking different languages and holding different religious beliefs might be supposed to have had; and it is a matter of sincere gratification to us, I say, that this state of things has existed and is now found among us. But if, instead of this mutual confidence; if, instead of the English-speaking minority placing trust in the French majority in the Local Legislature, and the French minority placing the same trust in the English majority in the General Legislature, no such feeling existed, how could this scheme of Confederation be made to work successfully? I think that it cannot be denied that there is the utmost confidence on both sides; I feel assured that our confidence in the majority in the Local Government will not be misplaced, and I earnestly trust that the confidence they repose in us in the General Legislature will not be abused. I hope that this mutual yielding of confidence will make us both act in a high-minded and sensitive manner when the rights of either side are called in question—if ever they should be called in question—in the respective Legislatures. This is an era in the history of both races—the earnest plighting of each other's faith as they embrace this scheme. It is remarkable that both should place such entire confidence in one another; and in future ages our posterity on both sides will be able to point with pride to the period when the two races had such reliance, the one on the other, as that each was willing to trust its safety and interest to the honor of the other. This mutual confidence has not been brought about by any ephemeral or spasmodic desire for change on the part of either; it is the result of the knowledge each race possesses of the character of the other. It is because we have learned to respect each other's motives and have been made to feel by experience that neither must be aggressive, and that the interests of the one are safe in the keeping of the other. * * * A feeling of distrust between the French and English races in the community would have rendered even the fair consideration of the scheme of union impracticable. Would the French have, in that case, been now ready to trust themselves in the General Legislature, or the English in the Local Legislature, of Lower Canada? No; and I pray God that this mutual confidence between the two races which have so high and noble a work to do on this continent, who are menaced by a common danger, and actuated by a common interest, may continue for all time to come; I pray that it may not be interrupted or destroyed by any act of either party; and I trust that each may continue to feel assured that if at any time hereafter circumstances should arise, calculated to infringe upon the rights of either, it will be sufficient to say, in order to prevent any aggression of this kind: “We trusted each other when we entered this union; we felt then that our rights would be sacred with you; and our honor and good faith and integrity are involved in and pledged to the maintenance of them.” I believe this is an era in our history in which in after ages our children may appeal with pride, and that if there should be any intention on either side to aggress upon the other, the recollection that each trusted to the honor of the other will prevent that intention from being carried out. Feeling as I do thus strongly that our French fellow-subjects are placing entire confidence in us, in our honor and our good faith, we the English-speaking population of Lower Canada, ought not to be behind hand in placing confidence in them. I feel that we have no reason as a minority to fear aggressions on the part of the majority. We feel that in the past we have an earnest of what we may reasonably expect the future relations between the two races to be. But although this feeling of mutual confidence may be strong enough in our breasts at this time, I am glad to see that my hon. friend the Attorney General East, as representing the French majority in Lower Canada, and the Minister of Finance as representing the English-speaking minority, have each carefully and prudently endeavored to place as fundamental conditions in this basis of union such safeguards and protection as the two races may respectively rely upon.”

On the same occasion the hon. gentleman said further:

“We the English Protestant minority of Lower Canada cannot forget that whatever right of separate education we have was accorded to us in the most unrestricted way before the union of the Provinces, when we were in the minority and entirely in the hands of the French population. We cannot forget that in no way was there any attempt to prevent us educating our children in the manner we saw fit and deemed best; and I would be untrue to what is just if I forgot to state that the distribution of State funds for educational purposes was made in such a way as to cause no complaint on the part of the minority. I believe we have always had our fair share of the public grants in so far as the French element could control them, and not only the liberty, but every facility for the establishment of separate dissentient schools wherever they were deemed desirable. A single person has the right, under the law, of establishing a dissentient school and obtaining a fair share of the educational grant, if he can gather together fifteen children who desire instruction in it. Now we cannot forget that in the past this liberality has been shown to us, and that whatever we desired of the French majority in respect to education they were, if it was at all reasonable, willing to concede. We have thus in this, also, the guarantee of the past that nothing will be done in the future unduly to interfere with our rights and interests as regards education, and I believe that everything that we desire will be as freely given by the Local Legislature as it was before the union of the Canadas."

This is the handsome eulogium of the tolerance of the French Canadians, made by an Englishman who had passed his life in their midst. And today as a reward for our justice towards the English minority, behold an Englishman, a distinguished member of this House, comes and asks us to deprive of their language the French minority in the Territories of the North-West. I appeal on its behalf to the sentiment of justice in this House whose most noble prerogative is the protection of the weak. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer some of the assertions made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in the last speech he has made in support of the Bill. This hon. member looks as if he believed that the Protestants are frightfully maltreated in the Province of Quebec—that we render their existence very bitter. Let us settle at once this point. There are in our Province 188,309 Protestants and 1,170,718 Roman Catholics according to the census of 1881. The Protestants, therefore, only represent 13 per cent., or one-seventh of the total population of our Province. They are only in the majority in the Counties of Compton, Stanstead, Brome, Missisquoi, Huntingdon and Argenteuil. Nevertheless, they have ten representatives. In these six counties the Protestants have only a majority of 2,136 and are in the minority in Sherbrooke, Montreal West, Pontiac and Megantic, so that they would have a right only to six members instead of ten, if they were excluded from representation in those counties where they are in the minority. I may also add that, since Confederation, several counties, whose population is wholly Catholic, have elected English Protestant members. I can mention the following names: Mr. Clarence Hamilton was elected in the County of Bonaventure; Mr. W. Price, for Chicoutimi and Saguenay; the Hon. Mr. Joly for Lotbinière; Mr. Hemming and Mr. Watts, for Drummond and Arthabaska; the Hon. Mr. Church for the County of Ottawa; the Hon. Mr. Wurtele for the County of Yamaska; the Hon. D. A. Ross for the County of Quebec; and Mr. Pozer for Beauce. This shows that the French-Canadians are not prejudiced in the matter of their representatives. It is the same thing in the Legislative Council, which is composed of 24 members. According to population, the Protestants, only forming one-seventh of the Province, would only have a right to but three Legislative Councillors out of the twenty-four, but notwithstanding, they have five, that is to say, one-fifth. But there is more to say. In the five divisions represented by Protestants the majority is Roman Catholic. The Protestants are only as 34 to 100 of the population. In 1878, we had, in the person of Mr. Joly, a Protestant, as First Minister. The Hon. Mr. Joly is a man among the Protestants who occupies the best position in the Province of Quebec. Was there ever complaint made that a Protestant was at the head of affairs in the Province of Quebec? No, Mr. Speaker; but the English Tories endeavored to excite the national prejudices of the French Canadians, by throwing into their teeth the sneer that they had a Protestant at the head of the Government. Now, turning to the school question, let us see in what manner Protestants are treated in the Province of Quebec. I will not give my own opinion, but I am going to quote an opinion which will not be gainsaid by any one. It is that of the Rev. Mr. Rexford, the secretary of the Protestant section of the Council of Public Instruction in the Province of Quebec. In the course of last summer in the Province of Ontario they carried on an anti-French and an anti-Catholic campaign. At this juncture, they represented the Government of the Province of Quebec as a Government which wished to drive out all the Englishmen from the country. The leader of the Government addressed a letter to the Rev. Mr. Rexford, in which he asked him for certain information respecting Protestant public education in the Province of Quebec. Mr. Rexford answered by the following letter dated the 4th of July, 1889:—

“DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC EDUCATION.

“QUEBEC, 4th July, 1889.

“To the Honorable the First Minister of the Province of Quebec:

“MY DEAR SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th June last, containing questions respecting the Protestant schools of the Province of Quebec, and I take the liberty of submitting the following declarations to serve as answers to these questions:—

“First question—What is the condition of the Protestant separate schools in the Province of Quebec?

“Answer—The Protestant schools of the Province of Quebec, are either schools controlled by the majority of the ratepayers of the municipality in which they are situated, under the control of five school commissioners; or they are dissentient schools belonging to the minority of a municipality, under the control of three school trustees. There are in the Province 916 of these elementary schools, thirty-eight model schools, and nineteen academies, forming a total of nearly 1,000 schools attended by 34,440 scholars. These schools, in a number of cases, suffer somewhat from the density of the dissentient element on which their support depends; but they enjoy all the rights and privileges of the schools belonging to the majority of the inhabitants of the Province as regards school regulations, class books, the course of studies, and the capacity of the teachers; in the last connection they are perhaps slightly more favored than some of the schools belonging to the majority of the people of the Province. It is a fact that the Protestant Committee, having a smaller number of schools under its control, is in a condition to take, when matters make it necessary, measures to improve the condition of the Protestant schools, before similar measures can be adopted with regard to the Roman Catholic schools of the Province.”

“Second question—Please give me an abbreviated statement of the law bearing on this subject, and upon the rights given to the Protestants to support separate schools in our Province.

“Answer—For school purposes, the Province is divided into sections, called school municipalities. The schools of these municipalities are under the direction of five commissioners elected by the ratepayers. If the majority of the inhabitants of the municipality are Protestant, the schools of the municipality are conducted conformably to the regulations issued by the Protestant Committee, respecting the course of study, class-books, teachers, &c. When the Protestants form the minority in the municipality, and they are not satisfied with the government of the schools, they have the right to record their dissent, and to notify the school commissioners that they are either in whole or in part dissentients. They then elect three trustees, devoted to the government of their dissentient schools. These dissentient schools enjoy all the rights and privileges of the schools of the majority of the inhabitants of the municipality, save in this one point, that the dissentient trustees cannot levy school taxes upon duly incorporated companies. This power belongs to the school commissioners of each municipality, who are bound to place in the hands of the trustees a portion of the taxes levied on the companies legally constituted as corporations, in proportion to the number of scholars attending their respective schools. In other respects, the dissentient trustees have the same powers as the school commissioners in all that respects the schools placed under their control. If the dissentients of a municipality are too weak in numbers to support a school they can unite with a neighboring municipality of their own religious belief, with the object of supporting these schools. Every head of a family residing in a municipality not provided with a dissentient school, may, (1) if he belongs to the minority, (2) if he has children of an age to attend school and (3) if he lives within three miles of a school of his own religious faith situated in another municipality, pay his taxes towards the support of this school, and send his children there.

"Any person belonging to the religious minority may, at any time whatsoever, become a dissentient by giving the prescribed notices, but he is subject to the payment of the ordinary taxes imposed by the school commissioners for the current year, and having reference to the existing debts of the school corporation. In every case, on the formation of a new municipality, if the notice of the dissentients is given within the month following the erection of the municipality, the dissentients are not subject to the taxes imposed by the school commissioners.

"When, in the municipality, the minority is a dissentient one it has a right to a portion of the property of the school corporation from which it is dissentient. This portion is determined pro rata according to the value of the taxable property represented by the dissentients. The Protestant schools, dissentient or under the control of school commissioners, are placed under the superintendence of the Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction, at the present time composed of ten members appointed by the Government, of five members appointed by the committee, and of one member elected by the Provincial Association of Protestant School Teachers. This committee has the power of making regulations respecting Protestant schools, normal schools, boards of examiners, school inspectors, class-books, as well as all matters respecting the organisation, the government and the discipline of Protestant schools, and the classification of schools and teachers. The McGill normal school educates, under the control of regulations made by this committee, the teachers for the non-Catholic portion of the Province.

"The central board of Protestant examiners, acting in accordance with the regulations of the committee, has alone the power of issuing certificates to act as teacher in the Protestant schools. Five regular inspectors and three special inspectors, appointed on a recommendation of the Protestant committee, perform the duty of inspection as regards the Protestant schools of the Province.

"Third question.—Please tell me the number of Protestant separate schools that there are in this Province and the sum of money which they receive from the Government?

"Answer:—1st. There are about one thousand separate Protestant schools in the Province; 2nd. The subsidy granted by the Government for elementary instruction is $360,000. This sum is distributed among the school municipalities of the Province, in proportion to their total population, as ascertained at the last census. In each municipality where there are dissentient schools in charge of trustees the portion of the grant coming to the municipality is divided between the school commissioners and dissentient trustees in proportion to the number of children attending their respective schools. As this grant is, in the first place, divided according to the total population, and then, where there exist dissentient schools, on account of the variable assistance given to the school, it is impossible to state the exact amount of the grant received by the Protestant schools. Nevertheless, it is evident that approximately these schools receive in proportion to the population, say about one-seventh of the whole grant.

"Fourth question.—Can you give me the number of the Protestant English-speaking population of the Province?

"Answer.—I have not the means of ascertaining the number of the Protestant English-speaking population of the Province,—distinguishing it from the Protestant population speaking other languages. According to the last census there were in the Province:

Roman Catholics.....	1,170,718
Protestants.....	183,900
No religion.....	4,319

Total..... 1,358,937

"I have the honor to be, dear Sir,

Your obedient servant,

"ELSON I. REXFORD,

"Secretary of the Department of Public Instruction."

Well, you see with what liberality the Protestant minority is treated in the Province of Quebec. It is of little consequence whether it be English or Protestant it is treated with the liberality and justice which are due to minorities. There is another question which we know agitates the hon. member for North Simcoe. It is the question respecting the Jesuit Estates. This question has come again to be threshed out before this House. Complaint is made of the famous preamble of the Bill respecting which so much noise was made last year. I shall not quote, in reply to what has been said, any other authority than that of a Protestant who occupies one of the highest positions in our Province, and who is looked upon with the greatest respect by the Protestants of the Province of Quebec. I mean the Hon. Mr. Joly. This is what he said on this matter in a letter addressed to the Montreal Witness on the 7th of January last:

"The Jesuit Estates Act has become the signal for a strong agitation throughout the Dominion. Men who for so many years lived together in confidence and friendship, in spite of the differences of origin and creed, have now become suspicious the one of the other and are gradually separating more and more. * * * Every effort ought to be brought to bear in order to preserve this time-honored sentiment of confidence and mutual tolerance, which has allowed us, Canadians as we are, English and French, Roman Catholics and Protestants, to live happily and in peace, side by side, in days when there is but little peace in the world. Such efforts deserve to be supported by all men endued with good will. * * * If I had been a member of the Legislature at the time, and the name of the Pope and his consent might have been omitted, I would have insisted in placing them in the Bill before allowing it to be adopted.

"* * * At first sight, a great portion of the preamble of the Bill appears to be out of place and subject to objections or superfluous; but after re-examination the attentive reader, especially if he is possessed of some legal knowledge, will be struck with the display of minute precautions which have been taken to obtain, on behalf of the Province, a final and non-appealable judgment."

This is how, Mr. Speaker, a Protestant holding the position which Mr. Joly does, appreciates the preamble of the Bill respecting the Jesuit Estates, which has been so severely criticised in this House. Another assertion on the part of the hon. member which has astonished me, is that which he has made when alleging that La Vérité is the organ of the Quebec Government. He appears to me to be a close reader of this journal, because he constantly quotes it in his speeches. Probably because he takes delight in it and reads it on Sunday in order to keep holy the Sabbath day. I protest, Mr. Speaker, against the statement of the hon. member. One must be a complete stranger to what is going on in the Province of Quebec to make such an assertion. La Vérité is not the organ of any political party; not more the organ of the Conservative party; not more the organ of the hon. Ministers who are sitting on the Treasury benches, than the organ of the Quebec Government. And, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire any other proof of this than an article in this journal published on the 26th October, 1889. This is what La Vérité said:

"We have never abandoned the Conservative leaders, for the excellent reason that we never marched under their banner; for the same reason that we do not follow Mr. Mercier to-day. From the first day of its publication, La Vérité has always been, what it is now, and what it will be so long as we have the control of it, a journal absolutely independent of party politics."

We see by this article how very unjust was the statement of the hon. member in wishing to excite prejudices in the Province of Quebec, by making it believed that this newspaper reflected the opinion of the great majority of a population of the Province of Quebec, and that it reflected, above all, the opinion of the Government of Quebec. And, finally, La Minerve, addressing itself to La Vérité asked it several questions with regard to the Government of Quebec. And what did Mr. Tardivel answer in his journal? He said that he accepted Mr. Mercier as the lesser evil. He paid us the compliment of saying that we were worth more than our adversaries,—which is, by the way, but a poor compliment. I can cite, Mr. Speaker, a more recent example of the liberality of Mr. Mercier towards the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec. No further back than fifteen days, a representative in the Legislature of Quebec, Mr. Hall, presented a Bill on the subject of university degrees. This Bill could only have passed the Assembly and the Council through the grace and influence of the head of the Executive of Quebec. I shall quote touching the estimation in which the Hon. Mr. Mercier is held, a newspaper which I am convinced the hon. member for North Simcoe should read as attentively as La Vérité, and whose statements he cannot doubt. This is what the Mail said three or four days ago:

"The Mail is not often able to commend Mr. Mercier's political acts, but it would be doing him an injustice if it failed to congratulate him upon the course which he has taken with regard to Mr. Hall's B. A. Bill, which has now passed both Houses of the Quebec Legislature. He made a vigorous speech in support of it in the Assembly, and exercised his great powers in the Council in order to secure its passage there. He deserves credit, therefore, for thus assisting in the removal of one of the disabilities under which the Protestant minority in Quebec has long been laboring. * * It is not difficult to understand the intense satisfaction with which the friends of Protestant education in Quebec regard the removal of a disability which has weighed heavily upon them for many years."

I am now going to cite, with regard to this Bill, what La Vérité, so often quoted by the hon. member from North Simcoe, has said. These are the reproaches which that newspaper cast upon the leader of the Government in connection with the adoption of this measure, of date the 8th instant:

"And at the time of the third reading had it not been for the scandalous intervention of the First Minister in favor of the Bill, the majority of the members would have rejected this exceptional legislation. We say scandalous intervention."

"In fact, contrary to all parliamentary usage, Mr. Mercier quitted his seat, while the members were entering the House in order to vote, and ran about the hall of meeting, openly bringing to bear the weight of his influence, as leader of the party, upon certain Liberals well known on account of their hostility to the Bill. This was an unseemly act which the Speaker of the House did not prevent, as he might have done and ought to have done."

This is the manner in which the newspaper, which the hon. member of North Simcoe says represents the opinions of the Government of Quebec, treats the leader of this Government. I trust that in the future the hon. member will give himself the trouble to read other newspapers in the Province of Quebec, in order the better to inform himself about what is passing there. For a long time past this hon. member, and those other members of his own kidney, have taken a considerable interest in our affairs. The proper mode of making himself well informed in all that respects us would be to read trustworthy journals, like the Electeur for example, which is perfectly up to the mark in the affairs of the Province, and La Justice, in whose columns my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) often writes. He would obtain through these newspapers all the information possible respecting our affairs. Another of our crimes, Mr. Speaker, is the case of Miss Maybee. It would seem that, eminently respectable as this young woman is, she has made herself latterly much talked about. It has been sought to make it believed that the objections against the appointment of Miss Maybee, to the post office at Quebec, were owing to the fact that she came from the Province of Ontario and that she was a Protestant. I say that this is entirely false. In this connection I will quote what has been said by a Conservative newspaper in Quebec, the Evenement. This is how this journal looks upon this appointment:

"As the business of this lady will be merely to work a small calligraphic machine, in the post office, we do not see why they go so far to look for an employé when they could easily have found one in our own city. It is not to our knowledge, and not to the knowledge of any one, that in any public office in the Province of Ontario did they dream of bringing from Quebec or Montreal a French Canadian woman to fill any employment whatsoever. Are we bound to be more generous, more complaisant than our neighbors, especially when we possess already persons who are fitted to do the work required in the present case?"

Well, I must say this to the hon. member: The gallantry of Frenchmen is proverbial; and certainly there is nobody among us who would not have been delighted to keep within our walls this Miss Maybee, who, by the way, they say is very pretty, as are, moreover, all English ladies. If my hon. friend, the member for North Simcoe, would visit our Province he would discover that the English and the French Canadians live on the best possible terms; he would see that in many cases Englishmen marry French Canadian women and that French Canadian men marry English women. If one may judge by the fruit of their affections, it is certain that they make good matches, for it does not appear that, either on the one side or the other, they are disposed to break the bonds of union. In order to conceal somewhat the sentiment which overrules him—and this sentiment is nothing else but fanaticism—the member for North Simcoe tells us that it is necessary that the nation should speak but one language, if it wishes to become homogeneous. He has quoted, to this effect, several extracts from newspapers in Ontario and elsewhere. I will quote for him a work which, I think, possesses fully as much authority as these newspapers. This is what on this point the great dictionary, of Larousse says at the word "nationality":

"NATIONALITY: And in the first place what is a nationality? What is it which gives it its character? What is it that makes a nation? Is it the community of origin and race? By no means, for there is no people which has not been more or less mixed during the course of ages with foreign elements, and there is no race which is not sub-divided into several nationalities. Is it unity of language? Community of language is one of the greatest characteristics of a nation; but it is not alone sufficient to stamp it, because a nation perfectly united and homogeneous may include populations speaking different languages. Can it be said, for example, that Brittany, Provence and Alsace at the present time separated from us, do not belong to the French nationality, because they speak in those countries languages which are not those of Touraine and the Isle de France? If this point of view is taken it must be affirmed that Alsace ought not to be French but German."

But the hon. member will perhaps say: You quote in this connection French authorities, but in my eyes these authorities have hardly any value. Well, I will quote for him other authorities, which have much more weight than the newspapers which he has read to this House. I will read to him the words of a Governor who has left behind him a very great popularity among us, and who has gone to gather in the Indies, and wherever the English Crown may send him, new laurels. I refer to Lord Dufferin. This is what he said about the French Canadians:

"At this moment the French Canadian race, to which you belong, is engaged in a generous rivalry with your fellow-subjects of English origin, the end of which is to see which of the two will contribute most to the moral, material, and political advancement, as well as to the prosperity of the country. There is not one student, man of business or of science, politician, or writer, of either origin, who does not feel himself inspired by this noble emulation. The issue of this conflict depends on the success of your efforts, on the efficiency of your discipline and of your education upon the character of the moral, and intellectual atmosphere which you create in this region." These words were spoken in reply to any address, which was presented to him by Laval University in Quebec. On another occasion the same noble Lord expressed himself as follows:—

"I think that Canada should esteem itself happy in owing its prosperity to the mixture of several races. The action and the reaction of several national idiosyncrasies, the one upon the other, give to our society a freshness, a coloring, an elasticity, a vigor, which without them would be wanting to it. The statesman who would seek to obliterate these distinctive characteristics would be truly badly advised.

"Whatever it may be elsewhere, the French race in Canada has learned to appreciate the advantages of moderation, this golden rule of societies, and the necessity of arriving at practical results by sacrificing the demands of a too inexorable logic, and by settling grave difficulties by generous compromises."

There is something more yet. If we go further back still in the political history of our country, we find that those who made the Constitution, which governs us since we have been under British rule, have always taken scrupulous care not to wound the prejudices, or the national or religious susceptibilities of the various peoples who inhabit Canada. I have taken the pains to read the debates which took place in England when they gave us the Constitution of 1774. Immediately after this Constitution was given us, a Constitution by which they took away the trial by jury and the writ of habeas corpus; a petition was signed at Quebec, addressed to Her Majesty, asking for the restitution to the citizens of Canada, of the trial by jury and the writ of habeas corpus. Very interesting debates took place in the English House of Commons, at this period, and we find in the Parliamentary History, in volume 18, what follows. It is Sir Robert Smith, a member of the House of Commons, who is speaking:

"Whoever reflects upon the excellencies of the British laws, whoever considers them in theory, or sees the daily advantages of them in practice, whoever justly admires them for their peculiar lenity, moderation, equity, and impartiality, would wish to see them extended over the whole face of the British Empire; but if there are local and circumstantial reasons, arising from the national character of the people, their language, customs, usages, institutions, and I will even add, their prejudices, which in this case ought to be consulted, and not only consulted but, in some measure, indulged; but if there are reasons arising from these various circumstances, that make it impossible for the English laws to be adopted in their original purity, I will venture to affirm, that a legislator is not only justified but that it is an essential part of his duty, so to alter and modify these laws as may best adapt them to the peculiar genius and temper of the people, so as to become the best rule of civil conduct possible, and the best calculated to promote their general happiness. It was ever the maxim of the greatest legislators of antiquity, to consult the manners and dispositions of the people, and the degrees of improvement they had then received, and to frame such a system of laws as was best suited to their then immediate situation."

Such were, at this epoch, the precautions taken in order not to wound the religious sentiments and the national sentiments of the various races which then peopled Canada. When the English Parliament itself gives such an example of conciliation and moderation, I think that it is in very bad part for the hon. member for North Simcoe to wish today to bring to an end the old traditional British fair play, and to oppress the minority, as he desires to do by this Bill. I may say also that it was not because the English population was fairly large that so much care was taken of Canada at this time; nor was it because she was very influential. I am going to quote what was said then before a committee of the House which, before passing the Act to amend the Quebec Bill, summoned before it General Murray and General Carleton, and heard them respecting Canadian affairs. This committee sat on the 2nd June, 1774. A question was put to General Carleton and this is how he answered:

"The Protestants in Canada are under 400, about 360; but the French inhabitants who are all Catholics amount to 150,000.

"Lord NORTH. Are those 360 men of substance?"

"Gen. CARLETON. Much the greatest part of them are not. There are some that have purchased seigniories, some in trade and some reduced soldiers; but the majority are men of small substances."

"Mr. JENKINSON. Is there much intercourse or communication between those 360 and the rest of the Province?"

"Gen. CARLETON. Very little.

"Lord NORTH. Are these people, upon the whole, proper and eligible for an Assembly to be chosen from them?"

"Gen. CARLETON. I should apprehend, by no means."

Well, Mr. Speaker, as we see when those precautions were taken, about which I spoke a few moments ago, it was not merely in order to protect the English minority, because Gen. Carleton answers that the English population which dwelt in Canada at that period was far from being influential and important. But if at that time there were men of elevated views, practical men, who asked that the people of the Province of Quebec might be placed on a footing of equality with the other British subjects; there were also at that time, men of narrow minds, men wishing to excite prejudices, as there exist such at the present day. I discovered while making the researches, which I have given to the House, a remarkable incident which I must relate. There happened to live, at the time in question, a certain Richard Whitworth, who was probably one of the political ancestors of the hon. member for North Simcoe, if one may judge from his remarks. The House of Commons had returned from the House of Lords, where they had attended to hear the sanction of the Bills. These are the words, which I again borrow from the history of England:

"SIR,—I have often wished that some member would take notice of the language in which the King's assent is given. We are just returned from the House of Lords, and I think this a very proper time to move, that by an address, or Bill, whichever may be thought most proper. His Majesty be desired to give his assent in his own language. I hate a dishonest language. Le Roi le veut. Let the royal assent, sir, be given in the language of truth. We have, sir, even in our proceedings, Die Martis, Die Lunae. I could wish they were abolished. The ceremony of the King's assent being given in French, is the remains of Norman slavery; a disgrace to the British Parliament, and which I hope will induce some member to move that either an address or Bill be forwarded to obtain the royal assent for the future, to be given in good honest English. I am fully satisfied it would make the people much happier. (The House was in a continual laugh.)

"The speaker replied very gravely that, as the matter was of a very weighty nature, he thought it would be proper that the House should take time to consider of it. This occasioned a second flow of good humor. The House, however, was adjourned immediately."

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe is going to meet with the same fate as the proposition made by this Mr. Whitworth in the House of Commons of England. It was in 1774, that this destroyer of French made his speech in the English House of Commons. In the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Simcoe, when introducing the measure now under consideration, he quoted a portion of Lord Durham's report on the affairs of Canada; he has only quoted that portion which applied to Lower Canada. He spoke of the troubles and difficulties which existed in Quebec in 1837 and in 1838. We know that at this period the people of the Province fought in order to obtain those liberties of which we are so proud to-day. Several of them ascended the scaffold; others were exiled, and the constitutional liberties acquired with the price of the blood of our ancestors, are to-day shared in by the English who live in Canada. After listening to the speech of the hon. member, one would be led to believe that difficulties existed only in Lower Canada. Nevertheless, we find in Lord Durham's report that difficulties existed also in Upper Canada. This is what he says:

"The Irish Roman Catholics complain loudly and with reason about the existence of Orangism in this Colony. They are justly indignant that, in a Province, which their loyalty and their bravery has effectually aided in preserving, their feelings are outraged by the processions and the banners of this association. The leaders probably hope to make use of this sort of standing conspiracy, of this illegal organisation in order to win for them political power; it is an Irish-Tory institution, having rather a political complexion than a religious one. The organisation of this body allows its leaders to exercise a powerful influence on the populace. And it is stated that at the last elections the Tories carried several seats by means of the violent acts committed by the rabble thus placed at their disposal. But it must not be a matter of surprise, if the existence of such an institution, wounding one class by its scornful hostility to its religion, and another class by its violent opposition to its policy, should excite among the two classes a profound indignation, and should seriously contribute to the want of confidence with which the Government is regarded."

It is seen, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member had desired to be impartial he would have quoted that portion of the report which concerns Upper Canada. But no, he has taken good care not to do that; he has limited himself to quoting what may be stated to the discredit of the Province of Quebec. He has designedly omitted the other side of the question, because a man possessing his vast knowledge could not but be aware of all that is contained in Lord Durham's report, but he has only read the passages which might be of use to him in the battle which he is now carrying on in Ontario. But, Mr. Speaker, Lord Durham is not the only person who mentioned these difficulties, Lord Metcalfe himself in letters which he sent to Mr. L'ANGELIER (Montmorency).

England, while he was living in Canada, found occasion to relate the manner in which this political contest was carried on. This is what he said:

"The strife of parties is much keener in Upper Canada than in Lower, because in the latter the French party is so overwhelming, that no popular movement in favor of their enemies could be incited; but, in Upper Canada, the strength of the Conservative and the Reform parties being more evenly balanced the contest is more lively and occasionally gives an opportunity for disorders. It is under conditions such as these, that the Orange lodges do much mischief. Organised at first, I think, as political associations, rather than as religious combinations, they nevertheless tend to excite religious dissensions. If an unscrupulous Conservative desires to carry an election or to get the mastery in a public meeting, he gathers a party of Orangemen or he collects a party of Orangemen, or Irish Protestants, armed with clubs, Orangemen being always on the Conservative side, although many Conservatives are not Orangemen. Lately a cross was planted here to point out the place where a Roman Catholic church was shortly to be erected; during the night the cross was cut down, and there was substituted for it a placard declaring that no Roman Catholic church should ever be built there."

Well, if we admit that we are not absolutely perfect in the Province of Quebec, people will acknowledge that they are not altogether angels who live in the Province of Ontario. Respecting the right of minorities, I desire to quote, to this House, the words uttered by the Hon. Mr. Mercier in a speech which he delivered in Montreal on the 6th of November last; and in which he has traced with a master hand, like a great politician as he is, the rights of minorities:

"Some people with evil intent have desired to profit by the settlement of the question respecting the Jesuit Estates, to excite prejudices against the majority in this Province, by accusing them of being unjust towards the Protestant minority; and it is alleged very falsely that this minority was ill-treated, and that it had not the complete exercise of its rights. The rights of a minority may be looked upon from four points of view: 1. From the religious point of view; 2. From the civil point of view; 3. From the educational point of view; 4. From the political point of view. Surely it will not be alleged that the Protestant minority does not exercise, and does not claim with success, all its rights in our Province, from the religious, political, and civil points of view. Nobody will dare to say that Roman Catholics prevent Protestants from practising their religion in as free a manner as they practise it themselves. There are Protestant churches everywhere, even in centres which I might call exclusively Roman Catholic; and we have it yet to learn of the smallest insult having been offered to Protestant congregations, when they judge fit to assemble together. As to political and civil rights, they are recorded in our codes and our constitution; and it has never entered the mind of anyone to say that the Protestants had any reason to complain, in this respect. As to the rights respecting education, it is but right to state exactly what they are, in order to make to disappear any ambiguity which might exist in this respect. But, before doing this, let us state plainly that the law declares the two languages—French and English—to be official; that in practice all our public documents are printed in these two languages; that in the Legislature both are spoken; and very often we French Canadians answer in English the speeches made in English by our colleagues of another origin; and that we take special pains to render to them, in this connection, all possible assistance, in order to remove any pretext for complaint. The same thing is done in our courts of justice, where, very often, French Canadian advocates plead in English, out of courtesy to their brethren of foreign origin; and, although we are not bound to do so, each time when in our public departments we have to write to a person speaking the English language, we do it in his own tongue. This is an invariable rule, which I believe has no exception, or at least if there are exceptions they are so rare that it would not be reasonable to take any notice of them."

"As to the education question, I do not think that there is a minority better treated, in this respect, than that of the Province of Quebec; and, as I do not desire to have my own evidence accepted, I have taken care to summon that of the Rev. Mr. Rexford, the Protestant Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction. Let them know, once for all, that the Protestant minority is well treated in this Province; it is treated generously, liberally, and there is no country in the world in which the majority has less of religious and national prejudice than in the Province of Quebec. The letter of the Rev. Mr. Rexford makes us acquainted with the situation; let us hope that it will produce salutary effect in the other Provinces, where they seem disposed to forget the rules of justice by threatening the minority with the loss of those rights which they possess here. * * * In conclusion, let me beg of you, numerous as you are, not to forget that we have formed the national party with your consent, with your support, with the consent and support of all Liberals in the Province of Quebec; that this party is the outcome of an honorable alliance and has enabled me to form the present Government which in its inception was called national, has remained national since, and will remain national so long as I am at its head.

"That is to say, we have broken from old party lines, we have given up certain traditions, looked upon as dangerous, and certain ideas condemned by respected authorities, in order to publish a new programme, sufficiently liberal to assure the public prosperity, but also sufficiently conservative not to disturb good citizens. This programme will be respected, this Government will be maintained, and this party will live under these conditions, and not otherwise. I reckon upon having all honest people on my side to enable me to keep this promise and to make this decision respected."

These are the terms in which the Hon. Mr. Mercier established the principles on which the national party in the Province of Quebec is based. These are the few remarks which I desired to make. I have endeavored to make them with all possible moderation, and I trust that I have not wounded any feeling which deserves respect. Before concluding, let me be permitted to thank the English members in this House for having taken up the defence of this beautiful French language, which we all love so much. One of them, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), has delivered, in this connection, an admirable speech. At the risk of losing his own personal popularity he has not been afraid to lift up his voice in maintaining the defence of the French minority in the North-West Territories, and in proclaiming at the same time the imprescriptible rights of the French language. We have in this courageous proceeding a new proof of his grand character, which enables him to rise above all narrow prejudices in order to render to every one what is due to him, without regard to consequences. Besides such noble conduct is not without precedent; we always will remember that it was his illustrious father who, in the old Parliament, raised his voice and asked for an indemnity in favor of the victims of the troubles in 1837 and 1838. For this reason, the names of both are written in ineffaceable characters on the ever grateful hearts of the citizens of the Province of Quebec. The abolition of the French language is asked for. Why? Is it because it was the first to awaken the echoes of the virgin forests of this country? Is it because French discoverers opened up to civilisation these vast Territories at the present time peopled by the English? Is it because French missionaries went and poured out their blood, in order to teach the Indians, who dwelt in these places, the first rudiments of christianity and civilisation? The country represented by the member for North Simcoe is situate on the shores of the same great lake which formerly heard the moans of the French martyrs, whom the Indians put to death with most horrible tortures. These were cries of Frenchmen, and at this time there were not there any Englishmen to protest against the use of the French language. These unfortunate Jesuits, who in this way shed their generous blood, were far from suspecting that later on a member representing a county bearing the name of this great Lake would rise in this House to insult the French language. They were far from dreaming that this soil which they had watered with their blood would yield so bitter a harvest; they little thought that their great work would be in this way so quickly sent into oblivion by those very people, who, this very day, reap the fruit of their labors, as well as of their heroic courage. If the member for North Simcoe wishes to abolish the French language let him commence by tearing off from the coat of arms of the English monarchy these extremely French words: "Dieu et mon droit,"—"Honi soit qui mal y pense." These extremely French mottoes blaze above the heads of the judges on their bench. What does the member for North Simcoe mean by not having asked for the disappearance of the remainder of this barbarous old custom? How does it happen that he has not yet protested against the use of the French language in sanctioning the Bills in this country, as well as in England? You can never abolish the French language; for if, unfortunately, there are to be found men who desire its abolition, there are also men with honest hearts who know how to respect stipulations made in the past, and to place themselves above prejudices of race and religion, to whom is visible nothing but holy and immutable justice. Evil be to those who come forward in this way to light up the fire of discord and to appeal to the most dangerous prejudices. History will hold them severely accountable for their want of wisdom and patriotism. One of our poets, Fréchette, who has won so much honor for the French language in Canada, has, in some admirable verses, given advice which I recommend to the serious consideration of the member for North Simcoe:

"He whose glance governs the universe, in His wisdom gave this fruitful soil to the various nations, as a father's free gift. Christian feeling should maintain the equilibrium of peace among all the children in this common cradle. Their peaceful occupation has lasted for fifty years—the twig has become a great tree and spreads itself afar over the plain. Evil be to those serpents whose baleful breath spreads throughout its branches, pestiferous breathings of hatreds, conflicts and rivalries,"

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is the sixth day of this debate, and, certainly, I think my hon. friend opposite will agree with me it is time it should be finished. I should like to ask my hon. friend whether he thinks we cannot have the division to-night.

Mr. LAURIER. I am quite sure, that unless we sit until 6 o'clock in the morning, we cannot have the division at this sitting. I will, however, do my very best, without committing myself at all, to bring the debate to a close to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is usual that there should be some understanding of this kind across the floor, and if I had some assurance from my hon. friend that we could close the debate to-morrow, I would not object to an adjournment.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will understand that this is a debate in regard to which it is more difficult than usual to have an understanding across the floor. However, I will say this: I have every reason to hope that we shall close the debate to-morrow, and I will do my very best to bring it to a close then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under these circumstances, I will not oppose the motion of my hon. friend for the adjournment of the debate, and I will move that it be made the first Order of the day to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 1 a. m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 21st February, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 95) respecting Agricultural Fertilisers (from the Senate).—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for second reading of Bill (No. 10) to further amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 50, respecting the North-West Territories; the motion of Mr. Davin in amendment thereto, and the motion of Sir John Thompson in amendment to the amendment.

Mr. AMYOT. Owing to the fact that this House consented, on my motion last night, to adjourn the debate, and owing also to the fact that a great many members desire to leave to-night, I will shorten my remarks as much as possible. Before entering into the merits of the amendment, which we have to discuss and upon which we are called upon to vote, I will say a few words in answer to the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That hon. gentleman persists in saying that the treaties never insured to the French Canadians, or to those speaking the French language in this country, the use of that language. He has repeatedly said that the language is the essence of a people's existence, so it must be the first privilege of a people. I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the Articles of Capitulation of Quebec, dated 18th September, 1759, where we find the following as having been demanded and granted:—

“That the inhabitants shall be preserved in the possession of their houses, goods, effects and privileges—”

The word “privileges” is there. What privilege is greater than the language of the people?

—“granted upon their laying down their arms.”

They laid down their arms, to take them up again for the defence of the British flag. They knew only one language then, but, with their old gun and their old French language, they succeeded in keeping this country in the possession of the British Crown. Now, if the hon. gentleman looks at the capitulation of Montreal, signed in French and English, he will find that it is stipulated that

“The French Canadians shall continue, as subjects of the King, to be governed according to the custom of Paris, and the laws and usages established for this country.”

If that does not include in the first place the language, I do not know what it includes. Then I will refer the hon. gentleman to the Treaty of Paris, which was written only in French. It was signed on the 10th February, 1763. I have had the first article translated, because we do not find it in English. This is what it says:

“There will be an universal, and perpetual, Christian-like peace, as well over land as over sea, and a sincere and immovable friendship will be established between their Britannic Majesties * * * and between their heirs and successors, Kingdoms, States, provinces, countries, subjects and vassals of whatsoever kind and condition they may be, making no exception for rank or fortune; so that the High Contracting parties will bestow the very greatest attention upon the maintenance between themselves and said States and subjects of this friendship and intercourse, without permitting from henceforth, on one side or the other, the commission of any acts of hostility, either by land or sea, on any pretext whatever; and they will carefully avoid all that which might tend to impair for the future the union so happily established, endeavoring, on the contrary, to secure for each other in turn on all occasions, all which may contribute to their mutual glory, interests and advantages. * * * There will be a general forgetfulness of all that may have been done or committed before or since the beginning of the war now put an end to.”

You must not lose sight of the events of that time. There had been a fight; both armies had behaved most gloriously; we had about 12,000 men against 60,000 on the other side, and sometimes the fortune was for us and sometimes against us. The last battle, which was fought on the field of St. Foye, was in favor of our arms. But then the Governor de Vaudreuil, one of the most miserable creatures that ever came to this country, gave us up. After that our troops went to Montreal; our brave generals were discouraged at seeing such cowardice and such treason on the part of the Governor. But the Governor went up to Montreal and there again capitulated. Then our troops went back to France, and afterwards there was signed in France, a treaty between England, France and Portugal, which was a treaty of peace. The different countries that had been the subject of dispute were divided between these kingdoms, and it was a cession of peace and nothing else. That is the reason why, the other day, when the hon. gentleman spoke of the conquest, I said it was a cession, and not a conquest. I will now draw the special attention of the hon. member to chapter 18 of 14 George III, 1774, which is “An Act to make more effectual provisions for the Government of the Province of Quebec in North America.” The preamble says:

“Whereas His Majesty, by His Royal proclamation bearing date 7th October in the third year of his reign, thought fit to declare the provisions which had been made in respect to certain countries, territories and isles in America, ceded to His Majesty by the Definitive Treaty of Peace concluded on the 10th of February, 1773.”

I will not take up the time of the House in reading the Act; but I will quote, for the satisfaction of the hon. member for North Simcoe, sections 4 and 8 of that statute. In those times the use of the French language was looked upon as so important that in 1790 an ordinance was passed “for the better preservation and due distribution of the ancient French records.” In the face of that I wonder how the hon. member can pretend that the use of the French language is not fully recognised by the treaties and the ancient laws. I will not take up the time of the House in reading any of these statutes, but I will remark that the British North America Act virtually makes the English and French languages official in this country. Then we have the Act which erects the North-West Territories and which establishes the use of the French language. Now, my hon. friend says that the perpetuation of a race is only possible by means of one language. I admit that there is a great deal in that, though I will not admit it fully. But in his mind the language is the essence of a nation. The second proposal is this: "We have the right to destroy you French, and we will do it." Well, I wonder where he gets that right. Is it in Divine law, or human law, or in the ius gentium? Perhaps he gets it out of some wicked hearts, as I do not know where else he could get it. I do not find any source or trace for such a right. He says: "Why do you get excited when I say that? I am calm," he says, "I am moderate, but you get excited." Mr. Speaker, a big man may come to you and calmly say, "Please give me your money." He may take a man by the throat and say, "Keep quiet and I will choke you;" and he will be calm, but he will not be just or right. It is perfectly astounding to hear the representatives of three or four millions say to the representatives of one million and a half, "We are going to make you disappear, we are calm, be calm." Well, a man who makes such proposals deserves simply to be laughed at, and that is the only answer I will give the hon. member on that point. Now, he says that we only want one language. Why? Is it for the good of the country? I presume that when there are two or three, or four races in a country, it stimulates them to good objects. Every one wants to do as well or better than his neighbor, and it is for the good of the nation. Is it for the peace of the country? Sir, we have had the two languages here since 1760, and have we had any trouble, have we had any fighting? In the United States they have only one language, it is true, but within a century they have had a war that cost more lives and more money than any other war the world has seen during the last 400 years. I do not see that any good reason has been given for the use of one language only. At all events, if it is necessary, it is now too late to say so. Confederation has gone into effect, and if one language only was necessary we should have been warned of it before we entered Confederation. It is too late now to tell us that we want only one language, one nation. If we want to change the terms and condition of the charter, we shall have to begin over again. If we are not willing to stand by the treaty that has been made, if we desire to change the conditions, then we shall have to begin at the beginning; because in law the consent of the parties is given upon certain facts, and when those facts are erroneous the convention is null and void. My hon. friend is too good a lawyer not to know that. Every time the hon. gentleman has a chance he brings up the Riel affair. I wish the hon. gentleman was in his seat; at all events, I will say what I intended, and he will be able to read it in the Hanard. What is the Riel affair? He does not seem to have understood it since it occurred, although it is a very simple matter. I shall not undertake to discuss the merits of that affair, but I want to state how, as a matter of fact, it occurred, and how it presented itself to the country. Riel had had his trial and had been recommended to mercy. For my part, I had always looked upon Riel as having been a madman, working for a noble cause, if you will, but still a madman, who, when he spoke of religion or politics, became perfectly insane, so much so that he wanted to go to Rome and be made a pope. He wanted to rule over the whole world. After his condemnation and the recommendation to mercy, it was stated that the man was mad, and the Government became anxious about it, and sent doctors up to examine him, and we know what report they made. Under the circumstances, petitions were signed to obtain his pardon, and his pardon was promised us. Then, Mr. Speaker, there is this point to which I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friend: when the Government was ready to grant the pardon, or to confine the man in an asylum for the rest of his days, what occurred? Petitions were presented signed by those whom the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) represents. The question then rested between those petitions and the promises of the Government and the Province of Quebec. It had been promised by the Ministers, that if we prayed for Riel's release it would be granted. The Government preferred to accede to those people who signed those petitions, and that was the origin of the trouble to-day. The Government preferred to grant the request of those petitioners, and we felt insulted. That is the whole case in a nutshell. If my learned friend cannot understand it, I am sorry; but these facts cannot be changed. Immediately afterwards the ministerial papers and many others joined hands to form a new party, and, as we had to give it a name, we called it the National party. There is no more harm in calling it by that name than there is in calling our fiscal policy the National Policy. We had a right to use the word National as other men in other countries use it. We chose that name, and since then that party has existed in the Province of Quebec. It commands a majority in the Province, even although my hon. friend opposite (Mr. McCarthy) calls it a bastard party. I do not know anything regarding his domestic habits; but I may tell him that, in our Province, if a man used such an expression, we would say that he had been very badly brought up; and if he were to say that in a private house, he would be put out. I will not give the hon. gentleman any other reply, except the emphatic statement that our party is not bastard. It has for its parents, love of country and self-respect; but we would prefer that it should be bastard rather than it should have a father like the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It was under those circumstances that we broke away from our allegiance to our old chiefs. It pained me to leave the ranks of those with whom I had been fighting for twenty years; it was hard to give up all my old friends; but my conscience dictated my action, and I accepted the consequences. That party exists; and I must say to the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) that, if he does not know it, he reminds me of the old Frenchmen who are still working for Napoleon I.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I did not say this party did not exist. I said it did exist; but that the old Liberals still existed too.

Mr. AMYOT. There may be a few—there were not enough, at all events, to get power. But please remember it is a political party, whatever there may be in a name. I trust that certain parties will cease presenting the position of that party under false colors. I presume we have the right to form a party, and if it should not please us we have the liberty to give it up and form another. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) attacked our schools; I wonder if the hon. gentleman has ever read any of the books which are given to our scholars; I wonder if he knows what is taught in our schools! He seems to ignore the fact that in the Province of Quebec we have Protestant schools which are conducted on the same lines as ours, except that the Protestants teach Protestant doctrines and the Catholics teach Catholic doctrines; but as regards the rest they are the same. If the hon. gentleman wishes to visit our schools we will admit him with French politeness, with which we are trying to equalise British politeness; and if the hon. gentleman sees what is taught there, he will see that we teach our children to obey the laws of God and man, to be faithful to the Crown and to the laws which ensure the welfare of man and of a country. It is a singular habit on the part of that sect—I do not see there is any other name I could give it—to be always making an attack. We never attack. In the Riel matter we were on the defensive. The members of that sect undertake to attack our schools, but we never attack the schools of Ontario. Why do they not leave our schools alone, when we let their schools alone? let everybody mind his own business. Next, the hon. gentleman attacked Mr. Mercier. The politics of Mr. Mercier are discussed in the Legislature three months, and every day of the year in the press, and some persons hold that he is very good, while others say that he is very bad. The hon. member for North Simcoe, however, imagines that in two words he will condemn that hon. gentleman in the face of the universe. I only wish he would meet Mr. Mercier on the stump, and then the hon. member for North Simcoe would find that, in spite of his talents, it would be very hard work to convince his audience that Mr. Mercier is guilty of half the sins with which he is charged. Mr. Mercier has done more for the good of his country since he has been in power than the hon. gentleman will ever be able to do harm. I now come to the Bill which is at present under the consideration of the House. I desire to say a word or two in regard to the preamble. There is a great difference between the preamble of this Bill as compared with the preamble of the Jesuit Bill. The preamble of the Jesuit Bill was a recital of facts and nothing else, and we had either to accept the Bill as a whole or to reject it entirely. The preamble of the hon. gentleman's Bill, however, is a preamble for which this House will be responsible, and contains a declaration of principle. As the Bill is unacceptable to the House, an amendment has been proposed. The hon. member for North Simcoe wants to take away the whole of the French language in the North-West; but the amendment says: no; we will take only part away. It occurs to me that we are legislating to take away from the half-breeds rights secured by statute, without even allowing them to be heard or without consulting them, and without their being represented in any way; and this is done at a time when no one expected that any such legislation would be proposed. The amendment seems to be unjust to the people of the Province of Quebec. If we diminish the strength of the French language in any part of the Confederation, we reduce the strength of the language as a whole. That is unjust, because when we entered into Confederation it was promised that we would receive full justice and never lose any of our rights. Since that time we have been asked to contribute millions to open up the North-West and to build up magnificent railroads. Yet that is the way we are recompensed now. I think it is both unjust and unfair. I believe, further, that the passing of this Bill would establish a bad precedent, for if we once declare that we will change either the Imperial or Federal charters, the door will be opened for all kinds of trouble and confusion. Every year we will have petitions sent to England, or forwarded here, asking for repeals and changes, and there will never be peace in the Confederation. We should lay down the rule that our constitutional charters shall never be changed except by the unanimous consent of the parties concerned. The first change in those charters is to do injustice to these four or five thousand Canadians of French origin who live on the prairies of the North-West, and who have no representative in this Parliament. By the Bill proposed we do not confer any favors on them; we take away from them important rights without any reason whatever. I warn my friends from other Provinces who are in favor of the Federal system, that this first change may lead to other changes and that the end will result in legislative union. There is a germ of legislative union in the Bill of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). It is an insult to nearly half the population of Canada; it contains false principles; and, unfortunately, the Government, to a certain extent, yield to it. The Bill is unjust to the half-breeds, because it takes away from them vested rights granted to them by this Parliament in the Act of 1877. If you give a man a hundred dollars, you have no right to take twenty dollars back from him; and yet this is exactly the way in which Parliament proposes to treat the people of the North-West. This Bill, if adopted, would be unfair to the half-breeds, to whom we owe much, because through them we have been enabled to make treaties with the Indians and to enter peaceably into the North-West. I have documents here, which, if I could detain the House by reading, would show that our possession of that territory is due in a great measure to the half-breeds. For all these benefits we have received, the recompense proposed by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is that we should take away their language and their rights. For years we have ill-treated this people. We sent a legion of surveyors amongst them to change the form of their lands, against their wishes, and when they complained we laughed at them. We pushed them to rebellion. When they held indignation meetings to protest against the conduct of the Government, we took that for a declaration of war and we sent our Mounted Police to fire upon them. Then we sent four thousand troops against them, and at a cost of a hundred lives and six million dollars we managed to destroy their property and to kill many of them. There were the claims of Indians and half-breeds. To the Indians we gave land which was not transferable, but to the half-breeds we offered land or scrip. These children of the prairie naturally preferred this scrip, and besides the men who gave the scrip were the speculators with money and whiskey, who cheated them out of their property. This I know from my own knowledge, because I have seen it done. I shall not at the present time refer to the letter of Monseigneur Grandin, but we all know his complaints. It is our duty as a nation, having some respect for itself, that we should cease to inflict evils on the people of these Territories, and that we should not inflict another one on them by depriving them of their language. In the prayer you have just read, Mr. Speaker, we prayed God to have peace and harmony, and we should remember that peace and harmony are as desirable for these poor people as for us in this House. If we want to be just, if we want to be proud of being Canadians, we must see that this injustice shall cease. I do not say that it is altogether the fault of the Government, for probably they are not acquainted with the fact that this injustice is inflicted, but they should ascertain it, and I believe that if they did know the facts they would see that justice should be dealt out to these weak people. There is also another grievance to the effect that when the country was divided for election purposes, the division was such that the French people could not elect a representative. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) states that there is unanimity in the Council on this question. That is a very poor argument, when it is remembered that we began by preventing the half-breeds from electing the representatives they were entitled to. Such an argument will, I am sure, have very little weight with an intelligent body of men, such as compose this House. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that there is a national danger in abolishing the French language, as is proposed by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)? Do not you think the French language is the best safeguard against annexation? If the people of this country were all English-speaking, annexation would come in a very short time. What will prevent annexation is the determination of the Province of Quebec to maintain its own language. The people there are not willing to give up the present state of affairs and risk going elsewhere. If we were not a loyal people, if we were not devoted to the Queen, if we were not loyal to the Confederation, does it not strike you, Mr. Speaker, that we might apply to our neighbors in the United States, and to our million of French Canadians there, for help? The United States never took any country by force, but at the same time they never refused a country which wished to be annexed to them. We do not want annexation, however. We want to remain Canadians. We want to form a grand nationality composed of the different races. We want Canada to remain a great country, and we want to form a part of it; but do not abuse that sentiment. You who believe in divorce, do not suppose that we are disposed to endure constant insults such as those thrown at us by certain portions of the English press, especially when they are repeated on the floor of this House by a party, led by a man of talent who stands at the head of the bar of Ontario. We are loyal, and we want to remain loyal. I repeat the words I quoted the other day, that the last gun which will be fired in defence of the British flag on this continent, will be discharged by a French Canadian; but there is another sentence which we must not forget, uttered by a traveller, who said that the first gun that would be fired for the independence of Canada, would be discharged by a French Canadian from the States. There is no danger with us. We are frank and loyal and just—just to the minority and just to every one; we never attack; we only want to keep what we have. Under the eyes of God, we want to grow and prosper with our neighbors and friends in this country, peaceably and harmoniously, and I implore that faction to stop their attacks, and to leave us to the peaceable enjoyment of our rights. What harm is done to them if our farmers speak French in their homes? When we come here as representatives of the people, do you find anything wrong with us—any dishonesty, any tricks, any complots against you? Are we not loyal subjects? Then, why not let us alone? What harm will it do you if the ordinances of the North-West Council are printed in French, so that the priests may read them to the loyal subjects who only understand French? What need is there to save a few paltry dollars, if, thereby, you throw the country into an immense danger? The responsibility of that faction is very great, but I know that the good sense of the country will soon put an end to their agitation. I am not threatening; I am only exposing the facts. If we want to form a large and compact country, let us not constantly be putting in the hands of one part of the population weapons which must be opposed by another part. Now, Sir, the hon. Premier through the hon. Minister of Justice, for whom I have the greatest personal respect, proposed the compromise amendment which has been offered to us. That compromise, I believe, is dictated by sincere and patriotic views. Whether I accept it or not, I am happy to see that both parties can forget their differences and join hands, in order to try to put a stop to this harmful agitation. It is true, the amendment itself attacks one of the roots of the tree of Confederation; but I am happy to see that the chiefs of both parties can agree to this compromise, without saying whether I can sanction it by my vote or not. In concluding my remarks, which I abridge so as to accommodate my hon. colleagues, I will repeat, that if we want the Confederation to go on, if we want harmony and prosperity in this country, we must cease to attack each other, we must respect the rights of each other, we must leave each one to the enjoyment of his aspirations, his religion and his language; we must give full liberty to everyone, so that all will be free to work for the common good of the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, while I refer to some matters which I deem it proper to refer to before this debate closes. I can endorse, most heartily, the sentiment given utterance to by the speaker who has just preceded me, as to our regard to the mutual rights of the inhabitants of the various Provinces. If we should treat each other in a spirit of disregard for those rights, it would be a misfortune, a calamity, to the country. I am not able to understand, however, that the rights of the French-speaking community of the North-West, with regard to language, are vested rights. They certainly are not vested rights in the sense of the rights conferred by the British North America Act on the French inhabitants of the Province of Quebec. These rights were granted by the North-West Territories Act in 1877, and, in my belief, it is quite competent for the Legislature which granted those rights to repeal the enactment by which they were granted. Now, I have noticed, in the treatment of this by almost all the speakers opposed to the Bill under consideration, a disposition to magnify the evils which are likely to result from this discussion, and to place on false grounds the object sought by the Bill, and the consequences likely to result from its passage. It is asserted that the Bill is conceived in a spirit of enmity to the French race, and that the effect of its passage would be to set the two races at each other's throats and to disturb all the good relations existing between them—that, in short, it is a public calamity, that the subject of the retention of the dual languages in the North-West should be mooted at all. If this is the case, we are unable to approach this subject in any sense without the consequences to which I have alluded. The real subject before us is not a design to assault the inhabitants of a great Province in this Dominion, to abridge their rights or to attack their language or their institutions, or to interfere with vested rights that exist in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act. That is not the design of this Bill. The hon. gentleman who brings this Bill before the House expressly disavows any such designs. The design of the Bill is to retrace the false step which, in the estimate of some members of this House, has been taken in forming the institutions of a new land, by repealing clause 110 of the North-West Territories Act and leaving to the people of those Territories the full and free exercise of Provincial rights in establishing their own institutions, without being handicapped by us by any legislation here, and thus replace them in the position of doing, as they should have had the right to do in the beginning, what they please in this matter.

Now, there are three plans before this House: There is the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); there is the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin); and there is the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir John Thompson). The first of these plans is a direct one, and the one which I prefer. It proposes to settle this question at once, so far as this Parliament is concerned. The second is in some respect of the same character as the first. It proposes to recognise the assertion as true that the existing state of things in the North-West Territories shall not be insisted on as permanent by this House; but it proposes to remove from our shoulders the responsibility of dealing with this question and to relegate it to the Assembly of the North-West Territories after the next elections, when that assembly shall have power to deal with the whole question. Plan number three is not only indirect but partial. It proposes, in the same indirect way, to shift the responsibility from our shoulders of dealing with this question and to place it upon the shoulders of the North-West Assembly, but it proposes to deal with only one feature of the case, namely, the use of the French language in the Legislative Assembly, leaving untouched the use of that language in the courts of the North-West and in the printing of the ordinances. In my opinion, the plan proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice is the least worthy of our consideration and support; and I must say that, after listening attentively to all the arguments advanced during the long debate on this question—which I do not consider a question that ought to create that degree of bitterness of feeling which exists—I am persuaded that we ought to settle this difficulty promptly and peremptorily in our capacity as the sovereign source of power in this matter, by retracing the steps we took in the year 1877. I cannot understand that the use of the French language in the courts, provided for by the 133rd clause of the British North America Act, contemplates the use of that language in courts such as these established in the North-West. The language of that section is as follows:—

“Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the House or the Parliament of Canada and of the House of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person, or in any pleading or process in, or issuing from, any court of Canada established under this Act, and in, or from, all or any of the courts of Quebec.”

Now, here is a remarkable difference in the language used regarding the courts of Quebec and the courts of Canada. Either language is to be used in any and all of the courts of Quebec, but they are both to be used in any court of Canada established under this Act only. What is a court of Canada established under this Act? The 101st section explains that:

So that reference is had in this 133rd clause to such courts as may be established in virtue of the authority conferred under section 101—such as the Court of Appeals, the Exchequer Court, or any court established as a court of Canada for the settlement of questions pertaining to the Dominion of Canada in which our French subjects and English subjects will meet for the purpose of trying cases from all the Provinces. But this clause does not, in my opinion, interfere with or apply to the courts of any Province in this Dominion, except the specially named courts of the Province of Quebec.

We have had a great deal of talk about Provincial rights in connection with this matter. In my opinion, any action but that proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe would be a violation of the fundamental principle of Provincial rights. The hon. member for North Simcoe proposes to repeal clause 110. He proposes to give the inhabitants of the North-West Territories the right to form their own institutions when they become a Province; he proposes to leave them in the full and unrestricted possession of Provincial rights. But the amendment of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice do not propose to do this; they only propose to make the condition, that we shall retain this authority and power which we have exercised and this law on the Statute-book until we have consulted the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories. The amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice proposes further, that we shall absolutely retain a portion of the abuse complained of, and only remove it in so far as it may apply to the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories; and neither amendment meets so fully the principle of Provincial rights as the proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe, the essence of which is that we shall withdraw our interference, and allow the people of the North-West to deal with this matter themselves. That is the proper and the direct way to deal with this question. I see no reason to change the opinion I have formed, or to withdraw my support from the Bill, which I announced I intended to support. The use of the dual language and Separate Schools are local institutions, which we have no right, as a Parliament, to impose upon any section of this country. They are institutions which should be established, which should be arranged for, which should be legislated upon, by the Provincial authorities of the Province in which they may exist. I do not say that I would not consider that the Governor in Council has not the power to veto a Bill of this kind on the ground of general advantage or in the general interests of the Dominion; but I do say that, in my belief, the Government has no right to establish local institutions in any portion of the territories of Canada. For that reason, I believe that this clause 110 should be repealed. We must remember that Canada was formerly a military colony; we must remember that divergencies existed between the old French colonies and the English colonies in America; and these differences of opinion, these differences of institutions, and these differences of instincts, have, to a certain extent, come down to the present day. Canada was a military colony; it had feudal institutions; and the thirteen colonies were quite different from Canada. The Saxon colonies are quite different in many respects from the colony of Quebec; it is natural, therefore, that friction should arise between these two systems, and it is in the last degree unwise to extend the area of that friction. It would be much better to restrict it to the Province where the question under debate was first at issue, as we would do by repealing this clause and leaving the people of the North-West to settle the matter by themselves, than to set ourselves by the ears, from one end of the Dominion to the other, as we have been doing.

The hon. the leader of the Opposition has made a speech, which, I can say most sincerely, was, in my estimation, a most able speech, one which I admired exceedingly both for its spirit and tone, and for the tact displayed in it by that hon. gentleman in dealing with that question; and one which I admired also for the sentiments it breathed in defence of his race and native tongue, in respect of which I could almost respond to the sentiments he uttered; but I think he was mistaken in saying that this Bill necessarily provokes enmity between the two races, that it necessarily sets them against each other in a spirit of hostility. I do not think it is necessary to take that view. I do not think the scope of the question extensive enough or the issues involved great enough to warrant the two great races setting themselves by the ears in this matter. It is a local question, a question affecting a certain locality in this Dominion, it is in one sense a small question at this moment, affecting only a few thousand people. It may be a great question as to the future, but at present it is a small question comparatively, and it is a question we may as well settle at once and take out of the way.

In the course of the speeches which have been made, I have been severely criticised in some respects. My hon. friend the member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry) took up an extract from a speech made by me at Essex (Centre) on the 12th July, in which I rather facetiously alluded to the alliance between my hon. friend the Minister of Customs and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works as being rather incongruous, and said that, when they were lying in the same bed, the representative of the French nationality and the grand master of the Orange Order, that the friendship was rather a peculiar and suspicious one; and that I thought they could not both be acting according to their principles, and that I thought my hon. friend the Minister of Customs would be the one who would be sold. I do not know that that remark should be considered as offensive. We have seen other incongruous spectacles; for instance, during this debate, Pilate and Herod have been made friends together for we have seen the leaders of the two political parties, no doubt from patriotic motives, acting in concert; and that is a very unusual thing to see. They have been endeavoring to arrange this matter in certain ways, whereas I think the simplest way would be to repeal the clause to which I have referred.

My hon. friend the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in the course of his very able speech, advanced the argument that it was necessary to keep up the French language in the North-West for the purpose of encouraging immigration; and the First Minister said he would be willing to have German made an official language there also, in order to encourage immigration. No doubt, he would be willing to go further and adopt the Gaelic or any other language for that purpose. The question is: is the retention of that language or any other necessary to encourage immigration into that country? In the year 1871, the hierarchy of your own Province, Mr. Speaker, issued a joint letter warning the French Canadians against emigrating to the New England States, which, it was said, would imperil their spiritual interests, which would prove very dangerous to themselves, and which was something they ought not to do. At the same time, the hierarchy requested the people of that Province who might desire to emigrate to migrate to the Canadian North-West. What was the effect of that letter; what was the effect of that warning and of those arguments; what was the effect of these mandates, in the name of the Church, upon the Canadian French of the Province of Quebec? Did they quit going to Massachusetts and flock in large bodies to the North-West? Did the existence of the dual language in the North-West draw thousands of the French Canadian people there, or did the fact that there was no dual language in Massachusetts and Vermont prevent them from going to those States? On the contrary, there are to be found in the New England States more French Canadians than there are inhabitants in Manitoba, the North-West and British Columbia together, with a score or more thousand added to that number. They have gone to New England in spite of that mandate; they have gone to a country where English is the only language spoken; they have refused to listen to their own hierarchy; they have done what they were entreated not to do, and they have not done what they were entreated to do. I think that is a fair argument to show that the retention of the French language in the North-West is unnecessary to promote immigration to that country. The Germans go there, and the Icelanders go there, though their languages are not official there, and I do not think that the absence of their language as an official one is the slightest bar to their immigration to that country.

In connection with this question of the anxiety of our French friends for the continuance of their rights—and it is a most natural anxiety on their part—it is, perhaps, a little significant that, one after another, the municipalities of the Province of Quebec are abolishing the use of the English tongue. I am informed that the great majority of those municipalities have already abandoned it. Wherever a municipal council petitions for power to abolish the use of English in its proceedings it is very soon obtained; an order is issued in the Official Gazette, and the use of English ceases. In view of this fact, I think our friends should not raise so much trouble in reference to the abolition of the use of French in a country which probably has no more population than an ordinary municipality in the Province of Quebec.

The hon. First Minister warned us of the terrible consequences of drawing up two races against each other. He said this was a question which could afford to wait, and a moment afterwards he said: For Heaven's sake, bury this and get it out of sight. It is certainly lamentable that two races should be drawn up against one another; but, if one race is drawn up, if that race is acting and aiming at a common purpose, it may become necessary to have some organisation in the other race, and our French friends have never, in my recollection, or, so far as I know, in the history of Canada, failed to press their own claims and to stand by their own interests. It may be necessary to watch the opposite party, because their devotion to their language, their religion and their race—which may be perfectly proper in their case and from their standpoint—may lead to demands, which, in the view of an impartial observer, ought not to be granted. In that case, the exhortation of the First Minister to beware of arraying one race against another, is out of place, because the English-speaking population in this country have always acted in a spirit of generosity and a spirit of magnanimity; and if the English-speaking people think it necessary to take some precautions for the future, it is not in a spirit of enmity to the French population, but, looking at the great North-West with all its resources, regarding it as the foundation of a great empire, we are justified in doing so if we have arrived at the conclusion that it is better at the outset to have the institutions there formed on the proper basis, when it can be done without any great con-tion, and to say that we will start with the English language and go on there with that language as the official one. I do not think it can be properly said by the First Minister that those who are in favor of that obviously common-sense arrangement are arraying one race against another.

Some of our speakers on this side appear to me to lack judiciousness. My hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), for instance, warned the French to beware of their enemies. Who are their enemies? I deny that they have an enemy in this House, or in this country, or that any demand is made in this Bill which indicates enmity to the French race in this Dominion. The hon. member from Iberville (Mr. Béchard), last night, in his temperate speech, spoke of the demagogues, whose designs were to provoke dissension and disaster. Was the hon. gentleman warranted in classing as demagogues those who seek for abolition of the dual language in the North-West? Is there anything like the spirit of the demagogue in this proposition to undo what we sincerely believe to have been a wrong step, and to place upon a proper basis the institutions for the future of a great country? If there is an act which is worthy of being characterised as an act of statesmanship which has come under my observation in this Parliament of Canada, it is an act of that character. Then the hon. gentleman read an extract from a speech delivered to his constituents last summer in which he proposed, as a remedy for all these unendurable evils which the French race was suffering at the hands of those who asked for equal rights—he proposes as a remedy annexation to the United States. Well, Sir, how much better off would his race be in that position? Would there be any less pressure that would tend towards unification of race and language? Would the influence brought to bear upon them be of a less aggravating character, if they wished to retain their isolation? Would the United States treat with a greater degree of forbearance than the Saxon population of this country does, the peculiar institutions of Quebec? Why, there would be danger of their being denied admission to the Union as is the case with Utah until they had adopted a Republican form of government and had rid themselves of medieval institutions.

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior says: "Oh, this is a small matter; what is the use of making this row over a cost amounting to $1,000 a year, or so? Let the whole thing go. Do not make the trouble you are making about this question." As I said before, it is not a matter of the cost; it is not a matter of the pressing importance of the question at this moment in any respect whatever. We are looking to the future, we are looking to the consequences in the future, and it is, because it is a comparatively small and trifling matter in itself, that we can now deal with it with so much greater facility and ease than we can by-and-by when it becomes a great matter, involving great issues in the North-West. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) tells us that the preamble is a matter of no great account. I agree with him. He says: Let the people decide. I agree with him most fully. The only fault I have to find with him is, that he will not act upon his assertion. He says: Let the people decide the question; and then he proposes to refuse to allow the people to decide the question. I say, let the people decide the question. Repeal the 110th clause, leaving them perfectly untrammelled; let them start de novo and decide whether they will have the dual language or not; leave them perfectly free to deal with their local institutions, without interference or meddling with them on our part.

My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, who, I see, is in his seat, had some strictures to make on my remarks, and I will ask the attention of the House for a moment while I refer to one or two of them. The hon. gentleman told us that the Protestants of Quebec did not complain. Well, I do not know that the Protestants of Quebec have any great reason to complain; it would be, however, only natural, as they are in a very small minority in that Province, that they should be cautious about making complaints, because the evincing of a spirit of captiousness, or what is termed such by the majority, might lead to their having greater reasons for complaint. But I have heard complaints from the Province of Quebec. For instance, I heard complaints last year about the degradation of the degrees of Protestant universities.

Mr. LAURIER. That has been remedied.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, these complaints led to the remedy of that evil. A Bill has been passed to remedy the evil, and the passage of that Bill is equivalent to a confession that the Protestants had, in this matter, just cause of complaint.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). They have no other cause of complaint.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe that all the grievances and the difficulties between the two races might be settled in the same spirit. Then we have the question of the division of the school funds. I do not know if that has been settled or not, but there have been some complaints about that—

Mr. LAURIER. That is before the Council of Education.

Mr. CHARLTON—taking the school funds paid by corporations, such as the Bank of Montreal, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, of whom the great majority of the stock holders are Protestants, and dividing the taxes paid by these corporations between Protestants and Catholics in relative proportion to the population, whereas they ought to be divided in proportion to the religion of those who paid the taxes.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Is that done in Ontario?

Mr. CHARLTON. Not now, but I understood that it was the case once. Complaint was made, and I think the evil has been remedied, although I speak under correction with regard to that matter. Then, the hon. gentleman makes an allusion to something which I have said in one of the speeches I made in the country, and which he thinks was of the most insulting character to the French population—something, I think, with regard to cutting a road to the St. Lawrence with the sword. Well, Mr. Speaker, upon one occasion, I forget where, when we were somewhat warm over these declarations in Quebec—and, by-the-bye, let me state that I am happy to learn that the language attributed to Mr. Mercier has been very much modified by a more authentic report of his remarks—but when we were somewhat roused by the talk about a French nationality, and French national institutions, and the building up of a French state at the mouth of the St. Lawrence, I did say, I think once, in one of my speeches, that if the French inhabitants of Quebec attempted to create a separate nationality, planting themselves upon the St. Lawrence and denying the western Provinces access to the sea, in that case it would lead to an attempt to cut a road to the sea with the sword. I have nothing to retract upon that score. If that attempt were made, such a result would unquestionably follow.

Now, Sir, a few words with regard to my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the criticisms made by that hon. gentleman upon the remarks I had made just before he spoke. I may say that I spoke without due preparation; I had only the time between ten o'clock in the morning, and three in the afternoon to prepare my brief, and in the haste of preparation I probably did fall into some inaccuracy, and amongst these inaccuracies was one, technical rather in its character, with regard to the course adopted by the United States Government when Louisiana was purchased in 1803. I stated that the United States Government, from the inception, had sought by every means to secure a single language, and had abolished the use of the French. But I find that for the first few years that policy was not so rigorously enforced as later on, and the use of French was permitted, to a limited extent, and in that sense my hon. friend had me at a disadvantage; for I had gone upon the assumption that the well understood general policy of the Government had been more vigorously enforced than probably was the case at the outset. But so far as the policy of the United States Government was concerned, with the new states along the Mississippi where French settlements were established, and in all these settlements outside of Louisiana proper, the French language was never used officially at all.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Civil Code of Louisiana was printed in French in 1825.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am referring to the territories away to the north along the Mississippi and the Missouri. But I am free to admit that in this criticism upon the policy of the United States with regard to Louisiana, I fell into a technical error, although the position I took in regard to the general policy of the United States with regard to Louisiana and to all other portions of the country originally settled by foreign nations and incorporated with the United States, was perfectly correct. Then the hon. gentleman indulged in some criticism about the use of the pronoun "we"; he seemed to be under an apprehension that I would convey the impression that he acted with me, or believed with me, in this matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, I always desire to avoid giving ground for the charge of egotism, and, consequently, avoid, as far as possible, the use of the pronoun "I." I do not like to see a large "I" used too freely. But, on this occasion, I find that the hon. gentleman himself used the word "we" in his speech, and used it on several occasions. In speaking upon this occasion when I used the word "we," I used it, not as including those who disagree with me, but referring to those, be their numbers great or small, who agree with me in this matter. Perhaps, if it suits the hon. gentleman, I may use the personal pronoun "I" and ignore the "we"—ignore all who are associated with me in this or other matters. But, in my opinion, this part of the hon. gentleman's criticism was a very "wee" matter indeed, and the spirit in which it was made was not one I admire very highly.

In the course of the speeches made by different members of the House, the motives of those who engaged in the Equal Rights movement during last summer have been very severely criticised. We have been termed fanatics and demagogues, and there is scarcely a term of disrespect in the political vocabulary that has not been applied to those gentlemen who saw fit to associate themselves in this movement in this House and in the country during last summer. I feel bound, under the circumstances, as the question has been raised, to say a few words in regard to this matter. What, probably, were the motives, I would ask, that actuated these thirteen men who stood up in this House and voted against the 188 members? What were, probably, the motives which actuated those men in the course they took after the prorogation of Parliament? Do you think, Sir, they were seeking after popularity? Was it with any desire to gain political advantage that those men united and embittered their foes and made foes of their friends? You, Sir, sat in this House on the night that vote was taken. Do you think any one of the thirteen stood up under flattering and encouraging circumstances or because there was a great advantage to be gained? No; no one will suppose that such was the case; and whatever may have been the motives which actuated those men, you can scarcely, under the circumstances, attribute that action to base, mercenary or dishonest motives. We felt that having taken that stand, it was perfectly proper to defend our position in the country. We felt that we were standing on principles that were just, and it was as proper to vindicate them upon the platform as upon the floor of the House of Commons. We thought we were resisting the investing of a dangerous order with special advantages and privileges. We may have been mistaken, but we believed that was the case, and, acting on that view, we submitted to the country similar arguments to those we had presented on the floor of this House. We believed we were resisting an unconstitutional reference to a foreign potentate. I believe it now, and believing it we felt bound to act on that belief. We believed we were resisting sectarian endowment from public funds. We believed this, and we held that it was establishing a precedent of the most dangerous character, and believing that we acted honestly before the country in denouncing it. We believed we were resisting a dangerous encroachment by clerical power. Believing this we denounced it. We did not propose, no man who has taken part in this agitation ever proposed, to deprive any subject in this country of any rights he possessed. No man has ever proposed to ask for himself what he was not prepared to give to every citizen in this country. We ask no special privileges; we merely resist the granting of special privileges. We ask equal rights for all, special privileges to none, a guarantee of the fundamental principle of liberty to the subjects of this country. I understand the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said he did not sympathise with the movement made by the Equal Rights party in discussing this question on the platforms of the country. I believe it was a proper way to influence public sentiment, and that it was necessary.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me for a moment to say that I do not think I said that; I did not mean to do so. I said I took no part, because I realised that no object would be gained.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood the reason why the hon. gentleman refrained from doing so was because he disapproved of it, and I am happy to receive his explanation. This movement, which is decried and condemned in this House, has, I believe, accomplished something; and, I believe, what this movement has accomplished is of the most salutary character. It has certainly awakened public attention to the existence of a great public danger. I believe it is due to this movement that the agitation exists in Manitoba with respect to the dual language and the Separate Schools; and the abolition of both of those evils, as I deem them to be, may be justly attributed to the agitation that commenced with the vote taken in this House on 29th March last. I believe this agitation has succeeded in arousing public sentiment in the North-West with respect to the dual language, and the fact that we are discussing to-day a Bill with respect to the abolition of the French language in the North-West, and that we have in the North-West a sentiment so pronounced as to have demanded the introduction of this Bill, is due to the agitation of the question of equal rights up and down throughout the country since the prorogation of the House last Session. The harvest is satisfactory; the results so far are abundantly satisfactory, if nothing else is accomplished; and if this Bill passes, or if the North-West is relieved of the burden of the dual language, there is nothing else to ask for, because the Constitution grants the rest.

Mr. LAURIER. What about the agitation in Quebec?

Mr. CHARLTON. We do not expect to have any. I do not say there has been such an agitation. I say there has been an agitation in Manitoba against the dual language and separate schools, and there has been an agitation in the North-West Territories, and it is a foregone conclusion that in some way or other the dual language will be removed there. On broad principles we are dealing with this question, and our sincere desire is to secure homogeneity and assimilation. We desire it, we do not expect to force it, or that it will come immediately; we hope it will come some time by the force of circumstances, and we hope, when the day comes, that solution will be reached by a consensus of opinion among the people of the Dominion. We hope for this, and anything that will exert influence in this direction without trampling on the rights of others is something we may properly make use of. The North-West is virgin soil, and any seed that is undesirable should not be planted by us there. Our first Act with respect to this question was wrong; I believe we cannot do better than change that Act, and in doing so we will act strictly in consonance with the principle of Provincial rights. With respect to vested rights in the Province of Quebec, I repeat that, so far as I am concerned and my influence extends, I have no idea, thought, desire or purpose to deal with the Provincial rights of Quebec in any sense whatever. I may entertain my opinion as to whether it is desirable for Quebec to have different institutions, and I may, in a proper way and on a proper occasion, express that opinion, I trust; but so far as regard dealing in any manner with the vested rights of Quebec, I would not be a party to such an attempt or countenance it in any way whatever. The proposal to divide the continent between the two races is unreasonable. I consider this country is under British institutions, and although the French language prevailed when the country was ceded to the British, and although the French language has been recognised and certain vested rights have been granted, yet the proposal to divide this great country between the two races and the two languages is unreasonable and unsatisfactory and not calculated to promote the future good of the country. The issue I think we all recognise is inevitable; no matter in what way we may deal with this question the dual language in the North-West is doomed. It is doomed, whether this Bill passes or not, whether the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), or even the motion of the hon. the Minister of Justice passes; in either of these cases it is useless to propose that the French language in the great North-West will be retained for any length of time, and to remove a source of irritation we may as well meet the inevitable to-day, and exchange clause 110 from the North-West Territories Act, and leave those Territories in a position so that when they frame Provincial institutions they may deal with the question as they may choose on the basis of Provincial rights.

Mr. HOLTON. I wish in a very few words to emphasise the position which I have so far taken, and in which I propose continuing, with respect to the measure now under the consideration of this House. And at the outset I would say that I fully agree with the majority of the speakers who have preceded me, in regarding its introduction under existing circumstances as a grave public calamity. The principle involved in this measure is, of course, a fairly debatable one. Yet after listening very attentively to the discussion of the past week, and more particularly to the speeches of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I am unable, in my own mind, to separate the Bill now submitted to us from those speeches, or from the utterances of himself and friends upon the public platforms during the past twelve months. In fact, Sir, the hon. member's advocacy of the proposed enactment is but the fulfilment of the promise or threat repeatedly made by him on the occasions referred to—the first step in his utopian scheme for welding and cementing the inhabitants of this whole country into one harmonious English-speaking people. I do not wish to impute motives to the gentlemen of the Equal Rights Association? Many of them are personal friends of my own: and, whatever I may think of their movement, I very cheerfully credit them with all the sincerity of purpose in which they claim for themselves, or to which they are entitled. Still, Sir, we cannot blind our eyes to the fact that, as a most lamentable result of the agitation which they have promoted and so persistently maintained throughout the country, the prejudices and animosities of the different elements of our population have been unduly aroused, so that to-day we find the public mind inflamed to a degree that has probably not been equalled since the unhappy period of half a century ago. And, Sir, with the public mind thus excited and disturbed, this measure is forced upon the attention of the House, and in no sense as oil is poured upon the troubled waters; under such circumstances, the cool, calm deliberation to which a question of this importance is entitled cannot possibly be had. In this fact alone, I find good and sufficient reason for supporting any proposition having for its purpose the postponement of the consideration of the measure. There is one matter to which I now feel it my duty—as it certainly is my pleasure—to make brief allusion; that is, the gross misconception which unfortunately obtains in many quarters outside the Province of Quebec, as to the true relations existing between the two races in it—a misconception for which I believe the present agitation is very largely responsible. I may possibly be told outside of this House, if not in it, that I am neither qualified nor authorised to speak here, for the minority of that Province. Still, Sir, I am one of that minority; I have lived all my days in that Province; my acquaintance with its people is pretty extended. And, I do think, and believe, that I fully represent the great majority of my co-religionists there, when I say that on the whole we have not very much to complain of. I, Sir, am as staunch and pronounced a Protestant, as loyal to my faith, as true to my race, as jealous of my rights, and as fully determined to defend them at all hazards, as any man sitting in this House. But, Sir, I have never yet had reason or occasion to imagine for a moment that my civil or religious liberty—my life, property, or any of the sacred rights which are mine, as a free-born subject of Her Majesty—ever have been, or are ever likely to be, in one whit in greater jeopardy in my native Province, than if I were a resident of any other portion of the Dominion. Of course, Sir, (and more particularly in those parts of the Province where we of the minority are numerically weak) we do labor under certain disadvantages; the inevitable incidents, I presume, of being in a minority. Yet, aside from the inconveniences flowing from that source, and aside from the friction engendered by such movements as the present one, our troubles are but few, and it may be truthfully said that the two races do dwell harmoniously together.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLTON. Further, Sir, I feel it is but due to my neighbors and fellow-citizens of French origin to declare here on their behalf, that they are not, as a people, the intolerant bigots and fanatics that too many people in certain quarters are inclined to suppose them to be, judging them, as they unfairly and improperly do, from the unwise utterances of excited politicians, the intemperate writings of obscure newspaper people, or the occasional unlawful acts of an ignorant mob. These things are truly and sincerely deplored and deprecated by the vast majority of French Canadians, and in no sense or degree reflect their real sentiments towards their English and Protestant fellow-citizens. The French people are devoted to their church, loyal to the traditions of race and family, and attached to their country in a manner and to a degree which we would do well to emulate. And in these things they are entitled to our deepest respect. Moreover, they are as peaceable, law-abiding, moral and kindly-disposed citizens as are to be found in any section of the Dominion; and I find that in the same measure that we respect their rights, feelings, opinions, and prejudices even, will they be found to respect ours. And just here, Sir, I would say that the true friends of the minority in the Province of Quebec are not those who, for any reason, seek to stir up religious or racial prejudices on the one side or the other, and that about the most dangerous foes we of that minority have to dread are those, from without the Province, who busy themselves discovering grievances which we do not feel to be such—or, perhaps, of which we know nothing,—and for which they are ever ready to prescribe heroic treatment. I would warn such to leave us to ourselves, for we are quite capable of protecting our own interests. And, for one, I have confidence enough in their sense of fair play and justice, to believe that, if left to the free exercise of their own impulses, the French Canadian majority will do all that in them lies — by legislation or otherwise — to render our position still more pleasant and secure. The French Canadians are, as a rule, quite as tolerant as their neighbors; and, at times, I am forced to the conclusion that in some things they are, perhaps, even a little more so. In illustration of this I would like to refer briefly to my own personal experience with them in public life; and my statement may, perhaps, prove a revelation to many to whom the idea of French domination is such a terrible bogey. Notwithstanding that about two-thirds of the electors of the County of Chateauguay are French Roman Catholics, that constituency has been represented in the Parliament of Canada for 30 years by English Protestants, my late father and myself. In my own three elections, my opponents were Roman Catholics; yet, in no instance was there any attempt on the part of residents of the county to raise the race or religion cry against me, and I have yet to learn of the first vote in any of these contests that was influenced by such considerations. I am naturally very proud of this record of my electors; but I must go still further, and say that, since I have enjoyed the honor of a seat in this House, no French Canadian priest or layman has ever intimated to me, directly or indirectly, the faintest whisper of a suggestion as to the course it might be wished I should pursue on any public question whatsoever. Having repeatedly sent me here as their representative, without exacting pledge or promise, they have left me absolutely to the exercise of my own discretion and best judgment. I am, of course, aware that my remarks have been a little aside the question actually before the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. HOLTON—but the debate has taken a very wide range, including the matters to which I have reference, and I wished, before its close, to say at least this much as a simple matter of justice to my French Canadian friends.

Mr. LARIVIERE. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. LARIVIERE. That is just what I am going to talk on—the question. After this long debate, I rely on the indulgence of the House to allow me to make just a few remarks. Coming from the west as I do, I hope I am entitled to a certain consideration, because I am very well acquainted with the people whose cause is now to be dealt with. I need not make any reference to the short Bill which has been offered to this House, because we have heard so much about it that I believe it is not now in existence; at least, after all the remarks that have fallen from the lips of the hon. members of this House, I do not believe that we shall ever be called upon to decide upon its merits. The cause of all this, Mr. Speaker, is undoubtedly the agitation which has been aroused since last year. When the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the other evening, denied that he should be styled an agitator, I believe he did not say exactly what was correct, for anyone who peruses the speeches that hon. gentleman has made on different occasions must see that the expressions he used in those speeches are proof that he is the principal promoter of this agitation. I have in my hand a copy of a speech delivered by him in the city of Ottawa before the Equal Rights Association, from which I take the following extracts:—

“We have a record for eight months, Mr. Chairman—I mean the Equal Rights Association—which no political party could boast of in a decade of years, and if there are men among us now who want to go back to their old political alliance, I say, shame on them! They ought to be satisfied with what we have accomplished in so short a time. (Loud cheers.) What have we accomplished? Go to the Province of Manitoba, and what do we see there? Why, that Government is going to deal, not only with the dual language question and the iniquitous Act which would fasten it upon them, but with Separate Schools. I had the honor to stand upon the same platform at Portage la Prairie with the Attorney General of the Province.”— This is an honor that I do not envy the hon. gentleman—

—“when he announced his intention, in anticipation of the action of his Government, that he would cease to sign the official cheque for the publication of the statutes in the dual language, or cease to be Attorney General. (Cheers.) Do you tell me that the Equal Rights Association had nothing to do with that?”

Nor Mr. McCarthy, I presume—

“Of course, the feeling was there; the grievance existed. People's minds had only to be directed to it, and the moment attention was drawn to it the Province of Manitoba rose to a man and said, ‘We want no dual language, and away with Separate Schools as well.’ (Applause.) Let me prove what I say is correct. There ought to be no sympathy between Attorney General Martin and myself, according to old political doctrines. He is a Reformer and I a Conservative; therefore we should be sworn foes.”

But I believe both can be put in the same sack. The hon. gentleman came to Manitoba, and he made a speech in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson). I did not see him in my own constituency, because the reception might have been pretty cold there. Hear what he said then:

“He was glad to notice that at last the Protestant minority in Quebec had waked up, and at an early date he hoped to have the pleasure of addressing them in Montreal on the question. They all had their hands full. In Ontario they would have to contend with the question of French teaching in the schools. In Manitoba they had the dual language to deal with, and in the North-West they had the same question.”

This is the key:

“As soon as the work had been accomplished, they would then be in the position to master the same difficulties in the Province of Quebec.”

Well, Mr. Speaker, if, after uttering such speeches, the hon. gentleman cannot be called an agitator, I really do not know what an agitator is. This question of the language as well as that of other privileges, which certain classes of the community enjoy under the Constitution, is a very old question; and we have had, in the course of that debate, the history of all those privileges; but on account of the similarity of the case, I will refer to an Address which was passed by the Legislature of Canada, in 1844, to the Queen, asking that the French language be restored to the country. This Address was moved by the Hon. Mr. Papineau, and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Moffatt, on 20th December, 1844, and reads as follows:—

“That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, renewing the expression of the faithful attachment of this House to Her Majesty’s person and Government.

“Setting forth, that sensible of the advantages we enjoy from Her Majesty’s care and protection, which this House trusts may long be continued to us under Her Majesty’s parental sway, it is, at all times, the duty of this House to submit for Her Majesty’s most gracious consideration, such matters as may have a tendency, with any class of Her Majesty’s subjects, to diminish that contentment, which this House is well assured, Her Majesty desires should exist in every portion of Her domains.

“Representing, that the French is the native language of a very large class of Her Majesty’s subjects in this Province; of this class the great mass indeed speak no other language. In it the largest portion of their laws and the books on the system of jurisprudence are written; their daily intercourse with each other is conducted; it is the language in which alone they can invoke the blessings of Heaven on themselves and all that are dear to them. A language indispensable to so many of Her Majesty’s faithful people, cannot, they will believe, be viewed by their Sovereign as foreign, when used by them.

“Stating, that Her Majesty’s royal predecessors placed the languages spoken by the two great classes of Her Majesty’s subjects in this Province on the same footing, affording, in this respect, equal justice and equal facility to all.

“Pointing out, that this principle was never departed from until the Act re-uniting these Provinces was passed; that this House do not question that the best intentions and designs influenced the minds of those who enacted the provision which declared:—

“That all writs, proclamations, instruments for summoning and calling together the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly for the Province of Canada, and for proroguing and dissolving the same; and all writs of summons and elections; and all writs and public instruments whatever, relating to the said Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, or either of them, and all returns to such writs and instruments; and all journals and entries; and written and printed proceedings, of what nature soever, of the said Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, and of each of them respectively; and all written or printed proceedings and reports of Committees of the said Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, respectively, shall be in the English language, only.”

“Stating, that in the very first session of the Legislature, under that Act, it was indispensable to translate into French every public record and document; that the debates were not and could not, unless a portion of the representatives of the people were silenced, be carried on without its use; that in courts and judicial proceedings, it was found equally necessary as before the Union, and for every other practical purpose, it is as much used as it ever has been.

“Urging, that the only distinction which exists, then, is, that the French is not permitted to be the legal language of Parliamentary records; a distinction of little value perhaps in itself,—one that cannot produce any beneficial result on the feelings or habits of the people using it; while it gives rise to a feeling among them injurious to the peace and tranquillity of the Province, namely, that this limited proscription of their language conveys, however undesignedly, an imputation of unfavorable distinction towards themselves.

“Representing, that desirous that the hearts of all men in this Province may be joined in unity, in attachment to, and support of Her Majesty’s person and Government, this House humbly petition Her Majesty to endeavor to remove this cause of discontent, and to recommend to Her Imperial Parliament, the repeal of that portion of the law which has given rise to it; assuring Her Majesty that such a course will be hailed, by Her Majesty’s loyal Canadian people, as an additional mark of her solicitude for their welfare.”

This was the position at the time when the French language had been abolished, and, acting upon the request of the Legislature, that language was reinstated upon the Statute-books. I have here the translation of a despatch of Lord Elgin on the same subject, in which he said:

“I am very anxious to hear that you have taken measures to abrogate this part of the Union Act that impose restrictions against the use of the French language.

“The delay happening in the execution of the promise made, I believe, by Mr. Gladstone upon this subject, is one of the points urged by Mr. Papineau to promote this agitation.

“Again I must avow that I am profoundly convinced of the impolitic character of all intentions of this kind to denationalise the French. In general it produces the opposite effect to that we have in view, and inflames national prejudices and animosities.

“But supposing it revives, what will be the consequences? You may be able to Americanise them, but believe me, with the same means you can never make Englishmen of the French population of the Province.

“On the other hand, they feel that their religion, their customs, their sympathies, and their prejudices, if you will, are taken more into consideration and more respected here than in any other part of this vast continent. Who would dare to say that the last arm that will raise the English flag on the American soil will not be that of a French Canadian?”

These are the words of Lord Elgin when it was asked that the French language, which had been taken away, should be restored. What is the position to-day? We have in the North-West a small population, it is true, but a population with the same rights as if they were much larger. These people have addressed this House in petitions which have been received here, and which, I must say, in spite of what has been said to the contrary, convey the expression of opinion of a large number of the people. I will read one of them, which is as follows:—

“Whereas, under the ‘North-West Territories Act’ the French is, equally with the English, an official language, the suppression of its use, as such, in the North-West, would be a flagrant injustice towards the settlers of French origin, who were the pioneers of this country, and towards those of the same race who, upon the faith of the Constitution and existing laws, came and established themselves in the North-West, and have contributed, with other citizens of other nationalities, to the development of the resources of the country.

I say, therefore, there is a similarity in the two cases, and I hope there will be a similarity in the results. The hon. member for North Norfolk has told us this afternoon that this measure of the hon. member for North Simcoe is not an attack on the rights of any section of our community, nor on the constitution, because, he says, the French have no vested rights in the North-West. Well, Sir, that is a question which may be subject to a certain amount of discussion; but there is no doubt, in my mind, that there are vested rights for the population of the North-West, as well as there are for the French population of the Province of Quebec and other parts of Canada. It is admitted that the British North America Act has restrictive clauses whereby the minority are protected in their rights, and these rights are acknowledged in the letter of the Constitution. They are of divers kinds. For instance, as has been stated by an hon. gentleman in this debate, in the British North America Act there is a provision whereby a certain number of counties in the Province of Quebec, which are supposed to be populated by English inhabitants, will retain their present limits until the representatives of those counties decide otherwise. This was a sort of protection for the minority. Then we have protection for the minority in the Province of Quebec, in regard to the Protestants, and in regard to their schools, and in regard to their language, and we have protection in the Province of Ontario for the minority in regard to their schools. All through the Dominion of Canada we have protection in regard to Federal legislation, for the French language, and, in Manitoba, which was created by a subsequent enactment, protection is given to the minorities in regard to schools and in regard to language. But, astonishing to say, when the Province of Manitoba was organised, it was not the Catholic or the French minority that was protected by the enactment, because at that time the Catholics and the French were in the majority. Therefore, the laws which were passed in order to give a constitution to the Province of Manitoba, were passed with the view to protect the Protestant and English minority. To-day the reverse exists. The Protestant and English-speaking population has increased, so that now the minority is on the other side. What do we see now? During the existence of the former state of things, did we ever see the majority attempt to take advantage of their position to take away the rights of the minority? No; but to-day we see that the majority, acting on the views which have been enunciated by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), are passing enactments to abolish the French language in Manitoba; and we are also threatened with an Act to abolish the Separate School system there. I may quote from a letter which was recently written by His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface on the subject of the Separate Schools, and also on the question of the dual language. It is dated the 22nd September, 1889, and in this letter the history of the negotiations which took place at that time between the delegates of the North-West Territories and the Canadian Government here is given in full:

"I may be permitted to review certain portions of our history perhaps not too well known. In 1868 two delegates of the Canadian Government, Sir George Cartier and the Hon. Wm. Macdougall, were sent to England to negotiate with the Imperial Government and the Hudson's Bay Co. for the acquisition of Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories. After long deliberations, the conditions of the transfer were agreed to by the interested parties.

"Meanwhile Earl Granville, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, though rejoicing at an agreement he had so largely contributed to secure, felt a little uneasy about the future condition of the old inhabitants of the country, and, to relieve his anxiety, addressed to Sir John Young, then Governor General of Canada, a despatch dated 10th April, 1869, from which I quote the following paragraph:

"I am sure that your Government will not forget the care which is due to those who must soon be exposed to new dangers, and in the course of settlement be dispossessed of the lands which they are used to enjoy as their own, or be confined within unwontedly narrow limits."

"That Government, I believe, has never sought to evade its obligation to those whose uncertain rights and rude means of living are contracted by the advance of civilised men. I am sure that they will not do so in the present case, but that the old inhabitants of the country will be treated with such forethought and consideration as may preserve them from the danger of the approaching change, and satisfy them of the friendly interest which their new governors feel in their welfare."

We all know, Sir, what took place at that time on the banks of the Red River. I now proceed to quote from the same letter:

"To remedy the evil, Lord Granville telegraphed to the Governor General, advising the issue of a proclamation in the name of Her Majesty, in order to quiet the minds of the disturbed. In that proclamation of the 6th Dec., 1870, we read:

"Her Majesty commands me to state to you that she will always be ready through me, as her representative, to redress all well-founded grievances and any complaints that may be made or desire that may be expressed to me as Governor General.

"By Her Majesty's authority I do therefore assure you that, on union with Canada, all your civil and religious rights will be respected."

"Lord Granville, having heard of the proclamation and of the good-will of the Canadian authorities, wrote as follows to Sir John Young on 8th January, 1870: 'I observe with great satisfaction the anxiety manifested by the Canadian Government to avoid any collision with the insurgents in the Red River settlement and to exhaust all means of explanation and conciliation before having recourse to force.'

"Unfortunately the difficulties of communication prevented the knowledge of the proclamation being imparted to the interested parties at Fort Garry, and, on the other hand, the same difficulty of communication left the Canadian officials at Pembina in the greatest uncertainty. Expecting that the affairs were progressing, as understood when they left Ottawa, they thought they had but to proclaim the transfer and secure by force their entry in the North-West. They acted in accordance, but the result was altogether contrary to their hopes, and the difficulties were increased to such a lamentable extent, that Lord Granville expressed his regrets to the Governor General in a despatch dated 20th January, 1870.

"I much more seriously regret the proclamation put forth by Mr. Macdougall and the commission issued by him to Colonel Dennis * * * Those proceedings do not render Her Majesty's Government less desirous of the restoration of tranquillity under the authority of the Dominion, but they have certainly enhanced the responsibility of the Canadian Government."

"The trouble had assumed such a dangerous aspect that the Federal authorities demanded the help of men who could command the confidence of the disaffected. The Very Rev. J. B. Thibault, Vicar-General, and Colonel de Salaberry were sent to Fort Garry to make known to the people the good disposition of the Government towards them. A few days later, Donald A. Smith, Esq. (now Sir Donald) was sent as special commissioner under the Great Seal. The three were to act jointly with Governor Macdavis to secure the pacification of the country and to advise the old settlers to send delegates to Ottawa, to make known their grievances and desires. The Rev. Mr. Thibault was to distribute the proclamation on the 6th of December, but only after conferring on the subject with the Hon. Wm. Macdougall, who was supposed to be still at Pembina. The hon. gentleman had left, so the Rev. Mr. Thibault could not see him, and the box containing the copies of the proclamation was deposited at Pembina, pending new instructions. The three gentlemen sent from Ottawa did their best to establish confidence in Canadian rule. A convention of forty representatives from the different districts of the Red River settlement was summoned for the 25th January, 1870, at Fort Garry, with the object of considering the subject of Mr. Smith's commission and to decide what should be the best for the welfare of the country. The convention assembled and, under the presidency of Judge Black, discussed the affair for which they were summoned, until the 10th of February following, and they framed a Bill of Rights.

By a resolution passed unanimously, the convention accepted the proposition made to send a delegation.

The proceedings of the convention came to a close by the nomination of a Provisional Government having a President, a Secretary of State, &c."

"The President of the Provisional Government made known to the convention his choice of the persons he would appoint as delegates of the North-West, and the Secretary of State notified these gentlemen of the choice the President had made of them. The following is a copy of the letter addressed to one of the delegates:

"FORT GARRY, 21st Feb., 1870.

"REV. J. RITCHOT, ST. NORBERT, R.R.S.

"REVEREND SIR,—I am directed to inform you that you have been appointed by the President of the North-West Territories as co-commissioner, with John Black and Alfred Scott, Esquires, to treat with the Government of the Dominion of Canada upon terms of confederation.

"I am, Reverend Sir,

Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) THOS. BUNN, Secretary."

"Unfortunately, the troubles were not at an end; within a few days most regrettable circumstances occurred, which prevented the fulfilment of what had been decided. The delegation was postponed and Bill of Rights put aside.

"At the same time Bishop Taché was requested to proceed to Fort Garry. The proclamation of the Governor General was handed to the prelate with request to give it to the insurgents, in order to determine them to make known their grievances, complaints or desires to the Governor General. Special importance was attached to a delegation, and to obtain it, Sir John A. Macdonald, in his letter to Bishop Taché, 16th February, says: 'In case a delegation is appointed to proceed to Ottawa, you can assure them that they will be kindly received and their suggestions fully considered; their expenses coming here and returning, and while staying in Ottawa, will be defrayed by us.'

"The new envoy, on his arrival at Fort Garry, communicated to the leaders the desire of both Imperial and Canadian Governments with regard to a delegation; he insisted on the necessity of the measure. The Provisional Government were very diffident; the delegates themselves, who had been chosen a month before, were showing great reluctance, specially as they would not be allowed to go, except on the promise of laying and defending before the Government of Ottawa a new Bill of Rights. After several days, all the details of the delegation had been agreed upon and the delegates received their credentials, dated 22nd March, all three alike, with the exception of the names. The following is a copy of the one handed to Judge John Black.

"To this I add the list or Bill of Rights mentioned in the same. The document is rather long, but as it has never been published before it may prove interesting to many as a historical document.

"Thus equipped the three delegates started on their way to Ottawa, leaving Fort Garry on the 24th of March, 1870.

"To JOHN BLACK Esq.

"SIR,—The President of the Provisional Government of Assiniboia in Council, by these presents, grants authority and commission to you, John Black, Esq., jointly with the Rev. N. J. Ritchot and the Honorable A. Scott, to the end that you betake yourselves to Ottawa, in Canada; and that when there you should lay before the Canadian Parliament the list entrusted to you with the presents, which list contains the conditions and propositions under which the people of Assiniboia would consent to enter into Confederation with the other Provinces of Canada.

"Signed, the 22nd day of March, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and seventy.

"By Order,

(Signed) "THOMAS BUNN,
Secretary of State.

"Seat of Government, Winnipeg, Assiniboia."

"17. That the Lieutenant Governor to be appointed for the Province of the North-West be familiar with both the English and French languages.

"18. That the judge of the Supreme Court speak the English and French languages.

"19. That all debts contracted by the Provisional Government of the Territory of the North-West, now called Assiniboia, in consequence of the illegal and inconsiderate measures adopted by Canadian officials to bring about a civil war in our midst, be paid out of the Dominion Treasury, and that none of the Provisional Government, or any of those acting under them, be in any way held liable or responsible with regard to the movement or any of the actions which led to the present negotiations."

"While all this was going on at the banks of the Red River of the North-West, great anxiety and uneasiness continued to prevail in the Colonial Office in Downing street and at Ottawa; numerous despatches and telegrams were exchanged between the two. The following will give an idea of what was desired, hoped or feared:—

"On the 5th of March Lord Granville telegraphed to Sir John Young: 'Her Majesty's Government will give proposed military assistance, provided reasonable terms are granted to the Red River settlers.'

"On the 17th of March the same to the same: 'Let me know by telegram when you know delegates have started from Fort Garry.'

"Sir F. Rogers, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, writes on the 22nd March: 'Troops should not be employed in forcing the sovereignty of Canada on the population of Red River should they refuse to admit it.'

"On the 4th of April, the Governor General conveyed by telegram to Earl Granville starting information: 'Smith came here on Saturday from Fort Garry with bad news. A Canadian called Scott was, by Riel's orders, tried by court-martial and shot, with the view, it is supposed, of compromising Riel's followers before Taché had arrived. They say the delegates are coming, but it is quite clear Riel will yield to nothing but force. Things now look, I think, very bad.'

"On the 7th of April, the same telegraphed to the same: 'Last of the delegates is expected at St. Paul on Thursday the 14th, the others arrived there to-day, and may reach Ottawa on Saturday the 9th.'

"Distressing as the news was, Earl Granville had still confidence in the negotiations he had so constantly urged; on the 9th of the same month he telegraphed to the Governor General: 'Let me know as soon as you can by telegram result of negotiations with Red River delegates.'

'It is evident from the above documents that Her Majesty's Government had no desire to impose by force the sovereignty of Canada on the settlers of Assiniboia, but that they were exceedingly anxious of a peaceable settlement through negotiations with the delegates. No need to add that all this was said and done in perfect good faith, on the part of Earl Granville, and that Her Majesty's Government intended to bind themselves to protect and safeguard the agreement, secured not only with their sanction, but at their explicit and repeated request.'

'The two first delegates arrived at Ottawa on the 11th; in spite of what had been said and promised, they were arrested. This incident, which could have caused serious complications, was learned with regret by Lord Granville, who telegraphed to the Governor General: 'Was arrest of delegates authorised by the Canadian Government? Send full information by telegram.'

'Sir John Young answered the next day; 'Arrest of delegates was not authorised by the Canadian Government.'

'On the 23rd of the same month of April, Earl Granville thus informed the Governor General: 'Canadian Government to accept decision of Her Majesty's Government on all portions of the settlers' Bill of Rights.'

'The very same day the negotiations began at Ottawa. Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier were appointed by the Canadian Government to treat with the three delegates of the North-West.

'The first interview was merely preliminary. On Monday the 25th, the two Ministers and the three delegates met again; the delegates insisted on a written acknowledgment of their official position and declared that the list or Bill of Rights they had brought with them was the only basis on which they were authorised to treat with the Government. Objections were made, but after a long discussion, it was agreed that the written acknowledgment would be given next day, and the list be produced by the delegates.

'On the 26th, at the next meeting the promised letter was given by the Ministers and the List of Rights produced by the delegates, and, practically, the official negotiations began this day and lasted until the 3rd of May, when the principal points on the List of Rights were agreed upon, leaving some details for further consideration.

'It is not generally known that the new Bill of Rights was the basis of negotiations, but it is nevertheless the case, and many points granted, as expressed in the Manitoba Act, were demanded in no other document, except on the List of Rights presented by the delegates.

'The first article is a very important feature of this new Bill of Rights. It contains the demand for the establishment of a Province covering the whole North-West, with all the privileges and governing machinery appertaining to other Provinces, including a responsible Government. This met with strong objections, but at last was conceded on the condition of reducing the new Province to very small proportions.

'Article II also caused a long discussion; it asked for the control of all the lands of the North-West by the Local Legislature. To this, both the Imperial and Canadian authorities refused to accede, but to condone for this refusal they gave to the children of the half-breed inhabitants of the country one million four hundred thousand acres of land, which had not been asked for, and with the understanding that by-and-bye they would also give some lands to the parents of those children and to other old settlers.

'The question of separate schools, as demanded in the 7th article of the List of Rights, was taken into consideration; the delegates were promised that they would not only have the benefit of the provisions of the 'British North America Act,' but they might rest assured and might assure the people of the Red River, that separate schools would be guaranteed to them.

'The recognition of the use of the French language, as an official language, was conceded as expressed in the 16th article of the List of Rights, with the promise that attention would be paid to the demands of the 17th and 18th articles, as in fact it has been done, if not completely, at least enough to satisfy the interested parties.

'The whole list having been examined, accepted, modified or rejected to the satisfaction of the negotiating parties, the Governor General telegraphed to Earl Granville on the 3rd of May: 'Negotiations with the delegates closed satisfactorily.'

'The negotiations had been asked for, they had been urged both by the Imperial and Federal authorities, the Government of Her Majesty had exacted from the Canadian Government the acceptance by the latter of the decision of the former on all points of the Bill of Rights.

Mr. LARIVIERE.

They had sent an official envoy to Ottawa to watch the conference, and when it is announced that the negotiations are closed satisfactorily it must mean that the Imperial Government is satisfied that its views on this subject will be carried out, and that no inferior authority would have power to disturb them.

'Lord Granville, in one of his despatches, says: 'I am glad to learn that the proceedings adopted against the Rev. Mr. Ritchot and Mr. Scott were promptly disposed of, and had not been renewed; and I take this opportunity of expressing the satisfaction with which I have learned from your telegram of the 3rd inst., that the Canadian Government and the delegates have come to an understanding as to the terms on which the settlement of the Red River should be admitted into the Dominion.'

'All this is previous to the Manitoba Act; it is a treaty between contracting parties placed on a certain footing of equality, as the Government of Her Majesty had declared 'troops should not be employed in forcing the sovereignty of Canada on the population of the Red River, should they refuse to admit it.'

These are the conditions upon which all that territory entered into the Confederation, and, therefore, when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said there are no vested rights, I say there are, and those rights are contained in the agreement, or in what I might call the treaty which was entered into between the authorities of this country and the people of the North-West through their representatives.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. LARIVIERE. I think I am dealing with the question. This question of the dual language has been discussed in the North-West Legislature. We have had here an address from that noble body which I will not read because it is already on record. That address was prepared by a sub-committee of the Council, and upon receiving that address the Council had a debate. The chairman of the committee who prepared the address, laid it on the Table, and a short debate followed. From the local paper there I quote the following:—

'Mr. Justice Rouleau asked hon. gentlemen to give their reasons for wishing to abolish the dual language which had been in their Constitution for so many years.

'Mr. Mitchell also asked for reasons. What harm had the French language done? What objection had there been to it? It was a little expensive, but the expensive way was the best. They were asking for a law to deprive the oldest residents of the country—the pioneers—from reading their own language.

'Mr. Oliver supported the contention of the judge. As a matter of courtesy, the members who introduced this question should give an explanation of their reasons.'

Well, Sir, we have the explanation of the chairman of that committee in bringing down that report.

'Mr. Cayley went over the history of the enactment of the section imposing the dual language in the North West, it having been put in at the instance of Senator Girard fourteen years ago. The discussion in his own district was to one effect, that the continuance of the dual language in the North-West was unnecessary. When a question of this sort, which might hurt the feelings of some of the residents of the country, came up, it was best that members should not state all their private reasons.'

This is the reason given—that is to say, no reason at all was given, because it was assumed that it would not be well to state the private reasons. So this document, which has been termed an address of the North-West Council to this House, was decided upon not for public purposes, not for the benefit of the public at large, but for private reasons that could not be stated publicly; and we are to-day called upon to act upon the request of men who pretend to have reasons, but private reasons such as cannot be stated publicly. Mr. Thorborn said:

"It was stated as the opinion of the assembly that the sentiment of the people was against the continuance of the section. This was very signally acknowledged by the Executive, on opening the session, by his not reading the speech in French as well as English."

There we find a reason at last :

"Mr. Mitchell again asked what harm the dual language did. They proposed to take away a right from a certain class of the people. There was no common sense in it."

This is the debate. But no reasons were given, no more reasons were given than those which we see in the reports of the proceedings of that Council. This address was passed, it is true, but we have a very long and able speech made by Mr. Justice Rouleau. Unfortunately that gentleman is only an ex-officio member of the Council, and could not give his vote against the address that was presented at the time. Now, I wish to refer, en passant, to some of the judge's remarks. It appears that the hon. member for North Simcoe has some admirers in the North-West Territories; that he has created a certain school, which, however, is no school at all. He has followers there—anti-Frenchmen. When His Excellency the Governor General visited that country last summer, at Calgary they built an arch over the roadway opposite the hotel, and, of course, the most appropriate motto that could be put on that arch was the motto of His Excellency's coat-of-arms—sans changer. But that was French, and the people had the greatest objection to put a French motto in the streets of Calgary. So they went on and translated it, and put up the words "no change." But as the arch happened to be opposite a hotel, the poor hotel-keeper did not have a single customer on that day, because everybody was afraid to go in there for fear that they would get no change. But here is something extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, though not a similar case, which happened a few years ago in the Province of Ontario, in a little town called—shall I name it?—St. Thomas. There is in that town a young ladies' school, and although they may be admirers of the hon. member, still they love the French language in that institution. Of course, they had to have a motto for their school. It was somewhat of an ambitious motto, I dare say, and, perhaps, it well became this institution, because it was a very good institution. Of course, an institution, like a nobleman, must have a motto, if nothing else. They had to have a motto from some other language than the English, and without having the fear of the hon. member for North Simcoe before their eyes, they adopted—not a Latin or a Greek motto—but a French motto, because all great men have French mottoes, and in that respect they differ from my hon. friend, whose motto is anti-French. Well, they selected a sentence in English, which, translated into French, would make a splendid motto. Their idea was to convey the impression that their institution was second to none in the country; and they took the two shortest words they could find in the English language and translated them into French. They took "second to none," which means "never behind," and so they looked up a French dictionary and found that a literal translation of "never behind" was jamais en derriere. Well, Sir, when I was called away from the question a little while ago, I was giving the history of that address presented by the North-West Council.

There is a point upon which I wish to call the attention of this House. We have been asked to trust to the majority of the people of the North-West for the future of our interests, to trust them for the preservation of our rights, for the maintenance of our religion, our schools, and even our language. Now, the other day, in voting in favor of the amendment of my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), we refused to accept the suggestion that had been made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I wish to show you that we were perfectly right in refusing to accept the amendment of the member for West Assiniboia, and in accepting the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier, because the history of what has taken place in Manitoba is certainly not satisfactory, and is a proof that if in the future we are treated in the same manner as we have been in the past, we are not so certain about the safety of our rights and interests. As I told you a little while ago, under the Constitution of Manitoba we have rights in regard to our language and to our schools, and those rights and claims cannot be interfered with. Moreover, at the time of Confederation, our then Lieutenant Governor, whom I am glad to see on the floor of this House, Sir Adams Archibald, took every precaution to prevent friction between the two classes of the community who were then very excited after the little rebellion that had taken place. The then Lieutenant Governor gave to each class of the community a fair, just and proper representation. Although the French had a small majority and the Catholics a small majority, the Lower House—and we had two Houses—was divided into 24 constituencies and sub-divided, so that 12 members were given to the English-speaking Protestant community, and 12 members who could be returned by Roman Catholics, whether Irish, English or French. The Upper House was composed of seven members, and the Roman Catholics were given a majority of one on account of a majority of people of that faith in the Province. Thus the then Lieutenant Governor dealt with the question in a liberal-minded manner, to the satisfaction of every class. Later on we were asked to abolish our Legislative Council. The Council was the only safeguard we possessed after the influx of population had taken place, and the Catholic and French population had been outnumbered, and if the Council had been retained the rights of the majority could never be endangered. A debate took place in the Legislature on that proposition. In that debate the French members complained strongly that they were asked to vote away the only safeguard they possessed—the Upper House. What took place at that time? The English-speaking members came to the front, and said: We must do away with the Upper House because the Federal Government, led by the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, insisted upon a reduction of the expenses of the Administration and insisted on the abolition of the Upper House, and if the request is not acceded to we will not get the better terms which are so much required. The French members accepted the proposition, on the promise that on no occasion would they have reason to complain of any attempt on the part of the majority to interfere with the rights of the minority. I have extracts from speeches made at that time. This is what Mr. W. F. Luxton, who was then member for Rockwood, said :

"There were some questions of settlements which lay close to the hearts of the French people, and he could assure them that, notwithstanding the movements of the member for Kildonan (John Sutherland), the English members would not ruthlessly deal with these if the French representatives were sufficiently patriotic to support the measure before the House. They would recognise their generosity and not forget it."

Another member, quoting from the late Francis Evans Cornish, who was then representing High Bluff, a distinguished advocate, and at one time Mayor of Winnipeg, sitting in his seat and speaking on the same question, said:

"He believed the old settlers and the French would make common cause if their rights were infringed upon, and he could assure them when the Canadian party became the very great majority it would not be found oppressive."

In its issue of the 12th February, 1876, the Free Press gave the reasons why the French members voted in favor of the abolition of the Legislative Council:

"On the profession of liberality made by the English-speaking representatives upon the floor of the House, under these circumstances, every French member of the Assembly voted in favor of the measure."

This is a treaty entered into between the French and English-speaking members of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Manitoba, when the French members were asked to surrender their right to the Legislative Council, which was their safeguard, and to trust to the future, relying on the promises of the hon. members who were then representing the English-speaking portion of the population. What has been the result? To-day legislation is being passed, in that very Legislature, unanimously passed, by the English-speaking members of the House, to abolish the French language, and they are going to abolish the Separate Schools in the face of the agreement solemnly entered upon in the Legislature by their predecessors. In the face of that fact, can it be matter of surprise that we should be reluctant to accept anything less than the fullest guarantee that this House can give? But we have trusted the future before, and we are willing to trust it again; but I hope we will never have the same history repeated as that which we have to record with regard to the Province of Manitoba. It may be said: You will not meet with the same fate in the North-West. I hope such may be the case; but as all sorts of extraneous matters have been brought into the discussion, I will quote a paragraph from a newspaper. The Moosomin Courier on 5th September, 1889, published an article headed "One people, one Language." It said:

"Are they [the Roman Catholics] a superior kind of people from Protestants, that they hold themselves aloof by having separate schools."

"To private schools no one can object, but we most emphatically protest against separate schools being maintained by the Government, for any denomination other than Protestants. Our motto is: 'One People, One Country, One Religion.'"

This is the kind of literature that is being circulated by the newspapers in the North-West. Knowing these facts, are we to be blamed if we resist any attempt to deprive us of what we consider and claim to be our vested rights, and if we ask this House, in which we have perfect confidence, not to delegate its power to the Legislatures, which do not view matters in the same light as we view them? I believe we should be thankful to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), for having brought on this debate. We are already beginning to feel the good results that will come out of it. I am to-day in receipt of a newspaper published in Winnipeg, a paper that has always advocated the abolition of the French language in the Province of Manitoba—the Manitoba Free Press. In the course of an article it says:

"In Manitoba we have abolished, as we think, the use of the French language and are now proceeding against Separate Schools. From the light of the recent debate at Ottawa, it would not seem so sure that we have been right in assuming to settle the language question alone."

This is the beginning of the result that we are going to derive from this debate, and therefore I am not sorry that it has taken place. I shall lay aside several matters that I intended to bring before the House, and I will conclude my remarks by stating that what has been said by some hon. gentlemen to the effect that the French language was not recognised in the United States was erroneously so stated. I take from "The American Statute Law" the following:—

"The language taught in the schools is, by the Constitutions of three States, to be English; but in Louisiana the instruction may be given in French."

From the same book, "The American Statute Law," I take the following:—

"By the constitutions of four States the laws, public records and written legislative and judicial proceedings shall be promulgated, and preserved in the English language only. But in Colorado, laws are also to be published in English and German, and in Louisiana the Legislature may provide for the publication of laws in the French language, and that judicial advertisements in certain designated districts may be made in French. So in Missouri, certain charters, &c., in the German language. So in Maryland, proposed amendments to the constitution, in German."

We see from this that there are only four states where the English language is at all the official language. From this authority (which, being the statute law of the United States, cannot be questioned), we can see what takes place with regard to the language question right across the lines; the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to the contrary notwithstanding. I could cite some other instances to prove the law in the United States with regard to this matter, but I think this ought to be sufficient to convince hon. gentlemen. Let me just quote something with regard to the French language in the Island of Jersey. So much has been said about the other British colonies that I will not refer to them. I will quote from a book written by Abraham J. LeCras, entitled "The Laws, Customs and Privileges, and their Administration, in the Island of Jersey," as follows:—

"Language.—Notwithstanding English is now generally spoken in the Island, the language of the State and of the Court is a French dialect peculiar to ancient Normandy, and which operates very much to the prejudice of English suitors, whose causes are usually the most important that are brought before the local tribunals, because a sworn interpreter is not appointed. In the case of Godfray on the prosecution of the Crown v. Robertson (1838) on the demand of the defendant that the said Godfray, who was a witness, should give his deposition in English, as the former did not understand French, the Court (Bisson and E. Nicolle), on the conclusions of the Attorney General, overruled the demand, and decided that it was only Her Majesty in Council who could alter the form of proceeding in this bailiwick."

We see from this that even in an English colony the French language alone is official. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has read some telegrams which he has said to have received from the North-West, where assemblies or meetings have been held, declaring that the mass of the people were in favor of the abolition of the French language. I am in receipt of an address from Qu'Appelle, dated the 7th of February, 1890, in which it is stated (I translate from the original French):

"Please accept profession of our profound gratitude for the opposition you have given to the Act concerning the abolition of the French language in the North-West Territories, and for your vigorous defence of our rights, &c., &c."

I shall not take time to read the whole document. This is signed by 217 people; and amongst those who signed I find the names of J. B. Farrell, C. B. Spencer, W. H. Finnerty, J. A. Crooks, J. R. Oliver, and others. About one-third of the names are of English, Scotch, Irish, and even German-speaking persons, and they congratulate me on the stand I took when the first reading of this Bill was proposed to this House. Here are 217 names of opponents to this Bill from one locality alone; so that the unanimity which we have been told existed in the North-West in favor of the abolition of the French language does not exist. I have to thank the House, Mr. Speaker, for the attention which has been paid to my remarks; and I am sorry that I have felt it my duty to detain you so long. I have again to express the hope that the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Justice will be accepted. I, for my part, accept it as a compromise, although I do not admit that this House has the right to ask us to deprive the French people of the North-West Territories of a single portion of what I consider to be their rights. Yet, in order to promote the peace and tranquillity of this Dominion, I accept this amendment as a compromise, and I hope that the House will unanimously endorse it. I trust that in the future we shall have no reason to complain of the position we have taken to-day.

After Recess.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest, as this is the seventh day on which we have been discussing the measure which was before the House this afternoon, that the consideration of private Bills should be postponed until Monday. All the members in town having charge of private Bills consent to this postponement. I, therefore, propose that we should go back to the Order of this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have much pleasure in supporting that. I think it is a very reasonable proposition.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. I desire, with the permission of the House, to offer a few remarks in explanation of the reasons why I cannot support the amendment proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice, and seconded by the hon. Secretary of State. It has been stated, in justification of that motion, that it is a compromise between two contending parties whose extreme views could not be reconciled. But I have not heard that the party most interested in this question, that is to say, the French population of the North-West Territories, have been consulted or represented in this compromise; on the contrary, it appears that the two wings of the Government party in this House, French and English, have agreed to settle their differences by sacrificing the rights and privileges of the French population of the North-West. To effect that object, they agree upon this compromise amendment, which professes to maintain the rights and privileges of the French-speaking people in the old Provinces of Canada; but the rights and privileges of the French people of the North-West are to be left to the tender mercies of a council, which, according to the hon. member for North Simcoe, has intimated to the Lieutenant Governor that if he should dare to speak French in their presence, they would leave the Chamber in a body. A compromise proposed under such circumstances I cannot accept; I cannot agree that under one pretence or another the constitutional rights of the minority in the North-West should be sacrificed. Some people are willing that those interests should be sacrificed in the name of Provincial rights or Provincial autonomy; but there is no question of Provincial rights or Provincial autonomy in the present instance. There are no Provinces in the North-West Territories which are under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, and are to a great extent governed by laws enacted by this Legislature. But even were Provincial rights in question, there are some rights which have been put above all others—above even Provincial rights—by the Imperial Parliament; these are the rights of minorities. Now, it is proposed by this compromise amendment, to leave the rights of the minority in the North-West to the control of the Legislative Assembly there after the next general election. If that course is the right one, how is it that the Imperial Parliament, in the Act of 1867, did not leave to the Parliament of Canada the right of deciding whether one language or two should be spoken in this chamber, and whether its proceedings and records should be printed in one or two languages? And how is it that the same control was not given to the Legislature of the Province of Quebec over the language of its proceedings and records? The fact that this subject, so far as it concerned the Dominion and the Province of Quebec, was settled by the Imperial Parliament in the Confederation Act, proves that it is not of the essence of Provincial rights that a Provincial Legislature should have the power of deciding in what language its proceedings should be carried on, or its records printed. Now, I contend that we are in the midst of a crusade organised by the hon. member for North Simcoe for the purpose of depriving the French population of their language, their institutions, and their schools. His programme has been promulgated in Ontario, Manitoba, and the Territories, and we are asked to-day to help him to carry out his scheme. That hon. gentleman, both in this House and outside of the House, has stated that his programme for his future lifetime is the abolition of the French language in Manitoba and the North-West, the abolition of the Separate Schools in Ontario, the abolition of the French language in the House of Commons, and, in the course of time, the abolition of the French language, in the Province of Quebec, although he does not expect to succeed for several years. Now, what is the object of the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Justice, in the opinion of all the newspapers, French and English, Liberal and Conservative, which have discussed the hon. Minister's proposition during the last three days, as well as in the opinion of a great many members who have discussed the matter? It is agreed that that proposition is really the McCarthy Bill in disguise. The Star of Montreal is a very influential Tory paper, enjoying one of the largest circulations in Canada, and it stated immediately after the amendment was proposed:

"The vote on Mr. Beausoleil's amendment to Mr. McCarthy's Bill is an indication that one of the motions now before the House to bring about the abolition of the dual official language system in the North-West will be carried by a considerable majority. Evidently the House will not adopt Mr. McCarthy's motion under any circumstances, but for all practical purposes it does not make much difference whether the House takes the bitter McCarthy pill, the same pill sugar-coated by Mr. Davin or the same pill sugar-coated by Sir John Thompson. * * * Mr. Davin's amendment to allow the North-West Assembly to relieve Parliament of the responsibility of abolishing the dual language system after the next election, and Sir John Thompson's amendment in other words to do precisely the same thing. The difference between Sir John Thompson's amendment and Mr. Davin's is that Sir John's begins by affirming the covenant rights of the French to the official use of the French language and denying that community of language is in the interests of national unity, and ends by giving the Local Assembly power to smash the alleged covenant and establish community of language, while Mr. Davin's amendment leaves the covenant alone. * * * Whether Sir John Thompson's amendment or Mr. Davin's amendment carry, Mr. McCarthy will have brought about the abolition of the dual language system in the North-West."

The Witness, which is an extreme Protestant paper, and which, though it pretends sometimes to be Liberal, is very illiberal at bottom, said:

"The Dominion Parliament, in passing this resolution and empowering the Assembly to take action, as well as in suggesting it, is responsible, in spite of itself, for the settlement which is to follow. The French-speaking, that is, the French and half-breed population of the North-West is not so insignificant as we assumed from declarations in Parliament, which remains uncontradicted. In 1885 it formed about twenty-four per cent. of the enfranchised population of the Territories, and about twelve per cent. of the whole population, Indian and white. What the verdict of the Territories will be, is clearly evident beforehand, especially as the proportion of the English-speaking and French-speaking populations has greatly increased during the past four years."

So much for the English press. If we turn to the French press, we find L'Etendard, both of yesterday and to-day, has denounced the amendment as being similar, in every respect, to the McCarthy Bill; and now we have L'Electeur, the most important Liberal newspaper in the Province of Quebec, saying as follows:—

(Translation). "This last concession was hardly made when we saw Sir John A. Macdonald trying to secure a still more important one, and threatening his partisans with an immediate dissolution if they would not yield submissively to this new sacrifice. Sir John has, in fact, caused his Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, to move an amendment to the McCarthy Bill, which, on the whole, is, in a disguised form, nothing short of the Davin amendment. [We give in another column the text of the Davin amendment.] Once the principle sanctioned as regards the North-West Legislature, it shall apply to Manitoba, where our compatriots are still in a minority, and where both parties have agreed to repeal, of their own free will, the official use of the French language. It is easy to understand that, once the principle sanctioned, the door is open, and that the last bulwark that protected one of our rights is down. The French language will be abolished in the Territories and Manitoba, where the French Canadians have, nevertheless, been the first pioneers, the first civilising people. There is no room left for idle hopes."

Here is the advice it gives:

"Our friends in Ottawa are, unfortunately, on the Opposition side, that is to say, powerless to secure the triumph of their broad and liberal ideas, to which the
Mr. BEAUSOLEIL.

Hon. Mr. Blake, a few days ago, gave voice in eloquent words. But we beseech them to stand firm and to do their duty to the end, and we feel that they shall have, not only the sympathies of our co-religionists and fellow-countrymen, but also those of an imposing number of fair-minded English-speaking people who consider as an honor to follow the traditions of the Liberals of old England, and follow the steps of those who, in the old country, defend the cause of Home Rule and equality of rights for all races and all creeds under the British flag."

I might quote several other newspapers which have declared themselves on this amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Justice, and, without exception, they all agree that it is a sacrifice of the rights and privileges of the French population of the North-West, in order to purchase peace in this House, because the Government expect that, if this amendment be adopted, we will hear no more about the repeal of clause 110 of the British North America Act. But I may say that this is only the beginning of the agitation led by the hon. member for North Simcoe, and that so long as there will be a remnant of French or Catholic institutions, whether in the North-West, or in Manitoba, or Ontario, or in any other portion of the Dominion, we will have that hon. gentleman coming into this House, year after year, and endeavoring to perpetuate this agitation which has been excited under his leadership. There is only one effective way of finally settling this question, and that is to vote for the amendment I have proposed, and thus clearly put on record our opinion, which is that of almost every hon. gentleman who has spoken, that this Bill of the hon. member of North Simcoe is a mischievous attempt to set race against race and creed against creed. It is for this House, and especially the Government, to take a bold stand, and say, once for all, that such an attempt shall not be tolerated, and by a crushing vote of the whole House against the five or six, or it may be ten, who would follow the hon. member for North Simcoe, declare that we are not prepared to give these men the means of disturbing the good feeling and understanding which now exists between the two races in this country, and we will not allow them to perpetuate the division which they have started and which has given rise to feelings it will take a long time to allay. It is not by yielding to the fire-brands who go through the country sowing the seeds of discord, that we will become united, but it is by showing them that the good sense of the country, as represented in this House, is in a position to deal with them in a summary manner by stamping out this agitation, and showing them they have no standing in the House or the country and that their course will not be tolerated. I am very sorry we are not about to take this course, and all the more so because I am obliged to separate myself from my most esteemed leader, in whom I have always had the greatest confidence. But this question has been left an open one, and I take the opportunity of voting according to my judgment, and in accord with the sentiments I feel so strongly in this matter, even though I be compelled to differ from my leader. Another cause for regret to me is that, by separating myself from my leader, I shall be obliged to vote in company with the hon. member for North Simcoe, but it will be the first time, and I hope the last, because I hope that the next time that hon. gentleman, or any other, attempts to create trouble in the country, a more vigorous policy will be followed, and that the House will be almost unanimous against those who attempt to destroy the happiness, the prosperity, and the good feeling that now exists, and I hope will always exist, between the different creeds and races of this country.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not my intention, at this late stage of the debate, to make any lengthy remarks, but I cannot allow this question to pass and give a silent vote upon it. We have been, on more than one occasion, brought face to face with racial and religious difficulties. For these difficulties, I think no man in this country is more responsible than the ex-leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for West Durham. That hon. gentleman, nearly twenty years ago, made capital out of the Scott murder case in the endeavor to gain power in Ontario, and when he had accomplished his purpose, he quickly dropped the subject so as not to embarrass his friends in the Dominion elections that were then about to follow. At a later date, on the question of the hanging of Louis Riel, the hon. member for West Durham, in his London speech, told the people that he would not make a platform for his party out of the Regina scaffold. Well, every true-minded patriot in this country commended that sentiment. But what did we find afterwards? when the Government thought that a murderer is a murderer, no matter what his nationality may be, we find the hon. gentleman taking the other side of the question and going back on the record he had made for himself in London, going back upon the declarations he solemnly made in London, though he knew the whole facts of the case then as much as he did afterwards, and as much as he knows them to-day. We find this hon. gentleman in this House, within the last few days, regretting that these difficulties were coming up again; but I believe that no one in this country is more responsible for these difficulties than the hon. gentleman himself. With reference to the question which is immediately before the House, we have been told that the North-West Council had no mandate from the people to dispose of this question, and we were told by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that they were in a state of tutelage. I think there is no portion of the people of this country more intelligent than our North-West settlers. They are the flower of the older Provinces of Canada; they are young, enterprising and intelligent men; they are young men of education, and I think they are as well calculated to express an opinion upon questions as they arise as the population of any other portion of this Dominion. Therefore, while I am in favor of the Bill as introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); and while I regret that the tone of this debate, on the other side, was not in imitation of the moderation of the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, I think the people of the North-West themselves are better qualified to pronounce upon this question than even we are in the House of Commons. Another reason is that the House of Commons to-day may repeal the 110th clause of the North-West Territories Act, and next Session, or in the next Parliament, it may re-enact that clause; and, therefore, we would be brought face to face, either at every Session of Parliament, or in every new Parliament, with this question. If we relegate it to the North-West Council, or to the new Legislatures we are creating in that country, to which each time we are giving largely increased powers, we know this, that when once you give power to a Local Legislature, you can never take it away again. The Local Legislatures are tenacious of any rights and privileges which are given to them; and, therefore, when you clothe them with a certain power, that power remains with them. Therefore, if either of these amendments is adopted by the House, you are more permanently settling the question than even by the adoption of the Bill itself. For these reasons, I will favor the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Justice, though it does not go as far as I would like to go, or as far as the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), which I more favor. But we cannot have everything our own way. While a spirit of compromise and conciliation is abroad, I think, as patriots, and as loyal citizens of Canada, we should try to meet each other half way. In the first place, therefore, I give my adhesion to the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. WATSON. This debate has taken a very wide range, and, to my mind, the practical question before the House has not been discussed as it should have been. If it had been so discussed, this debate would have ended three or four days ago. I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wallace) appears to desire to revive the old debate on the Riel question. That is a matter which is entirely foreign to this debate. I think the French people are somewhat to blame for this discussion. I believe that clause 110 was, in a sense, smuggled into this Act by Senator Girard in the Senate, and that it should never have been there. From reading the debates, I think that clause was inserted contrary to the wishes of the hon. gentlemen who were then in power, but, as that House was composed of a majority who were against the policy and principles of the majority in the popular House, they did as they pleased, and, if that clause had not been accepted, that Bill would have been delayed for another season. In regard to the visit of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to the North-West, he did not trouble me very much on his visit to Portage la Prairie. Even up to the present, I have some doubts as to the honesty of that gentleman, and as to his sincerity, in wanting to do good to people of the North-West. It appears to me that he came there more for the sake of agitation than for any practical good. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) made a reference to his visit and his speech on that occasion. I think his quotations from that speech are perfectly accurate, but he also referred to the Attorney General of the Province of Manitoba, who stood on the platform on that occasion, and he said he did not envy him his company. It was hardly necessary for the hon. member to make that statement, as this House knows that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) has not much use for the Attorney General of Manitoba, and that about the time he came around the legislative halls of that Province, the member for Provencher was very scarce. I believe that no change should be made in the constitution under which people live without consulting the people, and, though I believe that section 110 was smuggled into that Act and should never have been there, nevertheless as the people of the North-West have been living under that clause enacted by this Parliament, I do not think we should remove it without consulting them. I am not a lawyer, but I much prefer the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to that of the Minister of Justice, which has so many surrounding clauses, which contains so many things that appear to a layman to be a mystery. The amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia is plain, and I do not feel disposed to vote for the amendment of the Minister of Justice, as it recites certain things with which I do not agree. It says :

I believe, that at any time when it is in the interests of any Province of the Dominion that even the British North America Act should be changed, it should be changed for the convenience of the people living under that Act. Believing that, I could not consistently vote for the amendment to the amendment. It is quite possible that the Province from which I come may have occasion to seek to amend the British North America Act in some measure, to relieve them from some privileges which were granted to a minority in that Province which are objectionable to the majority. The French language is practically done away with in Manitoba, as far as the Legislature is concerned. It has been abolished by a vote of twenty-four to six, and in a full House of the representatives there would have been a vote of thirty-two to six. The people of the North-West Territories are similarly situated to those of Manitoba, and I have no doubt they desire to have only one official language in the North-West. Another reason why I cannot vote for the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Simcoe is the fact that I find that six of the gentlemen composing the North-West Council expressed themselves as being favorable to the power being granted them by this Parliament to deal with this question. They did not ask that an Act should be passed to repeal clause 110, as I understood from the hon. member for Simcoe, but they asked that they should have the power to do away with the French language if they saw fit. I will quote some extracts from the speeches delivered by a few of those gentlemen in the North-West Assembly. The hon. member for Provencher stated that Mr. Judge Rouleau had expressed himself as being sorry that he had not a vote, in order that he might cast it against the memorial presented to this House. I find in the report of the speeches in the Press the following :

"Judge Rouleau spoke at great length upon the question. He claimed that no action could be taken until the people had a chance to express themselves upon the matter. Let the members make it an issue at the next election if they wished. He had spoken French before he had spoken English, and this memorial proposed to deprive him and others of their mother tongue. He closed by again claiming that the question should be decided by the electors, and hinted that some of the members who would probably vote for this now, might suffer at the next election.

"Mr. Haultain pointed out that the assembly, in asking for the removal of a restrictive clause, was simply asking for more powers, and that they could make the use of the power to deal with the language question, an issue at the next election. He favored but one official language on the ground of convenience and economy."

"Mr. Oliver regretted that the discussion had taken such a wide range."

I think we can say the same thing in this House.—

"He represented a large number of French-speaking people, and did not consider that he was going against their interest in asking for extended powers, so that we could deal with this matter ourselves. He had always strongly advocated that the people of this country should be allowed to manage their own affairs, and would support the memorial."

"Mr. Neff said that the dual language system had been imposed upon us and we were simply asking for the privilege to retain it or not, as we wished. He had no desire to deprive French-speaking people of a luxury; they could not be prevented from speaking their own language, but he objected to its being an official language."

"Mr. Ross,"—

I think this gentleman represents Calgary or Moose Jaw.—

"Mr. Ross also represented a mixed community. He owed much to the French-speaking electors in his district, and would be ungrateful if he did them any injustice, but did not consider that he was doing them any injustice in asking that the people's representatives in the North-West be given the power to deal with this matter."

"Mr. Hoye said this dual language seemed to be a bugbear to some people, and yet not one member had been able to show any injury done by it. No action should be taken until the question was brought before the different constituencies."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with that evidence before me, I cannot do otherwise than to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, because I believe it gives the people the exact power they ask for. To my mind, the amendment to the amendment is simply putting this matter off to another year. It is not giving the power they ask for, and if the amendment of the Minister of Justice is carried, no doubt we will have a repetition of the debate that has taken place here for the last six days, a debate which, I think, is very much to be regretted. There is no doubt it has given rise to race and religious feelings that will not be quieted for years to come. I was a little astonished at a statement made by the Minister of Justice, and also one made by the Minister of the Interior. The Minister of Justice, in speaking in defence of his amendment, said it would be cruel to deprive those poor people in the North-West of the privilege of using their mother tongue; that a man might be tried there and convicted, and, after the trial was over, he might not know what he was convicted for. Now, it appears to me that there is a good deal of special pleading in a statement like that. I have yet to learn that any British subject, or anyone else, in the Dominion of Canada, be he of British nationality or of any other has suffered from a miscarriage of justice because he did not understand the language in which the statutes were printed. That being the case, I have no doubt that, when the French language is done away with in the North-West, there will be no occasion for saying that these people do not understand the law because it is not printed in their own language. The hon. Minister of the Interior, in his remarks last night, made rather a startling statement. He said that he visited six townships in Manitoba during his trip last fall, and he found nine different nationalities in those six different townships.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Excuse me, not in Manitoba; but in the North-West, I found in two townships representatives of nine nationalities.

Mr. WATSON. I took down the sentence which followed that statement, in which he said it would be cruel if the laws of the land were not printed in the language of these nationalities. I do not really think he meant it, but, if he did, it would be a very expensive luxury. Sir, I believe the amendment of the hon. member for West Assiniboia commends itself to a great number of the hon. gentlemen in this House. There is no doubt that the appeal made by the First Minister yesterday to whip his followers into line had considerable effect. It was a very strong appeal; he rose equal to the occasion, and to my mind made the best speech I ever heard delivered in the House. There were none of those little stories with which that hon. gentleman is accustomed to regale the House. But I hope that the amendment of the Minister of Justice will not be adopted, for the amendment of the member for West Assiniboia is the only one that will satisfy the people of the North-West, will give them the power they ask for, and will prevent a repetition of the unpleasant discussion which has taken place in this House for the last few days. The hon. member for Provencher said he considered it a fortunate thing that this question had been brought before the House, but I do not share in his view; I think it a very unfortunate thing. No doubt the hon. gentleman feels a little warm on the question, because a similar question is arising in Manitoba in connection with the French language and separate schools, which are going to be done away with in that Province, — at least separate schools will henceforth exist in a much modified form. As I said before, I thought the French people were to blame to some extent for this discussion in the House, inasmuch as I believe that this clause was smuggled into the Bill by Senator Girard in the Senate some years ago. I believe that one of the causes of irritation in Manitoba in reference to separate schools is the fact that while the hon. member for Provencher was a member of the Government of Manitoba he secured special privileges for the separate schools, and when the Protestants, who are the great majority of that Province, found that the separate schools were receiving much more than their share of the grant, they became aroused, and when a change of Government took place they decided that the moment was opportune for abolishing the system. With regard to the French language in Manitoba, I may say that, while I do not know what the custom is in the North-West, one of the principal reasons of the abolition of the official French in Manitoba was the expense. It has been stated here that the printing of French in the North-West amounts to only $400. I know that in Manitoba it costs a considerable sum of money, and it costs the general public a large sum of money in addition to what it costs the Government, because under the Land Title system all notices of application to put land under the Torrens system have to be advertised in the Gazette. This costs a considerable sum to the applicants.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any length, but I desire merely to state the conclusion at which I have arrived after listening to the discussion. I regret that the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beansoleil) was not carried, as I should like to have seen it adopted. That amendment having been defeated, I think the next best course to take is to adopt the amendment of the Minister of Justice, and I am, therefore, willing to vote for it. I am willing to do so because it contains an emphatic declaration against the principle of the Bill proposed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Of course, if that amendment went further in the direction of extinguishing the question at once I would feel more satisfied, for I am afraid it may come back; but under the circumstances, when I see that the flame is extending over the country, I think the first thing to do is to quench it at once. I place this question above party considerations, and I consider it on the broad principle that we must have peace and amity in this country, and that its future depends upon it. It is no doubt unfortunate that this subject has been brought before the House. It has arrayed a compact body of French members against the English-speaking members, which is a circumstance to be deplored. As the Minister of Public Works said, it has arrayed a compact phalanx of French Canadians in defence of their rights. In order to secure harmony, not only in the House, but throughout the country, I am glad to support the conclusion arrived at by the wiser heads on both sides of this House. No one will deny that the leader of the Government is not only a politician but a statesman, and although I am with him this time, it is certainly not because I belong to his following. At the same time I am glad to follow my leader, who on this occasion has shown his patriotism and devotion to his country, and who advocates the principle of the autonomy of the Provinces that has already been sanctioned. I am also very glad to follow the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), whose brilliant speech must have brought conviction to many members. From these considerations I accept the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice, not as the best conclusion possible, but as a means of soothing the bad feelings that have been aroused all over the country.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) The imposing debate, Mr. Speaker, brought on by the campaign carried on throughout the country by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and by the measure which he has submitted for the consideration of this House, clearly shows the importance of the privileges and the rights which it attacks. Several of my colleagues, at the opening of the campaign undertaken by the hon. member against the French Canadians, the first inhabitants of this country, believe that the good sense of the English people will consider this quarrel which the hon. member seeks to fasten upon us as a quarrel of but little importance. Several thought, at the beginning, that this mountain in labor would bring forth but a small and ridiculous mouse. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Simcoe has been backed up in his campaign by other gentlemen, whose talent, and the means which they have employed, to excite the prejudices of their fellow-citizens who are not of the same race as ourselves, in the Province of Ontario, it is impossible to ignore. The hon. member has aroused against us, I repeat, his fellow-countrymen; and as the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) has said, there has arisen a dark cloud on our political horizon, carrying within it a war of race, a war of religion, a war against the institutions of the first inhabitants of this country. Happily for us, Mr. Speaker, the good sense of the public men on both sides of the House has been, in the face of this dark cloud, the light of hope, which has animated the courage of all true patriots within the Dominion. I can only compare some of the speeches of the hon. members, who have endeavored to raise prejudice against us; on account of the small value of their arguments; on account of the lame reasonings which support them; on account of the few historical precedents which they have quoted in order to justify the attitude which they have taken against us—I can only compare these speeches, set going by these hon. members in the road of public opinion, to light carriages, to cabs which carry no load. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, if I applied the same simile to some of the speeches made by hon. members, as well on this side of the House as on the other, I ought to compare these speeches to massive waggon wheels pushed along the road of public opinion by powerful orators; I might say that these waggons carry boxes which contain solid reasoning, formidable reasoning, philosophic reasoning, and historical facts. Woe to the light cabs without a load, driven at an immoderate gait, by thoughtless drivers, if they should happen some day to knock against, in the road of public opinion, and in the road of history, these massive waggons which are laden with historical truths and true philosophical teachings. What are, Mr. Speaker, in short, the complaints of the hon. member for North Simcoe against the French Canadians and the French race, not only in the Province of Quebec but against the small handful of those of our nationality who have tried their fortune on the prairies of the West? The hon. member desires, be the cost what it may, to make the regions of the West, what he calls a British country. But is not the Province of Quebec a British country? Are not we in that Province subjects of Her Majesty, equally as are the citizens of the Province of Ontario, and as would be those of the North-West, were they all Saxons, as the hon. member for North Simcoe desires? I do not see what difference there is between an Anglo-Saxon subject, and a British subject of French Canadian origin. I do not see what difference there can be in the minds of English statesmen, in the eyes of the friends of the Empire, between a British subject of French origin or of Irish or Scotch origin, or even one of the subjects of Her Majesty in the vast Colony of the East Indies, and a Saxon like the hon. member for North Simcoe; we are all subjects of the same Empire, we are all citizens of the same Empire, and as such we ought to have equal rights. Great use has been made, Mr. Speaker, of the word "British," during this debate; and I have remarked, especially, that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), in moderate yet unjust language, has, in a way, profaned this noble expression. Every subject of the British Empire, to whatever race or nationality he may belong, can claim the same title. The hon. member for North Simcoe and the member for Albert have pretended that if French were spoken in the North-West it would no longer be a British country. And, say they, the French Canadians ought not to delude themselves to the point of believing that the North-West ought not to be a British country. No, Mr. Speaker, we have never been under this impression, we have never asked for it, and we would be the most grieved parties in the Dominion, if the North-West was not going to continue forever a British country. We wish, just as much as the hon. member for Albert does, or the hon. member for North Simcoe, that the North-West should continue to be a dependency of the Dominion of Canada, or rather form a portion of the Dominion, and that it may be a British country, if it should not be like the Province of Quebec, it would be such to the same extent as is the country whence comes the hon. member for Albert. But what do they mean to say, when using the expression "British?" Does this mean exclusion for some of the subjects of the Empire? Do we understand by that, unequal rights for certain subjects of the Empire, or again the rights of certain subjects of the Empire entirely ignored? Does this mean short-sightedness? No, Mr. Speaker, I have always held the highest opinion of British subjects and of British countries. I have always understood that the British language was a noble language; that a British country was a noble country in which liberty and equal rights reigned supreme. But, as the hon. member for Simcoe understands it, would it be a case of equal rights if all the subjects of the Empire were obliged to adopt the customs and the religion as well as the language of the hon. members for North Simcoe and Albert? Do these hon. members understand by equal rights that one ought not to do anything but what they do, to think only as they think, and to act only as they act? This liberty is a liberty which is not British. The hon. member for Simcoe profanes this noble expression, degrades this noble title, of which every subject of the Empire is proud. He desires to give it a narrow meaning, at which, no matter what English subject, if he but understands the importance of the title of "British subject," would blush. The hon. gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, who share the opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe, seem to believe that without unity of language the country is exposed to every plague, and that with unity of language a country is secure against all disorders and all misfortunes. They have cited the great American Republic as being a country which has prospered extremely, and they have attributed, so to speak, all this prosperity to the fact that American subjects enjoy this great prerogative, this grand privilege which is the hobby of the hon. member for North Simcoe, namely, unity of language. But why, I ask the hon. member, did a civil war break out in the heart of this same great Republic, which according to him enjoys unity in language? Why did this great civil war, which has had no equal in the annals of modern nations, this great civil war which has been one of the greatest scourges of the American people, why did it break out in a nation in which unity of language existed? The hon. members, Mr. Speaker, who have treated so learnedly this subject, my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and several of their colleagues on both sides of the House, have shown, by the clearest possible evidence, that it is possible to be a great nation, that it is possible to become a great people while not possessing unity in religion, unity in language, or unity of race. And, unless we believe that it is by presumption, or that he is impelled thereto by an evil genius, I cannot understand what induces the hon. member to persist in this crusade, in the face of historic verity, in face of precedents, which have been held up before his eyes, and which the hon. member ought to have known before they were pointed out to him by his colleagues; for everybody knows that the hon. member is a man of great skill, a well informed man, a man who has studied deeply. But, notwithstanding all this, like a blind man, like a deaf man, he cries without ceasing that without unity of language it is impossible or nearly impossible for this Canada, which we love so much and which we cherish, to become a great country. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is unjust towards us. I ask this House, I ask every impartial man, what would Canada be to-day, had it not been for the support of the French nationality in all the great questions which the present Government, and that which preceded it, have carried out? Who was the man who followed up, with the utmost perseverance, the acquisition of those great Territories, respecting which the hon. member for North Simcoe has embroiled us to-day? Was it not Sir George Etienne Cartier, one of the old colleagues of the hon. the present Prime Minister? Has not the Province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, paid its large portion, as well of the purchase money of the North-West, and for the construction of the Pacific Railway, as for all the great public works which have been constructed by the Government to open up the North-West to civilisation? And, in spite of all this, what does the hon. member for Simcoe wish to do to-day? What does he undertake? He undertakes to deprive the people of the Province of Quebec, of their just share in this great heritage,—towards the purchase of which, towards the colonisation of which, they have so largely contributed. This, Mr. Speaker, is the unjust undertaking of the hon. member with regard to the Province of Quebec; whereas without us, I do not hesitate to say it, without us there would be no North-West, no Canadian Pacific Railway, no colonisation in the West, and this vast country would be in a wild state. If the Dominion is to-day in possession of these rich Territories, she owes them to the French element, which the hon. member fights against with so much vigor. I do not understand how they can require that we should be at the same time loyal subjects of Her Majesty, and that we should be disloyal towards our mother tongue. We must defend it with all our powers; it is our right, and it is our duty. And I declare that the man who voluntarily surrenders his mother tongue, is not a good citizen, he is a man whose loyalty would not remain firm after every trial, as that of the subjects of Her Majesty ought to do. The hon. member for Simcoe has not always reasoned in the same way respecting minorities. Everybody remembers the attitude taken by the hon. members for North Simcoe, for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) as well as that of several other members who follow them, when in this House, the resolution asking for "Home Rule" in Ireland was rejected; we all know that, at this period, these gentlemen raised objections to this resolution, stating that we were going to sacrifice the Protestant minority in Ireland, and to place it at the mercy of the Roman Catholic majority. Such were the objections from these hon. gentlemen. Have these hon. members two weights and two measures—the one for the Roman Catholics, the other for their coreligionists the Protestants? I must hasten to conclude. I know that the House is anxious to close this debate; but I was surprised at the remarks which some of my colleagues speaking the English language made. And I cannot pass them over in silence. It has been admitted that the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin), was moderate as respects the expressions used in his speech on the present question, but it is alleged that he was too vigorous in its utterance. I cannot conceive how these hon. members can reproach the hon. Minister of Public Works with having testified by a degree of vivacity in his speech,—he, one of the fathers of Confederation, he, the successor of the illustrious statesman, Sir George Etienne Cartier. I think that he would have been wanting in his duty if he had not borne witness against the resolution of the hon. member for North Simcoe, with something of indignation. In any case it would not be me who would blame him for it. It is to my knowledge that several of my English colleagues,—and I do not say it of them as a reproach—in support of interests much less serious than those which are now being discussed, displayed much more energy in their language than did the hon. Minister of Public Works. My compatriots, Mr. Speaker, the French Canadians of the Province of Quebec, will be doubtless much obliged to many hon. members in this House,—I may say to the great majority of the members of this House—for the sympathy which they have extended to our nationality, during this debate, for the respect which they have shown for the rights of minorities, and for the firm determination which they have shown to defend them on all occasions. Among those distinguished men, who have come forward generously in support of the Government, in order to make easier their task, and to assist them in giving us justice, I must mention the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and I regret that again, this evening, on account of his great liberality towards us, it has been thought proper to attack him somewhat violently.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPONT. The speech of the hon. member for West Durham, as well as the other speakers who have spoken in defence of our cause, will dwell in the shrine of history; they will serve as lessons for our successors in this House, and for our posterity; they are founded in reason and on justice, and they show the true position in which minorities should be placed, in no matter what country. It might be said that in the family of the hon. member for West Durham,—I must render him this acknowledgment; and you all know, moreover, that he is no political friend of mine, I did not, in general, support his policy when he was leader of a party in this House,—it might be said, I say, that in questions of right, on great questions of justice, the hon. member has shown that British fair-play was, so to speak, bred in the bones of the family of Blake. I believe that every good citizen, every man who is a friend to his country, ought to be dismayed at the conclusions arrived at by the hon. member for West Durham. He has concluded his train of reasoning by these forcible words: if justice is not done to the minorities, if we kindle in this country a war of races, a religious war, neither prosperity nor progress will ever be possibilities for us. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, which ought to frighten us the most, whether it be this formidable conclusion or the inevitable contained in this conclusion. If the policy of the hon. member for North Simcoe should prevail, I believe that the conclusion of the hon. member West Durham is inevitable. I think that every patriot who loves his country, no matter to what nationality he may belong, should make superhuman efforts to keep the nation far from the path of discord into which the hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends desire to thrust it. I think that every public man,—and it seems to me that they wish to do it, for the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), intensely warlike as he is, has spoken with moderation and wisdom. He also has come to the aid of the Government to assist them in settling this difficult matter,—all public men should work together in concert, and with all possible energy, to lift us from the way of discord into which we are entering, and to thrust the nation from it as from a nest of vipers. Mr. Speaker, with these few remarks I conclude, heartily thanking the House for having kindly given me their attention.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the great length to which this debate has extended, it having now occupied seven days, and sympathising as I do with the natural impatience of the House, I shall not detain hon. members more than such time as will enable me, in a very few words, to explain the position I take on this question. I regret exceedingly that the question which is now before the House has been brought into it. I feared, when the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was introduced, it would give rise not only to great differences of opinion, but perhaps to angry and intemperate discussion, and would excite great feeling, not only in the House, but throughout the length and breadth of the land. The impassioned, not to say intemperate, utterances of some leading members on both sides of the House have satisfied me that my apprehension had some foundation. I was desirous, therefore, that some solution of the question should be reached which would remove it from this House, and relegate it to some authority to which it would be reasonable, just and fair to refer it, and I was glad, therefore, when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) submitted the amendment he proposed. It met my views completely under the circumstances, and I determined at the time it was submitted that, unless some modification of it was proposed which would more fully meet my views, I would support it. With regard to the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice, it does not meet my views as does the amendment submitted by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). I think that if the decision of this question is relegated to the people of the North-West, whom it mainly concerns, those people should be given the power to consider it in all its aspects, and it should not be divided into portions as is proposed by the amendment of the Minister of Justice. I agree with the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), in considering that a half-hearted measure, and I shall, therefore, feel constrained to vote against the amendment to the amendment, and, if that should be lost, to vote in favor of the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I recognise that the House is anxious to reach a decision on this question, and I shall, therefore, not attempt to discuss it at any length. I confine myself to the question now before us. It is not a question as between the amendment and the original motion proposing the second reading of the Bill, but is a choice between the amendment by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice. I desire to say that, as I approve more highly of the wording of the amendment offered by the member for Assiniboia than I do of that offered by the Minister of Justice, I shall be forced to vote against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, in the course of this debate, I stated that my opinion was that the best and most proper time to settle this question would be when Parliament felt that the time had come to extend to the North-West Territories a larger measure of local autonomy than they now enjoy. I voted for the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) on this express condition. I did not approve altogether of the wording of the amendment of my hon. friend; but I thought, on the whole, that the idea therein expressed, that our institutions in the North-West should be permanent, was true to this extent, that they should be permanent in every particular so long as the present form of government in the North-West endured. This view has not prevailed, and the consequence is that the House is not called upon to deal with this question. I then also stated that when the time came, be that time early or late, the only way to deal with the question before the House would be on the broad principle of local autonomy. I thought from the first, and I still more than ever believe it, that the only method under which we can carry out the system of Confederation, the only method by which we can give justice and fair play to minorities, wherever minorities may be situated, will depend altogether on the adoption of the principle of local autonomy. It has been stated to-day that there really is no question of autonomy or Provincial rights here. It may be said we have no Provincial rights, in the technical sense, in the Territories, but the principle involved is the same. Although the Territories have not been organised into Provinces, the principle applying to the case is the same as if they had been so organised. The only difference is that their powers would be supreme and absolute if they were organised into Provinces, and that they should not, in my judgment, be subject to the revision of the Central Government. For all that, the principle remains unimpaired, and should be acted upon, that the will of the people of the Territories affected ought to be the will which should prevail in the solution of this question, and of all other similar questions. My hon. friend, the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), stated this afternoon that the best method of solving this question, with a view to Provincial rights, would be simply to affirm the principle of the Bill itself. Surely, my hon. friend was not serious in so speaking. The Bill of my hon. friend from Simcoe proposes to abrogate clause 110 of the North-West Territories Act, which clause provides that either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Council or Legislative Assembly of the Territories. If you simply repeal this clause, you remove from the Legislature of the Territories the power which they now have of using either the French or the English language in their debates. What I understand by Provincial rights—and I suppose what my hon. friend must understand—is, that the people of the Territories should decide for themselves whether or not they are to have the privilege or the onus of having two official languages. If you remove that law, you take away from them the privilege which they now have of using the two languages. I do not believe that is in the direction of Provincial rights, or Provincial autonomy. The amendment of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, tends to uphold Provincial rights and local autonomy, and I am happy to extend my congratulations to the Prime Minister, and to his Government that more and more, and day by day, the force of circumstances brings them over to this principle. More and more the principle grows, and they are forced to adopt it, in spite of their former practice in older times. It is stated, however, against this amendment of the Minister of Justice, that it is not so complete as the amendment moved by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It may not be so complete, but it is not the less just, for the amendment of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice involves this: that in the debates of the Local Assembly of the North-West, and in the recording of their proceedings, they shall have the privilege of using one language or the other, or both, and they shall be empowered to decide for themselves whether they shall have only one official language or two official languages. There is, then, the question of the courts, and it has been stated (and I think properly stated), that the use of the language in courts, would be acknowledged as beyond the power of the Dominion Parliament. There then remains the question of the printing of the statutes. So long as we provide the Territories with a revenue, can any serious objection be taken to the fact that we should provide for the printing of the laws and ordinances in the North-West? I can see very well that if the Territories had to provide that out of their own revenue, to impose any obligations upon them, which they would not want to assume, might be a grievance. But so long as we give them the revenue, surely no man can object; and we who supply the money ought to have the power to put upon it an obligation (which is not after all an unreasonable obligation), and which on the other hand is in the tendency of peace and harmony. It has been stated that this amendment was a compromise. I must say for my part, and the First Minister will bear me out, that there has been no compromise between him and me. I always have stated publicly as well as privately, and I have never disguised my thoughts on this matter, that, in my judgment, sooner or later, and better sooner than later, this question had to be settled upon the broad basis of local autonomy. In fact, if this question has taken a wider range than is involved in the principle of local autonomy, it is simply because the member for Simcoe has chosen to make it so. If the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), instead of placing as the basis of his Bill, that there should be a community of language, and that this community of language should extend everywhere in the Dominion where French is spoken, had simply left it to the will and the desire of the people of the Territories, we would not have had one-half or one-tenth part of all the trouble we have had over this question. But it is because the people of Quebec have good reason to suppose that this was a preliminary skirmish, soon to be followed by other attacks, soon to be followed by attacks which would reach them in their own Province, that they have been so excited. A few days ago, the hon. member for Simcoe, speaking in this debate, disclaimed the idea of imposing his will upon the people of Quebec and attempting to deprive them of their language; but it seems that the hon. gentleman is not so brave here as he was in Manitoba; for in Manitoba he is recorded as having stated that if the French language was abolished in that Province, it would be abolished in Quebec. Is it to be wondered that the people of Quebec have felt as they have felt upon this question in face of such a threat as this? I want to say to my fellow-countrymen of French origin that we must expect, in the face of such a declaration, that, some day or other, this agitation commenced here will be carried into our Province. Let us remember this: that if we are prepared to stand by the principle of local autonomy in the North-West Territories, we will stand ten times, and a hundred times, stronger when we have to meet an attack in our own Province. If we are now prepared to stand by the principle of local autonomy, I submit that, when the time comes, we will find a tower of strength in the position which we may take upon this question. This is one of the reasons which impel me to take the action I propose on this measure, that is, to support the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice. I quite realise that it must be painful for many hon. members from the Province of Quebec to vote for a measure which may, perhaps, imply the possibility that the French language should cease to be the official language in the North-West Territories. I have no reason to suppose, and I do not for one moment suppose, that the people of the North-West Territories would act unjustly or unfairly towards the French minority. I know it has been said that, if we vote this measure, it is a foregone conclusion that the French language will not be an official language of the North-West, because the Legislature has already expressed its opinion in favor of removing it as an official language. Well, that is true; but we must remember that at present there is not one single member speaking French in that Legislature, and if, after the next election, there should be no change in the representation, if there should be no French representative in the North-West Territories Assembly, surely no one will complain if, under such circumstances, after the attention of the people has been roused to the question, the Local Legislature were to adhere to its present intention. I believe, for all that, that if there were even a sprinkling of French members in the Local Legislature, the majority would act with the same spirit of fairness towards them that the Legislature of Upper Canada evinced in 1793, as shown in the incident to which our attention was directed by the Prime Minister yesterday. I believe that they would act in the same spirit of fairness towards the minority which was evinced by the Legislature of Canada in 1845. As I said a moment ago, I am not at all surprised that some of my fellow-countrymen should feel strongly upon this question, and that they should propose to adhere to their present intention. As for myself I must say it is a matter of deep anguish to me that upon this question I have to sever my connection with such a life-long friend as the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil). I know he is acting for the best interests of his country according to his lights, and I am sure he will give me credit that in voting as I shall have to do with the Government on this question, I do so not out of any love to the Government, but with the conviction that in so doing I am acting in the best interest of my party and my country.

Mr. IVES. I desire to occupy the time of the House only for a moment, in order to say that I am against both the spirit and intention of the Bill of the hon. member for Simcoe. For my own part, I think it would have been far preferable if this House had deferred the settlement of this whole question until such time as the increase of population in the North-West Territories had made it necessary that portions of that territory should be organised into Provinces. I believe it is impossible at the present moment for any member of this House to know what will be the position or character of the population which may settle in that vast domain. We may perhaps have on the Saskatchewan a territory large enough for a Province, including in its population a large majority of people speaking the French language, and we may perhaps have in Alberta a population purely English; and when the different parts of that territory are organised into Provinces, the question could be very easily settled by this Parliament without annoyance to the people of the Territories, and without straining unduly the principle of local autonomy to which my hon. friend who last addressed the House has referred. In that way we might perhaps arrive at a settlement of this whole question without this debate or this agitation. For these reasons, and because I would not see the French language abolished in this House or in the country, any more than I would see the French Canadians obliged to leave the country, I supported the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil). But that motion has been disposed of, and we have now to choose between the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice and the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and when I have to choose between these two amendments I naturally choose that which least disturbs present conditions. Therefore, I intend to support the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice. If I could be assured that an amendment would be carried in this House to defer the whole question until the organisation of Provinces in the North-West Territories, I would support such a motion; but in the division we had on the amendment of the hon. member for Berthier, we saw arrayed on one side almost the whole force of the members from the Province of Quebec, who have no objection to the French language or institutions, and we saw arrayed on the other side, all the other members of this House. When our views, therefore, failed to meet with the approval of a majority of the House, I think it is a serious risk to persist, as does the hon. member for Berthier, in rejecting the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice, which certainly is not a serious interference with the rights of the French Canadians, but is a safe and fair compromise measure, and one which ought to be supported.

Mr. McCARTHY. I quite appreciate the desire of the House that this debate should close, and I would not have risen now to say a word if it had not been for the personal attack which, even at this late hour, the leader of the Opposition could not forbear to make upon me. I desire to repudiate the statement he has made with regard to my saying anything in Manitoba which I have not said here. My reference in Manitoba was not to the French language in the Province of Quebec; but there, as in Montreal, it was to the possibility—which I then thought was within reach, and which I do not yet deny to myself the hope of being accomplished—that the title and fabrique questions may yet be settled in the Province of Quebec, and settled I dare say with the aid of my hon. friend who now leads the Opposition. That was the question I referred to, and not the question of the French language, as my hon. friend will see if he will do me the justice to read the deliberate statement I made in Montreal. Having troubled the House again, I would like to say this with regard to the amendment before us. It has been stated here that this amendment is a measure of peace; but I wish this House to understand that what may be a measure of peace here, between the hon. members on both sides of this House, may be anything but a measure of peace in this country. For my part, I see in this amendment every possible evil which we have had suggested to us throughout this debate. It relegates a portion of this difficult and disturbing subject to the people of the North-West. That certainly is not a measure of peace, so far as they are concerned. It leaves the remaining part to be dealt with by this Parliament; and the House very much mistakes, no matter what its vote may be to-night, if it thinks that this Parliament has heard the last of this question; for I can assure this House that if the matter is disposed of here to-night by the adoption of the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice, I shall bring it up again at the earliest opportunity. If this is so—and that is certainly within my right, as the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) said last evening, and not only within my right, but within my duty—then where is the benefit of postponing, or delaying, or procrastinating on a question which we are told involves so many difficulties? This may or may not be a matter for the Territories to settle themselves, or for this Parliament to settle; but this measure raises no question between the right of the Territories and the right of this House to deal with it; because every member of this House knows perfectly well that if the Bill I have introduced passes this House, it will be with the full assent and concurrence of a great majority of the people of the North-West Territories. But whether it is a matter for the Territories or for us to decide, we are neither doing one thing nor the other by making a pretence here for the sake of peace, by shaking hands across this table, by the leaders on this side and on that side putting their heads together and coercing their followers,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCARTHY—because an amendment which will satisfy neither one party nor the other is not going to satisfy this country.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, the division which we appear about to reach will, I believe, close this debate; but the division list will not define the exact position of those who will vote nay. They are composed of three distinct parties: Those led by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who wish to reach his Bill, in order that they may support it; those led by the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who wish to support neither amendment nor the Bill; and those who wish to reach the first amendment, that proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in order that they may support it. I wish to define my position to be that I desire to reach the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), because I prefer it to the one moved by the hon. the Minister of Justice; but if the choice lay between the amendment moved by the hon. the Minister of Justice, and the original motion, I should support the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice.

House divided on the amendment to the amendment (Sir John Thompson):

That this House, having regard to the long continued use of the French language in old Canada, and to the covenants on that subject embodied in the British North America Act, cannot agree to the declaration contained in the said Bill as the basis thereof, that it is expedient in the interest of the national unity of the Dominion that there should be community of language amongst the people of Canada;

That, on the contrary, this House declares its adherence to the said covenants and its determination to resist any attempt to impair the same;

That, at the same time, this House deems it expedient and proper and not inconsistent with those covenants that the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories should receive from the Parliament of Canada power to regulate, after the next general election of the Assembly, the proceedings of the Assembly and the manner of recording and publishing such proceedings.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the Department of Marine, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1889.—(Mr. Colby.)

CANADIAN HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS.

Mr. VANASSE asked, Whether the Government have taken notice of the following remarks made by Mr. Brymner, the Dominion Archivist, in his report for 1888 :—

"I have the honor again most respectfully to draw your attention to the reports of Mr. Joseph Marmette respecting the documents in Paris. No doubt can be entertained as to the importance of having them copied as soon as possible; and I may be allowed to remark, in this connection, that our courts are now engaged in determining claims for considerable sums, which it is impossible to settle without recourse to the Paris documents. Our archives cannot possibly do without one copy of these papers."

And also of the following remarks contained in the report of Mr. Marmette for 1885 :—

"May I be permitted, in conclusion, to speak strongly regarding the expediency of having copied, as soon as possible, the manuscripts connected with our history, which are to be found in the public offices and the libraries of Paris. Should there come upon France any political storm, such as burst upon her in the revolutions of 1789 and 1830, and in the horrors of the Commune in 1871, the criminal hand of a frenzied person—by burning a public office or certain buildings in Paris—might again burn thousands of pages unknown to our historians, without reckoning the dispersion of important papers which a populace thirsty for pillage might occasion. For example, have we not assurance that a number of manuscripts relating to the history of Canada are to be found, at the present moment, in St. Petersburg, where they were carried by the Secretary of the Russian Embassy, Pierre Dubroski, who, at the time of the sacking of the Bastille, in 1789, and of the pillage of the Abbey of Saint-Germain des Prés, in 1791, himself gathered hundreds of bundles of manuscripts, at this moment still stained with mud.

"However far removed from our reach these documents are, however not entirely lost to us; but can we avoid feeling the most bitter regrets when we find Harris—from whom we have borrowed the foregoing details—add the following in his 'Notes to be used for a History and Bibliography of New France': 'So neglectful were they of the archives in the office of the Minister of Marine, that their precious documents served to feed, during five weeks of the winter of 1793, the stove of a picket of the National Guard stationed in the very building where the archives were lodged.' And further on he adds: 'In 1830 an employé gave up the archives to be pillaged, and sold them, by weight, for his own profit, whole bundles, of which some were bought up at the price of fifteen centimes the document by autograph hunters, whose collections are still enriched by their possession.' Again, at page 5 of the introduction to the same work, HARRISSE says further: 'The letters of Pierre Voyer d'Argenson, Governor of Canada from 1658 to 1661, were deposited in the Library of the Louvre, which was burnt by the communists in 1871, while the despatches of Louis d'Aillebout de Coulanges (1648-1651-7), of Lauzon (1651-1656), of the Marquis de Tracy (1655-1667), and of M. de Courcelles (1668-1672), have never been recovered.'

Are the Government aware that there are now in the office of the Minister of Marine, in France, more than one thousand volumes of manuscripts relating exclusively to the history of the various Provinces forming this Dominion? Have the Government any intention of causing copies to be made of these documents and papers, in order to deposit them in the Archives Office of Canada? If so, when? If not, why not?

Mr. CARLING. That matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. CIMON asked, In how many counties has "The Canada Temperance Act" been put into force since its passing? In how many counties has this Act been repealed? How many counties are now petitioning for the bringing of the Act into force?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Act has been put into force in seventy-one counties; it has been repealed in thirty-one counties; and there are no petitions at present for submitting it to any other county.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

Mr. FLYNN (for Mr. JONES, Halifax) asked, Whether, in view of the negotiations respecting the fisheries now going on at Washington between the British Minister and the American Government, as announced by the leader of the Government to this House, it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Canadian Commissioner to take part in the negotiations, and to watch over and protect the interests of Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no formal commission issued, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries left this afternoon at half-past one in order to represent Canada at Washington.

CLOSING OF POST OFFICES ON SUNDAY.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec) asked, Whether the Government have any petition asking for the closing of post offices on Sunday; from whom; when; what action have they taken as to such petition, and what do they intend to do in relation thereto?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no petition in my Department asking for the closing of the post offices on Sunday.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada, or any of the Departments, and the Messrs. Anderson, or any other parties, respecting the Atlantic mail service.

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible to bring down this correspondence at the present time. I think the reason will be obvious, when I state to the House the present position of the negotiations. The House is well aware of the negotiations which took place previous to last Session, and also of the vote of $500,000, which was taken last Session, for the purpose of procuring, if possible, a fast line of steam service between this country and Great Britain. The negotiations were continued after the Session, and a provisional contract entered into with the Messrs. Anderson. These gentlemen, however, found it impossible to carry out their contract, and handed it back to the Government. Since then negotiations have been and are still going on, and it would be exceedingly injudicious in the public interest to make known those negotiations while they are still unfinished.

Mr. LAURIER. I cannot at all accept the explanations, if explanations they can be called, of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman has told us that the House was aware that there had been negotiations going on previous to last Session. I do not know that the House was ever aware of any such thing. The hon. gentleman asked last year for an appropriation without giving to Parliament any of the information which Parliament should have been given previous to the granting of the vote asked for. The hon. gentleman has not forgotten that last Session, before taking the vote, it was moved from this side that no appropriation should be made until the House was put in possession of all the demands for tenders, and all the tenders received, and all information as to the nature of the service required. We have not had yet any information, and it is certainly not at all satisfactory to the public, after twelve months have elapsed, to be told simply that negotiations are still pending, and that nothing has been done which could be laid before Parliament. Parliament, in my judgment, is entitled to some information on the subject, but, of course, if the hon. gentleman refuses to furnish it, all I can do is to submit under protest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. Minister of Finance has declined to bring down the papers because to do so would be an injury to Canada. As mentioned by him, a vote was taken last Session for half a million dollars in order to get a fast line. The Government had to get as fast a line as any that entered the port of New York, and the Messrs. Anderson, a firm of shipbuilders of high standing, came here and entered into a provisional contract. But it involved a very large sum of money, £2,000,000 sterling, to carry out that contract, and they were to go to England and do what they could. They thought they could get the money, but the demand for steel and the amount required were so great that they were unable to carry out their contract, and they availed themselves of the two months allowed them by their agreement within which they might declare their inability to form a company. Now, the Government have been endeavoring to get other contractors, but the hon. gentleman will see that to publish the negotiations and correspondence would simply show our hand to any other party we might be dealing with, and it is not advisable we should do so.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think it is much to be regretted that the Government did not see their way to bringing down the correspondence the House is entitled to, especially after the long time which has elapsed since this matter was brought before the House. As the hon. the leader of the Opposition has stated, we took exception to the vote last year on the ground which hon. gentlemen maintained most energetically when they were in Opposition—that appropriations should always be accompanied with all the explanations and information that can be produced on the subject. Now, twelve months have elapsed. The Government are in possession of the offers from Messrs. Anderson, and we want to know what were the terms upon which the Government entered into a contract with these gentlemen. We wanted to know what speed they had arranged for, whether one of the terminal points was to be in the Dominion and another in France; whether these steamers were to possess the speed which the hon. the Minister of Finance said they could possess when he brought down his resolution. The right hon. the leader of the Government says now that that vote was to obtain a line equalling, in speed, the fastest lines in New York; but, according to the Government organs, which, no doubt, were inspired, the time for completing the voyage stipulated between this country and Liverpool would only require a ship to make sixteen knots an hour. If that be the case, there is a very marked difference between the speed of the steamers running from New York and the contract which the Government papers announced as entered into with the Messrs. Anderson. For these and other reasons, the Government are bound to put the House in possession of the desired information. We all saw distinctly last year that the hon. the Minister of Finance was discussing a question he did not understand. Certain figures had been given him respecting the route and distances and the cost of transport and the speed of the vessels, which were made up for the occasion, and when objections were pointed out to the hon. gentleman he could not answer them, because they were plain facts stated by the owners of steamboat lines and shippers who had engaged in that business all their lives. The hon. gentleman found his estimates were entirely inaccurate. When the Government entered into this contract with the Messrs. Anderson, it was obvious from the very commencement that they were bound to fail because they were asking, according to their speeches, for a class of steamers which could not be maintained on the subsidy given. They were asking for a port in France as a port of call, which would be destructive to the success of the line, and there were other conditions which, coupled with these, made it useless to expect success in a well-known commercial community like London. What was the result? The Messrs. Anderson, when they went to the other side, were met with a letter from the head of the Allan line, and it was very natural that they should be so met. They said, we propose to put on those steamers and they gave information as to the amount of Canadian traffic, and, when the moneyed men of England found that two large fleets like those of the Dominion and Allan lines would not accept the terms which the Government offered them, according to their explanation to this House, it was only natural that the moneyed men of England would have nothing to do with the matter, and I believe that they will have nothing to do with it now. This delay is most disastrous. It is disastrous to the interests of the country. I am informed that these two lines have made an offer to the Government to put on a sixteen or seventeen knot line, and I have always contended that that is sufficient for our business if it is connected with a good freight line. I desire to know if that is one of the proposals which the Government are considering or if they are still running abroad to get other competitors, and are keeping the real competitors, who would deal with this in a proper way, out of the competition? One of these companies is building a steamer at present of between 5,000 and 6,000 tons. That is the Dominion line, and it has been awaiting the action of the Government to know whether the sixteen or seventeen knot service would be accepted; because, if it were accepted, that line would put in the machinery to make that speed. I believe they have pressed the Government to say whether they will accept that offer or not, and the last communication states that the matter is still unsettled.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What line is that?

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Dominion line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are subsidiary to the Allan line.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). They are now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have had no direct communication with the Government.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will not say that the Dominion line have not asked him or his Finance Minister to consider them as negotiators. I know as a fact that they have, and the Finance Minister will not deny it if the First Minister does.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The First Minister may not be aware of all the facts.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am aware of all the facts.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). My information is that they have approached the Government, and have stated that they are prepared to enter into negotiations for a line of sixteen or seventeen knots, and that that took place no longer than three or four months ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Never in the world.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And they were informed by the Government that the matter was all adrift, and that they could give no information on the subject. Consequently, it is probable that that steamer of 6,000 tons will probably be turned into a freight steamer, because the Government cannot give any information on the subject. I think the Government are not only treating the public very unfairly, but are treating this House with great disrespect. They tell us they had a contract with the Messrs. Anderson. The hon. gentleman says that will show for itself in the hands of the public. Does he suppose that the public do not know what the Messrs. Anderson were at? They are evidently out of the field. Now, are the Government negotiating with another company, or are they still negotiating with the Messrs. Anderson, because the remarks of the hon. gentleman would suggest that the Andersons are set aside and that the Government are negotiating with some other company. This delay is of the most delusive.

character. Either the Government never intended to put on a fast line, or they are keeping it back for some purpose of their own. There is quite properly and quite naturally an anxiety on the part of the commercial people to have a fast mail service, but I say that a line of sixteen or seventeen knots, with a proper capacity for carrying freight, is sufficient in the interests of Canada, and under those circumstances I think the Government are not serving the interests of Canada either commercially or in a postal sense, by keeping the matter hanging over so long. We have constant intimations from the Government organs that this Government is going to give us this fast line, and when members of the Government speak, as the Minister of Finance spoke at Toronto last year, they state that this is going to happen at once, and they do not appear at the same time to attempt to take advantage of the offers made from either of these companies. I complain of them, first, for not giving us the information they possess; secondly, for not negotiating with our own companies, composed of men who have built, to a large extent, the trade and traffic of this country, who have a fine class of steamers, and are prepared to put on a larger class of steamers of sixteen or seventeen knots to meet the necessities of our service.

Motion negatived on a division.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—STUDENTS' MARKS.

Mr. PLATT moved for:

Return showing:—1. The number of marks for all subjects received by each cadet of the present first and second classes at Royal Military College, Kingston, from 1886 and 1887, respectively, up to 30th June, 1889. 2. The names of the cadets now serving as non-commissioned officers, together with a statement showing the total number of marks received by each, and number of marks obtained by each in each subject. 3. The names of the cadets who failed in the examinations in June, 1889, and who left the college. Also, a statement showing the names of cadets who were permitted to have special examinations after June, 1889, and the subjects of examination in each case.

He said: The object I have in moving this resolution is to obtain for the information of the public, details as to the conduct of the Military College, which I think it is for the interest of all to have placed before the public.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think this cannot be granted. There can be no objection to the granting of the number of marks received by each cadet, provided that the names of the cadets are not given. It would be very unjust to any of the young men who have been unfortunate, that their names should be given; and that is always true with regard to universities and educational institutions. There can be no object then, in giving the names of the young gentlemen who have not succeeded in getting the requisite number of marks, and in publishing their names to the world as having failed early in life. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want that. But he can number the cadets as Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on, and giving the number of marks each one has received. The third clause of the motion cannot possibly be granted. With regard to the second clause, I presume the hon. gentleman has an idea that there has been some favoritism shown, or, if not, I do not see why that motion is made. The first clause of the question can be granted on condition that the names of the cadets are not given. The first and the second clauses can be given, but the third cannot.

Mr. PLATT. I have no desire to get any information other than that which is usually granted, or that is unnecessary. I do not apprehend that it will be necessary for the information which I wish to obtain, to give the names of the cadets and the marks they receive. If the right hon. gentleman objects to that clause I am willing to amend it so as to satisfy him in that respect. I am also willing to eliminate the first clause which asks for the names of the cadets who have failed. Otherwise, I think the information asked for is reasonable and necessary.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the right hon. gentleman is in error in saying that these particulars are never published. We know that in every examination that takes place in the medical or legal professions, the names of the candidates are always published according to the position they occupy as the result of the examination.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only the successful ones are published; the unsuccessful ones, never.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I do not wish to parade the name of any one who has been unfortunate enough not to pass the examination; but I thought the object of my hon. friend in bringing this motion forward, was to clear away a misapprehension which exists in the minds of a good many people. I know that, in my own Province, there is a feeling that favoritism has been shown. I know a gentleman in Halifax who spoke to me on the subject, and said that his son had obtained a much higher number of marks than some others who had received their commission, and he wanted this matter brought before the House. Now the question has been brought up, I might as well say what I have to say upon the subject. Of course, it is very desirable that the public should have confidence in that institution, and that they should feel that when their sons have passed the examinations at the Military College, they are going to stand on their merits, and if they have a higher number of marks than others, and any commissions are to be given, they are entitled to them. I hope that the motion of my hon. friend is to remove that misapprehension. I think it would be very desirable that the right hon. gentleman should bring down the names of those who have passed, and the number of marks they have respectively obtained. It would not be putting them in a more equivocal position than the candidates for other professions in the country, whose names are always published in the regular rotation in which they have passed their final examination. Of course, I would not desire, and I think it would be unkind, to ask that the names should be published of those who have failed in their examination, or who have left the college; but only those should be published who have passed their final examination in the order of merit in which they stood. I think this would interest the public, and would be more satisfactory, and give more confidence in the college than exists now in the minds of a good many people. I know nothing personally of these complaints, but I have been spoken to frequently on this subject, and I think now that it ought to be cleared up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand, the hon. gentleman does not charge any favoritism on the college, but on the Government. He says that a friend of his complained that his son had got a larger number of marks than any other person who got a commission. Well, that does not show any favoritism on the part of the college, but it might be the subject of a motion, if the hon. gentleman is inclined to make it, with respect to the granting of the commission. I think, perhaps, the best plan would be for the hon. member to allow his motion to stand over, and he and I will get together and settle the terms of his motion so as to meet his views.

Mr. PLATT. I will consent to that.

Motion allowed to stand.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORTS.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland) moved for :

Return showing the number of reports of the Geological Survey published respectively for each year of the last ten years, the number sold each year, the number distributed gratuitously, and the number still on hand.

He said: In making this motion I desire to say that from information which has reached me, not only from parties connected with the Civil Service, but also from members of this House, the reports of the Geological Survey are of very little value to this country. Now, Sir, if that Department is of any use at all, it is to give information to the public. It is not absolutely necessary in the governmental machinery of any country, but it may be useful for the purpose of gathering information and spreading it among the people in order that the resources of the country might be developed. I have been informed that there are tons upon tons weight of reports of the Geological Survey that are lying in the cellars of the Department and are being eaten up by the mice and the caterpillars, and being destroyed. I have been informed by members of this House that they have made applications to that Department for copies of these reports and have not received them; on the contrary, they have been treated very curtly when they asked for them. I am also informed that special reports have been published by the officers in charge of field work, which reports are of particular value to the public. I understand that none of these special reports are distributed to the public at all. If such is the case, I think it is desirable that the attention of the Minister in charge of that Department should be called to it, in order that the money of the people, voted by this House and spent in geological work, should be expended in such a way that the people may derive some benefit from getting the information thus procured. The Geological Survey Branch state that their reports are for sale at certain places; but, on those places being visited, the reports are found not to be for sale there. Besides, the public have no notice given of the place where they can be had. There is very little use in placing reports in the hands of booksellers in obscure streets in a city, when no notice is given to the public as to where these reports are to be found. By adopting this motion and obtaining the return, members of the House will be better able to deal with the subject subsequently.

Mr. DEWDNEY. Of course there can be no objection to the return being brought down, in fact my officers have already been preparing it. I believe there is a large number of these reports on hand for different years, a great many more copies of the reports for some years than for others. I have found on enquiry that some years there has been a very large demand for a certain report, while in other years there has been a very slight demand. The distribution of the reports is regulated by Order in Council, and a number of Orders in Council have been passed from the time of Sir William Logan down to the present. I think every hon. member receives one copy from the Department and two more from the Printing Committee, consequently every hon. member should receive three copies. This matter, I repeat, is regulated by Order in Council, and the director and myself are bound by that Order. Should it be thought necessary to make the distribution more liberal, I would have no objection to this being done, but it must be remembered that this is a very expensive report. These reports are placed at different points for sale, and, if they have been sold out, the party who is selling them has only to apply to the Department for fresh copies and they will be furnished. The special reports referred to by the hon. gentleman are, I presume, the reports of the individual surveyors who are allowed to publish them under their own direction, and the applications for those have not been at all numerous, although the distribution of them is made on application. No application made to me since I have been in office has been refused. I have also succeeded in obtaining for institutions and for some individuals copies of these reports, where I found we had a large number on hand. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought forward the matter, and the return will be brought down at a very early day, in order that the House may understand the exact position of the matter.

Mr. ELLIS. The great difficulty regarding the reports is that you have to go through an enormous number of pages to find out any information which may be required. What is really wanted is a small manual, indicating clearly where the information and details are to be found, compiled from these reports, and the whole matter thus brought within the space of an ordinary blue book. These reports are printed on most expensive paper and prepared in a most expensive manner. I have been applied to twenty times, I suppose, by people in New Brunswick for copies of special reports. I presume the people who made these requests really wanted the information embodied in these reports. In order to furnish it I had to supply them with very valuable books, whereas the whole matter might have been placed in a comparatively small compass. A different system should be inaugurated. The Geological Department desire to make a very great display in a scientific direction, but what is required is not such scientific display, but a display for the economic purposes of the Dominion.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). Very few people are aware that the special reports are printed. I can well understand, for example, that a special report made on the Lake Superior district would prove a great advantage to the people of that district and might be the means of inducing capital to come in; but not only are few people aware that such reports are printed, but I am informed there are many printed and few distributed. Our object should be to give full information as to what is being done in that Department, and the reports printed should be distributed to the public.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTED GRAINS AND SEEDS.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) moved :

That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—That it is expedient to remove the duty on, and place on the Free List all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada, but which are now largely imported and sown for the production of food for cattle under the system of feeding called soiling and ensilage, now largely adopted by the farmers of Canada.

He said: I am encouraged in making this motion by the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Customs last Session, when he declared that this matter would receive the serious consideration of the Government, and that, if it was found it did not interfere with any other important branch of agriculture, it would receive every favorable consideration. I cannot see what other branch of agriculture this would interfere with. In the farmers' institutes last year there was no question in connection with agriculture which elicited a greater amount of discussion as that of soiling and ensilage. I have also been encouraged by the course the Government is pursuing in setting apart $25,000, which the Government organs declare they are going to set apart, for the purpose of bringing in seed barley, to be distributed among the farmers of the Dominion, so as to test the different varieties and find those best suited for the English market. While the Government is in this respect taking a step that will result in a benefit to the farmers, it is much more important that they should encourage the farmers of the Dominion to go into the system of soiling and ensilage. I understand that they have engaged Professor Robertson, and that he has been going to the several farmers' institutes, to explain to them this system. I am perfectly aware that Professor Robertson, at all these institute meetings which he attended during the last three or four years, advised all he came into contact with to go into this system of feeding cattle. He advises strongly that butter-making ought to be gone into during the winter months—something that has not heretofore largely engaged the attention of the farmers of this Dominion. Under the system followed by the farmers heretofore, that was almost impossible, but now it is found that ensilage is one of the best feeds that can be given to cows for the production of good butter during the winter. I have been encouraged also by the statement of the hon. the Minister of Customs, that the Government will take into consideration all young industries and all branches of industries not largely followed in Canada. Well, this is a new branch of the agricultural industry in Canada, and one that is calculated to be very advantageous to the people. Mr. Robertson stated, at the meeting of the Dairymen's Association held in this city the other day, that the system of feeding ensilage to cows would reduce the value of the daily ration fed to a cow from 22 cents to 15 cents. Take this for the half year, and you will find it means a saving of $12.75 upon each cow in the Dominion. In the Province of Ontario alone, we have over 700,000 cows. Take $12.50 of a saving on each cow, and you will find a total saving of $8,750,000 by adopting the system of ensilage. I hold it is the duty of the Government to assist the farmers in the production most profitable to them, and most in the interests of the agricultural community in the future. While I commend the action of the Government in seeking out new descriptions of barley, to supplant the six-row barley we have been accustomed to grow in Ontario, and find a profitable market in Great Britain; I hold with Professor Robertson that the day has come when the farmer ought not to be the exporter of any grain but wheat. At the meeting of the Dairymen's Association at Ottawa, Professor Robertson said that farmers ought to consume all the coarse grains on their farms, and import all the cheap coarse grains they can obtain, in order that the animals they export may go out in a finished condition, and not in the condition in which a large number are sent out at present. Let me observe that a very large amount of raw material is brought into the Dominion to assist the various manufacturers to carry on their occupations. In 1888, $1,605,000 worth of wool came into the country, duty free, to favor the wool manufacturers, and even the woollens we have are not gaining very rapidly on the market of Canada; because I find, during the last year, that $10,000,000 worth of manufactured woollen goods were brought into the Dominion. So that with all the advantages of free wool our manufacturers are not keeping out the imported goods and giving to the farmers of Canada the market they were promised under the National Policy. $3,800,000 worth of raw material came into the Dominion in favor of the cotton manufacturers, and yet those manufacturers put the whole amount of that duty on the price of goods they sell in the Canadian market. The tanners received in hides and skins $1,587,000 worth of raw material free for their interests. We find that the manufacturers of furniture and other goods made from lumber and timber got $867,000 worth of raw material brought into the country; making a total of $7,896,000 worth of raw material which came in, in the interests of these four manufacturing industries. It is a very small amount involved in what the farmers have been asking, and I hope the Government will see their way to give us that relief. It has been said that the farmers have not come to Ottawa, and ask for the relief which we have asked for on the floor of the House, but the Government cannot be ignorant of the importance of this branch of industry. I was at the Experimental Farm, and I found that the Government had silos there and were experimenting with ensilage, and I think they are succeeding very well. When it is thought important to spend the amount of money which has been spent on the Experimental Farm, in order that the farmers of the country may be indirectly benefited—because some $248,000 has been spent upon the Central Experimental Farm in order to give the farmers an indirect benefit—is it too much to ask that the small amount should be granted which will encourage the mode of farming to which we are now tending, and which will make farming more profitable than any other scheme that could be devised. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to encourage the farmers by every means in their power. In regard to animals, we find that we have in Ontario 1,928,000 head of cattle. If, as Professor Robertson states, it will save $10 a head to adopt this system, I ask what will be the amount saved to the farmers of Ontario by its adoption? Many of the most advanced farmers are seriously taking into consideration the building of siloes, in order to keep the ensilage over until the next summer, and making arrangements to feed the cattle under cover during the day time, and only to let them out to pasture during the night. Seeing that this is so important a measure and that such large interests are involved in it, it is the duty of the Government to assist us by every means, because this system is one which returns to the soil almost all which is taken out of it. Compare this system with that which they are encouraging to-day, of distributing barley among the farmers to enable them to send to the English markets a class of goods which may find a market there. The farmer who will consume his own produce and make farming pay, deserves more encouragement than the farmer who is sending his barley to the English market, because every load of barley which is sent to the English market is so much fertility taken off the farm. I do not think those who take this position could long hold the position which we, as farmers, have long occupied. It is the duty of the Government, and of those who take so great an interest in agriculture, and those who occupy seats behind the Treasury benches, to give us assistance in this matter. Although farmers have not come in large deputations to the House of Commons, let me read what took place at a farmers' institute in East Middlesex, and that is perhaps the third county in the Province of Ontario which can grow corn with profit to the farmer. I believe that only Essex and Kent are more favorable than East Middlesex for the growing of corn. From the Globe of 3rd February last, I take the following:—

“At a meeting of the East Middlesex Farmers' Institute yesterday, the paper read by Mr. F. R. Shore, on the subject of the duty on coarse grain evoked a long and animated discussion. Finally, the following resolution, moved by Mr. F. R. Shore, seconded by Mr. R. Gorwell, was passed with only four dissenting votes: ‘Resolved, That, in the opinion of this institution, it would be beneficial to have the duty removed from American corn.’”

I may say that the gentleman who moved this resolution has been a life-long Conservative, one who has had the scales removed from his eyes a short time ago with respect to the benefit of the National Policy to the agricultural community. Let me read part of a resolution passed at the Central Ontario Farmers' Institute in Toronto, and see whether or not the farmers who sent the delegates, and the delegates who met there, are afraid of the importation of coarse grains into Ontario, or believe that it will deprive the farmer of his own market:

“Therefore, this Central Institute do respectfully ask the Government to reduce the tariff on articles of prime necessity to the farmer, such as iron, steel, coal, cottons, woollens, rubbers, sugars, corn and salt.”

That is the view of the Central Farmers' Institute, and the discussion was carried on apparently without any political feeling, and when the vote was taken there was some seventy who voted for the resolution, twenty-four refrained from voting, and only three or four voted against it. It is the duty of the Government to pay attention to all these facts; and, if I have not been misinformed, a number of petitions have been sent to the Government from agricultural societies in the Province of Quebec asking them to remove the duty on corn. In face of these petitions and resolutions, it is certainly the duty of the Government to give us the relief which we ask. It is a very small amount which is involved. Compare the exports of last year with those of 1881 and 1882, and you will find that the value of agricultural products exported is about $16,000,000 less than the exports at that time. This may perhaps be caused in part by the failure of crops, and no Government can give us good crops, although the leader of the present Government stated, when the National Policy was adopted, that he was in league with the Clerk of the Weather, and that when the Conservative Government was in power, we should have the refreshing shower and the genial sunshine and the good crop. I must say that, if the hon. gentleman was in league with the Clerk of the Weather, he has steadily neglected his duty in those respects. At all events it is the duty of the Government to give us the relief which we ask in this resolution.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The motion before the House, although it may appear a small one to some, is one of great importance in the questions that it raises. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) has referred to the resolution passed by the Farmers' Institute. I know the gentleman who read the essay that day, and who moved the resolution my hon. friend has just read to the House. I can state that he is a gentleman of very large experience and of great intelligence; and not only that, but he is one of the largest stock breeders in the Province of Ontario, a man in every way qualified to judge of what he is talking about. It has been pleaded in this House, and may be again before this debate is ended, that this is really but a small matter. We may be told that only a small quantity of seed is imported into the Dominion, and that the duty collected upon it does not amount to very much. But, Sir, we are all familiar with the proverb that it was the last straw that broke the camel's back. It is so at the present time. The farmer has to pay a little on one thing, a little on another thing, and a little on everything under the sun, and it comes to a large amount when taken in the aggregate. This, perhaps, is an opportune time to enter upon a reform in this direction. I need not tell the hon. members of this House who are engaged in agriculture, that, at the present time, agriculture in this Dominion is in a sort of transition state, that we have come to a crisis in the agricultural affairs of this country. Some twenty years ago, our neighbors on the other side of the line conceived the absurd idea that they could manufacture in their own country everything they needed, and that they could compel other countries to pay cash for what they had to sell. They thought that wheat was king, and that they could compel England to buy their wheat and pay gold for it, while they manufactured the articles they needed for their own consumption. That idea was founded upon a fallacy. There are laws in trade as certain in their operation as the laws of gravitation, and one of them is: that people must buy where they sell, that they must exchange the articles they have to sell for the articles which they need to buy. This was the fallacy that the American Government committed, and I need not tell this House that the Canadian Government, a few years later, slavishly followed the example of the United States, and made the very same fatal mistake; and what is the result to-day? It has always been found in the world's history that a demand stimulates a supply. England was no exception to the general rule that a nation must buy where it sells, and when she found that America was determined not to buy from her, she resolved to find some other place in which to purchase her bread supply. She turned her attention to other lands, and found there was an illimitable area of fertile soil in India, for example, fit for the production of wheat, and in this and other countries, she stimulated a production of those articles of food she needed, and she found there a market in which to trade off her manufactured articles. Previous to that time the people of these other countries never thought of raising a bushel of wheat for export, whereas, now they contribute the largest part of the supply that Britain needs. The English people said to them: If you will raise wheat for us, we will give you in exchange the articles we manufacture, and which you need; and the trade has been profitable on both sides. Now, look at the results as far as America is concerned. In India they can raise about three bushels of wheat for the same cost that one can be raised for in America, and they take British goods in exchange. What is the result? The United States thought that they could coerce England into buying their grain and paying gold for it, and they find now when it is too late that they have made a mistake. The market has gone from them, and apparently gone for ever; for Britain can exchange her manufactured goods in the countries where she has stimulated the production of wheat, but she cannot send her manufactures into the United States and Canada in exchange for the articles she requires. Such is the state of things now that the market for cereals, which the United States formerly enjoyed, has gone from them. Well, Sir, Canada is in much the same condition as the United States, and we have to meet these changed conditions; we have to meet the fact that the products of the soil are fetching a much smaller price than they formerly did. We have another fearful condition to meet: we find that the farms are losing much of their former fertility, that the virgin soil is being exhausted, and that not only the products of the soil fetch a smaller price, but that we can also produce much less in quantity of those products; so that the candle is lighted and is burning at both ends. Now, the hon. member for Huron has pointed out one way by which that altered condition can be met; he has pointed out how the burden upon our farmers can be eased off in one direction, and the fertility of the soil increased. It is only by making one acre produce as much as two formerly did, that we can meet these changed conditions. As I said at the outset, it may be pleaded that these are very small matters; but when you come to take the amount of duty paid on all these articles that the farmer requires, it amounts to a tremendous aggregate. The other day I received a letter from a very intelligent gentleman, a farmer, in my own constituency, and he drew my attention to the fact that the combination among the salt manufacturers, rendered possible by the tariff—for the tariff is responsible for every one of the combinations that we have in this country—he pointed out that the salt combination had so raised the price of salt, that the price had become so burdensome to the consumer, that salt has ceased nearly altogether to be used as an article for manuring the land. This gentleman has had experience in the use of salt for manure, and he knows perfectly well that while it is good on almost all soils, upon certain kinds of soil no other manure can be applied that will produce such marked results as salt. Mr. Glen, the gentleman who wrote me, did not write only in his private capacity, but he wrote as Master of Elgin Division Grange, and his statement was endorsed by Mr. Little, Master of London Division Grange. Hon. members are aware that the duty on salt in barrel is 15 cents per 100 lbs.; the duty on salt in bulk, the variety used for fertilising purposes, is 10 cents per 100 lbs., or $2 per ton. This duty is so large as to almost prohibit our farmers using it. They find under the altered condition of things that it is practically out of their reach. This gentleman formerly dealt in salt. I wrote to him for particulars, and he waited until the East Middlesex Farmers' Institute held one of its regular meetings, and then the information was given. The subject was there fully and fairly considered in all its aspects, and it was moved by Mr. James A. Glen, Master of the Grange, and seconded by Mr. James Lammamin:

"That, whereas, owing to the combination of salt manufacturers, the agricultural community are compelled to pay 45 cents per barrel more than under competition, and the use of salt for manurial purposes has fallen off almost entirely, we are of opinion that salt should be either put on the free list or the duty reduced to 10 cents per barrel and salt in bulk to 30 cents per ton, and that binding twine should be put upon the free list."

This motion was carried unanimously. The tariff upon this article enables the manufacturers to combine and advance the price for all purposes for which it is used. It is used for cattle, in the manufacture of cheese, for curing hay and for manure, and the duty and the combination, resulting as a necessary consequence from the duty, has enhanced the price very materially and prevented its use in directions where it was formerly beneficially employed. So much is it the case that when I left London it was retailing from $1.20 to $1.30 per barrel, while in Michigan it was 70 cents per barrel. That is the way our farmers are fleeced. Then with respect to the item of fertilisers: we remember the time when the Government imposed a duty of $6 per ton on every kind of fertiliser that came into the country. After a hard struggle we got it changed to 20 per cent., which still is a heavy discrimination against the farmer. Last Session a motion was made from this side of the House to place fertilisers on the free list, but it was voted down. After prorogation I returned home and saw in the London Free Press a letter written by Chas. James Fox, who has always been a supporter of the present Government, drawing attention to this matter. He said:

"Last Session a motion was moved to put fertilisers on the free list; voted down. It is all very well to speak of our phosphate mines. They may represent much wealth, but in any case, and in the case of most farmers, it is not the phosphate they want, but an article containing a large proportion of nitrogen and potash. My experience in buying in Canada is, that I pay dearly for an article containing little else but the native phosphate rock ground up or else a large proportion of the German kanit. In buying in New York, I have always met with success, knowing I am getting a good article, and I have always paid the duty without grumbling."

Here is a worse grievance than the duty. On 1st April he got a notice that his fertiliser was at the Grand Trunk Railway station. He sent on the 2nd for it, with the duty; sent back 12 miles with the answer that a sample of it must be sent to Ottawa to be analysed before he could get it. Went himself on 8th; got same answer. He goes on to say that if he cannot get it before the proper time to apply it, the use of it would be lost to him. He adds that he has been a Conservative thirty-four years, but if this is the way farmers are treated, the sooner we have a change the better. Again, I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that there is one article which enters into every implement and tool on the farm—I refer to iron. In order to stimulate the production of iron in this country, the farmers are called upon to pay double price for the raw material of every article into which iron enters. That is the way the farmers are fleeced. Let me say a few words in regard to binding twine, which the Middlesex Farmers' Institute has asked to be placed on the free list. We know there is a combination of manufacturers of twine, and that the increased price farmers are called upon to pay has become a serious matter. A farmer was formerly called upon to pay 11 cents a pound, and that was a considerable tax, because three pounds of twine, on an average, are required for an acre of grain, or a tax equal to 33 cents per acre. Last year the manila twine manufacturers combined and raised the price until the merchants charged 18 cents a pound. It was ascertained, however, that two pounds of flax twine were equal to three pounds of manila, and this competition brought down the price of manila to 15 or 16 cents a pound. Taking the price as 15 cents, a farmer has to pay 45 cents per acre for binding twine. Farmers are in other respects placed at a disadvantage compared with other classes. Duties are imposed with a view to stimulate all other industries, but they are apparently intended to discourage the farming interest. Take salt, for instance. It comes in free to the curer of fish, and yet when a farmer requires to use it for manure, he is called upon to pay an almost prohibitive duty. Not only is that the case with regard to salt, but in the case of twine, the ship-rigger or sailor can obtain it for rigging a vessel and for use on ship board, for a duty of 5 per cent., while the farmer is charged 25 per cent. Why is this discrimination made against the farmers? Farmers should have the same privileges as the fish-curer. In regard to the motion which the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has brought before the House, I desire to say that this is a serious question, and one that will increase yearly in magnitude. One of the ways in which we can meet the changed condition of things is by working less land and producing more to the acre. If we can obtain the same results from 50 acres that we now obtain from 100 acres, there will be so much capital saved to the farmers. Any farmer who has had experience in the soiling system knows that this can easily be accomplished, that greater results can be obtained from one acre on the soiling system than from even two or three acres under the system now in vogue. Among the principal imports into our part of the country are the "Mammoth" sweet corn and the "Western Dent," which do not ripen and cannot be produced in Canada. What this resolution asks for is, that the farmer shall have the privilege and benefit of importing them duty free. Another article which it would greatly benefit the farmer to allow in free of duty is turnip seed, which, from experience, it has been found cannot profitably be produced in this country. A very good seed is produced from that imported, but if we go one step further than that, the turnips become woody and rooty. I have not time to go through the full list of these articles which it would benefit the farmers to import free of duty, but I would urge on the House that the farmers, in their present embarrassed condition, claim the attention of the Government, and that everything that can be done ought to be done to facilitate them in their operations, and to lessen the strain upon their resources.

Mr. ROWAND. I wish to trouble the House for only as short a time as possible, while I give my reasons for seconding this resolution. Let me first refer to the present state of the agricultural interests in this country. It has been stated on the floor of this House during the present Session, by a prominent gentleman who claimed to be a practical farmer, that the farmers of the country are in a prosperous condition. Such is not my experience. I would like very much to invite that hon. gentleman to the counties of Bruce and Huron, or some of the neighboring counties, to address a farmers' institute, and endeavor to convince the farmers that they are in a prosperous condition. I hope the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to accept the invitation, and I am quite sure that when he returns his opinion will be greatly changed. The First Minister was pleased to quote the remarks of the hon. gentleman I have referred to, as an evidence of the prosperity of the country, and to that right hon. gentleman I also tender an invitation to meet the farmers at their institutes, when I am sure he would obtain a more correct idea of the condition of the farming community. I regret that I am unable to say that the farmers are prosperous, because I know from my own experience, and from the experience of my neighbors around me, that such is not the case. What the reasons are which have led to this depressed condition of the farmers it is, perhaps, very difficult to say, but we are all well aware that one great reason is the failure of land to produce so abundantly now, as it did formerly. Another reason is that we have at present to enter into competition with the markets of the world, and this competition has largely reduced our prices. These are, in my opinion, the two prominent and important reasons which have led to the depressed condition of the farming community of this country. Any one who has had to do with farming in new countries knows well, that in clearing up the land the great return is from the raising of grain, and the exportation of it. Farmers are a very conservative class generally, and it is pretty hard to get them out of one rut into another. Our farmers have so long pursued their present system of farming—to the ruin of a great many of them, I am sorry to say—that they find it difficult to give up their present system and make new experiments. I would like very much if I were able to endorse the view that the farmers are in a prosperous condition, but I cannot. I am obliged to state the very opposite, and I do not do it with a desire to decry the country, for I know there is an old Scotch proverb which says: "It's a dirty bird that fouls its ain nest." The farmers in the section of the country that I live in have gone on raising grain, and for the last three years we have had partial failures of crop, each year worse than its predecessor, and last year the worst of all. They have been working under the impression that perhaps they would have a chance for improvement next year, and they have worked hard, saved hard, and cropped a greater portion of ground, at more expense and labor, but still the failure has been worse than ever. These men are now in a very bad position. We may go to them and say: "Gentlemen, you have got to change the system of farming you have been following in the past, for it is not going to tide you over your difficulties. You must get out of this grain-raising for export. You must retain all you raise on your land and return it to the soil to make it fertile, and to do that you must get improved cattle." Now, every farmer knows that a man who has been depending on the growing of grain has generally neglected to improve his stock, and that is the position of the majority of our farmers. We have to tell these men that if they are to get improved stock they will have to invest a certain amount of capital; and there are very few of the poor fellows, who, struggling along as they have been for the past few years, are able to secure the capital. We should also remember that our markets for stock are brought down to a very fine point, and that if we go into the markets we must go with the very best articles we can produce, or else we cannot get along. I have no doubt that many of the poor farmers must go to the wall. If they make place for others, who may, perhaps, have more capital, a change in this direction would come. However, we should do all in our power to assist the farmers who are now in straightened circumstances. The great struggle with us is to cheapen production, and that is the only cure we can see for our difficulties. I have heard it stated by an hon. Minister in this House, that the farmers have not presented their grievances to the Government. We do not believe that there is any use sending large deputations to the Government, because we know that they cannot make our lands more fertile. I can, however, assure the hon. Minister that if things continue the way they are, and if he wants deputations from the farmers, he will soon have plenty of them. Here is a very small concession which we are asking in the interest of the farming community, and why does not the Government grant it cheerfully? We asked the same thing last year, and I was led to suppose from what the hon. Minister said, that, unless there was some great difficulty to be overcome, these articles used by the farmers would be admitted free of duty. I do not see why that was not done. If we propose any measure of this kind, the cry is generally raised in this House that it interferes with the National Policy, but I do not think any one will believe that this at all applies in the present case. The seed which we want admitted free of duty does not enter into competition with our native corn, and if we had the privilege of bringing it in free I do not think there is very much likelihood of it being used for food as a general thing, because last year—I cannot speak of this year—our own coarse grains were cheaper for feeding purposes than corn would have been. Therefore, there could be no difficulty in this direction. I would make this suggestion: If there is a difficulty about removing the duty from seed corn for this purpose, let the Government remove it for one or two months in the spring of the year, when the farmers will require their seed, and then reimpose the duty for the rest of the year. We are told that this is a small matter. As the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) has said, all our burdens are made up of small matters; but if this is a small matter to the farmer, it is a small matter to the revenue; and seeing that so many things come in free as raw material for other industries, I do not see why this little benefit cannot be conferred on the farmers. No class in this country has to-day more need of assistance, and although it would be a small thing to give the farmers free seed corn, it would be an encouragement to them, as it would be in the direction of cheapening production, for it would enable the farmer to produce on one acre what he now produces on two. Therefore, I hope the Government will see fit to grant this concession to the farmers of the country.

Mr. BOWELL. I was not in the chamber when the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) introduced his resolution, but I understand that he referred to some remarks made by myself and by the Minister of Finance when this question was under the discussion of Parliament last Session. He is quite right in saying that I promised the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) that this matter would receive the attention, not only of the Department of Customs, but of the Government. The matter was considered very fully, but, in addition to the difficulty of making a distinction between the varieties of imported corn which might ripen and those who might not ripen in certain sections of Canada, there was also the difficulty which presented itself when the matter was submitted to the Minister of Justice, that the provisions of the law would not enable the Government, even if it were thought advisable, to place seed corn on the free list. It could only be done by a change in the tariff at the hands of this House. For that reason the subject was dropped by the Department. I have looked a good deal into this question of the importation of corn for the purpose of seeding, as well as into the difficulties that must necessarily arise in drawing a distinction between the different varieties that would be required for the purposes indicated by the resolution. It is clear that it would be no easy matter to decide as to what varieties would ripen in Canada, because that which will ripen in British Columbia will not ripen in Ontario, and that which will ripen in the south-western peninsula of Ontario will not ripen in this locality; and this would be a constant source of annoyance. Further, from what little practical knowledge I have of administering the tariff and Customs Act, I believe it would be impossible to carry out such an arrangement. In almost every case of importation of a variety of corn by a farmer or dealer, the question would arise as to whether it would ripen in this country or not. Apart from that, the duty on corn for this purpose is so infinitesimal in amount that if it were abolished I scarcely think any farmer would go through all the trouble that would attend its importation. The object the hon. gentleman has in view would be better attained by placing corn on the free list, and if a motion to that effect were made, it could be dealt with either yea or nay. Professor Robertson in his report on the subject of sowing corn, points out that although as much as three bushels per acre have been sown, half a bushel when properly planted has produced more than three bushels sown broadcast. Professor Robertson is an authority on this subject, and his report gives the results of tests on the Ontario Model Farm. He tells us that half a bushel per acre will produce 24 tons of fodder, although the average is 16½ tons. According to this statement the tax on the farmer amounts to 3¼ cents per acre; or, calculating by the ton produced from one-half bushel seeding, two mills and a fraction for every ton of feed produced; or, if the statement made by Mr. Robertson be correct, that half a bushel properly planted will produce 24 tons per acre, then the duty amounts to less than 1½ mills per ton. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that this is a very small matter, and it is very questionable whether the farmers of this country would ask the Government to change its whole policy in order to accomplish so little. I do not propose to enter into a general discussion of the points which have been raised in this debate by the hon. member for South Middlesex and the hon. member for South Huron. They have drifted away into the whole question of protection, alleging that the United States has done wrong, and that Canada, in following its example and adopting the National Policy, has also done wrong, and has imposed enormous burdens on the farmers. That question, I think, can be more properly discussed when the hon. Finance Minister brings down his Budget, and the proposed changes in the tariff. Now, as this is a question which can only be dealt with by the tariff, I would ask my hon. friend whether it would not be better to allow it to stand until the changes proposed are laid before the House. Then the whole question can be discussed upon its merits, as to whether corn should be free or dutiable, or whether you should confine the free corn to the descriptions "mammoth" and "sweet tooth," and two or three others which, it is alleged, will not ripen in this country. That is as far as I desire to discuss this question at present. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that I take exception in toto to the principle laid down by the hon. gentlemen who have discussed this question. Although not a farmer myself, and although it might be presumption on my part to combat the opinions of those who have been, probably, farmers all their lives, there is a general principle involved which, I think, any one who has thought out the question can discover, even if not a practical farmer. It is for my hon. friend to say whether he will adopt the suggestion I have thrown out, namely, to leave the general discussion over until the Budget speech is before the House and the changes in the tariff are proposed, or whether he will press his motion to a vote at present. I do not see how the Government can, under the circumstances and for the reasons I have given, do otherwise than resist the motion made by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. the Minister of Customs has declared himself as opposed to the principle involved in this question, and at the same time asks us to allow it to stand over in order that he may discover whether or not the Government propose to grant the relief asked for.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not go so far as that.

Mr. MULOCK. I so understood the hon. gentleman. Let me remind him that last year this same motion was made, and, at his suggestion, withdrawn, and nothing has come of it since. The only reason the hon. gentleman gave us why this change should be made is the most extraordinary one, that it would cause annoyance to the Custom house officers. I have been under the impression until now that public servants generally existed for the convenience of the public, but I now find that an exception must be made in the case of the Custom house officials, who, instead of being our servants, are our masters.

Mr. BOWELL. The annoyance to which I referred would be to the farmers and the importers.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend, if I understood him correctly, said it would be most difficult to distinguish in the Custom houses the classes of grain which ripen in this country from those that do not, and that this difficulty would cause annoyance in the carrying out of the law. If the Department is so broken down that it cannot administer the law in the interests of the public, it is time it should be reorganised. The hon. gentleman said that the tax is so small it is not worth remitting. To that I would reply, on behalf of the taxpayers, that if it is so small, it is not worth collecting.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SEMPLE. It appears from the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Customs, that the small request which is now preferred on behalf of the farmers, will not be granted. It is well known that under the National Policy the farmers are subjects to be bled by nearly every other class. It is well known they receive very little consideration, and one reason assigned for not granting their request is that it is too small. Well, if the request is such a small one, it is all the easier granted; but I can easily understand that the chief reason for not granting it is that it would injure that great image, the National Policy, and take one prop away from that fetish which the hon. gentlemen opposite are so particular shall not be touched. I am sure that the farmers need not expect any aid from hon. gentlemen opposite who, in times gone by, posed as the farmers' friends. That title, however, they can claim no longer. There is no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture is endeavoring to do something for the farmers in one respect, by bringing barley from England and introducing it into this country, so that we may grow it here and have it to export in the future. That is a very laudable object, and I can see no reason why he should not allow corn for seed purposes, which is the raw material for the most profitable articles the farmers have to sell, to come in free, for it is very evident that the cheaper the farmers get their corn the better for them, and will encourage the sowing for feed to a larger extent. In the past, wheat-growing was what the farmers chiefly depended on, but to-day whatever money they make is made out of cattle, horses, butter and cheese. Our exports are going forward in that direction, and I have no doubt that, if the Government would yield to the request of the farmer by granting this motion, a great impetus would be given to the agriculturist. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture, in bringing out barley from England in order to test the growth in this country of the kind used by English brewers, is making an experiment the result of which will be awaited with great interest, and I am sure that, when the estimates for his Department are before us, we will find a great deal of money spent to less advantage. We have been spending tens of thousands of dollars on immigration, for which, perhaps, there have been very little returns, but I promise my hon. friend that if he would give the farmers cheap corn for seed a profitable return would soon be reached. When this becomes known it will be appreciated at its true value. I am very glad that the hon. the Minister has got as one of his assistants a gentleman who looks after the dairying branch, and who can testify to the value of corn. That is one of the great points which he has made in addressing the farmers' institutes throughout the country, and the farmers are meeting now in various parts to discuss what would be for their greatest advantage, and this is one of the most important subjects discussed. I am glad the motion has been brought forward by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is a practical farmer and has had large experience in these matters, and I hope the Government will not think it is doing too much to accede to this small request of the farmers.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). We have been asked to allow this debate to stand over until the Government comes down with the Tariff Bill, but the Minister of Customs has shown us clearly that the duty on corn is not included in the changes which are to be made, because he says he is opposed to the principle of the resolution which I have introduced, and in that case he must be opposed to granting what the resolution asks. The Government have been sending out men to educate the farmers in the most improved methods of farming, and one result of that has been to induce the farmers to get over their prejudices in regard to ensilage. How many farmers have I heard say that it was impossible to take green vegetable matter and keep it for any length of time. But, in consequence of the visits which have been made to them by gentlemen from the Experimental Farm and from the Agricultural College at Guelph, their prejudice as to ensilage has been overcome, and now there remains only one body which requires to be educated to its duty; and, as long as I have a seat in this House, I will do my best to educate the Government of the day in regard to its duty to the farmers. I hope every farmer in this House will aid the Government to do its duty in assisting the class which is struggling more than any other class in the country. I shall bring up a motion of this description annually, as long as I am here, in regard to this matter and in regard to other articles upon which the farmers should have consideration. It may be said that this is a very small amount, but the amount of binding twine is very small also. Though it is small in regard to the amount which goes into the Treasury, it is not small in regard to the amount taken out of the pockets of the consumer. For every cent that goes into the Treasury on binding twine, 11½ cents goes into the pockets of the manufacturer; and that is another article which ought to be placed on the free list. I cannot accede to the request of the Minister of Customs to withdraw this motion, but I must submit it to a vote of the House, so that the educational process may be brought to bear on the Government in regard to this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the vote is taken on this question—and the hon. gentleman has intimated that he intends to insist upon a vote—I wish to say a word or two, so that this may not be taken upon the assumption which my hon. friend has just made. I listened attentively while the Minister of Customs was speaking, and I did not understand him to say that he was opposed to the principle of the resolution moved by my hon. friend, nor that no such change would be made when the tariff was brought down, or that any such change would be made. This is one of a series of resolutions which are being brought up, and some of which will be brought to a vote, which affect tariff matters, and upon which the opinion of the Government will not be given until the tariff is brought down. When that is done, for whatever changes are made we propose to be able to give a good reason, as we do for whatever changes are not made. In the meantime, I think it would be wiser that this motion should not be pressed to a vote. If it is so pressed, the Government will be obliged to refuse the motion.

Mr. PLATT. I think the reason assigned by the Minister of Finance for asking the withdrawal of the motion is the very best reason why the House should express its opinion upon it. If the Government wish to know the opinion of this House before they complete the structure of their new Tariff Bill, I know of no way in which they can in so short a time obtain the view of Parliament. About a year ago I had the honor to introduce a similar resolution to the House, and it was withdrawn at the request of the Government and upon the express promise of the Government that they would give it an early and fair consideration. They tell us to-day that they have given it consideration during the past year, but have been unable to discover any means by which the object of this resolution can be effected. If they have passed a whole year discussing it without arriving at a conclusion, can we imagine that, without an expression of the view of this House, they will arrive at any conclusion before the end of the Session.

Mr. BOWELL. The trouble is, they did not say so.

Mr. PLATT. I understood the Minister to say that, owing to the impracticable character of the proposal, he was unable to carry out the principle of the resolution.

Mr. BOWELL. I said I believed it to be impracticable, but, even if it were not so, my advice from the Department of the Minister of Justice was that we had no power to put this on the free list by Order in Council, but that it could only be done by Parliament.

Mr. PLATT. The reason given by the Minister is a new reason which is quite different from that which he gave last year, when he said that the Government were competent to place these grains on the free list for seeding purposes. Beyond that, the excuses given by the Government to-day are the same as they gave last year. In the first place, we are told that it is a very small matter, and we are led, by the Minister of Customs, to believe that, because of the smaller quantity of seed used per acre in the production of this ensilage, it is a very trifling matter. If he understood the extent to which this new industry is growing through the country, he would understand that the increased acreage will more than make up the reduction of the seed per acre. He puts it at half a bushel per acre. I am told that the farmers are advised by the professors who address them to use about that amount of seed, though I believe the farmers in the best part of Ontario are in the habit of using from one and a-half to two bushels an acre. This subject is becoming yearly of greater importance and magnitude to the farmers. The hon. Minister points to the difficulty of deciding what varieties of grain will or will not ripen in this country. That is a matter of very little moment. All the kinds of grain that are imported for this purpose are such as will be imported for no other purpose. No farmer, no dealer in grain, will import such grains as are used for seeding or for ensilage, for any other purpose; it would be too expensive. Whether it will ripen in this country or not, is a matter of small moment, so long as the hon. Minister is made aware that it was imported for seeding purposes alone. I have listened to the discussion thus far, expecting that the old excuse would be brought forward which was put forward in the debate early last year—that this was one of a series of attacks upon the National Policy. I have not heard that announced on the Government side to-day; in fact I understood, as most hon. members understood, the hon. Minister to say, that he was opposed to the principle embodied in the resolution, but I believe he has withdrawn that statement, or, at least, has said that he did not so express himself.

Mr. BOWELL. I have either been singularly unfortunate in expressing my views, or the hon. member has misunderstood me. I said, the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), had introduced the question of protection as a whole, and that I dissented from them.

Mr. PLATT. From the speech and not from the resolution. Well, it does not seem to make any difference when the farmer's interests is brought in question, whether it is an attack upon the National Policy, or whether it is in accordance with the principle which is the foundation of that policy. If it be an attack upon the National Policy, it cannot be granted on the ground that it is an attack on the National Policy. If it be in line with the National Policy, then it is refused because it is a small matter and difficult to manage. I wish to reiterate what I said last year, that the definition of the National Policy, as laid down by the leader of the Government himself, is such as to warrant any member, in bringing such a resolution before the House, in claiming that it was a part and parcel of the principle of the National Policy which was embodied in that resolution. The leader of the Government, speaking in 1887, used these words:

"That policy the Government adopted and carried out, in 1879—the National Policy—was simply this: That it made the free list as wide as possible, of the articles which could not, for climatic or other reasons, be produced or manufactured in Canada, and that raw material which could be made up here would be imported free."

This is exactly in keeping with the resolution which is now before the House, and it cannot be stated by any members upon the opposite side who so warmly supported the National Policy as a whole, that it is an attack. It is simply a request made, this time, at any rate, on behalf of the farmers of the country, on behalf of the agriculturists, and it would be to their advantage; and I think it is too bad that the farmers should be denied this request on the ground that it would cause a little annoyance or difficulty in the Customs Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sorry that the Finance Minister has not announced to the House that the Government are seriously considering a change in the tariff in the direction suggested by the member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), and, under the circumstances, it might be quite reasonable that he should consent to a withdrawal of the resolution in order to enable the Government to present their tariff changes. But the Finance Minister has not made any such announcement. He has not led the House to believe that it is their intention to make any such a change. The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Customs has said there are so many difficulties in the way, he finds that if he were to make a change in the tariff which would enable the Government to favor the farmers to the extent of permitting those commodities to enter free of duty, it would so upset their present arrangement and entail such an amount of trouble, that he does not feel that it could possibly be done. I say it is very much to be regretted that the Government, on all occasions when a proposition is made for the purpose of trying to better the farmers' condition, are willing to raise any number of obstacles in the way of meeting their demand. It is too bad that while the crank of the National Policy machine can be turned to better the condition of every manufacturer in this country, every man who is a producer of any other commodity than the farmers, they can reap some advantage by that particular policy, but when it comes to the farmer there is no possibility of his being considered. During all the years that I have sat in this House in no single case has the Government ever made an effort to benefit the condition of the farming community by the operation of their National Policy. In every single case the operation of that policy has been in the other direction. Take, for instance, the item my hon. friend referred to this afternoon—the item of salt. A number of the manufacturers and producers of salt in this Dominion were anxious to be placed in a position that they could make more money in the production of salt, and immediately the Government met their views and put a duty upon salt, and the result is that the farmers of the country are called upon to pay an increased price for a commodity of which they use very much more than any other class in the community. After all, the farmer must bear the burden. Every single turn that is made of the protection crank touches the resources of the farmer, and tends to increase the price of everything that he has to buy and consume. When the Government are appealed to, to help them to better their position financially, when the farmers are trying and struggling with the difficulties arising from a failure of crops the last year or two, the Government will not even give them any benefit on this one small item of salt; they will not even say that they will promise to consider and modify the tariff so as to meet the views of the farmers; they want to procrastinate and put off any action. The Minister of Finance does not want to hold out any promise just now; he would rather the matter were left over. Last year the hon. member who moved this resolution did meet the request of the Government; he agreed to leave it over. Was there any one benefited by that? No, Sir. The Government did not move one step; the matter remains to-day where it was twelve months ago. The probabilities are that changes will be proposed in that tariff in the direction of meeting the views of men who are producers of other things than farm products, manufacturers who can combine together and bring all their influence to bear upon the Government. But simply because the farmers do not come down here in large numbers and spend their money on railway fares, and go to a great expense to press their interests upon the members of the Government, the Government will not listen to those who are sent here to represent them. The farmers are not able to contribute to election funds like the manufacturers and others. When the First Minister goes out before a general election he does not call the farmers together and ask them to contribute, on the ground that they are reaping great advantages from the operation of the National Policy. The right hon. gentleman is able to do a great many things, but he has not had face enough to go before the farmers and ask them to assist him in a federal election. They do not reap such advantages as would enable them to do anything of the kind. I suppose we shall have to wait until the hon. Finance Minister makes his announcement in the Budget speech. The House has been in session over a month, and we have not yet got the Budget. It is to be earnestly hoped that we shall get it before long, and that it will show some little intention of meeting the pressing interests of the farming community in the way of reducing the duties upon some of the articles that enter largely into their daily consumption. The duty on iron was raised some years ago, and the farmers suffered very severely by that change. Among no class of the community is more iron used than by the farmer, and the advance in duty caused a rise in the price of all articles into which iron entered. Such an advance strikes at the farmers' resources and tends to pauperise them. I hope the Minister of Finance will take this matter into serious consideration, and will come down with a proposition to meet the views of the farmers on these important questions and give them some relief.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Last year, when this question was before the House, I said a few words, in which I expressed my opinion that the question of ensilage was of great importance to the farmers of this country. I said I believed that this was going to cause a revolution in the system of farming, and that the introduction of this fodder corn, if grown here, was going to make the greatest difference possible with the farming community. I said then it was going to take the place of the fodder for all our dairy farmers; that this ensilage, which a few years ago was unknown, was becoming a burning question with the farmers, and rightly so, when we consider that an acre could grow from twenty-five to thirty tons of ensilage, and that from four to five tons of ensilage would feed a cow for two hundred days. This shows that an acre of land will yield more fodder for cattle in this than any other way in which it can be utilised. If that is the case, it is of the utmost importance to our farmers, more especially as it is known that, if the ground is properly prepared, the crop will grow as well in dry seasons as in wet seasons, in fact better in dry seasons, that they should know that it will afford a fodder for our cattle that has hitherto been unknown. As an hon. gentleman who has spoken to-night had stated, wheat and barley growing has become a thing of the past, and our farmers cannot compete with the rest of the world in these commodities. There is no question, however, that in dairying our farmers have the means of making money. I believe that while our farming community are in a depressed condition it is well known that those who have been feeding cattle are not so depressed. They have been doing well, fairly well; and there is no reason to doubt, if they continue in that line—I speak for old Canada, and more particularly the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec—that they will become more prosperous in the future than they have been in the last few years, and they will resume their old condition of prosperity. But this change must be brought about by means of dairying. To insure success in dairying we must have cheap fodder, and, no matter whether the season is dry or wet, we must have a certain production of fodder for cattle; and that result can only be brought about by the adoption of the ensilage system. In Wisconsin a few years ago there was not a single silo in that State. To-day there are between 2,000 and 3,000, showing the advanced state of knowledge on this subject, and that the farmers are satisfied that by this system they have a certainty of production and good fodder for their cattle. I know this system of farming has been introduced among the farmers of Ontario, because even in the eastern part a great many silos were started last summer, and, so far as I can learn, they have been very successful. It is, therefore, very desirable that the Government should take this question into their earnest consideration and do what they can to encourage the farmers in adopting this system. The Minister of Agriculture has started a silo at the Experimental Farm. I should like him to see that the experiment is extended, and every encouragement given to farmers to start silos upon their own farms. If this is the case, why not let farmers bring in corn free of duty. I expressed that sentiment last year. The Minister of Customs said he would try and frame some regulation by which it could be done. I am sorry to say no such regulation has been framed; but that it can be done I have no question. I believe a regulation can be framed to accomplish this result, in the same way as the Government have been able to frame a regulation to admit free materials to be used in shipping, salt to be used in curing fish, twine to be used in making fishing nets.

Mr. BOWELL. You can do it by law and by the tariff.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Why not do it? The hon. Minister says this is a very small matter. Perhaps so, but if farmers did not take advantage of it that would be their fault. Let the farmers know that this corn can be brought in free of duty to be grown for ensilage purposes, and it will be a great advantage to them. I do not altogether like the resolution, because it is not well framed; but as I think it is in the proper direction I will vote for it; it is in the direction of an encouragement to the farmers to establish silos and grow corn for this purpose, and I, therefore, support it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) is a practical farmer, or has ever done much in that line.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I have ploughed as many furrows as you have.

Mr. TAYLOR. No; I farmed during a good many years. The hon. gentleman talks of corn for ensilage purposes. Professor Robertson has stated as a fact that the best corn for that purpose is our own Indian corn, if the land is properly cultivated. We can grow all those kinds of corn in Canada which are necessary for this purpose. Of course, we have sweet corn and varieties that will not ripen in this country. They will grow and answer the purposes of ensilage; but, I repeat, Professor Robertson has stated it as a fact that the best corn is our Indian corn. I do not believe the farmers want to jeopardise the National Policy by having it torn to shreds piecemeal. The Minister of Customs has pointed out that the duty is only 2½ cents for corn, sufficient for an acre.

Mr. BOWELL. 3 cents.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yet the farmers of this country, judging by the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, are ground to death by taxes. I believe our farmers are a sensible body of men. They acknowledge that the Government of this country cannot be carried on without raising a certain revenue, and they are willing to contribute their fair share to the public revenue by Customs duties rather than by direct taxation, as suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite. Those hon. gentlemen appear to have a special commission from the farmers to advocate their interests in this House and in the country. It is evident from the news we have heard from Haldimand during the last few days, that the farmers do not believe it. It is very much like the story of an American agent who visited Scotland lately in the interest of some railway company in the United States. In travelling through Scotland in a railway car he found himself seated opposite an old Scotch farmer, to whom he said: "Scotland is a grand country;" to which the Scotchman replied: "It is good enough for me, at all events." The American said: "You should see the United States; that country would make your eyes stare, and you would make a fortune in a year or two." "But," said the Scotchman, "you Americans are such atrocious liars that we do not believe a word you say." "Well," replied the American, "so far as I am concerned, my mouth never uttered a lie in all my existence." "Well," said the Scotchman, "you are like the rest of your race, you speak through your nose." In my opinion the words addressed by the Scotch farmer to the American would apply to hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not believe a word they say in reference to the National Policy grinding to death the farmers of this country. I believe the farmers are satisfied with the National Policy, and I believe they want even a higher duty put upon some of the grain coming in here, in place of throwing the duty off altogether. If we once open the door to bringing in free corn for feeding purposes, we will lower the price of the grain and oats grown in this country which is used for feeding purposes. This story about ensilage does not, in my opinion, amount to much, for the farmers of the country can make all the ensilage they require with the corn grown in this country; if not, they are willing to pay a few cents to reap the rich benefits the National Policy confers on them.

Mr. TROW. Not being a practical farmer myself, I cannot speak with the authority of my hon. friend the mover of the resolution on the subject of bringing in corn free for farming purposes. At the same time, I must dissent from the views of my hon. friend from Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Taylor), for the reason that the corn which my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) proposes to bring into the country will, at least, yield one-third more per acre than any corn grown in Canada. Further, there is more saccharine matter and greater feeding properties in that corn than there is in our native corn. It is a very reasonable proposition, that it is to the greater advantage of the farmer to cultivate that corn which will produce the greatest yield per acre. In the section of the country in which I live, those farmers who have turned their attention to dairying are in better circumstances than those who have been continually cropping their lands with cereals one year after the other, because the lands have become exhausted by continual cropping, as the crops take a certain amount of nutriment out of the soil which is necessary for production. A change in the system of farming must take place, or our farmers will, sooner or later, become impoverished, as they are now in many instances. As I have said before, those who have given their attention to the feeding of stock and dairying are in decidedly better circumstances than those who raise nothing but cereals. The lands require a change, and it is almost impossible to keep down noxious weeds when it becomes deteriorated by overcropping. The raising of eight or ten bushels per acre (that is about the average, I believe) is very unprofitable, while our dairymen make a return in five months of from $30 to $40 per cow during the summer season, which is more than they can raise on four acres of land by the culture of grain. It strikes me that it is a very easy matter for the Minister of Customs to allow corn of that kind to come in free of duty. The hon. Minister himself says it is a simple matter; and if he did so, I do not think the corn so imported would be used for any other purposes than that stated.

General LAURIE. I do not think too much can be said in favor of encouraging the system of ensilage among our farmers. For the last eight or ten years, I have myself raised about 600 tons per year, and I think, therefore, I may be considered as having a very fair experience of the subject. I only wish that silage was stored to a much greater extent by the farmers of the country than it is at present, because, in my opinion, it has proved to be a great success. I cannot, however, accept the statements which have been made on this side of the House as to the small amount of seed required, and the small amount of duty paid into the Treasury. Speaking from the point of view of the farmers of the Maritime Provinces, with whose condition I am best acquainted, I can state that we cannot raise a crop there on half a bushel of seed, but that we require two bushels. Neither can we raise a good crop for ensilage with the native corn, and we must have southern corn. From my experience, I should say that the duty we have to pay is about 15 cents an acre on two bushels of seed, from which we obtain about twenty tons of good feeding: that is to say, the duty is three-quarters of a cent per ton. This, of course, is an item worth considering, but at the same time, we have to consider the difficulties we would labor under if we attempted to import on our own account. I conceive that it would cost us more to make private importations than it does through the merchant, as at present. If I recollect aright, the proposal last year was that the farmers should be permitted to import for themselves, which seemed to me a very impracticable and a much more expensive arrangement than the present one. I think, under the circumstances, it is more judicious that we should vote against this resolution, and leave the matter in the hands of the Government; at the same time pressing upon them the necessity of moving in the direction of facilitating our importations by laying down such regulations as can be conveniently carried out. It is true, as an hon. member opposite stated, that the Department is for the country, and not the country for the Department, but, at the same time, we have to pay for the Department, and if you throw extra and onerous duty upon it the more we will have to pay, and the arrangement in the end will not be very practicable. I think it is wiser to leave it to the Government to deal with the question, when they are arranging the general matter of the tariff, as I understand they propose to do.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to say a word or two on this question. I regret that I only arrived in the House a few minutes ago, and consequently I have not heard at length what the Government propose. My hon. friends have, however, informed me that the Minister of Customs has practically refused to consider the motion before the House. I am surprised to hear this from the Minister of Customs, because I most distinctly understood from him last year—

Mr. BOWELL. If you have been so informed, you have been informed incorrectly; I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. FISHER. Do I understand the Minister of Customs, that it is to be taken into his consideration?

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman had been here it would be unnecessary for me to repeat what I have already stated several times. I said that the whole question of the tariff was under consideration, and whether the Government proposed to deal with this question or not, would be understood when the Minister of Finance laid his proposition before the House. I thought, under the circumstances, it would be better not to discuss this question now, but to wait until the tariff changes were before the House.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister said the same thing last year.

Mr. BOWELL. I beg your pardon; I said that the Government would consider the matter.

Mr. LAURIER. And they are still considering.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps if the hon. the leader of the Opposition, who is usually most courteous, would allow me to complete what I say—

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, very well.

Mr. SCRIVER. The leader of the Opposition is always courteous.

Mr. McMULLEN. Which cannot be said of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. BOWELL. I will not bandy words with that hon. gentleman, because he is too well known. His courtesy exceeds all bounds, therefore I admit not only his courtesy but his excessive politeness on all occasions, no matter what the subject before the House is. What I said before on this matter I desire to say now. I stated, I was under the impression then that I had power, under the Customs Act, to treat this matter as we did articles brought in for manufacturing purposes. The Government and the Department did consider it. I made enquiries at the Department of Justice, and was informed that we had no power to deal with the question by Order in Council, and that it could only be dealt with in a Tariff Act.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to hear the explanation of the hon. Minister of Customs, and I regret that I did not hear it before; but it is no more satisfactory than the statement of it which my hon. friends gave me. I understand that the hon. Minister of Customs found that he could not deal with the matter in the Department, but I have not seen any evidence that he intends to deal with it by law. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues could have made the change before the end of last session if they had been desirous of aiding the farmers in this matter. Now, the arguments which have been made against this motion seem to me to be very trifling indeed. It is said that the motion is a trifling one, and matters very little to the farmers; and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said that he was quite sure the farmers were prepared to bear their fair share of taxation. I have no doubt that is perfectly correct; but we maintain that they bear a great deal more than their fair share of the taxation of the country. I believe the farmers are waking up to that fact, and we have seen an evidence of it to-night. I am glad to see the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) appear as an advocate of the farmers' rights, and I have all the more pleasure in congratulating him from the fact that he is not a farmer. That the hon. gentleman, belonging to the profession he does, and occupying the position he does, should be—I was almost going to say forced, but I am sure he is willing—should be induced to stand up and advocate the rights of the farmers in this House, shows that the farmers are waking up to their interests and are in earnest. A year ago, when this question came up before the House, the hon. member did not use his eloquence to advocate the cause of the farmers.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I did.

Mr. FISHER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. It only shows that—

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That your memory is not good.

Mr. FISHER. Or that I did not know it at the time; but I am very glad that the hon. gentleman is on our side, and that he has shown that there is no greater difficulty in dealing with this question than there is in dealing with others of a similar character. We find manufacturers asking that their raw material should be put on the free list without any consideration of what effect such a change might have on others or on the public revenue, and very often the Ministers agree to their demands. I maintain that this seed grain is practically the same thing to the farmers that raw material is to the manufacturers; and if the hon. Minister of Customs can make arrangements in his Department to admit free the things mentioned a little while ago by the hon. member for Frontenac, when imported for certain purposes, while imposing a duty when they are imported for other purposes, there could be no difficulty in distinguishing between corn brought in for seed and corn brought in for other purposes. I should be glad to see all corn brought in free, but that is not at present the question, and I will not discuss it. As a practical farmer, having some experience with ensilage, I would say a few words on that subject. I endorse what an hon. member from Nova Scotia has said, that many varieties of corn suitable for ensilage are grown in the States and will not ripen in this country. The hon. member for Leeds quoted from Professor Robertson's report, and I was surprised to hear the opinion quoted, for scientific authorities have not yet come to a definite conclusion as to the best kind of corn to grow for ensilage. Experiments are still going on, such as those on the Experimental Farm last year, and Professor Robertson as well as other authorities know that the subject has not yet been sufficiently tested to enable them to give an authoritative decision. More than this, there is but a very small portion of this country where corn can be ripened surely and satisfactorily, so that the great mass of our farmers have to buy it from a distance. Therefore, a great many farmers in the eastern Provinces, even if they could get corn from western Canada which would serve their purpose, could get it very much more cheaply from the States to the south of them. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has just put in my hands Professor Robertson's report, where I find this statement:

"The best fodder for the silo is ensilage corn, known as Mammoth Southern sweet corn or Burrill and Whitman corn. It is a Virginian or Georgian corn, and grows a large bulk of stalk and leaf. It is of certain vitality, and when grown on good soil, properly prepared and cultivated, is proof against drouth. It has a high feeding value per ton. By planting in rows three and one-half feet apart, with three grains to the foot, the largest feeding return per acre will be obtained."

This is in the last report of the Council of the Agricultural and Arts Association of Ontario. I do not pretend to say that this is an absolutely final opinion, because I know that Professor Robertson and others are still experimenting on the matter; but still I believe it is the opinion of the majority of the authorities that the large southern corn does produce a great deal more food per acre than the northern corn. I am very much surprised that the Government are not willing to yield in this matter, because, as the hon. Minister of Customs has said, it is a mere trifle. I confess that I am proud of the taunt which the hon. member for Leeds throws across the House, that we on this side profess to speak for the farmers. I believe we do speak for the farmers; a majority of us represent farmers, while the great mass of hon. gentlemen opposite are not elected by the farmers in their constituencies, but in spite of their opposition. If the farmers of the country were able to elect the men they wish to represent them, apart from the other classes of the community, I am sure a much larger number of those holding the opinion we on this side hold, would sit in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite got into Parliament by the aid of certain interests, but if they appealed to the agricultural class, they would be left behind in a very small minority.

Mr. CARGILL. I happen to come from the County of Bruce, and in that county we have a large number of very intelligent farmers. If any evidence be wanting in support of that statement, I would just say to you, Sir, that they send two members here to support the National Policy, so that consequently two-thirds of the population of the County of Bruce are supporters of this Government. With regard to the question of corn, the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, has told the House that Professor Robertson has come to no definite conclusion as to the results accruing from the different crops of corn grown in this country, and cannot state which seed produces the most bountiful crop. In my own county I had the privilege of attending the Farmers' Institute meeting, and upon that occasion a very intelligent farmer who presided, and who was president of the institute, said that the Premier of Ontario had shown his wisdom in establishing those farmers' institutes throughout the country, and in sending the professors from the Agricultural and Experimental Farms to those institute meetings in order to educate them in the science of agriculture. At the meeting I have mentioned, I listened very attentively to Professor Robertson. He told the audience that on the Experimental Farm in the County of Wellington, they had experimented with some twenty kinds of seed corn, and his opinion was that we would have better results from our own native corn than from any American corn imported for the purpose of growing ensilage. Our hon. friends opposite profess always to voice the interests of the agricultural community of this Dominion. I take exception to that, for we have here on this side of the House a very large majority who represent a greater proportion of the agricultural interests of this Dominion than hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not know that I would have said anything upon this question had not my colleague from West Bruce (Mr. Rowand), a man for whom I have a great deal of respect although he is a Reformer, spoken. He is a gentleman who,

I am quite satisfied, would never make a misrepresentation, and when he spoke respecting the importation of this corn for ensilage purposes, he did not take exception to the National Policy or try to ridicule it in any particular way. He does not believe that this Government can devise legislation which will have the effect of giving us good crops, but he is a rational man coming from the County of Bruce. Now, with respect to the farmers in this country, I may say that, taking them in proportion to numbers, they will compare favorably, in a financial point of view, with the manufacturers of this country. The manufacturers, a few of them, accumulated their wealth previous to the introduction of the National Policy. They had a very large amount of capital to work on. True, the National Policy stimulated the manufacturing interests of this country, but it gave rise to competition, competition produced lower prices, and the farmers to-day are reaping the benefit of those lower prices. To-day you can buy a binder for $150, for which, previous to the introduction of the National Policy, you would have had to pay $300, and everything else in proportion. They talk about the cost of twine per acre for binding corn. Why, previous to the manufacture of those binders, it would cost the farmer 50 cents per acre, and $1 per acre if he had a good heavy crop, to bind his crop. In my younger days, when a boy working on the farm, I remember distinctly when we used to cut the crop with the cradle. It took two good men to follow the cradle, and from two and a-half to three acres a day was a good day's work in cutting grain. To-day, the farmers can bind their grain, notwithstanding the value of twine has increased, very much cheaper per acre than before, since the binders have come into use. In my native county I can name numbers of farmers who went in there with a very small amount of means and settled on land, and these men have gathered estates worth from $50,000 to $100,000. I could give the names if necessary, and I will venture to say that throughout the length and breadth of this country, if you will compare the manufacturers who have been in business for the last thirty or forty years, with men who have been engaged in farming during the same time, you will find that the farmers have, in proportion to numbers, succeeded better than the manufacturing community. As to the quantity of corn to be sown to the acre, I may say that Professor Robertson, in his lecture at the institute in my county, said he had made several experiments in order to ascertain the probable quantity of corn to be sown to the acre. He had tried it in drills, by planting it three, five, and seven inches apart, and he declared that the best results came where it was sown seven inches apart. Taking that as a basis we only require three pecks of corn per acre in place of two bushels, and from that amount of seeding the best results have come.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) never fails to tell us that he represents the farmers on that side of the House. Well, Sir, we all recognise the fancy farmer, and are glad to have him present on every occasion. But I would just remind the hon. gentleman that on this side there are representatives of the farming interest as well as on that, and that while he poses as the representative of a small portion of the Province of Quebec, there are hon. gentlemen on this side who represent the great majority of the Province of Ontario, and are entitled to speak for the farmers. While we would be well pleased to have the farmers receive their seed-corn free, we also appreciate the great difficulties that would be experienced in accomplishing that result, unless the market was left open to a great amount of importation of coarse corn for the purpose of feeding. Perhaps there are not more than one or two ports in Canada where it would be possible to find an officer in charge who could distinguish between the particular grade of corn which would be necessarily used for seeding purposes, and the great bulk of corn which would come in for the purpose of feeding and of distillation. In my own port, the city of Stratford, 22,000 bushels of corn were imported during the past year, and I venture to say that there is not a Customs officer in that port who could tell the difference between one grade of corn and another. The same thing would apply as to wheat, and it would apply to all kinds of coarse grains. I think the farmers have ascertained that it is not to their interest that corn should come into this country, even under the pretext of having cheap seed and saving 7½ cents a bushel, which is the duty charged, so as to open the flood gates to the importation of corn for feeding purposes, which would come into competition with the products of their own farms. They know that is too great a risk. While the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and two hon. gentlemen on this side, have taken the position that ensilage is the finest and best product that can be raised on a farm, the most economical and the most useful, and that it would be desirable to extend that to every farmer, I am sorry to say that at present very few appreciate the usefulness of raising it for the purpose of feeding stock. But I do not think, even if the advantage of 7½ cents a bushel on the cost of corn in this country for seeding were considered on two bushels of seed per acre, that would be a sufficient guarantee, unless the Department of Customs could find some better plan of introducing it into this country than they have at present. I think the Minister of Customs cannot but perceive from the discussion which has taken place, not only this Session but in previous Sessions, that it is the view of the House that the farmers should be relieved of any burden—no matter how small it may be—which is not in the interest of the great farming community of Canada; but, I am sure that the farmers of this country are not so ignorant as not to realise the difficulty that surrounds the position. We have the best evidence from the farmers themselves, that one bushel or one and a quarter bushels is sufficient to seed an acre with corn for ensilage purposes. So that the duty being 7½ cents a bushel, the cost would not be more than 10 cents an acre in duty to raise twenty tons of ensilage. Surely, for the sake of the saving of 10 cents on twenty tons of ensilage on an acre, no Minister of Customs would take the risk of admitting this article free. I would say to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) that the best evidence we could have in regard to the difficulties surrounding the farmers in Canada is given by the farmers themselves. If we had unrestricted reciprocity with the United States we would admit all grains free, and if the farmers were in favor of that proposal the results would have been found in the recent election in the County of Haldimand. If the hon. gentleman will read a portion of the address delivered by the defeated candidate—a former member of this House—Mr. Colter, at the nomination for that county, and will remember the platform on which he stood, he will see that that platform was free trade in corn as well as in other articles with the United States. I will read a few words of Mr. Colter's taken from the Globe on that occasion :

"A few closing words from Mr. Colter contained the declaration that the Liberal party stands on the platform of unrestricted reciprocity on this occasion, as they did a year ago. He stood upon that plank and proposed to fight to the end on that platform. (Prolonged cheering.) Other constituencies are watching Haldimand, to see what the result will be. On the other side, too, there are men watching the result. Free trade, unrestricted reciprocity between the countries would benefit us and the United States."

Now, we have in this extract a plain declaration that Mr. Colter stood on that particular platform. We have also the recollection that that county is an agricultural county. No one will pretend to say that there are any large manufacturing interests in that county. If, then, the solid farmers of Haldimand have so overwhelmingly changed their position and their views, I ask, why is it? It must be because the platform which was adopted by the Reform party has not been acceptable to them. Otherwise, why should there be a change from the 49 majority by which Mr. Colter was previously elected, I suppose without having made a declaration that he was a supporter of free trade or of unrestricted reciprocity? Last year this platform was adopted by the party, and the hon. gentleman had to go to his constituents, and it is evident that that platform has evoked the indignation of the farmers of Haldimand. While it has been said that the roads were bad, and that the Conservative party were furnished with snowshoes to go to the polling place, at all events the other side has been snowed under, and that must have been by the farmers, in consequence of the policy which they adopted of unrestricted free trade with the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite have their answer from their own friends from that county, which was so intensely Liberal. We all remember the bitter battles which were fought there, and the narrow majorities which were so often obtained; but here we find that the gentleman who has come to grief was the one who stood by unrestricted reciprocity. Of course, he is regretted, perhaps not on both sides, for on this side we may not be so sorry that his platform broke down. I venture to predict that, if those hon. gentlemen will go into any farming constituency, and will make the same declaration as they made in Haldimand, they will have the same result in any case. I am not opposed to the farmers having free seed if they cannot produce it, but we have had a statement to-day that we grow as good corn here as they do in the United States. In any case, the amount which is imported is so small, that I think this is simply an insidious attempt to break down the National Policy, which has been more successful in building up the interests of this country than the policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, with its sixty-five millions of a population.

Mr. HESSON.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). This appears to me to require a few words. Whether you take the duty off the corn which is to be used for seeding purposes or not, is of very little consequence. When I was in New York State last summer, at Clifton Springs, I examined several farms where ensilage was used, and found, in the majority of cases, the corn used for this purpose was western corn and not ensilage corn. Dr. Foster says that he prefers the ordinary western corn to the ensilage corn for ensilage purposes. There is no duty on ensilage corn in that State, and yet they prefer the ordinary western corn. I believe it would be the same thing as far as we are concerned, and that most of our farmers would prefer the western corn to the ensilage corn for ensilage purposes. I can quite understand why the hon. gentlemen make all these motions now, even though they are of minor consequence. They have learned that tariff resolutions are to be brought down by the Government, and they desire to be able to say to the country, if any changes should be made in the direction in which they are moving, that they forced the Government to make these changes. From their standpoint they are probably quite correct in doing this, but it will take a little more than 15 or 20 cents to each farmer in this country to convince them that it would be to their advantage to break down the National Policy. If hon. gentlemen desire to do the farmers of this country a good turn, why do they not move to give them a cent a pound additional on pork, or two cents a pound additional on beef? Most of the pork and beef used in the cities and towns in the Province of Ontario—and I fancy it is the same throughout the Dominion—is brought here from Chicago, cattle raised on the western prairies at very small cost, brought to Chicago and killed there, and then pushed upon our markets, taking the place of the pork and the beef that ought to be grown by our farmers, and would be grown by them if American pork and beef did not come into competition with it. If a real desire to benefit the farmer existed in the minds of the hon. gentlemen opposite, they would move in that direction instead of moving to save 20 cents a year on seed grain, which, from all the information that I can gather, would be of no benefit, because the farmers would not, to any large extent, use ensilage corn, even if they got it free of duty. The farmer requiring but a small amount of seed, he would just send to his seed merchant and buy it, and the question would not arise whether he pays 20 cents or 40 cents a bushel for the seed, because all the duty you take off would go into the pockets of the seed merchant and not into the pockets of the farmers. It would not pay the farmer to take his own team to drive off to get the small quantity of seed that he would require, but he would procure it through the local merchant who would reap all the benefit.

Mr. BERGIN. I had the honor for the last twelve or fifteen years, of a most intimate acquaintance with the late Frank Morris, the father of the silo system in the United States and in this country. I had many discussions with him as to the character of the seed that ought to be used for the purpose of producing the best ensilage. He had large farms in Maryland and immense tracts under corn in Texas and in Georgia, and he told me that the result of his experience was that the corn of the climate in which the silo was to be used, was the corn which was best adapted for the purpose. He told me that southern corn would not ripen in the north, and would not produce the same amount of juice or the same amount of sugar that the corn of this country would produce, because of the shortness of the season and the cold of our northern climate. There was no better authority than he during his lifetime—it is not quite two years since he died. I submit that his testimony, after a great many years of practical experience in growing corn in different portions of America, ought to be a complete answer to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was very glad to see the change that has come over the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). If I recollect aright that hon. gentleman, a year or two ago, was not such a friend of the farmer as he professes to be to-night. I think I recollect that when a motion was introduced into this House for the purpose of doing away with fraudulent and imitation butter, that hon. gentleman stood up in his place in the House and advocated the use of oleomargarine and butter and all that sort of thing, so as to give cheap food to the people of this country. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; I appeal to every member in this House, and I appeal to the Hansard if such is not the case.

Mr. BOWELL. He backed out afterwards.

Mr. BERGIN. He backed out, but that has nothing to do with the statement I made. If we convinced him, it shows that we made him a friend of the farmer whether he desired it or not. The hon. gentleman told us to-night that he is a practical farmer. Well, if what I hear from his county be correct, he is more scientific than practical; in fact I have heard that like his great prototype, he fed his cattle so scientifically that when he had accomplished a similar end, and had got his cattle to live on one straw a day, they died in the early spring time, and he buried them decently.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I think we have had some examples of the results of scientific medical men and lumbermen, and retired individuals of every class, who have experimented in farming. It strikes me that my hon. friend who has just sat down has wandered a good way from the subject when he undertook to discuss oleomargarine. My recollection of that question is that if our friends on the other side of the House had been able to carry out their views, we would have had a large institution in Canada to-day manufacturing this article; and if the farmers of Canada have anybody to thank for excluding that article, it was those who represent the farmers on this side of the House. I think it was my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) who moved the resolution finally excluding it, and I never heard anybody say that the motion introduced by him was not a wise and good one. I would like to suggest to the Minister of Customs that while it is not necessary for him to be led by people on this side of the House, if he is going to take his adviser on that side, I would advise him to get out of the circle of medical men and lumbermen, and all that class of people, and listen to the advice of his supporter from Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), who does do a little farming, and knows whereof he speaks. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has level ideas on that question, and I respect him when he gets up and has the courage of his opinion, though he recognised that he is not a farmer. Now, I do not think it is necessary to drag in the whole National Policy in discussing this one question. When my hon. friend from Leeds undertook to get up and speak in defence of the line that he thought it was the duty of the Government to take, it seems to me that he was travelling altogether out of the record. My experience is, that when the manufacturers come down to the Government and complain that the shoe pinches them in any particular direction, a modification of the tariff is made for their benefit sooner or later. I have no doubt, that if my hon. friend thought that the tariff did not suit him with respect to the building of carriages, he would not hesitate to wait upon the Minister, and he would keep on waiting, until he got what he wanted. But the farmer's duty is simply to endure all that is put upon him, and never say anything. When hon. members opposite tell us, that if the duty were taken off corn, it would be like the duty that was taken off coal, I would like to suggest to my hon. friend, that if he voted to reimpose that duty on coal, he would see hornets in a short time, he would see the manufacturers moving up around the Minister, wanting to know what this duty was reimposed for. He would soon undertake whose pockets 50 cents a ton came out of in the matter of the coal duty. So it is in regard to this matter respecting the farmers. I say to the Minister of Customs that while it is a small matter, it is a matter not surrounded with so much difficulty as hon. gentlemen would like us to believe. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) would like the House to believe that farmers could not tell corn suitable for seed imported from the south from ordinary western corn. That hon. gentleman evidently never handled corn, and does not know whereof he speaks. I venture to say that any intelligent farmer who has handled western corn for seed purposes, if his seedsman should undertake to give him a third-class article brought in here for consumption or for distilling purposes, would very soon tell him that that was not the corn he wanted, that he wanted a number one article; and, moreover, when it is mammoth southern sweet corn which is imported for that purpose, there is no very serious difficulty in distinguishing it from the ordinary corn for consumption. This concession might be fairly made in the interests of the farmers without any serious difficulty, and I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Customs whether it is not worthy of his consideration as to whether this concession could not be made. It is all very well for the member for Bruce (Mr. Cargill), to tell the House what it costs the farmer to take off his crop in olden days when he had to swing the cradle, and when a man received 75 cents for a day's work. The conditions under which farmers operate to-day are, however, entirely different, and if farmers to-day want to make their business a success, they must reduce the cost of production to the very lowest margin. What is the position of the farmers to-day compared with those of other protected industries? Take the last Trade and Navigation Returns issued from the Department of Customs, and if you look over the exports for last year, you will find that one-half of the gross exports sent out of the country to pay the exchanges of purchased goods were the products of our farmers. The value of the bulk of those products, is, moreover, fixed by the price in the foreign markets where they have to compete with the world. Under those circumstances it is only fair that the farmer should receive all reasonable concessions, and I fail to see on what grounds hon. gentlemen opposite consider this an attack upon the National Policy. Are the farmers forever to be told that the National Policy is not to do anything for them? Are they to be told that duties are to be imposed which are of no advantage to them, and when it is proposed that a concession in this direction should be made to benefit them, are they to be told that that concession will not be made? I do not read the National Policy in that light, and if the First Minister were present, he would repudiate the idea that the National Policy was intended to be interpreted on any such lines. It is because hon. gentlemen opposite will not view the question on its merits, and will not consider there are other important interests beside those of manufacturers to be considered, and, forsooth, because this does not run in the particular groove marked out by them, that the proposition must be voted down and set aside. I say to these hon. gentlemen that if they continue to pursue that policy, they must expect to alienate the farmers from them, and I submit that it would be wise on the part of the Minister of Customs to take this matter into consideration, and, notwithstanding the sneers hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in with regard to concessions made in binding twine and other matters, he should endeavor to give the relief asked. Some hon. gentleman said this was only a small matter, and that few men would have sufficient energy to take advantage of it. I admit it is a small matter, at the present time, but he has failed to understand the farming community and to see the disadvantages they are enduring, if he neglects to adopt this proposal.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I will not trouble the House with any prolonged remark, and I would not have said one word, but for the fact that the Minister of Customs seemed to indicate to the House that he proposed to consider the proposition submitted by the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. I am afraid I lie under the imputation which has been cast across the floor by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), that I am not a practical farmer, that I am engaged in another line of industry; but I venture to assert that it is no reason, because I am not a practical farmer, although I have been sent here year after year and election after election by an agricultural constituency to represent it on the floor of Parliament, I am not capable of forming an intelligent opinion on this question presented to the consideration of this House. I would say to the Minister of Customs that I hope he will not allow such a specious proposition as this which has been submitted to the House to induce him to consider the question of taking off the duty on grains coming into Canada; because I believe, notwithstanding what may have been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we have had their statements year after year during the last ten or eleven years, I am strongly convinced that the farmers of Canada have benefited to a very great extent by the imposition of duty on coarse grains coming into this country. Surely hon. gentlemen have not observed the course of events as they are passing before their eyes at this moment. Have hon. gentlemen examined the market reports as they appear in the journals of the day? Are they not aware that oats can be purchased in Chicago at 19½ cents, while they are worth in Toronto 30 or 32 cents? Surely they will not tell the House or the farmers of the country that if there was no duty imposed on coarse grains coming into Canada, oats worth only 19½ cents in Chicago, and corn, which can be purchased there for 27 or 28 cents, would not come into competition with our coarse grains and reduce the price of oats below that at which they stand to-day in the Toronto market. I am perfectly convinced that the imposition of duties on coarse grains has benefited our farmers to a very great extent. When I hear a practical farmer like the hon. member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurier) tell this House that the duty upon ensilage corn in Canada does not exceed three-quarters of a cent per ton, or fifteen cents per acre; when the member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), who seemed to be a practical farmer from the manner in which he dealt with the question, tells the House that three or four times as much fodder can be grown from the ensilage corn brought in from the United States as can be grown from the corn raised here, then I say hon. gentlemen are raising a very great howl about a very small matter. It seems to me they will be unable to convince the farmers that the entering of the thin end of the wedge as they propose would be of any benefit to the farmers whatever. I heard the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), an hon. gentleman to whose remarks on agricultural matters I listen with a great deal of attention, because I believe him to be a practical man and one who understands what he talks about, state, in regard to salt, that the price of the article had been raised to the farmers of the country. Surely he knows that the farmers can import salt free of duty if they choose to bring it from the United Kingdom.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I say they can import it entirely free for any purpose. Let me read to him the clause of the Customs Act:

"Salt, coarse, ten cents per 100 lbs. (not to include salt imported from the United Kingdom or any British possession, or salt imported for the use of the sea or gulf fisheries, which shall be free of duty.)"

My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) if he reads the Customs Act, will see that all salt imported from the United Kingdom or any British possession can be imported entirely free of duty, and that, therefore, the farmers of this country are not subject to the imposition which my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) declares has been imposed upon them. I simply rose for the purpose of endeavoring to impress upon my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, that, from my point of view, he should not consider the question of reducing the duties on these coarse grains, because, I believe, if he did so it would be a blow to the farmers of this country.

Mr. WATSON. This question of corn for ensilage is a matter that is hardly interesting to the people of Manitoba as yet, but no doubt it will become so in the near future. I would not have spoken on this occasion had it not been for the fact that the member for Bruce (Mr. Cargill) happened to draw into the discussion the question of binding twine. The duty on binding twine may not be of much importance to the hon. gentleman in his county where the farmers grow but little wheat, but in Manitoba it is a heavy tax. We fully realise there that the duty on binding twine does affect the farmers in Manitoba to the extent of the duty, which is 2½ cents a pound, or about $13.50 a year on a farm of 300 acres, a very large tax upon the farmers for the purpose of keeping up one or two binding twine establishments in Canada. I was struck with the argument advanced by the member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), when he stated that at present a large portion of the beef and pork consumed in the towns and cities of Canada was imported from Chicago. It does occur to me that it would be a good thing for the Government to take into consideration this fact, and not to raise the duty upon these articles, but to admit free of duty all feeding material required for our stock. I understand from the returns that there are some thirty-six thousand head of stock cattle exported from this country to the United States annually, which are fed in the United States and no doubt returned to us in beef. The average price for these is $14 per head, which is paid to the farmers in Ontario. Now if these cattle were fed in Canada they would be worth $50 each. It appears to me that in view of this fact the Government ought, in the interests of the farmers of Ontario, admit corn free of duty for feeding purposes. We should remember that this corn cannot be grown in Canada, except in a few counties, and I believe it would be in the interest of Canada and in the interest of Manitoba that the duty should be removed. The people of Manitoba would like to be able to import their corn free, as they could grow more barley to ship to the United States, and get more corn in return for food. While I am speaking on this subject, I would call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the fact that a petition has been forwarded from Manitoba to the Government, signed by all the members and Senators, and asking that coarse grain should be admitted free in Manitoba this year. I call attention to this fact, because I find that on some occasions Ministers were not aware of petitions addressed to them. The reasons given in this petition for the request, is because the oat crop is very light and it would be a very great benefit to the farmers of Manitoba, particularly this year, if the Government could, by Order in Council or otherwise, admit, free of duty, not simply corn but all grains for seed. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Cargill) is a manufacturer of lumber, and I think his comparison about the "cradle" in the old days when you could hire a man for 75 cents a day, was very inappropriate. Would the hon. gentleman compare the old muley saw which in those days cut 2,000 feet of lumber per day with the gang saw he uses now and which cuts 50,000 feet a day? I think the illustration would be just as good as the one given us by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not suppose my hon. friend the member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) needs any defense at my hands against the assault made upon him by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr.

Bergin), but as the latter hon. gentleman was pleased to indulge in some not very brilliant attempts, I must say, of wit at the expense of my hon. friend for Brome, I cannot help asking from what source he obtains his information with regard to the scientific and practical knowledge or ability of my hon. friend from Brome as a farmer. If the hon. member for Stormont had had the opportunity, which I have had, of visiting the hon. member for Brome at his own home, he would not have said what he did with regard to the cattle belonging to that hon. gentleman. I can assure him that there are no more complete or well-managed farm buildings in all that beautiful country, known as the Eastern Townships, than those which my hon. friend has built upon his farm. Both as a practical and a scientific farmer he has set an example to his constituents, and to the people of that country generally, which has been a vast advantage to them. Though the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) may not on the floor of this House have the appearance of a practical farmer, I can assure my hon. friend for Stormont that he is one; that he gets up in the summer time at an hour quite as early as the majority of his neighbors do, and that he goes to his fields and sees that his work is well done, and is not afraid to put his own hand to the plough. I had the pleasure of seeing the cattle belonging to the hon. member for Brome; and, so far from their being in the condition which the hon. member for Stormont said that he heard they were in, I can assure my hon. friend for Stormont that they have quite as good a chance of surviving this, and many years to come, as have the majority of the hon. gentleman's patients.

MAIL SERVICE AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. Fiset (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence with the Government, or any officer thereof, respecting the arrival, departure and distribution of mails at Rimouski.

He said : Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, when I rose to explain the object of my motion, I was asked to let it stand, but I am most happy that it was called again to-night. I shall make very few observations. This motion is about to the same affect as the one made some time ago by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier). We have much to complain about the way mails reach Rimouski ; and when I say Rimouski, I mean the whole county of Rimouski. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, we receive the mails from Montreal for Rimouski by the Intercolonial Railway at 8.50 p.m. ; they are distributed at about 9 or 9.10. The second mail reaches there at 10.30 : that one is not delivered ; it is the Quebec mail, the most important to us, but we cannot answer our letters on the same evening, owing to the morning trains passing through Rimouski at 6.30. Moreover, with respect to the mails we receive on Saturday evening, the only ones delivered on the same evening are the mails from Montreal ; the Quebec mails are only delivered on Sunday morning, between 8.30 and 9 o'clock. On Sunday mornings, the express train reaches Rimouski at the regular time, 6.50 ; no express train reaches there on Mondays ; therefore, no mails can be sent, and a letter sent from Ottawa on Friday reaches Rimouski on Saturday, but the Rimouski people can only answer it the next Tuesday, and it is only on Wednesday that the answer can be received here, which makes four days. Mr. Speaker, I think that when the mail service for Rimouski was carried on by stages, we had our letters sooner than we have them now. The fact is, the letters sent from Quebec to Rivière du Loup by the Intercolonial reached us the next morning, and on the same day the answer was forwarded to Rivière du Loup, so that in three days' time the service was done, whereas now the conditions are changed owing to the train hours. I wish it to be well understood that I in no way wish to blame the hon. the Postmaster General ; it is rather the Railway Department that is answerable for this state of things ; but I think the hon. the First Minister, who is at the same time Minister of Railways, will comply to our requests as he has promised us. When I say that Rimouski has to complain about, I am speaking of the whole County of Rimouski. If Rimouski is ill-ministered to, the more so the parishes below Rimouski. These are the few observations I had to make in moving in this matter.

Mr. HAGGART. If there is any inconvenience in the delivery of the mails at Rimouski, it is not the fault of the Post Office Department. The mails for Rimouski are now sent every day by the regular express train leaving Quebec in the morning, and carrying the mails of the previous day from Quebec and places between Quebec and Montreal. This train reaches Rimouski about 8.30 p.m., and the mails are delivered the same evening. A second mail is sent by a mixed train leaving Quebec in the afternoon. This mail reaches Rimouski too late to be distributed the same evening, and is delivered the next morning. No change can be made in these arrangements until there is a change in the time of running the trains on the Intercolonial Railway. I believe the subject of changing the time-table of the Intercolonial Railway is at present engaging the attention of the Department of Railways and Canals, and as soon as that change is made, I hope to be able to make a change in the time of delivering the mails at Rimouski which will be more satisfactory to the people there.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) I may say to the hon. member that the question of the train service on the Intercolonial from Lévis to below Rimouski was considered. As stated by my colleague, the Postmaster General, strong representations were brought to bear on the Department of Railways and Canals by my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Grandbois), showing that the special train which leaves Lévis for Rivière du Loup stops there and that the mail has got to wait there for the down train which leaves Rivière du Loup for Campbellton, through Rimouski. As stated by the Postmaster General, this mail reaches there too late to be distributed the same evening ; it can only be delivered the next morning. My colleague, the hon. the First Minister, has the matter under consideration and I think that before long it will be remedied.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That Government business shall take precedence every Thursday, on and after Thursday of next week, 6th March, during the present Session, after Questions put by Members.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the right hon. gentleman will not insist upon this motion, for certainly we have not reached that stage of the Session when such a motion is usually allowed. The hon. gentleman must remember that we have not yet discussed one single public Bill of all those on the Order paper. If the Government take Thursday, it is as much as to say that all these Bills will not come under consideration this Session. I think the motion is premature.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the motion is made any sooner than last year, if my memory serves me aright. I think the general feeling among the members is that we should get through the public business as soon as possible, so that we may get away early. It is no fault of ours if further progress has not been made with the public Bills and Orders. I have often had occasion to say that it is too much the habit of hon. members, when they put Bills or resolutions of any kind on the paper, to allow them to stand day after day. The proper time for such measures is the beginning of the Session, when, from obvious reasons, the Government measures cannot be presented. We have, day after day, gone over the list without fruit. However, if the hon. gentleman would agree, that after next Thursday, every Thursday shall be Government day, I will alter the motion to that extent.

Mr. LAURIER. That is so much, at all events, and I am glad to say we will have next Thursday. I am afraid that, perhaps, hon. members who are in charge of public Bills have not been as diligent as they might have been, to bring them forward in the earlier part of the Session. The example of the Government in this respect seems to be contagious.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government is all right.

Mr. LAURIER. We must remember that not one-half of the Reports are yet brought down. The Government has called us early this Session, but I am not aware that they were at all ready with their measures.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not expect, of course, that the right hon. gentleman would agree with me in this. As the hon. gentleman consents to give us next Thursday, perhaps that will do.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman will bear in mind that this is not the first time I have protested against his foreclosing the general business of the country. If this motion is carried, the Government will monopolise almost the whole time, and hon. members will practically have but one day in the week to do business. I have protested against this, Session after Session, and although the urbanity and courtesy of the hon. leader of the second great party of this House has caused him to give his consent, I do not consent, and I protest against Thursday being taken away from the people. If our mouths are closed in this fashion, we will have no opportunity of getting the questions we desire before the House and the country. The right hon. gentleman says the earlier part of the Session is that in which private members should deal with Public Bills; but why do not the Government, who have the whole year to make preparations, come down with their Bills in the early part of the Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So we do.

Mr. MITCHELL. If so, we have not seen much of them, nor has the Government made much progress with them. I protest against this motion. Of course, I know I will be voted down, for I do not command a majority in this House, but when it comes to a majority of the public sentiment of the House and of the country, I have it with me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wish to pay every respect to the leader of the third party, and if he will mention to me any of the measures that he has standing to his name on the Order paper, I shall be glad to give them special prominence.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nothing the right hon. gentleman has addressed to the House this Session has pleased me more than the remark he has just made. I have half-a-dozen claims before his Department, corresponding to the claim I made in relation to the damages done by the railway to the poor widow's cow. I can get no satisfaction whatever on account of those claims, but I must admit that they have not yet been brought fairly before the right hon. gentleman. I intend at an early date to bring them before him, and I want him to take them into consideration, so as to get those troublesome matters out of the way. If he will name any particular day, I shall be very glad to call upon him in his office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. To-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was going to say "to-morrow," but I am afraid I cannot count on that. The hon. gentleman was so pleased at being able to "cow" my hon. friend from East

Mr. LAURIER.

York (Mr. Mackenzie) when he was at the head of the Government, that he, no doubt, thinks he will be able to "cow" me, and that I will have to back down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope I may be as successful in the one case as I was in the other.

Motion agreed to.

THE FISHERIES QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are read, I think it necessary to call the attention of the hon. First Minister to a very important telegram from Washington which appears in the Canadian papers, and which, with the permission of the House, I will read:

"THE BEHRING SEA QUESTION.

"WASHINGTON, 24th.—Secretary Blaine and Sir Julian Pauncefote have reached an amicable agreement upon the Behring Sea fishery controversy, and the question of damages sustained by British vessels will be submitted to arbitration. The details of the agreement cannot be ascertained, but it is known that the Government of the United States will not, under any circumstances, permit foreigners to catch seals, even in disputed waters, during the seasons when our own subjects are prohibited from catching them. In other words, the United States will pay whatever damages the poachers have suffered in the past, where there was no sign of prohibiting poaching, and England guarantees that they shall not trespass again. It is not known who the arbitrators will be."

I do not know whether this statement is true or not, but I call the attention of the First Minister to it, because I am sure that a telegram of that kind will have a very disturbing influence on the community if it is believed that the British Government, without consulting Canada, and without Canada being represented, has taken upon itself to deal with the important questions involved. I may as well mention another rumor which I have heard—that a communication was sent to His Excellency the Governor General by Sir Julian Pauncefote, within the last forty-eight hours, informing him that very considerable progress had been made in the negotiations, that they had arrived at a crucial point, and asking that some one be sent down to Washington on behalf of the Canadian Government to furnish him with information on certain points. There is also a rumor that the Government had sent the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; but it appears to me that the Government ought to have someone there of more experience than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on a question about which he is not better informed than a great many other people in the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As to whether the Minister of Marine is the proper person to send, I do not think my hon. friend and I would agree. I have reason to believe that the hon. Minister of Marine has fully and thoroughly acquainted himself with the various questions connected with the fisheries, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific. The rumor the hon. gentleman has read, I am not responsible for; we cannot help what newspaper reporters put in the press; but I will tell the hon. gentleman exactly, so far as I know, how the matter stands. Of course we knew how matters stood at Washington, as we have always been fully informed; but on Saturday night a telegram came to His Excellency from the British ambassador, saying that he had received instructions from England to discuss the various questions, and was only awaiting the Canadian re-representative. That was received on Saturday night; I sent it to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on Sunday, and he started yesterday at one o'clock for Washington.

CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE.

Mr. DOYON. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Government to the fact that I asked, at the beginning of this Session, for the production of the report of the operations of Mr. McLea Wallbank as land surveyor of the Indian Reserve of Caughnawaga. The hon. the Minister of the Interior answered me that he had no objection to produce that document. During last Session I made the same request, and I received the same answer; nevertheless, the report has not yet been brought down. Am I to understand that the Government, although having no objection to lay that report before the House, has no intention of doing so? If, on the contrary, it is disposed to produce it, I would desire to know how soon, for I might say that it is not without good reason that I ask for it. I thought the matter had been forgotten, and that is why I have taken this opportunity of recalling it to the Government.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I understand that the hon. gentleman wants to know when the report and the map of the survey of the Caughnawaga Reserve will be brought down. The map is a very intricate one, and it will take a long time to prepare it, and, therefore, I cannot say when it will be brought down.

Mr. DOYON. The hon. Minister will recollect that, in a private conversation with him last Session, I asked for that report, and he told me that if he could not produce it during the Session, he would file it during the recess.

Mr. DEWDNEY. I will bring it down at the earliest possible moment.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—DUTIES ON SEEDS.

Mr. COUTURE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I regret that reasons beyond my control prevented me from attending yesterday's sitting, when the House was called upon to vote on a most important question as regards the agricultural class; I refer to the motion of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), in favor of free importation of seeds not produced in Canada and used for the fattening of animals, the improvement of the lands and for silos. Had I been here, I should have voted for the motion of the hon. member for South Huron, as I understand his proposition is calculated to do immense service to the agricultural class.

PRIVILEGE—THE FRENCH LANGUAGE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has been spread over the country that by voting as we did the other evening against the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice, I and a certain number of the members of this House voted for the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I did not take the necessary time last Friday to explain my view of the matter, because I desired to enable my colleagues to take the train so as to go to their homes. I was of opinion, first, that all the hon. members in favor of Mr. McCarthy's Bill had to vote against any amendment tending to prevent that Bill from being read a second time; second, that all the hon. members in favor of Mr. Davin's amendment had to vote against any sub-amendment tending to prevent that amendment from being affirmed by the House; third, that all the hon. members opposed to any change being made in the existing law had to vote against the sub-amendment offered by the hon. Minister of Justice, as they would have to vote against Mr. Davin's amendment, and the Bill itself, had they reached a vote. The Bill presented by the hon. member for North Simcoe was struck off the Order paper for the second reading by the adoption of the sub-amendment, and no direct vote was practically taken upon the Bill itself. I have consulted very high authorities on this point, and I may quote Bourinot, our worthy Clerk, who has been so justly honored by the Queen lately, who, at page 130, says:

"If a resolution opposed to the principle of the Bill be resolved in the affirmative, or the motion that the Bill be now read a second time be simply negatived on a division, the measure will disappear from the Order Book."

So that we never had a vote on the Bill itself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes, we had.

Mr. AMYOT. The meaning I gave to my vote was that I was opposed to any change in the existing law, and I am authorised to make the same statement on behalf of the hon. members for Laprairie (Mr. Doyon), Napierville (Mr. Ste. Marie), L'Assomption (Mr. Gauthier), Joliette (Mr. Neveu), Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), St. John's, Quebec (Mr. Bourassa), Chicoutimi (Mr. Couture), and I do not doubt that if the hon. members for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), and Chambly (Mr. Préfontaine), were here, they would join in the declaration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of the Government to the fact that, although the right hon. the First Minister himself indicated some time ago that important changes were likely to be made in the tariff, we have not only not yet got the Budget but have no intimation as to when the Budget is likely to come down. It is important, both to the business of the House and the interests of this country, that the period of suspension should not be prolonged any longer than possible, and the Government ought to be in a position to tell us within a day or two when they propose to bring down their financial statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. the Minister of Finance is not here, and will not be here the first part of the evening unless specially sent for, and, therefore, I cannot speak specifically in answer to the hon. gentleman. But the hon. gentleman must have seen that ever since the Session began, all kinds of deputations have visited Ottawa for the purpose of pressing their various interests on the attention of the Government with respect to the re-adjustment of the tariff. There is too much tendency on the part of the various interests to postpone discussing subjects or calling the attention of the Government to them until Parliament has met, which is really the most inconvenient season for that purpose. Still, they come during that period, and, I think, until this last week we have had deputations here representing most of the industries of this country. Their representations have been carefully considered by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs, and I have no reason to doubt these hon. gentlemen will be able very shortly to bring down the results of their examination.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will take the opportunity, then, when the House adjourns, or thereabouts, of asking for some information, and the right hon. the First Minister, I understand, will mention to the Minister of Finance what I have said, in order that he may give the information desired. I am aware of the difficulty which the hon. gentleman speaks of, in the matter of deputations putting off important questions until the last moment, and I do not think it is fair to the Government or the country that deputations should postpone coming here until within a few days of the Budget. Speaking with some little experience, I know it is utterly impossible for a Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Customs, or the Government generally, to make the requisite enquiries in the course of a week or ten days, which is generally the amount of time allowed by these deputations, but that is, to a certain extent, in the Government's own hands, and the sooner they bring down the Budget, the less likely they are to be troubled with these deputations.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the return asked for by the hon. member for Muskoka has been brought down yet—with reference to the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the constitutionality of the Jesuits' Estates Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will shortly be laid before the House. His Excellency was bound to ask for permission to bring the papers down, he has that permission, and we will bring the papers down.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to make a motion with reference to the printing of this when brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not in order. It will be printed as soon as it comes down, I can tell the hon. gentleman, without a motion.

THE ADULTERATION ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 9) further to amend the Adulteration Act, chapter 107 of the Revised Statutes.—(Mr. Costigan.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULLOCK. I understand that some persons engaged in the trade of selling agricultural fertilisers have made representations to the hon. gentleman with regard to some of the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They have, but that question will be treated in the Act to amend the Fertilisers Act, and has nothing to do with this Bill. The question of amendments to the Fertilisers Act are entirely distinct from this Act, and the Fertilisers Act amendments will be taken up later in the Session, after I have heard representations from all the parties interested.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have received representations from parties interested in fertilisers, but as the hon. gentleman says they are not affected by the Bill under consideration, but will be dealt with in another Bill, I will wait until that Bill is before the House.

On section 4,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I object to the general principle of amending Acts by simply declaring that certain words are altered or struck out. It makes it very difficult to understand what the law is, and it would be far better to repeal the whole section and re-enact it with the amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Bill is prepared by the law officers, and they, I suppose, take the course which is generally pursued.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think it is a vicious principle to adopt. If a new edition of the Revised Statutes were issued to-morrow, it would contain these amendments, and it is difficult to follow them under the present system.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some years ago this matter was discussed, and it was agreed that, wherever it was proposed to amend a section, the section should be reprinted in the amending Act with the changes inserted in it, and should be altogether repealed in the original Act. That is certainly a much more convenient system to adopt, and one which makes it much more easy to interpret the statute.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I remember the discussion referred to by my hon. friend, and there is no question whatever that very great inconvenience arises to laymen, at any rate, if not to lawyers, from the practice to which my hon. friend has alluded. I forget who was the Minister of Justice at that time, but I understood that the Government then promised to set a good example in Bills of their own, and to reprint the amended clause in the Bill. It seems to me that reason and common sense are wholly in favor of that course.

Mr. MULLOCK. At present, if any one wants to know what the law is, he has to buy half-a-dozen copies of the Statutes in order to understand one paragraph.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are these reports simply to be published at the option of the Minister, or will all the reports be published?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes, all reports will be published.

On section 8,

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). It strikes me that this is a very undesirable clause. We find in this proviso that any individual who, through no fault of his own, may have purchased an article that is ultimately found to be more or less adulterated, is placed in a position that unless he can show that he sold the article as he received it, and that he has at the same time a warranty from the party from whom he purchased this article, he is liable to a heavy fine. But the clause does not even stop there; for if he has a warranty, if he shows that he purchased this article in good faith and understood that it was pure when he purchased it, after proving all this, he is still liable to a fine. Why should a man be placed in that position unless it can be shown that he was in some way responsible, and knew he had an article in his possession that was not pure, and sold it knowing that it was not pure? In that case he should be held responsible;

but if he has exercised all due diligence to ascertain whether the article was pure, he should not be held responsible. Am I to understand that the Minister considers every trader is to be looked upon as a rogue, that no one is honest except the Government, and that they must adopt measures of this kind to vex and harass every individual who is engaged in any legitimate trade?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think it would be sufficient to show that the party had reasonable knowledge that the article was adulterated. But this is introducing an elaborate defence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This Act, of course, is adopted for a purpose. We have found in the administration of the Act, as it now stands upon the Statute-book, that it was impossible to enforce it. There were thirteen cases in succession where parties were proceeded against, and the prosecution failed to obtain one conviction. Consequently it became necessary to devise some remedy in order that the guilty parties might be convicted. In England it has been found necessary to adopt just such a clause.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It strikes me that if the accused proves certain things, he ought to be discharged, and only liable to pay the costs incurred. As I read this Act, if he does not give notice he will only be liable to the costs; but if he gives notice, he will only be liable for the penalty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He is liable to pay the costs if he proves all these facts, and by section 21 of the existing Act he is liable to the forfeiture of the goods themselves. But if after having given notice he proves that he relied upon that as his defence, he only incurs forfeiture, which is not a penalty. He is not relieved from forfeiture in any case.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If he proves that he is really innocent he is still liable to a penalty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He is not innocent; he is guilty of having adulterated food exposed for sale. If he proves that he used reasonable diligence to prevent the food that he has for sale being adulterated, he is not liable to a fine, but still the goods are confiscated.

On section 11,

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have been requested by Boards of Health, by gentlemen connected with the Dairy Association, and by others, to make some arrangement by which analysts should be appointed for certain classes of goods. One reason given is, that it is very inconvenient to forward samples long distances, and that the constituents change in such case; another reason is, that if these analysts were appointed for special purposes, the convenience of the public would be served, and their evidence would be available in the courts. I move the insertion of the following clause as a sub-section to section 3:—

The Governor in Council may, on the nomination of his Council, in any city, town, township or municipality, appoint examiners for such municipality, to examine such articles of food as may be determined by the Governor in Council, but such appointment shall not be made unless, and until the person so nominated has undergone an examination before the Examining Board above mentioned, and obtained a certificate setting forth that he is competent and duly qualified to examine and certify as to the nature and purity of articles of food for the examination of which he is to be appointed, in which case his certificate of analysis with respect to such article shall have like force and effect as certificates of the official analysts appointed under the Act.

Mr. WILSON. What salary is attached?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the present law the Governor General in Council has the power to fix the amounts to be paid in fees for the analyses made. The question of payment was discussed when the proposition was first made to me, and those who urged this matter on my attention stated that the question of salary was a secondary consideration with them, and that the municipalities would be willing to pay the salary. What they wanted was the authority under this Act. Parliament has already given in the Act, as it now stands, power to the Governor in Council to pay every analyst a certain fee for each analysis. Accordingly, these analysts appointed will be paid in fees according to the work they do; there will be no salary attached to the office.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The Governor in Council has power under the existing Act to pay the analysts whatever is the amount to which they are entitled for their services. This is covered by the fourth clause. It is all very well for those persons, with whom the Minister conversed, to say that the cost was a minor consideration, and that the municipalities would be willing to pay the salaries. Has the Minister any evidence that the municipalities would be willing to do so? If they do not, the amount must be paid by the Government, for there are no means whereby this Government can compel the municipality to expend any money.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we are practically doing the same thing to-day. If there are more samples sent for analysis, than can be attended to by the employes down here, the Government have to employ other persons and pay them. The analyst has got to be paid whether the analysis takes place here or in the municipality. I think this amendment to the law will be found to be very convenient, and will be much appreciated by the people, for I have heard objections frequently raised as to the difficulty of sending down samples to Ottawa, and complaints that very often they are spoiled in transit, so that a correct test of purity cannot be made. Again, the difficulty of sending samples such a distance, prevents many from taking advantage of the Act. I have frequently been written to by persons in my county, to know if the Government could not so amend the law, as to allow analysts to be appointed for the county, or a town, or for a few municipalities, so that he could be within convenient reach of persons from all parts of the county. This amendment provides for that. As to the question of payment, I would be much better pleased that the money should be paid to individuals in the locality, who are capable of making correct analysis, than that it should be paid to persons living in Ottawa. If our people in the country can discharge the duty, they are more in touch with the people around them, and they would be more alive to the importance of the subject, and see that an analysis would be a thorough protection against adulterated food.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The hon. member cannot consider what he his talking about.

Mr. SPROULE. May be you think so.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). He says that these analysts should be paid by the municipalities.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman either misunderstood me or I did not make myself clear. I did not say anything about the municipalities paying. I said that the analysis had to be paid for; and that being the case, I would prefer it should be paid to competent persons living in the municipalities than to residents of Ottawa.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not see that this Parliament has any right whatever to interfere in the matter. We might as well adopt regulations as to the weight of bread, or as to other matters which are now under the control of the municipalities. I think the Minister will find, if he examines this clause, that he is encroaching on local and municipal rights and privileges.

Mr. SPROULE. We always had power to provide for the analysis of food.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is, I believe, a very reasonable proposition, and it is brought forward at the desire of persons from all parts of the country, who have sent numerous petitions asking that it should be done. It is not encroaching on local or Provincial rights, for it simply provides that if the municipality wishes to do a certain thing, they may be enabled to do so under this Act. The discussion will do no harm; and if hon. gentlemen wish to have the clause struck out, I have no particular objection, and the Bill can pass without it.

Mr. BROWN. The people of Hamilton are very much in favor of the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. I have had a communication from the chairman of the Board of Health of that city, strongly sustaining this proposition in relation to analysis, particularly with regard to milk. The provision, as I understand, is simply that municipalities shall have the power to appoint an analyst if they so wish. I believe this will be productive of a great deal of good, for it will better insure the purity of milk and other foods supplied to the city. The City Council of Hamilton and the Board of Health are strongly in favor of the proposition. I understand that most of the municipalities are of the same opinion, and I trust the clause will carry.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It strikes me that the wording of the clause is not very clear, and that it tends to put a severe tax on a person who may be really innocent of any intention to adulterate food, and who may endeavor to comply with the Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall look over the clause carefully before the third reading.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I agree with the observations made by my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), that we might as well regulate the weight of bread, or make regulations as to the cleaning up of backyards in towns and villages, as to legislate in the way we now propose. This provision lies more clearly within the police regulations, which are part of the municipal law of every country, rather than within the criminal law. The discussion we have had goes to confirm the view I expressed when the original Bill was before us—that this is a police regulation and connected with civil rights, rather than a quasi criminal act.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPROULE.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CARLING moved second reading of Bill (No. 17) to amend the Patent Act.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CARLING. The first and second sections take away from the Minister of Agriculture the power to decide on the validity of patents, and transfers it to the courts.

On section 2,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This section compels the patentee of an article to manufacture it in the country. I am informed that in other countries the patentee is only required to be in a position to furnish the article to the public at a reasonable price if it is demanded. Does the hon. Minister know what the law is in other countries in reference to that?

Mr. CARLING. This is the same as the law in the States and in England.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This provision seems to require that the patentee himself or his legal representative shall carry on the manufacture.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is exactly the same as the present law, except the latter part of the section, which gives the jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court instead of to the Minister.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am aware that it is the present law, but this is the proper time to have it corrected if it is not right. I am informed by those who have studied the matter, that the United States and England do not require the patentee to manufacture, but they do require that he should be in a position to supply the public with his invention at a reasonable figure if the public call for it. This provision requires him to manufacture whether the public call for it or not.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot speak with authority on that point, but I think the enactments are substantially the same, because to require a man to have the article when anybody wants it, is practically to require him to manufacture. This provision does not require the patentee himself to engage in the manufacture, because there are provisions in the Patent Act with reference to the assignment of patents, and the more general practice is for the assignees to carry on the manufacture, and not the patentees.

Bill reported.

TRADE MARKS AND INDUSTRIAL DESIGNS.

Mr. CARLING moved second reading of Bill (No. 18) to amend the Act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial Designs. He said: The only change is to remove the trial of contested cases from the Department of Agriculture to the Exchequer Court concurrently with the ordinary course.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

Mr. CARLING moved second reading of Bill (No. 19) to amend the Copyright Act. He said: This is on the same line as the Bill just passed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. DEWDNEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 43) to amend chapter 4 of 52 Victoria, intituled: "An Act to authorise the granting of subsidies in land to certain railway companies." He said: By a clerical error in the Land Subsidy Bill, the land grant was given to the North-West Coal and Navigation Company instead of to the Alberta Company, and this Bill is to correct that mistake.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC STORES ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 53) to amend the Public Stores Act. He said: In the year 1887, at the request of the Imperial Government, an Act was passed to prevent the use of articles marked with the Imperial marks for public stores, and in that Act there was a schedule describing the various marks then in use for the public stores of Her Majesty's Army and Navy. It has transpired that, although the Act was passed at the instance of the Imperial Government, the schedule was not correct, inasmuch as one of the marks there described for worsted thread had been discontinued. The schedule should be amended in accordance with the practice established in the Imperial service, and this Bill is introduced for the purpose of making the correction.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE, CHEQUES AND PROMISSORY NOTES.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 6) relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes.—(Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 60,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The attention of the Committee was called to this clause by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who mentioned that it embodied a very important principle, and I, again, call the very special attention of the Committee to it this afternoon. The effect of the clause is that the bank paying on a forged endorsement is not responsible. I will endeavor to present shortly some of the arguments upon which that proposition rests. The clause has been attacked as being a total reversal of our present law, as it does not provide that the bank shall bear the loss in any case of forgery. That is not the fact. The clause provides that, if a cheque is regularly drawn, being made payable to order, the mere fact of the endorsement upon it being forged shall not render the bank liable to loss in consequence of the forgery. Therefore we have as the first principle that the cheque must be properly issued, and if it is properly issued, the loss is not to fall upon the bank if the endorsement is forged. That is represented to be a fair principle, because the business which the bank transacts is a business between it and the customer with whom it transacts its business. The proper business of the bank is to pay the money which the customer deposits there at his request, and not to guarantee the intervening transactions between the person who gives the cheque and those who receive it and those through whose hands it may pass. If the maker of the cheque chooses to make it payable to order and not to bearer, he must, in all fairness, bear the risk of its going into hands where it may be improperly endorsed. No such thing can happen in the case of a cheque payable to bearer. Another argument in support of the clause is the liability which the bank incurs in all cases of refusing payment of a cheque. No matter how numerous the intervening transactions may be, and although the endorsers may be entirely unknown to the bank, the bank is called upon to pay on a cheque on which not one of the endorsements can be verified, or to refuse payment at its own risk and liability for damages. I am using the word "cheque" for convenience to represent these documents. I may add that the principle of this clause has been adopted in England and has been acted upon there for thirty-seven years, and I think it is reasonable, in this respect, to assimilate our law to the English law.

Mr. MULOCK. When this clause was before the House on a previous occasion, I expressed my view in favor of it as I then understood it, and, if it were limited to cheques, I would still be in favor of it, but, as I understand, the clause refers also to bills of exchange. The interpretation clause shows that, and applies not only to an ordinary cheque for money deposited in the bank, but to a bill of exchange in the widest sense. A person may draw on a bank not by a cheque, but in the ordinary way of business. A bank may be willing to honor a draft, not because there is money of the drawer there, but because the customer does his regular business there. I would ask the Minister of Justice to cut down this provision and make it applicable simply to cheques pure and simple.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MULOCK. I observe that section 63 makes a cheque a bill of exchange payable on demand.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is important that we should understand exactly what the hon. gentleman intends to do. As I understand this clause, it is not incumbent on the bank to show that the endorser or the payee is the person whose name purports to be on the cheque. This goes to the root of the whole of our present system of cheques. If I make a cheque payable to the order of John Smith, and the bank pays it to somebody who endorses that cheque who is not John Smith, the risk is shifted from the shoulders of the bank to my shoulders. That is my understanding of the clause, though, of course, the Minister may correct me if I am wrong. I have the strongest objection to that provision. I see no reason why these corporations who derive their existence from us, and who get considerable benefit from the Parliament of this Dominion, should be relieved from the liability they now incur, at any rate, as regards the original payee. As regards subsequent endorsers something might be said; but that the hon. gentleman, as I understood, should allow any bank or person to escape liability by reason of a forged endorsement of the name of the original payee, seems to be a most objectionable thing, and one on which I, for my part, will certainly divide the House at a later stage. I do not think any sufficient reasons have been advanced, except the convenience of the banks themselves, and I submit that the convenience of the general public is of much more importance than the convenience of the banks. I do not believe that any considerable loss has accrued to them from the existing state of the law, and I think that before such a very material change is made, a much better reason should be given than the Minister has, as yet, brought forward. In fact, as I understood him to say, he was not himself much wedded to this innovation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman was not in when I explained the clause this afternoon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I have just come in. But I ask the hon. gentleman whether I was not correct in supposing that under this clause the bank was discharged from liability, even in the case of the original person to whom the cheque was made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it revolutionises our whole system of cheques, and I do not think such a revolution should be made without a much better reason than I have heard adduced as yet. It is a great convenience to the mercantile public, and to private persons who do business with banks, that they should know that, when they give a cheque to a particular man, the bank should take reasonable precautions to identify that man, and I do not see why they should be relieved of that duty from existing provisions of the law.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I think the Minister should show some reasons for this change. Does the recommendation come from the banks? Has there been any agitation among the bankers, or is it merely an idea of my hon. friend himself? Because it has been followed in England for a number of years is no reason why we should adopt it. There are a great many English laws which are applicable to their condition which would not be applicable to ours, and this change, it appears to me, is one of them. As my hon. friend in front of me (Sir Richard Cartwright) has observed, we have found great convenience in this country in transmitting cheques from one party to another, and generally without any of the inconvenience which the hon. gentleman is providing against. But I submit that whether the fact that a bank is henceforth to be relieved from the result of forgery, will not in a measure tend to create forgery. If people, knowing that they have got to go through the inspection of the bank officials, knowing the difficulty they will have to meet, are disposed to present a cheque that is not properly endorsed, and are deterred by these precautions, when that supervision is taken away, as it will be, under the operation of this Bill, it is a question whether people so disposed may not actually be more disposed to run the risk than they are under the present circumstances. The banks, I contend, are responsible for the signatures of their customers, and they should be responsible for seeing that the cheque or bill is properly endorsed. You might just as well relieve the bank from the responsibility of paying a cheque that was drawn or forged in another man's name. I cannot see that a distinction can be made in this case. If the banks are careful, and are bound to see that the cheques are in the signatures of their customers, I think they are equally bound to take every precaution, in the interest of the customers with whom they deal, and of the public generally, to see that these cheques are properly endorsed before they are paid; otherwise I think it will lead to a great increase of forgery in that direction.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that the local press, at least in the section from which I come, appears to be almost unanimous in condemning this proposed amendment to the law, and the few business men with whom I have had an opportunity of conversing, also condemn it. They think it is shifting the responsibility from the banks to the shoulders of the parties against who are made the drawers of these cheques, and that it will make the banks much more careless. They have now such ample control over the financial operations of the country and over business men, that it is used many times to the disadvantage of the business man, and to give them the advantage of this proposed amendment would be giving them even greater powers over business men than they are entitled to have.

Mr. BLAKE. Our course of business is not exactly the same as that in England, and we make a much wider use of cheques than is made in England. They have a system of crossing cheques which does not exist here, or exists but to a small extent. It does seem to me, that unless the hon. gentleman is prepared with proofs furnished him of the inconveniences which have been actually shown to exist from the present system, there is no ground for the change. If the suggestion is that the banks are placed in very great difficulty, that their duty to their customers and the exigencies of business oblige them to receive cheques which are forged, and that consequently great losses accrue to them, why, that is a state of things that ought to be considered. But we have before us no information that that is the condition of things, or that the banks have found it a serious obstruction or a difficulty to have this responsibility imposed upon them. I must confess, that I should view with great reluctance the removal of that responsibility, at any rate, in so far as it is connected with the genuineness of the endorsement by the persons to whose order the cheque is made—subsequent endorsements may be open to a different consideration. But that the drawer of the cheque should lose his money because the person in whose favor he has drawn it does not genuinely endorse it, or because it is endorsed otherwise, I do not see. Unless, therefore, the hon. gentleman is able to show that the course of business throughout the country is seriously inconvenienced, that there is a serious difficulty in the banks carrying on their business, I, for my part, am disposed to give my vote for the continuance of the present law.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is a good deal of argument on both sides. I think there are very good reasons why this change should be made. With regard to these cheques on bankers standing differently from bills of exchange or promissory notes, a good deal may be said. The cheque is drawn from the banker; originally in England it was only drawn payable to the bearer. In 1853, I think for the first time, this rule was introduced, when cheques payable to order were allowed. Now, there is a broad line of distinction. The bank is supposed to know the signature of the person, therefore they are responsible if they pay a cheque which has been forged. If the cheque is endorsed by individuals of whom they know nothing, the bank is placed in this dilemma: either they have got to refuse that cheque and run the risk of an action, or they have got to pay it and bear the loss. The advantage of drawing a cheque payable to order is, that it enables the drawer to have a voucher, and he draws the cheque in this form to suit his convenience. If it is for his benefit, why should he not take the responsibility? With regard to the changes made in England, I find the reasons succinctly stated by Chief Justice Cockburn, who was probably member of Parliament at the time the Bill was passed, and the reasons given by him in the case of Charles vs. Blackwell, were these:

"Now, the purpose of the enactment we are dealing with was, when cheques payable to order were expected to become general, to protect the bankers against the possibility of forged endorsements. The only reason why cheques had not been drawn payable to order before being, as I have stated, the expenses of the stamp, when the Stamp Act of 16 and 17 Victoria included these cheques among those which should be subject to the penny stamp, it was, of course, foreseen that the great convenience arising from the use of such cheques would make them of constant recurrence. It was equally certain that the use of cheques drawn to order would expose bankers to serious danger from forged endorsements, payment upon which, as the law then stood, would have been to their own loss. It was against this danger that the 19th section of the Act was intended to protect them. Against forgery of the writing of his own customers, the banker must be assumed capable of protecting himself. He is, or ought to make himself, acquainted with the signatures of his own customers. He cannot be acquainted with the signatures of whole multitudes of payees or agents who have to endorse cheques drawn upon him, and made payable to order. It was not unreasonable, therefore, that while the customer obtained the advantage of being able to draw cheques payable to order, the possibility of forged endorsement should be, as between him and the banker, at his risk. By making a cheque payable to order, the drawer obtained the advantage that if the cheque is stolen or lost before it reaches the payee, it cannot be paid without a forged endorsement, the risk of which many persons, who would not scruple to present a cheque payable to bearer, in fraud of the true owner, and pocket the proceeds, might yet be unwilling to run. Furthermore, he obtains, through the endorsement of the payee, an acknowledgment of the receipt of the cheque and of its payment. Obtaining this benefit, it was but reasonable that the possibility of a forged endorsement should be at his risk, or, at all events, be a question between him and the payee, leaving the banker free from liability."

There is very great force in this reasoning. While a banker is supposed to become acquainted with his customer's handwriting, the drawer of a cheque should assume some responsibility; and when a customer draws a cheque payable to a party whom the banker does not know, and the cheque is presented at the bank drawn in that form for the customer's own benefit, he should take the risk as he receives the benefit. The bank is placed in this dilemma: If it pays the cheque, then it is liable for the loss; if the bank refuses the cheque, then it runs the risk of an action being brought against it for dishonoring a good cheque.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have no doubt it will be a matter of convenience to the banks to have the change proposed; but, on the other hand, the interests of the general public must be considered. Unless it can be shown that a great inconvenience will result to the banks, a change so great as this should not be adopted. While I can add little to the arguments already adduced, I speak in order that the Minister may understand that this is a question in which great interest is taken and, if the change is not particularly demanded, the hon. gentleman should consider carefully the expediency of making the change. While the bank runs some risk, and in some few cases, loss, although in a mercantile life extending over a great many years, I know of only one case where a bank has suffered loss. It must be borne in mind that this system contributes business for the banks. A large amount of money is paid in this way, solely on account of the security given to the person drawing the cheque, and if you should wipe out that security and make every cheque or bank draft to order no greater security than an open cheque payable to bearer, the question arises whether you would not draw business from the banks, and find that payments were largely made through express companies instead of through the banks. So, while the banks run some risk, the present method means profit to those institutions. I submit that this is an additional argument against the change proposed. I feel positive that in many cases the change proposed would result in withdrawing what is a profitable business to the bank, and that the express companies would be found transmitting large sums to parties which otherwise would have been remitted through the agency of banks.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. It would be a great mistake to make the change contemplated in this direction, and the convenience of the public should always be considered in preference to the convenience of the banks. This system is of great convenience to the public, and it has been generally adopted by the people on account of the security given, by the bank being obliged to see that the signature to the cheque is a genuine one. Unless it could be shown that the banks have lost very largely, it would be very unwise to make the change contemplated. Moreover, when a system has become general and the public have got accustomed to it, it is always unwise to change it and adopt a new mode of business with which the people are not acquainted. It is especially a convenient system of remitting money from one part of the Province to another. From the town in which I live, you can send a cheque payable to "John Smith" in Toronto or elsewhere. He presents it in Toronto, and if the bank does not know him, they can require that he be identified. The people have become accustomed to the system, and unless it can be shown that there has been great loss and inconvenience, it would be unwise to change it. I do not think the banks should be relieved from the responsibility under which they rest at present. The banks are not compelled to do this business unless they find it profitable, but, if they do it, they should not be relieved from that responsibility. I sincerely hope that the Minister will not press this clause, but that he will allow the law to remain as it has remained for many years, and which the people of the country understand and appreciate. I certainly think that it would be very unwise to make the change contemplated.

Mr. EDWARDS. I cannot hope to add anything of importance to what has been said on this question, but I wish to express my sincere desire that the hon. Minister of Justice will see his way to not enforce the change now contemplated in this respect. In my opinion, if this change be made it will disturb the commerce of the country to a very great extent indeed. I cannot agree in the opinion that this idea is only for the protection of the person who gives the cheque, for I believe, that it is very largely intended for the convenience of the receiver of the cheque. In my business I draw a great many cheques, and I always ask the party to whom I give a cheque, "Will you have this cheque payable to bearer or to your order?" In almost every case the party receiving the cheque wishes that it should be made payable to his order, for the reason that if he loses the cheque he will be protected. If this proposed clause becomes law the finder of a lost cheque may go to the bank, and if the bank will pay the money, he will receive it and the responsibility is removed from the bank entirely. In the neighborhood of our place of business there is no bank, and a great many people come to us and deposit their money, and ask us to give our cheque for safety in remitting. So far as the bank is concerned, my opinion is, that one of the first motives of a bank should be to protect its own customers. I can hardly believe that the banks desire such a change as this. Of course it is generally understood that the presenter of a cheque has got to be identified, and the onus is on the bank; but what would be desirable would be to make the law so that the presenter of the cheque would be compelled to identify the endorsement if requested. So far as this line of endorsement goes down from one person to another, it is almost always the case that when a cheque is endorsed for the second or third time it gets into the hand of some commercial man whose endorsement is well known and who has a bank account. When he goes to his banker and deposits that cheque the responsibility is on him, for he guarantees the previous endorsements. So far as I am concerned I think it would be a very serious evil indeed, if this change is made, and I sincerely hope it shall not be made.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), when he referred to the convenience of the present system, has stated all that can be said in its favor. In proposing by a Bill to regulate the relations of parties to bills of exchange and promissory notes, and, so far as this question is concerned, the relations of bankers to their customers, I suppose it is not fair to impose a liability upon the banks for the convenience of a portion of the public with whom it has no dealings whatever. We provide completely for the relations between a bank and its customers when we propose that the responsibility shall fall, as it does now, upon the bank, if the signature to the cheque is not genuine or duly authorised. But it is but just to provide that the signature of the customer of a bank having been put to that cheque, he issues it at his own risk when he makes its payment depend upon the endorsement of other persons with whom the bank has no dealings, and whose signature the bank may have no opportunity of identifying. Should we make the loss fall on the bank for the convenience of persons who have no dealing with the bank? If we do so, I think we would put the loss on the wrong shoulders for the convenience of the public, and at the expense of one of the parties to the transaction.

Mr. BURDETT. The hon. Minister does not state what justification there is for changing the law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have stated the justification. I was quite aware that the Committee did not hear me very well, as there was confusion in the chamber. The hon. member for St. John stated the reason fully in his argument, while the case against it depends, as was said by the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), on the inconvenience of making the change. I admit that inconvenience, but when we are adopting a system as we are now in consolidating the law with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes, I think we should place the relations of everybody concerned in these instruments on a fair and just footing. The argument in favor of the change, when we are coming down to first principles, is, that it is but fair that the responsibility of a bank, as the agent of the person who draws the cheque, should depend on and be limited to the genuineness of the signature which the customer appends to his cheque, and that it should not be responsible, when he, for the convenience of payment, for the convenience of having a second voucher, or for the convenience of his friend who deposits money in order to get a cheque payable to order. We provide that the bank should not be subject to the risk of perhaps a dozen intermediate endorsements by parties, not one of whom may be known to a single officer of the bank. It seems to me that we are putting the matter on a fair basis, when we limit the responsibility of the bank to the genuineness of the signature, and the genuineness of the authority of the person who has signed the cheque. I think it is but fair that we should provide that it shall either be the signature of the person who professes to draw it, or the signature of one who has due authority in that regard. When we have found that the owner of the money has drawn the order that the money shall be paid, the agent ought to be protected from all liability when he complies with the demand, of what appears on its face, to be the proper authority to pay the cheque. This argument is strengthened, when we remember that the bank has no protection, no means of verification, no communication with any of these intermediate endorsers, but is liable to an action at law if it dares to refuse payment of a cheque on an authority which it suspects may be a spurious endorsement. There is one other observation which I forgot to make and which, to some extent, meets the argument of the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). The hon. gentleman was good enough to call attention to the fact that there exists in practice, a marked difference between the use of cheques in this country and in England, in this particular, that a system of crossed cheques has grown up in the mother country, and has not yet been established here. Dealing with this matter, as I have said, upon fundamental principles, as we are endeavoring to do, we are providing side by side with this provision all those provisions which relate to crossed cheques. What will be the position of the hon. member for Russell? He can draw his cheque, he can still draw it payable to order; he has only to cross his cheque in accordance with the provisions of this Bill and every one who takes that cheque knows that it can only be paid by the bank on which it is drawn to another bank. The hon. member therefore has but to draw two lines across his cheque, and mark "bank" on it, and that cheque must go into some other bank before it can be paid by his own bank. That being so, every person into whose hands that cheque may come, fraudulently or otherwise, knows that he must go to some bank and establish to the satisfaction of that bank his authority to receive that money to such an extent that the second bank will pay. He has only to do that in order to check to a very great extent the danger which would arise from a false or fraudulent endorsement. A person who makes a cheque payable to order does so either for his own convenience or that of the payee, and thereby imposes on the bank additional risks and obligations; and if he neglects to draw two lines across it and mark "bank" upon it, and in addition to that, desires that the bank should run the risk of loss from a forgery in an endorsement, he desires to establish a principle which appears to me to have nothing to commend it.

Mr. BLAKE. It will be observed that no answer has been given to the appeal made by several members to the hon. Minister to state whether this change is proposed upon information which the hon. gentleman has verified as to the existence in the past of considerable inconvenience and loss resulting from the existing practice; and, therefore, up to this time, we are to understand that we are dealing with it—as the hon. gentleman himself put it—upon first principles—upon the question as to what is abstractly right or best. I do not myself think that, after the very long experience we have had of one system, we can ignore the practical result of that system, and I do not think it is reasonable to suggest theoretical inconveniences or risks of a grave character as a sufficient ground for altering the law of the land as it has been for a great number of years, and to which the people have adjusted their commercial transactions. My opinion is that a very good test under these circumstances is the test of experience, and if it has been found that the banks are exposed to very serious inconveniences or risks—on the one hand, risk of an action because they refuse payment of a cheque which turns out to be properly endorsed, or, on the other hand, risk of a loss because a cheque, which they have no means of verifying, turns out to be improperly endorsed—or if it has been found that the security which the general public dealing with the banks has had up to this time, and under which they are carrying on the money transactions of the country, is insufficient, we want some statistics to show to what extent that has been the case. But, in the absence of proofs that there has been any serious inconvenience or loss in practice, I decline to accept theoretical reasons of hardship as a ground for altering the law.

Mr. DESJARDINS. My limited experience in banking leads me to believe that there is no such inconvenience experienced as to necessitate a change in the law. The banks are willing to accommodate their customers, and to accept any risk for the endorsements of the cheques which they receive. It is a very common practice for customers to make their cheques payable to order, and they know very well that but for that arrangement the person receiving the cheque would have no security against loss by the cheque getting into wrong hands. He knows very well that the accommodation the banks are willing to give would be minimised to such an extent that their customers would suffer considerably. As far as my experience goes, there is not much danger of cheques being paid to the wrong persons. Every bank has its own customers and its own means of indentifying those who ask payment of endorsed cheques, so that I think this change would be neither in the interest of the customers nor of the banks.

Mr. KENNY. This matter of conducting the business of the country by cheques is one which, of course, concerns the commercial community more particularly, and I can readily understand that there should be great objections to any innovations. I note specially the remarks of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), but in considering this question, there seems to be a disposition to throw all the responsibility upon the banks. The hon. the Minister of Justice has explained to us that in a subsequent section provision is made for adopting the system of crossing cheques, and if the hon. member for Russell, when one of his customers desires a cheque on exchange for the money deposited in his hands, will simply cross that cheque after he has signed it, he will then protect himself and his bank. There is no place where the system of cheques prevail to such an extent as in England, and in no city to such an extent as in London, and the extent to which the system prevails there is largely due to the fact that they have adopted this system of crossing cheques, whereby a cheque can only be cashed by a bank. This is a great protection to the customers of a bank, and also to the bank, and, as a commercial man, I must say that if we can adopt the system, which is equally convenient to us as the system which prevails to-day, and at the same time give more protection to our banks, without causing ourselves the slightest inconvenience, it is only fair that we should adopt it. This system of crossing cheques, English experience shows us, is a better system than the one which prevails in Canada to-day, and is not only a protection to the bank, but is equally convenient to the customers of the bank; and, therefore, as a commercial man, obliged to use these cheques, I think that if we would incorporate the system of crossed cheques it would be a very great improvement.

Mr. BLAKE. While I do not at all object to the introduction of the system of crossed cheques, I do not think that in the present condition of banking in this country, with reference to agencies and so forth, and the use made of cheques in this country, it is to be expected that the inconveniences we are now discussing will be removed by the introduction of this system. To a very large extent they will remain. It will be very useful, indeed, in large cities where there is a number of banks, but it would not be found applicable or convenient in a large portion of our transactions outside of large cities, in the rural districts.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This clause will operate in favor of the banks in this way: If you wish to make from Ottawa a payment in Toronto, and draw your cheque payable to order and send it through, under this clause your cheque will be no security, and the result will be, in order to secure safety, you will have to give the bank 25 cents to get a bank draft. If my hon. friend were interested in banking, I would say that it would operate to his advantage.

Mr. BURDETT. He is a bank president.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). His plan would result in business being given to the banks at the expense of the general public. As the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has pointed out, before such a radical change as this is made in the system which has been carried on for thirty or forty years, there ought to be examples of hardship or loss shown. Every business man knows that when he pays an account by a cheque payable to order, he does not care whether he gets a receipt or not. The cheque is a receipt. But the hon. gentleman is going to oblige the general public to be careful in every case to take a receipt for the money, and is going to infuse into commercial circles a feeling of insecurity with reference to remittances. He will force people to buy bank drafts, in order to be secure, instead of sending cheques payable to order as they do now. I am sorry to see the hon. gentleman taking such a ground. I fail to see the force of the arguments he addressed to the Committee, and I would say, with the hon. member for West Durham, that we should not deal theoretically with this matter, but if there has been no inconvenience and no loss, we should stick to what has been found to work well in practice.

Mr. TISDALE. I feel strongly that this clause is a step in the wrong direction. I have had some personal experience in dealing with banks, and I have yet to learn that anybody who has a bank account worth having has any difficulty in getting a bank to take it, under the law as it is now. As has been already remarked, these cheques payable to order serve as receipts, and we have heard no complaint of loss on the part of the banks under that system. If there were any complaints, we might then consider the question of crossed cheques. Our system of banking here is quite different from that in England. Our banks make a great deal more money out of their customers than do the banks in England, as we have more discounting and a different class of bank accounts. I would regret very much to see this clause retained in the Bill. The bulk of the Bill is very excellent, but, until there is a greater demand or more reason shown why the banks should have this protection, or why they themselves require this change, I would regret very much to see it become law.

Mr. WALDIE. I was about to say that our business is done with towns and villages where there is no branch of a chartered bank. If crossed cheques are necessary, they would have to be returned to Toronto to be cashed. Now, these cheques are passed to the different merchants in the different localities, they are forwarded by them to their correspondents, and by those correspondents they are forwarded to Toronto. It would cause a great deal of difficulty and great inconvenience to us, if this Act were amended as it is proposed. It would be of great inconvenience to our employes and to others to have marked cheques which could only be cashed through a bank.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that would be the effect of requiring the cheques to be crossed. The hon. gentleman will see that it would not be necessary for them to come back immediately to the bank in Toronto or to come back earlier than they do now. The only effect of this provision is that they must be presented at another bank than that on which they are drawn. Taking Algoma and Muskoka, to which I understand the hon. gentleman refers, the effect of the provision would be that the merchants who cash those cheques would be very careful as to the authenticity of every endorsement.

Mr. WALDIE. The effect would be that we would have to stop making payments in this way. The people to whom the payments are made are not so well known as the hon. gentleman supposes, and it would, therefore, stop our business if it were done in that way.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), I may say that I do not think this would have the effect he seems to expect, of sending all this business to the banks in the sense that every one who was going to a distance would have to get a bank draft instead of a cheque, because, as he will observe, a bank draft is subject to the same restrictions as a cheque. The cheque drawn by one bank on another is as much subject to the provision of this Bill as any other cheque, and, therefore, this could not have the effect of sending business to the banks. As to the inconveniences arising from the present system, every one knows that not a month passes without a bank being subjected to loss by virtue of the law being as it now is, and that without any fault of the bank and without the bank having any means to protect itself. In regard to the statistics which have been spoken of, if I gathered up the statistics on this point, what would be gained? The question of inconvenience, great or small, is a relative question, and it would, of course, be said that the banks are better able to bear inconvenience and loss than their customers are. But the question is not one of convenience or statistics. The question is whether the provision is right or wrong. If it is not right in principle, though it has not been assailed by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as being wrong, that is another question, but I believe I can recommend it to the Committee by arguments which will show them that it is right, though some people prefer to shift a loss to the shoulders of a corporation rather than bear it themselves. I am not going to submit any statistics on this subject, or to urge it on the Committee because the banks are interested in it. It goes without saying, that every one who is interested in banking would desire to see this provision passed; but that is no reason for its place in the Bill. The reason why it is here is that we thought it right to adopt it. I have been twice asked why I did not show who urged the adoption of such a provision. Will it commend the provision of this Committee any more to say that the banks are in favor of it or are not in favor of it? If there were no better reasons to urge, I would have abandoned it as hour ago. However, I am convinced that the weight of opinion in the Committee is against the clause. It has been said that I am wedded to the clause. I am not wedded to the clause. We are here to make the best Bill we can, and I am grateful to the Committee for the free discussion which has taken place. I propose to allow this clause to stand for the present, and if, on further consideration, the Committee is not convinced that it is right by what I have said in favor of it, I shall withdraw it.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 6) relating to Bills of Exchange, Cheques and Promissory Notes.—(Sir John Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 69,

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any provision made with respect to the security?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; we cannot define that. Similar clauses with respect to security and actions on lost instruments are clauses which are now in force in all the Provinces, and the sufficiency of the security is to be determined on the trial of the action. It is impossible to define what amount of security shall be given, or what kind of security. If on the trial of the cause the security offered shall be proved to be sufficient, the party recovers; but it is left to be determined as a question of fact.

On section 75,

Mr. BURDETT. There was a case in the Central Bank recently, where a party received a cheque which had been marked, but he never received the cash, and it was held that the drawer was discharged. I presume this is an exact copy of the English law, and probably it had better be left to its course, and no change made for cases like the one I have mentioned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The drawer at common law was discharged entirely if there was any delay at all in presenting the cheque. This is intended to relieve the drawer pro tanto, to the extent of the damage suffered.

On section 76,

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the reason for introducing this change in the present banking system? So far as I have ever heard, the system of doing business by cheques has been generally satisfactory, and any disturbance in the present arrangement would cause considerable confusion. I understand that banking institutions may possibly have suggested the change, but before we make a radical change of this sort it would be well for us to know the necessity for it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is nothing compulsory about this, and, therefore, it does not make any change in the law. As the hon. member will see, one can now draw a cheque in any form he pleases, and subject to any condition he pleases. This is but a convenient provision which, put on the face of the cheque, will notify the holder how it can be cashed. It is the form which is in existence in Great Britain and most other countries.

Not only is the system of crossed cheques in use in the mother country, but, to a limited extent, it has been in use here, especially in the case of cheques issued by Canadian banks payable in England.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any system of this kind in force in the United States?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot say.

Mr. BURDETT. It is in use in some of the States.

Mr. WALDIE. If this system is adopted generally, it would obviate some of the objections we made to the other clause. It is a permissible provision, I suppose?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

On section 80,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Suppose a crossed cheque is given by one person to another, the person receiving it cannot present it at the bank where it is payable, but must present it at another bank. Is the bank at which he presents it bound to cash it? If it does not, and he cannot get it cashed by the bank on which it is drawn, what is his recourse?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, he need not take the crossed cheque. If he does take it, he knows he takes it subject to his chance of getting it cashed by a bank other than that on which it is drawn. In effect, he takes a cheque subject to that limitation.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One other question. Suppose a crossed cheque is presented at a bank and the bank cashes it, and by the time that bank presents it to the bank on which it is drawn, it is found that there are no funds there, in what position is the second bank?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The second bank has recourse against the drawer only. It takes the risk of collecting funds from the bank on which the cheque is drawn. But the holder of a cheque, under no circumstances, can present it for collection, and the bank will at once ascertain whether funds are available or not.

On section 82,

Mr. WALDIE. If a bank is negligent in forwarding a cheque, would it not be liable for that negligence?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This section is merely to provide for the case of a bank collecting for a customer, in which case the bank shall not be liable, provide it acts in good faith.

On section 86,

Mr. McMULLEN. Where an endorsed note is held as collateral security to any instrument, in order to hold the endorser without protest, there should be some note on the bank that would settle the point between the parties, and show that the assent has been given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is a question of fact which has to be proved.

Mr. KENNY. Supposing the maker presented his note as collateral security, and the endorsement was satisfactory, how would the assent of the endorser be obtained to continuing the security?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In any way that any contract may be made—by act, word, or instrument under seal.

Mr. WALDIE. Where the holder of the note given as security extends the time of payment, I think the endorser should have some notice of that extension.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). If the extension is given without the consent of the endorser, then the endorser is no longer liable.

Mr. McMULLEN. Supposing a man wants to borrow ten thousand dollars from a bank and gives an endorser as guarantee to that extent. He will draw the funds as he requires them, and meet his notes by other paper put in for discount. That may continue for years, and if the endorser is to be held as a continuous running security and is willing to assume that risk, that should be stated on the instrument by using the words "waive protest" or in some other form. Otherwise, it will be difficult to prove his assent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What the hon. gentleman suggests is no doubt what the bank would do as a measure of prudence under the circumstances. But it may be done in other ways with perfect validity. It may be that the endorser derives benefit from the continued security. It will be a question of evidence to prove that he was in some way a party to the transaction before being deprived of his right. The burden of proof will always be on the bank, and that is the best security that the bank will take precaution to have the evidence clear.

On section 89,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Why is a distinction drawn in this 4th sub-section, which says:

"Where a foreign note is dishonored, protest thereof, except in the Province of Quebec, is unnecessary."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Merely because that is now the law of the Province of Quebec, and it was thought best, in drawing this Bill, to avoid altering the law which is peculiar to that Province in regard to bills and notes, except where it could be done without inconvenience. It was represented to us that the law, in regard to protesting foreign as well as inland bills, should be continued. That representation came not only from the professional notaries, but also from the banking institutions.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I understood that the last time this Bill was before the Committee, the Minister of Justice took the ground that the fees for the protest of notes should be the same all over the Dominion, which must result in very much increasing the fees in Ontario, if they are to be the same as those in the Province of Quebec. I think that principle should be applied to this section, and that the law should be made uniform throughout the Dominion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I said that it was the object to make the provisions of the Bill uniform wherever we could do so. I think, however, that we will have to abandon that view as far as the fees are concerned, and that the better course will be, both as to the requirement of a protest and the fees connected with a protest, to leave the law on both sides as it was before,—that is, the law in Quebec on the one side, and the English-speaking part of the country on the other.

Mr. KENNY.

Mr. WALDIE. It seems to me that when foreign bills are protested, they should not be treated in different ways in different parts of Canada. They ought to be treated in the same way everywhere.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. So they are.

Mr. WALDIE. If there is a necessity for protesting a foreign bill, it should be under a general law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This has only reference to the fees.

On section 93,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of this is to show that by the use of the word "protesting" it is not intended that the extension should be necessary, provided it is noted in the protest.

Mr. SPROULE. This clause seems to make provision for the protesting. A good many people hold the opinion that a Bill ought to be protested without employing a notary public to do it. There ought to be a provision allowing a bank clerk to protest a note the same as in the old country. I see that several papers advocate it, and a good many business men think it ought to be done. By that means you could do away with the cost of the protest, which is a considerable item in many instances. In certain localities it is impossible to get a notary public without going a long distance. I see there is a provision here that a magistrate may do it, but I think it might be left to a bank clerk or any person.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I think it will tend to prevent many negligent people from paying their notes, or from providing to meet them in some way. It is a good inducement to people to fulfil their engagements.

Mr. SPROULE. I hold the object of the protest is simply to notify the endorser that the note is not paid, and to hold the security good. It is a notice to him that the party who is liable for it has not paid it, and it is for his interest to see that the note is paid.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the only function of a protest. I think, if the hon. member will reflect upon it, he will see that the one class of persons, above all others, who ought not to be allowed to make the protest, would be the people in the bank.

Mr. SPROULE. They do it in England.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They have done it in England. They have there the same provision we have here, that where a bill is dishonored and the services of a notary cannot be obtained at the place where the bill is dishonored, any householder or substantial resident of the place, may, in the presence of two witnesses, give a certificate, signed by him, protesting the dishonor of the bill. It is not for the purpose of notifying the parties, but it is to establish, with some degree of notoriety, that dishonor has taken place, that being the most important step in the history of the bill, but a fact which requires to be proved afterwards, and to which some degree of notoriety must be given. We have on our Statute-book at present a provision that whoever shall make a protest, and whatever may be the circumstances under which it may be done, it shall not be made by the bank, as the bank might be the party interested, and such party might manufacture evidence of facts which did not exist. The hon. gentleman will see further, that the principal effect of the present law is to be able to establish afterwards, in a court of law, the fact of dishonor and due notice by the protest itself. We have done away with the necessity of calling witnesses, by providing that the protest can be put in as evidence; but if you leave the matter to an interested party, to an officer or clerk in a bank, who may have neglected his duty in regard to giving notice, to make the evidence afterwards, the whole question is left at the mercy of even the humblest clerk.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It would be more satisfactory to every one concerned to have an independent officer outside of the bank to make the protest.

Mr. SPROULE. I have here an opinion written by an eminent authority, in which it is stated as follows:—

"The necessity for a legal gentleman's services in this regard are not necessary, and we trust the English system, of having a junior clerk of the bank send the circular notices after the teller has certified that the document was presented and not paid, will be adopted instead."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. He is writing on a different subject, the giving of the notice of dishonor.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The law should be left as it is at present, and the notice should be given by notaries. This provision is very good where notes are made payable at places where the services of notaries are not available; but, there are some parts of Ontario where justices of the peace are not quite so thick as they are in the Province of Quebec, and it might be difficult to obtain the services of a justice of the peace to protest a note when the services of a notary were not available.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The provision with respect to justices of the peace is taken from the Code of Lower Canada. There is a choice only between adopting that provision, or the English provision, which provides that the duty may be performed by any householder or substantial resident.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think it would be better to go to the extent of the English law, as in some villages in country places it might be impossible to obtain the services of even a justice of the peace for the protesting of a note. I agree that wherever notarial services can be obtained they should be utilised, but when they cannot be obtained, and in some instances when the services of a justice of the peace might not be available, in those cases the clauses in the English Act might very well be adopted.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a discrepancy which might occur, if it is intended that this Act should repeal the provisions of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec. There is a provision passed by the old Parliament of Canada in 1866 which says, that no provision of the Civil Code will be held to be repealed by a statute unless the particular article of the Code is expressly mentioned. I am not prepared to say that this Parliament is bound by that provision, but I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the enactment in question, which he will find in the Statutes of 1886.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the Bill makes provision in that regard. All those articles of the Civil Code which are interfered with, are enumerated in the third section of the Bill.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I suppose that will provide for the matter I referred to.

Mr. WALDIE. Is it decided that the Act should come into operation on the 1st July?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the Committee wishes, I have no objection that it shall be the 1st of September.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that will be better.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will make it the 1st of September.

On schedule 1,

Mr. BURDETT. With reference to the fees provided for in this schedule, I may state I have had a long letter from a bank in Ontario which suggests that all dishonored notes shall be stamped, and, for a fee of 25 cents, a clerk of the bank could mail the notice at the close of banking hours. I think this would save considerable expense. I can understand the inapplicability of that principle to paper payable in another place than in the bank. There is another matter to which I wish to refer. In Ontario a note is payable at some village, perhaps ten miles from the county town, where there is a notary, and I would suggest that some slight fee for mileage should be allowed, if one has to travel that distance. The fees in Ontario at present are very moderate, and I think nobody can grumble if the present fees are not increased.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will allow this schedule to stand.

Committee rose and reported progress.

THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now that the hon. Minister of Finance is here, I will take the opportunity of repeating what I said to the hon. First Minister, that it would be very desirable, if possible, that the hon. gentleman should give some information to the public, and to the House, as to when he expects to bring the Budget down.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall be very glad to do that as soon as I can find out that I am able to make a reasonable forecast of the time. I do not know at present whether I could come anywhere near a reasonable anticipation of the exact time or not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume, from that statement, that the hon. gentleman is not likely to bring it down this week, at any rate.

Mr. FOSTER. Not this week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think he should at least give the House three or four days' notice of his intention.

Mr. FOSTER. I will do that.

PRIVILEGE—THE MEMBER FOR LINCOLN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would also take this opportunity of calling the attention of the First Minister to the fact that he stated in his place that he proposed, a few days ago, to lay on the Table a letter from his son, Mr. Macdonald, of Winnipeg. He must have received the letter. Is he prepared to lay it on the Table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A telegram was addressed to me, and I gave it to the Minister of Customs. In that my son stated, "I am writing." I received the letter, but it was not written as if intended to be laid before the House. It contains some language which is not quite parliamentary, and which might render him liable to a motion by my hon. friend. So I have sent for a revised copy of the letter in parliamentary diction.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Harbors and Rivers, Ont.—Construction of Port Arthur Harbor and dredging Kaministiquia River... $65,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. Minister of Public Works say what the total cost of Port Arthur harbor has been?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total expenditure on the Port Arthur harbor works, from the 1st July, 1884, when the work was begun, to the 21st December, 1889, was $381,000; for additional works, from the 21st December, 1889, to June, 1890, $27,000. The vote applied for in the ordinary estimates for the section of the breakwater in 1890-91, inclusive of superintendence, $40,000. Additional grant required for protecting the base of the breakwater, and preventing erosion of the bottom, $35,000. Total probable cost of the works, including $387 contingencies, and what we now ask for, will be $483,000. For that, we have probably the best harbor and safest on the large lakes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the length of the breakwater?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. All the information is in the departmental report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that the hon. gentleman had only completed the construction of two outlying piers, which, although valuable and important works, did not appear capable of sheltering a great deal of shipping. I do not know what quantity of shipping this breakwater will shelter, or how long it is intended to be, but the piers would not offer accommodation to any considerable quantity. Does the hon. gentleman know the depth of water?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The depth at low water at the contract opening is 18 feet. At the north-east opening it is 250 feet wide between the end of the breakwater and the Canadian Pacific Railway elevator wharf, and the depth is 17 feet. After the completion of the 1,500 feet now under contract, there will be a depth of 17 feet at the western end, and ample room for steamers and vessels to pass. The hon. gentleman will find all the information in the report, which is much fuller than the previous two years' reports.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman secured, besides the two piers, a basin of any considerable area?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the depth of water through that basin?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Seventeen feet, as far as I can say.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. the Minister of Public Works has stated that the report is fuller than that of last year. I pointed out, last year, that there was a great absence of detail in all these reports, so that it was difficult to arrive at anything approaching a correct idea of the amount of money spent on these various public works; and the hon. gentleman promised then that in future his reports would be more in detail. Although the report this year is much more lengthy, still, in my judgment, it is no better than last year's. What we should have in each case is the original estimate, the amount of the contract, the amount of money expended, the further amount required, the name of the contractor, and when the work is expected to be finished. It is utterly impossible to go through the records of previous years to get at information, which the hon. gentleman could give us in this condensed form. We would have in this way, in brief, the whole question, and dispense with the necessity on the part of the hon. gentleman of giving a great deal of explanation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is right, and it would be better if in each report there was a résumé of what appeared in former reports, so that the whole matter might be seen at a glance. Of course, being at the head of the Department, and seeing what has been published in the previous reports, I, as well as my officers, thought that the reference to the previous reports might do, but I see that it would be a saving of time and trouble to hon. gentlemen who have not the matter before them to have that condensed in one report, without reference to those which preceded it. I will see that this is done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With reference to the dredging of the Kaministiquia River, $25,000, I might ask the hon. gentleman to inform us what is the depth of water he has now secured by this dredging?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to pages 103 and 104 of the Appendix to the Report of the Department of Public Works. The depth is not given, but it says:

"In 1886 dredging was commenced in the river and has been continued from year to year, so that the largest steamers can now reach the elevators at Fort William without difficulty."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The largest steamers would draw, probably, 17 or 18 feet.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose the largest steamers on the lake are those of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount required to secure a depth of 18 feet, and this amount is to complete the dredging to that depth.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is very satisfactory, particularly in view of the fact that my hon. friend the former occupant of those benches was reviled very considerably for suggesting that a depth of 9 or 10 feet was practicable, and now the hon. gentleman has obtained a depth of 18 feet without any very considerable expenditure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A great many things have happened since then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; many things have happened to show that Mr. Mackenzie was correct in a great many of his ideas, though they have not been carried out always in the way in which he intended them to be. I would ask what has the total cost of this amounted to? What has been expended for dredging on this river?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total expenditure from July, 1884, to July, 1889, was $152,994. The additional amount required is $25,000, so that the total probable cost of the improvement of that river will be about $178,000.

Kingston Graving Dock $160,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What are the estimates for the completion of this dock?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total estimated cost of the dock, including everything, is $318,000, and this is required to complete the dock.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I have taken exception on more than one occasion to this vote and to the appropriations made for such purposes, unless the docks in Halifax were placed in the same position. I beg to remind the Minister and the Government that, when the dock at Halifax was first talked of the present High Commissioner led us to believe that it was contemplated by the Government to assume the dock at Quebec, and that, as the dock at Esquimalt was a public work, it was the policy of the Government to make all these dry docks public undertakings. Then we asked that the money to construct a dock at Halifax should be loaned to us on the same terms as those upon which it has been loaned to the city of Quebec for the same purpose. That was refused by the Government, and they subsequently made us a grant of $10,000 a year for twenty years, the city of Halifax giving another $10,000 a year, and the Imperial Government also giving $10,000 a year. Under that arrangement we have secured our dock. I say it is unfair that the citizens of Halifax should be called upon to assess themselves for $10,000 a year for this dock, while the people of Quebec have been relieved of the burden of their dock and the interest, though it is a similar public work, and the people of Quebec have also obtained a loan of about four million dollars for the tidal docks there. We wrote off $500,000, last year, of the loan to the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec, so that they now owe to the Government $3,500,000. I do not know what prospects there is of our ever receiving that money or any interest upon it, but it is the general impression with members from all the Provinces, that we shall never receive one cent from the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec, for the four millions of money we loaned them for the tidal docks at the Louise Basin. If that is the case, and the Government are now proposing to build a similar work at Kingston, I repeat that we in Halifax are entitled to be placed in the same position, and to be relieved from the $10,000 a year which, I admit, we voluntarily assumed, but which we were compelled to assume in order to obtain the construction of that dock.

I think the Government will see that we should not be placed in a more disadvantageous position than other parts of the Dominion. If Kingston is to have a dry dock constructed as a public work, it is simply another evidence that the principle which I have laid down is correct, because the Government are constructing public works all over the Dominion; and, although they will not own the dock in Halifax, because it has been constructed by Imperial money partly, I think it will be as useful, if not more so, than the dock at Quebec. I do not suppose that my argument will have much weight with the Government, but I consider it my duty, as representing Halifax, to bring this to the notice of the Government, and I shall never cease in my efforts to have the city which I represent placed on the same footing as other parts of the Dominion, in respect to these undertakings.

Mr. KENNY. I must say that my hon. colleague has placed this matter very well indeed before the Government, and I think he might possibly have made out a stronger case than he has. As I understand it, the $10,000 which the city of Halifax received from the Dominion Government was not a grant to the city of Halifax. I understand that there is an Act on the Statute-book whereby the Dominion Government pledges itself to give $10,000 to aid docks in any part of the Dominion, when the Government is satisfied with the bona fides of the undertaking, so that the city of Halifax is not under any obligation to the Government for the $10,000 it has received. My hon. colleague has fairly contrasted the usefulness of the Halifax dock with that of the Quebec dock. There can be really no comparison. The Quebec dock is closed for six months in the year; the Halifax dock is available all the year round. It is occasionally contended that there is ice in the harbor of Halifax; if there is a little ice, at all events there is plenty of water in the harbor of Halifax. As regards the dock, it is infinitely more useful, and is entitled to the same consideration, at least, from the hands of the Dominion Government, as the Quebec dock or the dock at Kingston. As regards the amount of money spent by the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec, it must be borne in mind by my hon. colleague that the citizens of Halifax objected to putting the harbor in commission. I do not know that they were wise in doing so; perhaps if we had followed the example of Quebec, and got ourselves pretty well in debt, then we might have come to the Dominion Government and asked for relief. But here it is contemplated to aid Kingston in a manner in which the dock at Halifax has not been aided, nor any other dock in any part of the Dominion. I would just say to the Government that I shall be very much surprised if that is done, and I hope they will take the claims of Halifax into their most favorable consideration.

Cape Tormentine Harbor $110,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not state the amount of the contract which was given to Mr. Murphy for the construction of that work, nor does he state the depth of water which he expects to get at the end of the pier. I am speaking of the last contract.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The last contract amounted, at schedule rates, to $169,000. The contractor was Mr. Edward Murphy, of Toronto. The completion will take place on the 28th October, 1890, but I am afraid that it will go beyond that date. We expect to get 16 feet of water.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How far is this pier from the site of the one which was contracted for in the first instance? Is this the same site as the original one?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; so I am told.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman estimated what it will cost to build the pier on the other side—on the Island side?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood there was a survey made and some report. Of course, the hon. gentleman can hardly give so large a contract on the New Brunswick side, without ascertaining whether it is feasible on the Island side.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt it would be feasible. But if the hon. gentleman wishes for that information, I will give him all I have later on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is an intimation which the people in that quarter are looking for with no small anxiety; because, as the hon. gentleman knows, there is a good deal of difference of opinion as to the feasibility of constructing a pier, unless at the expenditure of an enormous sum of money, which would afford sufficient depth of water for steamboats to ply there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A survey has been made, I suppose?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think so; I have no doubt that it was made at the time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because, unless it has been made, we have been going blindly on with the business.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it was made by the Railway Department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the hon. gentleman to ascertain whether the pier, now being built, is on the site of the old pier, for which a contract was entered into and abandoned. My impression was, and I hope I am correct, that this pier is being built half a mile further to the west.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is on the same site as the first contract.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where the pier was originally being constructed, many mariners thought it was a dangerous place, and could not be constructed so as to insure safety to the steamers plying there, and I understood that the site had very properly been changed to a position half a mile further west.

Improvement of Ship Channel between Quebec and Montreal..... $50,000

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). I would like to have some explanation on this item. If I remember rightly, when the Government last year assumed the maintenance of the channel between Quebec and Montreal, they stated that the amount asked for, which was $100,000, would complete all the works that would be necessary. This year we see $50,000 more asked for, and we do not know how much yet will be required. How is it that more is needed than was expected last year? On this side of the House we contended that the Government did not know what they were undertaking.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. The amount required to complete the works that have been under the charge of the Harbor Commissioners, and have been assumed by the Department of Public Works, was $250,000. A sum of $100,000 was voted last year, and this year we have asked $50,000 more, and a portion of the $100,000 remains to be expended. The amount of $50,000 would employ our dredges and other machinery to go on with the work required to complete the channel. A sum of $100,000 more will be required to complete it as intended by the Harbor Commissioners. We shall then have a channel through which large steamships may pass, but at certain portions of the channel there are very sharp curves which vessels can hardly pass without touching bottom, and where there is always danger of vessels going ashore. These elbows will have to be removed and the channel straightened so that vessels may not be exposed to this danger. That was, however, all foreseen by the Harbor Commissioners and stated in their report. We are continuing with that work as well as with the works at Cap à la Roche and Cap Charles. They have been carried on in order that there may be as great a depth of water over the shoals there as in the ordinary channel, so that there may be a minimum of danger to vessels. These works are carried out with all possible economy, but we cannot do otherwise than finish the works to complete the channel, which have already cost so large a sum.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). Events which have occurred since last Session go to prove that the Government did not know what they were undertaking. The hon. Minister of Public Works has just stated that he was prepared to straighten the channel in some places on account of the sharp curves. I admit that if he wants to have a safe channel between Quebec and Montreal, he will have to straighten the channel in many places; but how much such a work will cost, no one can tell. I may mention that a very serious accident took place last spring in front of Longue Pointe, a short distance from Montreal, when two steamers, the Polynesian and Cynthia, came into collision. The disclosures made by the witnesses in the case, which was brought before the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec, proved a most serious state of things. The result of the investigation by the Harbor Commissioners was that no one was to blame, that the channel alone was to blame. The people were not, however, satisfied with the decision of the Harbor Commissioners. The case was taken into the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec, and a few months ago the court held one of the steamers, the Polynesian, to be blameable. The case is now to be taken before the Privy Council. It was proved very clearly that the channel is so difficult and so crooked, that it would be almost impossible, under the circumstances in which the steamers were placed, to have avoided a collision between them, even with the greatest prudence on the part of the pilots of both steamers. After this accident another accident occurred, which again goes to show the difficulty of navigating the channel. In this case two steamers grounded. I do not remember the date, but, to the best of my recollection, it was in October, and they grounded in the channel between Montreal and Quebec. It was very fine weather at the time, and daylight. They grounded so seriously that it was a question whether they should not be docked at Quebec, and every one thought it was most imprudent on the part of the managers of the company, especially on the part of one of the companies, to allow the vessel to go to sea in that injured condition. Every man engaged in shipping was of the opinion that it was most imprudent to send one of the steamers to sea after the accident, which again was due to the condition of the channel. An accident occurred which would have been more serious even than that, and which might have blocked the channel for an indefinite time. At the place where the grounding occurred the channel is very narrow, and if the first steamer had grounded sufficiently to remain stranded the other steamer would have ran into her, the second steamer following at a distance of about half a mile, which was not a sufficient distance to have stopped her; and the result would have been that the channel between Quebec and Montreal might have been blocked for the remainder of the season. This fact shows that a large portion of the channel will have to be widened and straightened. How much that will cost I do not know, and the Government has no idea. The place where this accident happened was considered one of the best parts of the channel, and it is evident that some improvements are required there; but how much they will cost no one knows. When the discussion came up last year I was told by some pilots that the Harbor Commissioners in Montreal had very prudently saved their money and had carried out the work in such a way as to avoid blasting the rock at the bottom of the river; but now we have arrived at such a condition that, if the Government commence to blast, they will have to blast for miles and miles, because the bottom is almost level. I do not think the Government know much more than I do as to the cost of the work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount of money now asked, and the balance remaining over from last year, is for the purpose of completing the works intended by the Harbor Commissioners when the harbor works were taken over by the Government. The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in his statements with regard to the collision which occurred near Longue Pointe and the grounding of two or three other steamers elsewhere. But I think the hon. gentleman might state this also: that the season was an exceptional one. The waters in all the lakes and rivers of Canada were very low. Notwithstanding this fact, vessels in Montreal were loaded as if the depth of water was that of an ordinary season. The result was that some vessels grounded, I am glad to say without any great damage being done to them. During seasons when the water is lower than usual, a little precaution might be exercised in the direction of loading vessels less than usual. The hon. gentleman states that we may have to deepen the channel, and that we do not know what it will cost. The Government have not undertaken that responsibility, and the hon. gentleman is, I think, a little too much frightened about it. I do not believe there will be any necessity for that for some time to come. Last year was an exceptional season, as the water was very low. Vessels have passed up and down there drawing 25 feet of water. Prudent men will not load their vessels to the full depth, because it is quite possible that there might be a boulder or something in the way which might be carried into the channel in the spring. If any such occurrence should be reported to us, of course we would send a dredge there at once, but I do not think we need apprehend the necessity of deepening that channel more than it has been deepened. The money we have been expending is to complete the work of straightening the channel, and for deepening at Cap à la Roche and Cap Charles. There may be work at some other places, but this was the work included in the estimate made at the time.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Montreal will be thankful to the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) for the anxiety he has shown about the channel between Montreal and Quebec. I may call my hon. friend's attention to the fact, that although two or three slight accidents occurred last season when the water was very low, hundreds of steamers have gone through that channel without accident. I know for a fact that vessels have been loaded to twenty-seven and a half feet, and have gone safely through the channel. The only thing which remains to be done now, will be to remove some boulders which may get into the channel by the action of the ice in the spring, and, perhaps, straighten some parts of the channel where it is needed. The deepening of the channel so far has proved quite a success, and I am sure the shipping interest is well satisfied with the work that has been done.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I do not deserve the compliment that the hon. gentleman has paid me, as I did not intend to champion the interests of the harbor of Montreal, for I know that there are gentlemen here better qualified to do that than I am, and I wished simply to defend the interests of the public treasury. I want to know how much it is going to cost to have a good channel between Quebec and Montreal? The hon. Minister of Public Works has, on two or three occasions, made use of an expression which is rather perplexing to me. He stated it would cost $250,000 to carry out the works contemplated by the Harbor Commissioners, when last year they handed over the channel to the Government. What were these works so contemplated by the Harbor Commissioners? The Commissioners were very economical, and rightly so, because they had to take out of the shipping going to Montreal the expenditure for deepening the channel, and they did it as cheaply as it possibly could be done; but will the Government be as economical as the Harbor Commissioners had been? Will they confine themselves to carrying out simply those improvements which were proposed by the Commissioners? I am very much afraid they will not. If we consider that portion of the channel opposite Longue Pointe where a terrible calamity took place last year, involving great loss of life and money, we know that the Harbor Commissioners never intended any improvement to that portion of the channel, and I think the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), in whose county that portion of the river is, will not contradict me in this. I am very much afraid that the Government will be called on to make some improvement there and if so they cannot do it out of the $250,000. That is why I fear we shall not rest at the expenditure mentioned last year.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The collision between the two steamers at Longue Pointe was purely an accident, and it was admitted on all sides that there was no more danger there than there would be to two steamers passing each other upon the ocean. That accident might as well have happened on the Atlantic as on the river. It has been established that there was sufficient depth of water there, and that the channel was wide enough to allow two or even three steamers to pass at a time, but it was a pure accident, which might have happened anywhere. Nobody considers that it will be necessary to change the whole channel in front of Longue Pointe because of an accident which may not happen once in forty years.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). According to the decision of the Harbor Commissioners, before whom the two pilots were brought, the accident was due simply to the bad channel, and not to any imprudence or negligence of the pilots, who were both acquitted. The hon. gentleman knows, as well as I do, that the two pilots were acquitted on the ground that there was no blame attached to them, and if that be so, where was the difficulty?

Mr. DESJARDINS. The blame ought to be attributed elsewhere. I think there was a change made in some of the beacons, or something like that, which deceived the pilots.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). It was proved before the Harbor Commissioners and the Admiralty Court at Quebec, that the whole trouble was because of the dangerous nature of the channel, and the sharp curves which it takes there. It was a very serious accident, involving the loss of several lives, as well as £100,000 sterling. If accidents of that kind are to be avoided, a very large expenditure must be incurred.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The explanations given by the hon. Minister are all very well as far as they go, but he has avoided giving the explanations with reference to the expenditure on the river between Montreal and Quebec. Last year, when this question was up, it was pointed out by some hon. members on this side of the House that, in addition to the amount assumed by the Government for what had already been expended, there would undoubtedly be a very large annual expenditure. The hon. Minister of Public Works took exception to that view, and told us that the work would be finished, that the appropriation then made was ample for the purpose, and that the current would keep the river clear. Now it seems that so far from that being the case, we are asked to vote a very large sum. I find by the Public Accounts that we spent $243,000 last year. We have before us a very bald report from the Harbor Commissioners, respecting the deepening of the channel between Montreal and Quebec. I venture to say that this is a very unsatisfactory position to have that work in. If we are to be called on every year for a large appropriation for that work, we ought to know it. If the view of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) is correct, that that part of the river has to be straightened, at such an expense as he intimates, it is better that the House should understand it at once; because it is evident that the Minister knew very little about the matter last year, and if he knows no more this year than he has explained to the Committee, he is not in possession of very much more information to-day. I should like the hon. gentleman, if he can, to give me, either now or on a future day, the amount of receipts and expenditures on the graving dock at Quebec last year, which I cannot find in the Auditor General's Report. With regard to this item under discussion, I think we should have some assurance, on which we could rely, from the Minister of Public Works, that the amount he now asks is a finality, because, if we are to have such a vote every year, this work will land us in a very heavy expenditure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid my hon. friend has not followed exactly what I said, and I will tell him how the matter stands. The amount we asked last year, $100,000, the $50,000 we are asking this year, and $100,000 which we may have to ask next year or the year following, will complete the works as intended by the Harbor Commissioners. I cannot state what amount will be required every year to keep the works in order, but it cannot be a large amount. We shall probably require a dredge or two in the spring to clear the channel of boulders deposited by the ice and other accumulations, and perhaps one dredge during the remainder of the year. In 1888 there was expended $50,000; in 1889, to the 1st of July, $243,000; for 1890, to the 31st of December last, it was $67,962—that is, out of the $100,000 voted by Parliament;—so that we have about $33,000 remaining, which, with the $50,000 we are asking for now, will give us a sufficient sum to carry on the work to the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is, about $360,000 expended. The hon. gentleman will remember that his estimate last year was very much less than that. He was indignant that we should take exception to his statement last year. He said that he had all his information from his engineers, and he gave us a positive assurance, and if the House cannot rely on the information given by such a painstaking member of the Government as the hon. Minister of Public Works, it shows that very little reliance can be placed on ministerial statements in the future. It is evident from what the hon. gentleman himself admits, that he was not last year in possession of such information as should justify him in informing the House in the positive manner he did.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman may have misunderstood me, but I made the same statement then that I make now. So far as I know the hon. gentleman, my statement is worth as much as his. If I make a mistake in a statement, it is not done willingly; the hon. gentleman should know that, and he has no right to suppose that I should attempt to deceive the House. I have been long enough in Parliament to expect not to be treated in that way by the hon. gentleman; I expect better treatment from him.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The Hansard will show.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I say that the estimate of the Harbor Commissioners is $250,000 to complete the work, and it is impossible to say what amount will be required annually to clear the channel after the spring freshets. The channel at Longneuil was considered and is still considered good. There was no grounding of the vessels in the channel, but there was a collision, and the Admiralty Court at Quebec, found that one of the vessels was at fault, and mulcted its owners in a very large sum of money for damages to the hull of the other. That has been appealed from to the Privy Council, and the judgment there will finally decide who was in fault. But in so far as the channel was concerned, I have not heard that it is not as good as ever. If the Harbor Commissioners had stated that the pilots had not been in fault they would have condemned themselves, but I have not heard that they did so, before this evening.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman has gone out of his way very unjustly to take exception to the extremely mild and moderate criticism of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones). He must not suppose that in administering the Public Works Department, and expending enormous sums of money yearly, he is beyond criticism. Surely we have the right, not only to criticise the votes he asks for, but to recall his statements of previous years with reference to the same votes. When these works were taken over from the Montreal Harbor Commissioners, we stated on this side that Canada was involving itself in a large expenditure, and in the opinion of my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Langelier) that expenditure was hardly justified. The Minister of Public Works, however, assured the House that, after spending some $250,000 in purchasing the plant and work of the Harbor Commissioners, the deepening of the harbor in the manner contemplated by the Commissioners and set out in the report submitted to the House, would not cost over $200,000. On that statement, he received the first instalment of $100,000; and he now says he will require $50,000 or $60,000 this year, and probably $100,000 next year. The hon. gentleman should be called to account for that. He did not speak without the book last year, but he read from his book and gave all the details, which made up a total of $200,000. On page 217 of the Hansard will be found his explanation in detail. He then stated that $200,000 would complete the work, and that it was not the intention of the Government to deepen the channel more than 27½ feet, which was the depth contemplated by the Harbor Commissioners. For a painstaking Minister, the hon. gentleman seems to be enormously out in his calculation. Either he or his engineer has blundered. I have been accustomed heretofore, when the hon. gentleman read from his book, to place some reliance on his estimates, but if he is proved not only wrong in his estimates, but loses his temper when the error is brought home to him, I must confess to losing faith in the hon. gentleman. Here is a trifle of $60,000 in which he is out in this matter, and I only hope that the country will get clear by the expenditure of another $100,000, which I very seriously doubt.

Esquimaux Graving Dock.....$12,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. From the 30th June, 1881, the amount paid was $1,058,471. In 1888 we expended $90,000; in 1889, $7,900; in 1890, $7,150. Now the amount asked for is $12,000. The engineer says that this vote is to make provision for substituting iron gates, at an estimated cost of $12,000.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What were the receipts last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think about $18,000 or $20,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does this complete the work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Public Buildings—Nova Scotia.....$23,000

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the claims of Dartmouth to a post office. It is a place of 6,000 or 7,000 people, and which gives a revenue of nearly $1,700, and the building where the post office is kept is in a wretched condition. Considering the size of the place, the people are entitled to a respectable building. Perhaps I should not advocate the claims of Dartmouth so much, as they have always cast a big majority against me, but my duty compels me to bring this matter to the notice of the hon. gentleman. It is a place more entitled to a public building, than many of the small places, not only in my Province, but in other parts of the Dominion, which have buildings, and I hope the hon. Minister will take a note of this, and be able to make some provision in the Supplementary Estimates for it.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to this question of erecting post offices, we had quite a lengthy discussion last year. I think it is high time the Government should lay down some rule by which they would be guided in erecting post offices. If you take up the items of public buildings, you will find that there are several places in this Dominion the receipts of which are far in excess of what are had at points where post offices are being built. The Annapolis post office receipts amounted to $2,026.85; the Dalhousie post office receipts were $1,123, and there are eighty places in the Province of Ontario alone where the receipts are from $2,000 to $2,500 and some over $3,000. In the town in which I live the receipts are over $3,600, and there is no talk of a post office. In Harriston, the receipts are $3,200, and there is no post office. There ought to be some system laid down that, when a place contributes to the public revenue a sum of say $4,000 or $5,000 a year, or in excess of that, it should become entitled to the erection of a public post office, but the system of the Government peddling round patronage in this way in order to gain political support and make political capital for the moment, is not creditable to the Government, but very discreditable. In view of the financial embarrassments of the country, and the difficulties which this Dominion has to contend with, having an annual expenditure of about $40,000,000 altogether, I say that the expenditure of $25,000 or $30,000 on the erection of a post office in a place where the receipts are only $1,150 or $2,000, or about that amount, is an evidence of gross extravagance and recklessness on the part of the Government. There should be some principle laid down that when the receipts in any place reach a certain amount, that place should be entitled to a public building, and not otherwise.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has accused the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), of urging the Government to what he has just designated an act of gross extravagance. I recently heard the senior member advocating the erection of a post office in the town of Dartmouth. I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General to that a year or two ago, and I was told that the income did not warrant the expenditure which I urged, and I now find that the hon. gentleman who sits by the side of my hon. colleague says that the Government would not be warranted in erecting a post office in the town of Dartmouth.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say so.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman says that the Government is guilty of gross extravagance if it erects a post office in a place where the post office receipts are only $1,000 or $2,000 a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. I said that some system should be established.

Mr. KENNY. I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, but I understood him to say what I have stated. It unfortunately happens that, in the town where my hon. colleague and myself are advising the Government—in the public interest of course—to erect a building, the income does not reach the figures which the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), in his wisdom, tells the Government it should reach before any building should be erected. I think the Government would be quite warranted in erecting a building at Dartmouth, and my hon. colleague (Mr. Jones) has placed before the House very reasonably and fairly the claims of that town to a building. I hope, when it is erected, if it is erected, the building will be of sufficient dimensions to include a post office savings bank. The people there very much desire it. Dartmouth is a place which is growing in importance, and in material wealth, as well as in its admiration and devotion to this Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt that, if the hon. gentleman brings his powerful influence to bear upon the Government, he may succeed in getting the building, more especially if he shows that the place of which he speaks is becoming more devoted to the Government of the day. He would stand a far better chance of securing it, however, if my hon. friend here (Mr. Jones) had not suggested it at all. If it had come altogether from the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Kenny), I have no doubt he would have secured it; but, as the suggestion came from my hon. friend (Mr. Jones), the Government are not likely to grant it.

Mr. KENNY. Not if they take your advice.

Mr. McMULLEN. I repeat that it is wrong that the Government should peddle round their patronage in regard to the erection of post offices in every small, petty, miserable place where the receipts are not more than $1,500 a year, and should leave places with receipts of $3,000 and $4,000 a year unprovided for. My hon. friend by my side (Mr. Jones, Halifax) is perfectly justified in asking for the erection of the post office of which he has spoken. If money is to be squandered, it may just as well be squandered in that little town as well as in any other little place. But other places which are becoming trade centres have no public buildings erected there. The convenience of the public is overlooked, I suppose, because they are in constituencies which do not send members here to support the Government. Why is it that Woodstock, with receipts of $7,000 a year, has not had a post office till recently, while you find places like Joliette and St. Jérôme—small places where the receipts are practically nothing—have public buildings erected there. One of these places happens to be in the constituency of the Secretary of State, where the receipts are only about $1,200, and another is erected in some other place, and these buildings are placed there with a view, if possible, to secure the kindly feeling of the people of that section, so that they may send men here to support the Government. That is why they peddle these post offices around the country, and I say it is a disgrace to any Government to act in that way.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was afraid just now that the Government would spend money on a dry dock at some other place than Halifax, and now he wants to have a post office erected in a small suburb of that city. I do not think that there is a Custom house in Dartmouth, or an Inland Revenue office. We had this matter talked over last year, and it is certainly objectionable that in these very small towns, which are made up, for the most part, of wooden shanties, the Government should erect these massive buildings of brick and stone. The hon. gentleman has justified the expenditure on these buildings on the ground that the Government are creating things of beauty, which would remain a joy forever in the country, but the fact is that the contrast between the buildings erected by the Government and those which surround them, leaves a very unfavorable impression.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I see there is nothing in the Estimates for the buildings at Lunenburg, where the Government purchased the site four years ago. When I first came here, the reason given was that the Government could not perform all these works at once, but I see that the Minister has passed this over again, and, unless he provides for it in the Supplementary Estimates, the people of Lunenburg will have to do without a post office for another year. I beg to call the attention of the Minister to this matter, and he brings down the Supplementary Estimates provision will be made for it. In the discussion last year the Minister assured us that appropriations were made without regard to politics, and if that be so, I think he must be convinced that the town of Lunenburg has some claim upon the Government for aid. The ground has been lying idle for three or four years, while the business of the town has been growing very rapidly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before leaving this item, I wish to remind the hon. gentleman that three years ago when the post office in Charlottetown was finished, the citizens extended the public gardens, which surround the public buildings, to the Dominion post office, and the gardens have been kept for the last two or three years at the expense of private citizens. We have never asked or received any public aid. These gardens are very handsome, and contribute to the health and beauty of the city. A very large requisition was forwarded to the hon. gentleman's Department, praying him to take down the wooden boards which were put around those grounds, and afterwards erect something in the nature of a fence. I went myself to the Public Works Department and saw the chief architect. I asked him if he had received that petition, and he said he had, and also that he had a report from Mr. Harris, his local engineer, on the matter, and that it would be attended to at once. I accepted that statement, and I think, if I am not mistaken, that he sent a letter to me to that effect. But I am positive that he made that distinct declaration to me, after consulting with the head of the Department. Last year the Minister stated in a casual way that the matter would be attended to. The year went by, and the ugly wooden boarding remains there as a disgrace to the Government and a disfigurement to the grounds. No attempt has been made to put up the fence, and I cannot understand how it is that this gross act of neglect continues, and that the word of the chief architect has been distinctly broken in the matter. The citizens were very much annoyed about it. The square is right in the centre of the city, and this thing is worse than an eyesore. After I received the promise of the chief architect, I wrote to the mayor of the city and to the chairman of the citizens committee, informing them that the matter would be attended to at once. When I went home I was asked several times how it was I had written this letter, and that the matter had not been attended to, and all I could reply was that the Department had given me their solemn pledge that it would be done, and that I would make enquiry when I came up here. It is a small matter, and would not cost over a couple of thousand dollars, if it cost one thousand. It is too bad that, in the capital city of the Province we have been obliged, for three years, to submit to this ugly fence, which is a disfigurement to the gardens, an eyesore to the public, and a disgrace to the Government. I hope the hon. gentleman will give this his consideration. I want to be able to write down and say something to the citizens at an early date, so that for the coming season we will not be subjected to the annoyance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will take note of it.

Mr. LAURIER. I wish the hon. gentleman would also take note of the complaint made by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer).

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have done so. I have seen the hon. gentleman, and told him what I would do. The hon. gentleman is aware that in the ordinary estimates we only ask appropriations for works that are already begun. If there is anything for Lunenburg it will be put in the supplementaries.

Mr. LAURIER. The fact that the Government purchased the ground three years ago is an admission that a building is needed, and is a promise that it will be erected.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I make no promises.

Mr. LAURIER. What, then, means the Minister's reference to the Supplementary Estimates, if there is no promise?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not want to be told by the hon. gentleman that I have made a promise. I have made no promise. All I say is that the hon. member who represents Lunenburg has spoken to me about it, and I told him that I would submit the matter to my colleagues. Therefore, if anything is given, it will be put in the Supplementary Estimates, and it cannot be put elsewhere.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we have had this same subject for discussion for three or four years in succession. It does seem to me that the House has in a large measure abdicated its functions and transferred its authority to the Government of the day. Now, on questions of public policy, it is the business of the House to determine, and it is the business of the Government to administer, the public policy, whatever it may be. We have a right to find fault with them if they do not administer it honestly and efficiently. To determine what shall be the policy in matters of this kind, is clearly within the province of the House and not within the province of the Government. Now, it is the right of the Government, in the exercise of matters of patronage, to appoint those to office whom they may think proper, for the purpose of carrying their measures into effect, and for the purpose of administering the law; but it never can be assumed, without a gross abuse of authority, that it is any part of the patronage of the Government to regulate the public expenditure with reference to the political complexion of the various sections of the country. We are all contributors in the same way to the public revenue. Those electors throughout the country who return hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, are as much contributors to the public revenue, and as much entitled to derive benefits from it, as those who return hon. gentlemen opposite. This House, in the discharge of its public duties, ought to decide this question with respect to the erection of public buildings, that public buildings should be erected in localities which contribute most largely to the public revenue. That is the rule which should bind hon. gentlemen opposite when they have a majority in this House, and bind hon. gentlemen on this side if they should take the place of hon. gentlemen opposite. As regards the expenditure of public money in the erection of public buildings, we all stand on a footing of equality, and it is a most improper proceeding for hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to erect public buildings in places contributing small amounts to the public revenue, and leaving places which make large contributions wholly unprovided for. Before this House separates, unless some other hon. member does so, I shall feel it my duty to propose to the House for its adoption this proposition: that places contributing the largest sum to the public revenue, whether Customs, Inland Revenue or Post Office, should first be provided for, and then it would be proper for the House to see, in so far as the public resources would permit, that that policy is honestly carried out by the Administration. When we come to adopt that rule we shall have a more healthy condition of public sentiment than perhaps we have at this moment. I am making no charge at this moment against the Administration; I am simply stating what would be a proper rule of public policy and one which this House should adopt, and one which this House should see that the Administration of the day, whtever may compose it, honestly and fairly carried out.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. gentleman is exactly correct in the rule he desires to lay down, and that it would have invariably good results. The hon. gentleman is aware that in important towns in the West, where, judging by the population and the business done, the people are entitled to have a post office erected, the Government find it convenient to rent a suitable building, and do not erect a public building there. In some places, on the other hand, it is impossible to obtain a suitable building without paying too high a price, and the Government are then justified in making a considerable outlay for the purpose of procuring the necessary accommodation for the public. If the hon. gentleman imputes motives to the Government in erecting these buildings, and suggests that they are erected for the purpose of strengthening the hands of the Government, I say that if the hon. gentleman will only look at the course pursued by his friends in Ontario, he will find that the expenditure of public money for colonisation or other purposes is invariably made with the object of strengthening their hands.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is a bad rule, whoever follows it.

Public Buildings—New Brunswick.... $6,500

Mr. McMULLEN. On what principle did the Government decide to erect a post office at Dalhousie, N.B., where the receipts amounted to only $1,153 last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government thought a post office should be erected there, and submitted the question to the House and the House agreed to it. A contract was carried out, and we required $5,000 more to complete the work.

Mr. McMULLEN. What did you allow for rent?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I do not know.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Postmaster General's Report he will find that $40 was allowed for the rent of a building. How much does the Minister propose to expend on the construction of the building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $23,000. We have expended $11,977; there was a balance due on 1st December of $6,600, and these sums, with $5,000, will complete the building.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Government had a post office rented for $40. They have decided to erect a building to cost $23,000, the interest on which, at 4 per cent., will amount to $920 a year. We are receiving $1,153 revenue, out of which we are paying $450 to the postmaster and $80 for allowances. So that the net revenue is only $600, and yet we are going to erect a post office, the interest on which, at 4 per cent., will cost $920. I desire to draw the Minister's attention to two or three places in my riding where public buildings are required. At Mount Forest there is a postal revenue of $3,384, but no post office building. The sum of $160 is allowed as rent for a post office, which is a very small amount considering the excellent accommodation obtained. Harriston, another town in my riding, has a postal revenue of $3,189. Let the hon. gentleman make a note of these facts. It might assist the Government, politically, to erect public buildings in these two important towns, and I am perfectly willing to jeopardise my political prospects if the Government will erect these buildings, at a cost of say $23,000 each. I fully endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It is time this House should define the principles that should be adopted by the Government in the erection of post offices throughout the country. An understanding should be made to the effect that towns contributing largely to the revenue should have the first claim for public buildings.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has spoken simply of a post office at Dalhousie. The building will also contain a Customs house and examining warehouse. Some other sum, therefore, should be added to the $40 rent mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMULLEN. We would be very glad if the hon. gentleman, when he erects post offices in the towns I have indicated, would add Customs houses and other additions. I should like to know what the total Customs house revenue of Dalhousie was last year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $4,900.

St. John Dominion Building.....$1,500.

Mr. ELLIS. I wish to call the attention of the Government to a matter which does not, perhaps, come exactly under this item. Last year there was a vote of $650 for the Fredericton post office, and I find that there was expended on repairs on the said post office $1,130 or thereabouts. There were two gentlemen employed as clerks of works, and three rooms were plastered and fitted up in the building at a cost of seven or eight hundred dollars. A sum of $330 was paid to the clerks of works to superintend that expenditure. I find that one of them, who is a very near relative to the sitting member for the county, got $200 and another $100. It does appear to me that $330 is a very large sum to pay for superintending the fitting up of two or three rooms in that post office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think that must have been taken out of some vote specially made for that last year.

Mr. ELLIS. I call attention to page 175 D of the Auditor General's Report, which states that $1,129 was expended in repairs on the Fredericton post office. $330 went to the clerks of works, leaving about $800 of actual expenditure on improvements to the building.

Public Buildings—Quebec..... $91,800

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). This seems to be a very large amount compared with last year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The buildings did not require so much last year.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Perhaps it may be owing to the change made in the clerk of works. There was a very good superintendent of works below Quebec some years ago, and a very good supporter of the Government also, yet I understand, that, for reasons completely unknown, he received a letter stating that his services were no longer required. I refer to Mr. Joseph Garneau, of Quebec. To his great surprise he discovered that a gentleman named Lépine was employed to superintend the works in his place. I do not think there was ever any reproach against Mr. Garneau, and the only reproach I had against him was that he was a very strong Tory. His ability to superintend the work, or his honesty, I do not think were even questioned by anybody. Rumors in Quebec alleged that Mr. Lépine was appointed to superintend the works at the demand of some of the contractors who were not satisfied with Mr. Garneau. The public were very well satisfied with Mr. Garneau, but it appears the contractors were not, and they asked that he should be superseded. I cannot say for Mr. Lépine what I said for Mr. Garneau. I will not say any more, but I will confine myself to stating that public opinion does not give him the same character as it does to Mr. Garneau.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is there any increase in the number of employes at Grosse Ile ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not aware of any. With reference to what the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) has said, I may tell him that he is mistaken. Mr. Garneau was appointed clerk of works for the building of the immigrant sheds, and when that work was completed, his services not being required, he was discharged, as is done in every other case.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). If I am not misinformed he was employed to superintend some works below Quebec.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). If he had given satisfaction there was no reason to discontinue him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We had no complaint against Mr. Garneau, but as he was employed for a special work, when that work was finished his services were dispensed with. We do that in every case.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). What strong recommendation had Mr. Lépine to be appointed. I have known Mr. Lépine for several years, and the last qualification I would attribute to him would be any knowledge of the work he was appointed to superintend. He has been employed in different capacities, changing very frequently. He has never been very long at anything, and I never heard that those who employed him were ever satisfied. Why he was employed to superintend the Government work, is more than I can understand. If no other explanation is given by the Minister I shall be compelled to take the one stated in Quebec, and which I heard from several parties, that he was appointed to superintend at Percé and elsewhere at the particular request of the contractors.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is not so.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like that the Minister should tell us the amount expended on these works last year, because if we look at the Auditor General's Report, we find that a much larger sum has been spent than the small amount of $500 would imply. If the Minister has the information, perhaps he will give it to us, then we shall be able to tell whether this man Lépine has been performing the work efficiently or not. We find from the Auditor General's Report that moneys have been paid for services rendered as far back as the year 1881. What I want to obtain is a detailed statement of the expenditure from July, 1889, up to the present time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In 1888 we expended $3,829.28 ; in 1889, $2,230.13, and in 1890, $499.69.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). If $499 was all that was required to keep the quarantine in proper condition during last year, the Minister must certainly have some detailed statement to show why he is asking $2,500 for this year. Perhaps he can tell us whether the clerk of the works is to have a better salary or not. These clerks of works are peculiar officials ; they are well paid, and they get paid for Sundays as well as for week days.

Mr. CURRAN. I am glad to know that the hon. Minister of Public Works is accused of having been too extravagant in regard to these clerks of works, especially in regard to the person with whom my hon. friend from Quebec Centre is acquainted. My experience, however, has been quite the reverse, for I am sorry to say that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has been exceedingly parsimonious. I know a case of a very deserving gentleman who is extremely competent, as the hon. Minister knows very well, and I could not get him kept on for a week after the work was hardly completed ; in fact, I tried my level best to have this gentleman kept on, for I felt that he would be required in a few weeks again, but I did not succeed. I am glad to know, however, that there is a tender spot in the hon. Minister's heart, and I hope that the generosity that flows therefrom will not be entirely towards the friends of the hon. member for Quebec Centre, but that some of it will be towards the friends of the member for Montreal Centre. I trust that he will see whether the services of this man Lépine cannot be dispensed with, and some efficient man from Montreal put in his place.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am glad we have a deputy Minister of Public Works who is ready to give us the information which we have been unable to extract from the Minister himself. I must congratulate my hon. friend on having an eye to the boots of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and I have no doubt that when he takes that position he will keep his clerks of works on after the works are completed, but I am sorry that the friend of my hon. friend from Quebec Centre will have a very poor chance, because the hon. gentleman already announces his intention to have him removed to make way for a friend of his own. But the hon. gentleman did not give us the detailed statement I asked for, and I must again ask for it from the Minister.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was surprised to hear the hon. member from Montreal Centre say that he was not able to influence the hon. Minister of Public Works to keep a friend of his in employment. We know that he exercises a very powerful influence in securing the dismissal of some who are employed. Last year, a very noted case was brought before this House of two gentlemen who were dismissed because they voted against the hon.

gentleman. Therefore I am rather surprised to hear him now make the confession that he does.

Mr. CURRAN. It is really too bad, after an explanation has been given in this House over and over again, and the utter lack of truth has been shown in a charge of this kind, by affidavits filed with the Department and placed on record in Hansard, that a member of this House, who after all is supposed to be a gentleman, should again reiterate this old slander. If it came from any one else, it might make some effect on me; but, really, the position of the gentleman who has made this attack on me is so small in the opinion of the vast majority of the members of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CURRAN. I say he has no right to make this charge against me, and no gentleman would do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is to be the entire cost of the Joliette post office?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $25,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Would the hon. Minister give us some information with regard to the receipts at that particular point?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $2,691.

Laprairie Post Office.....$5,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the cost of that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will cost less than $20,000 altogether.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the receipts?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $587.29.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). What is the population?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In 1881, the population of the town was 1,341. It may be about 2,000 now; and the population of the parish was 1,840.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). That is a very fine building for a small population. There must be some exceptional circumstances that warrant this expenditure, or we will have to conclude that the hon. gentleman intended to benefit some political supporters. I would like to have information that such is not the case, for if the impression should go abroad that the Government are influenced by political considerations in the construction of public works, it will have a very injurious effect on the Government, and I am sure the hon. the Minister of Public Works is anxious that such should not be the case, and that he should enjoy the high appreciation of his fellow-citizens.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This building is erected for the good of the people. That county is represented by an hon. gentleman who sits on the opposite side of the House and votes with my hon. friends opposite. But, notwithstanding that, as we thought the building was required for that district, we gave it.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The people of Laprairie have shown public spirit. They offered the site themselves, and although the permanent population is not very large, in summer Laprairie is quite a watering place and quite a number of people go there, so that something better than the poor room that was formerly used is required for a post office.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). There is another reason which induced the Government to incur this expenditure. There have been two local elections during two years, and another is expected shortly. That peculiar circumstance explains the transaction.

Mr. GUAY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am not so amiable in the eyes of the hon. Minister of Public Works as the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Doyon), because if I have understood the hon. Minister aright, I believe that he said that it is thanks to the demands of that hon. member that he has finally decided to make so considerable an outlay in that village. If it is really for the beaux yeux of the member for Laprairie that such an expensive post office is given his county, I regret very much that I am not so amiable as he is, because I represent one of the most important towns in the Province, having a population of 10,000 souls. The hon. Minister will admit that I have often endeavored to convince him that the town of Lévis ought to have its post office, and its Custom house. If the hon. Minister would find me as amiable as my colleague of Laprairie he would put into the Supplementary Estimates to be brought before the House in a few days, a sufficient sum to erect a building worthy of the town of Lévis and of the Government.

Mr. DESJARDINS. (Translation.) And of the member for the county.

Montreal Dominion Buildings.....$15,000

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works if he is going to do anything towards deepening the channel of the Miramichi river this year. I have tried in vain for the last two Sessions to get the hon. gentleman to do justice to the county I have the honor to represent. He makes fair promises, and then writes down to the people who oppose me in my county to tell them that they do not want anything such as I recommend. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that the system of navigation, which has been so much improved by the deepening of the river, has been arrested for the last two years, because I oppose the Government. They have in every way shown their animus, even in the advertisements given to the papers. They do not send advertisements to the Herald—the same as they do to the Gazette.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Although it is a much better paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. A mighty sight better paper. There is some life in the Herald. It gives you an account, and an accurate account, of what occurs in the caucuses of the Government, and yet the gentlemen on the Government side of the House refuse to send their advertisements to the only live paper in Montreal—I mean the only live English paper in Montreal. I say to the hon. Minister, for whom I have great respect.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. MITCHELL. I refer to the hon. Minister of Public Works, for whom I have great respect.

Mr. WELSH. That is more than I have.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may tell my hon. friend that I have great respect for the Minister of Public Works, though he is in damned bad company.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is that you say?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Mr. MITCHELL. What expression? "damned!"—I withdraw it. It seems to me that the Chairman is putting on a good deal of side in this matter. However, I withdraw the expression, and now I am in order again. I have a grievance in regard to the deepening of the channel of the Miramichi River, which the hon. gentleman has heard me speak of before, and, with his facility of expression, he has replied that he would consider it, and so on; but it has never been done. I take this opportunity of saying to him that I think he will promote the passage of his estimates if he will simply say to me now that he will look into the matter, and will do what is right. I know that when he says he will do what is right, he will do so; and he knows that I have pointed out to him before that that channel should be deepened, and he has admitted that to be a necessity. I think my hon. friend will agree to this. If he says he will have that river properly attended to, I have no doubt he will. The dredges were only removed because the man who opposed me said it was not necessary to keep them there, and that was for the purpose of defeating me at the next general election, but I do not think that is very near. We will have two Sessions before that. The old sorcerer, as my hon. friend on this side called him the other night, will not have the election before that. If my hon. friend will say that he will have the Miramichi River deepened, I will allow this item to be carried.

Mr. DESJARDINS. What is the item?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is one that affords an opportunity for me to call attention to a matter which has been neglected more than any other in this Dominion.

Mr. WELSH. I beg your pardon; that is not true.

Mr. MITCHELL. And what for? Because I have opposed hon. gentlemen, and yet I supported them the other day when Sir John Thompson's resolution came up. I tell them there was a time, when Mackenzie's Government was in power, when they refused to pay a poor widow woman $40 for her cow, and for forty days I fought them, and I made them pay that widow for her cow. If this Government does not do what is right and fair, I tell the hon. the Minister of Public Works, for whom I have a great amount of respect, though he is associated with such a lot of—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will not say what, because they will call me to order. I tell the hon. gentleman that unless he deepens this channel—I think he is an honest man—he had better beware. He had better do what is right in deepening that channel, or I will not say what I will do. I have a lot of claims, some five or six of them, amounting in all to some $1,400 or $1,500, for damages sustained by people on the Derby branch of the Intercolonial Railway, and I now give the Government warning. There was a time when I had more vigor and more enterprise than I have to-day, and the Government and these Grits who are around me refused to do justice to the claims I presented, and stated they would not pay them or inquire into them. Now, in regard to these three or four claims which I have, if they are not paid, there will be another cow case before these Estimates get through. I do not see the Minister of Railways here to-night, but I hope the Minister of Public Works will tell his chief that if he does not pay these claims, he will have another cow case which will occupy three or four weeks before these Estimates get through.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Is this amount of $1,250 for the electric lighting, extensions and alterations to the Montreal Post Office intended to provide for the Government taking upon themselves the lighting of that building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; it is for the usual work and requirements of the postal service, as recommended by the mechanical engineer.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the entire amount paid annually to the Gazette for the purpose of producing electric light there?

Mr. MITCHELL. They cannot pay too much to the Gazette.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contract was laid before the House last year, I do not remember now exactly what it is.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does this add in any way to the contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; but if we require more lamps, or if the lamps get broken, we must pay for that separately from the contract, and we must pay the man who looks after the lamps. The contract is to give us so many lamps at such a price.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Gazette supports the Government, and you cannot pay too much to the Gazette. I want to say that unless the Minister of Railways deals with the question of the few claims I have, I am just going to raise Cain in the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister said it was the intention of the Government to increase the number of lights in the Montreal Post Office. I want to know if this increase will add to the increased sum that the Gazette draws for power.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think not. The amount of the contract was a bulk sum. The contract with the Gazette Printing Company was for so much, they were to give us so many lamps, with so much power, and so on. But we find now that the post office requires more lamps, and therefore we had to extend the power in the building and put in new lamps.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). How many more years has the contract to run?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. One year.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many more lights did we use last year than at the time the contract was given?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Gazette has got this contract, and it can get anything it wants. It supports the Administration, it does what it is told, and it has a right to every consideration that the Government can give it. My hon. friend has no right to take an exception to the vote.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec.) It is worth a good deal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think it is worth much myself; still it has a right to all it can get.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many increased lights were used during the last year over the number used under the contract?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I cannot say now. I will take a note of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are you prepared to say that the deepening of the channel of the Miramichi river is going to be continued?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will take a note of it. I will look into the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you say that you will give it your full consideration.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will give it my consideration.

Rivière du Loup (Fraserville) Post Office, Custom House, &c..... $8,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the receipts at this point?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The postal revenue is $2,583; Customs duties, $5,357.

St. Henri Post Office..... $8,000

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice the receipts at this point last year were $1,289.89. What is the entire cost of that post office to-day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. St. Henri is a portion of Montreal now. The postal revenue is $1,445. The post office will cost about $20,000.

St. Hyacinthe Post Office, Custom House, &c..... $8,000

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec.) How much is that post office going to cost?

Mr. MITCHELL. It depends when the election is coming off.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec.) That is a growing town.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the Minister whether he will tell the Minister of Railways that I have presented my claims.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I said I would.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope you will use your influence to get that paid, because if you do not—I don't want to use any threats, but I am on the war-path.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This post office is larger than at other places, because the city is important, and is growing.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary.... $30,500

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This amount includes materials for completing the south dormitories, which are being built by the convicts, and the amounts required for different buildings in connection with the institution.

Committee rose and reported the resolutions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Wednesday).

Mr. MITCHELL.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 26th February, 1890.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ESQUIMALT DRY DOCK.

Mr. PRIOR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed at once with the work of lengthening the dry dock at Esquimalt? If not, whether negotiations are proceeding between the Imperial Government and Dominion Government in regard to the same?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Correspondence is now going on between this Government and the Imperial Government on this subject.

SUPPLIES FOR GOVERNMENT STEAMERS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether tenders were called for by advertisements in various newspapers, last year, for furnishing supplies for the boarding of the employes on the Government steamers La Canadienne, Druid and Napoléon III; who secured the contract, and what were the terms thereof? Is it the intention to call for tenders this year for the same object?

Mr. COLBY. Tenders were not called for by advertisements in various newspapers last year for furnishing supplies for the boarding of the employes on these steamers. Arrangements were made with the masters of the vessels for boarding the employes at the rate of $12 per month for officers, and $10 per month for seamen. It is not the intention to call for tenders this year for this service.

FLOGGING IN STONY MOUNTAIN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1st. Is flogging used as punishment for escape in the penitentiaries of the North-West, and, namely, in Stony Mountain Penitentiary? 2nd. Was a prisoner flogged about one month ago in the penitentiary of Stony Mountain for attempting to escape? 3rd. Had this prisoner only three weeks more of seclusion to undergo? 4th. Was he, two days after having been flogged, declared insane and sent to the Kingston Insane Asylum? 5th. Are there any by-laws and regulations about discipline and punishments inflicted in penitentiaries? 6th. Is flogging one of the punishments inflicted, and in what cases? 7th. Are the regulations made by the Government or by the authorities of each penitentiary? 8th. If these regulations are made by the authorities of each penitentiary, are they submitted to the approbation of the Government? 9th. Is a memorandum of the punishments inflicted kept by the warden of each penitentiary and a report made annually to the Government? 10th. Is it the intention of the Government to define very explicitly all the cases in which flogging can be inflicted in penitentiaries, when it is not inflicted in execution of a judgment of a court of justice?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. 1st. Flogging is not used as a punishment for escape in the penitentiaries. 2nd. I have no knowledge of any prisoner having been flogged about a month ago at Stony Mountain Penitentiary for attempting to escape; I have made enquiries since the hon. gentleman put this question on the paper, to ascertain whether such could be so or not. 3rd. I have no knowledge of the prisoner to whom this question relates. 4th. No prisoner at Stony Mountain has been declared insane and sent to the Kingston Asylum. 5th. There are by-laws and regulations about discipline and punishment inflicted at the penitentiaries. 6th. Flogging is one of the punishments which may be inflicted in certain cases; the hon. gentleman will find the subject dealt with in one of the sections of the Penitentiaries Act of 1886, and many regulations on the subject have since been made which I will bring down for his information if he desires. 7th. The regulations are made under the Penitentiaries Act by the inspector, but with the approval of the head of the Department of Justice, and, as a matter of fact, although this is not required, they have been approved by the Governor in Council. 8th. The regulations are not made by the authorities of the penitentiaries. 9th. A memorandum of the punishments inflicted is kept by the warden of each penitentiary, and a report is made immediately to the Government through the inspector; but I may mention, for the hon. gentleman's information, that it is prescribed in the regulations that, in regard to any case which the warden thinks one for corporal punishment, he is required to take evidence under oath and transmit it to the Department for approval before inflicting the punishment. 10th. It has not been considered necessary to define the cases for flogging more particularly than that it has been done by the regulations.

AID TO ST. SAUVEUR, P.Q.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Whether the Government received any application from the Municipal Council of St. Sauveur, Quebec, or from any of the officials of the said council, asking for aid, after the disastrous conflagration of the month of May last? If so, have the Government come to a decision with reference to said application, and what is the nature of that decision?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An application was received, I believe, from the Municipal Council of St. Sauveur and other parties. The Government have the matter now under consideration.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES INSPECTION FEES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to relieve merchants and others, who use weights and measures, of the fees now charged them for inspecting the same?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is not the intention of the Government to relieve the parties referred to from the fees for inspecting weights and measures, nor has any application been made to that effect.

FEE FOR REGISTERING LETTERS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to reduce the fee now charged for registering letters? If not, why not?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not the intention of the Government to do so, as the present system is working well and no complaints have been received.

INSOLVENCY LAW.

Mr. GUILLET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, this Session, a Bill dealing with insolvency?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce, this Session, a Bill dealing with insolvency.

CORNWALL CANAL.

Mr. BERGIN moved:

1. That on Wednesday, the 17th day of April, 1889, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald presented to the House a return to an Order of the House of the 18th March last past, for plans and surveys of the then proposed Cornwall Canal, by J. B. Mills and Benjamin Wright, Esquires, Civil Engineers, and by Capt. P. Cole, Royal Engineers, in the years 1832, 1833 and 1834; also for surveys and report of Colin Carman, Esq., C.E., of a proposed change of location of Cornwall Canal, from Sand Bridge, through Hoople's Creek to Archibald's Point, with plans, profile and estimates; also reports, plans and surveys made by Mr. Clemas, C.E., in 1826.

2. That embodied in said return, under the signature of John Page, Chief Engineer, and addressed to the Secretary of Railways and Canals, is a letter, which said letter is in the words following:—

“OTTAWA, 28th March, 1889.

“SIR,—It is considered proper to state that the survey of what is called Hoople's Creek and Sand Bridge Gully, Feeder Line, was made a number of years ago, at the request of Dr. Bergin, M.P. for Cornwall.

“When the plan was sent in, it was, I believe, accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost of carrying out the scheme; but the estimate having been mislaid, the resident officer, Mr. Tom S. Rubidge, was requested to furnish a copy, which he did, along with the accompanying letters.

“Relative to this matter, it may be stated that the project appears to have been thoroughly investigated and discussed prior to the works of the Cornwall Canal having been undertaken, fully fifty-five years ago; and, judging from existing circumstances, it does not appear to have been looked upon favorably—a result that very few, if any, of those persons whose aim is solely the interests of canal navigation will be at all likely to regret. For its resuscitation now, so far as access to or egress from the canal is concerned, no reason worthy of the slightest consideration can be assigned, beyond that of allowing more water to enter the canal at about two miles below its upper end, consequently affording the means of drawing from a larger surface area, but it should be borne in mind that the canal under any circumstances, for a considerable distance above lock No. 20 and for the whole distance—4½ miles—below it, is and must continue of the ordinary width so long as economy continues to be an object.

“2. The question of ‘Brazil,’ however interesting in itself, or its effects upon the admission of water at certain times during the winter, has nothing whatever to do with canal navigation, which, it is well known, does not begin until the season for such accumulation is past and closed before it occurs. The question, therefore, seems in a great measure to resolve itself into whether it is better to spend nearly a million of dollars for the purpose of pleasing the member for Stormont and Cornwall, or reserve the money for a purpose where it is certain to be productive of a really serviceable and useful effect.

“This gentleman, I am credibly informed, in a far-fetched, elaborate oration, specially remarkable for length and want of point, occupied the House of Commons for several hours recently in talking about the Cornwall Canal and its projectors, leaving it to be inferred what a very different state of matters would now exist had they possessed a capacity of foresight, having even a very small share of the keen penetration claimed for his long range back-sight.

“Moreover, that defects in my humble self—intensified by obstinacy—have perpetuated and are continuing to eternalise the evils past, present and future, which he looks back upon in such a way as impels him to bring the matter before Parliament, and although of a different nature to the study of the human frame and system, he feels himself no less capable of fixing definitely the proper course that should be adopted by the Government, irrespective of what others may advise.

"It is truly surprising how some men possess facilities for getting at all kinds of knowledge, which others, apparently of fully as large individual capacity, are unable to reach satisfactorily, although assisted by training and experience; still, one occasionally meets a phenomenon of this kind that does not wholly collapse when probed. However, such instances are rare.

"From the worthy Doctor's elevated standpoint and far-searching vision, he perceives that nothing has been done right, and, indeed, never can be done satisfactorily on the Cornwall Canal, until the whole management has been taken out of the hands of the Government and placed solely under his enlightened control, or that of a person like him, who can at once deal with valves, roller plates in the bottom, the whole condition of the gates, working of crabs, effects of chain-winding upon the systems of lockmen, the position or location of the line, entrances, or whatever is necessary to get the whole into shape and keep everything in the best condition.

"I am at a loss to understand in what way I have had the misfortune to incur the ire, or rather to sink so low in the estimation of a person who appears to possess such unusual views of justice, honor, and the characteristics indicated in the speech previously mentioned.

"It may, however, be stated that it is not generally looked upon as a prominent mark of bravery for even a non-combatant officer to attack a person whose hands are tied, or even for a gentleman of the lancet to assail, in the most prominent place possible, the character, professional or otherwise, of one who is absent, or not in a position to answer the charges; still, in all such cases it is presumed that a great deal depends on the sense of justice, honor, and object of the attacking party.

"Before closing this letter it may be stated that the vast array of ancient records examined for the occasion, and the use made of them and kindred all-but-forgotten matters, has a strong resemblance to juggling with the subject for the supposed entertainment of those who had sufficient patience to listen to such a bitter, far-fetched onslaught upon an absent person, who had no more to do with them than the worthy Doctor had to do with framing the original Bill for the reform of Parliament, or with the settlement of the question of the Clergy Reserves.

"It, therefore, seems as if the statements were made under the impression that the declaimer possessed the proverbial advantage enjoyed by the chimney sweep, of being fully secure from retaliation in kind.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN PAGE.

Chief Engineer.

"The Secretary of Railways and Canals."

3. That the said John Page, the writer of the said letter, is a salaried officer of the Department of Railways and Canals, has been many years in the public service, and, therefore, not ignorant of what is due to the dignity of this House and to the consideration and respect due to its members.

4. That the said letter of the said John Page, so presented to this House on the said 17th day of April, 1863, is a scandalous, false and malicious libel upon a member of this House, and a high contempt of the privileges and of the constitutional authority of Parliament.

He said: It will be in the recollection of the House, no doubt, that I took occasion last year to bring before Parliament what I believed to be the errors in connection with the construction and enlargement of the Cornwall Canal. I pointed out what I believed to be a mistake in its location, in the first instance, and afterwards a mistake which I thought was made by the Chief Engineer of Canals. I did this in the discharge of my duty as a member of Parliament who had under his eye this great public work, and who had reason to believe that we stood in the face of a great peril to the trade and navigation of this country. I spoke strongly, perhaps, on the subject, but I spoke strictly within the lines of what I believed to be the truth, and for the purpose of arousing the attention of the Government to the dangerous condition of this great public work. Intentionally, I was not guilty of any discourtesy to the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals. On the contrary, before putting this motion on the paper, I placed myself in communication with him. I told him what papers, reports and plans I required, and was informed by him that he had never seen any such papers, reports or plans, and that none such were in his possession. I told him where they could be found, and, at his request, I forwarded them to him with a most courteous note. After several weeks, when requiring these documents, before making my statement to the House, I visited the Department of Railways and Canals, and asked the Secretary when it would be convenient for him to return to me these documents. He sent a messenger to Mr. Page, and within a few minutes these documents were brought to me by the messenger, and deposited on the table, with this message: That he wished me luck of my old books. This was all the attention he gave the matter. There were several members of Parliament present when this impertinent message was delivered. Instead of making a report upon the statements I had made, which could have been of any value to the country, Mr. Page addressed a libellous letter to the Secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, and had that letter also published in the Ottawa Free Press. I do not intend to draw attention to this any further or to repeat any of the statements made by this gentleman in his letter; but that the House may know that the opinion I gave was not mine alone, but the opinion of all the great engineers in this country and in the United States,—for I have hundreds of letters from them, and from gentlemen engaged in the forwarding trade in this country, who are thoroughly alarmed at the methods which are being pursued,—and to show that it is not a matter which, as Mr. Page says, has been resurrected by me, I will, with the permission of the House, read a short paragraph from a work published by Mr. Kingsford, a very prominent engineer, in 1865, upon the location of this canal:

"On looking at the location of the canal one cannot but be struck at the singular want of judgment in it. In every way it is a striking contrast to that of the Beauharnois. The latter leaves the river bank and strikes boldly for a direct route, curving with a large radius when necessitated to change its course. The former hugs the shore, and curves and winds with it. Some saving may have been made in the cost of the land, but it is a small item compared to the heavy embankments, which this adherence to the river bank necessitated. The consequence is, that very serious breaks have taken place which could only be repaired at great cost. Whether this arose from imperfect and careless construction, or from the very nature of the work, it is difficult to say. But the fact is certain, and it is so far suggestive, that no point in the canal system needs more closely to be watched. In case of war with the United States, a knowledge of this weakness would require that this point should be specially guarded. Some half-dozen men with picks and shovels, opening these embankments, would, in an hour, inflict an injury which it would take months to repair. No such misfortune could occur in any of our other canals; and here, in a military sense, is the weakest point in the whole system; the more unfortunate as, geographically speaking, no canal is so exposed, and as has before been remarked, it will ever be at the mercy of a judiciously planted piece of heavy ordnance discharged from American soil."

With this I shall conclude what I have to say. I do not desire to say one harsh word with regard to the gentleman who wrote this letter, but I desire to repeat the opinion that I expressed last year with regard to the dangerous condition of this canal, which danger has been increased a hundred-fold by the manner in which the work was conducted last year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If I might be allowed to say a few words, I would say that I regret extremely that the letter referred to in the motion ever appeared in the return laid before the House. It is a letter which ought not to have been made an official document at all. It is a letter written by Mr. Page to his superior officer, in which he speaks very strongly, and uses language which, in a public document, is quite inadmissible. He, no doubt, felt wounded by the strong language used by my hon. friend, in the exercise of his duty, in his place in Parliament, but this is not a letter intended for publication. It is not addressed to the House, and in no way can be considered as a breach of the privilege of Parliament. The mistake was made primarily by the officer who selected the papers for the return and included these documents, which he ought not to have done; and, in the second place, I, while acting temporarily in the place of my predecessor in the Railway Department, looked over the return and ought to have withdrawn that paper. All I can say is that I regret that it included that paper, and on behalf of the Department, including myself, I apologise to the hon. gentleman for its having been brought down. I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion.

Mr. BERGIN. With the permission of the House, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MITCHELL. It affords us a great deal of satisfaction to see the discipline which is maintained on that side of the House.

Motion withdrawn.

FREE IMPORTATION OF MINING MACHINERY.

Mr. PLATT moved :

That machinery designed for use in mining operations should not be subject to Customs duty when imported into Canada for mining purposes.

He said : I desire to state that it was not at the instance of any party or parties interested in the introduction of mining material, free of duty, into this country, that I placed this motion on the Order paper. I became aware, on several occasions last year, that efforts were made by parties interested in the importation of mining machinery, to induce the Government to admit that machinery free of duty. I also became aware of the fact, which every hon. member I suppose is aware of, that the mining industry, although at present an infant industry in this country, is just about entering upon a period of development far beyond what many of our people realise. The vast, and, I may say, illimitable mining resources of this country are becoming more and more apparent to the people, and we are looking forward to the day when the mining industry of Canada will be second in importance only to the agricultural industry. When we look over the geological map of this country, and when we contemplate its mineral resources, we cannot but look forward with pleasure to the day when Canada will be par excellence the mining country of the world. I believe it is the duty of the Government, particularly at this time, to give every encouragement to those who are trying to develop those vast resources, and it is that view alone which has induced me to place this motion on the paper. Since I did so, I have discovered that many of my fellow members, especially the representatives from the Province of British Columbia, are likewise deeply interested in the success of the object I have in view. Many of them are from mining districts, some are immediately from those regions where mining operations are carried on; and I have moved this resolution with the object of allowing members to express their opinions on the subject, so that the Government may be enabled to arrive at some definite conclusion in regard to this matter before the Tariff Bill is brought down.

Mr. MARA. I am very glad to see that there are other portions of the Dominion, as well as the Province of British Columbia, agitating in favor of the free admission of mining machinery. There is at present no question of greater importance to our Province than the free admission of mining machinery. Last Session, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Barnard) brought this matter before the House, and clearly proved that the machinery required to treat our refractory ores is not manufactured in the Dominion. He also clearly showed that the manufacturers would not suffer by the free admission of this machinery; that at present mining machinery is practically barred from entering into the Dominion; and that, if it were admitted for two or three years free of duty, the manufacturers would have a much larger market than they have at present. Since last Session the attention of the Minister of Customs has been repeatedly called to this question by the Provincial Government, by the different Boards of Trade, and by the press of the Province, which, although divided on every other subject, is united on this. We cannot understand why that gentleman will not yield to the representations which we have made. We consider that, in a matter affecting the tariff, we have a strong claim upon the Dominion Government. We pay a very large sum yearly into the Dominion Treasury. Last year we paid in Customs duties and Excise, $1,100,000, nearly five times as much as the Province of Prince Edward Island, 50 per cent. more than Manitoba and the North-West Territories combined; and, estimating our population at 100,000, exclusive of Indians, we pay more than twice as much per head as any other Province in the Dominion. In a matter of this kind, affecting an infant industry, we contend that, where we can show that it will not injuriously affect any other industry, the Government ought to yield to so reasonable a request as we have made. Situated as we are, so far from the manufacturing centres of Ontario and Quebec; having to pay a very heavy toll upon all manufactured goods taken into the Province, whether they are from Ontario or from Quebec, from the United States or from England; being, as far as manufactured goods are concerned, consumers rather than producers, the tariff presses heavily upon us. When the National Policy was framed, it was intended to protect every interest and to assist every industry. The farmer of Ontario is protected by the duty on his coarse grains and root crops; the manufacturer of Ontario or Quebec is doubly protected—first, by a high tariff on all goods manufactured in the Dominion, and, secondly, by the admission of such raw material, free of duty, as is required for manufacturing purposes, and is not the product of Canada. The coal-miner of Nova Scotia is protected by a duty of 50 cents and 75 cents a ton on coal; the iron industry of Nova Scotia is also protected by a bounty; but you will look in vain for any single article which is protected for the benefit of British Columbia, and on the free list there is not a single article intended to foster or encourage any industry in that Province. While we are supporters of the National Policy because we believe it is in the interest of the Dominion, and that the whole country has prospered under that policy, and that British Columbia has had its share of prosperity, we also feel that, where one industry is so heavily handicapped, it is the duty of the Government to yield to our remonstrance and remove the duty on that article. Since the discovery of gold on the Fraser River, British Columbia has produced over $50,000,000 of gold. Almost the whole of this has been taken from alluvial diggings. The placer-mining has not been successful, and the miner has devoted his attention to quartz, which will be more permanent, will give employment to a greater number, and be of greater benefit both to the Province and to the Dominion. In prosecuting his search for quartz he has, to a large extent, been successful. Large bodies of low grade ore have been found all over the mainland of British Columbia. In the district of Kootenay, along the line of railway, mining development has been retarded largely owing to the mining belt being practically locked up in a dispute between the two Governments. That, I am happy to say, is settled, and we may soon look for an era of prosperity in that section. But when we take the far-off district of Cariboo, as well as the southern and western district of Kootenay, districts almost inaccessible, far removed from roads and trails, where the cost of transportation is high and living expensive, the miners and prospectors have had many difficulties to contend with. In regard to the southern district of Kootenay, that portion to which I now call the attention of the House, if hon. members will look on the map they will find that it is bounded on the south by the States of Montana, Idaho and Washington, and is only separated from them by an artificial or imaginary boundary line. These States are rich in gold, silver, copper and lead; and the large output of gold and silver from these States has contributed greatly to the wealth of the United States during the past few years. The prospectors of quartz labor under difficulties that the ordinary miner has not to contend with. The miners who are working placer-diggings, or hydraulic mines, can, by their own individual efforts, or aided by mining companies, succeed in working their mines, but with the quartz-miner it is different. It takes years of labor and a large outlay to get a quartz mine successfully opened; and even then the capitalists have to step in before any successful working can be done. In that portion of Kootenay bounded by Montana and Idaho, the topographical features are somewhat similar to those of the States I have mentioned. The formation of rock is the same, and, as might have been expected, the miners, in their march northward across this artificial boundary, have discovered large bodies of low grade ore, and mines which will equal any of those in Colorado, Nevada or Idaho. Last year, in visiting that section of the country, I obtained a list or memorandum of shipments of ore from a few of the mines there. To show the state of development of these mines,

Mr. MARA.

I will read returns of the shipments of ore from that section for 1889:

	Tons.	Oz.
Silver King....	70	230	silver, 20 p.c. copper.
No One.....	146	87	“
Little Donald..	85	90	“ 35 p.c. lead.
Spokane.....	65	40	“ 70 “
Della.....	20	120	“
Sky Line.....	15	225	“
Krao.....	12	95	“ 50 p.c. lead.
Gallagher.....	14	119	“ $14 gold.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose these yields are in each case so much per ton?

Mr. MARA. In each case per ton; and I may say they are authentic. Several of the returns I got from the mine owners, and the others were furnished me by the Gold Commissioners. Now, you will see that these returns are not samples from a few ounces of rock, but returns from shipments of hundreds of tons. It may be said, that where the rock will yield such a large return, there should be no difficulty in procuring machinery or capital necessary to work the mines; and so it would be, if these returns represented the whole of the ore extracted from the mines. But this ore, when run out from the tunnel, has to be picked by hand by experts. The freight alone from the Silver King Mine to Butte, is $33 per ton, and from the Hot Springs Camp to Helena, $26.50 per ton, so that miners can only ship the higher grade ore; and instead of shipping it all, there are now lying on the dump hundreds of tons of ore that it will not pay to move for want of mining machinery to reduce the ore. Here we have hundreds of tons of ore that, in treating, would give employment to a great number of men, and representing hundreds of thousands of dollars, but it is lying there idle, simply because the rates of transportation are so high; and the Government imposes a duty upon mining machinery so high that such machinery cannot be brought into the country. I do not think a stronger argument can be used in favor of the Government yielding to the concession we ask. I visited another mine called the Blue Bell or Hendricks' Mine. In that mine I went down 100 feet below the surface, and traced a vein of ore 87 feet wide. The greater portion of this only yields from 4 oz. to 10 oz. in silver, and one small portion yields 20 oz. in silver, and gives 50 per cent. in lead. Several shafts have been sunk on this mine; the ledge has been cut across in several places; and to-day there are thousands of tons of ore exposed to view. That mine can produce more galena, and more lead than is to-day consumed in the whole Dominion of Canada; and I was informed by Dr. Hendricks, one of the principal owners of the mine, that, were the duty taken off mining machinery, their company would be prepared at once to put in a plant that would cost about $200,000—the machinery alone would cost $100,000—but they were not prepared to pay into the Treasury of the Dominion something over $30,000 in shape of duty. In discussing this question with these mine owners, who are chiefly Americans, I said to them: Now, you are Republicans; in your own country you are protectionists; how is it that once across the line you throw your protectionist principles to the wind, and you cry out for free trade? Their reply invariably was: That is not the case. We were protectionists at home, and we are protectionists here. We believe in the policy of America for Americans, and we do not blame you for insisting on a like policy of Canada for the Canadians. But we say this: You do not manufacture in Canada the machinery requisite for the treatment of our ores, and even if you did manufacture that machinery there is no means of our getting it into Kootenay. Steam drills are manufactured in Montreal, but they could not get one in Montreal because they had no means of taking it in from our side, and this rock drill had to go in from the American side and had to pay a duty of 30 per cent. I was informed that, instead of that one drill, there would be a dozen drills in use in Kootenay if they could be taken in free of duty. I met there a very intelligent man from Spokane, a representative of Spokane capitalists, and in conversation with him I learned that the capitalists he represented would also put machinery on the different claims in which they were interested if the duties were removed from mining machinery. He was originally in a bank at Spokane; he is a man who has some knowledge of geology and assaying, and was selected by the Spokane people to purchase locations for them in the Kootenay country. I asked him to give me the benefit of his views in writing, which he did a short time afterwards, and which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read to the House. He states:

"In relation to the benefits accruing to this section by the abolition of duties upon mining and reduction machinery, I have to state that were such a measure accomplished, I would within a year have a concentrator of from thirty to a hundred tons here, as well as at least two hoisting plants, and probably a quartz mill and other mining machinery, such as machine drills, &c. I am positive that at least two others would do as much more, and I further feel confident that a very large and complete smelting plant would be erected; and, of course, with the advent of these industries the progress of this section would be apparent. At present we cannot obtain these things in the Dominion, and if we could, transportation to this point is at present impossible, and that renders protection in one case a hardship, without any industry being protected, hence nothing is accomplished favorable to any party. Our ores in the main are of such a grade that we must be able to mine and reduce cheaply to insure a profit, and the margin of profit is so small that machinery on any but one or two claims would not be feasible while duties exist and transportation is exorbitant. It is apparent, then, that great things must result with the energetic working of the claims and a vast amount of industries incidental to extensive mining accompany and follow up the new era of prosperity, and, in my opinion, all it needs to bring on this state of affairs is a little fostering by the Government in the shape of duty rebates and better transportation."

I might say with respect to the question of transportation that that is a difficulty which, I believe, will very shortly be solved. Every northern transcontinental line is now seeking an entrance into Kootenay. The Northern Pacific are about to build a line from Kootenay to Bonner's Ferry, from whence a steamer can be taken to any of the mines on Kootenay Lake. The Spokane and Northern Railway Company has an application for a charter now before the House for a line running from the international boundary near Pan d'Oreille, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are applying for a charter from Sproat's Landing on the Columbia River to Nelson on Kootenay Lake. So the difficulty with respect to transportation will soon be solved, and it only remains now for the Dominion Government to say whether they will assist the mining industry, by allowing mining machinery to be admitted free of duty. It may be said by members of the Government that the letter I have read, as well as the information I have furnished, is from American sources. I admit that; but I will say this, that it is only through American enterprise, industry and capital that that section of the country has been opened. However, the same feeling pervades every other part of the Province, namely, that unless the duty is taken off mining machinery, very little advance can be made in the mining industry for years to come. A few days ago I read a letter published by a resident of Victoria, a representative of British capital to the extent of $500,000, and the representative of a company which is doing good work in developing the mines of Nicola, in which the matter was put very clearly. I may add that he is a supporter of the Government, and a Conservative, and, being an Englishman, he, John Bull like, goes straight to the point and strikes out from the shoulder. I will read an extract from his letter. After referring to the work done in the Nicola country, he says:

"You might assist that development by more vigorously and persistently pressing for the removal of the practically prohibitory duty levied by the Dominion Government on mining machinery, without which the mines cannot be worked. The situation at present is this: The Province which owns the minerals acts most liberally to those engaged in mining. It gives them away to whoever discovers and prospects them. It makes trails and roads to render mineral districts accessible. It does all this without deriving any revenue, except small sums from miners' licenses and record fees, which do not begin to recoup it for its large and generous outlay. The Dominion, which does not own the minerals, but which would gain the lion's share of benefit from a mineral development, through its heavy tariff neutralises the efforts of this Province by prohibiting the working of the mines unless it first receives a toll of 30 per cent. of the value of all machinery necessary to extract the minerals from them."

"To show you how this operates I will instance Nicola, and what applies to that district applies to all others in the Province."

"The ores of Nicola are refractory. They consequently require far more expensive machinery to treat them than free milling gold ores, which, except at and near the surface, have not yet been discovered in British Columbia. This means a large outlay and the payment of about twenty thousand dollars to the Dominion for the privilege of working Provincial mines that the Dominion never owned. I know that outside capitalists look upon this Dominion 30 per cent. tax on mining machinery as little better than a blackmailing operation, and they prefer to invest in semi-barbarous countries, such as South Africa, where they are not plundered of a portion of their capital before they have a chance of investing it, as they are at present if they venture into the Dominion of Canada."

"My opinion is that an output of precious metals from the quartz mines of Nicola, and other mining districts of British Columbia, will be delayed until the Dominion permits mining machinery to be brought in without the present proposterous duty being levied upon it. Every well-wisher of this Province should energetically protest the continuance of a tax which stops the investment of capital in mines and prevents the development of the greatest natural resource British Columbia possesses."

That is the opinion expressed by nearly every man, miner or trader, who has an interest in British Columbia. What we ask is this: That the Dominion Government should take the duty off such machinery as is not at present manufactured in the Dominion; and we contend that the manufacturers, instead of being injured, would be benefited by that measure. To-day little or no machinery is brought in, because there is no market; but we hold that if you remove the duty for two or three years, you will open up to the manufacturers of Canada a very much larger market than exists to-day. We say that such machinery as concentrating machinery, quartz mills, reduction mills, sampling mills, and refining works, are not manufactured here, nor will they be manufactured until the market increases. So our request is a very fair one. We ask that the Government will take the duty off that class of machinery for a short time, and we further ask that they will remove the duty from all machinery, including motive power, in that part of Kootenay at present inaccessible from our own side. It is so far removed from the railway system of the United States, that the people have not the advantage of the bonding system; so, whether it is American or Canadian machinery, the parties have to pay the duty, and if Canadian machinery, they will have, practically, to pay the duty twice. I again maintain that our petition is a fair one. We are not asking for the protection given to the farmers or the manufacturers, we are not asking for a bounty such as is given to the iron industries at Londonderry, we simply ask that the Government will endeavor to foster and encourage our infant industry by removing the duty on certain machinery, the result of which would be that the manufacturers of Canada would be afforded a larger market in a few years. I venture to predict that in the district of Kootenay, if that policy be followed, inside of three years you will have a market for more mining machinery than is manufactured in the whole Dominion to-day.

Mr. BARNARD. I took the opportunity last Session of introducing this subject to the attention of the House, and I then endeavored to express my views pretty fully upon it. Since that time I have interested myself in the matter, and I have on several occasions endeavored to impress on the Government, the great necessity, in the interests of the Province of British Columbia at any rate, of making some change which would assist the miners there, and enable us to introduce capital to develop the great natural wealth which is lying dormant in that Province. Had not the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) introduced this resolution, I, possibly, would have been compelled to bring forward a similar one later on in the Session. However, in view of the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance that the Government intended making some changes in the tariff, I would have deferred it until I ascertained whether they did, or did not, make the changes which we desire in this respect. I have submitted to the Minister of Finance a list of mining machinery which we hope will be admitted free of duty, and the greater part of which is not, I am quite satisfied, manufactured in Canada. I am in hopes, as all the members from British Columbia are, that the Government will be able to place some of these articles, if not all of them, on the free list. In the meantime I will defer making any further remarks on this subject, until the Minister of Finance has announced the changes in the tariff which he proposes.

Mr. CURRAN. I desire to state, in regard to some of the remarks which have been made here, that I have been informed by several manufacturers that the statement that we do not manufacture in Canada all the mining machinery required, is not correct. The manufacturers have assured me, and I have no doubt that they have also assured the Government, that they are perfectly able to manufacture in Montreal, and, I believe, in other large manufacturing centres as well, all kinds of machinery of whatever description may be required for mining purposes. The hon. Minister will, no doubt, give this matter due attention and do justice in the premises. In the meantime it is perfectly certain that the discussion of to-day must do good, if it does nothing else than attract the attention of manufacturers to the statements made here, and induce them—if the distance be too far to transport the articles manufactured in either Quebec or Ontario—possibly to establish branches of their industries in that new Province, where, if all that we have heard to-day be correct, there will be a very large field for them to reap a rich harvest in the manufacture of this mining machinery.

Mr. DAWSON. It is quite evident that a great deal of machinery required at present in mining is not manufactured in Canada, and that there are certain kinds of machinery referred to by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) which are not produced in this country. I would certainly favor the maintenance of the duty on such machinery as can be manufactured in this country, so as to prevent competition; but the fact is that in these new districts of Algoma and British Columbia (which must depend greatly on mining, and where there are new mines being discovered every day), it is very desirable that, until we can ourselves produce the machinery required in mining, it ought to a certain extent be admitted free of duty. There are certain things, such as diamond drills, and complicated machinery like amalgamators, which are not produced in this country, and which cannot be produced profitably until the mining industry has been much more developed than it is at present. In the existing condition of affairs there is not a sufficiently large market for the sale of such machinery. I, therefore, wish to support the members for Yale (Mr. Mara) and Cariboo (Mr. Barnard) in their contention with regard to the expediency of admitting certain machinery free of duty. I would not wish that any machinery which can be manufactured in this country should be admitted free, but the Government should take this into their favorable consideration, and see if in some way the demands of certain sections of the country in this respect can be met.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Perhaps no Province in the Dominion is more interested in the mining industry than the Province from which I come. Our vast coal fields and gold mining enterprises there, are even now of great value, and are increasing every year. I know it to be a source of complaint among those interested in that industry, that they have been compelled to pay duty on a class of machinery which is not made in the Dominion. I remember when, a few years ago, the duty was first placed on coal by the present Administration, one of the gentlemen of Halifax, who is supposed to represent the coal interests—who made it a question during the election, and had always advocated that a duty should be placed upon coal—was anything but satisfied when the regulation for the tariff on coal was presented to Parliament. That gentleman, who is recognised as an authority on the subject, said, that while the Government had imposed a duty on coal, they had taken away largely, if not entirely, the advantage which the miners would gain, by imposing heavy duties on machinery and other materials used in mining. The miners have always labored under the disadvantage of being compelled to pay heavy duties on what they required to develop their mines. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) made the statement that all mining machinery could be manufactured in the Dominion, but that seems to be contradicted by other hon. gentlemen who spoke on the subject. Whether it is manufactured in the Dominion or not, is of very little consequence. If it is made in the Dominion, of course it is only sold at the relative value which the machinery would cost, plus the duty if it were imported. There is, therefore, no advantage to the miners of the country that they can purchase machinery in the Dominion, because we know that manufacturers of machinery, like other manufacturers, fix their prices at what it will cost to lay down the foreign article plus the duty. I add my testimony to that of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that, in the interest of the coal and gold mining industries of Nova Scotia, it is of the highest importance that miners should have free access to the markets of the world to purchase their machinery, and in which they can get the best articles at the lowest possible price.

Mr. BROWN. I feel much interested in the question before the House, for on my recent visit to British Columbia I was much impressed by the statements made by the members for Yale (Mr. Mara) and Cariboo (Mr. Barnard) that a certain class of machinery which was not manufactured in Canada, and which very likely, for a great many years to come, would not be manufactured here, should be allowed to be imported free of duty, so as to enable the people of British Columbia to develop the great natural wealth of their Province. As my friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) states, there is a large quantity of machinery which can be manufactured in Canada. Certain manufacturers in the city of Hamilton, which I have the honor to represent, have informed me that they are quite prepared to manufacture a large proportion of the machinery required in the development of the mines of British Columbia. No doubt other centres of industry will be able to do the same thing, and as the city of Hamilton will soon be connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the manufacturers there will be able to forward this machinery to British Columbia at reasonable freight rates. There can, however, be no doubt that to promote the progress of British Columbia and to develop its great mineral wealth, such machinery as my hon. friend for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has referred to, should be admitted free of duty. I feel very strongly on this point, and I make these few remarks in support of the contention of my hon. friends.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) has furnished us with some useful information as to the working of this particular feature of the tariff, in regard to the great mining industries of the Province from which he comes. We have expended many millions of public money to develop the resources of that Province and to add to the material wealth of the whole of Canada, and to-day the hon. gentleman has informed us, on the authority of a gentleman whose name he did not give, but whom I understand to be in political sympathy with the party to which he belongs, that the present tariff in its operation, locks up the mining wealth of British Columbia as effectively as nature has ever done. On that statement, coming from the source it does—and it cannot be said for a moment that the hon. gentleman or his witnesses are animated by anything but the best interests of the country in asking for relief from that state of things—I cannot understand on what just grounds relief can be denied. Apart from the artificial obstructions offered by the tariff, there are sufficient obstacles presented by nature itself to the development of the mining resources of British Columbia, and, certainly, until some change is made in the tariff, which is within the reach of the Government, we need not expect any returns from the vast sums we have expended for the development of that Province. Could a more forcible attack on the Government come from any source than that which has been disclosed by the correspondence of my hon. friend? He says those great gifts of nature, those great undeveloped laboratories in the bowels of the earth, are locked up and made useless to man, by reason not altogether of natural obstructions, but by reason of the artificial obstructions imposed by the Administration and endorsed by the House, and, in a sense, by the country. Under these circumstances I think we are bound, as a Parliament, to give the fairest consideration to the proposition, and I think we can do so without impairing the general scheme which hon. gentlemen opposite have supported, and which they deem to call the National Policy. We can, without prejudice to that scheme, provide relief in the present instance. As hon. gentlemen have said, the tariff should not be available to handicap industries established in Canada, when Canada herself does not provide relief. Here we have the exact case to justify the suspension of the operation of the tariff in regard to this particular industry, at all events until manufacturers are found in this country ready to supply the needs of the mining industry. Therefore, in order to meet the views presented by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, while not jeopardising this great industry by giving occasion for the cry of the National Policy being in danger, I beg to move the following amendment, which, I think, leaves the National Policy in all its integrity, and is, perhaps, an argument in favor of its existence, at all events by admission, as it does not suggest an attack upon it:

That the motion be amended by inserting after the word "machinery" the words, "of kinds not manufactured in Canada."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. mover of the amendment seems to take the ground that it would not be an interference with the manufacture of machinery in the country. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) has stated that in that city all the facilities exist for manufacturing all kinds of machinery used in the country. Now, if I understand the object of the mover of the original resolution, it is to relieve, as far as possible, those engaged in mining from the burdens now imposed upon them by the duty on their machinery. We are all happy to hear that we have in this country the facilities for manufacturing mining machinery; but I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that these people in the city of Hamilton who manufacture machinery, when they come to sell it to the miner, are going to obtain the cost of producing it, with a fair profit, and the duty added. If that is not so, all I have to say is that the manufacturers in the city of Hamilton are different from any others in this Dominion or on this continent. I need not tell the House that the mining industry is a very important one, for the House has shown its sense of its importance in the past by granting bonuses to railways to give access to the iron and coal mines of this country and has imposed almost prohibitory duties for the purpose of encouraging mining in the country. I think it was the sage of Assiniboia who once made the remark that this country is one of large, of undeveloped resources. Well, it has mineral resources besides coal and other iron, and I need not tell the House that a great many of these lie a great way beyond, not only railway, but water communication, and they are at present impossible of development, owing to the immense cost of getting the machinery to the ground. Some years ago a member of the British Columbia Legislature, a Mr. Mason, showed me a specimen of native gold which he himself had broken from the rock, and from which he had chipped the stone with a small hammer, showing the native gold. He told me that there were immense quantities of that metal in all parts of British Columbia, and he was then in Victoria trying to form a company for the purpose of developing it; but the insuperable barriers to mining it successfully were, first, the duties on mining machinery, and next, the cost of getting the machinery to the ground. The motion before the House does not in any way deal with the latter question, but it does deal very materially with the question of the first cost of the machinery. I think it is the duty of the Government to do all they can to develop these undeveloped resources, and to afford every facility for getting the machinery into this country at the very cheapest rates. If you want to give bounties, and we have given bounties to manufacturers before now, it does not make any difference whether we give them directly or lighten the burden by throwing off the duty. In either way, the miners are benefited, and by the plan of throwing off the duties you lessen the cost to the consumer.

Mr. PRIOR. As this is such an important subject to the people of British Columbia, I do not think it right that I should let it pass without saying a word. It is the most important subject that will come up during the Session affecting the Province of which I have the honor to be a representative. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) has laid the matter so fully before the House that I need not say much as to the necessity for the change in the tariff which he has suggested. But I would like to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) and the hon. the senior member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown). These gentlemen said that manufacturers in those cities had informed them that they were perfectly capable, and indeed anxious, to make the machinery required to treat the ores in British Columbia. I may say that in Victoria there are iron works perfectly capable of making the machinery themselves without our being obliged to come east; but that is not the question. The question is: Is that machinery made at the present time in the Dominion? The fact is, different ores take different treatment, and you require different machinery to carry out those treatments; and no manufactory is going to set to work and spend a large sum of money in patterns and patents of a certain class of machinery until it is perfectly certain that it is the right sort to treat the ores. Therefore, I cannot see why the Government should put any spoke in the wheel by preventing the duty being taken off the machinery which must be got in the States until it is proved to the manufacturers in this Dominion what kind of machinery is required, and I hope the Government will see their way to comply with the request of the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. CHARLTON. A year ago last summer, as a member of the Ontario Mining Commission, I came in contact with a great many miners, in various parts of the Province. The Commission visited all the mining regions of Ontario, and in the course of its investigations, took the evidence of 150 miners and persons connected with mining. Among other things which these miners declared desirable in their interests, for the purpose of securing greater development to the mineral resources of the country, was the introduction, free of duty, of machinery not manufactured in Canada, and the investigations made by the Commission on this point were of the closest and most convincing character. It was found that various kinds of machinery were not produced in Canada, such as for amalgamating work, stamps, diamond drills, &c. It is only reasonable to suppose that in the United States, where the mineral production amounted to $542,000,000 in 1888, compared with less than $16,000,000 in Canada, the development in machinery and methods for producing ores has been much greater than it has been in Canada. Now, this is a matter on which the miners undoubtedly are good judges as to their wants. We visited the copper region in Sudbury, the silver region west of Port Arthur, the mineral regions of all parts of Ontario, and there was no dissent among the miners anywhere as to the desirability of the introduction of mining machinery from the United States, not produced in Canada, free of duty. It was quite evident, from the result of our investigations, that the want of this has been one of the great bars to the development of our mineral resources. Canada unquestionably possesses mineral resources of great extent and importance, both in the precious metals and in copper, iron and other metals. The mineral resources of Ontario are second to those of no region on this continent, although their development, and, consequently, their production, is very small, and anything that will tend to develop this industry will be in the general interests of this country. I hope the hon. Minister of Finance will take into account the vast importance of this almost undeveloped industry. The mineral production of the United States is $542,000,000, against our $15,000,000, and is four or five times greater per capita than ours. Our own mineral resources are probably greater than theirs, except in coal, and the Government should seriously consider what steps may be taken to promote mining in Canada, and no step they could take will have a more direct beneficial effect than the one they are asked to take by the hon. member for North York. The hon. member for Montreal tells us there is no kind of machinery used in mining that is not made in that city, and the hon. member for Hamilton tells us what can be done by Hamilton; but the miners, without a dissenting voice, from one end of Ontario to the other, as far as my personal knowledge goes, tell us that mining machinery cannot be produced in Canada, as regards many of the kinds required, and that it would not pay manufacturers in Canada to attempt the production of these, because the sale of the machinery, after incurring the expenditure necessary to manufacture it, will be problematical. Consequently, we must import the machinery, and if the miner has to pay 35 per cent., that will likely deter him or the capitalists from embarking in the enterprise. Nothing would be more likely to develop the vast mineral resources of Ontario, and every section of the Dominion, than the passage of this resolution.

Mr. COOK. It is very well known how rapidly the mineral resources of this country are being developed, particularly on the north shore of Georgian Bay, in the Owen Sound and Algoma districts. There are large quantities of nickel there, it is said, sufficient to supply the world, and nickel is becoming a very important metal, as it can be alloyed with iron. But the proposal of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) does not meet the case. In the first place, if a party wishes to order machinery, such as is required for large establishments as they have at Sudbury, by ordering all that he requires in one or more establishments on the other side, he is placed in a more favorable position as regards prices than if he ordered part in Canada and a part in the United States; and besides, in having a portion of the machinery made in Canada, and a portion in a foreign country, these two portions may not work satisfactorily together. For these considerations I shall vote against the amendment of the hon. member for North York and for the original motion. I wish to do what I think is the best practical thing for the interests of this country, and, if it is going to ruffle the feelings of any hon. gentleman on the other side or on this, it is no matter to me. I do what I consider my duty to my constituents and to the country, and I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment of the hon. member for North York.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta). Coming, as I do, from the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, representing a constituency 600 miles in extent, I shall support this resolution. I think we should be allowed to get all the mining machinery required in that country as cheaply as we can, so that we may get a population there which will make it really a country. Being handicapped by the long haul, and the distance we have to take our machinery through the mountains afterwards, I think we ought rather to be paid a bounty than to be asked to pay a duty on the machinery which comes into that country.

Mr. CASEY. I do not see any possible objection which protectionists can have to the amendment of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), seeing that it does not propose to interfere with any protection which is now, or which may hereafter be given to the manufacturers of mining machinery in Canada. If such machinery is to be taxed, then protection subsists in regard to it; and in regard to all other kinds of machinery no harm is done by their free admission. I, therefore, do not see what objection protectionists can have to this amendment. For my own part, I shall vote for the main motion. I believe in encouraging the largest and most productive industries of the country, and the mines are worth vastly more to the country than all the manufacturers of mining machinery who exist now or ever could exist in Canada. The manufacture of mining machinery is only a means to carry on the mines, and I do not consider it is fair to carry out a national protective policy in such a way as to encourage the means at the expense of the object. A national protective policy should encourage the industry of the country, and the only way in which the mining machinery industry can benefit the country is by benefiting the mines. Notwithstanding the existence of manufactures in Hamilton or elsewhere, I intend to vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. Platt). The object of every patriotic policy must be to obtain the greatest good for the greatest number, to follow a course which will add to our wealth and standing, and which will give employment to the greatest amount of labor. That has been said to be the object of the National Policy; and now we will see whether the Government will take advantage of this opportunity, and carry out that policy in this respect, because the development of our mines would add much more to our development than any protection of the manufactures of mining machinery. If the amendment of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) carries, I shall vote for the motion as so amended as the best that can be adopted under the circumstances, but I shall in the first instance support the original motion.

Mr. McKAY. I believe it is the desire of the House that nothing shall be done to prevent the development of the mining industries of the country, and I think the adoption of the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) will aid in developing those mining industries while, at the same time, not interfering with the manufacturing industries which are now established. In Hamilton we have men who are largely engaged in making this machinery, men who have had large experience in it. One of the gentlemen at the head of a manufacturing concern in Hamilton has had large experience in making this machinery on the Pacific coast. I believe, if the amendment of the hon. member for North York is carried, it would be more preferable than the motion, and more satisfactory to all the different interests.

Mr. MARA. While thanking the hon. member for North York for the few kind words he said in favor of our Province, I take exception to the statement he made that the Dominion of Canada spent millions, in opening up and developing the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not say that. I said, for the purpose of doing so.

Mr. MARA. Well, for the purpose of doing so. The Dominion Government did nothing of the kind. They spent millions in order to obtain a terminus on the Pacific coast. That money was not spent for the benefit of British Columbia, and British Columbia derived very little benefit from the expenditure of that amount of money. As to the amendment and the motion as they now stand, I put it to my hon. friend from Prince Edward

(Mr. Platt), whether it would be to the interest of the miner, or of the mining industry, that the motion should be pressed to a vote to-day. If it were, it might be defeated, and that would mean that the hands of the Government would be strengthened to allow matters to remain as they are. I am satisfied that my hon. friend does not wish that; neither do I; and I would suggest whether it is not well to withdraw the motion, or allow it to stand, or I will propose that the debate be adjourned, and stand adjourned until such time as the Government make known to the House their proposed tariff changes. Then we can deal more easily with these matters than we can at present. If, however, the question is then pressed to a vote, I will be with the hon. gentleman. I, therefore, move in amendment to the amendment:

That the debate be adjourned until after the proposed tariff changes are laid before the House by the Government.

I will withdraw that, if the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say a few words on this discussion, which has upon the whole been an interesting and a profitable one. A great many members, comparatively, have spoken in the course of this debate, and a great many opinions have been given from practical men and persons who are well acquainted with the districts from which they come, in reference to the mining resources of different parts of our Dominion. I may say that what was stated by my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Barnard) is perfectly true. During the past year he has been constant, in season and out of season, in pressing this matter upon the attention of the Government; not only himself, but other members from British Columbia, who have similar interest with him in this respect, have also made strong and vigorous recommendations to the Government to take off the duty on mining machinery. Persons interested in mining development in Ontario, in the Lake Superior region, and who are anxious to get in mining machinery, have also been pressing the Government to make some modification in the matter of admitting such machinery for the purpose of developing those mines. The same thing has taken place in various other portions of the country where mining development is comparatively new. The Government have not been idle in the matter; and I may say to the House that there is no one subject in connection with the tariff which has engaged more of our attention during the last few months, than the question which is the subject of discussion to-day. But, of course, there are difficulties connected with it. There are three interests which are to be considered. In the first place, there are those who are interested in putting in mining machinery for the development of new mines at the present time; they want a modification of the duties. There are those who have, under the National Policy, been investing their money and who have been engaged in developing the manufacture of machinery of various kinds in this country; and no person can take a comparative view of the state of the manufacturing industry ten years ago and its state to-day, without seeing the immense strides that our manufacturers have made in the way of producing machinery of almost every description and of excellent quality as well, to be used in mining industries. That interest has to be regarded, and it may well be considered by those who have invested their capital in that way, and who have arrived at a good degree of development in that industry, and are producing machinery of a very extensive character and of good quality, that it would not conduce to the permanency of the best interests of the country in that line, should we agree to the request of my hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. Platt), that all mining machinery should be allowed to come in free. His motion is very wide indeed. It would include everything, from the most complex and the largest kind of machinery, to the simplest forms of machinery, which are made in Canada just as well and just as cheaply as they can be made anywhere. Then there is another interest to be considered, which is the interest of those miners who, during the last ten, fifteen or twenty years, have gone into mining ventures in this country, who have been at the cost of putting in machinery, who have imported it and have paid the duty upon it. New machinery put into new mining industries would compete in a certain way with their own, and involve a competition which would be looked upon as being somewhat unfair to them. So that these three interests have all to be considered, and have been considered by the Government. Then, of those who ask for free mining machinery, there are three different classes. There is one class who want the duty taken off all mining machinery so that it may come in free. That class is represented by my hon. friend the mover of this motion, provided we take the motion as the index of his own views on that subject. I think that motion is wider than the sense of this House, or the sense of the country, would approve. There is another class who want only such machinery to come in free of duty as is not made in Canada. Now, any hon. gentleman who looks at the matter will understand the difficulty of coming to a conclusion as to what machinery can be made in the country and what cannot be made in the country, a much more difficult thing, perhaps, than to come to a conclusion as to what machinery is made in Canada and what is not made. Then there is another class who want mining machinery brought in free for a limited period, machinery of such a class as is not made in Canada. These are the three classes. I could not quite understand what was meant by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara), when he stated that mining machinery could not be taken in there from the east; that an implement, for instance, from Montreal could not be taken into the Kootenay district, because it had to go through American territory, without paying double duty. I think that cannot be so, because we have, just as they have in the United States, arrangements for bonding by which, on their side, articles can be taken from the United States territory through Canadian territory into the United States again, and vice versa, without payment of duty. However, these are the conditions of the question. The Government have had them under serious and earnest consideration—we have them under consideration to-day. The duties which are involved, if we were to let mining machinery in free, would be considerable. Although it may be that the Government would have had a right to do that by Order in Council, the matter was so important that, suppose they had decided to take the duty off such machinery, it would scarcely have been wise to do so in view of the fact that Parliament was soon to meet, when the great interests involved in this matter could be taken up and considered by Parliament. It has been announced that the Government intend to make certain tariff changes, and I am in a position to state, as I have stated here, that we are considering this matter with a view to its best possible solution. Under the circumstances, it does not seem necessary to press the matter to a vote. I think my hon. friend who moved the resolution ought to take the assurance that I have given that the Government are carefully considering this matter, and to abide events, at least until the Government's opinion, after mature consideration, is laid before the House, when each hon. member will be at liberty to take such course as he sees fit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If this question was brought under the attention of the House for the first time to-day, there might be some force in a portion of the hon. gentleman's contention, looking at the matter from his own standpoint. But it must be remembered that the Government have had this matter pressed upon them, not once or twice, but three or four times over. They have had ample time to make up their minds on this matter, and they ought to know exactly what they are prepared to do. For my own part, I think the motion of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) is an excellent one, and is conceived in the best interests of the people of this country. There is no one class who deserve more consideration from our hands than the miners of this Dominion, who are attempting to explore and develop the mining resources of Canada. Even in my own locality, although deposits are not as rich as they are in some other portions of this Dominion, I know that enormous inconvenience, enormous delay and enormous mischief has been wrought by, what I do not hesitate to call, the most barbarous policy of the Government in refusing to allow explorers and miners to obtain the use of properly constructed tools. Now, I believe it would be found a matter of considerable difficulty, and a matter of constant dispute, to decide what kinds of machinery can or cannot be profitably manufactured in Canada; nor do I believe that many kinds of machinery for mining purposes can be profitably manufactured in Canada, if manufactured at all; or that it is at all likely, under any circumstances, that mining machinery can be manufactured in Canada at such a cost as to free the miners from a heavy and unnecessary tax if they are compelled to have recourse to our limited market. I say, therefore, that I believe my hon. friend from Prince Edward is moving entirely in the right direction, entirely in the interest of a deserving class in this community, and entirely in the interest of this country, in pressing that all this mining machinery should be admitted free. Further, I think that, as the Government ought to have made up their minds on this question—they have had plenty of time to do it—my hon. friend has nothing to gain by delay in pressing the House to a decision on this motion.

Sir DONALD A. SMITH. I am in favor of the most liberal protection being given to manufacturers in Canada, but I think this question is open to some exceptions, and this is one of those cases where an exception should be made; and I am, therefore, in favor of the motion of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt). At the same time, after the representations made by the Minister of Finance, I think it advisable that the amendment of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) should be adopted now, and I hope that the Government will give their consideration to this motion, and that, without further action on the part of any member of the House, they will be prepared to accede to this request. It is of the greatest importance possible that every encouragement should be given to the development of the industries, mining and otherwise, of British Columbia; and as the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) said, the expenses of transport are alone sufficient against that country. So that I certainly think the duties against all importations there, especially when the articles are for developing the great resources of that country, should be made as light as possible.

Mr. PLATT. Had the hon. the Minister of Finance requested the withdrawal of the motion, or that we should grant an adjournment of the debate without further discussion, upon the ground that he was giving his best and most favorable consideration to the question under discussion, we might have been disposed to grant the request. But he preceded his request by remarks which led me to believe that he is not at all prepared to accept the principle of the resolution. He has told us plainly that he believes the resolution which I have the honor to place before this House will not meet with the approbation of the House and the approbation of the country. If that be his opinion, I cannot reasonably expect that the principle will be embodied in the new Tariff Bill he proposes to bring down; and if he is not yet convinced that the people of the country are willing, for the purpose of encouraging the mining industry of Canada, to admit mining material free of duty for a limited period, if you like, or for any length of time that may be necessary, this House will be failing in its duty if it does not do its utmost to force its opinion upon the Government. The hon. gentleman tells us of various difficulties that stand in the way. We have heard of those difficulties before. They are difficulties which will meet any Government under the circumstances, when they are nursing and cherishing what is known in this country as a protective or National Policy. It is part and parcel of that policy to throw difficulties in the way whenever such questions come before us. The manufacturers, who have had ten years of protection, the hon. gentleman tells us, have arrived at a certain degree of development and prosperity; and it was understood when the policy was adopted that after those industries became established, those other industries which were for the time suffering in consequence of the protection afforded those manufacturers, would in turn receive benefit, and those industries which had been able to get on their legs in this country, would no longer receive the benefit of a protective tariff. Now, mining is an old industry, but as regards its development in this country it is still an infant industry. Manufacturing industries, if they have arrived at the degree of prosperity which the hon. gentleman states they have reached, are no longer infant industries, and I hold that the mining interests of this country are such that it is the duty of the Government to see that those older industries, so long supported by the policy of protection, should no longer stand in the way of the advancement of the mining industry. I maintain that the resolution I have submitted is one which will meet with the approbation of the country, because our people are becoming alive to the importance of the mining industry. We know that while in the past many mines in Ontario have remained undeveloped, new processes have been introduced which are likely to be brought into use in Ontario for the refining of the magnetic iron ores, the machinery for which will not be manufactured here for many years. We are aware that these new machines are just being manufactured in the United States, and some other countries. Take, for instance, the appliances connected with the Edison process for separating magnetic iron ores, the new inventions for reducing copper and separating the nickel which exists so largely in the ore of the mines about Sudbury, and we find we possess the class of mines which American capitalists are seeking to develop, and which American ingenuity and industry promise to render profitable. We know that for many, many years past, mines like Coe Hill and others of magnetic iron ore, have remained white elephants on the hands of those who thought it was impossible to remove from the ores the sulphur they contain. Mr. Edison has discovered a method by which he is confident this can be done, and he has already selected a site in Trenton, and likewise sites in other places, for the erection of works into which he is willing to put his own money, and he has already made offers to different corporations as to what he is willing to do, and wherever his name is mentioned capital will flow into those enterprises. This is just the time for action, and there should not be a moment's delay in publishing what this country is willing to do on behalf of the mining industry, and the Government will not be justified in pursuing the course indicated by the Minister of Finance in yielding to those difficulties which he says are before his eyes at every turn, and in refusing that for which my motion asks. If the whole concession for which I ask cannot be granted, I hope the request embodied in the amendment will be granted; I will be willing to accept that rather than lose all. I suppose the motion for the adjournment of the debate will be carried. I think, however, as the discussion has aroused so much interest, and has been participated in by members on both sides of the House, I will scarcely be justified in taking the question out of the hands of the House, and I will leave it with the House to decide.

Mr. BARNARD. Considering the discussion which has arisen on the subject, it may not be amiss to refer to the fact that a year or two years ago the Government of British Columbia, in order to stimulate mining industries in the section which I represent, erected works intended as testing works in the district of Cariboo, at a cost of $15,000 or $16,000. The Government expended that money itself to assist the mining industry in that district, and to promote the introduction of capital there. They made what I deem to have been a justifiable request on the Dominion Government, namely, that a rebate of duties should be allowed in that case. I believe the matter has not been settled yet, but that a discussion has arisen between the Provincial Government and the Dominion Government as to whether machinery of that class was or was not manufactured in Canada. Unfortunately, the whole works were burned down the other night, immediately after their completion, and I would suggest to the Government, if application is made for a rebate of duty, as the Provincial Government propose to re-erect the works, it should be granted as applicable not only to the machinery in the works destroyed, but also to the new machinery.

Mr. WALDIE. In view of the courtesy which Ministers extend to all delegations that wait upon them, it is only reasonable, I think, that the representatives of the people be permitted to present their views on a vote, and thus assist the Minister of Finance in coming to a decision.

Mr. BLAKE. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is not in order. It is a motion to adjourn the debate, and is, therefore, a substantive motion and cannot be an emendatory motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is not a substantive motion; it is an amendment to the amendment, and, although improperly worded, it is in order as an amendment; but it ought to read: "That all the words in the main motion and in the amendment be struck out, and the following words substituted therefor." As an amendment I hold that it is in order, while if it were a substantive motion I should have to declare that it is out of order, since it specifies an undetermined time that the debate should be adjourned to; instead of being put as all motions for adjournment, either of the debate or of the House, are, purely and simply, that the debate be adjourned now.

House divided on the amendment to the amendment.

YEAS:

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. What are the proceedings now?

Mr. SPEAKER. The main motion will be put now as amended.

Mr. BLAKE. I think, Sir, that the only method in which the Speaker can regulate the proceedings is to act on what I understand to be the rule, namely, that a motion to adjourn the debate is a substantive motion, and not an amendment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I observe that in the course of the Pacific Railway debates, a motion was made by the hon. member for Shelburne to the effect "that as an offer for the construction and working of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been received by the Government, this debate be adjourned, in order that the Government may lay said offer on the Table of the House," and that motion was ruled out of order. The Speaker remarked that a motion to adjourn the debate, or a motion to adjourn the House, must be always purely and simply to that effect. This is not the character of this motion which has just been before us, and it is open to the objection that was then made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, your point of order ought to have been taken before the members were called in. I take it that the expression of the House is: that it is inexpedient to discuss this matter any more for the present. That is the opinion of the House, and, no matter in what form it may appear on the Journals, it is quite clear that we are not going to discuss this question further now. The resolution is, perhaps, a little irregular by using the expression that "the debate be adjourned," but it means that it is inexpedient to discuss this question until the tariff is brought down by the Government. That is the question simply, and I think it ought to be looked on in that light.

Mr. BLAKE. There is the question of the regularity of our proceedings also. The motion which the House has agreed to is a motion to adjourn the debate until a certain time, but by a process of amendment, eliminating necessarily that main motion, which was, after all, the question before the House. That is the inextricable tangle into which, I think, we have gotten, by not observing what I understand to be the rule, and which I ventured to suggest before the division was taken, namely, that a motion to adjourn is of necessity a substantive and not an amendatory motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I suggested, the motion ought to have been written in a different form, and I think if it were to be taken as an amendment it should state that all the words after "That" in the amendment and in the main motion be struck out and the following words substituted therefor: "that this debate (or rather the discussion) on the proposed question of altering the tariff should be adjourned until after the Government submits the proposed changes in the tariff." The question now is, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion as amended.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. That is as we decided it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; I suppose no member will have any objection that this should be worded so that an irregular precedent may not be established.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, I would like to correct it. That was simply my object.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have put the question as a sub-amendment, and with the consent of the House, if there is no objection the sub-amendment will be worded so as to be entirely within the Rules.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear; that is all I want. It can be made to read that the question of changes in the tariff shall not be discussed; and not that the debate shall be adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER. That, I think, would be the proper motion.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now that the hon. gentlemen have explained the parliamentary practice, I would like to know the effect of the resolution. Do I understand that these gentlemen from British Columbia, who made these eloquent speeches to show the resources of that Province, and the necessity for free machinery, have really voted against the introduction of free machinery into this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

An hon. MEMBER. Of course they have.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course they have not.

Mr. MULOCK. If this motion is allowed to stand as carried, I would like to know whether the resolution will again appear on the paper, or whether the discussion is killed on this motion or amendment for the Session?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I am right in saying that the question affirmed by the House has been, that instead of pronouncing that the tariff ought to be changed so as to allow mining machinery to be brought into the country free of duty, which was the effect of the main motion as first proposed by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt), the House has affirmed that it is inexpedient for the present to discuss the matter, until the tariff changes are laid by the Government before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the House gives a certain discretion to the Clerk of the House and myself, we will see that the motion, as printed in the Journals, will be so arranged as not to conflict with the Rules of the House, or with established precedents.

Mr. BLAKE. And keep the mining machinery out too.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. If it is proposed, Mr. Speaker, that you and the Clerk of the House shall amend the motion so as to conform to the practice of the House, we shall have to conform to that practice by retaining the question on the paper. The only motion that would be regular, would be a motion to adjourn, the effect of which would leave the question still on the paper. Now it is proposed to amend the proceedings so as to make this motion regular, or, in other words, to make the motion read as it ought to have been worded originally: that the debate be adjourned. If that is to appear on the records, then our proceedings should also be corrected, and the motion should be continued on the Order paper.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That was not the question—that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. CASEY. I understand that the effect of this motion as adopted by the House—

Mr. SPEAKER. Mr. Ferguson of Welland has the next Order of the Day.

Mr. MULOCK. The motion, as amended, has not been put yet.

Mr. SPEAKER. I declared it carried.

MAIL SERVICE, COUNTY OF MEGANTIC.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all petitions and correspondence respecting the change made in the carrying of the mail from Craig's Road Station, on the Grand Trunk Railway, to Leeds, County of Megantic; also of all petitions and correspondence respecting the carrying of the mail from Jiggin's Post Office to Wilson's Mills, Lower Leeds, County of Megantic.

He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Government upon the change which has been made in the carrying of the mail between the parish of Saint-Sylvestre, in the County of Lotbinière, and Leeds, in the County of Megantic. Formerly, the mails were sent directly from Craig's Road Station, on the Grand Trunk Railway, to Leeds through Saint-Sylvestre. Last summer, through a certain arrangement made by the Post Office Department, the Wilson Mills' Post Office secured a daily mail, instead of a tri-weekly mail which they had before, but, at the same time, it was decided to do away with the carrying of the mails between Saint-Sylvestre and Wilson Mills' Post Office. Several of the voters of Saint-Sylvestre wrote to me, complaining about this arrangement. The upshot of their complaint is that by giving a daily mail to Wilson Mills, two or three families are favored against some twenty-five families settled on Craig's Road, in the parish of Saint-Sylvestre. I should like to obtain copies of the petitions, of the correspondence with the Government, and also, of the reports of the Post Office Inspector, so as to be acquainted with the two sides of the question. I understand, however, by the information I have received and which, I have every reason to believe, are well founded, that an injustice has been done to the voters of the parish of Saint-Sylvestre, for these informations were furnished to me by wholly reliable persons. I myself have conferred about the matter with the honorable the Postmaster General, who said to me that, unfortunately, he could not comply with the requests made to him. I think it would be but fair to have a new investigation made, and I am quite sure that should this investigation take place, justice would be done to the electors of Saint-Sylvestre, as it would show that their complaints are well founded. The carrying of the mails between the two post offices I have just mentioned, had given general satisfaction for over sixty years, and I think the Government ought not to have done away with it without very serious reasons. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I once more ask that the Postmaster General should order a new investigation, and I think the electors will never be satisfied until they get it.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no objection to bringing down the papers the hon. gentleman moves for. There was a petition, as he states, against the proposed change. The inspector reported in favor of the present mode of carrying the mails. There was a counter-petition sent in, stating that the present mode was not satisfactory, and that the old system was the best. The question was again referred to the inspector, and he reports that the present system is the best for the locality; it gets a daily mail now instead of a tri-weekly mail which it had before, and the cost to the Department is only $100 against the previous cost of $125.

Motion agreed to.

FRAUDS IN THE SALE OF CEREALS.

On the order (Mr. Burdett) for Committee of the Whole :

That it is expedient to bring in a Bill to prevent frauds in the sale of cereals and seed grains.

Mr. BURDETT. The hon. Minister of Justice has kindly consented to allow my Bill to be considered as part of Bill No. 65 to amend the Criminal Law. Therefore, my motion will drop.

Motion dropped.

RETURN ORDERED.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Wilson (Elgin):

That, in the opinion of this House, the Electoral Franchise Act ought to be repealed, and that it is preferable to revert to the plan of utilising for the elections of this House, the Provincial Franchises and Voters' Lists.

Mr. TROW. When the House discussed this subject the other day, I moved the adjournment of the debate for the express purpose of allowing other members to speak on this question, who were not in the House at the time, and who were anxious to do so. No matter how long this discussion is carried on, I do not know that it will bear fruit. The First Minister is wedded to this idol, and has been so since Confederation. He had brought this measure down Session after Session, and on several occasions it was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. We had been so accustomed to hear the First Minister mentioning this Franchise Bill that when it was brought down in 1885 we never for a moment supposed that it was his intention to push that measure through during the Session for various reasons. One was that the House had already been in session seventy-eight or eighty days, about the length of an ordinary Session, before the Bill was brought down. Another reason was that when this Bill was introduced—and the First Minister, I must say, as a rule, is generally very clear in pointing out to the House what he intends to promote—but on this occasion the Bill was introduced in a very crude state, and the First Minister only occupied seven or eight minutes in explaining to the House its numerous clauses. However, I have no faith that our discussion will be of much avail, for the simple reason, and as I said before, that the First Minister is so wedded to this idol. I, for one, could never see the propriety of putting the Dominion to the expense of getting up a voters' list. Hitherto the voters' lists had been prepared by the municipal authorities of the various Provinces, who were sworn to do their duty, and who did it free of expense to the Dominion. I have never heard any complaint of that system; there was never any petition presented to this House against it, either from individuals or from any of the Provinces. There was no necessity for any measure passing this House so objectionable to all the members as was that Bill—I say all the members, because I never met a Conservative, in the House or out of the House, that approved of that measure. I have conversed with many men in my own riding who have enjoyed a party advantage from that Bill, because when the first division took place I know that I was placed at a disadvantage. In my riding a good many men voted against me on the first revision, for the simple reason that I did not attend to the list, and others neglected to do so in my interest. What aroused my friends more than anything else, when the last revision took place, was the fact that the leading Conservative organ in my riding came out with a paragraph stating that my opponent had been over the county, and that he had taken from the roll or added thereon no less than 1,200 names. This was a serious affair in my riding, and of course it aroused my friends, and we went to work and went through the riding, and tried to remedy this as much as we possibly could. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) says that this Act is an inexpensive affair, and that to arrange the voters' lists in the various ridings costs scarcely nothing, that the candidates have no reason to complain, because the expense is so trifling. He stated that he had attended the revising barristers' court all over the riding, and the expenditure was about a quarter of a dollar a day, the price of his dinner. Well, so far as my friends and myself are concerned, we are in the habit of eating three meals a day, and I know this Act is expensive, not only to Reformers, but to the candidates as well, and, at all events, we know that it costs the country at large $400,000 a year. Now, why should we submit to such an unnecessary expenditure? Why should there be 200 revising barristers appointed, and why should there be 200 clerks and 200 bailiffs—about 600 officers—for no earthly purpose but to gratify the hon. First Minister? If it had not been for the determined opposition, day after day, and week after week, of the Liberal party in this House, that measure, in the crude state in which it was introduced, would have placed the whole vote of the country in the hands of the Conservative party. I am sorry to say that the hon. First Minister, whenever a general election takes place, tries to place the Reformers at a disadvantage. We can recollect the time when money was the means used to influence an election. Then we find the next general election that the National Policy was devised for the same purpose, and it drew to the Conservative party some of the best manufacturers of the country who had previously voted in the Reform interest, but who afterwards, from purely selfish motives, supported the Conservative party, and have since kept them in power. The next plan adopted was to carve up the constituencies of Ontario. What has taken place between here and Kingston? The Reformers should at least have 14 members out of 30, but after the cutting and carving the Reformers have 3 members and the Conservatives 27. Is that the proper way to face the electors of the country? This Franchise Bill was more corrupt even than the Gerrymander Bill itself. Had it passed as it was first introduced, and had not the Opposition made such determined efforts to purify it, because they did so and the First Minister yielded to some extent and the most objectionable clauses were removed, the Bill would have been still more objectionable. It is imperfect now, for the simple reason that, after a member has been obliged to absent himself from his ordinary avocations during three or four months in each year to attend Parliament, he is compelled to lose two or three months more, in order to perfect the roll. And yet the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) says it costs nothing. I know it costs him nothing; I believe he is telling the truth, because his riding was made purposely for a Conservative when it was gerrymandered. He has a nice Conservative riding in which no Grit need appear as candidate. The result was that no effort was made by the Reformers to change a single name on the list, and it is a question in my mind whether there was any change made in the lists, for the revising officer held two or three courts in his riding in one day. It was merely a walk over the course in North Perth; and yet, the hon. gentleman says this Act costs nothing. Others do not occupy such a position. When my riding was gerrymandered, I was two hundred votes in the minority when I started on the contest. I had something to do, and my friends had work to do, and I have had something to do at every general election since. I have to see that every elector is placed on the roll, but I fail to get them all there, because the Conservative party appoints the revising barrister, and they are naturally anxious to euchre me on every possible occasion. In my opinion there is no necessity for incurring such an expense as is involved by the Franchise Act. The country is woefully in debt. Then, why spend $200,000 or $300,000 yearly? The Secretary of State says it will not prove so expensive in the future as it has in the past, and he adds, that there is no necessity to have the lists made annually. How does the hon. gentleman propose to guard himself against a bye-election? Will he disqualify and deprive electors of the rights of the franchise? That is the only alternative open to him unless the lists are made up yearly, as the changes in the riding are very considerable. The changes from the first revision of the lists number hundreds of thousands of voters over the Dominion. Young men come of age, persons remove from the riding, remove from one township to another, and continually changes are going on; and unless the list is made up annually, it is utterly impossible to have a correct one. Why cannot this work be carried out, as formerly, by municipal officials sworn to do their duty? There is an assessor sworn to assess justly and honestly. He knows every man in the riding, he sees them daily, and he is, moreover, watched. After he has returned the roll, it is revised by the Revision Court of each municipality. As a rule, these municipal officers represent both sides of politics, and no one in any township with which I am acquainted, dare place upon the roll any man not entitled to be there, or remove improperly any name from the roll. The result is, that our lists formerly were perfect. How can we expect the lists to be perfect to-day? They are made up hundreds and in some cases thousands of miles from the locality, and a typographical error in the Ottawa printing office may prove a serious matter. Printers may unintentionally make a mistake. I observe in the leading Conservative journal in Toronto, the Empire, an article discussing the election in Haldimand; it states that the revising officer left off the list a number of names, and then it proceeds to tone down the statement by remarking that of these as many were Conservatives as Reformers. What right had the revising officer to leave any names off the lists? Why should these men be deprived of their votes merely because that official did not do his duty? The Toronto World condemns the list, and approves of the resolution of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Wilson). In the interests of the country and of this House, the present system should certainly be wiped out. Let us go to the country and have a fair fight. I have no doubt the First Minister will hatch something for the next general election. We do not know but that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is in collusion with him. How do we know what scheme may be submitted to the community at the next general election? There is certainly something to be hatched, and if the First Minister were to be transported to the Windward Islands, or elsewhere, the Conservative party would be like a rope of sand and become demoralised within twelve months. The manner in which the First Minister keeps his party together is by adopting some new scheme for the next general election. What it will be, of course, we do not know; but every election there is a move made by which the Reform party is taken at a disadvantage. Why not have a free and independent fight? Let us go before the country and let the people decide. Why tie the hands of your opponents behind them, and then say it is a fair battle. The First Minister should come down and yield to the wishes of the people; and I am satisfied that if a secret vote were taken not five members on the other side of the House would vote against the motion of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson).

Mr. Fiset. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will permit me to make some remarks on the subject which is now before the House. The Act upon which we are called to vote has been characterised in many ways. Some have called it odious, others arbitrary, I shall side with the latter expression. In my opinion, this Act is one of the most arbitrary that any Legislature has yet dared to pass in any Parliament. In fact, it is a means like any other of depriving the people of Canada of their free will by preventing them from voting according to their wishes. The Government, by causing such a law to be voted has imposed considerable expenses upon its opponents. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to take the county of Rimouski as an instance. I have the honor to represent an immense county; the county of Rimouski is one of the largest in the Province of Quebec; it numbers 32 parishes. To make the revision of the lists in the county, requires at least 32 days, or rather 64 days, including the final revision. Now, the opponent of the Government, if he wishes that the revision should be well done, should first devote at least one day to a parish to prove those who have a right to vote and those who have no right to do so. I say one day for a parish, and that is the least that it can take. What are the expenses of the revision for these 32 parishes? He must devote two days to a parish, for he must accompany the revisor at the time of his first visit, and afterwards, at the time of the final revision. In a county like that of Rimouski, let us put the expenses at $5 per day. We consequently arrive at the sum of $160 of expenses imposed upon the opponent of the Government if he wishes that the lists should be proved a little in his favor. Add to this, Mr. Speaker, the loss of time to a professional man, as are the greater part of the members of this House, for him whose livelihood depends upon his profession, is it possible for him to give up the practice of his profession during two or three months of the year, when he has already spent two or three months' time sitting in this House? Still another expense the Government imposes on its opponents: the law requires that if we desire to take any names off the lists, we should be obliged to notify those whose names we desire to take off as not having any right to vote. Well! Let us suppose that in a county of from 5,000 to 6,000 voters, we notify 250 to 300 persons by registered letters, here is an outlay of $25 or $30 imposed upon the opponent of the Government, for it is well known that the Government having appointed its officer, the latter will be very much inclined, notwithstanding his good intentions and his honesty, to give fair play to the Government sooner than to its opponent. Add, besides, what it costs for certificates of baptism, in order to prove who among the farmer's sons are of an age to vote. This expense is also pretty large. A copy of each certificate costs from 20 to 25 cents. But this is not all, Mr. Speaker. In the county of Rimouski, do you know what happened? We notified people by registered letters. Well! these letters were returned to the Dead Letter Office, and here are eleven of them, which I am holding in my hand at this moment, all registered letters. Will they tell me that, again, in this circumstance, we have had fair play? No, Mr. Speaker. There is still something more, and upon this circumstance I shall take the liberty to call the special attention of the hon. Minister of Justice. Here is a list of 50 electors; they are employés of the Intercolonial. I do not wish that these people should be deprived of their votes, but am I to be told that it is just and reasonable that the law should allow them to vote in two or even three counties? I do not believe that such is the intention of the law. Nevertheless, these people have registered their names, some at Point Lévis, others at Rivière du Loup or at Ste. Flavie, and even at Campbellton; in four different divisions. Here are 34 who reside at Rivière du Loup, in the county of Temiscouata.

and at the same time have had themselves registered at Ste. Flavie. Therefore these people, who earn a salary of $450, $500 or $600, have right to vote in two counties. Would it not be easy for us, who are well worth $600, to go and vote in two counties? Is it because these people are the employés of the Government that they are going to have a right to vote in two counties? Is it because they travel upon the Intercolonial that they have the right to vote in two counties? I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that that is the intention of the law. They have been contested before the court, and they have been kept on the lists because it is not known where their home is. Consequently, at the next election these people will vote at Rivière du Loup, or at Ste. Flavie, and should time permit—and, of course, there will be a disposition to place a special train at their service—they will go and vote at Campbellton. Here are 16 others who reside or are looked upon as residing at Campbellton. They come to spend a day, or a night, or sometimes two days at Ste. Flavie, and for that they have been entered upon the lists at Ste. Flavie. Is that the intention of the law? I do not believe it is, and I believe that by drawing the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to this fact—and I also call to it the attention of our hon. leader—we shall see this great injustice done away with. But mark well that this question having been brought before the courts, has unfortunately been decided against us. I shall say no more about this, only that I should cause it to be observed that this is repeated every year. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it can be seen that the length of time required for the revision of the lists is almost incredible. Thus, we began the revision of the lists in the month of June last; we are now almost in the month of March, and we have not got them yet. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having been so good as to give me your attention during the few observations I had to make; but I hope that when the people shall have an opportunity of speaking out their mind about this law, they will come as we have had to come, to disapprove of it.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Before the House comes to a vote upon this question, permit me, Mr. Speaker, to make a very few observations. There is no doubt that the Franchise Act, which, like any other piece of legislation, ought to have been enacted for the advantage of the people, has not met with general approbation, and to say that it is popular in the country would be encroaching a little too much upon the truth. The Liberals to a man execrate it, and you will admit, Sir, that they form a considerable portion of the Dominion—about one-half of the whole people.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). And three-fourths of the honest people.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Not only that, but I have good reason to believe that a large portion of the Conservatives do not like it. They would not proclaim their dislike from the hustings lest it would hurt the interests of their party; but in private conversation from man to man, they admit that it is a piece of legislation which was unnecessary, expensive, and which imposes useless burdens on the country. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, told the House the other day, that a great reduction had been made upon the cost of the last revision of the voters' lists as compared with the first revision, which took place in 1886. He told us that the first revision cost the country from $400,000 to $500,000, and that the last revision cost only something like $151,000.

Mr. HOLTON. That was only for the printing.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I am reminded that this will cover only the expense of the printing of the lists. The Secretary of State further added that he hoped he would be able to bring about a still greater reduction in the future. Well, suppose he does; suppose that the whole thing could be done for $100,000 a year, I say that it is still too much, for $100,000 is a considerable sum of money. It is a useless expenditure, and when it is spent for such an object, which can give no satisfaction to the people, it is nothing else than money wasted. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have told us that this Franchise Act has been approved by the people, because they say that at the last general election the right hon. the Premier was supported at the head of the Government. I do not hold that opinion, for I believe that at the last general election the electors of the country forgave the right hon. gentleman for this new political sin, as they have been in the habit of forgiving him many other sins which he committed during his political career. They supported the right hon. gentleman for the great services which they thought he had rendered this country in the past, and his success was due to his own personal prestige more than to anything else. It is well known that he is himself the embodiment of that party, and that if he should disappear from the political scene the party would have to be reorganised upon another basis, and we would soon see gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches sitting on the Opposition benches. The preparation of the voters' lists is a work which, as every one knows, causes a great deal of trouble, and a great deal of expense and loss of time, to a certain number of people. It is impossible for the revising officer of a district alone to complete the lists. I do not insinuate, or make any complaint against the preparation of the lists in the county which I represent, for the revising officer there, I am pleased to say, is an honest man, and one who would not willingly do the least injustice to any person. Notwithstanding his good-will, his honesty, and his good intentions, it is impossible for him to prepare the voters' lists without the assistance of other persons. How could he find the names of persons who died since the previous revision, or of those who have left the county; how could he add to the list the names of newcomers, and of young men who have come of age during the intervening period? unless the information is given him by persons who interest themselves in the preparation of the lists. We all know that when the time comes for the revision of these lists that both political parties have to keep representatives there in order to see that the name of no one of their friends be omitted, and to see also that no name of an opponent who is not qualified to vote be placed upon the list. This work is exceedingly annoying, troublesome, and expensive, and some other scheme ought to be resorted to. The motion which is before the House proposes the adoption of the Provincial lists which are prepared for the election of members to the Local Legislature. I think, Sir, that experience has taught us that this is the best scheme we can adopt, and that municipal councillors are the best qualified persons to prepare the voters' lists. They generally live in the different sections of the municipality and each one knows perfectly well the persons who died in his section, those who have absented themselves, the names of the newcomers, as well as the names of the young men who have become of age and are entitled to vote. I think that this is the most simple manner in which the work of preparing the lists could be done. From 1867 to 1885 we had five general elections in this country, and at every one of these elections we used the Provincial lists. No one has ever complained of this. Not a voice was raised against the use of these lists, and not a single petition—at least to my knowledge—has been presented to this House asking for a change. On the other hand, since the adoption of the present Franchise Act, every time the lists have been prepared there have been complaints, and in this Parliament there have been protests against it Session after Session. Some hon. gentlemen object to the use of the Provincial lists, on the ground that Provincial Governments might disfranchise a part of the electors; such, they say, as Mr. Mercier has done in disfranchising officials of the Federal Government in the Province of Quebec. I am not prepared to say whether Mr. Mercier was right or wrong in disfranchising some Government officials. I do not know the reason which impelled him to do so, but I can believe that he had a good one. Mr. Mercier, as well as anybody else, knew, I suppose, that in election times great pressure is brought to bear on Government officials, and that although they are told that they may vote freely as they please, yet this is communicated to them in such a way as to let them understand at the same time that if they do not vote for the Federal Government candidates they will run the risk of losing their positions. Mr. Mercier, believing that the right to vote should belong only to free men, and knowing that in many cases Government officials are treated like slaves, considered that that right should not belong to them. I repeat, that I am not prepared to say whether he was right or wrong; that is a subject which requires a good deal of consideration; but I have this to say, that if we want Government officials to vote at elections, they should be protected against the pressure of those who employ them, and should be left perfectly free to vote like men, without running any risk of losing their places if they do not vote according to the wishes of their superior officers. Now, Sir, the assumption that Provincial Governments might disfranchise a part of the electors is, I think, groundless. I do not see what interest the Provincial Governments would have in disfranchising a part of the electors. The lists would be revised every year by the municipal councils. Then, suppose for one moment that for some exceptional reason the Provincial Government should disfranchise the electors of one municipality, these electors would be disfranchised only so far as the local elections would be concerned, and would not be affected as to their rights in the elections of members of this House. Therefore, I say that the use of our Provincial lists for the election of members to this House could not in any way affect the interests or the integrity of this House. For instance, the Province of Quebec is entitled to sixty-five representatives in this House of Commons. Well, let Quebec elect them under the franchise established by the Local Government. What does it matter to me that Prince Edward Island elects the six members to whom that Province is entitled in this House, by manhood suffrage or by a franchise based on property qualification? All that this House has to do is to see that Quebec sends only sixty-five representatives here, and that Prince Edward Island sends only six, without considering under what franchise they were elected. Now, Sir, we were told the other day by the hon. Secretary of State that when we used the Provincial lists for the election of members to this House, it happened in some municipalities that electors voted on old lists which had not been revised for a couple of years. That is quite true; but, Sir, that was the exception and not the rule. For several years more attention has been given in the different municipalities to the preparation of the lists every year. But even suppose it should be the case, as the hon. Secretary of State says, in a few municipalities; things would not be in a worse condition than they have been and will continue to be with the lists prepared under the Dominion Franchise Act, because we are told that those lists will only be revised every two or three years. Suppose that some consideration of the public interest had induced the Government last summer to dissolve Parliament and have a general election, the electors would have been compelled to vote on a list which had been prepared three years before; and this would not have been the exception, but it would have been the rule throughout the whole Dominion. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Public Works, the other day, told us that this Franchise Act is the basis of our existence. Sir, I will take the liberty of dissenting from that opinion. From 1867 to 1885 we existed without this Franchise Act, and during that period we accomplished a great many things. We displayed sufficient vigor to spend a great deal of money; we organised all the Departments of this Government; we executed great public works; we improved our internal navigation; we constructed the Intercolonial Railway; we also constructed that gigantic work the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think these achievements are sufficient to show that we have had a vigorous life without the existence of the present Franchise Act. No, Sir; the basis of our existence, in my humble judgment, lies in a full and honest application of the federal principle in the management of our political system. In a country like Canada, where we have a population composed of different races, speaking different languages, professing different creeds, and having different habits, there is but one way of maintaining among the various sections of our people a common interest, a bond of union, a feeling of brotherhood—in a word, a love of country—and that is, by upholding a political system which will give sufficient protection to every section of the people. That system, Sir, is the federal system; and I hold that the best friends of this country will be found among those who endeavor to apply in all its fulness the federal principle to the administration of our public affairs, whilst those who would centralise the administration of our affairs in Ottawa will soon find that their work has been productive of deplorable results. If we are going to gradually encroach upon the jurisdiction of the Local Governments in questions which legitimately belong to their domain, we will open the door to discontent, disturbance and perhaps, in the end, disunion. I repeat that the best way to keep this country in peace and to shut the door to any cause of disturbance is to uphold as much as possible the federal principle; but if the Government are determined to keep control over the preparation of voters' lists for the election of members to this House, they should resort to some way of amending the present law in order to render the preparation of those lists more simple and easy. I know that expression has been given to the opinion that the adoption of manhood suffrage would greatly simplify the preparation of the lists. I concur in the opinion that it would, but, on the other hand, I do not think that this principle would meet with general favor in this House. I know that hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, as well as the leader of the Opposition, are hostile to that proposition; and I venture to say that the elections which have just taken place in the German Empire and have resulted in great gains to the Socialists are not perhaps calculated to create a feeling of sympathy with universal suffrage. I believe, however, that the objections which militate against that principle in the old European societies do not exist on the young Continent of America, and it is my humble opinion that before long that principle will rule from one end of America to the other. I believe that even in our country the next generation will tolerate no other suffrage; but, be that as it may, I am free to say that though I have always admired the principle of manhood suffrage, yet I would not like to see its application here on account of the electoral corruption to which it generally gives rise. In conclusion, I think that the Government could do no better than do away with the present Franchise Act and adopt for the election of members to this House the provincial lists. Let our lists be made according to the franchises which the people of the different Provinces choose, whether manhood suffrage or suffrage based on the ownership of property. This is a question which ought to be settled by the Provincial Governments, as they are best fitted to know the franchises most in harmony with the education, the instincts, and the tendencies of the people.

Mr. BRIEN. I had not the honor of a seat in this House during the memorable debate in 1885, when this abominable legislation was placed on our Statute-book. I believe that the resolution now before the House, proposed by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), is one which voices the sentiment of nine-tenths of the people of this country, as well as nine-tenths of the members of this House, if the latter could free themselves from their party ties. I believe this specially to be the case under present circumstances, when our general interests, both agricultural and manufacturing, are in a depressed condition. One of the strongest objections against this Act is the large expenditure it creates. We, who have had experience in assisting at the revision of these lists, know too well how heavy the expenditure is, and can speak with no uncertain sound. In the constituency I have the honor to represent, the first revision alone cost the Reform party the sum of $700, and I presume it cost our opponents as much, making a total of $1,400 for one constituency. This system has cost the country directly through the Government, $420,000, as shown by the Public Accounts, and if we add to that the cash outlay in the constituencies, taking South Essex as an average, that outlay, amounting to $300,000 in all, would make a total of $720,000. But that is not all, for there is the additional expense to the voters in attending the revision of the lists, in order to see that justice is done. I am positive that, altogether, the Act does not cost the country less than $1,000,000 a year. Besides this, I believe that the sentiment of the country at present is in favor of a more liberal franchise than is given under this Act. It is to be regretted that the right hon. gentleman, in introducing this measure, did not more thoroughly explain it, for if it were intended that industrious citizens, as hon. gentlemen opposite represent, should all have a vote, that intention has not been carried out, for to-day, when wages are in a depressed condition, every industrious man has not a vote and cannot obtain it. In looking over the report of the Bureau of Industries of Ontario, I find that the wages of farm laborers, who are hired by the year with board, are $157, and without board, $250. This shows distinctly that there is a very large class of useful, industrious and intelligent citizens who are deprived of the franchise, owing to the franchise income being more than they can earn. Besides, the law is very disagreeable in its application, inasmuch as it demands an investigation into the private affairs of individuals in order to ascertain the ownership of land or property of any kind, and when all this is done, there are many who are deprived of voting, owing to the impossibility of their earning the amount prescribed by this Act, namely, $300. Hon. gentlemen in this House will readily understand how difficult it may be for laboring men or any other class to figure up and retain in their minds the exact amount they earn. I have seen men placed on the stand for an hour, trying their best to figure up the amount, which it was impossible for them to entirely recollect. Under the provincial law, in 1886, the income of wage-earners required was $250, and non-residents were not given a vote. "One man, one vote," was the principle, which I think is a good one; but, even after deducting the number of non-residents, there is a larger number on these lists than appears on the federal lists. As has been frequently stated in this House, we also think it is a violation of the federal principle. We think this right should have been left to the Provinces entirely. There may not be in our Constitution so much objection to the Federal Government taking the power to make that list if they see fit, but I think it is only a power which should be considered a reserved power, and should be used only in case of an emergency. The strength of a Government does not particularly depend upon the possession of power, but upon judicious and wise administration. I am somewhat surprised to listen to the arguments of hon. members opposite, who speak as though the Provinces had some evil design or some revenge to seek upon the Federal Government. The absurdity of that argument is manifest when we consider how Confederation was brought about in the first place. Is not the Federal Government the offspring of the Provinces? Then, if this child has proved a wise and good child, there is no danger of the Provinces desiring to weaken the Federal Government in any way. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) said, the other night, that he would be willing to keep this measure on the Statute-book even if it cost twice as much as it has. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will be willing to do so; it will cost, at that rate, as I think I have proved, two million dollars for every revision, which would be ten million dollars for every Parliament. I think that is more than this country is able to bear. With all the oratory and all the argumentative power of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, they have not shown a single argument for the existence of this statute which is tenable in any way at all. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) also seemed to desire to attribute the national sentiment that should exist in this country to such legislation as this Franchise Bill. If the national sentiment of this country depends upon such legislation as this, God help the national sentiment, for I am sure it is not based on a very sound foundation. Another strong reason why this resolution should carry is that the Provincial Government have to deal with the everyday matters of the people, they are more in touch with the people, they understand more thoroughly the wishes, sentiments and desires of the people. No stronger proof of this can be shown than the fact that nearly all the Provincial Governments are to-day Liberal. This Act is like most of the enactments of a Tory character—retrograde—and I hope the House to-night will adopt the motion of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), and will remove this mark of Cain from the Statute-book forever.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to say only a very few words in regard to this matter. In the first place, the Dominion Franchise Act is very generally objected to by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I do not object to it, for, defective as it may be, and it is impossible for anyone to say it is perfect, though it has been very much improved, still, I say the Ontario Elections Act is a great deal worse, even in the very features in which it is claimed that the Dominion Act is so bad.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In what way?

Mr. DAWSON. That is as regards my district. The difficulty there is to get the voters' names on the list, and even now that they have adopted manhood suffrage in Ontario, the assessors, either through misfortune or neglect—I would be sorry to say through intention—have left off a great many names, and on one occasion, when the matter was brought before the judge, he reprimanded them very sternly on that account. But there are many other objections to the Ontario Elections Act which I shall allude to presently. No new measure, when brought forward at first, can be expected to work very smoothly, and every great measure is susceptible of improvement. No doubt this Dominion Franchise Act is susceptible of amendment, and I think it might be very greatly improved in my district by diminishing the size of the polling districts, which, in order to meet, in some measure, the conditions of the Act as to the population required, are now made much too large. Generally speaking, they are much larger than ordinary election districts in Ontario. Some of them are more than 100 miles in length from east to west or from north to south, and it is very difficult to get the voters to the polls; the Ontario law is equally defective. The same difficulty is experienced under the Ontario system, and the difficulties arise as much from the nature of the country as from anything else. In such a district I believe the only true system is household suffrage. Another objection to the Ontario franchise is that the secrecy of the ballot is not sufficiently provided for. The ballot has been adopted as a principle in the election of members for the Dominion and in all the Provinces of the Dominion, but the Ontario Act is so framed that the secrecy of the ballot is not regarded. When voters come to the polls, they know it can be found out how they vote, and there thus exists a means of exercising influence over them in certain cases, and this is very objectionable. I believe that the Act will be amended during the present Session of the Ontario Legislature; at present sufficient secrecy is not attached to the ballot under the law of that Province. Then, in reference to this question of manhood suffrage which has been spoken of by several hon. gentlemen, I do not think that, if it were properly explained to the people of Ontario, in respect to its nature and in regard to what it leads to, it would be popular. Take, for instance, a district in which there are five thousand electors. They possess the land, they are the owners of that district, they look upon it as being theirs, and they look to their children inheriting it after they are gone. Tell these five thousand electors, and make it perfectly plain and palpable to them, that five thousand navvies in some large city, men who have newly come to the country, who have been here only a sufficient time to entitle them to manhood suffrage, men who have nothing at stake, who have no interest in the country, will have as much to say in the legislation of the country as they themselves would. When put clearly in view before the electors I think they will be very unlikely to approve of it, and manhood suffrage would not be very popular among them. Now, with regard to the revising barristers, I would be sorry to believe that they could be at all tampered with in any part of the Dominion; at all events in the district which I have the honor to represent, the breath of suspicion has not even attached to them from either side. There are two revising barristers in Algoma, one in the western part of the district and one in the eastern part; one of them, I believe, formerly belonged to one stripe of politics, and the other to the other stripe; but in neither case has it ever been for a moment suggested that they were capable of being influenced either one way or the other. They have acted with the strictest impartiality, and no one has even called their integrity in question. They have certainly very arduous duties to perform in such an enormous district, a district 1,100 miles in length and 700 in width, and with settlements scattered among islands. It is very difficult for them to get over it, and no doubt, notwithstanding their exertions of last summer, a good many names have been left off the list. But that is also the case with the Ontario lists, and it arises from the necessities of the case. They cannot avoid it. In that vast district the population has been increasing very much of late years. It is now—I mean the district—divided by the Government of Ontario into no less than four judicial districts;

the district of Rainy River on the west, which is of itself a vast territory; the district of Thunder Bay, the district of Eastern Algoma, and the district of Manitoulin; all of them very large, and all of them now very populous districts. They still have only one representative in this House, but they have two representatives in the Local Legislature, and I hope the day is not far distant when they may have two or three or more representatives in this Parliament. I mention these things in order to show that an immense labor is thrown upon the revising barristers. We hear a great deal of the exodus, and of people leaving the country and never returning to it. That is a thing, Sir, which, in the district I have the honor to represent, we do not hear spoken of.

Mr. McMULLEN. Because they cannot get out of it.

Mr. DAWSON. They are coming in every day and the population is increasing every summer. Fifteen years ago the white population in that district was under 5,000 souls; now we have a population exceeding 70,000, according to the best estimates that can be given. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot point to any exodus from that district. They talk about our population going to Dakota and the Western States, but I am happy to be able to assure this House that many very substantial settlers from Ontario and elsewhere are spreading over Algoma, attracted to it by the lumber trade, attracted there by the mining, and attracted by the fisheries, which are now becoming very extensive. I will mention one fact which may astonish the members of this House. Some years ago, when I was speaking of the great lakes, I suggested that the day was, perhaps, not far distant when the shipping passing through by Sault Ste. Marie would probably equal that of the Suez Canal. Well, Sir, I am now in a position to inform this House that during the past summer, in the short period of six months, a greater amount of shipping passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal than ever passed through the great Suez Canal in one year. The shipping passing through the Sault Ste. Marie last summer amounted to 7,500,000 tons, and the Suez Canal has never reached that amount of actual net tonnage.

An hon. MEMBER. Speak of the Franchise Bill.

Mr. DAWSON. The Franchise Bill covers the District of Algoma; and, I think, the information I am giving is of interest to the House. In another part of the district a large fleet of vessels will be found in an inland lake; we have now twenty-two steamers plying on that little inland sea, the Lake of the Woods. Sir, I merely rose to express my faith in the Franchise Act. I believe the Franchise Act is susceptible of improvement; that it will be amended from year to year. We must give our friends of the Opposition great credit for helping to improve it; and, I think, it is susceptible of being made a very good Act. I hope the time will come when we shall see a uniform Dominion franchise—the same franchise in Prince Edward Island that we have in Ontario, and the same franchise in British Columbia that we have in Manitoba.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before this question is put on this matter, I desire to make some remarks with respect to this electoral law and to enter my protest against it. I am the more warranted to do so, as this law was discussed on all the hustings, in all the public meetings, at the time of the last election, and as my opponent, who was one of the supporters of this measure—which has been very severely criticised up to the present time—was not accepted by the constituency, I pledged myself to make every effort to cause it to be repealed. I am opposed to this Act because I consider it was passed for political purposes, and it would be more courageous of the Government, should they take the responsibility of it and state that this Act was passed in order to keep them in power, and that they desire it to be kept in our Statute-book, in order to preserve themselves in power. I must state at once, Mr. Speaker, that I am not opposed to the principle of this law, so far as it extends the franchise, and the best proof I can give of this, is that, at the beginning of the Session, I placed on the Order paper a Bill for the purpose of causing the franchise to be still further extended, that is to say, to give the right of vote to farmers' sons who absent themselves during six months of the year, to students and to fishermen. We know that, according to the law such as it existed before last year, these people could absent themselves without using their right of vote, but I believe that through inadvertence, clause 7 of the statute was repealed, and they are now deprived of their vote. As I desire that all these people, who side, I state it with pleasure, with the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec and even in the Dominion of Canada, should have a right to vote; I say that I am in favor of the principle of this Bill, inasmuch as it extends the franchise, but I am opposed to this Act, because it is too expensive and because it is impossible to put it into force. I say, moreover, that this Act was passed for purely political purposes, and the best illustration I can give of this and the best proof that it was especially put into the Statute-book in order to the control of the Dominion elections, is that the most devoted leaders of the Conservative party were appointed in all the counties to administer it; and when the Conservative leaders were too honest, leaders disqualified for fraudulent electoral practices were appointed. In my county there were two men disqualified for fraudulent electoral practices. Well, of these two men, one was the Conservative candidate, and the other the revising officer during the last election. The Government cannot plead ignorance of the fact that their revising officer was condemned by the courts for fraudulent electoral practices, for during the very first Session I had the honor to sit in this House, I brought this question before the House, and I quoted the judgment disqualifying Mr. Hubert Hébert for fraudulent practices. If the hon. Minister of Justice desires to verify the fact, he has only to refer to Vol. 9 of the Quebec Law Report, page 35, and he will see, in the case of Bernatchez and Fortin, that the Hon. Justices Routhier, Plamondon and Angers rendered the judgment of which I have just spoken, disqualifying this Mr. Hubert Hébert. Nevertheless, in 1885, when this electoral law was passed, in spite of there being, in the county of Montmagny, very respectable Conservatives and men who deserved the position much more than Mr. Hubert Hébert, the Government hastened to appoint this same disqualified gentleman to the office of revising officer. Is it not the plainest proof that if this electoral law was passed, it was with the sole purpose of controlling the electorate and of putting into the hands of the Conservative headmen, particularly the least scrupulous, the revision of the electoral lists? Now we are told: But this Act you wish to be repealed and, nevertheless, there are no complaints about it, there are no petitions asking for its repeal laid upon the Table of this House. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Government is not serious. Does not the Government take our complaints as a protest? Were not the votes cast for the Liberals at the last elections complaints and protests against this electoral law? For it is well known that at the last elections, the electoral campaign was especially fought upon this electoral law. Is the Government ignorant of the speeches made, and the votes recorded by 70 or 80 Liberals, asking for the repeal of this law? Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, does not the Government know that the hon. members for Montcalm (Mr. Thérien), for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) and for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), rose in this House, and entered their protest by their voice and their vote against this iniquitous law? Is the Government waiting to see the statutes seized upon and their leaves torn away to show that there are complaints against this law? When members are seen to rise one after the other and ask for the repeal of this law, it is still said that there is no complaint, that there is no protest, and of all this no account is taken. But, Mr. Speaker, I might retort the argument against the Government, and say to them, if there are no complaints against this law, were there any more against the Provincial law? Did the Government which put aside the Provincial law, which had existed for twenty years, show that there were any complaints against that law? Did the Government lay before the House any petitions asking that that law should be removed from the municipal councils? Far from that, the people were not even consulted; this Bill was brought up in the House on the eve of the elections, for the purpose, as I have stated, of placing the control of the electors' votes in the hands of the friends of the Government, and it would be much more courageous of the Government, should they say: we had this law passed in 1885, so that we should be kept in power by controlling the votes at the elections then approaching, and we are keeping it with the same end, in view of future elections. Now, Mr. Speaker, another reason which has been given is that the law is too expensive. Well, I believe that the best reason, that the best protest which can be given against the Government, and against this law, are the measures which the Government introduce at each Session to suspend its carrying out. We contend that the law is too expensive, and we show by public documents, and the report of the Auditor General, that it has cost upwards of half a million of dollars up to the present time. The best reason, showing that it is too expensive, lies in the fact that the hon. Secretary of State himself stated in his speech that if this law was to cost from $150,000 to $160,000 a year, it should not be carried out, and it was shown that it has cost more than that. Therefore, when a law is too expensive to be carried out, does it not carry in itself the germs of its death? When a law is so expensive that the Government is bound to suspend it at every Session, in order not to spend the people's money, what is then the reason for keeping it, if the reason is not a political one? Can it not be seen that the only object is to keep into the hands of the Government, and of its friends, that electoral machinery which is so useful in the elections. Notwithstanding all these protests, and in spite of what was said by the hon. the Secretary of State in his speech on behalf of the Government, it is not carried out, because it is too expensive, and yet they keep it in the Statute-book. Well, I believe that this excuse is a lame one. Has a Minister ever been heard to say: Here is a law sanctioned by the Legislature, and, however, it is suspended because it is too expensive? I believe that this is the only law throughout the country ever suspended in this way; and I believe a good many members should be suspended with it. Well, the fact that they are bound to suspend a law, is the best proof that it cannot be carried out. I might add that the members on this side of the House are not alone in complaining about this Act. Does not the Government know that the Gazette of Montreal, the organ of the member for Cardwell, does not the Government know that the Toronto World, and a crowd of Conservative members, have stated that this law is too expensive and that it should be repealed? I say then that our duty, as Liberal members, elected principally upon this question in order to defend our electors, is to record our votes in the way I, for one, shall record mine. Now, the hon. Secretary of State has made a statement which is not accurate. I believe that he made it in good faith, for I am satisfied that he had no intention of deceiving this House. This is what he said in his speech.

"Now, speaking of the Province from which I come, I may say that for the last twenty-five years, on an average, we have never had elections on which the lists were not two or three years old."

Well, I believe that this is impossible, I believe that there cannot be more than a county or two—perhaps the county of Terrebonne is one of these exceptions—where the lists are not made every spring. The municipal law of the Province of Quebec requires that the lists should be prepared from the 1st to the 15th of March each year, and that, under a penalty of $200 against the secretary or mayor of the municipality. It is well known that the secretary prepares these lists, and that they are revised from the 15th to the 30th March. If they are not, they become law by the simple lapse of time. Well, if the lists are made every year, how can the elections take place under lists three or four years old? It is absolutely impossible. It is only under the Dominion Act that elections are carried on, on lists two or three years old. If we consider what happened at the time of the last revision, we shall see the disadvantage of holding elections on lists three or four years old. Thus, in my county, there was a difference of at least 800 names on the new list. Nearly 300 names were taken off and about 450 were added to it. Thus, if there had been an election in my county before this last revision; in other words, if the lists of 1885 had been voted by, would such parties as should have registered their votes four years after the first list, be really electors of the county? Would that have been really the vote of the electors of the county? Assuredly not.

Let us take, for instance, the election in the county of Richelieu, which took place last autumn, when my hon. friend (Mr. Massue) whom I see here, personally with pleasure, although politically I should have preferred to see his opponent here, was elected. Can my hon. friend from Richelieu speak here as the representative of the electors of Richelieu? Can he say that the electors of the county voted for or against him? For, in that county, there may be a difference of 1,000 or 1,200 votes; the town of Sorel alone may cause a considerable difference. Well, can a member elected in 1889, under the lists of 1885, rise in this House and say that he is the representative of the county? I say, no; and I say that that is one of the inconveniences of this law. I say that that is an encroachment upon the liberties of the people. And, were there only this reason, I say that this law should be repealed. Mr. Speaker, I shall not say any more about this, but I did not want to allow this opportunity to pass without recording my protest, particularly when we hear the hon. members on the other side, although those among them who uphold this law are very few, and that those who approve of it are still fewer, say that there is no protest against the law. Well, I, for one, stand up to record a protest in behalf of my county. And if it is still claimed that no requests or petitions have been presented to this House asking for the repeal of this Act, the Government must take into consideration the speeches made in this House by the hon. members on this side. With these observations, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I shall vote for the motion now before the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) paid a very doubtful compliment to the measure under discussion when he asserted that the franchise law was susceptible of being made a good law. I doubt whether his assertion is correct, because I do not believe it is possible to divest that Act of its objectionable features. It never can be made a good Act, because it never can be made a just Act. It is an Act which places on the Statute-book a set of machinery to accomplish a purpose which was better effected without it. The hon. gentleman told us the operation of the Ontario law, in regard to the creation of the voters' lists, was not satisfactory in Algoma, and a moment afterwards he admitted that the operation of the Dominion law was equally unsatisfactory. I apprehend the difficulty in both cases to be that in Algoma, a vast and sparsely settled country, the institutions are in a formative stage, and matters will not be in the same condition when the municipal institutions have been brought to bear on all the localities in that great region. The Ontario Act, the hon. gentleman says, is not as good as the Dominion Act, because the ballot cannot be made secret. That objection does not apply to the Dominion election law. All the use of the Ontario Act is to give us a list, and our own law will provide as to the mode of casting the ballot, and if the Ontario law is deficient in that respect, it has, at all events, no bearing on the question before us. Manhood suffrage, the hon. gentleman has told us, will not be popular in Ontario. That is a question on which there is great difference of opinion. The Ontario Legislature, in adopting manhood suffrage, acted in accordance with the opinion that seems to have actuated the present Government in retaining manhood suffrage in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. So far as the suffrage of the Dominion is concerned, it strikes me that any taxpayer ought to be a voter, and there is no citizen of the Dominion, twenty-one years of age, who is not a taxpayer under the operation of the tariff we have in this country, which is about to be revised by the Minister of Finance in a way probably to exact some more money from voters who are of age. I think we may claim that the payment of taxes should entitle any man who pays them to a vote, and every citizen of the Dominion, every British subject, contributes sufficient to the revenue to entitle him to a vote if he takes a sufficient interest in public affairs. The hon. gentleman says that an attack has been made on the revising barristers. In the course of this debate I have not heard any unfavorable criticisms with respect to the conduct of revising barristers. It is not the conduct of revising barristers of which we complain, but the character of the law, the unnecessary law which imposes on the country a very expensive double machinery at great public inconvenience. I am happy to say that the very great majority of the revising barristers discharged their functions impartially and justly. As regard the revising barrister in my own riding, who unfortunately died recently, the duties could not have been more impartially, more justly, and more honestly discharged than they were performed by that gentleman. But that is not the objection we have to this Bill. The fact that there is a yearly occurrence here of the discussion of this matter attests the fact that there unquestionably exists in the country a great amount of popular disgust, not dissatisfaction only, but disgust with this Act. It is a legislative abortion, nothing more and nothing less, and the attempts made by the Minister of Justice to lick this Bill into shape, so that it can be worked, have proved abortive, because the thing cannot be done. The law is universally unpopular. I assert this, and I believe it to be true. I do not believe, if you could arrive at the private opinions of hon. gentlemen who support the Government, you would find half a dozen who would not pronounce the Act unnecessary, oppressive, vexatious and unduly expensive.

My colleague from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) the other night, in defending this Act, dropped an observation which showed very clearly where the shoe was pinching him. After defending the Bill, he wished it could be managed so as to work more cheaply. I have no doubt his experience recently with respect to the revision of the list in his riding has left him with the impression that it would be a fine thing if the Act could be worked more cheaply, that he, in common with all other hon. members who had to attend to the revision of the list, has wished that the Bill could be worked more cheaply if not worked out of existence altogether.

The Secretary of State, in his defence of the Act, admitted that its operation is so expensive it would not do to have a new list every year, although the Act introduced in 1885 provided that there should be an annual revision of the list, and that the revision should be completed by the 30th November of each year. Yet the hon. gentleman rose and told us that owing to the expense of the revision, it was not advisable to have a list every year. The fact that there was no revision from 1886 to 1889 is a confession on the part of the Government that the Bill is unnecessary and that the country will not stand this large outlay every year. Are we to have this state of things continued? Are we to have a revision of the list once in three years, or possibly once in two years? Suppose there had been some crisis, and we are always liable to have a crisis here, and a dissolution had followed last year, we would have had an election held over the whole Dominion on a list three years old, and not a voter under 24 years of age could have cast a vote. It is an outrage on the liberties of the subject to leave this country in such a position that we are liable to have a general election held on a voters' list three years old; and if this Bill is one that the Government cannot revise every year on account of the expense, it is better that the law should be swept away. The law is an abuse of the Government's power, and of the privileges they possess, and it is an outrage on the people. I presume, from what I hear, the list of 1889 is to be the list on which the next election will be held. We may have another Session of this House, and perhaps two more Sessions; it is probable that the First Minister may wait, until after the census returns of 1891 are received, to gerrymander the constituencies of the Dominion, and he may hold an early Session for that purpose. I quite look forward to a general election in 1892 taking place on the revision of last year, for I apprehend from the statements of the Secretary of State that the Government do not think of incurring further expense in that regard. It has been shown that the return of expenses already incurred on the list of 1889 amounted to upwards of $150,000. I suppose there has been no return made of the expenses of the revising barristers, each of whom will receive a salary of from $400 to $500, and these with other expenses will swell the expenditure for the revision of 1889 to a quarter of a million of dollars. The Government shrink, and very properly so, from inflicting on the country such extra outlay. They have this miserable measure, and it is necessary to have a revision only once in three years in order to save expense. What I condemn is the uselessness of having adopted such a measure.

The Secretary of State told us in the course of his speech the other night that the discussion on this Bill in 1885 was a scandalous discussion. The hon. gentleman made a slight mistake; the statement he should have made was that the Bill under discussion was a scandalous Bill. What was the character of the Bill? Here it is in all its naked deformity as it appeared when first introduced. It contemplated a legislative fraud, nothing more and nothing less, and the Opposition on this side of the House fought that fraud for months, and finally reduced it to its present shape, divested of some of its most objectionable features, and made of it a legislative bungle as the best thing that could be done with it. What did it provide among other things? In the second section of the Bill I find that a person means a man married or unmarried, including an Indian, and the First Minister told us that this would include the Indians of Ontario, Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, and the barbarous Indians of the North-West, and Sioux, Crees and Blackfeet; and we discussed this question, we fought this item for days and days before we could obtain any modification whatever. Finally we came down to a settlement upon the civilised Indians in the older Provinces, but the original contemplation of this Bill was to invest the whole Indian population, the wards of the Government, with the franchise. Nothing but the opposition of the members on this side of the House prevented the perpetration of this great outrage, and yet, this was the scandalous discussion that the hon. the Secretary of State alluded to in his speech the other day. What were the provisions of this Bill with regard to the revising barristers? The revising barrister, according to the original Bill, was simply required to be a barrister of five years' standing, and what were his powers? He was empowered to prepare, to revise, and to complete the lists. He was the autocrat in whose hands was placed the power to make the list, to revise the list, to publish the list, and power was also given him to do this in almost any way he chose. He could consult any source of information for the purpose of determining in his mind who he should put on and who he should leave off the list, and if the subject desired to appeal from his decision he was allowed to appeal, only provided that the revising barrister had a mind to let him do so.

Mr. MULLOCK. That was on a question of law.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; and on a question of fact the aggrieved person could not appeal at all. The question of fact was likely to be more important than a question of law, and would involve whether a man had qualification to go on the list, whether he was of age, and a dozen other things which might be settled by evidence, if an arbitrary revising officer ruled against that man unjustly, we then had the proposition of the original Bill to deny an appeal altogether on a question of fact, and to allow it on a question of law, only if the revising barrister wished. That was a provision in this scandalous Bill which we had under discussion for several months. This discussion, which lasted until some time in July, left this measure in the shape in which it went on the Statute-book; a useless Act, a cumbersome Act, an expensive Act, an Act that started another set of machinery to do what could be better done with the machinery already in existence. A result of the discussion was, that the Government were obliged to drop some of the palpable frauds intended to be perpetrated when the Bill was introduced.

The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) stated the other night that the discussion upon this question made us the laughing-stock of the country. I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct in that. There was a very great amount of indignation existing in the country with regard to this Bill, and the people as a rule have approved of the course taken by the Opposition in striving to get it repealed, or, at all events, to have it placed on the Statute-book in the least objectionable form. The hon. member for Montreal also said that the Bill was not discussed on the hustings, and that statement is also incorrect. In my own riding, as was the case generally throughout Ontario, it was one of the leading points discussed. The indignation with regard to this Bill in 1885 led to the defeat of the Government candidates in many ridings where they had majorities previously, and where members had been returned to support the Government before that time. The hon. gentleman also told us that we forced the Government to pay an extra indemnity. I suppose the Government was forced to pay an extra indemnity to keep its members here to carry this Bill, and in that way we may have forced the Government to bribe its members to stay here to perpetrate a wrong by giving them an extra $500 apiece. "Any way," says the hon. member, "we are satisfied with this Bill." Of course they are, but why? "Because it continues us in power," he says. Exactly. They introduced the Bill for the purpose of continuing them in power, they proposed to continue to perpetrate this great outrage on the principles of justice in order to continue them in power; the Bill in its operation is designed for that purpose; the Bill accomplishes that purpose, and consequently the member for Montreal (Mr. Curran) is satisfied with it.

Let me again ask, what necessity was there for this Bill? Was there any dissatisfaction existing in this Dominion with regard to the franchise we had since Confederation? Had there been a single voice raised in protest against the use of the Provincial franchise for the purpose of sending members to this House of Commons? On the contrary, Sir, this system had worked with the utmost smoothness; there had been no complaint, there was no popular demand for a change, nor was there even a whisper from the people asking for a change in the direction made by the Government. Did this system improve the system previously in use? I claim it did not. I claim further, that it is perfectly proper that the franchise should have been controlled by the Province, it being a civil right, and the control of civil rights being guaranteed to the Provinces by the 92nd section of the British North America Act. The Federal Government should not have interfered with the exercise of this civil right by the Local Legislatures. Each Province sends to this Parliament a certain number of representatives. They are the representatives of that Province; they enter this Federal House representing the Province from which they come, and surely it is proper that the Province sending representatives to this Parliament should themselves arrange the franchise on which those representatives should be elected. I believe that, on the broad principle of civil right, the interference of this Government, by the passage of this franchise law, was an usurpation of authority. The municipality machinery by which the voters' lists are created in the Province, is the most proper, the most economical, and the most efficient system by which it could be done. In every municipality in Ontario there is a township council composed of five members, coming from the different wards of the township. These gentlemen, from the assessment rolls, and from other sources of information, form the voters' lists. It is subjected to revision before a court composed of this council, and any person in the municipality who deems that his name ought to be put on that list, or, who believes that some name is on the list which should not be there, may appear, without expense, before that court of revision and have the error corrected. Then there is the final revision before the judge of the county, and the system is a perfect one, inexpensive, efficient, speedy, and, in every respect, a striking contrast to the operations of the Dominion franchise law.

Now, Sir, this law which we condemn was professedly drawn from English precedent. The name "revising barrister" is a name copied from the English Act; but was there anything in the circumstances of the two countries that were parallel? Were there any similar circumstances in the Dominion of Canada and in the Government of Great Britain that made the case parallel in any sense whatever? In Great Britain there is one voters' list, and not two. In Great Britain the lists are formed by the overseers of the poor, who are municipal officers, elected by the people, and they are revised by the revising barrister, as they are in the Province of Ontario by the county judge. The English revising barrister is not a Government appointee, but a legal officer appointed by the court. His duties are purely legal; he has nothing to do with the Government, and they cannot exercise any influence upon him, nor can they secure his appointment or dismissal. When these lists are formed by the overseers of the poor they are revised by the legal officer, and the Government does not intervene in the formation of these lists in any way whatever. Compare that system with ours, and what do we find? You find that the revising barrister here is a Government official, and that he holds office during the pleasure of the Government. He is not appointed to revise the work of somebody else—of overseers of the poor, of township councils, or of municipal officers of any description; but he is appointed to discharge the functions of all of these—the functions of a council, of municipal officers, of a judge—to do the whole thing; he is to make the list, revise the list, and publish the list. He is a creature of the Government, and he is responsible to the Government alone. He may be an honest man, and discharge his duties faithfully and honestly, or he may be a scoundrel and play into the hands of the Government, and by his action reverse the decision of the people in many ridings; and when this official has discharged his duty, the lists are brought down here to be printed in a Government office under the supervision of the Government. There is no check on the Government whatever: they may perpetrate any rascalities or forgeries or outrages, and the people have no recourse. The whole system is a legislative abortion, to say the least of it, under which the people are at the mercy of the Government and their officials.

A good many references have been made in the course of the discussion of this Franchise Act to United States precedents, and I will refer to a few of them. My hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) in the course of his remarks said that we cannot have a nation anywhere under the federal system without federal control of the franchise. The hon. gentleman has not read history very closely, I think. The American Republic is a nation, and the very first steps taken with regard to the franchise in that country was to hand the matter over so the states in federal elections, just as we did in Canada for eighteen years. The hon. gentleman also told us that the federal elections and the states elections did not take place on the same voters' lists or on the same day. Again the hon. gentleman is very wide of the truth. The elections of the United States, both state and national, are held on the first Tuesday of November. Formerly, two states, I believe, Ohio and Pennsylvania, held their state elections in October—I speak subject to correction; but those two states have changed their practice, and now hold all their elections, state and federal, simultaneously on the first Tuesday of November; and now, throughout the whole United States, on the same day, and with the same rolls, elections are held for members of Congress, for electors who elect the president, for members of the state assemblies, for officers of the state, and for county officers.

The hon. Secretary of State tells us that the franchise in the United States is uniform. He says there was no difficulty in arranging that the state franchises should be the national franchise, because the state franchises in that country were uniform. I can inform that hon. gentleman that when the law was adopted by the constitutional convention of 1787, the franchises of the various states were not uniform, but that, on the contrary, there was a greater diversity in them than exists in the franchises of the Provinces of Canada to-day. If that hon. gentleman will turn to Elliott's reports of the debates on the Federal Constitution, he will find, on page 654 of vol. 4, the following statement with regard to the franchises that existed in the thirteen states that formed the American Union at the time of the adoption of the constitution: In Maine, citizenship and three months' state residence; in New Hampshire, residence and payment of taxes; in Massachusetts, citizenship, one year's state and six months' district residence and payment of taxes; in Connecticut, citizens in freehold and six months' residence, or one year's performance of militia duty, or paying a tax, blacks excepted; in Vermont, one year's residence; in New York, citizenship, a certain state and district residence, having paid tax, or performed militia duty, or been assessed, or having labored on highway, freehold for people of color; in New Jersey, one year's county residence and an estate worth £50 proclamation money; in Pennsylvania, citizenship, two years' residence and payment of taxes; in Delaware, two years' residence and payment of taxes, blacks excepted; Maryland, citizenship, state residence of one year, county or city, six months, blacks excluded; in Virginia, white male citizen, twenty-one years of age, district residence, freeholder or leaseholder; in North Carolina, freehold and a year's residence; in South Carolina, citizenship, two years' state residence, a freehold, or six months' district residence and payment of taxes, blacks excluded; in Georgia, citizenship, six months' county residence and payment of taxes, if assessed. These were the qualifications for voters in state elections for the thirteen states that comprised the American Union in 1787; and, yet, the hon. Secretary of State tells us that the reason the United States Constitutional Convention found it practicable to adopt the state franchises for the election of members of Congress and President, was that those franchises were all uniform, while in reality there was a greater disparity in them than existed in the Provincial franchises in Canada when this franchise law was introduced.

Well, Sir, instead of English example in this matter, which is not at all parallel or similar, it would probably have been more convenient to pay attention to American example which is exactly parallel and similar, because we know that the United States Constitutional Convention had to grapple with a question of exactly the same character as we had with regard to federal and provincial franchises in this country; and it would have been well to look, first, at the method of settling this question in the United States, and secondly, to the result of that settlement, as shown by their 100 years' experience. In that Constitutional Convention there were such men as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, Edmund Randolph, Robert Morris, and James Madison. I would not claim that these men were superior to the men who framed our franchise law—the right hon. the leader of the Government, the hon. Minister of Customs, the hon. Minister of Militia, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue; perhaps these men are superior to those fathers of the American Republic, but if they are, they would have acted wisely to have taken the lesson of experience which that country could give in regard to this matter. Now, what were the features of the franchises in the United States which that Constitutional Convention grappled with? What were the plans proposed before that convention and discussed by them? Was there more than one plan discussed, before the convention arrived at a conclusion? I answer, yes; they had this matter under consideration for several months, during which various plans were proposed and received ample consideration. There were four distinct plans before that convention with regard to the franchise. The first plan was that there should be federal control of the franchise, such as we have in this country by our Dominion Franchise Act, and that the United States should adopt a uniform franchise throughout all the states, irrespective of state franchises. That was the first proposition considered, and it was rejected. The next was that the State Legislatures should be allowed to elect the members of the House of Representatives, as they now do and always have done with reference to the members of the Senate. That plan was rejected. It was thought proper to allow the State Legislatures to appoint only the least numerous branch of the National Legislature and have the people elect the other. The next plan was that the state should, in each case, designate the mode of election of members of the House of representatives, and that plan was rejected; and the plan adopted, after ample discussion, was that the state franchise in each state should serve for United States purposes, the only proviso being that it should be the franchise in use in each state for the election of members to the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That is the broadest and most popular form of franchise in each State, and that plan was adopted in 1787. How has it worked, and how long has it been in operation? It has been in operation more than 100 years, and has worked without friction, and given general satisfaction. There never has been the least question raised, as to the wisdom of the settlement of that question, by the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and it is acknowledged on all hands now, that had the convention adopted any other mode, or any other one of the four plans I have mentioned, it would not have worked and a change would have been necessary. Why was this experience disregarded by our Government? Was it through ignorance? I do not think so. I think the Government were perfectly aware that this was the proper and judicious way of dealing with this question, and that the motive which influenced the Government was not to secure the best method, but to adopt a plan which would place in their hands an unfair political advantage. They had but a short time previous gerrymandered the ridings of Ontario, in a more or less corrupt manner, and they then proceeded to pass a franchise law, which would be more scandalous, corrupt and effective for the purpose of retaining power, as the hon. member from Montreal, the other day, said it succeeded in doing. I do not know that it is necessary for me to detain the House longer upon this question. There has not been in the history of any Anglo-Saxon community or commonwealth, since England has been a nation, an instance of as great an outrage upon popular rights as this very scandalous and infamous Franchise Bill. I characterise it as scandalous and infamous, and have always felt that it was so. There is only one thing in all the legislation of this country that makes my blood boil, that makes me thrill with indignation, and that is this piece of rascality, for rascality it is. It was conceived in rascality, it was designed to perpetrate a political fraud, and it has succeeded admirably in carrying out the mission the Government intended it to perform. When the time comes, as come it will, when this statute shall be dropped from our Statute-book, and we shall return to the common sense system of one set of voters' lists and machinery, and allow the Provinces to make their own lists, and our elections to be held on those lists, the whole people, with scarcely a solitary exception among the millions who inhabit this Dominion, will say, Amen.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not think that I would have said one word upon this subject but for the fact that the hon. member for North Norfolk has to-night, as on former occasions, characterised this Act as a scandalous piece of legislation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I hear my hon. friends opposite say "Hear, hear." I do not think it lies in the mouth of any hon. member of this House to characterise legislation within the competence of this Parliament, as scandalous legislation. It seems to me that the argument which these hon. gentlemen adduce, that we have no right to fix a franchise for ourselves in this Parliament, is one that is not capable of being successfully sustained. I quite agree with these hon. gentlemen that this Act is an expensive Act, that it entails considerable expense upon the country; but when these hon. gentlemen have offered that objection to the Act, unless they have some objection to the basis of the franchise fixed by it, they have offered the sole objection they can against it. Can it be contended for one moment that the rights of the Provinces are interfered with in the slightest degree by our exercising the privilege which the Act of Confederation confers upon this Parliament? Will it be pretended that the Local Legislatures of the Provinces should have the right to usurp the functions of this Parliament and to fix the basis of the franchise on which members to this Parliament shall be elected? Hon. gentlemen opposite have said a good deal about the convenience of having the voters' lists fixed by the municipalities, and they have said a good deal about the revising officers, although, I think, in listening to the discussion which took place upon this resolution since the debate began, almost every hon. gentleman opposite has declared that he has no fault to find with the officers appointed under this Act. With perhaps one or two exceptions, I have not heard hon. gentlemen complain of partisan conduct on the part of revising officers appointed under this Act; but it is declared that it would be much more convenient if the lists were made by the municipal officers, and more particularly has that argument been advanced by members from the Province of Ontario. Perhaps it would be more convenient, but we have no power to impose on the municipal officers of Ontario any duty with respect to the making of those lists under an Act of this Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I say we have no power to impose these duties upon municipal officers in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Does my hon. friend deny that proposition? Does he deny that we have not the power to compel the municipal officers to make the lists under an Act of our own? The municipal officers in the Province of Ontario make up the voters' lists under the Ontario franchise law, and they are compelled to do so by the legislation of that Province; but has this Parliament any power to compel those municipal officers to make up the lists under the Act now being discussed? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made a somewhat vigorous—I might characterise it as an almost vicious—attack upon the revising officers. He declared that they were the creatures of the Government, that they might do monstrous things under the provisions of this Act, that they could put upon the voters' list what names they choose, and keep off the list whomsoever they choose. Sir, this Act defines how they are to proceed in the exercise of their duty; it defines the mode in which they are to obtain the information as to those who are eligible to be placed upon the list. But not only that, the hon. member for North Norfolk declared that these revising officers were appointed to hold office during the pleasure of the Government. I do not so understand the clause of the Act which provides for their appointment, which reads as follows:—

“The Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint a proper person, to be called ‘the revising officer,’ for each or any of the electoral districts, who shall hold office during good behavior, but who shall be removable on address by the House of Commons, and whose duties shall be to revise and complete, in the manner herein-after provided, the lists of persons entitled to be registered as voters under the provisions of this Act in such electoral district or portion of an electoral district for which he is appointed.”

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for North Norfolk was reading from the Bill as originally introduced.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am reading from the Act as it stands upon the Statute-book, and that is what we have to deal with at the present time. This Act provides to my mind the most thorough means of dealing with those revising officers if guilty of any malfeasance of office. It declares how they are to get the information as to who should go and who should not go upon those lists, and the oath which revising officers are requested to take is an oath which no man would take who would not discharge his duties properly, or, if he did not discharge his duties properly, after taking the oath, he would be guilty of gross malfeasance of office, and would be subjected, no doubt, to the penalties provided in the section to which I have referred. If we are to admit the principle that this Parliament has the right to fix the basis of the franchise which will elect members to this Parliament, we have the right to create the machinery and appoint the officers who will make these lists. We have no power to compel the municipal officers to perform that service for us, and, not having that power, our duty is to appoint officers who are under the control of this Parliament and who can be punished if they do not discharge their duties properly. The cost of administering this Act seems to be the only argument which can be urged against it, and I hope, after what fell from the Secretary of State the other night, that the cost will be materially reduced in the future.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentlemen who have spoken in defence of this Bill have assumed that, if we adopt the list prepared by the different Provinces as the qualification for the election of members of this House, we are transferring to the Local Legislatures the power to legislate for us as to the franchise which should elect the members here. We adopted the provincial franchises of the different Provinces, and that system continued to govern the election of members of this House for seventeen years. By what process was that done? It was by an Act of this Parliament. We declared by an Act of this Parliament that we would make the qualification of the electors of members for this House the same as that for members of the Local Legislatures. The franchise was adopted not in virtue of the Act of the Local Legislature, but because of the Act of the Parliament of Canada, which declared what was the qualification of those who were entitled to elect members to this House. The hon. gentleman tells us that there is no objection to this measure except the single matter of expense. How comes the expense? Why should there be so much expense attached to the preparation of the voters' lists for the election of members to this House, more than in the preparation of the lists on which members of the Local Legislature are elected? It is simply because we have not the necessary machinery for the preparation of the lists. It is because those who prepare the provincial lists are the representatives of the people in the different municipalities. They are acquainted with the voters who put their names on the list in the first instances, and then there is an appeal from the parties who prepare that list to a county judge. At least, that is the rule in Ontario.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Is not the same basis adopted by the revising officer in forming the voters' lists as is adopted by the township clerk or the town clerk?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The term “revising officer” is a misnomer, because this official is the man who prepares the list in the first instance, besides revising it, and that is an altogether different function from that performed by the revising barrister in England, from which our system was professed to be copied. In the preparation of the provincial lists, the people who know the voters prepare the lists in the first instance. There is the township assessor, there is the court of revision, which is constituted of the council, and these prepare the list. All these parties are personally acquainted with the people who reside in that particular locality. The hon. gentleman says we have no power to name the municipal councillors to prepare the list in the first instance. I do not accept that statement. Why, who are the judges for the trial of controverted elections? We have designated the judges of the provincial courts, and by virtue of that designation, we have made them judges for the trial of controverted elections for the Dominion of Canada. In the same way, not conferring upon them any powers as members of a municipal council, we might designate as those who are to perform these duties the parties who are for the time being elected as municipal councillors in the various municipalities. The hon. gentleman has argued, as many other hon. gentlemen who have preceded him have argued, that because this is an independent Legislature, not deriving its existence from the Legislatures of the Provinces, we ought to have a voters' list entirely independent of the voters' lists in the various Provinces. In the United States, as my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has pointed out, the Constitution leaves no option to Congress, but declares that the basis for the election of members to the most numerous branch in the State Legislature shall be the qualification for the election of members to the House of Representatives. This was not in our constitution, but we declared the same thing by Act of Parliament, and for seventeen years that system prevailed here. Everyone admits that no abuse arose under it, that there was no complaint, and it was patent to everybody that it put those who were candidates to no expense in the preparation of lists, and in fact was entirely satisfactory. My first objection to the present system is that an interested party—the Government and those who support the Administration—are those who nominate and appoint the revising officers, who are not only revising officers, but who prepare the list in the first instance. That is not done in England. The revising officer there is appointed by the judge when he is on the spring circuit, and the overseers of the poor prepare the list in the first instance. The Government have no control either over the preparation of the list or the appointment of the revising barrister. There is that marked difference between our system and that which exists in the United Kingdom. There is an important feature of our constitution which the hon. gentleman has overlooked. The representation of the Provinces in this House is based upon population, not as between different electoral districts, but as between the Provinces. What does that imply? It implies that the representation in this House was to be a provincial representation. I had before me the provisions of the convention that were adopted by the Legislatures in the various Provinces, and in those articles that were framed by the Quebec convention it was expressly provided that the Provinces should determine not only the boundaries of the electoral districts for the election of members to this House, but the qualification of the voters who were to elect the members to this House. All this was changed in London, all this was changed after the representatives of the people had pronounced upon it. The change, it is true, has placed under the control of this Parliament the determination of the voters who are to elect members to this House, but that was not done by the representatives of the people of the various Provinces. Let me call the attention of the House to the articles of Confederation as they were prepared. This was done after very careful consideration, and among those who prepared these articles of Confederation were certain members of the Government of the day, who certainly did not suppose that they were doing any violence to the federal system in conferring upon Provinces the power to determine the boundaries of the electoral districts for the election of members to the House of Commons, and the qualification of those who were to return those members. Why was it intended, in the first instance, to put the whole matter under the control of the Provincial Legislatures? It was because the representation was a representation from the Provinces and for the Provinces, and as between the Provinces the representation was to be based on population. Now, Article 17 reads as follows:—

"The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population as determined by the official census every ten years; Upper Canada having 82, Lower Canada, 65."

And so on. Then the next Article is:

"Until the official census of 1871 has been made up there shall be no change in the number of representatives from the several sections."

And so on. Article 19:

"Immediately after the completion of the census of 1871, and immediately after every decennial census thereafter, the representations from each section of the House of Commons shall be readjusted on the basis of population."

Readjusted by whom? Readjusted by this Legislature? Not at all, readjusted by the Legislatures of the different Provinces in accordance with the census that were obtained. Article 20:

"For the purpose of such readjustment Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members, and each of the other sections shall, at each readjustment, receive for the ten years then next, succeeding the number of members to which it will be entitled on the same ratio of representation to population."

Article 21:

"No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any section, unless its population shall have decreased, relatively to the population of the whole Union, to the extent of 5 per centum."

Article 22:

"In computing at each decennial period the number of members to which each section is entitled, no fractional parts shall be considered."

And so on. Article 23:

"The Legislature of each Province shall divide such Province into the proper number of constituencies, and define the boundaries of each of them."

That is the provision—that the Legislature of each Province shall do this when the census was taken. And yet hon. gentlemen who assisted in framing this federal system, and who subsequently arranged it in London in this respect, have now seriously argued that it would not be a federal system if such a system was carried into effect. Every one will see that the whole theory of giving to each Province representation in proportion to population, as against every other Province, supposes that the representation was to be a provincial representation. More than that, our condition is not the same. What do we find in our Electoral Franchise Act? We find provisions giving fishermen qualifications upon the ownership of nets, upon the ownership of boats. You have special qualifications. Do these apply to the people all over this Dominion? Every one knows that they do not, and we, from Ontario, are no proper judges of the qualifications of the people of other Provinces in this particular, who, themselves are best qualified to speak on this matter, and for themselves. Why, Sir, if we were to divide ourselves up into Provinces and each section sit by itself, it might be that we would determine the question as well as they would in the Provincial Legislatures. But I say that it is for the Province of Nova Scotia to determine, it is for the representatives of Nova Scotia to say what shall be the qualification of the electors of that Province, for the purpose of returning the members that it is entitled to send here as a part of this Federal Parliament. That was the intention, that was the arrangement made. It is true that we have had our Constitution changed in this particular by the Convention that sat in London after the Legislatures had adopted those articles of Confederation here; but it did not take away from this House the power of saying, as it may properly say, that the qualifications for the election of members for the House of Commons shall be the same as the qualification of members to the Local Legislature. The same people return members to both Houses. Both insist upon the theory, as all representative governments insist upon the theory, that the people are fit for self-government, and if they are fit for self-government they are as well qualified to sit in their representative capacity in the Local Legislature, to say what shall be the qualification of an elector for the election of a member, either to the House of Commons to represent the Province, or the election of a member to the Local Legislature to represent a Province, as the representatives of a Province can be in this House. It is perfectly plain that so far as the principle of our Constitution is concerned, there is no violation of that principle in providing that provincial lists shall be the lists upon which the election shall take place. If that be so, the whole question is one of convenience. It is a question whether it is more convenient for the Government or for some one else to name a revising officer, or an officer to prepare the voters' lists wholly independent of the local authorities, or whether it is more convenient that the lists should be in the hands of the local authorities, that they should prepare it in the first instance, and that there should be an appeal from the lists so prepared to the county judge. In my opinion, there can be no question about this point. Every one knows that for eighteen years we were without expense and without inconvenience; and when the Secretary of State referred to the expense, a few evenings ago, of the preparation of the voters' lists, he left out what is by far the most vexatious portion of the whole proceedings, and that is the supervision, the care that is required on the part of candidates and active party men in the various portions of the constituency, in order to prevent the lists being grossly unfair or extremely imperfect.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That was done before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I venture to say that if you were to leave the preparation of the voters' lists in the various electoral districts wholly to the returning officer, you would have a list from which a large proportion of those who are entitled to go upon it, would be left off. How is it now with regard to the local lists? These lists are made up by the men who are brought in contact with the people every day, who personally know them, and who are capable of preparing a list without needing to be specially looked after or specially aided. An expenditure of over $400,000 was incurred in printing the first list. That is a very small portion of the expense. It does not take into consideration the expense which the candidate is obliged to bear in seeing that no name is omitted from the list; it does not include the expense which some rival candidate of the opposite party is obliged to incur in the preparation of the list. All these are matters of very serious expense, and unless there is constant attention there will be an imperfect voters' list. There is no comparison between the condition of things that would exist under the local arrangement, if there was no special supervision, and under the list that would be prepared under this Act if there was no special supervision. When we look at the question of convenience and the question of expense, we will see there is everything in favor of the provincial list and everything against the list which is now on the Statute-book.

Mr. FOSTER. If the House will pardon me, I will offer an observation or two before this debate closes, not, however, because I think that the Act as it stands on the Statute-book needs any fresh defence from this side of the House, taking into consideration what has been urged from the other side during the continuance of the present debate, because I find on noting down what has been the line of observation, and what have been the reasons advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have not attacked the principles of the Bill as it at present stands on the Statute-book. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has taken antecedent discussions, which arose before the British North America Act was framed, and he has told us what our constitution should be, and that the franchise under those antecedent discussions should have been left to the different Provinces. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) could not find in the Act, as it at present stands, sufficient ground on which to found his complaints, and he commenced to discuss a Bill which does not appear in the form of an Act of the Statute-book of to-day. He discussed what he termed the objectionable features of a draft of the Bill which was submitted to the House in 1885. One thing that must be remarked by those who have followed the present discussion, is the lack of argument against the principle of the Act as it appears on the Statute-book. This remark, I think, may be made: to what does this discussion tend? In 1885 a Bill was introduced into this House for the regulation of the Dominion franchise. It was discussed with all the ability possessed by the Opposition at that time, which is largely the Opposition of to-day; every feature of the Bill was discussed, and discussed most exhaustively. At the end of the discussion the House passed upon it, and by an overwhelming majority approved of the principle of the Bill; they went to work to perfect the details, and it was placed on the Statute-book. This was the first victory for the principle of the Bill. The Opposition at that time stated that, although they were in numerical inferiority in the House, there was the intelligent electorate to whom they could appeal, and that just so soon as their arguments in the House got before the people and were reiterated upon the hustings, the people would be found to condemn the Bill. Those arguments went forth. The arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite were spread upon the pages of Hansard, were published in the newspapers, and, afterwards, as an hon. gentleman has stated, were reiterated from every hustings in the Dominion when the general elections came round. In spite of all the arguments which could be used, and the presentation to the people of what was stated to be the infamous features of the Bill, the election of 1887 returned the very same party to power which had introduced this Bill and made it law. And the people did more than that? They returned almost identically the same members who had voted for the Bill, hon. gentlemen who met the discussion in the country and came out triumphantly on that as on other issues. That was the second victory for this Act. Year after year at the bye-elections this cry has been used for all it was worth in the different constituencies, and we have had confirmation after confirmation of the party and the supporters of the party who were instrumental in introducing the Act and placing it on the Statute-book. Now five years after the Act was placed on the Statute-book and the principle affirmed by the House, and the principle adopted by the electorate and the Act affirmed by them by overwhelming majorities, we find this Session that day after day has been employed in a vain discussion of a Bill, the principle of which has been as thoroughly sifted as has the principle of any law now on the Statute-book of Canada. To what does this tend? It is a principle of parliamentary constitutional government, and a principle of practical guidance for the despatch of business in Parliament—although it is perfectly within the right of hon. members to discuss any measure which has stood for years on the Statute-book and been reaffirmed year after year—that once you have had your fight and done all you can against or for the principle of a Bill, and the question has gone to the country and has been affirmed there, we had better, as a matter of practical parliamentary business, bow to the decision of the majority in Parliament and the majority in the country. There is no proposition made to perfect the defects in the Bill introduced this Session. It is a long and vapid discussion on what hon. gentlemen are pleased to call the infamous characteristics of this Bill, in which a great many harsh expressions have been used and in which in my humble opinion very few arguments have been employed. The main argument used is of two kinds. One has been alluded to by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White), who characterized it the argument of expense. That is the chief argument which I think is valid to-day, and I think that largely depends upon this: Is this Bill necessary, is it expedient, is it a proper principle for the guidance of a Federal Parliament which seeks to keep its autonomy and independence, that it should regulate its own franchise? If that is expedient, and necessary, and right, then we have to face the question of expense, whatever it may be, and unite to make the expense as reasonable as possible, in order to effect what we consider to be the greater object. It seems to me, although I am not a constitutional lawyer or a lawyer at all, that, leaving aside all antecedent discussions and all reasons which have been urged as to what ought to have been or might have been, it was contemplated by the framers of the British North America Act, and it was embodied in the Act, to give to this Parliament power to regulate its own franchise; and that the Provincial Governments should have the arrangement of their own franchises, and so long as we keep from dealing with the franchises of the Provincial Governments, we would not be interfering with them, and so long as they keep from dealing with the franchise of the Dominion Parliament they would not be interfering with us. The British North America Act says:

“Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all the laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following matters or any of them, namely,—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly, or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the several Provinces.”

There was given to the Federal Parliament the power to arrange its own electoral districts, the power to take charge of all these things which are mentioned in section 41, and, for the time being, for convenience sake, it was agreed to adopt certain arrangements which existed, and decided that these should be followed, until the Parliament of Canada should be pleased to make such other provisions as they wished upon any of these questions. With reference to all the matters which are noted in section 41, from Confederation up to the present, I find that the Dominion Parliament has legislated upon every one of them, and the last one that it took under consideration was the one which was the most important of all. In 1885 the Federal Parliament took up this fundamental question, and put it in line with its legislation upon the other subjects which, under that section of the Act, was granted to it to legislate upon. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no question at all of interference with provincial rights, when this Parliament takes upon itself to say what shall be its own franchise, and to regulate it according to its own wishes and desires. My hon. friend says that this is an unpopular measure. I ask him where he finds the evidence of that unpopularity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Among the members who support the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it because, that since 1885, after six or eight weeks of talk, there is continually coming back to these hon. gentlemen the echoes of their own words and that they translate these echoes into an evidence of the unpopularity of the Act? Is it that when they put before this Parliament, and before the public on the hustings in 1887, the iniquities—as they were pleased to style them—of this Act, the people rose in a mass and hurled into political oblivion the men who had been instrumental in placing this Act upon the Statute-book, and placed the opponents of the measure in positions of power and honor? It is not so. Has there been a single voice on the Conservative side of the House during this discussion raised in opposition to this measure, or to denominate it as unpopular? No. You may take the discussion of the press, and the other public discussion outside of this House, and which is very little indeed, and you will find no evidence of the unpopularity of the measure, other than that which exists in the minds of men who in 1885 determined to burk its passage by obstructive methods, and who, having failed in that, are determined to keep up this wearisome and unprofitable discussion year after year in this Parliament. Well, Sir, some good things have followed from the enactment of this law. Since this Bill, which widened the franchise immensely in many portions of the Dominion of Canada, became law, and since thousands of young men, and thousands of laboring men who had not the franchise before, came into possession of it, the power of example has been such that there is scarcely a Provincial Legislature which has not almost immediately patterned after this Act, and gone one better than this Act, and widened their provincial franchise as a result of the liberal franchise which was given to the people of this Dominion when the Act at present under discussion was put on the Statute-book. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with that ready force of language which he can use, brought a charge against the Government of having, in their present arrangement of printing the voters' lists under Government supervision, in a Government bureau, manipulated the lists.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of being able to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. If his language meant anything, it meant that the Government by printing the lists in the bureau here had the power to exercise, and was disposed to exercise, the manipulation of the lists to their own advantage.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; my assertion was that the Government had power to do so.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). What did that imply?

Mr. FOSTER. If there were any use in bringing such a statement as that into the argument, the only use that could be present in the hon. gentleman's mind was an insinuation that the Government did do such a thing, or were prepared to do such a thing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is an evidence they ought not to have that power.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman did not make that insinuation it was a useless argument, and he is not a gentleman who would waste his own time, or the time of the House, in presenting an argument which had no point in it. I think this is a statement which the hon. gentleman should have well weighed before he made it on the floor of Parliament. It is not a light thing to charge a political party, or a Government by a political party, with an act, or the intention to do an act of that kind; and a public man of the standing of my hon. friend, with ambitions such as he has, with the breadth and scope of thoughtful reasoning which my hon. friend so often shows in this House, should not make a statement of that kind, which even in the way of insinuation would go to reflect upon a political party in this country, unless he had the very best ground for making such an assertion, and then it should be made not as an insinuation but as a direct charge sustained by proof. There is not only no foundation for the charge—my hon. friend does not believe it himself—but there is no possibility of such a thing being done. There is no necessity for me to enter into the modus operandi by which these names on the voters' lists are got from the revising officer, and the shape in which they are necessary to be put before the sheriff, or the returning officer, at an election. That is all laid down in the Act; and the modus operandi, as worked out, gives no power to the Government to manipulate the lists. The list, as it ultimately appears, and as ready for use, is a list which comes from under the signature of the revising officer, who is a sworn officer, a responsible officer, and, I believe, an honest officer. It has also been said by my hon. friend that the Act was kept upon the Statute-book because it would keep the present party in power. That implies that the Act is dishonestly administered. The Act itself provides for the revision of the lists under the public gaze, and under public supervision, and the public have access to the court of revision which is presided over by a judge or a revising officer who has a legal experience of at least five years and who is a responsible and sworn officer. I do not think it lies within the power of my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman to say that the revising officers of this country, during the five years that they have had the working of this Act in charge, have, in any instance, prostituted their position, or prostituted the power which they have under the Act, in a dishonest and illegal way to perpetuate in power the party under whose Government they have obtained their appointment. There is nothing about which people would be so sensitive as the taking away of franchise rights which are authorized to them by the law, and which are considered the very foundation of stable and good government in this country; and it is not possible for a revising officer to unfairly use the power given to him by the Act without arousing a storm of public disapproval about his ears which would very soon find its echo in this Parliament; and yet from 1885 to the present time not one hon. gentleman has stood up on either side of this House and made charges of maladministration against a revising officer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) made a statement to-night.

Mr. FOSTER. Unhappily I am not a Frenchman, and I found it difficult to understand my hon. friend, who speaks very rapidly, so that I am without the information he gave in making the statement which I do. However, what I was going on to say was that there is not a particle of evidence to be derived from the country at large; and I believe that it has been stated over and over again, and that it is the common opinion of the men about these boards that the revising officers have faithfully and honestly done their work, and done it quite as well as any set of revising officers under provincial jurisdiction or municipal law would do it, or are doing it to-day.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. Minister of Finance, in replying to hon. gentlemen who had spoken on this side to-night, has characterised the discussion as empty, vain, and vapid. No doubt the hon. gentleman would infinitely prefer that there should be no discussion on this subject. I can easily understand that he and his friends would like all discussion on this Franchise Act to be avoided, because every discussion that takes place in this House goes to prove the object with which this Bill was originally introduced into Parliament, namely, to perpetuate the present Government in power. The hon. gentleman says that the principle of this Bill having been once affirmed and recognised, it is useless for us to discuss it from year to year. Sir, if I understand the question aright the present Act is not the one which the Government proposed to this House in the first instance. The Act now under discussion, though still possessing a great many very improper clauses, and taking away the liberty of the people of this country and placing it in the hands of revising barristers, is not the Bill which the Government originally submitted to this House; and I have always thought that the members of the Opposition committed a grave mistake on that occasion in not allowing the original Bill to pass in all its deformity, so that the country might have realised to the fullest extent its character; because the people would not very long have permitted such a measure to remain on the Statute-book. But, in the exercise of their judgment, and, as they thought, in the interest of the people at large, the Opposition opposed it clause by clause, and were largely instrumental in moulding and fashioning it and stripping it of many of its absurdities and enormities. But no matter what changes were made or can be made in that measure, it can never be made an Act which the people of this country will be willing to accept; and if the hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Government were free agents, this Bill would be swept off the Statute-book by an immense majority. Hon. members opposite, publicly and privately, over and over again, on the hustings before their constituents and in their intercourse with members on this side of the House, have denounced that measure in as strong terms as any members on this side; and if they were permitted—I use the word advisedly—to exercise their independent judgment in this matter and vote as they liked, that Bill would be swept from the Statute-Book to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I know that there are many high-minded and honorable men on that side of the House, and I can sympathise with them at the loss of self-respect which they must feel at sitting there and listening to the dictation of the Government which compels them to support a measure which they condemn in their hearts. The Minister of Finance says that there never has been a cause of complaint against the revising barristers. Surely the hon. gentleman must have a very short memory, or he must remember that when this Parliament first met, member after member rose in his seat and complained of the difficulties under which he labored in consequence of the partiality of the revising barrister in his district. I suffered to a considerable extent—I will not say that it was corruptly done, but it was carelessly and indifferently done; for I found, as a result of an examination of the county, that in the different districts five or ten, and sometimes fifteen or twenty, electors who supported the views of this side of the House were left off the lists; and we remember that many hon. members on this side of the House drew the attention of the Government to similar events in their own constituencies. Therefore the hon. Minister of Finance cannot consistently make the boast that he makes to-night, that there were not causes of complaint against the revising barristers. What did we see in Prince Edward Island the other day? We saw a revising barrister who had accepted the notices of some two or three hundred people that they were not residing in the district where their names appeared on the electoral list, and when the court was held and these people came before it to prove that they were electors in other districts in the same county, the revising barrister struck their names off and would not take their evidence as to that fact. That was a high-handed act. The case was not so bad in my own county, where the revising barrister—I will give him the credit of saying—took every precaution to transfer a voter from one district to another when his name was on the list. These circumstances go to prove that the revising barristers in all cases have not acted in the high-minded and honorable manner which the hon. Minister of Finance has claimed. The hon. gentleman said that this Parliament undoubtedly possessed the right of regulating the mode of elections in the various Provinces and the franchise. Well, we do not dispute that. But allow me to refer him to the action of the Government which was led by Mr. Mackenzie. In 1874, that Government divested themselves of all authority in this matter, by passing an Act transferring to each Province the right to regulate it. In that Bill, did they take power to appoint revising barristers? Did they take power to secure a correct revision of the lists in their own interests? Did they make any arrangement or provision whereby their own friends should have the power of revising these lists? No; on the contrary, they declared, in that Act, that the returning officers should be the registrars and the sheriffs of the various electoral districts where elections would be held. These sheriffs and registrars were, in a great many cases, the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite; and a very large proportion of the sheriffs and registrars in Nova Scotia at that time held views in sympathy with my hon. friends. But a Liberal Administration placed this matter entirely in the hands of those officers of the Government of Nova Scotia, irrespective of their political creed. That was a very different mode of settling this question, from the one pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite. It showed that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie desired to gain no party advantage, and utilised the officers of the Local Government, knowing their ability to discharge those high functions; and in that they showed a high-minded purpose which hon. gentlemen opposite would do very well to follow. The Franchise Act was introduced by this Government with two objects in view, as they declared. The first object was said to give a broader franchise. It was contended at the time that the franchise in the Provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were not as liberal as the Act contemplated they should be. It was also stated that the other object was to secure uniformity. Well, since the passage of that Act, if it had any raison d'être on the ground of broadening the franchise, that ground has disappeared. The Province of Ontario have since adopted universal suffrage, which goes far beyond the Act now under discussion. The Province of Nova Scotia have widened their franchise; they have made their franchise income $250, instead of $300; they have given to the fishermen and farmers a broader franchise than they have under the present Act. In New Brunswick they have almost universal suffrage. So as regards the argument that the present Act gives a more liberal franchise than those of the various Provinces, that falls completely to the ground, because the franchises of the various Provinces are much more liberal than the Act now before the House. Again, the Act was intended to secure uniformity. It was recommended on the ground that it was necessary to have a uniform franchise for the election of members to this House, and what do we find the Government did? One of the first clauses in the Bill was to create a different franchise for Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, where the Government found their Bill would create difficulty. They were advised by their own political friends that if they ventured to force this law on Prince Edward Island it would work against them, and they, therefore, violated that principle of uniformity, which was given as a chief reason for the support of the Act. In British Columbia it was violated for the same reason. Therefore, both the grounds on which the Act was recommended have been departed from, and the Government stand to-day driven to the last resort of defending the Act as it stands, in the interest of nothing else but the Tory party of this country. Under this Act, the Government by means of the manipulations which they can make of the lists, through their revising barristers, and through the trouble and inconvenience it creates, the Government have the advantage. One hon. gentleman said in public that it served the Government a good purpose before and will again. Take the unfairness of this Act as applied to instances in my own county. Under the system in Nova Scotia, every electoral district under our Municipal Act makes the electoral list. Now, the lists are made up by men who know all the surroundings and the people in that district, and, therefore, no trouble ever arises. These municipal councils are composed of Liberals and Conservatives. In some cases there may be a majority of Liberals, and in others Conservatives; but we have heard no complaints, and the Act always worked well. There was never any desire on the part of the people to keep any names off the electoral list, and, on the whole, the working of the Act was inexpensive and satisfactory. But under the present system these men have to come a long distance; they have to send in their applications a long time in advance to be placed on the list. All this work has to be got through by agents, and, then, when the lists are made up for final revision, the revising barrister holds his court. In places such as Muskoka, which extends 400 or 500 miles one way, and 600 or 700 miles the other way, how would it be possible for the electors there to meet the revising barrister, and have their names placed on the list? In my county, as elsewhere, the revising barrister has the power of holding courts in such places as he deems necessary under the circumstances. I do not mean to say that, in the exercise of that judgment, he acted unfairly, but he grouped together two or three or three or four electoral districts along our shores, from one end to the other, running east, from thence about 100 miles running up into the country some 30 or 40 miles. Well, it was utterly impossible that these numerous electors grouped together through three or four districts could attend his court, because our fishermen along the shores have not the means of transit. We have no railway, and they would have to go a distance of 30 or 40 miles to attend the court. In the cities, of course, that objection would not apply so much, but will any hon. gentleman contend for a moment that in a sparsely settled district, such as the one I have referred to, it could be expected that these various people, scattered all over these 30 or 40 miles, should go that distance to the revising officer's court in order to have their names put on the lists? They simply will not do it, and a very considerable portion of the electors in the rural districts are disfranchised. In the operation of our own system, where it was confined to a smaller limit, these men would be placed on naturally by those who knew them. They would be placed there by those who knew them and saw them every day and were familiar with their daily walks and avocations; but now a revising barrister who is unknown to them may go down there and find, as the revising officer did find, that these men could not, and would not, and did not, come that distance to have their names put upon the list. In that respect the Act has worked most unfairly. The whole Act has in many cases worked to such great disadvantage in the county which I represent, that I speak very strongly about it, and no Act such as this can ever be made satisfactory. We want an Act under which the people can qualify without all this trouble and annoyance. I am not now referring to the expense of the Act; but every hon. member on the other side of the House must know, as well as we do, the inconvenience and expense to which he is personally subjected. He knows very well that, in a large constituency, he is naturally looked to to interest people in having the electoral lists completed. Hon. gentlemen know, and have felt, and have mentioned, over and over again, the expense and annoyance to which they have been put in order to have these lists completed, because the electors will not come out unless they are looked after, and that involves delay, and trouble, and expense. I have no doubt, taking all the members in this House, that, from $400 to $500, would not be too large an estimate to put for the average expense and loss of time involved in completing these lists. Under these circumstances, I ask what is to be gained by keeping this Act upon the Statute-book? We have now a machinery which has always proved satisfactory, and, if we have a machinery which is provided for by local legislation, why should we not accept it instead of this cumbersome and expensive machinery provided for in this Act. The Secretary of State has stated one reason for not having revised the lists more frequently, and that was the expense. That is a very good reason for repealing the Act. Up to the beginning of this year, we know that all the bye-elections have been run—at least in Nova Scotia—on the lists which were made in 1885. Could it be supposed in any country enjoying the blessings of self-government that any Administration would dare to take upon themselves the control of the electoral lists for four years, and, consequently, not allow those people who should be qualified, either by purchase or by coming of age, or by moving into the district, or in any other way, to go on the electoral list? What would be the state of opinion in England in regard to such a matter? We copy as much as we can from English practice and precedent in this House and out of it. Suppose the present Government or the late Government in England were to decide that no revision of the voters' list should take place for four years, and that the elections of to-day should be run on the lists of four years ago, there would be such a storm of indignation from one end of the country to the other that would hurl any Government from power. In England they have a strong public opinion, they have a highly intelligent and cultivated public opinion, and they would not dare to take the liberty with the electorate there which this Government are taking with the people of Canada. It is an unfortunate sign of the times and shows that we are not advancing in the sense of independence of the Government, or improving our position, but it shows that the people are satisfied to be governed by the Government of the day regardless of the principles upon which they are governed. That is a very unfortunate sign of the decline of public opinion and independence in this country. These reasons are sufficiently strong for us on this side of the House—no matter what hon. gentlemen may do on the other side—to continue the agitation, not only this Session but every Session, and, although the Minister of Finance may say this is vain, and vapid, and a waste of time, we shall discuss the question whenever this House meets, and shall endeavor to place before the people of the country the enormous and unnecessary cost to which they are subjected. We hope, ultimately, to convince them, even if hon. members of this House have not the independence to act for themselves, that this Act should be repealed, and that we should save the money now expended upon it.

Mr. HAGGART. I desire to make a few remarks in answer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. member for Bothwell stated that, in the preparation of the British North America Act, the delegates agreed that the franchise should be fixed by the Provinces themselves, as well as the divisions of the constituencies, and he stated that was the form in vogue in the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say anything about the United States in that connection.

Mr. HAGGART. You quoted the example of the United States, but, perhaps, not to that extent. I think it must have struck every hon. gentleman in the House, that the result of that would be that whatever the political complexion of the different Provinces might be, if they had the fixing of the electoral districts, as well as the franchise, the representatives who would be sent would be in accordance with their political views. The member for Norfolk said we ought to adopt the principle of the United States, that the parties who should vote for the election of members to this House should be those who had a right to vote for the most numerous body in a Provincial Legislature. That means that the Provincial Government should fix the franchise for this House. In the United States it is no such thing. It is true that the Constitution of the United States provides that the electorate for Congress shall be the same as that for the most populous branch of the State Legislature, but the time and manner of the election, the electoral districts, whether the vote is to be by districts, or by other divisions, is fixed by Congress. The power is vested in the Central Government, and one of the anomalies and one of the faults found by all the writers on the Constitution of the United States is that the fixing of the franchise for the House of Representatives is left to the different States instead of being vested in Congress itself. Let me quote to you some authorities on the matter, and afterwards, I think, we will hear no more of adopting any system similar to that in the United States, which is complained of as one of the blots on the Constitution of the United States:

"Thus Congress may prescribe the day and month for holding the election, and make them the same throughout the country, with the limitation that the election must be once in two years. Congress may also prescribe whether the choice shall be by single districts, or by a general vote in each state; and may, no doubt, divide the states into congressional districts."

In every state of the Union, as stated by the hon. member for Norfolk, they have a different qualification. In some they have manhood suffrage with different terms of residence; in one or two, I think, they have a slight property qualification; in a great many a man must be 21 years of age to have a right to vote; in five or six states, I think, a man must be 25 years of age to have a right of voting for members of the House of Representatives. Now, let me quote an authority on this question, in reference to the qualification of the electorate being in the hands of the states, and it shows clearly, I think, that it is an anomaly, that it is an absurdity, and the writer proposes different means for the purpose of getting rid of it.

Mr. TROW. Will the hon. gentleman name one state that has a property qualification?

Mr. HAGGART. I think there are one or two.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Massachusetts has a property qualification.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. member for North Norfolk read the names of several states in which some property qualification was required when their constitution was formed.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is all changed since then.

Mr. HAGGART. I will read what this author says:

"It is certainly, however, an anomaly that the general Government of the United States should have no control over its choice of its own delegates in Congress; that it should be powerless to define the qualifications of congressional electors. It must be conceded that this is a defect in our organic law which needs amendment; it was an unnecessary and unfortunate concession to the theory of state sovereignty and independence. One code of rules should certainly prevail throughout the country to regulate the choice of representatives, and this should be the work of Congress, or of the people in its sovereign capacity. The nation should dictate in the selection of its own legislators. The integrity of the separate states is sufficiently guarded by allowing to each an equal voice in the Senate, and by permitting them to appoint Senators, and to control the selection of Presidential electors; the more national branch of Congress, that which comes directly from the people, should be entirely under the management of the one body politic which is represented in the general government.

Mr. CHARLTON. What are you reading from?

Mr. HAGGART. I am reading from "An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States, by John Norton Pomeroy, LL.D., Author of 'Lecture on International Law in time of peace,' Ninth edition, Revised and Enlarged by Edmond H. Bennett, LL.D., Dean of the Boston University Law School." Nearly every authority will state the same thing, if the hon. gentleman will look them up. Now, the only objection which remains to be answered is the one of expense. We have a right under the British North America Act to fix our own franchise and it is our duty to do so. We have done so, and I have never heard an argument from hon. gentlemen opposite, or a suggestion, of any manner by which it could be done more cheaply, unless we adopted the franchise of the different Provinces, a principle which is condemned by every writer in the United States.

Mr. SEMPLE. Although I am not a lawyer, I have given this subject considerable attention. The Minister of Finance seems to be of the opinion that too much attention was given to this question, and he seems to take it for granted that we should continue as we are. But I apprehend that it is the duty of this House to rectify evils when they exist. I can assure my hon. friend that he will hear of this Act in this House, and in the country, and in every other place, until both the Franchise Act and the Gerrymander Act are abolished. Since the Gerrymander Act came into force equal rights have departed from this Dominion. We do not enjoy equal rights at the present time. The Gerrymander Act enables a minority of the electors to elect a majority of the members. I listened the other evening to the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Cargill) whom I respect very much. He said that Bruce was two to one Conservative. But if he had taken the pains to look up the votes that were given he would find that if Bruce had elected three representatives, without the aid of the Gerrymander Act, it would have sent three Reformers here with 900 of a majority. So you see from this one instance that a minority of the electors can return a majority of the members. It was considered before the Franchise Act came into operation that the National Policy and the Gerrymander Act were not enough to ensure the return of the Government, and so they invented the Franchise Act. That Act was brought into existence after full consideration of its importance to the Government. The Minister of Public Works has said that on this side of the House we ought to be well satisfied with the Act. Perhaps they have reason to be satisfied. I know that in my county, before the election of 1887, the Liberal Conservatives of that riding, who were in the secrets of the party, were saying that they had made a gain of two or three hundred votes. The hon. member for Perth has made the assertion. The same was done in the electoral district he represents. I do not accuse the revising barristers of injustice; so far as I have seen, they desire to do justice. But this is a cumbersome Act, hard to be understood. A great many difficulties present themselves, and people who were accustomed to using the local lists had a good deal of trouble with the present Franchise Act. That was the cause of the gain in the past, but I fancy that when the Act is better understood there will not be so much gain in the future. The judges, I am sure, whatever may have been their predilections in the past, are determined to do justice as long as the case is presented properly before them. Now 200 votes was a large gain to make in one electoral district by the stuffing of the voters' lists. I am aware that there were five Ministers of the Crown, and all their majorities put together did not amount to 200; so that a very little gain in the different ridings explains the reason why these hon. gentlemen are here to-day. I have often heard it stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that they were returned by reason of the National Policy. They want to make it appear that this was the great issue before the country. I know they made a gain in the towns and cities, through the National Policy, but they made no gain in the country. If you stated to the most pronounced Liberal Conservative in the country that his party had made a gain through the National Policy or that it was a benefit to the country, he would think you were making a false statement or only talking for fun. They have made their gain through the Franchise Act, the Gerrymander Act and a liberal distribution of funds. Although this Act is only evil and that continually, still I suppose there can be some amendment made to it. To show it is unjust I may mention when the final revision is made, and the tenant cannot be placed on the list unless he has resided there and paid a year's rent, while those who qualify on income can be placed on the list if they have been residents in the country only one year. So if a tenant employs two or three men, they will have a vote and he will not have a vote. The tenant requires to be a resident of the electoral district for a year, but those who qualify on income only require to be resident in the country for a year. This is unfair and unjust. The Act is also very unjust in that certain persons not being residents on the 1st of January, 1885, but became residents shortly afterwards found when the elections were held in 1889 that they had not votes. When the Canada Temperance Act was voted on in different parts of the country in 1888 the names of a large number of people who ought to have votes were not on the lists, such as Methodist ministers, high school teachers, and other teachers who had been in the locality only for a short time. This intelligent and moral class of the community are deprived of their just rights through the operation of this partial and unjust Act. But their rights would be given by using the Provincial voters' lists. It has been stated that some of the Provinces have borrowed legislative features from the Dominion Franchise Act. That is not the case with regard to Ontario, at all events. The income franchise was a portion of the Ontario law, and when the Dominion Government incorporated it in their measure they placed the amount at $400 a year, and it was only by the persistent efforts of the Opposition that the amount was reduced so that a workingman earning $300 a year should have a vote. There was no greater display of patriotism shown in this House than was manifested when the Opposition members fought this distasteful measure night after night for over two months for the purpose of continuing to the country a pure voters' list and opposing an Act that was originated with the intention of stuffing the lists. I hope the First Minister will see his way to remove this measure from the Statute-book. The chief reasons why he maintains it are to give an exhibition of his power, and to retain the extensive patronage connected with it, costing the country for two revisions over $700,000. A printing bureau has been established, and a larger building will be demanded, then more men will be required to do the printing, and in various ways there will be an extension of the patronage of the Secretary of State. The lists as prepared in Ottawa may be right or wrong; at all events, judging from the past, we have very little reason to hope for anything good from the Government. We all remember the unjust action of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the Reform party, in regard to the gazetting of members, and although it might be imagined that he would be compelled to take a back seat, he was actually promoted and given a larger salary.
